Mr. Chevrier: Yes. At Moncton, Montreal and Goose a section of T.C.A. referred to as Arcan provides certain aircraft point to point communication for the Department of Transport. These services are a Canadian responsibility under ACAO, and for them we pay the amount mentioned.

Mr. Fulton: When these items are carried, and we appear to have voted $183,505 for travelling expenses, does that mean that if this amount is not spent on travelling expenses it can be used for any other general purposes within this particular item? In other words is the sum of $183,505 earmarked for travelling expenses only, so that if it is not used for that purpose it cannot be spent on anything else?

Mr. Chevrier: Naturally the answer I give must be the answer of an amateur, because this is a matter for the Department of Finance, which sets up the estimates. My understanding is that when $200,000 has been included for travelling expenses, let us say, it has not been voted for that specific purpose but for airways and airports, in which there is an item for travelling expenses. The entire vote is $4 million, let us say, of which $200,000 is for travelling expenses; and if the amount is not required it is not paid. This is not money that we are committed to spend. It is an estimate by the departmental officials of the amount required under this item, and if that amount is not required it simply will not be spent. Then next year there may be a decrease of $20,000 or $30,000, or an increase of $100,000. I do not think I can amplify that reply very much. If my hon. friend is a member of the public accounts committee he will remember that there it was explained that there can be a transfer of certain allotments. That would not apply in the case of travelling expenses from one vote to another, however, and I do not think it would apply here at all.

Mr. Fulton: I understand, then, that what is actually happening is that the minister is asking for $4,489,730 under this item, and in order to explain to the committee why he needs that amount of money this breakdown is furnished.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: Then I think it becomes important in each case to ask how much was actually spent on travelling expenses last year, let us say, so that we can get an idea whether the amount being asked this year bears a relationship to what was required last year, or whether we would be justified in suggesting a reduction.

Mr. Chevrier: The travelling expenses under this vote last year amounted to $169,180.

Mr. Fulton: That is what was asked for; that was the estimate. I am wondering how much was actually spent during the fiscal year.

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid it would take some time to get that information. The figures are available, and if my hon. friend wants the amount spent last year under each head perhaps I could get that information for him while we discuss something else.

Mr. Fulton: I do not want to press the point unduly, but the three things in which I have been particularly interested are travelling expenses, sundries and publicity. There is not very much for publicity in the minister's department.

Mr. Chevrier: There is nothing at all.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, yes, there is. The minister has an information office for which he is asking $3,780 this year.

Mr. Chevrier: I think of all the ministers I am the one who should be complimented on the absence of expenditures for publicity.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If you have only $3,780 you are a piker.

Mr. Chevrier: I certainly am.

Mr. Fulton: The minister does not have very much in the way of publicity if he is only asking for $3,780, but I am interested in these items for travelling expenses and sundries. Perhaps other members are interested in other items, but I would be glad if we could be told in each case how much was actually spent by the various branches in the fiscal year just concluded.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall get that information for the hon. member, what was spent under those two headings of travelling expenses and sundries during the last fiscal year.

Mr. Knowles: On the point that was just discussed by the member for Kamloops, may I confirm what was said by him, and by the minister as well, by a brief quotation from the now famous memorandum presented to us by the Auditor General. It states that the estimates presented to the House of Commons are supported by details. When an estimate is called members may elicit further information from the minister. "However," and I quote, "these details do not form part of the Appropriation Act, and therefore are not binding on the executive." In other words, as the minister has admitted, when we now pass a vote for $4,489,730, it can be spent by his department for any purposes related to radio aviation services. The details which we have been given on page 301 are just for our information, and the department is under no obligation to keep its travelling expenses down to $183,505, if it can save money on some other item to be used for travelling.

In fairness to the government, I believe it would be a good idea if we did some spot checking, such as the member for Kamloops is suggesting right now, and without warning we were to ask for items such as these just to see whether the department is following, with some degree of approximation, the details given in the back of the book. I would be glad if at some stage today the minister would answer the question asked by the member for Kamloops.

Mr. Chevrier: I now have the information in connection with travelling expenses. The amount of money spent in 1948-49 was $107,501.

Mr. Knowles: Have you the expenditure for 1949-50?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed there are no final figures for 1949-50.

Mr. Fulton: That leaves us rather in the dark. Would it not be possible to get the figures for 1949-50 so that we may have them before us when we are considering these estimates? The minister has stated that the expenditure in 1948-49 was $107,501, that is the actual figure. Last year the department gave a breakdown showing $169,000, and this year the breakdown shows $183,505, or $76,000 over the last figure that we have. My inclination would be to suggest a reduction of that amount. Last year the department actually spent an amount closer to this $183,000, but I am rather reluctant to let the item pass without the actual information.

Mr. Chevrier: The information I have is that those figures for 1949-50 would have to be obtained from the Department of Finance. The only information we have available now is for the year 1948-49, the amount which I gave. The final figures for which my friend asks can be obtained, but not before next month.

Mr. Knowles: Since the minister does have the figures for 1948-49, may I ask him one question? He has just indicated that the amount spent for travelling expenses was $107,000. I may say that the amount voted for that in 1948-49 was $157,865. Now, I should like to know whether the $50,000 remaining in this item in 1948-49 which was not spent for travelling expenses was spent for anything else under the heading of radio aviation services?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it was not spent on anything else.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister know what the total amount is that was spent under radio aviation services in 1948-49, as against the vote in that year of $3,909,975?

Mr. Chevrier: It was $3,446,427.

Mr. Knowles: The department seems to have met that spot check fairly well.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask the minister if one reason for the mounting travelling expenses is not the fact that officials and others are travelling now almost entirely by air, when possibly they could travel by train and save money. I have noticed that officials often take short trips by air, and that is expensive. It would seem to me it is costing far more than it would if they were to travel by other means.

Mr. Chevrier: Much of the work of the department has to be done by plane.

Mr. Brooks: I am not speaking of the minister's own department particularly, but officials are continually up in the air, as it were, travelling all over the country.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The item before the committee is radio aviation services.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Brooks: We are discussing travelling expenses, and I have asked a question of the Minister of Transport. I have asked whether there is not far more travel by air today than there was a year or two ago, and if it is not increasing faster than it should increase, at the expense of the country.

Mr. Chevrier: I think not; I think it is decreasing if anything. Certainly with regard to officials of the department and the minister, I think it is decreasing rather than increasing.

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to say a word on this because the people of Canada do own T.C.A. T.C.A. makes a point of showing that, whereas the actual air fare may be a little more than the combined first-class rail fare, berths and meals, there is a great saving in time, if time means anything. It was for this reason that some years ago I stood in my place and urged that M.P.'s be allowed to use air travel in coming to and going from parliament, which was finally approved. I suggest that, even though the transportation costs of the department might show a slight increase in dollars because of the use of air travel, there should be a great and real saving to the country in having our civil servants working every day instead of spending four idle days on a train going to Vancouver and four days coming back. Their wages cost Canada much more than the difference. I should not like the impression to get abroad, when we are trying to make T.C.A. pay its way, that it is cheaper to travel by bus or by train.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I take exception to the view which the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance seems to express, that the time of members of parliament is of infinitely less value than the time of civil servants.

Mr. Sinclair: My point is that the time of members of parliament is important. It is all very well for the member for Greenwood to speak about this, but he can come to Ottawa from Toronto overnight whereas the western members have to spend four days on the train wasting time. A real saving could be effected if travel by air were authorized, and these long time-wasting journeys eliminated.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister tell us how he arrives at this estimate of $183,000 for this year, which is a $14,000 increase over last year's estimate, if he does not know what he actually spent last year? I am not trying to labour a point, but I am trying to relate what we are asking for to what we have spent. I have definitely indicated that, in my opinion, unless we can show that the two are closely related we should reduce the amount requested this year.

Mr. Chevrier: I can only say, as I have already said, that the amount given is for the actual travelling expenses in 1948-49, and that is $107,501. I shall not have the figures for 1949-50 until the end of next month; they are not available.

Mr. Fulton: We come to this point, that according to the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950, at which I am looking, the previous year the minister asked for $157,000 for travelling expenses in 1948-49. He has told us just now that he spent $107,000. In other words, he had asked for $50,000 more than he spent. I can only suggest that it is desirable that the expenditures should be kept to a minimum. We have been shown no reason why we should be asked to authorize $183,000 which is $14,000 more than we were asked for last year. Unless some explanation is given or some actual figures of expenditure for last year are produced, I would move that this item be reduced by $50,000, which is the amount that the estimate exceeds the actual expenditure for the last year for which we have the figures available.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I find it exceedingly difficult to understand this situation. I wonder if the minister really means to take the position that, nearly two months after the end of the federal financial year, we cannot have a statement of what has been spent on travelling expenses. That seems to me an extraordinary position to take. As a matter of fact, we were given a statement only a moment or two ago for the same period of the amount spent in—

Mr. Knowles: 1948-49.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Was that only 1948-49? All right, then; I drop that. But I come back to this point. Surely after nearly two months it ought not to be difficult to give us a general statement, if not one down to the last cent. It is difficult for me to understand why, after two months, we cannot get that.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry, but I have not got it. My hon. friend gets up and makes a statement that he cannot understand why it is not available. I am saying to the house now on my honour as a minister that I have not got it, and that it is not available. If it were available, I would give it. I think no minister has given more information to the committee than I have.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There is no suggestion—

Mr. Chevrier: Just a minute. My hon. friend creates the impression, although perhaps he does not wish to, that there is a tendency on my part to withhold information. There is no such tendency. These are questions which concern the Department of Finance far more than they do the Department of Transport. The officials who are in front of me tell me now that they have not got the information and that they will not have it until the end of next month when they will get it from the Department of Finance. I wish I could add something more but unfortunately I cannot.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There is nothing further from my mind than to make any such suggestion.

Mr. Claxton: For the obvious reason that the books are not closed, in respect of items for the financial year ended March 31, until the end of April, the accounts are not in. We have not had even a month since then. The suggestion of the hon. member for Greenwood is completely without validity.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not impressed, Mr. Chairman; but I repeat that nothing was farther from my mind than to suggest that the Minister of Transport was withholding anything or that anything he said was not said perfectly sincerely. All I am saying is that even with the explanation we have from the Minister of National Defence—he says, and he is quite correct, of course, that the books closed at the end of April—I find the position taken hard to understand. We are now nearly at the end of May. I fully accept the minister's statement that he has not those figures now. But I do not accept the statement—and he did not make it—that, if it were considered desirable and worth while to take a little trouble to let us have, say, within twenty-four hours the rough total of these travelling expenses, it could not be done. It would take a great deal of argument to make me believe that it could not be done. I am not saying that it is in the ordinary routine. Of course, ministers do not like to depart from the ordinary routine. Perhaps I would say that more about other ministers than I would about the Minister of Transport. But I am not impressed with the statement that we cannot get it.

Mr. McLure: There is one item here in this vote, radio aviation services—

Mr. Fulton: I have made a motion.

Mr. Fraser: Are you putting the motion, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I had not the motion until just now. I just received it in writing. Mr. Fulton moves, seconded by Mr. Green:

That item 502 be reduced by the sum of $50,000.

Mr. Green: Question.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Lennard: Question.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): This question is debatable, I think, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I think it is an outrage that there should be any impairment of radio and other services of the northwest.

Mr. Fraser: Nobody said there should be.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): That is exactly what is implied in this resolution. Any of you who have been over the Alaska highway will know that this is a strategic part of this continent. I suppose the Department of Transport is taking over from time to time certain airfields on the Alaska highway, as the danger of war recedes. But there is still a danger of war and the cold war is still menacing the world. If this continent is going to be defended, you have got to maintain the services of the Alaska highway, such as the airport at Fort St. John, at Prince George in my own riding, at Fort Nelson, at Whitehorse and at other points which support the general defence of this continent in Alaska. It is all very well for the people down here in central Canada where you have railways, highways and every conceivable modern method of transportation and communication. But up in that part of the world the population is sparse, the distances are great and the people depend upon the air services. The town in which I live is fifty miles removed from a railway. Can you imagine any place in western Ontario fifty miles removed from a railway? The people in my district on the one hand depend upon trucks for freight and the handling of freight; and on the other hand they have to depend on aircraft. All our traffic from there to Vancouver is by aircraft, and from there to Edmonton. Of course from Dawson Creek there is a railway which connects with the system which goes on to Edmonton. But in the northwest part of this continent the industry of aviation is essential to the carrying on of the affairs of the people. As I say, anything that will impair the services there is a blow not only at our own safety there but at the defence of the whole continent of North America.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. Lennard: May I ask the hon. member a question?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The item under discussion is a vote of $4,489,730—

Mr. Lennard: May I ask the hon. member a question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Sinclair: You can make your speech afterwards.

The Deputy Chairman: Unless the hon. member consents, he may not be interrupted.

Mr. Lennard: What he is saying comes under item 510.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member should rise to a point of order.

I would point out to the hon. member for Cariboo that we are now discussing item 502 to which there is an amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops, reducing the item by the sum of $50,000.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I am quite aware of that fact, Mr. Chairman, and it deals with aviation or with radio in respect of aviation. You cannot fly these planes without radio. You cannot maintain this air service up there on the northwest staging route without these teletype machines that are mentioned here.

Mr. Fraser: Nobody said you could.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The hon. member for Greenwood has been urging that they be reduced.

Mr. Fraser: No, we didn't.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): He would have us go back to writing letters by hand or something.

Mr. Fraser: No, no. You have been asleep.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): In these days, when these planes are moving on schedule and when there is such a menace of weather, you need radio, teletype machines and every modern method of communication. Instead of cutting these items down the minister might well consider increasing them.

Mr. Fraser: He has.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The hon. member for Kamloops has been sparring about with the idea of reducing this and that; he would cut down on stamps, pencils and something else. He had not a word to say about Williams Lake in his own riding, which is deprived of an adequate airfield. He has been sitting here all week—

Mr. Martin: Does he know it is there?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): While over across at Dog Creek, for instance, there is an airfield which is not being used at all. The cattle ranchers, the cattlemen and others who want to use aircraft to get into town to do their shopping—

Mr. Fulton: I would say, Mr. Chairman, that normally I would answer the hon. member, but I would rather do it when we are both in order. I raised a point of order to point out that this discussion, which the hon. member is carrying on, has nothing to do with the item under review.

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, the hon. member for Cariboo is perfectly in order, and if my hon. friend would permit me to interrupt him I would like to point out just how ridiculous is the motion of my hon. friend. It is the idea given by the hon. member for Cariboo that brings it to my mind.

I said a moment ago to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that moneys voted under the details of this general vote may be allocated to something else. In other words, the point which my hon. friend is making is to reduce the travelling expenses by $50,000 because in 1948-49 we did not spend nearly as much as was voted.

Mr. Knowles: You spent $50,000 less.

Mr. Chevrier: That being the case, if the same procedure follows this year and we do not spend the $50,000 that my hon. friend expects, then we might as well take the $50,000 and put it into the Northwest Territories where my hon. friend needs service, or put it into Vancouver—

Mr. Fulton: Why don't you ask for it in that way?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Chevrier: Just a moment. I am speaking now to the motion made by my hon. friend, and I am trying to point out to the committee how ridiculous it is. I am also trying to show how, by making this motion, he may very well take from Vancouver, from Calgary, from Edmonton, from Fort William and from a number of other places, to which the sum of at least $85,000 has been allocated under this vote for radio services. If my hon. friend's point is well taken, and if it is a fact that we do not need the travelling expenses, and they should be reduced by $50,000, then we might well take the $50,000 and allocate it to several parts of Canada. As a matter of fact, what my hon. friend wants in the airport in Kamloops, namely, radio facilities, might well be covered by this vote; and by the motion which he makes, I say to the committee with deference, he is actually doing the thing which will harm his own airport.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, what the minister has said—

Mr. Leger: Sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: If I remember correctly, the hon. member for Cariboo had the floor when the minister interrupted him and made some additional remarks. I know that the hon. member for Kamloops would like to say a few words as well. But in all fairness, I think the hon. member who had the floor and was interrupted should again be given the floor.

Mr. Fraser: Let him get it off his chest.

Mr. Harkness: We may as well have the time wasted now.

Mr. Chevrier: We have been wasting it all afternoon.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): This particular item refers to the smaller airfields. At Dawson Creek we have a landing field which is at railhead. There is an application now before the government for an appropriation to make the field available for civil aviation, for the landing of aircraft by C.P.A., and other large aircraft. We have a flying club there made up of young men around Dawson Creek who own their own planes. My friend, Mr. K. O. Aspol, is one of the owners of aircraft there. On Saturday afternoons and Sundays these fellows take their private planes, travel about and teach young fellows the science of operating a plane. How is the Dawson Creek airport to be carried on if it does not get radio service? That applies also to Williams Lake, an old well settled and wealthy part of the country.

They need a good modern airport at Williams Lake. At Dog Creek there is a modern airport which is not being used. It is owned by the R.C.A.F., and is purely a military set-up. I would like to see something done toward improving the facilities up there right along the line.

One hon. gentleman asked a hypothetical question as to what we would do if the Russian planes came over Canada. I was on the Alaska highway when many Russian planes were passing up and down the northwest staging route. They were our allies then. They did not have any difficulty getting across the Bering sea, into Fairbanks and on down to Edmonton. Thousands of aircraft operated by the Russians were seen in the skies above the Alaska highway. It might very well be that they may return to the Canadian skies.

I might say also that the Russian aviators were quite the equal of United States or Canadian pilots, and, interesting as it may seem, a good many of them were women, and very handsome women they were. They were piloting their planes, and came from certain airports on the other side of the Bering sea.

In Ottawa, Ontario, the comfortable and luxurious capital of Canada, we do not realize how exposed our frontiers are to possible attack by an enemy.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I trust the hon. member will not go too far away from item 502.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Not too far.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): As I said at the outset, many of these airports in my riding, under the direction of the R.C.A.F., have been passed over to the Department of Transport or are now being turned over to that department. I suppose the facilities such as telegraphs, telecommunications and so forth are also being passed over. That I do not know. I close with this one word. To reduce this item in any way would be to reduce the efficiency of our civil and military defences up in the northwest.

Mr. Fulton: What has been said by the minister and by the hon. member for Cariboo, who has just taken his seat, shows clearly the type of consideration of the items that we are asked to put up with. What the minister has said is this. He has explained, and it was borne out by the quotation read by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that what they are asking for is $4,489,730 this year. In order to justify it or to explain it to the house so that the house may approve the amount, he gives us the breakdown showing what is estimated to be required for each of the activities of this particular branch of his department.

The minister's department proposes to spend, on a rough calculation, $1,038,500 on travelling expenses this year, of which this $180,000 is only a part. If it is the desire, as the minister has sought to make out, to have more money for improving facilities in the airports at Fort William, Regina, Calgary, Kamloops, Williams Lake or any of the other points that have been mentioned, then we could deal with the matter on its merits and it will not be necessary for the hon. member for Cariboo to make a political speech when we talk about reducing expenditures. What we are talking about here is a reduction in expenditure.

Mr. Sinclair: In every riding but your own.

[Mr. Murray (Cariboo).]

Mr. Fulton: We are dealing with an estimated expenditure for travelling of $180,000. If we can reduce this sort of item, which does not of itself contribute to airport development, then we will have that much more money to spend on airport development, and we can spend it without an increase in taxes. I suggest that what every hon. member should be doing in examining these estimates is to find out where we can suggest reductions in non-essential and non-productive items so that we can have more room to increase expenditures if necessary on essential items and on items which in turn are going to contribute to the development of the country, and do those things without an increase in taxation.

Remember that the Minister of Finance has told us that we cannot expect a budget of less than $2,400 million. He has told us that there is no extravagance, no duplication, no overlapping and that he cannot see any way to reduce. He told us that we can contemplate almost with certainty an increase in taxes in the very near future. I think it is the duty of every one of us to examine these estimates and to talk them over with the minister. Incidentally, I was rather disappointed to hear the minister say this afternoon that we are wasting time in doing this.

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, I was referring to the motion made by my hon. friend when I made that statement; that in making motions he is wasting the time of the committee.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, no. The minister said that we have wasted some three hours this afternoon and my motion has been before the committee for only twenty minutes.

Mr. Sinclair: It just seems like three hours.

Mr. Fulton: The minister is suggesting that in making this detailed examination of the estimates that we have made this afternoon—we have passed several million dollars already—we are wasting time. I agree that to make this detailed examination in committee of the whole is perhaps an inefficient method of proceeding, that it would be much more efficient if we could have the departmental estimates referred to committees, but that method has been denied to us. For an hon. member or the minister to say that in giving the estimates a detailed examination in this way we are wasting time is to indicate a lack of that sense of responsibility which should be—

Mr. Martin: The minister did not say that.

Mr. Fulton: —present in all of us. I come back to the point that the minister has given us no justification for his request for approval of $180,000 for travelling expenses. He has not been able to show us that that amount is actually required. If he wants more money for construction purposes, let him ask for more money and reduce the travelling expenses accordingly. We could then deal with the matter on its merits. As far as I am concerned, I would like to see more money spent on the various airports that have been mentioned, and in fact have on—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: —occasion said so.

An hon. Member: A political speech.

Mr. Fulton: This is almost interesting.

Mr. McCusker: Put it in reverse.

Mr. Fulton: I remember that at the outset, when I brought up this matter of reducing non-essentials, I said that if we would reduce the non-essentials we would have more money to spend on the essentials without increasing taxation. Hon. members agreed with me at that time. I remember the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary assistant appeared to think that that was a sound suggestion. I am merely repeating it. If we can reduce the non-essentials—the minister has not been able to show us that the $180,000 is essential—we will have more left for the essentials. It is with that thought in mind that I move this motion to reduce the item by $50,000.

Mr. McCusker: I find it very hard to understand how my hon. friend can get up and make a motion to reduce this item of $183,505 by $50,000 when he admits that he does not know what it is required for. He had an explanation—from the minister.

An hon. Member: The minister said that.

Mr. McCusker: You will have an opportunity of making your speech. The only way you can get in the limelight is to project yourself into everyone else's speech. The hon. member from Kamloops admits that he does not know what amount was required last year. The reason for that information not being available is that the figures will not be ready for another month. We must admit that the opposition is considerably handicapped this afternoon when their top expert on aviation is not here. But for the hon. member to move to reduce this vote by $50,000 when he does not know what is required shows that he is willing to hamstring the aviation services without just cause.

Mr. Coldwell: I hesitate to get into this somewhat heated and apparently political discussion, but while I feel that criticism of travelling expenses on the ground that air travel should not be used is difficult to justify I do think the hon. member for Kamloops has made a logical attack on this particular item. The last actual expenditure of which this committee has any knowledge is the expenditure of $107,000 on travelling expenses in 1948-49. We do not know what the expenditure was last year; the minister has not been able to tell us because the figures are not available. There is an increase of $76,000 over the last expenditure that we know anything about.

It seems to me that the criticism by the hon. member for Kamloops that we should have accurate knowledge of the amount required under a particular vote is a valid criticism. Probably the department does need more money for various services and projects, some of which have been mentioned, and if that is so those projects should be noted in the breakdown. We should not be asked to vote $183,000 for travelling expenses when all we know is that the last actual expenditure was only $107,000.

If the minister requires $50,000 more for other projects during the year, let him come to us and tell us what those projects are and I will be pleased to vote for the amounts. May I say again that I do not sympathize with the argument that officials of the government should not use air travel. I think they should. But I do think that the argument advanced by the hon. member for Kamloops is unassailable. I think the argument is logical and sound and because of that I am going to vote for the motion to reduce this item by $50,000 because we have had no justification for asking for this additional amount when the last amount we know of is the expenditure of $107,000 in 1948-49.

I said last night that I appreciated the manner in which the minister has brought down his estimates, but I think this afternoon he is on pretty shaky ground in connection with this particular matter.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to return the compliment to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, but I am surprised to hear him make the argument which he has made. With deference to him, I think he is on very unsound ground when he argues in the manner in which he did. It is true that the committee is entitled to all the information that is in the possession of the minister. I have given that information, and I do not think that anybody has refused less information than I have in so far as these estimates and the Canadian National Railways are concerned.

Here is an item of $183,000. It is an estimate. The departmental officials do not know exactly how much we are going to spend.

The hon. member for Kamloops says, "Why does the minister not tell us? We are entitled to know how much he is going to spend." This is not a statement of the amount spent; it is an estimate of the amount that is likely to be spent. My hon. friend says that all we can compare it with is an estimate for last year which is not based on the previous expenditure. That is where I think my hon. friend makes his mistake. It is based on the experience for the present fiscal year. I indicated at the outset that under the first vote there would be an increase of at least forty-four employees in the administrative staff of the Department of Transport. That gives some indication if there are to be forty-four employees more than there were last year.

Mr. Fulton: There are only nine more.

Mr. Chevrier: There are forty-four.

Mr. Fulton: In this item there are only nine.

Mr. Chevrier: There are forty-four under the general item of administration which is included in this as well. Some of those are in outlying districts, and therefore there is bound to be an increase in travelling expenses. If this were the actual amount of expenditure my hon. friend would be quite right in his argument and would be entitled to the exact amount, but it is not. It is only an estimate as to what is likely to be spent. Again I say that if I had the amount which was expended for the fiscal year 1949-50 I would make it available immediately. I have not got it. My hon. friend tried to make the point a moment ago that I said this was time wasted. If he took my statement to mean that it has been time wasted since we started consideration of the estimates this afternoon, then I had no intention of making such a statement. I did make it, however, the moment my hon. friend moved his amendment. From that time on I think the discussion has been wasted, with all due respect to my hon. friend. I repeat that, because if he were successful in reducing the item by $50,000 then he would do exactly what the hon. member for Cariboo stated: he might well remove from the outlying districts certain radio range facilities which these people would otherwise get.

Mr. Fulton: Rubbish.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend says that is rubbish. Let us see whether it is rubbish. Let us assume that the full amount of $183,000 for travelling expenses under this item is not expended in this fiscal year and only $100,000 is used. Then $83,000 can be used for radio or other facilities in the Northwest Territories, and even at the Kamloops airport in which my hon. friend is interested.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Chevrier: Some hon. members on this side of the house say "oh, no." I want to show how ridiculous the hon. gentleman's position is. If he wishes to qualify my statement as rubbish that is his privilege, but I do not think it is. I think, Mr. Chairman, that perhaps you had better put the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to remind some members of the committee, who seem to feel that it is a waste of time when these items are discussed, that it is our duty.

Mr. Ferrie: I do.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I know you feel that way.

Mr. Ferrie: You bet I do.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would remind the house of what the Minister of Finance undertook to say—I think in good part—when he made a speech and accused us of not doing our duty, and not examining these items closely enough.

Mr. Sinclair: You are quite right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let us see what has happened. There has been a good deal of rather loose talk. The hon. member for Kamloops moved a reduction of $50,000 in an item of nearly $5 million and you would have thought he had moved a reduction of $4 million to hear my friend over here talk.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): It might well be more serious.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think it would be well for the committee to realize that the very suggestion that anyone should dare to move a reduction in any of these estimates seems to be regarded as an outrage. I am inclined to think it has almost reached the point when anything brought in here by the government must be regarded as having a kind of divine impress on it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me come to one other point. The hon. member for Kamloops was most moderate and patient.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes, he was. We are all expressing our opinions. He said to the minister that if he could get any information about this matter he would not move the amendment. He asked for information which in my opinion, and I am glad to find in the opinion of a member of the C.C.F. party, is perfectly reasonable. Let us remind ourselves what we are doing now. It is not the minister's fault; it is a difficulty of our whole system. We are comparing money asked for expenditure this year not with the expenditure of last year but with the estimate of expenditure for last year. There is a terrible weakness in it. The hon. member for Kamloops made his request this afternoon in order to try to give us something definite to act on this matter. It was clear that in the year previous the estimate had been far too high, and he felt we should get the figures as closely as we could for last year. The minister says he has not got them. That is true of course, but nothing has been said that convinces me that some figure could not have been obtained.

All I am saying is that I am going to vote for the amendment because I consider otherwise we are left in a perfectly ridiculous position of voting on something which on the face of it is too much. We are left with the suggestion of the minister, which I think was unworthy of him, that if it proved to be too much then we would just divert it to some other expenditure. Instead of coming here and asking for the amount for the other expenditure he would get it on the rebound, so to speak.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to reply to what the minister said a moment ago, and I want to deal with it seriously. I take it the minister made it as a serious suggestion but I hope he will see that if it is taken seriously it places him on the horns of a very awkward dilemma.

Mr. Sinclair: Did you ever hear of a dilemma that wasn't awkward?

Mr. Fulton: The minister said in the first place, has repeated it, and I take his word for it, that this is the closest estimate he can make of the actual expenditure. He said in effect he is fully justified in asking for the exact amount of $183,000 for this particular expenditure, travelling expenses. In fact he is resisting the amendment on that ground. He said, "Admittedly I cannot give you the figure spent last year but I will give you every assurance that I can give as a minister that it is an accurate estimate of what we will spend this year. Therefore it is ridiculous and a waste of time for you to suggest that it be reduced by $50,000."

On the other hand he then turns around and says that he will show how ridiculous it is because if we are successful in taking off the $50,000 it might well be that only $100,000 would be spent on travelling expenses and that would leave this extra money to be spent somewhere else. By that argument the minister used he is saying that these estimates are perhaps not accurate at all. The minister says that he wants to come in here and ask for $4 or $5 million and just make a rough breakdown into the various branches, that they may overspend one item by $50,000 and underspend another, and if they underspend they will spend it on something else. I simply say that is not the way in which the committee should be asked to approve estimates of expenditure. If it is not estimated any more closely than that I do not think we should pass it.

As to the actual figure of $50,000 by which it is suggested this item should be reduced, that is based upon the most recent information we could get, which showed that in the fiscal year 1948-49 they overestimated their expenditures under this heading by $50,000, and nothing has been said to show that the same thing has not happened this year. In the absence of that explanation I certainly reject the minister's argument, because if what he said on the one hand is correct then what he said on the other is absolutely untenable. He has not told us which of the two branches he prefers, but it all boils down to this; that he has said nothing to give concrete proof that he needs $183,000, while the information he has given us indicates that he does not need that much.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest to some of the hon. members who are calling "Question" that we were prepared to take the vote on this amendment half an hour ago, when they were not here. That is a fact; one of their own number took the floor and kept the debate going until the government majority got here.

One point the minister made I think should be noted, and perhaps corrected a bit. He said there was an increase of forty-four employees, and I took it he was suggesting that this accounted for the increase in travelling expenses in this item. I shall take his word for it if he says he did not mean that, but I think it should be made clear that there is an increase of only eight employees under this item, and that the travelling expenses we are now discussing are only one of a good many items for travelling expenses spread through the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Chevrier: Those forty-four employees would be covered in part, because they are covered by the general administration vote.

Mr. Knowles: But there is an item for travelling expenses under the general administration vote as well. Surely this increase should not be set off against any more than eight employees under air service, radio division. It seems to me the most unfortunate thing said this afternoon was when the Minister of Transport indicated that it was quite an easy matter to shift these items around, as far as the details are concerned. He said that if this money was voted and not spent on travelling expenses, then it could quite easily be transferred to radio facilities at one airport or another.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think my hon. friend wants to misquote me, or leave an impression which is not correct. I did not make the statement mentioned by the hon. member. I said it might very well be that if this money was not spent on travelling expenses it could be used somewhere else. I did not say it was an easy matter to do it, which is a different thing.

Mr. Knowles: In discussing this matter the minister made reference to a quotation I gave some little time ago. I remind him that at that time the hon. member for Kamloops and I were doing what I called a spot check; we were trying to find whether in this department there was any case where that sort of thing had been done. The little check we were able to make gave the minister a clean bill of health; apparently it was not being done in his department, and I was satisfied. Now he is taking the other approach and is using the very quotation I read to suggest that this sort of thing could be done; that money not spent for travelling under this item could be spent for anything else under the general heading.

I point out to the minister that while the details in the back of the book of estimates are not part of the Appropriation Act and therefore are not binding upon the executive, still there is a certain provision in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act to which the department must conform. Section 26(2) reads:

> The deputy head or other officer charged with the administration of a grant authorized by parliament shall prepare and submit to the comptroller in such form and at such time as the treasury board directs a classification of the expenditures provided for under such grant and such classification when so established shall not be varied or amended except with the approval of the treasury board.

In other words the details of this item in the back of the book are not binding; but when we have voted $4 million for this item I take it from this section of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act that the deputy head of the department must classify how that $4 million is to be spent and submit that classification to the comptroller of the treasury. Once that classification of this $4 million has been established, then I understand it cannot be changed without the approval of treasury board.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: When the minister says these things can be changed he is telling us that all the government has to do if it wants to make a change is go to treasury board and make it.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think my hon. friend is being fair or just. I have risen twice now to correct the false impression he has left. I repeat that I made no such statement. What I did say was that if the amount for travelling expenses was not all used it might very well be that the balance could be devoted to another purpose. My hon. friend is saying that I said it was easy to do that. It is not easy, as will be seen from what the hon. member read from the audit act. On the contrary it is a difficult thing, but it may be done with the approval of treasury board. I do not think my hon. friend is being fair.

Mr. Knowles: I do not want to be unfair at all—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You are not being unfair.

Mr. Knowles: If the minister is in a difficult position here it is because of his own statement that it might very well be that this could be done. To clear this up I think the minister should say very definitely that he and his department have no intention of diverting money passed for one detail to another detail. If he leaves it as it is the matter is still open to suspicion.

Mr. Chevrier: The statement I made was quite clear, and I have nothing to add or take away from it.

Mr. McLure: I think we are straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. It would be nice to have this reduction of $50,000; but if we look at the last two items we see that no details at all are given. In other words in connection with those items we are asked to give a blank cheque for nearly $5 million. So I think both sides of the house might better spend their time arguing about something else.

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) negatived: yeas, 18; nays, 44.

Item agreed to on division.

Civil aviation division—

503. Airway and airport traffic control, $1,050,659.

Mr. Lennard: Will the minister give us a breakdown of this large amount of $430,094 for telephones, telegrams and postage?

Mr. Chevrier: The telephones, telegrams and postage item covers the rentals of telephone long lines, teletype circuits and telephone equipment in the control towers necessary for civil or commercial flying. As I indicated the other evening in answering a similar question, it is mostly for rentals to telephone companies.

Civil aviation division—

505. Contributions, subject to the approval of the governor in council, to assist municipalities to improve existing airports, the sites of which have been provided by such municipalities (revote $210,000), $137,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I am interested in this item which is to provide $137,000 to assist municipalities in improving existing airports. This vote would be applicable to the airport at Amherst to which I referred a short time ago. I would ask the minister to what airports, and under what classification, this appropriation will be applied.

Mr. Chevrier: This amount of money is voted to go to the assistance of municipalities that are in need of air services. Ever since its establishment, and particularly since the war, it has been the policy of the department to grant sums of $25,000 to assist municipalities in providing airstrips. It is on the basis of the land being provided by the municipalities, but the construction of the airstrip is assisted by the department to the extent of $25,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The minister has taken great pride in the development of civil air services, a just pride, and I join with him in that pride. The appropriation for civil air services amounts to approximately $24 million. I pointed out some time ago that there is an airport at Amherst, Nova Scotia. I do not think a better public spirit existed in any part of the country than in Amherst when those people joined forces with the government to establish this airport. Splendid service was rendered during the war in the manufacture of airplanes at that point. I cannot understand why the department, with this enormous amount of money available, more than $24 million, would allow an important airport such as the one at Amherst to deteriorate.

The minister informed the committee that this airport had reverted to the ownership of the town of Amherst. I have to accept his statement on that, but that is not my understanding of the facts. While the town is interested in it, I understood it had refused to take back ownership. Whether or not that was done, I believe it is a reflection on the department that this important airport has been allowed to deteriorate. Unless the government gives some assistance in the maintenance of it, it cannot be kept up.

Mr. Chevrier: The dominion government spent $340,367 on the Amherst airport, less $36,000 which was paid by the municipality. My hon. friend says, why do we allow it to deteriorate? It has been turned over to the municipality for operation. The Department of Transport tries to dispose of certain of its airports, and has disposed of many by turning them over to the municipalities in order to save additional expenditures. If the business is not there, I am afraid there is nothing we can do. I could point to a number of airports in Canada not very far from here, where there is no business. They have been turned back to the municipalities, but there is nothing very much we can do. We have assisted Amherst to the large extent of almost $350,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): With this special appropriation of $137,000 for assistance to municipalities, it has been the set policy of the department to allow a valuable airport such as the one at Amherst to deteriorate.

Mr. Chevrier: The department has nothing to do with the airport. It is the responsibility of the municipality. If there is any deterioration it is not the fault of the department, it is the fault of the operator or owner of the airport.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The point I am making is that I believe, under these circumstances, the department should co-operate with the municipality in maintaining a valuable asset such as this, and not allow it to deteriorate.

Mr. Chevrier: My understanding of the word "co-operate" is that the department is asked to assist. The department has not been asked, as I indicated to my friend earlier. At one stage the department did assist Amherst to the extent of almost $350,000, but there has been no application since. If there were, we would consider it. I do not know what the answer would be, but in the light of what I have said I do not imagine it would be favourable.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Speaking for the town of Amherst, I would now ask the minister to assist.

Mr. Chevrier: No, an application cannot be made in that manner. The municipality is the owner of the airport, and if the municipality wants to make representations they will be carefully considered.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Could the minister state when Amherst took back this asset? My understanding is that they refused to do it.

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot answer that, except to say that my officers indicate to me the title is now in the municipality.

Mr. Cardiff: Would the minister give a breakdown of what this covers, and where the money was spent?

Mr. Chevrier: The money has not been spent, it is an estimate of what will be spent. It is for Pentecote, Quebec, $25,000; Rouyn-Noranda, Quebec, $50,000; and the town of Val d'Or, Quebec, $62,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In this case, I should like to ask, where the authority is apparently in the municipality, who is responsible for seeing that all safety precautions are taken, and that sort of thing?

Mr. Chevrier: The Department of Transport, through its licensing division. Once an airport has been established, then it gives it a licence to operate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to be sure that my understanding of the minister's answer is correct. The department gives the airport a licence to operate, and is there a system of continuing inspection to see that it is kept up to the requirements of the department?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, but it is a twofold operation. There is an air line that serves the airport. Take for instance Rouyn-Noranda, which is being established now. Quebec Airways or C.P.A. will go in there, and the department will give certificates of airworthiness to the aircraft. They will also licence the airport to operate in accordance with our regulations.

Mr. Cruickshank: In so far as my own municipal airport is concerned, we have been fairly treated. The only question I am asking is: If private companies are operating into that municipal airport, is it eligible for a grant? There are no commercial air lines operating into the municipal airport, but there are private charter concerns operating there.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, if the municipal authorities wish to make representations, they will be considered. They are eligible.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

506. To authorize contribution of an amount not exceeding $30,420 to the state of Michigan, U.S.A, Department of Aeronautics, towards the cost of operation and maintenance of certain airways facilities at Grand Marais, Michigan, for use of Canadian aircraft, $30,420.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister say a word by way of explaining that item? The item is so small that it indicates that we do not do much there. I had the idea there was a sort of reciprocity of use as between airports. I should like to know what the exact position is.

Mr. Chevrier: This is an emergency or alternate airfield for T.C.A. operating from Toronto to Winnipeg. Very often because of weather conditions it is forced to go down in this airport in Michigan and that is the contribution which we make for the services rendered by this airport, and we pay the state of Michigan this sum.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Once when I was coming from Winnipeg, for reasons of weather we landed at Minneapolis-St. Paul. Just as a matter of interest, can the minister say a word about what the reciprocal arrangements are for a landing of that kind? We came down at Minneapolis-St. Paul.

Mr. Chevrier: Under the air agreement or the convention signed at Chicago, one of the main rights which air carriers have—the first air freedom—is to land in somebody else's territory; that is, any signatories of this international agreement. Therefore by virtue of the international agreement, T.C.A. can land in those ports just as American air lines can land in our ports.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is what puzzles me a little bit. This I take it is not an ordinary landing field. This is an emergency one which is kept up for special purposes and we are one of the subscribers.

Mr. Chevrier: It is because it is on the direct route across the lakes from Toronto to Winnipeg and it would not be kept up if it were not for our request to do so.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

508. Contribution to the government of Denmark as Canada's share in joint support of north Atlantic air navigation facilities in the Faroes and Greenland, $71,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister also give a word of explanation as to what the exact arrangement is there?

Mr. Chevrier: That is a commitment under ICAO, the international civil aviation organization, whereby we with other countries participate in the facilities of Greenland: radio, airports and stations for air safety navigation. We are assessed an amount with other countries using it, among which are Canada, the Netherlands, France and so forth. Our share is 9·8 per cent, and amounts to $71,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Through whom do we negotiate that? Solely the government of Denmark?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

509. Contribution to the south Pacific air transport council as Canada's share towards the maintenance and operation of air transport facilities in the south Pacific, $112,000.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister explain this item? I note that it is a new one. Will he tell us what air services benefit by it?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. This is to assist particularly C.P.A. on its transpacific route to Australasia. It arises out of a commonwealth agreement which was reached between New Zealand, Australia, the United Kingdom and Canada at a conference in the south Pacific last year. It has to do with the provision for the Nandi airport in the Fiji islands. We have been assessed $112,000 as our share towards the maintenance and operation of that transpacific airport facility.

Mr. Knowles: When the government turned over the operation of the Pacific service which was originally to have been carried on by T.C.A.; when it was turned over to Canadian Pacific Air Lines, why did the government not turn over this obligation to them? Why not let C.P.A. pay this?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think it is a similar position. I do not think my hon. friend can make that argument any more than he can make the argument why do we not turn over to T.C.A. the obligation of operating the weather ships on the Atlantic, the obligation of operating the Faroes facilities, the obligation of operating the weather ships on the Pacific which are for weather purposes. I indicated a while ago these are by virtue of international agreement and we are assessed with other countries. Other countries pay their share of it too and the different air lines use it.

Mr. Knowles: Some members in the house sometimes point out that we are operating T.C.A. at a deficit. I think it would have to be admitted that some of the money that we vote —as for example, the last item—should be included in that. May I point out that we are also helping to pay C.P.A.'s deficit in some of its air line operations, and that goes for this item and for a large part, if not all, of the next two items.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think it is correct or accurate to say that, for this reason. T.C.A. uses all sorts of facilities paid for and provided by other countries as do other lines in this country. That being the case because of the commonwealth agreement, I do not think it is correct or accurate to make the argument which my hon. friend makes. I do not want to get into a protracted argument with my hon. friend—

Mr. Martin: No; please don't do that.

Mr. Chevrier: —and a minute one, but I say to him that this is the same kind of service that is provided internationally for T.C.A. by Canada and by other countries for safer international traffic.

Mr. Knowles: I will accommodate the minister. I will not get into a protracted argument with him. I am just asking that it be noted now that a good deal of the expenses of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines for Pacific air service is paid for by the service we provide at Vancouver, by this item that we are now passing and, I have no doubt, by moneys spent by both Australia and New Zealand. That is an interesting form of private enterprise.

Mr. Chevrier: It is noted.

Mr. Fraser: I should like the minister to tell us what the other countries pay towards this. Have you a note of them?

Mr. Chevrier: The other countries pay all the capital charges.

Mr. Fraser: What other countries are there in it?

Mr. Chevrier: Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom. We pay 25 per cent of the cost of maintenance and operation, the other 75 per cent being paid by the three countries I mentioned.

Mr. Fulton: Does the United States pay any part of this?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

Northwest communication system—

510. Additions and betterments, including transport equipment—capital, $497,287.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May we have a word on this item also?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. This is for the northwest communications system, capital vote. The other vote is for the operations. This vote of $497,000 is for improvements, replacements and major repairs to buildings, works, pole lines, structures as well as the acquisition of mechanical and motorized equipment for the system. The line was constructed by the United States government along the Alaska highway, purchased by the Canadian government under the over-all Morgenthau-Ilsley agreement, turned over to national defence and then national defence turned it over to the Department of Transport for operation. I have a breakdown of the total amount of the vote which I can give: Summary of buildings and structures: $22,000; spiral 4 cable and transformers, $1,400; married quarters, $112,000; generator buildings, $13,000; garages, $43,000; repeater station building, $26,000; sewer and water works, $48,000; generating plants, $14,000; pump house, $9,000; major improvements to warehouse at Dawson Creek, $13,000; major improvements to repeater station, $8,000; inside plant equipment, $122,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What was the acquisition figure, roughly? Does the minister remember that?

Mr. Chevrier: I could not remember. It was given in the house at the time. It was a substantial sum of money.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Where do we find that asset set out in any public document? This is a separate asset?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Carried under that name?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): By the way, I thought I heard the minister refer to an operating figure as well as capital.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, the next vote. I am informed now that the amount paid under the Morgenthau-Ilsley agreement was some $11 million. It was for the purchase of this, the Canol project and many other things.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister later give me an answer to my question? Where will we find reference to the capital assets?

Mr. Chevrier: I will; I do not know at the moment.

Mr. Cruickshank: I understood that maintenance of Canol was mentioned. Does that include the supply of gasoline and oil to that particular line?

Mr. Chevrier: No. I presume the maintenance my hon. friend has reference to is the Canol project. There is no vote here for the Canol project. This is all for the northwest telecommunication system.

Item agreed to.

Northwest communication system—

511. To provide for the difference between the expenditures for operation and maintenance and revenue accruing from operations during the year ending March 31, 1951, including the acquisition of materials and supplies to an amount not exceeding $125,000, $231,034.

Mr. Knowles: Before we leave these items which provide service for the various air lines participating, can the minister tell us what amount of revenue is received per year from the Canadian Pacific Air Lines for services rendered by his department?

Mr. Chevrier: This is a vote which provides for the difference between the expenditure for operation and maintenance and revenue accruing from the northwest telecommunication services. I certainly cannot answer the question asked under this item.

Mr. Coldwell: Under what item?

Mr. Chevrier: Under the general administration item.

Mr. Knowles: Which is gone.

Mr. Chevrier: Well—

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister answer it with respect to this item? So far as the northwest communication system is concerned is any revenue received by his department from the Canadian Pacific Air Lines?

Mr. Chevrier: I have the total amount of revenue which has been received this year. It is $1,100,785. The revenue has come from commercial telegraph tolls, $42,000; commercial telephone tolls, $96,000; rents from leased wires; rents from telephone equipment; rents from leased equipment; rents from other operated properties. No revenue from C.P.A.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I find item 511 a rather curious one:

To provide for the difference between the expenditures for operation and maintenance and revenue accruing from operations during the year ending March 31, 1951, including the acquisition of materials and supplies to an amount not exceeding $125,000, $231,034.

In other words we have no operating statement. We do not know exactly what is happening. I suggest that the minister give us an operating statement. While I am on my feet I should like to ask this question. Where do we get other information which will be more illuminating as to the nature of this operation, which is of some substance?

Mr. Chevrier: This line is operated by the Canadian National Railways. When the committee on railways and shipping was sitting it would have been proper for any hon. member to ask the Canadian National Railways for a breakdown of this item, how it was operating, what the revenues were and the like. That committee has made its report to the house and is sitting no longer. I could give the information which I have here covering the revenues. That I have done already. The expenses, as furnished to me by the Canadian National Railways, are: maintenance, $681,000; conducting operations, $456,000; unemployment insurance, $3,000; general and miscellaneous, $65,000; making total operating expenses, $1,200,000; net deficit, $106,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the statement of this enterprise appear in the Canadian National Railways statement?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it does not.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not want to delay matters at this time, but I should like the minister to agree to this. Will the minister agree to get me a reasonably full statement of the operation of this enterprise.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I will.

Mr. Coldwell: I was surprised that there was no revenue from the Canadian Pacific Air Lines in the area which we are discussing. It seems to me that many services are provided for the Canadian Pacific Air Lines in the Northwest Territories into which they fly. My hon. friend reminds me that some of these services are provided for that particular line. It seems to me a queer way of running a private enterprise organization, when the country has to put up large sums of money to provide the facilities for this air line. I am sorry that we missed raising the whole question of revenue from the C.P.A. on the administration item. Of course one can put a question on the order paper at another time and get the information. I was surprised that there was no revenue. I did not think that there would be a great deal, but I thought that the C.P.A. would be bearing some part of the expenses.

Mr. Chevrier: There is a misapprehension concerning this item. This is not airport facilities; it is a telecommunication service, telephone and telegraph. The Canadian Pacific Air Lines pay landing fees, they pay charges, and they pay rental on all the airports of the Department of Transport in the Northwest Territories and elsewhere which they use. I gave a breakdown a while ago of the telegraph tolls, which amounted to $42,000 and the telephone tolls which amounted to $96,000. I am sure that in those amounts must be bills that have been rendered to the Canadian Pacific Air Lines and all the other air lines that use the telephone and telegraph services in that area, but it is lumped in that amount.

Mr. Coldwell: What about the beam, the radio service?

Mr. Chevrier: There is no charge for that. I indicated a while ago that that is provided free by the department.

Item agreed to.

Meteorological division—

512. Meteorological services, $4,958,450.

Mr. Fraser: Six o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: I understand that the Minister of Finance would like to move that progress be reported.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1950-51

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1951, was presented by Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the bills carry?

(Translation):

Mr. LaCroix: Mr. Speaker, I must register the strongest protest against the passage of these bills. About one hundred divorce bills are now before the house and, unfortunately, new batches of them keep coming every two weeks in ever growing numbers.

I wish to protest against a state of affairs that I find deplorable in the extreme. I should have been very glad to see five members rise with me and request a division on those bills, so as to drown them out for good by an overwhelming majority.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the bills carry?

Mr. LaCroix: On division.

Bills reported on division.

Mr. Matthew MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria) moved the third readings of Bills Nos. 136 to 151 inclusive, 154 to 176 inclusive, 182 to 204 inclusive and 211 to 220 inclusive.

Mr. LaCroix: On division.

Motion agreed to and bills read the third time and passed on division.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Viau: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Carried on division.

Motion agreed to on division and bills read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: These bills are referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

DIVORCE JURISDICTION

EXCHEQUER COURT TO HAVE JURISDICTION IN ACTIONS ORIGINATING IN QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 13, to provide for the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada in matters of divorce.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have introduced Bill No. 13 because I believe it will meet the wishes of members of the House of Commons. Certainly hon. members will agree with me that there is a desire that something be done so that the practice we have followed tonight, as we have on a good many other occasions, of letting ourselves be turned into a divorce mill may be brought to an end. I want to say a few things about the measure. Before I do so I should like to point out that it should have the interest and support of those in the house who are opposed to divorce and therefore must deplore the fact that they are parties to the divorces that go through parliament. I feel also it should have the support of those who, while just as much against divorce, recognize that there is such a thing and feel that it should be dealt with properly in the courts.

I want to point out that the bill does not change the grounds for divorce in any way whatsoever. There may be members of the house who will be disappointed that it does not do so but it is crystal clear from the way in which the bill is drafted, and certainly it is my intention not to change the grounds for divorce in any way so far as this bill is concerned. It does not establish divorce courts in the provinces of Quebec or Newfoundland. I mention those two provinces because the reason for the bill is that they now have no divorce courts, and that is why persons residing therein who wish to secure divorces have to come to parliament and get private acts such as we have put through by the score tonight.

As I have said, it is very clear that the bill does not establish divorce courts in those two provinces where we are led to believe the people do not want them. I would point out further that the bill does not make available to persons residing in Quebec or Newfoundland anything not now available to them. Persons in those provinces who feel that they must try to secure divorces can come to parliament and get them. It is being done every session. In fact I believe the numbers have reached about three or four hundred a year. When I introduce this bill providing another place, other than the other place, for these people to go it does not make available to them anything not now available. All the bill does is to transfer the hearing of divorce petitions, in the case of persons residing in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland, from parliament to the exchequer court. In other words, it transfers it from one building to another, from the centre block to the building to the west where the exchequer court meets.

It is clear from the bill, and is set out in the explanatory note, that jurisdiction as to alimony, care of children and other matrimonial causes will remain in the provincial courts of the two provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. The terms of the bill of course will not appear on Hansard, but despite the fact that there are three sections, and that one of them is a bit lengthy, it boils down simply to this, that if this bill were passed it would give to the exchequer court jurisdiction to try divorce cases involving persons residing in the two provinces I have named. Hence the name of the bill is an act to provide for the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada in matters of divorce, and the short title would be the exchequer court divorce jurisdiction act.

I would also point out, as I have already done briefly, to those who feel that we should be making some progressive reform in divorce that the bill does not meet that desire at all. Nevertheless I feel such people should support the measure because they surely cannot be satisfied with what should be dealt with in a court being dealt with in the way it is in parliament. To those who are thoroughly and unalterably opposed to divorce, may I point out with the utmost of respect that nevertheless they are parties to divorces being granted. I noted the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) said "on division" tonight when the house put through a group of divorce bills, but neither he nor other members who say they are unalterably opposed to such measures talked them out, which is a means they could employ if they are really opposed to them. They let them go through, and so long as we deal with divorce petitions from these two provinces in this parliament, so long as they are permitted to go through by the hundreds each year, it means that all of us in the House of Commons, no matter how much some members may shout "on division", are parties to scores and hundreds of divorces at a time.

It seems to me if that is the case it would be far better to regularize the whole procedure by having it done in a more appropriate place, namely, in a court of law. As hon. members know, this matter has been discussed a good many times in the house, and if there is a better suggestion I am quite ready to accept it in preference to this one. I think unless there is a better suggestion, and if hon. members are not prepared to agree to this proposal then we should not have any more complaints about our having to deal with divorces being put through in this House of Commons.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to make a rather unusual suggestion. One does not usually do this with his own bill, but I want to make it clear that I am trying to render something of a service, trying to meet what I think is a fairly evident wish on the part of hon. members. I know it is frequently said when a private member's public bill comes up that it is unfair to ask the house to make a decision on a matter of some importance within the space of the hour allotted to private and public bills. Many times it has been said that this is the sort of thing which should be discussed in committee. All right; I will not be disappointed at all if someone takes up the suggestion and moves an amendment to the motion for second reading to the effect that this bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills. In fact if that suggestion does appeal to anyone, and if it looks as though an attempt is going to be made to talk out the bill, I have that amendment already typed out, ready for anyone to move as an amendment to my own bill.

I know if that amendment should be put and carried it would be the end of the bill for this session, because the negating of second reading kills the bill itself. The result would be that the subject matter of the bill, as distinct from the bill itself, would be referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills, which could then discuss the matter, hear witnesses if it wished, and report back to the house if it wished. At any rate that would be a means of getting a little more time than the one hour period, and would also be a means of getting the matter discussed freely and frankly without any question of whether or not the principle of a particular proposal is being supported.

I do not recall an hon. member of this house ever before suggesting that his own bill should be treated in that way. I know when that was done to one of my bills a few years ago I was quite annoyed. But the whole purpose of the present bill, obviously, is not to present any social or economic principle to which some of us may be closely attached. Rather it is to deal with one of the problems of our own House of Commons, one of the things I am sure have bothered all of us; and I would hope that in one way or the other either this proposal itself or the problem it seeks to solve might be considered earnestly and sincerely by the members of this house. I do hope the house will either consent to second reading and have the bill itself go to committee to be discussed or, if that is too much to ask at this stage of the game, I would be quite happy if someone were to move that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter be referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills for further study.

Mr. W. R. Kent (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks on the bill now before the house relating to the dissolution of the marriage of persons domiciled in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. This bill purports to extend the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada to entertain divorce suits and to grant divorces to persons domiciled in those two provinces.

As one of the elected representatives of the province of Newfoundland I wish to place on record my attitude toward this bill. As hon. members know, this is the first parliament during which I have had the privilege of sitting in this house. I have heard the matter of divorce discussed on the presentation of divorce bills here. I am a member of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills to which divorce bills come after they are given second reading here, and I have given this problem a great deal of thought. I have no doubt the hon. member who introduced this bill did so with the sincere intention and honest endeavour to provide a means of dealing with the matter of divorce in the provinces concerned, in a manner he believes will be suitable and acceptable to all and which will take the place of the present procedure. For that he is entitled to full credit. However, I have to say that I cannot support this bill.

There were no divorce courts in Newfoundland and no divorce legislation prior to union with Canada, and there has been no change in that situation since union. In support of that statement I should like to refer to the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada, and in particular to clause 18.

18. (1) Subject to these terms, all laws in force in Newfoundland at or immediately prior to the date of union shall continue therein as if the union had not been made, subject nevertheless to be repealed, abolished, or altered by the parliament of Canada or by the legislature of the province of Newfoundland according to the authority of the parliament or of the legislature under the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, and all orders, rules and regulations made under any such laws shall likewise continue, subject to be revoked or amended by the body or person that made such orders, rules, or regulations or the body or person that has power to make such orders, rules or regulations after the date of union, according to their respective authority under the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946.

(2) Statutes of the parliament of Canada in force at the date of union, or any part thereof, shall come into force in the province of Newfoundland on a day or days to be fixed by act of parliament of Canada or by proclamation of the governor general in council issued from time to time, and any such proclamation may provide for the repeal of any of the laws of Newfoundland that

(a) are of general application;

(b) relate to the same subject matter as the statute or part thereof so proclaimed; and

(c) could be repealed by the parliament of Canada under paragraph one of this term.

(3) Notwithstanding anything in these terms, the parliament of Canada may with the consent of the legislature of the province of Newfoundland repeal any law in force in Newfoundland at the date of union.

(4) Except as otherwise provided by these terms, all courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction and all legal commissions, powers, authorities, and functions, and all officers and functionaries, judicial, administrative, and ministerial, existing in Newfoundland at or immediately prior to the date of union, shall continue in the province of Newfoundland as if the union had not been made, until altered, abolished, revoked, terminated, or dismissed by the appropriate authority under the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946.

That sets out the jurisdiction of the courts and laws in Newfoundland at the date of union. There has been no change in that situation, except that since Newfoundland entered confederation it would appear that persons in that province seeking divorce may do as those from Quebec have done; that is, proceed by way of petition and the enactment of a private act of the federal parliament. At present there are no divorce courts in Newfoundland, and I have heard of no intention or express desire of the people of Newfoundland to set any up. The bill before us proposes to change the situation, and virtually set up divorce courts or provide divorce jurisdiction before which persons seeking divorces in Quebec and Newfoundland could be heard. In my opinion this should not be done unless the people of those provinces desire it.

I know the hon. member in introducing this bill stated it did not establish divorce courts in Quebec or Newfoundland. My contention is to the contrary, and that it has the effect of virtually establishing divorce courts in those provinces. So far as I understand, and can ascertain, the exchequer court is a court that has power to sit on circuit. Section 34 of the Exchequer Court Act reads as follows:

Subject to rules of court, any judge of the exchequer court may sit and act at any time and at any place in Canada for the transaction of the business of the exchequer court or any part thereof.

As I see it, therefore, when the Exchequer Court of Canada sits on circuit in Quebec or Newfoundland, it brings a divorce court into those provinces. In addition to that, we might well be passing an enactment not suitable to the provinces concerned. Newfoundland is new to confederation, and new to the idea of divorce law applicable to that province. I feel that I should not support any bill to set up divorce courts in Newfoundland, nor to make any change in the present situation, unless I am satisfied such a change would be suitable and acceptable to the people. I am not satisfied on this point so far. I believe the establishment of divorce courts is a matter for the provinces concerned to decide for themselves, and not for us.

Further, I am not satisfied that this bill is appropriate to the situation. The exchequer court is a court having special jurisdiction in causes involving crown matters relating to patents, trade-marks, copyrights, income tax appeals and other allied proceedings not in the same class as divorce actions. It seems to me, therefore, that the procedure set out in this bill is not the correct procedure to adopt.

[Mr. Kent.]

In giving jurisdiction to the exchequer court, legal and practical difficulties might arise under the provisions contained in the Exchequer Court Act. Under this bill the care of the children and other matrimonial causes are left to the provincial courts. This involves an examination of the jurisdiction of provincial courts in order to be sure that it would be adequate to cover this very important consideration. It must be remembered that Newfoundland has no divorce courts, and that although certain jurisdiction resides in the Newfoundland courts in relation to such matters, I would require to be satisfied that the jurisdiction of the Newfoundland courts would be adequate in this respect.

For the reasons stated, Mr. Speaker, I cannot support this bill and propose to vote against it.

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): As representative of a constituency located in one of the two provinces mentioned in the bill before the house, I feel it is my privilege to express my own views on the subject. I want to say that if a vote is called upon the bill, I shall vote against it. Since I desire to be as clear and precise as possible, I shall continue in my own language.

(Translation):

I can say without exaggeration, Mr. Speaker, that if the citizens of the province of Quebec were called upon to express themselves directly on the merits of Bill 13, an overwhelming majority would vote against it.

The people of Quebec are sincerely convinced that marriage is indissoluble. Therefore they have no use for courts of law that would dissolve marriage and grant divorces. This firm belief comes from two main sources: firstly, our code of civil law, and secondly the Catholic faith, which is our official religion.

(1) Section 185 of the civil code of the province of Quebec states that:

Marriage is dissolved only through the natural death of one of the partners; as long as both are living, it is indissoluble.

All hon. members must know that Quebec is still governed by the old French civil law, which of course has undergone some changes and amendments, but which formerly, at least, did not recognize divorce.

Until the Union Act of 1840, divorce was never recognized, de facto or de jure, by the legislatures of Upper and Lower Canada.

In 1857, the imperial parliament in London passed a divorce act and Lord Stanley, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, pressed the Canadian government to vote similar legislation. A proposal to set up a divorce court was even submitted to the Canadian parliament in June, 1858, but it was turned down.

In 1860, a new petition requesting enactment of divorce legislation was again submitted to the Canadian parliament but it was not approved. No other proposal of this kind was introduced during the whole of the Union regime in Canada. In other words, until confederation, in 1867, the parliament of Canada, which then included present day Ontario and Quebec, would not recognize the principle of divorce.

That, however, is not altogether correct since, under the Union regime, from 1840 to 1867, the parliament of Canada, without agreeing to put divorce legislation in the statutes, nonetheless approved four private bills granting divorce.

We come now to the constitution of 1867. There, for the first time, the principle of divorce was recognized. Section 91 of the British North America Act vested in the dominion parliament the exclusive right to legislate in the matter of marriage and divorce.

Whether we like it or not, and much as I regret to admit it, as far as divorce is concerned, it is strictly within the power of the parliament of Canada to legislate for Quebec and Newfoundland, as well as for any other province. It was thought for a time, particularly in the province of Quebec, that under section 129 of the Canadian constitution Quebec could be preserved from that extremely hazardous situation in respect of divorce and matrimony. However, section 91 inevitably reminds us of that sad situation.

Of course, all this was not agreed to without at least some protests from some of the Catholic religious leaders in Quebec. Such protests, however, were ignored.

There even was talk of a compromise said to have been reached at the time between certain representatives of the Quebec religious and civil authorities on the one hand, and the fathers of confederation on the other. It was suggested that the minority element and the Quebec Protestants would gain by this compromise.

Moreover, in 1888, the right of the federal parliament to enact divorce legislation took concrete form with the establishment of a senate committee which became, in effect, a real divorce court charged with hearing cases originating in Quebec and Ontario.

That is why today, although I oppose this bill with all the energy at my command, I feel the greatest forbearance towards those who suggest a change in the practical application of a principle which, unfortunately, was given clear recognition at the time of confederation and which, in 1888, destroyed the indissolubility of Christian marriages in all Canadian provinces, Quebec included.

At the time, this parliament decided to retain the divorce laws in force before confederation. British Columbia, in 1858, had adopted the divorce law passed by the imperial parliament the previous year. In 1857 the maritime provinces already had their own laws. In 1886 and 1888 the federal parliament enacted two laws (49 Victoria, chapter 25 and 51 Victoria, chapter 33) whereby jurisdiction in divorce matters was handed to the superior courts of the three prairie provinces.

In 1930, through 20-21 George V, chapter 14, passed by the federal parliament, the province of Ontario was in turn invested with the right to have its divorce cases settled by its own supreme court.

Therefore only Quebec and Newfoundland are still left without any proper court to hear divorce cases.

Has the Canadian parliament the right to foist such a court upon them? I hesitate to venture an answer and I leave it to those members who are better qualified to defend a cause which, from a strictly legal point of view, seems to me already lost.

The explanatory note in the bill now before the house says that it "does not establish divorce courts in Quebec and Newfoundland". Very well; but I would very much like to know what practical or basic difference there is between establishing a divorce court in Quebec or for the province of Quebec. Will not husbands and wives be separated and homes destroyed just as before, with all the consequences we know.

If this Bill 13 were to be adopted, I would much rather see the present system maintained, though I detest it wholeheartedly, for it is both disgraceful and unsound. Disgraceful, because of the way the investigations are made; unsound, because of the waste of time it entails for officials who have so much else to do.

Besides, is it not strange that generally it is members from other provinces who strive to find ways and means of settling matrimonial disputes arising in the province of Quebec? It has been said that their aim is to take these matters out of the hands of the federal parliament. If the federal parliament is annoyed with divorce petitions from the province of Quebec, all it has to do is to set them aside, to ignore them, and the province of Quebec will be satisfied!

If petitioners for special bills designed to make divorce easier had as much trouble getting a hearing before parliament as certain other petitioners whose requests are sometimes perfectly reasonable, there would soon be a marked drop in the number of Quebec people who would monopolize the valuable time and the sacred duties of the legislators in an attempt to have bills adopted that clash with our own civil code and the immutable principles of Catholic faith!

Although I fear that it might perhaps be difficult, from a strict constitutional point of view, to prevent the parliament of Canada from legislating for Quebec on divorce matters, I feel reassured when I appeal to the uprightness, the common sense, the intelligence and the good will of the members of this house.

I do not question in the least the intention of the mover of this bill. On the contrary, I believe he is sincere and anxious to solve a difficult problem in the most effective manner. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would therefore ask him if he considers it wise to introduce a bill which is a direct attack upon the religious beliefs of the great majority of the people of Quebec. Those people believe in the teachings of Christ, who said and I quote from the gospel according to St. Mark:

> What therefore God hath joined together let not man put asunder.

We find a very similar statement in St. Matthew. Therefore, not only are we forbidden, as Catholics, to recognize divorce or the courts where divorce hearings are held, but as Catholics we are not allowed—at least it is my humble opinion—to share in the drafting or passage of bills that in fact institute divorce for persons joined in Catholic marriages.

For that reason, every time special legislation or private bills are introduced in connection with divorce I shall avail myself of our present privilege to oppose them, as the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) did a moment ago.

I do not see what use divorce or the alarmingly increasing number of divorced persons can be to Canada or the Canadian people. According to the saying, "As goes the family, so goes the nation". The family is the basis, the bedrock of a nation.

In a booklet published in 1949 by the information branch of the United Nations Organization, I find a chapter which bears the title: "General Declaration of the Rights of Man." In paragraph 3 of section 16, the General Assembly states:

> The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and state.

Will anyone deny that divorce destroys home and family?

Think of the lot in store for the victims of their parents' divorce and separation. Think of those innocent beings who, too often, unfortunately, are in danger of becoming human derelicts. Remember that, far too frequently, we are, I am sorry to say, much more interested in dealing with the lot of divorced parents than with that of their children. Do not forget that, as it becomes increasingly easier to obtain a divorce, far too many married couples will not even think of setting up their home on the firm bases which are likely to make it a permanent institution. Yet we know that children are sometimes an obstacle in the way of an easy divorce and that, as a result, a great many married people prevent the child from taking its place in the home! When we reflect on all that, are we not justified in saying that divorce destroys the family and that it is a blight on the body of marital society?

It is not by laws or by divorce courts that threatened homes can be stabilized. It is not by weakening the ties of marriage that marriage will be strengthened. This principle is acknowledged today by most right-thinking sociologists. In the United States, "marriage clinics" have been created where an attempt is made, outside the courts of justice, to mend broken homes. That is, undoubtedly, a useful, though inadequate gesture. We need better remedies.

That is why in Quebec we have realized the seriousness of the situation—one would have to be blind to fail to see the danger that threatens Quebec—and have established during the last few years, not "marriage clinics" but "marriage preparation clinics".

They are meant to fully inform future wives and husbands of the greatness of marriage, about its sanctity, its importance to the couple's earthly and eternal happiness, to teach them the true ends of marriage, the permitted things and those which are forbidden.

This method, I hope, will restore unto marriage that Christian quality of everlastingness which it is in the process of losing.

I remember having heard last year a member of this house remark: "It is better to separate if you cannot go on living together." I should be tempted to answer that by the converse statement: "Better not to get married at all if it is only to be separated." That, Mr. Speaker, might be the crux of this whole matter. In certain quarters, even among certain members of the legal profession, it is suggested that we make divorce easier, for all kinds of reasons. The simplest reason, and that which requires no demonstration, is that it is hoped to have the largest number of divorces possible. If this theory of easier divorce gains favour, we will soon have a situation in which the first marriage will become, all too often unfortunately, a probationary period, a novitiate, a period of apprenticeship, a trial flight, a test through which one will try to find out if the partner with whom one is temporarily associated is capable of rendering all the services which will serve to satisfy one's narrow egotistical nature, without too much being expected in return; or else one shall try to find out how long the rose which has been picked will retain its scent, all the while seeking, in somebody else's garden, another flower with finer petals and sweeter scent, a flower in full bloom when the time comes to replace the one that has just withered!

Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec does not recognize divorce, it does not want it, it does not want a court to regulate it and it believes there is no need for the parliament of Canada, or for a court established by parliament, to waste their time in granting it favours which it does not want and for which it has no use.

For all those reasons, I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. Fernand Viau (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I regret that very little time is left for me to—

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume consideration of the matter under discussion at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house resumed in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Meteorological division—

512. Meteorological services, $4,958,450.

Mr. Lennard: Is there any explanation of this item? I was not in the house at six o'clock. Was an explanation given?

Mr. Chevrier: This is the ordinary meteorological services item for weather stations of the department.

Mr. Wright: Is all meteorological work in the different departments of the government done by the Department of Transport, or have the navy and the air force meteorological stations of their own?

Mr. Chevrier: No; we do the work for the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Brooks: I notice on page 302 that in 1949-50 there were 49 meteorologists, grade 3. In 1950-51 there are 119. If you follow it through you find that in 1949-50 there were 9 assistants and this year there are 30. Another item shows 9 previously and 143 for this year. Why has there been such a change in the number?

Mr. Chevrier: For the same reason I gave on a number of other votes, because temporaries have become permanents.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to know a little more about this in so far as it can be explained to a layman. Is this service maintained in the interests of flying, both civilian and military?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, and for other purposes as well. Climatological surveys are made and published from time to time.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What about marine work?

Mr. Chevrier: It covers all marine and navigational work, ship to shore.

Item agreed to.

Meteorological division—

513. Construction and improvements, $600,625.

Mr. Lennard: An item of $170,000 is shown for printing, stationery and office equipment; what part is for office equipment?

Mr. Chevrier: I would not think there would be any office equipment in this vote. To what page is my hon. friend referring?

Mr. Lennard: Page 303, near the bottom.

Mr. Chevrier: I can give my hon. friend a breakdown of that item of $170,625. In addition to the usual items of printing, stationery and office equipment there is a sub-item covering meteorological maps, charts and special forms required for the operation of the forecast offices; teletype paper for all stations served by the teletype network, and publication of climatological and other meteorological data in pamphlet form.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to remind the minister that some questions on the teletype service were left over to be brought up when he thought best. The minister will remember that he wanted them left over until a later item and I am leaving it to him to say when he would like to deal with them. They do come up under this item.

Mr. Chevrier: When my hon. friend brought those up I referred him to two items, 510 and 511, which have to do with the north-west communication system. I understood when those items were called that the information given at that time was satisfactory. If there is additional information my hon. friend wants perhaps I could get it for him later on.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My questions were left over on the understanding that the minister wanted them to be brought up later and I do not think reference was made to any special items. My questions can be asked now. What teletype services have we outside the country, for example, to Washington?

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if we could not leave that for later discussion? An item will be allowed to stand to permit a discussion next Friday. I was under the impression that the matter was discussed under those two items. I have not an answer to the question which my hon. friend has asked.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We do not want to have a jangle about this thing, but I made it very clear just what I wanted, the minister asked to have it left over, and I agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: Let us get this clear. I asked to have it left over and if you consult Hansard you will see that I specifically mentioned 510 and 511. Those are the two votes under which it could be brought up.

Mr. Lennard: You just skipped them.

An hon. Member: They are passed.

Mr. Chevrier: I know they are passed and nothing was said about the matter. I certainly was not going to tell my hon. friend to go ahead and ask questions. If the hon. member has been harmed in any way he will have an opportunity of bringing it up again.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am asking it now and I am going to stick to it. I am not going to take a chance of any further misunderstanding.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Knowles: You may not get it when we are dealing with freight rates.

Mr. Chevrier: The teletype is used to collect weather data from the whole country. I am informed that there are over 20,000 miles of teletype.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have asked what teletype service we have outside the country, particularly to Washington.

Mr. Chevrier: The information I have is that the teletype service extends to the border only where it connects with the United States service.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is that the only teletype service we have between here and Washington? Is there any other service by the Department of External Affairs or the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Chevrier: I could not answer for those two departments.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understood the minister to answer me a while ago that his department did communications work for the other departments.

Mr. Chevrier: No; I said that we did meteorological service work for the other departments.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is right; I accept the correction. Does the minister say that he does not know whether there are any other teletype services between here and Washington?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, that is the answer. There may be in external affairs and defence but I am not aware of them. I cannot answer for the other departments. In so far as our department is concerned, the service goes to the border only.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When we are dealing with defence estimates we will know about transport, but how do we find out whether there is duplication or triplication?

Mr. Chevrier: Surely my hon. friend does not expect me to tell him whether he will find it in defence or external affairs. All I can be expected to give is what there is in this department.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would expect the minister to know whether he was operating a service that duplicated or triplicated other services. It seems to me that that would be a natural question to ask and I would be very much surprised if the officials did not know.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Whisper a bit to your right and find out.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not need to whisper. I am trying to do my best with this department and I do not think that is a fair remark to make. It is difficult enough to pass estimates and sometimes a minister gets impatient, rightly or wrongly, and I do not think that is a fair remark to make. I am informed that the teletype service we have is filled completely with messages concerning the weather and meteorological services. Therefore it would not have anything to do with messages from external affairs or national defence to places outside the country.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am grateful for that. I think we can quite clearly infer there probably are other services, and perhaps we will come to them later.

Item agreed to.

Radio division—

515. Radio direction finding stations, radio beacons and radio telegraph stations, operation and maintenance, $1,952,250.

Mr. Catherwood: Has the minister a record of how many radio beacons were in operation at the end of 1949, and can he also tell us how many will be in operation by the end of 1950?

Mr. Chevrier: Forty-seven radio beacon stations are covered by this vote.

Mr. Catherwood: Can the minister tell me the approximate cost of a radio beacon?

Mr. Chevrier: It is about $150,000.

Item agreed to.

Radio division—

516. Suppression of radio interferences, $354,885.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I hope the minister will not think I am rude, and that he will curb his impatience. I do not know whether I am on the right item. I want to ask about the collection of radio licence fees.

Mr. Chevrier: That is the next item.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister say a word as to the activities involved in the suppression of radio interferences which involves this amount?

Mr. Chevrier: There are a number of employees stationed at headquarters of the radio division in Ottawa, and staffs are located in twenty-four cities across Canada. Over and above that, there are forty-six specially equipped radio patrol cars maintained for the investigation of interference. As a matter of fact there is a continual demand for investigation of interference in various towns, cities and communities, and that is done. The investigators, with their radio patrol cars, first interview those who have reported interference. They test the radio to ascertain whether there is anything radically wrong with it. Most of the time they discover it is because of an oil burner or some radioactive instrument, be it medical, dental or the like, and the person with the offending instrument is asked to discontinue its use or purchase some scientific device that will suppress the interference. On the whole I think a very helpful and satisfactory service is being performed.

Item agreed to.

Radio division—

517. Issue of radio receiving licences—(transport department only), $705,340.

Mr. Lennard: What is the reason for the increase of some $25,000?

Mr. Chevrier: The increase is $54,000.

Mr. Lennard: What is the reason for it?

Mr. Chevrier: The increase is, first, because of salaries, annual and basic salary rate increases.

Mr. Knowles: The increase is $30,000.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry, I was looking at item 516. The increase is $30,846.

Mr. Knowles: We just saved you $24,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Keep on assisting me and I will not object. It is made up of $29,000 for increases in salaries, $500 for postage, the rental of a tabulator, and an increase in commissions to postmasters of $578, which makes $30,846.

Mr. Lennard: Can the minister tell me what the revenue was from the licences issued?

Mr. Chevrier: The gross revenue from the sale of radio licences has been continually on the increase. For 1949-50 it is $5,143,000.

Mr. Lennard: What is the net? That is the gross.

Mr. Chevrier: That is the gross revenue from the sale of licences. Commissions paid amounted to $331,652. Therefore the amount paid to the C.B.C. is the addition of $5,143,000 and $331,000 making $5,474,000.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Does the minister know how many radio receiving sets in operating condition there are in Canada? I might as well explain what I have in mind. Have you any idea how many people are using receiving sets in Canada compared with the number of persons who pay licence fees for the use of sets?

Mr. Chevrier: I can only answer that question in this way. The number of those who are owners of radio receiving sets and who have paid their licences is 2,177,445. There is no way of knowing accurately the total number of radio receiving sets, but by means of spot checks carried out from time to time in various cities we think that this number represents about 95 per cent of the total number of receiving sets in the country.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Have you not a better method than that? There are publications which tell you the number of receiving sets sold in Canada in 1949, 1948, and so on. They are available and I assume you have them. I was wondering how the number of persons from whom licence fees are collected has kept pace with the sale of new radios. Of course some of them will be replacements but have you any idea as to that? For example, the exact number for television is available at any time, but have you made any comparison between the number of radio licence fees sold in 1948 and 1949 and the number of new radios purchased?

Mr. Chevrier: We have not, for the reason that there may be as many as five radio sets in one house. The only thing the department is interested in is to see that the $2.50 licence fee is collected on one of those sets. That is the case today in many homes. I do not say there is an average of five, far from it; but I think it is pretty safe to say that in most homes there are two, if not three, small sets. I am also told that some of the sets become obsolescent and the owners break them up, throw them away or dispose of them by other means. For that reason it is difficult to make an accurate check of the full number of sets in the country. The way we get at it is by spot checks and percentages; and, as I said, we think the percentage is about 95.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Would you tell me what a spot check is?

Mr. Chevrier: It is a check that is made by an officer of this division who would go into a number of houses, I suppose—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Take a city of one hundred thousand people. How many houses would he cover?

Mr. Chevrier: They would take several streets and go into a number of houses, and by that method ascertain the percentage of those who had sets who were paying the licence fee. The result of those checks in various parts of the country would give the percentage I mentioned. I am informed now that fifty thousand homes were checked by this spot method.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Out of how many?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, all across the country.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): But out of what total number of receiving sets?

Mr. Chevrier: Out of a total of 2,100,000, I think it was.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): And is that check more intense in certain areas than in others? Take a city the size of Toronto. How many men have you working there, and how many in Edmonton doing this sort of work?

Mr. Chevrier: There would be about ten people in Toronto, four people in Edmonton, I suppose about fifteen in Montreal—

Mr. Knowles: None in Calgary?

Mr. Chevrier: Twelve to fifteen in Calgary.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The minister should be grateful to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for again helping him out. Knowing something of the situation, however, I assure the minister that he needs even more than that number, because I know many people who do not pay their licence fees. That is the thing I am getting at.

Mr. Knowles: They will be taking you on the staff.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am not a good snooper; that is the trouble. When the minister said they entered houses I do not think he quite meant that. They make inquiries; that is the kind of check, I suppose?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They have no right to enter houses.

Mr. Chevrier: No. If somebody objects they have no right to insist.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I was merely trying to correct your language, not mine. Have you not a car which you can drive around the streets and which will tell you in what residences there are radios?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I suppose that is how you determine where to go to make your inquiries; or perhaps it is done by telephone?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The minister says he thinks it is about 95 per cent perfect, as far as the payment of these licence fees is concerned. I wish I were an optimist like that; but that statement is on the basis of the spot checks of homes, apartments and so on?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes. I made it quite clear that we could not have an accurate figure, and I told my hon. friend I could not possibly answer his question except in that way. It may not be the best method, but it is the one we follow as being most feasible.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am not complaining about it. The department gets a list of sales of radios every month, does it not? Does anyone in your organization make a check and follow those radios to their ultimate resting places in the homes?

Mr. Chevrier: The dealers are required to make monthly returns to the department.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Does the department use those returns in calling upon people who have made purchases, to find out whether or not they have paid the licence fee, or does it rely only upon the spot checks?

Mr. Chevrier: I am told that it relies on both.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Do you compare the sales in a city the size of Edmonton, for example, with the number of licences issued? Do they bear any relationship?

Mr. Chevrier: I am told there is no relationship between the two.

Mr. Charlton: A few moments ago the minister said $5,143,000 had been collected in radio licence fees. Then he was asked what the net amount was, and he said $331,000 was commission on those radio licences. Then he made the statement that the C.B.C. was paid $5,474,000.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Charlton: Then do we pay those commissions twice?

Mr. Chevrier: No, we pay them once.

Mr. Charlton: Does not the man who sells the licence get a commission?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, he does. That is covered in the vote.

Mr. Hansell: If I may follow up that question, it would appear to me that the commission is paid twice.

Mr. Charlton: If what the minister has stated is so, it seems to me the commissions on these radio licences are paid twice. They are paid once to the salesmen and once to the C.B.C.

Mr. Chevrier: The C.B.C. gets the full fee of $2.50, which makes up the amount of $5,400,000 I gave a moment ago.

Mr. Charlton: The minister said the C.B.C. was paid $5,474,000. That is the total of the fees collected and the commissions paid, is it not?

Mr. Chevrier: No; the C.B.C. gets $5,400,000, which is made up of $5,100,000 from the sale of licences and $331,000 in commissions. That has to be done by virtue of an amendment to the Canadian Broadcasting Act passed on July 17, 1947, under which the amount of commissions paid to issuers of licences and formerly deducted from the gross revenues payable to the C.B.C. now is paid out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Charlton: How many radio licences were sold?

Mr. Chevrier: 2,177,000.

Mr. Charlton: What was the total amount collected?

Mr. Chevrier: $5,143,000.

Mr. Charlton: Then by paying the C.B.C. $5,143,000 they are getting the full amount of the licence fee collected?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Charlton: Without paying the commission of $331,000?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Charlton: But the minister says the C.B.C. gets $5,400,000?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, they do; they get both.

Mr. Hansell: On page 307 we have the explanatory note showing an amount of $375,000 as payment to the C.B.C. of the amount of commissions allowed issuers of licences. Is that part of the total of the $2.50 licence fees paid in Canada, or is it over and above that?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is. It is the full amount of the commissions.

Mr. Hansell: I know this is the full amount of the commissions; but is the C.B.C. paid the full $2.50 for all the licences in Canada, plus $375,000?

Mr. Cardiff: May I ask this question?

Mr. Hansell: I want the answer to my question first.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps while the minister is getting the answer to that question I could advise the member for Saskatoon to ask his question.

Mr. Knight: I wanted to follow for a moment the line of thought the member for Calgary West embarked upon concerning radios which are newly purchased. I presume each radio which is imported from the United States is a subject for notification by the department of government concerned to the licensing branch of the Department of Transport. Is that correct?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that returns are made from the customs office to the Department of Transport.

Mr. Knight: I thought the Department of Transport was efficient in that direction, because when passing through the United States on my way home last summer I bought a car radio. As soon as I reached home I bought a licence for it from the transport division in my own city. Along about the time the snow fell last fall, I received a rather sharp letter from the department asking for some explanation of why I had not purchased a licence for imported radio No. so and so.

Mr. Knowles: You call that efficiency?

Mr. Knight: Just a minute. The letter said: If by any chance you have paid your licence for this thing, what is the number of your licence? I instituted a search in my home, and after a couple of days we found the receipt from the Department of Transport. I wrote a little note stating that I thought perhaps an explanation was due to me, and I gave them the number. I want to know what would have happened if I had been unable to find that particular receipt. The minister has not heard anything I have said.

Mr. Chevrier: I am trying to get an answer for the member for Macleod. I hope I have it now. The licensee pays $2.50 to the Department of Transport for a licence. We pay the full amount of the $2.50 to the C.B.C., which amounts to $5,474,707—I think that is the figure I gave. The vendor commissions amount to $331,000, the amount I gave.

Mr. Knowles: Is not the confusion created by the way it is worded on page 307, where it says that this payment is made to the C.B.C., the amount of commissions allowed issuers of licences? What is the amount on each individual $2.50 licence?

Mr. Chevrier: There is $2.30 paid to the department, and 20 cents paid to the vendor.

Mr. Knowles: In other words the C.B.C. gets $2.30 direct from the citizen, plus the 20 cents that is paid out of the $375,000 in this item?

Mr. Chevrier: I have nothing more to add to what I said a moment ago. I am trying to say that the C.B.C. gets $5,474,000. My hon. friend is putting it in another form, and he may be correct; I am not sure.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They get the full $2.50 and the department takes up the cost of sale.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knight: Could I have an answer to my question? I know the minister was not listening, and I advised against the consideration of it while he was working out the other problem. If I bring a car radio into this country from the United States, notification of that importation is given to your department. I then proceed to buy a licence. Your department notifies me that I should buy a licence; that is what happened to me the last time; and if I had not been able to find my receipt to prove that I had bought that particular licence, what action could or would your department have taken? What protection have I?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Habeas corpus.

Mr. Knight: I become responsible for the mistake made by the department?

Mr. Chevrier: No, you become responsible for your own mistake—

Mr. Knight: Which was losing the receipt?

Mr. Chevrier: No, because the department keeps a duplicate copy of the receipt which was originally given, and the department will not proceed against the owner unless there is a breach of the act.

Mr. Knight: In that case, the next question is the obvious one: If the department had a receipt in the month of May, just after I got home from the session, why did they bill me for the licence in the month of November?

Mr. Chevrier: I presume my hon. friend has a particular case in mind.

Mr. Knight: Yes, my own.

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I cannot tell the hon. member why the department billed him. Probably they were in error; I do not know but that is possible.

Mr. Knight: When the department wrote to me and asked for an explanation, I wrote to them and told them the number of the licence and said I thought probably an explanation was due to me. It was not forthcoming. No attention was paid to my letter, so I thought I would get the explanation from the minister.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): There is nothing like trying.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Could the minister tell me how many prosecutions there have been and what penalties have been imposed? What has been the total amount collected?

Mr. Chevrier: There have been 9,524 prosecutions.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Does the minister have the information by provinces?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; British Columbia, 375; Alberta, 547; Ontario, 5,511; Quebec, 865; Nova Scotia, 795; New Brunswick, 195; P.E.I., 240.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What has been the cost to the department for these prosecutions?

Mr. Chevrier: The issue of licences and the collection of fees came to $306,000 for the term 1949-50.

Mr. Hansell: The total amount of this vote appears to be $705,340. This is for the radio division, the issuing and collecting of licence fees. Are we to conclude that it cost $705,000 to issue and collect $5,143,000?

Mr. Chevrier: No; as I indicated at the outset, this appropriation of $705,340 provides for salaries and other expenditures to the headquarters staff of the office here in Ottawa. The amount payable for the collection of licences is only a small portion of this vote. It is much less than half.

Mr. Hansell: I was referring to the issuing and the collecting of licences.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, it covers headquarters staff and field offices engaged in the issuing of radio receiving licences. If there were no licences there would be no vote.

Mr. Lennard: That is right; in other words, it does cost over $700,000 to collect these fees, because there would be neither office nor headquarters staff if we were not collecting radio licence fees.

Mr. Chevrier: The answer is yes and no. It does cost $705,000 to administer the branch, but to collect the licences, alone, it does not cost that much.

Mr. Lennard: It costs about 14 per cent, roughly, to collect them?

Mr. Chevrier: We worked it out last year at 12 per cent.

Mr. Lennard: It is a little more this year, so it would be probably 13 per cent.

Mr. Chevrier: And there is a little more revenue, too.

Mr. Fraser: Would the minister give us the number of licences issued for automobiles and trucks? I am referring of course to licences for radios in those vehicles. Are they kept separate, or is there any separation in that respect?

Mr. Chevrier: I think we can get that figure for the hon. member.

Mr. Fraser: And, while you are getting it, may I ask what arrangements you have with the post office department in paying commissions to them for the collection of fees. Is that paid in bulk, or is it paid separately?

Mr. Chevrier: It is 15 cents for one licence, instead of the 20 cents to the ordinary vendor.

Mr. Fraser: And is it paid in bulk or sent separately to the different post offices across Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: Many of the post offices get books in advance. They return them, with the ordinary returns, to the post office; and there is a refund in that manner.

Mr. Fraser: Then the main Post Office Department here handles the whole thing for you; is that correct?

Mr. Chevrier: Only the staff post offices do that.

Mr. Fraser: And the other post offices receive them direct?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: What about the car licences?

Mr. Chevrier: Could we carry this item, and permit me to give that information as we go along?

Mr. Brooks: In collecting these licences the Post Office Department does some of the work, and there are returned soldiers and others who make collections. Very often there is a time limit imposed in respect of the date at which the licences should be obtained. However, a good many people wait until the returned soldier or some other person, who has been in the habit of making the collection, comes around. Many people do not know whether to go to the post office or whether they could wait for the returned soldier. Is there any co-operation between the two, or are any instructions sent out in that connection?

Mr. Chevrier: There is the advice that goes out over the radio prior to the first of April. People who have radios will learn that licences are due in that way, because the notice is broadcast many times as the hon. member probably knows. These broadcasts indicate when licence fees are payable. It is at that time that the returned man who is a vendor begins his canvass. However, if the ordinary licensee wishes to purchase at the post office, I suppose there is nothing to stop him doing so.

Mr. Brooks: But is any encouragement given to the returned man? It is a personal matter with me, because I might say my wife always wishes to purchase from a returned soldier, but he does not get around until after the time has expired.

Mr. Chevrier: The encouragement given is that he gets 10 cents more than the post office gets.

Mr. Harkness: I always receive a brown card about so long and so wide telling me that my radio licence fee is due. Are those sent to everybody, or only to people in arrears?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed they are sent to everyone who had a licence in the previous year.

Mr. Harkness: How much does that cost,—because it seems to me that if canvassers are going around to sell these licences it is a waste of money to send out these cards to those who had licences in the year before.

Mr. Chevrier: The card has been very effective, and that is why we use it. It helps very materially in increasing the revenue, because, as the committee will see, the revenue has been increasing considerably from these sales. I cannot give the cost separately, but it is covered in this amount of $705,340.

Mr. McLure: In listening to all these figures I have become confused about these radio licences. As I have it now there were two million and one licences sold.

Mr. Knowles: I believe the figure was 2,100,000.

Mr. McLure: Oh, it was 2,100,000 was it? At $2.50 that gives something over $5 million, and yet the C.B.C. got $5,474,000.

Mr. Chevrier: There are a number of battery sets for which the fee is only $2.

Item agreed to.

Radio division—

518. Telegraph and telephone service, administration, operation and maintenance, $1,354,845.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Why is this item, which deals with telegraph and telephone service, in the radio division estimates? Is it out of place?

Mr. Chevrier: I think not, because it is a form of telecommunication. In the department we find radio, telephone, telegraph—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Any teletype in there?

Mr. Chevrier: If I am wise, the answer is no. That is the only explanation I can give. It is a form of telecommunication.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): In other words, it has nothing to do with radio?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Although it is under that heading.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. Harkness: What are those telephones and telegraphs? From where do they run?

Mr. Chevrier: They run throughout the country. They are services for isolated areas which could not provide telephone services for themselves unless some company were assisted. So to come to the assistance of points in the eastern part of Canada, Newfoundland, the maritimes and out on the west coast and on the Gaspe peninsula we provide the services and we operate them. The Minister of Public Works says, "also in British Columbia".

Mr. Harkness: Does the department get any revenue?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes.

Mr. Harkness: Where does it appear?

Mr. Knowles: It goes into the pot.

Mr. Abbott: Study the public accounts and you will know the answer; do your homework and you will find out.

Mr. Chevrier: The expenditure for the last fiscal year was $1,130,000; the revenue was $498,000.

Mr. Harkness: The total figure here for last year is $1,331,000. The minister gave the figure of $1,130,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I gave the expenditure for the last fiscal year. That is the estimate for this fiscal year. The hon. member asked me what amount of revenue was received. I say that last year the revenue received amounted to $498,000. I cannot tell what it will be this year because I will not know until the end of the fiscal year, but the estimate is about $500,000.

Mr. Harkness: The estimate last year was $1,331,060 and the expenditure was $1,130,000. The department spent the sum of $200,000 less than the amount estimated for.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed the reason is that we were unable to secure all the material and equipment which were necessary to put up the lines and the extensions.

Mr. Harkness: Where is the other $200,000? Did it go back into the consolidated revenue fund, or does it show in these accounts?

Mr. Chevrier: Any revenue that is received is paid into the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Harkness: It just remains there. But where does it show in these accounts? I do not see where the unexpended $200,000 appears.

Mr. Chevrier: Of course, these are not accounts; they are estimates of expenditure for the next fiscal year.

Mr. Harkness: However, quite frequently in some of these departments I see an unexpended appropriation not required. For instance, veterans affairs on the very next page, shows: "Appropriation not required for 1950-51, $10,000." You see the same thing right through the estimates. Why was not the $200,000 which was not required last year shown in the same way?

Mr. Chevrier: That is known as a revote and appears from time to time in the estimates. We have had several of them in these estimates.

Mr. Harkness: This particular item of $200,000 is the one I am asking about. Why does it not appear as an appropriation not required in 1949-50?

Mr. Dickey: There is an item under radio division which reads: "Appropriation not required for 1950-51, $350,000."

Mr. Harkness: I did not notice it before. Is the $200,000 part of that?

Mr. Chevrier: Where is that $350,000?

Mr. Harkness: Right at the bottom of the page.

Mr. Knowles: That was last year.

Mr. Chevrier: What page are you reading from?

Mr. Harkness: Page 63. It appears in italics at the bottom of the page.

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend is referring to item 519, that is for construction and improvements.

Mr. Fulton: No; just below that. It appears in italics, "Appropriation not required."

Mr. Abbott: That is just for the purpose of comparison.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that this was to cover projects that we were not able to carry out, projects which because of the time element it was not possible to complete, and some which were overestimated.

Mr. Harkness: I presume the revenue of $498,000 was put into the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: You get no credit in your estimate for that.

Mr. Chevrier: No, none whatever.

Mr. Fraser: This afternoon the minister said that his department covered all telephones outside Ottawa; that is correct?

Mr. Chevrier: That is correct.

Mr. Fraser: That is, in public buildings throughout, outside Ottawa?

Mr. Chevrier: No; this vote covers services, communication services to remote areas, sparsely settled sections of the country. This does not cover the cost of telephone bills; it is for service, telephone lines which are extended or constructed in remote areas, and would have nothing to do with the cost of government telephones to Vancouver or Edmonton. They are covered separately.

Mr. Lennard: Can the minister explain the increase in this item for telephones, telegrams and postage from $14,600 to $126,500?

Mr. Chevrier: Under the public works system of accounting, this amount was provided for under the rentals primary to cover the payment of charges levied by commercial communication companies for detachment, maintenance and attendance of departmental telephone and telegraph facilities. The amount of $100,000 is involved between Prince George and Prince Rupert, which is paid to the Canadian National Telephone Company; and the remainder is accounted for by a large number of small cases of a similar nature across Canada, which makes up the $111,900.

Mr. Lennard: It is a capital expenditure. It will not occur in another year. It is for work that is being done.

Mr. Chevrier: No; I am told it is a recurring vote.

Mr. Gibson: I do not want to load the Minister of Transport with all the difficulties in the government telegraph service, because after all he has been doing that job only recently. It always seems to me that the government telegraph service has been one of the orphans of the department, that we have had in Ottawa. I have been wondering whether any active objective thinking has been done about the future of the government telephone service. It has often seemed to me that these land lines that we run into the government telephone service have reached a stage where they are now pretty well obsolete. I have been wondering whether the minister or his department had given any consideration to the substitution of radio telephones for those old galvanized wire lines that we run through some of the rougher sections of Canada, which I know are very expensive and very difficult to maintain.

There is another point that comes to my mind. I go into towns and I find that they are well serviced with Canadian National, Canadian Pacific and the government telegraph services. This government telegraph service was founded for the purpose of serving communities that had no other means of communication. I was wondering whether there was any possibility of eliminating any of the offices and probably substituting radio telephone service in areas where it is necessary for the government to provide communication. It would not be necessary to have this service operated by the government telegraph operators as I believe a considerable amount of money could be saved by subsidizing private radio stations who would serve the public when necessary. I believe there is a great opportunity to save money here. I know the minister cannot look after all these things himself but perhaps he will instruct his officers to go to work on this matter of government telegraph services and see if a more efficient service cannot be substituted for it.

Mr. Chevrier: It is true that in some of the outlying districts the service is not what it should be, but it is far better to have a poor service than to have no service at all. I had a visit some two weeks ago from a gentleman from Labrador and he told me that the service there was terrific. That service covers 800 miles along the north shores of the St. Lawrence river and gulf and there is a reason for the type of service that is given. On the other hand, the service along the northwest staging route and the Alaska highway is a pretty efficient service. I have seen it in operation and it is modern and up to date.

We would like to see private or municipal corporations take over these services as we do not like to operate them at all. We do this as a service to the public. Where the population is not very dense we do not like to expend too much money, but following the suggestion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni it may be possible to give consideration to providing a uniform method which would be up to date and more modern.

Mr. Gibson: There is another matter which does not come under this item specifically and I ask the indulgence of the house in taking it up at this time. In the Quatsino district the minister's department chartered a boat from a certain individual at the rate of $4 per day and promised to pay that rate until it was returned. However, it seems that the man in charge of the boat got up one night and was looking around with a match and it blew up. It was a most unfortunate circumstance. The minister's department consulted the Department of Justice who said that there was no legal responsibility. That may be true in the strict legal sense, but the treasury board is now considering a submission from the department. I would be grateful if the minister would take a personal look at this to see if some fair settlement cannot be made.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall be glad to do that.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Gibson.]

Radio division—

519. Telegraph and telephone service—construction and improvements, $460,785.

Mr. Fulton: Could the minister tell us what standards are laid down in connection with the construction or improvement of a service? Is it based on the density of population? In other words, when a request is received from a sparsely populated area for a service is any standard laid down similar to those that exist in the Post Office Department in connection with rural mail routes?

Mr. Chevrier: There is no standard based on the density of population. It is a question of serving the area and also the fact that private companies refuse to service the people. I know of instances where a service has been extended to serve half a dozen people, but it tied in with a circuit already in existence.

Mr. Fulton: Each application is considered on its own merits.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: Where are these lines going to be constructed this year, or does this vote cover only improvements?

Mr. Chevrier: There is quite a list of them. Completion and rehabilitation of 323 miles of telephone lines in the rural areas around Dawson Creek and the modernization and expansion of the telephone system in the town itself. Magdalen islands—establishment of a radio telephone link between the islands and the mainland. Cape Breton, Nova Scotia —metalizing of existing telephone lines in order to improve the service of subscribers.

South shore, St. Lawrence river—Bonaventure, Dorchester, Gaspe and other points, improvement of routes, provision of federal assistance in the repair of existing telephone lines and in the construction of new lines in the area.

Item agreed to.

Terminable services—

Railway service—

520. Acquisition of properties in Canada for U.S. authorities, $17,750.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. Chevrier: These were properties which were acquired during the war from the United States government, turned over to war assets and given by war assets to the Department of Transport for operation. The Department of Transport is trying to sell and dispose of them as quickly as we can, and this item is to pay for rentals, taxes and so on.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—

521. Steep Rock mines—construction, $62,000.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to deal with this and the following item together.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee to deal with these two items together?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: For the last two or three sessions when these items were called I confined myself to asking questions, so as to get what information I could about Steep Rock. In addition I have had some questions on the order paper this year and a notice of motion for the production of papers as a result of which I have been able to get a fairly complete picture of this whole matter.

At the outset let me say that I recognize the urgency that obtained in the middle war years with respect to the production of iron ore and making as much of it available as possible, but it does seem to me that the practice which was instituted then has been carried forward a lot longer than it should have been.

When the figures are added together we are paying quite a bit to subsidize and assist this private corporation. I point out further that what we are assisting Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited to do is not only to mine ore in that very interesting body which was found at the bottom of Steep Rock lake but also to transport it to another country for smelting and fabrication. It raises the whole question whether we should not be using the iron ore in Canada rather than sending it to the United States and then buying it back, thus paying out good money in that way when we might be building up more industry in Canada.

As I understand the situation, an agreement was made involving the government, Canadian National Railways and in effect Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited, a private company which I believe is owned in the United States. The basic terms of the agreement are that in the first place the government would pay to the Canadian National Railways all the money required by them to build a spur line and certain other facilities from Atikokan, Ontario, to the Steep Rock mines. It is a short distance but at any rate considerable facilities had to be built there. In addition, Canadian National was to build a dock at Port Arthur so that the ore could be removed from the cars that brought it to Port Arthur from Atikokan and put on boats to take it across the lakes to the United States. As I say, the first term in this whole arrangement was that the government would pay the entire cost of constructing the facilities at Atikokan and Port Arthur.

It is noted that one of the other terms of the agreement is to the effect that the Canadian National Railways pays back to the government 6 cents on each ton of ore that it transports, for the purpose of repaying the capital expenditures. I note immediately that to date well over $3 million has been spent by the government in construction expenditures and under the 6 cent per ton arrangement we have received from the Canadian National Railways only $239,000. Even at that, when one thinks of money that we are receiving from the Canadian National Railways one has to face the fact that the railway operates at a deficit, and therefore we are paying the money anyway. In the long run the picture is clear that we are paying in full for the extra facilities necessary between Atikokan and Steep Rock and at Port Arthur to make possible the shipment of iron ore from Steep Rock to the United States.

Another phase of the agreement related to the cost of shipping the ore from Steep Rock to the United States. During the war Canadian National indicated that it would cost a certain figure per ton to ship the ore. It was more than the company felt they could afford to pay and accordingly, because it was necessary to move the ore while the war was on, the government agreed to pay Canadian National Railways a subsidy of 20 cents per ton. When I have asked these questions of the minister it has always been pointed out that the money was not paid to Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited but to Canadian National Railways. Obviously it is as broad as it is long. By paying the 20 cents per ton to the Canadian National Railways out of government funds the government saves Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited that amount.

In addition, during the first year or so of the production of iron ore at Steep Rock, during the war when it was thoroughly defensible, it so happened that it was not possible to get the dock completed at Port Arthur, and other means had to be used to ship the ore to the United States. Instead of going to Port Arthur it went through Duluth, which meant that the freight was higher than it would have been going across the lake. Instead of the government having to put up 20 cents per ton to subsidize the freight the agreement indicates that the government put up 70 cents per ton. When one reads the agreement more closely, however, he finds that even the 70 cents per ton did not fully make up for the difference between what it cost to transport the ore and what Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited was paying. There was another 38 cents, and the agreement simply says that Canadian National Railways agreed to absorb that amount. I come back again to the fact that the Canadian National has a deficit and we pay for it out of the consolidated revenue fund. Therefore we paid out of public funds a total amount of $1.08 per ton during the first year or two.

I want to say again, and let there be no doubt about it, that one has no complaint about that practice being followed during the war years. The reason for it was set out clearly in the orders in council initiating this policy. We discussed it at the time and agreed with it. As a matter of fact it is good to know that tremendous body of iron ore was found at the bottom of Steep Rock lake. It is a most interesting mining operation. As hon. members probably know, the lake was drained, and for the most part the mining consists of huge electric shovels simply removing the overburden and then scooping up the ore body from the bottom of the lake. As I say, during the war it was obviously desirable that there should be these subsidies to make sure that the ore would be produced and made available for war purposes, but it is still being carried on.

Every year since the war there has been a vote for construction purposes and also a vote for the subsidy on freight. We are now paying a subsidy of only 20 cents per ton, and the amounts for construction that we are continuing to pay are small, but surely it is clear that what we are now doing is to render considerable financial assistance to a private corporation mining a very valuable natural resource and shipping it in its raw state out of the country for smelting and fabrication in the United States. It seems to me that the policy is all wrong, that if we are going to allow a private corporation to exploit this natural resource and ship it to the United States they at least should pay the whole cost of shipping it there, and we should not have to continue to pay the 20 cent subsidy. If they cannot do it that way then I suggest that here is an excellent opportunity for the development of another industry in this country.

I said earlier that one of the ways in which I was able to get the information which I have been giving the house was by means of questions and so on on the order paper. I ask hon. members to note in particular the answers found in sessional paper No. 171. That return was tabled in this house on Monday, April 24 of this year, and gives detailed answers to the questions I had placed on the order paper. One answer in considerable detail gives the actual amounts spent under the heading of construction expenditures right from the first year, 1944, down to the latest figure for 1950. I have added them up, and they total $3,168,142.13. We have paid that entire amount out of the consolidated revenue fund, and tonight we are asked to vote another $62,000 for construction purposes.

I have already said that there was in the agreement a provision whereby the Canadian National Railways pays back to the consolidated revenue fund at the rate of 6 cents per ton on the ore it transports, but in the end the Canadian National gets that money from the consolidated revenue fund anyway. In addition to that $3,168,142.13 we have spent under this heading already, we have spent another considerable amount of money in subsidizing freight rates with respect to the shipment of that ore. The minister pointed out to me last year that we pay that money to the Canadian National; but we save it for Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited. During the time the subsidy was 70 cents per ton, which was during the years 1944-45 and 1945-46, we paid a total of $258,802.86. That, of course, did not include the 38 cents per ton absorbed by the Canadian National, which we had to pay, and which would amount to another $125,000 or $130,000. In addition to that $258,802.86, we have paid a subsidy since then at the rate of 20 cents per ton, to a total of $796,991.24.

If those two larger amounts are added they come to $1,055,794.10, and in a few moments we will be asked to authorize another amount of $129,066. Just to put those figures in round numbers, they add up to this; that we have paid out $3 million in construction expenditures and over $1 million in subsidizing the shipment of this natural resource out of the country. I have made it pretty clear already, but I should like to make it crystal clear that we had no objection to this being done during the war. But the war has been over for five years, and it does seem to me it is hard to explain a policy under which we keep on subsidizing a private corporation and assist it not only to exploit a raw material in this country but to ship it out of the country at the expense of the people of Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry? Carried.

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister no comment to make on this Steep Rock question?

The Deputy Chairman: Apparently not.

Mr. Fulton: I was expecting the minister to say something; otherwise I would have asked a question.

Mr. Knowles: Then may I ask a question. What is this $62,000 for construction purposes to be spent on?

Mr. Chevrier: The $62,000 is for the construction of 3,000 feet of trackage in the hill yard, required to handle possible increased production from the mine to cost $37,000; for strengthening the ore dock pockets with special lining for handling lump ore, $10,000; the purchase of land, $2,000; engineering expense and surveys and development of plans for additional trackage facilities, $10,000.

Mr. Knowles: That is exactly the point I am trying to make. This sort of thing was defensible from 1942 to 1945, but is it defensible today to keep on spending money in this way, on facilities which are used for one purpose only? No one else uses that spur at Atikokan. Nobody else uses that ore dock at Port Arthur. It is this corporation we are helping by this item.

Mr. Chevrier: The point is quite simple. There are only two matters concerned here, and I do not believe the points made by my hon. friend are well taken. Referring to the subsidy in the first place, that was covered by an agreement during the war years under which the subsidy would be paid until such time as five million tons had been delivered. When the five million tons have been delivered the subsidy will cease. Thus far 4,354,000 tons have been delivered, so the subsidy will not have long to run. That is being done by virtue of an agreement, and I am sure the house would want that agreement to be carried out.

With reference to the acquisition of equipment, that too is covered by an order in council to which my hon. friend has referred. It is a fact that some $3,200,000 has been made available to the Canadian National Railways, which has benefited by it; but by virtue of that agreement the Canadian National have undertaken to pay back that amount by way of amortization, at the rate of 6 cents per ton. It is true that this may take some time, but the agreement is there and the government has safeguarded its interests in the money expended by the six-cent provision.

This was done at a time when ore was necessary, in a time of war. The bargain was well received in the house; in fact I can remember the speeches made by the former member for Davenport, who felt that the government was not going far enough in its expenditures in order to assist the movement of that ore from Atikokan and Port Arthur.

Mr. Green: If the minister will permit me, I think what the former member for Davenport was supporting was the devolpment of an iron mine in Canada. That was his plea.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; and he was insisting—

Mr. Green: It was not a case of urging that it be all shipped out.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not saying that. He was urging that we were not going far enough in the matter of expenditures. There was no question about that. On one or two occasions he felt that we should go further in assisting the development of the mine by way of capital expenditures. This money does not go to a foreign corporation; it goes to our own Canadian National Railways. There is nothing abnormal about it. We are bound to do this by reason of contracts entered into during the war years. As I say, the subsidy is about ended, and as far as the other expenditures are concerned we will receive our money by way of amortization.

Mr. Knowles: I recognize that the subsidy will end when five million tons have been shipped, but the Canadian National will have to continue to pay back the 6 cents per ton on the construction costs, even though it will not be getting that subsidy any more. When we realize that those construction costs amount to more than $3 million and that to date the Canadian National have paid only $239,000, it is apparent that the Canadian National will be paying that 6 cents per ton for a very long time. As far as we are concerned it is just taking it out of one pocket and putting it into another. We will pay the Canadian National deficit so they can pay this 6 cents per ton and pay back the cost of the construction work. Now, the minister talks about the way in which the whole business was conducted during the war years, but many of the contracts made during the war were renegotiated. We had some talk about that this afternoon. It seems to me that what we should have done long ago, was to recommend that the capital expenditure be considered a war expenditure and written off as such. We are not under any moral obligation, once the war is over and the emergency power act is no longer in effect, to continue subsidizing in the way we are.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister say whether there is any power in the contract to insist that the ships in which the ore is carried from Port Arthur across the lakes be Canadian ships? If so, are there any Canadian ships to carry it?

Mr. Chevrier: No, we have not the right to insist that it be carried in Canadian ships. There are Canadian ships for the carriage of the ore.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister know whether it is actually being carried in Canadian ships now?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not able to give that information.

Mr. Fulton: I suggest he look into that, and even if it is not in the contract, surely we are in a position to bring some moral pressure to bear in order to ensure that we at least get that much out of it, that the ore be carried in Canadian bottoms across the lakes.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall look into it.

Mr. Green: Why cannot this ore be used in Canada instead of shipping it to the United States? This is a promising mine, and production is increasing all the time.

Mr. Chevrier: I gave the explanation for that last year, and it is as follows: Approximately 92 per cent of the ore is exported to the United States, and the balance is used by Canadian companies. The reason why it cannot be used here is as follows: The production of various types of steel requires ores of varying analyses, and it is believed that Canadian steel producers are using all of the domestic ores which their type of steel production will allow. The production of malleable pig iron at Port Colborne is being increased, and this is expected to increase the consumption of Steep Rock ore by about 35,000 tons. The ore imported from the United States is a type not produced by Steep Rock mines, or not produced in sufficient quantities to meet Canadian requirements.

Mr. Green: How much is being exported to the United States?

Mr. Chevrier: I said 92 per cent.

Mr. Green: No, in tonnage, what is the tonnage being exported to the United States?

Mr. Chevrier: The last estimate I have is 1,132,000 tons in 1949-50, so there would be 92 per cent of that. It has been increasing from the beginning, because in 1945-46 there were only 128,000 tons.

Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada—

524. Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada—administration, maintenance and operation, $624,800.

Mr. Chevrier: This item refers to the board of transport commissioners, and I think it should stand.

Item stands.

Canadian maritime commission—

525. Administration, $190,170.

Mr. Green: This is the administration item for the Canadian maritime commission which body, as members know, was set up to advise the government on shipping and shipbuilding policy. In fact, they have charge of the shipping and shipbuilding of Canada. I have no intention of going into this policy in detail this evening, but there are three questions I should like to place before the minister.

The first one has to do with the need for Canada to build fast, modern cargo vessels. The other day when the minister was speaking of the ship construction that is being undertaken in Canada, I believe he gave the figure of $67 million over the next five years for construction for the government. At that time I asked him whether any of these fast cargo vessels were being built in any of the shipyards in Canada. His answer was no. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that situation is very serious for Canada. It is a tragedy that we have not yet begun to build these fast cargo vessels.

I should like to refer to the report of the Canadian maritime commission, which is dated June 30 of last year. This was the report which summed up the history of shipping and shipbuilding in Canada, and made detailed recommendations as to what policy should be adopted. Throughout the report we find references to the need for fast cargo vessels; that was one of the main recommendations. In effect, the commission found that Canada must build fast cargo vessels if there was to be a Canadian merchant marine. For example, on page 20 we find this statement:

> For the second time in twenty-seven years a Canadian government was faced with the problem of what to do with a large number of merchant ships acquired through the exigencies of war.

The report is there referring to the position after the recent world war.

Then it goes on:

> The ships were of standard types designed to meet a wartime emergency. Their high fuel consumption, slow speed, and lack of refrigerated space unfitted them to hold their own against fast, modern, more economical cargo-liners which shortly after the war began to appear in British and foreign merchant fleets. It was obvious that, once the world-wide shortage of shipping had been overcome, the ships would not be able to compete with more efficient foreign vessels.

Then the report continues as follows:

> Undoubtedly, the proper course was to replace the ships, and to that end, on the advice of the commission, the government evolved a replacement which is outlined later in this report.

At pages 32 and 33, we find this statement:

> During the past year we have investigated the characteristics of Canadian ships employed in our shipping services, and have come to the conclusion that for many trades the standard war-built types now in operation are becoming inadequate. British and foreign cargo ships of post-war design are on the average one-third faster, are equipped with more efficient cargo handling gear, and are more economical to operate.

Then on the following page, this appears:

> However, aside from the special requirements of individual shipowners, we believe that the type of vessel most suitable for employment in our trade should have a service speed of at least 14½ knots and a capacity of 7,500 to 10,000 deadweight tons. It should be designed for the carriage of deck cargoes and have a reasonable amount of refrigerated space.

Of course, that is not the type of ship that was built during the war.

Mr. Stick: Is that a cruising speed or a surface speed?

Mr. Green: It says a "service" speed of 14½ knots, but that may be a misprint.

On page 51, the report states:

We believe, however, that with the advantage of trade routes developed during and since the war and under normal conditions the Canadian shipping industry has a reasonable opportunity of continuing in existence with a comparatively small well-balanced fleet composed of modern fast ships suitable for the trades in which they are employed.

The findings of the commission are on this point absolutely clear; I do not think they can be contradicted. The government announced a plan for the building of these faster vessels. It was, in effect, that as companies sold the wartime ships, the proceeds of the sales must be put into a fund, to be held in escrow by the Canadian maritime commission, and which could be used only to build fast vessels.

That is one reason I was much surprised to learn the other day that there is not one fast vessel being built in Canada today, and we have not one in our merchant navy. Last December the Prime Minister announced that our shipping policy was to transfer all our ships to other registries, having in mind I believe Great Britain, with the exception of 40 ships. We were to keep 40 ships under Canadian registry, and there was to be a subsidy of $3 million available to support these 40 ships. It will be noticed that two items farther down in the estimates we find this provision for that $3 million subsidy.

We asked the Prime Minister at the time whether that meant we would have 40 old ships or whether there would be any new ships. I must admit he said at that time that we would have only 40 old ships. And that is the position in which Canada finds herself—at least, that is still the government's policy. Canada is to have only 40 old ships in her merchant navy, and we have the assurance only that she is to have those for a period of one year. There is nothing definite as to whether there will be a subsidy for more than one year.

So I would ask the Minister of Transport, when he answers, to state why it is that we are not building any of these fast cargo vessels. I believe that unless we do that our merchant marine is doomed. I believe we will find that in the course of two or three years we will have no merchant marine of any real value at all. And, coming from a city where shipping is one of the main industries, may I say that shipping must be one of the foundations upon which the west coast of Canada can be developed. We are very much concerned about this failure to take steps to establish a merchant marine containing fast freighters.

Then, the second question has to do with shipbuilding. I am putting it in this way: How is the shipbuilding industry to be retained in Canada? The commission dealt with that very fully last year also. We find at page 48 of their report that we must retain at least 7,000 men in the shipyards, and that there must be new shipping built each year to a value of at least $28 million. Those are the figures contained in the report.

It is indicated that half of the work of the yards could well be in repair work, but that the other half must be the building of new ships, and that there must be at least $28 million spent each year on those new ships.

Mr. MacDougall: Carried.

Mr. Green: I would suggest to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, if he is in a hurry, to go back to Vancouver. He can perhaps do more good there than he does here. I can tell him that this item will not be carried until I have made my statement on it. I suggest that he might take a little interest in this question too, because it is one of vital interest to Vancouver.

Mr. MacDougall: You worry about yourself.

Mr. Green: I am worrying about Canada, but you do not seem to be. The orders the government is giving for the building of ships amount to about half this figure of $28 million. The question is: From where is the other shipping construction to come? The shipbuilders of Canada apparently are very much worried about the situation. They say they simply cannot keep up the minimum number of employees set by the Canadian maritime commission, unless there is an increase in ships being built in Canadian yards. They suggest as one means of bringing about this increase the adoption of a policy whereby Canadian coastal trade shall be restricted to Canadian vessels, meaning vessels built in Canada. That policy would seem to me to be sound, although the minister may have reasons for considering it otherwise. I would ask him to tell the committee whether or not the government has any policy in mind which will make it probable that we will have in Canada the construction of shipping at least to the value of $14 million a year, apart from government construction.

Then, the third question I would ask the minister is with regard to the rehabilitation of Canadian seamen who have lost their employment by reason of the shipping policy adopted last December. On October 15 last the number in the Canadian merchant marine had fallen to 4,100. That figure was contained in a return tabled on that date. I do not have the figure as of today, but no doubt the minister has it available.

I believe that each of these old cargo vessels carries a crew of about 35. The minister said the other day that since the policy was announced there have been 93 transferred to British registry, although I think 58 of those were actually being operated by the British under a wartime arrangement. He also said that there were transfers pending in respect of 23 more. That would make a total of 116 ships either transferred or to be transferred shortly to British registry. I would ask the minister to say how many men there are now in the Canadian merchant marine. Last night when we were discussing the question of merchant navy veterans he promised that he would tell us what the policy is with regard to helping these men, who are losing their jobs, to get new work.

Mr. Chevrier: I did not say that. I said that I would give the number of men who are affected by this movement, and it was not nearly as many as 5,000. That is not the same thing.

Mr. Green: The 5,000 figure was a quotation from a press dispatch published in Vancouver in January, I think. I hope that the government has some policy to help in the rehabilitation of these men who are losing their work because of a change in Canadian shipping policy. These are the three questions I would ask the minister to deal with on this particular item.

Mr. Chevrier: The matters which my hon. friend brings up are of considerable importance and perhaps I can give to the committee a comprehensive statement on the whole position because it affects the shipping policy of the country as a whole.

At the end of the last war Canada was left with shipping and shipbuilding industries of major proportions. These industries were revived as a result of the second world war. We were faced with the problem as to whether these industries could or should be maintained in Canada and if so, by what method. The government therefore at the end of 1947 created the Canadian maritime commission to advise it on this problem.

[Mr. Green.]

At the beginning of 1948 there were 215 dry cargo vessels which had been built by the government for war purposes and which had been sold to private Canadian operators and were engaged in the deep-sea trade. They were sold on the condition that they were not to be transferred out of Canadian registry without consent of the government.

At that time deep-sea operations were profitable and all these ships were fully employed. In spite of the fact that Canadian costs were the second highest in the world, the freight market was high enough to offset such costs.

In February, 1948, the maritime commission, having had an opportunity of making a survey of world shipping conditions, advised us that in its opinion the freight market was bound to decline and that Canadian ships would become uncompetitive. The government therefore adopted the so-called replacement plan whereby owners were permitted to sell vessels from time to time provided that the proceeds were placed in an escrow account to be used for shipping purposes.

The reasoning underlying the replacement plan was that Canadian operators bought the ships from the government at reasonable prices and terms. In these circumstances it was felt reasonable that operators instead of selling out at a profit should use such profits for the purpose of remaining in the shipping business. It was also felt that if the commission's forecast of falling freights were correct it would be better to have money in the bank rather than have ships laid up and rotting at their anchors for lack of employment.

At the time this plan was brought into effect the sale market for vessels was high. The plan was welcomed by Canadian operators. As a result 44 vessels have been sold to date at a gross sales price amounting to about $27 million which has been paid into the escrow account.

Although the escrow account has only been in operation for little over a year the sum of $4,249,430 has been or is being used for the purpose of replacement, conversion or improvement.

There follows a breakdown which will take some time to go into, but the amount, as I said, is $4,249,430 for the purposes of replacement.

It will be seen that the operation of the plan is already affording work to Canadian shipyard labour. There is of course a much larger volume of work in the shipyards to which I will refer in a moment, but the escrow fund is being used to encourage work which would not otherwise take place. I am not anxious to see the escrow fund used up too quickly as it will form a backlog of employment in the future.

As well as affording work for Canadian shipyard labour the escrow fund has enabled Canadian ship owners to consolidate their holdings. Owners are permitted to borrow from such fund to discharge mortgages on their ships. To date about $8 million has been borrowed for that purpose. This is not only to the benefit of the government in that the government receives the balance of the purchase price of the ship which was secured by mortgage but it also enables owners to reduce their overhead by way of mortgage interest. Such borrowings are repayable to the escrow fund which is in effect a revolving building reserve.

In passing I think I should refer to a statement in the second annual report of the Canadian maritime commission which may have escaped the attention of the members of this house. When all mortgages are paid, the government will have recovered out of a total expenditure of approximately $270 million about $200 million out of the operation and sale of vessels built by the government and placed under management of the crown-owned Park company. As the cost of these vessels was part of Canada's war expenditure, the sum of $200 million represents a very creditable recovery to the Canadian taxpayer. At the moment there is the sum of about $28 million outstanding on mortgages representing the balance of purchase price due to the government in respect of the sale of these ships. This balance is payable by instalments and I have no doubt it will be collected in full.

However, in order to maintain a nucleus of a Canadian flag fleet, and incidentally to collect such balance of $28 million, it has been necessary for the government to take the steps which I now propose to outline.

Before I leave the subject of the escrow fund, perhaps I may be permitted to refer to a question which the member from Vancouver-Quadra asked me a moment ago, namely, if any fast cargo ships were being built in Canada at the present time and my answer is "no." I assume that he refers to dry cargo vessels with a speed of over 15 knots. I have no doubt that he had in mind the usefulness of such vessels in the event of war.

If a war should occur, we will of course need ships of all kinds and sizes. Much would depend on the nature and scene of any future war in determining what shipping services would be required. Nevertheless it is necessary to make plans in peacetime to meet any emergency which may occur. I do not think that I am committing any breach of confidence in saying that discussions are now taking place between north Atlantic treaty nations for the purpose of pooling their shipping resources in the event of war. It will, I am sure, give satisfaction to the members of this house to know that Canada has played some part in the idea of creating an allied shipping pool. In the event of war the creation of such pool will make available to the member nations every variety of shipping service. For obvious reasons I am not giving any details, but I think I may say that Canada's contribution to such pool would consist at the present time of almost 2 million deadweight tons of shipping. This is by no means an inconsiderable contribution.

Not only would Canada's contribution be large but it would also be useful. Canada's merchant fleet, consisting as it does mainly of Park vessels, affords a large bulk-carrying capacity. War would again necessitate the availability of a large number of bulk carriers. For instance a number of such ships would be required in the bauxite trade which would be one of the essential services to Canada in time of war. As far as bulk-carrying is concerned, Canada's fleet is not outdated or outmoded. It may perhaps illustrate my point when I say Great Britain now regards ships of this type strategically useful up to the age of 20 years. None of the Canadian-owned vessels is more than 8 years of age. As I have said, I do not propose to discuss this matter in detail except to say that the idea of present planning is to provide that ships of all types should be made available to member nations according to their needs.

In his statement to the house on December 9 last the Prime Minister mentioned these matters and also stated the government policy in respect of shipping. I do not propose to go over this ground again except to remind the house that in order to enable the Canadian flag fleet to operate competitively in the world market about $25 million in annual subsidies would be required. The government did not consider that an expenditure of this magnitude could possibly be justified. It was therefore decided to permit transfer of a number of ships to United Kingdom flag.

One of the major factors handicapping the Canadian flag fleet was its inability to carry cargoes yielding freight revenues in sterling. Expenditures being practically entirely in dollars it was necessary to find dollar freights. Canadian owners were thus debarred for practical purposes from the large sterling freight market.

Under the arrangement which has been made with the United Kingdom, Canadian owners transferring ships to the United Kingdom flag will have free access to this market. Under such arrangements Canadian owners appoint agents in England who will receive the gross freights earned by such vessels whether such freights are payable in dollars or sterling. All ships disbursements are made through such agents and the United Kingdom will permit the net profit to be transferred to Canadian owners in dollars.

This arrangement is obviously advantageous to both Canada and the United Kingdom. The ships continue to operate under a commonwealth flag and have freedom of access to the sterling freight market. Gross dollar freights are paid into Great Britain which is in need of dollars and it is only the net profit in dollars which is repayable to Canadian owners, which should not put any drain on the British dollar supply.

Another feature of this arrangement should be mentioned. While the port of registry of these vessels is being transferred from Canada to the United Kingdom, the ownership is retained in Canada. In the event of an emergency Canadian owned ships operating under United Kingdom flag will either be returned to Canadian flag or will be treated as part of Canada's contribution to the allied shipping pool. Canada's position in regard to shipping in the event of war is not being impaired.

As stated by the Prime Minister it was considered advisable to maintain some ships under Canadian flag during the period required for the planning of the allied shipping pool. It was therefore decided to devote for this purpose the sum of $3 million which is mentioned in the present estimates. We have been advised by the maritime commission that not more than this amount will be sufficient to keep about 40 ships operating under Canadian flag.

As I have pointed out on previous occasions the freight market has declined, especially over the period of the last year. This has been due to a variety of causes, not the least of which was currency devaluation which occurred in the latter part of the year. There has not been a corresponding drop in Canadian cost of ship operations. It is hoped that the assistance now afforded to Canadian flag operators will enable them to pass through the present difficult period. It is not unreasonable to expect that the freight market will rise from its present low level at least to some extent. In the meantime Canadian owners who transfer a portion of their fleets to British registry will be receiving revenues from those vessels. There is an opportunity to Canadian owners who desire to do so, and who show initiative and foresight, to maintain Canadian flag vessels in operation.

Prior to the coming into effect of the shipping policy, there were 40 Canadian vessels lying idle. I have no doubt that practically the whole fleet would have been laid up by this time if the government had not taken immediate steps to deal with the problem. Today there are only 12 out of 172 vessels laid up and I am confident that these will shortly find employment.

As I said last Friday there are 172 ocean-going dry cargo vessels owned in Canada which are subject to the flag restriction covenant. Of these, the owners of 93 have applied for permission to operate under British flag and such permission has been granted. Twenty-three applications in respect of transfers still are pending. It must be understood that the actual date of transfers will depend upon the position of ships from time to time. The transfers are being made on as gradual a basis as possible to avoid any great disruption of employment at one time.

The Canadian maritime commission has to date approved subsidies in respect of 31 ships and 9 subsidy applications are still pending. Applications for subsidies are granted on the basis of the subsidized vessels employing Canadian crews and the commission is choosing vessels which are the most economical to operate and which are likely to be able to maintain themselves in trades beneficial to Canada and strategically useful to Canada in time of emergency. Sixteen applications for subsidies have been declined on the basis that the vessels do not fall in these categories.

While there is no item in the estimates of the Canadian maritime commission dealing with shipbuilding, perhaps I may be permitted to refer briefly to the state of this industry. Devaluation has again had serious repercussions in that it has effectively put a stop to shipbuilding in Canada for export. Nevertheless I am glad to say that there are still 9,000 men employed across Canada in shipbuilding and ship-repairing. This figure is to be compared to the figure of 7,000 men which is the estimate of employment given to us by the maritime commission necessary to preserve the industry on a nucleus basis.

I am informed that the total dollar value of tonnage delivered in the year 1949 amounted to approximately $32 million, comprising 26 vessels aggregating 54,000 gross tons. During the same period repairs and conversions accounted for an additional $18 million. Shipbuilding and ship-repairing in 1949 therefore amounted to $50 million. This can be compared to almost $107 million in 1948 and $68½ million in 1947.

As I stated in the house on Friday, 5th May, the dollar value of shipbuilding in preparation or under construction in Canadian yards from all sources, that is domestic, export and government account amounts to more than $67 million. I should like to draw to your attention that almost 62 per cent of all shipbuilding on order is for departments of government including national defence. With the exception of the naval program, the ships now building for government account are needed replacements which were postponed during the war years.

Mr. Green: That is for the five-year period?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

The present naval shipbuilding program accounts for approximately $34 million and is comprised of three antisubmarine escort vessels, four Influence type minesweepers, one gate vessel and one icebreaker. I think it is only fair to state, however, that with the exception of the icebreaker and the gate vessel which are now under construction, I am advised that shipbuilding will not commence on the balance of this program until the late summer of this year and that it will extend over a period of at least three years.

I can assure the house that every effort is being made by the Canadian maritime commission, with the wholehearted co-operation of all departments of government operating floating equipment, to plan and co-ordinate shipbuilding requirements extending into the next five years.

Present indications are that including the cost of the naval vessels which I have mentioned, estimated expenditures by the government in Canadian yards to meet the cost of necessary new construction and replacement for normal requirements over the next five years will exceed $60 million.

Then with reference to the question of employment, the Canadian maritime commission estimates that not more than 1,500 potential jobs will be lost to Canadian seamen by reason of the transfer policy. I make that statement prefaced by this additional statement: Half a loaf is better than no loaf at all. Had it not been for the policy announced by the Prime Minister all ships would eventually have been laid up. As it is now, most of the ships are transferred to United Kingdom registry and 42 ships are now under Canadian registration.

Mr. Green: How many are there now connected with the Canadian merchant marine?

Mr. Chevrier: One hundred and seventy-two.

Mr. Green: I mean men.

Mr. Chevrier: I will give that as I go along.

Mr. Knowles: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I should be allowed to complete the statement because after all the hon. member asked three questions and here we are at the end of Friday evening and my estimates are still before the committee. If I had been given a little more time I could have made this statement earlier. I had hoped I could complete my estimates tonight, but unfortunately I shall not be able to do that.

As I say, the Canadian maritime commission estimates that not more than about 1,500 potential jobs will be lost to Canadian seamen by reason of the transfer policy. These men will not all be thrown out of their jobs at once but will lose them gradually as the transfers proceed. They may choose to rehabilitate themselves through vocational training or may possibly secure employment in the ships which are being transferred.

I am informed by the commission that Canadian owners who are transferring the operation of their ships to United Kingdom registry are doing their best to afford jobs to Canadian seamen who desire to stay in the ships. There is only one difficulty in this connection which I think I should mention quite frankly and that is that the British seamen's union is doubtful about taking Canadian seamen into its ranks. This is a subject which is under discussion at the moment.

I cannot blame the British seamen's union for its attitude. We are all aware of the disastrous effects of the communist-led strike of the Canadian seamen's union last year. I commend to every member of this house the reading of the white paper issued by the British government on this subject on the 14th of December last. As to the cause of this strike and its international inception and ramification I cannot do better than read from the foreword of the white paper written by the British minister of labour:

> A review of the circumstances in which these strikes started and spread makes it clear that preparations for the strikes began as early as the latter part of last year, although the first strike did not take place until May of this year. The evidence shows that there was throughout a cold and deliberate plan, and that the unofficial leaders were completely indifferent to the loss and suffering that might result. They had one aim and one aim only —to restore the fortunes of the communist dominated Canadian seamen's union. In the course of the strikes they engaged in misrepresentation and violence and it was inevitable that when the trades union leaders in this country, mindful of the interests of their members, opposed the strikes and tried to bring out the true facts, they were in turn assailed and abused by the communists in this country who were supporting the strikes.

There is a lesson to be drawn from this unfortunate experience.

An hon. Member: Amen.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the hon. member for that remark. I was hopeful that it would have been possible for me to complete my estimates tonight, and I am still hopeful that it may be possible to pass this item.

Mr. Green: This matter is of too much importance to the coastal regions of Canada to let it go through without discussion. The minister has made a very important statement and I ask that he put on the record the complete statement. In the beginning he skipped portions and I would ask that he put on Hansard the details he said he was not going to read.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend should not make the statement that I skipped any portion. I read the whole of this statement and I will give it to Hansard so it will be on Hansard. I ask the hon. gentleman to please not make statements that I skipped anything.

Mr. Green: I was not implying anything. I realize that the minister has had a hard day—

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order—

Mr. Knowles: Eleven o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I understand that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra wants to explain that he did not intend to say anything offensive to the minister.

Mr. Green: That is right.

Mr. Chevrier: I accept his explanation. The hon. member says that this matter is far too important to dispose of now but we have had three debates on it and we will probably have another when the supplementary estimates are before the committee. I agreed to meet the wishes of the hon. gentleman and the wishes of the C.C.F. party by letting item 524 stand in order to be able to discuss freight rates next Friday, but have I received the consideration of the committee with reference to the rest of the items? I was assured, although it means nothing, that I would be able to complete them tonight, and here they are.

Mr. Green: The minister really should not take that attitude. We have had discussion on various items today which has been carried on in an orderly way. Personally I have asked only two or three questions and it is just the minister's bad luck that this question of shipping has come up late and his estimates are not being completed today. No one has been trying to block them and I am sure the miinster would not suggest that there has been any such attempt. This question of shipping and shipbuilding is simply too important to be permitted to go through without proper discussion. I wish it were possible to let all the items go through tonight, but in justice to the people I represent I cannot agree to that.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the hon. member permit the passage of the five other items having to do with government-owned enterprises?

Mr. Green: Those items include the national harbours board which again is of great importance.

Mr. Chevrier: There are three items concerning the maritime commission that do not deal with this policy. One refers to administration and another to subsidies. Then there is the matter which is under discussion now, item 527.

Mr. Green: The minister has said that there has been a debate on this question. This is the first opportunity there has been to debate the shipping policy. There has been no such debate before. Each of these three items is involved in the shipping and shipbuilding policy of Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: I should like to obtain the opinion of experienced members on this suggestion. On the first item of a department a general discussion is always allowed. I am wondering whether the general discussion allowed on the first item should not take care of all general discussions of any subheadings in the same department.

Mr. Green: If I remember correctly, when the administration item was up we were told that shipping could be discussed under the Canadian maritime commission.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, no.

Mr. Green: That is the proper place to discuss it, and it has not been discussed.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes. On a point of order, if I may, when the general administration item came up my hon. friend complained because there was no statement on the shipbuilding program. I brought down a statement at eight o'clock that day on the continuation—

Mr. Green: A very brief one.

Mr. Chevrier: —of my estimates. I read it and we discussed it. Now my hon. friend brings it up again. I do not think he should make the statement which he did.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the business for Monday is as follows: We will take up government notices of motion. Then we will proceed with the following bills: Bill No. 237, an act to amend the Customs Act; Bill No. 236, an act to amend the Tariff Board Act; Bill No. 235, an act to amend the National Parks Act, and the necessary resolution; Bill No. 82, an act to amend the Criminal Code; and if there is time left we will take up Bill No. 180, an act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946.

It being ten minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Air service—

498. Air service administration, $203,890.

Civil aviation division—

499. Control of civil aviation, including the administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations issued thereunder, $676,656.

Airways and airports—

500. Construction and improvements, including radio facilities; and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $421,000—capital, $9,430,340.

Operation and maintenance—

501. Civil aviation services, $7,708,041.

502. Radio aviation services, $4,489,730.

503. Airway and airport traffic control, $1,050,659.

504. Grants to organizations for the development of civil aviation, in the months detailed in the estimates, $310,000.

505. Contributions, subject to the approval of the governor in council, to assist municipalities to improve existing airports, the sites of which have been provided by such municipalities (revote $210,000), $137,000.

506. To authorize contribution of an amount not exceeding $30,420 to the state of Michigan, U.S.A., department of aeronautics, towards the cost of operation and maintenance of certain airways facilities at Grand Marais, Michigan, for use of Canadian aircraft, $30,420.

507. Contribution to the international civil aviation organization as Canada's portion of the financial assistance to the government of Iceland in respect of the provision, operation and maintenance of certain air navigation services, $37,000.

508. Contribution to the government of Denmark as Canada's share in joint support of North Atlantic air navigation facilities in the Faroes and Greenland, $71,000.

509. Contribution to the south Pacific air transport council as Canada's share towards the maintenance and operation of air transport facilities in the south Pacific, $112,000.

Northwest communication system—

510. Additions and betterments, including transport equipment—capital, $497,287.

511. To provide for the difference between the expenditure for operation and maintenance and revenue accruing from operations during the year ending March 31, 1951, including the acquisition of materials and supplies to an amount not exceeding $125,000, $231,034.

Meteorological division—

512. Meteorological services, $4,958,450.

513. Construction and improvements, $600,625.

Radio division—

514. Administration of the Radio Act and regulations, $847,320.

515. Radio direction finding stations, radio beacons and radio telegraph stations, operation and maintenance, $1,952,250.

516. Suppression of radio interferences, $354,885.

517. Issue of radio receiving licences—(transport department only), $705,340.

518. Telegraph and telephone service—administration, operation and maintenance, $1,354,845.

519. Telegraph and telephone service—construction and improvements, $460,785.

Terminable services—

Railway service—

520. Acquisition of properties in Canada for U.S. authorities, $17,750.

521. Steep Rock mines—construction, $62,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 29, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VISIT TO BROCKVILLE AND DISTRICT BY MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, it seems right and proper that the House of Commons and the public should be informed of the fact that the leading intellectuals of all political parties in the house spent the week end at Brockville in the county of Leeds, and in other parts of the province of Ontario. Speaking for myself and others, our visit was a great pleasure from every point of view. We enjoyed all the social functions, and gained firsthand knowledge of one of the beauty spots of Ontario. We visited the truly magnificent Thousand islands, the imposing, comfortable and beautiful tourist resorts of the county, and the industries of Brockville, the principal town.

What caught my attention and imagination was the complete cleanliness of the industrial plants, the beauty and tidiness of the outer surroundings, and the spirit of harmony prevailing between employer and employee. The tidy workshops of industry in the town of Brockville were very different from the dirty and miserable places in other large industrial centres of this country where people must toil day and night.

Our thanks and appreciation must go to the genial member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford). He is not here today, because he is attending the graduation of one of his sons from McGill university. I should also like to express our thanks and appreciation to his most amiable wife, to the mayor and aldermen of the civic corporations of Brockville and Gananoque, and the members of the chambers of commerce, for a wonderful time and an educational feast.

I hope and pray that in the future there will be more such visits from the east of Canada to the centre, from the west to the centre, and from the centre to the east and west, in order that members of the house may obtain firsthand knowledge of the wonderful country in which we are privileged to live.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Before the hon. member sits down, will he explain to the house what a leading intellectual is?

Mr. Cruickshank: There are none over on that side.

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, following the remarks of the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll), may I say that I was most happy to hear what the hon. member had to say about our visit to Brockville. I should like to express my sincere appreciation to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford) for organizing the trip. I want to express my appreciation also to the city of Brockville, the town of Gananoque and their chambers of commerce, for their part in organizing the visit.

I should also like to refer to a telegram that has been on the bulletin board of the House of Commons since noon yesterday. It reads:

Alexandria Bay, N.Y.
May 27, 1950

George T. Fulford, M.P.,
House of Commons

The "Wylie for president" campaign has got off to an enthusiastic start. There is much room today for purity in politics.

W. Hornblower, chairman.

The telegram demonstrates that when members of the Liberal, Conservative, C.C.F. and Social Credit groups get together on such a trip, we can do things.

Before I resume my seat may I say that the trip through the Thousand islands was very much appreciated; it was something I shall always remember. On behalf of those associated with me in this group may I say to those who were so thoughtful as to arrange for this trip, thanks a million.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, speaking for the other representative of the proletariat who was with me, as well as for myself, I agree with what has been said by both hon. members who have spoken. We are very much indebted to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford) and those associated with him in arranging this informative and interesting week end of recreation.

The trip also had international implications. We visited Alexandria Bay, New York, and were treated very kindly by the people of that area. You will notice that my vociferous friend from Alberta made such an impression over there that they are considering running him for president of the United States.

We had a very pleasant week end, and are greatly indebted to those who were responsible for it.

FIRES

RIMOUSKI AND CABANO—VISIT BY PRIME MINISTER—SCOPE OF DEVASTATION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I should like to report briefly to the house on what I have been able to observe in the course of the trip I made last Thursday and Friday to Rimouski and Cabano, where I visited the victims of the disasters which occurred in those two cities of the lower St. Lawrence.

I left Dorval Thursday morning with the Solicitor General (Mr. Lapointe), and Mr. Leopold Langlois, member for Gaspe, who acted as representative for the hon. member for Rimouski, Mr. Gleason Belzile. Brigadier Jean Allard, commanding officer of the Quebec military district, joined our party in Quebec city.

Perfect weather and visibility permitted us to have an aerial view of the damaged sections of the towns of Cabano and Rimouski, before we landed for our visit to these two interesting industrial centres.

After landing at Mont Joli airport, we were met by Brigadier A. Thériault, member of the federal-provincial commission which is to report on both disasters, and then our party proceeded immediately by motorcar to Rimouski.

We paid our first call to the city hall, where we were greeted by Mayor Victor Lepage. We met the members of the municipal council, the members of the relief committee, the civic department heads, the engineers, architects and technicians, all of whom were there on loan from the federal and provincial governments. We were shown the properties which were destroyed on the cadastral survey of the city. The plan would be to try to rebuild the district which was burned down by making a new cadastral survey which would take into account the views of the owners, engineers, surveyors and town-planners who are all working in very close co-operation. One can easily imagine the difficulty of the problem when one knows that the damaged area does not allow all previous owners to rebuild their homes if they are to be separated by sufficient space to prevent another disaster.

From the city hall, we went to visit the damaged area, where we met the superior of the seminary. As you know, half of the building, not being fireproof, was burned down. Then we met the nuns in charge of the hospital where extension works had been in progress. Unfortunately even in the fireproof section, flames spread through and caused damage. There we also saw the nuns in charge of the home for the aged and of the orphanage, both of which have disappeared; we also met the manager of the Price Company, whose mill was destroyed. At this time of the year, the mill employed between 500 to 600 men. Although the company's plans for the future are not yet determined, it is held that it will shortly be able to provide work for a good many workers.

We have seen the ruins of 359 houses, the destruction of which has left over 2,000 persons homeless.

Approximately one-quarter of the town has disappeared in this terrible fire, not to mention the vast area covered by the plant and lumber yards of the Price Company.

The canteen set up in the arena by the relief committee has operated very well and it still serves between 1,200 to 1,500 meals a day. In the committee's warehouses, we have been able to see great quantities of clothing, furniture, building material and goods of all sorts which were sent to the victims by sympathetic and generous people in Canada and the United States.

Toward the end of the afternoon, we called on the Archbishop of Rimouski, who expressed his gratitude for the sympathy shown to the population of his episcopal See.

Friday, we went to Cabano with the hon. member for Temiscouata, Mr. Jean François Pouliot. In that town, we were greeted by Mayor Emilien Morin and Rev. Canon Cyr, parish priest.

One hundred and fifty-nine homes were destroyed in Cabano, which left over 1,000 persons homeless. In Rimouski every victim took refuge elsewhere in the city and in surrounding villages; but it could not be so in Cabano, where close to a third of the village was destroyed and many of the victims still live under tents supplied by the army or other divisions of the dominion and provincial governments.

In Cabano, as well as in Rimouski, the army and Red Cross have performed an admirable task, and nothing was spared to save the victims from hunger and want.

The population of both localities is courageous and optimistic. The sympathy and help which they have received are appreciated.

In both towns there are clever and enterprising administrators and businessmen who show a great deal of initiative. In Cabano, the manager of the Fraser Company, whose plant has not been destroyed, assured us that normal operations would be resumed this very morning.

I have conveyed to every one the sympathy of the people of Canada and in both places I stated, as I had done in this very house, that upon receipt of the report concerning the nature and extent of each of the two disasters the federal government would take a similar stand with respect to assistance as was taken in the case of the Fraser valley disaster in 1948.

The members of the commission of inquiry into the disasters at Rimouski and Cabano are proceeding with diligence and the government has reason to believe that they will report on the results of their investigation in the near future.

Mr. A. Phileas Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, following the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), I wish to assure him and the government that the good people of my constituency, which adjoins Rimouski, scene of the terrible catastrophe, are entirely at the officials' disposal in order to help cope with this disastrous problem. The Matane civic authorities have already taken the necessary steps to have the home for the aged in that city replace that of Rimouski. The old Matane hospital has been furnished and will be turned over to the nuns whose own building was lost at Rimouski; this hospital, which is quite suitable, will be used to hospitalize the inmates of the home for the aged in Rimouski.

Many of the Rimouski fire victims have already taken refuge in the constituency of Matapedia-Matane. I am also sure that at Lac au Saumon and at Amqui, people are willing to do all that is humanly possible in order to relieve the hardship suffered by the citizens of Rimouski. Government officials are doubtless aware of the efforts that have already been made in this direction and they also realize that the good people of Matane are very anxious to help the fire victims of Rimouski, if only they are given the opportunity to do so.

Mr. J. G. L. Langlois (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, at the request of my hon. friend from Rimouski (Mr. Belzile), who is at present confined to the hospital, I was indeed happy to represent him at Rimouski while accompanying the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Lapointe) on a tour of that stricken area. If I speak today on behalf of my colleague as well as of the people of the constituency of Rimouski, it is to thank publicly the right hon. the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General for this visit, which was as much a token of sympathy as a means of investigation. My fellow citizens of the fire-ravaged town of Rimouski will most certainly have found in this evidence of interest and sympathy on the part of the government a most valuable incentive in the heavy task of reconstruction which now faces them as a result of this disaster.

I know also that the people of Rimouski were deeply moved by the visit paid them yesterday by Their Excellencies the Governor General and Lady Alexander. I am also certain that this expression of sympathy on the part of His Majesty's representative in Canada has been greatly appreciated by these sadly afflicted people.

I also wish to thank the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Cote), as well as his fellow citizens and constituents, for the generous support and valuable help they gave to the people of Rimouski during and since that disaster.

4. How many wives whose husbands received prairie farm assistance were awarded separate payment in 1949-50?

5. How many wives not applying for prairie farm assistance in 1948-49 applied for payment separate from their husbands in 1949-50?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

DENIAL OF THE USE OF MAILS

Mr. Knowles:

For a return showing the names and addresses of all companies or associations in Canada who are denied the use of the mails at the present time by virtue of any order or decision made since December 1, 1949, and showing also the reason and the authority for such denial in each case.

Mr. Lapointe: I have discussed this motion with the hon. member, and in view of the statements made in the house on this matter, and the fact that the Minister of Justice has announced that consideration was being given to changes in the legislation, he has agreed to drop the motion.

Motion dropped.

INCOME TAX APPEAL BOARD—EVIDENCE IN THE CASE OF MR. "C"

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of depositions and evidence taken before the income tax appeal board in the case between Mr. "C" and the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Winters: The third schedule of the Income War Tax Act, as enacted by section 22, chapter 55, statutes of 1946, provides:

7. (2) An appeal may, in the discretion of the board as the case may be, be heard in camera or in public unless the appellant requests that it be heard in camera in which case it shall be so heard.

Section 82(2) of the Income Tax Act is in similar terms. It reads as follows:

An appeal may, in the discretion of the board, the chairman, the assistant chairman or hearing officer, as the case may be, be heard in camera or in public unless the appellant requests that it be heard in camera in which case it shall be so heard.

As appears from the judgment rendered by the income tax appeal board in this case, the appellant requested that the case be heard in camera and it was so heard.

On March 28 the Minister of National Revenue, in reply to a question from the member for Lake Centre said this, as recorded at page 1182 of Hansard:

I have handed to the hon. member for Lake Centre a copy of the reasons for judgment and of the minutes of judgment in this particular case. So far as the evidence is concerned, that is not public or available because at the request of the appellant the case was heard in camera.

Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances I am unable to produce the information requested by the hon. member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not accept the interpretation given as to the meaning of the Income Tax Act, and wish to appeal against the refusal.

Mr. Speaker: Then I will have to put the question. Those in favour of the motion will please say "yea".

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say "nay".

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it, and I declare the motion lost.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Carried, subject to the reservation made by the Prime Minister.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MORNING SITTINGS ON AND AFTER THURSDAY, JUNE 1

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Thursday, June 1, 1950, until the end of the session the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock, p.m., there shall also be an intermission every day from 1 to 3 o'clock p.m.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Before this motion carries I think the house should consider the advisability of deferring the date for a week. I am making the suggestion because so many of the committees are sitting at the present time. Some committees have not by any means reached the reporting stage; some of them, in fact, have just begun to sit.

Our experience of the last week or so, when committees were sitting in the afternoon as well as in the morning, indicated the difficulty of hon. members paying attention to the business that was actually before the house. On a number of days last week I made a count of the hon. members in the chamber. I am not blaming hon. members who were out of the chamber, but at times during the week over a hundred members were absent, sitting on committees in the various committee rooms. Committees should be nearer the reporting stage before this motion is passed.

I looked up Hansard of the pre-war years —and this should be considered as a post-war sitting—and this is what I found. In 1935, for example, there were only three morning sittings out of 97 sitting days; in 1936 there were four morning sittings out of 91 sitting days; in 1937 there were nine morning sittings out of 62 sitting days. In 1938 there were only four out of 102; and in 1939, when we were dealing with defence matters because of the international situation that had developed, we did have 20 morning sittings out of 103 sitting days.

Even during the war we did not have a great many morning sittings. In the spring session of 1940 we had 11 morning sittings out of 61 sitting days. In 1941 we had 20 out of 105; in 1942 we had 13 out of 124; in 1943, 14 out of 120.

This is the sixty-sixth day of the session. It seems to me that a motion for morning sittings is premature, both because of the number of days we have sat, and because of the business of the house which has been referred to committees, which is not completed and which will require a great deal of attention from hon. members.

While we are all anxious that the business of the house shall be completed before the intensely hot weather arrives, because when it is hot it is difficult to give the kind of attention that should be given to the business of the house, I think reconsideration should be given to the date, and I move the following amendment:

That the motion be amended by deleting therefrom the words "June 1" and substituting therefor the words "June 8."

This will give us one more week to complete the committee work, and a chance to attend to the business of the house as well as of the committees. Perhaps the Prime Minister would consider changing the date himself, so that I would not have to press the motion; but I wanted to put it regularly before the house.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it does not seem to me that any reason has been put before the house for this motion; therefore I do not think we should add an amendment calling for morning sittings to start a week from June 1. I am not taking issue with the view expressed as to the undesirability of starting morning sittings at this point, but I do question the possibility that any of the committees will have presented their reports between now and a week from Thursday.

There is strong reason why the motion should not be pressed at this time. A number of extremely important committees are sitting. They are committees dealing with social security, public accounts and a number of other matters that are being examined with a great deal of care. Agriculture is coming up. The national defence committee is in process of considering a very long bill which has been referred to it. At the stage when we are asked to sit at eleven o'clock in the morning, at the same time as all these committees are meeting, a committee appointed with the authority of the government, on motion of the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) to deal with amendments to the elections act, has not yet been called, although the question has been asked several times when it would meet. If there has been any delay in the convening of these committees then the responsibility for that delay must be fully assumed by the government and those charged with the responsibility of directing the business of the house.

Members on the government side, as on this side, who have been attending these committees have been showing a commendable desire, in a great many of the committee activities—in fact, in most of them—to produce useful results and to facilitate the business of the house. I do not think it is possible for members who are sitting on several committees—and their number involves an actual majority of the members of the house—to give consideration to the business of those committees and also to give proper consideration to the business before the house.

No matter what any member may feel about the time that may have been devoted to the discussion of any particular subject, it should be remembered that we have not disposed of the estimates of a single department, that we have dealt with only a few departments, and that the fundamentally important business of the House of Commons, which is the provision of money for the public business, still has to be dealt with.

Particularly in view of the reluctance to set up a committee on estimates, and the invitation of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to examine the estimates carefully—which invitation, I may say, will be accepted—I do submit through you, Mr. Speaker, that this motion is premature. If it is intended that the committees shall have the opportunity to deal with their very important business as they should, this motion should not be pressed but rather should stand until there is some opportunity to see how rapidly the committees can proceed with their work.

Let us recall the criticism that there has been no attempt made fully to examine all the facts. May I say that with a committee on estimates sitting there would be an opportunity to do that. But if there is an attempt to proceed at the same time both in the house and in committees, and it is not humanly possible for members to deal adequately with all these activities, then there may well be justification for the suggestion that there has not been afforded a proper opportunity to go into such questions as social security, public accounts, agriculture, and all these other matters which are under consideration—to say nothing of the very important committee moved by a minister of the crown to deal with amendments to the elections act and certain recommendations which have been made.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, as a private member I venture to rise, because sometimes private members have a little bit of sense. I think the Prime Minister has been very patient during this session, and when we think of those who see us from another place we should mend our ways.

Mr. Drew: Which place?

Mr. McIvor: If we are serious in our business, then perhaps we could make better speeches by cutting them from forty minutes to about ten minutes. That is one of the things I have discovered, as a member of the House of Commons, namely, the number of hon. members who can sit and listen so long and so often.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss this matter at length. The record of proceedings will show what questions hon. members have felt were more important than the estimates, when motions have been made to go into supply. Hansard will show who the hon. members are who felt that there were more important questions they wished to raise.

With respect to the sittings of committees, the leader of the opposition has said that old age security and public accounts committees have not finished their work. I have looked up Votes and Proceedings for May 12, where I find that there is a notice for a meeting of the committee on old age security at four o'clock. There are notices for meetings on May 16 at four o'clock and May 17 at four o'clock.

In the last issue of Votes and Proceedings I find the committee on old age security called for four o'clock on May 29, for four o'clock on Tuesday, May 30, and for four o'clock on Wednesday, May 31. Those are the dates I have looked up. That committee got leave to sit while the house is sitting, and they have taken advantage of the leave that was granted to them.

This motion was submitted upon the suggestion of a large number of members from all quarters of the house. The leader of the C.C.F. party has now moved an amendment. I am going to vote against that amendment, but I am not making any recommendation to any of my followers. They are free to vote as they feel. Members of the house will be free to vote on the question whether this proposal should become effective on June 8 instead of on June 1 as is proposed. We will see just what is the feeling of a majority of members of the house.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I doubt if there is anyone who is more anxious to get home than I am. However, we have come here to represent our people. Something has been said about committees not reporting. On March 6 I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) if he would refer the last report of the Canadian wheat board to the committee on agriculture for examination. I did not receive a satisfactory answer. He did not say flatly that he would not, but he did not give much encouragement.

Recently amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act have been referred to a committee. There are other matters of great importance before committees. I do not wish to miss any of the proceedings of the committee on agriculture, nor do I wish to miss sittings of the committee of the whole when there are estimates before it. We must give serious consideration to these very important items in committee, and yet we should be in the house when there are important matters before it.

Mr. A. Phileas Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, as suggested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), every member should have his say in this matter. As one of those members let me point out that I have witnessed what has gone on since the beginning of the session. Every time the government has moved to go into supply on the estimates, the leader of the opposition has had something to say, about twice a week, so that those estimates have had to be placed in the background. I have not counted how many times it has occurred, but it has extended over several weeks. The only reason we have not finished the estimates is because of the leader of the opposition, and not because of the government.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): How do you know? You were not here.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): You had better check, because at times you do not see what is going on.

Mr. Ross (Souris): You cannot see if you are not here.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): The leader of the opposition has suggested that every member should have a say in this regard. We are faced with the proposal of the government that we sit from eleven o'clock in the morning. I for one am willing to agree to that, and it seems that the main objection to doing so is that the committee on privileges and elections has not yet been called to sit. I suggest to the leader of the opposition there is no urgency connected with that matter. There will be no election this year or next year—

An hon. Member: Who told you?

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): —because the government has a majority. It seems to be elementary, my dear Watson. Even with committees meeting it is feasible to sit from eleven o'clock instead of from three, if we take note of the attendance in the house. If the opposition had demonstrated up to now a willingness to speed up the business of the government and of parliament it would have saved a lot of the taxpayers' money, and I would say O.K. However, every time that the government has moved to go into supply the leader of the opposition has stood up and put forward an amendment. I have not counted the number of times he has done so, but they run to a baker's dozen.

So far as the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) is concerned, I do not think that postponing the commencement of morning sittings for one week matters very much. Why waste time discussing the question of allowing one more week before putting morning sittings into effect? I believe we should get down to business and try to carry on. If we do not have the proper number in the house on any occasion, then we can call for those who are attending committees.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made reference to the fact that the committee on old age security has been holding a number of its meetings in the afternoon. He mentioned that in answer to the reference of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to the fact that it was one of the important committees now sitting. It is true, as the Prime Minister indicated, that a number of its meetings are held commencing at four o'clock in the afternoon while the house is sitting. As a matter of fact our recent practice has been to hold meetings at four o'clock in the afternoon three days a week, but we also meet at eleven o'clock in the morning two days a week. One of the reasons that we have to hold some of our meetings in the afternoon is that so many committees are sitting that there are not enough rooms or reporters available for them all to meet in the morning. I suggest if the house starts to sit in the morning as well it will make it most complicated and difficult for these important committees to complete their work. So far as the committee on old age security is concerned, we are reaching the most important stage of our deliberations—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Knowles: —and to interfere with its work at this time is not fair to members of the committee. The hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Cote) and others who are shouting "question" now seem to think that the chief aim of parliament is to get through and to go home. If hon. members simply want to go home, why did they not stay there in the first place? The job of parliament is to deal with the business of the country. I think the notion that shortening the session of parliament is our chief aim is completely wrong. Our task is to deal with the business of the country. Those whom the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) lauds for sitting still should consider whether they are attending to the business that they were sent here to deal with.

Mr. Sinclair: You go to the other extreme and talk too much.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): On a point of order, I do not think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) should impute any motive to me from what I said. My remarks were not made for the reason he suggests. I think we have been here long enough, and I think the hon. member is one of those most responsible for not having finished the business of the house.

Mr. Knowles: I did not catch all that the hon. member said, but if he said that I am one of the most responsible members, it would hardly be fair for me to quarrel with him.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): You are responsible for our being in this spot.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, there is one other point I wish to make. As long as I have been here, it has been the practice for some consultation to take place amongst the various parties before such a motion as this is put upon the order paper. Either the Prime Minister has got in touch with the leaders of the other groups, or the government whip has got in touch with the whips of the other parties. Sometimes the house leader has done so. I know that on several occasions in the past the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), as house leader, has suggested a certain date to us, and we have objected to it and suggested a later date. Nevertheless we were able to reach a compromise, and then there was no delay when the matter came before the house. On this occasion the motion was simply put on the order paper. Certainly nobody in this group had any suggestion made to him about it, and there was no consultation at all so far as we are concerned. The other groups will have to speak for themselves, but I doubt if they were consulted either.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): The rump was consulted.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: I have not heard of any consultation taking place this session with respect to this matter. One of the things that is wrong with this parliament and its overwhelming majority is this notion—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles:—that whatever they want they can have without consulting those who happen to be in the minority groups. Since the motion would not go into effect until Thursday, and since my leader's amendment would not go into effect until a week from Thursday, I suggest to the Prime Minister that the proper thing for him to do now is to have the debate adjourned—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Knowles:—and let there be a conference among representatives of the parties to see if we cannot work out some reasonable arrangement. Members on the government side, Mr. Speaker, are always crying for co-operation, but they sit here with their majority of 190 or so and think that co-operation means that the minority should always agree with them.

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, when I was a boy in the navy we had a favourite saying that empty vessels make the most sound. I think that some of the reflections cast upon hon. members were uncalled for. Generally speaking I believe that members of the house without exception pay attention to their duties. If some of us spoke as much as some members—

Mr. Sinclair: One member.

Mr. Mitchell:—it would not be sufficient to extend our sittings two hours a day; we would need twenty-five hours every day seven days a week. My hon. friend says that we want to go home. Of course we do. I am dreaming of a white Christmas. There are some members who think that the destiny of the nation spins around the fact that they are members of the House of Commons. I have seen a good many people come here and go like ships that pass in the night. I am convinced that the quicker we get down to work the better it will be. If hon. members cannot get up in the morning, that is their business, not the business of the government. Let them get down here and get to work. You are not fooling the Canadian people, you know; the only people you are fooling are yourselves. Let us vote for or against this motion, irrespective of the part of the house in which we sit, and then for goodness' sake let us get down to business and do some work this afternoon. It is ten minutes after four already, and we have done nothing yet.

NORTHWEST ATLANTIC FISHERIES

APPROVAL OF INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION SIGNED AT WASHINGTON, FEBRUARY 8, 1949

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Fisheries) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the ratification, without reservation, of the international convention for the northwest Atlantic fisheries, signed in Washington on February 8, 1949, but subject to the observation that ratification by Canada of the convention extends to Newfoundland and that any claims Canada may have in regard to the limits of territorial waters or to the jurisdiction over fisheries, particularly as a result of the entry of Newfoundland into confederation, will not be prejudiced, and that this house do approve same.

Mr. J. W. MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the northwest Atlantic area has been, during several centuries, an important fishing ground for the nationals of North American and western and southern European countries. Recognizing the need for scientific investigation and protection of the fishery resources of this area, Canada, the United States of America, Great Britain, Newfoundland, France, Spain, Portugal, Iceland, Denmark, Norway, and Italy signed the international convention for the northwest Atlantic fisheries following a conference in Washington in February, 1949.

The convention provides for the establishment of a commission on which all contracting governments will be represented, and separate panels with jurisdiction over defined sub-areas in which governments with particular fishing interests will have representations. The over-all area covered by the convention is divided into five sub-areas. These areas generally cover the waters off the west coast of Greenland, and the waters off the coasts of Labrador, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and the New England states of the United States. Provision is made in the convention to safeguard any claims to territorial waters, or jurisdiction over the fisheries of the contracting parties.

The primary functions of the commission under the convention will be to collect, collate and disseminate scientific information on international fisheries in the convention area. The commission has no regulatory powers, but any panel may transmit, through the commission to the governments represented on such panel, recommendations for joint action of a regulatory nature in respect of those stocks of fish that support international fisheries.

The permanent seat of the commission will be in North America at a place to be determined by the commission. The convention will enter into force upon ratification by any four signatory governments. The convention has now been ratified by Great Britain, Iceland and the United States. It would accordingly come into force upon deposit of the instrument of ratification by Canada.

At the Washington conference which adopted the convention, Newfoundland was represented by a separate delegation, and the convention was signed "for His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom and the government of Newfoundland in respect of Newfoundland." The United Kingdom government, in depositing their instrument of ratification, drew attention to the fact that their ratification did not include ratification in respect of Newfoundland. When the Canadian government ratifies this convention an observation will be attached to our instrument of ratification, making clear that the ratification covers Newfoundland, and pointing out that the provision in the convention safeguarding any claims to territorial waters has taken a broader meaning as far as the Canadian government is concerned since Newfoundland has been united with Canada. This observation will therefore assert that the Canadian ratification is on the basis that the provision referred to above entirely protects all claims to territorial waters and jurisdiction over fisheries, particularly as a result of the alteration in the Canadian boundaries that has taken place by the joining of the tenth province.

HALIBUT FISHERY

APPROVAL OF CONVENTION FOR EXTENSION OF PACIFIC COAST PORT PRIVILEGES SIGNED AT OTTAWA, MARCH 24, 1950

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Fisheries) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the ratification, without reservation, of the convention for the extension of port privileges to halibut fishing vessels on the Pacific coasts of the United States of America and Canada, signed at Ottawa on March 24, 1950, and that this house do approve same.

Mr. J. W. MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): The convention provides for reciprocal port privileges to be granted to halibut fishing vessels of Canada and the United States in the ports on the Pacific coasts of each country. The privileges are:

(1) to land their catches of halibut and sablefish without the payment of duties and

(a) sell them locally on payment of the applicable customs duty;

(b) transship them in bond under customs supervision to any part of either country; or

(c) sell them in bond for export; and

(2) to obtain supplies, repairs and equipment, subject to compliance with applicable customs and navigation laws of either country.

These privileges which have been granted heretofore on an annual basis by special legislation will now be made available to the halibut fishermen of both countries on a continuing basis, so that in advance of the fishing season the fishing industry will be assured of the privileges that will be available.

In addition, the convention will alter the present practice in one other respect. It will extend the reciprocal port privileges to Canadian halibut vessels in ports of the United States proper, whereas at present these privileges are granted only in the ports of Alaska.

The convention will continue for an indefinite time, but can be terminated by either government upon 12 months' notice.

A recent survey of the opinion of the fishing industry on the Pacific coast indicated general support in favour of the treaty.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly in support of this resolution providing for the adoption of the treaty which deals with reciprocal port privileges for fishermen of the Pacific coast. But before dealing with the treaty itself, may I be permitted to make one other observation. This convention was signed on March 24 last for Canada by R. W. Mayhew and for the United States of America by the late Laurence A. Steinhardt. I wish to take just a moment to pay my little tribute to that outstanding gentleman, one of whose last official acts was the signing of this convention. We on the Pacific coast had the pleasure of meeting His Excellency and discussing with him several matters relative to fishing, Alaska and other subjects; and I know that I am expressing the feelings of all my people who met him when I say how deeply we regret his loss.

With reference to the convention itself, for the fishing people of my district I welcome this convention. As a Canadian, I welcome it as just another of the many examples of good neighbourliness between ourselves and the United States. As has been said, this convention is similar to an agreement already in force applicable to British Columbia and Alaska ports; but it extends the operation of the agreement to the Pacific coast ports of the United States proper. I hope that this convention will be lived up to fully by both countries; and it is just on that point that I want to take a minute or two of the time of the house.

Articles I and II are the operative articles. They are similar except that article I refers to the privileges we are granting to American vessels and article II refers to the privileges of Canadian vessels in American ports.

Article II reads as follows:

Fishing vessels of Canada engaged in the north Pacific halibut fishery only shall, subject to compliance with applicable customs and navigation laws of the United States of America, have the privileges in the ports of entry of the United States of America:

(1) To land their catches of halibut and sablefish without the payment of duties and

(a) sell them locally on payment of the applicable customs duty;

(b) transship them in bond under customs supervision to any port of Canada; or

(c) sell them in bond for export; and

I wish particularly to draw the attention of the parliamentary assistant to those words "halibut fishery only" which appear in the opening lines of the article. I know that later on it grants the privileges of landing halibut and sablefish. I am not for one moment suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that there was anything but the best of good faith on the part both of the United States and of Canada when this convention was negotiated and signed. But customs officers, both American and Canadian, cannot all be experts on fish nor experts in reading legal documents. Any customs officer or port official, suddenly and for the first time faced with a case under this treaty, might quite easily glance at these words "halibut fishery only" and come to the conclusion that the treaty applies to halibut only. Like myself, he might not know what sablefish includes. He might not know that it included cod.

This is not just a theoretical fear. About two years ago a case occurred in connection with this treaty before it was extended beyond Alaska. My recollection of that case is that a Canadian vessel put into the port of Sitka and was refused permission to land ten thousand pounds of cod, but she was partly disabled and unable to proceed. The matter was taken up with the appropriate authorities; but fresh cod does not remain fresh cod while awaiting the outcome of negotiations between Washington and Ottawa. Eventually, I understand, instructions were issued pointing out to the Alaska customs officials that their decision was in error. But in the meantime the cod had had to be dumped, a total loss. My request to the parliamentary assistant is that the Department of Fisheries, in conjunction with the Department of External Affairs, or whatever other authorities are proper, shall make absolutely certain that the customs and port officials will know just what this convention does mean. Inasmuch as fish, as I have said, is such a perishable product, it is essential that these officers be fully briefed before any occasion arises to use the advantages of the treaty. Before this short debate is concluded, when he closes it, I would ask the parliamentary assistant to give us an assurance on that point.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

APPROVAL OF EMPLOYMENT SERVICE CONVENTION ADOPTED AT SAN FRANCISCO, JULY 9, 1948

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of convention No. 88, employment service convention, 1948, which was adopted by the general conference of the international labour organization at its thirty-first session at San Francisco on the ninth day of July, 1948, and that this house do approve of the same.

He said: The purpose of this resolution is to obtain the approval by parliament of an international labour convention passed by the general conference of the international labour organization at San Francisco at its thirty-first session in June, 1948. This convention, No. 88, is designated the employment service convention, 1948. Copies of the text have been distributed to hon. members. Upon approval of its terms by parliament, the government proposes to proceed to the ratification of the convention.

Convention No. 88 provides that each member state ratifying the convention shall maintain a free public employment service, consisting of a national system of employment offices under the jurisdiction of a national authority. The duty of the employment service shall be to ensure the best possible organization of the labour market, in co-operation with other public and private bodies concerned. Co-operation of employers and workers shall be secured through national, regional and local advisory committees.

The organization of the employment service shall be so arranged as to assist workers to find suitable employment and to assist employers to find suitable workers on a voluntary basis. It shall also facilitate the movement of workers to areas with suitable employment opportunities, shall collect and make available information on the employment market, co-operate in the administration of unemployment insurance and other measures for the relief of the unemployed, assist in social and economic planning to ensure a favourable employment situation, and by vocational guidance endeavour to meet adequately the needs of particular categories of persons, such as disabled persons and young persons.

The Canadian representatives at the San Francisco conference voted for the approval of this convention.

It will be evident, I think, to all hon. members that Canada is already in full compliance with the provisions of the convention. Under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act, we have established and are operating a national employment service in conjunction with the unemployment insurance provisions of the act. The nature and standards of service provided by the national employment service under the act are certainly at least as high and as complete as those laid down in the convention.

The opinion of the law officers of the crown is that it is within the legislative competence of parliament to give effect to this convention, and no new legislation is required for this purpose.

The convention has already been ratified by the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden and Bulgaria.

In my opinion, Canada should proceed to the ratification of this convention for the reason that in the provision and operation of our national employment service we have given effect to the convention, and to indicate Canada's approval of its objectives and thus to give leadership and support to higher international labour standards, and for the establishment of similar services in other countries.

Perhaps I should explain just what obligations follow upon the ratification of an international labour organization convention by a member state. When the formal ratification has been communicated to the director general of the international labour organization, the ratifying state is required to take such action as may still be necessary to give effect to the provisions of the convention within the state by the enactment of legislation or otherwise, if this has not already been done.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Each of the states ratifying the convention agrees to make periodic reports to the international labour office on the measures which it has taken to give effect to the provisions of the convention. In short, a member state ratifying a convention undertakes an obligation that the provisions of the convention shall be given continuing effect in that its legislation and practice on the subject are on a level at least as high as the standards set by the provisions of the particular convention.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add only a sentence. We regard this as a commendable international effort to find a minimum base—I think no one suggests it is any more than that—from which fair legislation may grow. I am happy to know that we in Canada and in the various Canadian provinces have gone a long way—in fact we have shown leadership—in establishing such a base.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words to say. In fact, I agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), namely, that we regard the international labour organization as one of the most valuable pieces of international machinery established thus far. It has survived the test of a good many years as an international organization. We feel, too, that the means whereby the ILO works is a very useful and practical one, namely, that of having conventions considered and ratified at ILO conferences, following which that ratification is confirmed by the various countries represented.

This particular convention concerning employment services does seem to be one that is highly desirable to be laid down as a minimum for all countries that belong to the international labour organization. I think we would agree that Canada has gone at least some distance in pursuit of the principles laid down in this convention.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that this is one of those motions for which there is only one stage of debate. When this motion carries, that is the end of it so far as this house is concerned. But the minister can close the debate, and I would like, if I may, to ask a couple of questions—rhetorically—and perchance the minister would be good enough to answer them. My first question is this: First of all, does the government feel that there are any further steps that it will have to take, after it deposits the ratification of this convention, to make sure that Canada is living up to all of the terms of this convention? My second question is: Are there any outstanding ILO conventions which Canada has not yet ratified?

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I am not so enthusiastic about the ratification of this convention as some other hon. members seem to be, although I am not going to object seriously to it. I have a background which perhaps largely governs my thinking, and I must confess that I always look a little askance at the possibility of entangling ourselves with international organizations. I know that today civilization has reached a place where no nation lives unto itself. Nevertheless the tendency all around us in these days is to give to some outside body authority which belongs to us over our own affairs. I have never been able to bring myself to believe that is a wise move at any time.

While I am desirous that all nations should co-operate one with another, I believe we are headed for trouble if we put authority in the hands of any international body which would in any way eventually impose its will upon any individual nation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, paying some little attention to this particular convention, I must say that I am disappointed we did not have this printed or mimeographed document presented to us before. It was lying on our desks when we came here at three o'clock. The motion to adopt it was moved just a few moments ago. Between three o'clock and four-thirty our minds have been engaged in other matters. What opportunity have we had, as members of parliament, to read this convention in the last hour and a half? Yet we are now called upon as the parliament of Canada to ratify it.

I believe this could have been done tomorrow or on a subsequent day, and that a convention of this kind might well have been sent to the committee on industrial relations for further study. As the convention is not greatly involved, perhaps it has been considered unnecessary to send it to that committee. However, there may be underlying it certain principles a committee would have had an opportunity to consider in greater detail than can be expected in this house at the present time.

As I have glanced at it here and there in the last short while, it appears to me that Canada has already gone as far as this convention would go in respect of the management of our own labour problems. We have done this through the medium of the various employment offices across the country, and have been doing it for some years. In my view those employment offices have been doing a good job. While I have been in touch with only one or two of them, I have no fault to find, and would commend them.

I believe I am not far wrong when I say that at the international labour conference held at San Francisco they spent a great deal of time and energy, and must have spent a large sum of money, in attempting to do something Canada has already done. That is the way I feel about it; and there is no reason in the world why any other nation could not have done the same thing without necessarily subscribing to a convention of this kind. Those are my personal feelings in the matter.

As I look through the convention, about the only feature of an international nature I can find is that which appears at page 2, as article VI (b) (iv), which refers to facilitating the movement of workers from one country to another, as approved by the governments concerned. I had to read all the way down to that sentence to learn what the international aspect was. Up to that point it described only something we have already done.

I call the attention of the house to article V on page 2 which states:

> The general policy of the unemployment service in regard to referral of workers to available employment shall be developed after consultation of representatives of employers and workers through the advisory committees provided for in article IV.

As I read that, I thought I had never seen the word referral before. I do not claim to be a grammarian—indeed, sometimes I think I murder the King's English—but in this instance I called for the dictionary that is usually kept on the Clerk's table. It is the Concise Oxford Dictionary, and I find it does not contain the word referral. Therefore I am still at a loss to know what it means. I fancy it is a word which has been cleverly coined, and that its actual meaning is to transfer. When we talk about the transfer of workers it connotes to us something that might be dangerous in a free country like Canada.

When it comes to matters of employment, I believe we must view them from the standpoint of the obvious fact that we are living in a civilization moving at such a rapid pace that we have passed the day when we can think and talk in terms of full employment. Therefore we have to devise other means and think of things in terms other than those of simply putting everybody to work. Governments will be faced with almost insurmountable difficulties—I was going to say impossibilities—in an age such as that in which we live, where we have technological advances which are continually putting people out of work, an age in which we encourage technological advancement. We do that on the one hand, and then on the other we talk in terms of full employment.

I remember a lobbyist coming to my office some few years ago and asking me a number of questions. I felt I should have been the one asking the questions, but it was he who began the questioning by asking, "Do you believe in full employment, Mr. Hansell?" "Well," I said, "you tell me what you mean by full employment. Define your term." I continued, "When I was a boy my father used to get up with the chickens, work hard all day, and perhaps go to bed at dusk. He did that six days a week. I suggest to you that that would be full employment. Is that what you mean?" Oh no, he did not mean that. Labour organizations usually work eight hours a day, and he fancied that eight hours a day for six days a week would be full employment. I said, "No, I do not believe in that sort of full employment. I believe in six hours a day; I believe in four hours a day. What do you have to say to that?" He said, "Well, that would be very nice if we as workers could get by with working four or six hours a day, but I am afraid we would not be able to earn enough money working that number of hours." I said, "That depends on how much an hour you are getting." He said to me, "Well, of course, a man getting $1 an hour and working eight hours a day would get $8 a day, and if he were only working four hours he would only get $4 a day." I said, "Yes, that is a very profound observation." He said that he would not be able to live on that. I said, "Suppose the whole industrial machinery of the country working four hours a day should produce an overabundance of things. What then? If there were a possibility of augmenting your wages in some other way in order that you might have the advantage of the great production of the nation, would that not do?" He said, "I suppose it would, but is there any way that can be done?" I said, "I will tell you what to do. You call on Mr. King and ask him if he has a way he can suggest. Then after that call on Mr. Bracken and ask him if he has any way in which to handle a thing like that. When you are through with him call on Mr. Coldwell and ask him if he has any way of overcoming that difficulty. When you find they have no way then come back to me and we will talk a little further about it."

[Mr. Hansell).]

I have not seen the gentleman since but I think I can draw some rather correct conclusions. Returning to the document, I should like to suggest—and I say this purely on my own responsibility—that after the international labour organization has brought industry and labour into the position of a socialist state they will have all the stage work done for Uncle Joe. I see in this document something respecting the transfer of workers. That is exactly what Stalin would like us to have. I see no difficulty in the way of each country being able to run its own industrial organization in a co-operative way with one country learning from another. My profound conclusion is that the more we tie our hands to an international authority the less authority we shall have over the management of our own affairs.

Not so long ago we listened in the house to the pipe lines debate which took a long time to finish. The press and others referred to it as a filibuster. I am not debating that now, but there was one note sounded in that debate, and I have no objection to its being sounded. The view was expressed that we were taking our natural resources and giving them away to another nation. In the first place we were not giving them away. If we had any natural resources to dispose of we were selling them. That is one place where a mistake was made in the phraseology because we were not giving anything away. In some quarters of the house the measures were vigorously opposed because, so they said, we were giving away some of our natural resources. It was said that we must not do that, but when it comes to international organizations we can give away our freedom as fast as you like, and no objection is raised to that. I would rather sell our natural resources to another nation than give away some of our sovereignty, thus rendering us less free to manage our own affairs.

I simply warn of the danger of entangling ourselves with international organizations which will have the effect of outside authorities telling us how to run our own business and we shall not be able to tell them to mind their own business. That is the way I feel about these questions. As I said before, I see nothing particularly harmful in this convention, because I think we are several jumps ahead of it. In Canada we have already established our local employment offices that are able to do a good job. Let other nations take a leaf from the management of our affairs and do likewise.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this document and the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I do not take the pessimistic view of these international arrangements that the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) does. I believe it is a demonstration that nations can co-operate even under most difficult world conditions to produce something worth while and of mutual advantage. The document is the result of co-operative effort which the hon. member for Macleod has suggested should be undertaken. Even under today's difficult world conditions, when many people feel frustrated because of the difficulties experienced in reaching common agreement among the nations of the world, I am one of those who believe that it is better to light a candle than curse the darkness. I look upon this document, dealing as it does with the international labour organization, as a little candle in international relations in a somewhat dark world.

I rose particularly to ask the minister two questions. I notice the document was adopted on July 9, 1948. Why has there been such a delay in presenting it to the house? Second, the document was on our desks when we came into the house this afternoon. Why was it not made available a day or two before so that members might have had an opportunity to study it before the resolution was brought before the house?

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Order. I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): The international labour office is the oldest international organization in existence today. It was founded in 1919 in the city of Washington, U.S.A. I might point out to my hon. friend that at the Paris peace conference of 1918, under the chairmanship of Sir Robert Borden, the principles of this organization were enunciated, and eventually the ILO was established in Washington the following year. If I remember rightly Senator Robertson was one of the official delegates at that time. I forget the others, though I knew them quite well.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) spoke of national sovereignty. I do not think anyone in this house is going to suggest that the sovereignty of this nation be given up to any other nation. This is merely a declaration, to establish a principle. I would point out also that this is a tripartite organization, consisting of representatives of employers, employees and the governments of the respective countries; and I believe that in a broad and general way it has had a tremendous influence on what might be called the more backward countries of the world, in raising the standard of employment conditions and other things we have taken for granted in this country down through the years. I think perhaps it has contributed more than any other international organization, whether it be political, financial or anything else. I am not going to get into an argument about the financial aspect, which was mentioned by the hon. member for Macleod. This is not the time or place for that debate.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked whether any changes would be made to fit our system into this convention. I believe I made it clear in my opening statement that to my knowledge we are living up to all the provisions of the convention, and the hon. member may rest assured that from time to time the government will endeavour to increase the efficiency of the employment service of this country. As Canadians I think we can be proud of the speedy development of that organization. I lived through the agitation for it for thirty years, when the labour organizations of this country were violently opposing the maintenance of fee-charging employment agencies. Those of us who were close to the situation during those days know something of what that practice did to the working people of this country. This afternoon we have heard representatives of every party in the house, including the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Macleod and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), agree that this convention should be adopted, so that would seem to be the thought of every party here.

My hon. friend asked why this resolution was not introduced last year. That was not done for the simple reason that last year we had a situation somewhat similar to the situation developing this year. There is a limit to human endurance. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre smiles. That is the easiest thing in the world to do when you have no responsibility. Let me remind the hon. member that it costs more than $6,000 for every minute this house is in operation. I wish someone who has more leisure than I would count the time some hon. members have taken up in this house and multiply it by six thousand. I am a great believer in the British way of discussion. I think a better speech can be made in ten minutes than in forty minutes, and if you cannot say all you know about a subject in twenty minutes you do not know anything about it. The hon. member for Macleod was speaking about long words, and I forget the one he used; but I am a great believer in basic English. When you are in a jam, use a long word to get yourself out of it. No one will understand it, including yourself.

Then I was asked why this document had not been circulated before this. Well, it is a public document, and I believe the basic principles were carried in the Labour Gazette. As an afterthought it occurred to me that it might be circulated to hon. members today. I do not believe it would have made any difference if it had been circulated earlier, because we are all agreed upon the soundness of the principles under discussion. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked what interest the government had taken in the I.L.O. As a federal parliament we have so far approved twelve conventions. Anyone who has followed the work of the I.L.O. closely knows the difficulties that occur in what we call a federal state. They have the same problems in the United States, Australia, and other countries in connection with the approval of these conventions. In the United States and Canada hours and wages, for instance, come under the jurisdiction of the state and provincial governments. In Australia there is also divided authority on labour relations, and the same might be said of South Africa. There is one reason we have not approved as many conventions on paper as some other countries. Anything works on paper, but I like to see a plan in operation day after day. I seem to recall that prior to the last war the nation that had adopted the most conventions at the I.L.O. was Roumania, but I do not hear of anyone in Canada wanting to live in Roumania. I have some knowledge of many Roumanians who want to come to Canada, and I do not blame them. I believe the adoption of any policy by a deliberative assembly like this house should be based upon the practical application of that policy to the lives of the people to whom we are responsible.

I do not believe there is much more I can say, except to remind hon. members that the I.L.O. will be in session next month in Geneva. I wish I could be there; I hear someone say they wish they could see me there. In all my years as Minister of Labour I have not attended a convention of the I.L.O. outside this country. Mine is a busy department, as hon. members know, and I have never had that opportunity. Some day I would like to attend a meeting of the I.L.O. in Geneva, representative as it is of more than fifty nations and making, as it does, a great contribution to the lives of the men and women who work on the farms, in the mines, in the industry and commerce of the countries affiliated with it.

Mr. Knowles: Before the minister sits down I should like to thank him for the answers he gave to some of our questions. I am not sure that he gave a complete answer to my question as to whether there were any outstanding conventions of the I.L.O. which Canada has not endorsed. He made reference to the conventions respecting wages and hours. Are there any others?

Mr. Mitchell: I am speaking from memory, and I would not want to mislead my hon. friend or the house, but I rather fancy there may be one or two. However, they do not come within the jurisdiction of my department.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—TAX EXEMPTIONS ON RELIEF FUND CONTRIBUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister now prepared to make a considered statement in answer to a question I asked on May 24 as reported at page 2800 of Hansard, namely:

Will consideration be given to the request of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce that contributions to the Manitoba flood relief fund be exempted from taxation over and above the five per cent now allowed corporations and the ten per cent allowed individuals?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the act covers the circumstances I reported to the house in Hansard, page 2423. If anything more is to be done, it will come within the jurisdiction of my colleague the Minister of Finance, who is aware of my hon. friend's request and is giving it consideration.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PRINTING BUREAU EMPLOYEES—OPPORTUNITY TO APPEAR BEFORE PRINTING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In the absence of the Secretary of State, may I direct a question to the chairman of the committee on printing? I refer to the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). Will the request of the Ottawa typographical union for one or more of their representatives to appear before the committee on printing to discuss matters relating to wages and working conditions in the printing bureau now be given favourable consideration?

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, according to the rules of the house there must be a reference from the house to the committee requesting the committee to study matters pertaining to government printing. This is a joint committee of the house and the Senate, so I can only speak for myself as one chairman of the committee, and without having consulted the joint chairman or my colleagues, but I can assure the hon. member that so far as I am concerned the committee will give every consideration to any matter affecting government printing which is referred to it by the house.

CUSTOMS ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO APPEALS TO TARIFF BOARD, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 237, to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Repeal.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, section 2 proposes to repeal three provisions of the present act. It proposes to repeal section 43(3), section 43A in its entirety, and section 47(4). In what I have to say I have no quarrel with the proposal to repeal section 43A or section 47(4), but I do submit that the proposal to repeal section 43(3) is unfortunate, and would be a retrograde step.

The purpose or effect of section 43(3) is to confer a right of appeal to the tariff board from certain decisions of the minister under the Customs Act. The other provisions of that section, namely, subsections 1 and 2, empower the minister to fix arbitrary values in certain cases. The effect of subsection 3 of section 43 is to confer a right of appeal from such decisions of the minister. The purpose of clause 2 of the bill, that is the part of it I am now discussing, is to eliminate in its entirety the right of appeal from the decision of the minister to the tariff board. I submit that there is no reason for eliminating that right of appeal.

The jurisdiction of the tariff board on such appeals is limited to confirming or lowering the artificial value fixed by the minister under an earlier subsection than section 43. It cannot raise such value. If one looks at the explanatory note opposite section 2 of the bill, one finds the following words:

> Subsection 3 of section 43 was enacted in 1937 to implement a trade agreement with the United States which is no longer in effect.

Whether or not that explanation is correct, sir, in so far as it goes it is only an explanation as to how this section came into the act in the first place. I do not know whether that was the only circumstance that led parliament to enact section 43(3) in 1937, but I do know that, the section being in the act, there is nothing in the explanatory note that calls for its repeal. We are simply told that the circumstances which called the section into being in 1937 have passed, that particular agreement with the United States being no longer in effect. This section giving the right of appeal to the tariff board is a sound remedial provision, and no reason for its repeal has been given.

This right of appeal was exercised last year in one case, and I might inform the committee that in that case the tariff board upset the decision of the minister by reducing the amount of the artificial valuation which the minister had fixed under the powers conferred in the earlier subsections of section 43.

In my submission, sir, this question is not affected in the least by the Geneva agreement. If we were dealing with any question in relation to the Geneva agreement, the whole of section 43, including the two earlier subsections, would be immediately called into question under the existing protocol of provisional application of the Geneva agreement which Canada has signed. The provisions of part II of the agreement need only be applied "to the fullest extent not inconsistent with existing legislation." This is such existing legislation. Article VII, subsection 2(a), of the Geneva agreement reads as follows:

> The value for customs purposes of imported merchandise should be based on the actual value of the imported merchandise on which duty is assessed, or of like merchandise, and should not be based on the value of merchandise of national origin or on arbitrary or fictitious values.

There is nothing in the explanatory note to indicate that that was in the mind of the draftsman of this section of the bill. If it were, if that is to be the reason given for bringing forward this legislation, I have to say that in the first place the article is not fully in effect because of the existing protocol of provisional application to which I have referred. In the second place even if it were being applied as to the signatories of the Geneva agreement, it certainly would have no application to any of the other countries in the world. It happens to have been one of those other countries whose exports to Canada were involved in that case to which I referred as having been appealed to the tariff board from the minister's decision last year.

There are other nations that would be affected by this, and what will be the effect if we legislate as proposed here? Those affected by the decisions of the minister under the earlier subsections of section 43 will be deprived of the right of appeal to the tariff board. In my submission there is no reason at all for depriving any such person of the salutary right of appeal to the tariff board. Surely we believe in the tariff board. It is an existing institution under existing legislation of this parliament. According to today's order paper there is to be an amendment introduced to the Tariff Board Act dealing with the procedure before the tariff board. The tariff board is surely here to stay. Then why should we deprive persons who are affected by decisions of the minister in fixing an artificial value on imports of their right to appeal to the tariff board? If the tariff board is a salutary institution, and if this right of appeal to the board from decisions of the minister is a salutary institution, I submit there is no occasion whatsoever for repealing section 43, subsection 3, of the Customs Act.

Mr. Sinclair: This bill is a Department of National Revenue bill, not a Department of Finance bill. The point which the hon. member for Eglinton was attempting to make would be a good one if it were an appeal from a ruling of the department; that is, the deputy minister. Perhaps I should say a few words in general explanation to hon. members about the purpose of this particular section of the customs bill.

The present section 43 of the Customs Act gives the Minister of National Revenue the power to put a quite arbitrary value on the imports of goods if it is thought that the goods are being dumped and the effect is going to be prejudicial to the manufacturers of Canada. On that artificial value of course is then levied the ad valorem rate of duty and whatever dumping duty would apply. As the hon. member for Eglinton pointed out, the Geneva agreements removed that type of artificial fixing of prices from our tax structure as it affects those countries signatory to the Geneva trade agreements. It is, however, still necessary to have such a protection amongst those countries which did not, either by choice or for other reasons, take part in the Geneva agreements. I think perhaps I should give a list of the countries in connection with whose trade we still think it is necessary for Canadian industry to have this protection. They are Abyssinia, Afghanistan, Anglo-Egyptian Soudan, Arabia, Bulgaria, Egypt, the eastern zone of Germany, Honduras, Hungary, Iran, Iraq, Japan, Peru, Roumania, Russia and Siam. It is not the deputy minister of national revenue—that is, the department—who actually assesses or fixes this arbitrary value as a matter of departmental administration. It is a serious step to put on such a value, and so is a matter of government policy. The matter is first of all discussed in council, and the governor in council passes an enabling order specifying, first of all, the goods and secondly the country of origin. Then under this authority the Minister of National Revenue issues a specific order fixing the arbitrary price which is going to be set on the goods in question. This section of the bill now does remove the right of appeal to the tariff board from such an action by the minister. We still have that full right of appeal from departmental rulings, and we are extending the field of these appeals to include other interested parties.

There is a great difference between an appeal to the tariff board from a departmental ruling by the deputy minister of customs and excise and an appeal to the tariff board from a matter which has been discussed by council, which has been followed up by an order in council setting out government policy and then by a specific order from the minister. It puts the tariff board in an impossible position to be asked to rule in the latter circumstances; and because of that, this change is being made. This legislation now affects only those countries which I have listed, and will be used only as a protection for Canadian industry against dumping at unfair prices by producers of those countries.

Mr. Fleming: I thank the parliamentary assistant for his statement because I think that everything he has said has strengthened the case I am putting before the committee for retention of the existing right of appeal under section 43, subsection 3. Let us be quite clear about this. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, we are not discussing the power given to the minister to set an arbitrary or fictitious value for customs or anti-dumping purposes. These provisions are contained in the earlier subsections of this section. No one is proposing in any degree to interfere with those. Those stand and they do not come into this discussion in any way whatever. What we are discussing, and the one question before the committee now, is whether an existing right of appeal to the tariff board against such decisions should be eliminated.

The parliamentary assistant complained that we are putting the tariff board in an impossible position by retaining this right of appeal to them from a decision of the minister. That is a far-fetched argument to put before this committee when we know that last year, when an appeal was taken, under this subsection, to the tariff board, they upset the decision of the minister. What is so impossible about that? Apparently the tariff board is not worried about the embarrassment of sitting on an appeal from decisions of the minister under the earlier subsections of section 43. They felt quite at liberty in that case to upset the decision of the minister.

I think it is clear that what is bothering somebody here is not a question of the impossibility of the position of the tariff board. Somebody apparently feels that the minister's decisions are so infallible that they should not be subject to appeal. That, Mr. Chairman, is a theory that I cannot hold with at all. The minister, in exercising the powers given to him under this and other sections, is proceeding on an administrative basis, surely; and so far as he is exercising judgment, surely it is not unreasonable that that judgment should be open to appeal to a tariff board in which we all believe. If there was anything in this situation that demeaned the minister in exercising his right to make decisions under section 43, subsections 1 and 2, then this demeaning provision has existed for the last thirteen years in legislation of this parliament. Surely it is not going to demean unduly the minister and his prerogatives to allow that legislation to continue on the statute books.

It is sound legislation to protect a right of appeal to be taken to the tariff board in a situation of this kind. If you take away this right of appeal, you are saying in effect that there should be no right of appeal from a decision of the minister in a case of this kind, that the minister's judgment is final, and that he is infallible. As long as we have humans exercising these powers of judgment, there are bound to be mistakes, as was shown last year. Let us not take away from those affected a right of appeal in legislation in remedial form in this respect. Why take away from people a right they have today, which cannot be abused, and which does not hurt the government, but which exists and gives some protection to those who are affected by it?

Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clause 2 of the said bill be amended by striking out the words "subsection three of section forty-three of the said act as enacted by section six of chapter nineteen of the statutes of 1936.

May I explain that that refers to most of the first three lines of clause 2 of the bill. It does not affect clause 2 as to the repeal of section 43A and section 47(4), but it will retain in the act section 43, subsection 3, as it now stands and will preserve that salutary right of appeal to the tariff board.

Amendment (Mr. Fleming) negatived.

TARIFF BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO APPEALS UNDER OTHER ACTS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 236, to amend the Tariff Board Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Appeals under other acts.

Mr. Fleming: Could we have some further explanation? The explanatory note states:

The purpose of this amendment is to clarify the procedural powers of the board with respect to appeals under the Customs Act and similar statutes.

It is not quite clear from a perusal of the bill and the explanatory note whether the effect is to enlarge or contract the jurisdiction of the board on these appeals.

Mr. Sinclair: This bill is a consequence of the bill we just passed amending the Customs Act. In section 3 of that bill there was an extension of appeals by allowing not just the importer who was affected by a departmental ruling on tariffs, but any other person who felt himself aggrieved, either to appear as a witness in the appeal or actively to launch the appeal himself, and then, if necessary, to carry further appeal to the exchequer court.

Up till now these appeals to the tariff board have been fairly informal, in that there was only the aggrieved person who was the importer, and the department involved. We are now widening the field of appeals to allow other people, manufacturers in Canada, for example, who think they are aggrieved by a departmental ruling, to appeal. We must give the board—

Mr. Fleming: That is in the other bill.

Mr. Sinclair: Section 3 of the other bill. Now that the appeals are to be on a little broader basis, it was felt best to spell out the actual powers of appeal.

Before the last amendments to the Tariff Board Act this act was in two parts. Part I dealt with inquiries. In this part were spelled out the powers as far as inquiries were concerned. Part II dealt with appeals, but no special powers were mentioned. These two parts were consolidated in the 1948 amendments but it was not quite clear that the powers to conduct appeals and the powers to conduct inquiries were consolidated. So that there will be no doubt that the board has the necessary powers to conduct these expanded appeals, if you like, as well as other purposes given in the powers, we are now writing into the appeal section the powers given in the inquiry section, except for section three, 7 and 8. There will be no need to compel witnesses to attend such appeals because of course the witnesses are the persons appearing of their own volition since they are interested.

As far as subsections 7 and 8 are concerned, the necessary authority is already in the Tariff Board Act. There is a provision that there shall always be a quorum of two out of three to hear such appeals; therefore 7 and 8 of the powers given under the inquiry section are not necessary here.

Mr. Fleming: That deals with 7 which says:

> One member shall have power to conduct any inquiry . . .

Mr. Sinclair: That is the point. As far as appeals are concerned, the quorum is explicit in the present act. There must always be at least two members of the tariff board to hear an appeal. So the quorums which are given in subsections 7 and 8 under the inquiry section will not apply as far as appeals are concerned.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

LEVYING OF TAXES FOR CERTAIN WORKS OR SERVICES—AMENDMENT TO BILL NO. 235

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That the following provision be inserted as subsection three of section three of Bill No. 235 (Letter O-6 of the Senate), intituled "An act to amend the National Parks Act" now before the house:
> "(3) Paragraphs (p) and (q) of subsection one of section seven of the said act, as enacted by section nine of chapter sixty-six of the statutes of 1947, are repealed and the following substitued therefor:
> '(p) levying taxes upon the residents of a park or upon the interest of any person in land in a park in order to defray the cost of health and welfare services supplied to such residents by a province pursuant to an agreement made under paragraph (o) or supplied to such residents by the government of Canada;
> (q) levying taxes upon the interest of any person in land in a park in order to defray, in whole or in part, the cost of the establishment, operation, maintenance and administration of any public works, improvements or utility services referred to in paragraph (i) and prescribing that such taxes may be levied with respect to any or all of the following lands (i) all lands in the park; (ii) lands in such area or areas in the park as may be designated by regulations, and (iii) lands benefited by such public works, improvements or utility services;
> (r) the sale or forfeiture of lands for non-payment of taxes;
> (s) the abatement and prevention of nuisances'."

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Bryce: Will the minister tell us what this is all about?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, this is a resolution which, when we are dealing with Bill No. 235, section 3, I shall ask one of my colleagues to move to have inserted as subsection 3 of section 3. The reason for that is that when Bill 235 went to the other place for consideration this resolution was part of the bill; but it was of course necessary to have this part of the bill preceded by a resolution because it deals with the expenditure of public funds and raising revenue. It was therefore withdrawn from the bill so that the House of Commons might deal with it, and a section will be inserted as an amendment to the bill later on, subject to the approval of the house.

The resolution itself seeks to obtain from the house permission to lexy taxes in public parks. It is in most respects a clarification of powers that are already in the act to enable the government in the first instance to pay provincial governments for services such as health and welfare that are provided by provincial governments to the residents of national parks.

In the second instance it is to authorize for taxation to offset the cost of services such as water, sewerage, garbage collection and the like provided to residents of national parks.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO LANDS REQUIRED FOR GAS AND OIL PIPE LINES, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the second reading of Bill No. 235, to amend the National Parks Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Regulations.

Mr. Winters: I shall ask my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, to move that the contents of the resolution appearing on the order paper as item No. 14 be now added to Bill No. 235, letter O-6 of the Senate, as section 3(3).

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That the following be added as subsection (3) of section 3:

"(3) Paragraphs (p) and (q) of subsection one of section seven of the said act, as enacted by section nine of chapter sixty-six of the statutes of 1947, are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'(p) levying taxes upon the residents of a park or upon the interest of any person in land in a park in order to defray the cost of health and welfare services supplied to such residents by a province pursuant to an agreement made under paragraph (o) or supplied to such residents by the government of Canada;

(q) levying taxes upon the interest of any person in land in a park in order to defray, in whole or in part, the cost of the establishment, operation, maintenance and administration of any public works, improvements or utility services referred to in paragraph (i) and prescribing that such taxes may be levied with respect to any or all of the following lands (i) all lands in the park; (ii) lands in such area or areas in the park as may be designated by regulations, and (iii) lands benefited by such public works, improvements or utility services;

(r) the sale or forfeiture of lands for non-payment of taxes;

(s) the abatement and prevention of nuisances'."

Mr. Harris (Danforth): We have had only a brief explanation from the minister. I wonder if he has before him any further information to give the committee?

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps that could be done when the title is called.

Section 4 agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, this bill is to amend the National Parks Act. The most important change is a provision to authorize the granting of rights of way for oil and gas pipe lines through the parks.

Another amendment is to re-enact a provision in the Dominion Lands Act, which was repealed by the passage of the Territorial Lands Act. Recently there was passed by the house a territorial lands bill to replace the Dominion Lands Act. When that bill was being considered some questions were asked about timber berths which had been granted under the Dominion Lands Act. As stated then, there are some eight berths located in national parks, all of which were granted prior to 1930 when the National Parks Act was passed. As the territorial lands bill applies only to the territories, the provisions applying to these timber limits should be added to the National Parks Act. There are also a few minor changes which affect the definitions in the act, one of which is a change in the name of the department.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I believe that change has to do with the department of the interior, which went out of existence some years ago.

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Bryce: Have these contracts long to run?

Mr. Winters: To all intents and purposes they are in perpetuity. The only reason for termination would be lack of conformity with the regulations.

Mr. Bryce: To whom are they rented?

Mr. Winters: There are eight of them in all, rented to the following: Berth No. 406, Yoho national park, to the Berpall Lumber Company. The original date of issue was November 26, 1886. Then, berth No. 40, Glacier national park, issued on May 26, 1886, to the Royal Trust Company; then there are five berths in Glacier national park, Nos. 117, 292, 328, 329 and 342 issued in the years 1893, 1902, 1903, 1903 and 1903, respectively, to the Deer Park Lumber Company. The last one, berth No. 73, in Revelstoke, was issued in 1893 to the Royal Trust Company.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Is the minister before the committee the present minister of the interior?

Mr. Winters: The functions to which the hon. member refers have been taken over by the Department of Resources and Development.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): It does not say so.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like confirmation of what I believe the minister said, namely that prior to this time pipe lines did not have the privilege of going through national parks.

Mr. Winters: That is right; this enables the government to make provision whereby pipe lines may go through national parks.

Mr. Herridge: Is it usual for the federal government to charge the stumpage and royalty duties charged by the province in which a park is situated?

Mr. Winters: Yes; the procedure is so far as possible for the federal government to conform to the practice in the province.

Mr. Herridge: And increase the stumpage, as it is increased, or otherwise?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Cruickshank: I understand that the Royal Trust Company and certain other companies have enjoyed certain privileges. Do I understand now that any company will be eligible with the equal right to put a pipe line through a national park?

Mr. Winters: This gives the government the right to grant the same privilege to anyone receiving authorization in the usual manner.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO BREAKING AND ENTERING, FORGERY, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 82, to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister going to say anything?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) suggests that I say a word by way of explanation. I will make it very brief because the explanatory matter published opposite each section of the bill is pretty lucid. The bill comes from the Senate, which has given it careful consideration. It represents the annual amendments to the Criminal Code which the government recommends to the house at this session. In so far as second reading is concerned, the bill deals with fourteen separate matters which have little in common. There is no principle common to them all, and the only thing that can be said to bind them together in the one bill is that they all have to do with amendments to the Criminal Code, an act of a very comprehensive nature. Therefore I think we shall make much better progress if I just say these few words on second reading and then go into committee where, if further explanations are desired by hon. members with regard to any of the amendments, I shall be glad to provide them if I can.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, so far as the actual amendments are concerned, with two exceptions they cover amendments that are technical or procedural. The minister having said that the bill represents all the amendments to the Criminal Code the government intends to introduce at this session, it becomes necessary for me to refer to a number of matters having to do with the administration of the criminal law. I regret that some of the suggestions I am about to make have not found their way into the amendments that are being introduced on this occasion by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). I am sure he will agree with me that there is nothing more important than that the criminal law should be maintained and kept up to date. To that end the criminal law amendment commission has been sitting since January 1949. It is charged with the responsibility of recommending such revisions and changes in the criminal law as are deemed necessary by the members of that commission under the distinguished chairmanship of Chief Justice Martin of the Saskatchewan court of appeal.

When I say enforcement of the criminal law is of major importance, and I notice the changes that are made with regard to firearms, what has taken place within the last two days in the city of Montreal underlines the necessity for agencies of the crown to do everything possible to minimize the use of firearms, particularly revolvers, pistols and other such weapons. Indeed there is an article in tonight's paper indicating that a special reward has been offered by the Canadian Bankers Association in the case of the gunman who killed Royal Canadian Mounted Police constable Alexander Gamman during an attempted hold-up a few days ago in that city. The minister being in fact the titular head of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I suggest to him that no person should be allowed to wander about our country with even the slightest possibility of immunity from arrest without all agencies of the crown and private citizens doing everything they can to ensure his apprehension.

I have referred to a Royal Canadian Mounted Police officer killed in the discharge of his duty. I am sure that the country as a whole would approve of the minister, as head of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, offering an additional reward to that already offered by the Canadian Bankers Association with a view to showing all lawbreakers or potential lawbreakers that the murder of an officer of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police shall not go unpunished if agencies of law and civilian organizations can prevent it.

I am not allowed to deal with the various sections of the bill on the motion for second reading, and as the minister said they can be dealt with in committee. Nevertheless there are one or two things to which I should like to draw his attention. There are certain changes that should be made, and parliament should not wait to make them until the criminal law amendment commission reports. The first one has to do with the provision of the law as it now stands, that in so far as money penalties are concerned the alternative is imprisonment. I have known, as I am sure the Minister of Justice and other legal members of the house also have, of cases where, because an individual was poor and unable to pay his fine, the price of poverty has been a passport to imprisonment. That should not be. If the offence committed merits no more than a fine the pecuniary inability of the accused to pay it should not place him in a position where the stigma of imprisonment hangs over him, and is indeed so often imposed. From experience I know there are many magistrates who, in the enforcement of the law, extend the time for payment, and are often criticized for doing so by the agencies that appoint them.

I feel the time has come in Canada to follow the reform that has been made in this regard in the United Kingdom where a person no longer is imprisoned for failure to pay a fine when he is unable to do so. I also feel that an amendment might be introduced to provide for instalment payments under the law to the end that this injustice will be removed.

Then I come to one further matter. It has to do with respect for the law, because after all the criminal law depends for its enforcement on the respect people have for it. Nothing has done more harm to the enforcement of law in our country than the flagrant flouting of the law on the part of the Sons of Freedom. They have placed themselves above the law, which they regard as simply a means of attaining martyrdom. They commit the most serious offences with the excuse that they are motivated by religious considerations.

This is the first opportunity I have had to pass on a suggestion to the minister. I understand that a commission has been set up in British Columbia to look into the matter and determine what course should be followed. One thing is certain; something must be done. These people cannot be permitted to continue to commit crimes, including arson, at their least whim with impunity under the pretence that they are indeed acting under a religious impulse. I have no interest in the name I place before the minister now in connection with that commission. I know something of the influence this gentleman has on Doukhobors who would break our law, and I know that no Anglo-Saxon has had as much experience with these people. I refer to James Wright of Saskatoon, the author of "Slava Bohu", an outstanding book of a few years ago relating to Doukhobors. I know of no one who understands the temperament of the Sons of Freedom as he does, or who has as much influence with them. I must add that he has no particular political qualifications for the position, for he belongs neither to the party of my hon. friend the minister nor to the party to which I belong. His great qualification is his understanding of the problem. He is an authority on the Doukhobors, and in particular on the Sons of Freedom. If his services are enlisted I am sure he will do much toward solving the problem which faces the minister and the attorney general of British Columbia, for it affects both. The administration of the law rests with British Columbia, but the R.C.M.P. are an agency of the federal parliament charged with the responsibility of carrying out federal laws. They are being used to meet this threat in British Columbia, which places upon the shoulders of the minister a heavy responsibility.

In offering this suggestion I am endeavouring to share that responsibility as one desirous of seeing this problem settled so that no longer will these people, while accepting all the benefits of freedom, whenever they feel like it set out to destroy freedom. They came to this country looking for freedom from persecution. They must be made to realize that we will not have our laws flouted by them at their every whim. In that spirit, and in a desire to see that the criminal law shall not be evaded and circumvented by these people, with the inevitable lessening of public support for law enforcement, I advance this suggestion to the minister knowing what this man can do, having in mind the experience we in Saskatchewan have had with Mr. Wright over a period of fifteen or eighteen years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have one other suggestion to offer, which I believe deserves the attention of parliament. There is no more serious matter in our country today than the matter of drunken driving. In view of the fact that hundreds of people are being killed each year through the negligence of drunken drivers, I feel that the amendments to our criminal law should include some reference to this matter with a view to tightening up the law. Some time ago I asked the minister whether he intended to bring in any such amendment. On May 3, 1950, at page 2119, he informed the house and the country that the government did not intend at this session to bring in any amendments to the law with respect to drunken drivers.

Let us view the situation dispassionately. Some 1,800 Canadians are killed each year in motor accidents. Of these some thirty per cent—and this is a reasonable estimate based on the experience of police officers—are killed by drunken drivers. We regard murder as a terrible crime. Drunken drivers kill five times as many Canadians as are murdered. I am not going to place on record a great deal of data on the subject. There was a particularly good article in Maclean's magazine of March 15, 1950, and I am going to summarize what it says. In Canada the accident rate is 12·7 per 100,000. In Sweden, which has taken drastic measures to stop drunken driving, the rate is 4·3. One can determine how serious the situation is by communicating with any crown prosecutor in this country, or with the mounted police. Dr. Joslyn Rogers, the Ontario provincial analyst, has summed up the situation in these words:

> The drunk driver's killings and maimings would appal the public if they could be put before people in all their horror. He is the greatest menace we have.

Then I have one other quotation, from Chief Charles MacIver of Winnipeg. Knowing this man as he does, I am sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will place a good deal of reliance in what he says:

> Drunken driving is the No. 1 social problem today. A motorist under the influence of liquor is a potential murderer.

The police chief of Regina has branded it as the gravest social problem with which we have to contend. Yet we go on, year after year, with the criminal code unchanged, the minimum penalty being seven days and the percentage of acquittals particularly high because in many cases the crown is unable to establish guilt. The defence can always be raised that there has been a leak in the pipe in the motor, and the man has suffered from carbon monoxide poisoning, or he has had a heart attack or some other seizure. Perhaps he had a drink three or four hours before, or indeed he may have had a drink only after the police came. Frequently it is urged that the accused smelled of alcohol only because he took a drink after the police came in order to restore his morale.

This problem is not being faced by parliament as it should be. When you recall there are between 500 and 600 Canadians a year, or almost two Canadians a day, killed on the highways by drunken drivers, you can see that this is a matter which deserves the attention of parliament. The attorney general of British Columbia was under the impression, in an interview he gave on April 28, that amendments to the Criminal Code were being drafted. According to the minister he was in error in that regard.

What should be done? Some would suggest that we increase the penalty. Increasing the penalty very often results in an increase in the number of acquittals. If the minimum penalty is too high the judge or jury will go a long way in order to arrive at a verdict of not guilty when any doubt, however inconsiderable, has been raised. In the explanatory notes of the bill to amend the Customs Act, which was piloted through the house today by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair), the explanation given for reducing the penalties was that the penalties were so high as to constitute an invitation to acquittal. If heavier penalties are not the solution, what other methods are there? I am not here for the purpose of suggesting what methods should be followed. In Sweden, to which I have already made reference, drastic regulations and laws have been in force. According to Maclean's magazine the police of that country have the power to stop a line of cars at any time, on any street or highway, and take blood alcohol tests. Wherever the driver's alcohol percentage goes above the equivalent of one medium drink of whisky he can be sent to jail, and the minimum sentence is two months. That is drastic, and I doubt that such a plan could be accepted under our law.

An hon. Member: But not too drastic.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am arguing both sides of the question, and I can see the point my hon. friend has raised. I know from experience in prosecuting, but more particularly as defence counsel, that heavy minimum penalties defeat the object for which they were established.

What are the alternative suggestions? The alternative suggestion is that chemical tests be provided for under the law, whereby when a person is taken into custody on this charge he may be subjected to either a breath test, blowing his breath into a balloon, or a blood test, which is more drastic, or a test of saliva or urine. Under our law now those tests, if taken, would be illegal; certainly they would not be admissible in evidence. It is not for me to suggest what should be done, but certainly there is no doubt whatever that any person whose blood test showed a reaction of ·15 of alcohol is intoxicated to a degree that he is unable to properly operate his motorcar. It is not very long ago that I had experience in a homicide case; after a drinking party an examination was made of the blood of the deceased, and it was found that the percentage of alcohol was over ·15. Every medical authority on jurisprudence agrees that at that point a person is in fact unable to form a rational opinion as to the difference between right and wrong, and has lost that control of his motivating capacity as would amount to intoxication.

I feel that something must be done. The number of drunken driver cases is multiplying year by year. Taking the city of Toronto as an example, the figures given for 1945 show that 453 of the drivers in accidents were listed as under the influence or had been drinking; in 1949 the number jumped to 826. In Vancouver there were similar records, and in Winnipeg there was a pronounced increase following the trend across the country. There is no more serious problem today than the problem of dealing with this matter. It is not dealt with today under the section of the Criminal Code. I venture the opinion that if a compulsory blood test or saliva test were provided by law it would afford many persons a defence; and on the other hand it would also provide, for those who escape the just penalty for their wrong, the certainty of conviction in the event that their blood was found to have a percentage of alcohol over ·15. Therefore, sir, even at this late date, I bring this matter to the attention of the minister. I believe it is a matter that deserves attention now. Waiting another year means that 600 or more Canadians will be killed because the law is not sufficiently stern, and the enforcement of the law is insufficient to meet the requirements of present-day conditions.

I am one of those whose experience over the years has been largely for the defence. Nevertheless, I believe there is no section of the criminal law that is more evaded and circumvented than the provision against drunken driving. Indeed, as the law is today, there is nothing of a deterrent in the possibility of receiving a sentence of seven days in jail when any person desiring to break the law must realize that the possibility of conviction is next to nothing. However uncertain a person may be, however much he may smell of liquor, however terrible the accident in which he has been involved, there are in the law as it stands today so many loopholes—placed there not by the accused but by parliament—that I feel it should be strengthened. And parliament should not wait one year longer.

I am not going to deal with the phases peculiar to the provinces; but what a farce it is, with those who are convicted generally receiving the minimum of seven days, then in a matter of a few weeks getting their cars back again—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, in a matter of a few weeks.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Yes, you are right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And they are once again placed in possession of an instrument which is as dangerous as or more dangerous than a gun in the hands of many, to go forth with little more danger of a heavier penalty in the event that they again commit an offence, when the penalty becomes thirty days.

Not long ago I saw an example of the results of drunken driving. If the law were made really effective, no one would need to fear anything but his own inclination to be a potential killer. But certainly we in this parliament should see to it that something is done similar to what is today being done in the United States, where in thirty-five states the law is now enforced by means of blood, saliva and breath tests. At any rate, if the minister is afraid that a blood test is too drastic a measure, certainly there is nothing drastic about a breath test. There is no reason why an accused should be unwilling to submit to it.

These are three suggestions which, I submit, deserve attention now. Summarizing them, they are: First, let us stop penalizing anyone for inability to pay a fine. Second, let us do what we can to meet this threat to the enforcement agencies, the challenge to law and its enforcement, to which the Sons of Freedom are constantly subjecting our criminal law. Third, let us make the law inescapable to drunken drivers. If we reduce the death rate within one year by thirty-five per cent—as was the case in at least ten American states—from killings by drunken drivers, we certainly shall have done something worth while; for even if we do no better than that, we save in the next year in Canada two hundred Canadians who have a right to live, and who are asking parliament that that right be preserved by a proper change in the law.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to make remarks that might have been somewhat extended concerning this question of drunken driving. What I intended to say, however, has very largely been said by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) who, in addition, has been giving the house some worth-while quotations from the same documents which I have on my desk and which I had intended to use. Nevertheless, I think it is worth while to take just a few moments to support what the hon. member for Lake Centre has said and to do my best to impress upon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) the importance of taking action at an early date, to amend the Criminal Code with respect to drunken driving. I agree thoroughly—

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might be brave enough to raise a point of order against the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). We sometimes wonder why we take so much time in the debates in this house, but tonight I think we had have a shining example, I will not say of wasting time but of spending a great deal of it. We have in this bill a series of amendments to the Criminal Code. If in the discussion of these amendments we can discuss every section of the Criminal Code which is not being amended, there is utterly no limit to the amount of debate that we can put on a single bill amending the Criminal Code. What I suggest is this, and I would have raised this same point with the hon. member for Lake Centre—

Mr. Knowles: But you didn't.

Mr. Garson: —but I thought I would contain myself because his observations on matters of this kind are always of great interest. I think I was wrong, sir, when I did not raise the point of order. All of these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I submit are quite in order upon the estimates of the Department of Justice. But tonight we are discussing amendments to certain specific sections of the Criminal Code; and the only remarks that are in order are those which relate to the subject matter of the bill before us.

If I may extend my point of order, may I say that it is important to the time of this house, because what will happen is that we shall spend a lot of time discussing this subject tonight; and then when the matter is raised on the estimates of the Department of Justice, we can go over these remarks again. Then we wonder why we take up so much time.

There is another reason for my stand. I came down here, as I had a right to do with a bill containing certain specific provisions, prepared to discuss in debate the provisions of this bill and not a lot of other sections that are not being amended. I suggest that we shall have a much higher order of debate if we now keep to the points before the house instead of talking about a lot of things that are not in the bill at all; and then discuss, as we shall, these other points that have been raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre and that are now being raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), at the proper time, namely on the estimates of the Department of Justice.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I say that I indicated at the start that most of what I intended to say had been said by the hon. member for Lake Centre and that I was therefore prepared not to extend my remarks except to indicate my support of legislation against drunken driving, and to mention one or two additional points. I would have been through by now if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had not raised the point of order. But since he has raised the point of order,—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Is that a promise?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: —it is a serious question as to whether it is proper to permit the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) to speak at length on this matter and then for other members not to be permitted to do so at all.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In view of what has been said, it might meet with the approval of the house if the bill received second reading now and the sections were discussed in committee; then when the minister's estimates are being considered, there could be a general discussion. That seems to me to be a businesslike way of handling this matter. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion for second reading?

Mr. Drew: No. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member—

Mr. Knowles: Are you speaking on the point of order?

Mr. Drew: I want to speak on a point of order. There is a very clear point of order involved in this. The estimates do not provide the appropriate opportunity to present the recommendations that have been made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). What the hon. member for Lake Centre has been placing before the house is the desirability, I would say the necessity, for appropriate amendments to the Criminal Code to deal with the slaughter on our highways.

The introduction of this subject into the discussion of the estimates would be an entirely fruitless thing, because at that time we would be discussing the advancement of money, not the amendment of the Criminal Code.

At this point, if the minister is actually prepared to regard this as a parliament—and may I presume to remind some of the hon. members that the word "parliament" carries a meaning that seems to have been forgotten by some who spoke earlier today, and who thought that there should be no discussion here. Parliament is the place in which we discuss the principles of legislation. If the minister is anxious to meet this he could well introduce an amendment to his bill which would deal with something that is much more important than the amendment that he has introduced.

I did not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I do propose to have some comment to make about this particular subject, because the extent of it is something that should alarm every member of this house. I believe it should be possible at this time to place before the house something so important with the hope that serious consideration will be given to an amendment to the Criminal Code that will make the slaughter on a scale that is comparable with war casualties such a crime that it could really be dealt with.

Mr. Speaker: Now that the leader of the opposition has made his point and I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has indicated to the house his stand on this question, it would be a businesslike method of procedure if the bill were read the second time. Is it the pleasure of the house to—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, if that happens there is no opportunity in committee on this bill to discuss the matter which the hon. member for Lake Centre has opened up. I do wish to speak for three or four minutes on the matter. The leader of the opposition has indicated that he wishes to do so as well.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: I think there should be a ruling one way or the other.

Mr. Speaker: The leader of the opposition has already expressed his view in a very clear and forthright manner. Probably the house would like to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaking for two or three minutes on the subject. I think that would be the fair way.

Mr. Garson: I raise this point of order quite seriously, believe me, with no intention of curtailing the debate in any way or being unfair to any hon. member. If I had felt that way I would have raised the point of order the moment the hon. member for Lake Centre opened his remarks.

Mr. Knowles: But you did not do that.

Mr. Garson: The issue here is a very simple one. When we bring before the house amendments to certain specific sections of the Criminal Code or of any other act, in the discussion of the amending bill we are confined to the subject matter of the sections that are in the bill itself, and cannot roam all over the Criminal Code to bring in any other subject that we think should be included in the bill.

If hon. members of the opposition want to bring changes in the law to the attention of the government they can do so in the debate on the speech from the throne; they can do so in the budget debate; they can do so on the motion to go into supply; they have any number of opportunities to do so. But if, in addition to that, when we bring down an amendment to let us say section 100 of the Criminal Code, they are going to discuss other sections of the code that are not referred to in the bill, then there will be no end to the discussion on any amendment that we bring down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ruled on a previous occasion that on a motion to amend an act a general discussion on the act itself is not permitted. However, I do feel that I must be fair to all members of the house. The member for Lake Centre has expressed his view; the leader of the opposition has expressed his view. I think it would only be fair to have one member from the C.C.F. party express his view also. He said he would do it in two or three minutes. I think I should hear him and then I will put the motion for second reading.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you; and I shall take only a few minutes, particularly because the case was so well put by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I am glad he gave the quotations that he did from the article in Maclean's of March 15 by Mr. Fred Bodsworth. I might also refer to information that I have on my desk put out by the committee on tests for intoxication of the national safety council of the United States. That committee is pressing for more use of tests of various kinds in the states of the country to the south of us, with particular emphasis upon the breath test, or the balloon test as it is sometimes called.

As the hon. member for Lake Centre has pointed out, that test does not have some of the disadvantages that the blood test has. In particular, it can be taken on the spot, and I understand it is quite reliable. I feel that the hon. member for Lake Centre has done well to impress upon the government that it is urgent that action be taken along this line.

It is not good enough to suggest it will be considered in another year, for as has already been pointed out, 1,800 Canadians die each year as the result of traffic accidents, and a very large percentage of them are due to drunken driving.

I was interested in the answer the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) gave to the hon. member for Lake Centre on May 3, in which he indicated that some consideration was being given to the question of drunken driving, but he pointed out at that time that the inquiries being made of the provincial attorneys general did not relate to these intoxication tests. I am very sorry that is so. I hope that even the amount of discussion that Your Honour is permitting on this occasion will persuade the Minister of Justice that the time for action in this field is long overdue. I am sure that those of us who are expressing these views are expressing the views of a great many Canadians, and I earnestly hope that the minister will reconsider the matter at this session of parliament.

As I sit down I want to say to the Minister of Justice it seems to me more logical for us to be making these suggestions to him now when he is before us with his amendments to the Criminal Code, than it is for those suggestions to be buried in speeches on the address or on the budget, which he may or may not happen to hear. Now we have his ear, and I hope that we have it to good advantage. I hope that he will realize we are speaking for the Canadian people when we ask that action be taken at an early date to strengthen our Criminal Code, so that something can be done to reduce the amount of drunken driving.

Mr. Garson: May I be permitted four sentences to close the debate on the second reading?

Mr. Gillis: Before the minister closes the debate I should like to ask him a couple of questions.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In committee.

Mr. Speaker: As I have already said I think the business of the house would be advanced if we had second reading now. Questions could be asked in committee and the minister could make his reply in committee.

Mr. Garson: If I might close this drunken-driving episode, all I am interested in putting on the record in reply to the material that has been put on by the opposition is that we have had this matter under the most careful consideration.

Mr. Lennard: When?

Mr. Garson: For many months past in this committee, and in consultation with provincial attorneys general and law officers; and I am entirely prepared to come here and satisfy this House of Commons that we have given it adequate consideration, and give my reasons why we are not bringing down an amendment now. I would not be in order on this occasion in doing so. When the time comes, I am quite prepared to debate this very issue for just as long as any member of the opposition wishes to debate it—

Mr. Diefenbaker: People get killed.

Mr. Garson: —and take issue with many of the statements of fact of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and controvert them, and prove that so far as certain provinces are concerned they are not correct.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not mention anything about any province.

Mr. Gillis: May I ask a question, because I have a lot of non-legal opinions to express with regard to the Criminal Code, particularly about things that are not in it at all. Will the minister give us the assurance that when the first item in his estimates is called we will be permitted to discuss amendments or additions to the Criminal Code?

Mr. Garson: I have no hesitation in saying that when my estimates are before the committee, if the hon. member wishes to urge upon the Department of Justice that there are certain things which should be in the Criminal Code, but which are not there, we will have no objection to hearing about them. We are always delighted to have suggestions.

Mr. Drew: Too late then.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the fourth party in the house, I do not think it would be fair to rule us out, or to prevent our making a few observations about drunken driving. I would say that we are very much worried about the turn of drunken driving in the last few years, and we believe amendments to our Criminal Code in respect of drunken driving should be made at this session, without waiting until next session. Then, such amendments should be enforced for the protection of human life in Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Viau in the chair.

On section 1—Paragraph repealed.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I suggest there should be some explanation from the Minister of Justice as to why these sections should be repealed.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of sections 1, 4, 7 and 21 is to repeal part III of the Criminal Code, which has to do with the maintenance of order in connection with public works. These were defined as including any railway, canal, road, bridge or other ork of any kind in any manner constructed carried on by the government of Canada, of any province of Canada, or under any unicipal corporation or any incorporated ompany or private enterprise.

By part III of the Criminal Code certain ther sections of the code were brought into ffect, so far as the maintenance of law and rder was concerned upon these public orks, so defined. The reason we are now eeking the repeal of part III, and the conequential repeal of other sections of the ode, is that part III is obsolete. The last me it was invoked was in connection with ie building of the Hudson Bay railway, in 928. It has never been invoked since then, nd it is considered now unnecessary. It is ierefore asked that it be repealed.

The Chairman: Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. I am not satisfied ith the minister's explanation at all. Was e explaining section 1? —because he was sked about it, and the purpose of it.

Mr. Garson: No; perhaps the hon. member id not hear me, but—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I heard it.

Mr. Garson: Sections 1, 4, 7 and 21 are all elated, and I was explaining the effect of ie four of them. So far as section 1 is conerned, it repeals paragraph (46) of subsection of section 2 of the Criminal Code, and is onsequential upon the repeal of part III, hich is effected by section 4.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does part XII deal ith?

Mr. Garson: Part XII refers to part III, in ections 608 to 618 of the Criminal Code, hich relate to the search and seizure of eapons and liquor, in places where part III as been proclaimed in force. In other words, t us consider the Hudson Bay railway; if ney wish to maintain law and order in conection with the construction of the railway ney proclaim part III, and when that hapens these sections 608 to 618 deal with the natter of seizing and searching for weapons nd liquor in connection with that particular ork of constructing a railway.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But why do these sections 08 to 618 apply only to the Hudson Bay ailway?

Mr. Garson: They do not apply only to the ludson Bay railway.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the purpose of epealing them, then? I have not had an xplanation yet.

Mr. Garson: Part III is written into the Criminal Code for the purpose of maintaining law and order in connection with the construction of public works, the definition of which I have just indicated. When part III is proclaimed, then certain other sections of the code, for example sections 608 to 618, are made applicable to the search for and seizure of weapons and liquor, in those places in which part III has been proclaimed in force.

Then, another part, namely part XXII, makes provisions against certain proceedings by way of section 1132. In other words, when the proclamation is put into effect, certain sections of the Criminal Code are made available for carrying out part III in connection with the public works in respect of which it has been proclaimed.

Since part III has not been used for many years, and is now considered obsolete, we are seeking to repeal it. Then, in consequence of that repeal, we have to repeal these references to certain other sections of the Criminal Code which applied to the operation of part III in connection with public works projects.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why repeal insignificant sections like these, when there are major sections which should be amended? The minister made quite a speech a while ago about wasting time; apparently that is going to be the refrain we shall hear. If there is any good reason why parliament should take up its time repealing the odd section, which is as unimportant as the minister has indicated in this instance, then I cannot understand what that reason could be.

Was the repeal of this section asked for by the minister? Who asked for it? Here, on the one hand we are asked to repeal a section which is obsolete, while on the other hand we have a commission sitting—and it has been sitting for fifteen months—the main purpose of which is to remove these obsolete sections. Yet we find the minister bringing these sections before parliament, and asking us to repeal them. Why do we have this haphazard method of revision? I cannot understand it. The minister made his little speech a while ago. I raised three matters that are important to Canada and all we get from him is the brush-off. He comes along and produces the repeal of a section that has been obsolete since 1928.

Mr. Garson: Is my hon. friend opposed to the repeal of obsolete sections?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Opposed! I think it is the most ridiculous, haphazard interference with the Criminal Code. Instead of trying to revise it and accept suggestions from parliament, every year we have had this picayune selectivity on the part of the minister during his term of office. He comes along with these little insignificant sections as though the criminal law were being amended, and when matters such as drunken driving and imprisoning people because they have not the necessary money to pay their fines are brought up they are brushed aside. I cannot understand such action at all.

What is the purpose of repealing this unimportant obsolete section instead of dealing with important matters? Since the hon. gentleman has been Minister of Justice, each session, with one exception, little insignificant picayune sections have come up for attention. And that one exception has not been proclaimed yet. Who asked for this? What is the purpose of having this one section repealed? There are certainly a good hundred sections that are obsolete. So far as such sections are concerned, why do you not wait until the commission has made its recommendations, and in the meantime deal with matters that are of substantive significance in order to protect the rights of people and to assure the perservation of life and property? Look at section 1:

Paragraph (46) of subsection one of section two of the Criminal Code, chapter thirty-six of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, is repealed.

There are any number of other obsolete sections that remain in the code. What was the impelling motive that caused the minister with the tremendous advances that have been made in technological jurisprudence in the last few years, to bring in little sections like 1, 4 and 7?

Mr. Garson: And 21.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the impelling motive?

Mr. Garson: I can answer my hon. friend in about twenty-five words. We set up a revision commission to revise the Criminal Code, and my hon. friend spoke of that commission in terms of the highest praise just a short time ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not all they suggested.

Mr. Garson: Of course not. The commission has a gigantic task to perform. It is engaged in revising a criminal code that has not been revised since 1892. I do not initiate these things. They come to me through the regular routine from the drafting officers of the department who, by way of assistance to the commission in its task, are anxious to clear out of the way any of these obvious changes that should be made, and thus the commission will not have to spend its time considering such matters.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: You have certainly brought forth a mouse.

Mr. Garson: I think that is the commonsense, prudent thing to do. I cannot understand my hon. friend's attitude. He thinks it is ridiculous to bother with this section at all. Then let us repeal it and get it out of the way. There are one or two others like it but most of these amendments are fairly substantial.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I think if there were no part III in the act the minister would be introducing part III at this time if he were performing his duty. What part III provides is a special procedure to prevent the possession of weapons and liquor in the neighbourhood of public works where such things may be dangerous. Surely this is a step that does not require elaboration at a time like this when sabotage of our great electrical plants would be the very first act of those who would seek to destroy the economy of the country. If we had no such provision in the act I would imagine that what those who are aware of the kind of threat existing in different parts of the world today might well seek to have introduced into the act would be a provision which would make it possible for the government to declare that in the neighbourhood of certain vital public works there should be no arms or alcohol. This section can deal with the type of public works where one or two men can put hundreds or thousands of people out of work simply by the sabotage of these great producing enterprises.

This is not just the sweeping away of dead legislation. It is a bald statement to us, without any supporting evidence, that a section which has not been used for a long time should be brushed aside and made ineffective at the very time that it may conceivably be most useful. One of the most remarkable things about the last war was that through the effectiveness of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the intelligence branches of our military services no major act of sabotage succeeded in this country. We must remember, however, that at that time we were fighting an enemy which had no effective fifth column in Canada. Today the only possible enemy that Canada faces is one with a highly organized fifth column about which the government will do nothing effective. We need a law such as would make it possible for the government to deal with these people if a situation should arise short of war when these traitors to Canada might decide that the time had come for them to cause trouble by interfering with the operation of our great electrical plants, waterways, or anything of that kind that is vital to the development and maintenance of the economy of Canada.

The minister has given no reason for the repeal of part III except to say that it has not been used for many years, and then only in connection with the Hudson Bay railway. Today we see a situation with which we were never confronted before, a situation in which it may be necessary for the government to have the power to take immediate action to deal with those who are openly opposed to the survival of our economy and free system. I would say that if we did not have part III in the act today we should now be advocating it, and I hope the minister will immediately drop the proposal to repeal it and to carry out the other repeals associated with it.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I think my friend is suffering from a complete delusion if he thinks that part III ever had or now has any remote connection with sabotage. The presence of part III in the act is easily explicable. It was put there for the purpose of preventing the consumption of liquor and the possession of weapons in mining and railway camps in order to preserve peace in such places. In a sense it was an imposition to that extent upon the workmen engaged there. It has been found since 1928 that the ordinary provisions of the Criminal Code for the maintenance of law and order are quite sufficient for the purpose of maintaining law and order in such camps, and having regard to the fact that there has never been any occasion, in spite of the large amount of public works under construction since 1928, to proclaim this particular part of the code, there seemed to be no purpose in continuing it.

With my hon. friend's sentiments concerning the prevention of sabotage I would be the first in this house to agree. Certainly I think we should prevent sabotage, but that has nothing to do with part III. In the experience of the law officers of the crown, not those of the Department of Justice but the departments of the attorneys general of the various provinces, part III has not had to be invoked or proclaimed since 1928, nearly twenty-five years ago. They have found no difficulty in maintaining law and order in camps of this sort under the ordinary provisions of the Criminal Code. That being so it is considered wise now to drop it. The method of dealing with sabotage comes under an entirely different branch of the law, and on the proper occasion we shall be glad to go in great detail into the question of the adequacy of the provisions now available to prevent sabotage.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I cannot quite follow the action of the minister in altering the law with regard to the possession of weapons. He mentioned part III, which is entitled "Respecting the preservation of peace in the vicinity of public works," and a public work is——any railway, canal, road, bridge or other work of any kind, and any mining operation constructed or carried on by the government of Caada or of any province of Canada, or by any municipal corporation or by any incorporated company, or by private enterprise.

Then under the heading, "Weapons":

144. On or before the day named in such proclamation—

That is the proclamation of the governor in council to which the minister made reference.

—every person employed on or about the public work to which the same relates, shall bring and deliver up, to some commissioner or officer appointed for the purposes of this part, every weapon in his possession, and shall obtain from such commissioner or officer a receipt for the same.

145. Every weapon found in the possession of any person employed, as aforesaid, after the day named in any proclamation and within the limits designated in such proclamation, may be seized by any justice, commissioner, constable or other peace officer, and shall be forfeited to the use of his majesty.

Then, Mr. Chairman, if you will permit me to refer to subsequent sections, because apparently the rules regarding the possession of weapons are to be relaxed, the next is paragraph 2 which repeals subsection 1 (6) of section 119, which provides that any alien who——has in his possession any pistol, revolver, shotgun, rifle or other such firearm or any ammunition for any such firearm without having a permit in form 76B—

—shall be guilty of an offence. Why should that be repealed? Then the next one to be repealed is subsection 3, which reads:

In addition to the registration provided for in subsection two of this section there shall be, similarly, a general registration of all revolvers and pistols during the period between the first day of March and the first day of July in 1945, and during the same period every five years thereafter.

Why should the minister be so anxious to get rid of these sections dealing with weapons such as revolvers, pistols and the like? Certainly I can see no reason for relaxing the regulations governing these things. Only within the last few days in the city of Montreal a member of the R.C.M.P. was killed by one of these people carrying a revolver; yet now we are going to remove the provision for registration between March 1 and July 1, 1950. I do not understand why in amending the Criminal Code these sections dealing with revolvers and pistols, seeing that they are not in the hands of aliens and assuring that a proper check be made within the law, should be repealed. Who demanded this? Who asked for it?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend wants that question answered, it was the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right; and what was the reason given?

Mr. Garson: I shall be very glad to tell my hon. friend. I do not know how many sections or clauses we are going to deal with at one time, but it makes no difference; I am quite prepared to deal with six if my hon. friend wishes. The reason we are repealing the two sections to which my hon. friend has referred is that section 119 of the code, which is the law of this country today, requires all persons in Canada, subject to exceptions in section 129 having to do with military, peace officers and so on, to have certain permits with respect to firearms such as pistols and revolvers. For example, there must be a permit to carry one; there must be a permit to sell one and a permit to buy one and a permit to resell one. Paragraph (b), imposing an additional requirement upon aliens to have a permit in form 76B for any firearm such as a pistol, revolver, shotgun, rifle or ammunition therefor, subject to the exception in favour of sportsmen passing through Canada, contains duplication in view of the permits they are required to have, just like everyone else in Canada, under section 119. Since there is a duplication those in charge of enforcement think it is not very intelligent, and they desire to have it repealed.

As to the registration every few years, as I have already indicated the law at the present time requires me, as soon as I purchase any of these weapons, to have a permit to buy them and a permit to carry them; and I must register them. If I sell them I must have a permit, and the person who buys them must have a permit. By the enforcement of all these provisions, if they are all lived up to, a complete record is kept of the ownership of every revolver and pistol in the country. John Doe was the first owner. He got a permit to resell it to Richard Roe; and you can follow the course of that weapon throughout, always providing that those concerned in these transactions complied with the law. The result of this general re-registration every five years, at a great deal of expense and extra work, has not been very satisfactory. This is indicated by the fact that of 227,510 firearms registered in 1939, some 45,000 remained unaccounted for at the time of the 1945 re-registration, in spite of intensive efforts to trace them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask how many of those were revolvers?

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend a breakdown, but the total unaccounted for was 45,000. Supposing we maintained this system of re-registration an an inquiry should come in from the polic department in Vancouver, let us say, as to gun bearing a certain serial number. I order to reply we would have to go back t the first general re-registration of 1939, the to the next re-registration of 1945, then to th next general re-registration of 1950, and t all the intervening registrations, before w could reply to this wire which might have t do with the apprehension of some crimina and might have to be answered quickly the matter were to be properly attended t After careful consideration the commissione of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police wro me a letter, which I shall be glad to read t hon. members if they are in any doubt o the score, to the effect that these re-registra tions served no useful purpose and used up lot of time and money when we require peopl to have permits to buy, own, sell or resell. B that means we have the facilities for mair taining a continuous record of all the gur in the country, with one proviso that n human being can take care of, and that is th proviso that people will comply with the lav

Mr. Diefenbaker: But 45,000 disappeared i five years.

Mr. Garson: They did not disappear at al What happened was that John Jones ha registered a gun in 1939, and did not see did not pay any attention to the re-registra tion notice in 1945, and that particular gu would not be re-registered in 1945. The were 45,000 of that sort.

I make this point: If you require John Dc to register a gun in 1939, and he has to hav a permit to buy or to sell one, that is regi tered and stands on the registry in the nam of John Doe. Now let us suppose that i 1945 it still belongs to John Doe. You loc up the record and there it is registered in h name, whether or not you have re-registratio When he sells it he has to get a permit, an the application for that permit discloses whom he is going to sell it. The chap who going to buy it discloses on his applicatic for a permit the person from whom he going to buy it. By means of this quite rig system, a registry is built up which indicat those who own guns at every point of tim In this step we have taken we are followin the example of the United Kingdom whic has a much more rigid system of weapc registration than is prevalent anywhere this continent. I think that is the answer the points that were raised by the memb for Lake Centre.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Chairman, the minist seems insistent upon trying to create th impression that section 1 has an entire different meaning from that which it has. He seeks to convey the impression that this reference to camps or mines or something of that nature—

Mr. Garson: Are we back on the other section now?

Mr. Drew: We are on the same section with which we were dealing. We have not left it.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member for Lake Centre was off it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was not off it at all. I mentioned the other points in connection with it, since they all had to do with the apparent solicitude of the minister to get rid of this section.

The Chairman: As I understand it, the hon. member had permission to deal with the two other sections because of their relationship to section 1.

Mr. Drew: That is right. There was a continuity in these sections, because they all dealt with the removal of certain requirements in connection with weapons. Sections 2 and 3, which were particularly under discussion, have to do with the relaxation of certain provisions with regard to pistols and weapons of that kind. The point I wish to make in regard to section 1 of the amending bill is that it is not limited to any particular kind of enterprise. It is any public work, and would include a hydroelectric plant. It would include a gas-operated plant.

Mr. Garson: Not a hydroelectric plant.

Mr. Drew: Why not?

Mr. Garson: Because it is not so defined. I shall read, if I may, the definition:

> "Public work" includes any railway, canal, road, bridge or other work of any kind . . .

The application of the ejusdem generis rule would exclude a hydroelectric plant. A railway, canal, road or bridge are all means of communication, and give meaning to that section, so it would not include a hydroelectric plant.

In any event, the substantial answer to all of these observations and arguments that are being put forward is that at this moment part III is not in effect in any part of Canada, because it has never been proclaimed. There has never been any demand for it. Its obsoleteness is indicated by the fact that no person has asked that it be put into effect. It is not, as the leader of the opposition would indicate, that we are taking away some protection which is now being had. It is not being had because no person has asked for it. Since we have something on the statute book for which no person has asked in twenty-two years, we think it is sensible to clear this debris out of the way in order that the commission can get on with its work.

Mr. Drew: There is no use, perhaps, in bandying words back and forth with regard to the definition, except that the English language is reasonably simple. "Public work" is a clearly definable thing, and in order that it should be extended beyond certain things not included in public works, in this particular case it is declared to include a railway, canal, road bridge or other work of any kind. Obviously that would include any public work in the ordinary meaning of that term. I shall not even attempt to contend that any other meaning can be given it because it is so obvious. The words "public work" indicate something that is known by every alderman in every municipality, and every member of every legislature. It is something that is known in every part of this country. The reference to railways, canals and so on is to make it clear there is no limitation, and this extends it beyond the ordinary scope.

My point is that at this time, far from doing anything that would make it easier to have weapons around any public works, we should be strengthening the law. Let us recognize one thing that we have not been prepared to recognize. Rifles and shotguns, no matter what other purpose they may have, are sporting weapons and are used for that purpose. It is because they are used for that purpose that there is a desire to make it reasonably easy for people to have them. Revolvers and pistols are in an entirely different category. It is only within a limited field that they may be regarded as competitive or sporting weapons. The great majority of crimes related to the use of weapons are related to pistols or revolvers. The crimes that are unsolved, the crimes in connection with which we can all remember the most terrible tragedy, were crimes that were only made possible because of the ease with which pistols and revolvers can be concealed. It is only rarely that you read of murders being committed with rifles or shotguns. There are cases, of course, but those are usually premeditated. The murders we read of where people have been picked up in automobiles, where someone in a store has been shot, where someone on the street has been shot in connection with some robbery, are almost invariably committed by persons carrying a pistol or revolver. I believe that far from being more easy-going about the carrying of these weapons, the time has come to tighten up the law in this regard. Unless a person shows some good reason for having them, he should not be allowed to have them at all.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Forgery and penalty.

Mr. Carroll: I fear, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment is going to create a lot of trouble and difficulties for crown prosecutors. The code specifies about fifteen or sixteen ways—I do not know how many—by which one can commit forgery.

An hon. Member: Forty.

Mr. Carroll: Forty, my friend says. This amendment makes it a general offence. That, of course, was done, I have no doubt, in order to avoid all the difficulties in connection with counsel getting up on every occasion and asking for particulars of the crime of forgery that was charged. I have nothing against it myself, as I never intend to practise criminal law especially again. But I am going to suggest that it is going to take up a lot of time of the criminal courts in cases of forgery when defence counsel gets up and says, "I want particulars of this thing." At the present time particulars are included in the charge of forgery that is laid. I would not think that any attorney general of any province, if he has ever practised before the criminal courts in charges of forgery, would be in favour of an amendment of this kind.

Mr. Garson: In reply to my hon. friend, I may say that this amendment was approved by the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada at their 48th meeting. This is a conference on which there are represented all of the departments of the attorneys general of the various provinces of Canada and the federal Department of Justice. They are supposed to be experts in their field. In their view the amendment is advisable. In addition to the awkwardness to which the explanatory note on section 6 of the bill refers, the explanatory note says:

> Sections four hundred and sixty-eight, four hundred and sixty-nine and four hundred and seventy specify over forty separate instances of forgery. It is unnecessary and cumbersome to particularize in this manner and the three sections have therefore been combined into one.

In other words, I think my hon. friend would agree that the prosecutor in these cases is, by the nature of the present law, called upon in the indictment to specify which particular one of the forty different varieties of forgery is the one involved in that particular case. Then if he does not bring along evidence to support that particular kind of forgery, there are certain handicaps which flow back upon the prosecution. By this group of experts it was thought that it was advisable to do away with all of these forty varieties and to have just one crime of forgery which would be applicable to any type of forgery at all.

Another of the difficulties that arise here is that under one of these sections the person convicted could get life imprisonment, under another section he could get fourteen years, and under another he could get seven years. If therefore you picked on one of the forty varieties that happened to be under the life imprisonment section, and all that you could prove was one that was under the fourteen years section, a quite unnecessary hiatus was created just by the terms of the legislation. It is in order to avoid all that and to simplify the criminal law that the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada recommended this amendment.

Mr. Carroll: My point is that it is going to take an hour longer to try every case of forgery, with the defence counsel getting up and asking for particulars which in every case the judge will force the crown prosecutor to give. You say that it does away with particularizing, but it does not; because in a case of this kind there is not a judge in the country who would not force the crown prosecutor then and there to give particulars of the kind of forgery it is, and he is confined to that in his case. That is the point that I am making.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I want to endorse all that the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll) has just said. Let us assume that you are a crown prosecutor and you draw up your charge or indictment, depending on the province in which you are, and that you charge that so and so, between this day and that day, at a certain place, did commit forgery. That is permissible under the wording of this section as it now stands. Any defence counsel who knew beans about his business would first of all apply for particulars. Remembering that once particulars are given they become part of the charge, you find that you are right back where you are now, with the various divisions which are named. It is all right to say that there are forty different kinds of forgery; there might be more. But certainly any defence counsel who knows his business will have you choose one of those forty varieties. And it must be kept in mind that now, in stating your particulars, you have got to state them in such a way as to come within this general section, whereas before you could say he was in breach of the section because the prosecution had set out the particular kind of forgery that he was committing.

I am going to agree with the minister in this. I wish we could simplify things. But I am much worried that by trying to simplify them, in setting out the sections of the Criminal Code, we are not succeeding in doing so. I speak not as an authority but certainly with some experience in these matters. I have convicted many people of forgery. Fortunately, on the other side of the picture, I have had the odd one who was perhaps not convicted. But I know this. Any lawyer in the world who was defending someone on a general charge of forgery, and who would proceed without having the most exact particulars, should have his gown taken from him and should never again be allowed to defend anybody in any court whatever.

However, as always here, we are largely in the hands of the minister who has been advised by various persons in the various provinces in Canada. But the fact that a man is an attorney general—and I speak from experience—does not mean that he knows anything about the criminal law. Let us stick to the practical situation. That is just what it amounts to. I can remember what happened in certain cases. Let us take a charge of conspiracy, under the section dealing with conspiracy, which had to do with prices and so on. I went through two or three courts two or three times to find out, and I had to draw those particulars; I was on the prosecuting side. It was a difficult job; and as has been said by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll), our experience is that the courts will always grant particulars. They always should. Why? Because the liberty of the subject is at stake, and he is entitled to know, to the last detail and comma, what it is the crown intends to prove against him. I have excellent support in the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, but I hate to put myself up against the so-called experts, and I do not use that word derisively at all. It is all right to sit back, but when you get down there in front of that judge and jury, I know what happens. You give particulars. The minister had something to say about the different penalties. Of course there should be different penalties. Some forgeries are infinitely more serious than others. Let us assume that the forgery is of the type where a crown document or something of that kind is forged. Of course the most severe penalty should follow. Whereas if it was merely the forging of a little $5 cheque, which has become almost a diversion in some parts of the country, it would not be treated really with great seriousness; or if it were the signing of somebody's name to a subscription for a magazine or something of that sort it would not be quite so bad. Certainly there should be differences in penalties.

There may be some logical support for the argument that in dealing with crimes infinitely more latitude should be given to our judges.

Mr. Garson: That is what this provides.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): If that is the minister's idea, I do not know why we should stop with forgery. We have a great deal of work in front of us in dealing with many kinds of crime. I would be inclined to agree with him as to more serious crimes. Let us take assaults. The language of "common assault" covers every kind of assault. You may tear half a man's head off, or you may just put your fist toward him or point your finger at him and it is common assault, but some are much more serious than others. Our code has provided for that in the section dealing with assault occasioning actual bodily harm. What is it when you draw blood, and so on?

An hon. Member: Grievous assault.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): There are a number of degrees that are provided for by the code, and I have never yet heard any complaint about them. In advocating this change I wonder whether the Minister of Justice is not putting our courts and counsel into much greater difficulty than they are now.

Perhaps I should say this. I agree with him in that I do not like to see people who are obviously guilty get off on highly technical grounds. We all know that is a bad thing in the administration of justice, but you will never cure it.

The fact is that these various kinds of forgeries have been worked out down through history, and they all stem from the administration of the criminal law in England. They have all had a great reason behind them. It does seem to me to be a mistake for anyone in this house to rush hurriedly into the elimination of a practice which through experience has proven to be good. It is something that requires, let us say, hesitancy. I do not use any stronger word than that. However, I am bound to say this, I am not going to vote against it. I assume that the minister has given it careful consideration; I assume that he has had the advice of a lot of big names behind him; but a little police court lawyer like myself is telling him that he is looking for trouble right through the piece in passing this kind of legislation.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Adjournment of hearing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The amendment is to provide a method by which a justice conducting a preliminary inquiry may remand a person appearing before him, for mental examination. Paragraph (f) reads:

where in his opinion there is reason to believe that the accused person is mentally ill, order that the accused be remanded in such custody as he directs for observation for a period not exceeding thirty days.

Who asked for this? Is it at the request of any attorney general?

Mr. Garson: This amendment was approved by the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada, criminal section, at their 1948 meeting.

Mr. Blair: Does this not seem to be a dangerous type of clause? It leaves the finding of this to the justice. It does not say on the evidence of competent authorities; it says, "where in his opinion." If a justice has the power to commit any person to a mental institution on his own say-so without the evidence of psychiatrists, it seems to me a very serious thing. There is nothing in the clause about calling any witnesses. It says, "where in his opinion." I submit that would be a very dangerous thing to put in the possession of any justice. The justice himself might be suffering from delusions.

Mr. Garson: Perhaps my hon. friend is not aware of the fact that in some provinces at the present time persons who are accused of indictable offences and about whose mental condition some question has been raised are subject to mental examination under provincial statute. There is a procedural difficulty that arises here which is the occasion for this amendment, because, when these people are subject to an examination under provincial statute, the Criminal Code provides that in the case of a preliminary inquiry they can remand only for eight days. In most of these cases it requires more than eight days to conduct a proper examination of these people whose sanity is suspect. This section enables the judge, who is in charge of the preliminary inquiry, to give a remand not for the eight days provided in the Criminal Code but for a period of thirty days.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is the minister quite right about that?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is not the eight-day remand only for people who are in custody?

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Oh, now; persons on bail can be remanded for any length of time.

Mr. Garson: I will give my hon. friend the section of the code. It is section 679, subsection 1, paragraph (c), which reads—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Do you want to bet any money?

Mr. Garson: Yes; I will bet you $5.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I hope I may be forgiven for that. That is a breach of our rules. It is my fault, not yours.

Mr. Garson: The section reads:

A justice holding a preliminary inquiry may in his discretion

(c) adjourn the hearing of the matter from time to time and change the place of hearing, if from the absence of witnesses, the inability of a witness who is ill to attend at the place where the justice usually sits, or from any other reasonable cause, it appears desirable to do so, and may remand the accused, if required, by warrant in form 17: Provided that no such remand shall be for more than eight clear days, the day following that on which the remand is made being counted as the first day;

(d) order that no person other than the prosecutor and accused, their counsel and solicitors shall have access to or remain in the room or building in which the inquiry is held, if it appears to him that the ends of justice will be best answered by so doing;

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You had better pay up, had you not?

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Rowe: It is a good thing we followed our rules, or you would have lost your money.

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is the law. On a preliminary hearing the justice may remand the accused for a month, if he wants to, provided he is on bail. If he is in custody it is a different thing. The main reason for the eight-day limitation is that the man is in custody. That is the original reason for the section that the minister has just read. The last part of the section that the minister read is the part that makes it so plain. The position I took with the minister is quite correct. I have spoken to it dozens of times. Probably I was present when it was argued out some years ago, and it has been followed ever since, that the person having authority to hold the preliminary inquiry can make a remand—I do not want to make it too big—for thirty days, if he wants to, if the person is on bail. If the person is in custody, eight days is the limit.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, all I can say about that is that, if my hon. friend is right, the conference of commissioners is wrong. The express reason for this amendment recommended by them at their 1948 meeting is to provide for a thirty-day remand where there is now a remand for only eight days. If that necessity did not exist, this amendment would not be asked for.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is where a man is in jail.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): By consent it can be extended, but otherwise it cannot.

Mr. Garson: May I suggest to the hon. member for Yorkton that a man whose sanity is suspect cannot give consent.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I should like to say a word about sanity. I wonder if the law in the various provinces is the same as it is in Alberta. It may appear from certain indications, and from proper evidence, that a man is mentally ill, of unsound mind. My memory is that at the present time, on warrant of the attorney general, he may be committed to a mental institution.

This has always worked out very well. A moment ago the hon. member for Lanark said something which gave me some concern. It may be that in provinces like Ontario and Quebec, where the population is dense, you always have persons conducting preliminary hearings who have had a good deal of experience and who are capable of exercising the most excellent judgment. However in those areas from which the hon. member for Yorkton and I come—and one could include the whole of the north country—we have a different situation. In those areas we may have justices of the peace who, in their normal lives, are merchants, real estate men or blacksmiths; they may have many occupations, and let no one think that I am criticizing any of them. The country was built up by the fine services rendered to our courts by those men of good common sense.

It does seem rather strange however that inexperienced persons should be able to remand individuals for thirty days for a mental examination. Surely some better provision than that is required—and I am hoping that the hon. member for Yorkton will support me in this. It does seem to me that the suggestion that has been made gives altogether too much authority to some of our justices of the peace, when they are permitted to remand persons requiring such examination for a period of thirty days, without first having laid down some conditions, or the provision that the attorney general issue a warrant.

I am not suggesting that I will vote against this, but I am wondering if the Minister of Justice has given the matter as serious consideration as I am sure he thinks it deserves.

Mr. Blair: As this stands, it may be left in the hands of a justice of the peace where, in his opinion, it is proper to do so. No one has been called in, and I am suggesting that the provision whereby a justice can send a person to a mental institution for thirty days, for examination, would seem to be placing a great deal of power in his hands.

If the section read, "when on the evidence of a competent authority" or something of that kind, it might be understood that such power could be given to a magistrate. But there is no mention about examination, or anyone being called in. It refers only to his opinion, and that seems to be giving the magistrate a great deal of power.

Mr. Garson: May I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that in some provinces, under provincial statutes, this power is now exercised; and it is in that connection that this provision is inserted, so that there can be no question as to the length of time during which a justice can remand a prisoner.

I believe there is some merit in the point raised by the hon. member. But the man would be remanded for observation; it is not as though he made a finding as to sanity. The remand is for purposes of observation by people whose evidence as to mental condition would not carry any weight unless they were competent in their fields.

Mr. Blair: But it leaves a stigma on the man involved.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Perhaps not throughout the whole of Canada, but certainly in some parts of it, the term "jail" or "place of confinement" includes mental institutions. That is the only place to which a person of this kind would be admitted.

Use is made of the word "certify" rather generally in respect of people who are mentally ill. Then, when a person is charged, a magistrate can act only on the advice of two physicians. That is the only way in which even the wildest lunatic can be sent to a mental institution, which is a place of confinement. Then he can be released only on an attorney general's warrant.

I quite agree with the hon. member for Lanark that to have a situation such as he has described, wherein a justice of the peace may do something as a result of his opinion, and without prescribing that there shall be evidence from which he could form such an opinion, is carrying things altogether too far, and putting too much power in the hands of a man who, honest as he may be, perhaps is not trained to understand insanity.

We know that insanity is a most peculiar ailment. It has never yet been defined satisfactorily by any psychiatrist in the world. In fact, when I cross-examine a psychiatrist my first question always is: What is insanity? I have asked that question dozens of times, and I have never yet heard one psychiatrist who could answer that simple question in any other way than, "It is a departure from the norm." And then the question comes, "Whose norm—mine, yours or somebody else's?" It does seem to me that before a person can be put away for thirty days some other protection should be given. Remember, those in mental institutions are permitted to see their friends only when the people in charge give permission. Their rules are even more strict than those which prevail in the jails. That is necessarily so, and I am not arguing against it.

I do suggest with the greatest respect however, that some further consideration should be given to this matter. In Alberta we have about eight hundred justices of the peace, and in Ontario I suppose they are numbered in thousands. But to place in the hands of an inexperienced man the power to put you or me away for thirty days—true, in order that we may be examined, which is a splendid thing, but without some evidence that we require examination—seems to me to be going altogether too far in dealing with the terrible problem you and I know insanity is these days.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I regret that I have to agree with the hon. members for Calgary West and Lanark, but I like to be frank about these matters. Those of us who have had experience with the justices of the peace in our province—and I think possibly the same applies to Manitoba—have not very much confidence in some of them. Any lawyer who has appeared before them knows the difficulties with which he is faced. The practical effect of the section is simply to give power to a justice of the peace to declare anybody who is a mentally fit person to be remanded to an institution. I do not know why you are introducing the section, but under it a justice of the peace can remand anybody. If the hon. member for Calgary West came before a justice of the peace I could urge that he be examined as to his mentality. He might strenuously object to it. He might say that he did not want a remand and that he was mentally sound, but the justice of the peace could remand him under this section, and keep on remanding him. I rather think the section should stand unless there is some explanation. Frankly I must say that I have always believed in the system of using magistrates. These men are schooled in law, know their law, and when you come before them you know that, so far as evidence or law is concerned, your client is going to be treated fairly. In the province of Saskatchewan ninety per cent of our justices of the peace never knew any law and never should have been appointed.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, if the amendment were capable of the interpretation which has been placed upon it I do not think for a moment that it would ever have been approved by the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation which, as the hon. member for Calgary West knows, is not made up of attorneys general but consists of the legal advisers of the attorneys general, men who for the most part have a special competence in this field.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Yes, but they are all prosecutors.

Mr. Garson: Not by any means.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Yes, they are.

Mr. Garson: I know some of them very well and so does my hon. friend. Is Murray Fisher a prosecutor?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I mean they have that complex.

Mr. Garson: I am sure all hon. members who have spoken will agree that what one has to keep in mind is that the laws with regard to the establishment of mental institutions, treatment therein and mental diseases are all provincial statutes. Under these laws the greatest possible protection is given to the subject so that he cannot be adjudged to be insane or in a sick mental condition until he has been carefully examined according to the routine laid down in the provincial laws.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Suppose he is not insane; he has served thirty days.

Mr. Garson: The custodian into whose hands the justice of the peace would remand such an individual would be a competent person under the provincial statute.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): A mental hospital.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): An insane asylum.

Mr. Garson: Let us assume that a given justice of the peace may have been in error in his reaction to the appearance of the accused, that he wrongly thought that the accused should be subject to examination, and that he wrongly, if you like, remanded him into such custody. The immediate reaction would be that he would be declared to be perfectly sane, would come back, and the trial would proceed. Actually, as those who have been practising criminal law to a much greater extent than I have know—I do not pretend to be an expert in that field at all—in most cases this is a device which is employed not against the interests of the accused but for his protection. Insanity is a defence that may be raised, and the only way in which he can be found to be in that condition is not by compliance with any law this parliament may pass, because that does not happen to be under our constitutional jurisdiction. It is the provinces which declare what mental diseases shall consist of, and who shall decide as to what they consist of.

At the present time in some provinces persons accused of indictable offences who are appearing before magistrates on preliminary hearing are being remanded into such custody, but they run into this procedural difficulty. It is to cure the procedural difficulty beyond any peradventure that these people—and I mean this in no offensive sense at all—have made a point of studying this matter, in order to discharge their heavy responsibility of coming to an agreement and recommending it for consideration by the Department of Justice, as I am now recommending it for consideration by the House of Commons. After careful study of this matter I seriously recommend the section now before you. If I thought for one moment that the section was susceptible of the interpretation placed upon it by the hon. member for Lanark, the hon. member for Calgary West and the hon. member for Yorkton, I would not think of bringing it before the house.

It seems to me, however, that it is a wise thing to regularize the procedure in preliminary inquiries, and any findings as to mental disease in connection therewith must be carried out by the properly qualified people within the provisions of the provincial statute.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): But a justice of the peace can do it if in his opinion he thinks it should be done.

Mr. Garson: He simply remands him into the custody of properly qualified people.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Let us say that the man is all right. I am sure the minister has been up against this case many times just as most of us have. You know that our jails at times have held innocent men, although frankly I do not know very many. Let us say you go down to the jail and talk to a fellow through the bars. He says, "They cannot put a man in jail for this, can they?" You say, "No, they cannot, but you are there and I am here." What you are giving the justice of the peace power to do is to put that man away for thirty days. Let us say that at the end of thirty days everybody finds he was perfectly sane and that he was wrongly accused. Here we have the legalized incarceration of an innocent man for thirty days, and there is not a thing that he can do about it civilly or in any other way because the justice of the peace says "In my opinion he should have been remanded to that institution."

I have been very moderate in my remarks, and if in what I have just said I have made a single misstatement or drawn a wrong inference I hope somebody will tell me. As the hon. member for Yorkton said, we are placing in the hands of an individual the power to put an innocent man away for thirty days. There is not a thing he can do about it when he gets out, no matter how innocent circumstances may have proven him him to be. That is my last word.

Mr. Blair: It seems to me that the section should have some such words added to it as "if in the opinion of competent witnesses". A man is sent to a mental institution for thirty days. If I were sent there under such circumstances I would always feel that there was a certain amount of stigma about having been in a mental institution. I should like to point out to the minister that so far as the Criminal Code is concerned the question of insanity complicating murder cases has not been revised in over 110 years. The whole Criminal Code reeks of a lack of knowledge of psychiatry as a new science. Nothing has been done in that regard in 110 years. We are still following an outworn piece of legislation.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The Macnaughton case.

Mr. Blair: The proposal contained in this section is retrogressive. A magistrate without knowledge of psychiatry is given the power to decide that in his opinion a man is acting in a peculiar way and, as the hon. member for Yorkton has said it may work both ways. I am particularly concerned about the innocent person who is sent there and has that stigma placed upon him. If we could add something like "upon the evidence of competent witnesses" that would clear up the whole business. Then no magistrate could send a man to a mental institution for thirty days if that man were innocent as far as insanity is concerned. It means something in that man's future.

Mr. Garson: I do not like to protract this discussion unduly, but there are some excellent criminal lawyers here in the persons of the hon. member for Calgary West and the hon. member for Yorkton. I put it to them, and I hope they will correct me if they think I am wrong, that here we are talking about the preliminary inquiry of an accused charged with an indictable offence, that is, an offence of some seriousness. He has this charge against him, and it may be that the only defence available is the defence of insanity. So I put it to my hon. friends whether, in the actual conduct of these preliminary inquiries, in nine cases out of ten it is not likely to be counsel for the accused who will ask for this remand.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Very often; but in my experience any counsel who on a preliminary hearing calls the accused person to give evidence is nothing but a fool. I understand the minister, however; I have asked the crown to do this in the case of men I thought were a little queer, but I have had them examined by two doctors.

Mr. Garson: Take the case of some poor chap who has no money, who faces a very serious charge and who appears to be mentally unbalanced. What is more reasonable than that his counsel should say, at this early stage of the proceedings, "Remand this man into the custody of a mental institution and have him checked up. If he should be insane, that is an end of the matter."

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then why not say "at the request of the accused" if that is what you mean?

Mr. Garson: I am dealing with this section as it comes to the department from people whom we regard as highly competent to recommend it to us, and who have given very careful consideration to it.

Mr. Adamson: I just want to suggest that in section 1054 of the Criminal Code, dealing with the sexual psychopath, you must have two psychiatrists in order to sentence the accused. Why in this case would you not recommend psychiatric treatment or study as well?

Mr. Garson: But that is precisely what the magistrate has power to do, remand him into the custody of the people who under provincial statute have power to ascertain whether he is fit to stand trial. You do not remand him to a garage keeper, but to those who under the provincial statute have power to declare him sane or insane.

Mr. Carroll: In my province no mental hospital will accept a patient on the authority of a justice of the peace, so that is out as far as Nova Scotia is concerned. The only thing a justice of the peace can do is have a man examined by two doctors, whether they are psychiatrists or not, and it is those doctors who declare whether he is a fit subject for the institution. He will never get into it by the decree of a magistrate or anyone else. He can only be sent to the institution on the authority of two medical men.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have neither the knowledge nor the experience to comment on the legal point involved, but I have listened to this discussion and have been struck by one or two things I should like to place before the committee very briefly. We have had a competent physician and at least three competent counsel express the view that there are great differences about this. The minister has been frank enough to say that he has not the experience in criminal law of the hon. member for Calgary West or the hon. member for Yorkton, and if I may say so with respect he is probably quite right; he has been occupied with other things. But now apparently this is to go through.

What has the minister given as a reason for its going through in spite of these difficulties? I took down what he said. It is going to be put through regardless, apparently, because it has been recommended by people who in the opinion of the minister would not have recommended it if it had not been right. These people are not here; they have not heard this discussion. It is conceivable that if they had heard it they would have changed their minds; there is no certainty about that. Then the minister said that if he thought for a moment this could have the result that has been stated by people who he admits are more competent in criminal matters, he would not put it through. So we have it supported by the silent evidence of people who are not here. The minister assumes that they would not change their views if they were here, though that cannot be proved. But notwithstanding his modest disclaimer of knowledge, the minister still undertakes to say that these other views are wrong, because he admits that if he thought for a moment there was anything in them he would take a different view.

I just want to ask this. Are these bills that come before us here like the laws of the Medes and Persians in that they cannot be changed; or when we come into this committee do we undertake to discuss these matters? I want to tell the minister that even in the short time I have been in this house I have seen ministers of justice who in these circumstances would say, "I will take another look at this and not force it through."

Mr. Cruickshank: I would like to ask one question, if I may, and I am speaking as a layman. Would the same examination, of which we have heard so much from the other side, be given members of parliament?

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Blair: I desire to move an amendment, Mr. Chairman, which I am preparing now.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Why not let it stand for a while?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I think the minister might consider the fact that justices of the peace in different provinces have different qualifications, as he knows. Down east it may be that they are usually qualified lawyers; I do not know. The minister has said that this is being done on the recommendation of the bar, in the interests of uniformity of law enforcement, but I think he might seriously consider adding some such words as "on the application of the accused or his counsel." Under our own mental act in Saskatchewan I have had difficulty getting people out who had been wrongly committed because there, as the minister knows, relatives can go and commit them. We do not want anything like that.

Mr. Garson: As I understand, the hon. member for Lanark wishes to submit an amendment, so we had better let this section stand for that purpose.

Section stands.

Sections 10 and 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Using evidence taken below.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In some states of the union now evidence is taken by recording machines, and I have seen references by some judges in Canada to the fact that under our law the use of such machines is not permitted.

Has the minister considered making the necessary amendment to permit the taking of evidence in that way?

Mr. Garson: The answer, Mr. Chairman, is that we have not so considered. Ordinarily representations upon a matter of that sort would come from those who have charge of the administration of justice in the provinces. If they felt that recording machines of that sort would be more effective than court stenographers, and felt an amendment to the Criminal Code would achieve that result—

Mr. Blackmore: Will the minister speak more loudly, please.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member for Lake Centre asks whether we have considered substituting recording machines for court stenographers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, allowing the use of recording machines.

Mr. Garson: Allowing the use in Canada of these recording machines to take the place of court stenographers. My reply is that in matters of this kind which have to do with the administration of justice carried on under the responsibility of the attorneys general of the provinces, we ordinarily do not enforce upon them any new methods for which they do not ask. I think I am right in saying that we have received no representations from any of the attorneys general requesting permission to use such machines.

Section agreed to.

Sections 13 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

On section 18—Sections repealed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I believe the move made in section 18 of the bill is a good move. It does away with the moiety provisions. I am interested in knowing when the suggestion was first received by the minister for the removal of these several sections. Over the years they have constituted on occasion an invitation—I shall conclude my remarks there—that has not been conducive to the best administration of justice.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, this is a case where I believe the department can take some credit. We share the views of the hon. member, and we are asking for the passage of the amendment to do away with moieties. So far as I am aware there have been no representations by anyone. This is an original idea of our own.

Mr. Diefenbaker: To what extent have these sections applied? Has there been a distribution of moneys during the past year under these several sections?

Mr. Garson: I do not think so. These moiety sections have not been of very frequent invocation in this country. As my hon. friend knows, there were some countries in which people made their living by this sort of thing, but so far as I am aware that has not been true of Canada. While we affirm it is an excellent principle to abolish these moieties, the hon. member might take this as another example of an obsolete section which is being eliminated.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, it was not obsolete. It was used quite frequently.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—"Attorney general" for "Minister of Justice."

Mr. Adamson: I should like to point out to the minister that section 19 makes it necessary for a psychiatrist to be in court before sentence can be passed upon a criminal sexual psychopath.

Mr. Garson: Before it is established that he is a criminal sexual psychopath. I believe if the hon. member refers to the relevant provincial statutes he will find it requires two psychiatrists to establish the insanity of a person.

Mr. Adamson: I believe it is a good clause, and I am in favour of it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend says it is a good clause, and I recall all the approbation that was given to it when it was introduced and passed in 1948. Since that date, how many persons have been declared criminal sexual psychopaths, and liable to indeterminate sentence? To what extent has the section actually been used?

Mr. Garson: Not to a very great extent. The number of sentences of an indeterminate character—I do not think I can give the number from memory—I believe would be less than half a dozen. It depends a good deal on the attitude which is taken by the prosecutor in individual cases. We provide the law, but the use that is made of it depends upon the policy of the prosecution which is carried on in the individual provinces. It is the same with regard to the amendment to section 207 of the code concerning crime comics; we provided the law but whether or not it is invoked is another matter.

Section agreed to.

On section 20—Commencement of sentence.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Will the minister give us a brief explanation of this section? Perhaps I may ask a question to simplify it. Is the object of this section to make sure that, in all cases, sentence shall begin from the date it is imposed? Is that what is sought here? Perhaps I should speak of the exception. In the event that someone appeals, and his appeal is dismissed, as we have it now his term does not begin until the date of the dismissal of his appeal. As I understand, that is the law at the present time. Does this alter that situation?

Mr. Garson: I do not believe I can answer the question in quite the simple terms in which the hon. member has put it. The present provisions relating to the commencement of sentences are now found in the Criminal Code itself, section 1019 (2), the Penitentiary Act, 1939, sections 47 (2) and 49 (4), and the Prisons and Reformatories Act, section 3. These provisions, by reason both of their dispersement and of overlapping, are confusing and it is desirable that such provisions be consolidated in one place. The purpose of the present amendment is to consolidate them all in one place.

Clause 20 accomplishes this by inserting a new section, 1054B in the Criminal Code, and the existing provisions are repealed by sections 17, 22 and 23. Section 20 thus effects a consolidation without making any material change in the present law. It does, however, clear up one point in connection with applications for leave to appeal. In some cases the code confers upon an accused person the right to appeal without leave; for example, in the case of a person convicted on indictment who desires to appeal on a question of law alone. In other cases the code confers a right of appeal subject to obtaining leave of the court of appeal; for example, an appeal from sentence or an appeal on the question of fact alone. Section 1019 (2) now provides that the time during which a convicted person is on bail pending the determination of any appeal, and the time during which he is detained in jail pending the determination of an appeal, shall not count as part of his term of imprisonment. The new section 1054B makes it clear in subsection 5 that an application for leave to appeal is to be considered in the same light in this regard as an appeal itself.

Mr. Adamson: Shall time spent awaiting trial be considered?

Mr. Garson: Awaiting trial of an appeal?

Mr. Adamson: No. When a man is arrested and held without bail until his trial, which may await the assizes for two or three months, is that time considered?

Mr. Garson: The time he has spent in custody awaiting trial is taken into account by the judge when he imposes the sentence. This present section deals with what happens to him after he has lodged an appeal against that sentence. It is the time that he is in custody awaiting the hearing of the appeal.

Mr. Adamson: Are the sections of the other act going to be repealed?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 21 to 23 inclusive agreed to.

On section 24—Coming into force.

Mr. Knowles: Before this section is carried, can the minister tell me whether part XVI of the Criminal Code, which was adopted in 1948, has yet been proclaimed? That is the part headed "Summary trial for certain indictable offences". The matter was under discussion last fall, in September; and at that time it had not been proclaimed.

Mr. Garson: I am sorry, but I was engaged in conversation with my colleague, and I did not catch my hon. friend's point. It was with regard to part XVI, was it?

Mr. Knowles: That is right.

Mr. Garson: Part XVI has always been in effect.

Mr. Knowles: No. The matter was under discussion here on September 27, last fall. At that time the minister indicated that it had not yet been proclaimed. It had been passed only the year before.

Mr. Garson: I think I get the point of my hon. friend's question now. Certain amendments with regard to this part were passed at the last session of the house.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Knowles: In 1948.

Mr. Garson: Yes, in 1948. Before they went into effect, we wanted the municipalities and organizations to be thoroughly aware of what their purport was; and they have not been proclaimed until that condition has been satisfied. I think at the present moment they are not in effect.

Mr. Knowles: Not yet proclaimed?

Mr. Garson: No, not yet proclaimed.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): No, I do not think we should pass clause 24 just at the moment. You will find that it has a provision bringing this act into effect on the first day of May, 1950. I do not think the minister would want to carry that provision.

Mr. Garson: No, of course not.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): We had one section that has been allowed to stand, and I think this one might stand also.

Mr. Garson: This clause was put into the bill at the time it was introduced in the Senate, in the expectation that it would go through there, come here and be dealt with before the first of May. Now that it has not been dealt with by the first of May, we should delay it, I should think, until July 1 at any rate; and I think we had better leave it here, and we can ascertain the proper date.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I was merely trying to tidy it up. I knew that the minister would not want it to pass in that form.

Mr. Garson: The point made by my hon. friend is quite right.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Why not let this clause stand along with the clause that has already been allowed to stand, and it can be amended at that time.

Mr. Garson: All right.

The Chairman: Clause 24 stands. We shall now revert to clause 9.

On section 9—May remand for observation.

Mr. Blair: I move:

That subparagraph (f) be amended by deleting from the first line thereof the words "where in his opinion" and substituting therefor the following: "when requested by the accused or where in the opinion of at least two competent medical experts."

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am going to suggest that the amendment stand along with the section. As I understood the minister a few minutes ago, he was going to have another good look at the section itself and see whether or not he wanted it to go through. Unless someone has something more to say, there is not much object in our discussing the amendment when it may be that in fact, on contemplation, the minister may want to alter the section itself. I think the hon. member for Yorkton would agree with me that we thought it was going to stand until it could be re-examined.

Mr. Fulton: The minister never said that.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That being so, we do not want to press the amendment now or to press the section. If we do, no one will have had a chance to re-examine it on the points we raised a while ago.

Mr. Fulton: The minister never said he would let the section stand.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Oh, yes.

Mr. Fulton: Not yet.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The proposed amendment is not in legal language; it says "where in the opinion of two medical experts". That is not legal and has no effect.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I want to be put right on one question of fact. My memory is that this section was allowed to stand, and the Chairman said "stand". I am right in that, am I not, with regard to section 9?

Mr. Rowe: Surely.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then let it stand. I should like to talk to the minister about it.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Unless the minister would agree with the words of the amendment "or is requested by the accused".

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Why not let him take a good look at the whole thing?

Mr. Garson: I think the better way would be to let the section stand in the bill and report progress. Then we will look at it again. We have every desire to give heed to the suggestions that have been made; and if they are weighty, we should give them weight.

The Chairman: Shall section 9 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

PROVISION FOR BENEFITS FOR CERTAIN FORMER MEMBERS OF FORCES OTHER THAN CANADIANS

The house resumed, from Thursday, May 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. 180, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946—Mr. Gregg—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Newfoundland veterans.

Mr. Pearkes: Many representations have been made in previous discussions on this bill that some of the benefits should be extended to other classes of veterans. Since those representations were made I am sure the minister has had time to discuss that matter with his colleagues, perhaps, or anyway to form an opinion. Will he say whether he is prepared to make any further extensions of these benefits to any of the other classes of veterans, as recommended during the previous discussions on this bill?

Mr. Gregg: No, Mr. Chairman, not in this bill.

Mr. Pearkes: I am sorry that cannot be done; but if the minister has definitely decided upon that and assumes the responsibility for not extending these benefits, then may I say that, in my own personal opinion, we should try to get passed through as soon as possible what benefits are now being offered to the imperials or to the men who are already covered.

Mr. Cruickshank: I wish to ask the minister a question, but I do not know whether this is the proper section under which to ask it. If I am out of order, and I seldom am, I should be glad to know. Every responsible veterans' organization that I know of has made recommendations in connection with this matter. I am pleased that allowances have been made to imperial veterans; but I am particularly anxious to know whether this is the clause under which I should discuss the imperial veterans' widows. I should like to see them afforded the same treatment under the act as Canadian veterans receive.

Mr. Gregg: Yes, Mr. Chairman; as discussed before, the widows of British and allied veterans of twenty years' residence in Canada will become eligible under this bill, and will be treated in exactly the same way as widows of Canadian veterans.

Mr. Green: And the minister has not deviated at all from his original position, which was that unless the imperial veteran had been alive in Canada for twenty years the widow could not qualify. That is still the position?

Mr. Gregg: That is correct. That is the position I took when the bill was first introduced, and that is the position, I contend, which is the correct one with relation to those now eligible under the bill.

Mr. Cruickshank: I may be a little dense, but I should like a little more explanation from the minister through you, Mr. Chairman. Probably I have not grasped it as I should have. I have been speaking for my own Legion, and I believe for the Legion of the province of British Columbia. We think that wives of those imperial veterans who resided twenty years in Canada should have the same consideration under this particular act as the Canadian veterans. Some of us have been very fortunate in our marriages; some have not been so fortunate. Some may have been married only nineteen years. We have had so much legal discussion tonight that I have become almost legal-minded. I cannot put my point in legal language; it would be too involved. The point I am trying to make is this. A married veteran may have been in Canada twenty years, but he may have been married for only nineteen years. I want to be corrected in this if I am wrong. I have listened to the hon. member for Lake Centre and a few other hon. members taking part in legal discussions tonight and I am beginning to believe that I am legal-minded, but I am not. My contention is that we want every imperial veteran or a veteran of any other allied country who has resided here for twenty years to be accorded the same treatment under the War Veterans Allowance Act as a Canadian veteran. I think the Legion of British Columbia, and certainly my own branch, believe that the widows of the imperial veterans should have the same treatment as the widows of Canadian veterans. Am I wrong or am I correct in my assumption?

Mr. Gregg: The hon. member for Fraser Valley is exactly correct. The benefits accruing in this case flow to the wives or the widows through the veterans. The veteran is the person to be recognized; and the wife of the British or allied veteran in Canada twenty years who may have been married after ten years in Canada, but who otherwise qualifies, would be eligible if she became a widow just the same as the Canadian-born veteran married ten years ago.

Mr. Lennard: I regret that some consideration has not been given to widows of those imperial veterans who came here over twenty years ago. I do not want to cite any particular case, but I know of several cases. I know of one case in particular where the veteran came out here in 1922. He lived here for twelve years and then died. He left his wife with small children. She struggled, and through her own efforts raised those children. Now she is denied this pension because she was not fortunate enough to have her husband live for twenty years in this country. I think it is a shame that a case like that has not been given some consideration.

Mr. Brooks: I agree with the other hon. members who have spoken. There is one question I should like to ask the minister. Why is it that we stick to the twenty years? I do not see any logical reason why it should be twenty years. I think it was because we followed the Old Age Pensions Act which required that a foreigner had to be in this country twenty years before he qualified for an old age pension. In studying the old age pensions acts of other countries I have found that they do not require the same length of time. If an alien enters into any of those countries and takes out citizenship within five years, in most of the countries he qualifies for the old age pension. I do not see any particular reason why we should stick to the twenty years. We are amending the act. It seems to me that a shorter time should be specified, which would permit the widows of those imperial veterans to receive the benefits which their husbands would have received had they been here a certain period of time. I should like the minister to explain why twenty years was selected as the time.

Mr. Gregg: The hon. member for Royal is the first person who has suggested that the time should be less than twenty years. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra took up the suggestion the other night, looked at it, and then discarded it.

Mr. Green: No, I did not.

Mr. Gregg: Put it to one side; I will put it that way. To answer my hon. friend directly, the reason the twenty years has been taken is that all those who have been interested in this question for the last ten years felt that twenty years was a reasonable period of time. It was a period of time, more or less taken by rule of thumb, that it was felt would be fair. From 1920 to 1930 the greater number of these men came to this country. There were a comparatively small number between 1930 and 1940. Then of course the larger group that has come in since the end of the last war will be for somebody else to worry about some fifteen or twenty years hence.

Mr. Green: Of course the picture is that the veteran who came here in 1920 and then died before 1940 left his widow in this position that she gets no help.

Mr. Gregg: Quite right.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to get that point cleared up because it is pretty sticky. I refer to the point that the hon. member for Royal made reference to and the one that the hon. member for Fraser Valley is not clear on. No matter when the imperial veteran married, if he was in this country for twenty years, his wife is eligible; but an imperial veteran may have been in this country for nineteen years and six months and then passed on. His widow is not entitled to this award, although she may have been here all her life. I would like to know how many are affected. I myself think that it is a pretty rank piece of discrimination. I wonder whether the minister has any figures on the number that would be affected. I imagine there are few. I believe the amendments are all right as they are, but there is that one point that sticks out, and there is a lot of resentment over it. Can the minister tell us how many are being dealt out under this regulation?

Mr. Gregg: I have no figures for the simple reason that the two national organizations that made the survey of this question did not expect those particular widows would be eligible; consequently they did not take them into consideration in making their survey. They made the survey of those veterans who had, it was estimated, the twenty years' residence in Canada, and based their recommendations and their estimates on that.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to ask a further question through you, Mr. Chairman. I think the Speaker allowed a lot of leeway in some of the legal discussion tonight.

(Inaudible interruption.)

They may not be interested in veterans over here, but I am. Discussion was allowed tonight which might not have been particularly relevant. However, I should like to be permitted on this section to refer to allowances to war veterans. Permission was allowed the leader of the opposition, and the leader of one of the other so-called parties on another matter.

I should like to know if I am allowed to discuss what I consider would be proper allowances under the War Veterans Allowance Act to either Canadian veterans or imperial veterans, under the new amendment. May I discuss that on this section?

The Chairman: It is not in order on this section.

Mr. Cruickshank: It was in order for those people over there tonight, on legal matters.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—"Veteran" defined.

Mr. Green: Under this section is it clear that this covers veterans who served in the South African war?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Green: Would the veterans of any other wars be covered?

Mr. Gregg: I do not think there are any other wars that would be applicable in this case. Anyway, that is why it was made to apply prior to the official date of the end of the second great war, so that it will take in the few remaining South African veterans.

Mr. Cruickshank: And the veterans of the Riel rebellion; there are a few left. Does it cover them?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, if eligible.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Certain deductions not to be made.

Mr. Green: This is the section which provides that moneys received under a pension shall not be considered in arriving at a figure for war veterans allowance. Can the minister say what provisions are made in his department for cross-checking between the pensions branch and the veterans allowance branch? On one or two occasions difficulties have arisen in that pension has been increased because the disability of a veteran has become greater; he has received additional money as a result of that increase; at the same time he has been drawing war veterans allowance, but no prompt notification has been sent from the pensions branch to the war veterans allowance board.

The result has been that perhaps a year or eighteen months later the veteran has suddenly been faced with a notification that he has been overpaid. Then of course deductions have been made from his allowance, and a great deal of suffering has been caused which could have been avoided if there had been some system in the department whereby, the minute a pension was increased, notification had gone to the war veterans allowance board so that the allowance could be adjusted accordingly.

In some cases which have come to my attention veterans have received this increase, have thought they were entitled to it, and did not realize that it was going to affect the war veterans allowance. Then they were faced with a demand for several hundred dollars, perhaps a year or two later.

The income of such a veteran is limited; he can receive only a certain maximum; if he gets part of it in pension, then he gets that much less in war veterans allowance. So when this notification comes he is on a fixed income, and faced with repayment of several hundred dollars. I believe a difficulty of that kind could be avoided by a more efficient exchange of information between these two branches of the minister's department. Have any steps been taken to bring about such an exchange?

Mr. Gregg: In the planning that is taking place now active steps are under way to obviate the difficulty pointed out.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have had cases of my own that I have had to look after, affected in much the same way. For instance, a veteran's wife has been faced with sudden and serious illness, and the veteran has been called upon to make payment back, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has said. These sums have been deducted all at once. Still he has to pay doctor and hospital bills.

It is not reasonable that they should be called upon to make these refunds. If a man is entitled to war veterans allowance, it is because he needs it and because he is incapable of earning a full livelihood for his family. He is receiving it owing to the shortening of his life and earning ability through war service. It is most unreasonable to deduct from that man, as has been done in the cases I have had brought to my attention. His wife might require the expenditure of large sums of money each month for medicinal purposes; yet the veteran all at once has these sums deducted. Further consideration should be given to this.

Mr. Green: One further question. Has there been any change in the treatment regulations in so far as war veterans allowance recipients are concerned? My understanding is that until a year or so ago they were allowed into hospital in most cases under class 1-A. Now they are allowed in under class 5-B, which means a great deal of difference in the amount of allowance that goes with the treatment. Formerly, apparently, there was what was known as an adjunct treatment ruling. It was not set out in the regulations, but merely in the instructions. Within the last few months a change had been made so that they do not get this class 1-A treatment in as many cases as they did formerly. Why was that change made?

Mr. Gregg: I shall be glad to discuss that more fully when my estimates are being discussed. But if a veteran is entitled to class 1-A treatment he gets it. Otherwise, if he comes in under war veterans allowance, he comes under the appropriate class.

Mr. Green: Would the minister check that?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Cruickshank: I want to ask a further question.

The Chairman: It is eleven o'clock; shall I report progress?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We have given quite a lot of time to this, and I think we could finish it in a few minutes—unless there is going to be a long discussion on it. I am asking that the house give its consent to continue. There are only three more sections, and I do not think they are contentious.

The Chairman: Does the committee give consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cruickshank: I will try to be brief, but I entirely disagree with the leader of the house when he says that a lot of time has been taken on this. I heard a lot of time wasted tonight—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You may call it eleven o'clock, please.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I understand the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has consulted the leaders of the different parties concerning interim supply. Tomorrow he will move to go into supply and ways and means with the object of having interim supply granted by the house. We will not, after we go into supply, call any new department. If later in the day we wish to go into supply we will move the formal motion on which there may be a debate, amendment, or any other procedure. After interim supply has been voted we will take Bill No. 222, an act to amend the Cold Storage Act; Bill 82, an act to amend the Criminal Code; then resolution No. 8 on today's order paper in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If time is left we will take up Bills 249 and 89.

Mr. Drew: I thought that it was the intention to deal with the motion to go into ways and means now standing on the order paper.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes, but I have been told by the Minister of Finance that the motion to go into supply will have to precede the other motion because if we got into ways and means we would not have anything before that committee.

Mr. Drew: Is it the intention to call ways and means after dealing with interim supply?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Immediately after going into supply and having the two resolutions concurred in, we will go into ways and means.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 30, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. A. J. Bater (The Battlefords) presented the first report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

HON. LIAQUAT ALI KHAN

ARRANGEMENTS FOR ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT BY PRIME MINISTER OF PAKISTAN

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sure hon. members will be glad to learn that arrangements have been made, subject to confirmation by the house, to have the Prime Minister of Pakistan address members of both houses of parliament at three o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

The tentative arrangements are similar to those which were made when we had the honour of a visit by the Prime Minister of India; and as seats will be placed on the floor of the house for the members of the Senate it would be appreciated if hon. members of this house could be in their seats just a minute or two before three o'clock, when the Prime Minister of Pakistan will make his appearance here.

I understand that the ordinary tickets for the galleries have been cancelled, and that special tickets have been distributed to the whips, to be made available to those hon. members of this house who may wish to have guests attend the ceremony.

If this is agreeable to hon. members I should like to move, with unanimous consent:

That when this house adjourns today it stand adjourned until tomorrow at 4.30 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

WHEAT

STATEMENTS AS TO PURCHASES BY UNITED KINGDOM IN CANADA IN 1950-51

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In connection with my recent trip to the United Kingdom, I should like to read into the record an agreed statement by the United Kingdom and Canadian governments recording the result of our wheat discussions.

"The Canadian Minister of Trade and Commerce held discussions in London with United Kingdom ministers on the subject of the United Kingdom's wheat requirements in the crop year 1950-51 within the framework of the international wheat agreement.

Both governments have now reviewed the results of those talks. They are agreed that the international wheat agreement removes the need for a contract to replace the existing Anglo-Canadian wheat agreement which expires at the end of July.

The United Kingdom government has made it clear that out of its total wheat import requirements in 1950-51, it expects to buy a large proportion in Canada which, quite apart from the special contractual arrangements for the past four years, is, and it is hoped will remain, the traditional source of supply for the United Kingdom. The Canadian government, for its part, is satisfied that Canadian wheat growers will continue to find in the United Kingdom a market for a very substantial part of their exportable wheat."

I should also mention that the United Kingdom has agreed to take 300,000 tons of Canadian flour at competitive North American prices as part of its purchases of Canadian wheat in the crop year 1950-51.

In the light of all our discussions, I think it reasonable to assume that in 1950-51 the United Kingdom will purchase from Canada between 100 and 120 million bushels of wheat. It is understood that such wheat will be offered upon international wheat agreement terms as to price, quality and position not less favourable than those obtained by any other buyer in the dollar market, whether in the United States or in Canada.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if at this conference a basis of settlement under the "have regard to" clause was discussed for the great loss suffered by Canadian wheat producers as a result of these United Kingdom-Canada wheat contracts?

Mr. Howe: I understand the wheat board act will be discussed later in the session, and I do not care to amplify this statement at the moment.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to ask the minister whether anything at all was done in connection with small fruits.

Mr. Howe: They were not included in the wheat discussions.

Mr. Cruickshank: No, Mr. Speaker, but there is more in agriculture than wheat.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce in a position to advise the house what the price spread will be during the season 1950-51 on the wheat agreement or wheat arrangements that have been entered into?

Mr. Howe: The prices under the international wheat agreement will be in the range from $1.98 to $1.54.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF AGREEMENT WITH NEW BRUNSWICK—ROUTE THROUGH NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Hon. members may be interested in knowing that the federal government has entered into an agreement with the government of the province of New Brunswick for the construction, under the terms of the Trans-Canada Highway Act, passed by parliament at the last session, of the links of the trans-Canada highway through New Brunswick. The agreement was signed on behalf of the province of New Brunswick by the Hon. W. S. Anderson, minister of public works.

Mr. Brooks: Will the minister disclose the route of the trans-Canada highway through New Brunswick?

Mr. Winters: In all cases so far the route has been announced by the provinces, but I understand that by this time the province will have made an announcement, so I think I can disclose that the general route will be one that enters the Quebec-New Brunswick border near Edmundston and proceeds along the Saint John river to Fredericton, thence southeast to Sussex, thence to Moncton, and thence to Aulac. There will be a spur from Aulac to Cape Tormentine.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

RED RIVER, MAN.—PERMANENT WORKS AND DIKES—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to table at once the correspondence called for by the address adopted yesterday on the motion of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), asking for the correspondence, direct or indirect, with the government of Manitoba since May 1, 1950. I will lay on the table all that has been received or forwarded in the form of letters or telegrams, with the exception of those that have already been read into the record of the house.

[Mr. Howe.]

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—TAX EXEMPTIONS ON RELIEF FUND CONTRIBUTIONS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I may answer a question which was asked by the hon. member for Souris on May 24 when I was absent from the house and was brought to my attention yesterday. It reads as follows:

> Will consideration be given to the request of the Canadian chamber of commerce that contributions to the Manitoba flood relief fund be exempted from taxation over and above the five per cent now allowed corporations and the ten per cent allowed individuals?

This question has come up before, more particularly with regard to the Fraser valley flood relief fund. As the hon. member is aware, these limitations of five per cent and ten per cent are fixed by the Income Tax Act. Any variation would require an amendment to the statute. On the previous occasion to which I have referred, it seemed that the only way in which an amendment could be effected would be to give the Minister of National Revenue discretion to exempt certain cases from those provisions. Aside from other considerations, it was felt that was placing an onerous responsibility on the Minister of National Revenue to differentiate between most desirable relief funds of this kind, and after careful consideration it was decided that it was neither desirable nor practicable to amend the Income Tax Act. The same considerations, of course, apply in this case.

CRIMINAL CODE AND CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

BRINGING INTO FORCE IN NEWFOUNDLAND—CERTAIN NEWFOUNDLAND LAWS REPEALED

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 250 (from the Senate) to bring the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act into force in Newfoundland.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough, member for the electoral district of Hamilton West, introduced by Mr. George A. Drew and Mr. F. E. Lennard.

George H. Hees, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Broadview, introduced by Mr. George A. Drew and Mr. J. H. Harris.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA—COMMUNISM IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I wish to direct a question to the Acting

Secretary of State for External Affairs. A week ago today I asked him whether we could have a report on the commonwealth conference which took place in Sydney. He said he would let us have it within two or three days. Can he let us know when it will be available?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I was hoping to be able to let the hon. gentleman and the house have that report before this, but I felt that it would be more desirable that it be presented by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), who was expected back yesterday. It is now expected that he will be here tomorrow, and I am sure that he will present the report as soon as he can.

TRADE WITH BRITAIN

INQUIRY AS TO MARKETS FOR CERTAIN CANADIAN PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Did he have any success in selling British Columbia salmon or British Columbia fruit in the old country?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Many trade matters were discussed in the United Kingdom. Few of them were brought to a conclusion, other than the wheat transaction, which was the particular topic of discussion. The United Kingdom already has made a substantial purchase of British Columbia salmon for delivery during the current year, and it is hoped that other food purchases will be made as the season progresses.

Mr. Pearkes: What about lumber?

Mr. Howe: Try to buy some lumber.

Mr. Higgins: I should also like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, although I have not given notice of it. Did he discuss the sale of iron ore?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Higgins: Was there any result?

Mr. Howe: We hope that the results will appear shortly.

SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Interim Supply

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Abbott moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $116,793,505.67, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items (with the exception of item 170) to be voted, as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1951, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; and in addition thereto, a sum not exceeding $254,000, being one-third of the amount of items 364, 430, 497; a sum not exceeding $1,441,677, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 18, 30, 94, 189, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 198, 199, 360, 361, 370, 384, 385, 386, 554, of the said estimates, and a sum not exceeding $833,333.33, being one-third of the amount of item 635, of the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1951, be granted to His Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1951.

He said: Mr. Chairman, in this resolution I am asking for the usual additional one-twelfth of all the items in the main estimates for the fiscal year 1950-51, with the exception of item 170, on which one-twelfth has already been granted. Then there is an additional one-third of certain special items which are set out in the schedule to the bill, and which cover services coming for payment within the first few months of the year. Illustrations of that are the expenses of the international trade fair, which is now in progress in Toronto; the expenses of the royal commission on transportation, and an item of resources and development which provides for the excavation of a flood channel at Dalles rapids, where the work has been virtually completed. Then there is an additional one-twelfth of certain items of a seasonal nature, similar to one for which I asked for an additional amount on the first interim supply. These cover such matters as health of animals; compensation for animals slaughtered; freight assistance on western feed grains, which commence in the early part of the year; expenditures for mines and technical surveys, covering survey parties which are sent out at this time of the year. Finally there is an additional one-third of the special item in the supplementary estimates which I tabled the other day, covering unemployment relief in Newfoundland.

The form of the bill of course is exactly the same as the bill passed at this time last year. In asking for this interim supply I do so with the usual undertaking that it will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize and discuss any items in the estimates which will come up for consideration during the remainder of the session.

I understand that following the passing of the resolution in committee of supply we have to pass, of course, the corresponding resolution in committee of ways and means, in connection with which it will be necessary to dispose of the amendment moved some time ago by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew).

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house resumed, from Friday, April 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO ORGANIZATION OF DEPARTMENTS AND OTHER GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I am merely speaking to clarify our stand on this resolution. When the leader of this group spoke on April 28 he stated that we were in general support of the amendment, the purpose of which was expressed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on April 28, as recorded at page 1989 of Hansard, as follows:

> What I have suggested would be the surest way of giving convincing evidence to the people of Canada that we have done all within our power to make democratic government in this country as efficient and as economical as is humanly possible.

In view of the fact that it is a month now since this resolution was moved, I will quote the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, which is as follows:

> "Consideration should be given to the matter of appointing a royal commission for the purpose of examining and making recommendations for:
> 1. Reducing public expenditure to the lowest point consistent with efficiency.
> 2. Eliminating duplication of overlapping services.
> 3. Consolidating all public services and departmental activities of a similar nature.
> 4. Improving the general efficiency of government and assuring to all members of the civil service full recognition of their responsibilities.
> And without limiting the generality of the foregoing to make such further recommendations as may contribute to the general efficiency of the organization of government."

The leader of this group made it quite clear that we would not support any program of cheese-paring or curtailing of essential services. But on the other hand we do believe that economies can be effected in the cost of administration.

However, section 1 of this resolution is open to many interpretations, and may mean far more than the establishment of economical administration. It may very well mean a general curtailment of public expenditures. For instance, section 1 places the main emphasis on the reduction of public expenditures; but if public expenditures are to be at a level consistent with efficiency, it may well mean that they will have to be increased rather than reduced. We feel that the amendment should have read, "to control public expenditures at a level that will be consistent with efficiency."

[Mr. Abbott.]

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) took issue with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) for saying that expenditures could not be reduced below the level of $2,400 million. Evidently the hon. member for Greenwood felt that expenditures could be reduced below that level by establishing economies and also by eliminating wasteful expenditures. On the other hand there is need to expand expenditures of some of the departments of government. Therefore in the over-all picture you might very well have an expansion of government expenditures rather than a reduction through the reducing of administration costs.

It seems to us that the main point is to control public expenditures at a level that will provide for most efficient operation and servicing of the Canadian economy. Toward that end members of all parties in this house have from time to time urged an increase in certain government expenditures. For instance, recently we had a debate on the question of government grants to the provinces for educati n. Members from all parties urged an increase in expenditures for that purpose. We have also had debates on irrigation. Members of all parties have urged the federal government to increase their expenditures on irrigation. There has also been a great deal of discussion in the house about water conservation, flood control and reforestation. At the present time we have before us the picture of Winnipeg. We realize how necessary it is to establish flood control measures. There is an old Chinese saying to the effect that to control the rivers you must also control the hills. Of course in controlling the hills you will require to adopt a program of reforestation and building of reservoirs. As I say, members on both sides of the house have repeatedly urged an increase in expenditures for that purpose.

Last session we had a discussion about the federal share of financing the trans-Canada highway. Members on all sides emphasized the fact that the federal government should take the larger share in that financial responsibility. All these expenditures may be considered to be self-liquidating, but they would mean a substantial increase in government expenditures at this time.

All parties in the house have urged an increase in government expenditures for social services, especially for old age pensions. All parties have urged an increase in the amount of war veterans allowance from $40 to $50 a month. Members of various parties have urged the necessity of maintaining a substantial floor under agricultural prices and for the purpose of mking a substantial payment on the five year wheat pool. These payments would no doubt be greater than the reductions by the elimination of waste or by making cuts in the cost of administration. Therefore, for that reason, I am not prepared to support the motion to reduce public expenditures when it may very well be in the interests of Canada to increase public expenditures in the future.

The Conservative party emphasizes the need to expand production in order to ease the burden of debt and taxation, and I would agree with that wholeheartedly. I think members on both sides of the house would agree with the necessity of doing that very thing; but let us not forget for one minute that a prerequisite of increased production is an effective demand against that production, which means increased spending by the people of Canada. Some hon. members may say, not necessarily an increase in spending by the people of Canada; it may mean an increase in exports. But an increase in exports must mean also an increase in imports, and an increase in imports means an increase in sales internally. That means an increase in spending by the Canadian people. Therefore before you can hope to get industries to expand greatly their production, you must be in a position to assure them that when they expand that production they will be able to sell it.

I found it most refreshing to read a copy of a speech made by the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) before the advertising and sales club at Toronto on April 14, 1950. Since this is a new type of speech to come from a member of this government, I am going to quote a number of passages from it. I will say in advance that I concur in everything that he said in that speech. He was referring to the problems of the fifties, and he said:

> Most of our factories are in tip-top shape. Our workers are experienced and skilled. Our farms are well mechanized. Thanks to hard work and widespread ability the supply problems of the forties have been well-nigh licked.
> Looking to the fifties, the problem is: will there be sufficient demand both at home and abroad for the things our heavily industrialized economy can produce? One way of finding out how big the demand really is, is to sell, sell, and sell again. For remember the economic repercussions of what might happen if you sell less than you used to.

Then he went on:

> Canada's prosperity in the fifties will depend not only on your ability to sell. It will also depend, among other things, on the willingness of Canadian consumers to buy. And here a major responsibility rests on the shoulders of Canadian women.

Under the heading: "Canadian Women—A major factor in maintaining sales", he had this to say:

> Now what I have to say may appeal to the ladies, though I am not so sure about the reaction of some of the husbands. If Canadian consumers—and that includes the ladies here and their sisters in every part of our country—don't keep on buying, sales people will sell less, producers will produce less, and there will be less employment and less income. In the end there will be less of everything.

Referring to the high level of consumption essential to prosperity, he said this:

> In putting great emphasis on the point that consumers should spend, salesmen should sell and producers should produce, I am not unmindful of the fact that Canadians also want to put something away for a rainy day. I agree that this is important. But for the nation as a whole a situation may arise where there is too much of a good thing. If all Canadians were to try to save too much, less would be spent on consumer goods and services. And if less money is spent on consumer goods, businessmen will have little incentive to expand capital facilities. And if there is a decline in private investment, not only will many private savings remain unused—in the absence of the government's taking a hand in the matter—but men will be laid off work in capital goods industries. And off we will be on the road toward a depression.
> The major domestic challenge of the fifties, then, will be whether consumers can be persuaded to keep on buying, and how effective sales and advertising efforts based on increasingly efficient production will be in keeping up sales.

He concluded with these words:

> To put it into nine simple words: buy more, enjoy more, and Canada will remain prosperous.

That is a happy slogan. I would remind the house that it is the type of speech that we in this group were making in the thirties, every time we stressed the fact that increased saving on the part of the people, while highly desirable from the point of view of the individual, might have a detrimental effect on the economy of the country by bringing about a reduction in spending, unsold goods, and an increase in unemployment. I am sorry the Minister of Resources and Development did not go one step further. He told the people what would happen if they continued to save at their present rate, and if sales declined. He did not say, however, what the government was prepared to do.

In other words, if the people of Canada do not take his advice and do not step up their spending, is the federal government going to sit idly by and see a depression develop, as he forecast in his speech would be the case unless the people increased their spending? If unemployment becomes a problem, and if private spending fails to create effective demand, which would cause surpluses of goods, curtailed production and expanding unemployment, then we say the government would be justified in expanding expenditures without meeting the full cost by taxation or by borrowing the savings of the people.

It is very interesting to note that the governor of the Bank of Canada, speaking on that very point back in 1943, agreed that if such a situation developed as was envisaged by the Minister of Resources and Development, the government would be justified in expanding its expenditures without meeting the full cost from taxation or borrowing from the savings of the people.

In this connection I quote from a broadcast entitled "The Shape of Things To Come," which went out on April 4, 1943, and in which Mr. Graham Towers and I participated. At that time we discussed the subject of post-war financing, and the discussion ensued in this way:

Mr. Quelch: After the war the need will be to encourage private spending. Heavy taxes and public borrowing will be contrary to the public welfare. Will the government finance all desirable public projects by credit expansion when necessary?

Mr. Towers: In circumstances such as Mr. Quelch describes, I would say that there would be grounds for government not meeting the entire cost of its programs by taxing and drawing on public savings. The desire would be to encourage private spending and make government investment more of a residual item. If part of the necessary money had to come from credit expansion—and the projects were sound and in the public interest—then I should say, go ahead.

So when the Minister of Resources and Development warns the Canadian people that unless they increase their spending we will have a depression, I should like him also to say that if the people do not take that advice and if a depression does develop, the federal government will be prepared to step in and take up the slack as recommended by Mr. Graham Towers in the broadcast to which I have referred.

We believe that the royal commission which is urged by the amendment might well recommend setting up a commission similar to that set up in the United States back in 1934, to make a survey of the potential productive capacity of the country, with special reference to the relationship between national production and national income, so as to find out to what extent demand lags behind supply. It could then make a recommendation to the government as to steps which might be taken to ensure that there would be effective demand for the production of the country.

If the government can give business in Canada the assurance that demand will be maintained at all times, I am satisfied that industry in this country will at all times have sufficient confidence to go ahead and expand production. Therefore, as public expenditures should be controlled in this country at a level required to help provide a balanced economy—and by that I mean a condition under which production is maintained at the optimum level and at the same time effective demand maintained against that—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie):

That the amendment be amended by striking out clause 1 and substituting therefor the following:

1. Controlling public expenditure at a level consistent with efficiency.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I had not originally planned to speak in this debate, until I heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) say how very easy it was for members of the opposition to obtain information in answer to questions. He began to enumerate members of the opposition, and pointed out that there was one in particular, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who did know how to ask questions and how to obtain information.

During the last few days when the orders of the day have been called I have heard the hon. member for Lake Centre complain about the kind of answers he has been receiving and ask why he has not been obtaining the information he sought. A check through Hansard will show many occasions on which similar objection has been raised, and I have in mind one in particular which prompts me to speak in this debate.

First of all, I do not know why a question of mine about freight assistance on western feed grains should have been passed as an order for return, because it affected only one department of government. However, a return was brought down on May 16. The questions were as follows:

1. Is freight assistance on western feed grains granted in Canada beyond Fort William, Ontario, or Vancouver, British Columbia?

2. If so, where to?

3. Are milling companies or feed companies permitted freight assistance or drawback on freight on oats or coarse grains purchased or handled by them?

4. If so, what companies during 1948 and 1949 obtained freight assistance or drawback on coarse grains and what amounts?

I would ask the Minister of Finance if there is anything wrong with that fourth question. The return gave the following reply:

The attached information has been received by the Secretary of State of Canada from the Department of Agriculture.

1. Freight assistance is paid on feed grain shipped from Fort William to all eastern provinces, and from Edmonton and Calgary to points in British Columbia.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Freight assistance is paid to wholesale handlers of feeds and feed grain on submission of proof that—

(1) The grain has been shipped and the freight paid.

(2) That the grain has been sold to a consumer, retail dealer or co-operative and

(3) That the consumer or retail buyer has been allowed the freight assistance claimed by the wholesaler.

4. Answered by No. 3.

I will ask the Minister of Finance if he does not agree that in that answer I have been given the run-around. It speaks for itself. I certainly did not receive information that I asked for very pointedly. But I tell you that in my humble way I have been able to obtain some information myself. There was no reason why that question should not have had a proper answer. These things should be followed up and more information should be given. As we all know, hon. members have been trying to get information on the expenditure of the taxpayer's money.

Just the other day the hon. member whom the Minister of Finance said was an expert on getting information asked some questions in connection with coarse grains. Here are the questions, and the answers given by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. McIlraith); I quote from page 2695 of Hansard of May 22, 1950:

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many bushels of (a) feed oats; (b) feed barley, were sold by the wheat board to feed merchants, dealers or brokerage houses in each of the months beginning in December, 1949, and to date?

2. What was the average price received for each of said grains in each of said months?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. It is not the policy of the Canadian wheat board to divulge its sales position within the crop year in which it is operating.

2. See answer to No. 1.

Is there anything wrong with those questions?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just hiding.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I say there is a lot wrong with the answers. I do not intend at this time to refer to several newspaper articles that have been written about how we have been trying to get information. I can tell you that I have dug up a lot of information which is rather startling. In connection with both these questions the government has been hiding the answers.

Mr. Abbott: The government has not been hiding any answers. I am not responsible for answering for the wheat board, but I understand that it has always been understood that the board would not disclose sales figures for the current crop year. There is nothing new about that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): What about the position of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the parliamentary assistant? Does the same thing apply there?

Mr. Abbott: I am answering for my own department; I do not include all the rest of the government.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is the point.

Mr. Abbott: I will couple my hon. friend with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) as being one who is able to get the information he wants.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I do not profess to be very able at all, but when the Minister of Finance spoke against this amendment he was speaking for all the government. He covered quite a large field. He pointed out how easy it was to obtain this information from any department of the government. That is all I am finding fault with at this particular time. He pointed out that historically and primarily it was the function of the government, and especially of the opposition, to perform this duty. Anyone who has been following the proceedings of the public accounts committee knows how easy it is to obtain information, and it should be easy to get an answer in that committee.

An hon. Member: Very easy.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Very easy, I suppose. There are many such examples that I could give besides the two I have mentioned. I am bound to refer to an article that appeared in Maclean's magazine of March 1, 1943, written by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) when he was parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) pointed out the other day, it makes quite a difference where you happen to find yourself.

Mr. Abbott: Is this the first time that article has been brought up?

Mr. Ross (Souris): No, it is not the first time, and I intend to repeat it. As the Minister of Justice said the other day, you have a different viewpoint when you are premier of a province from that which you have when you are a member of the government in Ottawa; you see things in a different light. I presume the same remark would apply to the present Minister of National Defence, because at that time he was pointing out the great difficulty that the then 245 members found in obtaining this information, and that a committee should be set up to be furnished with a research staff and all that sort of thing; but how different it is today when he is a member of the government and is called upon to give these answers! He stands up repeatedly and votes against the very procedure that he so well defended in 1943 as a parliamentary assistant. This is not the first time this has been brought up; it has been repeated several times and may be repeated several times if we have this same difficulty in obtaining information which we should rightly be given on behalf of the taxpayers of this country.

As I have pointed out in other debates, I think a more satisfactory system could be evolved in this House of Commons for the scrutinizing and following through of public expenditures. I have pointed out that there are fifty members of the public accounts committee, approximately fifteen of whom are members of the opposition groups. You can see what happens there when they do not want to give information. The chairman is always a supporter of the government. Contrast this with what happens in Great Britain, where the house membership is much larger, and yet they have a small committee of about fifteen members. Usually the majority are members of the opposition, and frequently the chairman is an opposition member. It is granted that that should be so, that there should be that advantage in scrutinizing public expenditures and following through on behalf of the taxpayer.

This is a very unhealthy state of affairs that we have here. I repeat that extravagance is being practised by the present government. Even the Minister of Finance agreed with the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) when he said that the hon. member had ably pointed out and placed on Hansard several expenditures that could be eliminated without interfering in any way with the efficiency of government.

Mr. Abbott: I did not say that. I believe my hon. friend would wish to be correct. I congratulated the hon. member for Kamloops upon really getting down to this question of expenditures and bringing up specific cases which in his judgment could be eliminated without affecting efficiency. But I expressed no opinion on the merits of the suggestions.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I may have been going a little far and drawing on my imagination, but that is what I would expect the Minister of Finance to say could be done.

Mr. Abbott: I made no such suggestion.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Nevertheless the hon. member for Kamloops went that far; and more than that, he moved to eliminate certain public expenditures, but every supporter of the government voted against it. We have indicated how public expenditures could be eliminated without interfering with the efficiency of the government, and I do not think I can go any further. The original motion moved by my leader was a proper one, and I know it meets with the approval of many organizations and individuals from coast to coast in Canada. I am not unmindful of the fact that occasionally the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and other ministers draw to our attention the fact that the government was endorsed a year ago. Probably they did receive a mandate by constituencies; nevertheless the majority of the people who cast their votes on June 27, 1949, voted against this government.

Mr. MacDougall: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Laugh if you like, but stand up in your seat and dispute that statement if you can.

Mr. MacDougall: I certainly will.

Mr. Ross (Souris): You can do it when you follow me. I can elaborate on that. According to the figures released in early August, 1949, by the chief electoral officer, the majority of the electors of Canada who voted cast their votes against the present government. I defy anyone in the house to stand up and dispute that statement. While the government under the present antiquated electoral system did receive almost seventy-five per cent of the seats in this House of Commons—

Mr. Mitchell: I am here and you are there.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is very true. I am glad my good friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is in the house. I admire him.

I do not wish to take up any more time, but I was pointing out briefly that this motion moved by my leader has had the approval of chambers of commerce and other organizations, as well as of many individuals who have studied this matter. A great many people, regardless of how they cast their ballots last June, are becoming alarmed at the extravagant waste of money by this government.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a word on the amendment and the subamendment. When the amendment was moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), my colleagues the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) both stated that we would oppose it. We are still of that view, because we believe the suggestion means the abrogation of the responsibilities of this house, and we do not think we should be parties to placing our responsibilities upon a royal commission or any other body. However, that does not mean we do not believe there are certain government expenditures that need more careful review than has been given by this house and its committees.

Indeed I think the activities of our members of the various committees of this house will underline what I have just said. However, we do feel that the subamendment moved this afternoon is worthy of support. Therefore we shall support the subamendment, and if it is defeated we shall have to oppose the amendment that was moved on April 28.

I agree very largely with what was said by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). I would point out, however, that when we speak of issuing credits we must remember that there are times when the issuing of credits may be very beneficial to the economy while at other times, when there are high prices and inflationary conditions, such action may increase the inflation within the country. Consequently I like the words the hon. member used in the beginning of his subamendment, "controlling public expenditures at a level consistent with efficiency." Of course I would go a step further and say that if we are going to control public expenditures we must have some plan under which those expenditures are made. So we warmly advocated a proposal made some years ago and accepted by government supporters, and therefore I suppose in effect by the government itself, for the establishment in Canada of a national investment board. That has not been set up, but I believe such an instrument might have been extremely valuable over the past several years, and perhaps would be even more valuable during the course of the next few years.

That is one way by which we could control public expenditure and investment at a level consistent with efficiency. The hon. member for Acadia mentioned the possibilities of the use of the central bank of Canada, the establishment of which marked a great step forward in controlling both the amount of currency in circulation—to use Mr. King's words, to control it in terms of public need—and also to influence the economy in various directions at times when that influence is particularly desirable.

So, Mr. Speaker, without delaying the house further, I shall conclude what I desire to say on this point. I should have liked to comment briefly on the announcement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), because some of us regret very much indeed that the British wheat agreement has not been carried forward and our agricultural producers protected in a way perhaps they cannot be protected under the international wheat agreement, but I am going to defer any discussion of that matter until the appropriate time, when wheat and wheat marketing are discussed in this house. All I rose to say was that we shall support the subamendment, and if it is defeated we shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): First of all, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the subamendment is entirely acceptable, and I shall support the amendment as so amended. I would remind hon. members that the subamendment in no way affects the main body of the amendment I moved on April 28, and that in my opinion it does not in any way affect the meaning of the paragraph for which it is substituted, beyond the fact that it is apparently intended to avoid any uncertainty with respect to the interpretation which was placed upon the words of the original amendment by some speakers. The first clause of the amendment I moved read "reducing public expenditure to the lowest point consistent with efficiency," and by the subamendment that is to be replaced by the words "controlling public expenditure at a level consistent with efficiency." I am inclined to think the word "controlling" in that case is actually the better word, and for that reason I welcome the subamendment.

Before a vote is taken on the subamendment there are certain facts which I think should be in the minds of hon. members which have arisen since the original amendment was presented. There has been no suggestion at any time of a reduction of essential services. What has been proposed is that the biggest business in Canada, the business of government, follow the course that any ordinary business of any size would follow at this time and bring in outside experts to examine the method of handling the accounts and determine if there are ways in which those accounting methods may be improved and economies made. When it is suggested that it would be wise to have the whole organization of government and the system of handling accounts examined by a group of independent experts we are told there are no indications of any definite economies that can be effected, and that no single item has been mentioned where economy could be practised.

I am very glad that the amendment I moved just over a month ago comes up for discussion today, when there are two new members in the house. One of them is the only lady member and, apart from that special qualification, a public accountant of established reputation. The other hon. member who has come in today is a young and successful businessman with a very keen appreciation of sound business practices and, may I add, sound labour relations within his own organization. I can well imagine the surprise that both of them will get when they really have the opportunity to go into our accounting methods. There is no business in this country, large or small, that could survive if it adopted the accounting methods we follow here in carrying on the biggest business in Canada. It is so easy for the Minister of Finance to get up, and in his bland, friendly way say, "Give me examples; point to any specific item. I have sat here for a long time and no one points to any definite item." We are aware that there are great public services that must be performed, and that those constitute the bulk of the obligations for which he must tax the people on the scale that they are to be taxed.

I shall point out some items that suggest clearly where substantial savings could be made, but that does not answer the argument that there are great possibilities for reduction in expenditures, without reducing any essential public service. We are told of the large expenditures for old age pensions, family allowances, veterans services, and things of that sort, as well as the service of our large public debt which is in the nature of fixed obligations. We know that they do constitute the bulk of public expenditure. It must be remembered that when we have placed before us these large items for services of this nature, there are included in those services expenditures of an administrative character, and expenditures of another kind as well.

On April 17 of this year we learned that there are 366 publicity and information experts, if that is the correct name, attached to the various departments of government. They are receiving $1,275,508.43, but do not let any member of the house carry away the impression that $1,275,508.43 pays for this publicity. It is only the start. These are the people who turn on the tap and keep the flood flowing. These are the people who write the speeches. We do not know when we are really hearing the thoughts of a minister, and when we are hearing the thoughts of one of these employees. They are all so busy explaining things to the people of Canada to the greatest advantage of the members of the government. There is not anyone here who does not recognize that it is desirable that public business be explained, but that does not need this host of writers; that does not need these people outside of the ordinary activities of the civil service. We do not know how much they cost in paper alone, but the figure would be enormous.

Let me give you an example. I have in my hand a collection of material which was gathered in only eleven days by a member of the press gallery, and which constitutes the output of these publicity men. Every member of the press gallery has had more than the mass of material in my hand handed to him by these publicity experts in the last ten days.

Mr. Fulton: It must be two inches thick.

Mr. Drew: At least two inches thick, and that does not include everything. Every wastepaper basket in that part of the building is filled with it. If one took the time to peruse the material, one would know that is the best place for it. This does cost money, and when you multiply that by the number of days in a year, when you multiply it by the number of times the machines run this off for distribution, and when you realize that there are a great many circulars going out besides these, because I have only included the material that goes to the press gallery, you realize the cost. There are many other channels for this sort of publicity as well.

What is this publicity? In addition to the gaily coloured releases of this kind, and the other coloured releases of this kind, some red, white and blue, —

Mr. McIlraith: Would the leader of the opposition indicate the last publication he described as "of this kind"?

Mr. Drew: Yes, the director of public relations is the one I have in my hand.

Mr. McIlraith: No, the other one from the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Drew: Yes, the dominion bureau of statistics. Then, we have one the hon. member may like, the green one.

Mr. McIlraith: No, just read to hon. members the name of the publication, so that they will know what it is.

Mr. Drew: I am not going to read the titles of all these.

Mr. McIlraith: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition held up a publication and described it as "this publication". He made some remarks about it but he did not tell the members of the house what publication he was describing. I believe it would be fair to the hon. members if he would name it. It is a dominion bureau of statistics publication, and quite easily identified by him.

Mr. Ferguson: This is all trash; why waste time on it?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows, as every hon. member knows, that amongst this material there is some good, but the greater part of it is not worth reading.

Mr. McIlraith: Give us the name of it.

Mr. Warren: Tell the house what it is.

Mr. Drew: I hear a small, frail voice calling, but I would remind the hon. member who is interrupting me that he knows perfectly well where this comes from, because it comes into his office as it does into every other member's office.

In connection with these services we have been told, for instance, of the increase in expenditure for publicity and information of different kinds, and I shall give the figures in relation to that. One of the interesting things is the statement that the Department of External Affairs needs more money for its information service. It has 51 publicity men, and issues a large number of circulars. I wish to say most emphatically that I agree with the idea of informing the people of other countries, and the people concerned, about the real activities of the Department of External Affairs. But last week's issue of the Canadian weekly bulletin from the Department of External Affairs did not contain anything that was not covered by the excellent press of this country. There is not a single thing that has not been covered, and it amounts to a repetition of quotations from speeches by various cabinet ministers, along with other statements that have appeared in the press concerning matters of general interest.

Just as an example of the kind of thing that is going out under this heading of publicity from the Department of External Affairs, and just one item, may I give this instance. The Department of External Affairs, under its own heading and through its publicity channels, sent out not long ago a speech by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) delivered to a Liberal club in Montreal. Mr. Speaker, if any of the ministers on the other side of the house think their political speeches should be sent out, they have a perfect right to have that done, but not at the expense of the people of Canada and not in the name of the Department of External Affairs. That is the kind of thing in which there can be real savings. They are some of the things that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) could well examine but they are the kind of thing that the Minister of Finance might not be able to examine so easily because he knows perfectly well that an independent group examining matters of this kind can do so in a detached and objective manner much better than he can and much better than he has been able to do.

Let us see some of the figures that are not shown in the estimates as separate figures but are brought together to show the way that expenses have increased. The estimates for the last year before the war, 1938-39, amounted to $549,219,048. The estimates now before us total $2,367,480,478. Granted that much of this additional expenditure arises from the war itself and from the additional social services which are supported by all the members of this house, nevertheless there are items here which have no relation to these essential services. As an example, let us take the cost of materials and supplies bought by the government for different departments. In the year before the war the estimates for materials and supplies were $6,586,105. The current estimates call for $76,510,901 for the very same item. Our population is larger and the business of government covers a much greater field, but that fact hardly explains why approximately twelve times as much as in the year before the war should be required for this purpose.

Then let us take the expenditure for printing, stationery and office equipment; and it is in the item of printing that we find these circulars to some extent, though not entirely. There again we have the reason why an independent inquiry of this kind is necessary if we are going to get an objective examination of these facts. The estimates in the year before the war, for printing, stationery and office equipment, amounted to $2,582,901. This year the estimates for these same items amount to $14,725,572.

Next let us examine the total required for buildings, works and structures, and these are the combined totals for various departments. In the year before the war the estimates for this purpose, for the actual purchase and construction, amounted to $35,830,565. This year, under these same items, the estimates call for $168,575,705.

Then let us take maintenance and repairs on the buildings of this kind. In the year before the war, for maintenance and repairs the estimates called for $3,664,294. This year the estimates for this purpose call for $33,551,248. Then here is the kind of item that cannot be put down as one of those services that have been referred to as not being subject to effective reduction. The estimates for freight, express and cartage for all departments in the year before the war amounted to $639,825. Under these same headings the estimates for the present year amount to $6,746,457. As you add these figures up, it is interesting to note the number of occasions on which the estimates now are exactly ten times what they were in the year before the war. Then let us take the expenditures for an item—

Mr. Abbott: National defence, for instance.

Mr. Drew: Oh, national defence is a part of it; that is perfectly true. But it is only a part of it.

Let us take an item like travelling and transportation expenses. In the year before the war the amount of the estimates was $4,742,206; now it is $22,744,354. But, Mr. Speaker, the most striking item of all is that under the heading of telephones, telegrams and postage. It is well to remember that this is not ordinary postage, because ordinary departmental postage is carried free. Therefore these are services of another kind. In the year before the war the estimates for telephones, telegrams and postage amounted to $960,248. The estimates at present before us call for $8,595,943. In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance has so persistently questioned the possibility of savings which could be effected and the practical results of any inquiry of this kind, just let us take his own department with regard to these items. For telephones, telegrams and postage, in the last year before the war the Department of Finance asked for $33,000. This year the estimates now before us call for $1,639,900 for the Department of Finance largely.

Mr. Abbott: That is all the departments in Ottawa, of course; not just the Department of Finance.

Mr. Drew: This is for the Department of Finance, largely.

Mr. Abbott: It is on a different basis than before the war.

Mr. Drew: In other words, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), with whatever adjustments there are, is now asking for fifty times as much for telephones, telegrams and postage—

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, no.

Mr. Drew: —as was asked for before the war.

Mr. Abbott: That is simply because the telephones of the other departments in Ottawa come under these estimates. We took over telephones from the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Finance does not need to attempt to change the figures that come from his own department.

Mr. Abbott: I do not want to change the figures, but I do not want the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) to mislead the house and the public.

Mr. Drew: There is no suggestion of misleading the house.

Mr. McIlraith: That is what it is.

Mr. Drew: The figures I have are provided by one of his own senior officials.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Abbott: They are all before the public accounts committee. I know that my hon. friend wants to be fair. He puts out to the public that the expenditures of the Department of Finance for telephones, telegrams and postage are fifty times what they were before the war. I do not know whether that is true or not; it may be. But so far as the figures are concerned, the expenditures now for the Department of Finance on telephones represent the expenditures of all government departments in Ottawa, because they have been centralized under the direction of the Department of Finance and the expenses are included in the Department of Finance vote. If you are going to compare anything, you should compare like with like. That is my only point.

Mr. Drew: It is an interesting thing. Let us take, for instance, national defence. If all the departments are under the Department of Finance, how is it that we find, under telephones, telegrams and postage, that in the year before the war the Department of National Defence asked for $62,932 and this year is asking for $1,968,000?

Mr. Abbott: The answer to that is because they operate extensively outside of Ottawa.

Mr. Drew: These are departmental expenditures, and Ottawa, no matter how much some members of the government may think so, is not the whole of Canada.

Mr. Abbott: I know my hon. friend does not want to misrepresent intentionally. I was only pointing out the position of the Department of Finance. I am simply saying that to compare the figure before the war with the figure now cannot give you a valid basis of comparison, because the Department of Finance has taken over from the Department of Public Works the telephone service of all departments in the city of Ottawa. That is my only point.

Mr. Drew: That point is perfectly well taken.

Mr. Abbott: That was not the case before.

Mr. Drew: But I come back to what I have already given, namely, the total figure for all departments of government in every part of Canada for telephones, telegrams and postage, which was $960,248 in the year before the war and is now $8,595,943. And the fact is that instead of these figures being increased, in a great many instances they could well be reduced because today we have air carriage of mail, which in ordinary cases is almost as fast as service by telephone or telegram.

One of the things that a competent group of independent experts would examine would be the extent to which just as effective communication could be carried out by the speedy use of air mail as by the use of telephones and telegrams at the present time; and whether there are more departments in Ottawa brought under the Department of Finance, and other departments outside operating separately, makes no difference. These are the figures given by officials of the Department of Finance itself as to the comparative costs. I am not suggesting for one moment that this is not in every way an accurate representation of the figure. On the contrary, I am satisfied that it is. Whatever the balancing may be between departments, the totals have increased enormously.

In so far as the over-all picture is concerned, the items that I have given are only a few of the combined items that show very great increases under headings that certainly are subject to ordinary business examination. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in this case there is no abrogation of the responsibility of parliament by the appointment of a royal commission to go into a subject of this kind. In fact, if that argument is sound then there would be no single case where a royal commission could properly be appointed, because whenever a royal commission is appointed it is for the purpose of examining into some public affairs.

One of the statements made by certain speakers on this amendment is that this would be a commission of judges. I simply point out that I have suggested that this commission be set up on a basis similar to the commission which was set up in the United States under the chairmanship of ex-president Hoover. Whether there be a judge or judges is of course entirely a matter of responsibility for the government that would be called upon to make the appointments and to set the terms of the reference. I did make it clear that I believed a royal commission of this kind could best carry out its purpose if it were made up of business experts, and of experts in accounting and others who by their training could effectively deal with matters of this kind.

We of course cannot say that the result would be on the same proportionate basis. But it is interesting to note that the Hoover commission in the United States, inquiring into the same general subject, made recommendations which it is estimated would amount to an annual saving of $5 billion. In this country on a proportionate basis it would amount to a saving in excess of $400 million. I am not saying that such a commission could of necessity make recommendations that would bring about a saving of that kind. What I do say is that only a commission of that kind could determine the extent of the savings that could be made. If the savings are $50 million, $100 million, $150 million or $200 million, they are the kind of savings that we want at this time.

In this country, as in other countries, the war necessarily expanded the business of government. I wish that the government itself would accept these arguments without suggesting that we are necessarily imputing any improper handling of the public business when we say that savings could be made. When Mr. Hoover's commission, a large commission, got to work it set up a number of teams, and those teams examined different subjects. I do not recall any suggestion from either side of congress that there was anything unfair about the claim at that time that savings could be made. In fact Mr. Hoover, the ex-president, representing one party, was appointed by the president who belonged to another party, and that very non-political and impartial approach to this subject has been carried right through. All over the United States today public committees, made up of people of the two major parties in the United States, are organized to carry into effect and to obtain the implementation of the recommendations of the Hoover commission.

I should think that the government itself would welcome the opportunity to gain the assistance that it would receive from the constructive examination of departmental organization and accounting procedure by the most competent people who could be called to this service throughout the whole of Canada.

Although opposition has been expressed to this motion, I still urge the government to reconsider the position and to consider the advantage that there will be to the government, as well as to the people of Canada, if the whole organization of government in relation to its public accounting system, and the whole system of public expenditure, be so examined as to ensure that the taxpayer gets as close as possible to one hundred cents value for every dollar that he has to pay.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take time this afternoon to traverse again the ground which I covered on April 28 when this amendment was moved, and in which I answered the arguments for the appointment of such a commission which have been reiterated today by my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I want to say simply a word about the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), and to state why I am bound to oppose it. The subamendment, because of the form in which it is, is of course a want of confidence motion in the government, something which, I appreciate, does not interest members of the opposition parties.

Secondly, in my judgment this subamendment, if adopted, would constitute an abrogation of the constitutional responsibilities of this house.

The amendment, as contained in Hansard at page 1989, reads, after the preliminary words, that all the words after "that" be struck out:

> Consideration should be given to the matter of appointing a royal commission for the purpose of examining and making recommendations for:

The amendment as it stands reads:

> Reducing public expenditure to the lowest point consistent with efficiency.

For that is substituted:

> Controlling public expenditure at a level consistent with efficiency.

I am of the opinion that no royal commission can assume the responsibility of determining how public expenditures shall be controlled at a level consistent with efficiency. That, in my opinion, is a matter for decision by the House of Commons and, for the reasons I gave on April 28, the government will oppose both the subamendment and the amendment.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Quelch) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I was paired with the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Abbott moved:

That towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1951, the following sums be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, namely—

1. The sum of $116,793,505.67, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the items (with the exception of item 170) set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1951;

2. The amount of $254,000, being one-third of the amount of items 364, 430, 497 of the said estimates;

3. The amount of $1,441,677, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 18, 30, 94, 189, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 198, 199, 360, 361, 370, 384, 385, 386, 554 of the said estimates;

4. The amount of $833,333.33, being one-third of the amount of item 635 set forth in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1951, as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 251, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending March 31, 1951.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question which might have been asked on the orders of the day, except that I believed it would take too long, and knowing that this opportunity would be forthcoming today I saved it until now. It relates to something which comes within the minister's own department, and my excuse for asking it now is simply that this bill votes money to all departments, including his own. My question is based on an inquiry I received today from a person connected with a very responsible firm in Winnipeg. It relates to the Manitoba flood situation, and in particular to the question of income tax.

Will consideration be given to the case of employers who make special grants to their employees who have suffered heavy losses, those grants being for the purpose of assisting those employees to get on their feet again? The suggestion made was that, as the law now stands, any grant made by an employer for that purpose would not be allowed to the firm for tax purposes. Then again, the employee in receipt of it would have to list it as income and pay tax thereon. I appreciate that the problem is a little different from the sort of request the minister usually receives, but I am sure he will realize that the situation in Winnipeg is a most unusual one and that a request of this kind merits special consideration.

As one who does not often rise to say commendable things about large corporations, I would say that any corporation, large or small, which does something like that would be justified in asking whether that sort of consideration could be given. It may be a new thought to the minister, but will he make some comment on it or give the matter further consideration?

Mr. Abbott: I shall be glad to give it every consideration. While I hesitate to give a legal opinion, I shall draw it to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the facts as stated by the hon. member, I would say that it would be legitimate for an employer to make a payment of something in the nature of a bonus, which would be for consideration of past services as well as future services, and he could deduct it as an expense. Of course, the employee would have to include it as taxable income in his own receipts.

Mr. Knowles: I shall send the minister a copy of the letter I have received, and ask him to look into it and perhaps his colleague would do so as well.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Abbott: I shall be glad to get a ruling on it.

Mr. Knowles: If there is any discretionary power that could meet either or both of the two points I have referred to, I hope it will be used favourably.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is one matter I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. It was referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for Souris, and that is the considerable delay that is being experienced in receiving answers to questions passed as orders for returns. I want to bring a number of these matters to the minister's attention. On one previous occasion I mentioned this, and in my opinion the answers to these questions are available. The questions were passed as orders for returns on April 24. The first question reads as follows:

What was the amount expended month by month since the first of April, 1949, to date in all departments of government for (a) travelling expenses; (b) living expenses and allowances?

The next question passed as an order for return on the same date reads:

How many government officials or representatives of Canada have travelled beyond the confines of Canada in connection with government business month by month since the first day of April, 1949, and to date?

2. What has been the total amount of expenditures and for all travelling, living allowances and expenses incurred or expended by such persons since that date?

In so far as the delay in giving the answers to those questions is concerned, I do not want to bring it up every day as a question of privilege. Ten days ago I mentioned the matter, and I have since been in touch with the Secretary of State. He advises that he has not received the replies to these questions. I am now asking the minister to do his part to secure them. I do not want to raise strenuous objection at this time, except to say that there is too great a time lag in the answers given to these questions.

Furthermore I would point out that the member for Peterborough West had a question passed as an order for return on March 16. The question he asked was:

What was the total cost of (1) long distance calls; (2) telegrams, for (a) each department; (b) each section of each department of the dominion government, for the year 1949?

The hon. member asked a further question on April 27 dealing with the travelling expenses of persons engaged in publicity and information work. The member for Three Rivers had a question passed as an order for return on May 3 which read as follows:

What was the total amount of travelling and removal expenses paid by the federal treasury in (a) the year 1948; (b) the year 1949?

I do not speak about the answers to the other questions, but over a month has gone by. My questions were held up for several days on the order paper before they were passed as an order for return. I simply bring this to the attention of the minister, and say that one does not want to have to bring these matters up regularly. The degree to which delay prevails in answering questions such as these arouses at least more than passing interest as to the reason why the information is not available, having regard to the accounting facilities which the departments of government have. Surely the information requested should now be available in each department as of March 31, 1950.

I am mentioning this matter at this time and asking the minister to see to it that these delays, which are becoming almost insupportable, are not permitted to continue. The passing of orders for returns seems to amount to a means whereby answers are embalmed, and certainly great delays have resulted in connection with information which it is comparatively simple to obtain.

Mr. Abbott: I shall be glad to do that, Mr. Chairman. My hon. friend is certainly entitled to get the information for which he asked, and concerning which an order of the house was passed, just as soon as it is reasonably possible to give it. In the case of some of the returns, I know that it does take a considerable amount of time and work in order to assemble the information. That might be true in the case of travelling expenses, and I am sure it is in the Department of National Defence, where the travelling expenses of service personnel from one section of the country to another are very heavy. I do not know that it is the case with my hon. friend, but sometimes it requires a lot of work gathering in the information which the questioner really does not want. However, I shall do my utmost to urge other departments, just as I do my own, to produce the information as quickly as possible. The house is entitled to it and it should be given at the earliest reasonable date.

Cold Storage Act

COLD STORAGE ACT

REPEAL OF PART II WITH RESPECT TO COLD STORAGE WAREHOUSES

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 222, to amend the Cold Storage Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Charlton: Is the minister or the parliamentary assistant going to make a statement on this bill?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the house knows, the Cold Storage Act was first passed in 1907. It was passed by parliament at that time to encourage the establishment of public cold storage warehouses in order to take care of surpluses in the flush season so that in the seasons when there was not so much it would be possible for them to be sold and in that way they would bring a better return to the primary producer. There was also a Cold Storage Act passed in 1914. Over the period since 1907, I think the government has spent somewhere in the neighbourhood of $4,815,397 to assist the cold storages in helping the primary producers. But in 1927 the two acts, the one of 1907 and the one of 1914, were brought together; they will be found in the revised statutes of 1927; I think it is chapter 25. The amendment has reference to part II of the act. As to part II of the act in respect of certain regulations covering these warehouses, nothing has ever been done with it, as all the inspections and so on are done by the provinces. The federal Department of Agriculture has never done anything in respect of that. It has always been done by the provincial governments. For that reason we are asking that part II dealing with these regulations be taken out and excluded from the act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Part II repealed.

Mr. Charlton: Will the parliamentary assistant assure us that there will be no change in part I of this bill and that there will be no change in grants to cold storages being built in Canada?

Mr. McCubbin: That is right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the parliamentary assistant say what grants have been made in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta under this act? I understand that one grant has been made in the city of Prince Albert. I should like to secure from the department information as to the amount and as to whether the amount in question will be a continuing one payable annually.

Mr. McCubbin: I have not that information before me; but when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture come up for consideration, and when we come to the cold storage grants, at that time we shall try to answer that question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the answer be given without the question being asked again?

Mr. McCubbin: Yes. I will see that that is done.

Mr. Bryce: There will still be the same grants as there were before for cold storage lockers in the country points?

Mr. McCubbin: That is right.

Mr. Bryce: That section is protected?

Mr. McCubbin: That section has been left in the act.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO BREAKING AND ENTERING, FORGERY, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, May 29, consideration in committee of Bill No. 82, to amend the Criminal Code—Mr. Garson—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 9—May remand for observation.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Lanark and I spent considerable time in conference this afternoon on an amendment to replace the one which he has already moved, one which would meet the point that he has raised and at the same time be workable in the opinion of the law officers of our department. I think my hon. friend has the amendment, which is quite agreeable to the department.

Mr. Blair: I withdraw the amendment that I moved last night and substitute therefor this one.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the committee to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blair: I move that paragraph (f) be amended to read as follows:

(f) Where in his opinion, supported by the evidence of at least one duly qualified medical practitioner, there is reason to believe that the accused person is mentally ill, order that the accused be remanded in such custody as he directs for observation for a period not exceeding 30 days.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 24—Coming into force.

Mr. Garson: I will ask my colleague to move that clause 24 of the act be amended by striking out the word "May" therein and substituting the word "July".

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTROL OF ELEVATORS AND RAILWAYS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Thursday, April 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, inter alia, to extend the provisions of "Part II—Control of Elevators and Railways" to August 1, 1953; to extend the definition of "pool period" to include each crop year subsequent to July 31, 1950, and prior to August 31, 1953; to vary the payments by the board to producers selling and delivering wheat produced in a designated area; to extend the provisions of "Part IV—Regulation of Interprovincial and Export Trade in Wheat," to August 1, 1953; and to substitute a schedule of mills and warehouses declared works for the general advantage of Canada for the present schedule to the act.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, it seems a long while since I moved the adjournment of this debate on April 20, after the statement on the introduction of this resolution had been made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Since that time he has been abroad. Today he gave the house a very general statement regarding the outcome of the negotiations that he and the deputy minister had been engaged in in London over a period of several days. It is impossible to discuss in any detail the statement that was made today by the minister, for he himself said that, apart from giving the general outline, the particulars would not be given or furnished to the house at this time.

Even on the basis of the general outline that he has given, the wheat farmers of western Canada will be greatly disappointed at the failure to realize the promises so easily made from 1945 to 1949 of the benefits that would result from their accepting losses running into at least $600 million over a period of years. In return for acceptance of lower prices then they were promised security. There will be disappointment at the nature of the arrangements that have been arrived at between the minister, on behalf of the people of Canada, and the government of the United Kingdom.

It is a far cry from the sure hopes that were expressed over and over again by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) as to the benefits that were to accrue to the Canadian farmer in return for the sacrifices that were made at his expense in selling his wheat under the British agreement at a price of from 75 cents to $1.10 per bushel less than the world market.

We on this side of the house—and this applies to His Majesty's loyal opposition alone—warned what the results would be. I remember well on a number of occasions the then leader of the opposition, Mr. John Bracken, reiterated his view that the course being followed would not give to the Canadian wheat farmer an assured wheat market in the United Kingdom after the termination of the agreement. He was ridiculed for that stand.

He and this party supported the British agreement in so far as selling wheat to Britain was concerned at a price below the world market; but contended that the loss thereby suffered should not be saddled on the back of the wheat farmer, but should be assumed by the people of Canada as a whole. The answer always was in effect "Wait and you shall see. After 1950 there will be an assured wheat market in the United Kingdom." The message brought back today by the Minister of Trade and Commerce is a far cry from the optimistic statements made between 1945 and 1949. Instead of an assured market the minister brings a hope. In place of security he expresses the hope that there will be a market for 110 million bushels or more. That is far from the promises that were made between 1945 and 1949 when the western wheat farmer accepted the low prices that were given him in the agreement in return for the promises made by the ministers of this government that he would be assured of markets after the termination of the agreement.

I shall say no more at this time until the minister elucidates and explains the terms of the negotiations that have taken place. Suffice it to say that after listening to him today disappointment will indeed be expressed, and properly so, by the wheat farmers of this country having regard to the losses they have sustained during the period from 1945 to 1949. All they have in return is whatever is provided for under the international wheat agreement.

Apparently there is no compulsory requirement that Britain shall buy any quantity. The only provision is that a large portion of her requirements will be bought in Canada at a price between $1.55 and $1.90, as the minister said today.

Mr. Howe: I said $1.54 and $1.98.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Having said that, and awaiting further explanations as to the negotiations, I am going to refer to the resolution.

The criticisms that I receive from farmers in connection with this resolution and the wheat board policy are as follows: First this resolution, providing for the extension of the pool period to include each crop year subsequent to July 31, 1950, and prior to August 31, 1953, is a continuation almost from year to year of the short term policies that have characterized this government in connection with this matter.

What the farmer objects to is the piecemeal policy. He was promised security not for a year or two but for a considerable period after the expiration of the 1950 period in the British agreements.

The farmer expects a guaranteed market. That is what he was promised. He now feels —and he will feel this more strongly when he reads the announcement that the minister has made—that the sacrifices he endured under the British agreement have indeed been in vain, and that now he has no real guarantee of security. He has the international agreement which is full of the loopholes which were inserted in order to arrive at agreement.

The farmer is asking for a long term policy for wheat marketing, not the piecemeal policy that is being followed now, which is immeasurably deficient when compared with the promises that were made during the period from 1945 to 1949.

Secondly, farmers cannot understand—and this applies particularly in the drought areas of the prairie provinces—why there was a denial on the part of the government and of the wheat board of an interim wheat payment this year. It could have been made applicable to those areas in the prairie provinces subject to drought. There was nothing to prevent it, including the bookkeeping difficulties alleged as an excuse by the government. The farmers are commencing to wonder whether the reason there was no interim payment is that there is little or nothing to the credit of the farmers available for final distribution, much less available for interim payment.

Thirdly, the farmers believe they have the right to expect that the business of the wheat board shall be submitted to the committee on agriculture. We have not had such a submission to that committee for two and a half years. Why? This is one board, one crown corporation, or emanation of the crown, that is not subject to examination by the Auditor General.

Surely the report should be placed before the committee on agriculture to the end that questions may be asked, and accounts in connection with its mammoth transactions be subjected to examination and cross-examination. When we endeavour to get information in parliament, as the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) said today, we have difficulty in getting answers. If we try to get information respecting the wheat board and its transactions we are invariably met by a curtain that denies any information sought and the house is denied the opportunity of examining wheat board accounts in the committee on agriculture.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I stated early in the session that if the committee on agriculture wished to examine the wheat board accounts I would give that committee every facility to do so. I would point out that the committee on agriculture has been set up, as have other committees, but I have had no request from the committee indicating that it wished to examine the accounts.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I happen to be the member who asked on March 6 that the minister refer the 1948-49 wheat board report to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization for consideration. I have asked hon. members of the committee about it, and I am informed that it met for the first time today to consider another matter. We have not to this date been able to get any reference so that the report could be studied by that committee.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend is a member of the committee. He could have notified the clerk of the house last March that he wished to have the committee called together, just as well as to have done it today. Each member of the committee has equal responsibility. The ministry does not operate committees of the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not referring to the committee on agriculture, but some committees become too often a merry-go-round. The minister says that if the committee wants to get information, and wants the report submitted, he will submit it. Just try to get some of these committees, overpoweringly manned by supporters of the government, to do these things!

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Howe: Did the hon. member ever ask the committee on agriculture to examine the accounts of the wheat board?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the committee is set up for a purpose. The agenda is to examine the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The hon. member for Souris has already stated that these wheat board transactions should be submitted. Surely we do not have to continue to repeat the request for submission. The hon. member for Souris has asked for it. It was asked for last year, during the session of 1949, and was denied. It was denied by inattention, which is just as effective as deliberate refusal.

I am asking now that the wheat board report be submitted to the committee on agriculture to the end that examination may take place. I could say something further on that point. On one occasion when the wheat board report was submitted to the committee on agriculture, some years ago—

Mr. Ross (Souris): It was 1942.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Eight years ago. On every occasion we in the opposition endeavoured to get information the chairman of the wheat board was invariably supported by government members on the committee, with the result that our requests for information were voted down. But even in the face of that experience, we are asking that this wheat board report be sent to the committee on agriculture, to the end that examination may take place. The accounts are not examined by the Auditor General. Surely they should be subject to examination, however cursory that examination may be, by a committee of parliament.

Mr. Howe: May I ask this question, for information: How does one send a report to a committee except by laying it on the table of the house?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Speaker, the minister has earned for himself the reputation of a man who gets things done. If he wanted that report submitted to the committee on agriculture, I know it could be submitted very quickly.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The previous minister used to do it without difficulty.

Mr. Howe: Well, I do not know how to submit the wheat board report to the committee, then. The hon. member is the Stanley Knowles of your party. Probably he can tell me the rule in this particular instance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All that is necessary is for the minister to say that he wishes to have it submitted.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Certainly.

Mr. Howe: By laying it on the table of the house I indicate that it is available to any committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He was asked by the hon. member for Souris this year to submit it to the committee, and was asked by him and by other hon. members last year. And I now repeat the request, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce has not heard it previously, that the report be submitted, so that examination may be made of the accounts.

We cannot get the information in parliament. No department is more difficult to penetrate for information than is the Department of Trade and Commerce. I asked this question on May 22:

1. How many bushels of (a) feed oats; (b) feed barley, were sold by the wheat board to feed merchants, dealers or brokerage houses in each of the months beginning in December, 1949 and to date?

What was the purpose of that question? Surely the farmers in this country have a right to the information there sought, because in the main they are the producers. The farmers in western Canada are asking what has happened to the barley and oats they produced. Is it a fact that the wheat board has sold a large portion of it to brokerage firms in the United States? They would like to have answers to it and other questions.

The farmers in eastern Canada who feed cattle and hogs want to know why the prices of barley and oats are so high. They want to know what has happened to feed supplies. They want to know whether or not the wheat board has made any provision for the sale of feed oats and barley to eastern farmers engaged in livestock production.

The next question is:

2. What was the average price received for each of said grains in each of said months?

Eighty per cent of our coarse grain production is fed or disposed of in Canada. What possible harm could there be in furnishing that information? When the people of Canada ask for information, when the farmers in western Canada and in Ontario ask for information, the answer given by the government is:

It is not the policy of the Canadian wheat board to divulge its sales position within the crop year in which it is operating.

I am not going to deny that position as far as wheat on the international market is concerned, but that argument does not apply to sales of barley and oats within Canada, commodities that are so necessary to the eastern farmer and eastern livestock producer for feeding purposes. The Minister of Finance has said in effect: "Ask and the information will be given." Yet when a simple question such as that is asked, the farmers, the producers of livestock and the producers of barley and oats witness a brush-off of parliament, a denial by the wheat board of information to which parliament is entitled.

If the wheat board report is submitted to the committee an opportunity will be given to ask these questions and receive the information denied to parliament. I ask what recourse the opposition has against an all-powerful government supported by an all-powerful majority when information is denied regardless of whether or not it is justifiable. Up until recent years information could be denied by a minister of the crown only on the ground that it was not in the public interest, but that has been extended. Three members of the wheat board are able to say to parliament in effect "We just do not choose to answer; that is not a course that we are going to follow, the giving of information within the crop year in which we are operating".

This is the first year in which the wheat board has the exclusive marketing control of barley and oats and there have been difficulties. The western farmer is asking whether the wheat board has disposed of his oats and barley elsewhere than in Canada. He wants to know what prices have been received and whether or not the wheat board in effect is discharging its responsibility of getting the best price for oats and barley rather than doing what it did under the British agreements—secure a political price determined by the government rather than by world demand.

The members of the Progressive Conservative party believe that the farmers should have some say in the marketing of their own products. We have fought for the principle that the producers should have some control over the marketing of their wheat, oats and barley. We believe in the necessity—we think the events of the last few years support us in this regard—of an advisory board made up of a majority of farmers being set up to advise the wheat board to the end that the best possible prices may be received and so the farm producer will have some say as to the disposal of his wheat, oats and barley. The board should be a producers' wheat board operating for the benefit of the farmers in accordance with business principles.

For the past five years wheat farmers have been deluded by the promise that for the sacrifice of several hundred millions of dollars in prices that could have been secured for their wheat they were to have security of market after the termination of the British agreement in 1950. The statement made by the minister today is an effective answer to any who were minded to suffer from such a delusion.

The minister's statement occupies but two pages of Hansard. It states that discussions have been carried on in London and that both governments have now reviewed the results of those talks and are agreed that the international wheat agreement removes the need for a contract to replace the existing Anglo-Canadian wheat agreement. That was not the view one year ago. That was not the view six months ago. That was not the view expressed during the campaign just prior to the last election.

Finally the minister said, in summary, that the United Kingdom has made it clear that out of its total wheat import requirements in 1950-51, it expects to buy a large proportion in Canada which, quite apart from the special contractual arrangements for the past four years, is, and it is hoped will remain, the traditional source of supply for the United Kingdom. The minister's speech was an expression of hope, when instead he should have given parliament evidence of the security that was promised during the period of the British agreements.

With these few observations I will conclude. I believe the announcement made by the minister will be received with deep disappointment by wheat farmers, for it fails to carry out the promises made so clearly over five long years that the farmers of western Canada would achieve security after the termination of the agreements in return for the sale of their wheat at prices below world prices. What many farmers are thinking is indicated by a resolution recently sent to me by the Quinton wheat pool committee which reads as follows:

> That we the Quinton wheat pool committee feel that our M.P. should back up the resolution of the federation of agriculture, that the farmer be reimbursed through the wheat board for the subsidizing of wheat used for home consumption during part of the five-year pool.

That indicates that by reason of the failure of this government and the wheat board to provide the security that was promised, farmers throughout the west are beginning to ask that they be reimbursed for the losses they have suffered in subsidizing wheat used for home consumption.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 238, for the relief of Katherine Madge Samworth Monty.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 239, for the relief of Clara Rosen Freedman.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 240, for the relief of Frances Berman Mellor, otherwise known as Sharie Sinclaire.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 241, for the relief of Rodolphe Durand.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 242, for the relief of Helen Leck Karaszi.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 243, for the relief of Sadie Chernin Petruska, otherwise known as Sadie Chernin Prince.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 244, for the relief of Audrey Phyllis Angela Blom Rochfort.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 245, for the relief of Patricia Ruth Segall Wener.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 246, for the relief of Sophie Piatkowski Demyk.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 247, for the relief of Hilda Brooks Nangreaves.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 248, for the relief of Zemelia Katrina Ayoub MacDonald.—Mr. Winkler.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Carried on division.

Motion agreed to on division and bills read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: These bills are referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

The house resumed, from Friday, April 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Mitchell: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order; I should like to ascertain who adjourned the debate.

Mr. Mitchell: I was the last speaker, but I did not adjourn it.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I will take only a few minutes to do that, for I am glad that the house is prepared to vote on this measure. As I indicated in moving the second reading of the bill, its purpose is very clear and direct. It asks for the voluntary revocable check-off of trade union dues. It proposes that the check-off shall be brought into effect only when asked for by a union certified under this act; and even then it is to apply only in the case of those employees who request in writing that the check-off for their dues be made from their wages. It is also clear from the provisions of the act that if any of those employees later request that the check-off cease, it shall cease forthwith.

As I indicated in introducing this measure, it is a move for which there is recorded support on the part of all political parties in this house. All parties indicated during the course of the last election campaign that they favoured various measures of union security. This, as I have pointed out, is the minimum measure of union security; that is, the voluntary revocable check-off of union dues. I also indicated the last time I spoke on this measure that the wording of the bill now before the house, as far as this new section which would be written into the bill is concerned, is precisely the same as the wording that was put in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act when that measure was reported back to this house by the industrial relations committee in 1948. On that occasion the bill, after second reading, was referred to the industrial relations committee without this clause in it; but during the deliberations of that committee this clause was written in on the motion of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). As I have already pointed out, the wording proposed in the first instance by the hon. member was later revised at the suggestion of the legal adviser of the Department of Labour. I am not thereby suggesting that the legal adviser necessarily supported the principle of the proposal; but at least, that principle having been endorsed by the committee, it was then put in a form acceptable to the legal adviser.

The bill that came back to the house in 1948, therefore, contained—word for word—this very clause which my bill seeks to write into the labour code. Here on the floor of the house during discussion of the bill clause by clause, on the motion of the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Little), that clause was dropped out of the labour code. I feel the time has now come when it should be put back in, and I think it well that the house should have had this chance to consider the matter over two or three of these private members' hours. When the vote is called I hope members of all parties will stand by the position they have taken, particularly during election campaigns, by endorsing this minimum measure of union security.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Just before the hon. member resumes his seat I should like to know if he really feels that the employees are anxious to have this amendment. I am not going to make a speech; but do one hundred per cent of the men themselves want this voluntary revocable check-off? Do they not want a little more freedom of action for themselves?

Mr. Knowles: I do not suppose there is anything coming within the field of human choice that has the support of one hundred per cent of the people concerned, but—

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Then any reasonable percentage?

Mr. Knowles: —I was asked if it is my judgment that trade union workers generally want this measure, and my judgment is that they do. Many of them want more than this measure of union security, but they do want this minimum measure.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): One more question; do the union workers want it or the union leaders?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I think the distinction the member for Danforth seeks to make is not well taken. The views of trade union organizations are built up from the views of the local unions that are affiliated to the various trade union councils. These resolutions come up in the democratic way, so that when a body like the Canadian Congress of Labour writes a proposed code, and asks parliament to put this measure into the labour code, I am satisfied it is an expression of the wishes of the majority of the trade union members themselves.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say "yea".

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will say "nay".

Industrial Relations

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Knowles) which was negatived on the following division:

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF ACT OF 1947-48— REINSTATEMENT AND COMPENSATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Noseworthy for the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (reinstatement and compensation).

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): If I remember rightly, I adjourned the debate. I will be only two minutes. I just want to correct an impression left by my hon. friend in connection with the application of the labour legislation in Ontario.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I realize the minister is not seeking to be out of order, but it just so happens he did not adjourn the debate on this motion. He spoke earlier, followed by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and then by the hon. member for Verdun-La Salle (Mr. Cote).

Mr. Mitchell: I thought I adjourned to debate.

Mr. Gillis: You adjourned it on my bill.

Mr. Mitchell: So much the better. I am opposed to the bill anyway.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister the approval of the house to say a few words?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles: No.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): The minister is speaking on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister desires to speak on a question of privilege it will have to be one involving the privileges of all members of the house. I must point out that he cannot speak twice in this debate. According to the record he spoke the other evening, and I must see that the rules of the house are carried out with respect to all members.

Mr. Mitchell: I just want to say that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) should be the last man in Canada to try to prevent a person from speaking on a question like this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mitchell: On a question of privilege, I just wish to deal with the question raised by my good friend, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy).

Mr. Cruickshank: Hamilton West.

Mr. Mitchell: Don't try to be funny. You are too funny all the time. If you tried to be a good Liberal once in a while it would not be so bad.

Mr. Cruickshank: You can't even be funny.

Mr. Mitchell: I think the house would like to have this information. The hon. member for York South spoke of a case, I think in Kitchener, in which a prosecution took place. He thought it was under the Labour Relations Act of Ontario. It turned out to be under P.C. 1003, which was an order in council governing labour relations during the war. Some criticism was offered of the magistrate in that case. In fairness to the magistrate, in fairness to my hon. friend and in fairness to the people who drafted the legislation, it should be pointed out that the magistrate carried out his duty under the order in council to the full. Under the labour relations legislation of the province of Ontario and of the Dominion of Canada of course that mistake could not be made. We found out the weakness and corrected it by legislation.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for York South speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): If that is so, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word or two on this legislation. I am not in favour of the bill, and I put it on rather broad grounds. This house has already defeated similar measures on the same grounds that I now bring before the house. I refer to the whole scheme of the act respecting industrial relations, on which some of us at the last session and the one before spent a great deal of time. I think the committee are to be congratulated on bringing out a piece of legislation which received almost the unanimous support of the house. I agree with the argument, which has been used in connection with other measures, that a bill passed with general approbation should be allowed some time to operate without, from year to year, submitting amendments to bring about some result which, in size, is very limited when compared with those broad things accomplished by the bill itself.

The principle behind this measure is one involving judgment in a dispute. It involves the enforcing of judgments by bodies other than those courts which, in the experience of all of us, in times past, have been the custodian of that authority. The bill is brief, and gives to the board the right to fix compensation for persons who have been discharged contrary to the provisions of the act.

My main point is that if someone has done something to someone else and, in doing so, has acted contrary to law, then our courts have always been open and, indeed, are now open, to give that person redress against the wrongdoer. He who is in breach of the law is always the wrongdoer. Without commenting at all on hurry-up methods of dealing with legal matters I content myself with saying just this, that past experience has shown us that when we seek shortcuts we usually get ourselves into more difficulties than we would have had if we had followed the normal, orderly and ordinary procedure.

It may be that the sponsors and advocates of this measure have in mind the case of a discharged person who has felt he was not treated fairly. All of us at times have felt that way. But after all in this country there are courts who are charged with, accept and discharge the responsibility of deciding whether we as individuals have in fact been treated fairly.

This bill seeks to give a board the right to say that so-and-so was treated unfairly, and that therefore compensation as provided by the board should be paid to the aggrieved person. My point is that if a person, to use the language of the bill, has been discharged contrary to the provisions of the act, such person has suffered—and I hesitate to use legal language—a tort, or a wrongdoing. Who is there to suggest that our courts are not competent to take care of any proper claim that a tort has been done against an individual?

In short the bill states that—

The board shall have power to make an order requiring an employer to reinstate any employee discharged contrary to the provisions of this act and to pay such employee the monetary loss suffered by reason of such discharge.

I do not complain very much about the language. But when I see people bringing into this House of Commons bills which are one-sided, then I am opposed to them. If the hon. member had said that in the event of an employee doing something by way of injury to his employer such employer should seek equal rights before the board as against the employee, then perhaps I could see at least some fairness and some moral soundness in the idea behind the advancement of this bill. But this business of special legislation and special pleading for the friends of any group in the house must come to naught, unless they are broad enough to be fair to all parties concerned.

I fall back to my original statement, and that is to say that I am aware of criticisms of our courts; I know they are not perfect. I also know that no man-made thing has ever been perfect, and that perhaps such will never be perfect. But I do say this, with some knowledge of my subject, that in so far as we in the House of Commons believe in the administration of justice—and that is what this is—by our courts, we accept it as the best system yet found by any civilized people since the world began.

So I say the minute we start whittling and chiselling at the jurisdiction of our courts, to effect some special thing we have in mind—a single-track mind, if you like—at that minute we begin cutting down the jurisdiction of our courts, and immediately find ourselves in trouble.

It may be that the hon. member has something in mind. Perhaps I should modify that statement, because I know he has a great deal in his mind. My meaning was that it may be that he thinks there are some evils that are so general they should be dealt with by legislation in parliament. If that were true I would have a great deal of sympathy, and certainly have an open mind as to how I might vote in respect of a proposal of that kind. But I would need to be convinced that our courts had failed in their bounden duty, that the scales of justice had not been held evenly—which I do not for one moment believe. I would need to be convinced that there was some broad and general difficulty which would prompt parliament to enter into a field of legislation which would take care of some narrow business and which procedure in the end might not result in any good but rather in evil toward the whole structure.

I am opposed to the bill. I go a step further, and in making this statement I know I am not going to popularize myself with the voters. I wonder if we appreciate that labour today owes its very high position to legislation passed by parliaments and legislatures. I wonder how much the sponsor of this bill appreciates the simple fact that the growth of union organizations since the last war has been tremendous—and, so far as I am concerned, rightly so. I wonder if we all appreciate the tremendous gains which have been made. Why have they been made? They have been made because parliaments, congresses, legislatures, United Kingdom parliaments and so on have said two things: first, that no labour organization may be held liable in a charge of conspiracy. That is the thing upon which it is all founded. We have also said that the treasury—I will admit that there has been an alteration in the United States under the recent legislation—of a labour organization shall be free and exempt from civil action against the organization. I agree with both those things. I think they are the foundation upon which this tremendous growth has been built. But I say to all of these people: Do not work a willing horse to death.

They have made great progress. I have acted for them and I know something about them. I am not one of those who, every time the name of John Lewis is mentioned, use an expression which is quite unparliamentary. I am not blind to the tremendous service which that man has rendered labour on the North American continent. I remember the situation in the coal mines in many places in the United States and even in Canada where there were company houses and company stores and everybody owed the employer money at the end of the month.

Do not let us get personal about this thing and condemn somebody because he has committed excesses. Labour has committed excesses, but so has capital, and lots of them. I think the great thing that has been achieved by thinking people in the Dominion of Canada is that no longer shall industry regard labour as simply an intake product in the factory. A great gain has been made in that connection. With the assistance of the minister and other like-minded people the growth of labour has been tremendous. All we need to do is look at the settlement of that great automobile strike the other day. That would have been utterly impossible a few weeks ago. I am not going to talk out this motion, but I cannot say that I am going to vote against it because my pair is not here. But at least I am making my sentiments known.

I am going to give some advice to my hon. friends who sit to my left. I cannot charge them for it and they would not pay me if I did. Why not leave well enough alone? Why not flex your muscles and appreciate the wonderful growth you have had? But do not try to rush the growler too hard.

Mr. Gillis: We have listened to that kind of argument in respect to every piece of legislation protecting labour that is on the statute books today.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am going to say something to my hon. friend that he did not think I would say. Both in this House of Commons and elsewhere I have said that the strike is labour's weapon. There is no doubt about that. But no strike has succeeded unless it has had public support. You people who are anxious to kill the goose that laid the golden eggs will find that the public will rise in revolt against you.

I am proud of your accomplishments, but I am just saying to every hon. member who has some labour votes in his areas—I have them —do not come along and say, "I am going to move an amendment to clause A, B, C, D, of sections 1 to 290," or whatever it is. That is not the way to grow. That is not the way to bring peace. I am proud of the minister. He has made the same speech for the six years I have been here, but I like it. He believes in conciliation.

Look at the Chrysler show across the line. Look at what Walter Reuther went through. They tried to blow his chest off but it was lucky he stooped and got it in the arm. I am proud of our Canadian labour organizations who have thrown out of their midst those people who would destroy, not only labour but us as well. I am sorry to be so impassioned about this, but I rather believe what I have been saying.

Mr. Hosking: I was paired with the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. Speaker: The hour reserved for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTROL OF ELEVATORS AND RAILWAYS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe that the house go into committee on the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, inter alia, to extend the provisions of "Part II—Control of Elevators and Railways" to August 1, 1953; to extend the definition of "pool period" to include each crop year subsequent to July 31, 1950, and prior to August 31, 1953; to vary the payments by the board to producers selling and delivering wheat produced in a designated area; to extend the provisions of "Part IV—Regulation of Interprovincial and Export Trade in Wheat," to August 1, 1953; and to substitute a schedule of mills and warehouses declared works for the general advantage of Canada for the present schedule to the act.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house is to extend the powers of the wheat board to July 31, 1953. We in this group support the extension of the wheat board act to cover the remaining period of the international wheat agreement. The resolution would make August 1, 1950, the beginning of a one year pool period. I believe that will meet the general wishes of the wheat producers, in that they are anxious to get the final returns from the sale of any single year's crop as early as possible. It also gives the board the power to vary payments to the producers selling and delivering wheat produced in a designated area. That provision, as I understand it, would allow for the changing of the floor price from time to time, and also provide for the paying out of whatever moneys are earned, and the paying out of the final price for any given year.

I do not think, however, wheat producers will welcome the fact that the floor price is being established for only one year at a time, The wheat producers would like to have a floor price below which the price of wheat could not go, and that floor price guaranteed for a further period of years. I listened with considerable interest to the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) this afternoon. It is my opinion the announcement he made represents a further serious blow to the wheat producers of western Canada. It comes on top of a number of serious blows that have been levelled against wheat producers this year. The first blow came when the wheat board report was made public for the year ending July 31, 1949. The wheat producers looked over that report, and came to the conclusion there could not be a further 20 cent payment this spring as they had been promised. They were told that any payment that was made by the wheat board would be made out of surplus funds available. Instead they found that on July 31, 1949, the wheat board had a deficit of more than $5 million. The first blow to the western farmer, therefore, was when he became aware that there was not a large surplus available for him in the wheat board fund.

The second blow came when the minister announced, just before the Easter recess, that the initial price for wheat for the coming year would be lowered by 35 cents a bushel. There is no question that a lowered price for wheat at this time, when farmers' costs of production are continuing to rise, will represent a serious deterioration in the standard of living of wheat producers. At the same time our wheat producers have not the opportunity, as they had two or three years ago, of diversifying production into other profitable lines. The poultry industry is not profitable today. The floor price for butter has been dropped a further 5 cents a pound. There is no adequate market for Canadian bacon, and the bacon floor price is most unsatisfactory. The farmer has not the opportunity now of diversifying to other forms of agricultural production, but will have to produce more wheat and grain than he otherwise would had he a chance to engage in other lines of agricultural production at a greater return.

With this announcement an additional blow was struck when the minister stated that the floor price would be guaranteed for the coming crop year only. After that, some other floor price would be set. While our markets for wheat are not, in my opinion, assured, and while the price is to be dropped 35 cents a bushel, there is no guarantee that the farmer will be able to sell all the wheat he produces. The only guarantee given is that the wheat board will accept 14 bushels per authorized acre, so if there is difficulty in the marketing of wheat during the coming year, or if there is a large crop of wheat in western Canada, the farmer is guaranteed a market for only 14 bushels per authorized acre. I believe that the bill which will be introduced following the adoption of this resolution, for which I shall vote, should be referred to the agricultural committee. I think it should be carefully considered by that committee, and at that time I would hope that hon. members would ask that the Canadian wheat board officials appear before the committee so that we could go over the previous annual reports of that board.

This afternoon the minister stated that, "in the light of all our discussions, it is reasonable to assume that in 1950-51 the United Kingdom will purchase from Canada between 100 and 120 million bushels of wheat." This certainly represents a serious drop in the British market from the present quantity of 140 million bushels. It is a serious drop indeed from the 600 million bushels of wheat which Britain has taken over the last four-year period. The minister also stated that it was understood "such wheat would be offered upon international wheat agreement terms, as to quality and position, not less favourable than those obtained by any other buyer in the dollar area, whether it be in the United States or Canada." That would seem to mean that if the wheat board sells wheat to any country within the international wheat agreement in any one day, Canada undertakes to sell wheat to Britain on that day at a price not greater than the price charged to the other country. It would seem to me that, unless some other arrangements are made with respect to the coming crop, nothing will accrue to the wheat producers because of the "have regard to" clause of the United Kingdom wheat agreement. With the wheat producer having a market in Britain this year, according to the minister's assumption, of between 100 million and 120 million bushels of wheat, and with war ravaged countries all over the world getting back into agricultural production, we certainly may have a serious marketing problem on our hands. I believe that Canada could have maintained the preferred position in the United Kingdom market that we have built up over the last four years. Instead of that, however, our United Kingdom market for wheat and other exports is falling drastically.

I have in my hand the latest copy of Foreign Trade put out by the Department of Trade and Commerce. It shows that our exports to the United Kingdom in April of 1949 amounted to $63 million; but our exports for April of this year have dropped to just over $25 million. The report shows that within the first four months of 1949 we were able to export to Britain $202 million worth of goods and that in the same four-months period this year only $134 million worth. We are therefore losing the British market for many farm products. I think that could have been avoided.

In the same issue of Foreign Trade it is stated that Great Britain last year either renewed or signed twenty-four trade agreements with twenty-four different countries, providing for the bilateral exchange of British exports for the exports of those other countries. I am not going to list them all, but I might mention the first one that is listed in this article. It is a trade agreement with the Argentine signed on June 27, 1949, and it covers £129 million sterling of imports from the Argentine. On looking up that trade agreement in Keesing's, I find that Great Britain in the present year agrees to buy at least 300,000 long tons of meat and the Argentine agrees to supply that quantity and, if possible, 400,000 long tons. Great Britain is not going without agricultural products. Great Britain has signed bilateral agreements with countries all over the world for the exchange of British goods for goods that Britain needs to consume. I believe Canada could have retained in Britain a market for wheat as large as the market we have had in the last four years if our government had been prepared, as I think they should have been, to sign bilateral agreements which would cover not only the export of Canadian wheat to Great Britain but also the importation into Canada of British manufactured goods.

I believe we have some security in the international wheat agreement; but as I have studied that agreement and the results that have been obtained so far this year under that agreement, I am convinced that we need a large wheat market outside of the agreement if we are going to sell all the wheat that Canadian farmers are likely to produce. For example, I have a return here which shows the quantity of wheat purchased by importing countries from August 1, 1949, up to April 28, 1950. It shows that while most of the importing countries have taken, what I consider, a reasonable quantity within the first nine months of this year, nevertheless there are some large importing nations that have taken little wheat, and some of them have taken no wheat at all. For example, Bolivia agreed to take a little more than 2,750,000 bushels; according to this return, for the first nine months of the year she has taken less than one million bushels. Brazil agreed to take 13,250,000 bushels and up until April 28 had taken only 1,839 bushels. I see that Italy, which is one of the large importing nations according to the agreement, has taken only a small part of the quota that she was given. She has a quota of just over 40 million bushels, and in the first nine months of the year she imported just under 7,500,000 bushels; so she has taken only some 20 per cent of the 40 million bushels she agreed to take. Peru agreed to take 7,348,000 bushels, and up until this date had taken some 3,300,000 bushels. Saudi Arabia had agreed to take 1,837,000 bushels and had taken less than one-third of that quantity in this period, namely 568,000 bushels. China, for reasons which I presume are well known to all of us, according to this return did not take any of the 7,348,000 bushels of her quota. I therefore think it is clear that while, generally, the importing countries are abiding by the international wheat agreement, there are quite a number of importing countries that have bought little or none of their yearly quota to date. And even if every importing country under the international wheat agreement buys every bushel it agrees to buy, Canada will still have a considerable quantity of wheat she needs to sell over and above that agreement. It would appear to me now that we cannot sell to every country in the international wheat agreement that quantity of wheat that the importing nation agrees to take from either Canada, Australia or the United States. Because of that situation, I feel that the announcement made by the minister that he is assuming that Great Britain will take only from 100 million to 120 million bushels of wheat next year is an announcement which means that the farmers may not have a guaranteed market for all the wheat they may produce this year. As I said a few moments ago, the initial price is going down 35 cents a bushel. There is no guarantee that the farmer will be able to sell all the wheat that he produces even at that price. At the same time farmers' costs are rising and are continuing to rise. Just the other day we had a further increase in freight rates. Without question, that will add to the costs of machinery and repairs, gasoline, lumber and almost everything that goes into farmers' costs of production.

In the period from 1935 to 1939 we had a wheat board, and that board set certain initial prices. For the first three years, that is, 1935, 1936 and 1937, the initial price was 87½ cents a bushel. In 1938 the initial price was lowered to 80 cents a bushel. In 1939, still under a Liberal administration, the price was again lowered to 70 cents a bushel. Within that five-year period the average initial price offered by the wheat board was 82½ cents a bushel. If you take freight and handling charges, you have an initial price to the farmer in that period of something over 60 cents a bushel. With the present initial price of $1.40 a bushel, and taking off freight and handling charges, you have an initial price to the producer of approximately $1.20 a bushel. In other words, the initial price in 1950 will be twice as much as the initial price before the war. But the farmers' costs of production today are twice as much as they were before the war. As my hon. friend here reminds me, before the war wheat was at depression levels. I am afraid, however, that the farmers' costs of production at that time were not at depression levels.

[Mr. Argue.]

I have here an index, published by the dominion bureau of statistics, which sets forth the index for eleven important commodities going into the farmers' costs of production. That index is based on 1935-39 equals 100. The eleven commodities include farm implements, building material, gasoline, oil, grease, feed, fertilizer, binder twine, seed, hardware, tax rates, interest rates and farm wages; in other words, almost all of the important costs of production that the farmer must meet. In January of this year that index was 196·3, or almost twice as much as it was in 1935-39. And so you have the initial price for wheat for the coming year roughly twice that of the initial price in the immediate pre-war period. You have the farmer's costs of production twice as high, so that the farmer, in my opinion, is going back to the pre-war depression subsistence level. Therefore I say without question that within the last few months and the last few weeks and again today the farmers of western Canada have had levelled against them a number of serious blows resulting from the changes in the government's wheat policy.

There are to be no further large initial payments this spring. There is to be a drop of 35 cents a bushel in the initial price on August 1 of this year. There is to be a floor price for only one year at a time. No longer will there be long-term stability. Then there was the announcement by the minister this afternoon that we are going to take a reduction, according to his estimation, of not less than 20 million bushels in the quantity of wheat that we will ship to the United Kingdom this year, and if his lower figure proves the correct one it will be a reduction of 40 million bushels.

I say it is time the government reconsidered its policy, in the light of the sacrifices that our producers have made over the last number of years, when they accepted prices we all knew were below world prices, and were below the prices that could have been obtained from the domestic consumer if prices for agricultural products, as was done in everything else, had been allowed to find their own level.

Instead, the government said: We are going to give you a price stabilization policy; we say to you that we are not going to let you have the highest possible price, but when prices start to fall we are not going to ask you to take the lowest price. The farmer said: I agree that that is a good policy, and even if I make great sacrifices over a few years, I know that I shall have a chance to recoup my losses.

It has been estimated by various members how much the farmer has lost. I do not think anyone will ever know precisely but it runs into hundreds of millions of dollars. We know that the floor price under the international wheat agreement for the coming year is $1.54 in Canadian funds; yet we have the government setting an initial price 14 cents a bushel below the floor price in the international agreement, and that may well be all the farmer will get; I do not know.

Before Easter the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) explained why that might be all he would get. At the end of the 1950-51 crop year the wheat board would very likely have a considerable carry-over of wheat that would have to be marketed in the first months of the next year, being a year when the floor price under the international agreement fell another 10 cents a bushel. The government is therefore playing it safe. They are not risking anything in their present legislation. But the result of a drop of 35 cents a bushel in the initial price for wheat, a further loss of our international markets for wheat, along with the loss of a great many other markets for agricultural products, may spell such a substantial reduction in the standard of living in western Canada that it will affect all of the people from one coast of this country to the other.

I think we are getting in a vicious circle. The government adopts certain policies from time to time. We have no industries in western Canada. We have a policy adopted like this one that will mean a lowering of our economic standard. Then we have an exodus of people and we lose some of our seats in the House of Commons. Everyone who sits in this house knows that if any part of Canada wants to get a square deal it has to have an effective voice in parliament. When you lose population you lose seats; and when you lose seats you lose influence with the government of the day. Then when we do have some natural resources like oil in Alberta the first thing the government arranges is to take it out of that area to other parts of Canada and the United States.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the government should reconsider its wheat policy. If the present wheat policy is adopted, if nothing is done to arrest the losing of our agricultural markets, all the government will succeed in doing is to establish a depressed area on the prairies, the same kind of depressed area we had before the war. In my opinion, if that should result, it will certainly not be in the best interests of Canada, and the government should adopt a wheat policy so that such a condition will not obtain.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I am going to be quite brief in my remarks. There are a number of questions that I want to raise but I shall leave them until we get into the committee stage of the resolution.

We in this group support the resolution because we are of the opinion that it is in the interests of the people of Canada, and more especially in the interests of the grain growers of Canada, that the wheat board continue to operate as a hundred per cent marketing agency for all wheat grown in Canada. Moreover we believe that the permit book and quota system is the fairest way of handling deliveries of grain in western Canada. It always amuses me when I hear people commiserating with the farmers for being compelled to sell their wheat to the wheat board, instead of being allowed to choose what market they want, because I have always found that ninety-nine times out of a hundred these people are not farmers and are far more concerned about the welfare of the grain trade and the grain exchange than about the welfare of the farmers.

I always feel that if the day should come when we make the selling of wheat optional, and permit the decision whether it be sold to the wheat board or on the open market, we shall have signed the death warrant of the wheat board. Furthermore I am satisfied that an overwhelming majority of farmers in western Canada are solidly behind the wheat board today, and in my view the personnel of that board is to be highly commended for the efficient way it has handled the farmers' wheat in the past.

It is true that we hear many people criticize the wheat board on the ground that they lost money for the farmers by subsidizing the British consumer and the Canadian consumer during the time of the British wheat agreement. It is unquestionably true that the farmers did suffer heavy losses as a result of that action. But the mistake these people make is that they blame the wheat board for that situation, instead of the government. That action, of course, was forced upon the wheat board by the government. That is to say, the wheat board was forced to sell wheat to Great Britain below the current market price as a result of the government's having signed the British wheat agreement. They were forced to sell wheat to Canadian millers at less than current prices as a result of orders in council passed I believe under the War Measures Act.

We in this group take the very definite stand that the government should not use the wheat board as an instrument of government policy to limit domestic prices or to subsidize foreign countries. If it is government policy to subsidize Canadian consumers or the consumers in foreign countries by giving them cheap wheat, then let them buy the wheat from the wheat board at current prices, sell it at whatever price they see fit, and then absorb the loss resulting from such action.

That has been the stand taken by farm organizations. For instance, let me quote from a resolution passed by the western agricultural conference held at Saskatoon, January 20 to 22, 1949. It states:

> That the Canadian wheat board should be an agency operating in the interests of grain producers, with a duty at all times to sell grain for the best available price whether in export or domestic markets, and should not be used as an instrument of government policy to limit domestic prices.

It is well to remember that parliament was asked to support the British wheat agreement in part at least as a moral obligation. I recall only too well the discussion which took place at that time, when it was pointed out that Great Britain had made great sacrifices and that therefore we should be willing to help her out by allowing her to have wheat at a reasonable price. The House of Commons was glad to support the British wheat agreement on that basis, but many of us in the opposition of that day pointed out that if it was a moral obligation on the part of the Canadian people to allow Britain to have wheat at reduced prices, then it was the moral responsibility of the Canadian people to stand whatever loss resulted from allowing Britain to have wheat at those reduced prices.

The same thing of course applies in connection with selling wheat to millers at less than the price of No. II wheat. Not only did we let millers have wheat below the price of No. II class wheat but actually we allowed them to have it for less than the price we charged under the British wheat agreement in 1946 and 1947.

Before the bill passes the minister should indicate the government's policy in regard to compensating farmers for these losses resulting from government action. I am not asking the minister to say what the amount of the final payment of the five-year pool will be, but merely to give the assurance that some at least of the losses will be made up in that payment.

I recall that during the last session of the last parliament, in the concluding days, the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) what the government policy would be in regard to meeting these losses. Hansard for April 30, 1949, at page 2802 contains the following question by the hon. member:

> I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Is it the intention of the present government, if returned to office after the coming election, to reimburse the farmers of the prairie provinces for the losses which they have sustained under the wheat agreements?

The Prime Minister replied:

> I do not think it would be proper for any party to be making promises at this time as to what it will do. I am sure that whatever government is in office at that time will endeavour to reach a decision that will be fair both to the farmers and to the Canadian public generally.

Of course I know some people might say that does not mean very much. But after all when a statement of that kind is made by the Prime Minister I suggest it should mean a great deal. It should mean that the government intends to do the right thing or the fair thing by the farmers in meeting these losses. The wheat pools are suggesting that a 25-cent payment should be made. This of course would by no means cover the total losses, but on the other hand it would compensate for approximately half of the losses incurred during that time; and the balance of that loss could be made up by stabilizing the price of wheat in the future.

It is all very well for the minister to say that the farmers have had better returns in the past five years than in any former period. I would not dispute that for one moment. But at the same time farmers' costs have also been higher in those five years than during any other period; and today while the prices farmers are receiving for their produce are beginning to fall, their costs are still rising.

Let us not forget that in those years before the war farmers were taking very low prices for their produce and were told time and again that they could not expect to receive more than the world market price. So they hoped that when prices went up they would have a chance to recover some of their losses. Yet when the war came and prices went up to a high level the government set ceilings and farmers were not allowed to receive world market prices. It does seem only natural that if in peacetime farmers are told that they must be satisfied with world market prices, then in wartime when prices go up they should be allowed to receive the full benefit of those increased prices. But the ceiling was maintained in the name of stabilization and therefore the government have a definite obligation to stabilize prices in the future and thus fulfil their part of the bargain.

I find it hard to understand why the government considered it necessary to set the initial payment for the next crop year at $1.40 per bushel, 14 cents below the floor price under the international wheat agreement. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) prides himself upon being an optimist and he always tells us on this side that we are pessimistic, but it seems to me that he is taking a pessimistic view of the operations of the international wheat agreement when he finds it necessary to set a price 14 cents below the floor in that agreement. It does not look as though he has much confidence in the international wheat agreement. Although that agreement provides for a fluctuation from $1.54 to $1.98 the minister is not satisfied to keep the Canadian initial payment within those limits; he has placed it 14 cents below the floor established by the international wheat agreement.

If the government feared that by setting the initial payment at $1.54 per bushel some losses might be incurred, they should remember that over the past eight years or so the prices of farm products have been kept down in the name of stabilization. If any losses were suffered as a result of setting a price of $1.54 that would only be helping to stabilize prices as they promised to do during the years when the ceiling was maintained.

We in this group supported the international wheat agreement. If the international wheat agreement fails, in my opinion it will not be because the idea of long-term international wheat agreements is not sound; it will be because of the system of financing international trade that exists. Under the agreement, if a nation is unable to purchase its quota it can be released from its obligation. It will be our responsibility to see that we purchase enough goods from a nation to enable it to buy wheat from us. The international commodity clearing house would have provided a means by which we could have disposed of our surpluses. The government stated at that time that they were in a position to look after their own surpluses so the problem is definitely on the doorstep of the government. I certainly hope that they will not fail in the handling of our wheat problem and I repeat that if the international wheat agreement fails it will be largely because of certain international financial and trade policies that are being followed.

Fear is being expressed regarding possible surpluses of wheat in the future, but if you go through history you will find that we have never really had too much wheat. Wheat has accumulated in some years, but over a period of time those surpluses have all disappeared. It is largely a question of providing sufficient storage to carry the surpluses over from one year to another. When you look at the situation in the world today, when you consider the position of China, India and other countries, you can feel assured that there will be adequate markets for all the wheat we can raise, provided we make satisfactory trading agreements whereby nations can obtain our wheat.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief, but first I want to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and to say that following the announcement made this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) the wheat producers of western Canada will be very disappointed. We are now told that the loss under the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreements will be approximately $600 million. It does not need much figuring to realize that that is approximately $1 per bushel loss on the wheat delivered to the United Kingdom under those contracts. As has been pointed out, this party stands alone in having to a great degree opposed that contract, but I want to make it quite clear that we never opposed a contribution being made to Great Britain. On every opportunity we pointed out that if such a contribution were to be made the cost should be borne by all the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Fair: The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) was the first to suggest that, and I was the second.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I accept the statement of the hon. member; we are together on that and we are still of the same opinion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): I do not think it is in order to discuss the announcement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce at three o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I simply referred to that in passing and am not discussing it at all. I am discussing the resolution now before the house and pointing out the great loss our farmers will be taking. It works out to about $1 per bushel on the wheat delivered under the U.K.-Canada wheat contracts, or approximately 50 cents per bushel on all wheat delivered by the farm producers over those pool years. We contend that the treasury of this country should to a large degree make good those losses.

There was discussion this afternoon about the fact that the wheat board report for 1948-49 had not been referred to the standing committee on agriculture. Hansard speaks for itself and shows that I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce on March 6 if he would do that. Hon. members heard the discussion that took place this afternoon.

Mr. Howe: Suppose you read from Hansard and we will see what the minister said on that occasion.

Mr. Ross (Souris): If my memory serves me aright the minister said that, if it was asked for, he would have no objection and the department would facilitate it. I think those were his words.

Mr. Howe: I did not mention objection; I said that if the committee on agriculture cared to consider the wheat board reports we would give that committee every facility to do so.

Mr. Ross (Souris): If we want to be exact about this I think we should point out how we would go about getting this matter before the standing committee on agriculture. The minister has handled most departments of government at one time or another and has succeeded in getting business done, at times quite rapidly. I do not know how the wheat board report could be referred to the standing committee on agriculture without terms of reference being set out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I may be entirely wrong, but if I am the officials of the house can correct me. I do not think I will be found to be very far out in making that statement. The minister is not fooling anybody by making that sort of statement. It is entirely up to him to decide on the terms of reference to the committee, and those have not been set out as yet. At this stage I want to repeat the request that the report be referred to the standing committee on agriculture as well as the bill that will follow this resolution.

If we go over the statements made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who I am glad is in his seat, and other ministers, we will see that they have pointed out—I have not their statements before me but my memory is not that bad—that to bring in the reports from the pooling 1945 to date and then decide on future marketing policy would not cost this nation anything. At the end of that period we could decide what was best in the interests of the farmers. I know the ministers will feel downhearted after all that has happened and gone wrong. They took a long gamble. As a matter of fact I think they took a greater gamble in the marketing of our wheat than was ever taken by the Winnipeg grain exchange or anyone else, and things have not broken for them. Surely in the face of these statements they will be prepared to have the chief officials of the wheat board called before the committee on agriculture, where we will be entitled to question them with respect to the wheat board report for 1948-49 before dealing with the bill. Then the same committee will be able to go on and study the merits or demerits of the new legislation. Surely that is a logical request in view of the very great loss those farmers are going to suffer, unless the federal treasury is willing to reimburse them to the extent of about $600 million, which I doubt.

Mr. Gardiner: Just to get one thing clear, at one time the hon. member is speaking of the cost to the nation and at another time of the cost to the farmer. Which is it?

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is very simple; I am talking about the loss to the farmers. I thought I made the point rather clear that this is the loss the farmers ultimately would suffer unless it was made good at least to some extent by the federal treasury, and I said that to cover it completely in my opinion—and this is only an estimate, of course—would require $600 million. Is that clear?

Mr. Gardiner: No. My hon. friend said a moment ago that some time or other I had said something about the loss to the nation. The losses he has been talking about have been losses to the farmers, not to the nation.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The minister is agreeing with me that because the farmers might take the loss it would not cost the nation anything. Is that it?

Mr. Gardiner: No, I have not said that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): If we cannot agree I will look up the speeches of the minister and be prepared to quote them at another stage, so we may understand just where we are.

Mr. Gardiner: I have never undertaken at any time that anyone should take care of the losses of the speculators, which I suppose my hon. friend may consider part of the loss of the nation.

Mr. Ross (Souris): In this case the greatest speculators have been the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). They made a terrific gamble when they entered into a contract with Great Britain to deliver six hundred million bushels of wheat over a four-year period, when that wheat had not even been seeded. If anyone ever made a greater gamble in the marketing of wheat I should like to hear about it.

This is the first year the government has had a monopoly of the handling of oats and barley through the Canadian wheat board. In spite of the fact, as has been pointed out by various ministers, that it is not customary to give the trading position throughout the year, I believe we should have that information before we pass the new bill. I am bound to agree with the hon. member who preceded me that the majority of the people in the west want to deal through the wheat board, but they do not want a political board; they want producer representation. Many of those same people in my neighbourhood, and I think other hon. members will say the same thing, are very dubious about the marketing of their coarse grains this year. I do not sell coarse grains; I buy them from my neighbours and feed the grains on my farm, and I am not sure whether I have been doing that legally for the past year. My neighbours selling grain at the elevator have been paid for good oats only 52 cents a bushel. Mind you, that does not include the freight to Fort William, but their price at the local elevator is 52 cents. In the estimate given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to further payments at the end of the year—and I agree that it was only an estimate—he said they might get 10 cents a bushel. That would give them a total of 62 cents, if his estimate were right. I have before me a speech delivered by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Gour) just outside Ottawa, pointing out that No. 3 C.W. oats were selling at $76 per ton at stations in that neighbourhood, less a subsidy of $6 per ton. A little arithmetic will tell you that this amounts to something like $1.45 a bushel in sacks less the subsidy. You cannot tell me there is that much difference in cost; so I say those farmers are very dubious. I am not making any charge as to where the great difference arises; I am citing this as a logical reason why we should be able to question the officials of the board on the handling of coarse grains before we pass a new bill after this experiment.

At this stage, as I say, I do not wish to take a great deal of time. I am one of those who cannot see why the floor price on wheat, or to be more factual the initial payment, should be only $1.40, when the international agreement provides that for this year the minimum price will be $1.54 and the maximum price $1.98. Surely if the government had faith in that deal they should be able to pay more than $1.40 as a minimum, and I believe that requires some explanation as well.

You know, Mr. Speaker, it is rather strange how things can change in a few months. I have before me a copy of the Winnipeg Free Press of June 15, 1949, where I see a heading, "Would hurt farmer. Howe scores mention of devaluing dollar." By the way, the minister was addressing a meeting at Portage la Prairie that day, and as quoted in this article he said:

> If the dollar were devalued, he said, it would assist certain branches of the gold mining industry "because the price of gold would be increased by the percentage that the dollar is devalued." But other sections of the Canadian public, he emphasized, would suffer.
> For example, if the dollar were devalued by ten per cent it would mean that the western farmer under the wheat agreement with the United Kingdom would get ten per cent less in net return for every bushel sold and conversely, the cost of living for consumers would go up by ten per cent as Canadians would be required to pay for imports from the United States with a depreciated dollar.
> "We have seen what happens in other countries when they try working with a depreciated dollar," he remarked, "and I believe no one is so foolish as to think that a step of this kind is required or wise under present conditions in Canada."

Oddly enough in the same edition of this newspaper there is a press report of a speech by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) at Montreal on the same date, in which he said how silly devaluation would be. There is also a report in the same issue of an address by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) at Minnedosa, in which he discussed the very same topic. That was on June 15. We all know what happened on September 19, when we had devaluation by this government. If the statement made on that occasion by the Minister of Trade and Commerce was true, by that step the government added to that extent to the difficulties we prophesied the farmers were headed for under that contract.

I hope this government will give very serious consideration to reimbursing these farmers at least to some extent. I know they will not expect 100 cents on the dollar for all they have contributed to the consumers of both Great Britain and Canada, but I can tell you that resolutions have been passed by farm organizations of the west asking for a settlement on the basis of at least $2 a bushel. If that were done I believe it would cost the federal treasury approximately half the amount of the loss I mentioned earlier. Again I want to appeal to the minister to see that the report of the wheat board is referred to the committee on agriculture, and that the bill which will follow this resolution is also referred to that committee for consideration. I think that is logical and good reasoning on behalf of the producers of western Canada.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I should like to make a few remarks before the resolution is carried. I shall be brief, because I do not want to repeat the arguments that have been advanced by previous speakers. I do want to support the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) and the other hon. members who have asked that this legislation be referred to the committee on agriculture together with the last three annual reports of the Canadian wheat board. I believe that should be done.

While indicating my support for this legislation, I do so with certain reservations. I am convinced that this should not be temporary legislation that we must pass to cover one period after another.

Under this resolution we are extending the definition of the pool period to include each crop year subsequent to July 31, 1950, and extending the provisions of part IV, the regulations for interprovincial and export trade to August 1, 1953. In other words, this government is indicating to the farmers of western Canada that this is temporary legislation. We are just passing it for a period of time, and it is hoped to get rid of it. The wheat producers of western Canada believe in the wheat board. They believe in this wheat board act. They believe it is good legislation, and they would like to see it made permanent legislation by this parliament, not just temporary legislation. The farmers have had sufficient experience of temporary legislation.

During the war there was the War Measures Act, and later the Agricultural Products Marketing Act which was extended from year to year to enable our products to be marketed under the British contracts. Bacon and other products were marketed under that act, with what result? This year our markets and the act are going up in smoke, and we are not likely to have them another year. It appears to me as though, in extending this act from one period to another, we are following the same procedure, with the result that it will likely kill the wheat board instead of making it a permanent feature of marketing in this country. I want to protest that.

I always thought the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was an astute businessman, but when he brought in a floor price for wheat of $1.40 per bushel and then went over to Great Britain to renew a contract for selling our wheat, after having given notice to the world that we are reducing the floor price to the farmers by 35 cents a bushel, then I believe he was placing himself in a poor bargaining position. I believe it was a mistake to announce a floor price so low at a time when we were trying to sell wheat.

Mr. Howe: I have never announced a floor price for wheat. There is no such thing for wheat, so far as I know.

Mr. Wright: An initial price which is, in fact, the same thing.

Mr. Howe: An initial payment, it is not an initial price.

Mr. Wright: An initial payment, if the minister wishes to put it that way. I stand corrected. The minister announced an initial price—

[Mr. Wright.]

Mr. Howe: Not an initial price. I am sure my hon. friend wishes to make a correct statement. He did correct himself once, but it is an initial payment.

Mr. Wright: I stand corrected, but the initial payment was $1.75 before—

Mr. Howe: No, sir.

Mr. Wright: Yes.

Mr. Howe: The initial payment under the old pool was $1.35, and it was gradually increased during the pool by interim payments until we were paying at the rate of $1.75, but the initial payment in that pool was $1.35.

Mr. Wright: The initial payment in that pool was $1.75 a bushel, and make no mistake about that. The initial payment on last year's wheat crop was $1.75.

Mr. Howe: The initial payment on the five-year pool was $1.35.

Mr. Wright: I am speaking about the initial payment on the 1949 crop, and the minister has announced that the initial payment on the 1950 crop will be $1.40 per bushel. I do not stand corrected on that, because that is right. I believe the minister was placing himself in a poor bargaining position to sell our wheat, after having announced that our farmers were going to receive 35 cents a bushel less.

I happened to be listening to the radio tonight at 6.30, and I heard a British economist discussing this wheat agreement. I do not know whether or not he was correct, but if he was not correct I should like the minister to correct this statement. He said we were accepting sterling in payment for our wheat next year. For a long time we have been recommending that we should accept sterling or British goods in payment for some of our agricultural products. I should like the minister to comment on that announcement which I heard over the radio. I do say that this type of amendment, which extends the act for a limited period of time, is not the type of legislation the western farmer expects from this government.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I shall say a word on this resolution because of the discussion we had on the wheat agreement when it was brought before this house. It would repay hon. gentlemen on all sides of the house, and particularly those who were not here at the time, if they were to read the debate on that occasion. If they did so, I am quite sure that they would find that the wheat agreement was supported in principle from all quarters of this house. It is true that there were some reservations made regarding the possibility of increases in the cost of production, and perhaps increases in the supply of wheat over the period. None of us knew that the world price of wheat, or what was called the world price, which was really the United States price, would go to the heights to which it went. Indeed some expected a fall in grain prices.

I well remember speaking in that debate on behalf of the party with which I am associated. We suggested to the Minister of Agriculture at that time that if the costs of production rose, the same sort of thing should be done for wheat as it was proposed to do for other farm commodities. The minister stated that, just as we had set aside $200 million to assist the prices of other agricultural commodities, so a similar thing might be done for wheat. It was not done, of course. I do believe, however, that the method of marketing as outlined under the resolution is one that has almost unanimous support from the farmers in the prairie provinces. Consequently, we are supporting this particular piece of legislation.

I, too, heard the broadcast this evening to which my hon. friend refers, although we did not hear it together. At about 6.40, I think it was, a British economist was discussing the announcement made today in this house and in London, concerning the understanding between the government of Canada and that of Britain about the purchase of wheat for the ensuing year. I noted that he did mention the $1.40 initial payment this year as an indication that Canada and the United Kingdom expected the price of wheat would; in the near future, be lower than it had been for the past number of years. I believe there is good reason to suppose that there will be a larger supply of wheat available for consumption across the world in the next few years than we have seen for the past several years. Let me refer hon. gentlemen also to tonight's evening paper, the Ottawa Citizen. If one cares to look at the front page of the home edition, one finds a story from Europe to the effect that the Soviet union has approached the nations of western Europe about supplying them with a considerable amount of grain. When we know that lands are being brought under cultivation in Europe and North Africa in order to increase the supply of cereals, it is essential that our farmers shall be protected against low grain prices, not only during the coming year, but over a period of several years.

If the farmers were asked to accept a wheat agreement which, in its working out—again I remark that it was supported by all parties in this house, and what was going to happen was quite unpredictable—resulted in a loss to the farmer, then something should have been done about it. No one foresaw that during the period of the agreement wheat prices would rise to such great heights. Many of our farmers look at the Chicago price of wheat, and naturally believe they lost a considerable amount of money. We always thought that if that occurred during the period of the wheat agreement in the post-war years, when we were assisting the rehabilitation of the United Kingdom and other countries, in the further post-war period, if one can call it that, our farmers would be entitled to consideration for the sacrifices that they made during the earlier period of an agreement.

Mr. Ross (Souris): It was written into the agreement.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, it was written into the agreement. That was pretty much the understanding in the house at the time. I quite agree with the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) in that regard. Since most of the nations of the world seem committed to government purchase of these great basic commodities of food and so on, it seems to me that we should accept that situation and should try to make satisfactory agreements extending over a considerable period of time if we can do so.

I noticed that the minister in his speech, when he introduced this legislation on April 20 or thereabouts, made the statement —and I am speaking from memory—that some 85 per cent of the wheat sold in the world today was bought through government agencies. That fact indicates that we are in quite a different position from the position we were in before the war. When I look back to 1935, 1936 and the years right up to the war, I remember the amount of time spent in this house in discussing the marketing of wheat; and I remember how strenuously the idea of agreements of this description was opposed by members on the government side of the house, and how hon. members on that side of the house were certain that the only way to market was through the grain exchange or open market operation. The hours that we spent in this house in discussion of that method of marketing remain fairly clear in my memory. But in spite of all the criticism of the wheat agreement, none of us in 1946 foresaw what would be the price of wheat received by American farmers during the post-war period.

Let me add this. Had the whole of the Canadian crop been available for sale on an open market, perchance the price of American wheat would not have reached the heights it attained. It is altogether possible that the large quantity of Canadian wheat thrown on the open market might have reduced the price of American wheat considerably. It is all very well for us to have hindsight, but I believe the principle of the agreement was sound. What I am saying tonight is this. I think the farmers in this further post-war period are entitled to protection. They should have an initial price sufficiently high to give them a reasonable and decent return, and by that I mean a reasonable and decent standard of living comparable at least to that of people of moderate means in the urban centres. I think that should be the fundamental principle upon which we should approach not the initial price but the long-term price of wheat. We must remember that in the minds of many of our farmers there was an understanding that if the costs of production rose during the period of this agreement, then some compensatory adjustment would be made; and that was not made. I have risen tonight to draw these few facts to the attention of the house, and I hope that the present method of marketing wheat through the wheat board on a stabilized basis, with a reasonable initial price, will be continued and will be the long-time policy of this government and of this parliament.

Mr. Gardiner: Before my hon. friend sits down, may I ask one question?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know whether he intended to say this or not, but just in the last few sentences he suggested that no compensation was given for the rise in costs.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: I think he will agree that the price to the British was $1.55 to begin with and that it rose to $2.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: There was that much compensation for any rise in costs.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not want to argue that point with the minister, but I was not looking at it quite from that point of view. What I meant was compensation when viewed in the light of the prices of wheat obtained by the United States farmer. That is what I was thinking of.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The world price was still a good deal over $2 then.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Wright: Just on a matter of privilege, the minister corrected me a little while ago when I used the term "initial price." I find that I was in good company in using that term because on April 5 the minister, when announcing the initial payment for this very year, stated as follows, as reported at page 1562 of Hansard:

> The government proposes, therefore, to establish the initial price for wheat for the crop year 1950-51 at $1.40 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern wheat in store Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver. Initial prices for grades other than No. 1 northern will be fixed by the board with the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. Howe: No one makes more mistakes than the minister.

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on this matter. I had intended to say more, but the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has already said many of the things that I had intended to say. The question I wanted to put before the house is this, and possibly some of the spokesmen for the Winnipeg grain exchange could answer it. When the wheat board took over all wheat during the war—I think it was the year 1943—we could not have shipped wheat to Great Britain had we had no board. No one has answered this question, and I should like to have it answered: just what would we have got as wheat producers for our grain at that time, and what would our loss have been? It is all right to talk about what we have lost under the wheat board. But if we had not had the wheat board I should like to know what we would have lost. I do not think even this Free Press that the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) reads, which I always figure is the spokesman for the Winnipeg grain exchange, has pretended to answer that question. Maybe the hon. member can do so.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I do not speak for the Winnipeg grain exchange.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): I am glad to hear that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): If you had been here before, you would know that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Order.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): However, we are going to have either a wheat board or the open market. If we do not have the wheat board, we are going back to that speculation. And I think when we criticize this program that we have under the wheat board we should remember that we are going to have the wheat board or the alternative, and that is the exchange. My memory is not so short. We are told about what we would have got if we had not had the wheat board. But back in the years when we had the pool, the pools tried to hold the price for the farmer.

In 1930 what happened to our market? There was only one way to hold that market, as far as the pools were concerned, and that was to go into the Winnipeg grain exchange and buy options to hold the market. That is what the pools did. That is the only way they figured they had to hold the market. If that is the way we have got to hold the market, I think we had better watch our board; because under the board we get a stable price over the years. We have farmers who will argue that they would sooner have the Winnipeg grain exchange and that they would get a better price. It is easy for the farmer who was able to hold his wheat until March. Say he has harvested in the fall: if he can hold his wheat until March, he can get a better price than his neighbour who had to sell from the mill. But if he has to sell his wheat, as the average farmer does, in the dumping period in the fall, he will take the low price. I think the farmers, even members, should realize that as the thing is now we will all get the same price because you have your initial price, and whatever the wheat brings, we will get. If we went back to the exchange, I think that if the farmer was in a position to sell grain in the first week that we started to thresh—all farmers will realize this—he always got about ten cents a bushel more than the man got when the threshers started to run. I think that is correct. Then if he could quit selling his grain and hold it until March or later he got another ten or fifteen cents. That farmer might be in favour of the exchange; but the farmer who is starting up or who financially could not hold his grain, who had to sell his grain, got fifteen or twenty cents less, on an average of years, than the man who was able to hold his grain. In an average year he got about 15 cents or 20 cents less than the man who was able to hold his grain. The good thing about the board is that we are all treated alike.

With regard to oats, the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) said that we got 52 cents a bushel. That is true. The minister said we would get another 10 cents. He did not say that that was all we would get. I think we can all pretty well calculate that, if the eastern farmer has to pay a dollar for oats, we shall get more than 62 cents because it takes only 10 cents to get the oats to Fort William and they are freighted free practically all the way from there down here. I think what is happening in oats is this. Some of the exchange people have got hold of them. There has been some speculation in oats. What has happened is that the speculators have got hold of oats and they are speculating between the western and eastern farmers.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Why don't you find out from the wheat board?

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): It may be that the wheat board sold to the fellows in the east and they sold to somebody else.

When we are talking about what we have lost we should remember that we are going to have either a board or an exchange, one or the other. If we are going to be too critical of the board then we will get the exchange. So far as losses are concerned we should ask ourselves this question. What would we have got for wheat if during the war years we had had no board?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Will the hon. member permit one question?

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Yes, but I will not guarantee that I will be able to answer it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Does the hon. member think that the wheat board should account to the producers for the handling of their grain?

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Yes, I will agree with that. Furthermore I would like to know if it is our producers who are on this board, or if it is somebody who does not know what it costs to grow a bushel of wheat.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I agree with that.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): I do not know who they are.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Howe: I should like to clear up only one or two brief points. First I should like to deal with the charge that the government is resisting an inquiry into the affairs of the wheat board. That is perfect nonsense. The wheat board is badly overworked. One man has to be stationed in Europe to attend to Canada's representation on the international wheat committee. The other two are handling not only wheat, as they have in the past, but coarse grains, which is a new departure, and they are exceedingly busy. However, I said last March and I repeat: I will be very glad to bring the wheat board here if the committee will indicate that they seriously wish to hear the board. I say that because I think the house has gone committee mad. So many committees are meeting now that we have almost no one in the house to meet as a committee of the whole.

The hon. member said that the committee on agriculture is meeting tomorrow.

Mr. Ross (Souris): No; we met today.

Mr. Howe: Why not meet tomorrow and seriously consider—

Mr. Gardiner: They cannot find rooms; there are too many committees.

Mr. Howe: —and seriously consider—

Mr. Ross (Souris): The chairman would have to call a meeting.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend is a member of the committee. One member is in the same position as any other.

Mr. Ross (Souris): To call a meeting?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Not to call a meeting.

Mr. Gardiner: There are so many committees meeting we cannot get space.

Mr. Howe: If the committee on agriculture will meet and advise me that they wish to hear the Canadian wheat board I will summon the board to Ottawa with their proper officers, and if the committee wishes to discuss any report that has been tabled in this house in the last fifty years the wheat board will be there with the information on it.

I do resent the implication, which I think was made quite clear in the remarks of the hon. member for Souris, that the wheat board is doing something which cannot be explained and the government is covering it up.

I just want to make it clear that the wheat board has absolutely nothing to hide. I think it is a disservice to the whole marketing procedure of wheat to send out the implication that there is something wrong about the action of the Canadian wheat board.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I never said there was something wrong. I said we wanted to study their report.

Mr. Howe: It will be made readily available if the committee wishes to give it the time; but they must not keep the board here for a month to do a week's work. I think that is only fair to the situation we are facing in the marketing of these grains at this particular period of the year.

Mr. Ross (Souris): May I ask the minister whether this bill will be referred to the committee as well?

Mr. Howe: That is a question that is worth discussing. There is nothing in this bill that is new. Most of it is extending the period during which certain parts of the act will be operative. We could send this bill to the committee and have public hearings, and have the grain exchange down here for four or five days, and have any other witnesses who want to come to complain about the terms of the bill, and keep it in committee until the end of the session. I do not believe that is necessary. I am quite prepared to send the bill to the committee, but I suggest that the nature of the amendments is such that they could very well be disposed of in committee of the whole. I hope that will carry the judgment of the house as far as the provisions of the bill are concerned.

Some comment has been made on the announcement made today. The idea has been advanced that this is a let-down, a complete let-down in what we could expect in the marketing of wheat. That is not my feeling; that is not the feeling of the wheat board. We are very glad to know that we have a sure sale for more than half of Canada's normal exportable surplus. We have a sale to a market that has been ours for a great many years.

Hon members may ask, what is remarkable about that? Why should not we have that? The situation is this. If the United Kingdom buy the North American supply of wheat from Canada they have to pay cold hard dollars for it. If they purchase the same supply from the United States they do it under Marshall aid, which is not a drain on the United Kingdom dollar situation. Does anyone say that the assurance that they are going to buy these supplies from Canada is not a very valuable concession? I may say that when I got that far in the discussion I was quite ready to come home. We can accept too that we have a sure market for that proportion of Canada's export wheat.

Some say that there is no agreement as to price. Well we have an agreement as to price. We have an international wheat agreement that was made by the government, assisted by a very strong committee of producers. We had representatives of the three pools, representatives of the United Grain Growers, representatives of the individual farmers. They were unanimous in recommending that agreement to the Canadian government, and the Canadian government was unanimous in believing that that agreement did give security to the farmers of Canada.

In my opinion one agreement at a time is about all we can handle. Last year we had two agreements. The reason was that the international wheat agreement overlapped the period of the bilateral United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement. Next year wheat will be marketed under the international wheat agreement that provides for a maximum price of $1.98 a bushel and a minimum price of $1.54 a bushel. Under the international wheat agreement Canada will receive the North American price. I am optimistic enough to believe that the price, under the conditions which I think may prevail in the next marketing year, will be at or near the maximum price. Someone who is pessimistic may take the opposite view and say that it will be at or near the minimum price. However, it will be within the terms of the international wheat agreement, and that under present circumstances is about all that I think we should attempt to do about price at this time.

Ordinarily it is considered gambling to make a short sale of wheat, and we will remember that we are talking about the sale of wheat that is not even planted yet. I think we are much safer in allowing the normal law of marketing to prevail now that we are getting away from the abnormal situation of the reconstruction period, and that is what we intend to do then within the limits of the wheat agreement.

Something has been said about an initial payment. As I said, we are getting back to more normal practice and, in setting the initial payment at $1.40, we are following normal and sound pooling practice. The practice for the prosperous years of the pool, or the successful years of the pool, was to set the initial price at 60 per cent of the price of cash wheat in the month of July. That practice was followed in 1923, when the first pool was organized in Alberta, and in 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927 and 1928.

It was not followed in setting the price in 1929. The price was set well above the 60 per cent of the cash wheat price of that day. What happened? Pools went bankrupt, and some of them have not yet finished paying off debts they incurred as a result of having set that initial payment too high. However, that debt was taken over by the provincial governments, and the pools were allowed to pay off the debt over a period.

What happened in 1930? Again, the 1930 initial price was set well above the 60 per cent of the cash wheat price for July of that year. The initial payment was set at $1, and within a month or two it was reduced to 90 cents. The federal government of that day took over at that time, and Mr. McFarland handled the liquidation of that pool for the account of the federal government, with results that farmers in the western provinces are not too anxious to remember.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister a question? Does he consider the present situation is analogous?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: Is there not in the world agreement a maximum and minimum price?

Mr. Howe: Yes, but what is the world agreement? The world agreement is that within a certain twelve months—it is not for the sale of a particular crop, but rather within a twelve-month period—we will have a certain minimum price. That price is $1.40 United States funds. So long as the Canadian dollar is devalued, in terms of the U.S. dollar that is $1.54 for that particular year. But all the wheat is not sold in the year in which it is grown. The price drops 10 cents, and it is $1.30 United States the next year, which is $1.43—provided the dollar is still devalued. Will my hon. friend guarantee what the value of the Canadian dollar will be two years hence?

Mr. Coldwell: The minister could guarantee it better than I could.

Mr. Howe: I am not prepared to guarantee, except to see the pooling operation stands on its own feet. That is what we are trying to get back to. And that is why the people in pooling, who have had connections with pooling in Canada, will not challenge the wisdom of the government in following the practice of going back to an initial payment of 60 per cent of the cash wheat price in the month of July just preceding. Those are the points I wish to cover.

I could cover other points, but I think I have touched on the important ones. I was glad that I did not have to bring forward a new contract at this stage. The attitude of this House of Commons seems to be to approve a contract when it is entered into, but immediately to start criticizing it as soon as it comes into operation. The unfortunate thing about making a contract is that you have to decide whether it is good or bad when you sign on the dotted line. People who wish to reverse their principles when they see how a contract works out are not very popular in business circles.

I hear people get up and say they were very critical of the contract in 1945. I sat through the debate, and I did not find anyone rising and taking a decided stand against it. There were several opportunities to vote against it but only one man, the then member for Parkdale, did so.

Mr. Ross (Souris): 1946?

Mr. Howe: Yes, 1946.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I would ask the minister to produce Hansard to show where I voted in 1946 in connection with that contract.

Mr. Howe: Whether it was 1945 or 1946, I looked up every vote, and my hon. friend from Souris voted yea on every occasion. The only nay vote was that registered by the hon. member for Parkdale, who made himself so popular with his colleagues that he resigned his seat in the House of Commons two or three months later.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is hardly true, either.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Are we going to accept sterling in payment for wheat?

Mr. Howe: All wheat has been and will be paid for in Canadian dollars.

Mr. Coldwell: From what I heard over the radio tonight, the wheat would be paid for in sterling which would be used to buy British goods which, in reality, would be paid for with the wheat we are selling to Great Britain. As a matter of fact, in a sense that is pretty much what is done. We get British goods. Our wheat is priced here in dollars, and their goods on the other side of the Atlantic are priced in pounds. After all, we are using terms that are a bit confusing, because we speak of our receipts in dollars while they speak of their exports in pounds.

Mr. Howe: We pay for anything we buy from Britain with dollars and they pay us for anything they buy from us in dollars. This is a dollar country.

Mr. Coldwell: The British company does not receive dollars.

Mr. Howe: No, the dollars are held in Canada. He is paid in pounds by his own government.

Mr. Quelch: At what price will wheat be sold to Canadian millers during 1950-51? Will it be the same price as in the international wheat agreement?

Mr. Howe: I think that has not been considered, but I would expect that to be so.

Mr. Ross (Souris): In view of the statement made by the minister that there was a vote on that United Kingdom-Canadian wheat agreement, a statement which has been made several times in other debates, I must point out that the minister has never produced Hansard to show that vote. I will help him to clear it up. That agreement was announced by the previous minister of trade and commerce on July 26, 1946, I believe it was, and there was no opportunity even to debate it until the minister's estimates were brought down later. The vote to which he refers, I suggest, was in connection with amending the Canadian Wheat Board Act in 1947.

Mr. Howe: To make the agreement possible.

Mr. Ross (Souris): True, to fulfil the contract, a year later. But there never yet has been a vote on the agreement as such.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 252, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

ELEVATORS DECLARED TO BE FOR GENERAL ADVANTAGE OF CANADA—VARIOUS AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 249, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite prepared to accept the second reading of the bill at this moment, and I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we will take up Bill No. 249, to amend the Canada Grain Act; Bill No. 250, to bring the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act into force in Newfoundland; Bill No. 180, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act; and, if there is time left, Bill No. 89, to provide for the publication of statutory regulations.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m. until 4.30 p.m., May 31, 1950.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 31, 1950

The house met at 4.30 o'clock.

HON. LIAQUAT ALI KHAN

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS TO BE PRINTED IN HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew):

That the address of the Honourable Liaquat Ali Khan, Prime Minister of Pakistan, delivered before the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons of Canada in the chamber of the House of Commons on May 31, 1950, together with introductory and related speeches, be included in the House of Commons Debates and form part of the permanent records of this parliament.

Motion agreed to.

(For text of address of Prime Minister of Pakistan, with speeches of welcome and thanks, see Appendix, pages 3041-45.)

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, May 31, 1950

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Thursday, the 1st June, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce) be substituted for that of Mr. Power, and that the name of Mr. MacDougall be substituted for that of Mr. Douglas, on the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

POLYMER PLANT, SARNIA—SALARIES

Mr. Hodgson:

How many officials or employees of the Polymer plant at Sarnia, Ontario, receive $6,000 or more per year, and what are their names and official positions?

Mr. McIlraith: It will be noted that this question really consists of two parts. The first part asks how many officials or employees of the Polymer plant at Sarnia, Ontario, receive $6,000 or more per year, and the second part asks for the names and official positions. The answer to the first part is eighteen. In connection with the second part, may I say that it has never been the practice to disclose names and positions. The reason is one that I think will be appreciated by all hon. members. This plant is a highly competitive manufacturing plant, and to give details of the names and official positions of these employees would be unfair. I am sure it is something that hon. members would not wish to have done. If there is any other information I can give that the hon. member would like to have, I shall be glad to give it.

POTATOES—IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Hatfield:

What quantity of American potatoes was imported into Canada during the year 1949, and also during January, February, March and April of 1950?

Mr. McIlraith:

	Potatoes, seed Cwt.	Potatoes, other than seed Cwt.
Calendar year 1949.....	1,956	324,906
Month of January, 1950.	..	10,806

Month of March, 1950..	1,850	53,720
Month of April, 1950...	not yet available

CANADIAN SUBSIDIARIES OF UNITED STATES AND ENGLISH FIRMS

Mr. Catherwood:

1. How many American firms were operating subsidiaries in Canada in 1948 and 1949?
2. How many English firms were operating subsidiaries in Canada in 1948 and 1949?

Questions

Mr. McIlraith: The following figures cover firms with investment of $10,000 and over, which are controlled by companies outside of Canada:

1. 1948—2,172 firms (preliminary); 1949—2,227 firms (estimate).

2. 1948—475 firms (preliminary); 1949—485 firms (estimate).

PURCHASE OF GOVERNMENT LAND AT KIRKFIELD PARK, MAN.

Mr. Bryce:

1. On what date did Mr. Robert McInnes make an offer to purchase government land at Kirkfield Park, Manitoba?

2. Was his offer accepted by the department? If so, on what date?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. November 3, 1949.

2. Yes. November 7, 1949.

CATTLE—COMPENSATION FOR T.B. REACTORS

Mr. Coyle:

1. What number of cattle were condemned to the tank in the recent tubercular tests in each of the counties of Elgin and Oxford, for the years 1947, 1948, 1949 and to date, 1950?

2. How many dollars have been paid to Elgin county farmers for condemned cattle since January 1, 1950?

3. How many dollars have been paid to Oxford county farmers for condemned cattle since January 1, 1950?

Mr. McCubbin:

1.

Elgin county	1947-48	1948-49	1949-50	1950-51 to May 8
Cattle tested	Nil	21	32,116	2,071

2. Elgin county, $15,987.93 (136 condemned).

3. Oxford county, $3,553.48 (31 condemned).

PURCHASES OF CANADIAN LUMBER BY UNITED STATES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has the Canadian Commercial Corporation within the last month been negotiating or making purchases of lumber from the various mills on behalf of the government of the United States?

2. If so, what has been the total amount of lumber purchased to date?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. The Canadian Commercial Corporation has received from the United States government several invitations to obtain quotations for various species of lumber. These inquiries were referred to the Department of Trade and Commerce, which endeavoured to obtain quotations. One quotation only was received, covering an alternative to the supplies required, and was not acceptable to the United States authorities.

2. Nil.

[Mr. Catherwood.]

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—LEGAL SERVICES

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough):

With reference to page 322 of the estimates for 1950-51, Soldier Settlement and Veterans Land Act, item "Legal fees $100,000":

1. What are the names and addresses of the firms or individuals who received payment under this item?

2. What amount did each firm or individual receive?

3. What was the nature of the work or services rendered by each firm or individual?

PENSION COMMISSION—LEGAL SERVICES

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough):

With reference to page 319 of the estimates for 1950-51, Canadian pension commission administration, item "Professional and special services, $100,000":

1. What are the names and addresses of the persons who received payment under this item?

2. What amount was paid each individual?

3. What was the nature of the service rendered by each individual?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, it will be noted that with reference to these two questions the estimates for 1950-51 are mentioned. As these estimates have not been passed, of course the money has not been spent. I wonder whether the hon. member would care to reframe his questions, or perhaps take them up when my estimates are before the committee of supply.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreeable?

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I was speaking to the parliamentary assistant to the minister (Mr. Mutch), and I will reword the questions.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

UNEMPLOYMENT—WOMEN—DOMESTIC SERVANTS

Mr. Winkler:

1. By years from 1939 to 1949, how many females in Canada were without work and seeking employment?

2. From 1947 to 1950, how many females among displaced persons were employed as domestic servants?

3. By census years or other available figures since, and including 1931, what was the relation of female domestic servants to the total population of Canada?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

1. From 1939-1942 no data are available on the number of women unemployed and seeking work in Canada.

From 1943-1945, when most women seeking employment were required to register at national selective service offices, the following numbers were reported as seeking work:

June 1, 1943	29,000
June 1, 1944	24,000
June 1, 1945	24,000

From 1946-1949 the number of women without jobs and seeking employment, as estimated on the basis of a sample labour force survey, was as follows:

June 1, 1946	18,000
June 1, 1947	16,000
June 1, 1948	18,000
June 1, 1949	16,000

2. Statistics are not available to provide a direct answer to this question. The following table, however, shows the number of female displaced persons entering Canada for domestic service employment under the group movement plan of the federal government:

1947	700
1949	2,500
1950 (to April 30)	300

3. Number of women employed in domestic service†:

June 1, 1931	146,000
June 1, 1941	178,000
June 1, 1946	67,000
June 1, 1947	53,000
June 1, 1948	74,000
June 1, 1949††	75,000

Total population of Canada:

June 1, 1931	10,363,200
June 1, 1941	11,489,700
June 1, 1946	12,283,000
June 1, 1947	12,558,000
June 1, 1948	12,859,000
June 1, 1949††	13,177,000

Per cent of population employed in domestic service:

June 1, 1931	1·4
June 1, 1941	1·5
June 1, 1946	0·5
June 1, 1947	0·4
June 1, 1948	0·6
June 1, 1949††	0·6

† Figures for 1931 and 1941 show the number of women who were gainfully occupied in domestic service, according to the decennial census at that date. In the census a person is classified according to his usual or customary activity during the past year. Figures for 1946 to 1949 are based on a sample labour force survey which classifies persons according to the specific work in which they are engaged during the survey week.

TRENTON, ONT., AIRPORT—CONTRACT FOR SUPPLIES

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough):

1. What firms or individuals received contracts for supplying gas, oil, grease, coal, fuel oil, bread, meat and milk for the R.C.A.F. airport at Trenton, Ontario, in each of the years 1948, 1949 and 1950?

2. Were tenders called for these contracts?

3. What are the names and addresses of the firms or individuals who submitted tenders?

4. What was the contract price for each of the commodities mentioned in paragraph one above?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I have consulted officials of the Canadian Commercial Corporation with regard to the information asked for in this question. To get the information requested would take approximately three months, and the cost would be very heavy. I wonder if the hon. member would consent to drop the question. If I can find out just what point he is seeking to get at, we can perhaps frame a question that will elicit the information without involving such a heavy expenditure of time and money.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I will not agree to dropping the question. I rather doubt that it would take three months, but I will speak to the parliamentary assistant. I ask that the question stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

INCURABLES

Mr. Fair:

1. What number of incurables reside in each province?

2. How many of those are dependent upon their families for support?

Mr. Martin: No statistics are available. In view of that I am sure the hon. member will agree to drop the question.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

BURLINGTON, ONT., PUBLIC BUILDING—ALTERATIONS OR EXTENSIONS

Mr. Lennard:

1. Has a contract been let for alterations or extensions to the federal building at Burlington, Ontario?
2. If so, who got the contract, and at what price?
3. If not, what is the reason for the delay?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Public tenders for the construction of an addition and alterations to the public building at Burlington, Ontario, are now being invited, and will be received until Thursday June 8, 1950.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NAVAL SERVICE—FUEL SUPPLY

Mr. Pearkes:

1. What firms successfully tendered, during the years 1948 and 1949, for the supply of coal and/or oil for ships and shore establishments of the Royal Canadian Navy?
2. What was the quantity of coal or fuel supplied, and the amount of each contract?

Mr. McIlraith: Return tabled.

PUBLIC WORKS PROJECTS—RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Knowles:

1. Were two recommendations concerning public works projects received and considered by the Department of Resources and Development?
2. If so, from what precise committee was each of these recommendations received?
3. What was the result of the consideration given to each of these recommendations?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

RED RIVER VALLEY—RECOMMENDATIONS BY INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence since the 15th day of January, 1948, and to date, between the international joint commission and the government of Canada relative to suggestions and recommendations as to means or methods or public works to be undertaken to prevent a repetition of the flood on the Red river of 1948.

Mr. Pearson: I understand that the papers covered by this motion were in fact tabled on May 25 by my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton).

Mr. Diefenbaker: As I remember it, the only reference then made was that there had been no report. This motion involves an order for all correspondence in reference to the matter, including reports.

[Mr. Fair.]

Mr. Pearson: I am informed that the correspondence in question was in fact tabled, as noted in Votes and Proceedings of Thursday, May 25. Possibly I could have a word about it with my hon. friend, to see if in fact the tabling I have mentioned covers what he has in mind.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION—EMPLOYEES—WAGES, ETC.

Mr. Thatcher:

For a return showing the names and addresses of all persons employed under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1949, together with wages, allowances, and travelling expenses received by each employee during that year.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, the last time this motion was up I asked to have it stand because the hon. member was not here. I have found since that the same information was asked for by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) on December 3 last and was brought down on March 14. It would cost about $500 to repeat the information, and all the hon. member needs to do is to look at the other record. I am sure the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), of all members of the house, would not wish that I increase the costs of information in my department.

Mr. Coldwell: I think all members sometimes make an error by oversight. I will draw this to the attention of the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—RESTORATION OF HOUSES RENTED BY VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Fernand Viau (St. Boniface): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. Have any arrangements been completed to repair and clean as early as possible all houses owned and operated by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, situated in the flooded area east of the Seine river, all rented by veterans, and within the limits of the city of St. Boniface?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): All such houses owned and operated by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be restored to good condition at the earliest possible day.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND SALT CODFISH—DISPOSITION OF 1949 STOCKS—PRICE SUPPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries arising out of a press release of last Friday relative to Newfoundland fisheries. Has any decision been arrived at regarding the disposition of the surplus of the 1949 catch of Newfoundland salt codfish? Has any decision been made with respect to price support for the 1950 catch?

Mr. J. W. MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): The question of the hon. member for St. John's East is divided into two parts. The first part is whether any decision has been arrived at regarding the disposition of the surplus of the 1949 catch of Newfoundland salt codfish. I should like to inform the house that the disposition of the unsold stocks of salted codfish produced in 1949, and currently held in parts of the maritimes and Newfoundland, was discussed last week in Ottawa with representatives of the salt codfish industry from the maritime provinces, Newfoundland, and Quebec. No decision on disposition could be made with the insufficiency of available data. To provide this information the Department of Fisheries has this week dispatched investigators to Newfoundland to elicit information on the stocks held, the costs, and returns made on the various varieties of 1949 salted fish. Such information is necessary before the department can consider any recommendation to the government.

The second part of the question is whether any decision has been made with respect to price support for the 1950 catch. On May 9 the hon. member for St. John's East put substantially the same question to me, and the answer then given still represents the action the prices support board will be prepared to take if conditions should so require.

Mr. Higgins: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a supplementary question. Can he tell me the amount of the 1949 catch of codfish still held?

Mr. MacNaught: I cannot give the amount with any degree of accuracy. There seems to be some confusion in the minds of those connected with the fishing industry in Newfoundland as to the total amount still held. Some of the fish are held by fishermen, some by merchants, and there is some for which contracts are held; so the whole picture is quite confused.

Mr. Higgins: But it is a considerable amount?

Mr. MacNaught: It is a considerable amount.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

PARTICIPATION IN INTERNATIONAL TRADE FAIR—DISTRIBUTION OF ILLUSTRATED CIRCULARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of which I have not had an opportunity to give him notice. There has just come to my attention an extremely well-illustrated circular issued by the republic of Czechoslovakia which is being distributed at the Canadian international trade fair, from space towards the cost of which the people of Canada make a substantial contribution. In view of the fact that the publication contains a good deal of propaganda for a communist state, will the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicate whether we have any similarly advantageous arrangement in Prague or any other city in Czechoslovakia?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I believe this is the third year that the republic of Czechoslovakia has been an exhibitor at the Canadian international trade fair. It is unusual for exhibitors to put out advertising matter. I have not seen the particular advertising matter to which reference has been made, but I shall have it examined. If there is anything seditious in it, we shall certainly stop distribution of it. So far as exhibiting in Prague is concerned, I may say that we have been invited to exhibit at that trade fair for the past three years, but to date we have not accepted the invitation.

Mr. Drew: I am not suggesting there is anything actually seditious. I am merely pointing out that it is extremely clever and well-illustrated propaganda for what is taking place in Czechoslovakia today.

Mr. Howe: I may say that trade matters do not ordinarily concern themselves with political matters, but since this has been drawn to my attention I shall see if there is anything on the political side to which objection could be taken.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to ask one question in connection with this picture. I have not seen it, so I hope the leader of the opposition will send me a copy; but is there a picture of the member for Coast-Capilano in that issue?

CANADA GRAIN ACT

ELEVATORS DECLARED TO BE FOR GENERAL ADVANTAGE OF CANADA—VARIOUS AMENDMENTS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe for the second reading of Bill No. 249, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Canada Grain Act

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last evening I mentioned the fact that there were a few matters related to Bill No. 249 which I desired to bring to the attention of the minister. While the matters I may touch upon do not deal particularly with the amendments now before us, I believe this is the only opportunity I shall have to bring them to the attention of the minister. These are some of the things in which the growers of cash grains in southwestern Ontario are interested. In schedule D of Bill No. 249 I notice there is a reference to white pea beans. The beans in which the southwestern Ontario growers are interested are soybeans and not those beans mentioned in this schedule.

On April 15 last a meeting of the soybean growers was called in Chatham. All hon. members in southwestern Ontario were invited to the meeting, and certain proposals were placed before us. Most of those hon. members are as interested in this matter as I am. The fact is that the soybean growers find themselves with only one or two buyers in Canada. The net result is that in most cases there is only one buyer, and one can realize the position in which the growers are placed in that case. Not only the soybean producers, but the producers of corn, fall wheat and other grains are interested in having the Canada Grain Act extended to the area of southwestern Ontario that is now engaged in the growing of cash grains. In pursuing the matter after the meeting of April 15 I addressed a letter to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), asking him the proper procedure for those growers in having the Canada Grain Act amended so that it would embrace southwestern Ontario. I shall read a paragraph from the minister's reply:

> Consideration will have to be given not only to the individual amendments that would be required to the Canada Grain Act but also to the extent to which the principle of this legislation, framed originally to apply to grain that is, in the main, marketed interprovincially and internationally, could be made to cover the marketing of crops that are sold wholly or chiefly within the province where they are produced.

That directs our attention to some of the difficulties with which these growers are faced. I wish to point out, and I believe it is significant, that the soybean growers of southwestern Ontario are not asking for subsidies nor for floor prices. In a country in which nearly every commodity group is asking for subsidies or floor prices, one must pay a little attention to a group of producers who say they want neither floor prices nor subsidies.

A large increase in soybean acreage is expected in the United States. Since we are an importing nation so far as soybeans and soybean oil are concerned, an extremely heavy production of soybeans in the United States might result in a serious price drop, or the government might support the price in the United States and dump the surplus products on the Canadian market. The Canadian growers fear that possibility. I point that out so that you can see the position in which these farmers find themselves.

In order to give the house some idea of the enormous increase in the production of soybeans in southwestern Ontario, I might say that in 1945 the production totalled 842,000 bushels. This figure has gradually increased during the years, until in 1949 there were 2,600,000 bushels produced. When it is realized that this production means keeping Canadian dollars at home instead of sending them abroad to buy American soybeans and American oil, it can be seen it is an important factor.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Yes.

Mr. Cruickshank: What is soybean used for normally?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I understand that some of it goes into margarine.

Mr. Cruickshank: I hope that they all fail.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I think that is outside the question at the moment. It was your government that put the Canadian farmer in this fix, and I am suggesting a means of helping him.

Mr. Cruickshank: Our government did not get them into it.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): It certainly did. It was not the province of Ontario that got them into it, anyway. I should like to refer to the importation of oil from the United States. According to Foreign Trade, published by the Department of Trade and Commerce, in the month of January, 1950, there was $2,111,000 worth of foreign oil imported into Canada. If we can encourage these growers in southwestern Ontario to continue growing soybeans, possibly we can reduce that expenditure of Canadian dollars on foreign oil. I just mention this in passing because, as I said in the beginning, I realize that this possibly is not the place that this can all be done. But I am going to use here the resolution passed by the Ontario soybean growers; and by the way, their association is set up under the Ontario products marketing act. I will read you the entire resolution and the facts that they have put before us leading up to this resolution.

During the past few months the directors of the Soybeans Grower's Marketing Board, who are elected representatives of the Soybean growers of Essex, Kent, Pelee Island, Lambton, Huron, Elgin and Middlesex counties, have given considerable study to the sale and handling of soybeans and other cash crops in western Ontario.

Increased production and higher prices received for soybeans, corn, wheat and pea beans has greatly increased the value of these crops to farmers. There are at present no regulations governing the handling, sale, storage and transportation of these products by country elevators, track loaders, and truckers, in western Ontario. Nor is financial responsibility required of them. A producer sells his grain or beans on a grade and moisture basis, but must accept the grade and moisture given him by the purchaser. He has no recourse to an injustice except through courts of law.

In seeking the means to give more protection to the producer a study has been made of the licensing and bonding of country elevators in western Canada under the Canada Grain Act.

The directors are impressed with the protection given the western producer under the act by regulations governing the sale, and transportation of grain in western Canada, and by the efficient administration of the act by the board of grain commissioners for Canada.

The following resolution was passed at a meeting of the board of directors of the Ontario Soybeans Growers' Marketing Board held in Chatham, Ontario, April 15, 1950.

"That the board of directors of the Ontario Soybeans Growers' Marketing Board is of the unanimous opinion that the sale, storage and transportation of grain grown in western Ontario for which grades are established in schedule 2 of the Canada Grain Act, could be better regulated by the licensing and bonding of country elevators and dealers in Ontario, buying grain under the Canada Grain Act, than is now the case.

That the board of grain commissioners for Canada be requested to consider revision of the act, necessary to its application to western Ontario, for the purpose of giving protection to producers by:

1. Insurance of the proper conduct of the business in accordance with provisions of the act and regulations and to guarantee the farmers from loss through mismanagement or dishonesty of the operator.

2. Provision for sale by the farmer of his grain for cash on a grade agreed upon with the operator, or to have the right to demand that sale be made subject to inspector's grade and dockage.

3. The inspection of scales, equipment, records and returns of licensees.

4. Requiring a licensee to keep a complete record of his transactions and make reports to the board as required.

5. Approving the form of tickets and receipts that shall be issued to the producer on the sale or storage of his grain."

This brief respectfully submitted to the board of grain commissioners for their consideration and direction. The directors are of the opinion that it is of vital importance that the producer be protected in the sale and handling of his grain.

This is signed by the president and the secretary of the association.

Mr. Cruickshank: What did they say about the dairy farmer?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): We are not discussing the dairy farmer at the moment.

Mr. Cruickshank: We are discussing marketing.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I discussed this matter with some of the officials, and it just so happened that the flood at Winnipeg was at its height and it was difficult to make contact with Mr. Mackenzie at the time. Then the minister and Mr. Mackenzie went to Britain, and so we have not been able to get as far advanced with this as I had hoped at this particular time. It is because of that situation that I took these few minutes to explain to the minister and to the house what the aims and hopes of the growers in southwestern Ontario are.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Publication.

Mr. Wright: This is the clause under which the board makes regulations with respect to the tariffs that may be charged in country elevators or in terminal elevators. I wanted to bring one matter to the minister's attention with regard to the tariffs which are in force at the present time. That is the matter of the diversion charges on grain going to the port of Churchill. These diversion charges are, I believe, from one and a half cents to two cents a bushel; and they are charged by elevator companies who have control of the grain of any shipper when that shipper wishes to have that grain diverted to other than the terminal elevator either owned or controlled by the company shipping the grain. In that case a diversion charge is made.

At the port of Churchill there is only one elevator. That is a government-controlled or government-owned elevator, or an elevator operated by the government. Therefore that grain going to the port of Churchill must pay this diversion charge. On the other hand, grain shipped to Port Arthur-Fort William or to Vancouver seldom carries a diversion charge, the result being that most of the elevator companies either own or have leased elevators at Port Arthur and Fort William; so normally the grain handled by those companies goes direct to their own controlled elevators and there is no diversion charge. This results in a discrimination against grain going to the port of Churchill and results in an additional charge of one and a half cents on all grain being shipped to that port.

I should like to ask the minister if he would bring this matter to the attention of the board of grain commissioners. I feel that if the wheat board were to bring this matter to the attention of the board of grain commissioners, and were to make representation that this diversion charge in the case of Churchill be dropped, that matter could be accomplished. I just wanted to bring this matter to the minister's attention, and ask him to bring it to the attention of the wheat board and have them make application to the board of grain commissioners respecting it.

Mr. Howe: Section 2 provides that instead of the regulations being published at the end of the crop year, the consolidation be published at the beginning of the crop year. I think my hon. friend would be favourable to that procedure. I understand the problem to which my hon. friend has referred in the debate on his own amendment and again today. I did not realize that it infringes upon the duties of the board of grain commissioners, but I rather think it does; and I shall be pleased to call his remarks to the attention of the board.

Mr. Cruickshank: As Vancouver has been mentioned, I should like to make one remark. Although I do not happen to represent that particular city, I am from British Columbia. I should like to point out to the committee that the port of Vancouver, unlike Churchill, is open three hundred and sixty-five and a half days of the year, not just about thirty days.

On section 6—Grain to be received as offered without discrimination.

Mr. Charlton: By section 6, subsection one of section 133 of the old act is to be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

> Subject to this section, the operator of every licensed public or semi-public terminal elevator and, unless otherwise provided by the terms of his licence, the operator of every eastern elevator, shall, without discrimination and in the order in which the same arrives at such elevator and is offered, receive into such elevator all grain of any grade for which there is available storage of the kind required by the person by whom such grain is offered.

Does that include all grain elevators? Section 10 reads:

> All elevators in Canada heretofore or hereafter constructed are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

Does section 6 include all elevators? If it does, I think it is going a little too far.

Mr. Howe: According to the definitions of the act:

> "Elevator" means any premises into which western grain may be received, or out of which it may be discharged, directly from or into railway cars or vessels, and, notwithstanding anything contained in any other general or special act, includes any such premises owned or operated by His Majesty, either directly or through any individual, public body or company.

Therefore, if it is an elevator to receive and discharge western grain it comes under the act. If it is holding only local grain it does not come under the act.

Mr. Charlton: It does not include an ordinary feed elevator in eastern Canada—

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Charlton: —buying western feed grain?

Mr. Howe: No, it would not; it speaks of shipping western grain. It would not include a feed elevator that ships western feed.

Mr. Charlton: This section does not mention anything about reshipment at all, as I see it.

Mr. Howe: The elevator definition is as I just read it. An eastern feed mill is not a work for the benefit of Canada and does not come under the grain act.

Mr. Charlton: I do not think that is a satisfactory answer because there is nothing in the bill which says it is confined to grain in transit, western grain or eastern grain. The words "eastern elevator" are used in section 6. If this is discrimination against an eastern elevator that is buying feed grain and has to accept grade 3 grain in lieu of grade 2, which it ordered, I do not think it is right.

Mr. Howe: Which would my hon. friend consider discrimination—to have it declared a work for the benefit of Canada and subject to the jurisdiction of the board of grain commissioners, or otherwise?

Mr. Charlton: I am not saying anything about that.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend spoke of discrimination.

Mr. Charlton: As I see it the discrimination is right in this section of the bill.

Mr. Howe: Does the hon. member want the feed mill to be a public elevator or not?

Mr. Charlton: It is right in the bill. He must accept the grain regardless of whether it was what he ordered or not. That is the discrimination I am speaking of.

Mr. Howe: No. A feed mill in eastern Canada is a private institution. The owner of the mill does not have to accept any grain unless he wishes to. He does not handle the public's grain. I do not know of any feed mill in eastern Canada that handles public grain.

Sections 7 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Elevators declared to be for general advantage of Canada.

Mr. Charlton: Section 10 reads:

All elevators in Canada heretofore or hereafter constructed are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

I would like the minister to explain that.

Mr. Howe: It turns on the definitions of the act, and I have read them two or three times. It refers to elevators handling western public grain. If it is a feed mill, all grain is bought by the owner of the feed mill before it goes into the elevator. Therefore, if it is a private feed mill it does not come under the act. If it does not handle the public's grain it does not come under the act. In some instances, feed mills in western Canada do both kinds of business, handle public grain and also act as a part of a feed mill. In that instance they are works for the benefit of Canada; but there is nothing parallel to that situation in eastern Canada that I know of.

Sections 11 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

Schedules A, B and C agreed to.

On schedule D.

Mr. Charlton: Apropos of what the hon. member for Middlesex East has asked, does schedule D include soybeans?

Mr. Howe: It includes white beans, so-called. Soybeans are graded by the province of Ontario, assisted by the Department of Agriculture of the federal government. It is questionable whether the board of grain commissioners would have the constitutional authority to grade grains which are grown and consumed in the one province. The board of grain commissioners handles grain that moves in interprovincial traffic or for export.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, when I hear the word "soybean" I become very interested. I should like a little further explanation from the minister because I am doubtful and sceptical about soybeans grown in any quantity in Canada, since they are detrimental to the dairy farmers of Canada. What are these soybeans to be used for? How are they to be protected? Are they to be protected to the detriment of the dairy producers of Canada?

Mr. Howe: The present act does not cover soybeans, Mr. Chairman. In other words the question is irrelevant to the act.

I should say to the hon. member for Middlesex East that his problem has been put before the board of grain commissioners. I received a letter from the board today which I shall be glad to pass on to him. The problem cannot be dealt with in this amendment to the grain act, for various reasons; but I shall be glad to give him such information as I have, and perhaps it can be held over for another revision of the act.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like this schedule to stand until an explanation is given.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

PROVISION FOR BENEFITS FOR CERTAIN FORMER MEMBERS OF FORCES OTHER THAN CANADIANS

The house resumed, from Monday, May 29, consideration in committee of Bill No. 180, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946—Mr. Gregg—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 6—Part V.

Mr. Green: This is the section which adds a new part to the War Veterans Allowance Act and provides for the setting up of district authorities who, as I understand the bill, are to have practically all the jurisdiction hitherto exercised by the war veterans allowance board. Is it the intention to set up an authority in each district composed of certain men who will act continuously, or will there be different officials in the district doing the work at different times? Will the boards be different from time to time? This is not made clear in the new section 31.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, it is the intention to set up these district authorities in each district. It is also the intention that the members of each district authority shall be officials then in those district offices. For instance, it might well be that the chairman of the committee would be the senior administrator, or the second in command in the district. Depending upon each district, of course, one of the members may be a representative of the Veterans Land Act administration, if such representation would be useful and would be the means of co-ordinating and unifying all the information. As will have been guessed at once, the official who has been chiefly responsible up to now for obtaining information on applications, and investigating them, will play an important part and more than likely would be the secretary of the district authority. I hope that answers the hon. member's question.

Mr. Green: Not quite. Will the authority set up act continuously? For instance, will A, B and C be appointed the authority in the Vancouver district and deal with all applications, or will three officials be picked out from the department to work on war veterans allowances for one month, and a different group be picked for the next month? The act is so worded that either procedure could be followed. This brings up the question as to whether it would not be wise to have one group dealing with all the applications, so that a procedure may be established in the district, rather than to have different sets of officials acting at different times.

Mr. Gregg: I am glad the hon. member has raised the point, because that is exactly our intention, namely that there shall be continuity, and that the persons constituting this district authority shall be in a general sense permanent. Of course there would have to be changes from time to time, as there are in other posts; but it is our intention that to all intents and purposes those constituting the district authority shall be permanent.

Mr. Green: Under this part the new authorities are given very wide powers in dealing with applications. Indeed, I believe their powers are just as wide as those possessed by the war veterans allowance board. In the event of the granting of an application by the district authorities, is the veteran to be faced with an appeal by the department to the war veterans allowance board in Ottawa, or will such award be left untouched?

There is provision in the new part for appeal by veterans if they are dissatisfied with awards by district authorities. However, the sections are not clear as to what is to be done in the event of a successful application by a veteran. Is it to be the practice that a favourable award by a district authority will be final, or is there to be an appeal by the department to the war veterans allowance board here in Ottawa?

Mr. Gregg: No award is final in the absolute sense, as my hon. friend knows. I believe I would be answering his question if I were to say that it is the intention that an award made by a district authority shall stand, subject to review later either by the district authority or by any member of the board. But it is not the intention that members of the board, as they visit districts, shall immediately review the awards made by a district authority to ascertain whether or not they were correctly made.

Mr. Green: This is an important matter, because the new district authorities are given the power to review their own decisions. In effect they may keep on dealing with an application. That of course is the jurisdiction of the present war veterans allowance board as set out in the old act. It does seem to me that, in view of these facts, if a district authority makes a favourable award the war veterans allowance board at Ottawa should keep out of the picture and not interfere with such favourable award.

My understanding of the minister's explanation made earlier in the discussion on the bill was that the war veterans allowance board is to be turned into an appeal board, and that its chief job will be to deal with appeals by veterans from unfavourable decisions made in the districts. If that is so there cannot be such objection to the change; but if on the other hand the members of the war veterans allowance board are now to go around from district to district reviewing decisions made in the districts, then I believe there will be a great deal of difficulty.

Mr. Gregg: I believe I can answer the question by repeating what I said two or three weeks ago. As the hon. member has pointed out, I did indicate that members of the board will now be able to spend more time in the districts than they have in the past. They will be able to have appearing before them those applicants who have felt that they have been treated unfairly. I stated also that it will be the duty of members of the board to make absolutely certain that fairness and uniformity are maintained right across the country. It would be difficult to set out exactly how they would do that. I think they will have to look over what has been done and discuss the whole situation with the district authorities. I can assure my hon. friend that they are not going to sit down and say, "You have made mistakes on this and we are going to cancel it out and make new decisions right away." There will be continual consultation with the district authorities in an effort to maintain fairness and uniformity.

Mr. Green: The war veterans allowance board has always sat in Ottawa but apparently it is now to start travelling. I am not so sure that that is a good idea unless the board is to be restricted to hearing appeals by veterans from decisions of the district authorities. If this board is to go around from district to district reviewing cases, it is going to make a lot of trouble. If the minister intends the district authorities to do a job they must be given the responsibility. The burden of making these decisions must be left with them and not be subject to review by a board travelling out of Ottawa.

It should be definitely understood whether this war veterans allowance board is to be just an appeal board or whether it is to be a board of review. There is a great deal of difference in the two types of board. Personally I do not think it should be a review board going around to the different districts and interfering with them. My own opinion would be that it should be an appeal board, not a review board.

The war veterans allowance board here in Ottawa will not be in touch with the veterans in the same way as the district authorities will be, and the district authorities should have the right to decide whether a veteran should or should not get an allowance. If they decide that he should not get an allowance then it is quite proper that he have an appeal to the war veterans allowance board, but that board should be restricted to hearing such appeals.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief because I understand some other legislation is coming up before six o'clock. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra except as far as repetition is concerned. My first complaint about the war veterans allowance is that it is not a proper allowance. It does not equal the old age pension. Supplementary payments totalling $500,000 were put through last year. As I said before, you would need to be a Philadelphia lawyer or come from Ontario to be able to understand the form that must be filled out.

I agree entirely with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that this whole procedure should be simplified. If the local authorities think a veteran is entitled to an allowance it should be given to him without all this red tape he must put up with now. I want to tell the minister that there are veterans of the first great war who are unable to have the necessities of life because of the mass of red tape in his department. I know he does not want that and I do not believe the officials want it, so, for goodness sake, let us wake up to the realities of life and wipe out these things. It should be easy to do.

I believe that this government and this parliament want to do everything possible for the war veterans. I do not like the term "war veterans allowance" because I believe these men have a right to be treated in a proper manner. They served their country so that you and I might sit here in freedom and be well paid and well fed.

An hon. Member: And well watered.

Mr. Cruickshank: Some members from certain provinces are not as wise as they might be when you consider whence they come, but I think we can understand it.

An hon. Member: Coming from British Columbia.

Mr. Cruickshank: If one of my hon. friends wants to make a speech I shall be glad to sit down and let him do so. I want him to get up on his hind legs and make a speech on behalf of the veterans of Canada, not just to voters who are building the car that I am going to pick up in Oshawa next Monday. As I say, I do not think this allowance is adequate and I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that the provisions should be simplified. The red tape should be eliminated so that the veteran in British Columbia or in Newfoundland can obtain this allowance without having to go before some red cap in Ottawa.

I have had some experience with these matters on behalf of veterans in my riding. Even though I may not agree with all the provisions of the act I do suggest seriously that they be made more accessible to the veteran without the present unnecessary red tape.

Mr. Brooks: How many districts have asked for this change? My experience in my own district is that they are quite satisfied with war veterans allowances being handled from Ottawa. I think they would be quite satisfied if no change were made. I do not see how a board travelling around is going to simplify matters. I think the chairman of the war veterans allowance board has been doing an excellent job.

We have found in my province that in matters like old age pensions—this is really a form of old age pension for the soldier—when they are turned over to be administered by the province they become looked upon as being more or less political patronage. That should be avoided. The further it is away from Ottawa and the more the provinces have to do with it, the more political patronage enters into it.

Not so long ago I brought up before the board in Ottawa certain cases which were turned down. I felt they had been turned down for good reasons, but around election time, if I may mention such times, some of my political opponents thought that these men should make further application for war veterans allowances. They were told that if they made application it was quite likely they would get it. They were turned down for the same reason as they had been turned down before, for which I commend the board.

I repeat that once this matter is decentralized, once the administration is placed in the hands of the provinces or districts, the more political patronage there will be. I fear that that is what is happening at the present time with a lot of our social security measures. Unless strong representations are received from the different districts throughout Canada I think this matter should be left with the board in Ottawa. I do not think a travelling board will improve the situation at all.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I will not extend the discussion because I know that all who have taken part are anxious that the department should be given an opportunity to work this out carefully. I should like to thank the hon. member for Royal for his kind words about the chairman and the members of the board, with which I heartily agree. I think his remarks illustrate the point I was trying to make to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, namely, the importance of the board, which has held and will continue to hold the responsibility for this matter, having a chance to review the work that is being carried on within the districts, and to give guidance and direction. I am sure that, during the coming year there will be an opportunity to work it out to the satisfaction of all districts concerned.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Did I understand the minister to mean, in reply to the objection raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, that all applications that go through the district authority will be reviewed by the board?

Mr. Gregg: No.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Which ones will be reviewed, those that are appealed?

Mr. Gregg: Let me put it this way, and I am not attempting to tie the hands of those who will administer this legislation but rather to answer the question of my hon. friend. My opinion would be that in the ordinary case it would be those that the district authority wanted to discuss with the board, or a representative of the board, on their next visit.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Where an application is turned down by the district authority will it automatically be reviewed by the board without request?

Mr. Gregg: If the applicant desires it, it will be reviewed by a member of the board.

Mr. Fulton: I cannot quite appreciate the effect of the change that will be made when this goes through compared with the situation now existing. I understand that at the present time when applications are made by veterans living outside centres where the district offices are located the procedure is that an investigator is sent by the office to the outlying point to make an investigation and, as I understand it, his recommendation. Then the recommendation is simply approved or disallowed by the board in Ottawa. What will be the new procedure when the minister has gone through all this routine of setting up boards in the district offices?

Mr. Gregg: I think I can answer more clearly by stating that it is an attempt to simplify and speed up applications. From now on it is the intention that decisions shall be made at the district office instead of down the street from here in Ottawa. Most of these decisions will be made by the district authority. The applications that are so approved by the district authority will be put into payment immediately, I hope, with less delay than in the past.

Mr. Fulton: The recommendations for payment will still have to come to Ottawa?

Mr. Gregg: No, they will be paid from the district office.

Mr. Fulton: There is authority now in the district office to issue cheques?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Herridge: Before the section carries I should like to express my approval of it. I think it is an excellent section. I think when it is put into effect we in the province of British Columbia will benefit from it because there has been a certain loss of time owing to the present centralization. That is not the fault of the board. With other members of the house I want to commend the work the board has done. I think the procedure of a travelling board will result in much more benefit to those seeking war veterans allowance. In that way the board will obtain knowledge of the situation across the country and get closer to the veteran and the local situation. It will also standardize procedure, and I can see the advantage of that. I suggest that we would be well advised to watch the administration of this section for a year and see how it functions. Personally I think it will be of great benefit to veterans in every section of Canada.

Mr. Brooks: I do not think the minister answered my question. I asked how many districts have asked for this change. Frankly I do not think there has been a general request across Canada. I understand it has been mostly from the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Gregg: There has been no formal request for it from the districts. As in a number of other cases in our legislation, it has been the result of our own departmental experience and the feeling that this would improve the situation. There has been no formal request.

THE REGULATIONS ACT

PROVISION FOR UNIFORM SYSTEM OF PUBLISHING REGULATIONS AND LAYING THEM BEFORE PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 89, to provide for the publication of statutory regulations.

Mr. Green: Will the Prime Minister explain the bill?

Mr. St. Laurent: I have a statement to make which I can make now or in committee stage if it is more convenient. If any hon. member prefers that it be made now I am quite prepared to do so.

Mr. Green: We would like to have it now.

Mr. St. Laurent: The main purpose of the bill is to ensure that all orders, regulations and proclamations, made or issued in the exercise of legislative powers delegated by parliament, are published and tabled in a systematic and uniform manner. There is no provision here for enlarging the powers to make orders or regulations. It is merely to deal with the exercise of powers already existing under prior legislation. It is to provide that there be one uniform system of tabling and publishing these orders. Such publication and tabling is to be compulsory. The provisions embodied in this measure are the result of comparative studies of procedures followed in other countries, notably in the United Kingdom, and of experience gained in the application of the provisions of the statutory orders and regulations order made during the war.

Regulations Act

Perhaps it might be useful to review briefly the practice presently followed in the publication of statutory orders and regulations. As hon. members know, since the first of January, 1947, all proclamations, orders, rules and regulations of a legislative character or of an administrative character having general effect or imposing a penalty, whether these instruments are made by the governor in council, a minister, a board or other agent empowered by act of parliament, are published fortnightly in part II of the Canada Gazette, known as "statutory orders and regulations". This procedure was established by order in council P.C. 4876 on the 26th of November, 1946, under authority conferred by section 30 of the Public Printing and Stationery Act. This order in council also authorized the compilation and publication of a consolidation of all orders, rules, regulations and proclamations of a legislative character which were in effect on a given date.

A consolidation of such statutory orders and regulations in effect on December 31, 1949, has been prepared and is in the hands of the king's printer. I had hoped it would be available for distribution even before we reached this bill. I believe that early next week we shall have one or two volumes of the compilation. We wanted to get together, in convenient form, so that people could have ready access to them, everything that is now in force. Then we would have a systematized regular form for publishing anything new, so that it would be easier for all those who ought to be informed to know that, if it is not in such and such a place, it does not exist, and there is no need for taking into account anything that is not in this consolidation or that has not been published in the form called for by this bill.

The order in council to which I have just referred is known as "The statutory orders and regulations order, 1947". It was an attempt to find a practical and workable solution to the increasingly difficult problem of delegated legislation. This problem is not by any means restricted to Canada. The same difficulties have had to be met in all democratic countries. Particularly in the years during and since the war, the ramifications of public business have multiplied to such an extent that the representatives of the people have found it a practical necessity to delegate an increasing amount of subsidiary powers to the executive, or to boards or other agencies. Canada is no exception, and our parliament has delegated more and more regulatory powers to the governor in council, ministers, boards and other crown agencies.

For many years now, the government has been concerned with the problem of keeping parliament, and the public, fully informed with respect to this increasing volume of so-called delegated legislation. It is for this reason that during the war orders in council were passed directing that all orders, regulations, and proclamations of a legislative character, or even of an administrative character that provided for penalties, should be published. It was also for this reason that the statutory orders and regulations order, 1947, was passed. This procedure was adopted because we thought we would take some time to find out, by practical experience, how it worked before we brought something to parliament in the form of a statute. Three years have now elapsed since the passing of that order. Considerable experience has been gained during that time, and has resulted in amendments that, from time to time, have been made to the original 1947 order. We feel that the time has now come when we can bring to parliament something that should be practical and workable, and which may not have to be varied too frequently or too soon. This does provide unequivocally for the compulsory publication and tabling of all instruments made under the delegated legislative powers; that is the sole purpose of this measure. Although largely based on the statutory orders and regulations order, 1947, this bill will further clarify and extend the procedure, in order to ensure that it covers the whole field of delegated legislation.

The statutory orders and regulations order was passed only after a comparative study had been made of the procedure followed in other countries, notably in the United Kingdom. At that time, careful consideration was also given to the United Kingdom parliamentary committee on delegated legislation. Following a suggestion made in this house on September 22, 1949, by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), I undertook to give renewed consideration to the operation of the United Kingdom committee and, in the light of its operation and of such other considerations as might seem relevant, to indicate at an early stage in this session whether we would be prepared to support the establishment of a similar committee. We do not believe we should recommend at this time that sort of committee because most of the statutory regulations have to be made by the governor in council, and that gives considerable time for checking, whilst in the United Kingdom most of these things are done by boards or other agencies of the crown. No one who is responsible to parliament or to the public hears of these regulations until they have become law. This United Kingdom committee has strictly limited terms of reference that probably would not fit our situation. They have to report on whether or not the order infringes seven stated principles. If it does not, the committee has nothing to do with it. If it does, they call attention to that fact. We do not believe that would be a remedy that would fit our situation.

It was not possible to make a definition of regulations that would exclude the sort of thing one does not want to have in this. For instance, it might be that an order given to an aeroplane from a control tower would be a regulation. That would be one thing for one occasion. This bill provides that the general rule will be that everything has to be published, but that the governor in council may except certain classes. In order to do so, however, that class or those classes would have to be published and tabled, so that members of parliament will see what is to be excepted. Then they can make such comment as they think justified upon the exception that will be made.

We think that we have here made a serious attempt to be as helpful as possible. All those who want to know their way about in this quite large number of things that operate by virtue of acts of parliament, having that consolidation—I think there will be four or five volumes of it—will find we are trying to have a proper table made, because it will be just as convenient to us as it will be to other members of parliament. After that, we shall have this compulsory practice of having to table and publish in a systematized way, and register in the privy council office, the things that are in force. By consulting that register, even the things that will have ceased to be in force will be found, including the date when they came into force and when they ceased to be in force. The register will be easily accessible, so that all those concerned will be able to get, as expeditiously as possible, the information they require to govern their own conduct or, with respect to lawyers, to advise their clients.

Mr. Fulton: It being six o'clock, I move the adjournment of the debate.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall go into supply and take up the estimates of the following departments: National Resources and Development, Veterans Affairs, Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Green: In that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In that order.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

ADDRESS

of

HONOURABLE LIAQUAT ALI KHAN

Prime Minister of Pakistan

to

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE GENERAL PUBLIC in the

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

on

WEDNESDAY, MAY 31, 1950

The Prime Minister of Pakistan was welcomed by the Right Honourable L. S. St. Laurent, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Elie Beauregard, Speaker of the Senate, and the Honourable W. Ross Macdonald, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister of Canada): Mr. Prime Minister, members of the houses of parliament: In welcoming you today, sir, we wish to pay a tribute to your great country, which in so short a time has attained a place of prominence in the world community; to the rank it holds in the concert of nations as an active member of the United Nations and a sister nation of the commonwealth, and, last but not least, to the record of your personal achievement as Prime Minister of Pakistan.

We in turn are honoured by your presence in this House of Commons. These words of greetings are naturally addressed to you on behalf of the whole population of Canada; I find it particularly fitting, however, that this welcome be extended to you in our own House of Commons, the centre of the political life of Canada and the very heart of our democratic institutions. It is fitting indeed that greetings from one democracy to another originate in the House of Commons chamber.

The accomplishments of your country since it began its separate political existence on August 14, 1947, evoke sincere admiration. Your countrymen had a long tradition of history in the Asian subcontinent. Still it is only less than three years ago—and what are three years in the life of a nation?—that the dominion of Pakistan came into being. The astonishing progress made during such a short time augurs well for the future, and you may rest assured, sir, that we in this country will watch your future achievements with the same friendly interest we have had in what has already been accomplished in so short a time.

The future of Pakistan, notwithstanding differences in religion and language, in customs and habits, notwithstanding lands and oceans which separate it from Canada, is closely related to our own through our common association in the United Nations, our partnership in the commonwealth, and, most of all, in our common belief in those values which form the very basis of democratic life. We hope therefore that our association will become closer and closer as we get to know each other better. The exchange of high commissioners between our two countries is but a first step in this direction.

At present Canadians are wont to associate particularly the names of two men with Pakistan: that of Mr. Mohammed Ali Jinnah, who is regarded as the father of his country and whose name has been immortalized by a grateful people's use of the title "the Great Leader", and your own, Mr. Prime Minister. Mr. Jinnah, in creating a new nation, relied heavily upon you, Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan, whom he described as his "right-hand man".

As his death occurred so soon after the establishment of the independence of Pakistan, there fell upon your shoulders, sir, the tremendous task of giving substance to the blueprint of building the machinery of government in order that your nation might effectively express the will of the Pakistan people to contribute, through democratic processes, to the welfare of mankind.

(Translation):

Mr. Prime Minister, your stay in Canada, short though it may be, will allow you, I hope, to realize the interest we take in your country and your people. As our contacts become closer and more frequent, we shall better understand our mutual problems and be in a position to find a more satisfactory solution.

I wish to assure you that you may count on the understanding and good will of the Canadian people as Canada expects the same from your fellow citizens.

(Text):

In greeting you on this occasion, may I be permitted, Mr. Prime Minister, to state how happy we are that you are accompanied by your charming wife. Her gentleness and gracious manner almost belie the dominating force which the Begum Liaquat Ali Khan is known to exercise in organizing the women of Pakistan to meet the challenge of providing social security under most difficult circumstances.

On behalf of the parliament and people of Canada I ask that the Honourable Liaquat Ali Khan convey to the people of Pakistan, on his return, our best wishes for their well-being and happiness, together with the assurances of deep friendship.

Members of the houses of parliament, I present to you the Prime Minister of Pakistan.

Hon. Liaquat Ali Khan (Prime Minister of Pakistan): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, honourable members of the Canadian parliament: In permitting me to address you here today within these walls, you have conferred upon me a great honour and privilege which I value very highly and for which in the name of my country and my nation I thank you.

As the recipient of this signal token of your esteem my thoughts at this moment turn to the struggle which made it possible for our people to emerge as a free democratic nation to take their rightful place amongst the free nations of the world. For in honouring me today you honour them, their freedom, and the memory of that courageous man who guided their footsteps towards the goal of liberty. You will pardon me, therefore, if on this memorable occasion I am reminded of the father of our nation and the founder of our freedom, our Great Leader, our Quaid-e-Azam, Mohammed Ali Jinnah of revered memory, without whose vision, determination and burning honesty Pakistan might have remained a vague longing and a distant dream, and the reality, of which my humble presence in your august company today is but a symbol, might never have been born. A sincere patriot, a passionate follower of the democratic idea, and a man who saw farther and more clearly than his fellows, he led the Muslims of British India out of their perplexities and frustrations into the open air of freedom, and gave shape, significance and direction to their quest for liberty. All his life he fought for freedom, but since he fought for the substance and not for the shadow, for the thing and not for the word, he let no illusions or catch-phrases obscure his penetrating insight or confound his grasp of the essentials. He struggled long and hard to forge the diverse peoples of his subcontinent into a mighty nation. But foremost as he was in the ranks of those who fought for independence, he was also the first to perceive the inexorable logic of facts, and, when the time came, to proclaim fearlessly that the people of British India, bound together though they were in their common subjection, were not one, but two nations, and that to relegate one hundred million Muslims to the position of a perpetual political minority and to force the Hindu nation and the Muslim nation into a single unwieldly state would be the negation of democracy and would create the greatest single unstable area in the world. The great truth that he uttered was so startling in its simplicity that for a long time even some of his close friends and companions found it stimulating, but strange. But the hundred million suppressed Muslims knew instinctively that what he said merely gave coherence and dynamism to their own hesitant, inarticulate feelings. When on the 14th of August, 1947, our flag was unfurled in Karachi, a nation of eighty million people thanked God that the Quaid-e-Azam had lived to see his dream come true. And when he left us to rest in God, to whose greater glory he had dedicated himself, we knew that he had bequeathed to us a great destiny to fulfil. Wherever the flag of Pakistan may fly, its capital shall always be that hallowed piece of earth where he lies buried.

The three years that have elapsed brought with them many a trial that we expected and many others that we did not. The mass migration that took place between our country and our neighbour, and caused much unhappiness to people on either side of the border, was a great shock to our economy and a great strain on our administrative machinery, which, it will be recalled, had had to be set up within a period of two months for a population of eighty million and for a territory that was spread far and wide. But our experiences, whether grave or stimulating, only convinced us that the historic decision that the Muslims of British India had taken, to work for a state of their own, was eminently justified. What is more, the events of these early years and the manner in which the people of Pakistan faced them have filled us with hope and confidence for the future. It was not the maturity of our administration or any previous experience or preparation that helped us to tide over the almost insurmountable difficulties that appeared in our way. Experience or preparedness we had none; for there had been no time for these. It was the fortitude and the determination and the self-sacrifice of the common man and woman which came to our rescue and gave our young state a momentum which will not be easily exhausted and which we believe will grow in strength. No new state could have been launched on its career under greater handicaps. But these three years of struggle have made us a wiser and more unified nation than we could have otherwise hoped to become within such a short time. Although they demanded great courage, patience and vigilance, they have endeared our freedom to us even more and have shown to us very clearly the path to a bright future.

To what use do the Muslims who form the majority of the people of Pakistan propose to put their freedom? This is a question which we as a nation have pointedly asked ourselves and to which we have a clear and unhesitating answer.

First, we are determined that the Muslims in our state shall be enabled to order their lives in accordance with their faith; that at the same time our minorities shall enjoy full rights of citizenship and shall freely profess and practise their religions and develop their cultures, and that their legitimate interests and the interests of the backward and depressed classes shall be adequately safeguarded.

Second, we are pledged to the principles of democracy, freedom, equality, tolerance and social justice as enunciated by Islam. This does not mean theocracy; for Islam does not believe either in priesthood or in the caste system. On the contrary our conception of democracy is possibly even more comprehensive than that which is contained in the institutions of universal franchise and majority rule. For it embraces social and economic justice, the right of private ownership, of each individual to enjoy the fruit of his honest labour—and yet with laws and institutions designed to eliminate destitution and to place healthy checks on vast accumulations of unearned wealth.

All this we call the Islamic way of life and pursue it because as Muslims we could not follow any other ideology or seek guidance from any other source but God, whose injunctions we believe these to be. To abandon these principles would be for us to destroy, instead of create, what we hope to build up and for which we demanded independence and freedom and a separate state.

Third, we are resolved to safeguard our freedom at all costs, whatever the threat and whatever the quarter from which aggression may face us. For our own part we have no aggressive designs and consider it our moral responsibility to pursue the path of peace and to help in the maintenance of peace and stability everywhere, particularly in the uneasy continent of Asia, on whose future, according to our way of thinking, world peace very largely depends. Nowhere in Asia are the circumstances for the development of the democratic idea more naturally favourable than they are in Pakistan; for nowhere are people more unified and more determined to apply their moral concepts of equality and social and economic justice to promote human welfare and to resist any attempt to tamper with their beliefs. But democracy, in Pakistan or elsewhere, is of little use to the common man unless its advantages are made available to him in his daily life and his standard of living is raised at least to a level which gives him a substantial stake in the way of life which he has chosen for himself.

We are fully conscious of this, and consider it our foremost duty to develop the resources of our country at the greatest possible speed. Even in the days of our greatest anxieties we were able to go ahead with this task, and though much remains to be done we are glad that we have been able to revive our trade, to plan the development of our irrigation, the expansion and modernization of our agriculture and the utilization of our power resources; to keep our budgets balanced and to throw the gates wide open to private enterprise in our industrial development. For this task there is nothing more essential to us and nothing that we could or do desire more passionately than peace.

I know that in Canada I am among friends and speaking to people who are in the same family circle as Pakistan. I feel therefore that I can speak somewhat more intimately than is perhaps usual on formal occasions. Your great country and our young state both belong to the commonwealth of nations. I am not one of those who would demand that the bond which exists between the various members of the commonwealth be minutely defined. It is enough for me to know that they all basically have the same constitution, even though one of them may be a monarchy and another a republic, and all subscribe to the common principles of democracy, freedom and peace. In the uneasy, apprehensive world of today, such a large group of nations with so much identity in their declared aims should be a heartening spectacle to mankind. No practical person would therefore wish wantonly for its disintegration.

Two facts, however, I would humbly and respectfully commend to your attention. First, that with the growth of three Asiatic members of the commonwealth to the status of dominions, the notion that the commonwealth ties are mainly religious, historical or racial must be regarded as having outlived its use. If the commonwealth does nothing more than give the world a lead in establishing the brotherhood of man, irrespective of race, creed or colour, it will still have made a notable contribution to the cause of human welfare. Second, that since the greatest fear of the world is the fear of war, under whose shadow progress alters its aims and millions of humble men and women wait helplessly and apprehensively for an undeserved doom, the commonwealth has great opportunities for raising the hopes of mankind by outlawing war and aggression and the use of coercion or force as a method of settling disputes amongst its own members. We sincerely believe that in this way this free association of free nations can set the world an inspiring example and can give greater reality and efficacy not only to itself but also to the charter of the United Nations, to whose aims we are all pledged and whose success we all pray for.

The ideals of a freedom-loving, democratic, but young and underdeveloped country such as ours, could be epitomized in three words—peace, progress and co-operation. These three are but aspects of the same fundamental urge; for there can be no progress without peace, no peace without progress and the removal of the economic disequilibrium, so apparent in Asia, which keeps more than half the world in poverty and the ferment of discontent, or without international co-operation, which we believe to be the greatest need of all countries, great and small. In the pursuit of democratic ideals few countries have shown greater sincerity of purpose and a higher quality of quiet determination than yours. Blessed with the wealth of natural resources, you have shown the world how a nation, by dint of hard work, by its unity, its sturdy moral qualities, its progressive yet modest outlook, its wide international sympathies and its neighbourliness, can raise itself to great heights, bringing happiness to many and fear to none among those who love peace and honour the freedom of others as they do their own. I am sure that we can look forward to a long period of friendship between our two countries, and that in any joint moral undertaking to promote the welfare of mankind and good will and peace amongst nations, Pakistan and Canada will be more than friends. God bless your country and its people.

(Translation):

Hon. Elie Beauregard (Speaker of the Senate): Your Excellency, the Upper Chamber and the French-speaking people, on whose behalf I am now speaking, are pleased to welcome both yourself and your charming wife and collaborator, and to thank you for the friendly visit you have paid the Canadian parliament as well as for the substantial speech you have delivered. In you we greet a distinguished representative of a commonwealth nation which, in addition, is one of the world's great countries.

By its spiritual unity, based on the teachings and tradition of Islam, the sovereign state of Pakistan binds two territories that, oddly enough, are divided geographically. This thousand year old bond, of which religion and culture are the warp and woof, you recognize as stronger, as more imperious than that of mere neighbourhood or of the continuation of the land.

Pakistan's evolution provides one of the most interesting chapters of world history. In a sort of prophetic vision, your great poet Iqbal foresaw the development which you have made it your mission to achieve.

Under your leadership, your country, which throughout the ages has known and absorbed many civilizations, has progressed rapidly in the economic field. Though this is somewhat contrary to our conception of a legendary and static Orient, we can but rejoice at its march towards progress and a better standard of living, benefits which are common to all true democracies.

Following in the footsteps of the illustrious Mohammed Ali Jinnah, you recognize, as the leader of your country, that your authority comes to you from the people. You have desired to establish your country's constitution on a democratic basis and to complete its independence by making its policy as one with its ideals.

Through your character and your culture, as well as through the exigencies of our time, you are enabled to understand to the full what democracy really means. You know that a strong nation is one in which the several units are made responsible for national development, by being called upon to participate in the administration of public affairs.

Your industrial and social program is commensurate with your overflowing personality. You are extending in the economic sphere the reform accomplished in the political field. Without breaking your age-long traditions, you are leading your people to the development of natural resources, industry and world trade. Pakistan will thus be a democratic, industrial and prosperous country.

May we, Your Excellency, greet in you the great architect of this national revival and offer you a tribute of admiration and the expression of our best wishes.

(Text):

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald (Speaker of the House of Commons): Honourable members of the Senate and of the House of Commons: From time to time our parliament has been honoured by visits from internationally known statesmen. Once again this honour has come to us. Today we have had the privilege of receiving the Prime Minister of a new nation which has been formed by people of ancient lineage and great traditions. The history of our country is very short compared to that of the country of our distinguished visitor, but we are a few years older in the status of nationhood. We are both young nations. I am sure we were all very much pleased to hear our Prime Minister say that we are sister nations; and then, shortly after, we were happy indeed to hear our distinguished visitor say that we belong to the same family circle.

Pakistan and Canada have many things in common. Allow me to mention but one. Both countries are bordered by powerful nations which speak the same or a similar language, and which have the same customs and traditions. Canada has lived in peace with her powerful neighbour for nearly 150 years. I am sure that I speak for all our members when I say that we hope our younger sister, Pakistan, will enjoy with her neighbour the same peaceful relations as her elder sister, Canada, has enjoyed with her neighbour.

Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan, may I express to you our admiration for the statesmanship which has already been demonstrated by you in facing the problems which have confronted you. We are deeply impressed by the high morale of your people and their faith in the belief that their new status as a sovereign independent nation will gradually bring to them a better way of life.

Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan, on behalf of the members of the Canadian House of Commons, I extend to you our deep appreciation for your very informative and inspiring address this afternoon. Our Prime Minister has asked you to convey a message to all your people. May I, as Speaker of the House of Commons, ask you upon your return to Pakistan to carry our greetings to your constituent assembly, and to tell your members how happy Canadians were today to have in their houses of parliament the Prime Minister of Pakistan.

Bill No. 262, for the relief of Mary Marguerite Harvie Fine.—Mr. Winkler.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CIVIC HOLIDAY—WINNIPEG POST OFFICE

Mr. Knowles:

1. What regulations prevent compensation being given to employees of the Winnipeg post office who were not given civic holiday as a holiday with pay in August, 1949?

2. When were such regulations passed, and by whom were they made?

3. What period did such regulations cover, and are they still in effect?

Mr. Lapointe:

1. The Civil Service Act (section 45) provides that any day appointed by proclamation by the governor in council may be observed as a holiday.

2. In 1949 the proclamation provided that the holiday applied to Ottawa.

3. Advice has been received from the civil service commission that in the calendar year 1950 any day proclaimed by the governor in council, designated as civic holiday in a particular locality, will be observed as a holiday by postal employees and other civil servants in that locality.

NOVA SCOTIA—FEDERAL REVENUE AND EXPENDITURES

Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne):

1. What was the total revenue collected by the federal government from persons resident in the province of Nova Scotia in the fiscal year 1949-50, as direct and indirect taxes?

2. What was the total expenditures of the federal government in the province of Nova Scotia in the fiscal year 1949-50, including direct payments to the provincial government and to individual residents as well as assistance to agriculture and industry?

Mr. Sinclair:

1. $31,178,000 (estimated). Customs duties and excise taxes on imports are not included as such figures are only available by ports of entry which is no indication of the point of consumption. If customs duties are apportioned on the basis of population Nova Scotia's share would be approximately $11 million.

2. $118,482,000 (estimated). These figures do not include:

(a) The more general types of budgetary expenditures which are made for the benefit of the country as a whole and which are of direct benefit to all provinces. In this category are the expenses of the central legislative body and of the financial and administrative departments at Ottawa, research activities of the national research council and other bodies and commercial activities of certain government companies.

(b) Payments to the majority of suppliers of goods, as the payments are in many cases made to the head office of the company and therefore do not lend themselves to an accurate segregation by provinces.

(c) Purchases by government agencies on behalf of the United Kingdom and foreign governments. These purchases are financed partly through loans from the federal government.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PURCHASES OF LIVESTOCK IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. Ross (Hamilton East):

1. How many Canadians purchased livestock in the United States in the year 1949?

2. What was the amount of money expended in these purchases?

3. How was it divided as to (a) cattle; (b) horses; (c) sheep; (d) swine?

Inquiries of the Ministry

CIVILIAN DEFENCE PERSONNEL—TRAVELLING EXPENSES AND ALLOWANCES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What was the total amount of the travelling expenses and allowances of all officers and employees in connection with civilian defence during each of the fiscal years 1948-49 and 1949-50?
2. What was the largest individual amount expended in each of said years?

PUBLIC WORKS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. What was the cost of public works in each of the ridings in Newfoundland during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1949?
2. What amounts were spent for (a) wharves; (b) breakwaters; (c) dredging?

PUBLIC SERVICE—TRAVELLING EXPENSES, ETC.

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many civil servants or officials in the fiscal year 1949-50 received in addition to salaries and travelling expenses living allowances in excess of $5,000?

INDIAN ACT

CONSOLIDATION AND CLARIFICATION—BAND FUNDS AND EXPENDITURES, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend, consolidate and clarify the Indian Act, and to provide, inter alia, for band funds and expenditures therefrom, and for other appropriations in case of deficiency or lack of band funds.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

REPORT AS TO TIGHTENING UP OF REGULATIONS IN ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? Can the minister say whether the report in today's press is correct that the federal authorities have called upon those responsible for old age pension administration in Ontario to tighten up their regulations, with the result that the pension of some 7,000 people in Ontario is being reduced?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have not seen the report to which my hon. friend directs my attention. All I can say is that there have been no changes in the regulations for over some two or three years.

[Mr. Ross (Hamilton East).]

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION—DAMMING OF BEAUVAIS LAKE, ALTA.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): May I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture? Can the minister facilitate the bringing down of a return which was passed in my name on May 3 respecting a small prairie farm rehabilitation project near Pincher Creek?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I will facilitate the bringing down of the return.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—RESTORATION OF HOUSES RENTED BY VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. In answer to a question yesterday the minister said, as reported at page 3030 of Hansard:

All such houses owned and operated by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be restored to good condition at the earliest possible day.

Will he tell the house at whose expense?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I received notice of this question just as I came into the house. I think I can inform the house that houses owned and operated by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation wil be restored to good condition at the expense of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Bryce: It will not be charged up to the tenants or owners?

Mr. Winters: The expenses will be borne by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE—SYDNEY AND LONDON—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When may we have a statement from him concerning the commonwealth conference which took place recently at Sydney, Australia?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Canadian representative at that conference, my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), is on his way back to Ottawa. I think he will get here on Monday. It may be possible to make a short statement on the conference that afternoon after I have seen the Minister of Fisheries. I hope to be in a position to make a statement myself on that day on the results of the recent conference in London, and I may be able to associate with that statement a short one dealing with the Sydney conference.

CIVIL SERVICE

QUESTION AS TO FIVE-DAY WEEK IN JUNE, JULY AND AUGUST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is a question which perhaps should go to the Secretary of State. If someone is not acting for him in his absence, perhaps the Prime Minister can answer it. Will a statement be made soon as to the five-day week for civil servants in June, July and August?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): A statement will be made just as soon as a decision is reached.

Mr. Knowles: It has not been reached yet?

IRRIGATION

ST. MARY-MILK RIVER PROJECT—AGREEMENT BETWEEN DOMINION AND PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Some days ago I was asked by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) whether the contract for the St. Mary dam had been signed. I just want to say that it was signed some days ago.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT

358. Departmental administration, $370,640.

Mr. Fraser: Does the minister wish to take these items up separately, or would he like general discussion on the first item?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Chairman, I would of course like to expedite these items through the committee. I am in the hands of the committee as to where they would prefer to discuss the different items. I have no objection to the practice of a general discussion on the administration item.

While I do not propose to make a lengthy statement, I should like to say that although the estimates of the Department of Resources and Development for 1950-51 show an increase of $19,081,710 over the previous year, a review of these estimates shows that they include a few new items authorized by statute or made necessary as a result of statutory obligations: for example, Trans-Canada Highway Act, $20 million; administration of Trans-Canada Highway Act (increase), $286,695; trans-Canada highway through Banff and Yoho national parks, $25,000; to recoup Minister of Finance for advances made to Northwest Territories Power Commission, $30,000. Deducting these items, there is an actual decrease of $1,259,985 in the normal estimates of the department.

It has been necessary to ask for an increase in several of the votes, while in others we expect to be able to get along with a lesser amount than that provided in the previous year. With the reorganization of the departments of mines and resources and reconstruction and supply into three new departments near the end of a fiscal year, it has been difficult so to divide the votes for 1949-50 that an accurate comparison of appropriations may be had. Consequently some of the increases are more theoretical than actual. However, I shall be glad to explain the reasons for these increases and decreases as each vote is under consideration.

As we come to the votes for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the national film board I shall make separate statements.

Mr. Adamson: Does the minister wish to discuss the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation now, or leave it until the particular item is called?

Mr. Winters: I think it would be preferable to leave it until we come to the item.

Mr. Bryce: I want to take up the question I asked the minister a few minutes ago on the orders of the day. The minister said that the houses in the flooded area in St. Boniface, Manitoba, owned and operated by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would be put in shape by that corporation. I do not know whether the minister is listening to me or not.

Mr. Winters: I am trying to listen, but I told the chairman that I could not hear the hon. member.

Mr. Bryce: I want to get this clear in my own mind. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the minister says, are to pay for restoration of the houses that they own. What is the position of the house the ownership of which has been transferred to a purchaser? Will Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation take any responsibility for it?

Mr. Winters: If the ownership has been transferred to somebody else, then the arrangement would fall, I should think, on the same plan that is worked out for the general restoration of houses in Winnipeg.

Mr. Bryce: These men would pay for them?

Mr. Winters: Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would of course be in a position to pay only for repairs on the houses they own.

Mr. Bryce: I am quite clear on that now. Those that have not been sold will be looked after by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation; those on which somebody has made a down payment, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will not be responsible for.

Mr. Fraser: I want to say a couple of words on the national film board. Personally I feel that parliament is not yet in a position to know exactly what is happening there.

Mr. Winters: I wonder whether the hon. member heard me. I said that when we come to the national film board I will make a statement. I would prefer a discussion at that stage, if it is satisfactory to hon. members.

Mr. Fraser: I am in the same position as the minister was; he could not hear, and I could not hear.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to call the attention of the minister to answers that were given to certain questions of mine, the answers being found in sessional paper No. 67J, tabled on Wednesday, May 10, 1950. This is another of those occasions on which, although we are invited to ask questions so as to get information, we receive returns which frequently fail to give that information. In this sessional paper are a number of questions, all of which do not apply to this department, but some of which do.

My third question was:

What federal public works projects have been undertaken in order to relieve unemployment since September 1, 1949?

The answer to that question, given by the Department of Resources and Development, reads as follows:

3. The federal government's program of public investment, including public works, consists of worthwhile projects which will contribute toward the development of the country, and which can be implemented at such times as they will contribute to the maintenance of a high level of employment. In line with this policy, projects undertaken by all government departments since September 1, 1949, had full regard to the employment situation.

I suggest there is a clear inference in this last sentence, namely that there were projects undertaken by government departments since September 1, 1949, and that those projects had full regard to the employment situation.

All right. Assuming from that answer that there were such projects, I draw the minister's attention to the following four questions I asked in relation thereto:

4. What number of persons have been employed thereon?

5. How much money has been spent thereon?

6. To whom have contracts for such works been awarded?

7. In what areas have such works been undertaken?

Surely those are specific questions calling for precise answers. But the answer of the Department of Resources and Development is as follows:

4, 5, 6 and 7. Answered by No. 3.

As the minister knows, we have far too many of these. The hon. member for Lake Centre gave an example the other day. If there had been no projects undertaken, the answer to questions 4, 5, 6 and 7 could be "Nil," or "Covered by the previous answer". But the answer to question 3 implies that, in line with this policy, projects undertaken by all government departments since September 1, 1949, had full regard to the employment situation. If there were such projects, then the minister's department should have answered my specific questions 4, 5, 6 and 7.

I shall not take further time to discuss the matter. But I would like to have the minister's promise to have this sessional paper looked at again, with a view to seeing if I can be given more precise answers to questions 4, 5, 6 and 7 in sessional paper 67J.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I am familiar with the sessional paper and the contents of it. The government investment program is not of course the responsibility of any one department. On the contrary it is a matter involving expenditures by all government departments. If the hon. member will refer to the estimates, as he has done on more than one occasion, he will see a great many votes for a great many projects in, for example, the Department of Public Works, the Department of Transport, the Department of Resources and Development, and other departments. Those projects are undertaken from time to time, and in each case before a project is begun full regard is had to the employment situation obtaining in the area concerned. That is what was intended by the explanation given in the sessional paper.

Mr. Knowles: I submit that anyone looking at those answers will agree with me that there is simply no answer there at all. The answer to No. 3, which merely sets out general policy, is not an answer to my specific questions as to the number of persons employed, the amount of money spent, the persons to whom contracts were awarded, or the areas in which such works were undertaken. If the minister did not wish to answer those questions, he should have said so. But to say that those questions are covered by the answer to No. 3 is, to say the least, annoying.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are two matters I should like to bring to the attention of the minister now instead of waiting for their being called in regular order, because I have to attend the committee on agriculture.

My first question is in connection with national parks and historic sites services, and the national battlefields commission. As the committee knows, in the rebellion of 1885, the outcome of which was the preservation for Canada of what is now known as Saskatchewan, and in which numbers of volunteers from eastern Canada lost their lives, the battles in northern Saskatchewan were fought in the main at Batoche and Fish Creek, adjacent to Prince Albert; and then in the area around North Battleford at Fort Pitt and Cut Knife. These particular areas today are remembered by many as the scene of the last warfare that took place in Canada for the preservation and perpetuation of this union.

I would point out particularly, to begin with, the situation at Batoche, which is located some miles east of Duck Lake. That is where one of the battles of the rebellion was fought, and it was the first place where trenches were used in warfare. Today all that remains to indicate that one of the most important battles of the rebellion was fought there are the trenches, which at this time are only six or seven inches deep, having been filled in by the erosion which has taken place over a period of sixty-five years. There and at Fish Creek a number of volunteers lie buried, as well as numbers of metis and Indians who fought in those two battles. There is nothing to indicate that these are two of the great historic sites in Saskatchewan—nothing other than a small monument erected on the banks of the Saskatchewan river at Batoche through private contributions. There is nothing to indicate that Batoche and Fish Creek are indeed two shrines that should be preserved as such.

Having visited over the years a number of our memorial gardens, as I choose to call them, I submit that these two places, and the other to which I have made reference, should receive attention by the department even at this time. As I have pointed out, Batoche represented the first occasion on which trenches were used in warfare. One can still walk over that area and relive the romance of the days of the fur trader, of the metis, of Gabriel Dumont, the greatest metis leader of his time and the greatest buffalo hunter of North America, not excepting Buffalo Bill. By taking action in this matter the minister would be doing something worth-while for the maintenance of Canadian tradition and the cementing of the unity that today prevails among the whites, the metis and the Indians in that area, many of whom are descendants of those who participated on either side of that rebellion.

My first request is that these two areas be set aside as historic sites. The area does not amount to more than fifteen or twenty acres in each case, and these lands should be purchased by the Canadian government. In the years to come Canadians will look at these sites as being places worthy of preservation, because they represent battlefields, though they are small in comparison with modern battlefields, which are significant in that what occurred there contributed so much to the building of western Canada.

The second suggestion I bring to the attention of the minister has to do with Watrous lake, which lies partly in my constituency. Were this a matter that concerned only my own constituency I would not refer to it now. Since 1750, according to legend and history, Watrous lake has been regarded, first by the Indians and latterly by the settlers who came into the west, as a lake containing medicinal properties of great value. The lake is drying up, and in a matter of a few years will have disappeared unless something is done nationally to preserve it. The history of western Canada indicates that as early as 1750 Indians from as far east as Fort William and as far south as southern Nebraska made pilgrimages there to take advantage of the medicinal properties of this lake. Within the last twenty-five or thirty years many people suffering from arthritis, rheumatism and similar ills have found relief by bathing in the waters of this lake. It is several miles in length, and apparently the outlets of the springs are being closed off through the operation of the salts in the water. An expenditure on this lake by the national government would pay dividends that could not be estimated at this time. I know I speak for hon. members from all parts of Saskatchewan, and not just as one in whose constituency this lake is partly situated, when I say that anything done in this connection would be appreciated.

I ask the minister to consider making available members of the engineering staff or officials who would be able to give expert advice to the people of Watrous so that measures may be taken for the preservation of this lake. It might well be called an historical monument, because over the years this lake has been and still is regarded by the Indians, as the Ganges is in India, as a place where the spirit can be renewed by bathing in the waters.

If we are to build up a true Canadianism; if we are to have unity with no division because of race, colour or creed, nothing will contribute as much as the preservation of sites and areas which are so much a part of our history and tradition. Both Batoche and Fish Creek are shrines to the people of Saskatchewan, and they should be preserved for the future. If something is not done within the next six months or a year—I visited these battlefields within the last few weeks—they will be lost completely to posterity.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I say a word in support of the idea of preserving these historic sites in Saskatchewan? In setting aside these sites as shrines may I suggest that a small niche be provided in which could be placed a bust or statue of Louis Riel, once a member of this parliament, to remind the people that a great leader died the death of a martyr while fighting for his own people. A few days ago we memorialized the anniversary of Jan Smuts, who at one time fought against the crown. Some days ago this parliament paid a tribute to Jan Smuts, who at one time was a rebel but who lived to play a great part in the cause of democracy throughout the world.

Students of Canadian history who have followed the story of the northwest rebellion must realize that the central figure in that rebellion—he may have acted unwisely or rashly—was a true leader of his people. Louis Riel who led a lost cause, though he died upon the scaffold, is today regarded as a patriot and martyr by a considerable section of the Canadian people.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Chairman, I have a matter which might more properly be brought up under item 366 or item 370, but like the hon. member for Lake Centre I expect to be attending a committee meeting. I refer to the astrolabe of Champlain, who was one of the greatest early explorers of this country. Any hon. member who visits Nepean Point will find there a statue of this great early Canadian explorer, looking up the Ottawa river toward the scene of some of his early explorations, and holding in his hands a scientific instrument for the taking of latitude and longitude. He had used it when he was searching for the northwest passage.

In his memoirs Champlain tells of how he lost this instrument. Some years ago a farmer near Cobden found it when ploughing, but unfortunately it found its way to a collection in New York. This instrument should be in our national museum. Not only is it an instrument used by one of the greatest explorers; it is a tangible reminder of the great things he did for this country. I feel that it belongs to Canada, and I suggest that an effort be made to have it brought back and placed in our national museum.

At the same time I should like to pay tribute to the work of Harry J. Walker, of this city, who has written so much about this district and about early exploration in Canada. The other night Mr. Walker brought this matter up at a meeting in the county of Renfrew. He suggested that the department should make some effort to bring the astrolabe back to Canada and place it in our national museum. It belongs here. It is one of the most valuable scientific souvenirs of those times that is in existence. It is something that is closely linked with the history of this country. It is a part of Canada.

Mr. Harrison: I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre as to setting aside the historic sites of Fish Creek and Batoche. I think there should be added to them for the benefit of posterity the historic site of Rat Foot hill. At this point the last battle ever fought on Canadian soil took place between Major Steele and Chief Big Bear. Close to this site is the location of the Frog Lake massacre. A short distance away from that is old Fort Pitt, which I visited last year, and where a private party has erected a monument. In farming operations they had plowed up the old Fort Pitt graveyard. The number of people who turned out for the ceremony lend point to the arguments raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre that there are a great many people interested in such things. They should be preserved for our children and our children's children through all generations, to bring to their attention our early history. I have no doubt that as time passes, these sites will become important places of interest. I strongly support the argument of the hon. member for Lake Centre, and I should also like to add the historic site of Rat Foot hill, where, as I have said, the last battle fought on Canadian soil took place.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Lake Centre always seems to have an interesting story to tell the house, and the one he told touching on Buffalo Bill and other similar characters was no exception. He has made a good contribution, as he usually does. The matter of historic sites in the general area to which the hon. member for Lake Centre refers was brought to my attention some time ago by the hon. member for Prince Albert, who had in mind particularly the old R.C.M.P. barracks at North Battleford. We have referred that project to the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada, which happens to be meeting in Ottawa this week.

I can assure the hon. member for Lake Centre that I shall be very happy to ask the board to take into full consideration the remarks he has made this morning. I am sure they will find them interesting and helpful. Watrous lake is in an area that has been developed somewhat commercially. I understand the property is owned by the province. To my knowledge we have received no request from the province to develop the area, but should one be received we shall of course be pleased to give it full consideration.

As to the remarks of the hon. member for Lanark about Champlain's astrolabe, which I understand is a sextant type of instrument for determining longitude and latitude, as he said, it is now lodged in a museum in New York. We will see what can be done about having it returned to Canada. There are many instances in which valuable historic instruments have been given to Canadian museums and now form a part of the historic background of the country. I also wish to thank the hon. member for Meadow Lake and the hon. member for Cariboo for the remarks they have made, which have contributed to this phase of the discussion of the estimates.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, since the minister was kind enough to refer to my reference to Gabriel Dumont, may I say that what I said was indeed the fact. He was the greatest buffalo hunter that any part of North America ever produced, although his activities do not occupy such a prominent place in history as those of Buffalo Bill, by reason of the fact that the latter toured the world.

I should like to mention in connection with Batoche that there is another reason why the battlefield should be set aside as a national monument. At Batoche on May 9, 1885, there took place the only naval engagement that has been fought inland in North America since the war of 1812. In that area there are many metis descendants of those who participated in the rebellion under Louis Riel. They are good Canadian citizens. I know of nothing that would be more appreciated by them, as well as by the descendants of the whites who participated on the other side in the rebellion, than to set aside the battlefield at Batoche as a permanent memorial and as evidence of the unity of the descendants of those who were engaged on opposing sides in the rebellion.

Mr. Drew: While we are discussing these historic matters there is one subject I should like to refer to which comes under the general heading associated with museums and is not actually covered by any item.

In view of the fact that this department is charged with the responsibility of supporting the national museum of Canada and national historic sites, I suggest that there is a most important historical collection which should be placed in a museum, not only in the interests of the locality where the collection now is, but also in the interests of the whole of Canada. Strangely enough, little is known throughout Canada generally of the remarkable collection of experimental telephone models, carried right through to the final stage of development by Alexander Graham Bell, which are now collected at Baddeck, Nova Scotia, in a building near his old home. When we speak of history it is not necessary that something be seventy-five or a hundred years old to make it an important part of the history of Canada. The achievements of Alexander Graham Bell in Canada constitute a great record of individual initiative which can be a source of inspiration and encouragement to Canadians young and old. In the building near his old home is a collection which I should think is quite as interesting as the collection of experimental models and actual finished developments of Thomas Edison, which are housed at Dearborn in buildings provided by the late Henry Ford. That in the United States the corresponding collection of a man who was engaged at the same time in many similar fields has been taken care of privately in no way alters the fact that we should all be interested in the preservation and the appropriate recording of the essential details connected with the great achievements of Alexander Graham Bell.

At Baddeck are the experimental models of the instrument which evolved into the telephone so widely used today. It is interesting to note that there were two men on the continent of North America carrying on experiments in similar fields. It was really a race whether Alexander Graham Bell or Thomas Edison would invent the telephone. Edison was experimenting with a telephone, but Bell perfected and patented the invention first, and the models and drawings are all there. Edison invented the phonograph. Bell was working on a phonograph, and was within perhaps a few weeks of obtaining a patent on it. His experimental models of the phonograph are also at Baddeck.

Bell was also one of the pioneers in the field of transportation by air, and began his experiments at the same time as the Wright brothers in Dayton, Ohio. He began extremely interesting experiments with tetrahedral kites, which he thought could be powered and developed into a more effective method of air transportation than the monoplane or biplane; and his tetrahedral kites, up to the model that actually lifted a man, are still in this building at Baddeck, along with his plans for the development of that kite into a machine that would carry human beings. Then he switched from that to the biplane, and it is a matter of historic record that the first aeroplane flown anywhere in the British empire was flown at Baddeck many years ago by the present lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia, John McCurdy. There is a monument commemorating that first flight, which occurred only a few years after the Wright brothers had flown their machine at Dayton. There are also models of propellers. There were no wind tunnels in those days, and Bell had to construct propellers with different angles to find which would produce the greatest drawing power as it revolved in the air.

Furthermore, there are interesting models of an invention he developed during the first world war, which was intended to be used against submarines. It might have had very important results if the war had continued longer. That invention was called the paravane, a name which was later given to an actual device attached to ships for use in connection with submarines. It was a long, narrow boat with lifting planes on the side which would carry the body of the craft out of water so that it could be carried along the surface by an air propeller. There are other unique inventions there. They have been recorded; information about them is available, but to nothing like the extent it should be, having regard to their immense scientific value, and above all to the challenge they constitute to young Canadians.

I mention this matter at this time because it is the first opportunity I have had to do so; the minister will recall that we had not reached this point in our discussions when the session terminated last spring. One of the things about which I am greatly concerned is the danger that this whole collection might be lost. While it is cared for at the present time, unless something has been done very recently it is not housed in a fireproof building. The whole collection, comparable to Edison's collection at Dearborn, could be lost not only to Canada but to the world; and this is a world collection.

I would strongly urge the minister to consider whether this is not a subject that might well be discussed with the historical group now meeting here, so that steps may be taken, by whatever plan may seem practical, to provide a museum at Baddeck which will be fireproof—it should be equipped with a sprinkler system—to assure to future generations of Canadians an opportunity of examining these exhibits which show what a man of vision and initiative can do simply by his own efforts.

We now have available the opportunity to give all the schools in Canada a record of these things by means of coloured photographs, which can be prepared very simply. I first became interested in this subject when I was minister of education in Ontario, and greatly wished that it were possible to present in effective sequence and full visual form some of these developments which are the heritage of all Canadians.

For the reasons I have put forward—first, that of preservation; second, that of making these things available to all Canadians, and third, to add to the attractions of what is already one of the loveliest spots in the whole of Canada, and which I am sure in the years ahead will become an increasingly important place for tourists to visit—I would urge that, not in the distant future but as soon as possible, steps be taken to house this great collection in a fireproof building and to make it available for inspection under the most favourable conditions.

Mr. Winters: I want to thank the leader of the opposition for his remarks in general; and I cannot overlook the fact that they were made about Nova Scotia, which is a veritable treasure house of historic background. The subjects with which he dealt are of particular interest to me, particularly the telephone, and I should be quite happy to sit here and listen to remarks in that vein for a much longer period of time. The gentleman who made the first aeroplane flight in the British empire is of course very well known to me, and I have no doubt he will be delighted at this reference to his activities in that field. The area with which my hon. friend dealt is particularly dear to the heart of the premier of Nova Scotia, who is very familiar with it and very fond of it.

Mr. Drew: He learned his Gaelic there.

Mr. Winters: That is where he learned his Gaelic, and where he still goes to practise

it. In that area the federal government chose to locate one of its national parks, Cape Breton national park, in which we have the Cabot trail, one of the most picturesque trails in Canada. I can assure the hon. gentleman that I shall be pleased to seek additional information on the ownership of these historic models, and to see what action, if any, the federal government can take to retain them in a good state of repair in perpetuity.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to make a few general observations somewhat along the same lines as those that have already been made by previous speakers. First of all, I should like to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that this year in Newfoundland we are likely to have serious unemployment. Those who have listened to the answers given by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries must have some idea of the serious situation which has developed in the fishing industry in Newfoundland. As that industry concerns a greater number of people than any other, it is going to have a serious effect upon the economic situation this year. I have several letters which indicate that fishermen are not likely to go fishing because of the uncertainty of the situation. I do not wish to dwell on that matter now, except in so far as it refers to the answer that was cited here by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in which it was stated that the government has certain projects of great value to the country which it proposes to introduce at times when they are needed.

In regard to the projects which might be introduced in Newfoundland, first of all there is an economic survey which was promised under the terms of union. The provincial government at the present time has made an agreement with a New York corporation, sponsored by the Rockefeller foundation, for the investigation of economic conditions. Already the Newfoundland industrial development board has completed an investigation with regard to Newfoundland's resources. The federal government therefore would be in a good position to help out in that respect. I hope that the results will be beneficial.

I have not yet heard from the minister whether the Newfoundland government has signed the agreement in connection with the construction of the trans-Canada highway. If it has not been done yet, I feel that everyone in Newfoundland would like to see two sections attacked this year. One is from St. John's to Gander, where our great airport is, and the other is from Port aux Basques to Corner Brook, because that is the section of the country which offers the most attractions to tourists who are interested in fishing and shooting. A large number of American tourists come down there every year; and they are a source of profit to the guides and to those who operate hostels in that section of the country.

I am sure that the minister must be anxious to see a national park established in Newfoundland. One area which has been devoted by the government of Newfoundland for a long time to that sort of thing is on the Avalon peninsula, which has been a sanctuary. I believe that is the place where the government might establish a national park in the first place, on the Salmonier line, where it seems to me, from the difference in the climate between that section of the country and the east coast near the seashore, would be the most suitable place for encouraging the increase in game and the growth of various kinds of trees. It is a wonder to me that the Salmonier valley which is a most attractive place, with many natural advantages, has not been settled more than it has been.

With regard to the question of historic sites, of which mention has been made, may I say that we have some historic sites in Newfoundland. In fact so important are these historic sites that I think the history of Canada will have to be rewritten in order to do justice to those we have there. First of all, we have cape Bonavista, represented by the Secretary of State, where in 1497 John Cabot, who set out from Bristol, England, first saw land in the new world. We have St. John's which, according to tradition, is the place where John Cabot first dropped anchor on June 24, 1497, and where in 1583 Gilbert laid the cornerstone of what is now known as the British commonwealth of nations. We have Cupids, where in 1610 John Guy attempted to establish a settlement, and Bristol's Hope, where the first English-speaking child in Canada was born; Harbour Grace, where John Mason attempted to found a colony; Trinity, associated with Captain Whitbourne, who was a great lover and admirer of Newfoundland and wrote a book about it, and who fought in the Spanish Armada with Sir Francis Drake; Ferryland, where Lord Baltimore founded a settlement, but unfortunately, because of pirates and at the time the hostility of the French fleet, was forced to abandon the colony and establish a colony in what is now known as the state of Maryland in the United States.

We also had in Newfoundland a tribe of Indians that has been wiped out. They were known as Beothucks. There are many interesting points in Newfoundland where battles took place between white men and Indians and where the last of this great race of people were seen.

I come now to the question of reforestation. I am sure it must be known to the minister that between seventy-five and eighty-five per cent of the forest lands in Newfoundland are now controlled by two companies. Did I hear the minister make a reference to sixty-five per cent?

Mr. Winters: I did not say anything.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The great bulk of these timberlands are controlled by two companies, the Anglo-Newfoundland Development Company, and the Bowaters Company, operating at Corner Brook. Reforestation has never been practised on any considerable scale. It is a policy that I advocated previously, and which I now advocate as being essential for Newfoundland. Anyone who has read the writings of Sir Edmund Gosse, the famous curator of the British museum and a great literary man, will remember his statement that when his father went to Conception bay a hundred years ago the trees of pine and spruce came down to the water's edge. If anyone travelled along Conception bay now he would see only small patches of trees near the water's edge, and he would notice that large areas have been burnt over.

This brings me to a subject in which I am specially interested, namely, the prevention of forest fires. It seems to me that in this country sufficient attention has not been given to the prevention of fires. I would recommend strongly that every fire should be carefully investigated in order to find out what the cause was, and then that rules be drafted to try to prevent recurrences. During the time that I was magistrate in St. John's, I remember personally conducting an inquiry into every fire that took place there. It may have been a coincidence, but as a result of those inquiries, I believe, we went for a long time, for months in St. John's, without hearing a fire alarm. That situation perhaps has been considerably changed through the introduction on a great scale of oil-burning stoves for domestic use.

In regard to forest fires, the department must take all the precautions they possibly can. Only last week we heard of fires along a nine-mile front. Anyone who has seen a forest fire in action realizes how terrible it can be. It destroys not only the forests but also wildlife and sometimes settlements. Occasionally there is also loss of life.

We have had very serious forest fires in our country. In fact I believe there has been more destruction of timber resources by forest fires in Newfoundland than have actually been used by the paper companies since they were first established there in 1904. Therefore I would recommend most strongly to the minister that, so far as he is able, he give particular study to this question, and to the introduction of any preventive measures that might come as a result of that study.

Mr. Carroll: Without attempting to divert the discussion that we have had, I think it would be unfortunate if in considering what was accomplished by Bell and his associates at Baddeck, both in relation to telephone communication and in flying, the name of Casey Baldwin should be omitted. The hon. member for Cumberland knows Casey Baldwin very well. I suggest that the name of Casey Baldwin will long be held in the greatest respect and admiration for the things that he helped Mr. Bell and his associates to accomplish in Baddeck.

I invite the minister, when he comes down to look over the historical material that is there, to partake of a late breakfast with me, because I am building a little house at Baddeck in the prettiest spot on the ocean lakes.

Mr. Brooks: I agree with what has been said with reference to the marking of historic sites. I want to pay tribute to the memory of a man who I think has done more in Canada to preserve historical sites than any other. I refer to the late Dr. Clarence Webster, of New Brunswick. I am sure that Dr. Webster's name is familiar to everyone in Canada. His name is a household word in the maritime provinces. He was born in Shediac and studied medicine and practised his profession in the United States, where he made an international reputation for himself. In his later years he returned to his native province of New Brunswick and devoted his time, to the marking and perpetuating of historic sites. I do not suppose there is any man on the North American continent who has done more along this line than Dr. Webster.

The maritime provinces, like the province of Newfoundland, were more or less the cradle of history in the Dominion of Canada, and Dr. Webster devoted his time to the recovery of old sites and forts and of obtaining information on relics relating to the early days, of the time of the Indians, the French regime, and later when the English-speaking people were in possession of the country. I might just mention too that his collection of relics of General Wolfe, for instance, is considered the finest in the world.

Dr. Webster devoted his time to the uncovering of the massive ruins of Fort Louisbourg, Cape Breton. He has done a great work there for posterity. I think his most notable work was in connection with Fort Beausejour, which is one of the great historical museums of Canada. Thousands of people from the United States and Canada visit this museum every year.

I rose merely to pay tribute to this great Canadian and to call attention to the splendid work he did for the people of Canada, which I hope will be continued by others in the future.

Mr. Stick: I should like to thank the hon. member for St. John's West for mentioning the historical places in Newfoundland, because they are all pretty well in my riding. May I return the compliment by drawing the attention of the committee to the historic site of Signal Hill in St. John's. It is rich in history, and goes back for hundreds and hundreds of years. Very little has been done to preserve it. It was on Signal Hill that Marconi received his wireless signal from Penzance. In my riding there is a place called Heart's Content, where the first transatlantic cable was landed on the American continent. These are historical events, and now that we are a part of Canada they should be preserved. I do not think that we in Newfoundland appreciate their significance as much as we should. Now that the question has been raised, perhaps the minister will see to it that his department and our province work out some scheme of preserving these historic sites; otherwise they will be lost. There are many of them in Newfoundland, and a great many of them are in my riding. I would like to see them preserved. When the people from this part of Canada come to Newfoundland they will have something worth-while to look at and they will realize that that part of Canada, now the tenth province, is rich in history which will add to the history of this dominion.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to associate myself with my deskmate, the hon. member for Royal, in his reference to Dr. Webster. I had many contacts with him in recent years. Dr. Webster was a great Canadian. Only a few weeks ago he passed away. He was at the unveiling of the extension to the museum at Fort Beausejour last summer. He then said that his day was about done. He asked those who would come after him to preserve the relics and to add to those that were in that museum.

On that occasion, Dr. Charles Eaton, a prominent member of the United States congress, who now lives in New Jersey, but was born in Pugwash, Cumberland, was there and gave the main address. The minister's predecessor, now Mr. Justice Gibson, was there to represent his department and the government of Canada. I want to join the member for Royal in paying my sincere tribute to Dr. Webster, one of the great Canadians who gave his very best to make known our history and to preserve those relics of the past. He pointed out to the people of Canada their duty and their obligation to have them preserved.

I should also like to join with the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond in his tribute to Casey Baldwin. Casey Baldwin too was a great Canadian. He took a deep interest in these matters of scientific concern to Nova Scotia and to Canada. He carried out the work inspired by Graham Bell in connection with the aeroplane, and the improvement of an appliance attached to boats, to which reference was made by the leader of the opposition; paravanes, in the nature of wings, served to lift boats as they reached higher speeds, thus preventing friction in the water and increasing greatly their speed. He made an intensive examination into the possibilities connected with the speed of boats, with particular application to their use in time of war.

Casey Baldwin was for a time a member of the legislature for Victoria county. No man took a greater interest in the development of highways than he did. Votes did not mean much to him; he was more interested in the actual work that could be done on the highways. It was Casey Baldwin who was instrumental in doing the pioneer work that resulted in the establishment of Highlands national park. In the days of depression the money was not available, but Casey Baldwin pioneered in the development of that park, which is now being improved from year to year.

It was he who suggested to me, when I was minister of highways, that we build the Cabot trail. He claimed, and had evidence to prove it, that the first landfall made in North America by Cabot was on Cape Breton island. It was his recommendation that this trail, one of the most famous in North America, should be known as the Cabot trail, and it is so known today.

I join with those who have paid tribute to these two great men whose names mean so much in Nova Scotia. Graham Bell is buried in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, although he was not born there. However, his heart and his interests, as the leader of the opposition has said, were there. Many of his experiments were carried out in Nova Scotia, and no time should be lost in seeing that his memory and his works are preserved.

Mr. Herridge: I had not intended to speak, but I could not sit here longer, listening to references to historical aspects of the maritime provinces, without bringing to the attention of the minister the great explorer who discovered the Columbia river which flows through my constituency. I refer of course to David Thompson. Regardless of the fact that both provincial and federal governments have had departments dealing with historic sites, one cannot find a single monument or cairn erected at any point over the whole length of the Columbia river to indicate its discovery by this great explorer. There is nothing to show where his encampments were made, or anything of the kind.

Neither the provincial nor the federal government has done anything to record the historic work of that great expplorer. I cannot understand why as a nation we are so slow in marking the points in this country having historical significance, because in relation to the extent of our other expenditures the amounts required in this instance would be small indeed. It would not cost a great deal to erect cairns bearing bronze plaques for the information of the public. Will the minister tell the committee whether there is co-operation between the federal and provincial departments concerned with the preservation and marking of historic sites? What determines which government shall carry out the restoration or marking required?

Mr. Winters: The marking of historic sites is the function of the department acting on the advice of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada. Where the site in question is of national significance in the history of Canada it is handled in that way. There are many other sites of course which have only local significance, and in those cases provincial or municipal governments take the proper steps to commemorate the occasion. I can assure the hon. member that there is co-operation in the matter of marking sites.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister consider the discovery of the Columbia a matter of national significance?

Mr. Winters: I do not think anyone could overlook the significance of the Columbia river in the national development of Canada. Whether or not its national significance historically comes within the administration of this department is something that would have to be determined by the historic sites and monuments board.

Mr. Gillis: I do not wish to break up this friendly discussion, but I find it hard to understand why the only subject under discussion now is that of museums and historic sites. We are discussing the first item in the minister's department, which has reference to departmental administration. While I do not wish to detract from any of the glories of the past, still I am not too much interested in them.

I have gone over the minister's estimates, and I should not like Hansard to go out leading people to think, Well, this is the department responsible for the future development of Canada and for mapping out our potentialities from coast to coast; this is the department which will follow the government's policy regarding the future development of the country, as announced by many of the ministers, that it will support the system of private enterprise where it works, and, where it fails, supplement such private enterprise by government action.

I was surprised when going through the minister's estimates to find very little about the development of the resources of the country, or the supplementing of free enterprise where it has failed. True, there is a good deal about water, about the Arctic, about scientific surveys, and all that sort of thing; but there is nothing concrete in his estimates that fits in with the picture across the country as I see it today.

I am disappointed in that. For instance, in the matter of housing, for which the minister's department is responsible, I find very little. His statement has indicated that he has taken an interest in this subject, and that he has a program; but in the estimates before us one would imagine nothing is being done by the department in the matter of housing.

Mr. Winters: Why would my hon. friend come to that conclusion?

Mr. Gillis: Because I have read the estimates. I cannot see in them anything which would show that the minister has a program in mind.

Mr. Winters: I believe that as we go through the estimates the hon. member will find that his point will be covered—certainly in respect to housing.

Mr. Gillis: I hope so. If we are honest with ourselves, if we go across this country today and visit the industrial sections, we will find great anxiety in the minds of those who are operating industries about markets for the future. There is in every section a process of laying off help, and a bad unemployment situation is developing. The government did have a shelf of public works that was intended to fit into the picture so as to absorb the unemployed until international trade problems could be ironed out. They have shelved that public works program, and I have no hope of finding anything in the minister's estimates to cover the situation in areas where unemployment is not seasonal or regional; and I refer particularly to the maritimes. I do not think the discussion we have had on this administration item is at all realistic. Before the minister finishes with his estimates I hope he will be able to tell us that something is to be done. The maintenance of monuments, historic sites and national parks is not going to feed these people or cure our unemployment situation. It is not enough to arrange for things to go into our museums, because that will not solve the problems that are developing today.

I consider the minister to be a capable man who has had practical training. He is from Nova Scotia, and I have a lot of respect for him, because I believe he is loyal to that part of the country. I hope he will be able to tell us that some permanent measures are to be taken to relieve an unemployment situation which is more or less permanent in character.

Mr. Winters: If hon. members consider that they have had ample opportunity to discuss the administration item, perhaps we could move on to the detailed items, when the answers to the questions raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South will become apparent. Considerable amounts are provided for projects in Nova Scotia, and in most cases, if not in all, a consideration for initiating the project was the unemployment that existed.

Mr. Gillis: Will the minister give me the number of one of those items?

Mr. Winters: A large amount of work is to be done in the Cape Breton national park, by way of highway construction, and so on. There is also the trans-Canada highway program, although Nova Scotia has not signed as yet. A considerable amount of money is being allotted for housing under the dominion-provincial program, and would be available to any province, including Nova Scotia, if it cares to use it.

Mr. Rowe: I hope I am not out of order, but I feel that this first item should permit a discussion of our natural resources. So far no mention has been made of fire protection for our forests, and I am beginning to think that we have overlooked the importance of our great forest resources. During the last ten years spectacular changes have occurred in the development of these resources, and it might be said that we sometimes failed to see the forest for the trees.

Members representing both rural and urban ridings have stressed the importance of agriculture to this country. We are spending perhaps $60 million or $70 million under the agriculture items, and in addition there are the subsidies that are being paid to advance the development of our great agricultural industry. But we should not forget our forest resources and the industry that is dependent upon them.

I notice there is an item covering the forestry branch, and I suppose further discussion could be carried on under that item. Under our present constitutional set-up the provinces have to do with property and civil rights, but in the general development of our country there has been overlapping in connection with many services, such as health and agriculture. At one time or another some of these matters were more specifically provincial in character, but I fear of late we have had what amounts to duplication of services.

Our forest resources and our forest industry seem to have been forgotten so far as this house is concerned, and so far as this and previous governments are concerned. I would emphasize that there is little apparent change this year. Although there is some increase in the vote for the forestry branch, the total expenditure is still something under $3 million. We should realize what the forestry industry means by way of employment and national development, by way of the creation of national wealth and favourable balances of trade. In my opinion too little attention has been paid by our national government to the protection of our forest resources, to their development and to their conservation. Not enough attention has been paid to this growing industry.

I appreciate the responsibilities that the provinces have, and perhaps this matter is more specifically provincial than some of the other items. However, it might be of interest to outline some aspects of our forest industry. One out of every ten carloads of freight moving across the country is made up of forest products. Twenty per cent of Canada's trade is made up of forest products. Thirty-eight cents out of every United States dollar received for commercial exports represents forest products.

In the last twenty years we have more than doubled our exports of pulp. Our pulp production has doubled in ten years, and we now supply twenty-seven per cent of the world's needs, whereas less than ten years ago we were producing only sixteen per cent. We now provide fifty-seven per cent of the world consumption of newsprint, where previously we supplied only forty-one per cent. The production ten years ago was something like 3,300,000 tons, whereas today it is 5,200,000 tons. The importance of this in actual dollar value is enormous.

I feel that we have overlooked the importance of this industry in our economy. Tremendous advancement occurred in the two great wars, especially in the latter one. Today more people are reading newspapers and more people are using forest products. World consumption is increasing, and one of the greatest resources Canada has is her forests. There has been an increased consumption of rayons, celanese, wallboard, milk cartons, and hundreds of other articles, all produced from this great resource.

Just as our agricultural fields must be kept fertile, so must our forest resources be preserved by proper scientific methods. I hope I will be pardoned for speaking like this. Along with other members I have spoken in support of our agricultural industry, but I feel that anyone who is interested in the development of Canada should not overlook the vital importance of doing everything possible to protect our forest resources. The greatest need is for protection from fire and insects. Millions of cords of timber are being destroyed annually by insects and fire. I can illustrate this point best by saying that more good timber is destroyed by insects and fires per annum than is used in the whole pulp and paper industry to bring nearly a billion dollars into this country. When you stop and realize the situation, it is so gigantic and tragic that we should not overlook it any longer.

I feel I am consistent in what I say, because a few years ago our former leader emphasized that we should have a national forestry policy, and that we should establish a department to co-ordinate the efforts of the different provinces. I am not speaking politically on this issue, because it far transcends party lines. No matter what government has been in power in past years it seems to me they have overlooked the importance of an over-all national policy to co-ordinate the efforts of the provinces in this regard, in their respective fields.

Someone might ask how I would propose to have the dominion help. The minister knows very well that constructive work has been done and is being done by his department with reference to protection from insects. Nevertheless even if all this money were spent in any one of these ventures it would be very small indeed compared with the great industry that is involved and the tremendous amount of work to be done. Perhaps the provinces might be criticized for not doing as much as they might have. It is important that the Department of Resources and Development study carefully what might be done by way of a national policy. Many companies operating in the forests have extensive road programs running into 300 or 400 miles of roadway. These roads serve to bring out timber, and also serve as a means for transporting personnel engaged in fighting fires and protecting our forests from fire.

It is not much help if in one area there are 200 miles of highway, and only about 40 miles between that area and another company's operations across the border of the limit. One hundred miles of road would link up two systems covering 1,000 miles. Our forest rangers could travel on these roads and be available in case of fires that mean so much to the industry and to the country generally. As everyone will recall, we have had fires that have destroyed hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of virgin timber that might have been saved. The aeroplane has been of great help. While it has been accepted that the provinces should assume the responsibility for our forests, nevertheless Canada cannot afford to allow this great resource to be treated on any other basis than that of the treatment accorded to agriculture, mining, fisheries, and many other industries and enterprises vital to the welfare of our people.

I hope that at the dominion-provincial conference the government will discuss ways and means by which we may have a broader national co-ordinated plan of forest protection from fires and insects. There is every justification for the government of Canada spending several million dollars on a national forest highway policy to connect areas in different provinces and operations within areas. I should like to say in fairness to all classes of society that no industry has got along for a longer period of time and shown greater development with less government assistance than the forest industry of Canada. As you know, what has been spent on our forests by the provinces is infinitesimal compared with the revenues the provinces have collected. We are spending only $2,500,000 or $3 million on a forestry branch involving an industry responsible for 38 cents of every United States dollar produced by all our commercial exports, and an industry that is growing in importance in relation to the general development of the country.

We should realize, Mr. Chairman, that it takes 100 acres of Canadian forest to produce one of the biggest newspapers in the United States every day that the sun rises. There is an increased demand for pulp and paper products. Hundreds of new uses are being discovered almost every decade. Fine papers and other products are being produced in addition to timber and products of heavier tonnage. When you realize that it takes 100 acres every day to print one daily paper in New York, it is evident that we must perpetuate our forests if we are to have a lasting industry. It takes from fifty to sixty years to grow a tree in the northern parts of our dominion. Therefore a plan must be evolved for the perpetuation of tree growth in order that the industry may operate.

Many of our pulp and paper industries today have twenty-five and thirty year clubs. Some of our companies have workers of the third generation employed. Those of the second generation have never been employed anywhere else, and now the third generation is employed in the same plant. The industry is permanent and stable, but their stability will depend on the protection of their resources, their supply of raw materials.

I believe the department should spend much more money in the protection of the forests from insects. In the Thunder Bay district of Ontario about ten million cords of wood are affected by budworm infestation. Some of you may have gone through the forests and seen the budworms in action. You will hear stories about how the timber should be salvaged. I have stood in the forest and watched one of our sawyers saw pulpwood. I have seen him make seven cuts before he got a log that would scale and for which he could get paid. That will give you some idea whether a man will go in there to cut wood. This area stands there as a stark monument of the budworm infestation.

I am not blaming the department. You have some excellent men, and there are excellent men in the provincial departments. Vigorous campaigns have been carried on in co-operation with the department for the last two or three years, but it seems that there is no way to overcome the situation. Aeroplane dusting and other methods have been employed, but it just seems to be one of those things that it is almost impossible to eradicate.

The control of forest fires and other types of insect infestation such as fungus should be given more study. When you have an industry the size of the Canadian forest industry, one that means so much to this country, it is not nearly sufficient to have in the estimates an item of less than $3 million, in these days when the dollar will only go about one-third as far as it did ten or twenty years ago. The amount of this item has changed very little over the years. It is only something like $133,000 more than last year; and this seems to me to be a glaring example of the failure on the part of the government to appreciate the importance of this great national asset and this important industry.

I urge that careful consideration be given both to highway development and to greater research with respect to insects and everything else that will help protect the forests. Canada is the centre of the pulp and paper industry of the world. The industry is growing, and to realize its importance it is only necessary to look at the records of our exports, at the employment it gives and the income it provides for those engaged in it. I hope the government will consider increasing the expenditure along these lines, and I urge in all sincerity that another year, and especially after another dominion-provincial conference, the government take another look at this new industry, which has shown greater growth than any other on this continent. When we consider that we supply eighty-five per cent of the newsprint requirements of 150 million people to the south, we realize what a great resource this is. If we have not been neglecting it, at least we have not been husbanding it as we should. I do not particularly criticize this department or the minister's stewardship; this has been an oversight of governments for many years; but this industry has doubled in ten years and more than trebled in thirty years, and we should appreciate its importance in our economy. I believe that with greater utilization of our forests, with the discovery of new uses to which these products can be put, this industry can double again and carry on for the next fifty years as one of our great basic industries. We should look upon forestry as we look upon agriculture, because since the beginning of this country they have been the great basic industries; they have been the great sources of wealth; they have provided employment and opportunity for sound investments.

Mr. McLure: I am not going to say anything about historic sites, because everyone knows that my province is the most historic site in the whole dominion. However, when we speak of museums I believe I could locate the first automobile made and operated in Canada. It was made by a parish priest at Rustico, in my constituency. I believe it would be worth looking up, because it was put together and operated a great many years ago.

The estimates for this department amount to something over $26 million. I want to draw to the attention of the minister, as I did last year, the fact that included in this amount is a blank cheque for $2,416,539 for temporary assistance. In other years we could never find out how many temporary employees there were; but after pounding away at this for a long time I am very glad to see that we are now given the number of both temporary and permanent employees. The permanent employees number 575; the temporary employees amount to something around 1,200. There is still another class, the casually employed, and we do not know how many come within that group. I should like to go one step further, and get more information about these temporary employees. According to the amount being voted they are being paid an average salary of $2,050 per year; and I believe this committee is entitled to know how many it is going to be possible to make permanent. Personally I believe many of these people are useful employees, especially at election time, when we always find a great deal more money being voted for them. I know that in my own constituency over 150 temporary employees were put on before the last election, and we had a hard time to hold them down. They even split their votes. However, we were able to assure them that once the election was over, win, lose or draw, they would be dismissed.

An hon. Member: Were they?

Mr. McLure: Most of them lost their jobs, because the work ended then.

I was going to say that many of these people should be made permanent, and we should be told why all these temporaries are employed. If there is work for them, all the better. It seems to me the administration of this department is a pretty expensive matter, amounting in all to something under $3 million. However, the things I desire to take up can be dealt with as the various items are called, since it is now one o'clock; but I repeat that I believe the committee is entitled to more information with respect to temporary employees.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Hodgson: This morning in our deliberations much was said about historical events and all that sort of thing. I can concur in everything that has been said. I agree with my leader that a permanent home should be built for the relics of historical events and achievements so that they may be preserved for the education, benefit and pleasure of future generations.

There are, however, a few other things that I want to go into now rather than on each item. I am not going to ask the minister now to answer questions in full or any part of them as far as that is concerned. He can take the matters up as each item comes along, if he wants to. The matter of travelling expenses has come to my attention, because it seems to me to be a large amount for one department. I am not going into each item, but the amount ranges from $300 up to $34,000. The whole total is $309,150. This is an increase of $70,650 over last year. That seems to be a terrific amount for travelling. I do not know how many people have been travelling or where they have been travelling, but there must have been a great number and they must have travelled elsewhere than in the Dominion of Canada in order to spend that large amount of money.

The next thing I want to mention is the sundries accounts. I think these things should be more specific and that they should be set out so that we would know more about what they are. Probably the minister and his assistants can tell us just what these sundries are as we go along. The sundry accounts run from $100 up to $96,500. That seems to be a great deal of money for an account called a sundries account. The total for the sundries account is $327,354, an increase of $62,490 over last year. It seems to me that in some of these things there might be a saving, or at least they might be set out in such a way that we could understand them better. As we go over the estimates item by item, we hope that the minister will be able to clear up these matters.

Then the publicity account runs into $3,617,834 or an increase of $343,894 over last year. On this one item for publicity more money is spent by the department than is spent on forestry, of which the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe spoke this morning. I think that we shall need to have quite a few questions answered, and the minister had better get his assistants or helpers prepared to answer them when we go through the estimates item by item. I want to know about many things, and I am sure that there are others in the committee who feel the same way as I do about these large expenditures and large increases over last year. That is all I have to say now. We will take the estimates up item by item, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Green: There is one matter to which I should like to refer on this administration item because it really does not come under any one of the specific items. It has to do with the question as to whether or not the government has an iron and steel policy. Today is the first opportunity we have had to discuss the estimates of this new department which, significantly, is known as the Department of Resources and Development. May I suggest to the minister that one of his main tasks should be to initiate policies that will lead to the development and the use of our Canadian resources. That is set out in the statute under which this department was formed. In section 7 (1) of last year's act we find the following language:

> The minister may formulate plans for public works and improvements, housing, community development, research—

And then the section goes on:

—and the conservation and development of the resources of Canada . . .

Then subsection 2 reads:

The minister may co-operate with the provinces and with municipalities in carrying out any development programs.

Subsection 3 reads:

In carrying out his duties and functions under this section the minister may consult with and inaugurate conferences of representatives of producers, industry, science, labour and provincial and municipal authorities.

At this particular time in Canada's history it seems to me that this question of developing and using our resources is of the utmost importance, particularly the new resources which have been recently discovered such as the iron and titanium in Quebec, the iron in Labrador, the oil and gas in Alberta, and also uranium which is so essential for the development of atomic energy.

Mr. Winters: If the hon. member will permit me to do so, I should like to say that I think that this matter would more appropriately be discussed under the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Chairman, I think that the responsibility rests with the Minister of Resources and Development. It is not only a question of mining the iron or these other commodities; it is a question of the development of Canada with these resources, and that comes directly under the minister in the same way that he has responsibility for the trans-Canada highway, which is in reality a development project.

I believe that these new discoveries of natural resources are the most important ones that we have had in Canada since confederation. Granted that it would take some time to work out a policy as to how they can best be used, I think the time has now come when the government should be able to tell the Canadian people what the policy is to be with regard to these resources. The minister himself, speaking at St. Catharines in February of this year, pointed out the great importance of the discoveries of iron ore and oil; and Donald Gordon, the new president of the Canadian National Railways, had this to say last year, on October 13, 1949—

Mr. Winters: I wonder if the hon. member will permit me to say again that this department is not responsible for the development of iron ore, oil or any similar resource that can be depleted. We are responsible for the development of resources of the renewable type. If it were a matter of building roads to facilitate the mining of iron ore or that sort of thing, it might be a different problem. But the development of the ore body, let us say, and the utilization of the ore, is not a function of this department.

Mr. Green: I submit that the minister is responsible for policies having to do with the use of these resources. The very name of his department, the Department of Resources and Development, indicates that. I am afraid the position is that there is no policy whatsoever, and the responsibility comes back to this particular minister.

The Deputy Chairman: I do not know whether the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys have been before the committee of supply. I do not think they have. The Minister of Resources and Development has said that it is not his responsibility. I would suggest to the hon. member that he wait and discuss the question when the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys are before the committee. Even if in the opinion of the hon. member it should be the responsibility of the Minister of Resources and Development, the minister has twice said that it is not. I do not think we would be saving any time by continuing to discuss these questions.

Mr. Green: Surely, the Department of Resources and Development has some responsibility for the use of Canadian resources. The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys may be involved in the actual mining of ores, but I am not concerned about the mining. What I am worried about is what is going to be done after this iron ore is mined. What is to be done in the way of using the iron ore to produce steel? That certainly does not come under the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Winters: That is more appropriately a matter for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I suggest again that it does not come under the jurisdiction of this department.

Mr. Green: I am submitting that the minister is quite wrong. It is a matter of the development and use of our resources, and that certainly comes under his department, in the same way that he is responsible for various resources of Canada. Whatever dominion responsibility there is rests with this minister whose estimates are before us today.

Mr. Mitchell: On a point of order, I may say to my hon. friend that he is in the right church but in the wrong pew. I think he should take the minister's word for it. There will be ample opportunity to make a speech when the question involved is before the house. I think the hon. member should take the minister's word for it. I think he knows his responsibility.

The Deputy Chairman: I must advise the minister immediately that the point of order he raised is not a point of order.

I understand the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is of the opinion that these matters to which he has referred should be within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Resources and Development. It is a matter of opinion. It is a legal question which the chairman is not called upon to decide.

Mr. Green: I was going on to quote a statement made by Donald Gordon, the new president of the Canadian National Railways, in which he was quoted on October 13 of last year as saying:

> There is an obvious feeling in the air which bespeaks a new era of Canadian progress, and in that development, the railroads will have to develop too.

Then he went on:

> The new era's roots lie in Alberta oil, in iron ore, titanium, base metals and numerous other sources.

I think Mr. Gordon's statement was correct, that the foundation for great developments in Canada is available in these resources and particularly in the iron ore. In the speech from the throne of January 26, 1949, we find these words:

> You will be asked to make legislative provision for governmental assistance by loan to the producers of basic steel for the purpose of increasing production.

Mr. Winters: I must rise again on a point of order. While this is all very interesting and true, it is not a matter for this department. Whether in the opinion of the hon. member it is, the fact is that it is not, and these duties have not been assigned to me. I do not think the committee is in order in discussing it under this item.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, you have already given your ruling on this same point of order which was raised by the Minister of Labour a few moments ago.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Green: I submit that the minister is not in order in raising the same point again. There is no other department under which this comes.

Mr. Winters: Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Green: If the name of the minister as Minister of Resources and Development means anything it certainly covers this field, and I submit that I am entitled to proceed. If the minister or the government have any policy with regard to the iron and steel industry—

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. Winters: I did not say that. I simply said that this matter could be more appropriately discussed under the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Surely there will be ample opportunity to discuss an item which cannot be properly discussed here.

Mr. Green: I cannot discuss this under Mines and Technical Surveys, because I am concerned with the use that is to be made of this iron ore. It simply does not come under Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): The hon. member says it comes under this department.

Mr. Green: The minister must at least listen to my representations. If he cannot make any statement of policy, that is another matter, but I am entitled to make my submission to him.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not under this item.

Mr. Green: This policy should be initiated by the Department of Resources and Development. We have the situation that in northern Quebec the estimates are that Canada will be producing from 10 million to 20 million tons of iron ore annually.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, surely we should have a ruling on this.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. Winters: Decidedly out of order.

The Deputy Chairman: I think it will be admitted that the chairman has been quite generous. I have tried to see that both sides are treated fairly, and I have tried to arrive at some sort of agreement. The Minister of Resources and Development says that it does not come within his jurisdiction. He has also said that he could not effectively reply to the hon. member's remarks or give any additional information which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra would like to have. In these circumstances the hon. member should decide how far he can go on this item. This is the item under which a general discussion about the estimates of the department takes place, but only in so far as it relates to the estimates of the department under the jurisdiction of the minister.

When the minister says that the matter which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is discussing does not come under his jurisdiction, it seems to me that the hon. member should accept that statement; and that the matter could more properly be discussed when the estimates of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys are before the committee. If they had been before the committee and had been carried it would be a different matter, but they have not been carried so far. As a matter of fact they have not yet come before the committee. It is a question which is difficult to settle. To a certain extent it is a matter of legal opinion. What I am interested in is to expedite the business of the committee and also to see that all remarks made are relevant to the items before the committee.

It will be pretty hard to convince some hon. members that what the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is saying now is relevant to the item under discussion. The minister has stated three times that it does not come under his jurisdiction. I would ask the hon. member to govern himself accordingly.

Mr. Green: Perhaps I can put it in this way —and, incidentally, I think the minister protests too much—that there certainly should be some jurisdiction in this department with regard to an iron and steel policy. Can the minister tell us whether the government as a whole, of which he is a part, has any iron and steel policy for Canada at this time? If so, what is that policy?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I understand the hon. member is trying to be helpful—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winters: —but the fact is that he has talked a good deal with respect to a matter that does not come within the ambit of these estimates. There will be opportunity under the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, which come at the moment under my acting jurisdiction, or under the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to give adequate attention to the points he has in mind.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I think probably the time taken in arguing this matter has equalled the time the hon. member would have devoted to the subject.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: But I would suggest to those hon. members who seem so impatient in regard to the exercise of free speech in this chamber, that it is not going to facilitate procedure if they become impatient about the estimates—because these estimates are going to be dealt with, and dealt with very carefully. I do submit that there is the very sort of problem here which you, Mr. Chairman, have indicated in what you have said. There are these borderline problems. I would remind hon. members and the minister that this was one of the very difficulties I pointed out, namely the division between the Department of Resources and Development and the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I said there would be some doubt as to where the border would be drawn between the two departments.

When the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys are examined it will be found that there is no provision in that department for a program of development. This program is important for the purpose of dealing with the general matter of supervising mining, the investigating and mapping of mining areas in this country, particularly in view of the fact that the supervision of mining comes under provincial governments.

In this instance I understand the hon. member seeks to discuss the development of a great resource. Even though in the opinion of the minister there may be some borderline difficulty, and even though the minister thinks it does not come under his supervision in this department, my understanding is that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra thinks there should be a provision for a policy of this kind. I would point out to the minister that already in his department there is provision for development of forest resources and water resources in the forest areas and in the Northwest Territories, and the development of different types of resources involved there. I am suggesting that the hon. member be permitted to discuss this subject, unless it becomes apparent that it would be quite out of keeping to do so at this time.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Will you guarantee there will be no other speeches on the subject?

Mr. Drew: I will not give that guarantee, if that is what you are concerned with.

Mr. Winters: The question is whether or not we will address ourselves to the item before the committee or address ourselves to random items as they happen to occur to hon. members.

Mr. Green: That is not the situation at all.

An hon. Member: Yes, it is.

Mr. Green: The question is as to whether Canada has an iron and steel policy.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, may I—

Mr. Green: Wait until I make my statement.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You have made it twice.

Mr. Green: There is a question which must be faced, now. This is not a matter of bringing up something at random; rather it has to do with the resources of Canada, and it certainly has to do with the development of those resources—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Green: —and with the development of Canada. And if—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a point of order.

Mr. Green: I am on a point of order now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, the hon. member is trying to discuss the iron and steel policy of Canada.

Mr. Green: If the minister has no item in his estimates dealing with the iron and steel policy of Canada, that does not mean that the subject does not come under his department, or that he is not responsible for it. My contention is that there should be an iron and steel policy for Canada, and that it is a tragedy that there is no such policy. When a question of this kind comes up, and is not faced by the department which should be responsible for it, then we are entitled to make our complaints that the department is doing nothing to deal with the question. That is what I was endeavouring to do. But to brush me off with the statement that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys or the Minister of Trade and Commerce is responsible is just as ridiculous as to say that this Department of Resources and Development has nothing to do with an iron and steel policy for Canada. The result of the minister's position today is that the question simply could not be discussed on the estimates.

Mr. McIlraith: Of course it can.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a point of order, if the hon. member would look at item 445 in the Department of Trade and Commerce he would see that it is a vote to provide for production and transportation subsidies on steel and iron under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council. The amount of the vote is two million dollars. Does not the hon. member think, in all fairness, that that is where the matter should be discussed? Would he not defer the argument until we come to that item? I suggest that would be the logical way to proceed—unless he insists on making his speech about iron and steel. But I do not think he would be right in doing so.

Mr. Green: I am not trying to make a speech; I am trying to get a statement from the government.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): But the minister states it does not come under him.

Mr. Green: I am trying to get a statement on government policy with respect to iron and steel in Canada.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Ask it under that item.

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Mr. Green: If there is any such policy, then the Minister of Resources and Development should be able to explain it to the committee.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No.

Mr. Winters: That is neither a correct nor a fair statement. I submit it should be discussed under the item brought to the attention of the committee by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Green: The item in question is not broad. It does not deal with the broad question of an iron and steel policy for Canada, it deals only with one small subject. If this new minister is to face his responsibility as Minister of Resources and Development, then he must be prepared—

Mr. Winters: As assigned to me by the Prime Minister. I do not face responsibilities assigned to me by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

The Deputy Chairman: I believe I have heard sufficient representations to make a ruling. We cannot carry on this legal and academic discussion throughout the afternoon. Item 358 is now before the committee, and it deals with departmental administration of the Department of Resources and Development. I have looked at the statute and, as the minister has pointed out several times, the matter of an iron and steel policy does not come within his jurisdiction. The Minister of Public Works has told us that this subject could be discussed under item 445, and that is where I say the discussion should come. Furthermore there is the administration item of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys which has not yet been before the committee. In all fairness I do not see how the hon. member can continue to discuss this matter under this item, especially when he will have an opportunity to discuss it under the first item of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys or under an item of trade and commerce which has not yet been called.

A general discussion of matters that come within the ambit of the department is allowed on the first item and I think I have been generous in granting latitude to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. We cannot go on forever arguing whether or not this matter should be discussed here. I am informed, and I am satisfied, that this matter could be discussed at another time and I ask the hon. member not to discuss further the matter of government policy in connection with iron ore or steel.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have a question I should like to ask the minister. Just as a passing observation may I say that it appears difficult to get a declaration from any minister of the government with regard to the development of our natural resources. Did not the minister discuss the development of our natural resources in two speeches, one delivered in Toronto and the other in Montreal? Did he not enunciate a great system of development to aid in the expansion of this country?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Order?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You know nothing about order. I am asking the questions. Apparently some hon. members think that by making a noise and by howling they are making an intelligent contribution, but I tell them that they are not going to stop the discussion of these items.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): That is very clever.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are not one of those in that position.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I hope not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am asking the minister what happened to that policy which was enunciated when he spoke in Montreal and Toronto. Sometimes we have to read statements made outside the house in order to find out what government policy is going to be. I was much in accord with what the minister said and I am sure the Canadian people read his remarks with interest. But I would like to have the minister enunciate those plans in the house, plans which to say the least are ephemeral until they are discussed in the House of Commons.

I am not arguing whether my hon. friend has the right to discuss iron ore or steel, but I would like the minister to enlarge upon the remarks he made in Toronto and Montreal. The Canadian people want to know if Canada has assumed responsibilities under the North Atlantic pact as was evidenced in press dispatches of the last few days dealing with a meeting in London. The Canadian people want to know to what degree Canada's resources are to be utilized and its development expanded to the end that we may assume our responsibilities under that pact.

This department was set up to deal with the development of our resources and Canadians as a whole should know what we are going to do in regard to the production of minerals and other war materials which will be needed in the event of defence becoming necessary. The United States resources of oil, iron and many other requirements for defence are rapidly being diminished and are passing out of existence. The only country of the north Atlantic group that can supply many of the materials that will be necessary to the composite defence of the members of the North Atlantic pact is Canada. I should like to hear the minister speak with the same authority, the same vision and the same challenge to the Canadian people that he evinced when he delivered the two speeches to which I have referred.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that that is a sound argument as to why I should go outside my jurisdiction in this House of Commons. It is true that I have made speeches in various parts of the country dealing with different subjects. For example, I represent a fishing constituency and whenever I get a chance I speak about fish, but that does not mean that I can discuss fish in this house when we are dealing with the administration item of the Department of Resources and Development.

I give the undertaking that hon. members will be able to discuss this matter more appropriately at another time. Surely it is a matter of timing and in the interests of expediting the work of the house I suggest that hon. members address themselves to what is before the committee and what is within the jurisdiction of this department.

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, you ruled me out of order but I find that I am now in order.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a few words this afternoon to add my voice to what was said this morning about the problem of reforestation. I realize that this matter comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces, but I submit that the federal government has not taken an active enough part in a matter that concerns the lifeblood of our civilization. It is estimated that up to the present time at least fifty per cent of our forests have been depleted and that fire and insects are destroying 800 million cubic feet of timber per year. Then I should like to stress that 900 million cubic feet per year are being lost through wastage in the industry.

Many hon. members may wonder why a member from a prairie province should take an interest in this particular matter, but I would point out that more than three-quarters of Alberta is covered with timber of one kind or another, some good, some not so good. There are something like 59,000 square miles of marketable timber in Alberta and there are something like 400 permanent and over 300 portable saw mills in operation.

Considerable lumbering is carried on in the western half of my constituency around Breton and Winfield. Last spring while travelling through that country I saw literally hundreds of fires. Those areas will be ruined for all time unless some reforestation is carried on. As was pointed out this morning, lumbering is of infinite value to the Canadian economy.

However, there is another matter that is possibly even more important. That is the fact that forests exercise a strong measure of control over the amount of run-off and flood conditions. Possibly the best example to which I can refer is China. When Marco Polo went to China he described it as a land of forests, rich pastures and rich soil. During the course of the years the trees were cut down for one purpose or another and the land was over-grazed. No effort was made toward reforestation or reconversion of the land. The upper reaches of the rivers gave forth torrents of water causing floods up and down their courses. Silt and gravel were carried down into the lowlands. Erosion set in over huge areas of land, and many thousands of square miles were ruined. In some periods they would have floods and in other periods droughts.

To come a little closer home, there is the Mississippi river basin in the United States. It has been discovered that through the creation of tree belts in dry areas partial control at least can be exercised over the flood situation along the Mississippi river. What has taken place there could quite easily take place here. Students of civilization have found that where land goes to waste civilization declines. Many notable examples can be cited such as North Africa, the Middle East and China, to which I have already referred. They are major examples of what happens. We have in Canada a few minor examples of dried-out areas where people are living a subnormal existence. Let us get together and see that we do not have any such examples here. I strongly urge the minister to take up the matter with the government for the purpose of extending much more assistance to the provinces in the matter of reforestation.

Mr. Fraser: As to this item, I had a return tabled on April 19, 1950. The first question had to do with what departments of the federal government have information and publicity divisions. The second was as to how many employees there are in each of these divisions. The Department of Resources and Development answered that publicity for the administration branch cost $4,670. I notice in the details on page 246 there is one item of $10,000 for publicity and information under the first item of departmental administration. I should like the minister to explain that to me, and also why he did not include in the return the travelling expenses of the other branches of his department.

Mr. Winters: I gather the question is why we are showing $10,000—

Mr. Fraser: Why was that not shown in the administration section of the return to which I have referred?

Mr. Winters: The amount referred to in the return was the amount spent last year. The $10,000 is the amount estimated for this year. That does not mean we will spend the money. It is just an appropriation to cover what may be spent.

Mr. Fraser: There was $10,000 in the estimates for last year. How did you come to put that $10,000 in there when you had nothing to go on so far as your publicity and information service is concerned?

Mr. Winters: That is just an estimate. I should remind my hon. friend of what he already knows, that the Department of Resources and Development is one of those that resulted from a split of two other departments. That amount was put in the estimates for publicity at that time but that does not mean of course that it will be spent. It was an estimate at that time, but it is receiving very close scrutiny at the present moment.

Mr. Fraser: It is hard to follow the minister because under printing and stationery the amount in the estimates for 1949-50 was $9,700 but for 1950-51 it has jumped to $15,000. Can you explain why that should be? The item is exactly the same. The minister has explained that it was not all spent.

Mr. Winters: On the split, $9,700 was the amount taken over by this department. It was found that it was too low, and it was estimated that an amount of $15,000 would be required for this year.

Mr. Fraser: The minister said that was too low. How much of that was spent last year?

Mr. Winters: About $25,000 was spent by the three departments, and of that amount $9,700 was assigned to this department on the split.

Mr. Fraser: The $9,700 was all spent?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: And still you say it is not enough and that is why you have raised the amount.

Mr. Winters: This year we think we will need to spend more.

Mr. Fraser: Does your department employ any commercial advertising agency?

Mr. Winters: Yes, in the Canadian government travel bureau. But not in the other branches of the department.

Mr. Fraser: There is no other outside commercial agency?

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Kent: I wish to make a few remarks about national parks. When the departmental item was called this morning I was out of the house attending a committee meeting. I will have to leave again shortly, and therefore my words are going to be brief indeed. I assume the time will arrive in the near future when the possibility of establishing national parks in Newfoundland will come under consideration. I should like to draw the minister's attention to a couple of locations on the west coast of Newfoundland in my riding of Humber-St. George's which I think might receive consideration. My constituency has been described by a former prime minister of Newfoundland as the garden of Newfoundland. There are many places where national parks could be established. I particularly wish to mention the Serpentine area and the upper Humber. The valley of the Serpentine river is renowned both in Newfoundland and outside for its beauty. Standing on the well-wooded hills overlooking Serpentine lake and river one beholds a panorama of beauty. As I understand a national park it is a place where travellers, visitors or tourists may drive off the highway, enter and relax. To my mind the Serpentine area is ideal for this purpose, and the same remarks would apply to the valley of the upper Humber. These areas abound in wildlife of all kinds, including caribou, moose, wildfowl, and so on. There are other similar places in my riding as well, but all I wish to do is draw the attention of the minister to these points and to my riding in general, so that when the time comes to consider the establishment of a national park the west coast may not be forgotten. I feel sure Newfoundland will be treated well, that it will be surveyed and the most suitable place for the park selected.

Mr. Winters: Possible sites for national parks in Newfoundland have been under consideration and study by officials of the department. At the present time one of our officials is on his way back to Ottawa after conducting a survey of the Serpentine area to determine its suitability as a national park.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to direct one inquiry to the minister. Though it is not covered by any particular item, I know it has his personal blessing and the blessing of the department and the government. I refer to the possible tidal development at the head of the bay of Fundy, which was brought before this house by the hon. member for Westmorland. At that time the minister gave the assurance that a survey would be made. I understand that a survey has been made, and I should like to know if the minister is prepared to make a report. This is one of the greatest tidal development possibilities in the world; it is calculated that more power can be produced there than in the international section of the St. Lawrence river. It is estimated that the power available will amount to 2,300,000 horsepower. Is the minister prepared today to report on the position at the present time?

Mr. Winters: I am well aware of the interest my hon. friend has in that project, which has tremendous potentialities. It involves the use of the great tides in the bay of Fundy. The particular one to which he has reference would require both a low water basin and a high water basin with an average head, I would imagine, of from twenty to twenty-five feet over the twenty-four hour period. Mr. W. A. Melanson, of whom we have heard in this house before, wrote a report on this development, which I have read. It really was not an engineering treatise, but was more of a general treatment; so we sent one of our departmental engineers from Halifax to discuss the project with Mr. Melanson and make a general survey of the area. That has been done; the matter was discussed with Mr. Melanson, and the engineer flew over the site my hon. friend has in mind at the moment, as well as the other site where the Petitcodiac meets the Memramcook. As yet he has not sent in his report, at least it has not come to my attention.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I thank the minister for the information he has given, though it is still very indefinite. I want to point out how important it is that a decision be arrived at as soon as possible; for this proposal is in conflict with the suggested Chignecto canal, which is being urged so diligently by a great many people in the maritime provinces, and is also in conflict with the reclamation of the largest portion of the marshlands in Nova Scotia. If this tidal development is proceeded with, it will mean that another, though equally effective, plan must be drawn up with respect to the marshlands. That is why I point out that it is doubly urgent that a decision be arrived at as soon as possible.

Mr. Higgins: I should like to endorse the plea of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's with respect to a national park in the area he mentioned. In my opinion that is the most suitable area in Newfoundland.

Unfortunately it is not in my riding, but that is where I believe the park should be established. I notice that according to the estimates this vote has been cut by $1,178,872, from which it would appear that it is not intended to do very much this year. I believe some $50 million have been spent on national parks in Canada, of which I understand some $30 million has been spent in Alberta. I do not know how much you would expect to spend on a national park in the newest province if you should decide to establish one, but it will take a considerable amount of money, and I suggest that an item be placed in the estimates very soon.

This brings me to my next point, in connection with the trans-Canada highway. I take it the idea would be to put that highway through the national park, or at least have it go to the park. I do not know whether the minister is prepared to tell us anything today about the proposed trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland. If he is not, I shall not embarrass him by asking the question, but it has been announced that some changes have been made and that the provincial minister of public works has agreed to them. I was wondering if the minister could tell us what those changes are.

My next question has to do with a water power survey, which I understand comes under this department. Has any application been made by the province for a water power survey, and, if it has, was it agreed to or turned down?

My last question has to do with the development of the tourist industry in my province. I understand the gentleman you call Mr. Travel of Canada will be going to Newfoundland shortly, and we are hoping for great things as a result of his visit. Through the minister, however, I would ask the government to assist in every way in developing the tourist industry in Newfoundland, because we need a great deal of help to make up for the unfortunate results of things over which we had no control so far as the development of our tourist industry was concerned.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It seems to me the last three speakers have asked questions which would come under specific items. Matters relating to the trans-Canada highway, for instance, would come under item 394. Parks and historic sites would come under item 365, and water power projects might properly be discussed under item 360. If the general discussion is finished I think item 358 should be carried and specific questions asked on the particular items.

Mr. Higgins: The only reason I asked those questions was that I have to go to a committee meeting at four o'clock.

[Mr. Higgins.]

The Deputy Chairman: I can appreciate the hon. gentleman's position, but the rules do not provide that hon. members may ask specific questions on the general administration item just because they have to go to committee meetings. It is unfortunate, but I must abide by the rules.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I have one subject to which I wish to refer.

Mr. Winters: In that case, I wonder if the leader of the opposition would allow me to answer the questions which have been raised?

Mr. Drew: Certainly.

Mr. Winters: The trans-Canada highway project in Newfoundland is one that I hope will come to a head shortly. It was suggested here this morning that the first work should be on a road from Gander to St. John's on the east and from Port aux Basques to Corner Brook on the west. With that I agree. I hope that if and when the agreement is completed, Newfoundland will see fit to proceed on that basis.

Reference was made to the policy as to the trans-Canada highway going through a national park. That situation occurs, of course, in some of the western provinces, in which case the federal government pays the total amount of the costs of building the trans-Canada highway.

The question was asked whether we had been asked by the government of Newfoundland to undertake a water power survey. To my knowledge, and since my time in this department, there has been no request from the government of Newfoundland; but we have entered into an arrangement with Newfoundland for the normal stream surveys involving water flows and that sort of information. These surveys are going forward now in co-operation with the government of Newfoundland.

Mr. Drew: The subject that I wish to discuss is one which admittedly embraces the activities of different departments, but it relates to a definite responsibility of this department. For that reason I believe it is appropriate to bring it up for consideration on this first general item, because I do not know that there is any one department to which it could more appropriately apply. The subject to which I refer is the manner in which the problem that has been presented by the flooding in Manitoba is to be dealt with.

Mr. Winters: Would that not be more appropriately discussed under the heading of the international joint commission under the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Chairman; not the aspect that I propose to deal with. I would point out that the Department of Resources and Development has a direct interest in this problem through its interest in the National Housing Act and the effect of these floodings on its own interests in that area. There is also the question of the waterways involved, because this department is already making surveys of other waterways. It is for the reason that these two subjects come directly under this department that I believe it would be appropriate that I make certain observations now, recognizing as I do that a number of related subjects are obviously at the present time outside the field of this department.

I wish to place before the government my belief that some new approach should be made to the over-all problem that is faced today in Manitoba. First of all may I make it quite clear that in any remarks I make I am certainly not suggesting that there should be the slightest attempt to override the executive jurisdiction of the provincial governments over municipal law and municipal administration. Nor am I suggesting that the plans that should be developed would at any time fail to recognize the authority under the British North America Act of the provincial or municipal elected bodies and their administrative officials. There are, however, reasons why, it seems to me, I should place this suggestion before the minister now, so that if the government finds that it can agree with the proposal put before it, there will be time to bring it into effect.

There has been a certain amount of discussion of the question whether this great disaster, affecting not only the city of Winnipeg but also the tremendous area from Winnipeg south to the border of the United States, should be dealt with entirely by the provincial government or by some combined organization within the provincial area, or whether there should be some direct intervention by the dominion government. I believe that it is necessary that a bill be introduced in the House of Commons—I suggest it would be appropriate that the Minister of Resources and Development introduce it, having regard to the concern of his department already with this question—so that provision which does not now exist might be made for effective co-operation among dominion, provincial and municipal authorities in dealing with this complex question.

When it is said that this is entirely a provincial matter—and I qualify that by making it quite clear that the Prime Minister stated that the dominion government intends to accept responsibility for the financial aspect of the problem—when it is said that it is a matter that should be be handled entirely within the province, it should be pointed out that the dominion government is irrevocably involved in this whole question now, and that it cannot divest itself of the direct responsibility and the direct interest that it already has on a large scale.

It is my opinion—and I believe it is shared by everyone else who has seen that area—that this is the greatest disaster of the kind which has ever occurred on this continent. It is nothing but a miracle that there was no substantial loss of life as a result of the floods. But although there was not a large number of deaths—and all of us will rejoice in that fact—we have seen nothing comparable with the damage to this large city itself and to the country stretching more than eighty miles to the south.

My own impression is that the extent of the disaster will not be known for some considerable time. The unhappy truth is that many people will hardly be aware of the extent of their own losses until the water has receded and they can determine not only the damage to their houses, their furniture and other belongings, but also the immense amount of work which will be required to restore the land around the house, to remove the wreckage and to repair the erosion that has taken place in areas where a heavy current has been running continuously for weeks.

I would point out that the dominion government is deeply and directly committed in several ways. For instance, it has direct interest and direct obligation under such legislation as the National Housing Act, the Veterans Land Act, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and related legislation.

A great many of the homes, still largely under water even at this date, in the flood area of Winnipeg, are homes where these direct interests of the dominion government are substantially involved. Moreover, in the great area to the south of Winnipeg the dominion government has a direct concern under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and other legislation which affects the rural areas.

There is another way in which the dominion government comes directly into this. The Red river is a navigable stream; so also are some of the other rivers concerned. For that very reason they come under the authority of the dominion government, and the working out of arrangements in connection with these rivers would, I submit, come within the scope of the responsibilities of this department.

There is another aspect to this problem. In both the Red and the Souris, which empties into the Assiniboine, the waters rise on the United States side of the border. Therefore, since they are international waters, those waters can only be dealt with effectively by the dominion government. In the period of reconstruction that will follow the arrangements that are made to deal with this situation, it will be necessary to have regard to the international aspect of this whole question, and it will be necessary for the dominion government to bring into operation the machinery of the international joint commission, and also to take care that on the Canadian side of the border whatever is done is done in conformity with the international arrangements.

Furthermore, it will be necessary for the Canadian government to take such steps as are appropriate to persuade the federal government of the United States, and through them the state governments concerned, that certain things should be done if an examination should determine that there are things to be done on the other side of the international boundary.

I submit that with all these direct interests and responsibilities of the dominion government involved it is essential that there be some general authority which can bring together dominion agencies concerned, whether they be departments of government or agencies of government, and also the provincial government within its own field and others who are concerned with this work.

May I emphasize again that in setting up any such authority I would be very insistent that there should be no attempt in any way to invade the field of provincial jurisdiction under the British North America Act. However, that is not necessary because if this agency is created it can bring the provincial and municipal authorities into a joint plan which would make it possible to deal with the whole broad question without always being uncertain as to how the various rights of the dominion government were to be dealt with when they arose in these areas.

As the minister knows from having seen this area personally, it is going to be a heartbreaking experience for many thousands of people. The exodus of people from the city of Winnipeg, involving some 110,000, is the largest movement of people out of any city in our history. We probably would never have expected that even in war it would have been necessary to contemplate the movement of people out of any city in such numbers as that. That movement, made necessary by the threat which was so gallantly met by the people of Winnipeg and of the surrounding country, has of course imposed tremendous financial obligations on all the people who are affected; and those financial obligations are going to be very severe, quite apart from the personal losses which are involved in connection with damage to the property itself.

The question arises as to whether it is not essential also that there be some way in which this great return movement can be handled by the dominion government; and also whether it may not be necessary, in co-operation with the provincial and municipal authorities, to be able to establish in regard to reopening of property certain provisions that relate to the safety of the buildings, from both structural and health considerations, and the very important consideration of the state of electric wiring in these houses which have been flooded for so long. All these are things that would seem to require some authority that does not now exist.

I suggest to the minister that, in the light of this experience but not solely for the purpose of dealing with this particular disaster, it would be wise to introduce a very simple act, which could be dealt with at this session, to provide that in the case of what may be regarded as a national emergency it will be possible to declare such an emergency a national emergency; and under these circumstances to set up an agency which will be able to co-operate with the provincial and municipal bodies, all voluntary organizations, as well as to co-ordinate the activities of the various departments of government concerned.

With such legislation it would be possible for the dominion government to bring together representatives of all these departments which have these various interests, and fully respecting the provincial and municipal jurisdiction, to bring into effective co-operation the representatives of the municipal bodies. May I at this point say, what I am sure everyone has found who has had contact with them, that the municipal councils —and there are many concerned—and the agencies that they have created have done a truly magnificent job of which every Canadian should be proud. This was a great example to the whole of Canada, because rapidly improvised methods found the full support of every citizen.

One of the things which were constantly emphasized in the discussions on this subject was the spirit of the young people, who worked day and night in their fight against flood waters, and who contributed such a tremendous effort, because of their physical strength, to the building of the dikes and the maintenance of the various structures that actually succeeded in holding back the floods, and protecting great areas of property which otherwise would have been very badly damaged and some destroyed. It has been a great example and a great co-operative effort of unselfish people, because probably the majority of those doing this very heavy work day and night were not those who were directly affected at the moment by what was happening in their own homes.

Because of that it does seem that those of us who in this chamber represent all of Canada should do everything we can to recognize the spirit that was shown; and one of the things which certainly should be in the mind of each of us is that when these people return to their homes to find the walls damaged, the foundations weakened, probably a considerable part of the interior structure such that it must be removed, their furniture and house fittings badly damaged, they will need encouragement and some measure of certainty as to what they are going to be able to do to restore their property. While they have been assured that they will receive support, as yet that has not taken sufficiently definite form for them to know exactly what they can do and to assume the commitments which will be necessary in order to restore their homes and their farms, or whatever property may have been affected by these floods.

I do not want my remarks respecting my suggestion about the introduction of legislation to affect one way or another what I say about the necessity for some early decision, because that is quite independent of whether legislation is introduced or not. I submit that what is essential, now that the flood waters are falling fairly rapidly, is that at the earliest possible moment they know, in as exact terms as possible, what they can expect, so that they may plan for the future.

Thousands of veterans and others who have committed all their savings to these homes, which have been built under various plans or through their own personal arrangements, have all their savings involved. They are not going to be able to start to rebuild; they are not going to be able to put in furniture and other things which have been destroyed unless and until they know, in reasonably exact terms, what they are going to have for that purpose.

The calendar itself demands very early action. This is a tremendous reconstruction job not only in the city of Winnipeg, but in the whole of that great area south of Winnipeg extending to the United States border. It is going to impose great demands on those skilled in construction work. It is going to impose great demands on electrical supply and other establishments. It is going to impose great demands on the health authorities. It is going to impose great demands on the various public works organizations of the provincial and municipal governments.

Unless a start is made on a broad scale immediately it will not be possible to complete this work by the time the snow comes later this year. Every effort should be made to get ahead with it as soon as possible. Splendid plans have been completed for proceeding with the work—for examining houses, to see whether they are strong; for checking houses as to the condition of wiring; for cleaning them out, and for certifying as to their health conditions and making sure that there is no danger of epidemics through the reoccupation of those homes. All that is ready to proceed, but it will all depend upon knowledge of what is to be done.

In this I am basing my remarks upon conversations with officials of various municipal bodies. They are greatly concerned about how the whole problem is to be met and what the financial arrangements are to be, so that they may make the necessary commitments just as soon as possible to proceed with this work as the water recedes.

I do not intend to extend these remarks further, beyond saying again that I urge consideration of legislation that would make it possible to deal with this by some dominion agency which would bring together, on a voluntary basis and in effective co-operation, all the departments of the dominion government affected, the provincial and municipal authorities, and all those splendid voluntary organizations such as the Red Cross, the St. John Ambulance and other bodies of the kind which have done so well and have rendered such magnificent service.

Then again there is the immediate and urgent need for a decision as to what will be paid in both urban and rural areas, so that plans can be made to get ahead with this work just as soon as possible. In the cities and towns it is a case of rebuilding. Over a great part of the rural area it is likely that they will not have crops this year. They have lost their feed grain; they have lost their seed grain; they have lost large numbers of animals. Then, on top of all that, on the farms it is not only a question of the reconstruction of homes but one involving the enormous undertaking of rebuilding roads, restoring bridges and culverts, digging out silted areas, and generally restoring transportation facilities in the parts now flooded.

I have raised the question at this point because of the interest of the minister in some parts of it, but recognizing that this is a decision which the government as a whole must make. I also recognize the fact that the minister himself went to see what the problem was. I feel I am not assuming too much when I say confidently that every member of the House of Commons will wish that whatever can be done for these people shall be done just as quickly and as effectively as possible.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to make a request which concerns most of the subsequent items in the minister's department. Reference has been made to increases in details common to every item. I refer to travelling expenses and sundries. I would ask the minister, before we reach a discussion of details of the estimates, whether it will be possible to have the details I have indicated, including the figures for actual expenditures for the fiscal year ended March 31, so that we may compare what was spent last year with what is being asked for this year.

Mr. Winters: Yes; we have the figures showing actual expenditures last year in respect of each item.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I would ask the minister for information respecting the details in these items. I find provision for editorial costs sufficient to run most of the newspapers in this country. Here are some of the positions:

1 chief, editorial and information division..	$5,280
1 editor, grade 3	3,960
1 editor, grade 2	3,540
1 editor, grade 1	2,880
2 assistant editors: one at $2,580; one at $2,550	5,130

Then in addition there are other administrative officers, stenographers, clerks and so on. Most of these positions are new and I think the committee is entitled to an explanation.

Mr. Graydon: With all these editors it looks like a newspaper office.

Mr. Winters: By way of general explanation to the hon. member for Cumberland I would say that this department results from the reconstitution of two other departments and naturally in the reshuffle many of the positions went with one or another department, while some new positions had to be set up as are shown in the estimates at this time. If the hon. member has any particular item in mind I shall be pleased to explain it.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Does the minister state that all these editors are necessary?

Mr. Winters: Most of these positions were in the old department of mines and resources and are now in this department. The editorial staff is considered necessary for the editing of the many publications got out by the department. For example, the parks branch and the forestry branch issue many publications which are considered to be in the public interest.

Mr. Noseworthy: Could the minister make a statement with regard to the original wartime houses that were turned over to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation? What is the average amount per house that has been spent to make these houses permanent? What number has been sold and what number remains unsold? What price is being asked for those still unsold?

Mr. Winters: If the hon. member has no objection I should like to deal with those questions when we are discussing the item on housing. There are two items dealing with housing, one covering loans and investments, and then there is another direct vote.

Mr. Hodgson: I notice from the details that there is a new position, director of administration. Is that a transfer from one department to the other?

Mr. Winters: That is simply a change in title; it is not a new position.

Mr. Fulton: How many publications were issued by the department last year?

Mr. Winters: I do not have the exact figure, but I am informed it is something over 100.

Mr. Fulton: Would that be the total number of publications or would there be magazines going out every month?

Mr. Winters: One hundred different publications. We issue technical data from time to time on research matters, and then the parks and forestry divisions and national museum put out publications dealing with a wide variety of subjects. In all they total up to at least 100 publications.

Mr. Fulton: Would it be possible between now and the time we conclude with these estimates for the minister to furnish a list of the publications put out in the last fiscal year?

Mr. Winters: I will undertake to get that information. If I cannot have it by the time these estimates are concluded I shall send it to the hon. member.

Mr. Hodgson: The total travelling expenses for this department are $309,000, with $7,000 for the administration section. Could the minister give us the details of that item of $7,000?

Mr. Winters: That would cover the travelling expenses of the minister, of the parliamentary assistant, of the deputy minister, of the secretaries and of everyone that would come under this general administration vote.

Mr. Hodgson: How much of that $7,000 was spent last year?

Mr. Winters: The total amount spent last year was $12,982.61.

Mr. Hodgson: You overran your vote last year by $5,000, nearly double?

Mr. Winters: It is difficult to sort these out because three departments have resulted from two old ones.

Mr. Hodgson: Your vote last year was $7,000, and $12,982 was spent.

Mr. Winters: If you prorated it for last year the amount relating to the Department of Mines and Resources would be $7,000.

Mr. Knowles: I understood the minister to say that some of this was for travelling expenses of the parliamentary assistant. I have no grudge against parliamentary assistants but I am concerned about their technical position. I would point out that item 178 provides for additional salaries for the parliamentary assistants and it goes to the length of stating that they can get this money notwithstanding the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act and the Senate and House of Commons Act, and so on. In the one experience I had of travelling on government business when I was sent over to the United Nations an order in council was necessary so that my expenses could be paid.

Mr. Hodgson: You are sitting with the opposition.

Mr. Knowles: I imagine other hon. members have had the same experience. I would not want the parliamentary assistants to lose their seats because they are getting money that they should not be getting. I might want them to lose their seats for other reasons.

Mr. Winters: The travelling expenses of the parliamentary assistant come within this administration vote.

Mr. Knowles: I will not pursue it much further, although I may seek information from different sources, from the Auditor General for example. I am simply wondering why it is that the salaries of the parliamentary assistants must be provided for by a special item so that they will not lose their right to be members of parliament by accepting this money. Why is it, when a member is sent on a trip on government business, that there has to be an order in council to make sure that he can get the money without losing his seat in parliament, and yet here expense money can be paid without any such provision being made?

Mr. Green: Why was it necessary to increase the staff for departmental administration from 93 to 122? When there were additional departments established last year we understood it would mean each of the new departments would be smaller. Here we have an increase from 93 to 122.

Mr. Winters: A number of people were brought under administration who previously were in other branches of the department or in the departments that were split up to form this department. Here again it is very difficult to compare directly. What we have tried to do is to make the best breakdown we can for 1949-50 and show against it the number of people employed for 1950-51.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Chairman, the discussion has ranged all the way from national historic sites to iron mining and back again. There are one or two observations I should like to make as a result of the remarks of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. I refer to the enormous waste of our forest resources by forest fires. In the province of Ontario if I do some damage when driving my motorcar I am held liable for it. It would seem to me that more thorough investigation of forest fires should be carried out, and where it is possible to fix the blame the person responsible for the damage should be made to pay for it. There would not be as much carelessness in starting fires or careless use of inflammable materials causing this great loss throughout the nation. I also think a greater amount of research and investigation should be carried on as to insects and fungus diseases attacking our forests. May I say that a celebration is to be held this summer at what was once known as Fairfield village in southwestern Ontario, which is now a national historic site. It is planned that the President of the United States, the Prime Minister of Canada and other dignitaries will be present to commemorate Fairfield village. I should also like to mention the name of a former member of the house, John R. MacNicol, who was most interested in Fairfield village and devoted a lot of time and work to it.

Item agreed to.

Development services branch—

Water resources division —

360. Water resources division, including the administration of the dominion water power and irrigation acts, and including grant of $350 to the international executive council, world power conference, $541,766.

Mr. Lennard: Some time during the discussion of the estimates I wish to raise the question of the serious erosion taking place along the shores of the great lakes. I rise now to ask the minister whether it comes under his department or that of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Winters: It does not come under the jurisdiction of this department. As I understand it, that is a matter for public works.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister whether the administration of the Dominion Water Power Act and that of the Irrigation Act come under his department.

Mr. Winters: They do.

Mr. Fulton: Section 11 of the Dominion Water Power Act states:

> All investigations and surveys and all undertakings shall, subject to the control of the minister, and for the purposes of this act, be under the direction of a duly qualified officer to be designated the "director of water power."

That is in the revised statutes of 1927. It is possible there has been an amendment to the title since then but I could not find it. Is that the name under which that officer is still known or is there a change in it?

Mr. Winters: He is known now as chief of the water resources division.

Mr. Fulton: Then he is the man who is No. 1 in the details of this item at page 247.

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Mr. Fulton: Is he a member of the Fraser river basin board, or is there anyone from this branch on that board?

Mr. Winters: It is either he or one of his staff.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the Fraser river basin board was appointed after the Fraser river flood of 1948. From time to time we have asked questions in the house as to the progress being made by the board. The latest report I have was sent to me in a letter dated May 12 by the Minister of Public Works. The report was dated March 8, 1950, but it is entirely an interim report. At this stage I will not weary the committee with any of the details but I will say that it is entirely an interim report. Although the board has been constituted now for a year and a half it makes it clear that it is unable to make any specific recommendations. The work has not progressed to that extent. From time to time I have had conversations about this matter with the Minister of Public Works, a member of whose staff is also on the board.

I think I would be fair in saying as a result of those conversations that it appears —and I think it is borne out by the fact that we have not got any further than the stage of an interim report so far—that no department of the federal government has taken this matter completely under its wing to push it along so far as the dominion is concerned. Would not the minister consider it appropriate, since the water resources division is under this department—and I am not in any sense trying to cast aspersions on any other department—that the federal side of the Fraser river basin board be placed squarely under his department and that he be given charge of the matter in so far as the federal interest is concerned?

Mr. Winters: The Minister of Public Works now has the responsibility for federal operation in that field. I am sure he and I can discuss the point raised by my hon. friend and give it consideration.

Mr. Fulton: I hope the minister will do that. I should like to make one other observation in this connection. As I say, I am genuinely not trying to raise an issue for the sake of making difficulty. I think that if progress is to be made in this matter it might more properly come under the Department of Resources and Development. I do not want to take up too much time in discussing floods or the possibilities of floods in British Columbia when there are at the present time floods and other disasters in other parts of the country. I will not go any further at the present time than to say this. The possibility of floods in the Fraser river system in British Columbia is still present at this moment, and has been causing a great deal of concern to those who remember what happened only two years ago. The suggestion put forward in connection with flood control for the future is that a survey be made of the whole river system, which in this case is entirely within Canada, with a view to putting up dams or reservoirs at the headwaters and source lakes of the system, and that the whole project be carried out having in mind the possibility of developing a joint flood control, irrigation and power development scheme.

All these aspects are covered in this interim report, and for that reason I say that if this aspect is to be put forward particularly the matter which would fall more properly under the Department of Resources and Development, working in conjunction with the provincial authorities, might then become a matter for the Department of Public Works. So I I hope the minister will have those conversations with the Minister of Public Works, and that if the project is transferred from one department to the other he will take a personal interest in it, since he has an official working on it, and try to get the survey speeded up and a recommendation made so that work may commence.

Mr. Argue: I want to ask just a short question for the sake of information. Could the minister inform the committee whether under this vote any surveys are being conducted in Saskatchewan with respect to irrigation development, and just what is the division of work and responsibility between his department and the Department of Agriculture, under item No. 40?

Mr. Winters: No work is being carried on under this vote in Saskatchewan in connection with irrigation. The only work carried on under this vote is stream measurement. As between this department and the Department of Agriculture, if a project is primarily one of irrigation it comes within the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture. If it is primarily a matter of power development it would fall within the jurisdiction of this department.

Mr. Catherwood: Under this item I see an amount of $121,200 for field surveys. Would the minister tell us just where this work is being done?

The Deputy Chairman: We are now discussing item No. 360. I believe the hon. member's question would come more properly under item 361.

Mr. Winters: This item is to provide for operations in six district offices based at Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg, Ottawa, Montreal and Halifax, with nine sub-offices from which some fifty field engineers are engaged upon field hydrometric work throughout the year. These men travel almost continuously establishing and maintaining gauging stations, making measurements, and so forth. It applies in all provinces of Canada.

Mr. Catherwood: In connection with this Columbia river watershed, I believe the minister who was in charge of the Department of Mines and Resources last year told us it would take two years to complete this work. I believe some $1,125,000 has been spent already. Can the minister say whether this work will be completed this year?

Mr. Winters: That comes under the next item. Am I to understand that we have completed item 360?

Mr. Catherwood: I thought the chairman said we were on item 361.

The Chairman: No; I said the question asked by the hon. member should have been asked on item 361.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask a question referring to the prairie provinces water board. I understand the controller of the dominion water power bureau, which comes under this department, is one of the two federal representatives on this board. Last year we were told there were meetings of this board with representatives of the governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba in reference to the possibilities and results of the diversion of the waters of the Saskatchewan, particularly at a point near Elbow, Saskatchewan. I should like to ascertain whether this board is meeting, how many meetings it held last year, and what arrangements if any have been entered into with the representatives of the western provinces as to the diversion of some of the waters of the Saskatchewan in order to establish irrigation or power projects on that river.

Mr. Winters: When this matter was dealt with last year I believe I informed the hon. member for Lake Centre that it is being handled by the Department of Agriculture, since it is primarily an irrigation problem. It is true that people from my department serve on that board, but it is subject to call by Mr. Thomson, who is an officer of P.F.R.A.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many members make up the board, and how many are from your department?

Mr. Winters: I believe there are two from the Department of Resources and Development. I shall be glad to give my hon. friend the full composition of the board later; I do not have it here at the moment. I now understand from the Minister of Agriculture, who is in the chamber, that the board is composed of five members.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And has this board arrived at any agreements or arrangements with the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, or either of them, in regard to the diversion of water?

Mr. Gardiner: If I may say a word, I think it would be better to ask that question when my estimates are before the committee, because I will have all the information available at that time. There have been meetings and discussions as to the amount of water that might be permitted to go from one province to another, but I will have all that information when my estimates came up. There are five members on the board, and the chairman is Mr. L. B. Thomson, director of P.F.R.A. work. There is a representative from each of the three provinces and one from the Department of Resources and Development. The board meets from time to time and relies upon information such as that mentioned a few moments ago, concerning streams which are measured and have been measured for a number of years by the department concerned. Those measurements are matters of record with the P.F.R.A. at Regina.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As long as it is clearly understood that when we get to P.F.R.A. we will not be met again with the argument that this board is under the Department of Resources and Development.

Mr. Winters: I think that has been made clear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then who has responsibility for the administration of this board, the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Resources and Development?

Mr. Winters: The Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has it been transferred to the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. Gardiner: It was never anywhere else.

Mr. Winters: The minister is quite right; it was never anywhere else.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is right in the report of the Department of Mines and Resources as being under the charge of the Minister of Mines and Resources. As a matter of fact, it cannot be in the Department of Agriculture because it is in the annual report of the Department of Mines and Resources.

Mr. Winters: That may be. Each department may report its operations as a contributor to that board since they have representation on that board.

Mr. Graydon: Is Mr. Howe in there somewhere?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many meetings of this board were held in 1949?

Mr. Gardiner: The proper time to have that question answered is on my estimates. There have been two or three that I know of, but I am not going to give that as an answer to the question. The records are in our department and they will be here when we are considering our estimates. I do not think, however, that I should try to answer that question on the estimates of the Department of Resources and Development.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I quite agree with that statement. What has surprised me is that the minister came into it at all; because this board is set up under the department of the minister whose estimates are now before the committee.

Mr. Gardiner: No, it is not. You are wrong.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It operates under that department. In that report of 1948-49 that is made clear in these words:

> The controller of the bureau acts as one of the two dominion representatives on this board which was organized during the year to study the interprovincial waterway problems of the prairie provinces. Meetings were held at Regina in November and February.

Mr. Winters: That of course just means, as I understand it—and I think this is correct—that each department operates within its own jurisdiction and makes what contribution it can to the board. But as the Minister of Agriculture has said, the board operates under Mr. Thomson who is a member of the P.F.R.A. committee.

Mr. Gardiner: Our representative is the chairman.

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What contribution does the Department of Resources and Development make to this board? It has a representative on it. There are quite a few expenditures in connection with it from this department. What do the minister's officials do, and what contribution does his department make to this board to justify the expenditure that is charged under the estimates by this department?

Mr. Winters: We attempt to provide technical assistance and advice to the board as required.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has any technical assistance been given? If so, what? This matter of irrigation plans in Saskatchewan is one which it is difficult to get to the bottom of. I want to know as much as I can before the Minister of Agriculture comes along. The people in the province of Saskatchewan are asking what is being done. With the bifurcation of authority and responsibility between the department of the minister whose estimates are now before the committee and the Department of Agriculture, it is difficult to get any information. I ask the minister this question. How much is the anticipated expenditure by his department in respect of this board during the coming year?

Mr. Winters: The only expenditure charged against this department for the work of that board would be the travelling expenses of the officials concerned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just travelling expenses?

Mr. Winters: Just travelling expenses.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Nothing else?

Mr. Winters: Nothing else.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who are the technicians? What technicians are attached to it?

Mr. Winters: You mean the names of the officials from this department on that board?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Marr, chief of the water resources division; and Mr. Hoover, who is the department representative in the Calgary office.

Mr. Fulton: To go back to the matter of the British Columbia board which I was referring to before, under the Dominion Water Power Act, section 10, subsection 4:

The minister may enter into co-operative agreements with the authorities of any of the provinces for the making of stream measurements, the carrying on of investigations, and the collection and publication of data respecting water and power resources, and the best methods of utilizing the same.

Apart from this Fraser river basin board to which reference has been made, have any studies been carried on by this department under that section in so far as British Columbia is concerned? If so, what were the reports? Where are they available? How can one get hold of them?

Mr. Winters: Stream measurements are made of all the important streams in British Columbia. The results of the surveys are available in the department office in Vancouver. They are published from time to time.

Mr. Fulton: What I am wondering is whether they cover the same information as is now being covered by this board; because the board makes it a large task, they have to make the surveys and get the information necessary before any work can be started. I have been protesting the length of time it is taking to get this work going. That is why I am wondering how complete any previous work and surveys may have been under that section.

Mr. Winters: By and large, the measurements of streams just cover water flow and that sort of thing. This is a broader survey that is dealt with, as my hon. friend will find under the Department of Public Works vote 351, which is for the Fraser river, "50 per cent of cost of investigations to be carried out by the dominion-provincial board Fraser river basin".

Mr. Fulton: I know that. As I said earlier this afternoon, I think that the Minister of Resources and Development should take a personal interest in the matter. I find that under the Dominion Water Power Act there is provision for these joint surveys to be made with provincial authorities, and I am asking the minister to what extent those surveys were made in the past. I cannot quite understand why it has taken all this time since the Fraser river basin board was set up. All we have at the moment is merely an interim report. I am asking the minister to what extent these joint surveys were made in the past and why it is necessary that there should be such great delay now.

Mr. Winters: This is a much broader survey. The normal surveys in the past, under the act to which my hon. friend refers, were usually confined to measurements of stream flow.

Mr. Fulton: The minister said that he will follow the matter up with the Department of Public Works, so I will not press it now except to ask him if he can give me the names and positions of the officials from his department who are members of that board.

Mr. Winters: Yes. I will get that information, Mr. Chairman, and send it to the hon. member.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Has the department any official permanently located in Newfoundland?

Mr. Winters: Yes, we have.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will you give me the name of that official and tell me where he is located?

Mr. Winters: There is an official in Newfoundland. His name is Mr. J. E. Peters.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Situated in St. John's?

Mr. Winters: In St. John's, yes.

Development services branch—

361. To provide for studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed in Canada, $380,000.

Mr. Herridge: I was shocked this morning to hear from the Minister of Resources and Development that he was not quite certain whether the discovery of the Columbia was of national significance. I am pleased to see that from the point of view of development the minister considers it of national significance, although I cannot follow his reasoning in that respect.

Mr. Winters: No, Mr. Chairman; I said the discovery of the river was of the greatest national significance but that the historical significance was something to be determined by the national historic sites and monuments board.

Mr. Herridge: I think the minister is splitting hairs, but I am pleased to see that he considers the development of the Columbia of national significance, by this vote 361, to provide for studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed in Canada. This item is a matter of great interest to my constituents, because the whole of my constituency lies within the Columbia river basin. They have been interested in these surveys and studies while they have been in progress since 1945, I think.

Can the minister give the committee a statement as to the progress made to date in connection with these studies, and the possible time it will take to complete them? Can he assure the committee that when the final development takes place on the Columbia we will not do as was done when the Grand Coulee dam was built, and surrender a treaty right granted to us under article II of the Oregon treaty, 1846, without any protest whatever from any department of this government? When the United States government built the Grand Coulee dam on the Columbia river in contravention of article II of the Oregon treaty, which provided navigation in perpetuity to the sea for Canadian residents on the Columbia river, there was no protest from the Canadian government.

In addition, will the minister tell the committee what notice will be given to the people of Canada, and the people directly concerned, with respect to hearings by the international joint commission before developments take place? Can some further publicity be given in the press for the information of the Canadian people regarding these most interesting surveys and studies in relation to, shall I say, the Garden of Eden of Canada?

Mr. Winters: To answer the last question first, the international joint commission operates under my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I would not like to attempt to answer the question as to how much notice can be given. I understand that an attempt is made to give adequate notice.

The total amount of work done so far since 1944 in connection with this work is as follows: The amount of $1,176,544.45 has been expended by the government of Canada on the investigations of the Columbia river. It is not known how long it will take to complete this work because of the uncertainties entailed, as one goes along with the surveys; but it would appear that on a rough guess it will take about five years to complete the field work necessary, and that there will be a further considerable amount on money required over that period of years.

Mr. Fulton: I wish to associate myself with what has been said by the hon. member for Kootenay West. He and I share the river. My part of it lies between the two that go through his. It is a matter of great concern and urgency to the people out there if for no other reason than that, at the present time, for one thing, there is a lot of bank erosion caused by the flood waters of the river. I would hope that the field work might be done in even less than five years. I simply support the hon. member in his request that it be proceeded with as rapidly as possible.

Mr. Catherwood: We have not been given a breakdown of the details. Can the minister give the details of this expenditure?

Mr. Winters: I presume what my hon. friend wants is a breakdown of $380,000. It is broken down as follows: river investigations, $50,200; collection of stream flow data, $29,075; geological investigations, $4,000; topographical surveys, $84,000; meteorological surveys, $3,800; soil surveys, $3,500; groundwater surveys, $3,860; damsite investigations, $106,985; bathymetric surveys, $21,000; supervision and office, $48,580; design and estimates, $25,000.

Item agreed to.

362. Lake of the Woods control board, $12,480.

Mr. Hodgson: What is the function of this board?

Mr. Winters: The board is set up to exercise the responsibility for regulating lake levels in accordance with the treaty and protocol between Canada and the United States, and concurrent legislation with the province of Ontario and the tripartite agreement between Canada, Ontario and Manitoba.

Item agreed to.

364. To provide for excavation of a flood channel at Dalles rapids in Winnipeg river in Ontario to reduce flooding of riparian property affected by regulation under the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act (revote), $60,000.

Mr. Catherwood: There is a large reduction in this proposed expenditure. Is it because of the completion of the channel? What is the situation in this area with regard to the previous expenditure of $170,000?

Mr. Winters: This amount of $60,000 will complete the contract.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Are these properties along the river privately owned?

Mr. Winters: Yes—privately owned.

Item agreed to.

Wildlife division—

365. Wildlife resources conservation and development, including administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, $300,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can the minister tell me whether there has been any investigation of wildlife in Newfoundland?

Mr. Winters: The hon. member means bird life?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, not night life.

Mr. Winters: Yes; there is an officer in Newfoundland to carry out investigations of wildlife.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Has he a staff?

Mr. Winters: He has not yet acquired a staff. Up to date his time has been largely spent in travelling to gather information.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Could I be given his name?

Mr. Winters: Would the hon. member let it go for the time being and I shall pass the information on to him.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes.

Mr. Fulton: This is one of the very important items in the estimates of this department. I am sure the minister also feels that it is important. The actual division between the federal authority and the provincial authority under this Migratory Birds Convention Act is a matter which I for one have never been able to get clearly in my mind. If it will not take too long I hope that when the minister deals with this item he will give us a brief outline of the division.

As I understand—I am referring particularly to the ducks and geese which are some of the migratory birds referred to in the act—one of the major difficulties is the fact that these birds are shot in the United States and in Mexico all the way up and down the flyways which they follow on their various migrations. Some of us in the province from which I come would like to see consideration given to the possibility of a restricted season for at least a year or two. I am not saying it is a firm opinion, but our people feel the possibility should be examined because a lessening of the number of ducks and geese is very noticeable. Naturally our game branch would not contemplate such a thing unless some similar or reciprocal arrangement could be made with the Mexican and American authorities, and those in other countries concerned. I saw figures recently in one of the newspapers of this country indicating that the number of ducks on this continent has gone down to an estimated 47 million when, at one time, I believe there were hundreds of millions. There appears to be a constant increase in the number of those sportsmen who take pleasure in this sport, probably the finest of all sports.

Measuring this against the decline in the number of birds, a decline which I believe was arrested for a while but has since begun to go on the downgrade again, one can see the seriousness of the problem. I have mentioned only one aspect of the matter. It is not in any sense a recommendation, but I do know consideration has been given to the question whether or not it is desirable or necessary to declare a closed season.

Would the minister give his views in the matter, and tell us our relationship to the American and Mexican authorities in this sort of matter, and what has been proposed between the authorities in the dominion and the provinces in this connection?

Mr. Blair: I should like to add to what has been said by the hon. member for Kamloops, and make special reference to the season. Last year the season was set back from September 15 to October 15. In eastern Ontario this meant that all local ducks had departed by that time. The season was too late for the northern ducks coming in, with the result that sportsmen in eastern Ontario who were interested in duck hunting enjoyed practically no shooting.

As a matter of fact I was one of the duck hunters who went out on October 15. I went to a place where normally we had obtained a good bag. May I add that I believe the sportsmen adhered to the restrictions as to the number they should have shot either in one day or in a season. There were no ducks. Later in the season there was no possibility of getting northern ducks.

Another point is this—and I am glad the hon. member for Kamloops has mentioned it —that in this section of the country we are in some places on the flight of the ducks flying down the Atlantic seaboard. We read about ducks along the Atlantic seaboard being destroyed by patches of oil, and that sort of thing. I have always suspected that in Canada we are in the position of raising ducks, but that we do not get a chance to shoot them. We are raising them for somebody else to shoot.

I am not suggesting that we should have a wholesale slaughter of ducks, but I do feel that the ducks nest in Canada. The experience last year certainly showed that there was no possibility in eastern Canada of duck shooting. The other point is that when they fly into the United States they are on the wing and have banded together so that the American sportsmen can follow them all the way down through the United States to the gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean area. It is estimated that last year there were more than two million duck hunters in the United States.

I should like to see preservation of the duck population in this country, and I believe we should do everything possible to maintain it. At the same time our position seems foolish when it appears that we are making an attempt to preserve in this country a duck population which flies into the United States. While they may make regulations, I should like to learn from the minister if those regulations are being observed by the other signatories to the Migratory Birds Convention Act.

As the hon. member for Kamloops has asked, are the terms of the convention being carried out in Cuba, Mexico, the islands of the Caribbean, or the American states bordering the gulf of Mexico? This particular type of wild fowl will never change because it has always nested in Canada. I believe stronger pressure should be put on those countries, and especially the United States, if we are going to preserve the sport of duck hunting—and it is a king's sport. There is not a person who gets it into his blood who does not want to get out in the fall of the year to enjoy duck hunting. We are now in the position where we raise the ducks which go down the flyways and are slaughtered on the other side.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): When the minister replies I hope he will tell us about the mechanics of fixing the open season. I am a charter member of the Calgary fish and game association which, incidentally, is easily the largest association of its kind in Canada. Also I have been closely associated with Ducks Unlimited. We find from various sources much criticism which, in our area, is quite unwarranted. Of course it may be a bad thing to provide water, where there was no water before, where ducks may breed. Then we hear complaints from farmers who live in the neighbouring areas to the effect that the ducks have destroyed their crops.

Lest anyone think that that is nonsense, I know personally that a decent-sized flock of ducks—and by that I mean many thousands—will in one night destroy a quarter section of wheat. So that the complaint is a real one. The difficulty is not so much in what they eat, but in what they destroy with swathed grain. In the swathed grain the duck tramps up and down, eating only a small part of what it destroys. However, I imagine that is a provincial matter.

In other words I believe that under any and all regulations the provinces have the right to issue a special licence to shoot when destruction of grain is imminent. Upon whom does the department rely? I admit that there are different open seasons in different parts of Canada, depending upon the different flyways and the climate in the various areas. How does the government arrange with the United States, for example, that we in Alberta shall have open season on ducks between September 15 and November 15? Is that entirely within our own authority? I think probably it may be, although I do not know.

Out in Alberta we have the experience where no duck is worth shooting on September 15. It is too small and too thin. At that time as a rule they have not begun to eat grain, and we know that the grain-fed duck is the only duck worth eating. When I refer to grain I am referring to many types of grain sown by man.

We used to have it so that the season closed at the end of November. Last year we had a heavy frost which closed all the water in Alberta, so that the ducks went down to our friends in the United States and, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Lanark, they were all gone before anyone had an opportunity to do any shooting. Last fall I saw them on the beautiful fine days, but I found you needed a much stronger weapon to reach them than the gun I had, which was one of the best of those made in England.

I wonder if there could not be a movable feature in setting the end of the season? Last year I believe the season was closed on November 15, but the frost came along before that and we had no shooting. In other years the best shooting has been in the last fifteen days of November. I should hope it would be practical to provide in the regulations a fixed time for opening, but also possible to have a movable date for the close of the season depending on the type of weather that was prevailing. I do not think there would be any objection with regard to the opening date because no sportsman wants to take a bird that is thin and immature, but it is different with regard to the closing dates. These dates could vary in different parts of the country because it is logical that the climatic conditions differ along the border, and the border between Canada and the United States is a long one.

It is important that inquiry be made as to whether other people are observing the rules they have agreed to observe. I do not know what has happened in Mexico recently, but I know up until two years ago shooting for the market was still going on. Now that we have a convention with them it may be that they are carrying out their undertaking much better than they used to. I wish the minister would consider my suggestions, particularly with regard to the end of the season. I know certain people will disagree with me, but my own view is that ample time should be allowed before the season is opened to permit the birds to be fully grown. Then the local authorities should be able to make such regulations as are necessary to protect farmers' crops in the interval.

Mr. Coldwell: In dealing with migratory birds, has consideration been given to paying compensation for the very thing mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary West? Those of us who have lived in the country for a long time have seen crops of wheat, and particularly crops of barley, utterly destroyed by flocks of ducks. Many people enjoy duck shooting but very few farmers whose crops are ruined by ducks or geese feel kindly disposed toward either the birds or the hunters. Some thought should be given to finding ways and means of compensating farmers for their losses.

I am not suggesting that Canada alone should do this as this is an international problem. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary West and the hon. member for Lanark, most of the ducks raised in Canada are shot south of the line. Whether they are shot in the United States, in Mexico or elsewhere does not matter, but certainly some consideration should be given to providing compensation for these farmers. This destruction occurs mainly when the ducks are migrating from the north to the south.

I agree with what the hon. member for Calgary West has said about ducks being immature in September. As a matter of fact, they require some grain to become fleshy or palatable. Ducks that come down from the north often have a strong fishy flavour. I do not want to see these birds suffer the fate of the migratory pigeon which used to come down in thousands but has been extinct for a number of years, but I think we have to consider both the person who enjoys shooting and the farmer who loses his crops because of these migratory birds.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am in entire sympathy with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar but may I say that the fish and game association to which I belong has already done a great deal along that line.

Mr. Coldwell: I know that some organizations do that.

Mr. McLure: Will the minister take into consideration complaints similar to those raised by the hon. members for Lanark and Calgary West in connection with geese and brant? The complaints in this connection are the same as those in connection with ducks.

Mr. Huffman: I am in accord with what the hon. member for Calgary West has stated with respect to the closing dates of a season. Representations have been made to me on behalf of hunters along the shores of lake Erie. In an adjacent area a number of game preserves are registered with the department and no shooting is permitted within a half mile of those preserves. These preserves are in the marshy areas and the ducks are fed there. But the ducks are chased from one preserve to another, the shooting taking place in between. Many people do not have a great deal of time to spend in duck shooting and the representations that have been made to me have been that they would like to be able to shoot over baited areas and the bag limit strictly enforced. I would ask the minister to give this request consideration. They would prefer to have the bag limit examined and carefully taken care of.

Mr. Blair: Before the minister replies, I should like to point out that there is also the question of geese. We know the good work that was done by Jack Miner at his place near Windsor so far as the preservation of geese is concerned. I should like to call the attention of the minister to a situation that existed along the Ottawa river in Renfrew county this spring. Geese came there and there was no previous sanctuary. I understand that the province of Ontario gave some money and possibly there was a dominion grant. Apparently, however, there was not sufficient money to buy enough grain to feed the geese. Some arrangements should be made. I do not know whether there is any idea of establishing a sanctuary but apparently a farmer in the district gave all the grain he could possibly afford to give to feed the geese. He received some small help from the province and I think from the dominion but it was not sufficient. The game wardens were attempting to drive the geese off the grounds before they were ready to go north where the lakes were still frozen. If that situation should develop again I think we should do everything possible to preserve the wild geese together with the ducks because I think wild geese are in the same class as other migratory fowl.

Mr. Winters: At the outset may I say to my hon. friend for St. John's West that the name of the wildlife officer in Newfoundland is G. L. M. Tuck. The matter of the seasons for shooting wildlife is rather complicated. There is an international convention between the United States and Canada, and there are conventions between the United States and Mexico. From time to time we have meetings of our wildlife officers with the provincial wildlife authorities to which we invite people from the United States and Mexico in an effort to co-ordinate the over-all policy as to shooting ducks and other migratory waterfowl. The provinces have their own game legislation and regulations. In general practice once the birds are within a province they are the responsibility of that province. Any change that seems to be indicated in the season would have to be undertaken only at the request of the province concerned.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You fix that. The province does not do it.

Mr. Winters: We fix it but in all cases it is fixed as a result of conferences with the provinces. A survey is continually being carried on as to the habits of ducks, trends in population, reproductive success in Canada, feeding habits and other factors which might have a bearing on the season. These factors are under continual survey, and when and as changes in the seasons are indicated steps are taken to that end. The officials of the department feel that vis-à-vis the United States the hunters of Canada individually enjoy more privileges than do their opposite numbers. The question of compensation for damage is of course a very difficult problem. Many times ducks light on farmers' lands and destroy crops. The farmer may take compassion on the ducks and perhaps put out some feed. Some people feel that induces the ducks to come back there another year whereas if some other steps were taken to discourage the ducks from coming back the destruction might be avoided.

The fact of the matter is that once the ducks are in the province the problem is a provincial one and compensation must be regarded in that light. Permission is normally given to shoot ducks when they become destructive, or to persuade them to go away by some other means. There was the problem in Renfrew county this year to which the hon. member for Lanark referred. The provincial and federal governments put up equal amounts of money for feed. It was reported that there were a large number of geese in the area in a very distressed condition. We sent officials there who reported that there was a sizeable number of geese but not nearly as many as had been reported. We worked in close co-operation with the provincial authorities. We told them that if in their judgment they thought certain action needed to be taken we would co-operate with them to that end. Their officials and ours felt that the best arrangement was not to provide feed to the point where the geese would be encouraged to come back next year to the same area and destroy crops again. The matter is under continual survey, and perhaps some other means can be taken another year.

Mr. Fulton: What is the information of the department as to the present trend in the duck population? I referred to this article which said that it had fallen substantially in the last couple of years. I think the figure given was 47 million, and it was suggested—and I think there is good ground for it—that that is getting dangerously low. What is the information in the department on that question?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): While that is being looked up I should like to ask the minister a simple question. Is it your statement that if the province of Alberta in the fall of 1950 asked you to postpone or advance the closing date of the duck season your department would immediately agree?

Mr. Winters: No, I said that if the province of Alberta, in this case, asked us to change the season we would certainly give the matter consideration but that no change would be put into effect unless a request came from the province.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Let us get this straight. I am not being critical.

Mr. Winters: I know.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I said that the season was a matter that was entirely in your hands, as I understood.

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You then said that once the ducks were within the province the season was then fixed only on the recommendation of the province. If what you then said is the fact—and I do not mean that you are not doing the best you can—and a telegram came to your department next fall from the Alberta government recommending the closing of the season on the 15th of November rather than on the first—

The Chairman: Order. The Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod is waiting.

Progress reported.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was deliverd by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An act for the relief of Doris Joan Guest Rigg.

An act for the relief of Cora Elizabeth Jamieson Southam.

An act for the relief of Audrey Brenda Holmes Burnett.

An act for the relief of Barbara Edna Brownrigg Johnson.

An act for the relief of Aili Katriina Salokannel Martel.

An act for the relief of Velma Elizabeth Buchanan Lowson.

An act for the relief of Gladys Harriet Hassall Thom.

An act for the relief of Elisabeth Mavis Cann Jousse.

An act for the relief of Eric Lacate.

An act for the relief of Dorothy Margaret May Harris McCormick.

An act for the relief of Sigrid Denston Day.

An act for the relief of Beatrice Campbell McClay.

An act for the relief of Catherine C. Goodrow Rogers.

An act for the relief of Miriam Roberta Weir Caryer.

An act for the relief of Marjorie Frances Murphy Cozzolino.

An act for the relief of Mary Thomson Cadieux.

An act for the relief of Veronica Pearl Faulkner MacKenzie.

An act for the relief of Elizabeth Hampshier Atyon Reilley.

An act for the relief of Sybil Elliott Karr Boulanger.

An act for the relief of Mary Kennedy Dunn Anderson.

An act for the relief of Albert Ernest Curtis.

An act for the relief of Annie Swales Barber.

An act for the relief of Rebecca Catherine Pitts Duquette.

An act for the relief of Edith Mary Stone Ryan.

An act for the relief of Pearl Greenspan Abramovitz.

An act for the relief of Harry Rudner.

DEPARTMENT OF RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT

Wildlife division—

365. Wildlife resources conservation and development, including administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, $300,000.

Mr. Hodgson: There is quite a large amount for travelling expenses in this item, namely, $22,000. Will the minister give us a résumé of what it is?

Mr. Winters: There are wildlife officers in every province in Canada. As I explained before, their job is to travel around and get statistical information and secure data on the development of wildlife population, their habits and reproductive possibilities, and so on. In doing so, they accumulate the expense which is shown against this item.

Mr. Hodgson: Is the minister sure they are all on government business?

Mr. Winters: They are all on government business.

Mr. Hodgson: I have not bothered the minister about sundries in other items. There is quite a large sundries account in this item, amounting to $13,000. Can the minister give us an idea of what it is?

Mr. Winters: "Sundries" amounting to the total of $13,632 is made up as follows: dominion-provincial wildlife conference, $2,000; motion pictures, $5,000; legal fees, $1,200; commission on fur sales, $1,500; hire of motor boat in Newfoundland, $2,500; incidentals, $1,432, making a total of $13,632.

Mr. Hodgson: Tell us what the motor boat was hired for. It was not for election purposes, was it?

Mr. Winters: It certainly would not be so long as this party is in power.

As my hon. friend knows, Newfoundland is the type of country the shore line of which is very hard to get around. Travel between outports must be done by boat, and naturally the amount for boat hire would be considerable.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What does the boat cost per day to hire, and what is its size?

Mr. Winters: This is an estimate; it is not an item of past expenditure. It is an estimate of what we might expend during the present fiscal year.

Mr. Fulton: When the committee rose just before six o'clock the minister had not an opportunity to answer the question as to the information of the department on the trend in the population of ducks and geese; nor had he an opportunity to make reference to the question which was asked before as to the relation, under this Migratory Birds Convention Act, with such countries as Mexico and the other countries of the central and Caribbean area where these birds spend the winter, and where it has been suggested considerable slaughter is taking place.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I think I explained the latter part of the question. Under the Migratory Birds Convention Act we have an understanding with the United States, and they in turn have understandings or agreements with Mexico and I believe with other countries. The only agreement we have is the one with the United States.

As to trends in population, according to detailed information I have, the annual waterfowl inventory, which is carried out throughout North America each January when waterfowl are concentrated on the wintering grounds, indicates that there has been a reduction in the number of waterfowl from year to year.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister an estimated figure of the present population on this continent?

Mr. Winters: There is no estimated figure before me now. I understand we have a figure that can be obtained if my hon. friend would be satisfied to have me send it to him.

Mr. Fulton: Thank you. Did I understand the minister to say we have no direct relation with the countries of the Caribbean? Has he any knowledge of the sort of agreement that they and the United States have, and is it the sort of agreement we have with the United States? In other words, if we have regulations and laws, as we have, with respect to closed seasons and protective measures and so on, which obviously operate to the benefit of the sportsman not only of Canada but of the United States and other countries as well, do those arrangements that we have with the United States give us a fair reciprocity? Has the minister any knowledge of that situation?

Mr. Winters: I have no detailed knowledge of the relationships between the United States and Mexico and other countries. We do have contacts, for example, with Mexico. We invite them to our conventions, and exchange ideas with them. The United States is doing a considerable amount of good work with these countries in an effort to bring their regulations into line with what is mutually acceptable to our two countries.

Mr. Adamson: While this item on wildlife resources conservation deals to a degree with birds, I want to mention something which should be brought to the attention of the committee and of the minister particularly, namely, the question of predator control. The decimation of our wildlife, owing to predators, is something which cannot be allowed to continue for many years longer without serious destruction in the whole game picture in Canada.

In this connection I want to mention particularly the northern wolf and the grizzly bear. Today in our national parks, and in a vast area of northern British Columbia and northern Alberta, the northern wolf has attained such proportions not only in his ferocity but in numbers that the game resources—I speak of the deer, caribou, moose and to a certain extent even the elk—are in very great danger of such serious decrease as to be a menace to the whole economy of the area.

Not only does the wolf hunt in packs, but the depredations of the northern wolf have got so bad in comparatively recent years that the packs will co-operate with each other in order to destroy whole herds of game animals. The fiendish brutality of this animal is something which should be brought to the attention of the house and should be dealt with by this department. Not only will the northern wolf destroy animals for food, but they will hamstring those animals in order to keep them alive until such time as they are ready to eat them. So true is this that the southern limit of game animals in British Columbia and Alberta, and throughout the whole Rocky mountain range, is being driven north by this ferocious killer. With regard to the national parks I have one or two suggestions which I would ask the minister to consider seriously.

The Deputy Chairman: I understood the hon. member was referring to wildlife, but he is now referring to national parks. There is another item dealing with the national parks.

Mr. Adamson: I know; but wildlife does exist in the national parks, and the very next item in the estimates deals with those national parks. What I am saying refers to wildlife in the national parks, and in what I say I am combining the two items, and offering the suggestion that it is extremely germane to the item before the committee.

The position taken by the national parks administration is that every wild animal in the parks is a sacred cow. The wolf, and to an extent the grizzly bear, is by no means a sacred cow. Rare animals peculiar to the Rocky mountain range, including the Rocky mountain goat, bighorn sheep, deer and other animals, are being decimated by these killers. Recently the parks administration passed regulations preventing wardens from shooting or otherwise destroying these predators. Having in mind the damage which can be caused by these killers in reducing the number of unique animals which exist in our national parks, I feel that steps should be taken immediately to prevent an increase of this predatory force before it has reached proportions sufficiently great to drive north the unique and fine game animals that exist in the Rocky mountain range.

Years ago one could not go through the area of the Simpson pass without seeing excellent specimens of bighorn sheep, goats and other game animals. Today, owing to the depredations of the grizzly and the wolf, the herds of these animals are being decimated. I suggest two things: First of all my suggestion is that the wardens be allowed to shoot a wolf, or otherwise to get rid of the predators. The case against the grizzly perhaps is not so well proved as that against the wolf; but I do suggest that the regulations of the national parks administration should be amended so that the wardens may be allowed to shoot or otherwise to dispose of these predators.

There are other things I think should be done, but I shall not discuss national parks while we are dealing with the wildlife item. I should like to see it made an offence to shoot an eagle anywhere in Canada. Every time we hear about some individual who has shot an eagle we see that great publicity is given to him in the press, and it is considered that a most remarkable thing has been done. The eagle today is becoming almost an extinct bird. It is unique and magnificent, and its predatory instincts are of such minor importance that its adverse effect on game is almost negligible. Without question it is one of the really great birds of the Rocky mountain range, and I would hope that protection would be given to it.

The control of killers of our game, not only our game birds but our wild big game in Canada, is not only a great asset from the standpoint of our tourist business, but a great asset from the ethical point of view in our country. More destruction is caused to wildlife by protecting the predators than has ever been caused by even the greatest extent of hunting by man. I make that statement excepting always the history of destruction of the buffalo. But the natural enemies today of our wildlife are the greatest menace we have to meet in preserving the one thing that makes the Rocky mountain area and the western provinces the tourist Mecca and the unique place they have become for the sportsman.

Item agreed to.

366. National parks and historic sites services, $10,138,886.

The Deputy Chairman: Before we begin discussion on this item I would remind hon. members that there was a general discussion on the first item, and a discussion as to what procedure should be followed. As hon. members know, the discussion in committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. Notwithstanding the general discussion which was allowed on the first item dealing with departmental administration, some hon. members seem to think that there should also be a general discussion on the first item of any branch of the department. The hon. member who has just taken his seat was discussing wildlife generally and in my view he was not in order. The item now before us deals with national parks and historic sites, but I do not think there should be a general discussion under this item. Then later on there is an item in connection with the national museum of Canada. Then we take up northern administrations.

To have a general discussion on the first item of every branch is not in my view within the spirit of the general practice of having a discussion on the first item. There are experienced members in this house who surely can assist me and tell me whether my view is right. I do not see how we can have a general discussion on the first item of each branch if speeches in committee of the whole are to be strictly relevant to the item or clause under discussion. In my view what should be discussed under the items are the details at the back of the book, instead of having a general discussion.

Mr. Hodgson: Item 365 was not passed.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I have profound respect for the views you have voiced, Mr. Chairman, but with all due deference I ask you to give consideration to the magnitude of this next vote, which is for $10 million. That is a lot of money in any man's language. I think you, Mr. Chairman, might be considerate enough to allow us a little latitude because of the size of this vote.

Mr. Adamson: On a point of order—

Mr. Coldwell: I think perhaps one of the unfortunate features of dealing with these estimates is that so many hon. members are attending committees when general discussion occurs. I am never very long if I can help it, but I rose to say that I regret I was not in this committee this morning when the hon. member for Royal discussed this particular item 366.

Mr. Hodgson: We are on 365.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): 366.

The Deputy Chairman: 366.

Mr. Hodgson: I tried to get on my feet on several occasions.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): One at a time.

Mr. Hodgson: I was on my feet when you carried it.

The Deputy Chairman: I think it should be decided whether we are to have a general discussion on the first item of each branch after having had a general discussion on the first item, departmental administration.

Mr. Adamson: On a point of order—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. Coldwell: I understand that a tribute was paid to a great man who had a great deal to do with marking our historic sites and I want to say that this country owes much indeed to the late Dr. Webster. I hope the new minister will endeavour to see that more of our historic sites are marked before it is too late.

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. member permit me before he launches into a discussion of this particular item 366? I should like to point out that two members were on their feet when item 365 was called carried but I did want to ask one or two questions on that particular item.

The Deputy Chairman: I have already said that 365 is carried but we can revert to that item and the hon. member can ask his questions after the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has completed his remarks. I should like the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to indicate whether or not he agrees with what I have said about general discussion.

Mr. Coldwell: I quite agree with what the chairman has said. I make a plea that the minister endeavour to see to it that more of our historic sites are marked. I notice the hon. member for The Battlefords is in his seat and I think perhaps he will rise later on to say something about this matter. In Saskatchewan such places as Battleford, Duck Lake, Batoche and other places have historic sites that are largely unmarked at the present time. Some little time ago I was at Duck Lake and I found that that condition existed. At Battleford the old rifle pits are being obliterated and many of the locations of old Hudson's Bay posts are being lost. I repeat that I hope the minister will see that more of these sites are marked.

Is a grant made to the historic society of Canada? I cannot find it in the estimates. The work performed by men like Dr. Webster is of the utmost value and a society of this kind should be assisted if it is not already receiving assistance.

Mr. Hodgson: Reverting to item 365, I notice there are two superintendents of hatcheries. Could the minister tell us what type of fish were hatched last year?

Mr. Winters: There are hatcheries at Banff, Jasper and Waterton where sporting types of fish are raised. I have no figures as to the quantities hatched last year.

Mr. Hodgson: Do they deliver them to the lakes and streams, or are they handed out to other people for delivery?

Mr. Winters: That is quite right—to lakes and streams.

Mr. Fulton: I tried to catch your eye before item 365 was carried. The minister has said that statistics and other information in the department indicate that our migratory bird population is declining. Has the minister any plans for a discussion with other countries to devise ways to reverse that trend?

Mr. Winters: That particular matter is under constant study by the officers of the department in co-operation with wildlife officers of the provinces and the United States. Within the next few weeks there will be a meeting in Ottawa of wildlife people from all over Canada to discuss that and other problems allied to wildlife in Canada.

Mr. Fulton: Has the department any recommendation that it is going to put forward and insist be carried out in this connection? I understand these are annual conferences, and I do not wish to minimize the importance of the conferences or what has been done, but the fact is that the migratory bird population is still declining. Has the minister any proposals, and has his department any program which they intend to put forward and to press to the hilt so as to reverse the trend?

Mr. Winters: The department has views on what should be done. For example, there is the matter of tightening up the seasons. The whole idea of the conference is to get people together from all over Canada to obtain their views and see if some policy cannot be evolved to cope with the problem which will be satisfactory to all concerned.

Mr. Fulton: I hope you do it.

Mr. Adamson: On a point of order, you suggested that I was out of order in discussing the specific item of wildlife resources conservation. I deliberately waited until the item came up to discuss this one matter of wildlife conservation. I could have discussed it this morning on the general item. I did not do so because I thought it was better to wait until the specific item was called in order to discuss it. If it is going to be the general practice in this committee that we are to be shut off from discussing specific items then we will have to consider carrying on a more general discussion on the initial item. If the committee is going to function in the way it should the discussion should be germane and detailed, and should apply specifically to the item under discussion. If we are going to have a general discussion on everything and then be shut off when we discuss a specific item I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we will waste a great deal of time. I was discussing wildlife conservation under the specific item. I waited for it and was discussing it. There is nothing doing more damage today to our game than the predators, the wolf and the grizzly bear. That is what I wanted to say and that is what I said. If we are going to be prohibited from saying these things on the specific item then I suggest discussing the estimates has become a mockery.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Nobody stopped the hon. member.

Mr. Adamson: No, but they did everything they could to stop me.

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Adamson: My anger is not synthetic.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member will remember that I intervened only when he mentioned national parks together with the subject about which he was talking, wildlife. The very fact that the hon. member discussed the two items together indicates that his remarks were of such a nature that in my view they should have been made on the administration item. Then he could have come back and discussed only wildlife on item 365 and everybody would have been happy. I suggest the item under discussion relates to the details on page 249.

Mr. Adamson: The great asset of our national parks is the wildlife in them.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On the same point of order, I never get annoyed but I did not like very much your cutting off the hon. member for York West.

The Deputy Chairman: I did not cut him off.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You lectured him. Let us put it that way. Your lecture was full of such words as "I allowed so and so." With the greatest respect, sir, you do not allow anything. We have certain privileges in discussing these items as a matter of right, and you may stop us only when we exceed those rights. I have great respect for you personally and for the position you occupy, but you are not allowing us to do anything. You can disallow but you do not allow us. The rules of the house do the allowing.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I quite appreciate the assistance which I receive from the hon. members. I want to assure them that I try at all times to give the greatest freedom of discussion.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): May I quickly agree with that, but do not use that word again. Do not say what you allow us to do.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the expression does not suit my hon. friend but what I intended to convey was that the standing order which says that speeches in committee must be strictly relevant to the item must mean something. All hon. members will agree that we had a general discussion on the first item. When I began my explanations, the hon. member for York West had completely finished his remarks. I waited until the very end. What I want to get at now is that there are many other branches in this department. For example, the national museum will come later, and the next item is national parks.

I should like to ask for the opinion of experienced members. As they understand the rule that speeches in committee must be strictly relevant to the item, is it their view that when the first item of a branch comes before the committee a general discussion should be allowed, notwithstanding the fact that by practice a general discussion is allowed on the first item, departmental administration? I do not want to cut off anyone but here is the position in which I find myself. Some hon. members take the floor and others do not. When an hon. member takes the floor and starts to discuss something which he should have discussed on another item, it is quite understandable that other members feel that the chairman should intervene more than he does. That is the situation in which I find myself. I have to expedite the business of the house and at the same time permit free discussion. I am quite willing to do that. That is exactly what is required by my position and it is what I am doing. I am asking now for the views of members of the house. Should another general discussion take place on the first item of each branch notwithstanding the fact that a general discussion was allowed on the first item concerning departmental administration, and notwithstanding the rule which says that speeches in committee must be strictly relevant to the item under consideration? If hon. members want to co-operate I am sure we can achieve the purpose for which the committee is set up, that is, to examine the estimates properly and at the same time expedite the business.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On the same point of order, may I say that I am so happy to agree with the general remarks which you have made, sir, because I too read the rules many years ago. Nevertheless you have suggested that an hon. member is out of order when he refers to national parks in discussing wildlife. Wildlife is largely contained in our national parks, is one of the greatest tourist attractions and assets of our national parks, and predators in those parks are destroying the game animals which have a sanctuary there. When you tell the hon. member for York West that he is out of order because he mentions national parks, that is—forgive me—something beyond my very limited understanding.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member will understand that I do not want to delay the discussion any longer than is necessary. Wildlife comes under item 365 and national parks under item 366.

An hon. Member: Item 365 was passed.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Oh, no, it was not.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, you have suggested that we should not carry on a general discussion under these items. I had some remarks to make on an item we have not reached yet, and I refrained from making those remarks earlier because on one or two occasions the minister himself pointed out to hon. members that they should wait until the item is called and then have their discussion. I followed the minister's suggestion; I waited for my item to be called. Now you come along with a ruling under which we are going to be held strictly to the item before the committee and may not speak generally. You are putting us in this position, that when the administration item is called every hon. member is going to be forced to carry on his discussion at that time. I do not believe the minister wants that; I think he would rather wait until the item in question is called and then have the discussion, but I think we should have it very clear. Either those of us who want to speak on these items will have to carry on our discussion on the administration item, or we must be allowed some latitude when we come to the particular items to be considered. Some of us who have refrained from taking part in the discussion on the first item will be placed in a very difficult position if you apply the rule as you have just indicated.

The Deputy Chairman: I must inform the hon. member that I did not make a ruling. There is a citation in Beauchesne, third edition, citation 107, which provides that in case of doubt the chairman may ask the opinion of experienced members, and that is what I have done. After having listened to the views expressed by the hon. member for Calgary West, the hon. member for York West, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Bow River, I have come to the conclusion that we must try to observe this rule which restricts speeches to the item under consideration, but having in mind that a wide discussion must take place on certain items because of what has been said previously, it is up to each hon. member to exercise some self-restraint, in order that we may get on with the business. We are on item 366.

Mr. Bater: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was quite correct a short time ago when he stated that in all probability I would be rising to speak on this item. I do so in the belief that I am speaking on the proper subject, at the proper time and in the proper place. The item deals with national parks and historic sites services, and I want to ask the minister for just a small portion of this $11 million odd. I am appealing to the minister for financial assistance for the Battleford police memorial and Indian museum. This memorial and museum is located on a plateau practically on the historic old townsite of Battleford. Some miles below this site the North Saskatchewan and Battle rivers meet on their march to Hudson bay. Just three miles to the north is the city of North Battleford, and just one mile to the south is the first parliament building of the Northwest Territories council, located on the south bank of the Battle river immediately south of the historic town of Battleford. I believe this building was erected in 1875 and was used by the council until 1878. It is still there, in a good state of preservation. This memorial and museum was opened by His Excellency the Governor General on May 24, 1948, at which time we were honoured by a visit of their excellencies. Perhaps I might mention the plans that have been drawn up by those who have given much of their time and energy to this project, and who are in urgent need of funds to carry it on in a proper manner.

In the year 1876 the Battleford mounted police post was established by Colonel James Walker and linked up with such posts as Macleod, Fort Walsh, Calgary, Edmonton, Carlton and Swan River. This force served the Northwest council from 1878 to 1881 at Battleford. It served the Department of Indian Affairs. From this point its force went forth to battle at Duck Lake, Carlton, Cut Knife, Fort Pitt and Frenchman's Butte. Later, during the settlement days, it became a stabilizing and encouraging factor in our civilization. This locality is the home of the Cree Indian. In the early days it successfully held back the Blackfeet. There are also tribes of Saulteaux, Assiniboine and Sioux, with their long history and cultural development. The Indian agency office is still located here. The little red brick building which served as an office is still standing on the Northwest Council hill. Such early explorers as McGillivray, Pike, Cocking, Frobisher, Pond, Henry, Pangman, Umfreville, Thompson and Harmon passed up the North Saskatchewan and crossed to the Beaver river and Ile à la Crosse to Churchill. Their fur post sites are still to be seen. It has been a pleasure to search for these and have Professor A. S. Morton come up from Saskatoon and check them over. These posts should be rebuilt or remarked, and the thrilling story of early fur days retold: Manchester House, Pine Island Post, Eagle Hills Post, Turtle Post, Buckingham House. The rich fur and pemmican trade of the Hudson's Bay and Northwest Company was centred in this part of the Saskatchewan river and at Green lake, Ile à la Crosse, Prince Albert and Edmonton. As our young citizens grew up in the midst of this rich romantic and sacrificial story they too caught the spirit of enterprise. Such localities gave their best youth to the first and second world wars when the call came.

Peace has come again to our beloved Canada. A new youth is re-examining our national life. It asks, "How can harmony, brotherhood and culture be advanced and what shall we save in a new civilization?" Shall we study the social and economic factors of our localities in such a way as to engender love for nobler purposes and make the land blossom and sing? It is a land with a tradition and a promise. What shall be done with these historic spots? Once more we have asked the government to help. The Saskatchewan government consented to renovate the famous mounted police barracks. This cluster of some dozen buildings has been standing idle since 1923. The superintendent's house, the inspector's house, the jail, the hospital, stable and mess room are to be saved. The renovation work was commenced in August, 1945. All the main buildings are ready for use. Our citizens suggested a mounted police memorial and Indian museum. The government accepted this plan provided citizens would furnish and equip this memorial and museum. The challenge was accepted. Men and women of training and ability offered to help plan, equip and interest their fellow citizens. Our plans are well advanced. Citizens are being asked to furnish the necessary funds. This endowment fund will be used to furnish and operate this memorial and museum. Our citizens may elect to honour mounties and old-timers by their gifts. It is aimed to clothe this memorial with dignity, reverence and beauty, vitalized from the rich pages of history. May its best traditions be preserved in our future citizens.

Rooms of the superintendent's house are reserved for this memorial. A room will be reserved for each of the following phases of police history: the march of 1774; the early police posts; the rebellion of 1885; the story of the Yukon and South Africa; commemorative days; and the force in wars I and II.

Actual objects used will be taken from these days and donated in memory of these men. The mounties colour scheme will be used in the furniture and draperies. The hospital stable will honour the mountie's horse. It will contain the museum of agriculture. It will be used to depict western drama from a stage overlooking the junction of the Saskatchewan and Battle rivers three miles distant. The Eagle Hills, the city of North Battleford, the town of Battleford, St. Thomas college and the occupational therapy buildings of the mental hospital are within a three-mile radius. There are 40 acres reserved for gardens and recreation grounds on this magnificent plateau. These will be beautified.

The guard room will contain the famous pictures of the force and serve as an art gallery, containing the best pictures interpretative of western life. The famous old mess hall building will be used for an auditorium and an Indian museum to interpret the culture of Crees, Blackfeet, Sioux and Assiniboines. One wing will be devoted to the story of fur companies and natural resources. The inspector's house contains the orderly room of early days. Five rooms upstairs will be set aside for the scientific section, archaeology, minerals and soils, astronomy, ceramics, stamps and coins. Located in suitable corners will be the natural history story told in habitat groups, visualizing the scenes of the mounties, the trapper, the settler, and at the same time showing the birds, animals, insects and plants of the Red river trails. The advisory committees of each division are free to plan for their own division. It is planned to build a fund for each division to make this an institution of national importance and relate it to the museums of Canada and the United States. Books, documents and pictures will be preserved in the archives for the scholar. Monthly lectures will be given to interpret the fields covered in the museum. There will be social gatherings especially for the pioneers. The old palisade which sheltered the beleaguered garrison in 1885 is to be partly rebuilt around the main gates. The bastions will be replaced.

Not only will the memorial and museum preserve and enlighten, but it will serve as a link with old posts of the past. Fort Pitt of 1829 days is to be rebuilt this year by Mr. Hougham. It is hoped other old fur posts will be rebuilt throughout western Canada. May our citizens read the cultural story as they journey from one pioneer locality to another. Each has its wonderful story. From this point other centres may be revitalized. Thus may the spirit of creativeness be fostered to enrich the economic, social and cultural life, giving new hope and faith in a brave new world such as our pioneers struggled to build.

I could go into many details, Mr. Chairman, to show why we require some financial aid in connection with these projects, but I will not take up the time of the committee to do so now. I will take that matter up later with the minister.

In conclusion I should like to say that I trust the minister will give favourable consideration to our request for financial aid for these worthy projects. They will cherish memories of these great men who played so admirable a part in the early history and development of our great northwest, and preserve the folklore and tradition of our real Canadians, our Indians.

Mr. Hodgson: I should like to come back again to the question of travelling expenses of $38,850, and the sundries of $67,041. This seems to me to be a tremendous amount on travelling expenses and sundries account in one item of this department. Can the minister give us a breakdown of that?

Mr. McIvor: While the minister's assistants are looking up this information, perhaps I could make my request and speech now.

The Deputy Chairman: Very well.

Mr. McIvor: I have my first request to make of the minister; and of course in another sphere of life first offences are treated generously. We have been trying for a good many years to get a national park at the lakehead. We have perhaps the finest sight there is anywhere in Canada, in Mount McKay, Squaw bay and the Chippewa Indian reserve. No place that I have visited in Ireland, in England, or in Canada presents a more remarkable view from the standpoint of scenery. If the trans-Canada highway is going through that way, it would be a thrilling stopover for any of our tourists. Mount McKay is 1,400 feet high. The water supply of Fort William is away up behind the peak. We have a good road halfway up; and when you get up to that halfway mark, there is a thrilling view. We think it would be a great attraction for the wise men of the east if they could see the things we have there.

The other attraction that we have and that I should like the minister to consider is Kakabeka falls. Many times during the week hundreds of cars are parked there and thousands of people enjoy the beauty of these falls. My request, Mr. Chairman, is that the minister send out some of his experts this year, during July or August, and back up the request of our city, the parks board, the trades and labour council, the chamber of commerce and all sensible people at the lakehead.

Mr. Hatfield: Mr. Chairman, I want—

Mr. Hodgson: Just a minute. I should like an answer to my question first.

Mr. Winters: Sundries for the national parks, $67,041; the question was for the sundries breakdown as against the estimate?

Mr. Hodgson: I should like to get the sundries broken down and to have some details of the travelling expenses.

Mr. Winters: Which sundries are you referring to, the estimates for this year?

Mr. Hodgson: The estimates for this year, and you can give us anything you may care to for last year. The increase is $22,000 on the sundries, and on the travelling expenses the increase is about $13,000.

Mr. Winters: Sundries for last year of record were expenses of advertising, $17,000; rental of equipment, $15,000; unemployment insurance, $14,000; electric power for parks, $12,000; laundry and towels, $8,000; professional services, golf course experts, $6,000; technicians' fees, including architects, $6,000.

Mr. Fulton: Is that the actual expenditure?

Mr. Winters: Those are actual expenditures for last year of record.

[Mr. McIvor.]

Mr. Fulton: What is the total of those items?

Mr. Winters: I would have to add them up. I have not the total here. The expenses are the normal expenses of the wardens and so on in national parks. The increase is occasioned by what we think will be the additional expenditure in Newfoundland by possible air charters and examining territory, and the additional expense resulting from taking over some work of the battlefields commission.

Mr. Fulford: I am sure I am in order this time, because I am going to deal with matters that have to do with both national parks and historical sites. First I want to ask the minister to commend his department on the splendid progress which is being made in the St. Lawrence river national parks, the series of islands which stretch from Morrisburg, Ontario, on the east to Kingston, Ontario, on the west. The item in connection with the maintenance of all historic sites and national parks amounts to $10 million; but the cost of maintenance and further improvements to these parks amounts to but a fraction of the $10 million appropriation. Yet I venture to say that there is no group of national parks in Canada that give more pleasure, and to a greater number of people.

All one has to do is to go by the parks which are on the islands and mainland to see at all times during the summer months the canoes, rowboats, motor boats and the expensive cruisers drawn up at these docks, and to see the fireplaces, pavilions, the bathing houses and the other facilities which are used by the rank and file of the public. These facilities are used not only by Canadians but they are becoming increasingly popular with the citizens of the United States.

I want to commend the minister on the recent acquisition or transfer of property from the Department of Transport to the Department of Resources and Development. I refer to Windmill point, just below Prescott, Ontario. It is a very historic point and very near a town which in the past has not had the facilities of a nearby national park. I would like to suggest that further property be acquired. I understand that the property is owned by a department of government, namely the national harbours board. I would suggest that further property be acquired so that there would be adequate land available for the public to use.

At this time I should like to recommend to the minister's attention the possibility of acquiring Hill island. I might explain that Hill island is the island over which the road runs connecting the Canadian span of the Thousand islands bridge with the international span. To me it is a very historical point, inasmuch as this bridge was opened on August 18, 1938, jointly by the late President Roosevelt and the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. Unfortunately, steps have not been taken to safeguard the beauty of this island, with the result that already a great deal of timber has been cut off the island adjacent to the road. I realize that this part is under the jurisdiction of the province of Ontario, but unfortunately it seems to have been neglected. There are a great many unsightly buildings such as travellers' cabins, hotdog stands, souvenir booths and so on. I suggest that it is one of the most beautiful sections in eastern Ontario, and it is the gateway for thousands of United States tourists. It could be made something of which all Canada could be proud. It is definitely an historical site, and it definitely should form one of the most beautiful points of entry to our country.

Actually the bridge now spans two national parks, Georgina island and Constance island. The span on Hill island should also be on a national park. If feasible, negotiations should be entered into with the United States to make this entire section an international park, because certainly that site is of sufficient international significance to warrant such a monument for posterity.

There is another section in the district in which I live, particularly in the county of Leeds, the county I have the honour to represent, namely, the great chain of Rideau lakes, which form an integral part of the Rideau canal system. As we all know, the Rideau canal is of particular historic importance. It was built after the war of 1812 by British army engineers. There was a rather quaint treaty signed between Great Britain and Canada when the canal system was handed over to Canada. One of the clauses of the treaty said that Canada would maintain the canal system so long as the grass was green and the skies were blue above. In that respect the canal is being well maintained.

I wonder how many of us realize the great tourist attraction that the Rideau chain of lakes is, and how an ever-increasing number of Americans and Canadians are coming to view and use this magnificent national resource. Starting at Kingston Mills on the southwest one comes into the "river Styx", and gradually going up through a series of locks one is locked into Cranberry lake, and then into Whitefish lake, to the famous Jones Falls, up to the Officers Quarters, to Sand lake, and Opinicon lake; thence through Chaffey's lock into Clear lake, Indian lake, Newboro lake; through a lock and small canal into the little Rideau lake, where one comes to the dividing line of the land. Then one starts going down the canal toward Ottawa, and one comes to the big Rideau lake. The big Rideau lake stretches from the Narrows lock almost to the town of Smiths Falls.

Since the national parks on the St. Lawrence have proven so popular I see no reason why the department should not embark by degrees—it is not necessary to rush matters—on a plan to acquire gradually more islands in these Rideau lakes and develop them into national parks. There could be two or three of such islands in the big Rideau lake, perhaps one in the little Rideau lake, and so forth and so on through the various other lakes. I feel that by developing these national parks in the Rideau chain of lakes the department would be rendering a great service to the public of Canada. It would be a great attraction for the United States tourists, and at the same time it would become a living monument to the memory of those early British engineers who did such a magnificent job after the war of 1812 in creating an all-Canadian route from Montreal to Kingston.

Mr. Hodgson: I should like the minister to answer my question on the travelling expenses. He has been interrupted by two Liberal speakers.

Mr. Winters: I was under the impression that I had answered it.

Mr. Hodgson: You had answered the question on sundries, but not on travelling expenses.

Mr. Winters: I said that travelling expenses were incurred by the park wardens in the line of their duties and by the officials of the department. There is an increase in expenditures. That is occasioned by certain work we expect to undertake this year in Newfoundland, and certain other additional work we expect to do by taking over certain work from the battlefields commission.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can the minister tell us whether they are battlefields in Newfoundland or battlefields in Europe?

Mr. Winters: The battlefields commission applies only to the battlefields of Quebec.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to draw attention to the old historic forts I mentioned at Placentia, Trepassey and Carbonear island. Carbonear island especially is of significance, because it was the one place in Newfoundland that held out against the French in one of the wars between England and France. A moment ago, in answer to the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, the minister gave us a breakdown of expenditures for 1949-50 which, as I have totalled them, amount to $78,000, although only $45,000 is voted. Is that correct?

Mr. Winters: I shall have to re-check that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I took down the figures given to me. I should like to know the amount spent on salaries and wages last year, as well as the amount spent on the acquisition and construction of buildings, and the two following items which refer to the repair and upkeep of buildings and the acquisition of equipment. I presume the officials have that information. Referring to the first item, what was spent on salaries and wages last year?

Mr. Winters: The officials inform me they have not the information of expenditures for last year on specific items such as that. They have the over-all expenditures on the parks item.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I thought the minister told us a while ago that they did have these expenditures, and I presumed he gave us the figure for the sundries, beginning with an item of $17,000 for advertising. The figures given totalled $78,000. If the minister has not the details, can he get them?

Mr. Winters: We can get them, yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to have the figures on salaries, acquisition and construction of buildings and works, repair and upkeep of buildings and works, and the acquisition of equipment. Then, what amount out of this $10 million does the minister expect to spend in Newfoundland this year?

Mr. Winters: The amount earmarked against this for Newfoundland in 1950-51 is $10,000 for surveys.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is $10,000 out of $10 million.

Mr. Gibson: Give us time to take a look at it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is over a year now.

Mr. Hatfield: What has been the cost of the national park in New Brunswick? What has it cost to date, and has it been completed? What will it cost when it is completed?

The Deputy Chairman: May I ask hon. members to stand when they wish to ask a question. Otherwise it is very difficult for the Hansard reporter to know who is speaking.

Mr. Graydon: He did stand up in the first instance.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

Mr. McIlraith: A long time ago.

Mr. Graydon: You are living in the past, anyway.

Mr. Winters: So far the expenditure has been about $850,000. The expenditure earmarked for the park this year is $978,855. There are continuing expenses in a park such as that. I would imagine, at a rough guess—and it is always dangerous to guess—that another million dollars beyond the amount I have mentioned would complete the work.

Mr. Bryce: I have not had the opportunity to visit some of these national parks, but if they are all as well maintained as Riding Mountain park in my own province, then I shall be content. The display of flowers in that park last year was a credit to the parks administration. I had the opportunity of taking some coloured photographs and showing them to the minister.

Have the camp sites in that park been extended, and have more been established this year? Has the electrical wiring been continued past the three or four streets, and have more sewers been laid? I believe it was the intention of the department to do that work last year, and I should like to know if it has been done. Otherwise it would be a menace to the park to have visitors who come there using coal oil lamps when they could use electric lights if the cable were extended another two or three streets.

Mr. Winters: Some of the work to which the hon. member refers has been completed, and some is being done this year.

Mr. Hodgson: I am not satisfied with the answer I was given. Cannot the minister give a breakdown of the travelling expenses for last year?

Mr. Winters: We have not a detailed breakdown before us now.

Mr. Hodgson: What was the total amount spent last year in travelling expenses?

Mr. Winters: I understand from the officials that the accounts are just closing, and that at the present time we do not have the total amount spent last year.

Mr. Hodgson: I thought the accounts closed at the end of March?

Mr. Charlton: In view of the fact that there is an amount of $10,138,886 to be spent by this department, and almost $8 million of that is for the acquisition or construction of buildings, repairs and upkeep of buildings and works, and acquisition of equipment, I should like to bring to the minister's attention one important historic site located on the Six Nations Indian reserve at Brantford. I am sure most hon. members will remember Chiefswood, as the birthplace of Pauline Johnson, which is now in a state of bad repair. I am sure it is beyond the means of the Six Nations council to undertake the necessary rebuilding. I would urge the minister to use all possible influence to allocate part of this $8 million to be used as a grant to help the Six Nations council to repair Chiefswood.

Mr. Fulton: I understood the minister to say that in the breakdown of sundries there is an item of $17,000 for advertising. Is that correct?

Mr. Winters: The actual expenditures in 1948-49 for advertising were $17,000.

Mr. Fulton: What was the purpose of the advertising?

Mr. Winters: Largely for the calling of tenders for various projects in the national parks and to inform people of events of interest that are to take place in the parks.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The figures the minister gave me were for 1948-49?

Mr. Winters: That is what I said.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): They total $78,000.

Mr. Winters: Yes, that was the total for 1948-49.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am afraid the minister is wrong because the amount for sundries shown in the public accounts for 1948-49 is $91,000. I should like to have some explanation of that discrepancy.

Mr. Winters: The hon. member is quite right in his addition.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The amount is given as $91,000 in the public accounts.

Mr. Winters: I have not the public accounts before me.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I can send them over to the minister.

Mr. Stanfield: What is going to be done about the proposed Blomidon national park which the government said before the last election it would build? During the last campaign many ministers and others were running up and down the country trying to convince the people of the wonderful park they were going to build if the Liberal government was returned. The Liberal government was returned and we have not heard anything about the park since. As the minister knows, that park would be situated in the middle of the Annapolis valley which is the centre of the most flourishing tourist business in Nova Scotia as well as being an historic site. I understand the provincial government is anxious to have the park constructed and the Liberal government said they were going to build the park. We do not intend to let them off without a statement as to why they are not going to build it. I think we should have a statement from the minister as to the situation with regard to that park in Kings county.

Mr. Fulton: He is saving it for the by-election.

Mr. Winters: I made no such promise. If certain people made such a promise all I can say is that it is "small potatoes" compared to what I have heard from members of the party to which my hon. friend belongs.

Mr. Drew: There is a lot to do before they catch up.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They have all their small potatoes still left down there.

Mr. Winters: That is a beautiful area regardless of any political connotation my hon. friend wishes to read into it.

Mr. Stanfield: I was not trying to read any political connotation into it at all.

Mr. Winters: I do not think my hon. friend should generalize. To my knowledge no one has made a promise. There has been discussion and correspondence between the Nova Scotia government and the department. The site has been surveyed but before an area can become a national park it must be offered by the provincial government. So far there has been no offer and it has not been decided whether the area is suitable for a national park and whether the Nova Scotia government should be invited to make an offer.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What figures is the minister using to base his estimate on? Surely he is not relying on the 1948-49 expenditures when he has the 1949-50 expenditures to go by? How does he come to have this estimate? There was a supplementary estimate of half a million, but it included no sundries.

Mr. Winters: The items I have indicated to my hon. friend are the type of item that come under this general sundry item. If the hon. member wishes specific information we will get it and send it to him.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): As the hon. member for Colchester-Hants has said, there is only one major park in Nova Scotia and a great many people are looking forward to the construction of Blomidon park. I should like to have some information as to what is being spent in the Highlands national park in northern Cape Breton. Has any contract been let? How many tenders were received? Who was the successful tenderer?

Mr. Winters: The amount earmarked for Cape Breton Highlands national park is $1,338,478. It is for the construction of the Cabot trail from Ingonish to South Mountain including bridges, and the reconstruction of the Cabot trail from South Mountain to Cabot bay, including bridges and culverts, also the construction of low-rental tourist accommodation. The contract for the road work has been let. As I recall, there were three tenderers, the successful tenderer being the Fundy Construction Company.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What mileage is covered by the tender, and how many miles of the Cabot trail have been constructed? I think the original mileage was 186 with the trail starting at Baddeck and returning to the same point. I understand it has since been shortened a few miles by eliminating curves and bends.

Mr. Winters: In 1948-49, 6·2 miles were completed; in 1949-50, 8·2 miles were completed and in 1950-51 a proposed mileage of 15·5 will be completed.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has that mileage been graded and hard-surfaced?

Mr. Winters: It is not hard-surfaced yet.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): That mileage is still to be hard-surfaced?

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Mr. Fulton: If anyone looks at the breakdown on page 250 he will see that four persons have been added to the branch under the category of permanent and temporary assistance. Then there is a large item for casuals and others, although the number to be employed is not given. With an increase of only four in the number of personnel the total amount for salaries and wages has gone up $119,000 over last year. It seems that there is a large increase not altogether accounted for unless it be by casuals and others. If it be by casuals and others it would seem that the department must be intending to undertake a good deal of extra work this year over what was done last year. Can the minister explain the reason for the increase and say whether I am right in that assumption?

Mr. Winters: The increase to which my hon. friend refers is something of the order of 10 per cent which is taken up by increases and adjustments of salaries.

Mr. Fulton: Does that apply to casuals and others, the item for whom has gone up $42,000?

[Mr. Black (Cumberland).]

Mr. Winters: There have been increases in wages for casuals, and in many instances they will be employed for a longer period this year.

Item agreed to.

367. Trans-Canada highway—surveys of route in Banff and Yoho national parks, $25,000.

Mr. Johnston: First of all I should like to congratulate the minister on taking immediate steps to have the trans-Canada highway surveyed through the national parks. It would indeed be a shame if the rest of the highway were completed and the section within the national parks were not. I think the minister deserves credit for getting this part of the work done. Under the survey which is going to be conducted in the national parks is provision being made at this time for a four-lane highway, and is the national highway to be of sufficiently sound construction to carry freight hauled by motor transport? As the minister knows, it has been the policy of the present government to prohibit the passage of motor transports carrying freight through national parks. This affects us particularly in western Canada because it absolutely prohibits the transfer of freight by motor transport from the prairie provinces to the province of British Columbia. The federal government has put an embargo on the transportation of freight through the national parks. To my mind it is not good enough merely to have a highway so that people in motorcars may enjoy the scenery and prohibit the transportation of freight. I do not think that is the intention of the minister. In fact I am quite sure it is not, but inasmuch as it is the policy of the government I should like to know what provision is being made to have the road surveyed in such a way that it will be wide enough, and to provide for sufficiently sound construction to permit the transportation of freight and tourist traffic through the parks.

Mr. Winters: The trans-Canada highway through national parks will be of the same standard as the trans-Canada highway elsewhere in Canada.

Mr. Johnston: Is that a four-lane highway?

Mr. Winters: It is a two-lane highway. The basic specification calls for a hard-surfaced road 24 feet wide with 10-foot shoulders on each side, where obtainable. The loading permitted on the highway will be in conformity with that permitted on the highway elsewhere in Canada, and in conformity with the regulations of the province through which that part of the highway goes.

Mr. Johnston: Then I can take it if the province allows certain haulage on its provincial highways the same traffic will be allowed through the national parks. Is that right?

Mr. Winters: That is the general policy being considered for the trans-Canada highway through national parks.

Mr. Johnston: Will that be the policy of the federal government?

Mr. Winters: That is the policy of the federal government.

Mr. Johnston: Of course the minister is aware of the fact that the federal government does not now permit the haulage of freight through national parks. I do not know whether it is because they are trying to bolster the inefficiently run C.N.R. railway which goes in the hole every year, but certainly we should not allow them to say that the roads are not to be constructed in such a way as to carry freight over them.

Mr. Mutch: A fine example of irresponsibility.

Mr. Fulton: I am not quite clear as to the implication of what the minister said. When the highway is completed it will pass through Banff and Yoho national parks. Will through trucking be permitted? Will trucks be permitted to enter from the west, pass through the parks and leave at the east exit, and vice versa, without off-loading onto another vehicle in transit?

Mr. Winters: Yes; that will be the arrangement.

Mr. Green: Under the statute the trans-Canada highway need not be completed for several years.

Mr. Winters: Seven years.

Mr. Green: Is it the intention that this road may be used by trucks this year, or will the new policy be held in abeyance until the whole trans-Canada highway has been completed in British Columbia?

Mr. Winters: I am not familiar enough with the type of road existing through the parks at the present moment to be able to say. That will depend on the engineering standard of the road, but I can say that when the highway is completed and we are satisfied the standard is satisfactory to carry the traffic, which is what we are aiming at, we will allow the through transport of commercial vehicles.

Mr. Green: Is the road being completed this year in the national parks, or when is that work to be done?

Mr. Winters: We have the same restriction imposed upon us, that there will be a period of seven years in which we can complete the road.

Mr. Johnston: I feel quite certain from what the minister has said that he hopes—and I use that word advisedly—that when the road is constructed freight hauled by motor transport will be allowed to enter one gate of the national park and pass right through to the gate on the other side. I hope that policy has the approval of the Minister of Transport. If it has not, the condition will be the same as it is now. Motor transports carrying freight may enter the east gate of Banff national park and proceed as far as Banff but they cannot go on through. You cannot haul a load of freight by motor transport right through the park. That is a ruling made by the board of transport commissioners under the Department of Transport. The minister may be quite sincere—and I am sure he is—when he says that he desires freight to go right through the parks from Alberta to British Columbia.

An hon. Member: He said it would.

Mr. Johnston: He said it would, and I am quite convinced that the minister is of that view. What I want to know, however, is whether that policy has the approval of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Winters: The restriction my hon. friend refers to is a park regulation.

Mr. Johnston: No. You must understand that park transportation is controlled by the Department of Transport. It is the Department of Transport that lays down the ruling.

Mr. Winters: I am told by the officials that there is no restriction imposed by the board of transport commissioners. The restriction is one laid down by the parks branch.

Mr. Johnston: For what reason?

Mr. Winters: It was a matter of regulating traffic on the road.

Mr. Johnston: Was it because the road was not in sufficiently good condition to carry freight, because they did not want the freight to be taken away from the railways, or because they did not want to frighten the wild animals?

Mr. Winters: It was a matter of the adequacy of the highway.

Mr. Johnston: I should like to pursue that one step further. I am glad that the minister has stated that the reason such traffic was not permitted was that the highway was not able to carry it. My information is just the opposite to that, and it comes from a very reliable source. My information is that it is the policy of the government. In fact the statement was made in the public accounts committee a few days ago that it was the policy of the government to prohibit truck traffic in the national parks. Of course that is right along the line of closing the national parks to trucks. I am going to take the minister's statement as the truth. I hope it works out that way, though I am still a little sceptical, not of the minister's statement but of the policy of the government. After this highway is completed I hope the minister will see to it that trucks are allowed to pass through our national parks.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Following that same line, going out the west gate the highway goes around Big Bend, and it is purely a gravel road. Certainly from personal observation I would agree with those who believe it is not ready for heavy freight yet. But that is not what bothers me at the moment. Here we have an expenditure of $10 million with respect to parks. It may be that I have missed the boat under item 366. I was referring to the details on page 250, where these million dollar expenditures are shown, and we have not heard a word about them yet. However, if that section has been passed I accept the fact and am not going to ask for any favours.

Now we are dealing with item 367, which provides $25,000 for surveys of the route. I will leave the other matter as my own misfortune, but dealing with this item of $25,000 I should like to know where it is intended to spend that money, in view of the fact that the route of the trans-Canada highway through Alberta and British Columbia has been agreed upon. Where and how are you going to spend $25,000 on surveys for a road which is now very well established?

Mr. Winters: This amount is to cover location surveys for the road through our national parks, not through the provincial areas of Alberta or British Columbia. It is not at all certain that the present route of the highway through those national parks is the best, and it is proposed to run location surveys to determine whether the trans-Canada highway should be relocated through the national parks or whether the existing routes are the best available.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Let us take the route from the east gate, which is in the neighbourhood of Campbell. That has been altered. Then take the route west from there. I happen to know that country rather well, and I was wondering if the minister could tell me where it was contemplated that this surveying would be done within the park. I am not speaking of what may happen outside the park, but I would like to know where you intend to spend this money, near what town or place?

Mr. Winters: The survey parties are not going to be tied to any location. Their instructions will be to go in there and make location surveys, to survey the general area and find out what would be the best route for a road. That is common practice.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is rather overdoing it, is it not? These survey parties have gone through there time and again; and I can assure the minister that the route within the park is well located at the present time. As a matter of fact the western end was rebuilt within very recent years; that is the approach into Lake Louise from Banff.

Mr. Winters: It may very well prove to be the best route.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am sure it is, and my opinion will not cost $25,000.

Mr. Byrne: I am quite familiar with the area in question, and I am quite sure that if these surveys are made as cheaply as the pipe line surveys were made, for instance, the whole of this $25,000 will not be required. However, that is difficult terrain, and this survey will require a considerable time. With the river and gorge—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): There is no gorge.

Mr. Byrne: —it is going to be very difficult to properly survey a good route. However, that is not what I intended to deal with. There has been some confusion with respect to transport trucks going through the park. Owing to my intercession last fall the department relaxed their restrictions on trucking to the extent that at the present time farmers are allowed to take trucks weighing up to three tons through the park. Then I have had assurances, and I know similar assurances have been published, that when the trans-Canada highway is completed transport trucks will be permitted to traverse that highway just as if it did not go through the parks. Everyone knows the federal government would not undertake these expenditures and then have trucks stopped at each gate of the park.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The minister gave certain standard specifications for the highway. I should like to know the standard specifications for the right of way. Is it to be 100 feet or 66 feet?

Mr. Winters: The conference last December agreed that the optimum right of way would be 100 feet, but that there were certain circumstances in which 66 feet would have to be accepted; and we have agreed to that. We hope most provnces will be able to provide a minimum of 66 feet, but we also have regard to the fact that in certain areas of British Columbia and perhaps Newfoundland and elsewhere it may not be possible to attain even that. However, we hope every effort will be made to do so.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I think that is a sound decision. I know in Nova Scotia and particularly in Cape Breton when we were building what we considered to be the trans-Canada highway back in the thirties, the right of way was 100 feet. Then I should like to know what progress is being made toward the conclusion of a contract with the province of Nova Scotia. If it has not yet been agreed upon I should like to know what is holding up that contract.

Mr. Winters: There is a vote for the trans-Canada highway, if my hon. friend would care to defer his question until then; or with your permission, Mr. Chairman, I can answer it now.

The Chairman: The minister may answer it, but I think it is quite out of order on this item.

Mr. Winters: There is another item for the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): That is the $20 million item?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): That is a statutory item. We have been carrying on a rather extensive discussion of the trans-Canada highway under this item of $25,000, but if the minister prefers I have no objection to waiting for the other item.

Mr. Winters: This is just in the national parks of Yoho and Banff.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): That will be all right, if it is the wish of the minister.

Item agreed to.

370. National Museum of Canada, $250,000.

Mr. Fraser: I want to ask a question about a song book that came to my desk from the national museum entitled "Come A-Singing". Can the minister tell me how many of these song books were printed, or why they were printed? It is headed, "National Museum of Canada" and on the inside it gives the price as 25 cents and says it was printed by the king's printer.

Mr. Sinclair: Sing one of the songs.

Mr. Fraser: The only song I can sing well is "Far, Far Away." These are Canadian folk songs, and I wondered whether other books of this kind were printed, and if so how many of each and how they were distributed. I should also like to know what the cost was.

Mr. Winters: I have not seen the book to which my hon. friend refers. The national museum has quite a collection of old folk songs of various types which they usually try to have reduced to steel tape recordings, and eventually to get them on paper in the form of books. We have no record before us now of how many of that particular publication there were; but I can find that out and give my hon. friend that information.

Mr. Fraser: I wish the minister would find that out and also what other books the national museum publishes. I think we should have that information for the record; and I think we should know what they are costing. Songs of this kind perhaps are all right, although I am not too keen about the illustrations in the song book. I think the minister should have a look at it also. If he wants to see it, I will let him have it.

Mr. Winters: I will get the information and give it to my hon. friend.

Mr. Fulton: In connection with this item, on page 251 in the details a breakdown is given showing field surveys, $31,000. What field surveys does the national museum conduct?

Mr. Winters: I have a note here which says that last year the national museum was able to extend its field activities on the amount of money voted owing to the fact that the geographical bureau looked after the field expenses of two of the museum field officers, and also owing to the fact that two other scientists worked without remuneration, and all the parties put in a shorter season than was desirable.

Mr. Fulton: That does not sound good to me. I think the minister should read on.

Mr. Winters: The surveys are: botanical surveys, for which we have an amount of $4,600; zoological surveys, $7,000; archaeological surveys, $10,600; and ethnological surveys, $8,800.

Mr. Fulton: Why does the national museum carry on these surveys when in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys there are survey branches? I do not quite see the need for field surveys by the national museum.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Looking for trilliums.

Mr. Winters: I would think, Mr. Chairman, that these would be two quite different fields. The technical surveys which the Department of Mines and Surveys is responsible for are topographic, hydrographic and geodetic surveys and the like.

Mr. Fulton: I thought the minister said geological surveys was one type.

Mr. Winters: I said zoology, archaeology, ethnology and botany; surveys in natural history.

Mr. Fulton: In connection with this item, which is $31,000 for this year, how are the costs differentiated from travelling expenses?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They are not.

Mr. Fulton: They are a separate item.

Mr. Winters: The travelling expenses of the people engaged in those survey parties are included in that $31,000.

Mr. Fulton: Just the people in the survey parties?

Mr. Winters: Just the people in the survey parties. The other people in the museum who travel have their travelling expenses shown under the other item.

Mr. Adamson: Has the minister the report on the pre-glacial botanical discovery made by Dr. Porsild comparatively recently in the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Winters: The report is not in yet.

Mr. Adamson: It was reported at some length. It has been one of the outstanding botanical discoveries of the century. It was reported in the New York Times comparatively recently. I wonder if it is possible to have a copy of the report, because it is of some considerable botanical importance.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): A few moments ago when we were dealing with another item, I was told that the department is using the 1948-49 expenditures in connection with the illustrations of the estimates. In the public accounts I find that the expenditures for 1948-49 for the national museum were only $144,000. Then the estimate for 1949-50 went up to $209,000 and this year it has gone up another 25 per cent to $250,000. I think the minister should give some explanation of that increase.

Mr. Winters: The museum is an organization that has been neglected for a long time. It had been behind in its field work and in its publication of various scientific activities and findings. I am told, and I have every reason to believe it is correct, that the amount voted this year is certainly not too much for the sort of museum we should have as a national museum of Canada. The fact is not that this is too much; it is that the other amount to which my hon. friend referred was far too little.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I agree with that view. But you have not the place to put the exhibits. You will have to get another place. That building down there is not sufficient.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Parliament sat there once.

Mr. Herridge: My view would be that there are not sufficient funds available to do the work that a national museum in Canada should be doing.

Mr. Winters: That is what I said.

Mr. Herridge: I hope that this committee will support the granting of more funds for this purpose in the future. I am of the opinion that our national museum has a shoddy appearance inside. Are there any proposals or plans for improving the interior of the present building or for extending the national museum?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Where is it?

Mr. Herridge: I think that is most necessary.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Do you know where it is?

Mr. Herridge: Yes. I have been there several times.

Mr. Winters: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that matter is receiving active consideration; and we hope some improvements will be made in the near future.

Mr. Adamson: Actually, there is more material stored and out of sight in the museum than there is on view.

Item agreed to.

Development services branch—

371. Lands division—administration of dominion, ordnance and admiralty, and public lands; seed grain collections, $282,200.

Mr. McLure: What does the seed grain collection have to do with this ordnance and admiralty, and public lands administration?

Mr. Winters: These are as a result of advances made years ago in western Canada when the lands were still administered by the federal government and the responsibility for collections still remains with this department.

Mr. Fulton: An increase is shown here in total salaries of $32,000, and only one more person is shown in the breakdown at page 251. I understand that there have been increases in salaries, but this is a good deal more than 10 per cent. One approves of the increases that have been made in the civil service scale, but why should the addition of one person in the department result in an increase of $32,000 in salary?

Mr. Winters: This is a matter of salary increases and adjustments of salary, and also transfers between departments on the formation of the new department from the old department. It is entirely a matter of increases and adjustments.

Mr. Fulton: I can appreciate that there has been some difficulty in making a breakdown of personnel from the old department to the new. The breakdown that is given here shows a personnel of 82 employed in the Department of Resources and Development, lands division, last year; whereas there are 83 employed on the same work this year. Therefore there is only one extra person doing this work in the lands division this year and yet the same people appear to be getting $32,000 more this year than last year. That is more than 10 per cent.

Mr. Winters: If my hon. friend goes through the breakdown that we are discussing he will find that there are ten people under the classification of clerks this year as against six last year; although there is just one over-all increase, he will see that there are changes at different levels which account for the difference in salaries.

Mr. Hodgson: I have to go back to the travelling expenses again. I see they are five times as high this year as they were last year. Last year they were $500; this year they are $2,500. Can the minister give us a little explanation of that?

Mr. Winters: What was the figure my hon. friend referred to?

Mr. Hodgson: I was mistaken. The increase is from $10,000 to $14,000.

Mr. Winters: That is right. Last year the expenses of the travelling auditor were paid by the comptroller of the treasury. This year his travelling expenses are paid out of this vote, which would account for some of the increase to $14,000. Of course, the $14,000 is an estimate of what we think will be required this year.

Mr. Low: I wish to ask the minister a question in connection with surveys. I notice that $10,000 is allocated for surveys. By whom are the surveys made? Is the geographical section of the general staff of the army employed on this work?

Mr. Winters: What is the amount my hon. friend is asking about?

Mr. Low: It is my mistake; it is only $1,500.

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Low: Are army personnel of the geographical section employed on this type of work?

Mr. Winters: No; this is just for surveys of lands that are being sold under the act, under this section.

Item agreed to.

Northern administrations—Arctic division—

378. Operation and maintenance of services, including Eskimo affairs, $300,935.

Mr. Fulton: This item reads:

Operation and maintenance of services, including Eskimo affairs.

What services does this department supply to the Eskimos? Are there any similar services supplied by the Indian affairs branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration?

Mr. Winters: No; there is no duplication. This department is responsible for matters pertaining to Eskimos, and is quite separate from any work done in the field on behalf of Indians.

Mr. Harkness: What matters in connection with Eskimos does this particular subdivision of the minister's department deal with?

Mr. Winters: The purpose of this vote is to provide for salaries and expenses connected with the administration of the Northwest Territories Act, ordinance and regulations and order in council P.C. 709 of August 31, 1927, within the Arctic areas of the Northwest Territories, including the districts of Keewatin and Franklin and the coastal area of the Mackenzie district; Eskimo affairs, excluding medical care and hospitalization within the province of Quebec, education, welfare, investigations leading to improvement of native economy, development of handicrafts, administration of justice, inspections, preparation and publication of factual material, acquisition and maintenance of equipment and purchases of supplies and so on.

Mr. Harkness: Education of Eskimos and welfare work would come under the Department of Citizenship and Immigration?

Mr. Winters: No; for Eskimos it comes under this department.

Mr. Harkness: They also have a vote for it in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. Heretofore we have always dealt with it under that division. They certainly have a vote for Eskimos so far as hospitalization and welfare are concerned. We had quite a discussion last year in connection with the payment of family allowances to Eskimos under the Indian affairs branch.

Mr. Winters: No; the Indian affairs branch has not had anything to do with the affairs of Eskimos. That has been the responsibility of this branch.

Mr. Hodgson: I notice that this vote calls for a total expenditure of $25,385 for salaries and wages. Last year the amount was $500. Can the minister explain that increase?

Mr. Winters: It is due to the educational system under which we operate. We now have a number of schoolteachers that we did not have before. This large increase is attributable to the increase in the number of schoolteachers for Eskimos.

Mr. Hodgson: Can the minister explain the allowances of $7,200?

Mr. Winters: That is $1,500 for married men working in the department in the district, and $900 for single men.

Mr. Fulton: What is the reason that the Department of Resources and Development is responsible for Eskimo affairs when another branch of another department is looking after Indian affairs? From what the minister says the two of them appear to be carrying on much the same activity in their respective spheres. Would it not be more efficient to have the Indian affairs branch deal with both Indians and Eskimos?

Mr. Winters: No; that of course is a matter that receives consideration from time to time. This department is charged with the administration of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. The predominant people up there are the Eskimos. They live under conditions different from the Indians, and a great attempt has been made to assimilate them into modern ways of life and so on. They are not the same type of wards as Indians are, and the over-all conditions are sufficiently different that it would appear to be the proper thing to do, so far as we are concerned at any rate, to have them included in the northern administration of this department.

Mr. Fulton: There is an increase in sundries under this item from $42,000 to $96,000, or an increase of $54,000. What is the explanation for that?

Mr. Winters: The item of sundries totals $96,500, made up as follows:

Film rentals, advertising teachers' positions, miscellaneous		$ 1,500
Relief of indigent Eskimos of Quebec,	$30,000
Relief of indigent Eskimos of Labrador	25,000
		55,000
Allowance for old age Eskimos		12,000
Investigation and removal of Eskimo families to areas where game is more plentiful		3,000
Rehabilitation of Eskimos, including those who have been victims of polio		25,000
		$96,500

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Fulton: I should like to make a suggestion. As we go through these details we see large items for sundries which, on the surface, appear to be open or general expenditures accounts. In most cases, at least in this department, there has been a complete explanation of how those are made up. I suggest that in future years the minister consider including that detail in his estimates.

Mr. Winters: I shall certainly bring it to the attention of the Minister of Finance and treasury board.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister have no responsibility in respect of the detail in which he breaks down his estimates?

Mr. Winters: We are governed as to how they are printed by the Department of Finance and treasury board.

Mr. Drew: That is quite contrary to the information I understood we received from Mr. Bryce. I understood the explanation as to why there was not uniformity was that the minister in each department was responsible for the manner in which his estimates were presented.

Mr. Winters: Well, as I said, I do not think it is a major point, so far as I am concerned. I should be very happy to break them down. I simply said that I would bring it to the attention of my colleague and consult him on it.

Mr. Fulton: Looking through the public accounts for 1948-49, the last volume available, we find that for the department of mines and resources, as it was then known, there is a total expenditure for Northwest Territories, Arctic division, of $110,000. Of the sundries only $2,000 was expended. We now have a breakdown showing sundries of $96,500. Are these new expenditures—particularly the large items of welfare which the minister detailed?

Mr. Winters: Yes, they are new expenditures.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Do the Eskimos of Labrador come under this vote?

Mr. Winters: The matter of how Eskimos in Labrador will be handled has not finally been settled. However, we have put $25,000 in here for the relief of indigent Eskimos.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In Labrador?

Mr. Winters: Yes, in Labrador. And at the same time we are working on a final settlement with Newfoundland as to how this should be handled.

Mr. Adamson: Are the herds of reindeer which support the Eskimos now self-supporting?

Mr. Winters: Some of the herds are self-supporting and some are not. A great deal of attention has been given to that, as my hon. friend knows. Suitable Eskimos have been picked out and put in charge of reindeer herds, to take care of them and do what they can by way of protecting them.

Mr. Adamson: Are the herds increasing, and is the experiment a success?

Mr. Winters: The answer is yes.

Mr. Harkness: I see here an item for hospitalization, professional and other special services. Do I understand that this department looks after the hospitalization and medical care of Eskimos?

Mr. Winters: The hospital expense shown here is for indigent whites and half-breed patients in hospital.

Mr. Harkness: The minister's department has no responsibility for the hospitalization and medical care of Eskimos?

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Mr. Harkness: That comes under the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Hodgson: While last year there was no expenditure for temporary assistance, the amount this year is $24,285, and a further amount of $1,100 for casuals. Will the minister explain that, please?

Mr. Winters: The temporary assistance is largely for welfare teachers, grade III. There are listed six welfare teachers.

Mr. Hodgson: Is that something new this year?

Mr. Winters: Yes; the rest is for labourers.

Mr. Hodgson: The expenditure for supplies and materials has increased from $5,000 to $41,500; can the minister explain that?

Mr. Winters: The expenditures are as follows:

Direct relief to indigent whites, Eskimos, and those of mixed blood living in the Arctic area, Northwest Territories	$25,000
Fuel for heating school and teachers' residences	10,000
Food for noon-day lunches for about 400 Eskimo school children	2,500
Films, rations for teachers, miscellaneous items	4,000
	$41,500

Mr. Drew: Where do they use telephones and telegraphs up there?

Mr. Winters: It is a matter of communication, wireless messages to and fro.

Mr. Drew: From where?

Mr. Winters: Mostly from Ottawa.

Mr. Drew: If they were wireless messages they would be sent from the government stations as a direct operation.

Mr. Winters: I am told that if we use the facilities of the Department of Transport we pay their operating tolls; if we use the facilities of the Department of National Defence we are able to send the communications free of charge to the department.

Mr. Drew: Do you pay for that here?

Mr. Winters: We pay the tolls charged by the Department of Transport out of this vote.

Mr. Drew: It was explained to us yesterday by the Minister of Finance that all departments are now paid through the Department of Finance.

Mr. Winters: The fact of the matter is that this amount is required for telegraphic communications to the area concerned.

Mr. Applewhaite: Under the heading of northern administration this committee has passed without the slightest hesitation or criticism items totalling approximately $5 million, but we now have some petty little sum of $300,000 to be spent for the benefit of our Eskimo population and it is being picked to pieces. I trust sincerely that neither the minister nor the government will assume from that that this country begrudges the small amount we are now expending upon the Eskimo population and which in my opinion might well be increased without in any way over-pampering the Eskimo.

Mr. Hodgson: It has been doubled in one year.

Mr. Drew: Having heard this—I hesitate to use the term "claptrap"—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Applewhaite: I rise on a question of privilege. I am not certain whether the word "claptrap" is parliamentary but assuming that it is not I am willing to consider where it comes from and let it go at that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: We have the trained seals again. Let us come back to the item. This is the kind of item that should be explained, not from the point of view of taking care of the Eskimo, about whom other hon. members are just as concerned as the hon. member who has just made these utterly inane remarks—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: I am simply asking where this payment is made. I ask that because it is important that we know through which channels these things are handled.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Recently there was an outbreak of poliomyelitis among the Eskimo and it is thought that these germs were brought down the Mackenzie river—

Mr. Drew: They are not brought by telegraph.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): —by white men. No doubt they originated with troops from the southern states who were brought up to build the highway and airport.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They are brought by telephone.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Probably some money was spent on telephone communications by the government in order to get doctors and nurses to help the Eskimo. The Eskimo is a law-abiding decent little sort of man, although he may be slightly unusual in his marital relations according to our beliefs. However, he is a citizen of Canada and is entitled to just as much consideration as anybody else. I think this money is being well spent on hospitals, doctors, nurses and schoolteachers.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): We were told a minute ago that we should stay on the item, but could we get further away from the item than this?

Mr. Drew: This is not a single item, nor is it a case of the concern that hon. members of this house may have for the Eskimo. I do not think there is any doubt that everyone here is anxious to see them cared for. This item of telephones and telegrams is repeated under the various headings, and in this case I am simply asking where this is paid and to whom.

Mr. Winters: As I said before, this is paid to the Department of Transport for the dispatch of messages by radio telephone and by ground wires which deal with the administration of the Arctic areas, including messages to and from vessels other than the C. D. Howe.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is that a vessel?

Mr. Hodgson: At the bottom of page 254 there is an item of $30,000 for acquisition of equipment. Last year this item was only $400 and I think there should be some explanation.

Mr. Winters: This item of $30,000 is to cover miscellaneous small items required by officials of the eastern Arctic patrol, and includes the purchase of two 16 mm. film projectors; handicrafts; home economics; manual training; athletics; musical instruction; school equipment for the new school at Coppermine; school equipment for the new school at Pond Inlet; school equipment for another new school at Iglookik; equipment for seasonal schools, nursing stations, and additional equipment for five schools already established; it also includes six radios; six record players; fifteen film strip projectors; furnishings for three teachers' residences.

Mr. Hodgson: Those are all new projects this year?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Engineering and construction service—

380. Engineering and construction services, $500,000.

Mr. McLure: Is this construction work carried on in the national parks? A lot of surveying and engineering work was done in connection with a bridge in the national park from Rustico harbour to Robinson's harbour, and then a roadway to the other end of Robinson's island with another bridge connecting with Covehead. I have not been able to get very much information with reference to this matter from the minister and I should like to know whether the surveying of this bridge has been completed and when construction of the bridge will start.

Mr. Winters: This is still a matter of discussion. The survey has not yet been made.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Public accounts show that on March 31, 1949, there were 99 employees in this division. The estimates show that in 1949-50 there were 122 employees, and for 1950-51 the number is increased to 141. The cost has gone up from $304,000 in 1948-49 to $411,000 in 1949-50 to $500,000 for the current year. I think we should have an explanation when there is such a large increase in a vote like this.

Mr. Winters: For the period of years to which the hon. member referred there has been a considerable increase in the amount of work undertaken by these engineers. The figures I have show that for 1939-40 there was an amount of $1,896,456, with an engineering staff of 54. In 1949-50 this amount had increased to $10,176,778 with a staff of 122.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not think the minister understood me. I stated that according to the public accounts on March 31, 1949, only a year ago, there were 99 employees. The estimate last year was 122 and this year it is 141. The expenditure has gone down $1 million instead of going up.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, this department has been shorthanded for some time. We have been attempting to put our engineering work into better shape before contracts are let. It had been the practice in many instances to let contracts in national parks on some basis such as cost plus a fixed fee because the engineering staff simply was not available to undertake the necessary surveys to let contracts on a fixed cost basis. We are now making every attempt to get around that situation and develop our engineering staff to the point where engineering details and drawings can be made available before tenders are called so that contracts can be let on a fixed basis.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Have you let any contracts this year?

Mr. Winters: We have let some contracts this year.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Have they been let on a fixed cost basis or cost plus?

Mr. Winters: The contracts that have been called have been firm contracts in a sense but only in a sense. They have not been let on the basis of actual unit costs for quantities. They have been let on the basis of a firm price for fees and a firm price for rentals of the equipment involved, which is one of the big items in any road building contract.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You have not stated they have been on a fixed cost basis.

Mr. Winters: No, I did not.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Because we have been told in the public accounts committee that is a very rare thing.

Mr. Winters: The contracts let this year were, as I said, on the basis of a fixed fee plus fixed rentals for the equipment used in carrying out the contracts.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can you say how many employees you have now in that division?

Mr. Winters: I am told that the number is a few less than the 141 shown in the estimates because there have been some transfers recently.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You have some vacancies now.

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: As I understand it this amount is for work in the national parks. Why is it not included under the general item for administration of the national parks for convenience of reference, or do they do other general work for the department as well?

Mr. Winters: They do other general work as well, especially in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Perhaps I should read the explanation I have before me. The total increase is due mainly to (a) the inclusion of provision for general salary revisions and statutory increases; (b) provision for new positions and additional equipment, services, supplies, et cetera, as a result of the increased activities of the services required to cope with the expanded improvement and development program in the Northwest Territories, the Yukon and the national parks; (c) the constantly increasing price level which affects every service and commodity required in the administration of the various functions of the service.

Mr. Hodgson: Under temporary assistance there is an increase of about $60,000 over last year. The amount for temporary assistance is more than twice that for permanent positions. Can you explain that situation?

Mr. Winters: It is the practice of the department to hire most of these people on a temporary basis and hire them later on a permanent basis if they prove satisfactory. I think that is a common practice. At the present time there is a large percentage of temporary assistants.

Mr. Hodgson: That would be for summer work?

Mr. Winters: Most of it is for summer work.

Item agreed to.

Stony Rapids—Black lake road—

381. Contribution to the cost of constructing a mining road between Stony Rapids and Black lake in Saskatchewan in accordance with the terms of an agreement to be entered into between Canada and the province of Saskatchewan (revote), $12,500.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, under what statute is this item provided?

Mr. Winters: It is not a statute. It is a vote of parliament which enables this work to be done.

Mr. Drew: There is no covering statute?

Mr. Winters: No.

Mr. Drew: What is the agreement that is referred to?

Mr. Winters: It is an agreement between the government of Saskatchewan and the government of Canada for the carrying out of this work.

Mr. Wright: I should like to ask the minister what percentage this amount is of the total cost of building the road.

Mr. Winters: The total cost of the road is $37,500, and this is the federal government's share.

Mr. Wright: Approximately one-third.

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Item agreed to.

382. Cranberry Portage road—to provide funds for the 1950-51 contribution to the cost of section B, Cranberry Portage to Cuprus mines, of the proposed road between The Pas and Flin Flon in Manitoba, in accordance with the terms of the agreement between Canada and the province of Manitoba, dated September 30, 1948, $32,000.

Mr. Drew: Item 382 is in the same position as 381. It is not covered by any statutory provision and refers to an agreement. This is the type of provision in the estimates that has been under discussion before. Since there are various provisions for highway construction in which the dominion government has some participation, I should like to know whether these are the same type of agreements or whether they are special agreements, and the nature of them. It is not the amount; it is the practice that is of importance.

Mr. Winters: This is an agreement entered into between the province of Manitoba and the Dominion of Canada for a road into Flin Flon. The terms of the agreement were that the cost of the road would be shared on a fifty-fifty basis up to a total expenditure on behalf of the federal government of $437,000. The $32,000 shown in the estimates is the balance of payment on behalf of the federal government.

Mr. Drew: What I am interested in is why this provision for a mining road is not dealt with under the statute which deals with minings roads.

Mr. Winters: I know of no statute for mining roads.

Mr. Drew: There is assistance to mining roads.

Mr. Winters: I am told that to the best of the recollection of the officials before me there is no statute for mining roads.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to extend the discussion. There is a practice—and perhaps it is also covered by votes—of assisting mining roads.

Mr. Winters: Yes, there has been a practice, not by statute but by votes.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Wright: What percentage is the $437,000 of the total cost of this road for which assistance has been given by the dominion government?

Mr. Winters: As I said, it is supposed to represent half the cost of the road. I understand that the total cost has overrun the anticipated figure with the result that the province of Manitoba will probably put up more money as its share than it expected.

Mr. Wright: That is the point at issue. As a matter of fact the province of Saskatchewan agreed to build a road from Nipawin to Flin Flon in 1947, before the Manitoba government decided to build its road into this area. Saskatchewan spent half a million dollars in the construction of that road, building from both ends, but so far this government has not seen its way clear to contribute toward the cost of the construction of that road into this mining area.

Under the previous item, in connection with the construction of a road from Stony Rapids into Black lake, the minister stated that the share of the dominion would be one-third. I should like the minister to explain how he can justify giving assistance to one province to the extent of one-half the cost and to another province only one-third, and just why the province of Saskatchewan should be penalized as compared with the province of Manitoba in connection with the construction of a highway into the mining area of Flin Flon, when Saskatchewan was the first to commence construction of a road on its own account. It seems to me the dominion government should deal with the provinces on an equal basis.

Mr. Winters: Every effort is made to deal with the provinces on the same basis. Each project is different, and different circumstances exist. The project we discussed under item 381 was a three-way project involving a private company, the province of Saskatchewan and the federal government. Item 382 involves only two parties, the province of Manitoba and the federal government. That is why in one case there was a three-way split and in the other a two-way split.

Mr. Wright: The company did not enter into the contract in Manitoba? I can see that in that case the company might not be brought in, though the Black lake project was entirely for the benefit of the mines in that area. It was not intended to assist the general population of the area, because there just is not any population there at the present time. This is simply a road to move mining machinery into that area. Certainly the minister has not given an explanation that satisfies me as to why assistance should have been given Manitoba in connection with the construction of a road to Flin Flon while Saskatchewan, the first province to commence the project, has not been assisted at all.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Wright: No, Mr. Chairman. I want some explanation from the minister of the different treatment as between the two provinces concerning assistance in constructing a highway to Flin Flon.

Mr. Winters: I can only repeat that every effort is made to deal with all provinces on the same basis. Certainly there is no discrimination for any reasons other than those arising out of the conditions surrounding a particular project. In the one case the road went through the heart of a mining area and opened up that area. While this was done before my time, I have reviewed the situation and I find nothing that could be construed as discrimination against the province of Saskatchewan. It was a matter of circumstance.

Mr. Wright: There are no other mines along the highway that has been built from The Pas in Manitoba to Flin Flon. It does not open up any mining area; as a matter of fact the possibility of opening a mining area was as great in connection with the construction of the highway from Nipawin to Flin Flon as it was in the construction of the road in Manitoba. Certainly the explanation by the minister cannot be accepted, because the road from The Pas to Flin Flon does not open up any mining area. It is an old area, and the road pretty well follows the railway that was built from The Pas to Flin Flon a number of years ago. On the other hand the road from Nipawin to Flin Flon opens up new forest reserves and possibly new mining areas.

Mr. Weaver: I think I can explain some of the statements just made by the hon. member for Melfort, who has said one or two things that are not quite accurate. In the first place the road from Nipawin to Flin Flon was not the first road to be started. The famous highway from The Pas to Flin Flon was under construction prior to the war, and on the outbreak of war was abandoned half way between The Pas and Cranberry Portage. Work was not commenced on it again until almost three years ago. So that deals with that point. With regard to mining areas, the province received no assistance until this road actually entered what is known as the pre-Cambrian shield at Cranberry Portage, and it is only thirty-eight miles from there to Flin Flon, for which this vote helps to pay. Saskatchewan received the same treatment. The highway from Nipawin to Flin Flon enters the pre-Cambrian shield approximately at a point known as Beaver Lake, and as a result only fourteen miles of that road can qualify for this assistance. As to the proportion of cost I have not the actual figures, but the total cost of the road from The Pas to Flin Flon was in the neighbourhood of $1,250,000, which would make the contribution of this government a relatively small proportion of the total.

Mr. Wright: If what the hon. member for Churchill has just said is correct I should like the minister to tell us how much his department paid Saskatchewan with respect to the fourteen miles that are said to be within the pre-Cambrian shield.

Mr. Winters: Subject to correction when I check the figures, which I do not have before me at the moment, it was something in the order of $50,000 or $60,000.

Item agreed to.

Forestry branch—

383. Administrative division, $70,000.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister whether this is the point at which to bring up a question concerning a contract referred to in the last report of the public accounts committee. It has to do with the report of the Auditor General for 1948-49, dealing with the Department of Mines and Resources, at page 20, where the Auditor General commented as follows:

> Order in council P.C. 5510 of November 30, 1948, authorized a contract for the construction of a "temporary building for the forest products laboratories" at Ottawa, the cost to be $50,200. Payments in the year amounted to $40,713. Attention is drawn to the transaction because the building has been erected on rented property, the lease for which expires on April 30, 1950.

That was a month ago yesterday.

> The property has been under continuous lease by the crown since 1927. The file discloses that the owner, on August 30, 1948, consented to the erection of the building on the condition that if the crown vacated the premises and removed the building, "any excavations will be filled in and the ground restored to its present condition at the expiration of the existing lease or any renewal of same . . ."

Would the minister tell us the position with respect to the renewal of the lease which expired on April 30 of this year and what provision is in the renewed lease, if there is one, with respect to the removal of the building?

Mr. Winters: That is a matter of contract being negotiated by my colleague the Minister of Public Works, who is generally responsible for the accommodation in which the rest of us work.

Mr. Fulton: I see it in the Auditor General's report to parliament under the Department of Mines and Resources. If the present minister has no information on the matter, I could wait until we reached the estimates of the Department of Public Works. Is that the position? Has the present minister no information on the matter?

Mr. Winters: That is the position.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder what I should do, Mr. Chairman. I certainly should like to follow this matter up. Should I ask that the item be allowed to stand until the minister can get the information?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. gentleman is speaking of an expenditure which appears in the Auditor General's report. I do not know about this matter; I have not any information on it, but I will try to get any information he wishes to have. If I rightly understood what was just read, we put up a building on rented property. I am under the impression that the building is still there and occupied. If we have not renewed the lease, I hope we will come to some agreement with the owner, because we do not generally build on rented property without some guarantee or some assurance that we will have a renewal of the lease. I will try to get all the information the hon. gentleman wishes.

Mr. Fulton: What I am asking now, Mr. Chairman, is to be told the proper place to discuss the matter and to obtain the information. It seems to me that the item now before us would be the place to do it, because it is not in the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I think there is some confusion, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member is speaking of an expenditure, and what the minister is asking for is a vote on an estimate for this fiscal year. Any questions as to expenditure we can answer, I am sure. I have not the story ready right now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is the first time I have heard about it, but I am fairly sure that I could get a good story from my officials. We do not spend the public's money without having assurance that it is well spent. But I can give all the information the hon. member wishes on my estimates, or I can try to get it before that time.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to be quite clear on this point. I am quite sure that the Minister of Public Works can get an explanation. But while it is an expenditure, my view is that one of our duties in examining the estimates for the current year is to compare what is asked for this year with what has been spent previously, and that has been the practice as we go along. At the moment all I am asking is what would be the correct procedure. I think this matter should be discussed in the committee; but should it not be discussed under the Department of Resources and Development, or do I take it from the statement of the Minister of Public Works that he will allow us to discuss it on his estimates?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Certainly. If we in public works spent that money, you will certainly have all the time you wish to discuss it in committee on my estimates.

Mr. Casselman: What about the chairman? Will he agree to that?

Mr. Fulton: Who did spend the money?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If I correctly understand it, it is under his estimates. We probably had a transfer of funds in the putting up of this building. We are responsible for putting up the building and renting the land. I am glad the hon. gentleman has given me this advance notice so that I will be well prepared when he brings the matter before the committee on my estimates.

Mr. Drew: This whole group of estimates covers undoubtedly one of the most important activities of the new department whose estimates are under consideration. This afternoon the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe raised a point that I believe should be given earnest consideration and one which calls for a plan of co-operative effort between this department and the provincial departments which are handling the problem of forest protection, particularly the prevention of fires. This subject was discussed briefly on an earlier occasion. I wish, however, to emphasize the point that no matter how carefully plans may be drawn to ensure the perpetuity of the forest crop by the ordinary cutting methods, those plans will be defeated and there will be continuity of the forest threat unless more effective measures can be taken to prevent the tremendous devastation by fire that occurs each year. It is doubtful whether it is possible to prevent fires, but there is no question about it that a large percentage of all fires are preventable and a large percentage of all fires can be stopped in the early stages if the proper steps are taken just after the fire has broken out.

The prevention of fire is something that can well be considered on a wider basis than a division of areas by provinces. Some of the provinces now have effective fire protection services of their own. Other provinces are not able to maintain the fleet of aircraft necessary for that purpose. There is not a single province, however, that would not benefit greatly by some arrangement under which highly-trained firefighters could be carried quickly into threatened areas far from roads and far from ordinary water communication, and dropped by parachute. For that purpose it would seem to me that a plan of co-operation with the Royal Canadian Air Force could be worked out under which various commandos could be trained to go into any area where fires have broken out as a result of lightning or from other causes, and where they are remote from ordinary direct access.

I do not want any suggestion to be made that I am proposing that the Department of Resources and Development attempt to supplant, or in any way to enter into the field of direct responsibility of, the provincial departments. I feel sure, however, that the provincial departments would welcome some plan which would make it possible to fly in either their own or other trained men to some of these areas, with aircraft in the possession of the Royal Canadian Air Force which could do a job that the highly effective but smaller aircraft of the various protection services are not able to do.

This whole problem is one that goes beyond that of protection of the forests themselves. This department has under its administration the encouragement of travel into this country. Right at the present time there are a number of areas in different parts of Canada where travel is prohibited because of fires, even at this early season. This therefore is a matter of direct concern not only from the point of view of protection of the forests for commercial services but also because of its effect upon the tourist business. Once again I am placing before the minister the importance of a plan whereby the transport aircraft of the Royal Canadian Air Force could be brought into operation under some co-operative arrangement, and whereby they could fly, into areas not otherwise accessible, parachute firefighters with special equipment who could drop in and do this job. It is not any new suggestion over here, nor is it a suggestion of something that has not worked. It is being worked today very successfully in a number of areas in the United States.

I make this proposal to supplement what has already been said by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe as to the immense importance of taking every step possible to prevent loss by fire, which actually is eating up more wood than all the industries that are producing so much in dollars at this time.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, as arranged some time ago, tomorrow we will have a discussion on freight rates under item 524 of the Department of Transport. Then we shall try to dispose of the few items that are left in that department. I understand there are a few left. We hope to conclude the estimates of the Department of Resources and Development and then we shall proceed with the estimates of veterans affairs and citizenship and immigration.

At 11.03 o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT

A—Department—

358. Departmental administration, $370,640.

Development services branch—

359. Branch administration, $55,215.

Water resources division—

360. Water resources division, including the administration of the Dominion Water Power and Irrigation Acts, and including grant of $350 to the international executive council, world power conference, $541,766.

361. To provide for studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed in Canada, $380,000.

362. Lake of the Woods control board, $12,480.

363. To provide for the expenses incurred under the agreement between Canada, Ontario and Manitoba, confirmed by the Lac Seul Conservation Act, 1928, moneys to expended to be largely reimbursed, $17,750.

364. To provide for excavation of a flood channel at Dalles rapids in Winnipeg river in Ontario to reduce flooding of riparian property affected by regulation under the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act (revote), $60,000.

Wildlife division—

365. Wildlife resources conservation and development, including administration of Migratory Birds Convention Act, $300,000.

National parks and historic sites division—

366. National parks and historic sites services, $10,138,886.

367. Trans-Canada highway—surveys of route in Banff and Yoho national parks, $25,000.

368. Grant to the Jack Miner Migratory Bird Foundation, $5,000.

369. Grant to aid in the development of the international peace garden in Manitoba, $15,000.

370. National Museum of Canada, $250,000.

371. Lands division—administration of dominion, ordnance and admiralty, and public lands; seed grain collections, $282,200.

Northern administrations—

372. Administration, $151,000.

Mackenzie river division—

373. Operation and maintenance of services, including Wood Buffalo park, $678,415.

374. Forest conservation, including Wood Buffalo park, $337,295.

375. Roads, buildings and other works, as detailed in the estimates, $715,450.

Yukon division—

376. Operation and maintenance of services, including forest conservation, $174,500.

377. Roads, buildings and other works, as detailed in the estimates, $2,741,000.

Arctic division—

378. Operation and maintenance of services, including Eskimo affairs, $300,935.

379. Buildings and other works, as detailed in the estimates, $35,000.

Engineering and construction service—

380. Engineering and construction services, $500,000.

381. Stony Rapids—Black lake road—contribution to the cost of construction a mining road between Stony Rapids and Black lake in Saskatchewan in accordance with the terms of an agreement to be entered into between Canada and the province of Saskatchewan (revote), $12,500.

382. Cranberry Portage road—to provide funds for the 1950-51 contribution to the cost of section B, Cranberry Portage to Cuprus Mines, of the proposed road between The Pas and Flin Flon in Manitoba, in accordance with the terms of the agreement between Canada and the province of Manitoba, dated September 30, 1948, $32,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

NATIONAL DEFENCE—SECOND REPORT

Second report of special committee on Bill No. 133, respecting national defence.—Mr. Campney.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. Sarto Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont) presented the first report of the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

RADIO BROADCASTING—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. Ralph Maybank (Winnipeg South Centre) presented the first report of the special committee on radio broadcasting, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED NATIONS

UNESCO—AGREEMENT WITH RESPECT TO INTERNATIONAL CIRCULATION OF VISUAL AND AUDITORY MATERIALS

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to lay on the table three copies, in English and in French, of an agreement for facilitating the international circulation of visual and auditory materials of an educational, scientific and cultural character, signed by Canada on December 17, 1949.

Mr. Graydon: Is there any simple explanation of it?

ELECTRICITY INSPECTION ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO SEALING OF METERS, FEES, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the first reading of Bill No. 263 (from the Senate) to amend the Electricity Inspection Act, 1928.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GAS INSPECTION ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO SEALING OF METERS AND INSPECTION FEES

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the first reading of Bill No. 264 (from the Senate) to amend the Gas Inspection Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NEWFOUNDLAND HOTEL, ST. JOHN'S—WAGES OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport, of which I have sent him a copy. Has any consideration been given to placing the employees of the Newfoundland hotel, at St. John's, Newfoundland, on the same rates of wages as those paid in other Canadian National Railway hotels, and if so, when will the new rates come into effect? Will they be retroactive to October 1, 1949?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member sent notice of his question, I am afraid I did not receive it, although I was in my office all morning. The question involves a legal point which has been given consideration both by officers of the Canadian National Railways and by officials of the Department of Justice, I believe—although I am not too sure of the latter. I shall have to look into the question to ascertain the present position, and give a reply later.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

524. Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada —administration, maintenance and operation, $624,800.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, it is some months since there has been an opportunity in the House of Commons to have a full-dress debate on the subject of freight rates. The last time such a debate took place was on the occasion of a decision by the board of transport commissioners to increase freight rates by 21 per cent. Since that time of course there has been in the house intermittent discussion on the subject; but because of the rule of the house which states that all matters which are sub judice should not be open to debate, it has not been possible for the house to discuss the subject matter in the manner in which I am sure hon. members would have wanted to do.

I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate. I realize that in a subject such as this, with both the political and economic ramifications it has, it is almost impossible to deal at length with the various aspects which are likely to come up. In the main all of the applications made by the Railway Association for Canada were of a financial nature, and the board regarded them as such. In the course of my remarks this morning I shall deal first of all with the position of the railways prior to these applications, and next with the applications themselves. I should like to make certain comments respecting these as I go along.

The financial position in which the railways of Canada have found themselves in the last few years can be properly viewed only in the light of the developments which took place during the war and prior to the war. Stated briefly, and without for the moment considering the causes, the costs of labour and material have increased sharply, and while many industries have been able to keep revenues in step with rising expenses, the railways have not been nearly as successful in a similar endeavour. They have, it is true, on two occasions made application for authority to apply a general increase in rates. These requests have been granted, in part on one occasion and in whole on another, after extensive argument and study, and after a considerable period of time.

It is common knowledge that during the war years from 1939 to 1945, the volume of traffic severely taxed all the carrying facilities of the railways. For example, in 1938, the last complete year before the war, the revenue ton miles on all Canadian railways stood at approximately 27 billion, and in 1944 they had reached a level of 66 billion. The passenger miles revenue rose from 1·7 billion to 6·9 billion. This was a period of very high operating revenue; but these levels of activity were not secured without the full extension of all available manpower and equipment facilities. This of necessity involved additional expense commitments, but, as is normal under conditions of rapid expansion, the rate of increase in revenue was for a time greater than the rate of increase in expenses.

This is self-evident when consideration is given to the operating ratio of our railways in 1938 as compared with 1943. In 1938, in order to earn a dollar of revenue, the railways had to spend 88 cents; and in 1943 to earn a dollar in revenue the expense was 72 cents. The balance of revenues is in both cases the amount which is left available to pay fixed charges, surplus requirements, dividends and the like.

During 1944 and 1945 the rate of increase of expenses overtook the rate of increase in revenues, with the result that during 1946, with the declining level of traffic becoming more and more noticeable from month to month, there followed necessarily a decrease in operating revenues which was not accompanied by a proportionate decrease in expenses.

For the first eight months of 1946 the railways had to spend 88 cents for every dollar of revenue they earned. In other words the financial position of the railways as measured by the operating ratio had reverted to the position which existed before the war. This, in brief, was the financial position of the railways prior to October 9, 1946, when the Railway Association of Canada filed its first application for an increase in freight rates. That application sought a 30 per cent increase in tolls and freight tariffs, with certain exceptions, as I shall mention later.

In the application attention was drawn to the observations I have just made, namely that increasing costs and declining revenues had taken place in the field of railway operation. Mention was also made of the fact that the general level of freight rates had not been increased over the reduced level established by the board in 1922. In fact, it was stated that in some instances following 1922 there had been substantial important reductions in freight rates.

The application was put down for hearing at public sittings of the board, opening in Ottawa on February 11, 1947, and the final argument was not concluded until December 17, 1947. In addition to the sittings which it held in Ottawa, the board travelled from coast to coast and heard all parties interested in appearing before it in each of the nine provinces. The board handed down its decision in the 30 per cent application on March 30, 1948, by which it authorized an increase in freight rates of 21 per cent, horizontally, all across the board, with certain exceptions which I think are of extreme importance and which I should like to put on record:

First, a flat increase of 25 cents per ton was granted on coal and coke; second, the increase did not apply to rates on grain and grain products between points in western Canada; third, it did not apply to the agreed charges; fourth, it did not apply to grain and flour moving from all points on all lines of railway west of Fort William to Fort William and Port Arthur and Armstrong; fifth, it did not apply to grain and flour moving from all prairie points on all lines of railway to Vancouver, Prince Rupert and other British Columbia coast points for export; sixth, it did not apply on international overhead and import and export traffic through Canadian ports moving at rates relating to rates in effect from and to the United States of America ports.

At this point I should like to draw attention to a statement which I made on the general debate which took place in 1948 and which will be found in Hansard of April 13 of that year. At that time I said that the decision in the 21 per cent case which had been handed down by the board, instead of affecting an estimated freight revenue of $492 million for the two main railways of Canada affected a freight revenue of approximately $262,500,000, thus eliminating from that judgment nearly $230 million of freight revenue. The reason for that is to be found in the exceptions which I have just enumerated. With the concurrence of the applicants and the respondent provinces, the Canadian Pacific Railway was used as a yardstick for measuring the need of the railways, and the decision indicated that the 21 per cent award would yield the Canadian Pacific Railway additional revenues in the amount of $30,345,000.

Here I want to interject that there was a decision by the government to make a general investigation into the freight rate structure following the decision of the board of transport commissioners in the 21 per cent case. By virtue of order in council P.C. 1487, dated April 7, 1948, the board was directed to undertake a general freight rates investigation with the object of eliminating unjust inequalities which might exist between different persons and between different localities. In July of that year the railways indicated to the board that they were assembling information and would prepare a plan or schedule of rates which in their opinion would accomplish the purposes envisaged by P.C. 1487. To date the plan and proposals of the railways have not been received, and the provincial governments have not made any submission with respect to the order in council.

The board of transport commissioners were of the opinion that the report and recommendations of the royal commission should be studied before completing their findings pursuant to P.C. 1487. In the meantime, however, the board had not lost time but was conducting investigations of its own. Its bureau of transportation economics, along with its traffic department, have had under way for several months a waybill study and analysis of freight matters. This study involves the assembly and examination of waybills covering the movements of freight on certain representative days over a period of twelve months. By representative days is meant days which after study and examination reflect a normal movement of freight traffic on the railways of this country. It is expected that the waybill study will furnish to the board, for the first time in its history, basic data with respect to the freight rate structure and its incidence upon various sections of the country. The approximate number of waybills which are being examined on the dates selected will total 250,000 shipments. When the study is completed and considered in the light of the recommendations made by the royal commission, the board of transport commissioners will then be in a position to appraise the value of the submissions made by the railways and other parties.

I have indicated already that no submissions have as yet been received by the board. I think in fairness to those concerned I should point out that both the time and energy of counsel, officials and experts of the railways and the provincial governments as well as the board have been so completely taken up with matters of freight rates and the royal commission that so far it has been impracticable for the board to pursue its investigation on the general freight rates by holding public hearings.

I come back now to the history of the period following the decision in the 21 per cent case. Following that decision, representations against the order of the board granting the 21 per cent increase were made on behalf of the seven provinces which had opposed the application, Ontario and Quebec not being included. A petition was made by those provinces to the governor in council on July 20, 1948, and on July 27 the Railway Association of Canada, on behalf of its member railway companies, again applied to the board of transport commissioners for authority to make another advance of 20 per cent on the freight rates in effect at that time.

The board concurred in the suggestion of the respondent provinces that this case should not be heard while the appeal of the provinces from the decision of March 30 was pending before the governor in council. The governor in council gave consideration to the appeal of the provinces, and by order in council P.C. 4678, of October 10, 1948, directed the board of transport commissioners to review its 21 per cent decision and to give consideration to a number of specific complaints made by the provinces at the time at which they dealt with the 20 per cent application of the railways.

Hearings began on this subject on January 11, 1949, and an interim judgment of the board was issued on September 20, 1949. In its judgment the board stated, in connection with the review of the 21 per cent case, that it found that the increase should have been only 15 per cent, and established a new formula to gauge the financial requirements of the railways. The board applied its new findings to the 20 per cent application and granted an interim increase of 8 per cent in rates in effect at the time the application was received by the board. In its decision the board gave effect to a number of claims made by the provinces, including, one, the allocation of fixed charges as between rail and non-rail enterprises; two, rejected the user basis of depreciation suggested as opposed to the straight-line method; three, adjusted income tax by giving consideration to overstatement of depreciation and deferred maintenance.

The board also took into consideration the fact that by order in council, P.C. 6033 dated December 29, 1948, the royal commission on transportation had been appointed and that several matters then in dispute before the board were within the terms of reference of the royal commission. This might involve recommendations for revision of the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways, from which a rate base valuation could be made. Economies under the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act and a uniform accounting procedure for railway companies were also matters which had been referred to the royal commission on transportation, some of them on the recommendation of the provinces.

These were matters which the board thought would involve the treatment of deferred maintenance and other income. The principle of horizontal increases, which has been discussed in this house before, and which unquestionably will be brought up again, was under consideration in the board's general freight rates study. This, together with the fact that the changes in sources of revenue had not had time to make their effect felt, were reasons given by the board for granting the interim increase of 8 per cent which I mentioned a moment ago.

Then there followed an application by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to the Supreme Court of Canada for leave to appeal the decision of the 8 per cent interim increase in freight rates. The Supreme Court of Canada, having listened to argument, gave judgment in favour of the contention of that railway. Immediately following that decision the board decided to reopen the case for further hearing, and the case was reopened before the board on February 2, 1950, at which time further evidence was admitted in respect to the comparison of results for the year 1949. Final decision was rendered on March 1, 1950, authorizing an increase of 16 per cent in lieu of the interim increase of 8 per cent. In this decision the board applied the same formula as in the review of the 21 per cent judgment, and accepted two further contentions of the provinces, namely, (1) a reduction in the income tax of the C.P.R. for the year 1949, and (2) allowance for devaluation of the pound as affecting the overseas financial responsibility of the C.P.R.

While the board in the 8 per cent interim decision had questioned the lack of evidence in support of increased labour costs, additional evidence was presented and accepted by the board at the hearing following the appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. This evidence indicated that the effect of the 17 cents per hour wage award coming after the original 21 per cent decision increased the C.P.R. 1948 operating costs by $29 million, or nearly equivalent to the $30,345,000 deficiency which the 21 per cent award was intended to cover.

Following this decision the Railway Association of Canada made another application to the board of transport commissioners for review or amendment of its decision in the 16 per cent case, arguing that the 16 per cent should have been 20 per cent. The grounds were, first, that the board had erred in not authorizing such a percentage increase as was required to make good the total revenue deficiency of $29,971,700, and, second, that the board erred in authorizing an increase of only 16 per cent, in that such a percentage increase would have provided an increase in revenue of only $22,300,000.

On May 11 the board granted the application of the Railway Association of Canada and increased the 16 per cent to 20 per cent. This latest and final advance of 20 per cent in freight rates authorized by the board was again to be applied only, as I stated with reference to the 21 per cent case, to a certain proportion of the traffic. As in the 21 per cent case, no authority was given to the railways to increase statutory grain rates and international as well as import and export rates. The total freight revenue of our two main railways amounted to $635 million in 1949 but only some $425 million will be affected by the latest 20 per cent increase.

In conclusion, let me say that the 20 per cent decision handed down recently was the final culmination of a series of three applications which was arrived at only after hearings extending over a long period of time, in some cases many months, and the hearing of evidence taking up many thousands of pages. It would strike me that the men who sat on the board, who had an opportunity to hear the evidence and argument of counsel over a period of more than two years, were in a position to appraise the merits of the case as well as any other people in this country could. Furthermore, in the final analysis Canadian rates have been increased by 45 per cent compared with an increase in the United States of 60 per cent and in the United Kingdom of 80 per cent. Recently an increase of some 16⅔ per cent has been granted in the United Kingdom, making their total increase since the end of the war 80 per cent compared with 45 per cent in Canada.

Again I should like to point out that the benefit of the increases in the United States and the United Kingdom was granted almost immediately, either by interim decision or by decisions which had the effect of putting the new rates into operation the moment the decision was handed down. In Canada the situation has been entirely different, in that in the 21 per cent case, for instance, almost two years elapsed between the time the application was made and the time the judgment was handed down. This completes a brief historical analysis of the various applications made together with some comments as I went along, which was all I intended to do this morning.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When did the last increase in the United Kingdom take place?

Mr. Chevrier: Within the last month or two—quite recently. All in all, having regard to the circumstances as found at the time, I believe the decision of the board is one in keeping with the financial requirements of the railways.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, discussion of this item presents the first opportunity that has been afforded to indicate the opinions that may be held by members of the house as to the sequence of events leading up to the most recent announcement by the board of transport commissioners. The Minister of Transport has reviewed the events of the past two years, when, for the first time since the war, the question of increases in freight rates has been dealt with in the way that he has outlined. In his concluding remarks he gave comparisons between increases in freight rates in the United Kingdom and in Canada, indicating that the over-all increase in Canada is not as great as in the United Kingdom or in the United States.

I submit that the problem is one which goes far beyond a mere question of comparison of the percentage of increase in freight rates here and in any other country. The minister has outlined in clear and simple form the steps by which we have reached the position in which we find ourselves at the present time. He has pointed out that the necessity for listening to the mass of evidence in regard to this subject has precluded the possibility of consideration by the board of other related problems. He has referred to the fact that the board has available for this purpose a bureau of transportation economics, and that they have been continuing their studies.

Having said that, I submit that what the minister has given to us this morning is a review of confusion and incompetence which demonstrates that the main consideration before us at the moment is what is to be done with the board of transport commissioners, and the way in which we are going to deal with the whole question. In using the word "incompetence" I do so in the strict dictionary meaning of the word. I wish to make it quite clear that I concede the earnestness and the desire of those who have been charged with certain responsibilities to give effective service. When I say the board is incompetent, I say that whatever the reasons may be, it has demonstrated itself to be incompetent by its own actions during this extended period. Therefore I submit that the discussion of this item necessitates the review of one of the most important considerations this house could have before it. Everyone will agree that at the present time, in the wider field of government, our relation to the outside world and our concern for international security must be the number one consideration; but as far as our daily lives here at home are concerned the major consideration of every Canadian is the maintenance of that economy upon which the daily lives of our people depend.

In the Canadian economy there is no single thing of such vital concern as the provision of effective transportation for our people and for the things we produce. That is in fact what we are considering when we discuss this item. This is the first opportunity that has been afforded to examine this subject; and as the minister has very appropriately pointed out, this is the first opportunity he has had to review in this way the events which step by step, since these discussions were actively undertaken two years ago this spring, have led to the present position.

In reviewing what has taken place the minister has gone back to the judgment of the board of March 30, 1948, authorizing a 21 per cent horizontal increase in freight rates throughout Canada. He has pointed out that this horizontal increase was subject to certain substantial exceptions which resulted in a smaller amount being charged for freight rates on an over-all basis than otherwise would have been the case. In spite of those specific exceptions, however, and the fact that they did involve substantial sums, that judgment, as in the case of the subsequent judgments, failed completely to deal with a subject that must be dealt with in the interests of the national economy—that is, the unfair differential in freight rates as between different parts of this country. Subsequent judgments have proceeded to deal with this problem on the same basis. The most recent judgment, which came into effect only last week, carried forward and confirmed this situation. If it becomes effective, that judgment fastens upon the Canadian economy an intolerable discrimination between different parts of the country. In the very nature of the proceedings that have already taken place it is not possible to imagine that the board as at present constituted and equipped can hope to solve this problem within any reasonable time. Therefore we must deal with the matter on the basis that, if this board is to continue as at present constituted and equipped, a situation has been created which will have most serious consequences for our whole economy.

I emphasize this because I am going to urge in the discussion of this item that the time has come when the government must take hold of this problem, that we can no longer permit this confusion to continue or this endless bickering back and forth between the board, the Department of Transport and the courts to make it impossible for producers, for the people generally and for the railway companies to know where they stand. Because I am going to propose that this subject be tackled I should like to indicate considerations which it seems to me have been regarded as fundamental in the examination of this whole question since this country became a nation.

The economy of our country, perhaps to an extent not equalled anywhere else, depends upon the ability of the railroads to carry people and, above all, freight, in a manner that will make the work of our people economically sound in every part of Canada. One might say that in the United States they have a parallel economy and that the situation there is similar. It is not. Even in the great grain growing areas of the western United States, to the south of our grain growing areas, they have very large urban communities within easy reach which consume a substantial portion of what is produced in the way of grain and livestock products. There is also the fact that while nature has been generous to us, more generous than sometimes we recognize, nature has also established certain barriers in this country which challenge our ability to tackle our problems and find a solution of them for the common benefit of all our people, wherever they may live.

In the consideration of this problem and this particular duty of the board of transport commissioners, it is obvious that, on the one hand, there is the necessity to provide in Canada economic facilities for the transportation of our people and the products of our farms, forests, mines, waters and factories. There is also the duty on the part of the government, as representative of all the people, to provide the railroad facilities from time to time which are required for the development of the country, and to take such steps as may be appropriate to construct new lines and extend existing lines so that our development may not be impeded by a too rigid regard for the immediate cost of that development, as long as we can see that it is going to be a sound investment for the future.

Ever since we became a nation the duty of the government to take such steps as were necessary to assure efficient transportation has been regarded by this parliament as one of its paramount obligations. It is only necessary to go back to the debates shortly after confederation, and follow them through the succeeding decades in the history of this country, to realize that this was always well to the fore in the minds of those who were building this nation. While cost has always been a very important consideration, as it always must be in a world of sensible men and women, there are a great many examples which demonstrate that other considerations than cost have had a definite bearing on the construction of rail lines, and on the service offered. If cost alone had been the consideration, rail lines never would have been built to the west through the great rock belt north of lake Superior. Traffic would have moved south of lake superior by an easier route through the United States and back into Canada. There were different reasons why Canadians of those days, as represented by their members of parliament, decided that there would be a Canadian route. It was not national pride alone, although doubtless that had some bearing on the decision. It was the fact that one of the hallmarks of nationhood is that a country shall have, within its own borders, the means of moving its people and its goods.

At heavy cost, therefore, rail lines were constructed through the difficult rock barriers north of lake Superior, as well as through the mountain passes, and Canada was linked from sea to sea by a means of transportation without which this nation might not be one nation today. By various and quite legitimate devices, those who built the railroads were recompensed for that additional cost. The people of Canada approved the provisions which were made to assure construction that otherwise might not have been possible. The principles which applied at that time are principles which still apply to the problem of transportation, and that is the problem we are discussing.

The board of transport commissioners has many duties to perform. It must deal not only with railways and the problems of construction, maintenance, operation and rates, but also with telephone and telegraph lines, express companies, international bridges and tunnels, ships on the great lakes and the Mackenzie and Yukon rivers. It must deal with pipe lines to a limited extent; that is all it is allowed to do. These other obligations and duties however are, in comparison, not nearly so important as the requirement of assuring effective transportation which can carry heavy freight of every kind from one part of Canada to the other, and to the seaports so that it will move to the markets of the world.

In this case the board of transport commissioners has heard evidence over a period of more than two years. As the minister has indicated to us, the first award of 21 per cent was made on March 30, 1948. The second increase to which he has referred was made in September, 1949, and that award was an interim increase of 8 per cent. Subsequently on March 1, 1950, the board granted 16 per cent in substitution for the 8 per cent interim increase. As has been explained by the minister, the Supreme Court of Canada found that the board must not make such a decision, subject to a qualification of the kind which they imposed. That in itself reflects upon the ability of the board to deal with this question. Perhaps the limitation on the ability of the board may not be a limitation applied to individual members. It is perhaps a limitation under which they act. In any event, their decision was thrown out, and they were called upon to consider this whole subject again.

As I mentioned, an award was made on March 1 of this year, substituting 16 per cent for the interim 8 per cent award. Then comes the strangest incident of all. While the minister has pointed out the substantial grounds of appeal, what has not been pointed out is that the main ground of appeal was that the board had not been able to understand its own figures. Even assuming that their decisions were right as to the bases upon which they should make the awards, they were out a matter of $13 million in their conclusions because that is what the difference in percentage amounts to in dollars.

The most recent award of a further 3·4 per cent, bringing the total increase in the last stage up to another 20 per cent, is really a finding by the board that it did not know how to work out its own decision in terms of simple arithmetic. It is not for us to say who is to blame; that, in effect, is their finding.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this house has no right to pass this item, which in effect constitutes approval of the continuance of the board as now constituted and under its present authority, when by its own most recent decision it has stated it cannot do its job. I go further and I submit that if the board, within more than two years and with all the evidence it has heard, can only deal with this problem on the basis of a uniform horizontal increase, except for the limited exceptions that were made, then once again I say that the board has demonstrated that, whether because of the procedure under which it operates, or the personnel, or by the lack of effective assistance it has in doing its work, it is not capable of functioning in the way it should function.

After all, this is something that relates to the day by day economy of the country. Changes in the value of the dollar, changes in international exchange, changes in the volume of production in different parts of the country, all have their effect. The enormous volume of freight that will move from Alberta, added to the wheat and other commodities that move from there, in itself affects the economic picture, and affects beneficially the cost structure in relation to capital obligations. So also do those great discoveries that have taken place throughout Canada. What we need is a board that is supplied with and supported by technical experts, who day by day can continue to examine the situation so that at any time the board may be in a position to make a decision that is consistent with the facts of the situation at the moment. What has happened, however, is this: Even if these decisions of the board were not in appeal for indefinite terms; even if we were not confronted with an appeal to the privy council, an appeal to the governor in council and possible appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada, the position in which we find ourselves is that the board's judgments alone are, at each stage, almost ancient history in a country with the dynamic and rapidly moving economy we have in Canada. We must have a board competent to deal week by week and month by month with the events in a country that, given the vigour and the vision that it should have, will grow faster in the years ahead than it has at any time since we became a nation.

We have no other way of stating during the present session our view that the need for action by the government is urgent, and that it must be action of the most decisive and sweeping character. After all, under the procedure as it now stands, the government must make the ultimate decision, subject of course to appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada on points of procedure, subject to the termination of an appeal now before the privy council, subject to other appeals that may occur; and I hope I am not being unfair when I say subject also to possible future miscalculations of the nature of the recent miscalculation which has just been corrected.

Mr. Low: Better get them an adding machine.

Mr. Drew: It would take a big adding machine to correct errors of that kind and on that scale. No; without any reflection on any individual member of the board, we have before us the most colossal blunder in simple arithmetic that this country has ever seen. Here at a time when children all over the country are being asked to pass examinations in ordinary arithmetic, we have the direct declaration by one of the most important agencies or boards set up by the government that it was not able to add its own figures to the tune of some $13 million.

I am not saying that in any sense of reflection upon individuals, but I would remind the government and the members of the house that this is something for which every hon. member must assume responsibility. This board was reorganized in a very limited way some two or more years ago. At the time that was done the then prime minister emphasized the fact that there must be changes in the board and in its functions if it was to be able to do its work. There has been no substantial change. All that has happened is that there have been minor changes in personnel. It may well be that the board is carrying on under an impossible set-up, and that to a considerable extent its members may individually be placed in an unfair position. But that is something that the government must determine. That is something that the government must examine. After all, the government will very jealously guard its right to appoint the members of that board, no matter how it is constituted. Therefore we can only examine the net results; we can only accept their own decision that they were not able to carry out their task; we can only see the confusion that is caused by this series of decisions, with their variations for one reason or another; and we can only see that in over two years this board has not been able to deal with the fundamental inequity of the freight rate structure across Canada.

I have no desire to discuss any matter outside the ambit of the immediate subject that is before us. But in view of the fact that I am presenting these arguments, and in view of the fact that I would not wish any of them to be examined upon a false premise, I do want to anticipate any suggestion that while I was in a position of responsibility, other than that which I now hold, I had an opinion different from that which I am expressing here this morning.

It has been suggested from time to time that the fact that the government of Ontario when I was its head did not participate in the appeals which were before the board indicated a lack of interest in the subject.

Mr. Mutch: It surely did.

Mr. Drew: That was not so. I could not help hearing from across the way, "it surely did". That merely indicates why it is important that I attempt, if it is humanly possible, to keep this discussion on the right track.

Whether rightly or wrongly, the government with which I was associated at that time did hold the view that the British North America Act, on the one hand, placed certain responsibilities in the hands of the provinces; and we insisted that those responsibilities be recognized. We took the view that, on the other hand, the British North America Act did impose certain responsibilities on the dominion government, and we thought that the control of railways was one of the subjects which had been most exclusively placed under the jurisdiction of the dominion government by the British North America Act. We in fact held the view, which has been frequently expressed on other occasions by this government, that in relation to dominion affairs every part of Canada is represented in this house by the members sent here from the different constituencies. Whether rightly or wrongly, but strangely enough in this case holding the same view that has been expressed on other occasions by the dominion government, we thought that Ontario, in relation to dominion matters, is fully represented in this house by members of the different parties who have been elected to represent the constituencies of Ontario. We therefore took the position, rightly or wrongly, that this is a responsibility of the dominion government and of this parliament, and it is in accordance with that view that in this house this morning I am expressing the opinion that it is the obligation of members of parliament and of parliament itself to say what they think about the continuance of this board on the present basis.

I do not want any word that I have said to imply criticism of provinces which have launched appeals, because I recognize that they were in a most unfavourable position in relation to the central provinces. In spite of the views I have expressed, if those provinces had not expressed the opinions that they did express, some of the inequities that have occurred would not have been remedied to the extent that they have. I hope this morning, and later today, during the discussion of this matter, that we shall see evidence in this house that the provinces are effectively represented in federal matters by their representatives; that we shall hear members from every party express their opinions as to the conduct of the board and as to the present inequity of the freight rate structure of Canada and the necessity to end the discrimination which is so unfair to the maritime and western provinces. Unless we hear Liberal members, as well as other members from the maritimes and western Canada, express their opinions, the contention of the dominion government that every province is fully represented by its membership here stands on very uncertain ground. I hope, if for no other reason than that, Liberal members will prove here in the house and to the people of Canada at large that every province is represented and that the views of those provinces are represented, that by their vote—and I am going to offer the opportunity to vote—they will indicate they believe the time has come for drastic action in this matter.

It is not now possible to move an amendment which calls for a reconstitution of the board, but on the present basis the board could be wound up and the government could carry on its activities with whatever staff is maintained, because they are assuming the ultimate obligation anyway to decide what is to be done.

There must be a board of some kind; there must be an independent body, and a very much more independent body than we have had, charged with the responsibility of carrying forward into our transportation problems those fundamental principles which guided the construction of our roads and the development of this country in the first place. Therefore I feel that the house will support the government in the setting up of any newly constituted body, and will pass whatever supplementary estimates are necessary to meet that purpose. It is my view, however, that the board as now constituted, in view of its own decision that it cannot work out the details from its own records, is not competent to proceed to deal with these tasks, and that the government now must assume direct responsibility for this situation. If the government deals with this matter, and if the government does grasp the nettle and really deal with the problem, I hope it will give to the board, however constituted and with whatever authority it is granted, technical and expert advice at the very highest level which day by day will have available the changing statistics and changing considerations, thus making it possible for the board to act promptly in dealing with these matters—promptly not only in fairness to the people of Canada and to every part of Canada, but in fairness to the railways as well. They simply cannot operate except on a basis of sound economy. On a broad and balanced basis let the board make its award in such a way that the railways may operate soundly and effectively, and also that they may perform their services with full recognition of the right of every Canadian in every part of Canada jointly to receive benefit from the railways that this country supports—and it supports the private as well as the public railways—and so that there also will be available to them the very highest level of transportation in those areas which vision and good judgment tell us will open up rapidly in the years ahead.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, and to give an opportunity to indicate to the government that the time has come for real and drastic action, I move:

That item No. 524 be reduced to the figure of one dollar.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, with very much of what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said I find myself in agreement this morning. Frequently there is disagreement between us, but he has expressed a point of view in regard to the board of transport commissioners that most of us in the House of Commons should hold, after reviewing the judgments and the history of this board for the last few years.

He has made a direct attack upon the competence of the board, using the term "competence" in its dictionary meaning; and I believe that attack was thoroughly justified. One has only to look at the judgment of the board itself in the most recent application of the railways to realize how incompetent the board is.

The chief commissioner, the chairman of the board, Mr. Justice Archibald, has been gravely ill, and his health is impaired. He did have, in larger measure perhaps than the discussion this morning indicates, the confidence of a very large section of the Canadian people. But the judgment handed down, signed by the acting chairman, Mr. Wardrope, and concurred in by Mr. MacPherson, fully justifies the criticism made by the leader of the opposition that the board overlooked elementary rules of simple arithmetic.

At page 6 of the judgment handed down we find these words:

I was in error when at the end of my judgment I used the following language:

"As the majority judgment of September 20, 1949, reviewed the decision in the 21 per cent case and determined that the latter should have been 15 per cent, and also incorporated such modification in the 8 per cent interim award, it is necessary to modify the above-stated deficiency accordingly."

And he went on to say:

In effect, quite unintentionally of course, this amounted to a further application of the 8 per cent formula, thus reducing the percentage of increase required to meet the deficiency.

Little remains to be said except that I regret the error and take full responsibility for it.

Just imagine a board upon which great responsibilities were placed by this parliament, in an important judgment affecting the welfare not only of the entire population of Canada, but more particularly of certain parts of Canada, admitting in a subsequent report—and having to admit it—that an error, the extent of which the leader of the opposition referred to a few moments ago, was made quite unintentionally!

I wonder why such an unintentional error was made. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, on Tuesday, March 14, 1950, asked for an order for return. If we look at that return, and look at the personnel of the board, and particularly the assistance the board has and the duties imposed upon it, we begin to understand why it is not competent to deal with these matters. The return indicates clearly why the House of Commons should do what the leader of the opposition has said we should do—demand of the government that a board, with adequate staff facilities be constituted in which the house and country can have some confidence.

I do not want to go over ground that has been traversed this morning. I do wish to emphasize that these increases in railway rates are a serious matter, not only for the producers and consumers of this country, but also for the railways themselves. I have before me an extract from evidence given by an official of the Canadian National Railways. I should like to put it on the record, because it illustrates that these constant increases in rates will eventually make it impossible not only for the producers of Canada to ship their goods, but for the railways of Canada to compete and to earn sufficient revenue to enable them to carry goods at reasonable freight rates without very substantial subsidies from this parliament.

Mr. MacPherson, counsel representing the province of Saskatchewan, was examining Mr. Fairweather, who is the development officer of the Canadian National Railways. I wish to put these brief questions and answers on record, because they confirm the statement I have just made that these increases in rates are likely to price the Canadian railways out of the transportation market altogether. This is the question by Mr. MacPherson.

Q. Mr. Fairweather, in volume 65 of the evidence at page 13646 during the cross-examination of Mr. Walker—

Of the Canadian Pacific Railway:

—by Mr. Covert a question was asked and an answer given, and I want to read the question as put to Mr. Walker and Mr. Walker's answer and to ask you whether or not you agree with it. This was the question:

"Q. Now, I just wanted to ask you one question on this point. I think an article was read to you this morning by Mr. Campbell suggesting that the railways may be pricing themselves out of business in the United States. My understanding is that your view is that that is not the situation in Canada, that the railways have nowhere near reached, I think was the phrase you used—

A. That is my view, yes.

Q. —a rate level which would price the railways out of business?

A. Quite so."

Q. Do you agree with that statement of opinion by Mr. Walker?

A. No, honestly, I do not.

Q. Well, will you tell the commission why you do not agree with it, Mr. Fairweather?

A. Well, I think that the tenor of my evidence explains my doubts and my disagreement. I think when the rate adjustments presently in effect and in prospect before the board of transport commissioners, supposing they were granted in full, are applied, and having regard to this canker of highway transportation which I say is growing bigger, I have a real fear that the productive economy of our country will be disturbed and that marginal producers will no longer be in a position to see enough profit in their operations to produce, and that they could easily start a snowballing effect. I am a development officer, and as I have said, I firmly believe that our high standard of living is keyed into the incentive that is present in the producers of our basic commodities. Those basic commodities historically have always enjoyed low rates, and the prospect of increasing the rates beyond the levels that are now in contemplation is something that, as a development man, I look on with a certain degree of reservation. It is made clear in Mr. Gordon's brief that there is a fear expressed there looking to the future that the railway might price itself out of its market.

Mr. MacPherson: Thank you very much.

In spite of what the minister said about increases in rates in the United States and in Great Britain, to which I think the leader of the opposition gave an adequate reply, it must be remembered that those countries are not comparable with Canada. There are great distances between the productive regions of this country. We have the maritime region divided by rock, lake, river and forest from the region of central Canada. We have central Canada divided from the region of the prairies by a thousand miles of lake, rock, swamp and forest. We have the region from Calgary or Edmonton to Vancouver and Prince Rupert divided by range after range of mountains. The conditions in the different countries are not comparable.

This nation was built up by bands of steel which bound the maritimes to the central provinces, to the prairies and the Pacific coast province. Anything which destroys the use or effectiveness or efficiency of our railways will jeopardize the whole Canadian economy, and perhaps in some respects the very continuance of confederation itself. Consequently this is one of the most serious problems with which we have to deal. I refer again to Mr. Fairweather's answer when he said that historically the basic commodities produced in this country have always enjoyed low rates, and that the prospect of increasing rates beyond the limits that are now in contemplation—being before the board of transport commissioners he had to say that—is something that as a development man he looked upon with a certain degree of misgiving.

The board of transport commissioners has not sufficient staff to go into all the factors that should be considered in dealing with these rates. The Canadian Pacific Railway has been taken as the yardstick to be used in setting rates in this country. When we look at the history of the Canadian Pacific Railway we find that all its assets originated from the railway part of its operations. Going back into history we find that the people of this country gave to the Canadian Pacific Railway—the leader of the opposition implied this, although he did not enumerate them—great concessions in order that we might have a band of steel across Canada.

There were 700 miles of railway which the Mackenzie government had completed between 1874 and 1878. There were 25 million acres of land in western Canada granted to the company, and $25 million in cash. Subsequently there were guarantees of bonds and further grants of land and other concessions by the provinces, particularly by British Columbia. As the minister indicated—I am not saying that he approves the statements made by the Canadian Pacific Railway—the Canadian Pacific Railway is attacking one of the fundamentals of our rate structure as it affects western Canada and British Columbia, the Crowsnest pass agreement.

Let us remember that as certain concessions were given to the Canadian Pacific and other railways, in perpetuity and by statute; as large money grants and other valuable concessions were granted by the province of British Columbia, the Crowsnest pass rates were set and should not have been disturbed under any circumstances. But they have been disturbed. In 1925 the concessions which had been granted to the prairie provinces and British Columbia in the way of low rates on certain commodities—I am not going to list them again, because I did it some time ago in a similar debate—were removed. Under no circumstances must this parliament permit any further variation in the Crowsnest pass rates.

Of course when general increases are granted, on the discriminatory basis on which every decision of this railway board has been based, it causes not only anxiety and misgiving, but financial hardship, particularly when the prices of the commodities that have to be carried and for the carriage of which the producers must pay are likely to fall. Evidence was placed before the board of transport commissioners—not in the recent case, but I think in the 21 per cent increase case—to the effect that to move 100 pounds of petroleum products from Regina to Indian Head, a distance of fifty miles, would cost 26 cents; that to move 100 pounds of petroleum products the same distance in the province of Quebec would cost 10 cents, and in the province of Ontario 9½ cents. There is an illustration of discrimination. Every time a horizontal increase in freight rates is made, the discrimination is greater. We have had three such discriminatory increases within the last two years. No wonder those of us representing prairie, British Columbia and maritime constituencies are alarmed at these sharp increases.

I am going to appeal to the government to do what I suggest again today. Long before this, in view of the incompetence of the board —and again I am using the word in its dictionary meaning—in view of the continuous discrimination in the granting of increases in rates, the government should have used its undoubted power under section 52 of the Railway Act and disallowed the coming into effect of these increases. The government has the power; I believe only once before was it used, many years ago; nevertheless the power is there.

There is injustice to the people of Canada generally, not merely to the people of the prairie provinces, British Columbia and the maritimes. Some of us thought that until the royal commission on transportation had reported, no further increases would be allowed. The royal commission has just completed the hearing of evidence and argument and has yet to make its report. It seems to me that the government has a responsibility to protect the people of Canada from the discrimination practised recently and in the past. In spite of the fact that the Minister of Transport indicated that an investigation is being made by the board of transport commissioners into the rate structure of the railways, having in mind the return asked for by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, and the multitudinous duties placed upon the board of transport commissioners with its inadequate staff, in my view the board cannot do the job expected of it.

The rate structure today is a crazy quilt affair, so much so that some large companies actually maintain special departments which are continuously engaged in going over the rate charges and pointing out errors or charges under the wrong rate. I am told that these companies are collecting large sums of money from the railways, because even the people who charge the rates cannot follow the structure that has been handed to them and upon which rates must be based. These are the factors that make some of us most anxious about the present rate structure and the recent horizontal increases.

I want to go a step further and say to the Minister of Transport that, while a discussion of this kind is necessary, and while the criticisms that have been made this morning are sound, even if we have a more competent set-up of the board of transportation commissioners, and an adequate staff we shall not have got to the root of the railway problem. I think the house will have to consider how the transportation system of Canada can be modernized, how it can serve the people of Canada better, and how it can be integrated in order that it may accomplish the purposes for which it must be designed. This involves a great problem. In eastern Canada the railways are in competition with buses, trucks and water transportation, and that is the reason for the low rates. We have no water carriage on the prairies. We have very much less motor traffic, and therefore the prairie governments are not able to build the kind of roads which encourage truck transportation. The result is there is not the same competition in the prairies as there is in other parts of Canada.

It seems to me that here is the point at issue. While such competition has been valuable in a way to the people living in Ontario and Quebec, trucks pick up the profitable traffic and leave to the railways the heavy, bulky, unprofitable traffic which must be carried, as Mr. Fairweather says, on a low freight rate. There is the problem in a nutshell. How we are going to deal with it is a matter that the house will have to consider. I have views about it that I have come to hold because of thought I have given to the matter. Necessarily my views are not the only views that may be held. The solution I have in mind may not be the only one that can be found. Nevertheless I say to the government, to the official opposition and to all other hon. members that the time has come when we must tackle this problem in a fundamental way. Otherwise either we are to have increases in rates that will cripple the economy of our country, or parliament will have to provide even more substantial subsidies for the railways than we have accorded to them in the past.

It is said sometimes that operating and maintenance costs have increased, and they have. It is said that labour costs have gone up, and they have; but so has every other factor in relation to the cost of living in this country. Increases in living costs have particularly affected the lower paid railway workers, of whom there are many thousands. I know it is fashionable to point to the earnings of the more highly paid railroad men, but as a matter of fact there are many thousands of low paid railway workers who in the past few years have found it most difficult to live.

In examining the evidence placed before the board in the recent application for increases, one is struck by several considerations. In the first place, why should not the revenues of the subsidiary bodies, the subsidiary economic activities of the Canadian Pacific Railway, like Consolidated Smelters, be considered as part of the revenue from its railway operations, when those assets arise out of those operations or out of public concessions? If they were included, the picture would not be satisfactory, but it would be much better than appears on the surface. Then if the board had a sufficient and a competent staff, even under this set-up it would have gone more completely into the operating and maintenance costs, particularly the latter, which were placed before the board by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not have the figures before me at the moment, but in the evidence it was stated that while the maintenance costs of the Canadian Pacific in 1939 were some $49 million, those costs had risen last year to $150 million. What is the reason for that vast increase? I have been reliably informed, and I think this could be gathered from some of the evidence given before the board, that what they call the reconditioning of rolling stock has been charged to maintenance. I have been told that at the end of the first war the railway reconditioned some of their older engines, which were rebuilt so they were good for twenty-five years, or until the end of the second war. I have been told also that since the end of the second war locomotives and other equipment have been rebuilt by the C.P.R. and that the cost of this work has been charged to current maintenance costs. In my opinion, if the lifetime of that equipment has been extended for fifteen or twenty years that cost should have been charged to capital account and depreciated over the new lifetime of the equipment.

Mr. Stick: How much of the $150 million would be represented by that cost?

Mr. Coldwell: That is something the board should find out, and that is my complaint—that the board has neither the staff nor, apparently, the will to go into these factors, though counsel for the provinces did keep this point before the board.

So, Mr. Chairman, these rates and these increases represent an intolerable burden. I repeat that the railways are essential to the welfare and economy of this country; but the cost of carrying those railways should not be placed upon any particular section of our population. I believe the cost of carrying the railways could be drastically reduced by a proper integration of transportation facilities, by a modernization of our railways and all their equipment, and by a modernization of the entire outlook on railway transportation. After all, since the railways of this country were built by the Canadian people as a means of binding together the different parts of this country, our position is different from that of some other countries in regard to their railway services. To us railways are vital. They are vital to the continuance of our economic health and our national life.

So we must tackle this problem here in this parliament. We cannot continue as we have been going. Should there be any considerable fall in commodity prices, particularly in the price of wheat, the commodity many of us on the prairie provinces are particularly interested in, the result could be disastrous. We all remember that if the rates had been increased during the thirties, and particularly if we had not had the Crowsnest pass agreement, the freight rates on the grain that was produced would have exceeded and indeed in some instances did exceed the value of the grain. I believe that would have been altogether true in 1932. While I am not suggesting that there may be a drastic fall at the present time, I am suggesting that even if grain and flour freight rates are maintained substantially as they are, with the new increased rates, the increased cost of production, the increase in the rates on supplies, machinery all the rest of it, this will be a very serious imposition upon the producers in the prairie provinces.

One could raise a number of other points in connection with this matter, but I do not want to impose much further upon the time of the committee. I believe we have an opportunity of expressing an opinion by supporting the amendment introduced by the leader of the opposition. It is an old parliamentary custom in Britain. You do not want to wipe out the board of transport commissioners, but you do want to express your dissatisfaction with the board, its method of procedure, and its judgments. Had I been moving the amendment I would have done it rather differently. As a matter of fact I had it in mind; I would have moved not to reduce the amount to $1 but to reduce it by $1, which has the same effect but perhaps without the same implications. In spite of the implications, however, I believe we should support the amendment, because we want to express ourselves, and this is the only way it can be done. I had hoped to be able to raise this question earlier on going into supply, and I had an amendment already drawn for presentation at that time. However, owing to the fact that the Department of Justice considered that this should not be done while the board was actually sitting on the matter, and there having been no opportunity to do so since, we shall support the amendment of the leader of the opposition, in order that we may express the dissatisfaction we feel with the board of transport commissioners as to its competence, its lack of staff, its failure to go into various factors in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and so on.

Before I sit down, I want to say that this house should also take into consideration, when the time comes, the suggestion made by the president of the Canadian National Railways that that railway be placed in a more competitive position by removing from it the tremendous overburden of capital which was inflicted upon it when this country took over a number of bankrupt railways after the first war.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. member a question. It relates to the first part of his address. Does he consider it reasonable and just that the Canadian railways should get less in freight rates, or less in cash, for a longer haul than the railways of Britain receive for a short haul?

Mr. Coldwell: I said in the course of my remarks that conditions in the two countries were not comparable. My whole argument has been this; that the railways of Canada were built up in order to consolidate the country and make confederation possible, and that the discrimination in the rates that now exist imposes a burden on one part or two parts of the country, whichever way you look at it, which should be borne by the whole country. In some manner we have to arrive at a rate structure which would fairly distribute the burden. I will go a step further and say that, in view of the peculiar difficulties to which I have referred, if, after we have integrated our transportation facilities, the railways are still unable to haul commodities at reasonable rates, there should be a method of subsidizing the railways. But again I would not suggest subsidizing a privately owned railway system.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, first on behalf of the members of the Social Credit group I should like to commend the leader of the opposition on his excellent speech this morning in opening the discussion on the matter of freight rates. I was wondering whether I could recall any time since I came here in 1936 when any representative of an Ontario or Quebec constituency rose and had anything to say about the shameful, inadequate, inequitable freight rates which prevail from coast to coast in Canada. I am sorry to say I had not been able to recall any occasion until the leader of the opposition did it today. Therefore I look upon that speech as a fine augury of good things to come.

Since coming to the house I myself have never failed in any one year to give at least one talk on the injustice which prevails in the Dominion of Canada in the matter of freight rates. For the Social Credit group I should like to say to the leader of the opposition that we propose to support his motion to reduce the appropriation for the board of transport commissioners.

I do not wish to say anything unkind about the board of transport commissioners, but I am very much afraid that they have very little excuse, very little explanation for the things that have been allowed to continue in this country over these many years.

On May 16, 1950 I made a speech dealing with the freight rate question, as reported at page 2537 of Hansard. Because it was sub judice I deemed it inadvisable to go very far into the subject, but I will continue that speech today.

My argument regarding freight rates is to be based on the freight rates as they obtained in Canada in the year 1938. Hon. members will then know that the abuses which I point out have been before the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada long enough for any conscientious, open-minded group of people, desirous of seeing anything like justice in Canada, to have done something about this matter long ago.

There are five main general facts concerning the incidence of freight rates in Alberta with which I propose to deal. While these evils are observable in the other western provinces, they are not present to nearly as great an extent as they are in Alberta. We are at the apex of the costs going out, and we are at the apex of the costs coming in. They get us going and coming, and they all seem to think they have a perfect right to do anything they want to about Alberta. That is an astonishing thing, considering the fact that our province has never done anything that would justify anyone in supposing, so far as I know, that we do not propose to be an integral part of the Dominion of Canada, sharing the responsibilities of other Canadians and hoping to enjoy the privileges that are accorded to other Canadians.

In the first place, the ordinary consumers in Alberta are penalized for living in that province, so serious are the disadvantages of the freight rate structure as Alberta endures it.

Our primary producers in Alberta are inequitably handicapped by freight rates as compared with primary producers in other provinces of Canada. The freight rate structure in Alberta impedes ordinary economic development within the province more than it does that of any other province of Canada. Interprovincial trade between Alberta and British Columbia is hampered by inequitable freight rates, as is not the case in respect of interprovincial trade between any other two provinces of Canada, name whichever ones you desire to name. In effect a tariff wall has been erected around Alberta by freight rates, the object apparently being—designedly so, I fear—to keep Alberta products out of the markets of other provinces, and at the same time to open Alberta markets to the products of other provinces.

May I examine for a few minutes the statements which I have made in the light of facts that can be adduced?

First, as to the ordinary consumers of Alberta being penalized for living in Alberta, here are some figures which will startle anybody who gives them very much consideration. Flannelette blankets can be shipped from eastern Canada to Vancouver for $1.75 a hundred. But if you take them off at Edmonton they will cost you $4.53½ a hundred. Kalsomine can be shipped from eastern Canada to Vancouver for $1 a hundred; but take it off in Edmonton and you will pay $1.33½ a hundred. Lard and cooking oil cost $1 from eastern Canada to Vancouver, but $1.98 to Edmonton; paints and varnishes, $1.25 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton; shoes, $2 to Vancouver and $3.03 to Edmonton; soap, $1 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton; wrought iron pipe, $0.70 to Vancouver, $1.98 to Edmonton.

If you were talking to the board of transport commissioners, or to either of the railway companies in Canada, Mr. Chairman, of course they would explain the discrepancy in these freight rates by this reason, that reason and the other reason, and four or five others; but the important fact is that it costs Alberta people the extra amount of money which I have indicated on most commodities because they live in Alberta. Attribute the discrepancy to discrimination, to any cause you desire; the simple fact is that there is injury done to the economy of Alberta, which is an injury to the Dominion of Canada as a whole. And any group of men, board of transport commissioners or managers of the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Canadian National Railways, who cannot see that, need to have something done to their mechanism upstairs. I think there is no doubt about this general statement.

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, I know; you will want it carried even more before we get much further. A lot of this should have been dealt with long ago. It has got worse all the time, until it is generally putrid now.

This statement, "The reduction for class rates is on a higher percentage in eastern Canada than in Alberta, or on movements from eastern Canada to Alberta", I take from a document which I propose to refer to occasionally in the course of my remarks. This document was prepared by the Edmonton chamber of commerce as a submission to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations in 1938, and dated February 10, 1938. The Edmonton chamber of commerce assert that they had at their disposal some of the most competent experts available in the matter of freight rates, and therefore they are completely confident that everything they say is not only accurate, but moderate and representative. I quoted from page 28 of the submission.

May I turn to the second statement which I make, that our primary producers are inequitably handicapped by freight rates in Alberta. Barbed wire, of which we use so much in Alberta, can be shipped from Montreal to Vancouver for 75 cents per 100 pounds, but to Edmonton it costs $1.98; wire fencing, $1.25 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton—all these figures are from Montreal; building paper and roofing, $1.25 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton; iron and steel bars 65 cents to Vancouver and $1.79 to Edmonton; nails, $1.50 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton; structural steel, bolts and nuts, $1 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton. This gets rather tedious after a while, does it not? Many other hardware items show similar discrimination in the matter of freight rates. Then twine, which we use in all our harvesting operations, $1.30 to Vancouver—where they do not need it—and $2.33½ to Edmonton, where they do need it; window glass, $1 to Vancouver, and $1.98 to Edmonton; agricultural implements, which we use so generally in Alberta, $1.25 to Vancouver and $1.79 to Edmonton; galvanized or plain steel sheets, 60 cents to Vancouver and $1.44 to Edmonton. These figures can be found in the submission from which I am quoting, page 31.

All that is necessary is a very casual look at the list to satisfy any fair-minded person that something is most radically wrong in the building up of the freight rate structure in Canada, so far as Alberta is concerned. I am not arguing that any particular discrimination has been shown in favour of British Columbia. I believe that British Columbia is paying quite as much for freight rates as she needs to pay. But imagine what the feeling of British Columbians would be if they lived in Alberta and faced the figures I have just placed on record. As a matter of fact—

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, a hundred of them, one at a time. Speak as loudly as you can so I may hear them.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Why not quote the rates, not to Edmonton but to Dawson Creek, or to points up in the Peace river country?

Mr. Blackmore: Some of these days I will come in with a speech prepared to give those freight rates. But I did not come here today with the whole freight rate structure at my disposal.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The hon. member's reference to British Columbia being given preference—

Mr. Blackmore: I did not say that British Columbia was being given preference.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The most important farming area in British Columbia is the Peace river country contiguous to Dawson Creek.

Mr. Blackmore: And I have just finished making a statement that should have warned the hon. member not to make the statement he has just made. Apparently he could not hear what I said. I suggest he listen to what I say from now on.

It is pointed out that many commodities might be shipped from Montreal to Vancouver, and then back to Edmonton—all those hundreds of miles extra—and then shipped out a distance of forty miles to a town called Holden, and sold more cheaply than if they were shipped directly to Holden from Montreal. What does that mean? It means that Alberta distributors are being deprived of the privilege of distributing goods to the people of Alberta. But apparently the freight rates were designed for that very purpose. And if they were not designed for that purpose it will take plenty of explaining on the part of the men who drafted those freight rates to clear themselves.

We come now to the third point: the freight rate structure in Alberta impedes ordinary economic development within the province more than does the freight rates structure in any other province in Canada. I shall quote a general statement from the Edmonton submission in this connection and leave the burden of proof upon them. These are their words as they appear at page 28:

> Moreover, certain goods moving to or from points in other provinces enjoy a commodity rate that is not available on movements of the same goods to or from Edmonton and other Alberta points, which latter movements carry class rates.

I am sure that statement could be supported with figures just as striking as the ones I used in connection with the other point I made. But we will not take time to give too many figures, because it would weary the house.

The fourth point is this: interprovincial trade between Alberta and British Columbia is hampered by inequitable freight rates in a way that in my judgment constitutes a scandal. If any province has any rights at all, economically, those rights ought to include the privilege of trading with the province next door in an unimpeded manner. But that is not so in respect of British Columbia and Alberta. Why? I am not going to go into that matter. It has been suggested, though, that long ago certain men in eastern Canada realized the tremendous productive potential of Alberta and British Columbia, and intended to see to it that never should those provinces reach the degree of industrial development of which they were capable, considering their resources; and the freight rates were simply one of the means whereby a guarantee was provided that such development would not take place. If that is so, and if that was behind the freight rates, then I submit an outrage was committed against Canada. There was a betrayal of trust on the part of the men who had anything to do with planning those rates. There is an equal betrayal of trust on the part of the men who suffered those inequities to endure. I propose to quote again from the submission by the Edmonton chamber of commerce. At page 28 I find this:

> Again, basic freight rates on movements between Alberta and British Columbia are much higher than on interprovincial movements in any other part of Canada.

I am going to leave once more the Edmonton chamber of commerce to support its case, and I am sure it can do so. Then again from page 28 I quote:

> Similarly, movements from Vancouver to Winnipeg and eastern Canada are subject to a higher relative reduction for class rates than are movements from Vancouver to Alberta.

I now come to what is perhaps the most pernicious aspect of all, and that is that in effect a tariff wall has been erected against Alberta, through freight rates. Certain freight rates protect certain Ontario producers against competition from Alberta processed goods in any western Canadian market, and in the Ontario market. For example, live cattle carry a freight rate from Edmonton to eastern Canada of $1.14 per hundredweight. But fresh meat, the steer that has been killed and processed, thus giving Alberta people a little work to do, costs $1.88 per hundred as compared with $1.14, or 68 per cent more. Imagine any railroad charging, for a steer dead and dressed, something that requires no care or feeding or anything of that sort, 68 per cent more for shipment from Edmonton to Montreal than is charged to ship the same steer alive! Just contemplate that calmly and consider what it has done to the development of secondary industry in Alberta. Obviously the object has been to keep Alberta a primary producer or a hewer of wood and a drawer of water for the other areas of Canada, and permit those other areas to draw off the cream from the production of Alberta. The same inequity in freight rates exists in respect to live cattle and dressed beef shipped from Alberta to Vancouver. Whichever way the beef is going they have arranged matters so that Alberta loses much of the advantage of the livestock she produces.

No wonder the leader of the opposition had such scathing things to say about the board of transport commissioners; I am not sure that I should not say a few myself. Here are some more astonishing things. Certain freight rates expose the Alberta manufacturer to competition from Ontario goods in the Alberta market. In other words, certain goods can be manufactured in Ontario and shipped many thousands of miles to be laid down in Alberta at prices permitting them to compete with advantage with Alberta products made right on the ground.

Here are some examples. Alberta butter is prevented from entering the Ontario market in the following way: To ship 400 boxes of Alberta butter from Edmonton to Toronto costs $764.82, exclusive of icing charges, while the same weight of Ontario condensed milk or other products shipped from Aylmer to Edmonton, a slightly greater distance, costs only $467.46. It costs just slightly over half as much to ship from Ontario to Alberta as it does to ship from Alberta to Ontario. If that is not erecting a tariff wall against Alberta, I do not know what it is.

Mr. Major: You get the advantage of the cheaper food.

Mr. Blackmore: We may get lots of advantages, but until you live there and know more about it you cannot realize that these advantages are simply green pastures on the other side of the fence.

Mr. Major: A figment of imagination.

Mr. Blackmore: A figment of imagination. Some people think that we in Alberta are living in a sort of paradise, and perhaps that is so compared with people in eastern Canada. Here are some more examples.

Mr. Laing: You want to share it with British Columbia.

Mr. Blackmore: Vegetable oils, used in the preparation of shortening, can be shipped from Montreal to Edmonton for 90 cents per hundred pounds to compete with Alberta lard, but it cost $1.60 per hundred pounds to ship Alberta lard from Edmonton to Montreal. Ninety cents going one way and $1.60 going the other way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: I think it would be well not to deal with this matter with too much levity because there has been too much levity connected with it already.

Mr. Goode: How much lard has Alberta to ship to the east?

Mr. Blackmore: I am sure the hon. member realizes that no one could come down to the chamber with all the information necessary to answer any question that might be asked. Even the ministers cannot do it. But let me tell the hon. member that if Alberta has not the lard to ship it is because the producers have been discouraged from producing that product owing to abominations such as this that have occurred over the years. We could be producing a tremendous amount of these things, and if we are not, Canada is so much the poorer by reason thereof.

Now I come to fertilizers. To ship chemical fertilizers from Warfield, British Columbia, to eastern Canada costs 55 cents per hundred pounds but to ship stock fertilizers from Edmonton to eastern Canada, 363 miles shorter, costs 95 cents per hundred pounds. Can someone give me a reason for that difference? To ship fish oils from British Columbia coastal points to Toronto costs 65 cents per hundred pounds, whereas it costs $1.25 per hundred pounds to ship inedible tallow from Edmonton to Toronto, 60 cents per hundred pounds more. To ship edible tallow from Edmonton to Toronto costs $1.50 per hundred pounds, another 25 cents.

To ship lard and lard substitutes from Ontario to British Columbia points costs $1 per hundred pounds, whereas to ship the same products from Alberta to British Columbia, 2,000 miles less, costs 98 cents per hundred pounds. In this way the people who set up the freight rates are forbidding Alberta from selling her lard in British Columbia, this to the advantage of the eastern producer, although Alberta is 2,000 miles closer to British Columbia. To ship fish meal and scrap for animal and poultry feed from British Columbia coastal points to eastern Canada costs 85 cents per hundred pounds, but to ship packing house material, a competing product, from Alberta to eastern Canada, costs $1.33 per hundred pounds. The British Columbia producer is given an advantage of 48 cents per hundred pounds in shipping this commodity to eastern Canada. In effect that is a tariff wall against Alberta.

To ship hides and edible tallow from Vancouver to eastern Canada costs $1.25 per hundredweight, but from Alberta to eastern Canada the shipping cost is $1.50 per hundredweight, 25 cents per hundredweight more. That effectively shuts out Alberta from the eastern markets so long as British Columbia has the material to sell. I am not complaining about British Columbia, but I do complain against these outrageous inequities which obtain in the freight rate structure and from which western Canada has been suffering these many years.

To ship canned meat from eastern Canada to British Columbia costs 75 cents per hundredweight as compared with 98 cents to ship the same product from Alberta. On the one side we are shut out from the eastern Canadian market, and on the other side we are shut out from the British Columbia market. This is the result of the freight rates set-up and certain solemn and sanctimonious men representing the board of transport commissioners will stand up here and endeavour to argue that such rates are quite appropriate!

Such was the condition which obtained in 1938. Since that year, as the leader of the opposition pointed out this morning, we have had several horizontal advances, every single one of which aggravated the inequity and inequality by so much more. I should like to commend the leader of the opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. on the fine national point of view they assumed in their speeches this morning. I desire to assume the same national point of view. One of the things that amaze me is that Albertans have had to do so much fighting for the bare right to live. The assumption seems to have been that we did not need to live at all, that somehow or other we drew manna from heaven to supply our needs.

We want it understood that we too are anxious to see Canada become a great nation.

One of the serious difficulties from which we suffer in Canada is the loss of the very finest of our trained youth to the United States. Canadians spend tens of thousands of dollars a year to educate our boys and girls, and then they go to the United States and render service there. I am sure this constant migration over the years has constituted a drain on the Canadian economy. I wonder if there is any member in the house who desires to see that drain continue. If we are going to stop the exodus of youth from Alberta to the United States we must alter the conditions obtaining in the province so that when our splendid Alberta youth grow to maturity they will find the country attractive to live in. Every person who leaves Alberta to go to the United States is a distinct loss to Ontario, Nova Scotia, British Columbia and all the other provinces just as much as he or she is a loss to Alberta. Let us never forget that for one moment. Anything that hurts Alberta hurts all Canada.

I do not wish to spend all my time in criticism. I would much rather point out something that can be done about the situation because obviously a remedy is required. I have three principles that ought to be accepted and implemented by the government immediately, starting today. These principles should constitute an interim policy, something that we can do while we are determining what else to do by way of a long range program. In the first place we should set up a commission consisting of three representatives from each province chosen by the province they represent whose first purpose would be, in conjunction with the railways and the government in a round table, friendly, brotherly discussion, to determine an equitable freight rate structure for Canada. I do not wish to be sectional. I do not want to say anything that might offend my good friends from Ontario and Quebec because we depend on you for our welfare just as you depend on us. We want to get it into your minds that you depend on us for your market. If we are impoverished by inequities it impoverishes you at the next turn of the road. Let us get that into our minds clearly and fundamentally.

I noticed that most of the Ontario and Quebec members did not seem to be greatly impressed this morning when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar pointed out that it cost 26 cents to transport 100 pounds of petroleum a distance of fifty miles from Regina, while to transport the same amount of petroleum for the same distance in Quebec it cost only 10 cents, and in Ontario only 9½ cents. I did not see the reaction of indignation and astonishment which I naturally expected hon. members to display when they contemplated a gross injustice like that being perpetrated on their fellow Canadians in one of the provinces of Canada. That is something that must be changed.

Using that as a point of departure, I want to ask any man from Ontario, Quebec, or any other part of the country if he thinks we can safely commit the setting of freight rates in Alberta to people representing Ontario and Quebec. History has indicated that we cannot safely entrust freight rates to them. There should be representatives of every province in the dominion sitting on the commission while rates are being drafted so that when the rates are agreed upon they are the result of the best brains that can be brought to bear on the problem.

I do not know whether I ought to say what I am about to say because I hesitate to say anything unkind. But if we just knew to what influences present members of the board of transport commissioners owe their appointment, to whose influence they owe their retention on the board, and whose influence governs their actions while members of the board; if those three questions could be answered now, I suspect that the answers would throw a whole lot of light on the freight rate structure of Canada. Let us have representatives from each of the provinces on the commission. Let the commission meet right away and talk the whole thing over just as though we were starting anew in a new land where nothing wrong had been done.

Then let the commission go to work next on the problem of considering ways and means of financing such a freight rate structure.

I thought the point made by the leader of the opposition was very well taken when he said that there are two vast rocky wastes crossed every day by trains travelling from coast to coast. The one in northern Ontario is a thousand miles of waste where almost nothing but costs are entailed for a train travelling through there. Who pays for all that waste effort? In British Columbia the trains cross the great wastes of the Rockies. Who pays for that waste which gives no return? The next question is, who do you think ought to pay for it? Do you think the people of the three prairie provinces ought to pay the cost of these unprofitable expensive wilderness journeys? Can any man see any reason why that should be? Granted that we Canadians need a railroad to go through the rocky wastes, granted it is for the benefit of Ontario and Quebec as much as it is for the benefit of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta or British Columbia, let me ask in all simplicity who should pay for the waste? Certainly everybody in Canada should pay for it. Facing this question purely as a national problem, and remembering that we are concerned about the building of a great commonwealth where we can all be powerful and happy, will any man rise in this house and attempt to defend a situation where Ontario and Quebec pay 10 cents a hundred for petroleum transportation that costs Saskatchewan 26 cents a hundred? Will any man say that Ontario and Quebec are paying their share? Someone may ask if I am advocating an increase in the freight rates of those two provinces. I advocate nothing in that respect; I simply say let us turn that over to this commission and let them talk the thing through very carefully. Our two great railroads are a national asset and a national necessity. They must be supported, and the only people in the world to support them are the people of Canada. Can we devise a means whereby each and everyone in Canada can contribute equitably to the cost of supporting our railways? Then if we deem it inadvisable to raise freight rates in order to provide enough money to support the railroads, let us determine to what extent we must contribute subsidies from the national treasury of Canada to make up the amount necessary to maintain them.

That suggests a subsidy. I grant that; but let us turn the matter over to a commission which will be representative of all the provinces, and let that commission determine whether as representatives of the people of Canada they would rather raise the money entirely from freight and passenger rates or only partly in that way and partly by means of a definite subsidy.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time. Has the hon. member unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Blackmore: I can conclude in just a moment if the committee would permit me.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: The hon. member may not continue without unanimous consent.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not want to continue if I have not unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Chairman: The hon. member can see that he has not unanimous consent. I am sorry.

Mr. Arsenault: Mr. Chairman, this question of freight rates is certainly one of the matters in which the people of Canada are most interested at the present time. After a careful study of this important matter, which carries with it the possibility of unpredictable repercussions upon the economic life of our nation, one would reach the conclusion that above the dollars and cents aspect a great principle is involved which cannot be overlooked by those of us who wish to maintain our present way of life.

There are at least two historic conceptions of how the subordination of the individual or of private enterprise to the common good is to be effected and maintained. One is that the state is the supreme entity and the people its instruments, in complete submission to its dictates and purposes. The other is that the people are supreme, that the state is the creation of their will and the instrument of their purpose to live together for the common good. A few years ago we ended the second world war fought to maintain this latter type of state and government. Our soldiers protected it from the enemies who would have destroyed it by force from without. Our task today is to protect it from those who, in one way or another, would destroy it from within. Having said this, I shall endeavour to answer the question of how the common good of our nation can best be served in the solution of the problem confronting us at the present time.

Before 1903 there was no regulatory tribunal controlling freight rates in Canada. In that year the board of railway commissioners was established, and in 1938 its name was changed to the board of transport commissioners. Today that board has very wide powers in the regulation of railways which come within the jurisdiction of the Canadian parliament. It might be added that Canada has always had a railway problem. Whatever may be said of the railway problems of the past, however, it is certain that the problem today is how the people of Canada can be given adequate and modern transportation service at the lowest possible cost to the nation, and without unnecessary or uneconomic consumption of labour and materials.

No transportation service can be said to be adequate unless it is so arranged and its rate structure so framed that the traffic of the country moves freely and the agricultural and industrial development is maintained and encouraged. The problem definitely is not which part of the country should obtain special treatment in comparison with another part, nor is it the extent to which artificial or uneconomic development of certain parts of Canada may be achieved at the expense of other parts. The problem further involves the need of ensuring that the railways in Canada be made and be maintained financially sound in order to be able to provide adequate and modern service. Railways must be in a financial position which will enable them to keep pace with the need for expansion and modernization of their services.

As far as freight rates are concerned, the railways themselves have an interest at least equal to that of the shipping public in maintaining rates at the lowest possible level. It is not desirable, however, that the railways should provide uneconomical transportation service merely to create artificial growth in areas where the geographical disadvantages are such as to prohibit the economic development of certain industries.

As we all know, in recent years Canada has experienced two major inflationary cycles, which were the aftermath of world wars I and II. Following world war I, from 1917 to 1927, there were a number of freight rate increases, decreases and inquiries. From 1927 to 1946 there were no general rate increases, decreases or investigations by the board of transport commissioners. Canadian railways, unfortunately, are not immune to increased costs any more than private concerns or citizens in Canada. As a service industry the railways must receive sufficient returns to enable them to meet the costs of providing the service. Canadian railways felt the full impact of the increasing material and labour costs, which were evident in the latter part of world war II, and which have continued up to date.

When one listens to the many criticisms of increased freight rates, it would appear that this elementary fact has been overlooked. As the Minister of Transport has said the railways have made two applications for rate increases. The first application was for a 30 per cent increase, and that was made on October 8, 1946. Final determination of this application was not made until March 30, 1948, two years later, when the board granted a 21 per cent increase. The second application for a 20 per cent increase was made on July 27, 1948. This was not decided until May 25, 1950, when the board awarded the full 20 per cent. What caused the delay of approximately two years in determining each of those applications for increased rates? It was caused by the board itself, by the governor in council and the Supreme Court of Canada, at various times considering each and every issue that has been brought up in the house today, as well as many others.

Irrespective of what has been said today in this house, I contend that the board of transport commissioners is a group of men trained in railway matters, and assisted by a reliable, competent and experienced technical staff. The board has a freight traffic staff presided over by Mr. Kirk, who has been in freight traffic work all his life, and who has been with the board for more than twenty years. His ability has been recognized by practically every province and every railway in this country; his experience and that of the members of his staff have never been challenged, except in this house. When the leader of the opposition was speaking against the board this morning, I thought I should remind him that he was still studying law at Osgoode Hall when Mr. Kirk was learning freight rate matters. If I am not mistaken, at that time the leader of the C.C.F. party was teaching English. The head of the board's statistical branch, Mr. Scott, received his training in the province from which the member for Rosetown-Biggar comes. Whoever made the error referred to by the leader of the C.C.F. party this morning, at least the board corrected it and candidly admitted they had made an error. If both the leader of the official opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. party were willing to acknowledge perhaps the many errors that they have made in the past, and corrected them, the business of this house would proceed with greater dispatch, and perhaps the prosperity of Canada would be advanced.

The leader of the opposition talked about a lot of nasty things such as intolerable discrimination, confusion, inequities and the like. He said that, judging by the results, the board of transport commissioners was completely incompetent. Judging by the confusion which for many years has existed, and still prevails, among the members of the Progressive Conservative party, and judging by the results of the last general election in Canada, using the same sort of argument the leader of the opposition directed against the board this morning, one might be inclined to point to the intolerable incompetence of the leader of that party. But that is quite untrue, as we all know. If the argument is sound when applied to the board, it is equally sound when applied to the leadership of the Progressive Conservative party. In either case, it is an argument that merely carries a lot of noise, and does not stand the test of reason. One must, therefore, have confidence in the board of transport commissioners, or else get rid of the board altogether. We must have confidence in the fact that every issue receives full consideration and is determined by the board on its merits, with the assistance of the most competent staff of technicians that can be secured in Canada today.

As we all know, the greatest portion of the cost of railway operation is labour costs. In the period of 1946 to 1950, two substantial wage increases were awarded to the railway employees. The first was a ten cent per hour increase effective June 1, 1946, which added approximately $40 million per year to the railway operating payroll. The second was a seventeen cent per hour increase, effective on March 1, 1948, which added another $68 million to the payroll of railway employees. The two increases amounted to over $100 million per year. These increases granted railway labour did not result in wages out of proportion to the wages being paid labour in similar occupations in other Canadian industries. We should not overlook the fact that the railways are rendering a public service. They must, therefore, have adequate capital to maintain and operate their properties, so as to be in a position to perform their functions. Any form of regulation must recognize these obligations. It is the duty of parliament, which provided for the regulation of the railways by the board of transport commissioners, to make certain that the board is not hampered, and is able to grant justifiable freight rate increases to enable the railways to furnish the low-cost transportation which is so essential to Canadian prosperity.

The users of the service must pay the cost of providing the service. Unless this basic economic fact is recognized, Mr. Chairman, two results will come about. First, private enterprise cannot be maintained in the railway industry, and all railways must sooner or later come under public administration. Second, the general body of taxpayers must bear a portion of the transportation charges. Therefore, the general taxpayers will be called upon to subsidize those citizens who use railway services. I am afraid that the result would clearly be contrary to our present way of life.

Moreover, the railways today are meeting stiff competition, particularly from motor trucks and water carriers. It has been contended that competitive rates are of great benefit to eastern Canada, where there are extensive waterways and many truck operators, and that such competitive rates are not available in western Canada. There are numerous competitive rates throughout Canada. May I remind the committee that truck competition is not limited to eastern Canada. There are many truck operators in the prairie provinces and in British Columbia as well, as we all know.

The railways are meeting truck competition in the west as well as in the east. The great lakes and St. Lawrence waterways benefit traffic moving to and from western Canada. In any event one must not let the matter of competitive rates get out of focus. Competitive freight revenue in 1949 on Canadian railways was only about 14 per cent of total freight revenue, on the average.

It is also contended today that shippers in western Canada, and in the more remote parts of our country, who are a long way from their markets, pay more freight rates than do those Canadians situated close to their markets, and that increasing freight rates by horizontal increases or, as it is sometimes known, by a straight percentage increase, puts an unfair burden on the long haul shipper.

The board of transport commissioners has considered this argument time and time again. The western provinces particularly have urged this argument before the board. The board of transport commissioners, after very careful consideration, stated that the straight percentage or horizontal increase was the only fair and equitable way to apply general increases in freight rates. If a maximum was to be applied to the amount of increase rather than applying the increase by a straight percentage, the short haul shipper would be paying an undue proportion of the increase required in the light of the service being received. For example, why should a man shipping his goods five hundred miles have his rates increased by the same number of dollars and cents as would the man shipping his goods a thousand miles? That is the result of applying a maximum increase.

Railway rates should be at such a level that there is, after payment of expenses, an adequate return on the money invested in railway enterprises. Unless we are going to change our way of life, as I said a moment ago, this view must be true, whether the money invested is government money, as in the Canadian National Railways, or privately invested money, as in the Canadian Pacific Railway.

This committee knows that the Canadian National Railways has been able to pay its operating expenses but has not been able to pay its fixed charges, or provide a return on the investment in the railway property. In 1948 the Canadian Pacific Railway had a return of only 1.80 per cent on its investment in railway property; that is, the net investment after full deduction for depreciation. In 1949 the return on the net railway property investment of Canadian Pacific Railway was only 1.97 per cent. These figures can be secured from the evidence given by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the royal commission on transportation. Therefore, investors in the Canadian Pacific Railway have no guarantee that they will secure a return on their investment; but in prosperous times for the railway to be able to earn only less than 2 per cent on its net rail property investment is obviously inadequate treatment of private investors.

Certainly no one will allege that Canadian railways are not efficiently managed. And no one will deny that the employees of such railways are good citizens, striving to do a good job and to give Canada outstanding service. I need merely point to the tremendous and efficient job performed by railway employees and railway management during the last war to prove that railway employees and management are industrious, resourceful and efficient.

The efficiency of Canadian railways can still be improved by the railways securing new types of locomotives, such as diesels and other modern machines, and rearranging their plants, such as their yards, so that traffic can be handled more cheaply and more speedily. To carry out these improvements, railways require money. The only place, for example, the Canadian Pacific Railway as a private enterprise can secure that money is from private investors. For private investors to lend their money to the Canadian Pacific Railway, such investors must have a fair chance of a reasonable return on the money they lend.

[Mr. Arsenault.]

In conclusion, may I quote an excerpt from the evidence of the chairman of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Mr. George A. Walker, before the royal commission on transportation on December 12, 1949, when he stated:

> It has been the consistent policy of successive governments of our country and was recently reaffirmed by the Prime Minister of Canada that "the best way to maintain a high level of employment and to ensure prosperity is to provide the widest possible scope for private enterprise." No major political party in this country has ever adopted a contrary attitude.
> As the first great enterprise in Canada, one which was an essential link in confederation itself and which is still the greatest single enterprise in this country, the Canadian Pacific may justly claim the benefit and protection of such a government policy in as full measure as, but no more than, industry generally throughout Canada.

Finally I would like to say this. Surely this committee will agree that it is not equipped to deal with freight rate details. Most of us will come to the conclusion that the board of transport commissioners should be left to handle this problem on the evidence presented, and bring to bear their wide experience in arriving at a fair and just conclusion for the common good of the whole Canadian community. Unless we are prepared to leave the matter to the board of transport commissioners we must, admittedly ill equipped, deal with it ourselves. Surely no one who has given any serious thought to the question would suggest that as a solution.

Canadian railways must be allowed to live and to live dynamically. Let us support the experienced and qualified judgment of the board. Let us not hamper the railways from living by attempting to place our inexperienced judgment above that of the board of transport commissioners, to which parliament has given the task of seeing that the railways and the public are fairly and justly treated.

I sincerely hope that the house will agree that, through the board of transport commissioners, private enterprise, which is seeking no favours or special privileges but only fair and just treatment in this matter, will be fostered.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Chairman, the question of freight rates as applied to western Canada divides itself into two distinct compartments. In one compartment are the rates set by the Crowsnest agreement, which cannot be interfered with, and in the other compartment are the rates that vary.

In today's discussion we have heard the rates for Canada generally discussed, and very little has been said about the Crowsnest pass agreement. I think perhaps it might be wise at this time to say a few words in explanation to those who do not know the reason for its existence and how it came about. In the early part of the settlement of western Canada we found ourselves with a completed trans-Canada railroad. In the prairie provinces there were about 300,000 people. They were discontented. There were high freight rates, and settlement was at a standstill. Eastern Canada itself had only about five million people.

It was decided that to develop the country a vigorous program of immigration must be introduced, that the people of eastern Canada must depend upon western Canada to purchase everything that they required to settle that country. The natural market for the prairie country lies to the south. The great lakes region prevented our coming east. The Rocky mountains prevented our going west; trade was naturally with the people to the south.

The Canadian Pacific Railway wanted to overcome this, and therefore built a line from Lethbridge to Nelson, so that it would get in and shut off the traffic which was going from southwestern Alberta and southern British Columbia into the United States. It had been promised then that immigration would be strongly supported. This road was built, and for that the Canadian government gave to the C.P.R. a subsidy of $3,404,000 and from British Columbia it received a land grant of 3,620,000 acres with the mineral rights, and 60 square miles of coal land. They obtained a monopoly on the transportation to southern Alberta, and therefore were in a most favourable position to control trade there.

We know what has resulted from this. The great Trail smelters have developed into one of the greatest sources of income for the C.P.R. today. For this what did the railway give? It gave the Crowsnest pass agreement which was an undertaking that it would reduce the rates on grain to the extent of three cents per hundred pounds shipped from prairie points to the lakes. It also agreed to bring settlers effects, machinery and other essential goods for settlement from eastern Canada at a favoured rate amounting to a reduction of from 10 to 33⅓ per cent. These rates were set up and were to constitute the maximum for all time. The C.P.R. set the rate that it would give.

Owing to competition from the Canadian National Railways, which came into Manitoba, an agreement was made whereby the maximum rate was not changed until 1918. In 1918 a Tory or union government at Ottawa did away with the Crowsnest pass agreement. This may be surprising to some Conservative members when they learn about it. But thanks to an alert senator, Senator Watson, the Senate did not approve of the bill with the result that the rates were only suspended for three years. They rose above the maximum set by the Crowsnest pass agreement; but in 1922 a Liberal government again restored the rates on wheat and flour moving from the prairie provinces to Fort William. The rates on commodities moving west were restored in 1924.

Then arose a dispute as to the application of the agreement. The railways claimed that the rates applied only to points in existence when the act was passed, and that from any other points they could charge full rates. The submission to the royal commission on transportation by the pools in January of this year contains the following:

> Upon reinstatement of the Crowsnest pass rates in their entirety, July 7, 1924, the C.P.R. for the first time took the position that the agreement only applied to shipping points which were in existence in 1897. It accordingly ignored the maximum set by the agreement in so far as all other points were concerned. The discrimination and confusion thus created brought about appeals to the board of railway commissioners, and the government alike. The board held that the provisions of the agreement had been overridden by the Railway Act and it, therefore, restored the rates in existence prior to July 7, 1924, which on westbound freight were at a level higher than the maximum set by the agreement.
> The board's decision was reversed by the Supreme Court of Canada, which held that the Crowsnest agreement was binding upon the railroad and the railway commissioners, but only applied to shipping points in existence in 1897.
> The Parliament of Canada in 1925 intervened by relieving the railway company of its obligations under the agreement with regard to all commodities shipped from eastern Canada to the west. Thereby it removed the ceiling set by the agreement on all such commodities. At the same time, parliament not only refused to relieve the railway company of its obligations with regard to grain and flour rates, but enacted that they should apply to all shipping points, irrespective of whether or not they were in existence in 1897.

It is as a result of this Crowsnest pass agreement that the Maritime Freight Rates Act was passed, giving a 20 per cent reduction in freight rates to the maritimes. It was also responsible for the removal of the mountain differential, which was first reduced and then completely abolished by a Liberal government.

The Winnipeg Free Press of November 3, 1924, reports Mr. Mackenzie King as having said: "The east is protected by waterways, the Pacific by the Panama canal and the west by parliament." It is just that protection from monopoly that we in the west are asking for today. We are forced to sell on the open market; we are forced to export principally through eastern Canada and British Columbia. I believe the Hudson Bay route has not been given a fair trial, and with modern radar equipment and a modern icebreaker I am confident that port could be kept open longer than it is now.

I discussed this matter with the wheat pool and asked them why they were not using the port to a greater extent. They said they could not ship grain from Canada until the consignment had been sold in England. I asked them what they did in winter in respect of consignments going abroad, and whether they could not build in England or Scotland a terminal elevator to which they could ship during the summer months and in which they could hold the wheat for delivery, just as they ship to Portland or Halifax or Saint John for winter delivery now. That would save us a considerable amount in freight rates, and we have to look for every avenue of saving on freight rates if we are going to compete in the markets of Europe. Eastern Canada has profited greatly from this handling of grain. We do not complain about this, but what is our position when we come to buy? Our natural market lies to the south in Minneapolis and St. Paul and in the large implement houses in the midwest. Freights from there are much lower and we could obtain our farm implements at much lower prices. But, no. Although we are forced to sell on the open market, we must buy in a closed market and pay for the high protection that is necessary to develop industries in Canada as well as the long freight haul from eastern to western Canada. We did not complain about this until the rates became discriminatory, but the recent rate increases have resulted in a difference of 15 per cent between the eastern and western rates. The real issue here is that of discrimination, not just freight rates.

I should like to refer to a suggestion made by Mr. Tucker, the leader of the opposition in Saskatchewan. He suggests that payment be made to the railroads from the federal treasury, by all the people of Canada, of an amount sufficient to take care of the cost of bridging the gap between the different settled areas of Canada, and then when that is done equalized freight rates should be established right across the country. Of course, close account would have to be kept of the railway operations and accounting systems.

We in western Canada feel that we have some protection in the Crowsnest pass agreement. We paid for it and it never should be abrogated. We almost lost it when the union government was in power, but Senator Watson picked it up in the Senate; otherwise we would not have any agreement today. When I hear someone talking about the reform of the Senate I am inclined to think that at that time it was probably a little brighter than the House of Commons. All the railway acts, all royal commissions, the board of railway commissioners now the board of transport commissioners, were brought into being or set up by Liberal governments. I fail to see any basis for the opposition amendment. As one representing a western constituency I call upon the government to exercise its authority and see that injustices are not permitted.

Before closing I should like to comment upon a few of the things said by a most inconsistent gentleman, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I am sorry he is not in his seat, but I am sure the hon. member for Cape Breton South will report what I am saying to him. Normally the hon. gentleman advocates state control, but this morning he was advocating keen competition among the railways. He protests that the freight rate increases are too great and should not be granted. I should like to quote an editorial that appeared in the Ottawa Journal of February 1, 1950, as follows:

Payment by somebody else

Three western grain organizations appeared before the royal commission on transportation this week to attack railway wage scales. They said the railways' payrolls were too heavy, that rail wages and salaries should be re-examined before attempt was made to increase rates on grain.

Too bad these western grain organizations (Manitoba pool elevators, Saskatchewan co-operative producers and the Alberta wheat pool) did not think of that before. For had they thought of it a year or so ago, when the railways, faced with higher wage demands, were saying that higher wages must mean higher freight rates, their thought might have meant something.

As it was, the railways were left to fight their own battle. The western grain organizations were silent. The provinces were silent. The politicians were silent.

As a consequence, this happened: That when a conciliation board decided the railway employees should get so much and the railway employees insisted on more, the dominion government, not hearing any protests from the western grain organizations nor from the provinces nor from anybody else, stepped in and said the employees must have more.

The railways agreed; they had no alternative. As Mr. Justice Rand put it in the supreme court some weeks ago, they (the railways) "paid what they had to pay." And when they paid, and the stage was necessarily set for higher freight rates (for how else were the railways to get the money to pay the new wage costs?) not a word came from the west. The government wasn't told that by compelling the railways to pay higher wages (higher even than a conciliation board held to be fair) it was incurring the danger of higher grain rates. If the thing was thought about at all, it apparently was thought of with the idea—so common these days—that payment would be by somebody else.

It will be remembered that this morning the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar protested against any increase in rail rates. However, the railways have shown distinctly that the increases in freight rates that were given have all been taken up by the payment of higher wages to the brotherhood of railway workers. Is the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar opposed to those increases in wages to the brotherhood of railway workers?

Mr. Chevrier: That is the point.

Mr. McCusker: I am sorry the hon. member is not here to answer that question. Is that what he was supporting when he spoke in favour of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition? He is rather inconsistent on that point. I should like to comment on the attitude taken this morning by the leader of the opposition, who has a friendly habit of giving the supporters of the government a lecture on their responsibilities as members and on the duty they owe to their constituents. I have no doubt that he finds these lectures useful and perhaps necessary as far as his own followers are concerned, but I assure him that we new members are fully aware of our responsibilities and we are accustomed to fulfilling our duties.

The leader of the opposition asks us to support his amendment and he says that this government has done nothing. Surely he realizes that every freight rate act was brought in by a Liberal government? Surely he realizes that if it had not been for a Liberal government we would have lost our Crowsnest pass rates? The appointment of royal commissions and everything else has been the work of Liberal governments. I simply wanted to state my reasons why I could not support the amendment, and I hope I have stated them clearly so that my friends may understand.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Regina City with regard to the freight rates situation and his reply to the leader of the opposition; but he did not discuss the point that this increase will accentuate the discrimination. Nothing has been said by any previous speaker supporting the government as to the removal of discrimination in the freight rate structure. As I listened to the minister speak I began to realize that there was no hope for western Canada and the maritime provinces at all for relief against the increase in discrimination against these areas brought about by continuing horizontal increases in railway freight rates. When the hon. member for Regina City dealt with this question and went back into the history of the Crowsnest rates instead of dealing with the resolution now before the house, I could only conclude that no member from the province of Saskatchewan or the other western provinces can deny the grave injustice that is being intensified by reason of allowing this further increase in railway rates. It is in no way a question whether the railways should be able to finance and return a profit. All of us believe that there must necessarily be an increase in railway rates in order to meet increased costs of operation, wages and the like, provided that the companies are able to establish the necessity for such increases.

What we from the prairie provinces object to—and this applies to the maritimes as well—is that the freight rate discrimination against the economies of two sections of Canada is being perpetuated and the unfair discriminatory rates that have continued over the years are being added to. By 1922 the normal level of freight rates in the western provinces was 15 per cent above that of Ontario and Quebec. So far as the Crowsnest rates are concerned, I join with the hon. member for Regina City, as I have done on many occasions in this house, in urging the maintenance of those rates. There is no question about that so far as members from any of the western provinces are concerned, regardless of political considerations. That is old straw. All are in favour of those rates and intend to press that they are maintained. No matter what political party one belongs to, if from western Canada you support those rates. I am surprised that the hon. member for Regina City did not raise his voice against the injustice of this increase coming as it does on top of the increase in March.

Mr. McCusker: On a question of privilege, I raised my voice against it. I clearly stated that I called upon the government to prevent this injustice taking place.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right. Now that we have the voice let us also have the vote to support the voice.

Mr. McCusker: On another question of privilege, the vote will follow the voice—

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right.

Mr. McCusker: —but I will interpret it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, in effect he says, I shall do evil and call it good.

Mr. McCusker: The hon. member usually does.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of course that is no reply.

Mr. Chevrier: Nobody knows that better than the hon. member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am going to call as my witness the Saskatchewan Liberal party and a resolution that they supported in the provincial legislature a few weeks ago. I will also call as my witness a member of the government, Stuart Garson, the then premier of Manitoba.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: His was a voice for the western people when he was in the west, but that voice has not been raised since coming to the House of Commons. The voice that we used to hear from the premier of Manitoba, as he then was, is still. Oh for the sound of that voice once more—in parliament, where it would have the power to effect what it advocated in the legislature of Manitoba.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to read from the resolution that was introduced in the Saskatchewan legislature on March 7, 1950, as reported in the Regina Leader-Post. I shall quote the Regina Leader-Post and the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix as well later on on the question of freight rates to show that this is a matter that knows no disunity of opinion among western Canadians, regardless of party consideration. In view of the fact that discrimination is taking place and is intensified by horizontal increases, the continuation of freight rates at their present level strikes at the economy of the western farmer and farmers of the maritimes as well. It strikes at the expansion of industry in western Canada as it does also in the maritimes. The horizontal increases have been imposed on the original unfair discriminatory rates of 15 per cent and as a result the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan are now paying 21·78 per cent higher freight rates than are paid in the two central provinces of Ontario and Quebec. It was 15 per cent three or four years ago, and by reason of the horizontal increases the difference is now 21·78 per cent.

There was no division of opinion when the matter came before the Saskatchewan legislature on the 7th of March. There was a united front. The Minister of Transport must have received the resolution passed unanimously by the legislature and calling upon the federal government to act. The minister indicated today that the government cannot act and terminated his speech by saying in effect that with the case now sub judice and on its way to the privy council, in his opinion the increases were justified. That is not the attitude for a minister of the crown to take on a matter before the courts, thereby indicating that the government approves what has been done.

It is not a question of the railways' need for more income. If extra income is needed and rates must be increased no one will object, but what we do object to is that by continuing to allow these increases, which have the result of increasing the discrimination against the western provinces and the maritimes. Precedent is piling on precedent until finally we will find ourselves in the position where we are discriminated out of existence, economically speaking. That is why there was no division of opinion in the Saskatchewan legislature on the 7th day of March. The motion was passed by all members. It was supported by Mr. Walter Tucker, K.C., leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan, in language that I am going to place upon the record of the house. The report in the Regina Leader-Post of March 7, 1950, reads:

> A resolution calling on the federal government to disallow the recent 16 per cent freight rate increase pending completion of the report of the royal commission on transportation was given unanimous endorsation by the legislature Monday. Speaking in its support were Premier T. C. Douglas, opposition leader Walter Tucker and municipal affairs minister L. F. McIntosh.
> The resolution read: "That this assembly strongly protests the recent increases in freight rates granted by the board of transport commissioners, and requests the Saskatchewan government to appeal the decision to the federal government, urging the said government to exercise its statutory power of disallowance under section 52 of the Railway Act, disallowing the latest increases pending the report of the royal commission on transportation."

That was not a Conservative motion. It was a motion moved in the legislature of Saskatchewan. Mr. Douglas pointed out that the increase in March and the recent increases during the past two years had resulted in the consumers of Canada having to pay an additional $131 million in freight rates. The amount has now been increased to approximately $144 million. Mr. Douglas is reported as saying:

> We can be sure a heavy share of this burden fell on the people of the west and maritimes where lack of competition has allowed the railways to take full advantage of horizontal increases.

Further on:

> "We propose to carry the matter to the federal government and ask them to disallow the 16 per cent increase under the veto power in section 52 of the Railway Act." . . . Opposition leader Walter Tucker complimented the premier for bringing forward a resolution on which there could be no political differences.

It is not very often you have compliments passing between those two gentlemen, but all difficulties were forgotten in the face of the needs of that province and the feelings of the people as a whole. Mr. Tucker had this to say in part:

> "On this question of protecting the people of Saskatchewan from bearing an unfair share of railway freight increases the government has the determined and united support of the Liberal opposition. The government of Canada, having committed itself to the setting up of a royal commission on transportation, must know that we are not going to let any increase come into effect until we get the findings of that commission."

There was the leader of the Liberal party in the province of Saskatchewan taking a most definite stand. He went on to say something more, and these are not my directions to the minister; they come from his former colleague in this house, now the leader of his party in Saskatchewan, who said:

The governor general in council was under no obligation, he believed—

That is Mr. Tucker.

—to permit the latest increase as long as it was not consistent with the over-all policy of the federal government.

In other words, in effect Mr. Tucker said there should be disallowance unless it was the view of the federal government that the discriminatory situation should be permitted to continue. Then he said something more; and while my own words may have no effect I should think the words of Mr. Tucker should be most effective in reply to those who take a different stand from that taken by the province of Saskatchewan. He said:

"There is no reason why the west should bear all the extra costs of a railroad system that is essential to the whole nation." It was also because of national tariff policy, he pointed out, that western Canada had to ship most of its goods from central Canada.

"These factors had left an economic gap between central Canada and the west, Mr. Tucker said, and in their brief to the board of transport commissioners the western provinces had established an 'unanswerable case' in favour of a national subsidy to close the gap."

Then he went on to set forth the situation in general, at considerable length. At that time he expressed the first and fundamental objection to this increase which is that it has the effect of intensifying the injustice that has prevailed over the years. We used to object when the rate was 15 per cent higher in western Canada than in Ontario and Quebec. Surely now we have a right to object when that difference has been increased by approximately 6·8 per cent. This latest increase, coupled with the previous increases, in time will have the result of crippling our western economy. Why should it be brought in at this time, with the Turgeon commission just having concluded its sittings, heard the argument and commenced to consider its report? Surely this piling on of discrimination against the western and maritime provinces should be discontinued. As far as I can see the government can advance no argument for disregarding the call from Macedonia by Mr. Tucker, when he said in effect "Disallow these increases or you will do harm to the economy of the prairie provinces".

Well, Mr. Chairman, there is another voice, that of the Minister of Justice, a clarion voice with which he used to call upon the western provinces to preserve their birthright against injustice. I read first from the Manitoba submission opposing any increase in freight rates, presented to the board of transport commissioners during the hearing of the application for a 30 per cent increase, in 1947. I am quoting from appendix C, "Submission by Premier Stuart Garson," in which he said:

May I, at this point, briefly recapitulate:

The prairie provinces are in the centre of Canada's railway system.

They are a heavy producer of export goods and a heavy consumer of Canadian manufactured goods.

They therefore provide the railways with their longest and most profitable type of freight haul.

They therefore are most adversely affected by a freight rate increase because they have to pay both coming and going over long hauls.

The prairie provinces already pay a disproportionate share of the cost of railway operation in Canada.

That was in 1947. Since then the rates have been increased by more than 40 per cent; but even in 1947 the premier of Manitoba said that the prairie provinces already paid a disproportionate share of the cost of railway operation in Canada. Surely, belonging to a government that has power to act, the voice of the crusader in 1947 should be translated into the actions of the statesman of 1950. Now I shall read from the foreword, also written by the present Minister of Justice, dated January 5, 1948, in which he sets out the facts in such a way that they cannot be challenged. Those facts were accepted by the province of Saskatchewan, as well as by Manitoba. This is what he said:

Since the early days of railroad construction in western Canada, Manitoba has always been in the forefront of those who have opposed the efforts of the railways to take advantage of their quasi-monopolistic position in the prairies by imposing high freight rates which must be paid by the people of western Canada because they have no alternative transportation for the great bulk of the commodities which they buy and sell. Most of the people of western Canada are farmers, miners, fishermen and other raw material producers, or those whose interests are closely tied to this kind of primary production. This is the very group which would be harmed the most by high freight rates.

Let me repeat that statement:

This is the very group which would be harmed the most by high freight rates. For example, in the case of livestock products the return to the western farmer is the price at the market less the cost of getting the article to the market. On the other hand, in the case of manufactured goods, the manufacturer in eastern Canada, because of his tariff protection, is able to sell in western Canada at a price which is set by his factory price in eastern Canada plus the cost of shipping goods from the factory to the user. Thus, high freight rates are a burden upon western Canada both coming and going.

In view of these facts of economics and geography, the people of western Canada have always been quick to oppose any proposal that freight rates should be increased. Consequently, when on October 9, 1946, the Railway Association of Canada applied for authority to raise freight rates by 30 per cent with certain exceptions, Manitoba was quick to express its opposition and to prepare to state its position before the authorities charged with the responsibility of deciding the matter.

I shall read one further paragraph, in which the present Minister of Justice went on to say:

However, if residents of Manitoba paid that proportion of the increased cost of shipments in the western provinces that Manitoba's population bears to the population of the western provinces, then the additional cost to Manitoba resulting from a 30 per cent increase in freight rates would be over $800,000 per month or $9½ million per year.

So that there be no mistake that we were discriminated against in 1947, and that our freight rates were so much higher than in eastern Canada, I quote these words from the Minister of Justice:

They have shown—

That is Manitoba and these provinces that were opposing these increases.

—that the average level of all effective freight rates is higher by at least fourteen per cent in the west than in the east and that although the total amounts spent for working expenses in the two areas are almost identical, nevertheless, profits in the west exceed profits in the east in the ratio of 2 to 1.

It is a tremendously important submission that was made, and it was supported by the outstanding leaders in agriculture in the province of Manitoba as well as the province of Saskatchewan. It is for that reason, sir, I ask the Minister of Transport not to treat this matter in the way he did this morning, as though nothing could be done. I do not believe in the political fixation of freight rates, but I do believe if we are to build a united Canada there cannot be two, three, or four different kinds of citizenship, according to the freight rate structure in the several parts of Canada. You cannot build a united Canada on the basis of freight rates that are unjust to some sections of the country. That is why this matter becomes of such transcendent importance. I repeat that this last increase, coupled with the other increases, means that the western provinces will be paying 21·78 per cent higher freight rates than are being paid in Ontario and Quebec. This cannot continue; the problem must be determined. The commission has been sitting, and while the commission sits to determine whether discrimination shall be allowed, the discrimination continues to mount.

I shall now read, sir, from the Winnipeg Free Press editorials on this subject. It has taken a very strong stand over the years. On March 3, 1950, that newspaper said this:

This discrimination in rates is an old, old story, being the pith and substance of almost every major freight rate case since 1907. Some forty years of consistent and unremitting effort on the part of the western provinces has gone into the fight for justice in freight rates.

The discrimination arises as follows:

The editorial sets out what the result is, and then it points out:

Up to 1922, the transport board repeatedly moved to correct this discrimination by granting larger increases in rates in the east than in the west or by granting an increase in the east but none in the west.

Since 1922 the board of transport commissioners has done nothing such as it did prior to 1922 to prevent the increase in degree of discrimination. The article continues:

Thus the old discrimination against the west not only remains but is worsened. The latest flat increase of 7·4 per cent applied to an eastern rate of, say, 85 cents is one thing. Applied to a western rate on the identical commodity of one dollar, it is another. The present differential of 15 per cent is increased.

When I hear praise of the transport board, these words come to me from the Winnipeg Free Press:

The opinion of the west will be that once again the transport board has been derelict in its duty to the detriment of this part of Canada.

These are not the words of a Conservative paper; these are not the words of the opposition in parliament; these are the words of the Winnipeg Free Press which, over the years, has fought a battle on behalf of the removal of the unjustly discriminatory system that has prevailed for years, and has been intensified in recent years. When the Minister of Justice was in Manitoba his freight rate conscience reposed in the Free Press. I ask him to bring to bear on the government to which he now belongs the force of the principles which he enunciated in 1947. They are even more true today, because the discrimination of that day has been added to by horizontal increases.

What should our attitude be? The attitude in Saskatchewan is shown by the editorials in every newspaper in that province. The Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of May 26 said this:

The board of transport commissioners has sanctioned another increase in freight rates. This time it is 3·4 per cent. But coming on top of three other increases in a little more than two years it will inevitably push some farm districts and some businesses in western Canada below the level of profitability.

This newspaper concludes that the increase is going to result in business and farm districts in certain localities being forced below the level of profitability. The editorial continues:

The things we sell and most of the things we buy must move by rail at some stage in their exchange. We have no waterways or other forms of transport to restrain the insatiable appetite of the railways for more money. The west pays the full shot every time.

At the end of the article, this appears:

The present order perpetuates these errors in rate making. It is the third time these errors have been applied since the cabinet asked for a review. They are in a fair way to becoming established as precedents unless they are challenged. The provinces must appeal this order as they did the order of March 1, 1950. And when the appeal is launched, the government should hear the appeals before the new rate goes into effect. We think the new rate is unjust because it is based on rate-making rules that are unjust. The cabinet is our only remaining protection. We should have access to it immediately before any more damage is done.

Surely that challenges the Minister of Transport to speak otherwise than he did in his concluding words today, when in effect he gave approval to what has been done.

The Regina Leader-Post is equally definite. In an editorial on May 27 it said this:

With the latest award, rates have been increased by 45·2 per cent since 1948 to extract an estimated additional $144 million in revenue from the public. But this will not be the end.

Farther down it says:

The cabinet clearly has the authority to grant a stay in the application of the higher rates. The appeal already has been made to the cabinet following the March 1 award. But consideration was postponed until the board had completed its judgment on the application which was disposed of Thursday.

Then the editorial gives this reason for postponement until the report of this royal commission is brought down:

Since the main purpose in appointing the Turgeon commission was to endeavour to find a remedy for this situation, the fair and sensible course for the cabinet to take is to grant the provinces' appeals in the hope that shortly the commission's report will point a way to a solution of this knotty problem.

Sir, no matter where one goes in the western provinces, whatever the political faith may be of the individual, farmers and businessmen are saying, as I know the maritime people are saying, that because we live on the western plains, by reason of geographical location, this discrimination must cease. There is very little hope of its being stopped when the minister approaches the subject in the offhand, cavalier way he did this morning. He gave us history. It is not history they want today. What they want is action. He places the responsibility directly upon the board of transport commissioners.

There is only one means by which the leader of the opposition could bring this matter to the attention of the country, and that is by the traditional method. I could go into the records of the old country to show where the same method has been used on occasion. Where there are boards, and the government takes the recommendations of the boards and has the power to disallow them and does not, the only way in which parliament can speak is through an amendment reducing the expenditure for the board in question to the sum of one dollar. That is the only way in which members of parliament can officially say—I speak for those in the western provinces—whether or not they accept what has been done.

It is all very well to say, when the session of parliament is over and we go home, that we were against the increase. It is so easy to say that. There is no other way. If anybody can tell me of any other way by which parliament can show that we from the western provinces and the other provinces of Canada are discriminated against, that we oppose this discrimination, that we do not believe an injustice can be removed by aggravating an existing discrimination, I will give him an opportunity to do so.

This debate is one which directly affects men and women everywhere in this dominion. As I said at the beginning, no one argues the need of private enterprise being able to pay a fair and reasonable return; no one argues that you want to see perpetuated a system whereby any government industry is constantly coming back to parliament for help. Fair rates will assure fair wages; proper rates will assure the discharge of the proper responsibilities in expenditure. But surely the answer to the railway problem of Canada is not to load discrimination on top of discrimination against certain areas within our country.

I could go further and quote from the present Minister of Justice when he was premier of Manitoba, who said in 1947 that if the eastern rates were raised to the equivalent of what the then western rates were any question of a deficit would be done away with. Whether that is the solution I am not saying. That is what the Turgeon commission is endeavouring to decide at the present time. Since the matter is before the commission I am asking through you, sir, that the minister shall heed the small voice—it must be small today because no one has heard it—of the Minister of Justice who, speaking in stentorian tones in 1947, said in effect, "This condition dare not continue." And since then it has not only continued but multiplied and increased while the minister has sat as a member of the cabinet.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I have a few observations to make in this debate. I have listened with much interest to what has been said so far. In my opinion, what we are considering at this time is, first, whether the board of transport commissioners is competent or otherwise; second, whether the increased freight rates that are proposed can be justified. A royal commission is looking into the problem; but before I go into the details of a discussion of that kind I should like to say this to the hon. member for Regina City—he invited it. When he was speaking he made some critical observations with regard to what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had to say this morning, and intimated that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was departing from the position that he had taken on this question over the years.

I thought the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was clear this morning. His whole protest was based on the inequality that exists with respect to freight rates as between the centre, the east and the west. The hon. member for Regina City charged that the deficits on the Canadian National Railways accrue particularly because of the increases in wages.

Mr. McCusker: On a point of privilege, I named no railroad.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member's observations would not leave any doubt in anyone's mind.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): That is your opinion.

Mr. Gillis: First, he is wrong in the statement that the deficit on the Canadian National Railways accrues because of wages.

Mr. McCusker: Once again, on personal privilege, I made no such statement, nor did I insinuate it.

Mr. Gillis: The Canadian National is the only railway that has a deficit. The hon. member could not be talking about any other.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Chairman, I was not speaking of deficits. The statement which I did make—and the hon. member would have heard it had he been listening—was that the railroads had stated that the allowable increase in freight rates had been taken up by increases in wages. I said nothing of deficits.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member did make reference to the wage demands that are now before the different railroads, and so forth.

Mr. McCusker: The hon. member will see it in Hansard.

Mr. Gillis: He has already made the statement, and he can read it tomorrow or correct it tonight, if he wants to.

Mr. McCusker: I am not in the habit of doing that.

[Mr. Gillis.]

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member should not interrupt the member who has the floor—

Mr. Gillis: He wanted to know—

The Deputy Chairman: —unless he asks permission or raises a question of privilege. The hon. member raised a question which was not one of privilege. He replied to a statement made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. According to Beauchesne, third edition, citation 235, an explanation can be given only with the consent of the hon. member who has the floor. If the hon. member who has the floor does not give permission the explanation can be made after the termination of his speech.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I was quoted as having said that the reason for the deficits on the Canadian National was an increase in wages. I made no such statement.

The Deputy Chairman: Citation 235 of Beauchesne, third edition, reads:

> A member who, during a debate has spoken to a question may again be heard to offer explanation of some material part of his speech which has been misunderstood; but he must not introduce new matter or endeavour to strengthen by new arguments, his former position which he alleges to have been misunderstood, or to reply to other members. Here, again, a greater latitude is permitted in cases of personal explanation, where a member's character or conduct has been impugned in debate. The proper time for explanation is at the conclusion of the speech which calls for it. See also Beauchesne, third edition, citation 236.

Mr. Gillis: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I hope the hon. member understands that. I listened with a lot of patience to him while he made the statement, and did not interrupt him.

Of course, the propaganda that wage rates are responsible for all difficulties and deficits in every industry is not something new. I have heard it for the last thirty years, and it has been very prominent recently in the press. Editorial after editorial, chambers of commerce and so forth have been driving it home to the public. I am not surprised that my hon. friend fell for it. That is not the case, however. I think it is nearly time everyone understood that. I am thinking in terms of the Canadian National Railways, because I am particularly interested in them—and I suggest every member in the committee should be.

In the final analysis this whole question is not the responsibility of the board of transport commissioners or of any royal commission. The final responsibility rests with this House of Commons—and I say we should understand that. I would like to look at both sides of this question. The railways render a public service and must be maintained, and in order to operate they must have money. The only place they can get money is from those who patronize the system. Let me say this, for the benefit of anyone who has not been looking into the operations of the C.N.R. particularly, that it has not been wages that have pulled them down, nor has it been ordinary operating costs which have brought about deficits.

Every year the Canadian National starts out with a deficit of $45 million in interest charges on loans from the government in respect of the bonds of old, defunct railroads that should have been called in and liquidated years ago. That $45 million about which we hear so much in the press and in the House of Commons should be understood. It does not accrue because of operating inefficiency or because of the wage debt but rather from fixed interest charges on dead services. The capital should be written off as interest-bearing capital and show in the books as equity capital, or it should be called in and written off altogether. I hope when hon. members are considering that feature of the system they will keep this debt load in mind.

Later on I shall deal with freight rates as such. However, let me speak briefly now on the question as to whether the board of transport commissioners is a competent body. As a result of the debates I have heard in the house respecting freight rates since 1945, setting out how the whole question has been handled, I would say there is something lacking in the personnel of that body.

A return in the name of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) to which reference was made this morning by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), gives the names of the members of the board, and their previous occupations. I have not anything against anyone on the board, or any particular occupation; but I say that a body selected to handle the very difficult problem of fixing freight rates in Canada and of doing all the work the board has to do should consist of personnel highly trained for that position.

I shall not put any names on record. Hon. members may look at the document to which I have referred and they will find among the occupations listed there many lawyers, an undertaker, a real estate agent, car dealers and stenographers. Those particular callings do not give the qualifications, in my opinion, to handle a job of that kind.

Then, according to the return, the freight rate experts are all ex-employees of either the C.N.R. or the C.P.R. I do not know whether they are still working for those organizations. I think however it is the responsibility of the minister not to appoint a royal commission; if the board of transport commissioners are competent there should not have been a royal commission. If the personnel of the board had been selected carefully with full regard for their qualifications, and appointed on their merits, there should have been no necessity to hire a royal commission—because the board is a royal commission, sitting continuously and reporting through the minister to the government.

Why should we at this late date, when we have got into this tangle about freight rates, have to go out and hire another body to examine into the organization that is supposed to be efficient and competent and equipped to deal with this matter from day to day? It does not make sense. No; there should not be a royal commission; but I think the minister's department should make a job valuation survey of the board of transport commissioners, and take a look at the qualifications of the personnel. There are not too many of them; probably there are not enough. I believe there should be an examination of the qualifications of everyone on the board who has anything to do with the problems they have to handle. I believe there is ample justification for the accusation that they are not competent—at least they have not shown, to date, that they are.

Then, secondly, is there justification for the rates asked for? Taking a look at both sides of the question, and as one of the members who served on the committee on government-owned railways and shipping, and as one who had a chance to take a look at the balance sheet and to examine witnesses, from Mr. Gordon down, let me say that in my opinion, so far as the management of the Canadian National Railways is concerned—I do not know anything about the C.P.R., so I am not going to talk about it—they are as efficient as could be found in this country. I believe that in Mr. Gordon they have a man who is very competent and very determined to do something about the disabilities of the system over which he presides. He has shown a clear grasp of the problem, and I think we have no quarrel so far as the management of the Canadian National Railways is concerned.

If we examine the justification for the freight rates, from the standpoint of the present financial position, they are justified. But, as I intimated earlier, the C.N.R. is in a false position; and unless we are able to correct that position by bringing about some adjustment in the capital structure of the national railways, we are going to continue to go on and on in this way—there will be no end to it.

My opinion is that in respect of these freight rates for the C.N.R. and C.P.R., and their relationship to the whole economic set-up of the country, as well as to other industrial aspects of the problem, we are entering upon a new economic age. This country has reached the point where the old yardstick by which we measured things is no longer good enough. We have to do a lot of serious thinking and make a good many serious revisions in the whole economic structure of Canada, of which this is only one part.

The western part of this country has ample justification for complaining about the inequality of freight rates and the discrimination resulting therefrom. The maritimes also have ample justification for the same complaints. The 21 per cent increase in freight rates that was to be applied straight across the board was, to the best of my knowledge, never applied in Ontario—and if it was applied in Quebec, only to a limited extent. But it applied 100 per cent both east and west, The centre has direct competition, and their hauls are short, but in other parts of the country both east and west that is not so. On everything going either to the east or to the west, from the centre, higher rates were applied; on everything going out the same rates applied. Perhaps 80 per cent of the freight goes into those provinces and adds to consumer costs. Very little is shipped out of the maritimes except raw materials. It hits those who are shipping out, but the ultimate cost is passed on to the consumer. I submit that there is ample justification for the complaint that has been made.

No recommended solution has been offered so far by hon. members who have spoken, and I am going to make a few recommendations which are based upon the thinking of the people of the maritimes. There are one or two things I should like to clear up. Many people in central Canada consider that the maritimes are receiving a rebate or subsidy under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. I notice that some of the people appearing before the royal commission referred to that as a subsidy. I should like to put the record straight on that particular point.

The 20 per cent that is allowed under the Maritime Freight Rates Act is not a subsidy. In 1912 there was a general increase in freight rates of 55 per cent, but when that was applied to the maritimes it amounted to 92 per cent. We suffered under that injustice until the early twenties when the Duncan royal commission on maritime rights recommended that a 20 per cent rebate should be paid under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. We are still 17 per cent worse off than the rest of the country on a percentage basis. An injustice was perpetuated under the terms of confederation and they still owe us 17 per cent on freight rates. I do not want to hear anyone calling it a subsidy because it is simply part payment of something that is owing to us and for which we are still pressing.

Unless recommendations are made there is not much to fasten to, and I should like to refer to some that have been made in the maritimes. They may not be all right, but also they may not be all wrong. I think the committee may be able to get something from them. These recommendations were put forward by the New Brunswick government and by the maritime transportation commission. By the way, that body has a very good grasp of the whole transportation problem across this country, including freight rates. The recommendations that were made were as follows:

1. Lessen the impact of percentage-type freight rate increases—the kind awarded the railways since the war—on the long haul traffic typical of the maritimes.

2. Restore rate relationships existing between Canadian ocean ports before the last series of increases.

3. Preserve advantages guaranteed under the Maritime Freight Rates Act of 1927, which it is claimed have been partly nullified by transportation changes since then.

4. Extend the application of the act to make its statutory rate reductions effective on rail-and-water shipments from points in the maritimes to those outside the area.

In addition New Brunswick went a step further and asked for a 50 per cent increase in the rates under the Maritime Freight Rates Act and a wider coverage as to traffic to which it would be applicable. That statute now provides for a 20 per cent rebate on rail traffic within the maritimes and on the maritimes part of westbound traffic originating in those provinces. New Brunswick asks that the rebate be increased by 30 per cent and that it apply on the maritimes section of eastbound traffic into the maritimes from points outside.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Were those recommendations made to the royal commission?

Mr. Gillis: Yes. There was some disagreement as to the last point on the ground that it might interfere with fair competition. I do not think that argument is valid because we do not manufacture anything in the maritimes that would be in competition with anything manufactured in Ontario or Quebec. As I said before, most of our exports are raw materials and our young people. Despite the fact that certain sections of the press disagreed with that recommendation, I believe it should receive consideration.

Prince Edward Island went a bit further and advocated the nationalization of the whole Canadian transportation system. I am not going to comment on that; I shall give Premier Jones an opportunity to explain what he means some time in the future. I believe that a solution is to be found in the submission by the president of the Canadian National Railways to the royal commission on transportation. Mr. Gordon summed it up very well when he asked that there be a revamping of the capital structure of the system, a writing-off of the $45 million of fixed interest charges which the system is now carrying. I believe that if that were done, with the present management the system could be made efficient and in the future could be taken as the yardstick to be used. Unless that is done I do not know how the system can struggle along.

Last year the press was full of stories about the deficit of $42 million which the Canadian National Railways had incurred, but then elsewhere you would read that they had an operating profit of some $4 million. It is hard to understand these different editorials, one saying they had a profit of $4 million and the next one saying they had a deficit of $42 million. The people just do not understand that sort of thing.

I sat in this house as a member for a long time and voted for bills to wipe out deficits year after year. For a long time I thought that those were accumulated deficits from the previous year's operations, but then I began to dig through the books and finally found out the size of the load the system was carrying. I think it is rather unreasonable and unrealistic for the government to lend money to the Canadian National Railways and then have the system pay an interest charge of around $21 million a year. We pass a bill for $45 million, it goes to the C.N.R. and they pay back $21 million to the government. The principal is still there and goes on and on.

Old railroads representing $24 million in fixed interest charges were taken over. Under ordinary circumstances those roads would have gone into bankruptcy, but they were loaded on the Canadian National system. The bonds were transferred and the Canadian National carries all that deadwood, representing lines that produced practically no revenue, on which they pay a fixed interest charge of $24 million a year. It just does not make sense.

I do not think the proponents of free enterprise would expect that any free enterprise carrying on in that way can make money. I presume most hon. members are familiar with Mr. Gordon's submission to the royal commission on transportation. What it boils down to is that he simply asks them to do what I am suggesting. He asks the commission to take into consideration the possibility of taking the bonds and government loans and, instead of showing them on the balance sheet as interest-bearing bonds and loans, show them as equity capital bearing no interest, or that on the other hand the government should take a look at the whole thing, try to write it off and start the system off again with a clean sheet. Unless that is done, in my opinion freight rates will continue to go up. There is no way out of it unless we revamp the Canadian National system.

I think if we did so it would create stiff competition for the Canadian Pacific Railway, which would be a good thing for the country. It is my opinion that in the past a lot of the business that should have gone to the Canadian National has been deliberately swung in the other direction. I have noticed a proposal that freight from the maritimes should be shipped through Moncton to Saint John to the Canadian Pacific line, from there through the United States to Montreal, and that the provisions of the Maritime Freight Rates Act be applied. That cannot be done. The Maritime Freight Rates Act is not applicable unless it is a through haul. In addition it would just mean swinging more business from the C.N.R. to the C.P.R.

I do not want to be dogmatic about the question because my knowledge of it is not too great. I want to see the right thing done. I am absolutely sure in my own mind that, unless the C.N.R. can be relieved of the great debt it has been carrying since its inception, by revamping the whole capital structure, so far as the Canadian freight rate question is concerned we are going to go through the same thing year after year. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar pointed out this morning, the future development of Canada depends on the railroad system. Unless it is efficiently maintained and properly routed throughout the country it is not possible to develop either the north or the south, the east or the west. We must have a good efficient transportation system.

I think we have an efficient transportation system. I do not think there is any better in the world. I know that since the war there has been a great improvement in rolling stock, and efforts are being made to repair lines. I know that in the maritimes, where it is badly needed, some work is being done. The Minister of Transport is pushing very strongly for the bridge across the strait of Canso. That is a part of the Canadian National system and will be of great importance to that section of the country. I had the privilege of attending the meetings of the sessional committee on the operations of the Canadian National Railways for four or five weeks and investigating their business. I believe the management is doing everything it can to bring about more economic operation and better service for the Canadian people. It is our job to help them. I was glad to see that the committee, after going over the whole structure of the C.N.R., inserted in its report to the house a recommendation that the government should seriously consider, along the lines suggested by Mr. Gordon, the complete revision of the whole capital structure.

I come to the amendment of the leader of the opposition. My view is that if it is passed it means the end of the board of transport commissioners. If you cut their money completely they cannot work. Nobody works for nothing. At the same time I believe a protest to the board of transport commissioners is in order as to the way in which they handled the whole freight rate question. When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was speaking this morning he stated that he did not think we could move an amendment to the amendment. Our technical expert on Beauchesne was absent at the time. The hon. member for Kootenay West substituted for him. He is much slower but he finally found a citation in the second edition of Beauchesne that would justify us in moving an amendment to the amendment, and I propose to do so at this time. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar:

That the amendment be amended by striking out the word "to" and substituting therefor the word "by."

The amended amendment would then read:

That item 524 of the estimates of the Department of Transport be reduced by one dollar.

I notice that my ecclesiastical friend over here thinks I am wrong in saying "by". The leader of the opposition said "to one dollar". That would mean we would be wiping out all the money which would enable the board of transport commissioners to carry on its operation. The amendment to the amendment says, "by one dollar". That will not hurt them very much but at the same time it is a protest against the way in which the whole freight rate question was handled.

Mr. Fulton: A mild protest.

Mr. Gillis: Many hon. members will say that they cannot vote to wipe out the board of transport commissioners but anyone who is interested in protesting can vote for the amendment to the amendment because it merely means that they will be voting in protest against the way the whole freight rate question was handled.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Make it $1.50.

Mr. Gillis: I merely want to re-emphasize that, in my opinion, if members of the house want to do something about freight rates and prevent this kind of discussion in the future the only way they can do so is to get behind Mr. Donald Gordon's program for the complete revision of the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. McCusker: I want to say a word by way of explanation. I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South misunderstood what I said this morning. I made no protest about increased wages. I merely expressed surprise that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, in supporting the amendment of the leader of the opposition, should be so inconsistent as to protest that freight rate increases are too great and should not be granted. By so doing he was objecting to wage increases. In effect that is what he did. I know we all agree that the disparity in rates should not be allowed to exist. I quoted from an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press to show what was being claimed. The editorial reads:

The extent to which the Canadian people paid for the past wage increases, in the form of higher freight rates, can easily be shown. During the war, price ceilings prevented the railways from raising rates to counterbalance the increased costs, mainly in wages, of wartime. But with the lifting of the ceilings the railways launched their campaign. In October, 1946, they applied for an increase in freight rates of 30 per cent.

This is what will interest the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

After a battle that lasted for eighteen months, the board of transport commissioners awarded them an increase of 21 per cent, costing the public about $70 million a year. But all this was immediately sucked away by the wage increase of 1948 which cost $73 million a year.

I referred to no railroad.

Mr. Ross (Souris): May I ask what you are reading from?

Mr. McCusker: It is from page 3 of a reprint of editorials in the Winnipeg Free Press in April and May, 1950. The reprint is entitled, "The Railway Wage Dispute". I then asked, "Is he opposed to giving the brotherhood of railway workers an increase in wages?" That was my statement this morning; and I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for giving me an opportunity to correct the hon. member.

Mr. Coldwell: May I also have a moment to make my position clear. My whole speech this morning was directed against discrimination in freight rates. As far as wages are concerned, in the course of my remarks I pointed out that many thousands of low paid railway workers were suffering from the high cost of living, and I went on to say that if the railways could not operate economically we should integrate our transportation system and if necessary subsidize the railways. I was not changing my position in any respect, as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I should like to express a few thoughts on this subject before this discussion concludes. I was disappointed indeed in the remarks of the Minister of Transport this afternoon. He gave a fairly good résumé of the applications of the railways for increased rates, but certainly he did not indicate any solution whatever for the problem facing this country, except to agree with the tremendous increase of some 45 per cent that has been granted. In effect he also agreed with the increased discrimination which has been created against the maritimes and the prairie provinces. He agrees with the continuation of this discrimination, which is making it very difficult for people in those areas to maintain themselves. The unfair differential in freight rates has placed the western provinces in a very serious position. Therefore I must agree entirely with the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition.

I am not quite so sure as the hon. member for Cape Breton South that the board of transport commissioners is so efficient; therefore I am not so enthusiastic about supporting his subamendment. I must say I have not very much confidence in a board which, having been in existence for so long and having investigated this problem so thoroughly, has permitted this great discrimination to continue for all these years. Particularly does my confidence in the board fail in the face of these tremendous increases in freight rates, which have been permitted in spite of the fact that the western provinces protested so vigorously.

I want to deal with this subject from a little different angle than those who have spoken previously. In my view the railways, as disclosed in their submissions to the royal commission—and I am referring now to the presentation made by the C.P.R.—were not so much interested in solving the difficulties presented by these tremendous increases and this discrimination as in showing that the trucking industry, their only effective competitor in western Canada at least, should be driven out of the field, though by their own actions the railways are pricing themselves out of competition. The fact is that they are now attempting to do away with competition and establish a monopoly in the field of transportation, and that is the phase with which I want to deal more particularly this afternoon.

I do not believe anyone would contend for a moment that the railways are not a national asset, or that they should not be kept in a sound position. As has been indicated many times this afternoon, the railways are intended to serve all Canada, and if they are to carry out that function they must be maintained in a strong position. That does not mean, however, that the railways should be maintained in a favoured position or that they should be permitted to drive out their only competitors and have the field to themselves. As I pointed out on another occasion in this house the people in central Canada have more or less effective competition in the form of water transportation. Even those living in British Columbia obtain the benefits of water competition. Rail rates are rising so rapidly that General Motors are using the only effective competition against the railways and are sending their automobiles by trailer trucks to Montreal, then by boat through the Panama canal to British Columbia, thereby saving more than $80 per automobile. That is effective competition, and as a result British Columbia is in a position to get a more favourable rate structure than those in the prairie provinces or the maritimes.

The only effective competition we have in western Canada is provided by trucks; and in their presentations to the royal commission the railways did everything they could to get rid of that competition. As a matter of fact the greater part of their presentations was directed to that point. One must not take the position that the railways are a private enterprise, for such is not the case. My remarks apply particularly to the C.P.R., and I would point out that the greater part of the presentation to the royal commission was made by that company. They were the puppets who were carrying the ball for the Canadian National and the government, so it was up to them to make the presentation, which they did somewhat reluctantly. These railways have not built themselves up to their present position solely by their own efforts. I think hon. members of this house should be reminded of that. A great deal of assistance has been given to the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National as well.

In 1873 there was a grant of 50 million acres of land to the Canadian Pacific. The oil and mineral rights went along with that grant, and will become extremely profitable before very long. On top of that land grant, as the member for Rosetown-Biggar pointed out this afternoon, there were tremendous cash grants given to both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. These railways have been built up to their present status by these large grants of land and cash. In addition to that, the railways have received a large amount in subsidies. I should like to refer to subsidies for a moment. I am not against the principle of subsidizing the railways where necessary. I am just using this as an illustration to show that the railways have been subsidized to a great extent. There is a subsidy on one commodity which they use, and that is coal.

I have in my hand, Mr. Chairman, a report from the Canadian coal board. It gives a breakdown of the subsidies on coal received by the Canadian Pacific. With the permission of the house I should like to put this memorandum on Hansard, but before I do so I want to refer to it. These are the subvention payments made to the Canadian Pacific railway. In the calendar year 1939, there was no breakdown on coal for the railway's use, nor was there a breakdown on coal for domestic and industrial use. The total amount paid that year was $954,765.35. In the year 1940 there was no breakdown under those headings I have mentioned, and the total amount paid was $1,005,386.51. In 1941 there was no breakdown, but the total was $1,505,576.03. In 1942 there was no breakdown, but the total was $1,051,168.01. For 1943 there was no breakdown, but the total was $125,018.93. In 1944 there was a breakdown, and the subsidy paid to the Canadian Pacific on coal for their own use was $15,238.21; for domestic and industrial use it was $62,905.49, making a total of $78,143.70. In 1945, on coal for the railway's use the subsidy amounted to $97,997.83; on coal for domestic and industrial use it was $570,709.81, making a total for the year of $668,707.64. In 1946, on coal for railway use it was $156,752.55; on coal for domestic and industrial use, $577,736.08, making a total of $734,488.63. In 1947, on coal for railway use, it was $13,819.72; on coal for domestic and industrial use, $188,353.32, making a total of $202,173.04. In 1948, on coal for railway use it was $29,611.16; on coal for domestic and industrial use, it was $187,901.39, making a total of $219.512.55. This gives a total subsidy on coal for railway use at the end of 1948 of $313,619.47; on coal for domestic and industrial use, $1,487,606.09, making a total of $6,443,140.39.

This may seem to be a tremendous amount, but I am going to give the figures for 1949 to show how these subsidies to the Canadian Pacific have increased. The railway has been receiving a subsidy on coal for its own use, thus lowering its cost of operation. I do not know of any other industry to which a subsidy is granted to lower its cost of operation. May I say that these 1949 figures are subject to adjustment, because the board tells me the final figure is not available as yet, but this is as close to being accurate as they can get at the moment. The subsidy on coal for the railway's own use in this last year amounted to $231,642.56; on coal for domestic and industrial use, $233,975.09, making a total of $465,617.65. It will be noticed that the subsidy paid to the Canadian Pacific for hauling coal for domestic and industrial use was just about the same amount that was paid to the Canadian Pacific for hauling coal for its own use.

Mr. Chairman, before I start another branch of my argument, may I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

[Mr. Johnston.]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. Matthew MacLean (for Mr. Winkler) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 253, for the relief of Margaret Mary Hamel Whittaker.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 254, for the relief of Lewis Benjamin Wyman.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 255, for the relief of Edna Dora Tucker Conley.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 256, for the relief of Dorothy Marguerite Lester McBride.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 257, for the relief of Josephine Rood Trottier.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 258, for the relief of Margaret Irene Sinden Brown.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 259, for the relief of Camille Poulin.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 260, for the relief of Elisa Macdonald Mitchell Brock.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 261, for the relief of Theodore Levasseur.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 262, for the relief of Mary Marguerite Harvie Fine.—Mr. Winkler.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Gagnon: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Carried on division.

Motion agreed to on division and bills read the second time.

CANADA DAY ACT

SUBSTITUTION OF WORD "CANADA" FOR WORD "DOMINION"

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane) for the second reading of Bill No. 4, respecting Canada day.

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words on this bill. As I understand it, the intention of the bill is to change the name of our national day from "Dominion day" to "Canada day". I have heard no real reason given for this change; neither have I heard any definite reason against the idea that would appeal to me. I would prefer to wait until the public mind in the country is more in unison on this particular matter. That is, I would not like to see the name of our national birthday changed without there being unison or practical unanimity in the whole matter.

A year or two ago a similar bill passed this house, but it was killed in the other place. I did not have anything to do with parliament at that time, but I did follow the discussion that took place. The bill met with a considerable amount of opposition in this house, and with almost unanimous opposition in the other place, which is a clear indication to me that public opinion on the question is not close enough to unanimity to justify our passing it at this time, unless there has been a tremendous change in the feeling of the people of the country in the meantime.

So far as I am personally concerned, Mr. Speaker, I would be in favour of the bill if I felt that the people of Canada desired the change. I do not mean a hundred per cent, but if eighty or eighty-five per cent of the people desired this change I would certainly vote for a bill of this kind.

The words "Dominion of Canada", of course, have no legal significance either in the British North America Act or in any other act of this country. In dealing with the matter the British North America Act of 1867 put it this way:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, to declare by proclamation that, on and after a day therein appointed, not being more than six months after the passing of this act, the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick shall form and be one dominion under the name of Canada; and on and after that day those three provinces shall form and be one dominion under that name accordingly.

Section 5 reads:

> Canada shall be divided into four provinces, named Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

There is the creation of Canada, not the Dominion of Canada. That was forcibly brought to my attention for the first time, though I never took any particular interest in the matter, on learning that when Sir Robert Borden—and no more staunch Britisher and no greater Canadian ever occupied the proud position of prime minister of this country than the same Sir Robert Borden—came to sign the treaty of Versailles, which was perhaps the first act of a wholly Canadian plenipotentiary, he did not sign it for the Dominion of Canada but for Canada. That was the first time it ever came to my attention that there was no such name by statute or otherwise as the Dominion of Canada.

I could go on and give various other examples of the same thing. However, by statute there is a Dominion day. It was in 1879, I think, that an act of parliament was passed which first introduced Dominion day, and this is the preamble and part of the act:

> Whereas it was on the first day of July that the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick became one dominion under the name of Canada; and
>
> Whereas Rupert's land and the northwestern territory and the province of British Columbia became part of the dominion in the month of July, and Prince Edward Island became part of the dominion on the first day of July; and
>
> Whereas it is expedient that such important events should be commemorated:
> Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows.

Then they created our national holiday, Dominion day. It will be noted that it makes reference there to the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada, not to the Dominion of Canada. As a matter of fact between 1867 and 1879 July 1 had always been commemorated as our national birthday. That was brought to the attention of the house at the time the act was passed, in 1879, by the Hon. David Mills, who said that Dominion day was, he believed, universally kept as a holiday; at least it was in western Canada; but it was not kept under the authority of any act of parliament.

I am not one who thinks that the changing of Dominion day to Canada day would make us any less British or any more Canadian. I do not think it would create any breach in the historic links that join us with the great mother country. I do not think that it would in any way make a breach in the long history of this country, since 1867; nor would it in my humble opinion impress any one man in this broad dominion with the idea that because this change had taken place we had become less British and more Canadian. I say that because I do not think that we in Canada today can become much more Canadian than we have been for the last thirty, forty or fifty years.

My reason for wishing to see a change in the birthday of Canada is that, notwithstanding the provisions of the British North America Act, I do not think that we are any longer a dominion. We belong to a great commonwealth of nations, and with the same sovereignty I hope—sometimes I doubt it, of course—that the United Kingdom has.

I should think that Confederation day would be a far more appropriate name than would Canada day, and it would also take away any sting from the minds of those who are imbued with the idea that, because we want to call this day Canada day, we are going to be separated from the great mother country.

In this matter there cannot be said to be any flying in the face of tradition. How can we fly in the face of tradition by changing this day? Personally I cannot see how we could. Tradition is something based on a long series of historic events, brought down to us, perhaps not by the written word, but by various acts of omission, and more often acts of commission. These are incorporated into our country, not by the written word but by other means.

There is nothing in the traditions of this country that would be violated by changing the name from Dominion day to Canada day. There is nothing in this change which in any way would tend to separate us further from the great British traditions which we have held in the past and which I hope we shall always hold.

Having in mind that this question might be discussed, during the recess I visited various high schools in the city of Halifax and in my own constituency. On those occasions I discussed with the teachers and pupils in the higher grades this idea of Dominion versus Canada, or Canada versus Dominion. These were intelligent children in the tenth and eleventh grades which, in the old days, was looked upon as a higher educational grading. They knew their history well, although they did not know Canadian history, I am sorry to say, as well as they knew that of foreign countries. When I say that, I mean they did not have a background of the traditional history of this country to the point one might have liked to see. However, I never suggested to these boys and girls why I was discussing the matter with them.

While speaking to them I asked whether they did not feel it would be better to describe our national birthday as Canada day rather than Dominion day. The general answer seemed to be along this line, "Well, we know what Dominion day is and, in our short lives, we have always celebrated it on July 1. We cannot see why we should now change and call it Canada day." That was the reaction indicated in about three of the schools I visited.

In two other schools, teaching pre-university eleventh and twelfth grades, I found two or three exceptionally bright and intelligent boys who, perhaps, were under a false impression as to the meaning of Empire day. It was their view that if there were going to be any change in the designation of July 1 it should be known as Empire day. I pointed out to them at once that we already had an Empire day. Their reply was that they knew that, but they felt this description of our national birthday would have the effect of cementing the links already existing between Canada and Great Britain.

I may be told that I did not choose a satisfactory source for advice on a matter of this kind. My reply would be that from many of those children I got a good deal of better advice—much of which I am not giving to the house this evening—than I could have given if I had been asked questions on the same subject.

Having regard to what took place in the House of Commons two years ago, and also having regard to the opposition I understand this measure will meet on this occasion, my impression would be that perhaps we are somewhat premature in attempting to pass the bill. Because, when it comes to a matter of this kind, while it may not have any direct bearing on our relationship with the mother country, there are some aspects of the matter that might be considered in that light. In my view any change we make, whether along patriotic lines or otherwise, in the relations between Canada and the United Kingdom should have behind it a greater approximation to unanimity among members of the House of Commons, and throughout the country. I am in hopes that some time in the future a bill similar to this will meet with the unanimous approval of this house.

I think it was the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Cote) who brought this matter to the attention of the house before. At that time he did get the approval of the house. Perhaps I will be pardoned for referring to the debates that took place at that time, but on looking them over it struck me there was a lot of confusion among members who were in the house at that time. I hope I am not insulting anybody when I say that. They seemed to be at cross purposes. One member would vote for the bill, and you would turn another page and find him voting against it. It seemed to me there was some political prejudice on the part of hon. members, perhaps on both sides of the house, but that would not be the fault of the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane.

That is the stand I take on this bill. If it comes to a vote the probabilities are that I will vote for the bill because I see no reason for voting against it. At the same time I think the bill is premature. The people of this country are not just in a state of mind at the present time to adopt legislation such as this and for that reason I hope the hon. member will withdraw his bill.

Mr. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote against this bill. I shall not delay the house very long to say what I want to say. Perhaps I can say to the hon. member who has just spoken and to my hon. friend who with the best intentions in the world has moved this motion that there is no more united nation on earth than the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Carroll: I never suggested anything else.

Mr. Mitchell: I was not referring to my hon. friend; I was referring to the mover of the motion. I am British in the broadest sense of the word since my grandfather was a Frenchman on my mother's side, and on my father's side Irish. If you want anything better than that, take a look around you. I have travelled throughout the British commonwealth of nations and I have listened to crackpots who talk about empires. I have watched what the British people have done, and I speak again in the broadest sense of the word.

Our people have given the world a system of fairness and decency possessed by no other country since the dawn of history. The other day we listened to the Prime Minister of Pakistan pay a tribute to the family of nations. I think I am one of the few hon. members who have been to Pakistan and I know that tribute was well deserved. We have unity among all the racial groups that go to make up this great dominion. Recently I was in the state of Virginia and I noticed that they still call it the dominion of Virginia and they have a dominion network of radio stations. In Massachusetts where they tossed the tea into the harbour, where they said they would not have taxation without representation, they still call it the commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): They had a tea party there.

Mr. Mitchell: That may sound strange to your ears, but they had a tea party. There has been a lot of loose talk about the crown, but I have found that the older you get the more sense you have. Of course some grown-up people still believe in fairies and Christmas trees like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who quoted Brock Chisholm the other day. I liked fairies and Christmas trees when I was a youngster and my children liked them and looked forward to Christmas. I think the world would be better off without the Brock Chisholms.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mitchell: Looking over the world today you find that wherever there is a limited monarchy such as in Sweden, Norway, Holland, Belgium, Denmark and Great Britain you find a regeneration after the devastation of the last war which is unexcelled by most countries. It is one of those things that cannot be explained, but perhaps it is due to the leadership that is given, to the principles of decency that are practised. The crown today in its very essence represents decency in the life of the nation.

I think we are most fortunate in the British commonwealth in having a King and Queen who reflect the best there is in British life. I have often said that the province of my hon. friend may be the sheet anchor of freedom some day in the future.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): It is not a question of talk.

Mr. Mitchell: It is a question of common sense.

An hon. Member: He has none.

Mr. Mitchell: It is a question of vision, of taking the long view rather than the short view just for political reasons. As I say, that province may some day be the sheet anchor of freedom if things continue to travel the way they may well travel in this very difficult period in which we are living. I simply wanted to pay a tribute to our institutions, to our federal form of government, to our judiciary, to our school system, to our transportation system, to all the great things that this nation has built up in the last four or five hundred years. I say that without any mental reservation whatsoever.

I like the word "dominion". I hope I shall never live to see the day when we do not belong to the great family of nations known as the British commonwealth of nations. Every hon. member knows that during the zenith of its power there was very little trouble in the world. I think the world will be a better place in which to live if we still maintain and insist in this struggle between two ideologies that the dominions retain their contact with the crown. I am not going into a theoretical exposition of that matter, although I could. I hope the house will vote the motion down. If I am the only member to vote against it I am going to vote against it.

Mr. Harkness: You will have plenty of support.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Like the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) I intend to be very brief. When this bill was before the house a few years ago I voted for it, and I still like the idea. But it is apparent that the chances of such a bill being dealt with and voted on in the limited time allotted to public bills are very slim. It is also apparent that if the bill were to come to a vote tonight it would in all likelihood be defeated, after the speech just made by the Minister of Labour. It seems to me that there is something to be said for the position that we should not make important changes like this in the one hour allotted to private and public bills, or even in two hours as might be the case considering that this measure was up once before.

On the other hand I always feel uneasy when the result of that argument is that a worthy idea is talked out or defeated altogether. I think the best thing that could be done for this bill and the idea that it contains would be to refer the subject matter to a committee of the house so that it might be discussed further. It is for that purpose that I propose to move the appropriate amendment. Before I do so, may I say that I fully realize the amendment I shall be moving has the effect of suspending any further consideration of the bill itself at this session. Nevertheless it will permit discussion of the subject matter of the bill by the committee to which the subject matter is referred. I can say to the hon. member who is the sponsor of the bill that I was greatly annoyed in 1947 when a bill of mine was treated in this manner, but I must say that in 1948 the subject matter of the bill which was treated that way in 1947 was incorporated in one of the statutes of Canada, namely the federal labour code. Annoying though these procedures may seem at times to the sponsor of a bill, it is not all bad. It can produce discussion and possibly some progress. With that explanation I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge):

That Bill No. 4 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. Ralph Maybank (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise only to ask you for instruction and assistance. I was on the point of saying what I am about to say before the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) moved the amendment. Point No. 1 is that I do not wish to leave my seat and go into the lobby when the vote comes. Point No. 2 is that I have not any opinion that I consider it worth while to register by voting one way or the other upon either the amendment or the bill itself. I do not really care very much whether we are called "Canada" or "Dominion of Canada". The word "dominion" joined with Canada does not indicate to me dominion over us or domination of us by some power outside of this country. It is my recollection that the name came to be given to us by reason of one of the fathers of confederation recalling a biblical phrase with reference to God having dominion from sea to sea. That is how the term came into common use. As long as there is great loyalty and complete unity of the people, as long as we are working to make this country more widely known as the great country it is, I do not care whether we call it "Dominion of Canada" or "Canada". I do not wish to leave my seat and go out into the lobby when the vote comes. Would you be good enough to instruct me as to what I should do, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I do not think my opinion is worth registering one way or the other?

Mr. A. Phileas Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker I should like to refer to what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank). I want to point out to him that he has made a slight mistake. The first of July is not Dominion of Canada day; it is Dominion day. Which dominion is it? What dominion is it that celebrates the first of July? It is not Dominion of Canada day; it is Dominion day. For many years we have been a dominion in the British empire, and now it is called the commonwealth of nations. I suggest to a lawyer of the calibre of my hon. friend that there is a slight difference between dominion and Dominion of Canada so far as definition is concerned.

Mr. Maybank: One is shorter than the other.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Yes, and more simple, just as my hon. friend is. I will not quarrel with the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll), a former judge in Nova Scotia. He is a learned judge and he has told the house what it is all about. Days ago we had a discussion about this measure and it was talked out. We had a few arguments about it also. I will not even quarrel with the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Mitchell). I know his sentimental nature and that he could not be otherwise. Let us come back to reason. I have no intention of offering any further arguments in connection with the bill. When I proposed it I thought it was for the benefit of Canada so that Canada would have the proper sign on the door within Canada and the proper sign outside Canada. Dominion day does not mean anything. Any man who has travelled throughout Canada and outside the country will know that the words "Dominion day" do not identify our national holiday. I say to the hon. member for Welland that we should at least have a definition of the day. Of course the hon. member from Nova Scotia who defended the Senate a few days ago took somewhat the same line that the Senate took when the bill was passed by this house and they spoke for about five months on whether it should be called "Canada day" at a cost of several hundred thousand dollars. They were ashamed of the name of their own country. Finally they came along with an amendment, but they did not send it back to this house in time to give us an opportunity to analyse it. I am not going to be one of those who support that kind of thing. I would prefer to go back home and look at my garden.

This is a very simple question, which is a fundamental principle of democracy and our parliamentary institutions. We passed that bill here and sent it over to the other place. They played with it for several weeks; they laughed at us—

Mr. Brooks: No wonder.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): My hon. friend says it is no wonder. It is no wonder he is in the minority. We have had an election since then, and my hon. friend is not on this side of Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Brooks: I do not want to be as long as you are there.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): If we pass a bill here on its merits, and give it three readings all in the one day, in the other house they should at least respect the vote of the people. After all, we are elected by the people and they are not. This is the principle. We have to decide—we, the commoners of this parliament—whether when we pass a law we believe in it, or whether we are to leave it in the hands of those in the other place and have them hold us up to ridicule before our electors and the world.

Canada Day

Mr. Speaker: At the moment I am having a little difficulty in deciding whether or not the amendment is in order. Standing order 63 reads in part as follows:

> At the commencement of each session, a special committee, consisting of five members, shall be appointed, whose duty it shall be to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the following standing committees of the house:
> (c) On miscellaneous private bills, to consist of fifty members, fifteen of whom shall constitute a quorum.

Has the committee on miscellaneous private bills any power to consider a public bill of this nature? I doubt it very much; and unless I am persuaded to the contrary I think I must rule the amendment out of order.

The question is on the main motion.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Cote, Matapedia-Matane) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Mitchell: Because I have some sense; that is why.

Mr. Speaker: The hour reserved for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume consideration of the matter under discussion at six o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada—

524. Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada —administration, maintenance and operation, $624,800.

Mr. Johnston: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was endeavouring to show how the railways, through their subsidies, were in a preferred position as compared with their competitors in the field of transportation. I want to refer to another instance in which the railways have preference over other types of transport, thus giving them a further advantage. In 1949 an order in council was passed, P.C. 8303, which altered the subsidy previously given to railways, steamships and trucks in the hauling of western feed grains and mill feeds to eastern Canada. By this order in council, P.C. 8303, a change was brought about in that subsidy whereby, if western feeds, western grains, and mill feeds were transported by rail they received a subsidy of $5.50; if hauled by water they received a subsidy of $4.15, but if hauled by truck the subsidy was withheld entirely. The evidence is clear in that case too that the railways, through government action, were given a very preferred position over that of trucks, and once again we find the government protecting their own railway business by government legislation.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we have the increase in freight rates granted to the railways just recently by the board of transport commissioners amounting to some 45 per cent, which in effect increases the revenue of the railway. I am not saying whether that increase is justified or not, but it does undoubtedly put the railways in a preferred position.

On reviewing the evidence of the commission in regard to freight rates, the thing that struck me was that no endeavour was made to find out if there was an excess of overhead charges. It appears that any time the railways find themselves in difficulties, so far as revenue is concerned, all they have to do is to come to the government and apply for an increase in freight rates; and because one of the railways is government owned they have no trouble in getting all the increases they require. That is not true of the other competitors in this field of transportation.

As I indicated on another occasion, it was pointed out in the public accounts committee by one of the members of that committee that the over-all policy of the government was to give all their freight haulage to the railways or to water transport, and very little if any was to be given to trucks. That evidence seems to be borne out in all the things that I have indicated so far in my argument.

The railways are put in a preferred position by other government legislation. The house will remember that in 1938 legislation was passed which gave the railways the right to make agreed charges with business concerns which had freight to haul. That is, the railways could contract at a certain price to haul all or a portion of that company's freight, and thus the trucks were prevented from getting any of that business. Government legislation again gave the railways a very preferred position. I point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that several pieces of government legislation have discriminated against every other competitor of the railways so far as western Canada is concerned. This does not just merely happen; it is the policy of the government. There is no question about that, because they are the ones that are responsible for this legislation.

After the agreed charges were brought down, the judicial committee of the privy council recently decided that the effect of an agreed charge on the objecting carriers business and revenue is a relevant consideration for the transport board. The approval of an agreed charge has been withheld when it was shown to be unduly prejudicial to a water carrier who had participated in the carriage of a traffic and resulted in an undue or unfair advantage.

The Transport Act of 1938 gives to carriers by water and by air an opportunity to defend themselves but denies such an opportunity to carriers by motor vehicle.

There again, Mr. Chairman, we find that the board of transport commissioners very definitely make it impossible for motor transportation to take an appeal to that board no matter how unjust the action may be. It certainly goes without question that once again by legislation the government has placed facilities at the disposal of the railways and to the detriment of the only form of competitive transportation we have in western Canada, namely, the motor truck.

A while ago in regard to trucking I mentioned the national parks. I believe it was yesterday we talked about this matter when the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) assured me that when the trans-Canada highway was built through national parks the highway would be made available to trucks hauling through those parks, and not only through Banff but through Jasper, Yoho and the Kootenays.

Up to the present time through transportation by way of these parks has been absolutely forbidden. The Minister of Resources and Development pointed out that that was a regulation by the parks management themselves. However, when one understands that the national parks are under the control of the dominion government, then there can be no doubt about it that the order comes directly from this government.

There could be no more effective way of turning that entire transport business over to the railways than by barring trucks from passing through our national parks. That is exactly what was done in western Canada. All that business went to the railways. In effect it put a stop to all motor transport business between Alberta and British Columbia. Once again we find the government interfering with private enterprise in favour of its own government-owned railway.

It is contemplated that the trans-Canada highway may take seven years before it is completed. One must keep in mind that that is a long time for the railways to possess a further monopoly on those transportation facilities. As the trans-Canada highway is now being proceeded with the railways are becoming more concerned than ever about their competitors. They are not trying to compete, in the ordinary sense that one branch of free enterprise competes with another. They are not trying to reform their transportation business so as to bring it up to date. No; they are trying to drive out their competitors so that they will have the field completely to themselves.

As the legal representative of the province of Alberta stated before the royal commission, the day that motor transports are put off the road in favour of the railways, on that very day we will see an increase in freight rates in western Canada. And, believe me, that is only too true.

What is the purpose of building the trans-Canada highway? The purpose is twofold; one is to convey tourists from one side of Canada to the other, and the other is to have a highway which will serve for truck transportation as well. The Minister of Resources and Development indicated the other day that that was the purpose for which this highway was being built. Of course, no sensible person would take issue with that. However, it would seem that the Department of Transport is not of that view. While I am speaking about the trans-Canada highway, and its relation to freight, may I read a portion of an editorial which appeared in the Western Producer of May 4, 1950. It has this to say:

> Course of the highway across the west was never a very important issue, really. The big question was not where, but when the road would be built.

And then later:

> It will be a strong link between the industrial east and the agricultural west and constitute a sound beachhead on the trade and geographic barrier separating the two. From the standpoint of national defence, the highway is imperative now that Canada is at the crossroads of world history.

The editorial points out that when this road is built it will constitute a sound beachhead on the trade and geographic barriers separating the east from the west. But if the railways had their way, certainly no such beachhead would be established; because it is only too well known that if it had not been for the railways trying to maintain a monopoly on the transportation of freight the trans-Canada highway would have been built years ago. I give the Minister of Resources and Development all the praise coming to him for pressing forward this work. It has been held too long in abeyance in order to help the privileged few.

Let us take note of the difference in the attitude taken by the United States government in the matter of highway traffic. It is true, as was pointed out this afternoon by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), that freight rates in the United States are higher than they are in Canada. But that country is certainly taking the opposite view so far as general transportation is concerned, and in its attitude toward free enterprise, because not only are they encouraging truck transportation, but they are building express highways for the purpose of the greater and faster movement of freight by highways. The railways are forced to compete with those highways.

I say that if our railways cannot compete in rendering a service at as reasonable a rate as is offered by motor transport, then they had better get out of the business because, if that is so, they are certainly becoming outmoded.

When the railways were presenting their evidence before the royal commission they made four general statements in regard to transportation. The first was that they wanted an amendment to the British North America Act to give to the federal government complete control over the highways. Now, what would be the purpose of the railways in wanting to turn over to the federal government the complete management of the highways? They know, without question, that that problem would be turned over to the board of transport commissioners and that then, as now, all the favours would go to the railways in order that they might maintain their complete monopoly.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Johnston: I would just as soon you would wait. You will have another opportunity, and the time at my disposal is passing rapidly. In this connection I wish to quote from the Calgary Herald of December 15, 1949, to show that I am not the only one expressing this view. They say this in an editorial:

George A. Walker, chairman of the Canadian Pacific Railway, has suggested federal control of the highway trucking industry as one solution of the railways' difficulties. He has made this suggestion in the C.P.R.'s submission to the royal commission on transportation.

While we must accept the fact that the growth of truck competition is giving the railways cause for serious concern, we cannot agree with Mr. Walker that state regulation is the answer. It seems to us that a great number of other questions must be answered first.

It is customary for the railways to point out in this controversy—which, incidentally, has been going on for years—that while they move over permanent way which they have to maintain themselves at great expense, trucks move over highways which are built by the taxpayer. Therefore, they argue, trucks have a commanding competitive position.

But it seems to us that the question raised by this contention is not whether the state ought to regulate the trucking business, but whether trucks are paying their fair share of licence fees towards highway maintenance. So far as we know, very little serious research has been done into this problem.

If a heavy truck does more damage to highway surfaces in a year than is covered by its licence fee, then clearly that fee ought to be raised. There is no reason why trucks should be subsidized either by private motorists or by the general taxpayer.

May I interrupt there to say that they are not subsidized, but the railways are. The editorial continues:

But until it is established that trucks are being subsidized, it would be wrong to make any unsupported assumptions.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Now it is true that truck transport is often cheaper (and more convenient) than rail transport. Assuming that trucks pay their fair share of highway maintenance, this can only mean that for certain purposes truck transport is economically more efficient than rail transport.

And if this is so, there is no excuse whatever for regulating it into a position of lower efficiency—and that, whether we like it or not, would be the immediate effect of any control which forced trucks to charge as much as railways for carrying freight.

On some branch lines, and in some categories of freight, the railways apparently find it impossible to compete with trucks owing to their large fixed charges. There is no doubt that a healthy railway system is essential to the Canadian economy, but that cannot change the fact that where trucks can carry goods more cheaply and just as efficiently as railways, then trucks should get the business.

If, for strategic reasons, it is considered necessary to keep certain lines open despite the fact that they lose money in peacetime, then they should be maintained honestly and openly by direct subsidy as a charge against defence expenditures. But we do not see where further state control is going to help anybody.

May I endorse that statement as my own. I go on to the second submission by the railway which was: Eliminate highway services between railway points. That would have a terrible effect upon transportation particularly in western Canada. It would mean that trucks would not be able to operate between Calgary and Edmonton, between Edmonton and the Peace river, between Regina and Saskatoon, between Toronto and Montreal or between Toronto and other points in Ontario. If that suggestion were followed it would mean that the railways would have a complete monopoly.

Then it is suggested that trucks should be restricted to hauls between 50 and 100 miles. When I was speaking the other day I indicated that that was the government's view as well and once again we see the Canadian Pacific carrying the ball for the government and the Canadian National.

The fourth submission was to eliminate highway subsidies by increasing user taxes. It seems to me that there the railway is getting into the realm of nazi dictatorship. What greater dictatorship would you want than evidence that they are trying to force their competitors out of business by increasing taxes on motor transport when at the same time they receive a government subsidy? The insinuation there is that trucks do not pay their way, but I should like to quote from an address by Mr. G. M. Parke, president of the Automotive Transport Association of Ontario Incorporated. The figures I intend to quote were taken from the statistics of the department of highways of Ontario so they must be correct. I quote:

Last year, commercial vehicles represented 18 per cent of the vehicles on our highways yet paid more than 50 per cent of the licence fees and in the neighbourhood of 40 per cent of the gas tax.

A study made two years ago revealed that the owners of public commercial vehicles, although operating less than one per cent of the vehicles on our highways, paid approximately $6 million in licence fees and gas tax, or nearly 14 per cent of the total revenue collected by department of highways for 1947.

On the over-all picture of highway financing, department of highways statistics for the past ten years disclose receipts of $52 million in excess of the expenditure of $350,747,000. This expenditure not only included subsidies of some $77 million paid to counties, townships and towns and villages, as well as $4 million for roads in unincorporated townships and development roads under section IVB of the highway improvement act, but the complete cost of constructing and maintaining King's highways and development roads. A shining example is the construction of the Red lake road. The cost of $6,500,000 was paid out of current receipts.

That highway taxes in Ontario have been more than sufficient for the construction and maintenance of our fine highways is unquestionable. Suffice to say, commercial vehicle owners, paying close to 50 per cent of current highway costs, are more than paying their fair share.

The Deputy Chairman: I must inform the hon. member that he has exhausted his time.

Mr. Johnston: I am not able to conclude what I want to say on this occasion but later on I shall try to analyse the mental processes of the Minister of Transport in respect to competition with the railways and try to prove that they are in a very preferred position. I shall try to prove also that it is the intention of the government, particularly the Department of Transport, to eliminate all competition with the railways.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Does the hon. member regard the Big Bend route for the trans-Canada highway as being in the national interest?

Mr. Johnston: That question could more properly be directed to the Minister of Resources and Development because he is spending $25,000 on a survey of that route. I could suggest quite a few changes, and that would be one of them.

(Translation):

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Chairman, the question of freight rates is causing a great deal of comment. However today's discussion has not clarified the situation to a very great extent. It has provided an opportunity for our Conservative friends to move a vote of confidence in the government.

This rate problem seems to have originated with the history of this country, and it has certainly widespread ramifications throughout the whole economic structure of this nation.

The western provinces, at least this is what I understood from the remarks of the hon. member from Lake Centre, have complained of discrimination, unfairness and injustice. The Canadian National can hardly meet its obligations on account of the tottering financial structure it has inherited from our successive governments and our political fancies. The Canadian Pacific, a private concern that makes every effort to provide the best service possible, can barely stand the competition of a government subsidized railway.

Our economic structure is therefore shaken and at times has difficulty in keeping its balance because of all the problems created by this situation.

This afternoon, the member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) gave a short historical account of freight rates in western Canada. It seems they originated with the Crowsnest pass agreement, which goes back to 1897, I think, when certain maximum rates were set and guaranteed for the transport of grain and flour. Other conditions, for instance rates covering the transport of other commodities, were connected with this agreement.

As I see it, the agreement came about because western Canada had no choice in the matter of transport facilities, and was anxious to prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway from asking for a subsequent increase in its freight rates. On the other hand, those ceilings allowed the western provinces to ship a commodity vitally important to them. The rates set by the agreement have always been agreed to by the majority of the Canadian people, at the time of that decision as well as today.

This afternoon, the hon. member for Lake Centre championed the cause of all those who favour the maximum rates set in the agreement. I wish to remind him that around 1918 the Conservative party wanted to put aside that agreement and substitute therefor the authority of the board of transport commissioners. He seemed to have a good memory this afternoon. However, I would like to put on the record a brief account of what happened between 1922 and 1925 in connection with this problem. The following excerpt is taken from page 189 of the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, volume II—that is the Rowell-Sirois commission. I quote:

Between those who thought the Crowsnest Pass Agreement Act (which antedated the bill creating the board of railway commissioners by six years) should be repealed, leaving freight rates in the west to be fixed by the railways subject to appeals to the board, and those who held that these rates should be continued as a protection to an area which was not favoured with water competition, a conflict began in 1922 which was fought out in special parliamentary committees, in cases before the board of railway commissioners, in references to the supreme court, in appeals to the governor in council and in parliament itself. In the result, the principle that it was proper for parliament to put statutory limits to the powers of the railway commission was clearly established by the retention in the order in council of June 5, 1925, of the grain and flour provisions of the Crowsnest pass agreement.

Today, the Conservative party requests the abolition of the commission and poses as the great champion of the agreement that owes its survival to the Liberal party.

Naturally, in view of his party's previous position, I am only mildly interested in the invitation of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) to support his amendment.

It will be seen, therefore, that since 1925 freight rates for grain and flour have remained the same and recent increases could not be brought into effect.

We are faced here with an important question. Whenever a preferential rate is provided for certain goods in the lower classes, should not freight rates on goods in the higher classes compensate for the loss sustained in the first case? I merely want to point out the matter now and will refer to it again in a moment.

At the other end of the country, that is to say, in the maritimes, new rates have been brought into effect under the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

The central provinces, that is Quebec and Ontario, seeing these means of transportation grow with amazing rapidity, were, in turn, faced with a problem, since competition began to appear between the various forms of transportation.

It was then that the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. were forced to revise their rates in order to meet this competition. Certain adjustments had to be made, which caused the maritimes to lose the advantage that the 20 per cent reduction had originally brought them.

There obtained then, in some regions, conditions which were bound to affect the economic stability of a group of provinces, endangered by the competition which had arisen in the central provinces, which were bound by an agreement with another part of the country where a maximum price was imposed because of the greater volume of transportable goods. It was therefore not easy to find a formula satisfactory to Canadians of all regions, without imposing too heavy a burden on the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in order to maintain the railway system which Canada now enjoys.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, if there is a special rate for a certain class of commodities, it is only normal that another class of commodities should compensate for the loss incurred. Otherwise, the government would be forced to subsidize the railways in order to compensate for the loss in revenue they would necessarily sustain. Then, who is going to assume these responsibilities? I have often heard that Quebec and Ontario are paying their substantial share.

I am asked if I have anything to suggest. Yes, I have something to suggest, though it is something which does not agree with the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition. As a matter of fact, the board of transport commissioners, with all its experience, is in my estimation the organization which is most likely to bring about the best solution. Perhaps, it might be advisable that it should undergo certain changes, but it is out of the question that it should be dispensed with completely.

It seems that, as the years go by, the tendency is to equalize the freight rates in so far as certain higher grades of commodities are concerned. It seems also that there is now a tendency to grant special rates on primary products when the particular economy of a district is affected. If it is the decision of this government to relieve the situation by way of grants, why not add them to the maximum prices of these products? We would thus be killing two birds with one stone, helping at the same time the economy of the district concerned and that of our railways.

I have not carefully considered the various reasons put forth in favour of the horizontal increase in rates but, to my mind, it stems from the financial position of the railways.

The plight of the Canadian National, whose financial structure is heavily burdened by all sorts of commitments and in some cases crippled by extravagance, is daily growing worse. The Canadian Pacific, a private company, has to compete with a government enterprise and does not earn enough revenue to meet this competition.

Naturally, I am against any increase in freight rates but I have reason to believe that it is safer and wiser to await the findings of the royal commission before overthrowing, by a single vote, what generations have tried to build, in the past few decades, in the field of transportation.

I will not mention the C.C.F. amendment. It is, in effect, a motion of non-confidence in the government and I am not ready to accept their nationalization program that borders, if followed to its logical conclusion, on another doctrine which is not to my liking either.

(Text):

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, we have had a long discussion on freight rates today, and I do not intend to take much of the time of the committee. It is not my intention to discuss the merits or demerits of the amendment or the amendment to the amendment. Member after member has already discussed the incompetence of the board of transport commissioners. I will only say that if they are half as incompetent as the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar have accused them of being there is no reason why they should not go. I have heard railway rates discussed on many occasions in this chamber, and I took part when we were discussing the 21 per cent increase in freight rates in 1948. When it was instituted we of the maritime provinces did not oppose the increase as such, because we realized that railway rates had to be raised. What we did oppose was the method of the increase, and what we considered and believed was unjust discrimination against the maritime provinces. We felt then as we feel now, that increases in railway freight rates should be borne equally by all sections of the country and not as it is today.

There has been a 45 per cent increase since 1946. We believe that the horizontal method —and I think anyone who studies it will come to the same conclusion—discriminates against the people of the three maritime provinces as it does against the people of western Canada. It is something that should be corrected. I do not think the board of transport commissioners has been considering the matter of railway freight rates from the the broad point of view that it should take, but rather from what might be termed a dollar and cents point of view. I think railway rates should be considered from the point of view of the development of trade in all sections of the country, the geographical position in which different sections of the country find themselves, and more particularly, as I think was the case in the early days, in the spirit of confederation.

Railways and railway freight rates have been a most important consideration for the people of the maritime provinces from the days when this country first became the Dominion of Canada. As a matter of fact the economic existence of the three maritime provinces depended to a great extent on the railways and on cheap freight rates. One of the main conditions under which the maritime provinces came into confederation was that we would be given satisfactory railway transportation, and that we would also be given satisfactory freight rates. To indicate just how the present rates are considered in my own province I should like to read an article which appeared in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal of March 2, and which I think expresses it far better than I could:

Another Freight Rate Blow

The latest horizontal increase in railway freight rates, authorized yesterday by the board of transport commissioners, is another blow at the economy of this part of Canada. It will make it more difficult for New Brunswickers to do business, will aggravate the unemployment problem, and will tend to advance the cost of living.

The high cost of transportation has always been a burden on this region and a factor calculated to retard industrial development. And whenever the freight rates are advanced on a flat percentage basis the position of this province becomes worse.

That is the way they are being advanced at the present time.

That's because we are far from the country's largest markets and its main sources of raw materials, and are up against long rail hauls.

Percentage increases obviously bear more heavily on long haul than on short haul shippers. Then, too, in central Canada rail rates are held down to meet truck and water competition. In New Brunswick the railways do not face such competition nearly as much, and are thus not compelled to reduce rates to hold the traffic . . .

In hearing the railway applications for higher rates, the board of transport commissioners contended that it could not consider the economic implications from the standpoint of the various regions. It held that this was not within its jurisdiction.

That is what I said a few moments ago, that this matter was considered from the dollar and cents point of view and not from the broad point of view, as I think it should have been.

The royal commission on transportation, set up by the federal government to consider all phases of the freight rate issue, has wider powers. Our best hope now seems to be that this tribunal will find a more equitable way of distributing the freight rate burden, so that while the railways will get the revenue they need, undue hardship will not be imposed on all provinces but Ontario and Quebec. Certainly, horizontal rate increases are wrong in principle, and not in the best interests of Canada.

As I said a short time ago, Mr. Chairman, since the days of confederation we have realized that railways were one of our chief considerations. I shall not weary hon. members this evening with the history of the railway situation in the maritime provinces from the time of confederation, but I should like to mention just a few points. From 1867 to 1912 the maritime provinces were fairly well treated as far as freight rates were concerned. We in those provinces were left more or less to adjust our own freight rates. In 1912, however, when the Intercolonial railway was taken over, the first increase in rates was brought about. That increase amounted to 10 per cent, and I point out to hon. gentlemen that it applied in the maritime provinces only. In 1915 there was a 5 per cent increase, again only in the maritime provinces. Then in 1918 there was a 15 per cent increase, so the increases amounted to 30 per cent in a little over six years. The last increase, of course, applied to all Canada. These increases placed such an intolerable burden upon the economy of the maritime provinces that something had to be done. The condition was such that in 1925 members of parliament from the maritime provinces, Conservative and Liberal alike, joined in protest and presented to this house what was then called their claim for maritime rights. If I may say so, Mr. Chairman, I believe the action of the maritime province members in joining together in 1925 to urge what they felt were the rights of their provinces should set an example to the maritime province members of today. I hope all members from the maritimes will unite at this time to see if they cannot get our rights adjusted in this matter of rates.

The result of the agitation for maritime rights was the appointment in 1926 of what was known as the Duncan commission. Sir Andrew Rae Duncan as chairman made a survey of conditions in the maritime provinces and his commission made many recommendations, some of which have been implemented while others have not. I do not intend to go into those questions this evening, but as far as our railways were concerned it was recommended that this matter should be very carefully considered, and as a result a 20 per cent reduction on rail rates within the maritime provinces was brought about. The opinion is sometimes expressed in this house that this 20 per cent reduction in rail rates was given the maritime provinces because of the long rail haul, but that is not entirely true. After investigation, it was found that taking 100 as the index of operation at that time, the figure for the maritime provinces was 192 while the figure for the other parts of Canada was 155. So the 20 per cent reduction was not because of the long rail haul but because of this situation which had grown up over a period of years. It was also given us in order to encourage industry. We had lost much of our industry in the maritime provinces, and it was felt that if we were to compete with industry in other parts of Canada we must have some encouragement.

I was rather surprised to learn that there is some misunderstanding in New Brunswick in reference to this 20 per cent reduction, and particularly as to the submission that has been made to the royal commission on transportation. I understand the government of New Brunswick has recommended that the 20 per cent reduction under the Maritime Freight Rates Act, which now applies only to transportation within the provinces and west out of the provinces, should apply also to freight coming east into the maritimes. I have not sufficient information to say whether this should or should not be done; I believe there are strong arguments on each side. It does seem to me, however, a sad commentary on the situation in our province that the government should feel that the days of industry and manufacturing in New Brunswick must be almost over. Now we can say to the manufacturers in other parts of Canada, "You shall have this 20 per cent increase on freight coming into our province because it looks as though the freight structure we have will mean there will be no more manufacturing in our province". It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that must be the attitude which some of the people, and the government of our province, are taking at the present time. The hon. member for Cape Breton South spoke about the protection of our industries. He said that we only had a few industries in New Brunswick, and that may be true. He said that it did not make much difference, or words to that effect, whether or not those industries were saved. We know that the member for Cape Breton South is not in favour of private enterprise, and probably his remarks were coloured somewhat by that view.

I know personally that we have splendid industries in the maritime provinces. Over a period of years they have established a reputation for the excellence of their quality, and it is for that reason they are continuing. I could mention our boot and shoe industry in Fredericton; the enterprise foundry in Sackville; our chocolate industry, in both Halifax and St. Stephen; the Fawcett factory in Sackville; the Simms Brush Company in Saint John, and Stanfield underwear in Truro and others of the same quality and standing. Our industries have built a reputation for quality, Mr. Chairman, and it is for that reason more than any other that they have survived. It is not my intention to labour that point, but I do think it worth bringing to the attention of this house. that in the past the maritime provinces had a 20 per cent protection which built up our industries. With the loss of so many industries, with the high freight rates we now have, and the hopelessness which you will find if this situation continues—it will be difficult to encourage new industry or retain the old. The only hope we shall have will be from our basic industries.

I feel that the maritime provinces are back to the position in which they were in 1926 when the Duncan commission reported on the maritime claim. I should like to read what the Duncan commission said about our claims in its report to the federal government:

> The Intercolonial railway was completed in 1876, and it would appear from the evidence we have received that from then until 1912 the interests of the maritime provinces were fairly well safeguarded.

I mentioned that a few moments ago.

> The lower level of rates that prevailed on the Intercolonial railway system prior to 1912, is, in our view, rightly to be interpreted as the fulfilment by successive governments of the policy and pledges that surrounded the railway from its inception . . .

As I pointed out, the Duncan commission found that these confederation pledges had been followed. We had hoped that the injustice which had been done would be corrected. It was corrected, as I say, by the Maritime Freight Rates Act. Today the situation is as bad as ever. The Maritime Freight Rates Act came into force in 1928, just prior to the depression. We did hope there would be more industry attracted to the maritime provinces, and the province of New Brunswick, but as you know during the depression years very little industry was attracted to any part of Canada. The war followed the depression; and, so far as the Maritime Freight Rates Act is concerned, it really has not had an opportunity of operating in the maritime provinces to encourage industry.

I feel that the whole freight rate situation needs a complete overhaul. The disadvantages from a geographical point of view and other factors should receive every consideration. Every increase in the railway rates has meant less business in our province. We are in a different position today from what we were a number of years ago. Our overseas markets are lost. We do not sell our apples, for instance, in Great Britain as we did a few years ago. The apple producers have to turn to Toronto and Montreal, as well as the other parts of Canada, in order to sell their products. This means that the higher freight rates put another burden on the apple producers of the Annapolis valley and the Saint John valley. The same considerations apply, Mr. Chairman, to our lumber, our potatoes, our fish and other primary products.

The other day I noticed in one of the papers an article with which I quite agreed, to the effect we have too many miles of railway in Canada. By that I do not mean that in new territory, such as mining territory in the north country, where there are great natural resources, we should not have new lines of railway. In the various provinces, however, there are old branch lines which are not necessary. Trucks are carrying most of the freight, and buses are carrying most of the passengers. I hope this transportation commission will give careful study to the matter, and recommend the elimination of many of these lines which are today only a burden on the country.

The hon. member for Bow River spoke of truck transportation. This is a matter, of course, which will have to be given careful consideration. There is no question but what the trucks are in the transportation business to stay. I believe there is a place for the trucks in our transportation system, just as there is a place for our railways, our air transports, and our water transports. I believe this is something to which the royal commission should give careful study. I do not believe our transportation problems are such that they cannot be solved. I feel they can be solved in the best interests of all the people of Canada, and in a way that will make no section of Canada suffer. So far as this royal commission is concerned, I note that they are preparing their report and I do hope it will be a satisfactory one. I have great faith in that commission. The chairman of the commission, the Hon. Mr. Turgeon, is from my own province of New Brunswick. Perhaps that is one reason why I have faith in it. I have great faith that this problem of transportation will be solved, and that all sections of the Dominion of Canada will be properly served. No one could contemplate for one moment the loss of our railways. Canada would not be a nation long if that should happen. In my opinion the competition with which the railways have to contend must be controlled.

It is not my intention to speak any longer tonight. As I said a few moments ago, I do hope that justice will be done to all sections of Canada, whether it be in the matter of transportation, economic production or industry; that we will be protected and that every section will have the same opportunity for progress and prosperity.

Mr. Chevrier: I have listened with keen interest to the various speakers in this debate. Some of the speeches which were made were of a constructive nature. I am sorry to say that others were not.

If I were asked who made the boldest speech on this subject I would say it was the leader of the opposition. I would say that because of the language which he used; I would say that because of the fact that he found everything about the board of transport commissioners incompetent; he found that the government had made a mess of the whole matter. He had little or nothing to offer other than the motion which he made, which will solve absolutely nothing.

If I were asked who made the mildest speech I would have to hesitate between the leader of the C.C.F. party and the hon. member for Cape Breton South, because their criticism was somewhat mild. In fact all they wanted was to reduce the estimate of the board of transport commissioners by one dollar.

If I were asked who made the loudest speech I would have no hesitation in answering that question. It would be the hon. member for Lethbridge. If I were asked who made the most indignant speech I would say it was the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. Hansell: May I suggest to the minister that there are still more speeches coming when he gets through.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I shall have an opportunity to reply to them.

I would say that the hon. member for Lake Centre had made the most indignant speech because, in his inimitable way, he shook his fist, pointed his finger and turned his head at this side of the house in a most critical way. I do not think he added a great deal in a constructive way to the debate. I am sorry that neither he nor the leader of the opposition is in the house because I propose to deal at some length with their remarks.

The leader of the opposition began his statement by saying that the comparison I had made with the United Kingdom and the United States did not hold water because conditions in Canada vis-à-vis the United Kingdom and the United States were entirely different. I said that the increases in freight rates in Canada amounted roughly to 45 per cent; whereas in the United States they amounted to something like 60 per cent and in the United Kingdom to 80 per cent. I made that statement because it has always been the practice to compare the level of freight rates in this country with the level of freight rates in the United Kingdom and in the United States. We did that before the war, and in so far as the level is concerned the position is not changed today from what it was prior to the war.

The reason I wanted to put that on the record was to indicate that we are on the right path, since the percentage of the rise as between Canada and these two countries remains relatively about the same.

That is further borne out by an additional fact, namely, what the average revenue per ton mile is in Canada. The cost of transportation in Canada, as measured in terms of average revenue per ton mile, is the lowest in the world with the exception of one or two countries. I intend to put on Hansard certain figures which will bear that out. If those figures are not correct I hope that the opposition will challenge them.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the minister permit a question? Will he tell the committee how the freight rates of Canada compared with those of Great Britain and of the United States before the increases occurred? Has the minister those figures?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not propose to deal with that because I have already given the reason why the comparison was made.

The figures that I intend to put on Hansard will indicate what the public pay for transportation in these various countries. I repeat that the average revenue per ton mile or, in other words, what the public pay in Canada to transport their goods, is .97 of one cent. In Australia it is 2.47 cents; in South Africa it is 1.59 cents; in Argentina it is 1.94 cents; in Great Britain it is 2.34 cents; in France it is 2.30 cents; in Germany it is 2.05 cents; in Italy it is 2.13 cents; in Belgium it is 2.11 cents; in Switzerland it is 4.95 cents and in Turkey it is 3.44 cents. I say I was justified because of the statement which I have now put on Hansard, in making the statement I did earlier in the debate.

The next point made by the leader of the opposition was that the judgment of the board of transport commissioners failed to deal with the unfair differential. "In other words," said the leader of the opposition, "this judgment did not begin to deal with the most important question of discrimination." Of course it did not. It was never called upon to deal with it. It was not dealing with unfair discrimination between one part of Canada and the other. That was not the responsibility or the duty of the board on these applications; neither on the 30 per cent application nor on the 20 per cent application was the board called upon, and no one knows it better than the members of the opposition; because counsel for the provinces repeatedly said: "This is not the place nor the time to deal with discrimination. We will deal with that later on. This is an application made for an increase in rates." In other words, it is a revenue case, as I stated earlier in the debate. Therefore it was never the intention that this should be what was implied by the leader of the opposition.

Then the leader of the opposition made his main point. He said: "The board is incompetent. It is responsible for the state of confusion and chaos in which the country finds itself today." He said: "The government should take over. There must be a board of course, but it should be constituted otherwise.

It is not functioning at this moment as it should, and it is not competent to assume its tasks; the government must assume the direct responsibility." He was followed in that charge by the leader of the C.C.F. party, by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, by the hon. member for Lake Centre and by other hon. members. I am not surprised at that attack on the board. That attack was exactly the same as the one in 1948, when the 21 per cent case was made—when the decision was made to increase the rates by 21 per cent. The resignation of all members of the board of transport commissioners was called for then. They said at that time that every member of the board should be dismissed, that they were useless, that they did not know their business, that they did not know what they were doing, and that neither did they know what they were finding.

I am glad that other people have a different view concerning the board of transport commissioners. I have confidence in the board of transport commissioners, and I deprecate the attempt of some members in this House of Commons in trying to undermine the confidence of the people of Canada in that body. I do not think it is indicative of constructive criticism to attack the board of transport commissioners in that way; neither do I think that it will lead to any solution of this problem.

Let us for a moment see who are the members of this board. First there is the chairman, Mr. Justice Archibald. He is a lawyer, and a judge of standing. He acted as a member of the war labour board during the war—

Mr. Mitchell: As chairman.

Mr. Chevrier: My colleague says that he was chairman. He brought down decisions which met with the full approval of members of this House of Commons, and which met with the approval of the people of this country, on many occasions. He is learned in the law, and I say he is well qualified to act as chairman of that board.

Then, the assistant chief commissioner is Mr. Hugh Wardrope. He is from Ontario, and equally learned in the law. I do not think that anyone would say that he is not competent to deal with any problem we put before him. He is there for a second term, and has had a wealth of experience in these questions.

Then, Mr. MacPherson is from British Columbia. He is on the board for a second term, and also has a great deal of experience.

Commissioner Chase came from the railway brotherhoods of this country. I think it has been shown many times that he has the confidence of the people. The same is true of Mr. Patterson, who was premier of Saskatchewan. I do not think anyone in this House of Commons would dare to say that he does not know what the feelings of the people of Saskatchewan are. He has had a great deal of experience in public life, and I think he is competent to deal with the matter of freight rates.

Then the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) goes further and says that the government should step in and take over the responsibility. So did the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) who is coming into the house now. He, too, followed the same argument. Well, I say to him and I say to the leader of the opposition just this: That that sort of thinking is just about forty-five years old. That sort of thinking goes hand in glove with the thinking of the Conservative party across this country over a long, long period of time.

I say that because that is exactly what took place in 1903. In 1903 it was the responsibility of the governor in council and of the privy council to deal with matters affecting freight rates. In fact there was a subcommittee of the cabinet whose responsibility it was to fix rates. At that time, because of the difficulty of such a committee in dealing with matters of this kind, the government appointed Professor McLean, who had had a great deal of experience in matters concerning freight rates, and who had spent all his life studying the question.

After having made an investigation and having reported to the government, he gave the reason why the railway committee of the privy council was unable to do an efficient and effective job with reference to freight rates. I quote:

> The committee has been unable, owing to its organization, to grapple effectively with the problem presented. It has been impossible, owing to its stationary character, to deal effectively with questions pertaining to rates and preferences. A more migratory body could deal more effectively with these matters.
>
> The defects of the railway committee as a regulator of railway transportation I would place under the following heads:
> 1. It has a dual function, political and administrative.
> 2. The lack of migratory organization renders it impossible to deal effectively with complaints.
> 3. The distances to be travelled by complainants render the expense too great.
> 4. There is lack of technical training for the work.
> 5. The existing organization is not sufficiently permanent.
>
> . . . .
> In my opinion, the only way to put the matter of railway regulation on a more satisfactory footing in Canada is by entrusting it to a railway commission composed of men of technical training, who shall receive salaries adequate to attract the most efficient, and who shall have a long tenure of office.

There is the result of a survey made by a man who, I suggest, compares favourably with any other, in so far as his experience and his technical and expert knowledge are concerned. And now we are attacked by certain members of the opposition; we are asked by them to do exactly what was being done prior to 1903. And that is why I say that their thinking is at least forty-five years old.

It never should be the responsibility of the governor in council to fix freight rates. It never should be the responsibility of the governor in council to determine the freight rate structure.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Why, there is an appeal to you now.

Mr. Chevrier: I am coming to that. True, it has a responsibility under section 52 which is judicial in nature. And as far back as 1903 an order in council was passed setting out in detail what those responsibilities were. I have already placed them on Hansard in an earlier debate, and I shall not take time to repeat them now, because I have further things to say which I believe are at the moment of greater interest.

But I simply wish to repeat this, that it never was the intention since 1903, to date, that the governor in council should determine the freight rate structure in Canada. That it should exercise powers of a judicial nature?—yes. It has done that by way of hearing petitions by provinces. It will do it again with reference to petitions now before it. But that the governor in council should do those very things which were recommended against by Professor McLean would be, I say, a retrograde step, and one which I am sure the government would never think of taking.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You have done it on occasion.

Mr. Chevrier: The leader of the opposition goes on to say that it is the duty of the government to provide railway facilities and effective transportation facilities in Canada. Yes, of course. That is so, in theory. But what happens? A number of years ago I brought down a bill to build the Barraute-Kiask Falls line extending from the National Transcontinental Railway into the colonization lands of the province of Quebec. It was opposed by members of the opposition. Indeed, it was opposed by the hon. member for Greenwood, who is looking at me now, until I was able to establish to his satisfaction, and to that of the opposition, that the operation would be a profitable one.

Now, the leader of the opposition comes here and tells us that it is the duty of the government to provide effective transportation facilities in Canada, and on the other hand the members of his party oppose those things the very minute we propose them.

Then the leader of the opposition says that it is the duty of the board and of the government to provide effective railway transportation in Canada. No other country in the world has better railway transportation facilities than the Dominion of Canada. I say without fear of contradiction that we have here not only the most efficient but the cheapest transportation system in the world.

The leader of the opposition makes that statement, but what about his own followers who during the war and since have got up one after the other in their places to pay tribute to the Canadian National Railways and to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the excellent job they did during the war? Now we are told it is the duty of the government to provide effective railway transportation in Canada. I think that statement is somewhat farcical.

Then another point made by the leader of the opposition was that the board was in an impossible position, that it had an impossible task to deal with these matters. He then went on to explain why. I do not think that I quarrel too much with the statement that the board has a difficult problem, because it has a difficult problem to deal with in these applications that come before it and in equalizing freight rates across Canada. But the government recognized that and that is why under P.C. 1487 it directed the board to equalize rates and later decided that there should be a royal commission to investigate and advise the government.

When we give the opposition what they want, they criticize. When we do not give them what they want they still criticize. Will it ever be possible to satisfy hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the house? The language used today by the leader of the opposition was entirely different from that which he has used on other occasions. I should like to quote from a statement he made earlier, and I quote from page 45 of Hansard of January 28, 1949, as follows:

> Royal commissions have a very useful and very important function if they are given terms of reference which clearly define their responsibilities, and if they are given a task which can be performed in a way that will lead to some useful results. There is reference in the speech from the throne to a royal commission to deal with transportation, which at the present time is being used mainly for the purpose of diverting public attention from the fact that this government has failed to deal effectively in any way with the problem of freight rates, something which should be dealt with by the government with the information now available instead of setting up a further inquiry into this very subject.

The leader of the opposition complained about the establishment of a royal commission, but that is exactly what the seven provinces wanted. The leader of the opposition said that it was a waste of time, but the premiers of the provinces came to Ottawa and that is what they demanded. When the government accedes to their request the leader of the opposition is critical. Then he complained about the terms of reference, but they are pretty much what was recommended by the provinces when they came to see us. Here again there was consultation with the provinces, and still we are criticized. If we consult the provinces, we are found wanting. If we do not consult the provinces, we are told that we ride roughshod over them. I can come to no other conclusion than that the leader of the opposition is not happy because we consulted the wrong provinces.

I do not want to go into this point, but I think the leader of the opposition should be a little more cautious when he deals with royal commissions because his experience with royal commissions has not been too good. His experience with royal commissions in Ontario has certainly been far from what it should be. However, I do not think I should pursue that any further.

In his statement the leader of the opposition says that the government has failed to deal effectively with freight rates. It is not the responsibility of the government to deal with freight rates. That is the responsibility of the board of transport commissioners as was decided by this parliament when it passed the Railway Act as far back as 1903. This is the parliament that decided that it should be done that way, and not by the government. The only thing left to the government was the powers set out in section 52 which I say are of a judicial nature.

The leader of the opposition adopts the attitude that the government is responsible. But if he says that the government is responsible, which I deny and have denied several times already, then he will have no fault to find with me if I go back to ascertain what happened to freight rates under the Conservative regime. I hope that the hon. member for Lake Centre will listen to some of this because his mind is a little dusty—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about Mr. Tucker and the Liberals in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Chevrier: —as to what happened under that regime. From 1903 to world war I there were no increases in freight rates in this country. The first general increase came in 1917 and I need not tell the committee who was in office then. That was known as the 15 per cent case and was made as a result of application to the board following the granting of a similar increase in the United States.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): After three years of war.

Mr. Chevrier: The second increase came in 1918 and was known as the 25 per cent case. Do you know how it was made? It was made by direction of the cabinet. The cabinet simply passed an order in council directing the board of transport commissioners to increase the rates by 25 per cent. What would the hon. member for Lake Centre or the hon. member for Greenwood say if anything like that were done today? What would the leader of the opposition, who so suddenly has taken an interest in freight rates and from whom we heard not a word when he was premier of the province of Ontario, do? I wonder what those hon. gentlemen would say if we adopted that sort of attitude today? I do not think we would have such indignant statements as were made by the hon. member for Lake Centre this afternoon if the hon. member had been in the house when action such as that was taken.

Then in 1920, still under a Conservative regime, there was an increase of 40 per cent in freight rates following an application by the Railway Association of Canada. It was not until a Liberal government came into office that the 40 per cent increase was reduced, first by 5 per cent in 1921, then again by 10 per cent in the same year, with a further decrease on August 1, 1922, leaving a net increase of 17½ per cent in eastern Canada and 12½ per cent in western Canada. I wonder what the leader of the opposition has to say with reference to the action taken in those years? I should like to quote a report in the Montreal Star of a statement made by the leader of the opposition on January 14, 1949, as follows:

The royal commission to investigate Canada's freight rate structure was tagged tonight (in Regina) by Hon. George Drew, Progressive Conservative leader, as a "waste of time." In a brief press conference on the second stop on his western tour, Mr. Drew said all essential data seemed to have been assembled and that the most important thing now was "determining the principle on which adjustment must be made of rates."

The leader of the opposition said that the royal commission was a waste of time. Still his party in convention passed a resolution in which they asked for that very thing. That is not the first time that the leader of the opposition has been in disagreement with certain of his members. Neither is it the first time that the hon. member for Lake Centre is not in agreement with his own leader. The leader of the opposition states that a royal commission is a waste of time but his party supports an investigation of freight rates. It is well known by all who have given any attention to the matter that the board of transport commissioners have no power of themselves to deal with discrimination affecting geographic, economic and industrial conditions. That is the very essence of the case for the provinces. Their whole brief was based on this argument. It has been held time and again that our rate-regulating commission has no right whatever to attempt to equalize geographic, climatic or economic conditions. They are simply and wholly concerned with questions having to do with the reasonableness of rates or tolls.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who has the power?

Mr. Chevrier: The only conclusion I can come to is that the language used by the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Lake Centre is—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who has the power?

Mr. Chevrier: Just a moment. I did not interrupt the hon. member when he made his speech, when he waxed so indignant. Let him allow me to carry on because there are a number of things that have not been said that need to be said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a question that you cannot answer.

Mr. Chevrier: There are a number of things that have been said by the leader of the opposition about the board that I do not think should be said by the leader of any party. Be that as it may, the only conclusion I can come to is that the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Lake Centre are careless in their language and in the attacks they make. In any event, if they are not careless in their language and in their attacks they are certainly careless about the method in which they think this matter can be disposed of. If the leader of the opposition is correct in moving his amendment to reduce the item of the board of transport commissioners to $1, let me ask, how does that in any way solve the problem? What is the policy of the members of the opposition? I should like to know what it is.

An hon. Member: They haven't any.

Mr. Chevrier: Of course they haven't, and what is more they do not agree with each other. It is evident that the speech made by the hon. member for Lake Centre does not agree at all with that made by the leader of the opposition. Anybody who listened to it, or who reads Hansard, can come to no other conclusion. They have no policy. Of course they have no policy and they will not have any policy. I do not say that because I think it is all right to make destructive criticism as was done by the leader of the opposition and by the hon. member for Lake Centre, with whom I should like to deal for a moment. He said that the latest decision will accentuate and increase the discrimination. That was the important statement made by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Of course if discrimination exists it is bound to be accentuated by an increase in freight rates. I do not think there can be any doubt about that.

Then he went on to say—and listen to this—that there must of necessity be an increase in rates because of the increase in wage rates and costs generally. He says that nobody will find fault with that but he insisted that the increase be held up pending the disappearance of the discrimination. How logical is that argument? If it were to be followed to its logical conclusion what would happen? The railways would never get the money with which to pay increased wage rates, increased material costs and increases in other expenses which must be met. The point boils down to this. You cannot have an increase in wages and a reduction in freight rates. It simply cannot be done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You could remove the discrimination.

Mr. Chevrier: I will deal with that in a moment. Yes, you can have a removal of discrimination. True, you can have a removal of discrimination if it exists; but my hon. friend did not put one tittle of evidence on the record to indicate that there was discrimination. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did, and I want to deal with the example he gave.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I put Mr. Garson's statement on the record.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, you called the Minister of Justice as a witness just as I called the leader of the opposition as a witness. The leader of the opposition became interested in freight rates after he became leader of his party. Until then we never heard about it from the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: That is nonsense.

Mr. Chevrier: I hope the hon. member will not distract me any longer because I should really like to deal with his argument. He took it for granted, as many others take it for granted, that there is discrimination. Yes there is, but to what extent? While it is true that freight rates in Ontario and Quebec are generally lower than those in the maritimes and on the prairies, and on the Pacific coast they are somewhat lower than on the prairies, there has been no evidence since the case of 1927 to indicate wherein that discrimination lies. I wish the hon. member had put more evidence on the record than he did. He did talk about the Crowsnest pass rates. He was very careful not to say that they had been suspended by a Conservative administration and that they had been raised during the time of a Conservativ regime. He said that every member in the house should raise his voice and insist that the Crowsnest rates should never be touched. I ask you how then are you ever going to get revenue for the railways if freight rates are not going to go up?

There are only two ways in which it can be done. One is to amend the Crowsnest pass rates, and I know what would happen if any attempt were made to do that. I do not think there is any intention of doing so. Not only is there no intention but I personally would oppose it. The only alternative by which you can get revenue for the railways is to increase the rates on other commodities. I have made that clear on more than one occasion, and I think it is the only way. Then the hon. member for Lake Centre said, "What should our attitude be?" He went on to support the amendment of the leader of the opposition that item 524 be reduced to $1. That does not deal with the problem. The problem is an important one, and no one realizes more than I do—and not in any cavalier fashion such as the hon. member for Lake Centre attributed to me—how important this question is not only economically but geographically and politically. That is why I have attempted to approach it from a constructive point of view.

Before concluding I should like to deal with one or two matters arising from the statements made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Lethbridge. They said that the rate on 100 pounds of petroleum from Regina to Indian Head was 26 cents, while the rate in Quebec for the same product and the same distance was 10 cents and in Ontario 9½ cents. That statement is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Coldwell: I took it right out of the evidence given before the board of transport commissioners, and it was not disputed.

Mr. Chevrier: I am disputing it now.

Mr. Coldwell: It was not disputed before the judicial body.

Mr. Chevrier: I am disputing it, and I shall explain it. The 26 cent rate from Regina to Indian Head, a distance of 47 miles, is the normal rate which will become effective on June 16 next if these increases go into effect. The normal rate from Sarnia or Montreal for a similar distance will be 31 cents. However, an agreed charge from Sarnia and Montreal, to meet highway and water competition, of 8½ cents and 9½ cents respectively has been put into effect. A similar agreed charge exists in Alberta; and that charge, for the information of the hon. member for Lethbridge, from Calgary, Edmonton and Lloydminster is 10½ cents, and is also to meet highway competition. So the rate is not 16 cents lower on that commodity in eastern Canada than in western Canada, but only 1 cent or 1½ cents.

A condition of the agreed charge is that the industry entering into it with the railway undertakes to give the railway all its traffic. No such agreed charge is in effect at Regina. There is nothing to prevent those interested in arranging an agreed charge with the railway, but I am told the reason it has not been done is that it is the intention to give a certain amount of the traffic to motor transport. Well, if that is the case certainly this cannot be used as an effective example of unjust discrimination, because I submit with deference that it is not.

Then the leader of the C.C.F. party said that now, when the western provinces apparently are faced with a decreased selling price for wheat, freight rates should not be increased. But these increases, the 20 per cent case and the 30 per cent case, do not apply to grain rates and were never intended to apply to them.

Mr. Coldwell: But they apply to the machines and materials that enter into the cost of production. That is what I meant.

Mr. Chevrier: But that is not what the hon. member said. I say to the hon. member that freight rates on grain and grain products have not been increased since 1897 except as already stated. As a matter of fact those two decisions exempt grain products, whether going to the east by way of Fort William and Armstrong or to the west by way of Vancouver and Prince Rupert; and the hon. gentleman well knows the position in reference to the Crowsnest rate.

There are other matters with which I would like to deal, but let me summarize the position in this way. The amendment of the leader of the opposition will accomplish nothing. It does not begin to meet the problem. I submit that the problem can only be met, first by the investigation being conducted by the board of transport commissioners with the object of equalizing rates where there is unjust discrimination, and second, by the findings of the royal commission. I think the committee should be reminded that discrimination exists in many parts of Canada. I do not think that can be denied; it has always been the case. It is unfair or unjust discrimination with which the board seeks to deal. The other method adopted by the government to meet this problem was the appointment of a royal commission on transportation to which terms of reference were assigned so that it might report and advise the government on these matters. Meanwhile the provinces have filed a petition. The government will hear that petition and give it the same careful consideration that was given an earlier petition.

I have not given any thought to the question of whether or not the subamendment is in order, but I submit that neither the amendment nor the subamendment, nor both together, could begin to solve the problem. This difficulty will not be overcome by moving an amendment of that sort and putting the board of transport commissioners out of existence. Of all the groups or organizations in Canada that might deal with the freight rate structure of our country, I believe the board of transport commissioners is the one to do it, because that board has the experience and knowledge. It has been said they have not the staff, but that is not so; they have the staff. In the first place they have a traffic department composed of some twenty experts. They have a bureau of transportation economics composed of some forty men, and in all they have some 130 people who are familiar with this whole subject.

I consider this amendment and the subamendment in the nature of a vote of want of confidence; and even if they were to carry—I know they will not, but if perchance they should—we would not have a solution to the problem. I say the only way to meet the difficulties facing us at the moment is the manner adopted by the government, first by directing the board to equalize the rate structure, and second by setting up the royal commission to advise the government on matters of policy. The attitude adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite is both critical and destructive, and would not begin to meet the problem in any way.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I would not—

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Anticlimax.

Mr. Low: The anticlimax came when the vote was taken on the motion of the hon. member.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Chairman, I speak for the Peace river country of British Columbia, and even before the minister spoke I rose to put forward the case for my people.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Peace River tried to get the floor even before the hon. member for Bow River spoke this afternoon. Therefore in all fairness I think I should recognize him now.

Mr. Low: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Certainly I do not wish to keep the hon. member for Cariboo from expressing his opinion on this matter. As a matter of fact I think every hon. member of this house should recognize the importance of this problem and have something to say about it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the minister who just finished speaking began his address this evening in rather moderate tones. He proceeded to characterize the various speeches that had been made up to that time when he introduced his rebuttal. He classified them in this way; the boldest speech was made by the leader of the opposition; the mildest speech by the leader of the C.C.F. and his colleague from Cape Breton South; the most indignant speech by the member for Lake Centre; and the loudest speech by the member for Lethbridge. It is always wise for people who begin to classify contributions of others to take a little care with their own. Frankly, I would classify the minister's speech as the loudest of the day, the most excited, the most strident, the most raucous, and the most evasive. As a matter of fact, I was surprised that he allowed himself to be carried away by the sound of his own voice. At various stages of his address, he reminded me a great deal of a minister who had to yell like hell when his argument was weak.

I would not speak in this debate, Mr. Chairman, if I did not have a different approach from those who have spoken thus far. In the course of the case which I shall present I do not intend to vilify anybody, to castigate the board of transport commissioners, or set myself up as the arbiter of the freight rate structure of this country. I do have a suggestion to make, and I hope it will be received in the spirit in which it is given. It is a constructive approach, and something that has not yet been brought to the attention of this house.

Before I launch into it, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that during the course of the minister's address he said that no evidence since a certain date, I think it was 1925 or 1923, had been brought to show where discrimination lies. I believe he was speaking of the statement made by the member for Lake Centre that there was discrimination in Canada. It depends, of course, on how you define discrimination. I am all too aware of the way that the board of transport commissioners, and of course the Minister of Transport, define discrimination. They take the position that there is no discrimination unless some individual considers himself to be aggrieved, or unless the railways charge someone in a certain region a rate that is different from that which they would charge some other person in the same region for the same haul.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the hon. member allow an interruption?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: I merely wanted to say that the Railway Act defines discrimination, and the board is bound by what is set out in the act.

Mr. Low: That is very good, and it falls right in with the case I want to present. There is discrimination as between region and region in this country, and the minister knows that such discrimination exists. Furthermore, he knows that the examples that were produced today by my colleague the member for Lethbridge were bona fide examples of discrimination as between region and region. I know full well that when the minister says the board of transport commissioners is not charged with the responsibility, at the moment, of removing regional discrimination, he speaks the truth. He says that all the board can do is to remove unjust discrimination, and that is true. The complaint we have, Mr. Chairman, is that the board of transport commissioners have not been given a directive from this government to remove regional discrimination, as well as unjust discrimination between persons within a region. It is that case I want to present when I start in earnest with my presentation.

It is so near eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman, that I would not like to launch into the argument I wish to present, and then break it off in a minute or two. I wish you would allow me to adjourn the debate.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on Monday at eleven o'clock we shall take up the following small bills: Bill No. 252, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935; Bill No. 263, to amend the Electricity Inspection Act, 1928; Bill No. 264, to amend the Gas Inspection Act; and perhaps Bill No. 135, if time is left.

At three o'clock we shall ask to revert to motions, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs will make a statement on the conference held in London by the ministers of the nations signatory to the Atlantic pact. We shall then move to go into supply, and I understand there will be a discussion of external affairs. When this motion is carried, we shall call one item of the secretary of state to stand, and we shall proceed with the estimates of veterans affairs.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 5, 1950

The house met at eleven o'clock.

WHEAT BOARD

REFERENCE TO AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE REPORT FOR CROP YEAR 1948-49

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That the report of the Canadian wheat board for the crop year 1948-49, tabled in the house on Tuesday, February 21, 1950, be referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN YARMOUTH, N. S., AND STATE OF MAINE

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth):

1. What is the present status of the arrangements between the federal government and the government of Nova Scotia concerning the provision of a ferry service between Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and a port in Maine, United States of America?
2. Was a conference of representatives of the two governments recently held? If so, on what date?
3. Were ports in Nova Scotia other than Yarmouth again given consideration?
4. What port in Maine has been selected?
5. Has any formal financial agreement between the two governments been signed?
6. Will the ferry be designed so as to permit the carrying of large refrigerator and trailer trucks and passenger busses?
7. When is it now expected that the details and plans will be completed?
8. What is the estimated length of time required for the construction of the ship after contract is let?
9. Is it expected that the service will be in operation in 1951?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Studies proceeding, but decisions not yet reached.

2. Yes; May 10, 1950.

3. Yes. Various ports in western Nova Scotia were again given consideration.

4. Not yet determined.

5. No.

6. This is being given full consideration.

7. No definite date can be given at this stage. Present schedule calls for completion within two months.

8. Estimated twelve to fourteen months, depending on type of propulsion unit chosen.

9. Every effort will be made to place the vessel in operation in 1951, but delays in building and delivery of material may prevent the operation of the vessel until the opening of the 1952 season.

WAR PENSIONS—WIDOWS OR DEPENDENTS OF VETERANS WHO COMMITTED SUICIDE

Mr. Murphy:

1. How many applications for pension have been made by widows or dependents of veterans of the last war who committed suicide during the war?
2. How many applications for pension have been made by widows or dependents of veterans of the last war who have since committed suicide?
3. How many widows or dependents of veterans of the last war, who committed suicide either during or since the war, have or are receiving a pension?
4. How many of the applications have been granted?
5. How many have been refused?
6. How many are still under consideration?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lambton West and I had a discussion about this question. In view of the fact that we are undertaking to give him all the information available, I think the hon. member has agreed that, in its present form at any rate, the question should be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

COLD STORAGE PLANTS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. Have any cold storages been established in Newfoundland since April 1, 1949?
2. If so, where are they located?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. No cold storages have been constructed under subsidy contract with the Department of Agriculture in Newfoundland since April 1, 1949.

2. See answer to No. 1.

POTATOES—NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

Are there any restrictions against the movement of potatoes for seed, or any other purpose, from the province of Newfoundland to any other province?

Mr. McCubbin: Yes; because of the prevalence of wart disease, the movement of potatoes for seed or other purposes from Newfoundland to any other province of Canada is prohibited under the Destructive Insect and Pest Act and regulations.

Questions

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—JOLIETTE, QUE., OFFICE

Mr. Balcer:

What amounts of unemployment insurance benefits have been paid each month since January, 1948, by the office at Joliette, Quebec?

MOVEMENT OF NEWFOUNDLAND FARMERS TO OTTAWA DISTRICT

Mr. Higgins:

1. Has the matter of moving farmers out of Newfoundland to Ottawa district farms been discussed?
2. If so, has a decision been reached?

Mr. Mitchell:

1. Yes.

2. A group of workers have been moved from Newfoundland and placed in employment on farms in the Ottawa district.

FEED GRAIN—TRANSPORT BY TRUCK—APPLICATION OF FREIGHT SUBSIDY

Mr. Fair:

Has a recent order been passed which has the effect of denying to farmers who use trucking service to transport feed grain from lake ports to their farms or feed lots the freight subsidy now paid to railroads?

Mr. McCubbin: No. From the inception of the freight assistance program in October, 1941, down to the present time, freight assistance on feed grain has applied only to carloads, or equivalent shipments by water, delivered to distribution points. Truck movement, if any, has always been regarded as a part of local distribution cost and has not been paid for by the government.

[Mr. McCubbin.]

VETERANS AFFAIRS—CLAIM OF STE. SOPHIE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY AGAINST JACK COOPER

Mr. Bertrand:

1. Has the Department of Veterans Affairs reached a decision with respect to the claim made by the Ste. Sophie Agricultural Co-operative Society for mill feeds, fertilizer and other goods advanced to Jack Cooper, a veteran?
2. If so, what decision has been reached?
3. Has the Department of Justice been asked to give a legal opinion on this matter?

Mr. Gregg:

1. Yes.

2. The crown is not legally liable with regard to the claim made by the Ste. Sophie Agricultural Co-operative Society.

3. Yes.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT—GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES DISCHARGED OR RELEASED

Mr. Fulton:

1. In each department or branch of government or board or corporation set up by the government, how many employees, if any, have been discharged or been in any way released for reasons having to do with security?
2. What was the effective date in each such case?
3. What were the position and duties of each such employee at the time of his discharge or release?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

RED RIVER VALLEY—RECOMMENDATIONS BY INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence since the 15th day of January, 1948, and to date, between the international joint commission and the government of Canada relative to suggestions and recommendations as to means or methods or public works to be undertaken to prevent a repetition of the flood on the Red river of 1948.

Mr. Pearson: I have had a word with the hon. member for Lake Centre about this motion, and have informed him that all the information asked for was tabled by my colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), on May 25 last. In the circumstances I hope he will allow this motion to be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

SYDNEY HARBOUR DISTRICT—SUPERINTENDENT OF PILOTS

Mr. MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

For a copy of all correspondence from March 1950, to date, in connection with the matter of appointing a superintendent of pilots for the Sydney harbour district.

METEOROLOGY

APPROVAL OF CONVENTION OF WORLD METEOROLOGICAL ORGANIZATION SIGNED AT WASHINGTON OCTOBER 11, 1947

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the convention of the world meteorological organization signed at Washington on October 11, 1947, and tabled on February 14, 1949, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: The object of this resolution is manifold: First, to facilitate world-wide co-operation in the establishment of networks of stations for the making of meteorological observations; second, to promote the establishment of systems for the rapid exchange of information; third, to promote the standardization of meteorological observations; fourth, to further the application of meteorology to aviation, shipping and agriculture; and, finally, to encourage research.

Because of the rapid progress of aviation and the universal interest in meteorology, it is becoming increasingly important to achieve world-wide co-ordination of weather services. It was decided at two international meetings held at Toronto and Washington to recommend the establishment of a world meteorological organization. It is a specialized agency of the United Nations. The cost to Canada will not be extensive, being in the neighbourhood of $3,000 or $4,000.

We have an excellent network of observation stations throughout the various regions of Canada, and we co-operate with the United States, with whom we operate joint weather stations in the north. There are a number of weather stations on the north Atlantic as well as on the Pacific.

The convention has been signed by forty states, and will come into effect when there are thirty ratifications. It is hoped that parliament will accept this convention. The following countries have deposited instruments of ratification: Australia, Burma, Czechoslovakia, Dominican republic, Norway, Peru, The Philippines, Sweden, and a number of others.

I recommend the formal adoption of the convention of the world meteorological organization.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it may not be necessary to debate this resolution at any length, but no notice was given on Friday that it would be up for consideration by the house today. Therefore I would move the adjournment of the debate. I would ask the minister to have distributed to hon. members copies of this convention, which apparently was tabled over a year ago.

Mr. Chevrier: It was tabled and distributed to hon. members.

Mr. Green: That was over a year ago, and many of us do not have copies.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think there would be any difficulty in obtaining them from the distribution office. I have no objection to an adjournment of the debate.

Motion (Mr. Green) agreed to and debate adjourned.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PRESS REPORT AS TO TREATMENT OF MR. AND MRS. TREMEWEN, OF MONTREAL, AT MEXICAN BORDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, a news item from Montreal which appeared in the press last week indicated that two residents of Montreal, Mr. and Mrs. Vern Tremewen, had had difficulties with the authorities in Mexico and had been lodged in jail, Mr. Tremewen having been badly beaten while in custody. I understood that these people were Australian citizens and perhaps would be making a plea through the United Kingdom authorities in Mexico, but yesterday and the day before the radio referred to them as Canadian citizens. Would the minister of external affairs care to clear up the matter, so we may know the exact situation?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to say what I can to clear this matter up, as there seems to be some misunderstanding about it. When I read the reports in the press I asked for a report on the incident. My information is that Mr. and Mrs. Tremewen are Australian citizens. They are now living in Montreal, but have not yet acquired Canadian citizenship. Therefore when Mr. and Mrs. Tremewen got into difficulties with the Mexican authorities, they asked for the intervention, through the Australian high commissioner in Canada, of the United Kingdom representative in Mexico. I believe it is the custom, when a nation of the commonwealth has not its own representative in a foreign country, to use the United Kingdom representative in that country. The intervention of the United Kingdom representative was, I believe, speedy and effective, and the Australian citizens in question were quickly released. If they had been Canadian nationals it would have been our duty to intervene. If as Australians they had asked for the intervention of the Canadian ambassador in Mexico we should have been very glad to put him at their service, but they took the other and the normal course.

HOUSING

PROSECUTIONS UNDER WARTIME LEASEHOLD REGULATIONS—MRS. BESSIE ELLIS-REID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I did not give him notice, but I am sure the matter came to his attention. It has to do with the imprisonment of Mrs. Bessie Ellis-Reid, of Ottawa, on two charges of violation of wartime prices and trade board regulations. I read the report in the press on Saturday and made some investigation myself. It would appear that there was unnecessary harshness in the imprisonment meted out to her. I should like to ask the minister if he is in a position to report on the matter.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Yes; I saw the newspaper report in question, and at once had inquiries made as to what the circumstances were. I have received a report from the secretary of the wartime prices and trade board, which, as the house is aware, is charged with the responsibility of enforcing the rental regulations. The Mrs. Ellis-Reid referred to in the newspaper article, who resides at 264 Gladstone avenue, Ottawa, was charged under the wartime leasehold regulations with renting one unit of housing accommodation which had a basic date rental of $10 per month at $15.40 per month, an increase of some fifty per cent, and another unit which had a basic date rental of $14 per month, which was increased to $17 per month. Both properties are located in Shawville.

Leave to prosecute was issued on February 10 last, and the Department of Justice appointed Mr. J. O. Laflamme to act for the board. Mr. Ste. Marie, of Hull, counsel for Mrs. Ellis-Reid, requested two adjournments, which were granted, and on May 17 the case came to trial. At the outset of the proceedings Mr. Ste. Marie asked to be relieved of his duties, and this was granted by His Honour Judge Millar. Mrs. Ellis-Reid handled her own case and pleaded not guilty to both charges. At the conclusion the court found her guilty on both charges and sentenced her to a fine of $5 and costs or eight days on each charge.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: What were the costs?

Mr. Abbott: They have not yet been determined. I am coming to that later. In a telephone conversation with Mr. Lemire, the clerk of the court, the secretary of the wartime prices and trade board was advised that Mrs. Ellis-Reid definitely refused to pay the fine and costs and emphasized that the lawyer was crooked, that the judge was crooked and that she only had $8 in the bank. At this point, Mr. Lemire, the clerk of the court, offered to consult with the judge with a view to granting time within which to pay the fine and costs. However, Mrs. Ellis-Reid definitely declared that she would never pay one dime to the court. Mr. Lemire advised her that the only alternative was to serve sixteen days in jail, and Mrs. Ellis-Reid said that was what she intended to do. She was imprisoned on May 17, and was released upon serving fourteen days in jail, two days apparently having been allowed for good behaviour.

I am informed by the enforcement counsel of the board that he has had several telephone conversations with Mrs. Ellis-Reid, and that she is an extremely difficult person to deal with.

As to the question of costs, the board has not received a final report from its counsel, owing to the fact that he is waiting for an account from the clerk of the court covering court costs in this prosecution. Since the alternate jail term was served by Mrs. Ellis-Reid, the board of course will be liable for such costs as are assessed by the court.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says he has not the information as to the costs. I ask him to table the record of the conviction and the evidence in these cases, as well as the judgment; because my information is that the costs were $196.

Mr. Abbott: I am told the costs were high, but I have not that figure as yet. As to the tabling of the record of the conviction and the evidence, if that is in accordance with the rules of the house I shall be glad to do so.

AIRPORTS

NOVA SCOTIA—EASTERN PASSAGE—HALIFAX AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister's department reached any decision on the matter of expanding the Eastern Passage defence airport to accommodate larger aircraft? Has the question of a new airport for the Halifax area been discussed? If so, has any decision been arrived at?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I suggest that question should be directed to my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier).

Mr. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): If the hon. member for Cape Breton South is referring to the Dartmouth airport—I am not sure from the wording of the question handed to me by my colleague—that is a matter which would necessarily come under the Department of National Defence, and I would not be able to answer the first question. With reference to the second question, whether or not a new airport for the Halifax area has been discussed, I can say to him that no recent discussions have taken place.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NEWFOUNDLAND HOTEL, ST. JOHN'S—WAGES OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) asked whether any consideration had been given to placing the employees of the Newfoundland hotel, St. John's, Newfoundland, on the same rates of wages as those paid in other Canadian National Railway operated hotels; if so, when will the new rates come into effect, and will they be retroactive to October 1, 1949. The answer is that if and when the Newfoundland hotel is entrusted to the Canadian National Railways, negotiations will be entered into with the authorized representatives of the employees of the Newfoundland hotel for the purpose of reaching an agreement as to wages and working conditions.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Who is in charge of the hotel at the present time if not the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Chevrier: Negotiations are being carried on between the government of Newfoundland and the federal government through Canadian National Railway officials. Until those negotiations are completed it will be impossible to deal with the matter referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is not the question I asked the minister. I asked him who is in charge of the hotel at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot answer in any other way than to say that the government of Newfoundland has asked the government of Canada to take it over, and the government of Canada is negotiating with the government of Newfoundland through Canadian National Railways.

COAL

SUPPLY FOR NEW BRUNSWICK PUBLIC BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. It is based on a complaint from certain New Brunswick coal producers that, according to reports, all tenders for supplying coal to public buildings in New Brunswick stipulate Nova Scotia coal. Is the report correct, and if so, will the minister reconsider the desirability of allowing New Brunswick coal to have the preference in these tenders, particularly since it was used last year in practically all New Brunswick buildings without complaint?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, before I came in the house I was handed a copy of this question.

Mr. Brooks: I sent it on Saturday.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I missed it on Saturday and I caught it today. I have been handed all the details as to procedure in the tenders. I see there is a notice for tenders for coal for the maritime provinces. One paragraph reads:

> Tenders should be made on the forms supplied by the department and in accordance with departmental specifications and conditions attached thereto.

I have tried to read the general specifications, and I cannot see any limitation in that part of the tender. Further on there is a sheet annexed which is sent to those who wish to tender. It gives a list of all the areas where coal is needed in the maritimes. It is headed by this note:

> Do not write your quotations on the present list. It is not a tender form but merely a guide to help you select the name(s) of the town(s) where you may wish to supply coal.

These things are always complicated in my department, however, and I see further on that in New Brunswick they give the names of the towns and the quantities, and I think they even mention mines, but I do not see any mention of the Minto mine. If that is what is implied by this document, I shall give instructions today that tenders may be received from the New Brunswick mines. I cannot say that they will get any preference of course, because they would have to supply the best quality, and so forth, in order to get the contract; but I can have those instructions sent out in half an hour or so.

CANADIAN MARITIME COMMISSION

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Can the Minister of Transport say when the annual report of the Canadian maritime commission will be tabled?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I am not sure when the Canadian maritime commission will be presenting their annual report. An extensive report was prepared and tabled last November or December, toward the end of last session.

Mr. Green: I believe they have three months from March 31 within which to make a report to the minister, so I should think they would have to file it with him before the end of the present month. I am wondering if we shall be able to get it before the end of June.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall have to make inquiries and let my hon. friend know.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—SOFTBALL GAME ON PARLIAMENT HILL IN AID OF RELIEF FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the treasurer of the Manitoba flood relief fund for this building I should like to announce that we hope to increase our donation as the result of a softball game to be played in front of the centre block at 6.45 on Thursday evening. The two teams will be composed of the youths of the House of Commons and the experienced team from the press gallery. The honorary battery will be our two Victoria Cross men, and the first batter will be the Speaker of the house. We hope the collection will be taken up by a lady from the Senate and a lady from the House of Commons, though we are not sure of that yet; and we trust that we shall have a silent but heavy donation to the fund. The teams will be led to the field by an hon. senator playing your—I will say our—beloved bagpipes. We ask your hearty co-operation.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

PUBLIC SERVICE—TRAVELLING AND LIVING EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I again bring to the attention of the Secretary of State the fact that some six weeks have gone by since this house passed, as orders for returns, two questions standing in my name relating to travelling expenses of members of the public service for 1949. Is the minister in a position to give me any hope at all that this return will be brought down?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I have done my best to hurry the preparation of the answers to these questions, but I find that in some of the departments the work is exceedingly complicated, and up to the present I have had no report from two departments. I am trying to get the returns as quickly as possible. I shall make a further effort to expedite them.

Mr. Graydon: Which departments are in default?

Mr. Bradley: I could not be sure at the moment.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTROL OF ELEVATORS AND RAILWAYS, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 252, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a few remarks on this bill. As you know, this is the outcome of an experiment we have been conducting for the past four or five years. Since the summer of 1946 the wheat agreement between the United Kingdom and Canada has been debated in this house on various occasions; and in order to clarify some of the statements that have been made I should like to point out that the agreement was first announced in this house on July 25, 1946, by the then minister of trade and commerce. On July 30, 1946, speaking of that agreement, at page 4037 of Hansard the minister said:

> There is no question that the wheat producers have made possible the success of domestic price control by immediate sacrifices in their 1945-46 and current export prices. These sacrifices have also assisted in overseas rehabilitation. The government is convinced that the outlined policy will give fair and comparatively stable returns to the producers, so far as it is within the power of the government.

There, I think, we have the nucleus of the whole control system from that time on as far as prices to consumers in this country were concerned, and to a large extent as far as prices to consumers in Great Britain were concerned.

Later another measure was introduced having to do with agricultural support prices, and so on. It was the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) who negotiated this agreement on behalf of the then minister of trade and commerce, and he was given full credit for it at that time. Several times since then the Minister of Agriculture has indicated that the prices of other agricultural products were more or less determined on the basis of the price of wheat, which has been controlled and is still controlled.

As I have said on other occasions, there was no opportunity to debate that announcement at that time. It was put through by order in council; and when the leader of the opposition at that time asked when it might be debated, the reply of the then minister of trade and commerce was that on his estimates, which were still to come before the house, there would be an opportunity to discuss the contract. It was discussed to a certain extent later that year, in the following month, and I am going to quote what the Minister of Agriculture had to say on August 14, as it appears at page 4810 of Hansard:

When we are at the end of the four-year period, if in the last six or twelve months we find ourselves in the position that world markets, so-called, are not offering as much for wheat as we are getting for it, I hope people will still stand behind us to the extent they are standing behind us now. Even if wheat stays above $1.55 during the whole period, I hope people will still feel that it was worth while trying. If we are successful in this experiment, then we can talk to the grain trade people with some assurance. If they are able to show us at the end of the five-year period that we were all wrong, that over the length of time the farmer got less than he ever got before under similar circumstances and that the other system would have brought him more, then we shall be in a position to discuss the matter with them on an even footing. I am sure anyone who has taken this position and finds himself wrong will be quite prepared to discuss it from that point of view. In the meantime we are convinced that this is the best thing for the farmer. As long as we are convinced of that, and having another four years in which to try it out, we can put the policy into effect in a way that will at least help us to determine how this long argument between farmer and grain trade in western Canada ought to be settled in the interests of the great masses of the people.

On August 15, 1946, at page 4848, the minister put on the record in detail the terms of this contract. In one of the paragraphs there is this statement:

In determining the prices for these two crop years, 1948-49 and 1949-50, the United Kingdom government will have regard to any difference between the prices paid under this agreement in the 1946-47 and 1947-48 crop years and the world prices for wheat in the 1946-47 and 1947-48 crop years.

That is termed the "have regard to" clause, and is significant. In the same contract it was set forth that the United Kingdom might resell any of this wheat or flour to any country at any price they desired. The entire agreement is there; anyone who wishes to refer to it may do so.

Since that time the Minister of Agriculture has on various occasions said there has not been a world price for wheat. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and I pinned the Minister of Agriculture down during the course of a debate, and he and the then minister of trade and commerce admitted that the Canadian wheat board, in arriving at the Canadian price for class II wheat, used the American grain exchange as a yardstick, along with other factors. The admission can be found in Hansard. I believe everyone in the grain trade throughout the world, as well as those holding official positions, recognize that the price for class II wheat is the world price.

I have recited the argument of the Minister of Agriculture that this was an experiment for four or five years. Certainly it is explicit in his argument that on behalf of this government he was taking a long gamble in assuming that at the end of the contract period the bottom would have fallen out of the wheat market and Britain would have to pay more under that contract than the prevailing world price. As I have stated before, no one in the world ever took as long a gamble in selling wheat as was done under that contract, because the government contracted to sell 600 million bushels of wheat over a four-year period, and the greater part of the wheat had not even been seeded. You talk about the grain exchange! I am not saying anything in favour of the grain exchange, because I have always argued in favour of the Canadian wheat board. But I do believe we should be fair, and listen to all the arguments on both sides.

The very opposite to what the Minister of Agriculture set forth in his argument at that time has happened. He said that if wheat were selling for much less than the contract price after the war, he hoped we would stand behind the contract. Since then there has not been a day when the world price for wheat has not been considerably above the contract price. I am sure that on July 31 of this year, when the contract ends, the wheat producers of Canada will have suffered a loss amounting to many hundreds of millions of dollars. They have not only lost money on the 600 million bushels sent to Britain, but for some years the price of wheat made into flour in Canada was tied to that price. Roughly there is about 70 million bushels of wheat annually used that way in this nation. The price for that 70 million bushels of wheat bore a relationship to that contract, so that over these years the farmers have suffered a loss in subsidizing the consumers of Britain and Canada. I do not wish to labour this point, but there are many new members of this house who are not conversant with the contract and with the debates which took place at that time.

On May 30 of this year, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce returned from discussing this situation in Britain, he made a statement. I asked him this question, which appears at page 2985 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if at this conference a basis of settlement under the "have regard to" clause was discussed for the great loss suffered by Canadian wheat producers as a result of these United Kingdom-Canada wheat contracts?

Mr. Howe: I understand the wheat board act will be discussed later in the session, and I do not care to amplify this statement at the moment.

He pointed out that the matter of wheat had been discussed by him with the Canadian wheat board officials and the proper officials in Britain. The Minister of Agriculture has stated that within the last six months of the experiment we might be in a position to decide the matter. We are now within a period of weeks of the termination of the final contract. Surely the minister is now prepared to tell this house the result of the discussions on the basis of the "have regard to" clause. The final settlement on the basis of the "have regard to" clause has been postponed until July, 1950. I have pointed out, as have other people more conversant with the subject than I, the great loss, running somewhere between $500 and $600 million, that has resulted to date. The year's business is not completed; therefore no one will know the exact figure until July 31 of this year. Surely the minister will say at least on what basis the United Kingdom proposes to make up this gigantic loss. The Minister of Agriculture pointed out that the wheat producers would not suffer any great loss, because if the United Kingdom failed to make up the loss—he was then referring to the matter of these contracts, and the fact that if Britain did not take as much wheat under the contract this year she might take timber, salmon, and other things—then the federal treasury of this country would make that loss good.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member has quoted the Minister of Agriculture. Will he tell me on what page of Hansard I can find that quotation?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I shall get it for the minister. I have not got it before me at the moment.

Mr. Howe: I have never heard him make that remark.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I do not know whether the minister was in the house at the time. I had the page marked; I shall give it to the minister before we pass from the committee stage. Not only that, but the Minister of Agriculture said that the Prime Minister had requested him to make the statement. I cannot give the exact wording, but I can give a rough approximation of it. He said that the federation of agriculture and other officials had visited the cabinet before the opening of this session, and the matter had been discussed. The minister prefaced his remarks by saying the Prime Minister had asked him if he was going to speak in the debate—I think it was the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, but I would not be sure. The Prime Minister said that if he did intend to speak, the government's intention in this regard should be cleared up. Roughly, that is what the Minister of Agriculture said, but I shall give the minister the proper page reference in Hansard.

I should think that in fairness to those who spoke when we entered into that contract the minister should at this stage tell us the basis of the discussion with the United Kingdom for settlement of this contract, and, if there is to be no settlement by the United Kingdom, then on what basis the government proposes to make up the loss to those producers. It has been intimated that we could properly discuss this subject when the bill was before the house.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a few short comments to make at this time. I can say that the members of this group, as did other members of all parties, supported the original United Kingdom wheat agreement. We believed at that time, and we believe today, that such long-term agreements, which enable us to have a market for a large quantity of wheat, are in the interests of our producers. I cannot see how any hon. member could now go back and criticize that agreement, and at the same time complain that a new agreement similar to that one has not been signed. My only wish is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) could have announced a further United Kingdom wheat agreement to provide for the sale of the same large quantities of wheat as were provided for in the first agreement.

The farmers believed that they were being given protection as to price, not only during the period of that agreement but over a longer period after that agreement came to an end. Our producers also felt that because of the "have regard to" clause, if they did make great sacrifices within that four-year period, those sacrifices would not have been in vain, but would have been made up either by the United Kingdom government or through a continuing price stabilization policy carried on by this government, a policy which would take that great sacrifice into consideration.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that we in this group, today as in the past, support the continuation of the Canadian wheat board as the sole marketing agency for wheat. In that stand we believe that we have the support of the organized farmers of western Canada. If there is any criticism as to the extent of the wheat board's operations at this time, it comes from the fact that the wheat board is not the sole marketing agency for all grain produced in western Canada. We hope that the time is not far distant when this government will extend the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board Act so that all grains may be included under it. At the same time we should like to see the wheat board engaged not only in the buying, but also, as the sole agency, in the selling of oats and barley. We object to the grain exchange being used for the sale of oats, barley, rye and flax at this or any other time.

I believe that the wheat picture is not nearly as bright as some might have us believe. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day assumed that the rock bottom floor under the amount of our shipments to Britain this year would be 100 million bushels, I think he demonstrated how serious may be the market situation for wheat in the future. During the last four years we sold, on the average, 150 million bushels of wheat to the United Kingdom each year. During the present year our contract calls for the sale of 140 million bushels. We therefore see the prospect of losing the United Kingdom market for wheat to the extent of between 20 million and 40 million bushels. I am afraid we may have great difficulty in replacing that market with other markets in other countries.

If I read correctly the reports from the Department of Trade and Commerce, we are likely to have a large carry-over of wheat at the end of July; in fact, I believe it will be a much larger carry-over than we had a year ago. According to a report issued by the dominion bureau of statistics, on May 18 we had in Canada a visible supply of wheat of 117,500,000 bushels of wheat; on May 19 of last year, almost one year ago to the day, we had on hand only 99,800,000 bushels. On May 18 of this year the visible supply of wheat in Canada exceeded the visible supply of a year ago by 17,700,000 bushels. All I can say is that if that trend continues we may wind up at the end of this crop year on July 31 with a carry-over of between 90 million and 100 million bushels of wheat. That carry-over exceeds the normal carry-over in pre-war days, and it is a carry-over that might well become unmanageable if it continues to grow. In the face of that possible large carry-over, I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce should have endeavoured to obtain a further United Kingdom-Canadian wheat contract.

As I have said before, I am not at all happy about the reduction in the initial price for wheat. I believe that it represents a serious blow to western Canada. A year ago the farmers received a further payment of 20 cents a bushel, amounting to $213 million. They are not receiving any large further payment at this time, and the initial price or initial payment will be lowered by 35 cents a bushel on August 1. If the farmers market a normal crop of some 300 million bushels this year, they will sustain a drop in income, because of the lowering of the initial payment, of approximately $100 million. That will add up to a drop in income to western farmers during the coming year, on account of wheat sales, of something in the neighbourhood of $300 million.

Unless something is done to increase the income of western farmers, our people will not be able to purchase all the farm machinery, manufactured goods and lumber that they have been purchasing in the last few years. Western Canada has proved to be the best market for manufactured goods produced in our country; and in my opinion to allow this substantial drop in income is not in the best interests of any part of Canada.

There has been a great deal of discussion as to what happened to the agricultural producer over the last four or five years, and as to what sacrifices he has made or losses he has sustained because of the government's wheat policy. I have before me the last report of the Canadian wheat board. It shows that in the first three years covered by the United Kingdom wheat agreement, class II wheat sold for $2.39 a bushel. During the period of the United Kingdom wheat agreement, up to that date, we had sold to the United Kingdom 339 million bushels at $1.55 a bushel, or 84 cents a bushel less than the average price for class II wheat. During the same period we sold 146 million bushels to the United Kingdom at $2 a bushel, 39 cents a bushel less than the price of class II wheat. That represents a substantial contribution by the agriculture producers of our country. Moreover, not only were our farmers called upon to make sacrifices because of the United Kingdom contract, but they were called upon to make sacrifices because of the domestic price of wheat set by the government from time to time.

According to the same report of the wheat board, during the first three years covered by the United Kingdom wheat agreement, the Canadian consumer obtained 38 million bushels of wheat at $1.25 a bushel, $1.14 a bushel less than the average price for class II wheat. The consumer obtained 112 million bushels at $1.55 per bushel, 84 cents less than average price for class II wheat. The Canadian consumer obtained 52 million bushels at $2 a bushel, 39 cents less than the price received for our class II wheat. According to those figures, that represents a contribution by the wheat producers of western Canada to the Canadian consumer within that three-year period of $159 million. Because of that great sacrifice, and because of the contribution made by the wheat producer to the Canadian consumer, the farmer believed—as did I up until the last few days—that funds would be made available for the support of wheat prices if that action became necessary in order to provide stability.

Speaking in the house on May 30, the Minister of Trade and Commerce made it perfectly clear that under the present bill setting out the wheat board policy for the next three years the government does not intend in any way to support the price of wheat. He went over the history of pooling arrangements, and said that the only way pooling arrangements could be sound was to establish an initial price for a given year at 60 per cent of the July cash price for wheat.

The minister should not forget that during those pooling periods farmers were pooling their own grain on a voluntary basis, and of course it was in their own interests to have a sound pooling arrangement. But now the government is doing the pooling, and has done it for a number of years. According to the annual statement of the wheat board, during the last three years the Canadian consumer received wheat at a price which meant that the farmer of western Canada contributed to the consumer to the extent of $159 million.

In my opinion, if there is any equity and any fairness, that contribution by the wheat producer to the Canadian consumer should now result in the government guaranteeing a substantial initial payment to the wheat producer, so that his standard of living may not be allowed to drop, even though such procedure might cost the public treasury some money.

The farmer has made his contribution to the Canadian consumer, and now the consumer should be prepared to make his contribution to the agricultural economy, if such contribution became necessary because of falling prices. But under the present bill each pooling period is to stand on its own feet—and when I say that, I am using the minister's own words. In other words, under the present bill the farmer is not going to recoup a single dollar of the loss he sustained in the last four or five years. Moreover there is no guarantee that even with the lower floor price he will be able to sell all the wheat he produces.

[Mr. Argue.]

A plan was discussed last November before the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations by which surplus food commodities might be moved to needy countries from the countries in which those surpluses occurred. The proposed arrangement may have had some faults, but the fact is that our government blocked any consideration of it as it was placed before the organization at that time. Speaking for the government, the Minister of Agriculture said that national policies would be able to deal with surplus commodities. Well, I hope the government will now act on that statement and take every bushel of wheat the western farmers produce. The government had a chance to support an international pooling arrangement for the sale of agricultural surpluses, but in its wisdom it decided that national policies were the best means by which to deal with surpluses. So now it is the responsibility of the government to make sure that wheat surpluses are either disposed of or stored, and that the farmer is not asked to bear a disproportionate share of the government's wheat policy in the future, as he has been asked to bear it in the past.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) asked me a question, but because I did not have Hansard before me at that time I was not in a position to answer. I have now before me the page of Hansard in question, and from it I should like to quote the words of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) as they are found at page 569, the issue of March 8, 1950. Then there is another matter of privilege—

Mr. Howe: Would you mind reading it?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Yes, but it is lengthy. The Minister of Agriculture is reported to have said:

> What I want to say is what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said to the farm delegation when that point was raised at the time the Canadian Federation of Agriculture met us a short time ago just before the opening of the session.

I shall read it all, so that no one can say that I have left some out. It continues:

> When the remark was being made the other day the Prime Minister asked me if I intended to speak—and I said that I probably would—and suggested that that matter ought to be answered in the house just as he answered it to the farmers.
> There is another reason that I am referring to it. It has not particularly to do with the affairs of my department; it has to do with the Department of Trade and Commerce. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was not here at the time that the farm delegation met the government and he therefore was not a party to the discussion. But he was here when the discussion took place as to whether or not the exchange would be made. What I wish to say to this house, and through this house to the country, is that the Prime Minister stated to the farmers that it was decided during the first discussion that every dollar the wheat pool was entitled to as a result of the British agreement would be paid into the pool by the end of this crop year, on the basis on which the British agreement called for the deliveries, and that therefore there would be no possibility whatsoever of any loss being taken by the farmers of western Canada as a result of that exchange. The money will be paid into the pool by the government of Canada and any loss which is taken—if any loss is taken; and we do not expect that there will be any—would naturally be taken by the treasury or by a settlement that we get from the British under the "have regard to" clause rather than by the farmers themselves. I thought it was necessary that that matter should be cleared away at this time in order that we may avoid discussion of the idea in the future.

I think that is clear. Then, another point—

Mr. Howe: It may be clear to you, but it is not clear to me. The minister was talking about exchange loss, was he not?

Mr. Ross (Souris): We had expected that this amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act would not be brought up in the house while the committee on agriculture was sitting, as it is this morning, to discuss the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, in which many of us are vitally interested. The result is that we cannot have the members in the house. Indeed, the Minister of Agriculture himself is tied up in that committee and cannot be here to discuss a bill which is most important, and an arrangement which on behalf of this government he negotiated back in 1946. It is unfortunate that the government cannot arrange the business of the house so as to meet the convenience of members.

Mr. Howe: We are not discussing past negotiations in wheat. We are discussing a bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act. If we could keep to that it would save a good deal of time, and also leave my hon. friend free to go to the committee on agriculture.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that it has been found necessary to have the committee on agriculture and colonization sit this morning at the same time Bill No. 252 is being discussed in the house. Apparently that was unavoidable, but it has meant that those of us who belong to small groups have had to split up into still smaller numbers in order to be represented in both places.

Bill No. 252 will prolong the life of the wheat board until the end of July, 1953. Lest there be any mistake about it, I want to state again that we Social Crediters are in favour of the wheat board continuing in operation. While many people who do not understand the functions of the wheat board have blamed t for some of the things that have occurred in the past, as a grower of grain I am quite satisfied that the wheat board is the best organization we have had up to date.

The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) have covered many of the points that I had intended to deal with, and it would be needless repetition for me to go over them again. But I do want to stress the fact that the wheat growers of the prairie provinces have been subjected to unnecessarily heavy losses because of the operation of the British wheat agreement and the supplying of cheap bread to the Canadian people for the past number of years. Many people do not realize this, nor do they realize that because of the concessions made to the Canadian people the wheat growers of the three prairie provinces lost approximately $600 million in the crop years 1946, 1947, 1948 and 1949. That was quite apart from losses that were suffered on other agricultural products because of government policy.

I submit that there should be some settlement of the losses that have been sustained. The quotations read by the hon. member for Souris, as well as one I intend to read in a moment, should definitely prove the fact that these losses have been suffered by the farmer and that at least certain ministers of the government agree that that is so. The Ottawa Journal of February 10, 1949, contained the following article:

War sacrifices of farmers entitle them to fair prices.

Canadian farmers were "entitled now" to prices which would justify their wartime sacrifices, agriculture minister Gardiner said last night. He was speaking to the annual meeting of the Ontario Concentrated Milk Producers Association at the Chateau Laurier. More than 150 delegates are attending the two day session, the largest in several years.

"Because there have been declines in the United States, people here are suggesting that food prices should drop to that level, forgetting that prices there rose during the war to a peak never experienced here."

The whole idea in preventing high food prices in Canada during wartime was to allow a "levelling out" afterwards, Mr. Gardiner remarked.

He was "inclined to agree" with the popular statement that consumers did not appreciate what farmers did during the war in keeping the cost of food down. Mr. Gardiner said he was "surprised that farmers had not been able to sell that idea fully."

To reduce the cost of food would mean "bringing down returns to farmers".

"People are inclined to forget that farmers, and dairy farmers in particular, were asked to hold their hand on prices during the war—at a time when they might have charged almost what they wanted."

That statement was made by the Minister of Agriculture, who I believe knows agricultural conditions in Canada as well as or better than any of us. I am sorry to see that no steps are being taken by the government to settle up the losses sustained in the past. On different occasions during the first few sessions, particularly on the last day of the session before the last general election, I have asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) what the government intended to do about making good those losses, but up to the present time no statement has been made. I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce will tell us what the government policy is, so that we may know whether the farmers will be asked to continue to carry these heavy losses.

I should like to know why the price of wheat has dropped the way it has. We find that today the cost of living index is at the highest point on record, 164, and we know that after the last war when the wheat board was established, we received an average price of $2.63 for wheat under wheat board operations. At that time the farmer's costs were not half what they are today. Over the past four year period the initial and interim prices have amounted to only $1.75.

The setting of an initial payment of $1.40 for next year is one method of inducing people to bid lower prices for our wheat. It is an admission by the government that the price of wheat should come down. As far as I know, the prices of most of the things the farmer must buy are still climbing; in only a very few cases has there been a drop in prices.

Many people realize that this question is of interest only to the farmers or grain growers, and I have been trying for some time to show that when the farmer has money, then Canadians as a whole are prosperous. Just as soon as the farmer is prevented, either by lack of crops or by poor prices, from having sufficient money to buy the products of industry, then the workers will find themselves on the street because there will be no jobs for them. This should be taken into consideration by the government when dealing with agricultural products.

I want to say again that I am glad that the life of the wheat board is being prolonged. While the government and the wheat board have been doing a good job in getting rid of our wheat, I do not think sales should be pushed without adequate prices being received. It would be much better for us to grow a smaller amount of grain and sell it at prices which have a proper relationship to the things we have to buy.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. members who have preceded me, I regret that the agriculture committee is sitting at this hour, because of necessity many members who are interested in this problem and who represent wheat growing areas are attending that committee and consequently are unable to be here. This problem is one of the most important that has come before the house, from the point of view of those who represent prairie constituencies.

I agree with what has been said by hon. members who have preceded me, and shall not repeat their argument that the farmers are entitled to more consideration in regard to initial price. All of us support the wheat board method of marketing, and I do not think there is a member from a prairie constituency who will take any other view. We want to see it continued, and our supporters want to see it continued. We believe it is the proper method of dealing with this particular matter.

I believe a vast majority of the producers would like to see all grains marketed through marketing boards which would be more representative of the producers than is the wheat board.

I want to say something this morning about the initial price. The bill leaves it to the governor in council to set the price. I quite agree with the statement that has been made that the initial price which is to be set is too low when we consider the contributions that the farmers have made over the past number of years, particularly during the war. I also want to express my regret, as I did when the minister made his announcement on May 30 as to the new United Kingdom agreement, that the agreement is not for a longer period of time and for an adequate price, as I think our producers expected it would be.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Fair) has made the point well that at the present time the cost of living is at the highest figure in the history of our country, and that this is reflected in the cost of production of farm products. The costs of production of all farm commodities have reached unprecedented heights. Consequently I think that the initial price this year should be different; and it should be set out in the bill now before us, instead of leaving the fixing of the price as provided in the bill. Of course no one can say what the price of wheat is going to be in the next year. The minister made an optimistic prediction the other day, but no one can tell. Indeed, the prognostications that economists, members of parliament and others have made over the past few years as to the price of wheat and the manner in which the economy would develop in the course of a year or two, have in many instances proven to be wrong. Consequently it is very difficult to make any prediction as to the future.

I remember, when the British wheat contract was before the house on August 15, 1946, the conflicting views that were expressed sometimes by the same speakers. I have Hansard for that date before me. I remember Mr. Bracken, then leader of the opposition, making various predictions. He said, for example, at page 4822 of Hansard for August 15, 1946:

> . . . Britain is expected to pay more for our wheat two years from now than the world price when it may be lower, I say that as an insurance that this will be done, it is valueless.

Again on the same page he said very much the same thing:

> This, Mr. Chairman, is the end of the government's policy of selling cheap wheat to the hungry nations of the world other than Britain, and it will be a handicap to us in trying to build up a market in all these other countries which so interpret this arrangement.

Again he said:

> I predict that in two years, or a little more, this agreement will blow up, when the advantages to Britain are gone and when her own people will be wanting to get food at the world price, as they have always wanted to, and when the world price will probably be lower than it is now.

That merely illustrates how very difficult it is to predict what is going to happen over a period of time. I thought that perhaps the opposite might happen, and that wheat might go up. I certainly thought that the cost of production would rise. We have no guarantee now that the cost of production will fall. At that time I said, as reported at page 4825 of Hansard:

> I believe the government would be well advised to consider this suggestion that in the event of the costs of production rising for the next few years, as they will do largely because of the government's failure to maintain the ceilings, any difference there may be between what the farmer receives for his wheat and the increased cost of production should be made up out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Let us remember that at that time, when we were discussing the price under the British contract, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) thought that the price then being negotiated was fair because he put the parity price at $1.41 or $1.42, and not $1.55, which some of us were suggesting. Today, with the cost of production where it is, if we are going to consider a parity price for wheat the initial price should be very much higher than the $1.40 which the government proposes to set. Indeed the minister's own statement the other day, when he thought that the average price we might get this year for wheat might not be less than the price we got last year, would also warrant a higher initial price.

I regret very much indeed that the government set a lower initial price, because, as was stated by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) a few moments ago, that seemed to be an invitation to our customers to bid a lower price than we might otherwise get. That is one of the great difficulties of the bill and the whole arrangement. I am not going to try to estimate the wheat growers' losses; some have been suggested this morning, although you could argue that if Canadian wheat had been thrown on the market the United States price might have been considerably lower than it was, and therefore when we made a comparison the loss would not have been as great.

Mr. Fair: People have to have wheat, anyway.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and the hon. member for Battle River may be quite right when they give the figure of the losses as some $600 million. We do not know about that, but it is certain that there was a considerable loss. It is also certain that farmers of Canada assisted the government in maintaining price ceilings and took a great loss as to the amount of wheat consumed on the domestic market. I think that cannot be gainsaid. Consequently I regret that the initial price is not in the bill and for a longer period. I regret that the amount of wheat we are likely to sell to Great Britain is so much less than many of us had hoped. It is only 100 million to 120 million bushels. With a hungry world all around us we should be able to get rid of any surplus that our farmers produce. Unfortunately, however, economic conditions are such that Canada has to trade, and unless we can get something in return for our wheat we cannot trade. The nations that need it often cannot give us anything for our wheat. We are in a difficult position with a sale of only 100 million or 120 million bushels of wheat to Great Britain.

I do not want to prolong the discussion. I have heard the views of the hon. members for Souris, Assiniboia and Battle River. I hold similar views myself, and I believe that if the hon. members who are attending the meetings of the standing committee on agriculture were here they would express similar views. I want to move an amendment which I believe is wholly in line with amendments we moved earlier on somewhat similar marketing measures. I believe the amendment to be thoroughly in order because it expresses a view contrary to the principle of the bill. The principle of the bill is that the governor in council should set the initial price. I believe that parliament should decide on the initial price. We in this parliament have the obligation of doing justice to the group of producers who contributed so largely to the maintenance of our own price ceilings and to the feeding of the world during the war years.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight):

That Bill No. 252 should not now be read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the provision of an initial payment, for the periods covered by this bill, of $1.75 per bushel for No. 1 northern wheat basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver.

Those, of course, are the points. I wish we could include Churchill as well. In any event I think the house should express its opinion on this matter. I believe the amendment is quite in order, and that as a parliament we should see to it that something better is done than simply to leave the fixing of the initial price to the governor in council, and particularly, to permit the comparative low initial price already announced to go into effect this year. This will not in any way delay the progress of the bill. It is not our purpose to delay it, or to interfere in any way with its passage. We believe in the wheat board method of marketing, but we do want the house to express an opinion on the initial price.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think I should say a word on the amendment in reference to the discussion that has taken place. First I should like to refer to the quotation from a statement by the Minister of Agriculture read by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). From his remarks I had understood that he was referring to a statement of general application to the marketing of wheat, but on looking up the quotation I find that the reference is to only twelve and a half million bushels of wheat for which delivery is being deferred.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I believe I stated that in my opening remarks.

Mr. Howe: I do not think you did so.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Yes; I was referring to lumber and salmon and other commodities that were taken out this year.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member is quite correct if his remarks are limited to the twelve and a half million bushels of wheat which the Minister of Agriculture stated would be paid for at the United Kingdom-Canada contract price. As a matter of fact the arrangement with the United Kingdom provides that an order will be placed for the twelve and a half million bushels at the contract price for delivery in August; therefore no adjustment arises under that item. I just want to make it clear to the house that remarks of the Minister of Agriculture on that occasion had no relation to the marketing of wheat other than the twelve and a half million bushels to which he was then referring.

Now I come to the question of the so-called losses. I find it hard to understand the reason why people who have so little use for grain markets should be so confident that the price quoted on a United States grain market must be the world price, notwithstanding the fact that Canadian wheat is denied access to that market. We are told that the Chicago price of wheat throughout the whole speculative period during the 1940's was the world price. I would point out that far more wheat was sold for cash under the United Kingdom-Canada agreement than was sold under the so-called world price, the price quoted on the Chicago market. Practically everything exported by the United States at that time was either given away for military relief or sold under the Marshall plan with funds furnished by the United States to buy wheat from the United States. It seems to me the price at which the bulk of the wheat is bought and paid for might well be regarded as the world price, and I therefore suggest that it would be much more reasonable to call the price under the United Kingdom-Canada agreement the world price than the price quoted on the Chicago exchange. The latter was merely a domestic price which the government paid the trade for wheat shipped for military relief or sold under credits established under the Marshall plan.

Mr. Ross (Souris): What about Canadian class II wheat?

Mr. Howe: Canadian class II wheat was sold at any price that could be obtained. We speak of the loss of markets. In 1946 and 1947 we lost in nearly all markets except the United Kingdom, for the reason that we had contracted to sell practically all our exportable surplus to the United Kingdom. We had a few bushels extra, and we sold those to old customers at the prices that those customers were paying others for wheat at that time, which was the price that they were willing to pay us. For the wheat we sold outside the United Kingdom we received the class II price then prevailing; but I would point out that the class II price for which we are selling wheat today is by no means the Chicago price. It is about 30 to 40 cents under that price; but it is the price which customers outside the international wheat agreement are willing to pay for our wheat. However, there are so few customers outside that international agreement today that the class II price is not very important in so far as the marketing of Canada's crop is concerned.

What is a fair price for Canadian wheat? Well, we sent to Washington to discuss the proposed international wheat agreement a group as representative of the wheat growers of western Canada as I thought could be found. It included at least one representative from each of the three pools, one from the United Grain Growers, and at least two independent farmers, chosen for the prominent part they had played in Canadian agriculture. What did those men recommend to the government as a fair maximum price for Canadian wheat? First they recommended $1.70; which was later, through negotiation, increased to $1.80, which our advisers obviously considered a fair maximum price for western Canada's wheat crop. The minimum price also was established on their recommendation. As hon. members know, that is on a sliding scale. For the current year it is $1.50. For the next crop year it will be $1.40; for the following crop year, $1.30; and for the year following, $1.20. That was the recommendation of a carefully selected group of representatives of the wheat growers of the three prairie provinces. The significant figure to which I want to call the attention of the house is the maximum price they recommended to the government, which finally was $1.80 in United States funds. The counterpart of that maximum price today in Canada is $1.98 in Canadian funds.

Then we come to the question of an initial payment. I think those who believe in pooling wheat believe that pools should stand on their own feet. Certainly that is the theory on which pooling was established in this country by the Alberta wheat pool back in 1923. Certainly that is the theory upon which pooling was carried on during the period in which it proved to be practicable. It was a departure from that principle that wrecked pooling in this country in 1929 and plunged the pools into debts which they have only now succeeded in paying off. The year after those debts were financed by the provincial governments a further departure from that policy brought about the ultimate collapse of pooling, and resulted in the taking over of the marketing of wheat by the federal government.

Those who believe in pooling should for that reason believe in sound principles of pooling. It is suggested now that an initial price be established that might very well lead to the bankruptcy of the 1950-51 pool in its first year under this amended wheat marketing act. Why would we do that? It seems to me that if pooling is sound policy then sound pooling principles should prevail. Why does the amendment provide that the government shall establish the initial price? Because the government hopes to be able to vary the initial price during the year in favour of the farmers, as it has done in working out the five-year pool. The five-year pool started with the initial price of $1.35 per bushel. After a period that was raised to $1.55 per bushel, and it was raised again to $1.75 per bushel. When we speak of the initial price for the five-year pool, we should remember that that price was raised from time to time as conditions within the pool made possible, and always under conditions which gave the government reason to believe that the new initial payment represented a safe price. In other words, when the government fixed the price at $1.75 it fixed it at a time when the pool could not have been made bankrupt by any circumstance that could then be foreseen, arising out of known conditions of completing sales of all pool wheat. The initial price was always a safe price.

We have set the price at $1.40 for the crop year of 1950, and we have done that because it is the minimum price under the international agreement for that year, stated in United States funds. It is true at the moment Canadian funds are at a ten per cent discount from United States funds, but that may well be a temporary situation. The historic position of the Canadian dollar is at par with the United States dollar. How long the discount situation will continue, I do not know. It may continue for five years or ten years, but there is also the possibility it may not continue for very long. There are certain factors that raise a doubt in my mind as to whether that period may not be shorter rather than longer. That is another element that has to be considered in fixing the minimum price. However, if by next February the pool has accumulated a considerable surplus through paying a low initial price, certainly the initial price will be increased, payment made for past deliveries and a new initial price established for future deliveries. It has never been the policy of the government to accumulate large sums in the pool, when these sums can with safety be paid to the growers.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the minister permit one short question?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: I believe he has missed my point. My point was that, owing to the sacrifices made by the farmers at a previous time, the initial price should now be set at $1.75. If necessary, compensatory adjustment should be made from the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, just as we do for certain other agricultural products.

Mr. Howe: If my hon. friend is suggesting that his amendment may cause a drain on the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, and I was about to suggest that this is so—

Mr. Coldwell: I am not suggesting that, but should the price of wheat fall, it could be done that way, as for other agricultural products.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member's suggestion may lead to a drain on the public purse and that would make the amendment out of order. I believe the mover of the amendment has made a suggestion which puts his amendment out of order.

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Howe: I do not wish to prolong the argument, Mr. Speaker. I suggest to you that the amendment in out of order, because it threatens a drain on the public purse, and for that reason cannot be moved by a private member. If there is any doubt about it, I am quite willing to let the matter go to a vote of the house.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Will the minister say something about the proposed basis of settlement under the "have regard to" clause in the contract? When he made his statement the other day he did suggest we could discuss it when this bill was before the house.

Mr. Howe: I do not see anything in the bill that refers to it, but I should be glad to have anyone discuss it who wishes to do so.

Mr. Fair: Is it the minister's intention to make a statement on that point?

Mr. Howe: On the "have regard to" clause?

Mr. Fair: And the compensation for loss.

Mr. Howe: I made a statement on the so-called losses. I questioned the figures presented by my friend when he referred to $400 million, $500 million, and $600 million, calculated on the price of domestic wheat on the Chicago market.

Mr. Fair: I did not present those figures. I presented figures brought down by the government in reply to one of my questions. If the figures are wrong, then the minister will have to take the responsibility for them. It is the price of our class II wheat upon which hon. members are working, and that is the price for that class of wheat sold on the open market. The minister must take the responsibility for any misrepresentation of the figures.

Mr. Ross (Souris): If I may just refer to this question again, at page 2985 of Hansard the minister certainly implied that we could discuss this clause when this bill was before the house.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Order. I must remind hon. members that we are not in committee. I heard the minister express some doubt whether the amendment was in order. I have examined the citations in Beauchesne's third edition referring to amendments, and I should like to say that the amendment merely refers to the fact that "consideration should be given", and is therefore not an order to the government to spend money out of the public treasury. I have examined the citation, but if the doubt cannot satisfactorily be cleared up, the best way to decide the question is to let the house express its opinion. Therefore, if the house is ready for the question, it is on the following amendment, moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell):

That Bill No. 252 should not now be read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the provision of an initial payment, for the periods covered by this bill, of $1.75 per bushel for No. 1 northern wheat basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver.

I shall ask all those in favour of the amendment to say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Call in the members.

Before the taking of the vote:

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment. Before putting the amendment, may I say that I am not convinced that the amendment is in order. The division bells rang before I had an opportunity of coming to a conclusion on the matter. I shall therefore put the amendment.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Coldwell) which was negatived on the following division:

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL—ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO SOUTH AND SOUTHEAST ASIA—REPORT ON LONDON AND SYDNEY CONFERENCES

The house having reverted to the order for motions:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to take advantage of this opportunity to make a report on my recent journey to London to attend the meeting of the north Atlantic council, but before doing so I should like to say a few words about the commonwealth meeting held in Sydney, Australia, to discuss economic assistance to south and southeast Asia. At that meeting the Canadian government was represented by my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), and I am sure we are all glad to see him back in his seat today after what I know from experience must have been a long and arduous trip.

The commonwealth meeting at Sydney was an important one. This government appreciates its importance, and is anxious to join with other commonwealth governments in co-operating to improve conditions in that particular area of the world. Although there is no limit to our good will in this matter and in other similar matters, naturally there is a limit to our resources. In expending those resources we have to take into consideration other commitments. However, that is the only reservation to our co-operation with other commonwealth countries in this matter.

At the Sydney conference the representatives of the commonwealth who met there recommended a number of points to their governments. It was proposed and agreed that assistance for economic development in that area should proceed by progressive stages under a general plan covering a period of, I believe, six years. Plans for economic development to that end are to be drawn up during the coming months, and the commonwealth scheme for technical assistance for the area is also to be organized within the next few months.

Assistance under this scheme would be available to non-commonwealth governments as well as commonwealth governments in south and southeast Asia. It is hoped that other than commonwealth governments will participate in that assistance. This and related proposals of the conference will be under study by the Canadian government in the near future, when we shall have had a chance to receive a report from the Minister of Fisheries, who reached Ottawa only last night; and when all the necessary information has been received. That is all that I can say about the Sydney meeting at this time.

With regard to my journey to London, by an unexpected and possibly symbolic coincidence I found myself concerned during that visit with the two most important international political agencies of our day, the United Nations and the North Atlantic treaty organization. In London I attended the second formal session of the north Atlantic council. I also had the privilege of an interesting discussion with the Secretary General of the United Nations, who had just completed a series of consultations with the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States, France, and the U.S.S.R.

It is my firm belief, and indeed it is the principle upon which the foreign policy of this government is based, that the North Atlantic treaty and the United Nations complement each other, that the aims and purposes of the larger body are sustained and strengthened by the smaller, and that the greater security which the members of the north Atlantic community enjoy by reason of their association together contributes materially to the political stability which is essential if problems of international order are to be solved.

The central purpose of the United Nations, security for all states through general collective action and vigorous international policies to remove the causes of war, remains the objective which this government, and I am sure this country, is prepared to support by every possible means. We continue to believe that in the long run lasting peace can be established only on the basis of universal action. We continue to believe also in the urgent necessity of pressing on toward that ideal; of taking advantage of every genuine move which brings it nearer to realization. So in London we began the final communiqué of the north Atlantic council meeting with this paragraph:

They—

The members of the council.

—reaffirmed the adherence of their governments to the principles which inspire the United Nations charter and their conviction that common action under the treaty is an integral part of the effort which all free nations are making to secure conditions of world peace and human welfare.

Whether we like it or not, the technical developments of our time are leading us towards "one world." If we do not get there as a result of peaceful co-operation we will almost certainly have that end imposed on us by force at the conclusion of a devastating war. Naturally we want to move towards world unity the peaceful way, and we are more likely to do so if political and economic stability are maintained over as wide an area as possible. That is the reason why the North Atlantic treaty is a constructive contribution to the objectives of our larger policy. To the extent that it increases the security of the members of the north Atlantic community it also increases their ability to co-operate in the work of the United Nations, to fulfil their commitments under the charter, and also to base their policies on the assurance that "one world" may be attained by peaceful means since no one will risk the attempt to impose it by force.

Therefore I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we must never cease to emphasize that the north Atlantic pact is for peace alone. I am more convinced of this than ever before since our discussions in London. I can assure the house, if any assurance is needed, that if any member of the north Atlantic group had aggressive intentions or tried to engage in provocative diplomacy—and this of course is not the case—the other members of the group would neither follow nor support that member. There need be no doubt on that score no matter what the so-called communist "partisans of peace" and their misguided followers may say. The nations of the north Atlantic community who are co-operating for peace can, I think, face the days ahead with renewed and indeed increased confidence because of the decisions that we took at the recent London meeting. In a general way the significance of this council session rests in the evidence it gave of the ability of free nations to meet extraordinary circumstances by vigorous and imaginative measures. The north Atlantic alliance was formed in the first instance in response to a physical threat, the threat of an aggression against the members of our community. Against a common danger we agreed to stand together and use our resources collectively for defence and peaceful development. I have always believed, however, that the North Atlantic treaty was a response to a deeper and more significant compulsion than that of fear. All the circumstances of our times, political, economic, technical and cultural, point to the necessity for greater unity amongst the free nations of the world. And by unity we mean far more than paper agreements for common action in certain contingencies. We mean a genuine coming together of peoples on as wide a front as possible.

We have learned, and indeed all history teaches us, that this is a process which cannot be forced, and which cannot develop except in a favourable climate. We know that it is most likely to prosper amongst people with a common background and similar ideals, and that it must take full account of the realities of national identity, national loyalty and national traditions. In other words, we are faced in our time, in the sphere of international organization, with the old familiar social and political problem of freedom and organization. It seems to me that the North Altantic treaty, arising out of the emergencies of the post-war situation, is an attempt of far-reaching importance to solve this problem within an area where success is least difficult.

Many of the conclusions of our meeting in London are of course necessarily secret, because they affect the details of defence planning. Nevertheless, if you will examine the published conclusions of the council, you will find evidence which I think supports my judgment about the importance of the meeting. In the first place we have taken a decision in the military defence field which I think is without precedent in peacetime. We have adopted the principle of "balanced collective forces" as the basis for our defence. Here is the text of paragraph 5 of the summary of conclusions:

> The council unanimously agreed that if adequate military defence of the member countries is to be achieved it must be along the lines of the most economical and effective utilization of the forces and material at the disposal of the North Atlantic countries. They accordingly urged their governments to concentrate on the creation of balanced collective forces in the progressive build-up of the North Atlantic area, taking at the same time fully into consideration the requirements for national forces which arise out of commitments external to the North Atlantic area.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, this is no less than the principle of the international division of labour to be applied amongst the members of the north Atlantic community for collective defence. We are now pledged to do within the framework of the North Atlantic alliance what each of us has already been doing within our national defence system. We shall try to agree amongst ourselves which of us is the best able to concentrate on certain types of defence preparation.

This principle may come to mean the further application to defence of new techniques and tactics of scientific warfare; and eventually, possibly, the abandonment of the old concept of defence by great masses of conscripted infantry, the bulk of which would be reservists called up on the outbreak of war.

In this planning allowance has to be made for the fact that certain states have commitments which are external to the north Atlantic area. Allowance has also to be made for the specially exposed position of some states to meet an initial attack. The acceptance of "balanced collective forces" does not of course imply a strategy by which less exposed countries, or at least countries less exposed to ground attack, can collect their resources of men and material behind the ramparts of sacrifices made by others so that eventual victory can be achieved. North Atlantic strategy cannot mean, and our agreement does not imply, a strategy of liberation after destruction and occupation. There could be no hope for Europe in that strategy because the next time there may well be nothing to liberate.

On the other hand our strategy cannot be based on plans for national action alone, through national forces developed for national territory alone. The new principle recognizes, if I may pick out a purely hypothetical example, the waste and futility of one country trying to build battleships, let us say, if there are enough of these already in the navies of other members of the group. This principle in its turn must rest on the firm assurance that the other battleships, if I may continue that example, will be at your service if you need them. Therefore I think, Mr. Speaker, that this decision in favour of balanced collective forces is of vital importance. Of course it is a decision of principle only. Many bridges will have to be crossed before its application can be worked out in practice. We do not yet know how it will affect the detailed responsibilities of any particular member of the alliance. As far as this government is concerned, in our defence policy we have already accepted this principle and have been trying to relate our policy to the defence of an area rather than merely to the defence of a country. We have been going on that principle and we will gladly do what we can to continue its application.

In this field of defence preparation the council also took a number of other important decisions. A beginning has been made by the two defence committees of the council, one military and the other financial and economic, in working out the details of a unified defence program for the north Atlantic community.

The reports of these committees were reviewed and carefully examined, and directives were issued to guide these committees in their future work. To quote from the communiqué, "these directives emphasize that the problem of adequate military forces and the necessary financial costs should be examined as one, not as separate problems." It was recognized that while in present political circumstances defence requirements must come first, nevertheless it might be dangerous and indeed disastrous if the defence effort in any country were carried to a point where it strained and weakened the economic and social fabric of that country. That is one reason, I think, why the north Atlantic nations must plan their defences as a team. That is why there must be the closest co-operation in planning and in production, and the greatest possible standardization of weapons and equipment, a matter which we also discussed in London. Only thus may it be possible for some, and perhaps most, of the members of the Atlantic community to avoid the economic and social dangers of unnecessarily swollen defence expenditures, which would open the doors to the exploiters of domestic discontent.

In short, Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic nations must supply their peoples with guns and butter until guns are no longer needed. How much of each will have to be determined by each country in the light of its own special position and of the general situation. Personally, however, I think it is idle and indeed it could be mischievous to try to lay down formulae and mathematical criteria for the purpose of determining exactly how much each country should do. It may be that the development of a new iron ore field by one country would be a far greater contribution to general security than an additional division of infantry; yet no one wishes to make the comparison, with all its implications, between blood and iron. So we in this north Atlantic group must have, as we do, faith that every member will do its full and fair part in ensuring our collective security. As a result of the decisions we have taken we may now be advised by the agencies we have set up as to the most effective kind of individual contribution we can make to the collective effort. It then remains for the individual governments to decide how this advice and these directives can be made effective by national action.

Other decisions which were important in the field of defence concerned mutual aid and shipping. In London we reaffirmed the principle that self-help and mutual aid are important parts of our defence measures. Again the detailed effect of this decision will have to be worked out. Within the vast area of our alliance, however, there are more than ample resources to meet our defence needs, and tremendous actual or potential productive capacity, much greater than exists or can be developed in the communist despotisms. There are many ways in which we can assure distribution of these resources in a way to meet the demands of the defence program. Mutual aid is only one of them.

The decision to establish a north Atlantic planning board for ocean shipping is another step of great potential importance in the preparation of a unified system of defence. By this means we hope to be able to foresee and meet in advance any emergency that may arise in wartime in connection with the organization of our merchant shipping in the north Atlantic.

These decisions, Mr. Speaker, have carried us a long way, I think, in the preparation of a unified defence system for the north Atlantic community. They are not, however, military decisions alone. A large part of their effectiveness, a large element in the strength of the north Atlantic alliance, rests in the fact that we are not taking decisions about defence unrelated to other problems, and that we are not concentrating merely on military preparations. In this connection I should like to read another part of the council's final conclusions:

> In formulating their directives the council proceeded on the basis that the combined resources of the members of the North Atlantic treaty were sufficient, if properly co-ordinated and applied, to ensure the progressive and speedy development of adequate military defence without impairing the social and economic progress of these countries.

That is a proposition with major implications, and we are able to state it with conviction not merely because we have adopted the principle of division of effort but also because we have written into our treaty, in article 2, a commitment to economic and social co-operation on a wide front. In the light of our determination to proceed with adequate defence measures and at the same time fortify the economic welfare of our north Atlantic community, which is such an important part of our defence, the consideration we gave to article 2 in London takes on a new and added significance. We all agreed that this article is a fundamental part of our pact and that the greatest possible value must be attached to the concept of social and economic collaboration in the north Atlantic community, which it embodies.

The question is continually being asked in regard to article 2 to whether or not we intend to set up some special machinery for this kind of collaboration among the members of the group. Well, it is too soon to answer that question; and of course we can dwell too much on machinery. We have a good deal of machinery at the present time. Sometimes we hear it said that we are going in for harness rather than horse. I think in our north Atlantic and European arrangements we have both horse and harness, and possibly we should concentrate on the production of hay. So at this time I am not able to state that any special machinery will be set up, as a result of our meeting in London, to carry out the principles of article 2.

I should like to explain the line we took in London on this point. There now exists in Europe a very effective economic organization of European states, the organization for European economic co-operation or OEEC. We do not wish either to duplicate the work of this body or to impede it, because it is doing good work. At the same time it seems quite clear that the economic problems of the western world cannot be solved by a purely European body. Yet we cannot suggest to OEEC that it should transform itself into a north Atlantic council body to make article 2 effective, because it includes a number of states of economic importance which do not belong to the north Atlantic alliance: Sweden, Ireland, Switzerland, Greece, Austria, Turkey, and above all, Germany. In these circumstances, it seems to me that it is extremely important that we should avoid putting ourselves, and the countries of western Europe, in the position of having to make a choice between OEEC and the North Atlantic treaty machinery as an instrument of economic co-operation.

To avoid that dilemma, and as a constructive step forward, the governments of France, Great Britain, the United States and Canada have suggested the possibility that, for the time being, the United States and Canada should enter into informal, but I hope effective, relationship with OEEC. This suggestion was made after consultation with Mr. Stikker, the Netherlands foreign minister, who is chairman of OEEC. I expect that it will be considered by OEEC itself sometime in the near future. The circumstances connected with this decision were made known to the house in a statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), I believe on May 18. We are hopeful that, whatever form of organization eventually emerges, it will develop into an important agency for social and economic co-operation between free Europe and free North America; co-operation which may one day lead to an Atlantic commonwealth of free states.

Independent of this OEEC development the council, at its meeting in London, and to emphasize its recognition of the importance of article 2, decided to direct its committee of deputies to study and report as to what further action can be taken under article 2 of the treaty. This report is to be made available for the next meeting of the council in September. These studies will refer to both economic and social questions, and consideration will also be given to the possibility of greater co-operation in preparing and making available information about the aims and objects of the north Atlantic alliance. May I quote again, Mr. Speaker, the relative paragraphs of our communiqué, where the council, through its different deputies, was charged with the duty to > . . . promote and co-ordinate public information in furtherance of the objectives of the treaty while leaving responsibility for national programs to each country;

> consider what further action should be taken under article 2 of the treaty, taking into account the work of existing agencies in this field.

While most of the decisions taken at the north Atlantic council meeting were, as I have pointed out, decisions in principle, decisions in principle are of little consequence unless the details are worked out and given effect. We discussed for some time the question of setting up some kind of more permanent machinery to follow up our work, and to see that the work is made as effective as possible. There were two ways by which this could have been done. One was by making the central figure the secretary general, and by building a machine around him, an international secretariat under the north Atlantic council. The other procedure would have been the establishment of a committee, which would meet in more or less continuous session as deputies of the members of the council, and who would be assisted by the necessary secretariat. The latter course was adopted, and the adoption of that course, I hope, will in a sense put the north Atlantic council into permanent session. It is expected that the governments concerned will appoint their deputies shortly, and that the deputies will then elect a chairman who will become, I suppose, the key figure in this permanent machinery which we set up.

The paragraph in the communiqué dealing with this point reads:

> To enable the council effectively to carry out its responsibilities and to exercise them continuously, each government will appoint a deputy to its council representative. Each deputy will be in a position to give whatever time may be necessary to ensure that the responsibilities of the council are carried out effectively.
> In the intervals between meetings of ministers, the deputies, duly authorized by their respective governments, will be responsible, on behalf of and in the name of the council, for carrying out its policies and for formulating issues requiring decisions by the member governments.

This committee will have its headquarters in London, and it will not be surprising if the United States member of the committee is chosen as its chairman.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few general observations arising from the meeting in London, and from private discussions which I had there from time to time. I was profoundly impressed by the new spirit of hope in Europe and the United Kingdom. There is certainly no reason of any kind for us to be unrealistically optimistic about what is happening or what may happen, and this is certainly no time for us to lower our guard in any respect. Nevertheless, there is a new feeling of confidence in western Europe itself. Both the United Kingdom and western European countries have made great strides in economic recovery, particularly during the last eighteen months. In this recovery aid from North America has been very important, but the countries themselves, by their own efforts, are primarily responsible for the advances they have made. The recovery of morale in western Europe is perhaps of even greater importance. I think it is not an exaggeration to say that that is due in large part to our North Atlantic treaty, and the action which has been taken under it. By this treaty western Europe has been given assurance that it will not be left alone to face the dark threat from the east. In this connection the military aid being provided by the United States under the mutual defence assistance program is of great importance in strengthening immediately the defences of western Europe.

But here again the European countries of the North Atlantic treaty are not leaning on their oars. They are making great progress, and expending every possible effort to strengthen their own position. The recent French proposal for consolidating western European coal and steel production under a single control is indicative of the imaginative approach to their problems that western European nations are making. That is a very important development, as I see it, the importance of which may be as political as economic. It may mean a long step forward in ending the ancient feud between Gaul and Teuton, which has caused so many dark things to be written on the pages of European history. I believe that this is an example of the new approach by Europeans to their problems, and we can only hope it will be successful, both politically and economically.

It has become increasingly apparent that the nations of western Europe and North America must stick together if they are to assure their economic or military security. The recent north Atlantic council meetings in London have, I think, done something to further cement this essential association.

May I conclude, Mr. Speaker, though it may sound a little egotistical for me to do so, by reading from my own statement at the final session of the council. It expresses my own views better than I could possibly express them in any other language at this time. I said then:

> We have done a good week's work. We came here to take further steps to prevent war by strengthening our determination to resist aggression collectively, and our ability to resist it successfully. We have taken those steps.
>
> We have also strengthened the structure of the Atlantic community, now arising out of the destruction of world war II. Our Atlantic community, which is a part of the larger community of the United Nations, is now strong in the power which freedom gives, and in the freedom which power makes possible. We are coming together for peace and human welfare, in a deeper and more permanent way than could ever be brought about by a military alliance alone.
> Nevertheless, the resolutions on which we have agreed, and the words we have uttered, will be of little avail unless our governments and our peoples translate them into action. I am satisfied that this will be done, and that its doing will make a good contribution to peace and human progress.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL —ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO SOUTH AND SOUTHEAST ASIA

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, following the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in connection with the important mission to London from which he has just returned, I wish to make some comments in connection with this and other matters relating to the present foreign situation.

Whatever may be said in a debate such as this, I think the first words of members on this side of the House of Commons ought to be to the effect that when the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke in London and took the stand he did with respect to the North Atlantic council decisions he spoke not merely for the government but also for parliament and for the nation, and that parliament and the nation will give him wholehearted and unanimous support in that stand.

I suppose it will be only natural for members of this house who have sat here for a number of years to recall the conditions of previous years and reflect upon the extent to which our foreign policy objectives have slowly but surely made an almost complete turn from isolation to full-blown co-operation in world affairs. It is a far cry from the day some fifteen years ago when this house heard declarations by virtue of which this country made a hasty retreat from international co-operation in connection with the oil sanctions having to do with the Abyssinian issue. It is a far cry, too, from the days when, just prior to world war II, the government—and the people were perhaps largely behind them—said that they were proud of the fact that this country had no international commitments of any kind whatsoever. It is also a far cry from those days when we were just on the threshold of world war II, and when we debated in this house the problem of Canada's remaining neutral in the event of a world-wide conflagration. But fortunately for our people and for this parliament, those days have gone; and the decisions of the North Atlantic council, which have been so well described by the minister this afternoon, have seen Canada and her friends of the north Atlantic community now going the whole way in burning the last vestige of the bridges of isolation for this country.

The defence of the north Atlantic community is now to be shared by the twelve nations which are signatories to that pact. We had already been committed on principle to that very thing, but this last council meeting did far more than that. It put flesh upon the dry bones of the original pact, and, as a first step, it has translated that principle into the first stages of action. We are now to have, as the minister described it, a specialization with respect to our defence, and balanced collective forces with the minimum of duplication of effort within the north Atlantic community. In other words, each partner is to do what it is best equipped and fitted to do.

Up until now the fulfilment of our commitments under the North Atlantic pact was largely predicated upon one of the signatory powers being the victim of an aggressor. We have now gone the next step forward and have made that commitment applicable before any aggression has taken place. I think it will be evident to everyone in this house that, with this further step forward, when this integration of our armed and economic effort has been effected, we shall have committed ourselves to the policy that we shall not—nor shall any of the nations in the north Atlantic community—any longer follow a go-it-alone policy. Conversely, the collective obligation which we have now assumed to help a nation that is invaded becomes that much stronger. We are now in a community chain, and each link in that chain becomes much more important than it ever was before; because if one link of the integrated defence or economic forces is broken, of course the whole chain itself becomes gravely weakened. In other words, we have joined in a common policy for the defence of the north Atlantic area.

I think all of us had an additional concern in our minds as the minister and the communiqués from time to time brought to the people of this country the message as to what was done at London. We all remember that prior to the last world war great stress was laid upon the alleged impregnability of the then powerful Maginot line. We saw that Maginot line circumvented. We saw it made useless as a defence against aggression. One of the things we have to watch for and to concern ourselves with now is that in this north Atlantic community arrangement, this integrated defence arrangement and plan, we are not isolating our north Atlantic community and are not failing to lay sufficient emphasis upon other parts of the world scene, which parts might easily prove to be the soft underbelly of our whole defence structure, whereby Soviet imperialism might readily avoid striking the strong Maginot line of north Atlantic defence, swing around and outflank us in southeast Asia and other vulnerable areas. We must see to it that the back door to Asia is not left open. I was glad to hear the minister state that there would be a further report forthcoming with respect to the Canberra talks, from which the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) has just returned. I was glad, too, that the Big Three ministers, meeting, as they did, almost concurrently with the north Atlantic council, placed considerable emphasis upon the situation in southeast Asia.

After all, Russian objectives perhaps are not so much pointed at the moment at the stone wall of the north Atlantic defences as they are toward southeast Asia—yes, and toward Japan. The reasons are of course clear to all; because were they to be successful in concentrating their immediate endeavours and their attack on that part of the world, it would mean that not only would key strategic positions be lost to the democratic cause, but there would be a loss of important sources of raw materials in that part of the world, with all the attendant dangers flowing from such a loss.

The loss of Burma, Thailand and Indo-China, and the outflanking of Japan, Okinawa and the Philippines, would leave these latter areas strategically, economically and politically in a position of almost untenability. It needs no stretch of the imagination to see the position in which our good friends of Pakistan and India, who are not yet self-sufficient in the matter of food, would be placed were such a successful flanking movement to take place.

I am most anxious that while we are balancing our economic and military defences in the north Atlantic community we shall not allow ourselves to become isolated, only to find that the flanking movement around that great economic and defence "Maginot" line has struck in softer and more vulnerable spots. We should, so far as possible, lay as much emphasis as we can upon trying to stop the aggression which is so obviously taking place in southeast Asia, and which, were it carried to the conclusion one can visualize, might easily weaken the structure of the north Atlantic community itself.

I know the people and parliament of Canada will support the government in its practical and realistic efforts to enforce peace against any dangerous combination which understands only the language of force and power. I sat in this House of Commons years ago and heard members from time to time—and they were honest, sincere and patriotic members—offer the considered opinion, which was shared by a great many people in Canada, that if this or any other country attempted to prepare for war, somehow or other it was taking a step toward war and away from peace. How often we heard the statement made—and it was accepted in many parts of the country—that if we manufacture weapons and train men, those weapons and men will be turned against some enemy, and in such endeavours we would be moving toward war.

The period in between the two great wars saw us taking that principle to heart, but the unpreparedness of those days did not bring peace; it brought war. It might not have been the only reason for the war, but in any event it is sufficient to show all of us that our being unprepared did not stop aggression, did not stop the holocaust of a second world war. I believe therefore that the people of Canada are ready to try another principle, are ready to see if we cannot enforce peace and make those who would break the peace keep it by being sufficiently strong to avert attack at any time.

In this tough world, where tough and realistic men are anxious to achieve world domination, we must meet fire with fire. As General Eisenhower in effect said, not long ago in an address at Columbia university, unpreparedness, in the condition in which the world now finds itself, is just as criminal as war itself. I am quite sure that when a few moments ago the minister, on behalf of a peace-loving people, voiced the government's aims in connection with the north Atlantic community, said that it was driving toward peace as the chief objective, he said what the people of Canada wanted to hear. The people of this country do not want preparations for war; they want preparations which will ensure peace rather than have world casualty lists published for a third time.

It is the hope of all members of the north Atlantic community that the realistic movement now being made toward peace may lead to a permanent, just and lasting peace. In return for the support that parliament and the people of Canada will give the government, perhaps in a measure greater than it could have expected, parliament and the people will expect the government to tell the whole unvarnished story with respect to the position in which we find ourselves under these new north Atlantic arrangements. In view of the support thus given, the country is entitled to as much information as can be made public, having in mind security considerations. Canadians can take whatever message in this respect there may be, and will be prepared to shoulder whatever burdens the alliance of the north Atlantic community may involve.

However, having said that Canadians can take it, one must add at once that they should know exactly what the future holds for them on all political fronts. They would like to know whether, in the opinion of the government and those closely associated with it in diplomatic affairs, this means that we are moving closer to peace than to war. They would like to know if this is a step, even though a short and halting one, toward a full-blown north Atlantic political and economic federation.

A few moments ago the minister used the word "commonwealth" in describing the movement of the north Atlantic community. Perhaps this gives more point to the question I have just asked. Do the present activities of the north Atlantic community imply—and I believe the people are entitled to know this—that, one day, through the various steps taken, there will be only an Atlantic army, navy and air force, having in mind the integrating features of the plan just placed before parliament and the people? While in a matter of this kind costs are perhaps a secondary or tertiary consideration, the people of Canada ought to be told what additional cost is involved. After all, if we have to tighten our belts, we ought to know how far we have to tighten them. It is only a matter of information. Whatever may be the cost of peace, it can never equal the tragic cost of war. I think the Canadian people are ready to assume their full burden. Secretary of State Acheson, informally addressing a meeting of the congress of the United States, indicated in general terms what the United States people would have to face by way of heavier burdens. Our people ought to know that too. It is part and parcel of the information which the government ought to give our public today.

After all, the government may not be able to take the public into its confidence on all military matters that may be involved, but it ought to take the public into its confidence as to how much it expects of them.

The next question I should like to have answered is this: What part in the economic defence plans will Canada play so far as security is concerned? I know the minister was hesitant about that, for reasons which I think were proper; but I hope that as soon as that information can be given, it will be given, subject to security considerations, to parliament and to the Canadian people. In other words, the Canadian people ought to be told the full implications of this new policy of balanced collective defence; because there is no better way of securing and maintaining the unanimous support of the public of Canada, commonsense and responsible citizens that they are, than to tell them the full facts. When they have the full facts, the Canadian people never let their leaders down.

I should like to make one reference, if I may, to the concurrent meetings of the north Atlantic council and the foreign ministers of the United States, Great Britain and France. I think it was fortunate that those meetings were held at the same time, because, as the minister pointed out a few minutes ago, they helped to clarify the situation with respect to economic considerations affecting their respective countries and their relationships with those parts of the north Atlantic community that are in Europe. However, for those in the house who might wish to refresh their memories with respect to what was agreed to by this country in connection with the economic and social aspects of the North Atlantic pact, I should like to read into the record article 2, which reads as follows:

> The parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

It has been pointed out by many statesmen of the world that you cannot separate peace from prosperity; they are indivisible. For that reason there is an economic part of the North Atlantic pact which is indivisible in respect to this country. While perhaps in the early meetings the question of military aid had to be emphasized, still I think that Canada, the third trading nation of the world, whose economic prosperity depends upon the economic health of the world at large, realizes that article 2 becomes a vital and important part of the North Atlantic pact.

I summon as a witness to my argument with respect to the economic aspects of the quest for peace the words which were uttered within the hearing of all of us in this chamber the other day by the Prime Minister of Pakistan, who said:

> But democracy, in Pakistan or elsewhere, is of little use to the common man unless its advantages are made available to him in his daily life and his standard of living is raised at least to a level which gives him a substantial stake in the way of life which he has chosen for himself.

Then he went on to say:

> . . . for there can be no progress without peace, no peace without progress and the removal of the economic disequilibrium, so apparent in Asia, which keeps more than half the world in poverty and the ferment of discontent, or without international co-operation, which we believe to be the greatest need of all countries, great and small.

Another great and powerful statesman, Prime Minister Nehru of India, spoke in this chamber last fall and uttered words just as strong in support of that argument. The economic and social life of the world is bound up in this whole question of striving toward peace in our time. When these matters of defence are being discussed by the deputies, our choice of a permanent deputy for Canada will have been of great importance, because he will have to deal not only with defence problems, but with the equally important problems of the economics upon which the prosperity of this country is so completely predicated.

In connection with the military and economic defence measures that are to be taken, I should like the minister to tell us at a convenient time whether civilian defence was considered at that meeting. The minister pointed out that while civilians were in the front line in the last war, they are going to be in a much more dangerous position in the next war if there is one. I am afraid that civilian defence is quite often overlooked or relegated to the background in our consideration of defence matters. I submit that it should be placed further up in the priority rating, because, after all, safety and security from outside aggression, whether in other countries or in our own, are of prime importance to the people of Canada as a whole.

I think it is important to realize just how much alarmed the people on the other side of the border are with respect to the matter of civilian defence. I have in my hand the current issue of the United States News and World Report, which in one paragraph gives an example of just how much alarmed they may be over there. This is one of the statements made:

Key industries—

This is, in the United States.

—will have to be put 100 feet underground if they are to be assured of protection from the hydrogen bomb that scientists consider a coming weapon. W. Stuart Symington, new head of the national security resources board, is trying to decide how to break the bad news to the public about what civilian defence will cost in preparing against war involving atomic weapons. Idea until now has been to play down the need for vast new programs costing untold millions to provide the public with the protection it would want in another war.

I point that out as one indication of how those in another part of the world feel with respect to this matter.

I also want to ask the minister, if there was any discussion with respect to civilian defence, whether civilian defence formed a part of the integrated defence program of the north Atlantic community. In some places the prospective costs of civilian defence so far as individual nations are concerned may very well be such that they ought to be pooled in the interests of an integrated and balanced collective defence system. I do not mind saying, Mr. Speaker, and I think I reflect the views of many, that, from the information parliament has, Canada is alarmingly and dangerously behind in her plans for civilian defence for the safety and security of our citizens in case of some unwanted eventuality of the future. I should also like to ask the minister if he will indicate at the proper time whether there was any formal or informal discussion while he was in London, of the vexed question of the recognition of the Chinese Red government. Secretary of state Acheson, in answer to one of the questions propounded to him at the unofficial meeting of congress the other day, indicated that there was some slight sliding from the original position which the United States took as to the recognition of the Chinese Red government. He indicated that the United States government were not now prepared to support its entry into the United Nations, or to give it that much recognition, but that they would not veto such a proposal. Perhaps the minister will enlighten us, at a convenient time, as to what changes have taken place in that position during the last few weeks.

[Mr. Graydon.]

I want to come now to another point having to do with our relations with our great and friendly neighbour to the south. In that regard the minister clarified our position in what I thought was an admirable speech he made in London, a speech which was favourably commented upon by many newspapers. Parliament will support him in what he said on that occasion. Nevertheless certain proposals have been made by persons who perhaps carry some weight in the business world of the United States, and perhaps a private member of the house may be pardoned for making certain observations about them at this time. In doing so I want to indicate clearly that I think a nation that has reached maturity in world affairs should avoid, as I am going to try to avoid, the temptation of barking at every wagon that goes by in the international show. Nevertheless I think most Canadians were calmly amused at an article which appears in the current issue of a magazine called Look which is published in the United States. The article was written by George E. Shea, Jr., financial editor of the Wall Street Journal. I am not going to attempt to read the whole article, because it is lengthy. The heading of the article is, "Why the United States and Canada should be one country". In the article he says:

The frontier between Canada and the United States is becoming today an oppressive cord that threatens to strangle the progress and security of both our countries. Dating back to the revolutionary war, the border for many years has meant little more than an inconvenience. People may have thought idly that it made little sense. But they have put up with it as one submits to any senseless but harmless routine. Now, however, the arbitrary division of the continent is beginning to hurt both countries in two fundamental ways: (1) it is serving to hold back the development of Canada's wealth; and, as our natural resources are gradually exhausted it is also restricting United States economic welfare; (2) it is weakening the ability of the two countries to ensure the military security of the continent in an age of new intercontinental weapons. The time has come to think seriously of making the United States and Canada one country or, to start with, at least one economic unit.

First of all I want to say most sincerely to the author and to the magazine in question that we are very grateful for the highly complimentary things the author said about Canada. We regard it as a very high compliment that a nation as great as the United States should consider a marriage with us, even though it may be a marriage of convenience, with a rather substantial marriage settlement or dowry attached to it; because the author goes on to make one reference that I thought was interesting. He said:

How senseless the frontier is has been pointed up sharply with the recent news of Canada's fabulous oil bonanza in Alberta.

If our point of view would be helpful to the average United States citizen, then perhaps it ought to be stated. I should like to say to the author of the article and to the American people: You are our good and friendly neighbours. Let anyone in the world say anything against you and Canada will rise to your defence. We like you and admire you. We find it easy to work with you. Our nations provide a compelling example of how two nations, one small and one large, can make peaceful relations permanent. You are doing all right, and so are we. Please do not embarrass us with this latest proposal for national marriage. No matter how highly we feel complimented by the offer, we are sorry; we cannot accept the ring.

In addition I want to echo the well chosen words that the minister used in London as to this very point. I think they provide a complete answer. This is what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said in London, as reported in the Times:

> In this central theme of his speech, Mr. Pearson carried on the thought of his previous speech to the Pilgrims, when he spoke of Canada as the little fellow between two giants. Canadians, he said, had a special part to play in the world because they were "bilingual, not merely in the French-English sense, but in the sense that we speak English and American." Canada is a North American nation, living an American life and thinking American thought; yet at the same time extremely content and wholehearted in her membership of the British commonwealth.
> Mr. Pearson was at pains to reassure his audience that his country was not passing through a transitional stage towards becoming a United States satellite; but in thinking they needed any such assurance he was unnecessarily modest. The time is long past when Englishmen could think of Canada as capable of becoming the satellite of anybody.

Now I want to pass to another point, and say to those who were responsible for the article from which I have just read that we might be talking about other and less romantic things than a national marriage between the United States and Canada. There is the question of the renewal of the Hyde Park agreement in some modernized and modified form. Perhaps in that respect I should quote the opinion of some Americans themselves, as it appeared in the current issue of Newsweek. This writer, dealing with Canadian affairs, spoke of this very thing:

> As Pearson prepared to give the Commons a fuller explanation of what Canada got itself into at London, a big question was what military contribution Canada could make. The United States-Canada joint defence program had been a onesided affair so far, with Canada using up scarce dollars to buy American parts and equipment. The first Canadian arms sale to the United States since the war will be made in the fiscal year beginning July 1. Purchases between $15 million and $25 million will offset approximately the amount of dominion arms buying in the United States.
> Buying and selling: It is not known what Canadian items will be sold. The best guess is medium artillery and special equipment for Arctic warfare. The defence department thinks there is no chance of the United States taking the CF-100, the long-range all-weather Avro jet fighter, which Canada desperately wants to sell.
> The arms deal represents a modification of the "Buy American Act" which had been construed to prevent such purchases. This removes a long-standing issue between the two countries. Canadians had complained that they had to spend their precious dollars for American military equipment, while the United States always found some excuse for not buying Canadian-made equipment.

That temporary solution is all right as far as it goes, but I should think there is a very great need for a permanent revival of the Hyde Park agreement in some modernized form. I am particularly interested in this, in common with many others who are so very proud of the CF-100, which is manufactured at Malton in the county of Peel, which I represent. Both the management and the workmen who have had to do with the production of that great aircraft take pride in its achievements, and we are hopeful that in time it will find a market in the country to the south.

In my concluding remarks on this matter I should like to deal with the economic aspects of our north Atlantic position as they concern our domestic affairs here at home, because they are interrelated and vital to the success of the pact itself. Although full details of the obligations are not yet known, it is becoming evident that the economic aspects of the Atlantic pact are and will continue to be very much to the forefront in the days that lie ahead, as I was attempting to indicate previously. The Prime Minister foresaw this aspect of the developments as far back as 1948, when the idea of the North Atlantic pact was crystallizing in the minds of government leaders, both in Europe and on this continent. As evidence of this, the Prime Minister's radio speech to the Canadian people on November 11, 1948, called upon us to support the North Atlantic pact. In that speech, obviously with the economic aspects in view, the Prime Minister stated that it was the opinion of the Canadian government at that time that a security treaty such as was proposed could not be fully effective if it was nothing more than a military alliance; and with that I think this parliament agrees. Fifteen days later the Secretary of State for External Affairs, at a press conference at The Hague, stated that Canada would commit herself freely to military measures specific enough for security.

While full details of the obligations of the signatory powers are not yet public, it is evident that as a nation we have made our commitment from the military point of view; and from the size of the estimates for national defence this year in Canada we are moving toward carrying out these commitments. There is little evidence, and certainly there has been no announced government policy, as to the other and equally important aspects of our responsibilities under this pact, namely the economic aspects, and what we are doing, and more important what we propose to do, in the way of development of our resources to meet the demands that will fall upon this nation in fulfilling our obligations under this pact.

Perhaps before we entered into a balanced, integrated defence policy under the pact there was not the compelling pressure upon us to develop our own natural resources that there is at the present time, though I believe we should have been doing something along that line in preparation for what looked like an obvious eventuality. This aspect of responsibility is equally important in respect to any military measures pledged by this nation, first because it is the sphere of co-operation from which the greatest assistance may rightfully be expected from Canada, and second, because it is the determining factor upon which the extent of the military measures which can be sustained by this nation must necessarily be determined.

As a nation of only fourteen million people we cannot be expected to contribute anything like the numbers of men that could be supplied by some of our allies in the Atlantic pact. What we lack in available manpower, however, because of our population, we more than make up in agricultural, industrial and natural resources, of the very kind any gigantic defence program in modern warfare must have if its efforts are to be sustained and successful. In the last war the contribution made by this nation in material resources, so essential to the success of our own forces and those of our allies, exceeded all expectations. Today the challenge to the defence preparedness of this nation by virtue of our obligations under the Atlantic pact and the ever-present challenge of world domination by communism makes our marvellous contribution in the past pale into insignificance. The demands upon Canada in this particular field will be even greater than ever before in our history.

There is growing evidence that the economic resources of the United States, particularly in the field of raw materials essential to any continental defence preparedness program, are showing signs of becoming exhausted. Considered in the light of expected demands in accordance with obligations under the Atlantic pact, the result is alarming. The most recent issue of the same United States publication from which I quoted just a few moments ago, Look, has this to say as to why the United States and Canada should be one country. I quote this paragraph:

> The United States suffers just as much from the frontier. We are losing out especially today because we are turning from a "have" nation into a "have-not" nation.
> Whereas we used to ship oil, copper, zinc and lead to the rest of the world, we now have begun to import all of these essential materials. And the proportion of imports in every case seems sure to grow. The same thing is happening in iron ore and timber. We used to be able to produce more of these things than we could possibly use. Now we use more than we can possibly produce.

Then the article goes on to mention other matters with which I shall not weary the house at this stage of my argument; but the main argument is based on the fact that Canada has the natural resources but not the development, while the natural resources of the United States are becoming depleted. We cannot continue to be unmindful of the fact that our failure to develop our natural resources is a source of wonderment to others, even to our most friendly neighbours.

Nor is this assertion of failure to develop our resources to the point where it may be considered as at least equal to our obligations, first for our defence and second under the Atlantic pact, confined to sources outside of Canada. I should like to quote an inside source as well.

Only recently, General Howard, the general manager of the Canadian Industrial Preparedness Association, said this in Ottawa, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen of March 30, 1950:

> "There is too much thinking of preparedness in terms of men, arms and munitions when we should be considering how many tons of steel, rubber, lead, tin and even paint we need," Major General C. B. Howard, C.B.E., of Montreal, said in Ottawa yesterday.
> Speaking on "Canadian industrial preparedness" to a luncheon meeting of the Ottawa branch of the Naval Officers Association of Canada, General Howard, who is general manager of the Canadian Industrial Preparedness Association, said the navy, army and air force were only parts of a plan of defence. Research and industry, he asserted, were equally important in the defence plans of this country.

He went on to outline eight points of a plan for complete mobilization of Canada's material and industrial resources. Some of these might fit in more particularly now, in view of our integrated scheme for collective defence. These were his points:

> 1. Complete mobilization of industrial resources.
> 2. Efficient and effective attention to distribution and employment of manpower in the armed services and in industry.
> 3. Mobilization of Canada's financial resources with mutually satisfactory financial arrangements.
> 4. Distribution to industry of designs and data on all designs not in normal course of production.

5. Adequate and authoritative inspection of design branches to avoid duplication and production of certain items.

6. Storage and distribution arrangements to the armed forces.

7. Supply and storage of materials in short supply.

8. Shadow government department or departments to deal with problems of supply and priorities.

Some of us might be inclined to disagree with some of these proposals, but I mention them all to point up one of the important things about which I am in agreement with General Howard, and that is the importance of developing our natural resources, in view of our extended obligations under the North Atlantic pact.

Unfortunately parliament and the country at large are not in a position to judge accurately whether or not our efforts to develop the resources of this country are adequate under the circumstances, because neither this parliament nor the country has been told the full extent of Canada's obligations under the Atlantic pact. There are, however, grave doubts in the minds of many people, both within and without the boundaries of Canada, as to the adequacy of the development of our resources to meet the demands which would fall upon this nation should the day ever come when the signatory nations to the Atlantic pact find it necessary to defend themselves against aggression. True, our annual defence costs today are not far short of the total ordinary expenditure of the federal government before the last war. True, there must be strict avoidance of panicky overspending, and the taxpayer must be assured that every dollar spent in our defence, whether direct or within our obligations under the Atlantic pact, be spent to the best advantage.

But the Canadian people want some assurance from the government that our resources are being directed into the most profitable channels and in a manner that will assure an adequate defence program; that will make it possible for this nation to carry out its obligations under the Atlantic pact, in the sphere of activity where we can make our best and most valuable contribution. The people also want some assurance from the government that present plans for the development of the resources of this country are sufficient to meet the demands we may expect in this sphere, as a result of the recent decision of the Atlantic treaty conference. Recently press dispatches reported that the Atlantic treaty nations had agreed, by united efforts, to build up a system of defence capable of withstanding any external threat directed against any of them. As a result of this decision, Canada as a nation stands obligated to come to the rescue not only of any signatory nation that is attacked, but to the defence of Europe, under the obligation to build by united efforts with the countries of western Europe "a unified system of defence." This means that our obligations up until now were projected into the future, dependent upon one of the signatory powers being attacked. Today, as a result of this recent decision of the Atlantic treaty council, our obligations are now due. Carrying out these commitments involves the economic phase of our obligations. The second decision, having to do with the creation of balanced collective forces, involves the question of trained manpower, and directly concerns the Department of National Defence.

With regard to our commitments under the economic aspect of our obligations under the Atlantic pact, however, the minister of external affairs should give some indication to parliament and the country just what program the government has in mind. While there may be some justification for secrecy with regard to efforts directed to meet obligations under the collective forces commitment, no such reason exists for secrecy as to plans for the development of the resources of this country and our industrial and agricultural potential.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to conclude by saying that this is a critical stage in the life of a young, progressive, peace-seeking nation such as ours. It calls for calm fortitude, national unity, and prayerful determination on the part of our people. It calls for the best and most constructive statesmanship parliament can apply. Let us resolve to march as one toward that goal of permanent peace upon which the welfare, happiness, and survival of our peoples are so completely predicated.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we heard from the minister a statement which was interesting, concise and important. I very much regret that it was delivered before a house so sparsely filled. This was due not so much to lack of interest as to pressure of other affairs. This morning we had an important debate on agriculture. Many of the members who were interested in the problem before the house were unable to be present and participate. This afternoon the social security committee, as well as other committees, is sitting. It is unfortunate that this debate is held under these circumstances.

I must say I appreciated the minister's statement this afternoon, and I shall look forward with a great deal of interest to the report to be made by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) with regard to the Sydney conference. He will place more fully before the house the discussions with regard to southeast Asia, and the manner in which we can assist the people of that area in building up their economy and their resistance to the threat of totalitarianism. When I speak of "totalitarianism", I am thinking not only of totalitarianism in the communistic form but totalitarianism which does exist, and indeed may extend to some other part of Asia, owing to the reinstatement of other reactionary regimes such as once held sway in those countries. I often think that the democratic powers have been placed in a difficult position with regard to Asia Minor and Asia in that, from time to time, the force of events has compelled them to assist regimes that were anything but democratic or which did not conform in any respect to our democratic viewpoint. I shall therefore be interested in hearing what the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) has to say about the Sydney conference and the aid to southeast Asia.

I was glad to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) say that, on his visit to the United Kingdom, he found that both in the United Kingdom and in western Europe there was a new spirit of optimism and that conditions evidently were improving in that area. I think perhaps he is right when he says this is due largely to Marshall aid and perhaps to a greater feeling of security because of the North Atlantic agreement. But, after all, the strengthening of the economies of the western European countries and, indeed, of the economies of the nations throughout the world, is our best assurance against the outbreak of another war. We of this party will continue to give every support to, and to exert every influence we can on, shaping a Canadian international policy directed toward ending the cold war and endeavouring to find a secure basis for future peace. As has been stressed this afternoon both by the minister and by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), there is no question about it that the ending of this cold war and the finding of the basis for peace depend in no small measure upon the economic health of the world. We believe that this economic health must be planned more specifically than it has been planned in the past. We need effective planning to raise the standard of living everywhere. We need concrete plans to increase the productivity and means of distribution of the world and to build up particularly the economies of Asia and of Africa, as well as that of Europe, to higher levels and standards. I believe that this involves our steadfast adherence to the principles of the United Nations and its specialized agencies which deal with these particular problems.

We are glad that in recent months and years we have seen specific steps in this direction. We have the success of the Marshall plan in rebuilding the European economy; the recent decisions of the north Atlantic nations at the conference which the minister attended, to increase their economic co-operation under article 2 of the North Atlantic agreement; the adherence of Canada and the United States to such organizations as that for European economic co-operation. Then we have the Schuman proposal to which the minister referred this afternoon. This is one of the most remarkable proposals the world has seen for generations. We have France suggesting that there be an integration of the iron resources of France and the coal resources of what was Germany, with a view to their joint development for the benefit of the whole of the European economy. How this will be done will have to be worked out in the future. I am inclined to think that the problem is a difficult one because you have the tug of war between those who believe that it should be done under various privately-owned organizations and those who believe it should be done under public ownership and organization; and governments, like that of the United Kingdom, which feel the need for public ownership, international ownership and administration, are afraid that the privately-owned set-up would result once again in a great private cartel that might even restrict production rather than expand it and thus defeat the very objective that this great Schuman plan should have in mind.

Then we have the European economic commission of the United Nations, and the other organizations that are subsidiary to the U.N., all of which are working for international co-operation and which are all to the good. No responsible political party and no responsible parliament can fail to recognize that the world today is divided into two parts. We have not hesitated to state where we stand in this matter. We stand with those forces that are determined to retain, to expand and to promote everywhere the democratic ideals of human right and of fundamental freedom. We have recognized and have stated that the cold war is due to the fact that the new imperialism—I think that is the correct description of it—of the U.S.S.R. and its ruthless exploitation of the communist parties everywhere in the European and Asiatic countries are the major threats both to democracy and to peace. We have therefore supported the Marshall plan—and are continuing to do so—the Brussels treaty and the Atlantic pact, all of which seek to unite the democratic world, both for its own defence and also—something which is part of its defence, of course—for possible international co-operation in the economic field. That is not only the policy of this movement; incidentally it is the policy of the democratic socialist groups and parties throughout the whole of western Europe and indeed the whole of the world. At the same time, in common with such parties, we will continue to oppose anything that seems to be contrary to the principles of the United Nations charter and to the aims of international economic co-operation. We believe that it is equally important to stand against pressures of capitalists who would try to rebuild the world on the old plan of economic imperialism of the pre-war sort and those who want to control the world under the new type of imperialism that is promoted by the Soviet union and her satellites at the present time. We believe that the thing we must do is to join together with all democratic countries in the world in standing firmly against any infringement of freedom and democracy, from whatever quarter it may come.

We are glad indeed that the government, through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has consistently supported the United Nations and its subsidiary organizations. We think that this country more and more should endeavour to see to it that all the positive agencies of the United Nations should be strengthened and should be used. What we want to see, of course, is the prestige of the United Nations restored at once to the extent to which it has been lost; and I think there has been a loss of prestige in the last year or two. But most of all, we want to see the prestige of the United Nations greatly increased. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) mentioned the recognition of the new government of China. That, of course, has been a matter of discussion and controversy in most democratic countries. But it seems to us that when we fail to admit that the new government of China is in power we are cutting ourselves off from four or five hundred million people in Asia.

After all, we have in the United Nations governments that are perhaps more thoroughly dominated by the communist party than is that of China. In this I find myself reinforced by the opinions of Nehru, the government of the United Kingdom, and other people throughout the world who believe that recognition under international law does not mean that recognition of a country implies approval of its government. However, if we want to maintain contact with this great country in Asia, then we should reconsider our position in respect of the new government in China and grant it recognition.

In passing may I observe that I believe a new attempt should be made at the forthcoming meeting of the assembly to reach an agreement on the thorny problem of atomic energy. In a speech over the radio by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) some time ago he seemed to imply that there might be some modification of the position that had been taken, and that there was hope that with some modification agreement could be reached. We have regarded it as essential that whatever is done shall include within the agreement the right of the United Nations authority engaged in atomic energy inspection to be free at all times to examine within every country any atomic energy project and, indeed, anything which may look like an atomic energy project, including the mining of the radioactive material.

I hope a new attempt will be made, because our people are greatly disturbed. Recently a petition was circulated across Canada for the banning of the bomb. In my opinion the petition was deceptive because it excluded the one vital thing, and indeed when it was first presented to me in draft form I refused to endorse it unless a clause were inserted demanding the right of unrestricted inspection in every country of the world by a United Nations commission. Without that, in my opinion the banning of the bomb or the signing of petitions of this kind would not only be ineffective but would lull us into a false sense of security. I wanted to say that, although the matter was not discussed this afternoon.

Economic co-operation must be stressed by the representatives of Canada. I know Canada has been interested in article 2 of the treaty, from the beginning. So far as those of us in this party are concerned, we have laid great stress upon it both in the house and in the country because, after all, to the extent that the nations can improve their economies, just to that extent are we strong and to that extent can we remove the causes of discontent in which some totalitarian ideology may take root and flourish. Again I use the expression "some totalitarian ideology," because, while we may be concentrating upon the communist ideology and its totalitarianism, we must not forget that there is a real danger that, given the right conditions, we may see a revival of something resembling fascism or nazism in European and, indeed, Asiatic countries.

Consequently we need to stress that, as quickly as possible, the economic conditions of the various countries shall be greatly improved. Apart altogether from the Schuman proposal of international development and control of iron and coal and steel, I believe we need to go beyond that and have some international arrangement so that transport, electricity and some of the other vital and fundamental aspects of our economic life may also be utilized and controlled socially and internationally.

The Schuman plan, in other words, is in our opinion a step in the right direction, and we support it; but it does not go far enough to meet the needs at the present time. Although I do not wish to discuss the matter in detail this afternoon, there is of course the matter of co-operation in all phases of world trade, to improve the trading relationships of countries so that, for example, they may have access to our food supplies, such as wheat, and we may have access to some of the things they produce and which we could use, such as vegetable oils, perhaps, and even raw rubber—although we have a synthetic plant. There would be numerous other commodities which, if available, would enable us to improve our standard of living. Together, then, we could guarantee higher standards and greater freedom for all mankind.

At all times Canada should encourage the forces of progress, wherever they exist, and assist everywhere in the realization of that part of the United Nations charter which calls for the recognition of human rights and fundamental freedoms. If we are going to have racial equality and religious freedom we must see to it that we have no prejudices and intolerances in our own country. In other words, example is better than precept. Every time we permit in our own country something which looks like intolerance, or the refusal to recognize certain democratic rights of association, of speech, of worship or of religion, it is used by the enemies not only of our own country but of democracy throughout the world.

We need political democracy and we need economic democracy as well. We talk about raising the standard of living, so I regret very much that some few months ago our government did not support wholeheartedly and fully the food and agriculture organization plan for distributing food to the needy people of the world. As a matter of fact in the economic and social council Canada opposed international action to maintain full employment.

I think that not only is that a mistake, but that it casts a reflection upon the good faith of our country in connection with its international efforts for a better world. Apart from the North Atlantic pact, which I believe, as the minister said, is an essential part of the United Nations, we should press constantly for the establishment of an international police force under the security council, so that a nation like this, or any other nation in a similar situation, may not have to expend so tremendous a proportion of its manpower, its energies, its basic resources, and what we might call its wealth, upon preparations for military defence. Indeed, those preparations for military defence may very well place in danger the very cause that we have at heart, but as long as we have no security through the security council of the United Nations we must consider ways and means of defending our own country and assisting in the defence of the group of countries with which we are associated.

I welcome the decisions that have been made over the months for the north Atlantic group of nations to co-ordinate their defence preparations, and I believe that Canada must carry out fully her obligations within these agreements and understandings; but I hope the time is not far distant when these obligations will be carried out under the aegis of the security council of the United Nations.

I was glad the minister stressed what he called the division of effort. I think those were the words he used, or they were words to that effect. Indeed this is a new form of division of labour in the world so that we and other nations can decide what we can do best. I held the view, even before the last war—sometimes I was criticized for having said it—that Canada's best contribution could be made in the realm of economic aid. I still think that, should war break out again, in all probability this country would become a greater source of economic aid than it was in the last war. We might even become the arsenal of democracy. That does not mean that we should not participate in the armed forces of the Atlantic group, but I think we should endeavour to see to it that we play our part in the most effective and efficient way that can be determined in consultation with those nations that are united with us under the Atlantic treaty.

I believe the democratic world has the physical, economic and spiritual forces to win, let us say not the war but the peace. I have heard, with a good deal of interest, many leading statesmen of the world state, as President Truman stated only a few days ago, that war is not imminent or inevitable. Nothing is inevitable. I still believe that if we remain strong in ourselves, if we improve the standards of living of the people across the world and strengthen the democratic institutions in this country and the democratic people with similar institutions, war may never come. That is what we should hope and pray for. But of course we should not live in a fool's paradise, believing, while we may think it is not inevitable, that we are not threatened at the present time by the expansionist demands and projects of communist totalitarianism under the Soviet union. As days go by we must be vigilant lest we find that we are threatened by the expansionist ideas of other great countries in the world. I believe that if we use the economic, physical, spiritual and moral resources that we have we can win through and with like-minded peoples maintain the peace of the world.

Then we might as a nation assist in building a world society from which war will be banished permanently and in which all the peoples of the earth may live in peace and freedom. That of course is what the minister visualized during the course of his remarks —one world. Undoubtedly the day will come when there will be just one world, but we must make sure that we are laying a foundation for a democratic and free world. When there is government at the international level, when there is a freely elected parliament of man, then we shall have achieved the age-old desire of men that war be banished from the world.

As I close, let me emphasize that I believe that that can come only when the resources of the world are used to the advantage of all the peoples of the world and when the standards of living of the world have been raised and poverty, misery, want and disease, as far as those evils are undeserved, have been banished for ever from our midst.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the statement made this afternoon by the minister of external affairs and, as was so well said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I look forward to the supplementary statement to be made by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) following his return from a long journey to India, New Zealand and Australia. While it is in mind, may I say that I would like to have had the minister explain a little more the statements or declarations that came out of the meeting at London having to do with the relationship of the policy laid down there to Africa and the development of the colonial possessions of the various countries in that continent, which I understand has as its objective the final independence of those colonies. Naturally Canada is not very much interested in the continent of Africa, especially as far as colonies or possessions are concerned, but we do have an interest in that we will share, as a member nation in the Atlantic union, in the responsibility when action is contemplated in that country.

The trouble I usually find with the pronouncements that come out of London or ministers' conferences or Atlantic pact meetings is that they are couched in language that nobody can clearly understand. I do not know whether that is done deliberately or whether it is unavoidable, but the fact is that I find they are usually capable of many different interpretations. I wonder if the people who draft them do not expect the average citizen, and I am only one of them, to experience some preconceived emotional reaction rather than to understand some of the objectives we are really struggling to achieve.

I have been watching the press ever since the minister went to London and have been reading the pronouncements that have been made. I must confess that I was not able to make too much of some of them. I found also that the minister's statement this afternoon contained terms that were difficult for the average man to understand fully. I must confess to an occasional feeling of uneasiness about where all these international commitments are going to lead the people of Canada and finally leave us when eventually peace is attained through co-operative action. Sometimes I wonder what the language of the minister envisions. I read a speech he made while he was in London, I believe. On that occasion he spoke of the necessity of surrendering our national sovereignty, as a prerequisite to the achievement of world peace. I wonder exactly what it is that the minister wants Canada to do, and I suppose not only Canada but the other signatory nations. To my knowledge he has never made his views clear in this respect. This is the time to do it, and I think he should do so.

The people of Canada surely ought to know exactly what we are going to be expected to do with respect to the surrender of our sovereignty, our liberty as a nation. I for one am not satisfied with the rather nebulous things that have been said up to this time in that regard. There is a substantial portion of the Canadian people who, like me, wonder if those individuals who are planning the course of world events have not in their minds the final establishment of a world government to which this and all other nations will one day wake up to find that they have surrendered every effective sovereign right they ever possessed. That is the fear in the minds of a good many people; and, once they are surrendered, it is mighty difficult to get them back.

I speak for all my colleagues when I caution the minister to look out. We think that Canada should be prepared to co-operate with the Atlantic community nations and other nations of the world—but of course we are speaking now more particularly of the Atlantic nations—to the fullest possible extent in any bona fide effort to bring peace and security to this old world. Canada has always conducted herself in the past in such a way that our reputation for honesty and trustworthiness is well known, and is never doubted by anyone in the whole world. That being the case, I contend it cannot be necessary for us to surrender permanently any part of our sovereignty. Our word is our bond. Our actions in the past have so often spoken for us that we should never have to put up any further security to seal our good intentions. Therefore in any integration of our economic and military strength with those of other nations we demand that every safeguard be set up so that the future will not find us short as to our right of self-determination in very important aspects.

The minister should make himself crystal clear as to what he expects Canada and other nations to do in the surrender of their sovereignty. I maintain that the American nations—and I mean all the American nations—must preserve their liberty and never be found in a position where they cannot order their own affairs as they want to order them when it becomes necessary for them to do so, as it doubtless will.

Canadians generally will be pleased to hear that the policy to be followed by the Atlantic nations is not a strategy of, as the minister said this afternoon, the liberation of European countries after occupation and destruction. If he did not use these words he at least implied that the strategy to be followed would be one of defending rather than rescuing. I am all for that, but let me point out, Mr. Speaker, that that is the spirit of the British commonwealth at its best. The British commonwealth has always held defending rather than rescuing as a tradition. That is the principle by which the British commonwealth grew and waxed strong in right and justice.

It must also be comforting for people generally to know that the nations of the north Atlantic union are showing considerable inclination to plan their defences as a team. I do not think that there is any question about the necessity for the strongest and closest possible team work. No doubt the closer and more effective the co-operation amongst these nations the less social and economic disruption there will be within them. No people can be counted upon to do their best if they are discontent or at the point of protesting against the economic burden. The minister said in his address this afternoon that the north Atlantic nations are not concentrating merely on military preparations for strong defensive measures. That was pleasant to my ears. He declared that due regard would be had for the economic and social stability of the member nations now and in the years to come. We Social Crediters as you know, Mr. Speaker, have consistently taken the position that our contribution to the Atlantic pact, and to movements for world peace and security, cannot be very great or effective unless we keep the production of every kind of wanted material and service at a very high level. That is why, in the course of the budget debate this year, we advocated the setting up of a commission to survey Canada's potential productive capacity in order to make sure that we are not overlooking something, to make certain exactly where we stand with respect to our policy to produce the things that we and the world need.

Not only that; we need to know to what extent we can take advantage of our capacity to produce. That is why we have constantly laid emphasis on production. We are glad to see that very important studies are going on at the national research council. There is a committee now studying the affairs of the council. Just the other day when we visited the laboratories on Sussex street we saw some things that gladdened my heart at least, and made me feel very proud of what that body is achieving. One thing that impressed me was that there are certain studies going on with respect to the ability of Canada to become self-sufficient in the production of oils and fats. It was most impressive when I saw what they were doing. I found, for example, that certain scientists are pressing forward with all their strength and ability to help Canadians to know that we have right within our boundaries the source of all the fats and oils that we need for food purposes, as well as those that are being developed in the west for industrial and home use.

I was amazed to find, for example, that we had made considerable strides towards almost self-sufficiency in cooking fats through the use of such common things as rapeseed of which we can produce an almost limitless abundance. They have even gone so far as to recover quantities of palatable and edible cooking fats from the lowly stinkweed and mustard seed that we thought hitherto were just a nuisance to man instead of being a potential blessing if we use them rightly.

There are so many other things that we are finding out, but I heard one of the scientists say, "it burns me up when I find I cannot impress people in this country with the necessity for using these things." It is easy to go out and buy when you have the wherewithal to buy. It is another thing to produce. The mark of a successful nation, of a nation full of vitality, is its ability to make use of the things that are at hand. The only way we can do that is to concentrate our attention upon the findings of the national research council and others who are engaged in investigations of that kind; then, when the information is disseminated, try to direct the minds of our industrialists and our people generally into those channels where they will believe that they should be using Canadian products in so far as they possibly can. Some day we might be called upon to fall back on our own resources, and then if we have the know-how we might be able to prevent unnecessary suffering that might result from impotence.

The minister said little about Germany. I had hoped he might be able to throw a little further light on what he was able to give us in the external affairs committee not long ago. Since he appeared before that committee I believe there have been some important developments, especially in eastern Germany. We are told now that it is known the Russians have been able to organize a fairly substantial army. They call it a secret police body, but in reality it is an army. Just how the presence of that army in eastern Germany affects the security of the people in western Germany, it seems to me ought to be given the most careful consideration. I do not know whether the minister has anything further on it; but, if he has, I for one would certainly appreciate some statement with respect to it when he speaks.

I should also like to have him give us something about the way the western nations are making headway against the determined drive by Russia to win Germany over to the Russian way of thinking; whether or not the combined communist-nationalist cry that is arising in eastern Germany is beginning to take hold in the minds of the people in western Germany. The people of Germany are susceptible to that sort of thing, and especially are they swayed by anything that has the touch of nationalism, particularly nationalism for Germany. It might be that the minister has something he could say to reassure us in that respect, but perhaps he has not.

I should like to join with the member for Rosetown-Biggar in pointing out that, when the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations suggested the world pool idea for the distribution of surplus food, and then the officials of the international monetary fund were allowed to influence them against it, that division of the United Nations lost a great deal of prestige. We have argued this matter many times, but somehow or other there seems to be a disposition on the part of the officials of this country at least to support the action that was induced by the officials of the international monetary fund. The time is coming when that international pooling will prove to be an absolute necessity; it is not far ahead. I am satisfied that the officials of this country who have charge of these affairs must, sooner or later, come to see that that is the only solution to this recurring problem of surplus food materials. The sooner we get at the setting up of that organization the better it is going to be for us all. I know the minister has had little, if anything, to do with that part of our international relations, but I merely echo what the member for Rosetown-Biggar said in his address. It is a very important consideration in future international relations, and may well become one of the great factors upon which international peace and security will be based.

I shall conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that I think Canada ought to be prepared to go all-out in its efforts to co-operate to the fullest possible extent with the Atlantic nations in their efforts to achieve world peace and security. I will back the minister in anything he does to achieve these worthy objectives. But it seems to me that one of our most important considerations is now being neglected. I have not heard anything coming out of any of the United Nations organizations, much less the Atlantic union, to the effect that one of the things we must do, if the nations of the world are going to get out of the present impasse and clear away the clutter and debris of the cold war, is to get back to the rule of law. That does not mean just the rule of national law or international law. It has far wider implications than that. Every single blessing that man enjoys is predicated upon a law. If the laws upon which those blessings are predicated are broken, we cannot enjoy the blessings. You can see that in every phase of our activity, our human relationships. We have had floods in our country. I am just as satisfied as I can be that fundamentally those floods that have occurred in Manitoba came as a result of a broken law: men defying the laws of nature, denuding the forests or ploughing up lands that ought to have been left to grass so as to restrain the run-off; that is only an example. The depletion of our forests is another example of an instance where men are setting themselves up as arbiters, and are defying the natural and fundamental laws. So it is with every aspect of our endeavours with human relationship. I believe that as a nation we ought to be concentrating upon getting people to realize that until they begin to observe law, in every one of its aspects, we cannot hope to achieve world peace. I am looking forward to the day when we shall be engaged actively on a program of this kind, and I pledge the minister my support in everything he undertakes that will lead us to that goal.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to detain the house for just a short time to make a few comments on what has been said. In common with the member for Peel, I find myself in agreement with the line the minister has taken, but I have one or two questions I should like to ask. The first point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is that I understand these London decisions had to do with the matter of defence, and it is about defence I am going to talk. Of course, we all want to avoid a war, especially those of us who have seen war. We believe too that in so far as we can develop economically we will help to meet the scourge of communism—we all agree with that. But I want to address myself particularly to what the minister said this afternoon with regard to those decisions which have been hailed as most important decisions throughout the world.

One comment I wish to make is that, while the minister said quite enough things to make me feel he regarded this matter as urgent, nevertheless I did not carry away from his speech any sense of urgency at all. On the one hand he told us that we were moving into one world and that we would get there either as a result of peaceful co-operation or through a devastating war. He also said that we had gone a long way in the preparation of a unified defence system. That sounded good. Nevertheless, he also told us these decisions were decisions on principle only, and that many bridges had to be crossed before we could take any action. It is quite true that, compared with what was said about Sydney, he went very far, because with regard to Sydney I had a feeling it was just a shadow of a shadow of the real thing. He was talking about the months or years it would take to get co-operation. If the people of southeastern Asia are hoping much will come from the Sydney conference, I would advise them to change their ideas.

I am making this point, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is extraordinarily difficult at the present time to make the people of this country take a serious view of these dangers. After all, spring is here; the baseball season is opening; people are going fishing and the summer holiday season is coming. It is the hardest thing for anyone to make people believe there is really such a thing as danger about in this country. I feel there is a special duty on the minister. I was quite in agreement with the member for Peace River (Mr. Low), when he said he wished the minister would tell us what Canada is to do, because I have no idea of what Canada is to do. I should like to read an article from the New York Times. From that I get the feeling that they had a sense of urgency, that they thought the London discussions meant something and that they thought the decisions had to be followed up quickly. On May 22 the New York Times had this to say:

> With the momentous decisions of the London conferences of the Atlantic powers spread upon the record of history, there devolve upon the Atlantic governments and peoples the task and the duty to take speedy and concrete action to transform the paper agreements into living reality.

Those are words which, so far as words can go, suggest a sense of urgency. But I did not get that sense of urgency out of the speech of the minister this afternoon. In the same article later on the New York Times said:

> But the first and foremost of all these obligations would seem to be that, beyond all previous technical reservations in the North Atlantic pact, all the nations providing the collective force must be ready to act in concert the instant any one of them is attacked.

Then later on they say:

> For the defection, or even hesitation, of any one nation would immediately and inevitably wreck the whole collective force and expose all to defeat and subjugation.

Those are extremely ugly words, Mr. Speaker; and I submit, with deference, that nobody reading the minister's speech would have such ugly words in mind at all. We had the rather pleasant suggestion that things were better. As a matter of fact, I suppose the only thing that warrants us in believing that things are better in the last two or three months is what happened in Berlin on May 28. As someone pointed out to me this afternoon, let us remember that it was Germans who did that. True, it was Germans with the feeling that behind them there was a common sense of purpose. Nevertheless, there it was.

It seems to me the minister is trying to make the best of two worlds. He says we have got to find out how to have both "guns and butter". Of course, that is true; and I recognize that that is true. In time of peace we cannot suddenly plunge people into great sacrifices or even a part of the sacrifices that they are ready to make in wartime. But again

I say that I do not think the minister has given us any sense of urgency. He did say that western Europe was given the assurance that it would not be left alone to face the threat from the east, and that is good. But again I submit to him that the hon. member for Peace River was perfectly entitled to say that we should like to know from the minister what he wants us to do.

If I might digress just for a moment, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say this. The worst feature about this danger that we face is not the physical destruction and so on, with which we are so familiar; it is the moral destruction. After all, we know what happened in Czechoslovakia. Before the putsch, Czechoslovakia I suppose lived a life much more in accordance with the kind of life we believe in than did any other country in eastern Europe. Yet I am told that the strides communism has made there are perhaps greater than in other countries which seemed in their way of thinking much more amenable to the communist view. I remember in 1940 one of my friends in England sent three little boys out to us to be looked after. He said something that I have not forgotten. He said, "I am not sending these boys out because I am afraid they might be killed; I am sending them out for fear they might be turned into nazis." We therefore I repeat have this thing facing us. As I say, we have to make up our minds whether or not we are prepared to do anything about it. When I say "do anything about it", I mean do something which perhaps means a certain sacrifice even in peacetime.

That able columnist Lippmann points this out in an article on May 22, and I think it applies just as strongly to our own country and indeed to all the other countries. He says:

> Mr. Truman has been inviting the people to dream the American dream of an ever better life in happy and peaceful American communities. Mr. Acheson has made the people feel that they are so gravely threatened that the resources of diplomacy are so nearly exhausted that the situation cannot be righted except by swift increase of American military power.

Later in the article he says:

> The central and critical issue at the London conference was in effect how each of the Atlantic nations was to reconcile its Truman with its Acheson.

May I suggest with deference to the minister that I think he is trying to be a little Truman and a little Acheson at the same time, and that is his difficulty; that is the difficulty of all of us. Nevertheless we have the right, I think, to expect that the minister and the government will give us a lead. Then Lippmann goes on, but I need not go any further with that. I should like to read this quotation from an authority at home, and one which should be received with great respect I am sure, by the minister, at any rate. This is from the Winnipeg Free Press. They say:

> It is too early to say whether all the participating governments yet realize the costs or the lengths of the adventure on which they are embarked. Success will involve not only the obvious direct burden of stronger military defences, but the readjustment of economic arrangements by the partners.

I put these things forward because I think they are in point and because these are questions which I think would entitle the minister to give us an answer. The practical aspect of this will be the way it affects our military dispositions, and maybe when we come to the defence estimates we shall get some indication as to whether any practical steps are taken here. It may be thought that parliament would to some extent be taken into the confidence of the government at that time. It is conceivable that this is not the proper time to speak about it. Indeed, I understand that no time is the proper time to speak about it. But I would say in passing that possibly the previous decision with regard to a committee might be viewed differently at this time.

That reminds me of something else, and this is rather a digression but I am sure it will interest all members, particularly those opposite. Yesterday I was reading quite a new book reprinting the speeches which Churchill made at the secret sessions of parliament during the war. He used a phrase there which interested me greatly, and I am sure it will interest all members, whether they agree with it or not. He spoke of the government as being the servant of parliament. To me that was a moving idea, and an extremely novel one. I hope it will be taken to heart and be given consideration across the way.

I have been talking about military aspects but before I sit down I should like to say a word about another aspect of this matter because I do not think anyone thinks we are going to settle this finally by military dispositions. We talk a great deal about our way of life. We say and we believe that it is a better way of life than all others. We could not go on living our life at all unless we believed that there was some kind of moral order in the universe. Believing that, it seems to me that we have got to believe that somehow or other, if we are worthy practitioners of the way of life of which we boast, we may gradually be able to make some impression on the people on the other side of the iron curtain. After all, nobody supposes that the ordinary Russian is any more anxious for war than is anyone sitting in this chamber. He does not want to go to war, but he may be driven into it by the powers that have control over him now and which apparently, for anything we can see, will control him for an indefinite future. But there he is, and one must go on hoping that there will be means of gradually influencing him, just through events as they pass.

I was greatly interested to find that Gouzenko somewhere said that the thing which convinced him finally that there was something genuine about our way of life, and that it was not all a gigantic hoax, was the election of 1945. Apparently he was impressed by finding that the opposition to the government was actually free to go out and express its views. Of course, we should have liked a great deal more freedom, but nevertheless we were on the whole comparatively free. That is a thing which is worth remembering. It is worth our remembering also how many people who get to this country from the other side of the iron curtain escape before their time comes for going home; and of course the very existence of the curtain itself holds out some hope they believe our way of life is what we believe it is.

To revert to what the hon. member for Peace River said, it we really practise the rule of law, if we really practise racial non-discrimination—and incidentally, that appears to be one place where we have something to learn from the Russians, as I understand it—and the other things, then it may be that there is hope in that direction.

In that connection, I should like to read a word or two from an authority which you will all be interested in and will all respect. The other day Sir Alexander Cadogan, speaking to the graduating class at McGill university, had some wise words to say. He spoke about the need of our being tranquil. He spoke about the need of not giving way to excitement and nervousness. He said quite frankly that we might have many years in which to control ourselves in the same kind of tense situation that we have now. Then he said this, which I thought was most interesting, and I am reading from the Montreal Gazette of May 30:

> He warned against fatalistic despair and a current danger of "too easy and hazy optimism, of rather loose and too hopeful thinking." No early or easy solution could be expected; it might take generations to reach the goal.
> Meanwhile, free nations should do all possible to provide themselves with defence against attack.

Then there is this part that I thought was particularly apposite, and particularly practical if you take the long view:

> And a positive effort should be made to convert other nations to freedom and out of tyranny. "If we the free nations can put our house in order, labour without ceasing to develop our own resources in peace, contrive that benefits are justly shared, show that our way of life can bring happiness, that freedom of belief, freedom of speech, the right to question and criticize make for material and moral progress and strength," he said, "then it may be that we shall convert others by the teaching of hard facts which cannot forever be suppressed, and that those others may refuse longer to live under the tyranny that now oppresses them."

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if we are not prepared to believe that there is something in that, it is hard to go on believing anything at all; and so I put it before you.

I think I have nothing further to add except to say that I think the advice from this great diplomat who, I suggest, has had to "take it", as we say, from the Russians at numerous international conferences in a way that passes my understanding, is something that we can well consider; we may well mark his words. I add that to what I said earlier about defence, and I will close by reminding you of these words that we have heard quoted quite often, and I am going to venture to make one small change in them. You will remember the line from one of Shakespeare's historical plays: "Out of this nettle, danger, we pluck this flower, safety." Nobody now believes that there is any great safety to be plucked but we perhaps might greatly daring venture to change the line to read: Out of this nettle, danger, we pluck this flower, courage.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, there is another matter to which I wish to refer, if no one else wishes to speak on this present topic.

Mr. Speaker: If the Secretary of State for External Affairs wishes to speak on this subject, he should do so before we change to another subject.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question. Is it understood that as soon as this debate finishes we will go into external affairs, call one item and carry on the discussion?

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No. The minute this motion carries we will call an item in a new department, the Department of the Secretary of State. That item will stand. I understand that if the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) speaks on another subject, it will be impossible to continue this debate.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, if that is so, I would like to make a few comments on the minister's speech. I feel that all is not nearly as well as it ought to be in connection with our external affairs. Somehow or other I get the idea that you cannot rely on what men say publicly nowadays, that what they say when they are preparing to go to a San Francisco conference or to a Bretton Woods conference or to some other conference is deliberately designed to veil the truth and to convey, to people who hear and read, something which is altogether different from the facts that underlie what is being said.

I believe that in the case of the Atlantic pact and the developments going forward before us at the present time a similar thing to that is going on. So that the great rank and file of the people simply do not know what is being plotted against their peace. I should like to devote some time to a discussion of that general point of view. I may be wrong, but I am very much afraid I am right.

I should like to refer to an article appearing in the Christian Science Monitor of May 27, 1950, page 1, by Roscoe Drummond. From that article I should like to read several quotations which I believe will make very interesting reading for the folks who live out in the country and who do not ordinarily have a chance to read the news as near, shall I say, the root of things. They will be surprised when they hear what Mr. Roscoe Drummond thinks ought to come out of the apparently innocent-looking economic proposals of this most laudable Atlantic pact, which has promised us everything but the millennium, just the way the United Nations did—everything but the millennium. And the Bretton Woods agreement—all we needed to do was to sign that worthless thing, and immediately we would have no more trouble at all, financially and economically! That was just the beginning of all our troubles!

And this is another of the same kind. May I read from this article. These are the things which Mr. Roscoe Drummond thinks ought to be achieved in order thoroughly to implement the economic proposals which constitute an integral part of the Atlantic pact:

1. To hold more frequent meetings of the Big Three foreign ministers in order to concert American, British and French foreign policy.

No serious objection to that.

2. To build up the machinery of the North Atlantic peace alliance so that it can begin to play an economic and political role, not merely a defence role.

What is envisaged by that economic role? What is envisaged by that political role? I am deeply concerned to know what they mean. Then:

3. To put American military leadership at the top of a new supreme western defence staff to bring about a totally integrated Atlantic defence.

What is the meaning of "totally integrated"? I wish I knew.

4. To seize moral and intellectual initiative in the cold war and keep before the whole world the peaceful purposes of the free nations.

Just as though we needed anything to tell the world what our peaceful purposes are. Dear me, we have been voicing them abroad, all over the world, for several years. If they are what we say they are, everybody ought to know by now.

5. To bring Germany into full-scale peaceful partnership economically and politically, with the west.

"Full scale peaceful partnership economically and politically"—sounds very beautiful, but what does it actually mean? Then, a little further on, he begins to particularize. These are the things he would have done if we brought these beautiful words into some sort of implementation:

1. To make the United States nearly a full partner in the development of a union of the western nations.

Now, what would that union be like? What would be meant by "a full partner", or "nearly a full partner"? That is not made clear at all. He does not try to make it clear. It seems to me that we in this debate right here and now ought to know something about what these things mean. Then:

2. To require Britain to decide before long whether it is going to play a role of active leadership in western Europe or whether it is going to force France and Germany to seek a settlement by themselves.

What is meant by "a role of active leadership in western Europe"? Why in the world should there be any group of people whose business it is to be "requiring" Great Britain? This kind of thing absolutely astounds me. Here is a nation that stood out to save mankind twice since the turn of the century, and impudent people like this are talking about requiring her, as though she did not have sense enough to know what she wanted to do, and enough intelligence to go ahead and do it. One would think that the world's major villain was Britain, that she had been responsible for all the ills of mankind for at least two hundred years, instead of having been the saviour of mankind twice in our generation.

It is time we knew something about what all this means. Then he asks this question:

3. Will the United States become a partner in the unification of the western nations?

There is the word "unification" again.

No theoretical answer would seem possible at this stage. But events are moving in that direction.

And then, further down:

It is becoming evident that no realistic defence of western Europe can be had unless it is organized economically and politically as well as militarily, with America as a participant, not merely as friendly counsellor and aide.

How in the world was it that we came successfully through two great wars in the last fifty years, if it was impossible to organize for successful war, without the ghastly thing which this man envisages? How did it happen? We came through successfully, and Great Britain led us.

It is astonishing, is it not, that, as soon as the United States is to lead, she cannot do the job without all these complications. This is really something that needs a complete explanation, I would imagine. And then, here again:

M. Schuman, in his plan to pool French and German coal and steel production—into which he invites all others who would join—has put the issue in so concrete a form that the British government almost inevitably will have to give a conclusive answer in the next few months.

What does this mean? Does it mean that once again Great Britain is the archvillain in the piece and that all the virtuous nations such as France, the United States and Germany have got to devise means of forcing Britain to declare her hand and to do their will? Again it says:

—and this will effect the whole range of British association with the continent.

That is a most astonishing remark to make. And then again:

There is every reason to believe that M. Schuman's proposal to pool French-German coal and steel production is designed not to keep Britain out of the continent but to encourage, even to stimulate, it to come in.

In the moment or two I have before six o'clock I should like to lay this fact down, one which I think is quite obvious: Along about 1940 or 1941 we began to find propaganda coming through all the newspapers of the land, and especially through United States newspapers, to the effect that the major objective of the war was to disintegrate the British commonwealth. That kind of propaganda has continued right up to the present time.

If the men who were guiding and inspiring that propaganda are the men who are guiding and inspiring the proposals in connection with the Atlantic pact, then, Mr. Speaker, I submit there is grave cause for warning.

The one power that under God has been equal to the task of saving the world twice in fifty years must be destroyed so that she cannot save the world again? I shall continue my remarks after the dinner recess.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, before six o'clock I was discussing what I feared to be the dangerous implications in what is being said and what has been said in respect of the Atlantic pact. It is not that I desire to oppose anything which appears to be genuinely and scientifically founded on a basis of fact and which gives out frankly all those facts, which explains those facts to the people and shows how its proposals will overcome difficulties which have lain at the base of war, but none of all these good qualities are observable in anything which has emanated as yet from the Atlantic pact or any discussion thereof. I now propose to go into some detail in respect of the matters which I raised.

First of all I should like to take what are likely to be the results of the economic clauses proposed in the Atlantic pact, if the hints which appear in the newspaper reports which I quoted before six o'clock happen to be founded upon reality. Before we take up what might be and what look as though they will be the results of the economic clauses of the Atlantic pact, may we consider for a minute or two what could be if there were an Atlantic organization soundly based. I believe people the world over realize what could be and they are longing and praying in their hearts and trusting that the men who are charged with the responsibility in respect of their affairs in these terrible times will be actuated by genuine and honourable motives to bring about what could be in the world.

We could have a system of mutual aid similar to that which obtained during the war and as a result of which and by the use of which we could have an era of freedom from the danger of international trade competition such as the world has never known. We could have a distribution of purchasing power within each nation on the basis of Social Credit proposals, which I do not propose to discuss. We could have the creation and distribution of purchasing power internationally as though the Social Credit system were going to be applied internationally, which it could be, but which again I am not going to discuss. The result of the application of such a system would be the expansion of productive power and the expansion of the ability of the people of the world to use that productive power. We could have in this world an abundance, or we could have abundance in any portion of the world which we organized into a community such as the Atlantic pact community, the British commonwealth, the United States or the Dominion of Canada.

But we find not the slightest hint that any one of all the men who have to do with organizing in connection with the Atlantic pact or the United Nations or any of our international organizations contemplates or would tolerate the introduction of such a system of distribution and the consequent encouragement of production. On the contrary, we find a stubborn refusal on the part of those men to even discuss these matters. As a result what is going to follow? If we do not have an expansion and abundance, we shall have restriction and scarcity. Is that what is going to come out of the Atlantic pact? Let us see.

First of all, because we will not adopt a scientific method of distribution we are bound to have a restricted economy and loss of freedom. Let us see what evidence we have that such a thing is being contemplated and is ready to be implemented. I should like to quote from an article headed, "Britain submits objections to the Schuman steel pool plan" which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor of May 29, written by Volney D. Hurd, as follows:

> The Schuman plan calls for an overall authority able to override the various participating governments in the field of coal and steel.

I quote again:

> The Schuman plan calls for an arbitrator who would be given the right to make a final decision in the case of a difference between the powers. This, in effect, puts the final sovereignty into the hands of a single man.

Are we to believe that the minister of external affairs and the government of Canada are solemnly and sincerely supporting a proposal under which that can become the case? In our British nations we have fought a thousand years to free ourselves from the domination of one man, and now with reckless fanaticism we have the men in charge of the great British nations actually contemplating, in a fatuous manner, the placing of their collective interests and welfare under the control of one man over whom they can exercise no possible control, either in the matter of his appointment or that of his responsibility after he is appointed.

These men come and tell us that that is the only possible solution they have for war, that that is what the Atlantic pact contemplates! I wonder what has become of my admirable French Canadian friends who on every occasion stand up and fight for provincial autonomy. They stand up here in the house occasionally and seek to break themselves further away from the British connection because they say it is imperialism. Yet they sit tamely and allow imperialism beyond anything the world ever dreamed of to be contemplated right before their eyes. Merely because that imperialism masquerades behind an international front called an Atlantic pact or a United Nations organization! It is high time that the people of this and other nations began to give some attention to what is going on. For example the Schuman plan proposes complete control by a single man over coal and iron. How would Canadians like to be told how much coal or steel they may or may not produce? Just imagine a man issuing an edict from Geneva telling us if he chooses to do so, for example, that we must cease to produce coal in Canada and buy it all from the United States, or cease to produce iron and buy it all from Great Britain. That is implied as clearly as day in the quotations I have read. How would we like to have some one man able to tell us whether we could or could not produce lumber, wood pulp or textiles? It is all implied in those passages I have read, and if the minister cannot satisfy us that those passages do not apply then undoubtedly we must assume that they do.

Suppose we have one man in charge of all these things. I ask where can there be found on earth a man informed enough, wise enough, unselfish enough and free enough from external and hidden influence to govern a dozen nations in respect of trade and industry? Hon. members sit here in the house and find a single minister having more than he can do to handle one department in one nation like Canada. Imagine a man undertaking to handle the trade and industry of seven, eight, nine, ten, twelve or fifteen nations!

Who will control that man if he is chosen? There are three groups, any one or all of which may control him. The first one is the United States of America, the second is international finance and the third may be any one of two or three other evilly disposed international powers. Having him in a place where no parliament on earth can get at him directly, he will be as unanswerable to us for his acts as a super-royal commission with its headquarters on Mars.

What could be achieved by such a union as is contemplated by the Atlantic pact? Face the facts squarely. Suppose there was complete unity of the fourteen or fifteen nations it is proposed to unite in the Atlantic pact. What may we expect to occur? Something similar to what has occurred in Canada. What has occurred in Canada? All members of the house who come from any province other than Ontario or Quebec know what has happened in Canada. Control over Canada has come to Ontario and Quebec. What has happened in the United States? Industrial and financial control of the forty-eight states of the United States has got into the hands of three or four powerful industralized states in the northeastern part of that country, and all the efforts of all the other states put together cannot remove it. What nation would become the Ontario and Quebec, or the northeastern states of the United States, in the great super nation, dominion or confederation, that would be formed ultimately under the Atlantic pact? Which ones of the nations that are going to be involved will become the sharecropper states of the United States, the southern states that are a scandal and reproach to that country today because it does not know how to distribute among the southern states the good things the nation can produce? Have hon. members taken a moment to wonder whether that might not be Canada? How recklessly we are approaching this whole thing!

Why should the unity of several of these nations render them more prosperous than they are individually? We will grant that a number of nations working together can form a productive unit such as the United States, but the United States has not solved the problems which are just wrecking the world. She has not solved the problem of distribution. In the United States right now, the greatest nation on the face of the earth, there are at least one-third of the people who constitute the submerged third of which Roosevelt commonly spoke. The United States has not solved the problem that is vexing us internationally.

Why has the United States not been able to bring about the distribution which is desirable in that country? She is able to produce practically everything she needs. She has forty-eight independent nations joined in one, all in complete unity. There are no tariffs between them. There is free trade, about which we hear so much in this house. There in non-discrimination in trade that our ministers are almost fanatically declaiming about to us all the time. There is no difference in their currency. They have one common currency. There is convertibility, unified control, everything. Why should not the United States govern themselves as a veritable Garden of Eden? If the nations in the proposed Atlantic pact become united could they employing the present financial system do any better job of distribution than the United States has done in their country? Who will show how they could or would? I do not think we would be very happy about the result.

I should like to ask what necessary improvement would come about in a military way through the union of these various nations with the sacrifice of national sovereignty that would be involved? It has never been shown that their union would necessarily make the whole united group more powerful in a military way than the group was in the last war or in the first world war. We hear no scientific explanation. The people who are proposing the Atlantic pact just assume that it will accomplish these and these and these results. We are just assuming that along with them, and accepting everything with the most implicit faith, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) expressed himself willing to do this afternoon. It happens that you do not ordinarily get by on just pure faith. You have to have works along with faith!

Most of the talk is completely unrealistic. I challenge any proponent of the proposed Atlantic pact to contradict anything I have said up to the present time and produce the facts and figures to prove what he has to say.

Let us turn to the possible effect on Great Britain. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that the key to our freedom and security today is Great Britain just as she was the key to our security in world wars I and II. If we allow her to be destroyed, to that extent we sacrifice our own probability of security. Great Britain is now beginning to prosper. News reports now show that. There is an article in the Christian Science Monitor of May 29 at page 3 entitled, "Britain begins to bask in warmth of prosperity". There is a comment upon the slowness of recovery, but there is positive recovery at the present time. Why has Great Britain's recovery been so slow? Largely because of the international complications and restrictions imposed upon her as a result of world war II when the United States insisted on the Washington loan agreement and Great Britain was forced into the Bretton Woods and San Francisco agreements, and so on. Every one of them restricted her in her freedom to do as she had done before and made her position ever so much more difficult.

Nevertheless, in spite of that, Great Britain has made a very fine recovery up to the present time, but she is in a more or less precarious state. The Atlantic pact could easily wreck the British economy. For what other reason are the British so careful about entering into this measure? It is not because the British are not as anxious for freedom as the other nations who are pressing her to enter into it. For the last thousand years Great Britain has striven for the freedom of mankind and has been ready to make any sacrifice to obtain it. What is there in the Atlantic pact for the British? Primarily the British require three things. They desire security of sources of raw materials; they have to have security of markets; and they have to have the ability to compete in their own home market. Is there one single solitary thing in the Atlantic pact which will guarantee or help to guarantee these things to Great Britain? If there is, I fail to find it; and if I fail to find it I believe it is because up to the present time no proponent of the Atlantic pact has given anything like a clear definition of how these things could be accomplished in Britain. May I quote from the article "Britain begins to bask in warmth of prosperity" by William H. Stringer, of the London bureau:

> Certainly, it is agreed on all sides, this is no time for relaxing the post-war drive and self-restraint which have built British recovery. Prosperity still is precarious. German and Japanese trade competition must soon be faced. An American recession could shake Britain to its economic roots.

I ask what the Atlantic pact could do to help Britain resist Japanese and German competition. What would it do? What does it propose to do? What do its proponents think they would do? I wager they have never taken the trouble to get down to these matters and think about them at all. They have drifted around, completely drunk with enthusiasm. They have made no proposal, and in what they have said there is implicit no proposal of any concrete value whatever. Up to the present time what has the government of Canada or the government of the United States or any other government under the present economic system done to increase distribution within the nation, except to tax people according to the socialist doctrine and redistribute the results of that taxation? My reply is that they have done absolutely nothing, and I defy any man in Canada to contradict that statement.

Now let us consider such concrete proposals as have appeared in those small portions of the Atlantic pact discussions that have been revealed to us. What is behind the Schuman plan, about which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) waxed so eloquent and enthusiastic this afternoon? Sometimes I find myself quite at a loss to understand how the hon. member can so completely lose control of his mind when he comes to think of anything international. He seems to think that the moment you get into the international sphere you lift your feet right out of the clay which characterizes this mundane world and go flying off among the clouds where everything is lovely and dreamy and misty and nebulous. So he is exuberant about the Schuman plan; but what does the Schuman plan propose, and why? In the first place the Schuman plan recognizes that German competition in steel and coal is now becoming very keen and very dangerous. That is clearly set forth in a fine article on page 3 of the issue of May 24 of the Christian Science Monitor by J. B. S. Halper. The Germans are underselling home producers in Belgium of such products as nuts, bolts and wrenches by some twenty to thirty per cent, after overcoming an eight per cent customs levy. They are underselling Belgium, in South America, in Switzerland and Holland. They are even underselling in France and Luxembourg. Now the Schuman proposal is designed to get Germany under control so it will be unable to continue to undersell these nations. That is the whole reason and purpose of the Schuman plan. Is that not a magnificent proposal for the solution of the causes of war? Think of becoming enthusiastic over such a nebulous and vaporous thing! That strikes one as being quite ludicrous and fantastic. The Schuman plan is called a bar to growing cartelization, in recent issues of the Christian Science Monitor. Hon. members can get those issues and read those articles.

The net result, as the information comes to us, is that the only thing proposed by the Schuman plan is the control of cartelization and control of the productive capacity of Germany and her ability to undersell other nations. This is the extent of the guarantee of freedom from war! There is a fine article on page 4 of the June 1 issue of this newspaper headed "Schuman proposal aims to check overproduction" which backs up the sort of thing I am talking about. Considering all these facts, then, upon what is the whole Atlantic pact based economically? It is based merely on restriction of production, scarcity and regimentation. Is this all the people of this generation, after the unbelievable sacrifices they have made in two world wars, can look to as the new heaven and new earth which the prime minister of an earlier day used to promise?

I wish to turn for a moment or two now to the question of the British empire. One of the amazing things to me is that so few people ever take the trouble to say a word of commendation about the British commonwealth. In recent days in this house whenever one speaks of the British commonwealth he tries to leave "British" out of it, and then he tries to say "commonwealth" in a sort of whisper, as though ashamed of it.

What is the minister doing to build up the British commonwealth? As I said before, the greatest guarantee of freedom and prosperity for Canada as well as the nations of the world is the British commonwealth. It is the greatest potential guarantee. It is an instrument which has been tried and proved and found not wanting over the years and centuries. For one hundred years, from 1814 to 1914, the British kept the world virtually at peace. What happened after the league of nations entered following the first world war, when British power was destroyed largely through the manipulations of the United States? It was not very long until we had another world war, was it? Today the British commonwealth is great in potentiality. The nations composing it are greater in population than those coming under the Atlantic pact.

Then why not organize the nations of the commonwealth? They are willing to work together. They know how to work together. They have shown they can work together. Why try to destroy the British commonwealth and then go racing around hunting a nebulous thing called the Atlantic pact? That is the way any ordinary person will think, I should say. I believe the British commonwealth has a tremendous destiny ahead. I believe the prophecies in the bible indicate that great destiny. Why not endeavour to pursue it, instead of trying to wreck the noble things we have? I want the minister to know straight from the shoulder that there is at least one member of this house who wants him to do everything in his power to cultivate closer relations between the members of the British commonwealth of nations. I want him to know there is at least one member who wants him to do everything in his power to offset the tendency of any organization or individual in this world to undermine the power of the British commonwealth.

I understand there is more than one hon. member feeling as I do, from what I hear about me, and if all the hon. members were here I would wager seventy-five per cent of them would be in favour of what I have said. Yet with the utmost impunity and lack of consideration for the membership of this house and the people of this country, members of this government representing this nation go out and do things that tend to destroy the unity and strength of the British commonwealth. I want the minister to know that I believe in Britain. I believe in her past, in her present and in her future, as I believe in the past, present and future of the British commonwealth. We do not need to slap in the face those who propose an Atlantic pact. Let us do anything that will help improve conditions, but let us not permit ourselves to be led into any traps or complications which will limit or hinder us any more than we are now being limited or hindered.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in rising to deal briefly with one or two of the points that have been brought forward in this discussion, I shall try to take the advice of the member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), and not allow my feet to get too far off the ground, or allow my mind to wander nebulously into those clouds which are supposed to descend upon us when we talk about international affairs. I should like to assure him also that it is no part of the Atlantic pact, or the idea of any of those who participate in it, to weaken in any way the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Blackmore: I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) in his statement this afternoon suggested that in opening this discussion I did not leave the house with any feeling of urgency about the matters under discussion. If I did not it was my inability to express my own feelings, because of course there is a very great sense of urgency about this matter. Indeed, as he pointed out, this sense of urgency is likely to continue for a long time. In dealing with these matters, therefore, we have to deal with a situation of continuing urgency. The hon. member referred to that wise speech of the able and experienced Sir Alexander Cadogan, who cautioned us that this period in which we are now may continue over the years, that we would have to approach the solution of the problems which it involves in a spirit not only of urgency but of coolness. I believe he used the word "tranquillity".

The member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), in following me in the discussion this afternoon, asked me some questions which I confess it will be very difficult for me to answer. He asked, for instance, whether we were moving towards peace or towards war. The member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) put the same idea when he asked whether a war was not inevitable. It is indeed difficult to deal with such all-embracing and fundamental questions as those. In my opinion, of course, there is nothing inevitable in human conduct except life and death. War is certainly not inevitable. But the fact is we now live in a sort of twilight zone between peace and war. There are times when we wonder whether that twilight is between darkness and light or between light and darkness. The fact remains that one or the other is bound to follow. If we order our affairs in a wise, firm and unprovocative way internationally, we have no reason to believe that the twilight will not be followed by light. I can assure the house, Mr. Speaker, that I for one do not feel any sense of complacency whatever as I contemplate the international problems that face this country and other countries. If I gave that impression this afternoon in anything I said, I assure you I did not intend to do so.

It was pointed out this afternoon that statements of principle are all very well, but we do not hear very much in the house about what we are going to do to convert those principles into performance. The member for Peace River (Mr. Low) mentioned that even the language we use in these international documents is ambiguous. I confess that at times at international meetings, where differences of opinion are often important and where the necessity for agreement is so great, there is a temptation to seize on words which may seem to express the lowest common denominator of difference. I do feel, however, that in the recent meeting of the north Atlantic council we did avoid that difficulty and danger in the language of the communiqué in which we expressed our views. It is straightforward and to the point. I would have thought it could have been understood by all the members in this house. If there are any particular words which seem ambiguous to my hon. friend I hope he will let me know what they are, and I shall do my best to make them clear to him.

Mr. Blackmore: I certainly will, on your estimates.

Mr. Pearson: Then the hon. member to whom I have just referred remarked, and his remark was repeated by at least one other hon. member, that he was very worried about all this talk of the surrender of sovereignty. What did we mean, and particularly what did I mean when I used that expression? He went on to say, if I recall correctly and if I am not correct I know he will correct me, that North America must preserve its freedom of action; that we were in danger of weakening ourselves by giving away our sovereignty.

I have never been very worried about this danger. I believe, however, that we should not refer so often to the word "surrender" in connection with sovereignty. What we are trying to do in building up international life and international organization, as I see it, is to put our sovereignty to work, to make it work for us. The only way to do that, as I understand it, is by agreement with like-minded countries, so that we will gain far more from that agreement than we may lose by giving up some of our individual rights. That is the only justification for a surrender of a national right, that we get something more valuable for it. I suggest that is the basis of a good deal of political development. Indeed, it is the basis of the development which led the colonies of British North America to give up some of their sovereign rights in order to form the Dominion of Canada.

The member for Peel asked me whether we discussed, in London, the question of civilian defence. We did not. It was not one of the subjects on the agenda of this particular meeting. Of course, it is one of the most important subjects that face us in the field of defence. But the first consideration of this subject internationally would be through one of the technical committees, I assume, which have already been set up by the north Atlantic organization. He went on to ask us what our particular role might be in this new concept of what we now call balanced collective defence; and how much it is going to cost us. Those are pertinent questions indeed, but I am sure the hon. member will appreciate the fact that the north Atlantic organization has been in being for just over a year. We signed our pact just about a year ago. During that year we have accomplished a great deal. I believe it has been an important and effective year, but we have not yet reached the point where we can estimate the detailed obligations of each member of the pact from the principles which we have adopted. That is going on now through the agencies which we have set up. I confess, Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer his question at this time in a form which I believe would satisfy him. I would only add that I should think that, whatever the cost may be, it will not be too high, as he admitted, for any member of the group to pay if it preserves peace and guarantees security. I would also feel, as the Prime Minister has indicated on previous occasions, that the cost of a group insurance policy should be less than the cost of eleven or twelve individual policies.

The member for Peel also mentioned China. He wondered whether we had discussed that at the North Atlantic council meeting. I should possibly have pointed out this afternoon that, in addition to our North Atlantic council meeting, there was in London at that time a meeting of the foreign ministers of the United States, Great Britain and France. They discussed a great many questions which were not on the agenda of the North Atlantic council, among them China. I am not, of course, in a position to reveal to the house what their conclusions were, although they were good enough to let us see them, because that is something which they will have to give out themselves. The hon. member for Peel was particularly interested in the possibility of there being some change in United States policy towards China as a result of these discussions. He mentioned a statement of the United States secretary of state the other day which indicated that the United States, although not recognizing the communist government of China itself, would not oppose the recognition of that government in so far as membership in a United Nations agency is concerned if the majority of the members of that agency voted in favour of the communist government being members of it.

Mr. Graydon: They would not veto it.

Mr. Pearson: They would not veto that position. However, as I understand it, that does not represent any change in United States policy over the last two or three months, because I think that was made clear some time ago. The recent statement of the secretary of state does not, I think, mean that there has been any particular change in that situation.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) spoke at some length on the economic obligations of the pact; this matter was referred to by other speakers, and it is indeed an important aspect of the whole affair. He wondered whether we were taking into account, in our plans for national development of our own resources, the obligations which we may have undertaken by article 2. I think I can say, Mr. Speaker, that the obligations that we have undertaken under article 2 are not obligations which would require any special plans for national development, at least until we get more detailed information as to what we will be expected to do as our specific part of this balanced defence. I cannot give any exact information on the point at this time for reasons which I have indicated. When these matters are worked out in detail and the governments concerned come to an agreement as to how they are going to make their special contribution, it may be that we can most usefully contribute, in addition to what we are contributing in other respects at this time, by provision of strategic materials and all that kind of thing; and that may require some special plans on the part of the government. But I think it would be premature to speculate on that point. Certainly until we get more information as to what we should do or might do, speculation would be premature.

Then, departing for a moment from the London meeting, the hon. member for Peel brought to my attention an article in Look magazine on Canadian-United States relations; and I think he asked me whether I felt that that article would cause me to modify in any way the statement which I made in the speech in London. I have seen the article in question. It is entitled "Why the United States and Canada should be One Country", by Mr. George E. Shea, Jr. I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that my attention was distracted when I tried to read it, because on the page opposite the article were some extremely interesting pictures of a movie actress called Miss Lana Turner. For my part I felt that those pictures dealt more impressively, more authoritatively and more truthfully with the subject with which they were concerned than did Mr. Shea's article.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The hon. member for Peel did not see those pictures.

Mr. Pearson: However, I have the manuscript of my London speech, and I should be glad to read from it so that it may be on the record. The hon. member for Peel mentioned it this afternoon but he quoted from an editorial in the Times. I should like to put on the record what I actually did say in London on this matter, and it still represents my viewpoint. I said in London:

> Do not, however, over here—

I meant in England.

> —write us off as a former colony going swiftly through a transitional stage of dominion status prior to becoming a United States satellite. Believe me, that is not true, nor is this the destiny that lies ahead of a country whose future is as bright as any in the world. That future is based on national freedom, on self-reliance and on self-respect. It includes the closest possible co-operation with, but not absorption by the United States.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) this afternoon also referred to the important question of atomic energy, a matter which was of course not on the agenda of our council meetings but which must be in the mind of every person these days. He wondered whether we had made any progress in the last few months in seeking for a solution to this vitally important problem. No progress has been made. Though the secretary general of the United Nations has discussed this matter with the governments he has been visiting in the last few weeks, the difficulty that blocked progress two or three months ago still remains, namely the refusal of the government of the U.S.S.R. to allow its representatives to attend the meetings of the committee of five who are searching for a solution to this problem. The refusal, of course, is based on the fact that the Chinese communist delegate has not been admitted to those meetings.

We here have not been happy about this situation and we have been casting about to see if there is any way in which we could get out of this difficulty. We have been in touch with other governments on that point. So far, however, we have not been successful. It is tragic that that kind of political development should prevent the discussion of such a matter as atomic energy at this time. If we could resume those discussions we would do our best—and I know I am speaking for the other members as well as for the Canadian members of the group—to find out what the foreign secretary of the U.S.S.R. meant last autumn when he said that the government of the U.S.S.R. were now willing to accept a system of adequate inspection and control in return for the abolition of the bomb. He never explained what he meant by that; and until he gives that explanation, it is impossible for us to be optimistic that the Soviet government would in fact be willing to accept conditions which we consider to be absolutely necessary before we outlaw this terrible weapon.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the minister say what those conditions are?

Mr. Pearson: The conditions which have been laid down in a plan to which the great majority of the United Nations members have subscribed include inspection by a United Nations agency, not merely at the suggestion and with the approval of the government of the country in which the installation exists but inspection at any time that the international agency chooses to send its inspectors into that country, with full freedom to visit and to examine what is going on. Until we get that kind of inspection it would be difficult indeed to feel that a declaration banning the use of this weapon and destroying the weapons already in existence would be safe. That is the reason why we have not made more progress. No matter what the members of the communist party and their followers may say, that is the one and, as I understand it, the only great obstacle in the way of some agreement in this matter. But it is a fundamental obstacle that must be removed before agreement can be reached. I think, Mr. Speaker, that those are among the more concrete points raised during the course of the discussion. I know I have dealt with them only in a superficial way, but there may be an opportunity when my estimates are under discussion to go into some of these matters at greater length.

Meanwhile I should like to end my remarks by saying that we have reason to be encouraged by what we accomplished in London during the recent session of the council, but we certainly have no reason to be complacent about that meeting or about the course of international developments generally.

Bancroft, Ontario

REFUTATION OF ALLEGED MISSTATEMENTS CONCERNING BANCROFT AS A TOURIST ATTRACTION

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish briefly to bring to the attention of the house a matter that affects my own riding and various other ridings in eastern Ontario. I refer particularly to those ridings interested in the tourist business. I direct the attention of the house to an article published in a weekly newspaper, the Montreal Standard, in its issue of December 31, 1949, entitled "Bancroft was Tough". This article was written by Mr. Mackenzie Porter. It was slanderous in many respects, untrue in practically every statement made in it and most unfair to all the people of a very large community. It has given the tourist industry much adverse advertising.

One could only wonder how a reporter or a writer, if Mr. Porter can be classed as a reporter or a writer, or the editor of such a Canadian weekly paper could write or publish such an article without first checking or verifying even a few of the glaring untruths and slanderous statements made in this article.

Mr. Gibson: What is the name of the paper?

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): The Montreal Standard. Everyone admits that the tourist industry is most important to all parts of Canada. The dominion government, all the provincial governments and many of the counties and other associations have their own tourist departments; and these agencies and departments send out books, maps, pamphlets and other literature to all parts of the North American continent, for the sole purpose of advertising our tourist attractions in the various parts of Canada.

Large sums of money are spent by dominion, provincial and municipal governments. For example, a short time ago a sportsman's show was held at Cleveland. The county of Hastings, in which Bancroft is located, had a booth at this show, and had two representatives from the county there over a period of a week. These two representatives were there for the sole purpose of distributing tourist literature and giving firsthand information with respect to the tourist facilities the county of Hastings has to offer.

For a number of years that county has published a tourist booklet consisting of forty-five pages, entitled "The Highlands of Hastings and the City of Belleville". The hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Follwell), who resides in the city of Belleville, only last week sent each member of the House of Commons a copy of this very fine booklet which outlines some of the tourist attractions in the county of Hastings. The Peterborough Examiner each year puts out a very large special tourist vacation edition which covers the tourist resorts in the Kawartha lakes district, and in the county of Hastings. The hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) each year sends members of the house a copy of this vacation guide.

I mention these two publications simply to show the extent of the publications and the money spent in advertising the tourist attractions of this section of eastern Ontario. The steady increase in the number of American tourists coming to eastern Ontario, and particularly to Hastings county, and the large number who have purchased land and erected cottages on the sites clearly shows that this method of advertising by means of booklets, maps and advertisements in American papers and magazines has paid good dividends.

It appears to me most unfortunate that at a time when every community which has tourist attractions is doing everything possible to attract American tourists and American dollars to Canada, a large weekly Canadian paper with a wide circulation should go out of its way to publish an article such as "Bancroft was Tough". I am sure anyone reading the article and for the first time learning about this county would never think of going there for a vacation.

Shortly after the article was published I wrote to the Montreal Standard pointing out the many errors, and the nature of the slanderous references. After a long delay the editor published only certain parts of my letter. To date the editor of the Standard has not seen fit to publish an apology to the thousands of Canadians who reside in the Bancroft district for this most insulting and slanderous attack made against the whole community.

I think all will agree that the press of Canada has every freedom; yet I submit that with that freedom goes the responsibility that no paper should use the power of its pages to slander or to hold an entire community up to ridicule and contempt, as has been done by the Montreal Standard. I submit the editor of this newspaper was guilty of the cheapest kind of ethics—if it can even be called ethical—when he printed an untrue, slimy and slanderous story for the sole purpose of attracting attention to the pages of this newspaper, and thereby increasing its circulation.

As for Mr. Porter, who wrote the article, I can only say that I hope Mr. Porter has the guts—and I doubt if he possesses guts of any nature—to return to Bancroft. If he does he will then receive the type of treatment he so justly deserves.

Bancroft is a village of about 1,100 persons. It is located in the northern part of Hastings county. To show the "very primitive conditions and shanty standards", to use the exact words of Mr. Porter in this article, I would mention that about a year and a half ago a new school was opened in Bancroft. This school cost about half a million dollars, and is the finest of its kind in the province. The attendance at the school is about 400, and already plans are under way to enlarge it. Modern busses bring the children to the school daily from the surrounding districts. This school is equipped with every device and every kind of equipment used in modern education. Bancroft possesses a hospital which is not equalled by those in the cities of Belleville and Trenton, which are also located in the county of Hastings. The village has a very fine community hall, a new covered rink, a fine swimming pool—and I am wondering how many other Ontario communities with 1,100 of a population have a modern swimming pool. A modern paved highway connects Bancroft to the south with Belleville, to the west with Peterborough, and to the east with Pembroke and Ottawa. Modern busses provide daily services to these cities and towns.

The village has the hydroelectric service, a modern theatre, paved streets, a very fine tourist hotel—and yet this is the "primitive and shanty standards" town described by Mr. Porter in his article "Bancroft was Tough". When he was in the village of Bancroft he was shown the school, the hospital, the rink, the swimming pool, the community hall and the other attractive features of the community. However, he chose to ignore all these things in selecting material for his article.

Bancroft is located in the centre of the finest tourist district of Ontario. The altitude is very high, and in that district hayfever is unknown. There are hundreds of lakes, rivers, trout streams, rapids, and other ideal spots, all within the northern part of Hastings county, rugged hills with wide sweeping valleys, with lakes and rivers providing scenery that cannot be equalled anywhere in the world. There is a lake, L'Amable lake, which rivals lake Louise. Nowhere else in Canada will you find such varied lakes with so many game fish. But Mr. Porter did not choose to write about any of these attractions, nor did he mention the thousands of ideal camping and cottage sites which are so attractive to United States tourists, all with fine sandy beaches with pines in the background, all ideal places to spend a holiday. Mr. Porter did not mention one single constructive thing about Bancroft as a community. He was shown some of the finest lodges in eastern Ontario but he made no mention of them.

You might wonder what Mr. Porter did write about this community. He chose to write about sex crimes, illegitimate children, shanty standards, intermarriage, deformities, Indians, liquor and various other matters on the same high level. Here is one choice extract from the article:

> The population grew from 6,000 to 18,000, not always through marriage and very little through immigration.

Here is another choice phrase:

> The great-grandchildren of the pioneers scratch for a living.

Another choice extract:

> Compelled by the poverty of the earth to live on shanty standards, they have become disillusioned.

Another one:

> Intermarriage has sapped their vigour and caused much deformity.

Mr. Porter puts these words into the mouth of the Ontario provincial constable stationed at Bancroft:

> When I came here this was the most drunken and immoral area in Ontario.

The constable denies ever making such a statement. The article goes on to refer to criminal offences and Mr. Porter states that many of them were sex offences. These few quotations indicate the nature of the whole article and how little Mr. Porter cared about writing of the true Bancroft. As for sex crimes, I checked with the police authorities and found that it was over three years since there had been a sex crime in the district and then the parties concerned came from the highly virtuous and intellectual city of Toronto.

Apparently Mr. Porter was not interested in writing the truth about this community. He wanted something sensational so he used his limited imagination and vocabulary to use every possible degrading word and phrase simply to make copy. If Mr. Porter had been even a fair reporter he might have told the story of Bancroft's part in the war. He would have pleased everyone in the community if he had mentioned in his article that Bancroft had the fine record of having ten per cent of its entire population in the armed forces, and when I say armed forces I mean the active armed forces. He could have told the story of the Bancroft Red Cross, of the Bancroft bond campaigns. He could have told of the splendid work done by the Bancroft legion.

There was a real story in the history of the Bancroft Lions club, in the large sums of money raised each year. This is a service club that built a covered rink, a service club that made a swimming pool possible, a service club that raised thousands of dollars to assist settlers in a township just south of Bancroft who lost their buildings and belongings in a tornado, a service club that sponsors a very fine regatta each year, a service club that provides sports equipment for young Canadians.

These fine community activities did not interest Mr. Porter. Apparently he thought such things lacked colour. He was not interested in the activities of the community in providing proper supervised sports activities for the young Canadians of the community, nor was he interested in reporting the success of such activities which is reflected in the complete absence of juvenile delinquency cases in the district. Apparently Mr. Porter and the editor, with the idea of printing an article that might increase circulation, deliberately chose to overlook and ignore the facts and the true history of the community and to produce an article on Indians, sex crimes and intermarriage.

I suggest to Mr. Porter and the editor of the Standard that they might well read the daily papers of Toronto and Montreal. There they will find daily reports of acts of violence, often murder, and of rape, robbery, theft of cars, assaults on young women and the doings of vicious young city hoodlums who travel in gangs. Where do these crimes occur? Right in the largest cities of Canada, cities that pride themselves on being educated and the cultural centres of the nation.

If Mr. Porter and the editor of the Standard wish to do something for the benefit of the whole country then they should write and publish an article that will tell of the true Bancroft. Let them tell of the great attractions there are there. Let them tell of the few places left in Ontario where the beauty of nature is left unspoiled. Let them tell of the place where you will find people who are loyal, who have genuine friendship for their friends. Let them tell the story of the breed of young men that Bancroft produced during the war. Let both these men forget the degrading matters which were included in this article and produce an article about their fellow Canadians of which they may well be proud.

Surely the editor and Mr. Porter are old enough to know that you should never judge a man by the clothes he wears or by the correctness of his grammar, but rather by the contribution he makes to his community. The record of community contribution and progress in Bancroft speaks for itself. I wanted to protest in the strongest way against this article and the serious breach of the freedom of the press by the Montreal Standard in publishing an untrue, an unfair and slanderous article on a very fine, progressive and worth-while Canadian community.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Item stands.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTROL OF ELEVATORS AND RAILWAYS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 252, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935—Mr. Howe—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Constitution of board.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Could the minister state the average total annual world production of wheat, and what percentage Canada produces?

Mr. Howe: I cannot give that answer at the moment. I shall ask my officials to come down to the floor of the house and hope to be able to give it shortly.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I do not know whether I understood the minister aright this morning, but I believe he said that the Chicago market did not have any bearing on the wheat we sold, that we were getting whatever bids we could. The minister said also there was forty cents difference between the two markets.

Mr. Howe: Thirty to forty cents.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The last quotation over the week end according to the Globe and Mail shows two cents difference between Chicago and Canadian No. 2.

Mr. Howe: What location? What basis?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Chicago and Winnipeg. I suppose Winnipeg would be basis Fort William. That is what is in the newspaper quotations for markets.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the minister explain why the number of members is being raised to five?

Mr. Howe: The difficulty is that the board has taken on additional duties. One of them is to represent Canada at the international wheat agreeement organization which has its headquarters in London, England. Another is to market coarse grains. There has been a good deal of illness among members of the board, and there have been two or three changes in the board within the last two years. The pressure of work is heavy and, if the board is reduced from three to two, two members are hardly able to keep up with the work of the board. I am asking the house to make provision for two additional members with the thought that perhaps we will appoint one additional member in the next few months. One member of the present board has been in the hospital for the last two or three months which leaves only two members to function. One of them is on his way to England, and the other has been summoned to appear before a committee of the house which leaves no member of the board in Winnipeg to carry on its work. The provision for additional members is simply a precaution which we may or may not take advantage of. It depends a good deal on whether we can find a qualified man available for appointment.

Mr. Coldwell: That seems a very good reason. I wondered if it was to give more representation to the producers of this country.

Mr. Howe: That is a thought as well, but the main thing is to get men who are competent to sell wheat. I believe my hon. friend thinks that is paramount, and if we can get them from the producers' interests we will of course be interested.

Mr. Fair: Can the minister give us the names of those on the advisory committee?

Mr. Howe: I would refer my hon. friend to page 11 of the annual report of the wheat board which lists the names. They are Lou Hutchinson, Calgary, Alberta; D. I. Walker, Toronto; J. C. A. Nijdam, Winnipeg; F. H. Clendenning, Vancouver; J. Theo Roy, Montreal; J. H. Wesson, Regina; R. C. Brown, Winnipeg; F. Pettypiece, Auld, Ontario; J. A. McCowan, Summerberry, Saskatchewan; P. Farnalls, Halkirk, Alta; and C. E. Hayles, Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The minister was going to give me an answer about the production of wheat.

Mr. Howe: The world production of wheat is about 4 billion bushels and Canada produces from 8 to 10 per cent of the total.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Eight to ten per cent of that.

Mr. Howe: Depending on the size of the crop.

Mr. Ross (Souris): There was another question. I asked the minister two or three times, and he made a statement the other day, about the "have regard to" clause. I know that he now tries to separate this amendment entirely from the United Kingdom wheat agreement but at another time he insisted they were pretty close together. It would have a bearing on this legislation if the minister could tell us whether there is any basis of settlement arrived at as to the "have regard to" clause in the contract.

Mr. Howe: The "have regard to" clause reads as follows:

> The actual price to be paid for wheat to be bought and sold within the crop year 1948-49 shall be negotiated and settled between the United Kingdom and the government of Canada not later than the 31st December, 1947, and prices for wheat to be bought and sold within the crop year 1949-50 shall be negotiated and settled not later than the 31st December, 1948. In determining the prices of these two crop years, 1948-49, and 1949-50, the United Kingdom government will have regard to any difference between the prices paid under this agreement in the 1946-47 and 1947-48 crop years and the world prices for wheat in 1946-47 and 1947-48 crop years.

That is the "have regard to" clause in the agreement. I suggest that regard was paid in fixing these prices. The price for the first two years of the agreement was $1.55. After negotiation the price for the third year was fixed at $2, and after negotiation the price for the fourth year was fixed at $2. What does my hon. friend read out of the agreement beyond the fact that the price for the last two years would be settled having regard to world prices in the first two years?

Mr. Ross (Souris): The Minister of Agriculture said they had agreed with officials in Great Britain to extend the final settlement until July, 1950. That is next month. He distinctly made the statement in this house that would be the date for the final settlement if there is to be any further settlement with Great Britain for the difference between the world price and this price. That was the final arrangement as nearly as the house knows it.

Mr. Howe: The matter of the "have regard to" clause was discussed in great detail during our sessions with Sir Stafford Cripps and other ministers of the United Kingdom government. The whole situation was reviewed. The United Kingdom is just as positive as I have been in my statements in the house as to what the world price of wheat really was in those periods. My hon. friend said the world price was the price in a local market to which Canadian grain is not permitted access. I wonder what the world price would have been if we had been able to ship our Canadian grain to the Chicago market, which he says is the great criterion for world prices. We went over the agreement while in London. We asked the United Kingdom government what further settlement it is to make on account of the "have regard to" clause. The United Kingdom government took a very strong position that they had fulfilled all obligations under that clause, and so far as the United Kingdom was concerned. We agreed on behalf of Canada that considering all the circumstances that was the case.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Chairman, I asked the minister about the world production of wheat and what percentage of that amount the Canadian production constituted. He gave me the answer, and I think that is some proof as to what would have happened if we had been using the Chicago market. I do not think that 8 per cent of the world's market would have made the very great difference that he would have us believe.

Mr. Howe: If my hon. friend will excuse me, he is twisting phrases. He did not ask me about the world market for wheat. He asked me about the world production of wheat which is totally different from the world market.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am not confusing the two at all.

Mr. Howe: Why not stick to one of them?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I asked a direct question and I got a direct answer. I am stating now, in answer to what the minister has just said, that I do not think that the 8 per cent would have made a great difference. The point I want to make now is that I do not recall a difference of 40 cents in recent days between the price of class II Canadian wheat and the Chicago price, which the minister mentioned this morning.

Mr. Howe: The chairman of the wheat board, who should have some knowledge of these matters, tells me that the difference today is between 35 and 40 cents.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Did he say what prices would be compared to show that difference?

Mr. Howe: It is the United States cash wheat price delivered at seaboard as compared with the Canadian cash wheat price delivered at seaboard.

Mr. Ross (Souris): What was the price of Canadian class II wheat last week end?

Mr. Howe: The price at Fort William two days ago was $2.08, to which must be added about 17 cents, which brings it to $2.25 at seaboard. That is the Canadian cash price at seaboard, and that is about 35 cents under the cash price at seaboard of United States wheat for comparable grade.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I well remember the many promises made in this house by the previous prime minister and the present Minister of Agriculture in relation to this contract. This morning I read a quotation in which the previous minister of trade and commerce pointed out that the wheat producers were making great sacrifices by entering into this contract, and further that this was the factor that governed the cost of living in this country in those times. That is still true today. The Minister of Agriculture and the then prime minister repeatedly stated that the farmers who were making those sacrifices would have that taken into account for many years following the war. However, I take it there is to be no further settlement expected from Britain under that contract?

Mr. Howe: That is correct; but let me point out to my hon. friend that this house did not enter into that contract in a spirit of sacrifice. The leader of the C.C.F. party read an extract from the speech of the leader of the Conservative party of that day in which he said the contract was no good because when the price went down Britain would not honour the contract. He said that very clearly. At that time more people believed that after the war the price of wheat would fall than believed it would rise; and many people entered into that contract in the belief that they were protecting the farmers of western Canada against a sharp drop in price.

No man can look four years into the future with any certainty. I do not mind saying to my hon. friend that I was as sceptical of this contract when it was signed as any man in this house, because I do not like to sell wheat four years in advance of its production. As I said today, I do not like to sell wheat one year in advance of production. It seems very strange that the people who have been most critical of the wheat contract and the way it has worked out are the people who have been most critical of the government for not signing another contract, in other words for not selling n-other crop before it is planted. Well, next year Canada will get the same price for its wheat as any other country exporting wheat. Perhaps that is the complaint of hon. members, namely that there will be no cause for criticism with respect to sales from the new crop, for the reason that the price of Canadian wheat will be no different from the sales of anyone else. I cannot think of any other reason.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The minister said no one entered into this contract with any thought of sacrifice. This morning I quoted the words of his predecessor in announcing the agreement in this house, when he said it was a matter of sacrifice on the part of our farmers. The quotation is on Hansard and will speak for itself. Is it the idea after this year, then, to trade through the exchange, as they do in the United States? If there is no contract I suppose that is the way the wheat will be sold, within the terms of the international agreement. Is that right?

Mr. Howe: No, sir. The bill we are asking the house to pass this year provides that the wheat will be pooled and sold by the government at the best price obtainable.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Then what about oats and barley? They also come under this; and we have had one year's experience. I remember the minister announcing last June, I think it was, that the wheat board would handle oats and barley this year. I am not saying he has not carried out his promise, but I can tell you it is not what a great many farmers in the western provinces thought would be done. When the minister announced that the board was going to handle oats and barley they naturally thought it would be on the basis he now says the board is going to handle wheat. Without arguing the pros and cons I can tell you that many western farmers were very disappointed when they realized the way last year's crop of oats and barley had been handled. That is what I am coming to now; and then I want to ask on what basis these feed companies arrive at a price. Do they have fluctuating prices from day to day, or how do they work it?

Mr. Howe: The condition under which the western provinces agreed to enact complementary legislation to that passed in this house two years ago was that oats and barley would be sold at the best price obtainable on any market. The parties to that discussion were representatives of each of the three governments, the president of the Canadian federation of agriculture, Mr. Hannam, and representatives of other grain growing organizations. The grower representatives attempted to extract that promise from me and the other ministers present before they would agree to pass the complementary legislation. This government did not agree, but indicated that since that was the obvious wish of all the farming interests represented, that policy would be followed to the extent that the overriding national welfare would permit.

That policy has been followed. Grain is offered by the board each day to any buyer who comes forward at a price the board considers to be the best price obtainable that day. The complaints that have been made in this house have not been that the price of coarse grains has been too low. There have been far more complaints that it has been too high. Nevertheless the board has followed the mandate given it by the grain producers of both eastern and western Canada, that the coarse grains of the prairie provinces should be sold at the best price obtainable.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is what I am trying to get at. I have asked questions before, and have not had very satisfactory answers as to the handling of these grains. For instance, at my delivery point the best grade of oats was paid for at 52 cents a bushel, on the basis of the board's price. It is true that freight and handling expenses had to be added at Fort William, and I appreciate that through their participation certificates those producers will receive a further payment which the minister has estimated at 10 cents a bushel, though I hope it will be higher than that. Not long ago I listened to an hon. member from eastern Canada, I think it was the hon. member for Russell, which is just outside Ottawa, who stated that at that time—and the price of oats has gone up since then—the same grade of oats were selling here at $76 a ton less a subsidy of $6 on freight, which worked out at $1.45 a bushel. That is a great difference in comparison with what the producers have been receiving, and it is easy to see that there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction felt by the feeders of this country, no matter in what part of Canada they live. That is what I was trying to get some information about, as to how that was to be levelled up or settled for, because I presume the statement by the hon. member for Russell was quite accurate, though I have not checked it. That represents a terrific spread between what the producer has received and what the feeder is paying for the same grade of oats.

Mr. Cardiff: Has the government any control over the difference between the price at which the grain is sold and the price at which it is bought?

Mr. Howe: None at all; that is not within federal jurisdiction. It could not be within the federal field unless the province of Ontario follows the example of the three western provinces and passes concurrent legislation which would permit this government to enter that field.

Mr. Bater: Did I understand the hon. member for Souris to say that oats were selling down here at $1.45 per bushel?

Mr. Ross (Souris): The hon. member is probably as good a mathematician as I am; I was not too good a student at school. I said that in a speech delivered by the member for Russell he said that on April 24 this feed cost a certain price, and a little arithmetic will show how that works out. According to my figures it works out at $1.45 per bushel.

Mr. Howe: I think it is a fairly simple problem to know what oats or barley sells for in Ontario. The dealer pays the cash price at Fort William, which is published in the papers each day, with free freight to destination, or practically free freight. There may be some small transportation charges payable, I am not sure about that point. When oats or barley are sold for anything above the price of the cash grain at Fort William the difference represents dealers charges. Dealers charges may be exorbitant or they may not. I suggest they are not as exorbitant as my hon. friend would have us believe.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am just giving you the figures. I am not making any charge about an exorbitant profit. I do know what we are receiving at the delivery point, and I am simply quoting the member for Russell as to the cost right here. Those are the figures.

Mr. Major: I quoted figures for oats on April 4, and I quoted $1.25 per bushel delivered to the farmers; that was not on rail, but was after the dealer had received them and delivered them to the farmer in eastern Ontario.

While I am quoting these figures I should like to ask the minister if, in setting the prices next year on coarse grains, it could be borne in mind that the price of western grain should be set at a point which would enable the eastern Ontario farmer to use the grain and still market his product at a fair price.

Mr. Bryce: I want to take part in this debate, because I am the man who started it in the house. At that time the member for Russell was complaining about paying $76 per ton for oats, and there were all the expenses that had to be paid. I said that oats were being delivered to the dealer in eastern Canada for approximately $64 per ton. If one looks up the Winnipeg Free Press or Tribune, one can find that Stanley Jones, president of the Winnipeg grain exchange, said oats were being delivered for $63.32. The oats which were mentioned by the member for Russell gave the dealer a profit of $480 per car. I inquired about the Ottawa and Montreal prices, and they averaged around $70 per ton. There was $6 per ton clear profit, after all expenses were paid.

Mr. Howe: May I point out that anyone who is dissatisfied with the price he has to pay in his district for oats can buy them from the board at the lakehead. The wheat board sells to everyone.

Mr. Tustin: He would have to buy a carload.

Mr. Howe: Yes. If any group of farmers is dissatisfied with the price in their locality they can combine together and buy direct from the wheat board.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What proportion of coarse grains are sold through the Winnipeg grain exchange, 98 per cent?

Mr. Howe: Not more than 50 per cent of malting barley and perhaps 70 to 75 per cent of the oats are sold in the futures market.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Where do they sell the rest of it?

Mr. Howe: It is sold direct to the consumer.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Whereabouts?

Mr. Howe: Wherever he lives. I am not supposed to know where each buyer lives or what he does with the grain he buys. I am saying that amount of coarse grains goes through the futures market.

Mr. Wright: The minister indicated that the board offers grain for sale at all times through different agencies. One of those agencies would be the Winnipeg grain exchange. I should like to ask the minister if at any time the board sold more for future delivery than the receipts of coarse grain during the period in which the sales on the futures market were made?

Mr. Howe: I am advised that they have not.

Mr. Charlton: The minister made a statement that only 50 per cent of the barley was sold on the Winnipeg grain exchange. What percentage of the feed barley was sold on the Winnipeg grain exchange, and what percentage of the malting barley was sold direct to the breweries?

Mr. Howe: About 80 per cent of the feed barley was sold on the futures market.

Mr. Charlton: That does not answer the question. If 80 per cent of the feed barley was sold, we know there was a lot of malting barley sold because you are not accounting for the malting barley at all.

Mr. Howe: About 50 per cent of the malting barley was sold on the exchange as well. About 20 per cent of the feed barley is sold directly to the feeders. It is sold outside the futures' market, and I do not know who buys it.

Mr. Charlton: What percentage of the barley for malting or feed purposes was shipped to the United States?

Mr. Howe: About 75 per cent of the malting barley went to the United States, and practically no feed barley.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Charlton: If an eastern farmer owns and operates a farm in western Canada as well, can he ship grain from that farm in western Canada directly to his farm in eastern Canada?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Charlton: It has to go through the wheat board?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: He has to sell it to the wheat board and buy it back from the man who handles it for the wheat board?

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend can make a very plausible story out of that, but may I deal with it in two parts? First, we will assume that this parliament decided to introduce a compulsory pool in western Canada. This means that every grower in Canada is entitled to the same price for the same grade of barley or oats. I may say that I have heard of this case before. My hon. friend has his farm in western Canada and is, therefore, a western grower. As such he is entitled to the average price for which barley is sold over the year. If he marketed his barley last fall he would get more for his barley from the pool than the market price of that day because there has been a rising market. If he marketed his barley today he would get less from the pool than he would if he could get his grain outside the pool and sell it at current prices. Well, that is pooling.

I sympathize with my hon. friend's desire to get his grain extracted from that pool and sell it independently, either to himself or to somebody else.

Mr. Charlton: He is not selling it at all.

Mr. Howe: Let us look at the theory that he would like to get that identical grain down to his farm in Ontario. The only way by which he could get the identical grain would be to put it in a boxcar and ship it direct to his farm in Ontario. If he did that, he would be very sorry. He would receive no freight assistance on it, and he would find that the average cost of the grain in the pool, added to the freight he would pay for shipping the grain down to eastern Ontario, would give him more expensive grain at the delivery point than he can buy locally. So if he were allowed to handle that transaction, his fellow farmers all over western Canada would lose because they all have an interest in grain that is marketed at a high price. They would be the losers. My hon. friend would be a loser because he would take an expensive way to provide himself with coarse grains in eastern Canada.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Somebody questioned the figures I was using. Then the hon. member for Glengarry I think stated that he spoke that day and used the figure of $70 a ton. I will just quote the member to whom I was referring; it was the hon. member for Russell. This is to be found at page 1559 of Hansard of April 4. He said:

> Today the bulk car price for No. 3 C.W. oats is $76 a ton at stations in eastern Ontario less a subsidy of $6 per ton.

Mr. Fair: May I ask the minister what the average price of class II wheat was during the 1948-49 crop year as compared with the $2 a bushel?

Mr. Howe: I cannot answer that question. My hon. friend can get the information when the wheat board is before the committee on agriculture. I believe that will be on Wednesday.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The minister said that the wheat board offered coarse grain every day on the market. Do they fix the price at which they offer it, or how do they arrive at it?

Mr. Howe: It depends on the demand. It is sold at the market price of that day.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): All right. But they are the only people who have any.

Mr. Howe: No. There are other people.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They are the only vendors. Tomorrow will be Tuesday; that is, with any luck, it will be. I think this is Monday. As I understand the minister, the wheat board tomorrow will offer what? Will they offer so much barley, or how do they do it? Will they offer 10,000 bushels or 20,000 bushels or what do they offer? Surely it cannot be done in that way.

Mr. Howe: They will offer coarse grains to fill the demands of that day, provided they have coarse grains delivered at the lakehead which enable them to offer that quantity.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then the position of the wheat board is this. They do not fix the price at which they offer at all. What they do surely is to take the buyers' bids and, if they have grain in position—I think that is the expression—to make delivery, they then go on the buyers' bids, surely. What I mean is this. They do not pick the price out of the air. Or do they follow Chicago or Kansas City or something like that?

Mr. Howe: They offer oats and barley on the market at a price which to them seems a reasonable price in view of several factors. One is the demand. If there is an active demand for barley or oats, that has an influence. The price on the Chicago market also has an influence, although the two prices are not comparable. Canadian oats and barley have been selling above the Chicago price. The price of American corn is a factor. There are various factors to be taken into consideration. The officers of the wheat board are trained to analyse those factors and to come up with a price.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I know. But surely the price of anything is that arrived at between a willing buyer and a willing seller. Surely their price must be fixed on the applications, orders or offers they have for coarse grains. Is that not the only way it could apply?

Mr. Howe: Whether or not they are a willing seller depends on the offers that are made. They do not accept any offer that is made.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Oh, I know that you do a little "David Haruming". I admit that. You probably try to get them up a cent or something of that kind. But surely the basis of the price at which it is sold depends, to use your words, on the offers they have for the grain on that day or the night before. That must be the basis of it, is it not? What I mean is this. The wheat board do not fix it at all. It is the buyers who fix it. Is that not right?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Thank you very much.

Mr. Major: The average price was $1.25 per bushel, delivered to my farm. That is at page 1554 of Hansard of April 4. While I am on my feet, let me say this. The minister has I think stated that any group of farmers could buy a carload of feed from the wheat board. Could a farm association in eastern Ontario buy it for their farmers if they wanted to?

Mr. Howe: Yes. Anyone, or any group of people, can buy coarse grain at the lakehead. My hon. friend suggested that the price be held down to a ratio based on the price of livestock. That is one theory of marketing coarse grains, but it is not the theory of marketing that is imposed on the wheat board by the grain growers of the western provinces. If my hon. friend can persuade the growers to accept that formula, the board will be pleased to carry it out.

Mr. Fair: If a formula of that kind is considered, I think you will soon have a demand by western hog and cattle growers for the same freight from all points to Toronto in order to compensate for the privilege that is being asked for by the hon. member for Glengarry.

Mr. Howe: I said "if".

Mr. Fair: I appreciate that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): To come back to this wheat deal, I have an article before me. I presume the minister is dependent upon the international wheat agreement to sell this over 100 million bushels of wheat to Britain. That is right, is it not?

Mr. Howe: I am depending on the undertaking that Britain's North American wheat will be bought in Canada, and that the price will be the current price within the limits of the international wheat agreement.

Mr. Ross (Souris): There is not anything that guarantees that anybody must buy the wheat within that agreement. They do not have to accept the wheat, do they? They can fall down?

Mr. Howe: Collectively, they must buy the wheat at the floor if it is offered to them at that price.

Mr. Ross (Souris): One article is headed "Canada's Wheat Dilemma", and another "Testing the Wheat Agreement?". The latter reads as follows:

> There have been some recent signs that wheat is being sold under the international agreement at below the maximum price at $1.80 a bushel (U.S. currency). Practically all the purchases have been of American wheat, particularly inferior qualities—

We know that much of their wheat is inferior to ours.

> —and the actual price paid for these substandard wheats was lower than the margin allowed for in the agreement. It is difficult to discern any clear trend from such few facts as emerge about these dealings, and it is well to remember that American domestic wheat is still firm. Importing countries can be required to take up their full quotas only if the price is at the minimum of $1.50 a bushel. In Canada, the "free" market price for wheat has been falling recently, though it is still $2.14 a bushel (Canadian currency). At the moment this is hardly a fair test of the state of the market, since a large portion of Canada's export surplus is withheld for Britain.

The $2.14 figure is the very figure that I have for a day or two on our market here and it is only two cents under the Chicago market. That is rather significant.

Mr. Howe: What Chicago price? Cash wheat?

Mr. Ross (Souris): You can quibble all you like about it.

Mr. Howe: Cash wheat Chicago?

Mr. Ross (Souris): The other day, yes.

[Mr. Fair.]

Mr. Howe: What other day? It must have been a good many days ago if the cash wheat, Chicago, has been within two cents of the cash wheat Fort William.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I should like to see if I have been all wrong in my idea of wheat. I am not talking about coarse grain. As I remember the agreement with Britain, it was a short sale of roughly 600 million bushels. The argument advanced was that it was a sale on a recession in price, as I remember it, to begin with. Let me give the government and parliament credit for trying to find a steady long-term market. But that whole agreement, surely, was based on the anticipation as then set out by the then minister of trade and commerce, involving a depreciation in the price of wheat over the years. I do not think I am wrong about that. That was my understanding, in any event.

Time has shown that that anticipation was wrong; the wheat market, instead of falling, advanced. Therefore there can be no doubt, first, that the farmer selling wheat under that agreement, having due consideration for the "have regard to" clause, lost money. There can be no doubt, having made a short sale and the price of wheat having advanced —never mind the price per bushel—the producer of the wheat took a licking. Let me, in opposition, accept whatever responsibility I may have; but the simple fact is that the producer lost a great deal of money because we made a short sale of 600 million bushels anticipating a falling market—and that was completely wrong. The market advanced, and therefore he did lose a good deal of money. Am I wrong in any of the statements I have made?

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend has his thesis; but the fact is that the sale of 160 million bushels of wheat to one buyer for two years and of 140 million to one buyer for two years removed that wheat as a factor in fixing prices. It was taken out of the market. The price recorded in Chicago was the price with that wheat eliminated. My hon. friend is trying to reason that the price would be just as high if that wheat had been sold on the Chicago market. I do not agree with him.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I have not any doubt about it.

Mr. Howe: Unless he can prove his thesis, he cannot prove that the farmer took a licking on account of the wheat agreement.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am merely asking if my reasoning was right or wrong.

Mr. Howe: It was faulty, let us say.

An hon. Member: Wrong.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Someone says "wrong" who does not know anything about it. But the point I am getting at is this: Am I wrong in my statement as to the argument advanced by the Minister of Agriculture and the then minister of trade and commerce, that this was a short sale of 600 million bushels over a period of years, and at a declining price; whereas the fact was that the price did not decline, but rather advanced.

Can anyone argue that I am wrong in what I say? Supposing the minister has made a short sale of wheat at $2 and the price advanced to $3; he would lose a lot of money, would he not?

Mr. Howe: On the same grain exchange?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You would lose a dollar per bushel, on the figures I gave.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend is talking about price in a very loose way. If I sold wheat at $2 a bushel on the Winnipeg grain exchange, and the price on the Winnipeg grain exchange went up to $3, I would lose a dollar per bushel, yes. But if I sold at $2 per bushel on the Winnipeg grain exchange, and the Chicago price went up to $3, while the Winnipeg price held steady, I would make no loss at all.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Now, now, now. After all, with great respect, the minister told me just a moment ago that the price of barley on the Chicago exchange was one of the factors in determining prices of barley or oats today—prices of coarse grains.

Mr. Howe: It is a factor, but not the only factor.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): And it is perfectly true; we know it to be true, that there is this "arbitrizing", as the traders call it, between grain markets as there is between money markets.

Mr. Howe: No. They used to, but not now.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): From the illustration the minister gave us, he could not hold wheat at $2 in Winnipeg if it was $3 in Chicago. Nobody in the world could hold it. There just is not any question about that.

Mr. Cardiff: What was the price of oats on the last day on which there was any sale? Perhaps that would be June 1.

Mr. Howe: I suppose the hon. member is referring to feed oats?

Mr. Cardiff: Yes, No. 3.

Mr. Howe: Cash price, Fort William, $1.10 per bushel.

Mr. Harkness: This section provides for an increase in the number of members on the board from three to five, if required. What is the purpose of that, and is it intended to increase the number to five as soon as the bill is passed?

Mr. Howe: I explained that in detail a few moments ago. If I could have all the members in the house at the same time I would not have to go over the same item so often. I pointed out that, of the three members of the board, one has been ill for two or three months. Owing to the pressure at which members of the board have been working, illness has been frequent. Then I pointed out that one member of the board has to appear frequently in London to attend international wheat agreement meetings. I pointed out further that today one member of the board is on his way to London and the other has been summoned to Ottawa to appear before the committee on agriculture—which leaves no member of the board in Winnipeg. I offered the opinion that the work of the board might be improved if the personnel is increased to four or five.

Mr. Harkness: I am sorry I was not here when the explanation was given before. Who are the members of the board at the present time?

Mr. Howe: Mr. McIvor is chairman, Mr. McNamara is vice-chairman, and Mr. Grindley is the third member.

Mr. Harkness: Is that the Mr. MacNamara of the Department of Labour?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Argue: Since we are going to be selling a large part of our wheat this fall under the international wheat agreement, I should like to know if an importing nation under that agreement has the privilege of buying more than its quota within a given price range? My reason for asking is that I have a return of May 22 which shows that very few countries—but there is the odd one—purchase more than their quota. Is it the right of a country to purchase more than its quota within the price range?

Mr. Howe: No, it is prohibited from doing so. It is allowed to purchase its quota within the price; above that it must pay the class II price for the balance. It is the privilege of any country to apply for an increase in quota, which may or may not be granted by the administration. But if it applies for an increase in quota, that increase must apply for the full four years of the agreement.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister tell us, from his own knowledge, how the international wheat agreement has been working out so far? I mentioned the other day that a number of countries seemed to have purchased very little wheat, even though three-quarters of the crop year has gone by.

Mr. Howe: It seems to have worked very well to date. I would point out to my hon. friend that no country is compelled to take its quota under the agreement unless it is put at the minimum price, and no wheat has been put at the minimum price as yet.

Mr. Quelch: Assume we work out an agreement between the floor and ceiling limit; assume we agree upon a certain price; do we then allow all countries to have wheat at that price or do we work out an agreement with each country?

Mr. Howe: All international wheat agreement countries are quoted the same price on the same day.

Mr. Argue: The importing country can take its quota at the maximum price?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Argue: How is it that Italy has purchased only 7 million bushels out of a quota of some 40 million bushels in the first three-quarters of the crop year? Is the reason that she is not demanding the wheat?

Mr. Howe: Apparently she does not require wheat and nobody had put it to her at the floor price.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The agreement to which the minister refers was mentioned first in this house last Tuesday. The minister has referred to his expectations of purchases by Great Britain. Is that made possible by some special arrangement under the Marshall plan and its subsidiary organizations?

Mr. Howe: No. I have explained that Canada is not a Marshall plan country. I might go further and say that Great Britain has advised that she does not intend to ask for Marshall plan help in connection with her purchases of wheat during the next year. There is an undertaking by Great Britain that her requirements of wheat from North America will be purchased from Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In the narrow sense there may be some force in the minister's statement that Canada is not a Marshall plan country, but I think he will admit that Canada has been getting great benefits from the Marshall plan for years. There is no doubt about that.

On section 8—Declaration for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. Wright: I suppose the reason why 1953 is fixed as the termination date is that the world wheat agreement will be concluded in that year? I should like to see the government go further and not place any termination date in the act. I think the growers of western Canada are interested in having the wheat board maintained and orderly marketing continued and I do not think the act should be limited to 1953.

Mr. Howe: We know the world method of marketing wheat up to 1953 but beyond that we are not sure what method will be used. It seems reasonable to ask parliament to pass on the appropriate character of this act when we do know what the method after 1953 will be.

Mr. Argue: Is that because other countries might be operating on what you would call a free market or free exchange and we would have to consider doing the same thing?

Mr. Howe: I make no suggestion as to what the method will be, I simply say that it seems appropriate that parliament should have a look at the provisions of the act before July 31, 1953.

Mr. Wright: Parliament would be in the same position in any event and it could look at the act if the termination date were not there.

Mr. Howe: It might look at it but it might not deal with it unless there was a provision requiring it to do so.

On section 9—Preamble repealed.

Mr. Fair: Just before one o'clock and before I had an opportunity to reply the minister stated that the pools had been wrecked because unsound initial payments had been made. The minister knows that the pools are not wrecked, that they are all sound organizations, financially and otherwise.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend did not interpret my words in the manner I intended them to be interpreted. I said that the pooling of wheat put the operators of the pools in debt. That was the case in 1930 when the provinces came to the rescue of the three pool organizations. In 1931 the situation was so serious that the federal government relieved the pool organizations of their liabilities and took over the marketing of wheat.

Mr. Fair: In 1929 when an initial price of 90 cents, I believe it was, was set, I remember hauling grain and getting $1.46 at the elevator, Very shortly after that the man-made depression of 1929 started and world prices of wheat fell until it was necessary to bring the initial price down to 70 cents per bushel. The pools were operating on sound business methods but this planned depression threw a monkey wrench in the works and as a result there were losses by the pools. I am glad to say that they have all been honoured and some have already been paid off.

Mr. Argue: The farmers are anxious to know roughly when they might expect the final payment, and I wonder if the minister could indicate whether it might be before Christmas, next spring or at about what time?

Mr. Howe: Every effort will be made to make that payment before the end of the calendar year 1950. The wheat board and the government believe that that can be done.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

528. Departmental administration, $2,175,279.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us whether the imperials who were made eligible for the war veterans allowance under the statute passed within the last few days will be paid as from the first of April of this year if they now apply for that allowance? I would suggest that quite a period be set within which they may apply and have the allowance dated back to the first of April. Will the minister tell us what the position is in that regard?

Mr. Gregg: It would perhaps answer my hon. friend's question more directly if I were to read to him the brief directive that has been sent out quite recently to our district offices. It reads:

Re war veterans allowance applications, veterans of British or allied forces.

Reference is made to confidential letter dated January 11, 1950, concerning the possible applications by ex-imperial (or allied or associated powers) veterans not domiciled in Canada at the time at which they joined the forces for purpose of war service in world war I and world war II. As at that time, the proposed legislation had not yet been drafted, district offices were requested to answer inquiries and to give prospective applicants any information relevant to the preparation of their applications but not to accept applications until further advised.

The bill to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act to render eligible ex-imperial and allied forces veterans to its benefits is now before parliament. The amendment sets the effective date of this proposed change at April 1, 1950.

Therefore it will now be in order to accept applications for war veterans allowance from these ex-members of the imperial, allied or associated forces who appear to qualify.

It will be realized that no action can be taken to adjudicate upon these applications until after royal assent is given to the amending act; but, meanwhile, for the guidance of district offices, the following procedure will be adopted: (a) in the case of those who may have applied or endeavoured to apply on or before April 1, 1950, and would appear to be eligible, their formal applications may be considered to have been submitted and received in the district office as at April 1, 1950.

In other words, I may interpolate, if the bill passes the other place and these applications are accepted then their payments will go into effect as at the first of April, 1950.

(b) As regards those who may have inquired with a view to apply, or applied subsequent to April 1, 1950, their application will be considered as having been received as at the date of the receipt of their inquiry or application in the district office.

That is whether or not the bill has passed all stages at the time the inquiry is received by the district office.

(c) All such applications should therefore be dated accordingly and may now be processed in the usual way.

That is with regard to investigations and so on.

You will be further advised with respect to adjudications upon these applications by the board in Ottawa, or by the district authorities when the proposed changes in procedure, now before parliament, have been authorized.

That is the end of the directive.

In further answer to my hon. friend's question, even in the case of telephone calls or verbal inquiries our district offices have been asked—and I know they will comply—to register those at the time they are received. When the applications are finally checked, if they are approved they will go into effect as from the time of those inquiries.

Mr. Green: I suggest to the minister it would seem only fair to set a date up to which applications may be made and be dated back to the first of April. Many eligible veterans will not have made their applications yet because the act has not been passed. Some of them live in remote districts where it is impossible for them to keep informed of what the position may be. Why not set a date, say the first of October, and say that any application made by that date will be considered to have been made as of the first of April? We actually had hoped that the allowances would be dated back to the 10th of December of last year when the statement was made by the parliamentary assistant. I suggest, however, that these men be given until the first of October to make application, and that if they apply before that time their allowances will run from the first of April. Is it not possible to do that even yet?

Mr. Gregg: I do not believe there will be any necessity. A good deal of publicity has been given to this matter. A great many applications—I am not speaking in the formal sense but rather of inquiries—were made before the first of April. Others inquired from our representatives here and there, and we are taking these inquiries, verbal or otherwise, as being tantamount to applications. I will be glad to keep my hon. friend's suggestion in mind and give it further consideration if it appears necessary.

Mr. Fulton: I have had inquiries from men in the remote areas to which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra refers. Inquiries have been made directly to me as to what was being done about it, in some cases saying that contradictory rumours or reports had reached them, and that they did not know where the matter stood or when to go about making application. I have generally answered by telling them that the legislation was introduced and we expected it to be passed fairly soon. I have suggested that they get in touch with their local legion branch in order to keep themselves informed, and so that they could make their applications as soon as the act was passed and it became certain that the allowances would be granted.

I would certainly assume that in those cases these men have not yet even got to the stage to which the minister has referred, of making an inquiry of a representative of the department, because there is no war veterans allowance representative in that area. They may have made an inquiry of their local legion branch. Again I should imagine records would have been kept at the legion branches which are probably collecting files; but I do not know of any recommendations issued to the legion branches by either the British Columbia command or any other command to forward such applications or inquiries to the Department of Veterans Affairs district office in order that they may qualify under the arrangement the minister has just outlined. In the case of individual inquiries directed to myself and other members, of which we have received quite a number, and again in the case of inquiries directed to legion branches in centres where there is no departmental representative, it is almost certain that such inquiries will not yet be on file with the department. Therefore these men—who are just as interested in this matter as those living in Vancouver or Victoria who have made their inquiries to the department—will be precluded from getting the advantage of the backdating of their applications which the others will get. For that reason I would strongly urge that favourable consideration be given the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, even if the minister does not feel that he can put the date as far ahead as October 1. Let him make it July 31, or any date which will give these men a reasonable opportunity to get their applications in so they can be treated the same as the others. I hope the minister will do that.

Mr. Gregg: I can assure my hon. friend that we shall take into consideration the representations that have been made here this evening, and will undertake to put this into operation in a way that will not bring about any unavoidable hardship.

Mr. Herridge: I want to ask just one question, because I have had an experience very similar to that mentioned by the two previous speakers. Has the minister's department notified the national office of the Canadian Legion, or the national offices of other veterans' bodies, advising them to advertise or inform their membership that those who intend to apply should list their names immediately, and so on?

Mr. Gregg: There has been no official advice, but the executives of the two organizations concerned, that is the imperial division of the Canadian Legion and the British-Canadian veterans' association, were in close touch with my department all the way through, and I believe hon. members will recall that some weeks ago the legion had an editorial giving advice to its membership. I know Mr. Jones of the British-Canadian organization has also notified his membership to get their applications in without delay, and to get proof of service and proof of their arrival in Canada.

Mr. Quelch: At the time the Veterans Land Act was before the veterans committee the minister was strongly urged that merchant seamen should be made eligible for its benefits. I recall that the minister at that time stated that in view of the fact that the merchant seamen would be needed on their ships at the end of the war he did not think it would be wise then to bring them under that act. On the other hand, however, he said that some years after the war the situation might be entirely different. At that time there might be unemployed merchant seamen, and it might be possible then to give further consideration to the request that merchant seamen be made eligible under the Veterans Land Act. I am wondering, now that many merchant seamen are unemployed, whether the government has given consideration to bringing them under that legislation.

Mr. Gregg: No, Mr. Chairman; no such consideration has been given.

Mr. Ross (Souris): A short time ago the minister announced a plan under which veterans other than pensioners could go to military hospitals throughout the country, such as Deer Lodge in Winnipeg, and pay for the treatment they received. I should like to know whether those veterans would have any choice in the matter of the medical practitioner who would look after them, or whether they would simply go there, pay for their treatment, and take whatever medical people were allotted to their cases. Would they have any choice in the matter at all?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, when my estimates were before the committee a week or so ago the hon. member for Nanaimo delivered an address on item 528, the administration item. That is quite customary; that was the first item, and we are still on it. I am quite prepared to answer questions, but if my hon. friend would permit I should prefer to answer them when I have my officials before me, and in this case when we come to the item covering treatment.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I should be quite happy to leave it at that; but the difficulty, which I experienced in another matter this morning, is that we have so many committees meeting now; we are sitting morning, afternoon and night, and it is pretty difficult to be in two or three places at the same time. It might happen that I would not be in the committee when these estimates came up. That is the only reason I raised the question now. It is difficult to follow the matters in which you are interested when the committees are meeting and you cannot be in the house all the time.

Mr. Gregg: Then if my hon. friend will accept my answer, which is given without consultation with my officials, it would be that the veteran who elects to go to a D.V.A. hospital for special treatment or service for which he is prepared to pay will be entitled only to the services of the doctors in attendance at that hospital.

Mr. Harkness: There still seem to be a very large number of temporary employees in this department. In the two or three years immediately after the war, when the activity of the department was at a peak, naturally it employed a large number of people whom it could not be expected to retain when that activity declined, so that a great many of the employees were not in the permanent civil service. However, it is now five years since the war ended, and the work of the department has declined as is indicated by the fact that the number of employees has been considerably reduced. Under practically every item, however, I see that the number of temporary employees is still very large in comparison with the number who are permanent.

Under this item there has been a reduction of some 74 employees, but at the same time the number of permanent employees has increased by almost 60; and the temporary employees still number 802 out of a total staff of 1,008. It seems to me that by this time the direction in which the department is going, the number of people who will be required as permanent employees, and those who have proved themselves to be efficient, should have been pretty well determined, and there should not be such a large number of temporary employees compared with the number of permanent employees as we have at the present time. It seems to me that it would give a greater feeling of security to the employees, which would result in greater efficiency in the operations of the department, if a much larger number of those in the department were put on the permanent staff, so they would know they were paying into the superannuation fund regularly, and so on. Would the minister comment on that situation?

Mr. Gregg: I hasten to thank the hon. member for his constructive suggestion, and I can assure him that the point he raises is under constant review. He will bear in mind, however, that my department has had a special type of experience during the last five years. My distinguished predecessor and the deputy minister had to expand the department very rapidly in a very short time at the end of the war. That expansion, as reflected in the estimates, continued from year to year. Now we are in the midst of quite drastic reductions, particularly in certain phases of the work of the department, while at the same time making changes and reclassifications in others. As that work is being carried on we are attempting to decide those positions which will be more or less permanent in nature as compared with those of a temporary character; and while we have not made a great deal of progress we have made some. Running over the whole picture on page 312 of the estimates, it will be noticed that as the hon. member has suggested there are some 74 fewer employees coming under departmental administration here at Ottawa.

May I pause here to refer to the point made by the hon. member for Nanaimo the other evening, as to why the decrease had not been greater in Ottawa as compared with the districts.

One factor, amongst others which are in the same category, is the fact that the $80,000 in a single item appears in the total under Ottawa administration, which last year was part of the item referred to on page 67 under the heading "terminable services". It will be noted at the bottom of the column, "appropriation not required for 1950-51, $2,176,000". That was the large item for medals, production and distribution. The remainder to carry through that task this year has been transferred into headquarters administration under the item of $80,000.

Referring to personnel again, it will be noted that under departmental administration some improvement has been made in permanencies at a time when 74 have been let out. Under "district administration" there is a total of 194 less this year than last, and again some permanencies have been obtained. Under "veterans welfare services", which is a reorientation of the old rehabilitation services, the lesser number of employees is marked. There is a total of 349 less than last year. Under "treatment services" we were perhaps a little optimistic in our estimate. I shall explain that situation more thoroughly when we come to the supplementaries. I think we shall have to ask for more than we have in the main estimate there, but as shown in the book there are 487 less. Under "prosthetic services" there is only 1 less. In the Canadian pension commission there are 22 less. The war veterans allowance board has 8 more than last year, accounted for by the fact that we will need a few more junior staff to cope with the large number of applications this year. Veterans insurance has 5 less; soldier settlement and Veterans Land Act has 168 less.

I should like to say that, in making those reductions in staff, and this is related to the point made by my hon. friend, particularly for those who are getting along in years, we are undertaking to utilize all the resources of the national employment service and in our own department to assist them in finding new employment. We have had a reasonable amount of success in doing so. The younger veterans of this last war who have been let out have found little difficulty in finding other employment.

Mr. Harkness: Just to be more specific on this point, could the minister tell us how many of those people who are listed as temporary employees this year are likely to become permanent employees before the year is out? Are there any estimates of that?

[Mr. Gregg.]

Mr. Gregg: Perhaps I could take that question as notice, and attempt to answer it later?

Mr. Harkness: The minister has mentioned the older employees of the department who are now being let out. During the past two years a considerable number of cases of this kind have come to my attention, men who were veterans of the first war and who got jobs in the Department of Veterans Affairs during this last war or at the end of it. They are now being let out. It seems to me this is a course of action which should be kept to a minimum. I know there are bound to be some cases of men who are not suitable and perhaps have to be let out, but the department itself maintains a bureau to encourage industry to hire older men, particularly older veterans. A lot of propaganda has been put out, and I think it is something which needs even greater attention than has been given to it. The older veterans have extreme difficulty in securing employment. It would seem to me the department should make every effort possible to retain those employees rather than put them out. As the minister says, there is an attempt to find jobs for them through the employment service, but in many cases that attempt is not very successful.

Has the minister any figures concerning the older veterans who have been released from his department, and how many of them have succeeded in finding other employment?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, a survey of the older veterans was completed for the year 1948-49. Perhaps that would answer my friend's question. During that period the older veterans whose services were terminated numbered 193; the number placed in alternative employment, 151. A summary of the remainder is as follows: Declined employment offered, 4; inherited a legacy, 1; over 65 years of age, 9; under treatment, that is in hospital, 3; granted war veterans allowance, 3; considered unemployable, 2; left the district and we have no information, 4; on part-time employment for the present and will go on war veterans allowance, 3; apparently unemployed, 13.

Mr. McCusker: I should like to ask the minister if the department has had sufficient experience with that new type of patient that is being admitted, the one who can afford to pay, to determine whether the department is able to collect from that man? I doubt very much whether any veteran, having availed himself of the facilities of the hospital, will pay for them when he is leaving. He will think he is entitled to that, and therefore the department is going to open it up to all veterans who will demand free treatment.

I would rather have seen them admit more patients, if it is patients they require. Evidently it is their desire to control the medical services, the teaching, and the whole medical profession of the country. It would have been better to admit the lower salaried group. I do not think the department will be able to collect from these men anyway, but you might as well give the advantage to those who can least afford to pay for hospitalization.

I should also like to ask whether it is the intention to expand these hospitals. The war has been over for a considerable period of time, and the demand for hospitalization should be diminishing. I am wondering if the number of hospitals is to be increased, and if so why? I believe the civilian institutions can operate hospitals more economically than the military authorities.

Mr. Gregg: I would prefer to have both questions deferred until the appropriate item in the estimate. I should like, however, to challenge the statement at once that those veterans who are earning their own living, and have completely rehabilitated themselves and have no eligibility due to their service, will not be willing to pay for their hospitalization treatment. They will demand the right to pay the same as a citizen who goes to a civilian hospital.

Mr. McCusker: Has the minister had sufficient experience to enable him to say that? I know it is a fine theory, but has there been sufficient experience with these people to find out?

Mr. Gregg: Our experience has been very short, Mr. Chairman, but we have had no experience to indicate that the fear expressed by the member for Regina City is justified.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am bound to agree with the question that the hon. member for Regina has raised. In cases quite recently at Winnipeg, at Deer Lodge, I think his suspicion is being borne out as a fact. Our veterans are not all rehabilitated and making good money to that extent. Some of these people will not be able to pay for some time. I feel sure of that. I do not know how many cases there are, but I think that is going to be the question.

This is a follow-up of remarks of the hon. member for Calgary East, as to why the staffs are not being reduced. It is a build-up all through. There is the other item where they are asking for a vote now for hospital accommodation and facilities, and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $11,314,414. I do not expect the minister to explain all that at this stage, but I think that is a huge amount to be asking for in a vote at this time for future years when we have certainly been over the peak, I would think, in all of these military hospitals throughout the country. There apparently is a deliberate attempt on the part of the department now to retain the present staff. I think it indicates that the matter I asked questions about a while ago and to which the hon. member has just referred is part of the plan.

They are going to accommodate all the old veterans who wish to apply now. I agree with the minister that in the vast majority of cases, where they can, they would certainly want the privilege of paying; they would pay if they could. But he and I and others know many of our comrades who will not find themselves in a position to pay that amount of money. We all know from actual experience that they just will not be able to do it. That is something you are going to have to face up to. Then in a time like this to be asking for another $11 million and more for future years for hospital development I think will require some explanation.

I think the minister himself will admit that the peak for hospital administration and the consideration of these veterans has been passed and the trend is certainly well on the downgrade. I think you will find many veterans who will not be able to pay for that hospital accommodation. I know of others again, on the question that I raised, who are in a position to pay but they feel that they should have some choice as to the medical attendants they might have looking after their particular cases. I have met applicants in Winnipeg going to Deer Lodge who are not satisfied on that basis, and they are veterans who are in a position to pay. They think they should have some choice as to their medical practitioner. They have pointed out the fact which the hon. member for Regina City has mentioned, that that was simply the department endeavouring to maintain that staff of medical practitioners and other staff now that their real usefulness has passed in this country for the time being.

Mr. Gregg: The matter of hospital accommodation to which my hon. friend has referred is one that I shall deal with when we come to the appropriate item.

Mr. Thomas: I should like to get some clarification on the matter of applications by the imperial veterans. Are we to understand that any applications made after this date or after the date of the minister's letter will not be retroactive till the first of April? Or is it merely for a matter of handling that their time will not be backdated? Are we to understand that only the applications that have already been received for the veterans allowance will be made retroactive to April 1?

Mr. Gregg: I stated that we were attempting to treat as applications all inquiries from those veterans regarding this matter; and if those applications were received before April 1 and later approved, the benefits would date from April 1. If they have been received after April 1, between April 1 and whatever date the bill receives the royal assent, we would take the date of inquiry or application as the starting time. But I also indicated that I should be glad to look into the whole question of applications and make sure that no avoidable hardship was experienced by the applicant.

Mr. Thomas: In other words, if an application were to be received by the minister or by the department today, then the benefits would not start as of the first of April but would start today. Is that correct?

Mr. Gregg: I want to make sure about the suggestion which was made here, that that applicant, through circumstances beyond his control, may have been unable to get that application in by the first of April. If he had wanted to make it and had been unable to do so, I should like to give it further consideration.

Mr. Thomas: That just brings up this point. On several occasions veterans have written to me with regard to the allowance. I wrote back to them and told them that the bill had not yet become law, that I did not feel that their applications would be acceptable at that time, but that I would notify them as soon as the bill became law. I would hate to think that I had "beat" somebody out of a couple of months' veterans allowance through an act of my own. It is no fault of theirs. It would be my own fault.

Mr. Gregg: Perhaps the hon. member would send me the original letter.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister if he would outline for us the present duties of the director of public relations.

Mr. Gregg: The duties of the director of public relations are varied. He is, of course, head of the fairly modest public relations service in each of our districts. Our work, in many phases of the department, requires from time to time information to be passed on to the veteran's constituency. Sometimes it is the older group of veterans, sometimes it is the younger group. For instance, the matter we were discussing a few minutes ago, as soon as the bill receives the royal assent, would lend itself very well to public relations information going out.

Mr. Fulton: Showing how generous the minister is being?

[Mr. Thomas.]

Mr. Gregg: When I came to the department there was set up what might be called a house organ, a departmental periodical, which went to our own officers, to those settled on the land, to those in hospitals, to members of parliament, to senators and other people, setting out some of the rehabilitation efforts that were going forward, some of the results on the part of casualty training which is a story that needs to be told again and again not only because it has been a great asset to Canada but because of the effect in morale upon those veterans who have successfully, with the help of our medical people, hospitals and training personnel, brought themselves back as almost full-time productive citizens of Canada. It may be stated that sometimes Veterans Affairs had the minister's picture in it too often, but I can assure my hon. friend that an interdict went out with regard to that.

Mr. Fulton: I never would have suggested that.

An hon. Member: A good idea.

Mr. Gregg: But I am sure that he would be the first to agree with me that men and women who were accustomed to working in teams and were accustomed to taking a great pride in the achievements which they were able to produce, now that they have become scattered all across the country, do appreciate having information as to how their comrades are getting along. In reviewing Veterans Affairs some months ago, rather than have a monthly we asked ourselves if we could perhaps produce the same results by making it bi-monthly. And so it has been during, I think, the last six months, at a cost of some $4,500. The work of the head of the public relations here, and his assistants across the country, is not only to carry out duties with regard to that publication, and to attempt to interpret the work fairly to the public, but particularly to attempt to interpret the part which the veterans themselves have played in their own rehabilitation, and the improvement of their physical condition in the hospitals. I think a great deal of good has been done on behalf of the whole effort.

Mr. Herridge: I notice what appears to be a new position in the details in connection with departmental administration. There is reference to a financial adviser to the deputy minister. Is that a new office? If so, what are the duties of the official?

Mr. Gregg: No, that is not a new office. I cannot explain why it was left out of the 1949-50 estimates, but I shall be glad to get that information.

Mr. Fulton: I notice there is a veterans welfare officer under the departmental administration vote. Why would it not be listed under veterans welfare service? Is there some division of responsibility between the two branches? This item is found about halfway down page 311.

Mr. Gregg: I am not able to answer that question. However, in connection with the financial adviser I may say that he has been made permanent this year and is consequently named in the list on page 311. In other years he was shown in the temporary bulk list at the foot of the column.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has told us that the departmental paper, Veterans Affairs, cost $4,500 or $5,000?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, $4,500.

Mr. Fulton: On page 312 of the estimates there is an item of $20,000 for advertising and publicity. What does that include, in addition to that paper?

Mr. Gregg: That amount of $20,000 is to provide for the publication of the departmental newspaper Veterans Affairs to be issued bi-monthly, for $4,500; the issue of the French edition of the veterans charter. Those are just being completed or paid for now, and come to $7,500. Then, monthly advertising in newspapers and veterans publications, $8,000. This covers such items as I referred to a little while ago on matters of special interest to veterans. These give a total of $20,000.

Mr. Quelch: I am somewhat concerned about the discussion which took place regarding hospitalization. Is it still the policy of the department to grant free hospitalization to all veterans of the first war who are indigent? An indigent veteran has been defined as one with an income of less than $1,000 a year. Is that still the policy?

Mr. Gregg: The change made and the additional paying class announced a while ago does not in any sense change the situation under class 5A and class 6 patients.

Mr. Blackmore: As it is within a minute or so of the time for closing, perhaps the committee might rise. I have a matter which might take some time.

Item stands.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Second report, in both English and French, of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Bater.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will consider the government notice of motion in the name of the Minister of Transport. Then we will take up Bill No. 135, to amend the Department of Transport Stores Act; Bill No. 263, to amend the Electricity Inspection Act, 1928; Bill No. 264, to amend the Gas Inspection Act; Bill No. 221, to provide for the payment and distribution of prize money. I am not sure as to the order of those bills. I know we will begin with Bill No. 135, but I am not sure as to the order of the others. When those bills have been passed we will go into supply and take up the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 6, 1950

The house met at eleven o'clock.

"CANADA DAY"

REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL" OF JUNE 5

Mr. A. Phileas Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, in the Ottawa Journal of yesterday there is an editorial entitled:

"Dominion day" wins; petty nationalism loses.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Wait a moment with the cheers. The editorial concludes with these words:

Time, we think, that the great majority of the people of this country who despise this state of mind should stop appeasing it. For it is one of the ugliest, most barren and meanest things in our midst.

I am afraid I cannot congratulate the chief editor of the Ottawa Journal upon having made an outstanding effort toward national unity. Even if he is also the chief propagandist of the Tory party, even if with his unperturbed superiority complex and matured political acumen—

Mr. Graydon: This is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): —this chief propagandist—

Mr. Graydon: Surely we do not have to listen to this.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has a question of privilege he should state it.

Mr. Graydon: He has no question of privilege; he is just trying to make another speech.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I know it hurts, but I shall not be long. Surely this editor must not be allowed to impute motives to any hon. member who has registered a vote in this house, as I submit is being done in this article! In order to keep the record straight I propose a correction of the false impression that this article may have created in certain circles, and I have no hesitation in stating that there is surely much less petty nationalism among the Grits or the Liberal-minded citizens of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): —than there is among the Tories or the reactionary-minded people in this country who practise narrow jingoism.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

First report of joint committee of both houses on the library of parliament—Mr. Speaker.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Carter be substituted for that of Mr. Kent on the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTRICAL AND PHOTOMETRIC UNITS

DEFINITIONS IN ACCORDANCE WITH RECOMMENDATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE ON WEIGHTS AND MEASUREMENTS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the first reading of Bill No. 265 (from the Senate) respecting the units of electrical and photometric measure.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATEMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS ON JUNE 5— CONSIDERATION OF ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the leader of the house. In view of the statement made yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), indicating an entirely new concept of Canada's national defence role, may I ask when the estimates of the Department of National Defence will be before us, having in mind the necessity now for a wider examination of the work of the department?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we expect that the special committee considering the two defence bills will report them today. If so, we shall be ready to take them up tomorrow. Then we will move to go into supply and take the remainder of Wednesday and Thursday on defence estimates.

Inquiries of the Ministry

OLD AGE PENSIONS

STATUS OF PERSONS COMPENSATED FOR FLOOD DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he can give the assurance that old age pensioners in the Red river valley who have had their houses damaged will not have the financial assistance given them by way of compensation treated as other income under the Old Age Pensions Act?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend did not give me notice of his question. I would not want to give a snap answer. In any event I am guided of course, as is the hon. member, by the regulations, which are a matter of agreement between the provinces and the dominion, and also by the statute itself. I will look into the matter.

Mr. Knowles: And give an answer tomorrow?

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

CANADA-UNITED STATES—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MR. HOWE IN DEBATE ON JUNE 5

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in his speech on the Canadian Wheat Board Act yesterday introduced a discourse on the question of the exchange rate between Canada and the United States, was he speaking for the Minister of Finance, was it a private venture, or is he perhaps planning to invade the Department of Finance?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, was as usual speaking for himself.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Not very authentic.

Mr. Abbott: I did not hear his remarks, but I understand he expressed the view that exchange rates were not necessarily fixed in perpetuity. With that view I am in agreement.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, PURCHASE AND CONSTRUCTION —STATIONERY USED BY GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Secretary of State if he will be kind enough to do what he can to expedite two orders for returns standing in my name. One was passed on May 15, and concerns public works contracts. The other was passed on May 24, and concerns the types and sizes of stationery used in various government departments. If it is not possible to have the complete returns brought down at an early day, may I ask the minister if he will consider letting me have interim replies as they are received?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I shall be glad to look into the matter and do all I can to get the information for the hon. member.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

QUESTION AS TO PROCLAMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I had a question to address to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson); perhaps in his absence the Solicitor General will look into the matter. Several weeks ago, in answer to a question, the Minister of Justice indicated that the Bankruptcy Act could not be brought into effect before July 1, but did not actually say it would be brought into effect on that date. Will the minister indicate as soon as possible on what date the act will be brought into effect?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Solicitor General): I will look into the matter and see that an answer is given.

METEOROLOGY

APPROVAL OF CONVENTION OF WORLD METEOROLOGICAL ORGANIZATION SIGNED AT WASHINGTON OCTOBER 11, 1947

The house resumed, from Monday, June 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the convention of the world meteorological organization signed at Washington on October 11, 1947, and tabled on February 14, 1949, and that this house do approve the same.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, having now had an opportunity to review the terms of this convention, I am going to suggest to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) that he have it considered by the standing committee on external affairs. This committee is now sitting, and there would be very little delay. I believe the committee has never had an opportunity to consider this convention. It would be possible to call before the committee not only officials of the Department of External Affairs, but also the chief meteorological officer of the Department of Transport, and other witnesses if necessary.

I am going to try to explain to the house why I think it is important that we give a little consideration to this convention rather than merely approve it in a perfunctory way, which is all that can be done if it is approved by the house in the present debate.

Apparently this is one of the two or three specialized agencies of the United Nations which have not yet been brought into operation. At page 41 of the report of the Department of External Affairs for 1949 I find the following statement, under the heading "Specialized Agencies":

> Canada is also taking part in the formation of the international trade organization, the intergovernmental maritime consultative organization and the world meteorological organization, which have not yet been established in their final form.

I repeat that this is one of the few specialized agencies which have not been finally established.

The purposes of the meteorological organization are set out in the convention in some detail. I wish to emphasize particularly the first two. They are:

> (a) To facilitate world-wide co-operation in the establishment of networks of stations for the making of meteorological observations or other geophysical observations related to meteorology and to promote the establishment and maintenance of meteorological centres charged with the provision of meteorological services.
> (b) To promote the establishment and maintenance of systems for the rapid exchange of weather information.

Then there are other purposes, but those are the two I wish to stress for the purposes of my submission.

Provision is also made in the convention for the setting up of what are called regional associations. These are associations of countries which are closest together. Under this provision for regional associations, not only can the members who belong to a regional association sit in on consultations, but also, under article 18, paragraph (b), the members of another regional organization may sit in. This means that anyone belonging, for instance, to an Asiatic regional organization could sit in with a North American regional organization. There is also the provision for the setting up of technical commissions.

Now, all of this may seem to be of very little importance so far as Canada is concerned; but I do submit, Mr. Speaker, that today we are not living in a world dominated by the United Nations. Instead of that we are living in a world divided into two groups. Everyone had hoped that the United Nations would be able to function as it was intended to do when set up in 1945. I think this world meteorological organization was planned on the basis of the United Nations being able to function as originally intended. Unfortunately such is not the case.

This convention involves the interchange of weather information. For example, if the convention comes into effect, such nations as Russia and her satellite countries, should they become members of this world organization, would be entitled under the convention to have access to all our weather and meteorological services.

In view of the fact that these meteorological services are so tied up with aviation I do suggest that Canada should give careful consideration to the matter before she decides to join this particular organization. After all, should there be trouble between these two great world groups, Canada is in a worse position than any other nation. She would be the Belgium in a third world war. I believe every member of the house will agree that if there should be trouble between Russia and the United States, Canada would be subject to air attack on her Atlantic coast, probably in the prairies and the central part of Canada, and also on the Pacific coast where planes would cross Bering strait, and come down through Alaska.

Before the house adopts this convention we should know the extent to which Russia and her satellite countries are going to co-operate in the organization. For example, are they willing to give us all their weather and meteorological information, just as we would be bound to do under the convention? I notice one of the satellite countries has already deposited instruments of ratification; I am referring of course to Czechoslovakia. Yesterday the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) listed the following countries as having deposited instruments of ratification: Australia, Burma, Czechoslovakia, the Dominican republic, Norway, Peru, the Philippines, Sweden and a number of others. I have no way of knowing what the other countries are, but I presume there were not very many of them. Incidentally, thirty countries must deposit ratification before the convention comes into effect, so that there would seem to be no particular hurry for Canada to rush into it.

Furthermore, I suggest we should give consideration to the question whether we have anything to gain by joining the convention at this time. We are already working closely with the United Kingdom and the United States in all our meteorological affairs. We are also in a position to work closely with the other members of the British commonwealth, and with the other north Atlantic nations—those nations which have now signed the North Atlantic treaty. I doubt very much whether Canada has a great deal to gain, under present conditions, by becoming a member of this world meteorological organization. I know there is a temptation for Canada to join all these international organizations. It is like joining a club; we like to become members of these different organizations, and that is an attitude which can easily be understood.

An hon. Member: We are good joiners.

Mr. Green: Yes, that seems to be the picture. I am not saying that Canada should not join this world meteorological organization, but I am saying that before the house approves the convention we should send it to the committee on external affairs. That is a good committee, the members of which take their work seriously, and I am confident that they would go into the question thoroughly and bring back to the house a worth-while recommendation.

That is the course I urge upon the minister today. This convention instead of its being approved after two or three members have spoken, should be referred to the committee on external affairs, so that witnesses could be called to tell the whole story. Then if we do approve the convention we shall at least know what we are doing.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a word to what has been so well said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). It is to be noted that this convention of the world meteorological organization was signed in Washington on October 11, 1947. Almost three years have passed without this country doing anything about its approval or ratification. This resolution was on the order paper in 1948, and I believe, although I am only speaking from memory, that it was on the order paper during the last session. The very fact that Canada took no immediate steps to ratify this convention speaks volumes. There is no particular reason why we should be rushing, toward the close of the session, to ratify a convention of this kind.

In addition a great deal of water has passed under the international bridge since 1947. Conditions with respect to the two-world position have changed, as have the considerations upon which the members of the United Nations founded their judgment in 1947. Moreover, one's suspicions—if one may use that harsh word; perhaps it is not appropriate, but I use it in any event—might be aroused by the lack of enthusiasm on the part of other members of the north Atlantic community. As I understand it, our powerful and friendly neighbour to the south has not taken any steps to ratify this convention. Now that we are entering a new era in our defence program, still within the framework of the United Nations, it would seem to me that this convention ought not to pass with the sort of sporadic discussion that is possible in this kind of debate. We should examine the conditions which existed when the convention was signed, and contrast them with the conditions that now exist. If they were substantially the same, then perhaps our judgment ought to be that we should ratify the convention and conclude the matter at this time. But I believe there is sufficient reason, having in mind the changed world conditions, for a further review of the convention by a competent committee of this house before it is ratified. In a debate such as this, when the matter does not go to the committee of the whole, we have no opportunity to ask questions. Here we have a convention consisting of a considerable number of pages, dealing with one of the most vital parts of the defence program of the north Atlantic community—and at the time it was signed there was no such thing as the north Atlantic community. Yesterday the minister of external affairs showed us the draft blueprint of a new system of balanced collective defence. No doubt within that balanced collective defence there will be found what is covered by this convention—that is, the question of weather data. It may be said, of course, that this is a two-way street, and that we shall receive information from Russia. The past history of relations with the soviet has not been such as to indicate that it is a two-way street, because most of the information we have been able to get from Russia so far has been so infinitesimal as not to be capable of recognition. I believe the minister ought to take that into consideration, and seriously consider the proposal made by the member for Vancouver-Quadra.

So much has happened since this instrument was signed that I do not think we can afford to take a chance by simply warming over old cooking; we ought to know what is in it. The only way to ascertain that is in a committee where we can call experts with respect to the changed conditions since 1947.

I want to urge upon the minister the seriousness of this matter. I am afraid that the signing of this convention now may not be consonant with the policy which was announced yesterday, and which will be followed out by the deputies' committee meeting permanently as the focal point of the north Atlantic alliance.

I urge with all the earnestness I can summon that this resolution be not proceeded with until a competent committee—I suggest the committee for external affairs—has had an opportunity of dealing with it and providing a basis upon which parliament may finally pass its judgment.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the arguments to which we have listened so far in relation to the merits of the resolution before us, I must say I feel that if we were called upon to make a sudden-death decision in the house I would vote for the resolution. The argument that we should refrain from agreeing to this convention of this world organization, if carried to its logical conclusion, would mean that we should withdraw from other world organizations of which we are a member. I wanted to make that clear. If the minister will not agree to the request which has been put forward by the official opposition—in other words, if he insists on a vote now—my disposition would be to support the resolution.

However, I hope that the minister shares my view that a fair case has been put up for referring the matter to the external affairs committee before a decision is made. It often happens that a resolution is moved in the house and does not go through any other stages, with the result that we are cramped in not being able to ask the minister questions in committee of the whole. That is the case with this motion, and therefore it does seem to me that this resolution might well go to the committee. Since the minister has been nodding his head up and down—oh, he is nodding it the other way or which way is it?

Mr. Chevrier: I am just listening.

Mr. Knowles: I had dared to hope he was agreeing to the proposal to send it to the committee. If he would agree, that would certainly be the end of this debate.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to add a word, because I know the minister always likes to hear from me. I hope the minister will accept the suggestion of the member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), because it seems to me manifest good sense. I can see a good many arguments in favour of it, and I entirely fail to see any valid argument against referring the convention to the committee on external affairs, as the member for Vancouver-Quadra has suggested.

The only other thing I want to say is that this seems to me such manifest good sense that if it is not acted upon I shall revert to a quotation I used in this house yesterday from the great Churchill, when he referred to the British government as the servant of parliament. If there is any validity in that remark here, I suggest that referring the matter to a committee is the proper way of dealing with it. If there is no validity in what Churchill suggested with respect to this house, then no doubt we shall have a sudden-death vote, as we so often do.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Chevrier: I should not like to lose my right to close the debate, but I do not want to close it at this stage.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will be closing the debate, unless he has unanimous consent of the house to make a statement and then have discussion.

Mr. Graydon: By consent.

Mr. Martin: He wants to explain something.

Mr. Speaker: By consent.

Mr. Chevrier: If the house would like to know now, I may say that I intend to accept the suggestion that the matter be referred to the committee on external affairs, which I think is an excellent one. But in case there might be some misunderstanding as to the countries that have already indicated their intention of ratifying this agreement, I should like to put on the record the names of those countries, because there are far more than I mentioned yesterday. In fact the United States has consented, and that seemed to be the doubt in the mind of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon).

Mr. Graydon: I understood they had not ratified it.

Mr. Chevrier: Thirty countries have ratified the convention. I named several yesterday, but there are a large number that I did not mention. Perhaps I could put them on the record now. They are, in addition to those previously mentioned: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Egypt, Finland, France, Greece, Iceland, India, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Mexico, New Zealand, Roumania, Switzerland, Thailand, Turkey, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of South Africa, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, the United States and Yugoslavia.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) tabled this agreement over a year ago. I say that in answer to the suggestion that this matter is being brought down in the later days of the session. There was an opportunity of considering this matter before—I had the document before me—at least upwards of a year ago when the document was tabled in the house.

In view of the suggestions which have been made, and which I think are reasonable, it might be well that the committee on external affairs study the contents of the world meteorological convention. With that purpose in mind I move that this convention be referred to the committee on external affairs.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that this motion is presented and accepted with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Chevrier), for reference of convention to standing committee on external affairs, agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT STORES

AMENDMENT OF ACT WITH RESPECT TO OUTSTANDING ADVANCES, OBSOLETE STORES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Friday, May 5, consideration in committee of Bill No. 135, to amend the Department of Transport Stores Act—Mr. Chevrier—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Outstanding advances not to exceed $5 million.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): When this matter came up for discussion on May 5, I believe there was some confusion—in fact, a great deal of confusion—in the minds of some members; and I would not be frank if I did not admit that there was an equal if not greater amount of confusion in my own mind. I think that can be readily understood when one realizes that this bill has reference to two departments besides the Department of Transport, namely, the Department of Finance, and the division of the Auditor General. In fact it is a matter which concerns the Department of Finance far more than it does the Department of Transport; it is more or less incidentally that it concerns transport, because of the situation in regard to the stores of that department.

During the debate a number of questions were asked, and perhaps, before dealing more particularly with section 1 of the bill, I should try as best I can to dispose of some of the apprehensions and misunderstandings that were voiced during that discussion.

In the first place I should like to say that there is, with reference to the department, what is called a stores capital fund. The stores capital fund is exactly the same thing as the advances to the Minister of Transport mentioned in section 1 of this bill. The stores capital fund means the total sum required (a) to cover the value of the inventory of stores on hand, which has already been indicated as $3·2 million, or, roughly speaking, $3 million; (b) to purchase stores in order to maintain stock levels required by the operating services; and (c) to cover the value of stores issued until payment for them has been received from the appropriations or the votes under the various items.

The working capital means that portion of the stores capital fund which is not tied up in stores stock. In other words, with reference to the bill now before the committee, it means $2 million; because the amount tied up by stores in inventory amount to $3 million. The revolving fund means the same as stores capital fund; and the advances, as I have already stated, means exactly the same as the stores capital fund.

The Department of Transport includes three major operating services: canals, marine and air services. Because there is a considerable degree of uniformity in facilities operated by the canals service, the stores requirements in the canals service are fairly similar and fairly simple. They are a little bit more complicated when one gets into the division of marine and air services. Under marine, for instance, stores are required for various facilities known as aids to navigation, such as lights, lighthouses, lightships, beacons, buoys and fog alarms. Then there is the group, still in marine services, having to do with dominion icebreakers. They have a varied and long list of stores required for those operations. Then the air service embraces the operation of airways, airports, radio stations, meteorological stations, telegraph and telephone services, which require a broad range of stores. There are nearly 2,800 operating stations and establishments in the department, and they are divided as follows: 62 for canals; 1,164 for marine services; 1,544 for air services.

The purpose of this bill is to provide for a consolidation of stores in one account. The principle has already been approved in the two measures that have come before the house previously, and I will not deal with that feature. But with reference to this bill in particular, the purposes are manifold. First, it is to enable the establishment of an effective central purchasing control over the purchasing of stores. Stores purchased are paid for out of the stores capital fund, and the value of such stores, when issued, is charged to the appropriation of the services concerned and credited to the stores capital fund. The purpose of the bill is also to promote economy through bulk purchases; also to facilitate the transfer of stores from one depot to another; to promote the orderly planning of purchases of stores that are required for certain seasons of the year; and finally, to facilitate the acquisition of supplies for outlying districts.

I shall now deal more particularly with section 1, which reads as follows:

The amount of advances to the Minister of Transport shall at no time exceed $5 million.

The proposed $5 million would really be a stores capital fund, against which the present inventory value of approximately $3 million would become a first charge, leaving a balance of about $2 million of working capital which the Minister of Transport may draw upon for the acquisition and replenishment of stores as required from time to time. It is money that is voted to the minister for use; it is money that is in the Department of Finance in the hands of the Minister of Finance, which may be advanced to the Minister of Transport from time to time.

He may not need the $2 million; he may need only a small portion of it, but the information that has been provided to me is indicative of the fact that he will require it for the reasons that I shall give at a later stage.

May I revert for just a moment to the position which existed prior to the passing of this act—for instance, the position which existed in 1937. The stores act of that year provided in effect for a similar capital fund of $1,957,368, composed of inventory of $957,368, and, in addition, an authority to obtain advances from the Minister of Finance of $1 million. In other words, the position was: inventory of $957,368, plus advances to the minister of $1 million.

The information that has been given to me is that because of the advances, as indicated by the dominion bureau of statistics, in commodity wholesale prices, there has been a general increase in price, and on this basis the equivalent volume of stocks would be valued today at slightly more than $2 million. By adding to this figure the value of the inventories of stores taken over in Newfoundland about a year ago, which was roughly $1,200,000, we would have a total inventory of $3,200,000. This figure is somewhat greater than the actual inventory of stores as at March 31, 1950, which was given at $3 million in round figures, and which as we go along I should like to use as the amount of inventory with reference to section 1, now on hand. There remains $2 million, which is a sort of revolving fund. The $2 million remaining out of the $5 million which has been referred to previously as working capital will not actually be paid over to the Minister of Transport, but as already pointed out, will simply be available to be drawn upon as needed.

The figure of $2 million does not seem to be unreasonable considering the fact that in 1937 parliament authorized an advance of $1 million to be used as working capital in conjunction with the stores inventory of about the same amount, $957,368 to be exact. Today in reality we are asking for an advance for working capital of $2 million in relation to inventory of $3 million. These figures combined represent the proposed stores capital of $5 million referred to in the bill as advances to the minister.

It is estimated that approximately $2 million is needed to purchase stores required to maintain stocks at necessary operating levels and to cover the time lag between the dates when stores are issued and date when the stores account receives credit from the votes concerned.

This figure also includes a margin of around $500,000 to take care of temporary upward fluctuations in value of inventory, which may occur as a result of relatively light withdrawals and heavy receipt of stores during certain periods.

This is all I need to say at this time on section 1. There are a number of questions which I feel I should reply to, and I think I can do it fairly quickly.

Mr. Green: Before the minister leaves section 1, can he tell us the annual turnover?

Mr. Chevrier: The annual turnover, as I will indicate in answer to a question which was asked on the last occasion by an hon. member, is $8 million.

Mr. Knowles: What guarantee will we have in the legislation, or anywhere else, that the $5 million asked for in this bill will include both the inventory now on hand and such additional advances as the Minister of Transport may get from the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Chevrier: I propose to move an amendment when I complete my statement which I think will cover the greater part of my hon. friend's suggestion, if not all of it.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked whether I would indicate, just as an example, where in the estimates there are items to pay for some of the things that have been bought out of these advances. These are to be found in most of the operating votes in the Department of Transport—certainly the vote for the operation of canals, the vote for the operation of marine agencies, the vote for the operation of airports, and so forth.

The hon. member for Greenwood asked this question: "I should like to know how much we have relative to what is used from time to time". That was not an easy question.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not know what it means now.

Mr. Chevrier: I did not. I do not think I was able to give an answer; but if it means what we think it does, then the answer is this.

Department of Transport Stores

The inventory as at March 31, 1950, was approximately $3 million, as I have already indicated, while the value of stores issued in the preceding twelve months was $8 million. That is the answer that I gave to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra a moment ago.

The hon. member for Greenwood asked another question: "To what extent has Mr. Howe's promise of 1937 to eliminate surplus stocks been carried out; also to what extent are we piling up stocks in any way?" Inventory value as at March 31, 1937, was $957,368. The record shows that the value of the stores inventory as at March 31, 1939, two years later, was $876,877, or approximately $81,000 less than two years previously. The inventory value today—by "today" I mean March 31, 1950—exclusive of Newfoundland, was $2,059,730. And that of course, as already stated, was owing to the increase in prices from that date to this, and also to the addition of new divisions in the department.

Mr. Green: What is the Newfoundland figure today?

Mr. Chevrier: It is roughly $1 million.

Mr. Higgins: It was $1,180,000.

Mr. Chevrier: I say roughly $1 million.

Mr. Green: I understand it has been cut by several hundred thousands.

Mr. Chevrier: I will give that in a moment. I have it all here. I propose to answer most of the questions that were asked at the last sitting.

The hon. member for Greenwood asked: "To what extent have we got stock that is piling up and perhaps should be cleared out?" The answer is that with the exception of stores taken over in Newfoundland a year ago it is estimated that the value of stores inactive and unserviceable and obsolete in nature at the present is about $20,000. That is only about one per cent of the inventory value as at March 31, 1950, excluding Newfoundland stocks.

The hon. member for Greenwood wanted to get some kind of statement—not in exhaustive detail—as to what there is in stores now. I have quite a lengthy statement. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman wants me to put it on the record. Perhaps I can give some of the main divisions which will give an answer to what he wants.

For instance, in canals the divisions are something like this: general hardware and tools, metals, paints, spare parts, lumber, lubricants and fuel. In marine and radio the division is: general hardware and tools, metals, steamer supplies, lighthouse supplies, paints, lubricants and fuel. In radio stations and airports the division is: general hardware and tools, radio equipment, parts and accessories, airport spare parts, accessories and miscellaneous supplies. In meteorological, the division is scientific instruments and miscellaneous supplies.

There is another long classification that I have, composed of twenty-seven different items, which are made up of iron, steel and other metals, castings, pipe and fittings of all kinds, tools, and so forth. Then there is a break-down of one of the depots in the canal service at Lachine.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not think we will need to proceed any further unless we get into difficulties with the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: I hope my hon. friend will not. I am the most co-operative minister in the house.

There was another question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood which I think is important and which should be clarified. He wanted to know why we buy all these different stores and carry them in stock when they might be purchased without delay in the ordinary course of merchandising. We buy in large quantities, and we like to buy in large quantities because we save substantial sums of money. For instance, by buying 5,000 gallons of anti-freeze for the various depots rather than buying it piecemeal for each requisition we save $2 per gallon. If we buy 10,000 gallons of paint in one lot we save $2 per gallon over the retail price. The same thing can be said of manila rope, white lead, binoculars, and so on.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra wanted to know by how much the department had exceeded the advances of $1 million authorized by the present act. The present act provides in effect for a capital fund of $1,957,368, composed of the April 1, 1937, inventory, $957,368, and $1 million which was authorized as advances to the Minister of Transport. That inventory, exclusive of Newfoundland stores, as of March 31, 1950, stood at $2,059,000.

Mr. Green: What about the increases? There were amendments to the act in 1939 and in 1946, in each case increasing the amounts that could be held in stores.

Mr. Chevrier: The inventory as at March 31, 1950, exclusive of Newfoundland stores, was about $2,059,000. Therefore the advances were exceeded by $102,000 at that date. In the previous year, March 31, 1949, the advances were exceeded by $72,491, exclusive of Newfoundland stores. Then on April 1, 1949, the Newfoundland stores inventory was fixed at $1,158,000, but that has not yet been charged to the Department of Transport stores account. Provision for the acquisition of those stores was made in the supplementary estimates of 1949-50 under vote 673. However, when I stated in the original debate of May 5 that the advances were overdrawn to the extent of $1 million, that figure was based on the assumption that the Newfoundland stores had been transferred to the Department of Transport, but as stated, this is not so. The proposed amendments to the stores act provide for the inclusion of the Newfoundland stores in the over-all inventory.

So that there may be no misunderstanding about section 1, I intend to propose an amendment, which will cover the inventory. There was some anxiety indicated in the committee about the amount of the advances. It was thought that $5 million was far too much. Having regard to the explanations I have given and the conversations I have had with my officers since that time, it strikes me that if the committee were willing to authorize advances to the extent of $4,500,000, that would meet the position. I have asked the officers how they could get along with that, and they say that that would be running them pretty close but if they had less it would be difficult for them to operate. I hope it will be possible for the committee to approve this, and I intend to move an amendment to section 5.

Mr. Green: There is an amendment before the committee at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: This would be a subamendment.

Mr. Knowles: You will have to wait until the amendment is disposed of.

Mr. Chevrier: When we get to it I will suggest an amendment providing that the amount of advances to the Minister of Transport shall at no time exceed $4,500,000, including the value of the stores from time to time on hand. There would then be no doubt that it included the $3 million inventory now on hand, and it would give a revolving fund or working capital of $1,500,000. Perhaps in view of these explanations the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will consider withdrawing his amendment.

Mr. Green: The explanations given by the minister this morning help to clear up the difficulties we had when this bill was under discussion on a previous occasion. As the committee knows, the Department of Transport Stores Act was enacted in 1937. At that time there were two points that worried the members of the house. The first was that power was being taken to spend money before it was appropriated, and that is our main worry in connection with the proposed amendments now before us. Under this act the Department of Transport can spend a certain amount of money before it is actually appropriated by parliament, which is contrary to the whole basis of our parliamentary system. That particular objection was put very clearly by Mr. Bennett, then leader of the opposition, when he spoke on April 2, 1937, as reported on page 2488 of Hansard:

> I say to the minister in the light of experience that there is nothing more inviting to permanent officials than the possibility of having an advance of great proportions.

The second worry in 1937 was that stores would be accumulated to a greater extent than was necessary. At that time the stores on hand were of a value of less than $1 million. The present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who was in charge of the bill at that time, said, as reported on page 2488 of Hansard of April 2, 1937:

> It will be my aim to see that at the end of the year there are no surplus stocks.

The whole emphasis by the minister at that time was that surplus stocks would be cut right down to the minimum. In order to meet those two difficulties, provision was made in the original act that the advances to the minister would be limited to $1 million, and there was also a provision that the value of stores held after the inventory at the end of each fiscal year after 1936-37 should not exceed the amount of the stores inventory established as of April 1, 1937.

Those were the two restrictive provisions placed in the legislation to meet the objections raised. It is interesting to note what has since happened to each of these obstacles. That of the ceiling of $1 million has remained in the act to this date. In other words, right up to the present time the minister has never had the power to draw on the Department of Finance for more than $1 million. It is true that an amendment was made in 1939, but that was because of the wording of the original section 4. There had been some trouble with the Department of Finance. They read the original section 4 as still calling for an appropriation by parliament in each case. Therefore the act was amended in 1939 to provide for a straight advance up to a ceiling of $1 million. The value of the stores was increased in 1939 to $1,250,000. Then during the war it was increased by order in council in 1943, I believe—the minister can correct me if I am wrong—to $1,500,000. In 1946, after the war, less than four years ago, it was increased again to $1,600,000.

Before I start discussing the terms of the bill now before the committee, I should like to point out that the position under the present law is that there is a ceiling of $1 million on the amount that can be advanced, and a ceiling of $1,600,000 on the value of stores that can be held in the inventory. Until this year the legislation has been based on those two different restrictions, one by way of ceiling on the advances, and the other by way of ceiling on the value of the stores in the inventory. For some reason or other the Department of Transport is now asking that those two items be lumped together, and that the new section read:

> The amount of advances to the Minister of Transport shall at no time exceed $5 million.

In other words, they are lumping together the stores on hand and the amount that can be drawn before there has been an appropriation by parliament. We objected of course to the provision for an increase in the advances from $1 million to $5 million; at the same time there is a provision in the bill which strikes out the restriction on the value of stores; that section is being deleted.

I think the minister's offer to include in the new section 5 the words, "including the amount of stores on hand from time to time", meets one of the objections, but there remains the question as to the total figure that should be written into the section. Some of us have suggested to the minister that the figure should be $4 million rather than $5 million. We believe the amount that can be spent without appropriation by parliament should be carefully restricted. The minister is now basing his figure of $4,500,000 on an inventory of stocks amounting to slightly over $2 million, an inventory of stocks in Newfoundland of about $1 million, and then he wants working capital of $1,500,000. It is my understanding that the Newfoundland stores are largely at Gander airport, and that while at one time they reached the figure of about $1 million they have since been reduced by $300,000 or $400,000. It does not seem reasonable that half as many stores should have to be kept in Newfoundland as in all the rest of Canada. Yet that is exactly what the minister's figures mean. There are $2 million worth of stores in the rest of Canada and $1 million in Newfoundland. That does not seem to be reasonable. As I said a moment ago, I am told that the Newfoundland stores have been drastically reduced, and that they are still being reduced.

Of course it was stated time and again in 1937 by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce and also by Mr. Dunning, then minister of finance, that an attempt would be made to keep the stores down to a minimum. I believe the Minister of Transport should agree to a new figure of $4 million. I think that gives him ample leeway, and it serves as a check on his officials. They are getting the right to spend money that has not yet been appropriated by parliament, and in addition they are getting the right to have this large amount of stores on hand. I think there should be a check placed on them. I do not believe they will be badly hurt if the figure is placed at $4 million. I hope the minister will agree. After all, there are only one or two other cases in our whole governmental structure in which departments can spend money before it is appropriated. The minister gave the printing bureau as an illustration, but I do not believe they have the right to draw in advance up to the amount of $1 million. He also gave the example of the Indian affairs branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. Apparently they have the right to draw moneys in advance before appropriation.

Here we have a total turnover of only $8 million in the whole year. With the figure set at $4 million I think the minister's officials will have ample power to carry on. It will be an incentive to them not to draw ahead unless they have to do so, and it will also be an incentive to keep down the amount of stores on hand. If he finds in two or three years that they need a larger figure, then I think it is a very good thing for him to have to come back to parliament and explain why, because in effect parliament is being by-passed by legislation of this kind.

I hope the minister will agree to put the figure at $4 million. If he will do so I do not think there will be any more argument.

The Chairman: Is the hon. member withdrawing his amendment?

Mr. Green: My amendment is standing at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the minister for the further, and dare I say better, explanation he gave this morning than was given on the 5th of May. I also want to say that I appreciate his readiness to meet some of the arguments that have been advanced from this side of the house by the amendment which he has indicated he will be prepared to move if the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will withdraw his amendment to the first clause of the bill. It is difficult for us to judge whether $4,000,000 or $4,500,000 should be the figure. I think it is significant, however, that in view of the debate which took place, and the representations made from this side of the house, the minister has seen fit to split the difference and be satisfied with $4,500,000. But the more significant part of the proposed amendment, if I understand it, is that which makes it clear that the $4,500,000 would have to include both inventory on hand and cash advances made available. If it is clear that when the minister has on hand $3 million in inventory he can get only another million and a half by way of cash advance—

Mr. Chevrier: That is clearly understood in the amendment I intend to propose.

Mr. Knowles: Very well; if that is clear, even with the qualification the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra now makes, I feel more satisfied. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra points out that if inventory were reduced from $3 million to $2 million, then the minister could get $2,500,000 cash. But, in connection with the whole matter, can any stores in the inventory we are talking about actually be used without a charge being made against a vote provided in the estimates?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me that is what we were trying to get a month ago.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: It is clear, then, that if there are estimates in the votes for $8 million worth of stores for the year 1950-51 it is not possible for more than $8 million worth of stores to be used?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: During 1950-51?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: In other words the inventory is really something that still belongs to the Department of Finance.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right; I thought I indicated that earlier in my statement.

Mr. Knowles: I think the minister indicated it today, but he did not indicate it that way on May 5. I am trying to get it sorted out, and in doing so I hope I am not being unhelpful.

Mr. Chevrier: Not at all.

Mr. Knowles: If that is clear, then it seems to me there is more justification for doing things this way than there seemed to be on May 5. But I want to be absolutely clear that not a gallon of paint or anything else can be taken from inventory provided under this measure, and used, without its being charged against a vote by parliament in that current year.

Mr. Chevrier: No question about it at all. However, if a purchase is made, it must be made under the appropriations set out in the various items for the department. Whether it be called a direct purchase, outside of stores, or whether it be called an issue from stores, it has to come from the various votes for canals, air services and the like. But, because of the time lag which is unavoidable in respect of some of these purchases, advances are made to the minister with which to buy them out of this $1,500,000 revolving fund, and they are repaid to the Minister of Finance under the appropriation.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has referred to the revolving fund being $1,500,000 because at the present time the inventory is $3 million?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: That might change without any change in the act being necessary.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has referred to purchases of stores either from stores inventory or direct from merchandising people. Can he indicate any break-down so far as the practice of his department is concerned? During the last year for which information is available how much by way of stores has been brought down from stores inventory, and how much has been bought direct from wholesalers or retailers?

Mr. Chevrier: There were purchases direct, outside of stores inventory, to the value of $4,600,000 in the last year. There were issued from stores $8 million during the last year.

Mr. Fulton: That is $12,600,000 altogether?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Just a moment; what was the total amount provided in the estimates for last year? Is that the year the minister is talking about?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: What was the total amount provided in the estimates of last year for the purchase of stores, roughly?

Mr. Chevrier: Approximately $12 million.

Mr. Knowles: That amount was provided by votes passed by parliament.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: And the total amount of stores actually used last year was what?

Mr. Chevrier: It was $8 million, the amount I gave a moment ago as being commodities issued out of stores. That is the amount as compared with the $4,600,000 for direct purchases.

Mr. Knowles: But the commodities issued out of stores were also used, were they not?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Then you used $12 million worth of stores last year?

Mr. Chevrier: No. There one must differentiate between direct purchases and stores actually on hand. We used $8 million worth of stores and purchased other materials outside of stores. For instance, we do not stock coal, and things of that kind.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Those things which came direct.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, that is a better word. Those were purchased outside, and did not form part of stores.

Mr. Fulton: They never went through the Department of Finance at all?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: When the minister gave me the figure of $12 million provided in the estimates of last year for stores, that figure included both stores and purchases in the sense of purchasing coal.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Has it been found possible by means of this act to exceed in any year, such as last year, the total amount of money provided in the estimates so far as stores and purchases are concerned?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Knowles: You have not found it possible to do that?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Knowles: And you do not think you will find it possible to do that in the future?

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure we will not.

Mr. Higgins: I am trying to understand the Newfoundland item. I understand the figure is now $1,200,000; is that correct?

Mr. Chevrier: The figure originally indicated was $1,200,000.

Mr. Higgins: But the first figure was $1,180,000, was it not?

Mr. Chevrier: For the purposes of this discussion, that is roughly $1,200,000.

Mr. Higgins: And this $1,158,000 has not yet been charged. That is actually what it came to.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Higgins: That is what you actually paid out.

Mr. Chevrier: The Department of Finance did. We did not pay it out, because it has not been transferred to us.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Higgins: That is what has been paid out.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Higgins: The minister also said, as indicated in Hansard at page 2217, of May 5, that there was a sum of $300,000 to cover the value of outstanding accounts receivable for issues from Newfoundland stores pending recovery from votes. What was that for?

Mr. Chevrier: That was the sum required to cover outstanding accounts receivable for issues from Newfoundland stores, pending recovery from votes. It was an item which indicated a break-down of the $2 million which was required over and above the inventory of $3 million. I was trying to explain how the $5 million was made up at the time.

Mr. Higgins: Does the minister mean that the $300,000 included the two items he has just given me?

Mr. Chevrier: I gave the amounts. I am not too clear on them myself.

Mr. Higgins: You mean the $2 million, over and above the $3 million, included the $300,000 you are now talking about? What stores are you planning to carry in Newfoundland yearly?

Mr. Chevrier: Roughly a million dollars.

Mr. Higgins: What would they be actually? How much at Gander?

Mr. Chevrier: I shall give the three items that are most important, and they are almost stationary. In themselves they make up practically the full amount. For plant, shop machinery and transmission equipment, parts and accessories, $293,738; and that must remain.

Mr. Higgins: That is not a yearly amount; that is fixed.

Mr. Chevrier: We are talking about stores.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is plant considered stores?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, plant in the sense of machinery for aircraft repairs. Then there is fuel, gas, petroleum products and oil, which must remain almost fixed, $406,946, for Newfoundland.

Mr. Higgins: What would that be for? What would you be supplying?

Mr. Chevrier: Aircraft.

Mr. Higgins: Just Trans-Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: Not necessarily. There are purchases made from our stores at Gander by various air lines. They buy their gasoline.

Mr. Higgins: They do not buy it from the Department of Transport?

Mr. Chevrier: Some of them do.

Mr. Higgins: Not to any great extent?

Mr. Chevrier: There are other aeroplanes in the area.

Mr. Higgins: There are not very many private aeroplanes.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, there are, but I am not going to discuss that. I am saying that is so, and that is the information I have. I do not think it is inaccurate. Then, for chemicals—no, this covers the restaurant at Gander and the provisions that must be kept on hand, $109,308. There are other items that are all small, ranging from $1,000 to $50 and $60. The items I have mentioned total about $800,000.

Mr. Higgins: Did the minister say "chemicals"?

Mr. Chevrier: That was an error. Chemicals amount to $8,944. I was looking at the wrong figure beside the description of the amount. It is provisions that amounts to $109,308.

Mr. Higgins: Is it not planned to rent out the restaurant concession at Gander? Then you will not have to carry that $109,000. I understood there is a tentative proposal to rent the restaurant concession; at least that is what I heard at Gander.

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Higgins: How much of that $293,000 would be plant?

Mr. Chevrier: I have not a further breakdown of the amount.

Mr. Higgins: The gas and oil seems very high, but you have the information, I suppose.

Mr. Stick: Probably the plant takes in the railway machine shop and the drydock, does it?

Mr. Higgins: It is for Gander only.

Mr. Stick: What about fuel oil; does that apply to the railway?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it is for air services only.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask a question of the minister, but first of all I think we should thank the minister for the way he associated us with himself at the opening of his remarks this morning as being in a state of mental confusion. I think we should be grateful for being associated with the minister, even if it is only in a state of mental confusion.

Department of Transport Stores

I want to say a word in support of the suggestion made by the member for Vancouver-Quadra, but before I do that, I understand that the department manufactures for itself certain materials that it uses—buoys and things of that kind; or have I been misinformed?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, there are certain marine agencies which make their own equipment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How are the prices for them fixed? Are they just turned in at cost?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, they are itemized at cost.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to say a word in support of the suggestion made by the member for Vancouver-Quadra. I do think it is clear that we are not talking about an expenditure; we are talking about what has been accurately referred to as working capital. We are talking about sensible business arrangements to facilitate the department. The only difference between us at the moment is the question of the amount. I believe the minister's amendment to clause 1 will make it clearer.

As to the amount, I want to go back for a moment to the debate in 1937, because it is perfectly clear from the words used at that time by the then minister of transport (Mr. Howe)—one must get wisdom wherever it can be found, even in unexpected quarters—that what was mainly in the minister's mind, in the mind of the then leader of the opposition, and in the mind of the then minister of finance, was that they were going to get these stores down. Speaking of the inventory, the then minister of transport said he thought it was far too large. He said, at page 2488 of Hansard for April 2, 1937:

> It will be my aim to see that at the end of the year there are no surplus stocks.

He said he did not know whether that would be possible, but that was the aim.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I suggest very strongly to the minister that there is a danger if we make this over-all amount too large, that that aim would be largely missed. I am not going to go into a lot of figures, but I am going to put these figures to him. They sum up the situation as I see it, and, if he agrees with me, perhaps he would be induced to accept the suggestion made by the member for Vancouver-Quadra to reduce the over-all amount to $4 million.

Let me put it to him this way. During the last year, in effect, the amount of stores plus the present revolving fund was roughly $2,600,000, excluding Newfoundland. The significant thing to me, and it has been made very clear, is that that amount of working capital enabled the department to get by with reasonable comfort. Actually they did exceed their authority by some $72,000, but subject to that they got along all right. Newfoundland came in, and that certainly warranted some addition to the amount. I suggest, having regard to the fact the department got along last year with only $72,000 extra, that the figure suggested by the member for Vancouver-Quadra is $1,400,000 in excess of the $2,600,000, apart from the additions in Newfoundland, and should be adequate.

Incidentally I quite agree with what has been said, that one should look very carefully at the gross figure for Newfoundland if it is going to be anything like half of the total for the whole of Canada. I put it to the minister that it is in keeping with the spirit of those who brought this measure into the house, on both sides; that this sum of $4 million is in accordance with what was intended, which was to put pressure on the officials to keep the amounts down. If, in fact, $4 million does not give them the elbow room which I think it will, then a year from now, on proper representations, it could be changed.

Mr. Chevrier: I am very much impressed by the points made by the member for Greenwood and the member for Vancouver-Quadra. After the explanations that have been given today, I do not think there is any other impression left in this committee but that we want to operate with what we require, and no more. I had been under the impression that with $1,500,000, we would be somewhat tight. It may be possible to carry on on that basis. We can try. I am willing to accept the suggestion, and I am willing to ask my officers to try, in order to meet the wishes of the committee. I stated that there was some confusion in the minds of the members of the house, and there was a lot of confusion in my mind, as to how this revolving fund operated. For the reasons which I gave earlier, I am willing to ask the officers to try to get along with $4 million, inclusive of the $3 million stores.

I have discussed it with the comptroller of the treasury, who is here before me, and he is willing to make an attempt at it, although he thinks it is going to be difficult. In fairness to the committee I should say that if I find it impossible to accomplish this, I shall have to come back next year and ask for another million, or $500,000, as the case may be. If the committee will accept, then I will move accordingly, if my hon. friend (Mr. Green) will withdraw his motion.

Mr. Green: I think the minister has been reasonable indeed in his suggestion about this amendment, and I would ask for leave to withdraw the amendment I moved on the previous occasion.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

The Chairman: Has the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra leave to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Green) withdrawn.

Mr. Chevrier: Then I would ask one of my colleagues to move:

That section 1 of the bill, clause 5, be amended to read as follows:

The amount of advances to the Minister of Transport shall at no time exceed $4 million, including the value of stores from time to time on hand.

I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to move accordingly.

Mr. Howe: I so move, Mr. Chairman.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Accounting transactions to be at cost.—Deletion from inventory of obsolete stores.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister to explain the new section 8 that is provided for by this clause?

Mr. Chevrier: Does clause 3 carry?

Mr. Knowles: Clause 3 of the bill contains both sections 7 and 8.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry. Section 8 reads:

The Minister of Transport, with the approval of the treasury board, may direct the deletion from stores inventory of obsolete or unserviceable stores . . .

The present position is that obsolete or unserviceable stores cannot be disposed of to the satisfaction either of the Department of Transport or of the Department of Finance. It will be done now by including an appropriation in the estimates.

Mr. Knowles: Under this section, when the minister directs the deletion of unserviceable stores, does that mean selling them or destroying them?

Mr. Chevrier: It might be done in two ways —by declaring them surplus, and by having them sold by crown assets or destroying them.

Mr. Knowles: When the value of stores so deleted is to be credited to the stores account, does that mean the stores account provided for in this bill, the $4 million?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: All right. The section goes on to say:

. . . and charged to appropriations that may be made by parliament for this purpose from time to time.

Does that mean the appropriations that are now in the vote for stores and purchases, or does it mean special appropriations to be put in?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it does not. It means a separate appropriation which will be indicated in the estimates of the Department of Transport as an item "sold to crown assets" or as an item "destroyed".

Mr. Knowles: In other words, if there is a loss through the deletion of obsolete or unserviceable stores, in the last analysis it will be paid for by a special vote?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister answer one other question? I note that reference is made to "stores lost or destroyed". Has the value of stores lost been of any magnitude?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not able to indicate what amount of stores has been destroyed or disposed of. For instance, in the fire which took place at the marine agency in Quebec some weeks ago, a substantial quantity of stores was destroyed. But to what extent or what the amount is, I am not able to say.

Mr. Knowles: My question relates particularly to the use of the word "lost". When reference is made to stores lost, does it mean lost by fire, or just by inexplicable disappearance?

Mr. Chevrier: It can be lost in more than one manner. It can be lost by fire. It can be lost by breakage. There are articles that break from time to time, such as bulbs. In the marine end concerning marine services and lighthouse services, there are a number of things that are breakable. Then from time to time there is the commission of theft, and articles disappear in that manner.

ELECTRICITY INSPECTION ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO SEALING OF METERS, FEES, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 263, to amend the Electricity Inspection Act, 1928.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister explain the import and purpose of this bill?

Mr. Howe: The purpose of the bill to amend the Electricity Inspection Act is threefold. First, it incorporates in the act certain changes which have been effected by the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act. Second, it seeks power for the governor in council to alter the statutory period for verification of meters.

Section 10 of the Electricity Inspection Act and section 9 of the Gas Inspection Act require meters to be presented by the owners for reverification within six years from the last verification. The verification of a meter entails its being taken out of service to a place having special technical apparatus and equipment, and meanwhile a replacing meter must be installed in the consumer's premises. There are hundreds of thousands of meters to thus verify. During the war, the restrictions and scarcities were such that this peacetime process of verification was impossible. Consequently the wartime meter inspection order, being order in council P.C. 1450 of February 23, 1943, was made under the War Measures Act, which stated that those provisions of the two acts were not to apply to certain electricity and gas meters. It was revoked on April 1, 1947.

The result was that the statutory period for verification was interrupted for over four years, so that when the order in council was revoked there was a huge backlog of unverified meters. Not only did this present a very serious physical problem to the public utilities by reason of material and labour shortages, and to the inspection service, but it also presented a legal problem as to what was the effect of the wartime order on the statutory time limits: for example, was the running of the statutory time merely suspended while the order was in force, or was the effect that the statutory period was to recommence on revocation of the order?

It appears that some difficulties still exist and that many meters due under the time schedule for verification in 1949 were not verified, and some due for verification in 1950 may not be verified in 1950. This bill will provide clear authority for extensions by the governor in council in necessary cases and for enforcement of the act where further extensions appear to be unwarranted.

In addition to the need for extending the six-year inspection period by reason of the wartime meter inspection order, the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission is undertaking the conversion of all 25-cycle power to 60-cycle power in southern Ontario. This program, it is expected, will cover the next ten to fifteen years. The problem facing the department is the six-year seal period of meters in so far as it affects meters of any contractor who may be scheduled for conversion immediately after the six-year period is reached. For example, meters sealed in 1944 are due to be resealed in 1950, and it is possible some of these will be included in the conversion schedule for 1951. In this event, under the existing legislation, the contractor would be required to present these meters in 1950 and again in 1951 after conversion, or present new meters if such are installed. There are some 400,000 meters affected by conversion. While it is extremely unlikely that this number would be in the position mentioned, with a minimum inspection fee of 60 cents per meter plus cost of removal, repair, etc., large utilities could be faced with sizeable expenditures which, on the ground of good sense, should not be incurred.

In a good many cases the contractors involved have extended every co-operation to the department with respect to their overdue meters, and to require verification in the succeeding year would, it is felt, be an undue hardship.

It might also be pointed out that power is vested in the governor in council under the Weights and Measures Act, which is another inspection service administered by the department, to fix the periods in which inspections may be made.

Third, this bill provides for the elimination of adhesive stamps, which are fixed to certificates of inspection at the present time as evidence of payment of fees for the inspection. The Electricity Inspection Act was originally administered by the old department of inland revenue, and it was apparently the practice in that department that any document evidencing payment of funds to the crown should be receipted by stamps. There was the further feature that this practice did provide some measure of control of funds received by inspectors from companies where inspection work was undertaken.

Present-day practices have eliminated the necessity of this type of control. When meters are inspected in any utility, lists of these are entered on a document known as a "field note", which gives details of the work done and the fees due. When the work is completed, a copy of the field note is left with the contractor; the original copy together with a receipt for contractor's copy and the amount of fees due is returned to the district office of electricity and gas in the area. A bill is then rendered against the utility for the fees indicated in the field notes. When payment is made to the district office, a certificate is sent to the utility with the necessary value of cancelled adhesive stamps thereon. Even in the case of the smallest contractors, where the fees may be paid upon completion of the inspection, the stamped certificate is not issued except by the district office upon receipt of the field notes and the fees collected.

Stamps are in themselves not negotiable for postal or excise purposes, and the printing for the stamps required by the three inspection services—gas, electricity and weights and measures—costs between $1,200 and $1,500 a year. It is felt that by including an appropriately worded receipt in the certificate, the stamps can be eliminated.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Re-verification of meters.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister a question arising out of the statement he made? Is there any program in effect for getting back to the six-year period of inspection, apart from the difficulty created by the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission conversion? Or is it the intention merely to let the normal six years expire and then insist on the six-year verification from then on? Is any effort being made to catch up on the disruption caused by the war and to insist on the six-year period from there on?

Mr. Howe: A very serious effort has been made to catch up. I am told that there will be very few meters not inspected within the six-year period at the end of 1950. There may be a few. But the difficulty is that the meters that have not been inspected are in a doubtful legal position, and in case any argument should arise, there should be the formal exemption.

Mr. Fulton: Will the same thing apply to Ontario? Will the new period or the start of a new period be fixed at the completion of conversion so that it will be every six years from there on?

Mr. Howe: Yes; if the conversion is to be completed within a year from the end of the inspection period, the purpose would be to extend the existing inspection period for a year so that the new meters would be inspected and the old meters removed, as they would require to be in that case.

GAS INSPECTION ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO SEALING OF METERS AND INSPECTION FEES

ELECTRICAL AND PHOTOMETRIC UNITS

DEFINITIONS IN ACCORDANCE WITH RECOMMENDATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE ON WEIGHTS AND MEASUREMENTS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I should like to move the second reading of Bill No. 265, respecting the units of electrical and photometric measure.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Howe: This bill is a tidying up bill. Its purpose is to bring the Canadian law into line with the laws of Great Britain, France and the United States, defining the units of electrical and photometric measure and thus giving effect to the recommendations made by the international committee on weights and measures, on which Canada was represented.

Appropriate legislation has already been passed in the other countries mentioned. Electrical units are at present defined under the Electrical Units Act, R.S.C. 1927, chapter 56. Photometric units have not been defined previously under Canadian statutes. This bill is entirely technical in character, bringing our legislation into line with that of other countries.

Mr. Drew: It is not intended to proceed with third reading today?

Mr. Howe: Not necessarily.

Mr. Drew: While the bill may be entirely technical, that may be a reason why an opportunity should be given to ascertain whether it is as simple as it seems. I am not raising any question as to the explanation that has been given, but it is possible that a bill such as this may present problems that are not apparent. I think it should stand before it goes forward for third reading, in order that it may be ascertained whether the details are in fact acceptable.

Mr. Howe: I shall be glad to hold over third reading of the bill.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

528. Departmental administration, $2,175,279.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Perhaps I might reply now to the questions put last night by the hon. member for Regina City and referred to by other hon. members with regard to the class 12-D patients, as we call it, that is those paying patients coming into our D.V.A. hospitals. I was asked if I could give any indication of the results of our experience so far, and I replied that the period had been quite short. I should like to say again what I stated the day the announcement was made.

We are taking the first year to work this out as best we can. We are under no illusions, because we realize that it is a difficult problem; consequently I do not want to pin the department down too closely at this time as to charges and other factors. We realize that an attempt must be made to solve the problem sooner or later, and we would prefer to do it quietly, while there are comparatively few beds available, rather than let it move to a point after four, five or six years when there might be quite a number.

Hon. members will understand that when the hospital construction program was entered upon, arrangements had to be made for the peak load, coming normally in midwinter, as well as the valley load in midsummer, which we are approaching now. That means if the peak load has been provided for there are quite long periods during a year, even in normal times, when there are a number of beds vacant. It is now our intention to take advantage of the interim gaps to experiment as to how our federal D.V.A. hospitals may best be used in order to play their part in the hospitalization program of the country. Coming down to cases, this will give an indication of what is moving forward in the very short period that we have been trying it out. There has been a steady increase in the number of patients in this category, which we call 12-D to distinguish it from others. The number in class 12-D in D.V.A. hospitals rose from fifteen on April 11 of this year to sixty-five on May 30. Approximately 175 patients have been treated and discharged under this classification during April and May. As an example, one district has treated and discharged thirty-four patients, the total cost being $3,109, all of which except $86.20, has been paid or guaranteed to the department. Other districts have either had a similar or better experience. I have certain data with regard to the districts of Toronto and Montreal.

Mr. Blair: What is the rate per day charged in these hospitals for non-pensionable veterans?

Mr. Gregg: For veterans coming within this class?

Mr. Blair: Yes.

Mr. Gregg: If I may I will answer that later, because I do not want to give my hon. friend the wrong answer.

Mr. Gillis: I should like the minister to explain something about the point raised by the hon. member for Lanark. A non-pensioned veteran may have a service disability entitling him to treatment, but he is not pensioned for it. I have had several of these cases recently where the veteran has paid his own transportation to the hospital and has entered on the assumption that he was at least going to get free treatment. After being there for a month he received a bill from the department at the rate of $9 a day. In most cases the veteran could have received the same treatment at a local hospital in his own community and at a much lower rate. He entered the D.V.A. hospital on the assumption that he was to get free treatment.

I should like to know when the rate of $9 a day was fixed, and under what regulation. In the case of a veteran such as the one I have mentioned, one who enters the hospital, has no money and is not able to take work, is there any provision under which the hospital bill may be waived after investigation? I should like to know how and when the rate of $9 was arrived at.

Mr. Gregg: The situation referred to by my hon. friend may have existed before in the case of a veteran pensionable for one disability who had to go to hospital for another, which, according to the doctors, is a post-war disability and one in respect to which he is not eligible for pension or treatment. Now, however, such a man would come under the new arrangement for his non-pensionable disability. In other words, if he held Blue Cross insurance, or if he was paying it out of his own pocket, it would come under the new 12-D rate, which is not as high as the $9 per day in vogue before.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, last night just before eleven o'clock I pointed out that there was a serious matter I wished to bring to the attention of the committee under this item. I should like to do now what I said I was going to do.

The matter which I desire to bring to the attention of the committee is one pertaining to what was known as the McCann commission. Members who entered the house as a result of the last election will not be familiar with that remarkable commission. In case they desire to look into the matter they will find it interesting to turn to pages 6232 to 6238 of Hansard for June 30, 1948. There they will find the speech I delivered in which I pointed out there were some things concerning the McCann commission that apparently were completely out of order, things which ought to be looked after before we could consider the matter as finished business.

There was an eminent pensions advocate in western Canada by the name of Walter H.

Kirchner. I felt that there was never a more sincere, earnest, industrious and persistent advocate of the rights of pensioners in the Dominion of Canada. This man was injured in world war I, and devoted himself to the welfare of his fellow veterans practically from the time of his return to Canada. He was known as the secretary of the Canadian Combat Veterans Association. Mr. Kirchner had been entrusted by a good many veterans with the care of their petitions for redress of certain grievances. He had been to Ottawa a great many times and had prepared extensive briefs in relation to the cases of the various men who had presented themselves to him.

On July 16, 1947, the hon. member for Acadia and the then member for Swift Current brought to the attention of the house two bad cases on which Mr. Kirchner had been working, and as to which there appeared to be grave irregularities as a result of which veterans had been deprived of their just rights. Hon. members will find these cases briefly summarized at pages 5759-5765 and 5768-5769 of Hansard for 1947. Apparently two things were supposed to have gone wrong in the cases of these men. First of all their plea was that their service records had been tampered with, that falsifications had been written into them through which they were deprived of their just dues in respect of pensions. The second complaint was that men called psychiatrists had diagnosed their cases and declared them to be not neurasthenia or some other nervous injury which would naturally result from war service, but mental trouble which would be a pre-enlistment disability. If a man's case was diagnosed as pre-enlistment that automatically deprived him of a pension. These men felt they had been so deprived by these two irregularities committed by officers of the Department of Veterans Affairs. As a result of what has been said at previous times, together with what was said on July 16, the then minister of veterans affairs, Hon. Ian Mackenzie, made what was taken to be an undertaking. This is what he said, as reported at page 5769 of Hansard for 1947:

> As far as we are concerned, I would welcome a committee of three doctors from this house to go into the suggestions that have been submitted, and I would suggest the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) and the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. McGarry). They could meet some time between now and the next session and call in whom they want and submit a first-class report.

That suggestion appealed to all members who were particularly interested in these cases and who had been convinced that Mr. Kirchner was sincere and well informed, which I believe he was. As a result of that statement by the minister there was set up what was known as the McCann commission. To show that the McCann commission was a public inquiry operating generally under the Inquiries Act, I desire to read into the record the following, which consists of excerpts from appendix A to the report:

> Report of a commission appointed under the provisions of part I of the Inquiries Act by order in council P.C. 4980 dated December 4, 1947, as amended by order in council P.C. 75, dated January 8, 1948.
> 1. The following members of parliament were appointed by order in council P.C. 4980 dated December 4, 1947, and order in council P.C. 75, dated January 8, 1948, as commissioners under part I of the Inquiries Act for the purposes hereinafter set forth:
>
> The Hon. James J. McCann, M.P., chairman, Ottawa, Ont.; Dr. M. E. McGarry, M.P., Margaree Forks, N.S.; Dr. W. G. Blair, M.P., Perth, Ont.; J. O. Probe, Esq., M.P., Regina, Sask.
> R. H. Winters, Esq., M.P., Lunenburg, N.S., in the absence of the Hon. James J. McCann, M.P.
>
> F. L. Barrow, Esq., Ottawa, Ont., departmental secretary, Department of Veterans Affairs, was secretary of the commission.
>
> 2. The purpose of the commission was to investigate complaints made by Walter H. Kirchner, Esq., M.C., D.C.M., secretary, Canadian Combat Veterans Association, Inc., Vancouver, B.C., regarding pension and treatment services and, in particular, to inquire into and report to the Minister of Veterans Affairs on
>
> (i) the adequacy of the treatment provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs with respect to the cases concerning which Mr. Kirchner has made representations;
>
> (ii) the qualifications and competence of departmental doctors treating these cases; and
>
> (iii) the adequacy of pension consideration given to the cases concerning which Mr. Kirchner has made representations.
> 5. The commission was charged with considering the cases of sixty-two veterans with respect to whom Mr. Kirchner had made representations. Subsequently, in giving his evidence at Vancouver, Mr. Kirchner presented one additional case in which it was understood that he had become interested only very recently.

I read this to show hon. members that the commission was set up as a first-rate commission. It was no second-rate affair, no two-for-a-nickel commission which could do its job in a more or less haphazard way. On the contrary, it was one of the most important commissions that could be set up in the Dominion of Canada.

I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to this important fact, that whereas, as I have already pointed out, the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) and Mr. Bentley had represented Mr. Kirchner as the complainant about (1) the falsification of records and (2) the felony of psychiatrists in the department, in the statement I have read setting forth the purposes of the commission, these complaints were not even mentioned.

This is item No. 1: the minister of veterans affairs, apparently in all sincerity, set up a committee of the house to investigate complaints made by two members of the house on July 16. Then when the commission was set up, and its purposes set forth, among those purposes there was not even any mention of the charges which the commission was set up to investigate. I think every hon. member will realize that this was a flagrant disregard of the privileges of members of the House of Commons on the part of someone, and certainly it should not be allowed to go into the archives of the past and be forgotten. It remains to this day to be explained how that discrepancy occurred between the purposes set out in the order in council and the purposes for which the commission supposedly had been set up.

It is about this remarkable commission that I wish to protest this afternoon. May I point out at once that no one of the veterans concerned is in my constituency or in my province. I had contact with Mr. Kirchner and was directly interested in these men, purely because they were Canadians and veterans. But as a member of parliament responsible for the welfare of veterans and Canadians as a whole, I feel it my duty to bring this matter to the attention of the committee, and see if it cannot be cleared up.

This commission began to do strange things right from the time it commenced activities —strange things so far as I can see. There may be something I have not had brought to my attention; if there is, I shall be happy to be corrected. On November 26, 1947, as indicated at page 6234 of Hansard, the commission assumed authority to recommend to the minister whether he should sponsor further inquiry or action. When has it been established that any group of persons appointed by parliament as a royal commission, or as the agent of parliament, should feel itself empowered to make a recommendation to the minister as to whether he should go further into the subject under their examination? The fact that they presumed to do such a thing constitutes a most astonishing irregularity. Yet these gentlemen were responsible for that very thing on November 26, 1947. This statement I quoted at page 6234 of Hansard for June 30, 1948:

> It was agreed that the commission would examine the files of the cases in which Mr. Kirchner had made representations and the other evidence at hand and would recommend to the Minister of Veterans Affairs whether he should sponsor further inquiry, or action.

The commission had no authority whatsoever to do anything of that kind, so far as I can see. They were appointed to look into the cases of these veterans who, according to the representations of Mr. Kirchner, had suffered injustice at the hands of the Department of Veterans Affairs of Canada. They should have gone about doing that, instead of undertaking to advise the minister.

Apparently most of the evidence which this commission considered was recorded upon phonograph records, and that evidence has never been transcribed. Let me ask hon. members this question: what would hon. members think of the Rowell-Sirois commission report, if all the briefs and evidence upon which they based their findings had been recorded on phonograph records and had never been transcribed and made available for the people of Canada to read? What would you think if the Turgeon grain commission had been dealt with in that way? What would you think if a parliamentary committee, as my hon. friend has suggested, spent public money and time taking evidence and having that evidence recorded on phonograph records, then neglected to transcribe the evidence so that the people could read it? A report by this McCann commission was made out supposedly on the basis of the evidence, but the people who read the report were unable to gain access to the evidence except by listening to phonograph records before they were destroyed. Surely, it was a most astonishing way to proceed, to have members go into the archives to listen to phonograph records. They would have to depend entirely upon what they could remember. Perhaps the commission was advised to take evidence in that manner, but I think this house and the country are entitled to know who gave the commission permission or advice to make records of the evidence and not transcribe them or put them into a regular report which would be available to the members of the house and the people of the country.

The next important thing concerning this commission is that the veterans' witnesses were sworn, while the witnesses who appeared to give testimony against the veterans were not sworn. All hon. members have to do is to contemplate the seriousness of the injustice indicated there. Imagine that all those who appeared in support of the veterans were sworn, and all those who appeared to give testimony against the veterans were not sworn. They were free to say anything they chose to say. Did you ever hear of a public inquiry being conducted in such a slipshod and inequitable manner as that? Our present Minister of Veterans Affairs is in no way responsible for this. It was left on his doorstep so far as I can make out. I do not think he was responsible for the set-up of the commission, the direction to the commission, or anything pertaining to the commission. However, we have the words of the minister concerning this matter of swearing the witnesses. On June 14, 1948, the member for Peace River requested a copy of the evidence and proceedings of the McCann commission, and in a statement on page 5151 of Hansard of that day, the minister said:

> The witnesses were not sworn, and as a result they gave evidence over and above that which would have been required had they been informed that they were proceeding on a formal basis under oath. Some of the discussions at Vancouver were recorded on sound recording discs in order to assist the commissioner in writing his report on that phase of the hearing.

The minister does not specify that the witnesses for the men were sworn, while the witnesses against the men were not sworn. My information, however, is that that is what took place.

An important item concerning this commission is the fact that it consisted mainly of doctors, and no commission counsel was retained. They were free to obtain the best counsel available in the Dominion of Canada. They were free to call any person before them to supply evidence on any aspect of the problem under consideration, had they desired to do so. There is no excuse whatever for the commission omitting to retain counsel of the greatest ability. I think what I have said so far is sufficient to indicate that the most remarkable set of circumstances pertains to this commission. I am not saying for one moment that the commission did not act in good faith. There must have been some sort of misunderstanding somewhere, and I believe it is our task to find out how it arose. As a result of the misunderstanding, an apparent injustice was done.

It is interesting to note that from the very beginning of the investigation there was a campaign of what, from the standpoint of Mr. Kirchner and the sixty-two men, was misrepresentation. The misrepresentation would appear to have been designed to discredit Mr. Kirchner, to discredit the men, and discredit their claims, so that Mr. Kirchner would no longer be respected when he brought a case to the attention of the government, and the men's cases would not be heard with respect thereafter.

Now, this is the way the campaign of misrepresentation was conducted. At the outset it was advertised that the commission was going to investigate the kind of services that were being rendered in veterans hospitals, such as the Shaughnessy hospital in Vancouver, and the sort of medical services that were available to the men. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Kirchner had never once brought up any question concerning those two points. From the beginning he maintained that Shaughnessy hospital was of the highest quality, and the medical services available under the Department of Veterans Affairs were of exceedingly high efficiency. For the commission to set out to investigate those two subjects, and begin a campaign to publicize those as the things they were going to investigate, was certainly playing unfair in respect to Mr. Kirchner and the men who were in his charge.

The next interesting thing is that this commission omitted to examine all of the cases. Only a few of the sixty-two cases were brought before the commission, and apparently they were selected. For any commission that was appointed with full powers under the public Inquiries Act to examine into a vexatious problem that had been irritating the country for years to neglect to examine all the cases amounts to the commission being derelict in its duties. According to my information, and I had it directly from Mr. Kirchner, the men who were subpoenaed to appear before the commission were required to appear personally, without the assistance of their pensions advocate. What would any ordinary man, or any ordinary member of this house, feel if he were subpoenaed to appear in a court in which his case was being tried, and his lawyer was not called in to present his case? It is exactly that sort of thing that was done in respect to the men who were called before this commission. The men were put on oath so they were afraid to make any remarks they had not come prepared to verify. They would be speaking from memory altogether, and the result would be that their testimony would be of a most unsatisfactory kind from their standpoint.

I cannot see how a commission, appointed under the conditions under which this one was appointed, having regard to the minister's remarks on July 16, 1947, could have proceeded in a more unsatisfactory way. Mr Chairman, I do not propose to say any more about this remarkable commission at the present time, but I can tell the minister that before we are finished with his estimates this year I think this house expects him to explain the irregularities in this situation. He should explain to us why a commission that was set up to examine two charges; namely falsification of records of men and felony on the part of psychiatrists of the department, should have devoted its time to a consideration of two completely different charges that were never laid in parliament, namely, the quality of the hospital service rendered at Shaughnessy and the quality of the departmental doctors who were available for service to the men. From what I read in appendix A, I must say that the commission was entirely within its rights when it did devote its attention to the staff of the Shaughnessy hospital and the doctors employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs, because those were the purposes which were set forth in the appendix. What needs to be explained is why in the world the appendix or the order in council had failed to set forth the real purposes for which the minister of veterans affairs had apparently given his word there would be an investigation.

Then, of course, the next thing the commission has to do is to explain why they did several other things that I have mentioned, and I expect the minister to give the committee and the country answers to these questions. Why was it that this commission saw fit to take the most important evidence on phonograph records that were never transcribed and rendered available to the general public? Why was it that the commission, having before them the job of investigating 62 cases, saw fit to call only four or five cases? Why was it that the commission saw fit to swear some of the witnesses and to leave a number of the witnesses unsworn; and, if my information is correct, to swear the very men who should not have been sworn and not to swear the men who should have been sworn? Then the next thing that the minister ought to explain is why the commission submitted to him and to the country a sketchy report in which we have their opinion instead of the evidence upon which they based their opinion.

Then I should like to ask the minister if he will tell us another thing, after he has had time enough to go into this matter—I am not expecting his answer today because he could not have known that a thing like this would be brought up, and consequently he is at a great disadvantage in attempting to answer what I have said—I should like the minister to tell us what he thinks can be done to guarantee justice to these 62 men who were evidently deprived of justice if the evidence of Mr. Kirchner submitted on their behalf is true; because this commission, either because of the terms of reference prescribing the duties set forth for the commission or because of the way the commission discharged its responsibility, neglected to look after that matter. There are 62 or 63 men there. I have the personal files of a number of these men in my possession, and Mr. Chairman, they constitute material that is a serious reflection on the Department of Veterans Affairs of those days. I shall be glad to bring down to the committee some of the evidence in support of some of these cases. I think the minister will not be able to square the department until he is able to take several of these cases at least and explain away the irregularities which are attributed to the Department of Veterans Affairs by the evidence of these men. I should like to know what he proposes to do now with respect to these 62 or 63 men so as to guarantee or to give them some sort of guarantee that they are going to receive justice.

Mr. Lesage: That is about forty minutes.

Mr. Blackmore: That is all right. If we spent five times forty minutes to clear up an abomination like this, we would be doing very well. This constitutes an outrage of the first magnitude, so far as I can see.

Then I think the minister ought to explain, as I have already indicated, in considerable detail, just exactly how it came about, if it is on record, that after the late Hon. Ian Mackenzie promised the house by implication on July 16, 1947 that a committee would be set up to examine into the charges which were laid by the hon. member for Acadia and the hon. member for Swift Current, he failed completely to keep the promise under the terms under which the commission was set up. This is the first that I have had to say concerning this matter, but it will not be the last, Mr. Chairman, in this session.

Mr. Blair: I am obliged to leave shortly in order to attend an important committee. As a member of the opposition, it is not my purpose to defend the government at any time, but I believe in telling the truth; and I think that those things which are good should receive attention. When there is something to criticize, I think it should be criticized.

I have before me the terms of reference of this committee and they are as follows. They were to report to the Minister of Veterans Affairs on:

(i) the adequacy of the treatment provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs with respect to the cases concerning which Mr. Kirchner has made representations;

(ii) the qualifications and competence of departmental doctors treating these cases; and

(iii) the adequacy of pension consideration given to the cases concerning which Mr. Kirchner has made representations.

In so far as Mr. Kirchner is concerned, that is absolutely none of my business. He was a distinguished soldier, twice decorated for gallantry. But I am going to say this. Every person is not a psychiatrist; every person is not a surgeon, nor an orthopædic man nor a man trained in the subject of internal medicine. With regard to the records being kept, I think that the hon. member who has just spoken would not want his history spread before the public on paper as the report of a royal commission especially if the case were confidential. When you are dealing with veterans, I do not think there is one hon. member in this committee who would want the veteran's personal history spread before the public to make reading.

Serious charges were made against the hospital at Vancouver. If the hon. member wants to read some of those charges, I have the file in front of me. I am not going to place them before the committee.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the hon. member tell us who laid the charges?

Mr. Blair: Yes; and I have them signed.

Mr. Blackmore: Was it Mr. Kirchner?

Mr. Blair: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: When did he lay the charges?

Mr. Blair: Would you like to hear them?

Mr. Blackmore: I want to know when he laid them.

Mr. Blair: On May 26, 1947. It is signed in print and also initialled by Mr. Kirchner. Those charges referred to things in Shaughnessy hospital which would not be tolerated at any time by the Canadian public, let alone the veterans. If you wanted it, Mr. Chairman, I could read into the record here certain statements that have been made, but I do not feel like doing that. Suffice it to say that serious charges were made against this hospital and against the surgeons who were operating and working in it. Dr. McGarry, now deceased, and I investigated the surgery in that hospital. We were up there at eight o'clock in the morning when the operating room first started to work. I must say this so far as the hospital was concerned. I reported to the veterans affairs committee when I came back. Dr. McGarry was not feeling well. I found it necessary to report before the veterans affairs committee that the hospital surgeons were most competent. I saw some of the finest work being done out there that I have ever seen in my life. There were statements made about the disabilities caused to men through an operation on the spinal discs. We found that the records of that hospital were far above the average. I should not say "far above." Let me withdraw that. We found that the records were equal to and slightly better than those of some of the best hospitals in this country. You have to be fair about these things.

We found that hospital most efficient. Do not let it be said that I am covering up doctors because I am a doctor. I covered nobody when it came to the plight of the veterans or the disability of any man. But these were most competent doctors. I see now that one of the surgeons has been appointed to a new chair of surgery in British Columbia's new medical school. When I saw that I remarked to myself that they had obtained a good man.

So far as the other branches of the hospital were concerned, we found equal efficiency; and so far as the whole report of the committee is concerned let me again draw your attention to this. If the committee did not write down on paper the result of the interview with every man—and when the hon. member says that there were only four or five cases investigated I want to tell him there was a thorough investigation—

Mr. Blackmore: How many cases?

Mr. Blair: We saw forty or fifty; at least I saw them personally out there, looked at them and examined them. It is quite all right to clear myself in this matter, and I am not defending the government because I would criticize them if I found something wrong. I criticized it before the veterans committee with the result that a clause was put in the veterans act which made it impossible or nearly impossible for some of these things to happen again.

As regards what we found in 10 per cent of the cases, I did criticize the government. I am calling a spade a spade. If a thing is true, if a thing is good, say so; if it is not, say so. We found in 10 per cent of the cases that we investigated out there that the government, or through its agency the Canadian pension commission, was not giving the benefit of the doubt to veterans. At that time in the veterans committee we brought in some enabling legislation which makes it imperative that the Canadian pension commission give the veterans the benefit of the doubt.

At first I did not feel like defending this thing because I was satisfied in my own mind that this commission had done a good job. Everybody wants to be a doctor or a psychiatrist. I believe in keeping the confidence of any patient that I examine. I could make statements in this House of Commons with which every hon. member would be in complete agreement, including the hon. member who has made these serious charges. It is sufficient to say, sir, that this committee was absolutely satisfied with the good hospital and the good staff, and that these serious statements which have been made regarding the mutilation of veterans had no foundation whatever. The hospital was most efficient. It had a good staff. I am perfectly sure that I am right in saying that it had as good a staff as could be obtained in any section of the country, and that the citizens of British Columbia and Vancouver, particularly, might well be proud of the hospital and of the staff as it was at the time of the inspection.

I am not going to argue this question. I think it is more important to go to the committee on old age security at four o'clock than to stay here arguing this case; but I again call your attention to the fact that I would not want any relative of mine, who is a veteran in any hospital—I would not want his case to be paraded before the country whether he has to suffer from some form of psychosis; nor would I want his physical disability to be paraded before the whole country. In this I think laymen will be forced to recognize—and I think they will approve of it—that doctors have some degree of honour. I am just as much interested in the veterans as is any member of this house because—and I say this without any degree of, let us say, blowing—my family has been intimately connected with both wars. My son was a patient in the veterans hospital for two years after he came back. I am proud of the surgery, of the work and treatment that were given him. It was of the very best. I have no criticism to make. When I have a criticism to make of the Department of Veterans Affairs I will let them have it from the shoulder, but I am not going to be a party to any criticism involving myself as a medical member of that committee.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, it is quite obvious now that while everything the doctor says is completely reliable he has once more completely sidestepped the issue. Let me mention once more the fact that the charges were falsification of documents.

Mr. Blair: It was all looked into.

Mr. Blackmore: Why was no report given on that? You do not need to parade a man's personal and private affairs before anybody in order to prove whether or not his documents were falsified.

Mr. Blair: No.

Mr. Blackmore: There is no reference whatsoever to the question of felonious behaviour by psychiatrists in falsely diagnosing the condition of nerves of a young man, attributing his condition of nerves to a pre-enlistment condition, by calling it mental, whereas it should be attributed probably to something that occurred in service. You do not have to show any unsightly facts about a man's history in order to probe into these two problems, and these are the two problems which were specifically mentioned before the minister of veterans affairs, Mr. Mackenzie, on July 16, 1947. The doctor, however, has sidestepped the whole thing.

If Walter Kirchner made the charges against the Shaughnessy hospital and the doctors of the Department of Veterans Affairs I have never heard him do it, and I have heard pretty nearly everything that Walter Kirchner had to say for years because I worked with him. Anyway, these are not the things that Mr. Mackenzie said would be looked into. What I want to know is why in the world this commission was not set up to look into those things that Mr. Quelch and Mr. Bentley dealt with in the house on July 16? Why was it not set up to look into those things and why did it not do it?

The next important thing is this: I agree with the doctor that in the life of probably a good many soldiers there are many many things we would not have exposed to view; yet because of our reticence in this particular thing we leave the way open for the grossest kind of abuse of privileges on the part of nefarious men who as officials will deliberately falsify the records of a soldier in order to deprive him of his pension. There is no doubt in the world that that sort of thing has been done. There is no doubt in the world, as far as my information goes, that psychiatrists have been guilty of diagnosing a case pre-enlistment when it should never have been pre-enlistment. What I want to know is whether these two abuses were found in the records of these sixty-two men.

Mr. Martin: The doctor dealt with that.

Mr. Blackmore: The doctor did not say a thing about that.

Mr. Martin: Yes, he said that was examined.

Mr. Blackmore: The doctor said not a word about that.

Mr. Martin: Yes, he did.

Mr. Blackmore: The report does not detail anything in that respect.

Mr. Martin: He said that was looked into.

Mr. Blackmore: Let us get the record completely straight. The doctor did not say a word about the psychiatrists. No, what he said—

Mr. Mitchell: What is a psychiatrist?

Mr. Blackmore: I wish we all knew.

An hon. Member: You should know.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not intend to get sidetracked now, not for a minute. If the minister does not know what a psychiatrist is, there is a dictionary in the library and he may go and look at it.

Mr. Mitchell: I will give my definition of a psychiatrist. It is just an excuse for sin.

Mr. Blackmore: The minister could not have made a finer contribution to my case than he made in that remark. The conclusion I have arrived at is that psychiatrists have come to be a synonym for sinners in the Department of Veterans Affairs. I say that what the doctor has said utterly sidestepped any idea of the truth. I am not advocating that facts pertaining to the lives of these soldiers should be exposed, but I do contend that, if soldiers' service records have been tampered with or falsified, that can be proved without revealing any unsightly facts in their lives. If a psychiatrist has diagnosed a soldier's case pre-enlistment when that should never have been done, you can expose that without exposing any unsightly thing in the soldier's life. That is all I am asking for. I do think that this committee and the country and the sixty-two men involved are entitled to have these matters cleared up.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to follow the hon. member for Lethbridge, but he asked a number of questions as appear in Hansard of June 30, 1948, which he says I have not covered.

Mr. Blackmore: I did not say a word about those questions. The minister must be wandering in his mind.

Mr. Gregg: I understood that in the early part of his remarks the hon. member quoted Hansard of June 30, 1948, that is his own speech, when he asked certain questions which he wanted the minister to reply to.

Mr. Blackmore: I did not say a word about those questions.

Mr. Gregg: The reasons why I have not answered them to date were given more fully and better by the hon. member for Lanark than I could possibly do. Across Canada there are something like 10,000 men and women who have been seriously broken or damaged in either world war I or world war II, some of them mentally, some of them physically, and some of them suffering a combination of both. Under no circumstances will I be a party to publishing in the records of this house intimate departmental details on the mental and physical condition of individual veterans, giving their regimental numbers and names, as was done in the Hansard I have referred to.

I realize that hon. members must bring up individual cases from time to time, in a hypothetical way, in order to prove their argument to establish a principle. We welcome that. But as the hon. member for Lanark so well said, there are none of us who would want the record of our son, our daughter, our brother or our sister spread on the pages of Hansard. In the next breath I want to say that ever since I came to the department I have continuously offered to the hon. member for Lethbridge complete access to the records for his personal and confidential information. He has been free to discuss with the medical men of the department any point he might care to when investigating these cases.

The hon. member asks me what I am going to do about the sixty-two cases about which that gallant gentleman, Walter Kirchner, has complained in British Columbia. I will tell him what I did about a few of them. When I was in British Columbia I went to see them. I came into a certain hotel in the Okanagan valley on a June night at about one o'clock and I found in the lobby of the hotel one of these men to whom the hon. member for Lethbridge referred two years ago. We sat down and talked about his past. What I am doing, what my department is doing, what the medical men and the administrative people are doing is to make sure that the utmost care and attention is given to these sixty-two patients of the department as well as the other 10,000 seriously hurt whom we have to care for.

In regard to these particular cases I am sure it is unnecessary to remind my hon. friend that the mere fact of their circumstances having been noised abroad in this house is a deterrent to their recovery. I do not mind his criticism regarding the McCann commission, and I am sure if the Minister of National Revenue were here he would not mind it any more than the hon. member for Lanark did a little while ago, except that he would want to express his point of view just as forcibly as did his professional colleague. When cases are brought to the attention of the house, as the hon. member for Lethbridge has done—I am grateful to him for not doing it by naming the individuals today—the individuals concerned are placed under an unnecessary strain in their rehabilitation and recovery.

I do not propose to go back into the history before my tenure of office in an attempt to do the things which the hon. member for Lethbridge has suggested I should do. I believe that there are a group of members on all sides of the house from British Columbia who are quite able to express any complaints on the part of their constituents. I have not had from any one of the nine or ten ex-servicemen who make up the British Columbia membership in this house any complaint or suggestion that the charges of persecution and other things made by the hon. member for Lethbridge had any basis in fact. Not one suggestion had been made during the two years I have been Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of that fact, and because I have looked very carefully into these things in the department, I do not propose to go into the background of what is known as the McCann commission.

Mr. Blackmore: Which means that the minister does not propose to tell the committee how it came about that when specific charges of falsification of records and misdeeds of psychiatrists were made on July 16, 1947, the commission was set up with terms of reference specifically omitting both of those charges?

Mr. Gregg: It was not a commission in the formal sense. If I read the story of my distinguished predecessor correctly, that commission which represented both sides of the house was set up with a sincere desire to have charges that were presented at that time looked into fully and carefully and informally. I do not think there was ever intention of calling counsel and making it in substance a commission. I am completely satisfied that if there had been any basis for the charge that records had been falsified, or in the other matter referred to by the hon. member for Lethbridge, the gentlemen who went west on that commission would have taken them into consideration in their report.

Mr. Blackmore: The minister's statements are entirely out of contact with the facts. The commission was set up under part I of the Inquiries Act, and to call the proceedings of such a commission set up under such circumstances informal is nothing but sheer nonsense. If it was never intended that this should be a formal commission investigating in a first-class manner, why was all the trouble taken to set it up under part I of the Inquiries Act?

Mr. Goode: The minister has mentioned that the British Columbia members have made no representations in this matter, and he is correct. As a new member of the house, I had representations made to me some time ago about these cases. I have learned in the short time I have been here that I am on safe ground to refer such cases to certain veterans organizations. If these organizations support them then I take them to the department. I can say now that when I took two of these cases to a certain veterans organization the organization did not support them, and therefore I have not brought them to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Mutch: Before the item is carried may I say a word. It falls to my lot to say a few words about one who, for some thirty years, has been a "good companion" to all who have sought in this chamber and elsewhere to serve in civil life those who served all of us in Canada's wars. It is both a privilege and an honour to pay tribute to one who so richly deserves it. It is a pleasure deeply tinged with regret that the time has come when such tribute can be appropriately made. Perhaps no one in the house has been blessed with a wider opportunity to work and enjoy a measure of intimacy with Dr. Woods than it has been my good fortune to enjoy.

There are others more qualified than I to speak of the genius which he brought to bear upon the problem of organization in the Department of Veterans Affairs. There are many in the chamber who will have had personal experience of his patience and unfailing tact as he sat with us in various committees. There are many indeed who have experienced his help in attempting to obtain benefits for veterans who had appealed to them.

I should like to pay my tribute to the man himself. For more than three decades he has made a career of seeking the ultimate good of Canadian veterans. This has been his life work, he has made their problem his problem, and from their ranks he has drawn many of his personal friends. In Dr. Woods' relations with his associates he has been a loyal colleague and a considerate chief. Under his example his associates have been inspired to regard their jobs as an opportunity for and indeed a call to service.

Walter Woods, as he is known to thousands, served in the ranks in world war I. It is characteristic of the man that even then he was enlisted in a cause rather than embarked upon a career. As a senior civil servant Walter Woods has lived up to the best traditions of the service. He has never forgotten that to a man in trouble his problem is, for the moment, the most important thing in his life. He has not forgotten that members of parliament, however limited in their personal capacities, appear in this house and in departmental offices clothed with the dignity which public election has conferred upon them. Because of this quality Walter Woods has been able, yielding nothing from the dignity of his own office, to be friendly, courteous and co-operative, and never compromising the position of those who sought his help.

It has been said, and I think rightly, that Canada came out of world war II better organized than any other allied country to meet the immediate post-war problems of the veteran. That this was true was and still remains a wonderful tribute to the late Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie and the government which encouraged him. Mr. Mackenzie was always quick and generous in his tribute to the man who was not only the chosen instrument in the initiation of administration but also a wise and valued counsellor on matters of policy.

I might go on endlessly, Mr. Chairman, illustrating the qualities and character of Walter Woods, this great public servant. I will not, for his story is written in the hearts of men. This session will be his last in his post as deputy minister of veterans affairs. It is for that reason that I have desired to pay him some tribute while he is here among us. It will be the wish of all of us that as he goes to take his leisure he will preserve permanently for us and for posterity something of the store of wisdom he has acquired. For inspiration, for encouragement, for high example of selfless devotion in a great cause, for good advice and for some discipline, I desire to tender my personal thanks publicly.

Mr. McIvor: In the last few years I have had a good deal to do with the pensions board and the Department of Veterans Affairs. I must say that I never wrote a letter or made a request to which I did not get a prompt reply and reasonable answer from Walter Woods. I should like to give the example of one man who was receiving $9 a month as a pension consequent upon his service in the first world war. He jollied me along and said, "I hope you will look after the veterans better this time than you did last time". I said, "What is the matter with you?" I got his army number, and his pension was raised to $60, then to $80 and now he is getting $100 a month, because it was a case where the doctors perhaps did not agree. I should like to say that I think the family doctor should be given far more consideration that he is. These doctors know the pensioners. I had one case where a man died with shrapnel in his liver. The other doctors disagreed and thought he was foolish. The post mortem showed, however, that the shrapnel was there. I hope to have this man's widow taken care of. I should like to pay my tribute to the minister and to his predecessor. I heard the late Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie stand up in the house and say that if there was any man who knew of a pensions advocate who was not giving the pensioner the benefit of the doubt he wanted to know about it. That attitude was a splendid influence and help. The present minister is doing a great job, and we should back him up. I should like to pay my tribute to the chairman of the pension board and to the others who have given us such outstanding service. I could give a long list of cases where men have benefited.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, knowing Mr. Walter Woods very well I feel quite confident that these are very embarrassing moments for him. I hesitate to add to his embarrassment. Down through the years it has been the privilege of those of us who have served on veterans affairs committees to learn of the wonderful work done by Walter Woods. I think Canada is fortunate in having a civil service that cannot be excelled in any other country of the world. In that service I do not believe there has been a finer civil servant than Walter Woods. He has been a great friend of the veteran, and I think a great friend of the Canadian people. The way in which he has approached the problems of veterans has shown him to be one of the biggest men of our generation. I am very happy to be able to pay this slight tribute to him today. It is too bad for Canada that the time has come when he has to retire. I am sure that all of us hope he will live for many years to enjoy the retirement he has earned so well.

Mr. Herridge: On behalf of this group, and particularly the members of this group who are veterans and who have had a long association with Dr. Woods, I want to express our support of the statements of the previous speakers and our admiration for the long period of service Dr. Woods has rendered to Canadian veterans and their dependents. I am sure Dr. Woods will be long remembered by thousands of veterans and their dependents in Canada because of the things he has done for them. Whether it was as deputy minister of veterans affairs, whether he was attending a committee to give evidence, whether he was answering questions, or whether one met him on the street or at a veterans' convention, it was obvious that his first consideration was to do the best he could for the man who served his country.

In concluding my brief remarks I believe I would be expressing the sentiments of the great majority of members of the House of Commons if I were to say, in the words of that grand old poet, Moore:

> When Time, who steals our years away,
> Shall steal our pleasures too,
> The memory of the past will stay,
> And half our joys renew.

Mr. Quelch: Hon. members of this group would like to associate themselves, too, with the kind remarks made concerning Dr. Woods, and the very fine work he has done on behalf of the veterans of Canada. In all my contacts with him in the last fourteen years I have always found him most anxious to do everything within his power in the interests of the veteran. This was specially true during those years when he was chairman of the war veterans allowance board, and when he earned the reputation of having an understanding and sympathetic heart in respect of all veterans problems. So we extend to him our best wishes for an interesting and enjoyable life in retirement.

Mr. Blackmore: Just before we leave this matter, I should like to put on record—

Mr. Gregg: Before the hon. member continues, would he permit me to express my appreciation of this very happy interlude. There is one satisfying feature, and it is that these kindly words will be preserved and will appear on Hansard. One can almost regret that it is not possible for the deputy minister to respond directly to the high tributes which have been paid to him this afternoon by hon. members from all corners of the house. I should think that such a series of generous and well earned eulogies constitutes an almost unique occasion in this chamber. However, it is completely in order that this should have been done, because every phase of the work coming under the Department of Veterans Affairs has been immeasurably enriched by the patient guidance and clear vision of the distinguished recipient of the kind words expressed this afternoon.

As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has said, Canadians owe a great deal to Walter Woods—and when I say "Canadians" I refer to both veterans and non-veterans. Both generations of veterans have an intimate knowledge of his work, and I am sure no words of mine could add to the expressions of appreciation received from one end of this country to the other.

When the veterans returned after the last war, and even before that time when the veterans' charter was under consideration, Walter Woods acted as a focus behind all those activities. He was most active in the evolution of that veterans' charter. To its preparation he gave much of his experience, and to a high degree its success was due to his realistic and friendly outlook on life.

At the time of demobilization there came into being throughout the whole of Canada a marked receptive atmosphere which played a paramount part in the whole job of rehabilitation. That receptive, friendly and welcoming atmosphere has continued from 1945 to the present. Many factors entered into it, one of the most important of which was the setting up of citizens rehabilitation committees in our cities. The establishment of those committees did not just happen; they were evoked by the enthusiasm and hard work of the deputy minister.

And so this afternoon I should like to add my simple tribute to those which have already been made to a friend and a great public servant.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. Blackmore: Far be it from me to strike a discordant note concerning the work of a great man in the veterans' service. I believe he is entitled to those expressions, and I rejoice in the fact that these things have been said. I concur in what was said by the hon. member for Acadia, who spoke for every member of this group.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us bear this in mind, that when an inspector goes out to assess the strength of a chain he does not inspect the strongest link; he seeks out the weakest. It is my business, as a sort of inspector, representing my constituency, to seek out the weak links in what we are doing. Thus it is that we shall pave the way for that evolution to which the minister referred, so that by and by we shall have a set-up in Canada in which we may have complete confidence.

I wish to place only two things on Hansard, so that hon. members may know that there has been a good deal of smoke screening resorted to this afternoon by those various members who have tried to brush off what I have said. People will understand that behind these smoke screens there are some grim realities. First of all the minister endeavoured to establish the idea that the commission was not appointed to act as a formal commission. So that the facts may stand right out, and so that we may know just how serious that commission was, and how much this country has a right to expect from it, I should like to quote briefly. First of all, the commission was appointed under the provisions of part I of the Inquiries Act by order in council P.C. 4980 of December 4, 1947, as amended by order in council P.C. 75 of January 8, 1948.

Commissions appointed under that paragraph are not secondary commissions. They stand in a class with the best commissions ever appointed by the House of Commons, and the house has a right to exact just as complete a service and just as clear a report from them as from any commission ever set up in Canada. May I now read the powers the commission had, and in doing so I shall turn first to the Inquiries Act, chapter 99 of the revised statutes of Canada, an act respecting public and departmental inquiries. Part I reads as follows:

1. This act may be cited as the Inquiries Act.

2. The governor in council may, whenever he deems it expedient, cause inquiry to be made into and concerning any matter connected with the good government of Canada or the conduct of any part of the public business thereof.

3. In case such inquiry is not regulated by any special law, the governor in council may, by a commission in the case, appoint persons as commissioners by whom the inquiry shall be conducted.

4. The commissioners shall have the power of summoning before them any witnesses, and of requiring them to give evidence on oath, or on solemn affirmation if they are persons entitled to affirm in civil matters, and orally or in writing, and to produce such documents and things as the commissioners deem requisite to the full investigation of the matters into which they are appointed to examine.

5. The commissioners shall have the same power to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel them to give evidence as is vested in any court of record in civil cases.

All I am asking is that this House of Commons and the minister shall demand of the commission under consideration, the McCann commission, the performance they have a right to expect under the provisions I have just read. That is all. I suggest they have not begun to discharge their responsibilities under those provisions.

Then the next little bit of smoke screening that has been done has been to raise the crocodile tears about having the private records of the soldiers thrown open to public gaze so that everyone could read them, but that is not what I proposed. Oh, the hon. member need not try to laugh it off.

Mr. Lennard: I am not trying to laugh off the hon. member or anyone, but I know a rose when I see one.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member cannot know a rose unless he looks at it. Here is the sort of question to which the commission would have found the answer. These are questions that were asked by the member for Acadia, as found on page 5764 of Hansard for July 16, 1947:

Did Dr. William Baillie, departmental psychiatric consultant, who has never seen John Thom personally, submit as "evidence" to the Canadian pension commission his opinion based solely on a statement alleged by Dr. B. F. Keillor to have been made to him by John Thom?

Did John Thom submit evidence to the Canadian pension commission denying the statements attributed to him by Dr. B. F. Keillor and submitting documentary evidence in proof they should have been expunged from the records as falsities?

Did the Canadian pension commission accept Dr. William Baillie's opinion, based on Dr. B. F. Keillor's challenged statement, to outlaw John Thom's pension claim as a total war disability?

I do not think there is any member in this house who would hesitate to have the facts of his personal life, or that of his son, or his brother, or his grandson, or anyone else, revealed to the extent of answering questions like that. Those questions could have been answered sufficiently to justify or to condemn this action. Those are the questions this commission was supposed to answer, and I submit the greatest detail could have been given concerning the evidence bearing on all such questions as those. Those questions should have been investigated, evidence should have been adduced and included in the report.

Mr. Green: There are two questions I should like to place before the minister in connection with this item. The first one is this. During the present session frequent requests have been made of the minister that a committee be set up to deal with veterans affairs. As you know, Mr. Chairman, we have been unsuccessful in those requests. I regret that there has been no such committee during this session. It is now too late for a special committee to function, but I should like to urge upon the minister that he have such a special committee set up during the 1951 session. In fact, I would prefer to have the rules amended to provide for a standing committee on veterans affairs. If the minister does not see fit to make a recommendation for a standing committee, he should at least have a special committee of the house set up to deal with these important questions. There are important problems coming up all the time, and sooner or later a committee of the house will have to be set up to deal with them. The longer the establishment of such a committee is delayed, the more difficult the problems become.

For example, there is the question which has come up within the last twenty-four hours concerning hospitalization. There are different views on that question which is worrying the veterans across the country. Much has been done in that respect, but there is dissatisfaction with regard to some of the provisions. This dissatisfaction could probably be ironed out if a committee were given an opportunity of considering the question. Another problem concerns the treatment meted out to the men of the merchant navy. As the minister knows, I have raised that matter on various occasions, and I do not intend to do so again today. The position of these men should be examined carefully by a committee of the veterans of this house.

There are other problems connected with the war veterans allowance and the pension act. For example there is the position of the children of those veterans who gave their lives for this country. Today those children are likely to be handicapped because their fathers were lost when serving Canada. I have always hoped that some arrangement could be made so that these young folks could start off in life on just the same basis as the children of those of us who were fortunate enough to come back from one or both of the great wars.

Those are just four of the problems which I believe could well be considered by a committee of the house. If the minister would intimate now that he intends to ask for the establishment of such a committee next year, the result would be that the Canadian Legion, the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans, the Amps, the Canadian Pensioners Association, the Canadian Corps Association, and other veterans bodies could be considering the various problems and preparing briefs on them. I am sure that when their representatives appeared before such a committee they would present briefs that would be extremely helpful. They have always done so in the past, and would do so again. My question is whether or not the minister would be willing to recommend the setting up of a committee on veterans affairs at the next session.

My next question has to do with the medals issued for service in the recent war. There has been discussion in the house from time to time about those medals being issued without the names inscribed thereon. I suppose it would be too late now to do anything about the medals for the men who returned, but I believe the minister should give consideration to calling in the medals which were sent out to the next of kin and having the names inscribed on them. Some months ago when in Vancouver I was interviewed by a father who had lost his son. He was deeply concerned about this whole question. In fact, he felt so deeply he wrote a letter to the minister. I have a copy of it, and I should like to read a paragraph or two which I believe sum up the situation just about as well as it could be done. He writes:

If these medals had borne my son's name, I would have been glad to receive them and proud to place them in the family archives. It happened that my son died well. But they do not bear his name. They are just four medals picked from four stockpiles, packed, not too tidily, into four little boxes and sent with instructions on how they should be worn.

Worn by whom?

He goes on to say he is returning the medals, and then we find this paragraph:

I suggest the government could, even now, cleanse from the national record the more hurtful feature of its disgraceful parsimony, by recalling at least all medals sent to next of kin and having them inscribed with the names of the men who earned them.

There is nothing more that one can add to that request. I do hope the minister will be able to give us some assurance that there is a possibility these medals will be called back for the names to be inscribed thereon. Those are the two questions upon which I should like to have a statement from the minister, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Herridge: Before the minister replies, I should like to support the remarks of the member for Vancouver-Quadra concerning the calling of a veterans affairs committee for 1951, to consider veterans legislation. This proposal was made by the Canadian Legion some months ago, and they are very emphatic about it. Now that close to three years have elapsed since the committee last sat, they believe that the government and the country have had some experience with the important legislation which was drafted or adopted at that time. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra mentioned hospitalization. In British Columbia, while we are well pleased with the services of the administrator and the officials of the department in British Columbia, I think there are certain aspects of hospitalization which should be brought to the attention of the committee and discussed. The same thing may be said with regard to the merchant navy which the hon. member speaking previously has mentioned. That is a situation that wants clarifying. A good many people in this country believe that something more must be done for the merchant navy veterans if justice is to be done. Then there is the question of the Veterans Land Act. The Veterans Land Act administration has, I should say, been effective and on the whole successful; but there are certain local situations which arise, certain details of administration and certain weaknesses in the legislation that should be discovered and considered by a committee.

Then again, there is the administration of the various benevolent funds for veterans. I think it would be wise to have a report from the administrators of those funds to a veterans committee in order to see if the legislation and the administration can be improved. I therefore urge the minister to give consideration to the proposals of the Canadian Legion—those are the proposals we are actually advocating this afternoon—that a special parliamentary committee on veterans affairs be called to discuss these important questions.

Mr. Higgins: I have one question to ask the minister, and I will not delay him long. It is in connection with the supplementation of the imperial pensions. In order that the minister may be aware of the situation, I believe an answer was given last year which may be found at page 443 of Hansard. The question was asked by Mr. Church and the reply was given by the parliamentary assistant to the minister. The question was as follows:

1. In view of the devaluation, will consideration be given by the government to providing imperial veterans residing in Canada some allowances for devaluation of the pound sterling?
2. Will any action be taken?

The reply was:

Canadians who were domiciled in Canada prior to their service with the British forces have their British awards of pension supplemented by Canada to an amount equivalent to that paid to Canadian pensioners under similar circumstances. The recent devaluation of the pound sterling will consequently not affect such pensioners.

The other part of the question is the one I am more interested in.

The only proviso is that such supplementation may only be paid during residence in Canada. Other than the foregoing, no provision exists to pay moneys from public funds to imperial veterans who were non-pre-war residents and have income from some British source on the grounds that their income is affected by the change in rate of exchange.

The position is this in one particular instance. A distinguished member of the imperial forces, who began to reside in Newfoundland shortly after world war I and who has been a permanent resident there ever since, I believe has not had his pension supplemented. I was wondering what the answer is to such a case. There are more than one involved, but that is the only one I know of. I wonder if the minister can tell me something about the case.

Mr. Gregg: To try to answer the hon. member for St. John's East first before I come to the other questions, may I say that the situation has not changed a great deal. The group in which he and many of us are particularly interested, owing to the effects of devaluation, are those men who served with the British forces, were not domiciled in Canada before service, were pensioners and came to Canada during past years. Two things of some assistance have happened. One of them is the fact that under our recent legislation small pensioners who came to Canada twenty years ago and have lived here since may be eligible to receive some help under this new legislation. The other one is that the head of the British ministry of pensions here in Ottawa, about the end of our last session of parliament, made a special trip to Britain to seek some assistance; and he obtained assistance to meet hardship. I will admit it was something of the nature of our own war veterans allowance assistance fund. We were called upon—and we are happy to do what we can, although we have no responsibility for doing so—to co-operate with the British ministry of pensions by helping to provide information.

Mr. Higgins: Is there any difference in the type of pension, whether it is long service or disability?

Mr. Gregg: What I am speaking of, of course, is disability pension only.

Mr. Higgins: Long service is not affected at all?

Mr. Gregg: As far as I know, there is no assistance in that regard.

I welcome the opportunity provided by several members to say a word with regard to a parliamentary committee. During the last six months I have had the pleasure of speaking to quite a number of veterans organizations throughout the country. As has been indicated here this afternoon, many of them have represented to me that they would like to have a parliamentary committee from time to time. It might be just as well if I at least had the virtue of consistency and gave to the house what I have said on those occasions.

I believe that there are times for a parliamentary committee on veterans affairs and that there are times for a period of freedom from a parliamentary committee. One of the times for a parliamentary committee is when the government is submitting to parliament important legislation introducing new principles which affect veterans and which require intensive study. A great example of that, of course, was in the years during the war and at the end of the war when orders in council were converted into statutes. But one of the times for freedom from a committee is when the department is absorbed in consolidating changes in legislation and in adapting its administrative technique to meet the new conditions; and I think this last year or two has been one of those periods.

Time and staff have been needed to keep abreast of the changes designed to meet the changing needs. I do not think any hon. member will accuse my department of being averse to bringing in amendments to legislation if we felt that they were needed. In addition to the quite impressive list of changes that were made as a result of the report of the 1948 parliamentary committee, last year quite voluntarily we brought in not world-shaking but still valuable amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act. This present year we have brought in what I hope will prove to be valuable amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act. The changes in pension rates, the 1948 changes in war veterans allowance rates and the various changes in the legislation have required some time to digest and to put into force. Government departments I suppose must move slowly and at least they should move carefully. If for no other reason they have to move slowly because they have to move in conformity with some nineteen or twenty other departments. I do not at all mind being pushed as Minister of Veterans Affairs, but I do not want to have the department pushed into making its officers available for study in a parliamentary committee of matters about which nothing can be done at that particular time, and I hasten to add those particular words. I did not want to be guilty of kidding the excellent troops, as might have been done this year, by setting up a committee thus encouraging veterans and other bodies to send representatives long distances, costing time and money, to make representations before a parliamentary committee which I knew the government was not able to put into effect this year. The one which I knew could be put into effect I brought forward, and it at least has passed this house.

The national organizations of veterans, everyone knows here, are in the closest touch with the veteran constituencies across Canada. I can say the same of the hon. members of this house. There is not a member of this house, in whose constituency there are many hundreds of veterans, who is not in close touch with them. If it is individual cases of grievances, or unfairness or hardships, the quickest and most effective committee or people to deal with it are those in the district office. If no recourse can be obtained there I can assure hon. members that we in Ottawa are only too glad to go into these cases at once. In any event, in the past parliamentary committees have in the main dealt with principles and not with individual cases. When suggestions have been made for improvements in administration or in legislation, open discussion has taken place here and there has been an opportunity and there will continue to be an opportunity for the national veterans organizations to make representations before the minister at any time and before the cabinet at regular intervals. I consider it perhaps as valuable to maintain that direct route as it is slavishly to set up a parliamentary committee every session whether there is any particular job for it or not.

Having said that, may I say that when the government introduces legislation, or for any other reason there are improvements in veterans affairs, I shall be glad to discuss the matter of a committee with my colleagues. I have said these things because I have felt that at this particular session of parliament no parliamentary committee was necessary.

On the other point made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, my department became the custodians and shippers of the medals in midstream. Hindsight is often better than foresight. If one were put back into the situation that must have obtained at the end of the war when decisions were reached as to what should have been done, my opinion would be that I would have agreed with the steps that have been taken with regard to the medals for perhaps no better reason than this. As hon. members know, all the medals issued to Canadians received the authority emanating from the war office with the exception of one, the C.V.S.M. In former wars they were made in London and sent to Canada. This time—I suppose it may have been owing to the vast number of men and women involved—at any rate in the United Kingdom, in the United States and in Canada decisions were reached that medals be issued without the names stamped on, not engraved, because our old medals were not engraved. They were stamped around the edges as with a punch and hammer; the names and regiment were put on. On that basis our mint went ahead this time and produced them. As it has turned out, there are approximately 3½ million individual medals in the lot. Those who saw the magnitude of this job looming up—certain veterans were entitled to eight medals each—realized that it was going to be easier and quicker to pack them up, wrap them and send them than to have them stamped or engraved and then to sort out John Jones' several medals out of the pile of 3 million. It was admitted that it would take at least three years longer than it did to get out the medals if the stamps were made. I am going to confess immediately that I am not worrying so much about those who are living but I will not take any exception whatsoever to the remarks that have been made regarding those who have gone out to the next of kin. I quite heartily wish it had been possible to have got these and to have had the names appear on them. While I can see difficulties in reversing orders and having them come back, nevertheless my officials are studying the situation to see whether there is any possibility of sending something out that might be attached to them and that would be appropriate.

A question that has been asked not here but elsewhere is, why was it necessary for the veterans to go to the post office and get a postcard like an old field postcard and put on their name and number and address? The answer is, it is not always clear how much veterans, after their rehabilitation, moved around in Canada. Even in respect of those in receipt of pensions, we find it very difficult to keep tab on them from month to month; consequently it would have been simply hopeless to have sent the medals to the addresses registered on the date of discharge.

The suggestion was also made that the medals were not well parcelled. I will admit that the parcel was not perhaps a very solid one. The suggestion is sometimes made that a good deal of slapdash and carelessness was evidenced in shipping out the parcels. I disagree with that. The medals were carefully packed. It was brought to my attention that after the first war when the medals went out they did not know the order of precedence and one was up and one was down; the suggestion was made this time that a little booklet be put in giving that information; furthermore, that something be inserted so that the veteran's wife or his best girl could sew them on evenly. A bar was put in depending on the number of medals a man had. These, with a message of appreciation from the Minister of National Defence, were put in the parcel and sent to the veteran. But on the point made, I can assure the hon. member that, whether we have any success or not, we will look into the matter with regard to the medals that have gone to the next of kin.

Mr. Lennard: Will the minister refer at this time to the matter I brought up as to why the personnel of Dieppe were not awarded the Northwest Europe Star or decoration. I do not want to know, but I think it should be said at this time.

Mr. Gregg: I would prefer to have the document I have here on that, but I think I can give it quite clearly. My hon. friend means the medal for western Europe.

Mr. Lennard: Yes.

Mr. Gregg: That was the medal authorized by the war office to come into effect for those who landed and fought on the continent of Europe after V-E day, which was, as my hon. friend knows—

Mr. Fulton: After D-day?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, assault on Europe day. That was quite a long time after the Dieppe battle. I know that after a great deal of correspondence steps were taken by Canada and by my colleague the Minister of National Defence to that end. The request was made that these medals be made available for Dieppe; but after long conferences it was decided that if exceptions were made for one group which landed, exceptions would have to be made for the various members of smaller commando raids and other attacks on Europe prior to the main landing.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Harkness: Is the minister now in a position to answer the question I asked last night? How many of those people who are listed as temporary employees are likely to become permanent employees before the year is out? Is there any estimate of that? The minister said he would take that as notice and answer later.

Mr. Gregg: There are a number of factors involved, not the least of which is the civil service commission. My officials state that they would not like to estimate that there would be more than 3,800 in the whole organization during the coming year.

Mr. Harkness: You do not mean 3,800 more, but 3,800 altogether?

Mr. Gregg: We have 2,331 now and we hope to bring that up to 3,800.

Mr. Lennard: Can the minister state how many are only temporary that have not passed examinations, who are now in certain grades who apparently are not qualified?

Mr. Gregg: I am afraid I have not any information in that form.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister give further consideration to the request of the Canadian corps of firefighters? I understand that they have two modest demands, first, eligibility to receive the Canadian Volunteer Service medal and then to be given preference in employment in the civil service. As the minister is aware, these men enlisted for service anywhere without reservation and were subject to great danger. In the British zone, at least, they were required to stay out at times when the armed forces were ordered underground, and they were not too highly compensated for their services. I admit that they have been given most of the benefits that have accrued to the armed forces, but as they did such great service in that area, as they helped with the loading of barges for the attack on Europe, as a commitment was made, at least by inference, by Major General LaFleche that they would be granted equal rights with the armed forces, I wonder if it would not be possible for the minister to give further consideration to their requests?

Mr. Gregg: The two requests, civil service benefits and the C.V.S. medal, are both outside my department. Fundamentally the men referred to were not attested and consequently are not technically veterans and therefore do not come under the Department of Veterans Affairs. By virtue of the fact that similar benefits have accrued to them we have been interested in them.

Perhaps my hon. friend and the committee would be interested in knowing that the firefighter received a gratuity of $15 for every thirty days of service overseas; he was made eligible for vocational training; if in receipt of pension, which I shall come to, he was eligible for benefits under the Veterans Land Act; if he was hurt by enemy action he was eligible for pension; he was eligible for veterans insurance; he came under the provisions of the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, which I will admit at once was not used very much, and he received benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Hellyer: The auxiliary supervisors were eligible for the Canadian Volunteer Service medal and I was wondering if the same privilege could not be given to the firefighters?

Mr. Gregg: I do not see how it could be done because the basis of eligibility for the Canadian Volunteer Service medal was volunteering for service in His Majesty's forces.

Mr. Lennard: That brings up a matter which perhaps I should not bring up, that these promises were made. We will let it go at that, but I think it should be on the record again that they were promised these benefits by a certain representative of the government. That is an established fact.

Item agreed to.

530. Veterans welfare services, $3,494,538.

Mr. Harkness: I understand that steps have been taken by the department to secure employment for older veterans. Could the minister tell us what is being done along that line at the present time and what success has been achieved?

Mr. Gregg: Quite apart from our work in that connection, there is an attempt to co-operate with the national employment service in helping to find work for older veterans. These are mainly veterans of world war I whose average age is now 61 years. There is the utmost desire on the part of these older veterans to continue just as long as they possibly can. Unfortunately there are a number of veterans, not many—about one per cent—who have never become re-established during the thirty years after the war and yet have been able to keep their faith, their hope and their cheerful outlook on life.

The way we have gone about it is the establishment within this division of a small group, having smaller counterparts in the districts, which has been carrying on a good deal of discussion with employers in connection with this matter. I had the privilege myself of talking on this subject to the Canadian Manufacturers Association the other day in Toronto, and also at a number of other places. Valuable work is going on from day to day in seeking employment and breaking down the resistance of employers to putting these older men to work. They can give just as valuable service today as they could have given 20 or 25 years ago. I think that fact is becoming realized more and more.

During the three years that we have been concentrating on this matter the national employment service, with the help of ourselves and other agencies, have turned up 160,000 jobs into which these older veterans have been fitted. I hasten to state that those are not 160,000 permanent jobs as some of them would represent one, two or three jobs for the same man. We feel that this work is valuable, primarily for the good effect upon the veteran and, secondarily, for the saving it represents to the country. If many of these men did not obtain employment in this way they would become applicants for war veterans allowances.

In connection with the older veterans I should like to say a special word about the corps of commissionaires, and also to pay tribute to the public spirited men across Canada who are giving their time and effort free as members of the board of governors to make the corps the success it is. There are something like 5,000 older veterans registered in the corps. I saw 300 of them on parade the other day. At the right of the line were the old chaps of the South African war with their medals up, and the average age of the remainder would be at least sixty-one. The corps provides a place of service for men who have maintained their integrity, discipline and trustworthiness but who have no special skill and perhaps are not too strong physically. In the main their posts of supervision do not require manual work. It is valuable for its effect upon the men. It is useful for the employer because he does not have to worry about what employing older men will do to his pension or group insurance scheme. The corps takes care of all the normal security measures that would otherwise fall upon the employer. I thank my hon. friend for the opportunity of saying a word about older men entering into employment.

Mr. Harkness: As I understand it, the department maintains no placement officer in order to put older veterans in jobs. Is that not the situation?

Mr. Gregg: We do not turn down any opportunity to place them directly but normally we work through the excellent facilities provided by my colleague, the Minister of Labour. He has a special veterans officer who is the liaison man between the employment service and our own local offices. Consequently better results are obtained in that way than if we attempted to build up any kind of separate organization of our own.

Mr. Harkness: I was wondering what special efforts are made by the placement people in the Department of Labour in order to get the older men into jobs. I have hired a few men myself during the last two or three years. I have never seen any indication that any effort was made to place veterans rather than others. As a matter of fact there are certain indications at times that perhaps the reverse is the fact. What I am really trying to get at is what particular, definite and specific steps are taken to try to get these people into employment? It seems to me that efforts along that line are not as definite as they might be, that considerably more effort might be made and a better organization provided in order to accomplish the purpose. That may not be the case but that is the way it has appeared to me through casually hiring men from time to time.

Mr. Herridge: Before the minister answers, I was about to rise to speak on the question of welfare officers coming under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour. In my constituency there happens to be one such officer attached to the employment office in Trail and another at Nelson. They have done most effective and excellent work in looking for jobs for aged veterans. That has been the major employment of these two officers in the last fifteen months. While the Minister of Labour does not believe in psychology, I should like to say to him that his welfare officers' understanding of psychology has meant jobs. Therefore I think there is something to be said for psychology. The point I wish to make is that I am under the impression that the Department of Labour is not as enamoured of the value of these welfare officers as the Department of Veterans Affairs, or as a good many members who are interested in veterans. I understand in some cases they have been dropped, and that at the present time there is pressure to dispose of them. I urge the Minister of Veterans Affairs to use his influence for the retention of these men where they are needed and where they are doing a job. I know in my own constituency they are doing an unquestionably good job.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend said something about psychology. I was one of nine children, and I thought my mother was a pretty fair psychologist. She was not the kind of psychologist that my hon. friend is talking about, but she raised the family and did not do a bad job. In the light of these new-fangled ideas, those who went before us did not do a bad job and they left a pretty decent heritage to the people of Canada based on simple things.

Referring to what my hon. friend said about the organization of the employment service, I think it has worked reasonably well. I have not the figures before me now but I would be glad to provide them when the estimates of my department are under consideration. We have laid special emphasis on the placement of returned soldiers and handicapped people. Comparing the results with the experiments in other places, I think we may well be proud of the people employed in the employment service of Canada.

It is a very difficult thing, but those of us who were in the first great war have some knowledge of the confusion that existed after the war. We are not taking all the credit for what has been done. We had the experience of the first great war and we acted on it in a big and broad way. When you consider that we moved over a million people from the fighting forces into gainful employment in less than six months, that is some indication of the efficiency of the organization. There is nothing perfect in this life. Anybody can play the horses after the race is run. I think with the co-operation of all sections of society in Canada we have done a reasonable job. Mind you, I also take the view, if I may say so, that I do not believe in a planned economy. The only place you can plan is in a penitentiary where everyone does as he is told, goes to bed and gets up on orders and wears the same clothes.

We possibly had more control over the movement of human beings during the war than at any time in the history of North America. I was convinced in my own mind that Canadians made good airmen, soldiers and sailors, but that they were free men and wanted to get back to private endeavour. If I wanted to do a thing in those days I used to make a speech that everybody understood. I said "Selective service is down the drain." There is no equivocation in a statement of that description. I think we can be thankful that the Canadian people took that advice. In peacetime if you have a decade of the state moving people around it is the easiest thing in the world to slip into the method of government direction that we see in other countries. If you do that in the formative stages of life I think any nation will live to regret it. I think the Canadian people used good common sense in the movement of our people out of the fighting forces into productive employment in industry, agriculture and commerce in its broadest sense.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question. Does he believe in assisting the employment of veterans by continuing so far as possible the use of veterans placement officers in his department?

Mr. Mitchell: Absolutely. I want to say that without any equivocation whatsoever.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister what amount was spent last year under the equivalent item for travelling expenses, staff, for which he is asking $164,000 this year.

Mr. Gregg: The item of $164,000 for 1950-51 provides for the cost of travelling for the veterans welfare branch staff at head office and in the districts. Costs incurred for investigation, and reports in connection with applications for the benefits in connection with war veterans allowances, and so on, represent a large proportion of the money required. The amount considered necessary for 1950-51 approximates that expended in 1949-50 owing to the fact that the level of travelling activity remains pretty steady.

Mr. Fulton: How much was spent last year actually?

Mr. Gregg: It was $108,500.

Mr. Fulton: And the minister is asking for $164,000 this year. Why is there that discrepancy?

Mr. Gregg: If the hon. member will cast his eye over the details in connection with war veterans allowances, particularly travelling and miscellaneous, he will note a very drastic reduction in many of those items, including that of travelling expenses. The reason for that is that during the year, for obvious reasons, we have transferred to welfare services many of the duties which formerly came under the war veterans allowance. So that there is this year some $54,000 travelling expense money going into the veterans welfare service that will not appear in the war veterans allowance grant.

Mr. Goode: I notice that the travelling expenses of applicants and recipients amount to $3,000 which was not covered by any amount in 1949-50. Can the minister explain that?

Mr. Gregg: In the other expenditures, such as hospitals and pensions, it will be noted that there is a large sum for veterans coming in to hospitals, including expenses and meals while they are there receiving examinations. Under the welfare division this year, even though there are not very many where the department needs to pay the expenses of veterans, there are some under this classification. So for the first time we have set up this amount, so as to keep those travelling expenses separate from the expenses of our own staff.

Mr. Fulton: I notice there is a considerable increase in the amount for professional and special services. What is the reason for the increase, and would the minister explain the services covered by this item?

Mr. Gregg: This constitutes medical examination, legal fees, social services and outside investigations. Again they reflect a transfer.

Mr. Fulton: From war veterans allowance?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: There is an amount of $15,000 for advertising and publicity. Last year it was $25,000. How much of the $25,000 was spent last year, and what has been the necessity for advertising and publicity in this branch of the department?

Mr. Gregg: Under this vote we spent only $3,500 last year. We asked for too much. This year the estimate has been set at $15,000 for advertising and publicity expenditures related to the question mentioned by the hon. member a while ago. We do plan a modest advertising campaign on behalf of older veterans. Then there is the necessity for carrying out some advertising in connection with disabled veterans, or any other phase of the veterans welfare work. It also provides for general advertising when changes in regulations affecting rehabilitation benefits are made. Therefore we set the figure at $15,000 this year.

Mr. Harkness: What form would this advertising or publicity take?

Mr. Gregg: Largely in veterans publications.

Mr. Harkness: Would that be by way of advertisement?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, display advertising in veterans publications, and occasionally in other appropriate journals.

Mr. Gillis: Is the program of vocational training still being carried on under the veterans welfare service?

Mr. Gregg: That matter could be discussed under item 555, I suggest.

Item agreed to.

531. Treatment services, $34,389,177.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us whether the department is now in a position to provide medical care and treatment for the widows of veterans receiving war veterans allowance? They have been asking for some time that they be given that privilege. Hitherto the minister has not been able to arrange for them to get hospitalization. Apparently now, however, departmental hospitals are not as busy as they were formerly. That of course is evidenced by the fact that hospitals are being thrown open to all veterans who would not ordinarily be eligible, provided they pay their way. So it seems that there is now more accommodation available, and I am wondering whether it would not be possible to provide that these widows, who are commonly known as non-pensioned widows, might have that hospital treatment.

Then, in British Columbia we have a hospital insurance scheme. Under that scheme a veteran is compelled to pay the insurance premium to the provincial government, unless he is eligible for treatment as a pensioner. In any event many of the recipients of war veterans allowances are billed for these provincial insurance premiums. It is not a great deal of money, but for them every dollar counts.

There has been a good deal of concern about this situation. Has the minister's department taken any steps to make some arrangement with the provincial government hospital insurance authorities so that veterans either will not be billed for provincial insurance premiums or will be covered by the federal hospitalization scheme?

Mr. Gregg: I take it that the hon. member refers to the wives of veterans. I understand recipients of veterans allowances are exempted. The veterans themselves are exempt from payment to the provincial hospital plan.

Mr. Green: No, not unless it has been done this year.

Mr. Gregg: I know to my certain knowledge that there has been discussion between my department and the provincial government towards that end. With regard to widows generally, I do not need to repeat of course, because my hon. friend knows it better than I do, that these benefits accruing to the veterans provide subsidiary benefits to wives and widows, but only through the veteran. They were not to apply to the widows he mentioned, or in fact to the widows of those who were killed in action or the widows of pensioners.

On the point made by the hon. member about our hospitals being less busy than they were, and the 12-D patients being accepted, the hospitals are equipped to accept men veterans in the main, but also women veterans to a limited number. Physically speaking therefore, apart from other considerations, it would be difficult to adapt our hospitals at this time for that purpose.

Mr. Lennard: Several years ago the Department of Veterans Affairs issued orders which enabled optometrists to be employed on hospital staffs. The intimation went out at that time that one or more would be allotted to these staffs permanently. About a year ago I put a question on the order paper asking how many optometrists had been employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs since January, 1948. The answer said that there were 277 on a fee for services basis. I am quite aware of the reason why no optometrists were permanently appointed to the hospital staff. I feel it is due to professional jealousy. The ophthalmologists have full control of the situation and are jealous of their position. They have prevented the department, if the department ever did wish to make an appointment, from fulfilling its promise to the Canadian Society of Optometrists. Several years ago a promise was made that the optometrists would receive consideration, but that was never done.

From my own experience there is no better man to care for the eyes than a man who specializes in that work. From my own experience, and my experience with service clubs in that connection, I can say that better results have been obtained by having children treated by optometrists than through other branches of the professional service. I feel rather strongly about that because I know the reason, and I believe the minister has some idea about it. I believe it is something that should be corrected.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, before my estimates are through I shall be glad to bring in a statement on this subject, and I hope it will not be tinged by professional jealousy. With regard to the answer to the question last year, I would point out that we have adopted a policy relating to professional men generally, doctors and so on, that there are not many full-time doctors employed in our hospitals. The main principle behind it is the desire that these well-trained professional men should be kept in touch with what is going on in the outside world, and in the profession generally, and thus bring to the hospital the best that can be obtained. It may be that, owing to that policy with regard to men in medicine, these professional men have only been employed part-time. I shall bring in a proper statement later.

Mr. Lennard: It may be well for the minister, when he makes that statement, to ascertain whether there are any full-time ophthalmologists employed by the department.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister where we find that position of director of treatment services? I notice it is not in the detail here, and I cannot find it under departmental administration.

Mr. Gregg: I am told the reason is that the director is a term appointment, and consequently is blanketed in the non-permanent list.

Mr. Fulton: What was spent last year for materials and supplies, for which the minister is asking about $6,500,000 this year?

Mr. Gregg: Last year we spent $6,384,000.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this is a branch of the department in which the number of temporary employees compared with the permanents is particularly high. There are 9,328 temporary employees, and 985 permanent employees. In other words, there is a proportion of about 10 to one. Can the minister tell us in general terms what sort of job those 9,000 people do that they are all temporary after this length of time? Why is there such a large number of them in that category?

Mr. Gregg: Apart from a comparatively small group who work in the office, the remainder comprise those who serve in the thirty odd hospitals across the country, doctors and nurses under term employment. Only a few are permanent civil servants; the great number of them are temporary employees, orderlies, drivers, kitchen help and so on.

Mr. Harkness: Do I understand that these people are going to remain temporary employees, or the great majority of them, most of your doctors, nurses, kitchen orderlies, cooks, drivers and so forth?

Mr. Gregg: As I said a short time ago the doctors are, in the main, on a part-time basis. The nursing sisters are what we call term appointments. They are appointed for a period of time which may be renewed. I think it is fair to state that a large proportion of the non-professional assistance in a hospital will remain temporary, but I think some positions may become permanent.

Mr. Harkness: What is the reason for that? If a person is there as a cook, and there are cooks on the permanent list, what is the idea behind keeping these people on a temporary basis?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, the whole hospital organization, as my hon. friend well knows, because it applies to what he said last night about construction, is only about four years old. Most of the construction and development programs for hospitals started after the war. I think the reason why so many are temporary, that is the serving staff, the cooks and so on, is that the superintendent has not yet made up his mind whether he would like to have the person as a permanent employee. He would like to try some out a little bit longer.

Mr. Harkness: The general effect of the estimates being in this form, and all of these people not being permanent, is that 90 per cent of the people employed all come under one item. The other employees are listed. We find there are 49 hospital nurses grade 3; 87 cleaners and helpers; so many hospital cooks grades 5, 4, 3 and 2; but 90 per cent of the employees in this particular branch are found in one item, and one does not know what they are. You have no idea what the break-down is or anything else. It does not seem to me that it makes for the best provision for examining estimates when they are in that form.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister tell me what was spent in "travelling expenses, patients and escorts," last year.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Gregg: $336,000.

Mr. Fulton: What is the meaning of the item, "loss of wages, patients and escorts?"

Mr. Gregg: As far as the pensioner patient is concerned, if he were employed and called in for examination, he is recouped for the loss of wages on the day or days that he might be in.

Mr. Harkness: This item of medical education research, $300,000, is, I know, a new item. What is the purpose of that? What sort of medical education is going to be carried on? What kind of research?

Mr. Gregg: I wonder if my hon. friend would permit me to bring in a statement on that matter later. I should be glad to do so.

Mr. Harkness: Very well.

Mr. Fulton: I have one other question. What is the amount that was spent last year for light and power?

Mr. Gregg: The total for all our institutions was $284,000.

Mr. Harkness: There is another item here, "Less:-Amount recoverable for treatment of patients not the responsibility of the departments, etc." I wonder if the minister would tell us how much was received. Last year it was estimated that $1,500,000 would be secured. I should like the minister to tell us just how much they actually received under that item, and what proportion of this money it is estimated will come from veterans who are able to pay and who are taken into veterans hospitals for treatment on a paying basis; also where the rest of it comes from.

Mr. Gregg: The amount recovered last year was $2,568,000 instead of $1,500,000.

Mr. Harkness: A million more than you estimated?

Mr. Gregg: Yes. As was pointed out last year on my estimates, most of this money comes from other government departments, mainly the Department of National Defence and the R.C.M.P. Very few, unless it is a case of emergency, in the past year have come from individual veterans. During this year of course there will be the revenue from the 12-D class.

Mr. Harkness: What about this matter of the amount? Is there any amount in there which it is estimated you are going to recover from veterans who are in hospitals on a paying basis?

Mr. Gregg: No. The amount we have estimated here, $2,450,000, is the amount we anticipate from the comparable sources of revenue last year. There may be some adjustment in that in the supplementary estimates. The revenue forthcoming from patients under 12-D will vary that. What I mean is that we have not made any estimate for that in this particular item.

Mr. Harkness: Does that mean that you do not expect to get any?

Mr. Gregg: We expect to get some, but it was overlooked at the time these estimates were being prepared last fall.

Mr. Harkness: Having regard to last year's financial picture, has any been taken in up to the end of the financial year in March of this year?

Mr. Gregg: No. 12-D just came into effect on April 1, 1950, and those estimates were prepared last October and November.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister tell me whether, under professional and special services, there is included an amount to cover the costs of veterans who are the responsibility of the department but who are being treated in other than veterans hospitals?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister the figures for the number of veterans who are being treated in other than veterans hospitals?

Mr. Gregg: As at April 30, 1950, at other institutions we have a total of 1,824 patients.

Mr. Fulton: Is there a standard daily rate paid to these other hospitals for those veterans, or does it vary from institution to institution?

Mr. Gregg: No. They are each subject to contract. As my hon. friend knows, the rates of civilian hospitals across Canada vary; and our contracts have to correspond with the existing rates.

Mr. Fulton: Does the department make a special rate with each hospital or does it pay the standard rate of that hospital or do you try to do the best you can?

Mr. Gregg: That is true, yes.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, but which is it? I put the question in the form of two questions. Which is the case? I asked the question in a confusing manner. I ask the minister to clear up what I asked.

An hon. Member: To make up your mind for you.

Mr. Gregg: We negotiate with each hospital for the rate we will pay for the veterans that we send to that hospital. That rate is based upon their prevailing rate.

Mr. Fulton: How are those hospitals selected? Let us take, for instance, British Columbia, where there are veterans hospitals only in Vancouver and Victoria, I believe. How do you make the selection of what other hospitals veterans will be admitted to?

Mr. Gregg: Again I should like to get advice on that subject; but generally speaking, there are various yardsticks. Let us take, for instance, one outstanding example which is Newfoundland. We have not any D.V.A. hospitals there so we are carrying on on a per diem basis with the hospitals that exist. Then in certain provinces, for special diseases, the provincial or other hospitals may be specially equipped for the necessary treatment.

Mr. Goode: After waiting for an hour, Mr. Chairman, and with the permission of the hon. member for Calgary East, I should like to ask the minister a question.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lennard: With the permission of the Chairman, you mean.

Mr. Goode: I made my statement. You make yours.

Mr. Lennard: I just did that.

Mr. Goode: There are two items about which I should like to ask the minister. One is for $55,000 with regard to Canadian Red Cross Society and another of $300,000 with regard to medical education and research. Can the minister make a short statement?

Mr. Gregg: The research item is a very special one. This is the first time it has appeared. I would like to suggest that I bring in a statement on it on another item. On the Canadian Red Cross Society, $55,000, that is an item which covers our obligations or our share of half the cost incurred by the Red Cross in providing the handicraft work and the great variety of diversional and therapy activities which are provided by the Red Cross to the patients. Then of course in addition to that, which is not included in this at all, is a series of excellent Red Cross hostelries which are built in association with many of our hospitals where patients and wives and parents can come and spend a few days.

Mr. Green: Three weeks ago there was a press dispatch to the effect that the department had instructed Colonel John Crawford to make an investigation into the difficulties that had arisen with regard to the hospitalization of Canadians who were prisoners of war in Japan. I took it from those dispatches that those unfortunate young Canadians are not recovering from their treatment in Japan as quickly as had been expected. Can the minister tell us just what the situation is with regard to these veterans?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Both the department—and particularly the medical phase of the department—and the Canadian pension commission have taken a very keen interest in these men ever since their return to Canada. It was requested at that time that special attention be paid to learn of conditions which had come about because of their service and to have special medical examinations carried out. After discharge each case was followed up and re-examinations were carried out at regular intervals of all who would co-operate or who could be located.

During the past year I authorized a special medical review of all cases under one medical adviser specially selected for that purpose. This officer was recommended to me by the medical people themselves and is Colonel John Crawford who was senior medical officer of the Hong Kong force and who was himself of course a prisoner.

In this study he has access to all reports available to us, and he has the co-operation of outstanding specialists. The Canadian pension commission has conducted a constant review of all cases and has not hesitated to concede entitlement. They pass up no opportunity of finding out if the physical incapacity may be attributable to experiences during the imprisonment.

The total number of survivors of the Hong Kong force is now, or was at the last check, 1,415. Of these, over 1,000 are in receipt of pensions, with approximately 200 more with entitlement to treatment for disability. I would like the committee to know that the utmost attention is being given to the care of these Hong Kong veterans. I would like hon. members to know too, so that any evidence of hardship that may come to the attention of any hon. member of the house might be passed on to me. I do that because I think it is important to all of us to discourage any expressions of pity on behalf of these men, which is the last thing they want, and which their leaders tell me does not help at all in the recovery from the difficulties or the disabilities they have owing to their imprisonment.

I would like to assure my hon. friend and the committee that under this item the treatment services and the pension commission are giving special attention to these men. If we can find them, as we can in practically every case when they are willing, we try to have them in at regular intervals whether they apply for it or not.

Mr. Green: Did the minister say that over 1,000 out of 1,415 are drawing pension?

Mr. Gregg: Correct.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Green: And that another 200 are entitled to treatment because of war disabilities?

Mr. Gregg: That is true.

Mr. Green: There are only about 200 who are not disabled at the present time?

Mr. Gregg: And they are being carefully watched.

Canadian pension commission—

533. Administration expenses, $2,132,824.

Mr. Fulton: This is an item for the administration of the Canadian pension commission. Can the minister tell us what was actually spent last year on travelling expenses of the staff?

Mr. Gregg: Last year the travelling expenses of the staff were $85,300. When I say "staff", of course I mean the most important item is the review board which travels extensively. Frankly I am glad to see the chairman of the pension commission encourage extensive travelling because I feel it is very important that these boards should get out, as the hon. member for Kootenay West said last year, and raise the flag even at some of the subsidiary centres as well as in the main city in the province. This year under this item we are asking for $90,000. This amount covers the cost of travelling for the commission staff at head office and the districts. During 1949-50 approximately $85,000 was expended for this purpose. A large portion of the expenditure is incurred by the review boards which traverse the country and consider pension appeal cases. The anticipated increase in their work necessitates a slight increase in the amount required for the new fiscal year.

Mr. Fulton: I am not being immediately critical. I notice, for instance, there are 73 medical officers on the commission, according to my calculation of the breakdown. I do not imagine that is in any way too many. But then there is a very heavy item for professional and special services in addition. It amounts to $100,000 this year, and was $115,000 last year. It just strikes me that perhaps one is justified in making some inquiry as to the reason why such a substantial amount is necessary when there are after all quite a fair number of medical officers with the pension commission itself.

Mr. Gregg: That in the main comprises outside specialists' reports.

Mr. Fulton: How would that arise? Does the commission itself want to submit the case for outside help?

Mr. Gregg: That is correct.

Mr. Fulton: Would the expense of an applicant in getting an opinion be covered in this item?

Mr. Gregg: No; that would come under travelling expenses. I beg your pardon; you mean the applicant getting his own opinion?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Gregg: If the commission authorized repayment of the applicant's independent examination that would come under this item.

Item agreed to.

534. Veterans bureau, $436,791.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Third report of special committee on Bill No. 133, respecting national defence.—Mr. Campney.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

The house resumed, from Friday, April 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Thatcher for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Criminal Code (capital punishment).

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the house provides for the abolition of capital punishment in Canada. As hon. members know, this question has been debated in this house many times. The death penalty is as old as human society, but in recent generations sociologists have been exploring the possibility of substituting some other still effective but less drastic means of punishment than that of taking the offender's life. In support of the measure which he has introduced the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) repeated the classical observations which have so often prompted leaders of social reform to advocate the abolition of capital punishment and its replacement with some form of deterrence which they submit would be more in keeping with modern trends of the utmost humane treatment of convicts.

I think the hon. member should be congratulated on the sincerity of purpose which he so effectively and eloquently displayed when presenting his bill a few weeks ago, but I hope that his arguments in favour of the abolition of capital punishment in Canada will not be found sufficiently convincing by hon. members to warrant them in favouring a change in the law as it now stands.

I have no intention of burdening the house with the religious and historical arguments which have been expounded so well in the course of previous debates on this question. Although the hon. member for Moose Jaw claimed that he could not profess to be a biblical authority, he based his first argument on the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill", which was given by the Lord to Moses and which is to be found in the first pages of the Old Testament. I do not profess to be a biblical authority either, but I think the hon. member might have remembered that the bible should be taken as a whole. If he had pursued the reading of this holy book a little further he would have found that the same One who commanded not to kill also directed that certain crimes should be punished by death.

The hon. member objects to capital punishment, and particularly to hanging, as the law provides in Canada, because of the brutality of the actual execution. He quoted the evidence of witnesses who had appeared before a special committee of this house which was set up in 1937. As I recall from reading the proceedings of that committee, it was set up for the express purpose of determining whether another form of capital punishment than hanging would be more humane and whether another form of capital punishment would prove to be a greater deterrent to the commission of murder.

That committee was comprised of members from both sides of the house and it recommended that no change should be made in the law as it stood. In support of his argument as to the brutality of hanging, the hon. member for Moose Jaw recently quoted from the evidence given by a deputy sheriff of Toronto who had assisted in a number of hangings and who testified that the actual time elapsing between the springing of the trap and death was fourteen minutes and seven seconds. The hon. member should have analysed that evidence more carefully. If he had, I believe he would have found that what that witness really was referring to was the time between the execution and the moment when the doctor, who was a witness to the execution, declared that death had taken place. That is a matter completely different from the question of consciousness and suffering in the ordeal of hanging.

I believe a substantial summary of a few outstanding points relating to the intrinsic merits of this problem should be given to the house not only for the sake of brevity but for the advantages to be derived from a concise marshalling of the main facts and considerations bearing upon the issue. For instance, our statistics reveal that out of a population of nearly fourteen million people there is a yearly average of only ten individuals who suffer the supreme penalty under the present statutory provision which the hon. member now invites the house to abolish. Each one of these ten men stands convicted of murder after trial by a jury, usually after an appeal heard by the supreme court of his province, and in many cases after an appeal heard by the supreme court of the country.

Furthermore, the condemned murderer who goes to the gallows is one who has been refused a commutation of sentence. He is usually a man who took the life of his fellow citizen for the purpose of gain, or for some other sordid motive, after having planned his crime and carried it to completion with determination and often with very great cunning. Frequently he has a long criminal record and is the type of person to whom people refer as a bad man. I should like to give the house the thought expressed on this subject in 1924 by one who had been solicitor general of the country, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. I believe he expressed very concisely and adequately what the situation is in Canada regarding the criminal who is actually executed. These are the words of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, as recorded at page 1294 of Hansard for April 11, 1924:

> But after the jury's verdict and the sentence there is vested in the Department of Justice a power of review—

I might interject that this power is now vested in the Solicitor General.

> —and it is only a fair statement of the practice to say that any circumstances that go to show the lack of appreciation, the mental inferiority of the accused, even far removed from actual insanity, or other circumstances of a strongly mitigating character, operate to relieve the victim from the extreme penalty. So that we are left in the position, in the actual practice of our law, that the most atrocious cold-blooded instances alone are followed through to capital punishment.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the type of murderer who is executed in Canada is usually a vicious cold-blooded killer, the worst of the lot. I should like to make it clear that in this country the actual infliction of the death penalty is in practice reserved for the worst type of assassin, the man who kills with full knowledge of his deed, having carefully planned and premeditated his crime which he usually commits for some very selfish or sordid motive. I think we all agree that all citizens are entitled to effective protection, and the law accordingly provides recourse against the criminal aggressor. The common good of all, I believe, is a sound basis for state action and punishment of the criminal in keeping with the nature and the gravity of his crime.

The struggle of society to maintain order is an immense problem involving rights and responsibilities on the part of the state as well as on the part of the individual. With the development of the community the state has become the keeper of the public peace, and has the power to control the activities of members of society so that all may live in harmony as exemplified in the legislation which permits the exacting of the extreme penalty when the crime has been the commission of murder. Thus each and every one of the citizens of our country is entitled to have his life and his goods protected against wanton aggression. When the assassin is convicted of murder the law ordains his death for the protection of all against him and against those others who might be tempted to follow his example. The legislative enactment is intended to promote security, order and harmony in society so that it may function to attain its ends.

One of its most important aims is to guarantee the lives of its citizens. The desire to live is natural, and it is the clear duty of society to inspire the would-be assassin with due respect for the sanctity of human life. Nor, Mr. Speaker, is the death penalty imposed by our law a disproportionate punishment. Suppression of the convicted murderer is in order as he has become a threat to the lives of others and because appropriate punishment must serve as a deterrent to those who would likewise commit murder. There are excellent reasons for the state to dispose of the life of the convicted murderer in keeping with the statutory requirements of the law. I have already mentioned the necessity to provide a really effective and adequate deterrent which will give the maximum assistance in preventing the vicious and cold-blooded murderer from slaughtering his fellow man. Does capital punishment as we know it in Canada—because after all this bill would have the effect of taking away capital punishment in Canada—provide that much needed deterrent to committing the crimes of murder, treason or rape for which the extreme penalty is provided?

I take it, Mr. Speaker, that we all agree that in drafting laws for the benefit of the Canadian people we necessarily take into account Canadian conditions as we find them. Our vast expanse of territory with its policing problems—and I can assure hon. members that there are many—our close proximity to large centres where major crime is reported to be rampant, make it necessary for the Canadian authorities to keep all criminals fully informed as to our reputation for justice, swift and sure, and for stern measures in the enforcement of law and order.

I say that our reputation as such has a deterrent effect, and I base this assertion on the numerous testimonials which we in this department, and others connected with the administration of justice, receive from authorities who are charged with similar responsibilities in the country to the south of us. They are all unanimous in saying that the reputation this country enjoys for swift and sure justice, and for strict application of the law, has a deterrent effect on the criminal element in their country, and prevents them from crossing the border to commit crime in Canada.

I say also that the efficiency of our police agencies has the same deterrent effect, and so has the attitude of the Canadian public, whose education for generations allows no patience with those who commit major crime. I should also mention that, generally speaking, the press of Canada shows no such tendency as unfortunately is found elsewhere, to encourage hero worship of the gangster type of criminal.

It is stated by the opponents of capital punishment that this method of punishment has never had the effect of diminishing the incidence of murder in any country. I maintain that leniency to the murderer, to the point of exempting him from the fate which he so cruelly inflicts upon his fellow man, has not proven its effectiveness in preventing crime. On the contrary let me emphasize the fact that the frequency of murder in Canada appears to be at a remarkably low figure. Indeed, if the number of arrests, convictions and executions for murder in Canada is compared with similar data elsewhere, and may serve as an indication, we find our statistics covering the past ten years show the rate of execution, with a population of approximately fourteen million, to average about ten per annum. It seems that the fate of the killer who eventually goes to the gallows has provided Canadian authorities with an extremely effective means of coping with the incidence of such major crime. Our very low rate of actual executions, which stands at one person per million and a half of population, seems to be outstanding proof of the efficiency of our present system of capital punishment.

I say this with some reserve because I believe that in analysing such a question it is not sufficient to base one's argument purely on statistics. There are so many factors which have an extremely important effect on the rate of murder in any country that statistics alone are not sufficient to prove the efficiency or inefficiency of capital punishment. However, I give these figures for what they are worth—and they certainly do indicate a very low incidence of murder in Canada.

All capital cases pass through the clemency records of my department. I have here a table which was compiled recently and which gives the number of cases brought to court between 1939 and 1948. This table shows the number of cases in this country during those ten years to be 179. Of these there were 89 executions; 46 were disposed of through commutation of sentences and 44 were eliminated by courts of appeal.

While we are on the subject of statistics, and since the hon. member for Moose Jaw quoted profusely from statistics a few weeks ago, I should like to ask him to compare the figures I have just given with those of the six states in the country to the south of us where capital punishment is still abolished. Incidentally I might remark that twenty-five years ago, I believe, there were fifteen states where capital punishment had been abolished. It has been re-established in seven or eight of them. In one it was re-established following a referendum where the people themselves asked for the re-establishment of capital punishment.

These six states were Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, North Dakota, Rhode Island and Wisconsin. We find that in 1946, the year for which I have the figures, the population of those states was 13,388,500. At that time the population of Canada was estimated at 12,307,000. Although I have never had the privilege of visiting these states, I understand they represent a cross-section of the United States, closely resembling that of Canada.

During that year the total number of convictions in those states stood at 65, showing an incidence of 4·85 convictions per million of population, whereas in Canada the figure was 22, showing a rate of 1·78 per million of people. I believe the testimonials I mentioned a little earlier, and these figures—if one is to base his conclusion on statistics—do not point to Canada as a proper testing or experimental ground for the so-called humanitarian trends which would be served by the adoption of this bill. I do not believe we are justified in altering our traditional outlook towards this question. I say, why change our law when capital punishment appears to have proven itself most effective in deterring the criminal, or should we say the "potential criminal", from his depredations? The knowledge that execution, the rope, usually awaits the murderer in Canada provides him with a most salutary train of thought.

I know that during the course of his remarks the hon. member for Moose Jaw asked whether anyone could provide him with evidence that hanging had ever kept a murderer from committing his crime. That is rather difficult to establish, but I think if my hon. friend had read more closely the evidence adduced before that committee of the House of Commons which sat in 1937 he would have found evidence given by experts who have had actual contact with criminals in jails and penitentiaries. They testified these criminals openly admitted that, in many cases, what had kept them from committing murder was the fact they knew that if caught they would be hanged. That is in the evidence if my hon. friend wishes to look for it. I say, the longer the preparation for crime, the better chance the criminal has of pondering the consequences and of desisting from his criminal pursuit. This may mean saving the lives of innocent people who do not deserve to be killed; people who are entitled to protection; people to whom our sympathy should go, rather than the criminal. We have no real scientific data or statistics to establish even the approximate number of those who are deterred from the commission of murder, and those whose lives are spared by this deterrent. I doubt, Mr. Speaker, that we should take a chance.

Can we ignore the fact that the strongest instinct of man is that of survival, self-preservation? When all other moral forces have failed should we not, if necessary, inspire fear if it is to deter the assassin? In that respect I am sure that a great majority of the members in this house who have had the opportunity of serving in the armed forces of this country, and who in common with hundreds of thousands of other Canadians have had to face arduous and tense situations, will agree with me that, in spite of all the arguments that can be brought forward, in spite of all the so-called scientific developments in the sphere of mental sciences and other considerations of the kind, the instinct of self-preservation is strong and still remains in even the most hardened criminal. Should we remove this barrier of protection our citizens now enjoy to achieve what I consider to be the rather questionable reform proposed by this bill? Should we be remiss in the discharge of our sacred duty towards all Canadians, merely to gratify a sense of humanitarianism towards the most anti-social of all criminals, the traitor, the murderer and the rapist?

From what little experience I have had in dealing with these cases, it is in my view impossible for the bandit planning a crime and contemplating the possibility of murder, not to measure the consequences of his act. I believe he must be very callous indeed to persist in his recklessness. As I said, no one knows how many are deterred by the thought of the rope, the gallows, the drop into eternity. Undoubtedly a few are not deterred. They are the hopeless, the reckless, the desperate few who deliberately take a horrible chance in order to gratify their selfish ends. I am not one of those who will make the way of those desperate few more easy. Those who are responsible for the protection of society, whatever their personal feelings in this matter, in my opinion will be driven to the conclusion that in alleviating the extreme penalty now provided by the law they might assist—and I think that would be sufficient—in multiplying the incidence of murder. They would, thereby, be letting down the people who are surely entitled to the protection of their lives.

I believe, because of this situation in Canada, because of what I have described here tonight, it is our duty to maintain capital punishment no matter how distasteful it may be to take the life of a human being. The execution of the assassin who kills his victim wilfully, and with malice aforethought, is the most effective means we know of at the moment to protect our Canadian people against wanton aggression.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I speak tonight, and I hope the expression I use will not be misinterpreted, as a firm believer in capital punishment for murder. I go even farther and say that I am a firm believer in hanging as the method of extermination, and I use that word advisedly, of a murderer. I do not approach this subject so much in the way of sentiment or even of, what shall I call it, exaggerated ethics about the sacred regard we all have, and which our law has, for human life. I know that in this debate the bible has been quoted. We have heard the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill." It seems to me that that commandment has an equal application to the murderer as he kills his victims as it has to the law of this land in seeing to it that capital punishment is meted out to him. But if there be any question, I am going to quote from the bible, Leviticus, chapter 24, and I begin with verse 15:

15. And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying, Whosoever curseth his God shall bear his sin.

16. And he that blasphemeth the name of the Lord, he shall surely be put to death, and all the congregation shall certainly stone him: as well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of the Lord, shall be put to death.

17. And he that killeth any man shall surely be put to death.

18. And he that killeth a beast shall make it good; beast for beast.

19. And if a man cause a blemish in his neighbour; as he hath done, so shall it be done to him;

20. Breach for breach, eye for eye, tooth for tooth: as he hath caused a blemish in a man, so shall it be done to him again.

21. And he that killeth a beast, he shall restore it: and he that killeth a man, he shall be put to death.

In the argument that I am making before the house I am not relying on those scriptural commandments in the old testament. I am looking at it, I think and I hope, from a more practical point of view. It is unfortunate perhaps but in fourteen years acting as a crown prosecutor I had the terrible responsibility—and it is that—of calling the evidence which hanged quite a number of people. The most that one acting for the crown can do is to see that the individual is well defended. In our courts, Mr. Speaker, that is always done. Irrespective of what you hear about money and all that nonsense, that is always well done. When I hear many people—and there are many of them, and no one can disregard their views—telling us what a cruel thing capital punishment is, my mind always goes back to the man or woman who is dead, without warning, from a bullet, a knife or something of that kind. When I see the man who deliberately committed the act—and we do not hang people unless the act is deliberately done—and when I see all the sob sisters gathering about and telling us that we should reform this fellow, that his crime is the result of certain faults in society, as far as I am concerned that is absolute and complete rot. As far as I am concerned, he is a killer, a murderer, doing it deliberately, and he will pay with his own life. If he lives to be one hundred years old, there is nothing else in God's world that he will ever understand.

Let us take a look at things across the line in the states in which they have not capital punishment. Let us take the reports of the parole boards over there. What do we find? Men sentenced to terms of imprisonment, for life most of the time. The reports of the parole boards are to the effect that a killer, once paroled over there, ninety per cent of the time goes out and kills somebody else.

I am conscious of the great work done by the various cabinets that we have had in the Dominion of Canada. My memory goes back to the time when Arthur Meighen, quoted by the Solicitor General (Mr. Lapointe), was himself Solicitor General. I remember long talks I had with him at that time. I know this was true then and I think it is true now. In this country no death sentence is carried out unless the Minister of Justice has read every word of evidence given at the trial. No man is hanged unless the Minister of Justice makes a report to the cabinet; and the cabinet itself has the last word on commutation. That was true then and I think it is true at the present time. The Solicitor General nods his head.

Mr. Lapointe: The Solicitor General is the one who reads the evidence.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The Solicitor General reads every word of the evidence. I made a mistake. I said it was the Minister of Justice. Coming down to the practical thing, no one is hanged in this country except by the verdict of a jury of his peers. I confess that a judge, on an election, is empowered to try a murder case alone and without a jury; but as a matter of fact that is never done. The accused, then, has had that trial and the appeals, with all the advantages that we who are defending can give him; and I have defended a number, some of them unsuccessfully, I may say. After all that is through, then it comes down here, and we hear a lot of petitions for commutation of the sentence. I remember extremely well one case in which I defended a man. The petition was signed only by myself. Commutation was granted. I say these things with great pride in our administration of justice not only in our courts but—and I hate this word "level"—at the cabinet level. I mention these things to show the care which is taken before any man's life is forfeited on the gallows. As the Solicitor General has so truly said, it is almost impossible to get statistics as to how many people have been deterred from committing murder because of the death penalty by hanging in Canada. I realize that probably there can be no worth-while statistics of that kind. But may I add this with regard to many of these amateur crime investigators who gather statistics. You can make statistics out of almost anything. I have talked to a number of people engaged in crime. I remember so well some safe-blowers. A friend of mine was the most expert safe-blower that ever got into western Canada. He was a pal, and he knew how to do it. I asked him if he was not afraid when he blew his safe that he might kill some people who were innocently in a neighbouring office, or something of that kind. He was not greatly concerned about that. He said: "Art Smith, there are a lot of amateurs blowing safes these days." He said: "They may kill somebody, but I never would." He showed me how he blew his safe. He built a little cup with soap, he poured in the nitroglycerine, and he knew how much to put in. He could blow a safe with just a little puff and the door was open. He said: "I am not concerned about it." He said: "You have got to stand up some day and sentence some of these amateurs to be hanged because they did not know how to handle nitroglycerine," but he had it in his mind. I talked to quite a number of these chaps. You know, these people who commit crime are not all dumb. I have talked to a good many of them. I have pleaded with the Solicitor General for some of them. I have talked to even the present Solicitor General to exercise that mercy which I know is in his soul, but he is keeping it locked up pretty well these days, I do not mind telling you.

I know perfectly well that the fear, not of capital punishment, but of hanging is the greatest deterrent to serious crime in this country at the present time. I do not know how many of you have read the story by Mr. Duffy which has been running in six issues of the Saturday Evening Post recently. Mr. Duffy is the commandant of the San Quentin penitentiary in the United States. He uses most excellent arguments, from his standpoint, against capital punishment; but what has happened to him is obvious. There they have the gas chamber. The warden of the penitentiary must see each man. He must be present, looking through the window, when the gas is turned on below the chair on which the prisoner is strapped, and so on. It is so easy, Mr. Speaker, with the humanitarian feeling that is in all of us, to say: Well this other chap is killed. The state will look after the children. His widow has gone to work and has got a job. In cold blood now we just cannot execute this man. It is awfully easy to get yourself into that frame of mind and be honest with yourself in so doing.

I have not a word to say in criticism of anyone who is seeking to do away with capital punishment; certainly if we succeeded we would salve our conscience to a considerable extent. But I still firmly believe, Mr. Speaker, that hanging is the greatest deterrent that we know of. You want statistics? If you want testimony go to England. There was lots of it there in the old days. That is all changed now. Today murder has become with some people a fine art. It is true that today the English bobby for the first time in history is armed with a revolver or a gun of some kind. Why? You rarely heard of a shooting in England until recent years. Murders there were by knife, by club, by garrotte or something like that. But this revolver business is in fact the reason why that rule of the metropolitan police has been changed in the last few years.

I am not going to talk this bill out. I know that I leave myself open to criticism and well meant criticism and honest criticism. I know I can be accused of being cruel and all that sort of thing. It is not cruelty, sir, to take the life of a man when by so doing you save the lives of half a dozen others, as has been the history of the United States.

So far as I am concerned, I am in favour of capital punishment for wilful murderers. I am also in favour of death by hanging by the neck until you are dead, and may God have mercy on your soul. I have heard that often.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): It is obvious that if my colleague speaks now he will close the debate. Since he has expressed the wish to have an opportunity to attempt to refute the arguments which have been so well put before us by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Lapointe), I feel it is my duty upon his behalf to fill this gap.

I personally did not intend to take part in the general argument, but I am intrigued somewhat from an academic point of view by the scripture arguments of the Solicitor General, when he told my colleague that there was another book and another argument in scripture that could be read I am quite sure that he was referring to the famous one, "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth."

Mr. Lapointe: The one that the hon. member for Calgary West quoted to you.

Mr. Knight: My curiosity at any rate was sufficiently aroused to cause me to send for a copy of the bible. There must be two copies since the hon. member for Calgary West has one, unless it is a private one of his own.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Even I recognize the bible when I see it.

Mr. Knight: Exodus, chapter 21, verses 23 to 25 read:

> 23 And if any mischief follow, then thou shalt give life for life,
>
> 24 Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot,
> 25 Burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe.

Obviously these are the passages to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. Lapointe: No, that is not the one.

Mr. Knight: To finish the quotation I shall now turn to the words of our Lord in Matthew 5, verses 38 and 39, because, after all, what I have read you surely can be admitted to be a barbaric and out-dated document. The scripture of the New Testament is this, where the Saviour said:

38. Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth:

39. But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: But whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also.

I would like at this time to elaborate it in accordance with my own views, but time is up and I shall resist it.

Mr. Lapointe: He who kills by the sword shall perish by the sword. Is that there also?

Mr. Speaker: The hour reserved for public and private bills having expired, the house will revert to the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Canadian pension commission—

534. Veterans bureau, $436,791.

Mr. Gregg: I should like to try to fulfil a few of the promises that I made before dinner. I said that during the period that we had emphasized employment for older veterans during the last three or four years some 160,000 had been placed. A question was asked as to how many older veterans had been placed in the last fiscal year. During the last fiscal year through the co-operation of the national employment service and our own welfare officers upwards of 40,000 older veterans were placed in employment. Despite this fact during the same period there has been an increase of 3,000 in unplaced older veterans. Since February 1 of this year an active campaign has been carried on by the Legion branches in co-operation with other agencies to obtain jobs for these men. In the final analysis, of course, the placing of these men is a community responsibility and with the full co-operation of the community the problem will be solved. This work is being headed up by the veterans welfare service branch with Colonel Percy Philpott, himself a dual service veteran, directing the effort.

Then the question was asked as to what rate was charged the veterans under the 12-D repayment class. At the present time this rate is $8.65 for hospitalization which includes everything but the doctor's fee, which is arranged between the patient and the doctor.

Another question was with respect to medical education and research grants. Research projects that have to do with the better treatment of veterans are paid out of this grant. One example is the study of the disabilities of Hong Kong prisoners of war which may lead to new methods of treatment. Another example is the use of new drugs, such as cortisone, for various conditions to be found among veterans. Medical education refers to the special training of medical officers and technical staff to undertake special problems in the treatment of veterans. Since this is a new item we will be glad to report fully at the end of the year the results of the first year's experience.

Another question was asked with regard to optometrists. Many optometrists are employed on a schedule fee basis part time; no optometrists are employed full time. No ophthalmologists, or doctor specialists, are employed full time with the department. The non-employment of full-time ophthalmologists is in keeping with the general policy of treatment service for non-employment of full-time specialists, part-time specialists being employed in their stead.

Mr. Fulton: With respect to medical education and medical research, could the minister state whether anything will be recovered from the Department of National Health and Welfare and whether this work is being undertaken jointly with that department?

Mr. Gregg: There will be no refund. The effort is being carried out under the closest collaboration with the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): The minister stated that the rate charged the veteran was $8.65 per day. Is that the actual cost to the department or is there a profit on that charge?

Mr. Gregg: It is based upon our estimate of the actual average cost of operation of our hospitals across Canada, that is the active treatment hospitals.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): How does that figure compare with what is allowed by the department when a patient is placed in a private hospital?

Mr. Gregg: I am told it compares quite favourably with the charges made by hospitals of the same standard.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is any provision made for the hard of hearing? There is the original cost of the necessary equipment as well as the monthly upkeep, and I should like to know if that is paid.

Mr. Gregg: If the deafness is due to service, treatment is provided by the department and the hearing apparatus is furnished free.

Mr. Cruickshank: What about the monthly upkeep of the batteries?

Mr. Gregg: Under the conditions I have related, all upkeep is taken care of.

Mr. Lennard: What is the explanation for the increase of $29,682?

Mr. Gregg: As my hon. friend knows, the veterans bureau provides free advocate service for veterans seeking pensions. When a veteran feels he has a good case but is unable to prove it, he is able to obtain the services of a competent advocate to help him in assembling his evidence and presenting it when the review board next visits his area. The work of this bureau is certainly not lessening. Here again, as in the case of the pension board, we are encouraging the pension advocates to do their utmost on behalf of applicants, even if it requires extra expenditures on travelling.

We believe that in the long run such a policy will be economical because when a veteran who feels he has a pensionable disability believes that everything is being done that can be done, his mind is in a better state and in the long run the cost to the taxpayer is less.

Mr. Lennard: How many more cases have been appealed during the past year than previously, and why has this increase taken place?

Mr. Gregg: I cannot give that offhand but I shall be glad to get the information and give it to my hon. friend, if not on this item, later on.

Mr. Lennard: I notice that there are increases in the numbers of pension advocates. There is an increase of one in the case of pension advocate, grade 4; an increase of three in pension advocates, grade 3; an increase of two in pension advocates, grade 2. Where are those pension advocates located and what is the reason for these increases?

Mr. Gregg: I do not think there has been an increase. There has been an increase in those who are listed as permanent as compared with those who were blanketed in with the temporaries. Pension advocates are located in the 18 districts across Canada. In New Brunswick, for instance, there is one, and I think there are three in Toronto.

Mr. Lennard: I notice that there are some part-time pension advocates provided for. Should there not be more of these? Are there a sufficient number of pension advocates throughout the country to adequately look after the cases that are coming in?

Mr. Gregg: The part-time advocates would be located in the smaller districts where the work would not warrant the use of a full-time advocate.

Mr. Lennard: Are there any districts where there is not a sufficient number of pension advocates?

Mr. Gregg: No, Mr. Chairman, I have had no complaints as to the adequacy of the number of advocates. I feel they are fulfilling the purpose for which they are intended, and are taking care of the cases. In visiting the various offices across Canada I made it a point to find out from the pension advocates how many cases they had ready for the next sitting of the review board. So far as I could learn, the meshing of the work of the advocate and the work of the review board was going forward satisfactorily.

Mr. Cruickshank: I do not wish to make a complaint but merely to ask a question. First of all I should like to say that I think we have a most excellent board of pension commissioners. In administering the act they are fair in every way. It may be unusual for me but I should like to pay a compliment to the parliamentary assistant who has assisted me with every complaint I have put before him. The complaint from my riding, and indeed from my province, is as to the delay in getting appeals ready for the pension commission. I am not sure of the number but I do not think you have enough commissioners.

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have never been accused of that before. I do not think there are enough commissioners going to the various provinces. I am not complaining about their decisions but I am complaining about the fact that there is too long a delay before appeals are heard. I do not think you have a sufficient number of commissioners to hear appeals. After all, we must remember that we now have the veterans of two wars to consider, and what may have been sufficient to cover the first great war—and I do not think it was —is not enough now. I think in the province of British Columbia there is too long a delay before the consideration of appeals. I should like to know if we are going to increase the number of commissioners to hear these cases.

Mr. Gregg: I am glad to have that brought to my attention. If there are any special cases of delay I should like to know about them. During the past year I have not felt that the delays were caused by the fact that the review board, composed of commissioners, was not able to get there. Sometimes what appear to be unreasonable delays are occasioned by the fact that the advocate requires a tremendous length of time to assemble the information, sometimes from far places of the earth, in order to make his case. Consequently such an application is delayed until the advocate feels he has all the available evidence at hand. He then lets it be known to the chairman of the pension commission that he is now ready to deal with eight, nine, ten or fifteen cases at Vancouver or New Westminster, as the case may be. I will look into the matter raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. Cruickshank: I believe you have a sitting at Kamloops in the interior of British Columbia. I can be corrected by the hon. member representing that constituency if that is not so. I believe you also have sittings in Vancouver and New Westminster. I want to suggest that it means a great deal of inconvenience and expense to veterans, who may or may not have a case, to go to Vancouver or New Westminster. Chilliwack has a population of some 17,000 or 18,000 people. Could we not have a sitting of the commission in Chilliwack? Chilliwack has the largest Canadian Legion branch in the province of British Columbia, and therefore we must have quite a number of veterans. I should like to see a sitting at Chilliwack instead of veterans from the entire Fraser valley having to go to Vancouver or New Westminster at their own expense and inconvenience.

Mr. Gregg: Owing to the large number of veterans in British Columbia, the sittings there are under constant consideration. I will take under advisement the suggestion made. I am informed that an appeal board of the commission is sitting in British Columbia at the present time, and that every appeal listed as ready for hearing is being heard. We have at least three appeal boards sitting in British Columbia each year.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the minister take into consideration having one of the appeal boards sitting in the city of Chilliwack?

Mr. Gregg: I will discuss it with the chairman of the board.

Mr. Lennard: A few minutes ago the minister said that the reason for delay in the hearings was that the pension advocates take so long to prepare their cases. That is the same complaint I have had, that we have not enough pension advocates to adequately care for the different cases. I would not say that they have too much to do but I feel that some of the pension advocates have a few more cases than they can adequately handle under the circumstances. Sometimes it does not take much to keep them busy.

Mr. Mutch: I think it is pretty well the experience of everyone who has had anything to do with this matter that the fastest pension advocate is not necessarily the best one. At the present moment I know of a case which has been in the course of preparation for more than a year. It is an application for leave to reopen, and in order to make the case stand up you have to have new evidence. Correspondence has been going on with the British ministry and with people scattered all over the country. That is where a good deal of the delay arises. Once an appeal fails after leave to reopen has been granted, it is exceedingly difficult to succeed on a second appeal for leave to reopen. In most instances the delays are delays in preparation. It is not so much the result of a shortage of pension advocates as the fact that these people have got a bit foxy through long experience. They have not only the interest of the veteran but their own reputation at stake, and they exhaust every possibility in order to get evidence. Just recently one of these chaps sent a man to a country drugstore to search for prescriptions issued twenty years ago which might substantiate a claim. That involved nearly a week spent in the dusty basement of a small-town drugstore. I am sure these efforts contribute more to delays than either failure to work hard enough or insufficiency of pension advocates.

Mr. Gillis: What are the necessary qualifications under the regulations for a pension advocate?

Mr. Gregg: The qualifications are rather special. Normally of course, if other qualifications exist, training in the law is useful. It is not always possible to entice a lawyer from his practice to that work. To answer the question in an offhand way I would say that the prime qualifications are intelligence, patience, industry, and anxiety to serve the best interests of the veteran.

Mr. Gillis: Is it not necessary that he should know something about the Pension Act?

Mr. Gregg: Oh yes, of course. He gets an orientation course in that.

Mr. Gillis: The reason I ask that is that at one time it was obligatory that a pension advocate must be a member of the legal profession, but that has been removed. It is necessary to know something about the machinery.

Mr. Cruickshank: So that it may be on the record, I should like to ask the minister a question. I should like to be corrected if I am wrong in my understanding of the procedure. Let us say a man is entitled to treatment for lung trouble and then, unfortunately, finds that he is affected by heart trouble; in such circumstances is he or is he not entitled to hospital treatment at, let us say, Shaughnessy hospital for that heart trouble, or only for his pensionable disability in respect of his lungs?

Mr. Gregg: Only for his pensionable disability.

Mr. Cruickshank: Then I should like to take issue with that. A case was brought to my attention which, I am pleased to say, was arranged satisfactorily. The person in question had been blinded at Ypres while serving in the first world war with the Princess Pats. Unfortunately about a month or two ago, owing to his blindness he walked into a woodpile and suffered injury to his elbow. This man was refused treatment in the hospital at Victoria because, it was stated, his elbow injury was not due to his war disability.

I must admit that this matter was straightened out satisfactorily. Surely if a man who was blinded because of his service either in the first or in the second world war meets with further difficulty, his blindness should constitute a disability. It is my view that if a man is disabled in any way owing to service in either of the great wars, whether he suffers from heart, lung or any other ailment, he should be entitled to hospital treatment. We in British Columbia have known of too many cases of brigadiers, generals and even major generals suffering from rheumatism, bad knees or something like that, but who have been able to secure treatment at Shaughnessy when the private soldier could not get treatment because, according to the regulations, he was not entitled to it.

In my view every veteran of either the first or second world war should be entitled to free hospitalization, without declaring himself a pauper. I certainly must object when a blinded man is barred from securing hospitalization for an ailment resulting from his blindness. I admit that, in the case I referred to at first, fair treatment was given; I wish to be fair about that, but I do urge that every consideration should be given by the department to any veteran of either war in the matter of hospitalization.

Mr. Gregg: "Eligibility due to service" might be either direct or indirect. The example of "indirect" would be the blind man injuring himself by walking into the woodpile. I think it will turn out that his injury was an indirect result of his service.

The other point I should like to make is that neither at Shaughnessy hospital nor at any other D.V.A. hospital across Canada is the ex-major general given any preferred treatment over the ex-private.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): A minute ago the minister said he was quite satisfied there were enough pensions advocates, and then he referred to the long time it took to prepare a case. Could he tell the committee the approximate number of appeals from Ontario in one year, and the number of pensions advocates to handle those appeals.

Mr. Gregg: Perhaps that might be discussed under item 537.

Mr. Herridge: The minister referred to pensions advocates. I understand that at the moment pensions advocates in British Columbia are located at Victoria and Vancouver. These two cities get all the preference in British Columbia in anything of importance. They have the ministers, and officials go to Vancouver or Victoria, and rarely come to the interior. Some years ago we had a veterans advocate located in the Kootenays, serving what would be considered the ridings of Yale, East Kootenay, West Kootenay, Kamloops and the north country. At the present time, with the advocates having to come from the coast periodically to serve this large area, I am sure that under present arrangements there is some unnecessary delay in interviewing men and taking up their cases. I would ask the minister and his officials to give consideration to locating at least one veterans advocate in the southern interior of British Columbia.

Mr. Gregg: We have included in the estimates an advance for such personnel as may be requested by the chief advocate. I shall discuss with him the points made tonight and if there is a necessity for more advocates the matter will be taken under careful consideration.

Item agreed to.

535. War veterans allowance board, administration, $203,960.

Mr. Wright: I notice there is a decrease of about $50,000 in this item. The details at page 320 would indicate that this decrease is due to a decrease in travelling expenses. This year there is a sum of $3,000 for travelling expenses as compared with $58,000 last year. Would the minister explain this difference? It seems to me that the board either does not intend to travel, or does not intend to do much inspection this year, as compared with last year. Under the amendment to the act regional boards are being set up, but I would expect those regional boards would cost some money to operate.

Mr. Gregg: I believe the hon. member was not in the house this afternoon when this matter was discussed under the administration item. In response to the hon. member for Kamloops I explained that a good deal of the work formerly reflected in the estimates for war veterans allowance is now being done under welfare services. He will notice a corresponding increase for travelling and other things under that heading. I would like also to add, however, that even with that I will need to ask in the supplementary estimates for more money for war veterans allowance in order to do just that thing which he has mentioned, namely, travelling by members of that board.

Mr. McLure: I should like to know what authority is given to the war veterans allowance board in a city like Charlottetown. What authority have they in the granting of a war veterans allowance? Is their report to Ottawa sufficient to decide the matter, or does Ottawa decide on the evidence produced by this board?

Mr. Gregg: The district office in Charlottetown has exactly the same authority in this and other matters as Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver or any of the larger cities. It is a complete set-up in itself. If my hon. friend wishes to look into that more fuly, I am sure he would be interested in the discussions which ranged around the amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act which passed through the Commons within the last few weeks.

By virtue of that amendment, we have undertaken to decentralize the work of the war veterans allowance board. Whereas in the past the board at Charlottetown looked into the applications, made recommendations to the board in Ottawa, and the board studied the matter and arrived at its decision, it is the intention in the future to have these decisions reached at Charlottetown. The members of the board will visit the local authorities from time to time for the purpose of co-ordination and to hear appeals from local decisions.

Mr. Jones: Will the minister explain the last item, "professional and special services", reduced by $12,000.

Mr. Gregg: Because of the transfer to welfare services. The hon. member will find it reflected there.

Item agreed to.

536. Veterans insurance, $77,495.

Mr. Lennard: In connection with this item, will the minister indicate how many applications there have been during the past several years, and how many policies were issued?

Mr. Mutch: Policies or applications?

Mr. Lennard: Both.

Mr. Gregg: I may state that during the past year—my hon. friend does not want the amount of money, just the number of applications?

Mr. Lennard: The number of applications, and the number of policies issued.

Mr. Gregg: As at April 30, 1950, a total of 27,337 applications had been received. At the same date, April 30, 1950, the policies in force numbered 23,824.

Mr. Fulton: What was spent last year on advertising and publicity under this item?

Mr. Gregg: There was $44 spent.

Mr. Fulton: I notice in the last issue of the public accounts which we have, reporting on the 1948-49 expenditures, advertising and publicity, which was estimated that year at $15,000, was allotted $13,000, and there was spent only $817.92. It appears that the estimate under this heading has been running consistently in excess of the actual expenditures on advertising and publicity in connection with veterans insurance at this time. Would the minister consider reducing the estimate under this heading? There is a consistent record, if I may call it that, of overestimating and underspending. I do not think it is good estimating practice to ask for so much more than is actually needed.

Mr. Gregg: I believe that without question there was an overestimation last year. The main reason for this amount this year is the fact that in 1951 the act runs out, I mean the cut-off date becomes effective. We feel it is important this year that all veterans be notified of that fact, so they may be able to get in under the Veterans Insurance Act before the cut-off date becomes effective.

Mr. Fulton: Has the department a definite advertising program worked out by which the committee can be satisfied that something in the neighbourhood of $5,000 will be spent?

Mr. Gregg: The cut-off date is in February of 1951, and plans are being worked out. The campaign plan is not completed yet, but thought is being given to it.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I know the cut-off date was proposed for 1951, but is it necessary to cut out the veterans insurance at that time? Why can the insurance not be allowed to run? I bet you there are thousands of Canadian veterans who came back from this war, like those who came back from the last war, who are not familiar with the benefits of the veterans insurance under this act. Very little advertising has been done. There has been little urging of the veterans to take advantage of this act. A few booklets have been written but they have not been very widely distributed. I bet you that in this city eight out of every ten veterans you might question about the reason why they should take insurance under this act would not be able to tell you anything about it. Instead of cutting down the advertising about this particular insurance, I think consideration should be given to wiping out the cut-off date. There is no reason why the government should not be in the insurance business for the veterans of this war and the last.

There should be more advertising. Someone should be selling that insurance in competition with the old line insurance companies. Many of the veterans cannot get insurance with the old line companies anyway. There is no comparison between them. Competition is supposed to be the life of trade, and I strongly urge the minister to give some consideration to advancing the cut-off date, and commencing an active advertising campaign on the benefits of this insurance to veterans. I do not believe in cutting down this particular item at all. I think we should extend it because there is no comparison between the insurance offered under this act and that offered by the old line companies.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to support what the member for Cape Breton South has said. I think experience in the first world war demonstrated that it was not until the majority of the veterans became settled and had families that many of them realized the benefits of this insurance. They could not get insurance with the old line companies. I was in that category myself. I was home for some years before I had a family, and then I realized I had a load to carry. I could not get insurance with the old line companies, so some years after the first world war I took out a policy under this provision. I am of the opinion that what the member for Cape Breton South has said is true. There will be a large number of veterans who will realize the value of this insurance in the next five years who have not realized it up to the moment. I do urge the minister to give consideration to that aspect of this question which is important to those veterans who, without doubt, will want to take advantage of it within the next five years.

Mr. Gregg: I should just like to reassure the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Kootenay West that this light has not been hidden under a bushel. The veterans insurance has been in all of the booklets on demobilization and since. The act came into effect in 1945 for three years. In 1948 we brought it forward and lifted the cut-off date for three more years, to 1951. I think we might do some modest advertising and see how it works out this year.

Mr. Lennard: Where is that advertising to be done?

Mr. Gregg: In those veterans periodicals and others that are most likely to reach the attention of the veterans.

Mr. Lennard: As to the veterans periodicals, one might say that there are so many members of one veterans organization or of another veterans organization, but few of these take their veterans organization's official magazine. As to the Canadian Legion, The Legionary is taken by very few of the members. I personally know that to be so in my own district. If the medium of advertising is through these veterans journals, then the veteran at large is certainly not hearing about it.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to make one point clear. I have to confess that when I asked the question with regard to this particular advertising, I did not know that the cut-off date would be next February. If that is the case, when the minister gives the explanation, I withdraw the suggestion I made that possibly this item for advertising could be reduced. I certainly think that, if the cut-off date is only February, wide publicity should be given to that fact. However, I am inclined to agree on the whole with the hon. member for Cape Breton South in the suggestion he has made. For a man in good health I do not think the veterans insurance policy is better than the ordinary policy but for the veterans who cannot get ordinary insurance I do not think there should be a cut-off date, and certainly not by 1951. For the man who is unable to get insurance otherwise through the private companies, I think the privilege of getting veterans insurance should be extended and carried on for, I would say, another five years. It seems to me, as the other hon. member pointed out, that many of these veterans perhaps only now are realizing their family obligations or in fact achieving family obligations; some of us find ourselves in that position. It is only now that they will be realizing the necessity for insurance and looking for that policy. I think the minister might well consider carrying it on for another five years.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us how long after the first world war it was possible to get this insurance? If I remember correctly what happened in the veterans affairs committee, the general feeling was that there should not be much hesitation in extending the cut-off date. I would hope that the minister is giving consideration now to extending that date next year.

Mr. Gregg: In view of the discussion tonight, Mr. Chairman, I shall be glad to give that matter careful consideration before any announcement is made as to the cut-off date.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us how long after the first war it was possible to get this insurance?

Mr. Gregg: I am afraid that none of us here can tell that exactly. Of my own personal knowledge I remember that it was extended several times. I think it was somewhere in the vicinity of 1935, but I am not sure.

Mr. Green: That is seventeen years.

Mr. Mutch: At least four extensions.

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister tell us whether this cut-off date of February 2, 1951, is a statutory provision?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, Mr. Chairman. It was in the amendments to the insurance act which I brought in in 1948.

Mr. Harkness: I would suggest to the minister that if that is the case it may be, and certainly I would think it is likely, that the house would not be meeting again in time to pass an amendment to this act before that date. If therefore anything were going to be done by us to extend the date, it would probably have to be done at this session.

An hon. Member: Or by order in council.

Mr. Harkness: Therefore it is a matter that should receive what you might call immediate consideration. There is another question I wish to ask as to the figures the minister gave of approximately 27,000 applications and approximately 23,000 policies issued. Do I understand that those are the numbers of applications and policies issued as from the inception of the act?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Harkness: My understanding has always been that this insurance was for the benefit of veterans who were unable to get an insurance policy from the ordinary line companies because of various disabilities they had and so forth. I was rather surprised to find that the number of applications exceeded the number of policies by some 5,000. I should like to ask the minister what the explanation of that is.

Mr. Gregg: Perhaps I should have explained that. The number of applications that I quoted was the grand total of applications from the beginning down to the present time. The number of policies in force were those actually in force at the present time, which did not take into consideration at all those whose policies had lapsed; for example, those who had died and whose policies had been paid.

Mr. Harkness: There is then no question of people having applied and having been turned down?

Mr. Gregg: Oh, no. There have been some turned down.

Mr. Harkness: There just have not been any cases of that kind?

Mr. Gregg: There were 58 declined out of the whole lot.

Mr. Harkness: What would be the reason for those 58 being turned down, just generally speaking? I do not mean to go into every case.

Mr. Gregg: I could not give it exactly, but to cover it generally it could be that they did not meet the requirements of the act. I suppose it probably might be lack of sufficient service or it might be for a number of reasons.

Mr. Harkness: There is one other question I want to ask. This is entirely the administration end of the veterans insurance. I had some question in my mind as to how this veterans insurance had worked out from the point of view of profit and loss. Has the government had a profit on this veterans insurance or has it suffered a loss up to date? If so, what is the amount of the profit or loss?

Mr. Gregg: I think this would answer my hon. friend. The treasury pays the cost of the administration, which is voted here.

Mr. Harkness: I meant apart from administration.

Mr. Gregg: Granted the cost of administration, then beyond that we believe it to be actuarially sound: no profit and no loss.

Mr. Harkness: Does that mean that up to date there has been a profit to the treasury, we will say, on the operation of this act? And if so, to what amount?

Mr. Lennard: The minister said "no profit and no loss".

Mr. Harkness: You cannot have that. That is not practically possible.

Mr. Gregg: To put it briefly the payments received on account of premiums on policies are paid into the fund; the amounts due on account of collections on policies are paid out of the fund. With that intake and outgo, there remained in the fund as at March 31, 1950, a total of $6,307,889.88.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Yale.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I had another question.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member should consider giving other hon. members an opportunity of asking questions. I understand that he wants to pursue a certain line of questioning; but suppose, for instance, he would like to pursue it for another twenty or twenty-five minutes. In that case no other hon. members could put any questions. He can always revert to his line of questioning.

Mr. Jones: My question has been partly answered. I wonder if the minister can tell us the total amount of insurance carried or the value of the insurance carried, the amount of premiums held by the government and, if possible, how those premiums are invested?

Mr. Gregg: The total value of the policies in force is $68,286,000 odd.

Mr. Johnston: How many have lapsed?

Mr. Gregg: On March 31, 1950, there were 1,092 lapses.

Mr. Jones: What premiums in total are held against this liability?

Mr. Gregg: The sum of $5,996,000. That is held by the Department of Finance.

Mr. Harkness: I was going to ask that question. Apparently there are premiums of $5,996,000 held against the policies. The total payments that have been received are $6,700,000. Is that extra $900,000 what might be called profit, or what is the basis of it?

Mr. Gregg: Perhaps this might answer my hon. friend's question. The total disbursements on account of deaths and so on, payments on policies, have been $311,021.83, leaving a net balance of $5,996,868.05, or a total of $6,307,889.88.

Mr. Wright: What interest does the Department of Finance pay, if any, to the insurance fund for the reserve of which they have the use?

Mr. Gregg: It is 3½ per cent.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think my question has been answered yet. There is a difference in the amount held as premiums against the policies of $5,900,000. Apparently there have been disbursements of $311,000. That still leaves some $500,000. My original question was as follows: Was the $800,000 profit, or what might be called profit? Apparently it has been reduced by the $311,000. I do not know whether that is actually so or not. Apparently you still have $6,700,000 on hand.

Mr. Gregg: I will be glad to send my hon. friend a copy of the balance sheet.

Mr. Lennard: When a private insurance company issues a policy the general rule is that if the policyholder pays in anything over possibly three premiums he has a paid up policy of some amount. Does that apply in this instance? If a veteran pays in for four years and then allows his policy to lapse has he any stake in it? If not, that is a departure from the general practice of insurance companies.

Mr. Gregg: The principle is incorporated in the insurance. I have not here the exact number of years, for instance, at which it remains paid up. The principle is incorporated in this insurance.

Mr. Johnston: A moment ago the minister gave the number that had lapsed. The number was well over a thousand. I could not catch the odd numbers. In any event can the minister give us the reasons for those lapses? How long do they have to reinstate their policies if they so desire?

Mr. Gregg: I presume the reasons would be the well known reasons why many of us have allowed our insurance in ordinary line companies to lapse—they did not have the money. If the man finds that he can get over whatever difficulty caused his policy to lapse he can renew his application and take out a new policy.

Mr. Johnston: How long a period does he have to reinstate it?

Mr. Gregg: Until the cut-off date, whenever that may be set. He can come back and apply again. Perhaps the hon. member means, how long would his policy run if it had been going for several years. I cannot give him that information offhand. I will try and get it for him.

Mr. Johnston: Is there any cash refund if he does not carry the policy on?

Mr. Gregg: This perhaps will throw some light on it. I said that the number that had lapsed was 1,092; but I am advised that there have been a total of 3,505 lapsed. Of those 3,505, 2,413 have been reinstated, leaving a net of 1,092 that are still lapsed.

Mr. Johnston: Is there any cash refund on those that are not reinstated? What is the rate of interest that is paid on their investment?

Mr. Gregg: I will get that information for my hon. friend.

Mr. Harkness: A little while ago the minister said that he would send me a copy of the balance sheet. That is very nice. I may get it in a week or so, but it will certainly not be any good to me as far as the discussion on this estimate is concerned. As far as I can make out, there is some $500,000, probably more than that, on which we have not been given any explanation. I asked whether it was profit, whether it was reserves or what the situation was in connection with it. That is the explanation I should like to have.

Mr. Gregg: Let us take a date, say March 31, 1950. My hon. friend has a sharp pencil. Under the heading of receipts appears the fund as at March 31, 1949. That is carried forward, and amounts to $4,156,238.49. Still under receipts appears, interest on fund at 3½ per cent, $168,536.15. Under that, interest on overdue premiums, $140.71. Under that, premiums received, $1,980,085.28. Under that, claim repayments recovered through subsequent awards under the Pension Act, death benefits, under a subheading, $2,061,28; annuity payments, $872.97. These are all under receipts. The total is $6,307,889.88.

Now, under expenditures, payments at death—includes $4,892.40 paid up insurance, section 10—the total there is $92,057.44. There were annuity payments of $36,458.92. Excess premiums refunded amounted to $28,976 27. Cash surrender values paid—this partly answers the question asked—$149,538.93. Payments under change of plan of policy, $2,990.27. Total disbursements, $311,021.83. The difference between that and the total net receipts gives a balance of $5,996,868.05, making a total of $6,307,889.88.

Mr. Harkness: The minister said the payments into the fund were $6,700,000 odd, which still leaves $500,000. Where does that come in?

Mr. Gregg: I am afraid I do not understand just where the hon. member gets his $500,000.

Mr. Harkness: The minister said the receipts were $5,900,000, which is the figure just given to us made up of a number of smaller items, but he said at the same time that the payments into the fund amounted to $6,700,000, which gives a difference of some $800,000. The total payments out were $311,000, which leaves out of the $800,000 approximately $500,000.

Mr. Gregg: I am afraid my earlier figures misled the hon. member. The $5 million figure was not a payment into the fund, it was the net balance of the fund itself.

Item agreed to.

Payments to or for veterans and dependents—

537. Pensions for disability and death, including pensions granted under the authority of the civilian government employees (war) compensation order P.C. 45/8848 of 22nd November, 1944, which shall be subject to the Pension Act, $99,739,000.

Mr. Cardiff: I received a complaint the other day, in connection with the pension of £10 which is paid when a Victoria Cross is awarded, about this money being in sterling rather than Canadian funds.

Mr. Gregg: The item we are on deals with disability pensions but I shall attempt to answer the hon. member. In world war I there were certain awards such as the Victoria Cross and the Distinguished Conduct Medal which carried pensions. If the Victoria Cross was won by a man in the ranks he received a pension of £10 per year in English money from the war office; if it was won by an officer, he got nothing. In the second world war Canada assumed the responsibility of making these payments. I am rather inclined to think that the inquiry the hon. member refers to has to do with a Victoria Cross won in the first great war.

Mr. Cardiff: That is so.

Mr. Gregg: I suppose it indicates the growth of our Canadian nationhood that in 1919 it was considered that these should be paid in the way they were, and in this last war the method of payment was changed. The following is the list of awards being made by Canada to recipients in world war II:

	No. of recipients	Total amount paid
Victoria Cross	2	$ 100.00
George Medal	3	150.00
Military Medal	252	11,498.76
D.S.M.	8	365.04
D.F.M.	42	1,916.46
D.F.C.	14	638.82
M.C.	3	136.89
D.C.M.	40	1,825.20

With regard to the military crosses it will be noted that if won by an officer, no pension is paid, but where won by a warrant officer, a pension is paid.

Mr. Cardiff: This man complains that he is being discriminated against because the pound has gone down in value, and I think this amounts to a difference of $37 per year.

Mr. Gregg: I have had correspondence with some recipients of this pension. The hon. member will realize that the amount is more of a token payment than anything else. There have been other recipients who have stated to me that they would like to have the payments continue from the original source, the war office. I assure my hon. friend that I shall keep it in mind.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I wonder if I could ask one question? At the last veterans affairs committee there was a brief on behalf of the Hong Kong veterans. Can the minister tell us how many of the Hong Kong veterans are receiving a pension and whether or not the pensions board gives any special allowances or consideration to them?

Mr. Gregg: I know my hon. friend was not in the committee this afternoon, and I hope he will read the statement I made about the Hong Kong veterans with regard to both treatment and pensions. The number in receipt of pension was just around 1,000, and approximately 200 more have entitlement for free hospitalization who are not in receipt of pension. This is out of a total of 1,415 survivors.

Item agreed to.

538. Newfoundland special awards, $46,000.

Mr. Higgins: This item appears to be cut almost in half and perhaps the minister could explain. The minister might also explain just what this item covers.

Mr. Gregg: The item is trimmed to the actual need. As my hon. friend may know, before the union of Newfoundland with Canada there were a few veterans in Newfoundland who were in receipt of pension from the G.W.V.A., which was to all intents and purposes administering moneys under the former government of Newfoundland. In order to fulfil the terms of union to the last dollar it was arranged that this should come in as a special item and be carried forward as long as these particular recipients were alive.

Mr. Higgins: The need for this has now gone?

Mr. Gregg: The need for part of it is gone.

Mr. Higgins: Who advised you that the need was gone?

Mr. Gregg: They have all been provided for.

Item agreed to.

539. War veterans allowances, $21,715,000.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to ask the minister whether this estimate includes the increased amount which it is estimated will be required as a result of the changes in the War Veterans Allowance Act to extend the benefit thereof to people who served in British and other allied forces during the first war?

Mr. Gregg: No, Mr. Chairman, that is not reflected here. It will be necessary to ask for a further supplementary amount of approximately $2 million. When these estimates were compiled the bill had not been brought forward.

Mr. Harkness: The increase of $2 million is entirely due to the greater number of people who will become eligible this year?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Item agreed to.

540. Assistance fund (war veterans allowance), $750,000.

Mr. Lennard: I should like to ask how this money was distributed by provinces, what amount in each province?

Mr. Gregg: It is not allotted in accordance with the population. As has been explained before, the intent of the fund is to take care of cases of hardship amongst recipients of war veterans allowance who have no other means of support. This breakdown is at the end of the fiscal year, March 31, 1950. It is as follows:

Province or city	Applications Approved	Amount
Newfoundland	44	$ 1,664.35
Charlottetown (P.E.I.)	97	6,987.68
Halifax (Nova Scotia)	430	25,918.48
Saint John (New Brunswick)	492	29,155.15
Quebec (eastern Quebec)	190	10,432.30
Montreal (western Quebec)	1,093	69,475.40
Ottawa	252	10,020.00
Kingston	122	7,441.67
Toronto	1,229	114,702.14
Hamilton	301	14,923.77
London	370	29,250.64
North Bay	287	14,996.90

Mr. Lennard: How many were monthly payments and how many were outright grants?

Mr. Gregg: We have never demanded that our district offices break that down for us. It would be a very difficult thing to do. Based upon the need in some cases, there might well be a grant to overcome the difficulty and a little later an increase in the war veterans allowance. Except as a matter of general interest, I doubt very much whether if it would be worth all the work that would be involved in preparing a statistical record.

Mr. Lennard: In other words, these amounts are for monthly payments?

Mr. Gregg: No, these are payments for the fiscal year, for the number of people in each district that I have indicated for the first year of the fund's history.

Mr. Lennard: But they were monthly payments?

Mr. Gregg: Not necessarily. Many of them were but some of them were not.

Mr. Lennard: Does the cost of administration come out of this item?

Mr. Gregg: No, the cost of administration is taken care of by the welfare vote.

Mr. Green: This particular form of help was first introduced in the fiscal year 1949-50, and for that year it was set at $500,000. For the present fiscal year there is an increase to $750,000. Last year the provision was really an experiment. The minister told us that he wanted to see how it would work out before deciding on a permanent policy. Is the minister now in a position to tell us what the permanent policy is to be? If assistance of this type is to be continued then I suggest there should be some statute behind it so that these veterans will not be dependent on the bringing in of an annual vote. That is always a very uncertain way to provide for payments. It would seem that we should very soon be reaching the stage of having some statute to define just what the rights are. Perhaps the minister can tell us whether his department has reached any final conclusion as to this matter. I think it should also be pointed out to the minister again that the very fact he is finding it necessary to increase the amount for these grants shows that the amount of war veterans allowance payable is insufficient. These amounts are paid to help recipients of war veterans allowance, and if the amount of war veterans allowance were increased there would not be such need for the grant. I am sure that veterans would prefer to have an increase in their war veterans allowance instead of having to pass a second means test in order to receive payments from the assistance fund.

Then, there is another feature. As I understand the present regulations, a man cannot qualify for any help whatever unless he is drawing full war veterans allowance. It would appear to me that if he is getting a small pension of, let us say, $25 a month, and then gets a certain amount by way of war veterans allowance, he cannot qualify for help under this fund.

I have here a notice sent out by the Vancouver office which refers to "any veteran or veteran's widow in receipt of full war veterans allowance, who is in need." That is, they have to come within that classification in order to qualify for help.

I am wondering why there is that strict provision. Why is the regulation not made wide enough so that help can be given to any veterans in receipt of some war veterans allowance? I believe there are many cases where a veteran may be drawing only partial war veterans allowance, and yet he may be badly in need of help of this kind. He cannot qualify for it because of the present regulation.

Then, there is one other point; apparently in making an investigation, before allowing any help from this fund, investigators go into all sorts of details. For instance, question 13 on the form refers to entitlement to assistance from other sources, such as social assistance, mothers' allowance, old age pensions, family allowance, medical and hospital care, and other things.

Surely that is going pretty far. Does it mean that an attempt is made to shove the veteran off onto the city authorities for social assistance or, if it is a widow, onto the provincial authorities for mothers' allowance? I do not think the attitude should be that these veterans or widows must try every other source for help before becoming eligible for assistance from this fund. Would the minister explain the situation with regard to these different points?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, dealing with the maximum of war veterans allowance, if the recipient were not in receipt of the maximum available, and were in need, then he could be raised to that maximum under the regular terms of the war veterans allowance. That is why we refer to the recipient who is in receipt of the maximum war veterans allowance available. Because if he is not in receipt, and is in need, then he can be brought up to that maximum.

Mr. Green: What about the small pensioner?

Mr. Gregg: Perhaps I had better read the regulation, word for word:

> Amount allowed: no recipient may receive assistance in any twelve consecutive months in an amount greater than the difference between his total income including war veterans allowance and income from other sources and the maximum amount of income allowed under the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946. In no case shall the amount exceed $120 for a recipient awarded the rate for a single person or $180 for a recipient of war veterans allowance in the amount of $70.83 a month if awarded otherwise.

In practice I am told that the receipt of a small pension does not debar him from participation in the assistance fund.

Mr. Green: Even although he is getting a pension of, let us say, $25; that would allow him about $25 war veterans allowance. Would a man in that position be entitled to get this assistance? If so, the regulation should be clarified.

Mr. Gregg: With his pension and his war veterans allowance we can bring him up to the maximum permissible income.

Mr. Green: I want to get that clear; take the case I mentioned where the man gets a pension of $25. He is allowed $10 over and above war veterans allowance, so that he would get $10 clear, and then the remaining $15 of his pension would cut down the amount of his war veterans allowance to $25.41. In the way these regulations read at the present time that man would be ineligible for any assistance from this fund, because he is not getting $40.41 war veterans allowance.

Mr. Gregg: We are able to augment such a man's pension up to the maximum of the permissible income.

Mr. Green: But you do not have to augment it. He is entitled to a pension of $25.

Mr. Gregg: His war veterans allowance, I should say.

Mr. Green: He is entitled to a pension of $25 and under the War Veterans Allowance Act he is entitled to an allowance of $25.41, making a total of $50.41. Can the minister give him further help from this fund?

Mr. Gregg: No, we have already lifted it.

Mr. Green: But he could get that before this fund was ever brought into existence. There is no help for him at all from the fund, in those circumstances. Surely some discretion should be given to the district to help these men if they are in need.

Mr. Gregg: I believe I have answered the hon. member as best I can. The normal maximum augmentation of the $25 pension for a single man would be another $25.40, thus bringing it up to $50.

Mr. Green: But he is entitled to get war veterans allowance bringing him up to $50 anyway. I am asking whether he is entitled to any help from this fund.

Mr. Gregg: Not above the $50 in this case, no.

Mr. Green: There is the other point I mentioned with which the minister has not dealt yet, the question of putting this into legislation.

Mr. Gregg: The answer to that briefly, Mr. Chairman, is that this last year has been the first year for the fund. I do not think my hon. friend is justified in criticizing us for increasing the amount of the estimate this year when we feel the need is there. We might have been subject to criticism if the need had been there and we had not increased the estimate.

Mr. Green: I am criticizing you because you have not increased the war veterans allowance.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Mr. Gregg: There is a good reason for that, and I should like to say a word about what our policy within the department is this year. Frankly, during this year, we would like to utilize this assistance fund to take care of hardship, as we started to do last year, while the discussions mature about old age security generally. There is no question about it; this War Veterans Allowance Act, with the assistance fund alongside of it, is old age security. If my hon. friend wishes me to tell him what I should like to see, it is this. Under the theory of the pre-ageing effect of battle, it has been established that war veterans should get the war veterans allowance ten years earlier than the old age pension would be received, or at the age of 60. I am glad that has happened, even though I do not agree that every individual who survived in battle was pre-aged by ten years. I am sure my hon. friend was not. Nevertheless, I am glad it happened.

When social security for the aged is worked out on behalf of all our people, then whether it is five years or ten years, whatever it might be, I hope that the amount of the war veterans allowance going to the veteran in each of the provinces, in that period between 60 and 70 we shall say, will be the same as it would be for all the people after the age of 70. In other words, in my own province at the present time the war veterans allowance between 60 and 70 is almost exactly the same as the old age pension for the rest of the people from 70 until death. In my hon. friend's province, for 75 per cent of the recipients, the war veterans allowance has been augmented to bring it up to $50 per month as a sort of cost of living bonus. I should like to see the time when the veterans of the various provinces will receive the same as the residents of those provinces are receiving under the old age pension. Now, it is going to take a lot of planning to work that out, but in reality that is the real reason why I would rather see hardship overcome during these two years by this patchwork method, if you will, rather than by making an over-all increase from the eastern border of Saskatchewan to Newfoundland inclusive, which would bring the war veterans allowance, from 60 until death, ten dollars higher than the old age pension from 70 until death for the rest of the population.

Mr. Green: This is a temporary arrangement, pending some change in policy. I just want to say a word about the other point with which I was dealing. If a non-pensioned veteran drawing $40.41 war veterans allowance has an income of $10 outside his war veterans allowance, he can still get help from this fund. But take the case of a small pensioner, if he gets $10 extra in addition to his pension, he can get no help whatever from the fund. The way the regulation is worded now, it does not work out fairly, and I think there should be a change in the wording of the regulation, instead of basing it on the fact the man draws a total of $40.41 war veterans allowance. Some other line should be drawn.

Mr. Gregg: I shall be glad to make a careful study of that, Mr. Chairman, and have it reviewed by the counsel within the department who has given a lot of thought to this matter of the assistance fund.

Mr. Knowles: I heard the minister give a figure as to the percentage of recipients of war veterans allowance in one province who had their allowance supplemented by $50. During the discussion has he given those percentages for the other provinces, and if not, could he do so now?

Mr. Gregg: I have that in my office, but not here. I remember British Columbia figures particularly because I have been told so often in this house that the war veterans allowance is so much lower in British Columbia than the old age pension.

Mr. Green: So it is.

Mr. Gregg: Let me reply to that by stating that 76 per cent of the applicants in British Columbia for war veterans allowance assistance have been granted assistance for which they applied. Of the recipients of old age pensions in British Columbia, 74·2 per cent are receiving the extra $10 per month if they have lived in British Columbia three years, and it is looked upon as a cost of living bonus.

Mr. Harkness: That causes me to ask a question. So far as Calgary was concerned, the figure given by the minister worked out to about $40 per year, and that was given to 319 people who applied for assistance under this particular provision. He says now that in British Columbia 75 per cent of the people on war veterans allowance have been brought up to the scale of the old age pension. The scale for the old age pension in Alberta is higher than in British Columbia at the present time; it is the highest in Canada. Apparently the war veterans in Alberta have only had an average of $40 per year increase, so they have not been brought up to anything like the scale of the old age pension.

Mr. Gregg: I did not state that 70 per cent of the applicants for war veterans allowance had been brought up to $50. I said that their cases had been cared for. I would also indicate that even at the average of the amount shown for Calgary, it has been rather surprising to see the degree of hardship that could be overcome by spot amounts of $25, $30, $40, or $50. It has helped in a great many cases.

Mr. Harkness: But my point still remains. How is it that 75 per cent of the people in Alberta have not been brought up to the scale of the old age pensions if they have in British Columbia?

Mr. Gregg: I did not suggest that, Mr. Chairman. I could also ask the question, if I wanted to do so, why a larger per capita amount had not been spent in the province of New Brunswick, or on behalf of my friends in Newfoundland. We are more economical down there.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister about the supplementary amount that has been paid in British Columbia. He says that 75 per cent of the recipients of the war veterans allowance assistance have received spot payments of $40 or $50 to tide them over. Were those $40 to $50 payments a temporary arrangement or a more or less permanent thing?

Mr. Gregg: Some of those will be payments of $10 per month to single men or $15 per month to a man and his wife, while others will be spot payments, and others will be small amounts of money to help the veteran overcome a difficulty. I did not at all attempt to indicate, and if I did I take it back, that they were all in any sense regular amounts paid for the twelve months of the year.

Mr. McCusker: I should like to ask the minister if there is a greater proportion of veterans in British Columbia asking for assistance than in the other provinces. It seems to me the grants there are considerably heavier.

Mr. Gregg: I would not say that they are, Mr. Chairman. I would say, however, that there is a much larger proportion of veterans in British Columbia, both old and young, in comparison with the rest of the population, than in any other part of Canada. That is because of the climate.

Mr. McCusker: I am not doubting what the minister said, and I do not want to seem to be doing so. I think the minister said that 2,400 applied for assistance in British Columbia compared with about 400 in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Gregg: Who had been accepted.

Mr. McCusker: Who had been accepted.

Mr. Gregg: 2,751 in Vancouver.

Mr. McCusker: Compared to how many in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Gregg: That is Saskatoon and Regina, which takes in all Saskatchewan?

Mr. McCusker: Yes.

Mr. Gregg: 432.

Mr. McCusker: I do not think that there are seven times as many veterans in British Columbia as there are in Saskatchewan.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. McCusker: I should like to have an answer to that question.

Mr. Gregg: The census is to be taken next year and we shall have for the first time in Canada a real picture of the veteran population. The bureau of statistics have agreed to do that. Until then I am sure I would not be able to answer the question correctly.

Item agreed to.

Payments to or for veterans and dependents—

541. Unemployment assistance, $50,000.

Mr. McLure: This is only a small item, but I should like the minister to explain what unemployment assistance is. Large amounts have been gone over tonight. For instance, there is an item for temporary employment. We have already voted about $25 million without asking any questions. But I should like to know what this small item is.

Mr. Gregg: This vote is a traditional one. It has been in the estimates for about twenty years. One of these days perhaps we shall merge it with something else. It has played a useful part, and it provides for controlled assistance, generally in the form of cash, to provide shelter, lodging, fuel and food to veterans in the following classifications who are unemployed and in necessitous circumstances:

(1) Veterans who served with the Canadian forces during world war I and who are in receipt of a small disability pension under the Canadian Pension Act. Perhaps this will be some satisfaction to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra because some of those he mentioned may receive assistance here.

(2) Veterans who served with His Majesty's forces other than Canadian during world war I or with forces of His Majesty's allies during world war I who are in receipt of a small disability pension and were resident in Canada on or before December 1, 1924. Under category B this little fund will now be relieved by the effect of my bill that went through the other day. I am sorry, but if the hon. member for Queens asked me a direct question, I did not catch it. May I ask if he would repeat it.

Mr. McLure: I was just asking what this amount was for, and the minister has given practically a general view of it. How much of this was paid out last year? Under what terms does a veteran make application for this assistance? It is something new. I do not know whether or not any of it is being paid out in my province. I should just like to find out whether it is or not; and if not, why not.

Mr. Gregg: Each district is familiar with this little emergency fund; and from time to time there come to their attention veterans within this category who are in need of assistance immediately; and amounts from this fund are used. For the year 1949-50 a total of $29,964 was utilized. Of that, $3,848 was in the way of cash assistance to veterans in need in the categories I have mentioned; $240 was to assist in the purchase of clothing. The number of veterans involved was 1,068.

Mr. Bater: Are these veterans who cannot qualify under unemployment insurance or is this a supplement to unemployment insurance?

Mr. Gregg: Yes. These veterans would not be able to qualify under unemployment insurance, no.

Mr. Gillis: Is that fund administered provincially, and who administers it?

Mr. Gregg: Our district office in Halifax, Saint John, Charlottetown and so on.

Mr. Gillis: You have not the break-down of that by provinces, have you?

Mr. Gregg: No, I have not.

Item agreed to.

Soldier Settlement and Veterans Land Act—

547. To provide for the cost of administration of Veterans Land Act; soldier settlement and British family settlement, $4,563,514.

Mr. Hansell: The minister will have to tell me whether or not I am speaking under the correct item. If I should come in on a later item, I shall be glad to defer discussion until then. But I have a case which might be typical of several others. It is that of a war veteran who sought the benefits of the loans offered to veterans for machinery to run his farm. This particular veteran had only put in 259 days and his service was in the western hemisphere. Evidently he was not able to get the loan. In a letter to the minister I explained the situation and I received a reply from one of his officials who evidently answered the inquiry owing to the minister's absence from his office. The answer I received was the report that was given on this young man's case. That was not the answer I wanted, because the young chap himself gave me the same report, which he had also received some little while before.

The regulations were quoted, and evidently the young veteran has to put in a certain length of time before he can qualify. I am wondering whether that is simply a hard and fast rule or whether the rule could not be made flexible enough to take in deserving cases. According to this young man's interview with me, he was not entirely responsible for his early discharge. He wanted to remain in the forces and he also wanted to go overseas. I must confess the young man feels that perhaps he has been discriminated against a little for some reason or other. I am wondering whether the minister would agree to look into this case further to see if something can be done for this young man. He does not want a grant; he wants a loan. It would appear that he is able to pay back a loan. At present he is residing on land that he is farming. It looks good, and there appears to me to be no risk on the part of the government to grant the loan to this young man under the regulations, if it is possible for him to get under the present regulations.

If there is no risk taken I do not see why he, as well as others who may have been in the army a week longer than he was, are not able to receive the benefit of the loan. I know that in all of these things you have to draw the line somewhere; but in a case like this of a young chap, who after all offered himself and was in the forces, it does seem to me that he should be able to get the benefit of this. As a matter of fact, it is not a benefit; it is simply an accommodation.

I am wondering whether the regulations could be made more flexible, or whether the minister will not look a little further into this case, with a view to trying to accommodate this particular individual.

Mr. Gregg: It is not a matter of the regulations; it is in the act. A great deal of thought was given to this by those who worked on it here and framed the act. The result of their deliberations was: for the veteran who had service overseas, yes; if he were a pensioner on any amount, yes; if he had 365 days, in the western hemisphere, yes. As my hon. friend says, they felt that there had to be a fair cut-off day somewhere, and one year appeared to be sound. Bear in mind that service of less than that time did entitle the veteran to some re-establishment credit for his service, so he was not left out entirely. But for the purpose of this act it was considered that either 365 days, a pension or service overseas was the governing factor. It is there in the act, and I think that it has met with general acceptance. I feel sorry, as my hon. friend does, for those that we have had to turn down. We have not granted any at all under that 365 days. I have one on my desk now for 363 days which I have to turn down; so there it is.

Mr. Harkness: The travelling expenses under the Veterans Land Act, soldier settlement board, seem to be pretty high. I see it is estimated at $600,000 this year. Last year it was $550,000. I was wondering whether it was necessary to have that amount for travelling expenses. I do not know how much of this $550,000 was spent last year. I would like the minister to tell us that. In my own experience with this I think that there is probably a great deal more running around the country than is entirely necessary.

During the last year, for example, there was a sort of garden competition held for small holdings. I know that the supervisors and others ran all over the country looking at those gardens to see which one had made the greatest improvement. A prize was given for the garden which showed the greatest improvement. As a matter of fact, these people went around in threes. I happen to know of three of the supervisors who went around to the men's places looking at their gardens. They spent considerable time there. Then they went on to somebody else's place. They spent a great deal of time doing that. It seems to me that the travelling expenses incurred as a result of these people doing that amounted to a large amount. I do not know how many of them did it. It must have been a large number across Canada as a whole. The cost of that was extensive. I doubt very much whether any good result came from it. This is one instance of the way in which considerable amounts of money are being, if not wasted, at any rate very close to it, in the way of travelling expenses under the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. Gregg: To answer my hon. friends' question, last year the sum of $574,340 was spent in travelling expenses. It is a large amount. I think it will be realized that those who followed the experiences of the soldier settlement board from 1920 on, and saw the losses incurred by the treasury and the taxpayer on account of veterans being placed on land and left to a great extent to fend for themselves under circumstances that they did not understand, losing their morale in many instances, and coming to the point on two occasions where these loans had to be cut off, or substantial portions of them, will not object. We are now in the process of clearing up these problem cases at the latter end. It was determined that this time men going on the land should have follow-up assistance.

I can assure my hon. friend that the directors, and field supervisors in Alberta and elsewhere, do not enjoy driving their cars out over the hills; they do not do it as a matter of pleasure. But so far—and we are not going to brag too soon—the Veterans Land Act plan both for the farm and the small holdings is moving forward with a good deal of success.

My hon. friend spoke of the competition last year. I am not going to make any apologies either for the competition itself, the prizes, the running around or the publicity with regard to that competition. It will be remembered that two years ago it was my duty to bring to this house in estimates a demand for large sums of money for what I was pleased to call remedial purposes. What it was for was to try and fix up quickly built structures on our subdivisions across Canada, some of which were bad, but often worse in the minds of those who lived in them, because they were discouraged.

By the efforts of the director and the staff with the people living on those subdivisions, that phase ended and eventually they achieved a measure of enthusiasm for brightening up their property, and growing some garden on it, and as a result of the competition held last year as applied to the small holdings and subdivisions I can tell my hon. friend that the whole standard of the homes on those subdivisions has been greatly raised. So much so that this year we are carrying on a similar scheme of competition as between small holdings which are independently located, not on subdivisions. On the other hand, we will continue to make as large economies as we can in the travelling expenses here, commensurate with service to the veterans.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up third reading of Bill No. 265, respecting the units of electrical and photometric measure; then the resolution which appears in today's Votes and Proceedings to provide and maintain a residence for the Prime Minister which the Minister of Trade and Commerce will wish to advance as far as possible. I am told that there are some amendments from the Senate to the Income Tax Act which may come up. I have not seen the Minister of Finance but I am announcing them in case it is possible to go ahead. We will proceed with Bill No. 209, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939, if the Minister of Agriculture is in Ottawa. Then Bill No. 133 and Bill No. 134 concerning national defence and the Militia Pension Act. There is also a resolution in the name of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to amend, consolidate and clarify the Indian Act. If time is left we will take up the estimates of veterans affairs. On Thursday it is our intention to proceed with national defence estimates.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

528. Departmental administration, $2,175,279.

529. District administration, $2,894,311.
