FIRST AND SECOND REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Motion agreed to.

VACANCY

HALIFAX—APPOINTMENT OF GORDON B. ISNOR TO THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication from two members notifying me that the following vacancy has occurred in the representation, viz.:

Of Gordon B. Isnor, Esquire, a member for the electoral district of Halifax, consequent upon his being summoned to the Senate.

I have accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to say to you, sir, and through you to hon. members of the house, that following the issue of your warrant to the chief electoral officer, he has been directed to issue writs for by-elections to be held in the following electoral districts: Annapolis-Kings, Cartier, and Halifax, on June 19 next.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my deskmate, but I am sorry for myself. I am sorry to lose such a deskmate. If any other hon. member had sat in my place during this session and the last, he would have appreciated the many fine characteristics of the member who has been removed heavenwards. His outstanding characteristics are Christian courtesy and helpfulness. Fifteen years ago we advised the prime minister to send young men into the Senate. This advice was heeded, and now they are sending wise men from the east. We congratulate the Senate.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, now that a close personal parliamentary friend of mine, the former member for Halifax, has just completed another stage in what the member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) referred to as the pilgrim's progress, I could not permit this opportunity to pass without saying a few words. Having come into the House of Commons at the same time as the former member for Halifax who has now been appointed to the Senate, I suppose it is a favourable commentary upon the House of Commons itself to say that political lines interfere but little in the friendships or the good relations that people have with each other in this parliament. I always liked Gordon Isnor. Perhaps that is putting the matter in as plain and simple terms as one can put it. I liked him because he was honest and straightforward. More than that, he was a sound parliamentarian, even though sometimes we did not see soundness in exactly the same way. In addition, he came into this House of Commons as one who had had a wide and successful business career, and in that career, as we all know, he has since had continued success.

I want to say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the new senator who cannot take his accustomed seat among us today, that from this side of the house come the best wishes that a member can have from political opponents or friends on an occasion such as this. It is true that his appointment to the Senate will throw that body somewhat further out of balance, having regard to political affiliations; on the other hand, while I know that the Prime Minister is anxious to see that the Senate does not become too far out of balance, may I say to him that this by-election may perhaps see the House of Commons put in a little better balance.

When the new senator takes his seat I hope he will adopt the same judicial and non-partisan air that some senators have been known to adopt in the past. If he does that and keeps out of party politics, it will help us to win Halifax in the next by-election.

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): As the junior member from the province of Nova Scotia, I want to say how pleased I am at the elevation to the Senate of a colleague who had been one of the members for Halifax. What is the loss to the House of Commons will be the other place's gain. I know of no other person in Nova Scotia who in the past thirty years has taken such a keen interest in the welfare not only of his own constituency but of every part of the province as well as of this great dominion.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Knowles: The senior member for Halifax.

Mr. Dickey: —speaking for the constituency of Halifax, I should like to say that the many friends and supporters of Gordon Isnor in Halifax will be pleased at the honour that has been done him in appointing him to the Senate. The people of Halifax will realize at least as well as the members of this house how well merited that honour is.

Mr. L. A. Mutch (Winnipeg South): As one of the rapidly dwindling number of members of this house who came here in 1935 for the first time, I should like to express the pleasure it has been for me, as a western member, to have the advantage of the friendship and the advice of Gordon Isnor during these years in the House of Commons. But it is not particularly with respect to that that I wish to speak today. It is in the memory of everyone in this house, and in the experience of many, that during the period of Gordon Isnor's membership in this house the port of Halifax, which he never let us forget, became one of the great strategic war centres of the Dominion of Canada. I greatly doubt, sir, whether during those war years any other private member of this house, in uniform or out of it, contributed more to the good feeling which existed between the civilian population generally and the members of the armed forces than did Gordon Isnor. I dislike to talk in this way, because it sounds as though he were dead; on the other hand it is perhaps the only opportunity I shall have to pay this tribute.

I am morally certain that among the armed forces of the Dominion of Canada there are hundreds, if not thousands, of navy men, army and air force men who have had personal contact with and who enjoyed the benefit of the friendly assistance and co-operation of Gordon Isnor in that port of Halifax through which most of our serving personnel passed.

Because of that fact, and because of the scores, if not hundreds, of personal contacts I myself have had, I am sure that they, together with us, will remember his kindly good offices and will be glad that he has been rewarded—if it is a reward—by recognition by his Prime Minister, and that he has been sent to the place in which he will be able, without the problems that confront us in the House of Commons, to be, as he has always been, the real friend of those men and women in this country who put Canada first.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Speaking for the maritimes of the Pacific coast, Mr. Speaker, and having been a guest of Gordon Isnor—and no finer host that I know of and no finer gentleman could have been elevated—I want to congratulate him. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I also want to tell the Prime Minister and the government that I am available from the Pacific coast.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I rise to utter a word of complaint, Mr. Speaker. In Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure many words are set out as unparliamentary. I think that section should be amended so that when anyone speaks of someone going from this place to the other place and calls it an elevation, he will be using unparliamentary language.

Mr. Mutch: I said "if it is"; I did not say it was.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 152, to amend the Canadian Red Cross Society Act.—Mr. Macnaughton.

BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

REFERENCE TO PRESS DISPATCH AS TO CANADA'S POSITION—THE KING'S TITLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of a Reuters dispatch of yesterday's date from Capetown, in which the Prime Minister of South Africa stated as a positive fact that Canada was dissatisfied with her position in the commonwealth, will the Prime Minister take the appropriate steps to remove any uncertainty on this score?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I do not think it requires any deliberation, Mr. Speaker, to be able to state that there is no justification I know of for any such statement to be made by anyone. The dispatch also referred to dissatisfaction with the king's title. That must be based upon some resolution or motion that was before this house a couple of years ago, pointing out that His Majesty's title was no longer in strict accordance with the facts. No dissatisfaction was expressed with the title, but a statement was made here some time ago that it no longer corresponds with the present situation in the commonwealth because the title does not include Ireland. At that time it was said that when it was modified it would probably not be appropriate for Northern Ireland to be specially mentioned in the title and the other units of the commonwealth lumped together under a general description; and that possibly when consideration was being given to any change in the title there would not be merely the elimination of the reference to Ireland. I know of nothing else that could be any semblance of justification for the story that was shown me last night by a member of the press gallery.

Mr. Adamson: May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question? The title of His Majesty was actually changed some years ago, was is not?

Mr. St. Laurent: It was changed some years ago, but since that time the republic of Ireland has ceased to be a member of the commonwealth. It is my impression—I have not the text before me—that the title still reads: "King of Great Britain, Ireland," and so on. It was felt that some change would have to be made there, and it might not be appropriate to substitute for "Ireland" the term "Northern Ireland" and leave the other units of the commonwealth lumped together as "The British dominions beyond the seas."

Mr. Adamson: The change I am thinking of, Mr. Speaker, is in regard to the Indian empire. I am looking at a 1940 five-cent piece; now, our coinage omits the Latin abbreviation "Ind. Imp." I think the change was made in 1947.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, and that change was assented to in this parliament by a special act, as is now required by the provisions of the Statute of Westminster.

THE SENATE

INQUIRY AS TO FILLING OF NEWFOUNDLAND AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND VACANCIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that over a year has elapsed since the act of union between Newfoundland and Canada, and there are still three vacancies in the Senate to which Newfoundland is entitled, when does the government propose to make these three appointments?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government is giving very serious consideration to a number of candidates, and I can assure the hon. member that he will not be omitted.

Mr. McLure: Since we are on the subject of new appointments to the Senate, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. We have a vacancy in Queens county, and I should like to know from the Prime Minister when that vacancy will be filled.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is not to my knowledge that there is a vacancy in Queens county. It is to my knowledge that there is a vacancy in the province of Prince Edward Island, and when a decision has been reached with respect to it I will, without any delay whatsoever, bring it to the attention of this house.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

COMMUNIST ACTIVITIES IN CANADA

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, events of the past few days have suggested the desirability of the immediate consideration of communist activities here in Canada, and the steps which should be taken to deal with the activities of persons who subscribe to those doctrines.

On March 7 of last year I wrote to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). At that time I pointed out to him that certain events had indicated the desirability of some action to deal with communist activities in this country. After outlining statements made by communist leaders in France, Italy, Australia, Britain and the United States, I suggested the desirability of taking immediate steps to amend the Criminal Code so that legal authority might exist to deal effectively with those who were seeking to undermine our democratic way of life in this country.

The letter was written at the time for the purpose of indicating to the Prime Minister that I proposed to ask a question in regard to this subject, and to ascertain whether it was the intention of the government to deal with the matter. At that time the Prime Minister stated that the subject was under consideration by the Department of Justice, and that in due course we would be informed as to the result of that discussion. More than a year has passed, and as yet no indication has been given by the government as to the course it proposes to follow in dealing with this very important subject.

Cabinet ministers and others have made a number of statements condemning communism in the most unrestrained terms, and this condemnation has gained increasing force within the past few weeks. If these words are intended to mean what they do mean in the ordinary interpretation, then the time has come for more than words; indeed the time is overdue for positive action to interpret those words in legislation.

A royal commission was appointed by the government of Canada, and as a result of the findings of that royal commission a number of persons who had been stealing secret records and otherwise acting as agents of the Kremlin in this country were sent to jail.

There has been some tendency to recall the action following the presentation of the royal commission's report as evidence of the comprehensive measures adopted by this government to deal with communism. The fact is that the prosecutions which were launched carried out only to a very limited extent the recommendations of that commission. Now that world-wide communism has reached such a point that no one with any understanding of the real danger of this evil force can possibly regard it any longer as something academic and simply a matter of individual opinion, it does seem appropriate to remind hon. members, to whom after all the royal commission's report was presented, that the recommendations of that commission are still to a very large extent not dealt with. I should like to refer to some of those recommendations and show the extent to which action ceased when the prosecutions were launched which did deal with one aspect of the commission's report.

The first recommendation of the royal commission was:

1. That because of the introduction into the evidence, necessarily and unavoidably of secret technical data, the publication of which, according to the witnesses most concerned, would not be in the public interest at this time, none of the evidence or exhibits relating to any top secret, secret, restricted or confidential matters be published except with the approval of the government in consultation with the heads of the services, departments or organizations concerned.

I submit that in addition to the confidential book published by the government of Canada in February of 1949 there should be a full disclosure of all the evidence and records which are not rigidly and under the most severe terms of security still necessarily secret. The strongest weapon of democracy is freedom of speech and discussion of public issues based upon a full disclosure of all essential information. So that the people of Canada as well as their representatives in this House of Commons may be in a position to deal with this matter and to form their own opinions with full knowledge of all the facts which have been ascertained in regard to this particular form of treachery, I submit that except in the most exceptional cases there should be publication under the terms of that recommendation.

The second recommendation was:

2. That the proper authorities in each service, department and organization take such steps as may be considered desirable and effective, in the light of this report and of the evidence and exhibits, to prevent further unauthorized transmission of information and to set up further safeguards.

The disclosure, which came only after considerable pressure, that the national film board was not carrying out some of its most important duties last year because it was being screened to ascertain whether there were any communists active in its organization, was simply a disclosure that even as late as 1949 effective steps had not yet been taken to deal with this recommendation. And when we speak of further safeguards, there is after all no safeguard so effective as properly drafted laws to deal with functions of this kind.

The third recommendation was:

3. That all security measures should be co-ordinated and rendered as uniform as possible.

When this subject was under consideration in the house last year, on December 7, 1949, it was quite clear from the discussion as it is reported at page 2869 of Hansard that steps have not yet been taken to co-ordinate and render uniform throughout the government services and their agencies all measures intended to deal with activities of this kind, wherever those activities may be found.

The fourth recommendation was:

4. That the evidence and exhibits accompanying this report be placed before the proper persons in the various services, departments and organizations affected, for study so that a complete evaluation of the information and material handed over can be made in each case to ascertain in detail what has, and what has not, been compromised. That consideration be given to whether the findings so made should be communicated to the proper authorities in the United Kingdom and the United States.

That fourth recommendation is of special significance today because of the full implications of the Fuchs case in Great Britain. The government has been at some pains, through its appropriate spokesmen, to explain that the handbook containing Dr. Fuchs' name was disclosed to the government of the United Kingdom. But I am not aware that there was a complete evaluation of the information, in the light of the special knowledge obtained by the royal commission here, and that when the material was handed over to the government of the United Kingdom an evaluation of the significance of any particular name in that list had been prepared by the appropriate officials of the Canadian government, in keeping with the clear and express recommendation I have just read. This is something which today should be given very careful consideration; because it would appear that, wherever the carelessness lay, there was carelessness in dealing with Dr. Fuchs; and that as a result of that carelessness there was a transmission to our only possible enemy, now or in the years immediately ahead, of highly secret information not only as to the actual processes in the manufacture of the atom bomb, but also as to certain preliminary examination of the construction of the hydrogen bomb.

For this reason not only should there be the most complete statement at this time on behalf of the government as to their evaluation of the information in their possession, and the notice they gave to the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States which interpreted their special information in relation to this special knowledge, but we should know to what extent recommendation No. 4 has been complied with. I say that because there were a number of other names in addition to that of Dr. Fuchs in the same notebook; and this House of Commons should know what steps have been taken to follow the activities and actions of those other men whose names appear in that same notebook which today has such tragic and significant importance.

The fifth recommendation of the royal commission was:

5. That The Official Secrets Act, 1939, be studied in the light of the information contained in this report and in the evidence and exhibits, and, if it is thought advisable, that it be amended to provide additional safeguards.

So far we have no indication that, in the opinion of the government, additional safeguards are necessary; nor have we any indication that under this recommendation any steps have been taken to prevent a repetition of the same conduct, or an extension of the same conduct into a wider area of the government service. We do know, from the unexpected disclosure connected with the national film board, that steps have been taken to examine into the activities of certain members of that agency of government. It was also disclosed at the same time that the screening of other departments was taking place. But so far we have no indication of any steps having been taken by the government to carry out recommendation No. 5.

The sixth recommendation was this:

6. That consideration be given to any additional security measures which would be practical to prevent the infiltration into positions of trust under the government of persons likely to commit acts such as those described in this report.

If any steps have been taken along these lines I suggest that it would be appropriate, in the discussion of the resolution which I shall move at the conclusion of my remarks, that we be told just what those steps are, so that we shall have information which will be of use to us in considering what should be done to deal with communism in this country. There is an explicit recommendation there "that consideration be given to any additional security measures which would be practical to prevent the infiltration into positions of trust under the government of persons likely to commit acts such as those described in this report." The time is overdue for the fullest and most effective implementation of that recommendation.

I ask members of the house to listen particularly to the seventh recommendation, in view of the discussions which have taken place in this house within the past few days. It reads:

7. That the practice and procedure in connection with the issue of Canadian passports be revised. While not elsewhere referred to in this report, we have had evidence indicating that naturalization and birth certificates have also been improperly obtained. We therefore suggest that the conditions surrounding the issue of these documents might be the subject of consideration by the proper authority.

We all know that only recently Tim Buck, the leader of the communist party in Canada for many long years, obtained a passport to go to a meeting of the cominform in Hungary, and that he has proceeded from there to Moscow, where he is doubtless at the present time receiving instructions and orders from his lords and masters there. If the issuing of a passport has any meaning or significance at all, then it should be subject to certain conditions which will give it meaning. If a passport is to be handed to anybody and everybody, then let us not pretend that any application is necessary, and give everyone a passport so that he can travel to any country for which he can get a visa. There is only one kind of passport that Tim Buck should have, and that is a one-way passport to Moscow without any possibility of return.

The same kind of passport would be appropriate for others who seem to feel that communist Russia has so much happiness and bliss to offer to the rest of the world provided that conditions there are transplanted elsewhere. Whether it be Dr. Endicott, whether it be Tim Buck, whether it be some other propagandist for Russian slavery, there is no reason why the passport processes of this country should facilitate their movement back and forth on their extremely improper course. There are others whose activities might well be reviewed.

A great many people from Canada who are acting as delegates for some of the communist false fronts which have been set up in Canada and other countries find it strangely easy to go behind the iron curtain and tell the people there of the iniquities practised under the government of Canada, and then come back and, with the apparent authority of having been actual visitors to the communist scene, seek to impress the people of this country with the wonders of communism, whether in Russia or elsewhere. I think that seventh recommendation of the royal commission's report should have been acted on long ago, but since it has not been, the time has come for action; passport procedure should mean something, and should provide a method by which those who are carrying on treacherous activities of this kind can be restrained from moving back and forth in that way when their one and only purpose is to undermine the democratic processes of this country.

The time has come when we should realize that freedom of entry is something which should not be extended to those who are flagrantly seeking to carry on a program of false propaganda in this country. While there is no reason why the Red Dean should not be allowed to pass through Canada, as long as he passes through, I can see no reason why he, any more than anyone else, should be permitted to state what is not true about Russia or any other country he has visited, when it is known by everyone who has been in Russia, or who has read carefully any of the accurate documentation which is available today, that his statements with regard to Russia are thoroughly misleading; but unfortunately they mean something because of the dignified position he holds in the church of which he is a member.

These recommendations of the royal commission were made not only to the government of Canada but also to the House of Commons. They stand as recommendations which this house should say in no uncertain terms it wishes to have implemented by its executive, the government, on the one hand by whatever steps may be taken in the ordinary course of its authority, and, on the other hand by the introduction of appropriate legislation to deal with offences related to activities of this kind.

This government at one time felt convinced that it was appropriate to take action. As a result of that decision communists in this country who were occupying leading positions in the communist party were arrested and placed under restraint. My recollection is that some of the leading communists were not arrested at that time; nevertheless action was taken on October 6, 1942. In the Ottawa Journal of that date there is a report of the decision of government. I think it is interesting, in view of these recommendations and the fact that previous action had not been taken to implement them, to learn who those people are and what the attitude of the government was on an earlier occasion in regard to some of them. Under the heading, "Tim Buck and sixteen other Reds released", there was a subheading:

No mention of communist party ban. Justice Minister advises Hepburn that Reds freed.

The report went on:

Justice Minister St. Laurent has ordered the conditional release from custody of Tim Buck, secretary of the communist party of Canada, and sixteen other persons against whom detention orders were issued in June, 1940, and who surrendered to police a few days ago.

This information was made public through a release to the press of a telegram sent by the Minister of Justice to Premier Hepburn of Ontario.

Mr. St. Laurent: Have you the date of that telegram?

Mr. Drew: Yes; the report reads, "His telegram dated today". That is in the report of October 6, 1942.

Mr. St. Laurent: That must be erroneous.

Mr. Drew: Of course I have only the report, but the report is dated October 6, 1942.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think that was the report of the decision about incarceration, but the other matter arose a couple of years later.

Mr. Drew: Later?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

Mr. Drew: At any rate, what I have here refers to a telegram replying to the premier of Ontario, and I would remind the Prime Minister that Mr. Hepburn was not premier of Ontario several years later. This was in October, 1942, and that was the last October that Mr. Hepburn was premier of Ontario. The telegram from the then minister of justice to Mr. Hepburn reads:

Your wire of 3rd October reached my office the Saturday after I had left, and I did not see it until this morning. In the meantime had received recommendations from an advisory committee, dated yesterday, that Mr. Tim Buck and sixteen other persons against whom orders of detention had been made in June, 1940, and who had surrendered to the police a few days ago, be conditionally released because their admitted hostility of that period to Canada's participation in the war on the ground that it was an imperialist war has given place to an expressed desire, since Hitler's attack on the Soviet union, and under present circumstances, to support a total Canadian effort.

It continues:

I have accepted these recommendations and ordered accordingly.

As you know, this committee has been sitting in Toronto considering these cases since September 29, and completed the hearings on Saturday, October 3.

In view of the publicity given to your telegram, I am also informing the press.

I would point out that the action in that respect suggested that the activities of the communist party were not to be carried on, and that the conditional aspect of the release was related to that understanding. It does not leave too strong a feeling of confidence as to the way in which the government has from time to time dealt with this subject that in the Grey North by-election, when General McNaughton was a candidate, a number of the most prominent communists in Canada, some of whom had been released under that order, actively campaigned for General McNaughton in that by-election, and that advertisements appearing over the names of such well-known communists as George Harris, C. S. Jackson, Jack Shaw, Pat Sullivan, Harold Pritchard and others were published by the authority of the Grey North Liberal Association.

Nevertheless that is in the past, and the government can make its own decision about the wisdom of having accepted support from men of that type. It is a very high tribute to the good judgment of the people of Grey North, and elsewhere, that they took appropriate action to deal with the support of men of that kind. Nevertheless it suggests a failure to recognize the full seriousness of this threat, both then and now. It is perfectly true that Russia was fighting Germany because it had been attacked by Germany on June 22, 1941, and for no other reason. Russia would still be helping Germany today if Hitler's dream of a united Europe under his control had been fulfilled. Russia was fighting Germany, and because of that it was considered advisable in the higher realms of international decision that all who were fighting nazi Germany should stand together for that purpose; but these men against whom orders for arrest had been made, Tim Buck and others like him, were just the same men as they were before. The fact that Russia was forced to take up arms for the defence of its own soil in no way purified Tim Buck of his treachery, nor did it make any more decent citizens of the remainder of those people than they were before or than they are today.

There are many people who for one reason or another, and undoubtedly with the most sincere purpose in many cases, seem to think that it is not desirable to take positive action against communism, and that the only way to deal with it is to state publicly that communism does not meet with their approval. One reason why this subject should be under consideration in the house at this particular time is certain events of the past few days in different parts of the world. Last week a bill was introduced in the Australian house of representatives which, when it is passed by their parliament, will have the effect of making communism a criminal offence punishable by very severe penalties. On Saturday it was announced that the government of South Africa will introduce in the South African parliament this week a bill to make communism a crime in that country and subject to very severe penalties. Last week it was announced that the government of Malaya has not only decided to make communism a crime, but in certain aspects thereof a crime punishable by the death penalty, and that this new law will come into effect on June 1. Yesterday it was announced that the government of Panama had introduced a most severe act which will make communism a criminal offence there. India has dealt with communism, and has made it a criminal offence; the law has been in effect now for several months.

I think it might be helpful if, while this debate is taking place, we were informed whether this subject was under discussion at Colombo, and whether this uniform pattern which is taking shape throughout the commonwealth was one of the things agreed upon but not disclosed at that time. I believe it would indicate that the Colombo conference was of more use than it appeared to be, if in fact there was such a decision on that occasion. In any event, it is rather significant that there should be this rapid sequence of events of a similar nature in different nations of the commonwealth which were represented at Colombo.

There are those who still take the position that it is not wise to pass laws which would make communism a criminal offence. There is an editorial in today's Montreal Gazette under the heading "Its Strength and our Danger", relating to this subject. I should like to read the first two paragraphs:

Whenever it is suggested that communism should be brought under legal control in Canada, many at once reply that this would involve an alarming invasion of civil liberties.

This type of reply has been well and fairly expressed by Hon. L. B. Pearson, Canada's Minister of External Affairs. Mr. Pearson explained that he considered it wise to reserve the penalties of the Criminal Code for those who by some overt act have threatened the peace and security of the country. He thought it would be dangerous to go further.

"Once we make it a crime to hold political ideas," he said, "merely because they are thought to be dangerous, it will then be but a short step to suppressing political ideas because they are not liked."

The editorial goes on to discuss this subject further, but I wish to refer to this statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), which I understand is a quotation from a speech made some time earlier but which, subject to any indication from him that his opinion has changed, I assume can be taken as his opinion at this time. That quotation gains special meaning in view of the statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in March of last year, that this subject was under consideration by the Department of Justice. I should like to hear the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) tell us exactly what consideration was given. In fact, I should like to hear the Minister of Justice tell us whether it is not a fact that an amendment to the Criminal Code was drafted, which would have had the effect of outlawing communist and similar activities in this country. Certainly I believe the house should be informed at this stage just what consideration has been given, and what the decision of the government is. I hope the government has come to the conclusion to take positive action to deal with activities of this nature.

As I have already indicated, I am not in any doubt that many of those—I most emphatically do not say all—who express concern about the danger to civil liberties from laws which would make communist or similar activities a criminal offence are sincere. I do feel that they still misconceive the real meaning of communism in its modern interpretation, and that they still misconceive the nature of the activities of these agents of the Kremlin. We are not dealing today with any vague or shadowy dialectic consideration. We are dealing today with the most terrifying brutal reality the world has ever known. Nazism and fascism fade into insignificance beside the nature and scale of this horrible and evil force that is spreading its tentacles throughout the world.

When the war ended less than five years ago, one human being out of every twelve in the world was under this vile tyranny. In these five short years 600 million more people have been brought under that form of slavery. The red tide is on the flood. At no point has it stopped or receded. Today one out of every three people in the world is under the most evil form of human subjugation that was ever designed by the tortured brains of men of evil intent. That is the reality, and the flood is still on the move. Within the past few weeks we have seen still further evidence of the mounting forces of communism: fresh pressure in India, China, Malaya, Indonesia, and indeed on the southwestern borders of Russia in Afghanistan and the surrounding states. New pressures have emerged elsewhere, in Italy and in France—yes, right here in our own country.

[Mr. Drew.]

Some people may still regard it as a minor manifestation, but this House of Commons was treated to at least one symptom of that disease within the past week. These things may seem unimportant to us, and merely the expression of a few men. But will we wake up in time? These men are not expressing a political doctrine, they are paid and financed by the Kremlin. Money does not grow on trees, and the expensive publishing and other activities of the communists in our midst require money, and plenty of it. It does not come from the workers in Canada. The real workers in Canada loathe and condemn communism as much as or more than any other people in this country. They are not the ones who are supporting any of these activities. We blandly watch activities of this sort, and regard them with an attitude of tolerant acceptance, without looking upon it as anything very serious.

It is only when one examines the sum total of all these activities, and realizes how they are spreading out into every part of the social structure of this country, that one realizes that tolerance of that kind is not tolerance but sheer insanity in the face of what is happening throughout the world today. If we really love our freedom, if we respect the memory of those who died for freedom in two world wars, the time has come for every Canadian, and particularly for those of us who collectively represent in this house all the people of Canada, to say that we will take the appropriate legislative steps so that freedom shall not be used to destroy freedom itself in the Canada that we love.

When we recognize the fact that communism now embraces in its dreadful grasp a third of the population of the whole world, we should remember that on no single occasion have the armed forces of Russia crossed a single border to carry out the actual aggression that placed other governments under communist authority. It was only after the coup d'état or revolution was an accomplished fact that Russian troops were welcomed as brothers in a great cause. Just think of it: the Baltic states, Roumania, Poland, Hungary, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, China and now other parts of southeast Asia. All these countries came under the control of the Kremlin through fifth columns organized in exactly the same way that a fifth column is being organized in Canada right now. The fifth column in Canada, under Tim Buck and his associates, has exactly the same purpose as had the fifth columns in Czechoslovakia, in Hungary, in Bulgaria, in Roumania or in any other country now occupied by communists, including China, in which was the largest act of aggression of all. There is no difference. This is not a political doctrine as we understand a political doctrine. This is a plan to carry out revolution in Canada.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It is more than that.

Mr. Drew: Yes, a great deal more than that. It is the kind of revolution that matters, as well as the revolution itself.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It is more than that. It is a religion.

Mr. Drew: It is a Godless religion, and that is the horrible feature of it. It is a religion without God. It is a religion which makes materialism in its grossest form the ideal, if possible, of those who serve this cause. It is in all truth the anti-Christ pictured by the bible. I do not wish anyone for one moment to think that I feel any less deeply about this matter than my words would indicate. The depth of my feeling with regard to men like the Red Dean and Dr. Endicott, as well as Tim Buck, is occasioned by the fact that I know of my own knowledge how false their interpretation of communism in Russia really is. Speaking of this being the teaching of the anti-Christ, those who have been in Russia have seen the antireligious museums operated by the state, in which everything that we hold dear is held up to ridicule and to contempt, with the one idea of destroying faith in the minds of youth. Yes, it is true that the churches are open in Russia, but they are in great disrepair, in a state of neglect. You cannot kill Christianity. You cannot kill the belief of a people; and those in power in Russia have not done so. But in every way within their power they are using the mechanism of state instruction in order to try to create in the minds of youth a contempt for the superstition of their elders which interprets itself in a continuance of their religious beliefs.

I have talked to young communists in Russia, and they have frankly said that they pitied the older people for their superstitions; and they indicated quite clearly that they were more enlightened. They had come under the influence of this evil propaganda. It is, in fact, the doctrine of the anti-Christ; and if ever the spirit of evil incarnate was centred in a single human being, it is centred in Joseph Stalin in Moscow today. This is the force we are fighting. Every one of these people who knowingly propagates the Russian form of communism in Canada is serving that foul doctrine and trying to spread it here in this country.

We have been strangely tolerant in many ways. When I broke my remarks at that point, it was because I agree so thoroughly with the statement that had been made to the effect that this is more than an ordinary revolution. The fact is that we do not need to be in any doubt as to what it is that these people are actually working for. According to their own statements, they are working for revolution. Those are the statements of Tim Buck himself. In the textbooks used by the communists in this country, which were seized at the time that Tim Buck was prosecuted and sent to prison, we find that no doubt whatever was left that they were working for an armed uprising. That was the reason that Tim Buck was sent to the penitentiary; he was sent there not because he was a communist but because the kind of communism he was supporting was, by their own statements, working for an armed uprising.

Let us see what he is working for in other ways. This is a definition used by the Canadian communist party as to the meaning of the word "revolution":

> "Revolution" means an historic event when one part of the population imposes its will upon the other part of the population by bayonets, guns and rifles.

Perhaps we understand exactly what they mean when we find these words of Tim Buck himself in one of the many books he has written to explain communism in this country. This is what he says:

> Once we have mastered the political strike, the general strike is but a step, and the general strike during a political crisis is the gateway to revolution.

Surely no communist can be critical if we take their own words as a definition of the intention of their organization in this country. They are working for revolution, and they do not mince words. We do not need to be in any doubt about that. They have not changed at all in that respect.

Even without an amendment to the law, the Department of Justice has been negligent in failing to deal, as it should have dealt, with some of the newspapers published in this country in languages other than English or French. The unfortunate truth is that the centre of communist activity in Canada today is in the city of Toronto, where a great many publications in the languages of many lands are appearing week by week for the purpose of undermining faith in Canada on the part of those who have come here with the one desire of becoming good Canadian citizens.

Just let me read to you a couple of examples. In Toronto week by week is published a Russian language newspaper known as Vestnik; and that newspaper, which has a strangely large circulation when one considers how difficult some people find it today to start newspapers, has statements like this. In Vestnik of Saturday, January 14, of this year, appears an editorial which I have had translated by a translator of tested reliability:

> The St. Laurent government should also check the warmongers in the ranks of Canadian military leaders, who, in the persons of General Simonds and retired General Crerar, propagate policies of preparedness and aggression against the U.S.S.R.

I should like to read from an editorial which appeared in Vestnik on Wednesday, January 11. I ask you to listen to this as the kind of thing that is being spread, in this particular case, among those who speak the Russian or Slav language:

> The ruthless soldier Crerar is now prepared to sacrifice probably millions of Canadian lives on the battlefront, and on territories of Canada proper, in the atomic war with a view to correcting "the mistakes" made in the last world war. Crerar does not care, either for England, nor for other western European states, nor for Canada—which countries may be turned to ashes in a new world war, started by Wall street. It seems strange that such individuals, to whom Canada's security is entrusted, are permitted to address meetings and conferences. How is it that such individuals, who actually should be put in "straitjackets," are permitted to discuss problems of state politics at authoritative conventions? Canadian people should voice their indignation against the propaganda carried on by such fools, who strive to involve us in a horrible catastrophe.

This is not something to be treated as a joke, Mr. Speaker. There is no effective counter-propaganda going out in the same language to these same people; and this affects a great many people whose minds will be poisoned permanently unless this thing is tackled at the root. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that no new law is needed beyond what we already have to put the publisher of that paper behind prison bars, where he should be for writing an editorial of this kind. If this is not criminal libel I do not know what criminal libel is.

Let me read another editorial just to show the pattern. In Vestnik of Saturday, February 4, 1950, under the heading "Hydrogen Bomb" appeared the following:

> The St. Laurent government, which has linked our country with the atomic policy of the U.S.A., is leading Canada to a catastrophe of war and devastation. It is imperative that this government should hear the voice of the people in the forms of hundreds of thousands of signatures on a petition in favour of outlawing the atomic weapon. Canada must break with the insane politics of Wall street and its protégé, Truman.

This is just another example, and this goes on week after week. Again in Vestnik of Saturday, February 4, 1950, there is a special article to glorify Tim Buck. When the Department of Justice is looking at the files of Vestnik, as I hope it will, I hope it will also look at the name of the Canadian citizen who wrote the article from which I now quote:

> Tim Buck—the greatest product of the thirty-year old communist movement in Canada. He is the founder of the communist party in our country . . . as in 1929 he again emphasized the full importance of the party, as the vanguard of revolution . . .

Don't let anybody talk of this as just an ordinary political doctrine. It is described in 1950 as the vanguard of revolution. We know from their own definition that they mean armed revolution, and always have. No other form of revolution has ever succeeded, because there has not been a single case yet where the communists who seized power were more than a very small percentage indeed of the whole population. To those who still can be so strangely tolerant of communism in our midst it may be well to remember that in Russia, when the third revolution of 1917 took place, and the socialist government of Kerensky was overthrown by Lenin and Trotsky, less than two per cent of the people of Russia were members of the communist party. It may be well to remember that in the seizure of power in what had been one of the finest democracies in Europe, Czechoslovakia, just over a year ago, less than ten per cent of the population of that country had ever supported the communists. That is the picture everywhere. They never expect to seize power through the ballot. They know they can seize power only by creating a fifth column, which, as Tim Buck himself has said, in a time of hardship and disturbance might open the gateway to revolution.

I might say that there are a great number of these papers. The Department of Justice is well aware of many of them. There is such an active communist paper as Vapus, a Finnish paper of Sudbury, and Munkas, a Hungarian communist paper, published in Toronto. There are communist papers published in Toronto every week in the Serbian, Croatian, Slovak, Russian, Polish, Hungarian, German, Bulgarian, Italian and Finnish languages. And I might of course add that there are also publications in Toronto every week in English. The Canadian Tribune is published every week; and there is also in English National Affairs published by the same organization.

It is only necessary to examine what these publications say to find the strange uniformity in pattern. I have here the originals of a number of these foreign language newspapers. The one in front of me is the Hungarian paper Munkas in which one reads almost the same words as the words which appear in Vestnik. Read Vapus and you will find the same things. All this is emanating from some central point. All of it is emanating from some guiding office.

Each of these publications is supplied with clippings, with photographs and with feature articles from their own countries. The diplomatic representatives of these countries here in Ottawa send out mats for the press, photographs and feature articles. And these papers, with no visible means of support, receive telegrams, thousands of words long, direct from Moscow.

It is wonderful how easy it is for some people to publish newspapers at this time, despite the high cost of newsprint and of expensive wire services. And then also, as part of that general activity, some of these diplomatic agencies here in Ottawa distribute propaganda films sent over here from communist countries. These are being used under guidance of these papers which, in the languages of the homelands of many of these people, tell them where they can see these pictures.

Lots of people who hate communism will go to see pictures of the Danube, pictures of Vienna, pictures of Roumania and of Poland and of Czechoslovakia, and of all the countries which they still love, and love dearly—and perhaps love even more because of the terrible conditions there today. These pictures are used to spread communist ideas in the minds of youth.

Over the week end children are brought together and these propaganda pictures—clever, dangerous, and opposed to everything we believe in—are used to attract the minds of youth to this doctrine. These activities extend into every field. We know the false fronts that are developing. Everybody believes in peace. Every decent human being wants peace. Therefore we have peace councils. I see by this afternoon's paper that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is to be visited on Thursday. I do not know that he has given an appointment; I hope he has not, and I do not believe he has.

However, the Ottawa Evening Citizen carries the head: Ban the Bomb Delegation Will See Pearson Thursday; Dr. J. G. Endicott With Petitioners Coming to Ottawa. The first paragraph of the article reads:

> A ban-the-bomb delegation is expected to call on the Hon. Lester B. Pearson, external affairs minister, on Thursday, at noon. This information comes from Mrs. Edith Holtom, 5 Hawthorne Avenue, who is active in Ottawa in the Canadian Peace Congress. Mrs. Holtom stated that the interview with Mr. Pearson had been arranged through Prime Minister St. Laurent.

I feel sure that that is a great surprise to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), as it would be to any of us.

Mr. St. Laurent: No, it is not. I received a letter from the secretary of this league some time ago asking for an appointment with the cabinet, and asking that I arrange with Mr. Speaker to make the railway committee room available for a presentation of their petition or representations.

I wrote back stating that it was not the practice of the government to assist in publicizing movements of that kind; and that I would not attempt to arrange with Mr. Speaker for the railway committee room or any other room; that if this league had any representations they wished to submit to anybody, of course we could not refuse to hear those representations; that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) would be prepared to receive them if they presented those views before the date of his departure for a real peace conference in London; that if it did not suit them to do that before his departure the acting secretary would receive their petition or representations but that their impression upon the government would not be added to by the numbers of persons attempting to compose the delegation.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, of course it was only a moment ago that I saw the article in this evening's edition of the Ottawa Citizen. But I will say I had thought that this probably was an inaccurate report; because I do think that in these troubled days the government of Canada—and every member of the government of Canada—has more important tasks to perform than to waste his or their time on communist fronts of this kind. After all, no one today is in any doubt about the so-called Canadian peace congress. I think it is the duty of the government, as the Prime Minister has indicated, through the appropriate ministers or officials, to meet every delegation which has some proper purpose to serve by coming here, whether or not one expects that they will have some necessary representations to make; but I think that we are contributing to the public importance of these bodies when these people are received at all.

We have too many of such organizations. We have the national federation of labour youth, the national committee of L.P.P. students, the association of united Ukrainian Canadians, the federation of Russian Canadians, the league for democratic rights. We have all sorts of organizations of that kind with innocent names. But to the extent that any member of the government indicates that they are to be regarded as public bodies which should be recognized as eminent democratic public bodies, then I suggest the possibility that other members of the public may think that they should be regarded in the same serious manner. And in those cases where it is definitely known that these are merely communist false fronts, then I suggest the wisdom of not giving them added importance by hearing representations that are intended as nothing else but communist propaganda.

This very week a youth gathering is being held in Toronto on Thursday, Friday and Saturday with the declared purpose of discussing peace. Whether he will actually be there or not, it was announced at one time that the red dean was to enlighten them about Russia. These organizations undoubtedly impress many innocent people.

Mr. St. Laurent: Unfortunately.

Mr. Drew: That is an unfortunate and very unhappy feature of these activities. But again we cannot ignore the danger that they will be considered seriously. For instance, here is a circular sent out by the second Canadian peace congress in regard to the meeting being held in Toronto to which I have referred. It is under the heading "The people can win the peace." Everybody is appealed to by the idea of peace and that is the sort of thing which makes appeals of this kind so dangerous and makes the corrosive influence of propaganda of this nature something that we cannot disregard.

Not only is this treachery of a particular form intended to serve Russia by weakening our democracy and by destroying faith in any way possible in our people; it is, as has already been indicated, an anti-Christian force which should be dealt with if only for that reason. No one should be complacent about the fact that there may be only a few thousand Canadian youth who come under the influence of this communist propaganda. If there is any way in our power that we can prevent it, we as the representatives of the Canadian people should take every step within our power to make sure that not a single Canadian youth will have his faith destroyed by these servants of the Kremlin.

There is another aspect of this matter which should be in the minds of members of the house at this particular time. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) leaves at the end of this week. World events are moving fast toward a climax. Peace or a break-down in international diplomacy depends on the conviction in the minds of the thirteen men in the Kremlin that the democracies really mean business.

There are different ways in which we can convince them. We cannot convince the people of Russia, because we cannot reach them. Even if the "Voice of America" or any other powerful radio system in the world could carry this message without being jammed by the costly jamming devices erected by the Russia people, there would still be only a limited number of the Russian people that could hear shortwave messages of that kind. The overwhelming majority of the citizens of that country cannot be reached by such means.

The only people we can convince with any results flowing from that conviction are the men in whose hands lies not only the fate of Russia, but to a great extent the fate of the whole world. They will be convinced by evidence of unity on the part of the nations who have signed the Atlantic pact. They will be convinced by strong and firm and definite statements by the heads of the free nations. But I am convinced that there is another argument which will impress them. If those agents in our midst and in other free countries to whom we extend facilities so readily are able to tell them that the democracies really know what communism means and are dealing with it accordingly, it may have a very profound effect upon the thinking of the men in the Kremlin.

If within the next few weeks we in Canada show that in our own domestic activities we intend to deal with this treacherous force, that will have its effect, just as the action in Australia, South Africa, Malaya, India and other parts of the world has had its effect. It is because I believe not only that action in regard to this evil force is long overdue, it is because I believe that this criminal conduct should be dealt with as criminal conduct, and also because I believe that a strong gesture by the elected representatives of the people of Canada may have its effect that I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that appropriate legislation should be introduced so that communist and similar activities in Canada may be made an offence punishable under the Criminal Code."

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there are many Canadians who do not believe that there is ideological warfare going on and that there has been for a number of years a conflict between communism and Christian civilization. I am sure that there are very few Canadians who do not wish to see that war won by Christian civilization. It is a matter of opinion as to what are the best methods to be adopted to prevent the spread of communism in our country. I firmly believe that it has diminished over the last few years.

I firmly believe that some years ago communist leadership was, to a regrettable degree, influential in some labour unions and the question arose as to whether or not some action should be taken by legislative authority in Canada to purge the labour unions. That was not done. We relied on the good sense, good judgment, patriotism and Christian traditions of the labouring people themselves to see that they got rid of these obnoxious influences.

I feel quite confident that they did a much better job than could have been done by the police attempting to enforce any laws adopted by this parliament in that regard. Labour unions in Canada are responsible democratic organizations and I feel sure that a large number who have no leaning whatsoever toward communism or any of its affiliated isms would have resented any attempt by legislative authority and the police to determine how their unions should be officered and who would receive votes at their elections. I think that at the present time we all have great reason to be satisfied with the autonomous purges that the labour movement of Canada has carried out in its own ranks. There are laws on our statute books, laws in the Criminal Code, which are sufficient, if applied, to deal with all overt acts directed against the security of the state.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has just said that the Department of Justice has been negligent in not prosecuting the publishers of a certain number of newspapers published in Toronto and elsewhere in languages other than English or French, and even one published in English. When we give lip service to the distribution of constitutional powers and responsibility between the federal parliament and the provincial legislation we must continue to recognize that under the constitution the responsibility for the administration of justice in each province is that of the attorney general of that province. The character and tone of these newspapers now published in the city of Toronto are not very different from the character and tone of newspapers published in Toronto while the hon. member, who has just taken his seat, was premier of the province of Ontario and had a devoted and respected colleague as his attorney general.

Again it is a matter of opinion as to when it is advisable to launch criminal prosecutions. For my part I am not prepared to say that the attorney general of the government of which the hon. gentleman was the leader was negligent. I think, in his judgment, he did his best to maintain law and order in that province, and that if he had been of opinion that treasonable acts were being committed in the city of Toronto that were really dangerous to the security of the state he would have taken action.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish to interrupt the Prime Minister but I think that an incorrect impression should not be left here. I would remind the Prime Minister that communist activities are peculiarly under the authority of the Department of Justice, and that the provincial governments have no facilities available, nor have they attempted to set up facilities, to deal with this particular problem.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, it is not proper to say that communistic activities are under the Department of Justice. By statute the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is the head of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are active in endeavouring to suppress every kind of activity that might be a threat to the security of the state. They co-operate with provincial police forces, and have the co-operation of provincial police forces. But when prosecutions are to be instituted before the courts it is the privilege, the responsibility and the duty of the attorney general of the province where those activities are carried on to institute the proceedings. Of course there is a difference between peacetime administration of justice and wartime measures taken for the security of the state. The hon. member referred to what was done in 1940 and 1942, but that was done under the Defence of Canada Regulations which had the authority of law under the War Measures Act, and which no longer have the authority of law in this country, a thing for which we are all thankful. We are all thankful that conditions in Canada are no longer such that the special measures required during the war period still need to be applied. We are now in peacetime, and the administration of justice is the privilege and responsibility of the departments of the attorneys general of the respective provinces.

I am not suggesting that they are not doing their duty. They do their duty in the manner that they think best. One of these attorneys general attempts to administer a padlock law. There is much resentment in many parts of the country over his attempts to do so.

Since the report of the royal commission we have been giving close and careful attention to the recommendations contained therein. I can assure the house that nothing that we felt could be done effectively to implement those recommendations has been left undone.

We have at times been subjected to questioning and criticism in this house because of the existence, for instance, of a security panel co-ordinating security measures adopted by all the different departments of government to ensure that the vulnerable departments of the state will be served only by persons in whom the heads of those departments can have implicit confidence. That was commenced even before the report of the royal commission was published. While the report was still in draft form and we had the advantage of knowing some of its recommendations this interdepartmental security panel was set up.

It is difficult for one to be quite positive in one's own mind as to how much one should disclose of the protective measures that are taken for the security of the state, because those who might be a threat to its security are sometimes pretty clever in the methods to which they resort in order to withhold information that would lead to proper conclusions in respect of them. I do not think it would be in the interests of security to describe too particularly the safeguards we are attempting to set up, just as trappers do not try to make their traps too obvious when they are placing them in the paths that game sometimes follow. I can assure the house, however, that we have been very much concerned about security.

It is no pleasant responsibility to have to do some of the things that I felt it was my duty to do when I was minister of justice in connection with the disclosures arising out of Mr. Gouzenko's declaration. I endured many a slap on the wrist in this house for the methods that were adopted to handle the situation. We do not want a repetition of such a situation if we can avoid it by any possible means. We have been taking all precautions that can properly be taken. One of the hon. members in the house this afternoon will recall the questions he put about the existence of snoopers for the purpose of finding out about prospective civil servants.

The association for civil liberties is not a communist organization. It is composed of a great many people with whom a great many other people may not agree as to all their views, but it is an association of which the president is the Rev. Dr. R. S. K. Seeley, the vice-presidents being Professor Harry M. Cassidy, Rabbi A. L. Feinberg, Mrs. W. L. Grant, Charles H. Millard, M.P.P., Joseph Sedgwick, K.C., Dr. Malcolm Wallace; of which the treasurer is Rev. W. P. Jenkins; the executive secretary, Irving Himel; chairman of committee for a bill of rights, Dr. B. K. Sandwell, the editor of Saturday Night; chairman of committee for academic freedom, Dr. Malcolm Wallace; chairman of committee on group relations, Miss Vivien Mahood; chairman of legal committee for civil rights, J. S. Midanik. It has an advisory board consisting of F. Andrew Brewin, K.C., R. G. Cavell, David Croll, K.C., M.P., William Arthur Deacon, Rev. Gordon Domm, Rev. James Finlay, Anne Fromer, Professor C. E. Hendry, G. A. Martin, K.C., Norman J. McLean, E. B. Jolliffe, M.P.P., Professor Charles E. Phillips, Professor E. J. Pratt, Senator Arthur W. Roebuck, K.C., Harry Simon, Professor George Tatham, and Professor H. Wasteneys. This association presented a brief to the senatorial committee on civil liberties and human rights concerning the desirability of a bill of rights. It was a statement of what they thought should be, by constitutional amendment, put beyond the touch of common members of parliament dealing with the everyday business of the nation, something that would be absolutely sacred.

Article 19 of their declaration reads as follows:

> Everyone has the right of equal access to public service in the country.

Article 20 states:

> Every person is entitled to all the rights and freedoms above set forth without distinction of any kind such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

Article 17 states:

> Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

With regard to passports, article 13 of this declaration states:

> Everyone legally resident in Canada has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the country, and the right to leave and return to Canada.

Those are things that a substantial body of public opinion in Canada think should be made a part of a Canadian constitution. They are good, honest Canadians, concerned about their own rights and about the rights of their fellows. In these matters there is room for diverging opinions as to what are the best methods of combating the spread of communism. For my part, I have been preaching for many months past that the best method of combating communism is to make democracy work as a system benefiting no particular classes or groups, but benefiting all the members of the population. There will be little danger of the spread of communism if all our people realize that it is the desire of those representing the majority of the people in Canada to have laws that enable each to get a fair share of the welfare which Providence makes it possible to provide for everyone in the country.

I do not attribute any special effect to that preaching, and I have not been alone in preaching it; it is being preached by a great many others. But I do believe that with respect to communism we are in a better position today than we were a few years ago. It is disagreeable to have these organizations that we are inclined to believe are false fronts before us to receive their petitions and complaints. The hon. leader of the opposition must have been bothered, as many of us were, by those gentlemen—I shall call them that here—who were calling themselves the Unemployment League of Canada or the Unemployment Association of Canada, and who had briefs and petitions to present to us. They waylaid me at more than one place, and on one occasion they had these briefs to thrust into my hands. I said, "Gentlemen, I have other occupations at this moment. We have a good postal service, and if you have anything to communicate to me, put it into the post office and when received it will get the consideration it deserves". It is difficult to turn down requests to be allowed to present petitions.

I believe that perhaps one of the best arguments against these people is found in the fact that they are allowed to do these things. It establishes the best possible contrast between what happens in a democratic country that is confident of its ability to maintain its democratic institutions, and what is enforced by fear and police in the totalitarian states. Perhaps that opinion is shared by others.

With respect to the fact that Mr. Tim Buck and Dr. Endicott have travelled abroad, I do not know whether the leader of the opposition read the article in the Globe and Mail today which has a leader dealing with that particular subject. The last paragraph of it is in the following terms:

> Some people question the wisdom of giving such people as Buck and Endicott the passports they need for their baleful itineraries. But surely it is better to let them go than to keep them at home. They do Canada no real harm because what they say in Russia merely confirms an ignorance already total. But they discredit themselves and their cause in the eyes of the Canadian public in a highly satisfactory way. No argument against the Canadian communist party could be half so convincing or so damaging as the argument that Buck and Endicott have themselves supplied.

I am not reading this because I agree with every word that is in it, but merely in support of my argument that this is not a question of party politics in Canada. It is a question of individual opinion as to what is the best way to deal with this obnoxious growth in our midst. There are honest, patriotic Canadians of my party and the hon. gentleman's party, of the C.C.F. party and the Social Credit party, who have views that are the same, and there are others, probably in my party as in other parties, who think that a more drastic way of dealing with the obnoxious growth would be more effective.

There are interesting experiments being attempted at the present time in Australia, South Africa, Malaya, Panama, and India. We will be interested in seeing what are the effective results of that method. There are other things being practised across the border, a sort of witch-hunt. Committees are being set up charging the department of state with being overrun with communists or communist sympathizers. People are saying, "I assert that there are communists in the department of state, and until you put the F.B.I. files at my disposal I am not in a position to prove it, but I will still assert it." I do not think that has created a very favourable impression on our Canadian public. I do not think that the charges against General Marshall of incompetency, and his leanings while he was secretary of state, have carried much conviction in the judgment of Canadians who know anything at all about the former secretary of state. I do not think that the charges levelled against the present secretary of state, Hon. Dean Acheson, are disturbing us a great deal about him. But again there are no doubt some Canadians who think that the strong hand, the padlock law and such measures are the appropriate methods to be adopted. It may happen that they are right. But up to the present time the methods we have followed here have coincided with what appears to have been a diminution in communistic activities. This is something which all of us frequently have to talk about. I was talking about it in Windsor, Ontario, in March, 1949. I then cited the Globe and Mail because of the fact that my view had been that this is not a partisan party thing but rather a thing as to which Canadians, regardless of the political party to which they belong, have diverging views. I cited an article from the Globe and Mail which reads as follows:

> How to meet the communist threat to liberty is a two-sided question for Canada as for other free countries. One half of the task is checking Soviet aggression and the other is curbing communist influence in home territory. The North Atlantic pact is the obvious answer to the first problem. It is harder to find the right method of dealing with the second.

That is the end of the quotation. Then I went on as follows:

They—

That is to say, the Globe and Mail.

—do not pretend to have found a solution for it in an absolute manner but they do say this which I also read without feeling any revulsion in my mind.

And I quoted this further paragraph:

Any law which merely forbids communism as such is objectionable; but there can be no argument against a law defining the opinions and preachments the community will not tolerate. Recently the communist leaders in France, Italy and other countries have said, directly or by implication, that their followers' duty in any future war would be to work and fight for the Soviet union.

Then I went on:

With that I fully agree. That is or would be, if said or attempted to be practised in our country, treasonable conduct for which we have plenty of laws to protect ourselves and laws with plenty of teeth in them to prevent that from going on here but I do not like the kind of laws that you put in the statute books and then put the statute books away and forget about them. That is not the way to maintain respect for the law in a free country.

I also expounded then the same theory, that the best antidote to the spread of communism was to make our free institutions really work, and work in a manner that would give satisfaction to all sections of the population. I repeated that statement recently in Toronto, citing this paragraph from Dr. Vannevar Bush about the prevention of a shooting war:

It need not come if we fully maintain our strength. It need not come if we realistically enough and with enough determination resolve that it shall not. It need not come if we really learn to make our democracy work. It need not come at all, for if the strength of free peoples prevents it for a generation, that same strength can then produce a new sort of world in which great wars will no longer occur. For this consummation we face a task that will test us as we have never been tested before, that will test whether we really mean it when we say that we believe in human dignity and human freedom, whether we can really submerge selfishness and petty motive, and bring our enormous latent power to bear, to make our way of life function with true effectiveness for the good of all.

With that expression of confidence and with the methods indicated as necessary to justify that confidence, I think most members of this house would be in full agreement.

I will not trouble hon. members by citing any more of my own speeches; they are of the sort that many of them have been making themselves.

Let us make democracy work, and work in such a manner that practically all of our people will feel its benefits; that they will then wish to retain it and defend it because they will know that it is not only a much better system than what communism realizes but better even than what communism promises.

We must maintain a fair balance between the rights of the human individual and the abuses that human individuals may commit against society. But I would be sorry to see it become a crime to hold opinions unless, as a consequence of those opinions, one did something that threatened the security of the state.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I imagine, Mr. Speaker, that most of the members in this house would agree with much of what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said before he introduced his motion at the end of his speech. But I would be sorry indeed if a majority or even a small minority of the members of the house had agreed with the motion. The motion, if you will examine it, is extremely broad. If it were carried and if legislation were founded upon it, how it would be interpreted by those who had to interpret and enforce the legislation might be a sorry thing for this country indeed. Let me read the motion so that we can get it better in our minds. It reads as follows:

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that appropriate legislation should be introduced so that communist and similar activities in Canada may be made an offence punishable under the Criminal Code."

We may be able to define a communist, legally, as a member of the communist party; but who is going to define "similar activities" and what would be similar activities? The leader of the opposition, early in his speech, made the following statement. I think I have it correctly; but even if I have not the correct words, I am sure he will agree that I have what he intended to say. He said: "The strongest weapon of democracy is freedom of speech." Then he went on: "A discussion of public issues based upon a full disclosure of all essential information." If the strongest weapon of democracy is freedom of speech, surely any curtailment of freedom of speech curtails or lessens that democracy. We cannot have it both ways.

I believe that I am just as much opposed to the communist party and its philosophy as is the leader of the opposition, or as far as that goes, as anyone in this house can be. I abhor the communist party and all its works. I abhor its policy of force and violence; I abhor its policy of dictatorship and suppression of every freedom; but above all, I abhor and reject it because it has reversed human values. It has raised dissimulation, lying and deceit to the eminence of virtue. On the other hand, it has degraded truth, integrity and fair dealing as between man and man, group and group, nation and nation, to the category of vices. Because it has done that it is hard, if not impossible, for anyone who believes in the virtues that it has turned into vices to have any association with communists under any circumstances, because you just cannot believe at any particular moment that their words mean what the words imply in our language and in our meaning. On that score I think there is very little difference between the members of this house.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question, because it might clarify my own understanding of the situation presented by these words? In the amendment to the speech from the throne, as amended by the party to which the hon. member now speaking belongs, appears the following words:

> Failed to take adequate measures to protect civil liberties and at the same time curb espionage and other harmful activities of communists and fascists in Canada.

I would have thought that this was entirely in line with this motion.

Mr. MacInnis: I doubt whether it is in line with this motion; but I submit that our sub-amendment had to be based on the wording of the amendment before it, and because of that certain phrases had to be used. In any event, I do not agree that this amendment and the other amendment have the same meaning.

In the session of 1948 a bill was introduced by a private member with phrasing somewhat similar to that proposed in this amendment. In speaking to that bill I made the following remarks, which will be found at page 2926 of Hansard of 1948:

> May I point out that no country ever saved itself from revolution or from overthrow by oppressive laws. If oppressive laws have any merit, if they would prevent subversive methods from growing, the communist party would never have come into existence, but the fact of the matter is that the communist party grew and prospered where oppression flourished. There is only one way in which freedom can be extended. That is by extending it. We cannot extend freedom by limiting it. We have laws now on our statute books for dealing with sedition and overt acts. Let us apply these laws where and when there is need, but do not let us begin to make laws to ban ideas, because such laws just won't work.

That was my position in 1948; that is my position today. We cannot make laws to ban ideas but we can make laws to deal with overt acts. It has been my opinion for a long time that the danger from communism lies mainly in the lack of the people's understanding of what communism really is and the conditions out of which it grows.

If there had been freedom of thought, freedom of political action in Russia, prior to 1917, as there was, say, in the United Kingdom and in other countries of western Europe, there would have been no communist party in Russia, and no revolution of the kind that took place in Russia in 1917; but because everything that the czarist government did not believe in, and every thought that they felt was a danger to their safety, were suppressed, there developed the conviction that since we cannot change existing conditions by peaceful means, and if we are going to change conditions at all, then we must change them by force.

I have been troubled, as I said, because I find that even today, despite all we have learned since 1917 of what communism means, and all we have learned since the end of the war of social, economic and political development in communist controlled countries, people do not yet understand what communism means. I say, understand how it works, and understand how and why it grows.

Following the Soviet union's share in the war against Hitler, the Soviet union gained millions of friends among the peoples who were in that war on the same side, but they overlooked entirely how the war began, what it was that gave Hitler his opportunity, and they overlooked entirely how the Soviet union came into it. They saw only that the Soviet union put up a wonderful struggle in opposition to nazism. Then, as the various conferences took place from 1944 on, among Stalin, Roosevelt and Churchill, I saw in conference after conference the allied leaders giving away concrete concessions of great value to Stalin for, on his side, promises about abstract principles which he never intended to honour, promises he never intended to keep; there was the exchange of territorial concessions for a promise that democratic elections would be held in various countries coming under communist control.

That is the sort of thing that troubles me. While the Chinese civil war was going on I got myself disliked in social gathering after social gathering because I disagreed with people who insisted upon telling me that the Chinese communists were not communists at all, not communist like the Russian communist, but merely simple peasants who were trying to better their conditions.

It is true that the great mass of the Chinese people were not and are not communists; but it is equally true that those who were directing the civil war were and are communists who accept the same philosophy as the communists of the Soviet union. As a matter of fact, so deluded are people who ought to know better that in 1944 the chief justice of British Columbia took a Sunday evening off to speak at an open forum in a church to justify the purge trials in the Soviet union in 1936, 1937, and 1938. He went over the evidence to prove that these trials were completely justified. The trials, Chief Justice Farris believed, showed that Leon Trotsky headed a vast plot to set up a fascist government in Russia and hand over vast areas of Soviet soil to Germany, Poland and Japan. He believed the trials showed that Trotsky plotted to kill Lenin and Stalin in 1918, and that he and his quislings had intended to enter into active negotiations with Germany in 1921. But he did not tell his audience that Stalin not only intended but did negotiate and make a treaty with Hitler. Then he said:

> Is there any wonder, when Stalin's closest associates plotted against him, that he has a suspicious nature, or that he is hostile to the Polish government in exile.

It is that sort of inane thinking on the part of peoples who should know better that is responsible for the lack of understanding in this country of what communism means, and what should be done to combat it.

What should be done to overcome communism? I agree very much with what was said this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I said in my speech on April 13, 1948, what I would say here today. Let me read from that speech a short paragraph which sets out my idea of how we can combat communism:

> What is needed in this country is not a law to make illegal parties and ideas that we do not like, but that we should as quickly as possible improve the quality—I emphasize that, improve the quality—of our democracy by abolishing social inequities and making our economic democracy as pervasive as our political democracy. That is what this parliament has to do, and when we do that I have sufficient confidence in the common sense and good judgment of the Canadian people to be satisfied that we shall not need any repressive laws such as this bill would put into effect.

If I were to change the words "this bill" to "this motion" these same sentiments apply today.

Where do communists get their following among the various strata of society? They get a following among intellectuals who feel that their contribution to society is not being appreciated. These people get a feeling of inferiority; then they gravitate to the communist party where they are made much of.

Only a few days ago I was talking with a lady from the United Kingdom who is visiting Canada. She told me, and a few others, what the Labour party in Great Britain was trying to do, or was doing, to raise the standard of living in the colonies, particularly among the coloured people. She said they were bringing thousands of them to Great Britain for education in the schools and universities. But, she said, as the government brought them over they would be met at the boat by members of the communist party and taken to some home for a social evening. Before the evening was over they would be given a little pep talk on the evils of the Labour government and, of course, on the glories of communism.

Of course the solution to a situation of that kind is that we who believe in democracy should be as active in support of it as is the communist party in support of communism. And until we believe in democracy so that we shall be as active, we shall be losing the fight for democracy.

The most amazing thing of all is that church people, ministers of religion, should remain in the church and in the communist party at the same time: It is a most amazing thing to me. I think it must be because they have lost faith in the efficacy of their spiritual teaching or their hold on spiritual things, and have not the courage to make a clean break with what they have lost faith in and embrace their new found religion.

When we come to another section of society, the working class, it is the poverty-ridden, the people who have no say in their own particular industries, who are affected, workers whose employer has the last say in everything. These are the people who grasp at the communist promises of freedom and power in the world of affairs.

As long as we have either here or anywhere else wealth and poverty, luxury and squalor, learning and ignorance side by side without doing our best to change their position and bring about equality, so long shall we be carrying on a losing fight with communism. Free people will not be content to remain merely free with limitations. As long as they are prevented from gaining the heights where they see other people, they will strive to reach those heights by whatever means may seem to be available to them.

I do not intend to take up much of the time of the house because I did not know that a matter of this kind would be raised. Had I known, and if I had the time, I have sufficient material available to keep me going the rest of the afternoon and evening. However, there is one other point I should like to raise before I sit down. The leader of the opposition said that he thought the government should not meet delegations from communist or their front organizations. I believe it would be wrong for the government not to meet such delegations.

I am glad that I can tell my communist friends that conditions are better here because we have more democracy, because it is much easier to see the Prime Minister of Canada than it is to see the prime minister of Russia. You do not have to get past so many people before you see him. I would hope that that would be the case if the leader of the opposition were sitting on the other side of the house. I would feel very sorry if it were not.

I think it was about 1934 that a delegation came down here to see the Prime Minister of that day.

Mr. Coldwell: July, 1935.

Mr. MacInnis: It was during the term of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. This incident has gone into history. This was a delegation of unemployed from western Canada. They stopped off at Regina and there was some trouble there. They then came on to Ottawa. One of the leaders was a fellow by the name of Evans and I saw him after the prime minister had met the delegation. I am sure that the feeling in the country was much stronger then than it is today because there was more misery. He told me that he had told the prime minister he was a damned liar. That is the sort of thing a communist can do in this country and live to tell the story, but it is not the sort of thing he could do in Russia and live to tell the story. Even if he were able to see the prime minister of that country he would not dare tell him what he thought of him.

I hope that when these people attempt to make appointments with ministers of the crown such appointments will be made as they would be made with people representing other sections of the community. These people should be shown that democracy in this country is for everyone as long as they allow democracy to operate. I agree that communists make it very difficult to deal with them as one would like to deal with people, but as long as they do not make it impossible we should practise the democracy we preach and not enable them to say that our democracy is a sham. Let us show them that it is deep and broad, that it is available to everyone in Canada who wants to make an effort to make it work.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a brief word because I am convinced that any man who is elected to this or any other legislature should have a standard by which he can test anything and everything. I must admit that I was proud of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when I saw the following heading and article in the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday morning:

P.M. says world in need of spiritual rebirth.

In these troublesome times, Mr. St. Laurent said, a spiritual rebirth is more required than the ingenuity of man. "We need faith by deeds, genuine brotherhood cannot be achieved without faith in God."

Any nation that leaves God out is bound to go to the bow-wows sooner or later. Russia has treated God as a myth. Our Prime Minister worships as he was taught by his mother to worship, and when we have a Prime Minister who says that faith in God is our foundation then the legislation that comes from this house is going to be a credit to that foundation in which the Prime Minister believes.

Solomon was the wisest man of the Jewish nation. He sought satisfaction from wealth and money; he sought satisfaction from enjoyment and many wives; he sought satisfaction from public buildings; but when he wanted to build up the whole thing on the proper foundation he told the people they should fear God and keep his commandments. If we as members of parliament and as members of the Christian church build on that foundation the devil of communism will have to hide his head.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, may I say in a kindly way that I believe it is a matter of courtesy that when a debate such as this occurs in the house each party takes part in it in rotation, and we usually come in at the last. When I saw my friend, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), rise I thought by conceding the floor to him he might even go on until six o'clock and my speech would not be broken. I regard him as a friend and he never takes too much time in the house. This time, however, he cut his speech too short, and it is now only six minutes to six. Would you care to call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker? I should like you to do so, but if not I will go on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY

The house resumed, from Monday, May 1, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company—Mr. Maybank—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, when the hour for private bills expired last night I had taken five minutes of the time of the house, and I should like to take up a few minutes more tonight on this subject which is of vital importance to my province and to the economy of Canada. I intend to start in a different way tonight, Mr. Chairman, because I believe that in a matter of such importance as this, we should have the support of all the members of this house. I should like to point out that I have yet to come here with a typewritten speech on these pipe line bills prepared for me by someone else. I have plenty of data that I could quote. In fact, I have a book full of clippings.

I am sorry the Minister of Public Works is leaving, because I am going to refer to something that should be brought to his attention. I am glad to see that he is returning. I do not intend to quote from the data I have compiled, although I could make a forty-minute speech by doing so. I intend to refer to the Chignecto barrier, but I am not going into great detail about it. I received a booklet concerning it, from which I intend to read. I am doing so because I am appealing to some of my friends on the right, and some who are over on the other side, who have spoken disparagingly of the rights of British Columbia.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Name them.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have never indulged in personalities in this house, but if the name of one is required I shall name the member for Charlotte.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): And he will speak in that manner again when he has the opportunity.

Mr. Cruickshank: I shall quote what the people in his own district say. I am not going into details about this Chignecto barrier, but this is the little booklet I got today entitled "The Voice of the Maritimes". So far as I have been able to ascertain in this house, the voice of the maritimes has completely forgotten the maritimes of the great Pacific. This booklet calls for the construction of the Chignecto canal. I wonder if some of those maritime members who are opposing justice for the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia will answer? I am going to put on Hansard the various organizations that took the trouble to mail this to me, and I presume to other members, at great trouble and expense to themselves. It appears to have been published and distributed by the Chignecto canal committee, Sackville, New Brunswick. I understand that New Brunswick is part of the maritimes. British Columbia has supported every move that part of the country has made for justice.

Before I continue, I should like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Public Works the fact that this booklet contains a nice map in which he may be interested some day. It covers the territory from the gulf of St. Lawrence to the bay of Fundy. If that canal is ever built, and I do not say that it should not be built, the people of Canada will be called upon to pay for it, including British Columbia and the riding of Fraser Valley. They have paid for the Welland canal, and every other development in eastern Canada.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Including the diking of the Fraser valley.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member will have an opportunity of speaking, and I shall be only too glad to hear the member for Charlotte speak, but not about petty smuggling across the line in his district. I live on the American border but we do not worry about the mounted police or smuggling because we are honest people in that district.

I am now going to name the different local committees supporting the construction of the Chignecto canal. They are located at Amherst, N.S.; Annapolis Royal, N.S.; Bathurst, N.B.; Bear River, N.S.; Campbellton, N.B.; Canso, N.S.; Caraquet, N.B.; Carleton county, N.B.; Charlottetown, P.E.I.; Chatham, N.B.; Chipman, N.B.; Clarke's Harbour, N.S.; Dalhousie, N.B.; Digby, N.S.; Edmundston, N.B.; Fredericton, N.B.; Grand Falls, N.B.; Grand Manan, N.B.; Hantsport, N.S.; Hartland, N.B.; Kentville, N.S.; Moncton, N.B., and Newcastle, N.B.

The Chairman: Order. I do not think the remarks of the hon. member are relevant to the item under consideration.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I will bow to your ruling because the people of the maritimes will know that when their members will not support British Columbia, Alberta, and the whole economy of Canada in the development of the resources of Canada for Canadians, they cannot expect our support in the construction of the work mentioned in this booklet. We are only asking that the Canadian route be adopted for the development of the resources of our own province.

I was interested in hearing the member for Coast-Capilano outline why we believe the timber of Canada should be processed within our own dominion. I have made that remark myself. We believe the same thing applies to our fish and other resources. The surplus, of course, could be exported to any market we can find for the product.

Mr. Johnston: What price are we paying for British Columbia lumber?

Mr. Cruickshank: I will just tell you this. If you were paying for British Columbia lumber what we are paying for No. 4 Alberta wheat, you would be doing very well.

Mr. Johnston: That does not answer the question at all.

Mr. Cruickshank: I do not want to delay proceedings on this matter, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: I hear laughter from some quarters. I have been disappointed in some of the support that we secured in connection with our efforts to develop not only Alberta and British Columbia but, as we saw it, the entire economy of Canada. Particularly have I been disappointed that northern Alberta and northern British Columbia did not appreciate the great opportunity that had been afforded us by both of the companies; and I say by both of the companies to a certain extent but definitely, as to northern Alberta and northern British Columbia, by one company. In northern British Columbia we have possibilities that equal anything as yet produced in that great province of Alberta. I cannot understand why, all of a sudden, after a couple of excellent speeches—and I was a little bit surprised that each speech took up forty minutes of our time, because I do not believe in that sort of thing—from Alberta members in the far corner, closure was put on, and not another word and not another peep came from our friends in the Social Credit party. There is one advantage we in this party have, Mr. Chairman. Nobody puts closure on me or on any other Liberal member. But apparently it is possible for the great Social Credit party to be dictated to as to when they must and when they must not talk. That is, however, their privilege. If they are not anxious to develop their great province—

Mr. Low: How do you know?

Mr. Cruickshank: If you are not as anxious to develop your great province as is your fine premier, it is not to your credit.

Mr. Low: Maybe we ought to call in the hon. member for Fraser Valley to advise us.

Mr. Cruickshank: It would be a good idea if you called in the member for Fraser Valley to advise your little group. You would then have a far more advantageous stand.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: I do not have to be called to order by the hon. member from Charlottetown or any other member from the maritimes. If the chairman calls me to order, I will sit down; but I will not be called to order by any maritimer, I will tell you that right now; and particularly after what we have done for the maritimes, and how we have supported them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You still have forty minutes to go.

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Cruickshank: Filibuster nothing. And even if it is a filibuster, I am not ashamed of the fact that it is, when I am fighting for my own province and for my own riding.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): That is quite an admission.

Mr. Cruickshank: I notice one thing about my friends here. We were asked just a short time ago by certain interests from the province of Ontario to raise the tariff on pipes in order to protect a concern at Hamilton, and my friends did not object to a little filibuster then; but some eight western Canadian members prevented that. I understand what some members said, and it is apropos of our argument that we need this natural gas to develop industry and to decentralize it in Canada. I remember very well one member who was in favour of the United States route advocating that his province and two other provinces secede from Canada because it cost $40 more for a frigidaire in his district. That is a different story. I should like him to answer that. He is good at talking when he is working against the prosperity of western Canada; but when he wants to bring these frigidaires in $40 cheaper, he would advocate that three great provinces of Canada secede from the British empire on account of a frigidaire.

I do not want to go back too long to the committee we had the other day, Mr. Chairman; because, as I said, I do not think that committee or any such committee that ever sat in this house was a credit to it. It was dominated and dictated to by one member.

An hon. Member: You should have been on it.

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes; I should like to have been on it.

An hon. Member: Why weren't you?

Mr. Cruickshank: If any of you people want to make a speech that is all right; and if any of my friends behind the curtain have not the courage to come into the chamber and ask me questions, they should not ask them. This committee was dominated, in my opinion—and I am expressing my opinion only; anybody who wishes may contradict it—it was dominated and dictated to by one individual who was the sponsor of a bill.

It was stated in the house—and this can be checked in Hansard—that the Westcoast Transmission Company, for which company I had the privilege of sponsoring a bill last year, have an application before the transport board for a United States route as well. I said at the time, and I repeat it, that when you are in a battle the first thing you learn to do is to protect yourself in the clinches. That is exactly what that company did. I want to point out through you, Mr. Chairman, to the members of this committee that what was stated yesterday and what was stated in the committee is absolutely not correct. Over two weeks ago that company withdrew from the transport board their application for the United States route. Do not forget that. They withdrew that application over two weeks ago.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Cruickshank: For the good and simple reason that they have on the record before the petroleum conservation board an application for an all-Canadian route, a route laid out by competent engineers. The most competent firm, it is thought, in that line in Canada, have gone over every foot of that route; and it has been gone over by a firm of the most eminent pipe line engineers in the United States. That route is recorded in the application at the present time, and that application was withdrawn two weeks ago; but apparently some of my junior friends from my own province have not awakened to that fact. It was withdrawn two weeks ago. That application is on record, with every mile of the route laid out, even to the number of feet that it may be necessary to tunnel in order to put this line through.

As far as I know, there is only one engineer in the house. There may be more. If so, I will stand corrected. But as far as I know, there is only one engineer in the house and last night I heard him say this. Incidentally, both he and I have been over every foot of the route; but he happens to have engineering ability that I do not possess. But he happens to have engineering ability and I have not. The most capable engineers that can be hired in the Dominion of Canada have approved the route and it is on record in the capital of Alberta. The most eminent firm of engineers in the United States in pipeline construction, which had more to do with the building of pipe lines in Louisiana and in other states than any other firm, have approved the route. That approval is on record in the capital of Alberta today. But I had to sit in the committee and hear two eminent engineers speak of it. One said that he had gone over the route by train and that he would go over it again by October.

I say to the sponsors of these bills that if they had happened to be where I was last Saturday they would have heard a lot. I do not know whether I have said this before or not, but I will repeat it. Last Saturday I went down to Montreal. I sat in a chair car and two of the prominent United States witnesses sat next to me. Naturally I knew who they were because I sat in on the committee, although some of my friends from British Columbia would not let me be a member of the committee. But I sat in there and listened to what was going on in the committee. I sat next to these United States witnesses on the train. I will give some advice to the sponsors of the bills. I advise them to tell their witnesses not to talk so loud and not to give away so many secrets. That is very good advice to the sponsors of the two bills. As I say, I sat in the committee and I recognized these two witnesses. I have supported Quebec long enough, and some hon. members from that province should try to get on the bandwagon for British Columbia.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Applesauce again.

Mr. Cruickshank: As I say, I sat next to these two gentlemen, and it was very interesting to hear their conversation.

It was said in the paper the other day—and I admit it—that I got up by mistake and voted for this motion. They said that the face of the member for Fraser Valley was red. I admit that; but, Mr. Chairman, if the sponsors of these two bills could have heard their witnesses talk in the chair car, their faces would have been a lot redder than mine. I do not want to take up any more of the time of the committee—

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Cruickshank: I heard one of my Quebec friends over there interrupt.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Now you are mistaken.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to know of any member who has been more loyal to, or supported the ambitions and often unfair desires of, Quebec than those from the province of British Columbia. I have had to listen to speech after speech of forty minutes of stupidity from that hon. member. He ought to listen to at least twenty minutes, if he calls it stupid, from me.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Who said "stupid"?

Mr. Cruickshank: If you want me to say so, I will say so.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Nobody said it.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I have already said one thing. The Westcoast Transmission Company have withdrawn their application before the board of transport commissioners for a United States route. I am authorized to say further, Mr. Chairman, and I particularly want a couple of my junior friends from the province of British Columbia to listen to this with interest—

Mr. Thatcher: Capilano.

Mr. Cruickshank: The Westcoast Transmission Company have a charter, and of course these charters are valuable, or why would they invest hundreds of millions of dollars, if they were not? I am authorized to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Westcoast Transmission Company have absolutely no objection to having it inserted that they will build an all-Canadian route if the other two companies have the same proviso inserted in their charter.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended until last evening to participate in any of the debates with respect to the bill to incorporate the Alberta Natural Gas Company, for reasons which I will mention in a few minutes. I rise now to take exception to what I regard as entirely unwarranted and unjustified insinuations and innuendoes contained in the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. Referring to me in his remarks in the debate on this bill in the committee last night—

Mr. Hodgson: May I ask the hon. member a question? Are you still the lawyer representing this company?

Mr. Campney: I am representing myself and I will indicate that in a few minutes. Referring to me, the hon. member said that when the original petition for incorporation was presented at the final session of the last parliament I was one of the applicants for incorporation. That is correct. On this fact, and on the fact that I was present at times at the meetings of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, as were many other hon. members of this house, and as was entirely my right as it was the right of every other hon. member of this house, he said that my position was open to question and implied that in some way or other I had not taken the proper attitude as a member of this house on the consideration of this question.

I resent very much the aspersions on my conduct in this house which the insinuations and innuendoes to which I have referred clearly allege, and I want to state briefly the facts with respect to my own position.

These are the facts. Almost three years ago the sponsors of this company came to me as a solicitor and asked me or my firm to secure for them a Canadian incorporation to build a pipe line. At that stage the incorporation was obtainable, as was any other incorporation, from the Department of the Secretary of State under letters patent. We proceeded with that incorporation; but before it was completed parliament had passed the Pipe Lines Act which made a statutory incorporation necessary before a company could engage in the construction or operation of a pipe line. We thereupon abandoned the proceedings to incorporate under the Companies Act and launched a petition to parliament, and on that petition my name appears as an applicant, in accordance with what I think is generally recognized as a common practice in solicitor firms. Purely as a matter of convenience, I was a formal petitioner for the purpose of incorporation.

That petition, for reasons which in themselves are very interesting but probably not relevant to this debate, failed. That was in April, 1949.

In June of that year I was elected to parliament. I may say that during that election the same sort of attack by radio, by press and on the platform, as we have witnessed in connection with this bill, was directed against me.

Mr. Green: Not by me.

Mr. Campney: I was the subject of vicious and unfair attack on the part of my opponents in that election simply because I had been the petitioner as a solicitor for this particular company, and had acted as a solicitor in the usual way. Well, I won that election, by almost 4,000 votes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Campney: The Progressive Conservative candidate and the C.C.F. candidate, the then sitting member, very nearly lost their deposits in each case. Therefore this line from the hon. member from Vancouver-Quadra is not new.

Mr. Green: I did not attack you in the election.

Mr. Campney: It is old stuff, like so much, shall I say, of his contributions to Hansard.

Alberta Natural Gas Company

I should like to place before hon. members of the committee exactly what did happen following my election as a member of parliament. When the applicants for this charter came to me prior to last session and said that they intended to proceed with a petition to endeavour again to obtain incorporation I told them, definitely, in a general way, that I would not act in any way that was incompatible with my duties as a member of this House of Commons, and told them specifically a number of things.

This is what I told them: That neither I nor any partner of mine nor my firm would act for them in this or any other matter which would come before the parliament of Canada. I told them further that I would not be an applicant on the petition. I said further that neither I nor any member of my firm, nor my firm, would accept any fee or payment whatsoever payable to me or my firm or any member of it with respect to the petition to parliament to incorporate this company, so long as I was a member of parliament. I told them I would not sponsor their bill—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On a point of order. The hon. member is now speaking in complete breach of the chief rule of our profession, and that is that he is giving us information passing between him and a client.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: Tell that to Sweeney; great stuff, that is!

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Will you let me go on and finish my point of order? In spite of the raucous intervention, particularly by the Minister of Transport, that privilege is the privilege of the client, and not of the solicitor.

Mr. Abbott: It was not your client.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): No, it was the client of the member who is now speaking, and who was busier than a one-armed paper hanger in the committee just a short time ago.

Mr. Campney: I said that I would not vote on the bill, and that I would be free to take any attitude I thought desirable in the interests of my own constituency, my own province and my country, a position which I have meticulously and continuously maintained to the present time. I believe that is a position which will commend itself to members of this house; and I would hope that it might even commend itself to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green).

I am extremely desirous, as is every member from British Columbia and from Alberta, and particularly desirous as a member of the House of Commons from the constituency of Vancouver Centre, that natural gas be brought to Vancouver at the earliest possible date, in abundant quantity, by the most safe and secure route in the best interests of Canada and at the lowest possible cost.

I would prefer to rely upon the decision of the board of transport commissioners which has been charged with the jurisdiction and with the responsibility of dealing with all the matters attendant on that decision rather than upon the jurisdiction and responsibility of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra who, I do not think, has been blessed with either of those qualities.

Let me say in conclusion that from my observations during the short time I have been a member of this house nothing I have seen would lead me to have any desire whatever to base either my parliamentary ethics or my conduct in this house upon the example of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman, on April 3 I spoke in this house during the debate on second reading of this bill to incorporate the Alberta Natural Gas Company. At that time I urged hon. members of the house to allow this bill to go to committee where we could ascertain further information, believing as I did that in committee evidence would be available from independent sources which would enable hon. members to make up their minds as to whether or not this all-Canadian route which was spoken of was both economically and physically possible.

I regret very much that my absence from the country made it impossible for me to attend the first meetings of the committee. But I have now received a belated edition of the evidence, and after a careful study of it I have come to the conclusion that the pipe line promoter was biased in the extreme, no doubt by his very evident desire to get his gas as quickly as possible out of Canada and into the United States, by the shortest fire escape, far from the searching eyes and voices of members of this House of Commons.

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Gibson: By his own admission we now know that he never gave a passing thought to the welfare of the northern part of British Columbia, not having even tried to examine the possibility of using the Yellowhead pass route through Kamloops to Princeton and down through Hope to the Fraser valley. He had other fish to fry, evidently, with gas across the border to the south. The committee however was able to extract the monumental and exotic promise from him that he would take another look at it, his previous look having been taken from the softly lighted interior of a C.N.R. drawingroom.

Mr. Chairman, is this the rugged type of pioneer we Canadians must import from across the line to develop our natural resources in Canada? I know that all hon. members here will wish to cast their votes in a way which they sincerely believe will accomplish the best results for Canada. While I am not an engineer, I have had considerable construction and engineering experience.

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Gibson: Despite the unbiased professional advice which the members of this committee did not receive, after the committee reported out the bills on Friday night I made it my business over the week end to obtain some factual engineering data on the Yellowhead pass route, and also on the proposed American route across Montana, the Stevens pass and the state of Washington.

This data was supplied me by Major "Jerry" Wood, a professional mining engineer, whose distinguished military career was referred to last evening by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano. May I add further that my personal knowledge of Major Wood extends over the last eighteen years, having been associated with him in a number of mining ventures, some of which were successful and some not. Anyone who is familiar with mining will know that that is the history of that industry.

I have complete confidence in his judgment and in his ability and integrity. This information is from his personal survey. All the information I have received was compiled by him from a careful personal study of the area involved. I know the house will be amazed and delighted to learn that the length of a pine line from Edmonton to Vancouver via the all-Canadian Yellowhead pass route will be within twenty miles of the same distance as a line laid from Pincher creek in Alberta, south through Montana and Washington to Vancouver.

Another fact which will astound and I am sure influence hon. members is the testimony given before the Alberta natural gas conservation board by the firm of Ford, Bacon and Davis, outstanding pipe line construction engineers of the United States, to the effect that there is eighty miles less of rock work on the Yellowhead pass route than on the American route across Montana and the state of Washington.

The same witness stated before the Alberta conservation board that he thought, from an engineering standpoint, that he would rather build the northern or the Yellowhead pass route than the one through the United States. Those statements would indicate to me that the Yellowhead route will deliver gas to consumers in Vancouver at least as cheaply as by any other alternative or American route.

This testimony by the outstanding pipe line construction company in the United States has convinced me that the all-Canadian route is both economically feasible and sound. I know all hon. members are interested in the development of British Columbia. I can even point out to maritime members that the obvious source of supply and fabrication for our steel used in construction of an all-Canadian gas pipe line would be the Dosco plant at Sydney, and that it would reach us from that plant by way of the Panama canal by cheap water transportation for delivery at Vancouver. We know of course that this will create a great amount of employment for Canadian workmen, and consequently both the east and west coasts of Canada will enjoy a tremendous increase in employment by the building of an all-Canadian route.

Mr. Thatcher: They did not do that with the one they are building now.

Mr. Gibson: My hon. friend knows that there is a great deal of difference when it comes to a pipe line being built on the Pacific coast. I am speaking of water transportation and he knows very well it is quite difficult to get into the Moose Jaw swamp with a large ship. Some fear has been expressed in this house that in refusing these charters we are creating a monopoly for one company, the Westcoast Transmission Company. Actually, nothing could be further from the truth.

The Alberta conservation board has said that they will welcome applications from any responsible company for a permit to export natural gas but so far the Alberta Natural Gas Company have not taken advantage of this opportunity. Such an application would involve the disclosure of what route was to be taken, a disclosure which every member of the committee realizes they are hesitant to make.

May I point out here that no company needs a federal charter until it has received the sanction of the Alberta conservation board since the board of transport commissioners in Ottawa have refused to listen to testimony until such permission is obtained. Why does not Alberta Natural Gas Company go ahead with its application and then come back to parliament next session? If they have received the approval for an all-Canadian route then I know every hon. member will be glad to grant them a charter.

Alberta Natural Gas Company

Last evening the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) said that he was satisfied with the decision of the board of transport commissioners, that whatever decision they might make he was quite prepared to accept. May I remind him that parliament is the policy setting body. Parliament set the all-Canadian policy in the post-confederation years for the building of the Canadian Pacific railway. Parliament set the policy for Trans-Canada Air Lines, and only last session this parliament set the policy for the trans-Canada highway. Let the parliament set the policy in this instance and instruct the board of transport commissioners that gas from Alberta may go to the Pacific coast only over an all-Canadian route. I have ascertained, and the committee could have ascertained also by calling independent witnesses, that such a route is feasible.

May I pause here to remind hon. members that the Westcoast Transmission Company, which has been incorporated, have withdrawn their application for a route through Kingsgate to the United States, and as further evidence of their good faith have submitted expert testimony extending for almost a month to the Alberta conservation board in connection with their request for permission to build over the Yellowhead pass route.

I am opposing the passage of this bill to incorporate the Alberta Natural Gas Company because I feel that this company has not been entirely frank, either with the committee or with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Does anyone in this house believe that the minister would have written to the city of Vancouver as he did unless he had been assured of an all-Canadian route? The minister used these words:

> My information is that the new company is proposing to build this line through all-Canadian territory and to serve all Vancouver points before taking the line into the United States.

I am quite sure the minister never would have written that letter unless he had been assured by Mr. Dixon or other principals of the Alberta Natural Gas Company that that was their intention. I certainly have no difficulty in making up my mind as to which of the gentlemen in question I believe. Probably hon. members would be interested in the views of the government of British Columbia in regard to this matter. With your permission I should like to quote from the testimony given by the attorney general of that province, the Hon. Gordon Wismer, before the Alberta conservation board on February 7 last. Mr. Wismer said:

> We are and have been, ever since the construction of gas pipe lines has been under consideration, strongly supporting the proposal that such a line should be built from northern Alberta into and through British Columbia and thence, if sufficient gas is available, to the Pacific northwest states of the United States of America.
> I took that position before the transport board. We are, of course, assuming that it will be shown before the proper tribunal that this route is feasible and practicable as we understand it to be.
> This route, if followed, will assure that the domestic and industrial requirements of the people of British Columbia will be a matter of first consideration, and it seems to us that this objective cannot be reached in any other way.

I would point out to hon. members that that is the considered view of the government of British Columbia. I continue to quote Mr. Wismer's remarks:

> That is as we are advised at the present time.
> More important than this consideration, however, is the fact that the northern route will undoubtedly afford the opportunity of great industrial development and expansion in both northern Alberta and through the considerable territory in British Columbia which lies in the path of the projected route.
> And of first importance, in our view and submission, and here we may be of some assistance in the disposal of the primary question at issue, is the following:
> The northeastern area of British Columbia lying to the east of the Rocky mountains in the Peace river block is part of the sedimentary basin which underlies the northwest portion of the province of Alberta. My information is that there are about 50 million acres in this area which may be considered to be potential oil and gas lands.

May I just interject to say that when I read that I called up the dominion geologist, Dr. Hume, whose name is familiar to most hon. members because his standing in the geological field in Canada is the highest. I asked Dr. Hume if the 50 million acres of potential oil and gas lands in British Columbia would be at all comparable with a similar acreage in Alberta, and he told me that those oil and gas lands in British Columbia unquestionably offered the same potential for the production of oil and gas as a similar 50 million acres in Alberta. I just pause there to point out how extremely important it is to the people of British Columbia and to the development of the northern portion of the province that this gas pipe line go through that area rather than the Crowsnest pass route or through the states of Washington and Montana.

We have been told that it is only feasible to construct the one pipe line from the natural gas resources of Alberta to the Pacific coast. If by any chance that pipe line should go by the southern route or through the United States these 50 million acres of potential oil and gas lands would remain undeveloped. If that should be the case the development of the hinterland of British Columbia would be retarded for generations. I quote further from the submission by Mr. Wismer:

> The government of British Columbia and others have carried out some exploration work in this area, and I believe we are justified in saying that there are strong indications that there is a very considerable gas and oil potential in this district. The government is desirous that further exploration be undertaken, but it must be obvious that the greatest incentive for the undertaking of this work is that provision be made for market facilities if and when oil or gas or both are discovered in quantity.

The nearest market area for northwestern Alberta and northeastern British Columbia producing areas will be the Pacific coast points of British Columbia, and if the projected pipe line is built along the route suggested through the northern points, it will provide an available and accessible market for these products.

In considering the question of the route of the pipe line, it should be noted that the northern route would add to the gas potential of the province of Alberta that of the area described in British Columbia.

In conclusion may I say my government is most anxious that natural gas be made available to the people of British Columbia if and when the government of Alberta determines that in the interests of the people of Alberta a permit for exportation can properly be granted.

The government of British Columbia is prepared to take any reasonable steps within its power to facilitate the building of a pipe line system from Alberta to and through the province of British Columbia, and will be prepared to join with Alberta in supporting any applications that may be made to the federal authority in order to secure and make possible the building of the lines.

I would point out that the government of British Columbia has already advised the government of Canada of the resolution which they passed in regard to this matter. I continue:

We in British Columbia congratulate the people of Alberta on the successful oil exploration program being carried out in the province, and hope that the work now being carried on will continue to meet with success in greater measure year after year. One of the main factors which actuate our interest in the present project is that we wish to make it possible that British Columbia areas will be explored and will enjoy a like experience, and in the not too distant future oil and gas production in the province of British Columbia, particularly in the district which I have mentioned, will be able to share in the markets available, thus making a contribution to the general well-being and prosperity of Canada.

I think, Mr. Chairman, the house will agree that is a very worth-while submission by the attorney general of British Columbia. I ask hon. members to give the views expressed by that government their very earnest consideration before we allow the sanctioning of any other pipe line routes.

I was quite interested in some of what appeared to me to be the rather evasive statements made by the chief witness for the Alberta Natural Gas Company. At page 65 of the proceedings of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines there was a question asked by the hon. member for Edmonton West. He asked Mr. Dixon, the witness, what his opinion was with regard to the main supply of gas. Mr. Dixon replied:

. . . this is a matter of opinion—but to my mind the main supply of gas is in the southern part of Alberta.

Then the hon. member for Edmonton West asked:

Do you not think that situation is changing fast?

The witness replied:

No, sir, I think it is just the opposite.

In other words, the witness in this particular instance tried to prove what I am sure a man who is eminently well acquainted with the oil business must have known was not correct, and was an evasion. I cannot bring myself to believe that he could have been as stupid as that unless he was trying to be evasive. In order to check the matter again I referred it to the dominion geologist who informed me that as of the present date probably the largest gas reserves that have already been developed lie more in the south than in the north, but that anybody who has studied the geological structure and the recent developments in the province of Alberta must realize that the northern area is developing much more rapidly. He said that he would state without any hesitation that the greatest bulk of our natural gas resources will be found in northern Alberta. I said, "In that case you would say that Edmonton was much nearer to the centre of the gas resources of Alberta than Calgary". He said unquestionably that would be the case.

In conclusion may I reiterate that we are not delaying Alberta Natural Gas Company in getting on with their business by refusing them a charter to incorporate a dominion company at this time. All they have to do is to go to the Alberta natural gas conservation board which, as I have said before, has stated that they are willing to hear submissions from any responsible company. The Westcoast Transmission Company, which already has a charter, has stated that they would not raise any objection to the hearing of their submission. If the Alberta Natural Gas Company is acting in good faith and really desires to build an all-Canadian pipe line I can see no reason in the world why they should not make their submission to the Alberta conservation board as to what route they intend to follow. As I said before, I am sure I speak for every member of the house when I say that if they convince us that they really desire to build an all-Canadian route they will have no difficulty in getting their charter through the House of Commons.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose it is very often that a man is believed when he says that he really had no intention of speaking on a subject. At any rate, it is some evidence of the truth of what I say that I have waited a long time before venturing to take part in this discussion. Certainly during the early weeks of the debate I thought it was something that I could very well leave to other people. I thought it was a matter which primarily concerned the people of British Columbia and Alberta, and I acted on that belief for a considerable time. The principal reason, more than any other, why I am on my feet, is that as time has gone on I have come to have a very uncomfortable feeling that this bill was not exactly what it seemed, that it was not as private as it looked, and that whether or not it was a government bill one might at least describe it as a "Howe" bill.

It has been stated in effect without contradiction in this house that it was a government bill. That has not been denied. As I say, certainly it seemed to me to have lost many of the aspects of a private bill as time went on. That was the first feeling that made me uneasy and made me feel that the house was not being treated with perfect candour. Perhaps that is not an entirely unprecedented experience for us. Therefore I began to feel more interest in it, and finally I came to the conclusion that it was a matter which concerned all of us.

There are one or two other things I should like to say about it. First of all I must admit I was impressed with the argument that we should vote for second reading because it would go to a committee and then all would be well. Incidentally, when I read the evidence of the committee and see what happened there I have a feeling that I was what might be called a "sucker" in ever paying very much attention to that argument. I had never realized before that, whereas in this house many means have been worked out over the century to protect the rights of minorities, so far as I can discern in a committee there is no means of protecting those rights at all. The minority is entirely subject to the will of the majority, and in this case I think the will of the majority was exercised in a rather unfortunate manner.

Mr. Knowles: The railroad committee.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Last night my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, was taken up for suggesting that a certain gentleman who had to do with this committee had acted in a high-handed manner. Apparently that was regarded as a term which perhaps should not be used in the house. I am not offering any opinion whether it should or should not. I am only saying I think it was a gross understatement of what happened in that committee.

Of course we remember the beginning of this difficulty. It all goes back to the days almost exactly a year ago when the government was getting ready, in perhaps unseemly haste, for an election. I will not say an unseemly election because that might sound as if one were feeling a little personal about it. At any rate, they were getting ready in a hurry for an election. A lot of things were done in a great hurry, and as has been pointed out not quite as well done as they might have been. The leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre have outlined that in detail clearly and cogently, and I have no intention of going over it again. I observe that it is almost nine o'clock, Mr. Chairman. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

PURCHASE BY C.P.R. OF SHAWINIGAN FALLS TERMINAL RAILWAY CAPITAL STOCK

The house resumed, from Monday, May 1, consideration in committee of Bill No. 88, respecting the purchase by Canadian Pacific Railway Company of shares of the capital stock of the Shawinigan Falls Terminal Railway Company—Mr. Pinard—Mr. Dion in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

COMMUNIST ACTIVITIES IN CANADA

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock, we were dealing with the amendment that had been proposed by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew), to the effect that this house is of the opinion that appropriate legislation should be introduced so that communist and similar activities in Canada may be made an offence punishable under the Criminal Code. I listened with a good deal of interest to the leader of the opposition, to the reply by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and also to the speech by the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). All three speakers put forth some remarkable thoughts, with some of which I agree and others with which I disagree.

It does seem to me that, in order to make a motion of this kind effective, it would be necessary for us to define our terms. In fact, I think we have come to a place in our Canadian life and thinking when the terms "communism" and "democracy" have been bounced around so much that they mean all things to all men. I wonder if the Prime Minister, who, after all is the leader of this nation, has ever actually attempted to define communism. Putting the resolution in other words, we might just as well say that anyone proposing anything contrary to our way of life be regarded as coming under the Criminal Code. Now, that would also be subject to definition. I do not know if there is anyone in this house who would be capable of defining our way of life. When we deal with these things, we are dealing with life principles. I doubt very much whether one could successfully legislate in such a way as to be able to govern great life principles.

The leader of the opposition said some things with which I agree. I was quite pleased to hear him say that communism was in reality anti-Christ, that it was anti-Christ doctrine. I do not want to appear to be splitting hairs, but in considering a matter of this nature, in order to get the most accurate picture, one has to say some things that might be interpreted as splitting hairs. I do not know whether the leader of the opposition watched his words carefully, but I think Hansard will record that he did not say it was anti-Christian doctrine. There is all the difference in the world to my mind between that which is anti-Christ and that which is anti-Christian. Now, that may pose a question that will involve some thought. The member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) in debating this theme during the last session of parliament, made a remark which I do not think I shall forget for a long time. It was a remark that, on the face of it, might appear to be quite agreeable. He said that Christianity must deliver the goods. I have a high regard for the member for Winnipeg North. There are many people for whom, after you get to know them a little better, you gain a high regard, even though you do not agree with what they say.

I want to say this, Mr. Speaker, that when we get to the underlying root of communism, which is anti-Christ, we discover that it is not Christianity that is at stake at all. We use the term democracy, and the Prime Minister today said the best way to defeat communism is to make democracy effective. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, of something about which I reminded you last session, and that is that as you open these sittings each day you pray on behalf of this house, "Thy kingdom come." When that prayer is ultimately answered you will not have a democracy at all, but you will have what is known as a theocracy. It is for that reason that the issue is not Christianity versus anti-Christianity, because I fancy the world would not have any great difficulty in accepting Christianity. The issue is between Christ and anti-Christ. It is Christ the world at large is not ready to accept. I pose those thoughts which may be somewhat provoking to those with leisure to pursue them further.

When the Prime Minister replied to the leader of the opposition, I carefully noted some of the things he said. I am largely in agreement with him. I do want to say this, that I do not believe the leader of the opposition is any more concerned about this matter of communism in Canada than is the Prime Minister. I regard the Prime Minister as being a great Canadian who has the welfare of Canada at heart. I believe that he recognizes the danger of communism. But, as he said, and as the leader of the opposition would discover if he were sitting in the Prime Minister's place, it is a matter of how to deal with the situation that confronts us.

The Prime Minister referred to the labour unions, and said that they were able to take care of the situation themselves. I think he used the significant term that they had undergone an autonomous purgence. I want to make an observation on that. It is true that the great labour organizations in Canada were able to get rid of some of the troublemakers who were communists and powerful men in them. But I will make this observation. They were able to do so only because those who were not communists still were in the majority and still had the upper hand. Given time, the picture may have changed, as it has changed in some other countries that we know of. France is supposed to be a democracy, but it just so happens that communism in France, having regard to labour, has gained the upper hand as it has also in Italy and some other countries. Given time, the picture may have been changed in those two great labour unions in Canada. If the communists had gained the upper hand, then the picture would be different today. I fancy that one reason they did not gain the upper hand was that since the war communism has become slightly more unpopular than it was during the war days when Russia was considered to be one of our allies.

Furthermore, let me say this. We must not think that all labour unions therefore have been able to cope with this particular matter. That may be so in the larger unions but it is not always so in the local unions. If any of you live in constituencies in which there are strong local labour unions, especially in some industrial areas, you will find that the communists, having regard to some of these local unions, still hold the upper hand.

I do not think that anything the government did caused this autonomous purgence that has gone on in the labour unions. I think it was the natural course of events. Time happened to be on our side. Then the Prime Minister said that we are in a better position today with respect to communism than we were a few years ago. That may be a subject of argumentation. We may be. But if we are, once again I say it is not because the government has done anything in particular about it. It has simply been that public opinion has slightly changed with respect to communism by reason of the fact that Russia, since the war, has been acting rather badly in the United Nations; and this has had its reflection upon the people of Canada, of the United States and of some other countries. Time there again happened to be on our side.

Then the Prime Minister read part of a brief that had been presented to the Senate committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms. The Prime Minister read the names of those persons who were attached to the organization that presented that brief. Might I say that I personally believe that the reading of the names of prominent men does not strengthen the argument a great deal, for the reason that prominent men can sometimes be wrong. Anyway, let me go a step further. The Prime Minister read certain parts of that brief on the matter of human rights and fundamental freedoms. Might I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that the parts he read from that brief, supported by those whom he named, could be accepted in every communist organization in this country. Each and every one of them would say "Amen" to that. Why? Because it would give them their freedom to pursue their work, and what they want is freedom enough to take away our democratic freedom.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that I did not believe that you could legislate with respect to great life principles. I happened to be on the committee of this house on human rights and fundamental freedoms when we were to recommend some stand that should be taken on this matter in the United Nations. I am reminded that it was a joint committee of the upper and lower houses. In debating that matter I posed the thought that I did not believe you could legislate on great human life principles. The then minister of justice, the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, when he spoke in the debate—and you will find it reported in Hansard—agreed with me on that matter.

As an illustration, a man is supposed to love his wife; but you cannot write a law that a man must love his wife. How could you? Oh, you could write the law, but that would not make him love her.

Mr. Knowles: You can make a law to keep him from loving another man's wife.

Mr. Hansell: No. My friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says you could make a law to keep him from loving another man's wife. Maybe he should have defined his terms. You cannot make that law at all, not to make it effective. You can make the law, and put it on the statute books; but there is a life principle you cannot legislate for, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. Knowles: That applies to anything.

Mr. Hansell: No, it does not apply to anything. It does not apply to stealing. You can legislate for stealing.

Mr. Knowles: But that does not stop it.

Mr. Hansell: Of course it does not stop it. But you can put a man in jail for stealing. There is something tangible there. That is not a life principle. He breaks a law. But when you are dealing with human relationships, you cannot legislate on great life principles.

I do not want to overemphasize this point at all, but we read a great deal about racial discrimination; and that is one of the parts of the brief that the Prime Minister read this afternoon. I greatly doubt whether you can legislate effectively on the matter of racial discrimination. Perhaps you can. But I believe there is a better way. I happen to live in a small community and I have a Chinese family as my neighbours. My children play with the Chinese children. They come into my house. We do not have any difficulties. He minds his own business; I mind mine. I go out in the morning and look over the fence. I say: "Good morning, Frank." He looks over the fence and says: "Good morning." He doesn't call me by my first name, but it does not make any difference; we are the greatest of neighbours. I have friends who are negroes. They happen to be studying to be missionaries. I do not have any difficulty with these people. Why is it? You do not have to enact any legislation. So long as they mind their own business and I mind mine we get along perfectly well. I have Jewish friends. I deal with one or two of them down here in Ottawa. I deal with them simply because in this particular instance at least they always give me a square deal. I know these are rather homely little illustrations. When I first came down to parliament fifteen years ago I used to wear a great big watch and chain. I said to myself: "It looks too much like a politician; I am going to get a wrist watch." I came down town, saw a little store and went in. The owner was a Jew who was trying to keep in business. It was during the depression days and jewelry was not selling very well. I said: "I see you have some watches in the window." He said: "Yes, I have some." He said: "This is a very good watch; it is a $16 watch. I will give it to you for $8." I thought, well, I don't know—I bought the watch.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): For how much?

Mr. Hansell: For $8.

Mr. Knowles: Where did the money come from?

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, I say this is a very homely illustration. I went back to that man on a number of occasions and bought things from him. I talked with him as a friend talks with a friend. He and I never had any difficulty. Of course if my watch had gone on the blink about a week afterwards we might have, but he appeared to be honest. What I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, is that I am wearing that watch here tonight; I have never had it in a repair shop and it does not lose a minute in a week. He and I did not have any difficulty. As a matter of fact a few years ago I came back and I said to myself: "You know, Hansell, I think you took advantage of that chap." I was going in there to tell him about the watch and pay him another $8 anyway.

Mr. Knight: Did you ever do it?

Mr. Hansell: Why bring that up?

Mr. Knowles: Send him a copy of Hansard.

Mr. Hansell: I was just about to do it, Mr. Speaker, when I walked by his place and found that he had sold out to another man. That saved the day.

If these various ethnic groups mind their own business they can get along with each other. I get along perfectly well with them all. Of course if they began to push me around it would be a different story; and I am quite satisfied that if I commenced pushing them around it might be a different story; but so long as we do not push one another around I do not know that we need any particularly stringent laws to try to force people to like one another. That is my view of these things.

I now come to something which I regard as more important than anything else. Suppose this legislation passes. Suppose the government should write into our Criminal Code something that would make the activities of communism, and, as it says here, similar activities, a criminal offence. How can we be sure even then that we are really getting the culprits? I may have some peculiar views on these matters. Tim Buck was mentioned this afternoon. I do not know whether Tim Buck is the most dangerous man.

Mr. Sinnott: Oh yes, he is.

Mr. Hansell: He is the head of the communist organization, but when you mention Tim Buck to a person he can label him right away. He says, "Oh, well, we know all about him." They have him categorized. They have him where they want him. They know what you are talking about. I am wondering whether it is the Tim Bucks that you really want to get after. Remember, Mr. Speaker, there is more than one way of selling out a country; there is more than one way of sabotaging a democracy.

I should like to pose this question to anyone who cares to answer it. How deep a hue must pink become before it becomes red?

Mr. Harkness: That is a dyer's question.

Mr. Hansell: I heard no answer. How deep a hue must pink become before it becomes a danger in Canada? Can we assume, Mr. Speaker, that it is criminal to gain power by a process of rape, while at the same time assume that it is within the law to gain the same end by a process of seduction? These are a few questions that we have reason to think about. The strange thing is that there has been a mentality built up in this country that will condition the people for the acceptance of a mild form of communism. I should like to ask this question to provoke some thought. Did this ever occur to us? How is it that some of those people in responsible positions, who perhaps fell into disrepute because their actions indicated a reddish hue, have resigned their posts only to find that they are welcomed into a wider and more influential field, sometimes going to some branches of the United Nations where criticism has no effect, and where we could not get our hands on them if we wanted to? That has happened over and over again.

The hon. member for Vancouver East gave a rather good speech. I agreed with a good deal of it, but sometimes he likes to tap me on the head, and I like to turn around and tap him. One thing he had to say—and I think it was quite reasonable—was that the best way to extend freedom is to extend it. You know, I cannot quite reconcile that with the fact that every time we want to loosen up controls and give more freedom, he wants to keep them on. It seems a strange sort of thing to me. What he should have said was that the best way to extend freedom is to institute control. I am just pitting what he said there against his philosophy.

There was another matter mentioned by the Prime Minister which I think we have reason to think through. He said that the best way to combat communism is to make our democracy effective. That is a nice thing to say, and I am guilty of saying it myself. I am not afraid to say that sometimes I change my mind. When we talk of making democracy effective we usually think of making people economically secure, with the greatest amount of freedom.

Let me pose this question even to the Prime Minister: Some of the leading communists in the world are in one of the freest countries in the world, and have more money than they know what to do with. For instance, Hollywood is wracked from stem to gudgeon with communism; and yet nearly all of them have incomes in the millions.

Paul Robeson, that great artist and singer, was reared in the United States where he was free to pursue his talent and to become a great singer and a wealthy man. Democracy, so far as Paul Robeson is concerned, has been mighty good to him. But it does not stop him from being a communist. Furthermore let me say that those in our own country who were exposed during the recent spy trials were not those who were the rabble rousers. They were intellectuals, men of letters, men whose economic future was assured, and who reached that position very largely through the freedoms granted them by this country and others. Yet, as the leader of the opposition said, and to use his term, they are the ones who had accepted communism as a doctrine. Communism had become a conviction of their lives, and all the legislation in the world would not take that conviction away from them.

So I doubt very much whether an effective democracy will do away with any fifth column in this country. Supposing we come to the place where we have an effective democracy, supposing we come to the place where taxation is reduced, where social security is the highest in the world and is guaranteed—in other words, supposing we have a Social Credit government: granting all that, does anyone suppose that the fifth columnists would say, "Well boys, it is all up now; let us pack our grips and go back home"? No, sir, not on your life; because communism, being what it is—anti-Christ—is out to win the world, to sabotage mankind, to frustrate any divine program for man's redemption and to make your prayer, Mr. Speaker,—"Thy kingdom come"—amount to nothing but empty words. That is the issue today.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I begin by endeavouring to clarify some aspects of the present debate and the amendment which, it seems to me, have become somewhat blurred in the course of the discussion since my leader made his speech.

I would first of all draw attention to the language of the amendment. This is an amendment to the motion that the house resolve itself into committee of supply, and it is in these words:

> This house is of the opinion that appropriate legislation should be introduced so that communist and similar activities in Canada may be made an offence punishable under the Criminal Code.

Sir, the key words to the amendment are "legislation" and "activities". If I may say so, with respect, the full import of those words has been lost on some who have taken part in the debate today. What this amendment proposes to illegalize is overt acts. It is activities necessarily involving overt acts that are to be the object of the legislation proposed in the amendment.

There is no suggestion in the amendment of penalizing people for their mere thoughts. There is no suggestion here of the suppression of unpopular ideas, if they remain nothing more than ideas, and do not result in overt acts which, in effect, strike at the security of the state or strike at human freedom.

It is of the essence of freedom and our conception of it that no man should be subject to punishment for what he thinks, provided his thoughts do not issue in acts of the kind I have described. The acts at which this amendment is directed are acts which, as I have said, strike at the security of the state, and those which strike at the roots of our freedom.

It is inherent in the communist creed that religion is the opiate of the people. That was the language of the communist manifesto nearly a hundred years ago. Sir, if anyone wishes to confine himself to thinking atheistic thoughts he is not committing an offence against the law of the land. But if he advocates a system involving the overthrow of constituted government by force, the suppression of the right of any man to worship according to the dictates of his conscience in the church or the religious organization of his choice, then that overt act is something which challenges both the security of the state and the freedom of the individual; and of acts of that kind this parliament must take due notice.

There is no suggestion here of those purges of libraries which have occurred in some places in the world. There is no suggestion here of destroying those books which record the essentials of the evil doctrine of communism. The people will want to know what are the essentials of that foul doctrine of communism. I am the possessor of a copy of Marx's "Das Kapital". I am the possessor of a copy of the communist manifesto. I possess a copy of the statutes of the third communist international. There is nothing in this amendment that proposes to take away from me or anyone else the right to possess documents of that kind. But it does propose that where people are animated by those ideas, where people put into action the doctrines contained in those works and in that way attack our system of government, not in a democratic way but by force seek to destroy freedom by that abuse of freedom, this parliament shall meet that danger by the democratic method of legislation passed in this parliament.

This afternoon the Prime Minister referred to this as a question of what is the best way of dealing with this obnoxious force in our midst. He said that was not a partisan question. But there are differences of view demonstrated in this debate as to our ideas of the best way to meet this challenge. The Prime Minister said this afternoon that we have sufficient legislation on the statute books to deal with all overt acts against the state. It is with that statement that this amendment takes issue. We say that there is not on the statute books of this country today sufficient legislation to deal with overt acts against the state of the kind which communism preaches, which communism indoctrinates into its followers and which communism advocates.

The Prime Minister introduced some other matters which I think were not germane to the amendment or within the proper scope of the debate before the house today.

The Prime Minister talked as though the amendment was directed toward making communism an offence under the Criminal Code. That is not what is proposed in the amendment moved by my leader. The amendment simply proposes that these activities, these overt acts—not communism as an abstract doctrine—should be made an offence under the Criminal Code. Again I say it is the results of that doctrine, it is the acts in which that doctrine seeks to issue, that are referred to.

The Prime Minister referred to the padlock law. There is nothing here that calls for a discussion of the padlock law. We are dealing here with a proposal that the Criminal Code shall be amended by democratic process in what we contend to be a necessary particular.

Then on the issue of civil liberties and the question of a bill of rights I submit that there is nothing in the amendment proposed that runs counter to or does the slightest violence to any of our conceptions of freedom or those rights of the people of this country that it is proposed should be guaranteed within the framework of our constitution by a bill of rights.

I said there was one other key word in this amendment. It is the word "legislation". If I may say so, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) dealt with this amendment this afternoon as though it embodied the terms of the proposed legislation. Of course that is a highly unfair, yes, an absurd approach. What we are dealing with here is a general statement in an amendment as to the tenor and object of legislation which we submit should be enacted by way of an amendment to the code. The amendment does not purport to set out in detail the terms of the legislation, and never was brought forward by my leader in that light.

A word about dealing with particular or political organizations. I for one am convinced that communism is a challenge to the fundamentals of our Christian civilization, our free way of life, more direct, more immediate, more forcible than at any time in the history of the world. It is true that there has been some recent stabilization of the political situation in Europe, and we are very thankful for that. We are thankful that the nations of western Europe along with the nations on this continent have been able to see clearly the challenge with which they are confronted and are prepared to concert measures together against a common foe in the interests of a common defence of their free way of life.

Elsewhere in the world the picture is not nearly as bright. In what has happened in Asia we have seen the numbers of those brought behind the iron curtain to live under the darkness of communist rule doubled in the past ten or twelve months. Think of it, the number of those living under communist rule in the world has been doubled in the last year. That was not by a free political decision, not as a result of the expression of any free choice on their part, but as a result of military action and massive communist propaganda working to sabotage the functioning of other systems of government and to break down, break down, break down those forces of resistance which are trying to hold their ground against the pressure of the communist menace. In the face of the challenge which has been hurled at the very ramparts of democracy we need to be utterly realistic.

I want to see our Canadian parliament proceed by purely democratic methods. I do not want to see our parliament meet this totalitarian menace by the adoption of totalitarian methods. The method which my leader has put forward today is a purely democratic method of the enactment of law binding upon all and known to all who will be affected by it. The method proposed is not to pick out a particular political organization that we know to be communist, namely, the Labour-Progressive party, and to say that that shall be deemed to be illegal—not that the Labour-Progressive party is entitled to any particular sympathy, because they are thoroughly communistic. They preach the communist doctrine and they preach communist methods.

An hon. Member: They admit it.

Mr. Fleming: If you simply passed legislation to declare the Labour-Progressive party to be an illegal organization, that would not get at the root of the problem. The root of the problem is, and must always be, those acts in which that doctrine or the preaching of that doctrine issues. You could abolish the Labour-Progressive party or declare it to be illegal and it would simply turn up tomorrow under another name. That is what happened during the war years when the old communist party of Canada was declared an illegal organization, and the Labour-Progressive party appeared the next day and blossomed forth as a reproduction of the old communist party. As I have said, that would not be an effective way of grappling with this problem. The effective way is to legislate in such a way as to make an offence of those overt acts which strike at the roots of our system of government and our conception of individual freedom.

It is worth remembering that in the past communists in this country have been placed upon trial for offences of the kind I have been describing here tonight. It was not when the law was in its present form. It was at an earlier period when there were some teeth in the law. At the moment I am not advocating any particular and detailed form of legislation. I do not know that in a debate of this kind it would be proper to do more than to indicate the intent, purpose and scope of the proposed legislation. As I have said before, it is a mistake to approach an amendment of this kind and criticize it because it does not contain all the words that would necessarily be written into the Criminal Code if the intent of the amendment appealed to the house.

When the law had teeth in it communists were placed upon trial and communists were convicted. Was it because of the existence of some abstract theory? No. Was it because communism as such was declared to be an illegal doctrine? No, it was not just that. Communists were placed on trial and communists were convicted because the doctrines they were propagating were doctrines that proposed the overthrow of government in this and other countries by force. Some of the facts of this situation have been forgotten throughout the country, and if I may say so they have been forgotten by many hon. members of the house. They have forgotten just what it was that was the basis of the conviction of Tim Buck and others of his ilk in 1931.

In the courts of Ontario nine communists were placed upon trial in the year 1931 for certain offences. At the hearing the charges against one man were dropped. The remaining eight were tried and found guilty upon three counts. One of those convicted was sentenced to two years' imprisonment on the first two counts and one year on the third count. The other seven were sentenced to five years' imprisonment on the first two counts and two years on the third count, the sentences to run concurrently.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What were the charges?

Mr. Garson: I wonder if my hon. friend would permit a question. What were the counts? What were the charges?

Mr. Fleming: I am dealing with the case that is reported under the title of Rex v. Buck. The excerpts that I shall be reading are excerpts from the judgment of the Ontario court of appeal in 1932 delivered by Sir William Mulock. The case is reported in several series of reports. The one I have before me is 57 Canadian Criminal Cases. The report begins at page 290. I do not wish to spend too much time on the subject of the nature of the indictment. It involved various offences under the old section 98 of the code. As I have indicated, there were three counts in respect of these various individuals. What I am discussing is the essence of the offence at which the law was striking, the essence of the offence of which these particular individuals were found guilty. I begin by reading an excerpt to be found at page 295 of the report, being the judgment of the court of appeal delivered by Sir William Mulock:

> Buck testified that the communist party of Canada was a section of the communist international, and that from the year 1924 onward the above-named theses and statutes became binding upon the communist party of Canada. The communist international at the meeting of its second world congress . . . held in Moscow in July, 1920, passed certain theses and statutes.

These theses and statutes were put in at the trial as an exhibit. These are some of the extracts from the theses and statutes of the communist international as quoted in the judgment:

The communist international makes its aims to put up an armed struggle for the overthrow of the international bourgeoisie and to create an international Soviet republic as a transition stage to the complete abolition of the state. The communist international considers the dictatorship of the proletariat as the only means for the liberation of humanity from the horrors of capitalism . . .

Further:

The communist international fully and unreservedly upholds the gains of the great proletarian revolution in Russia, the first victorious socialist revolution in the world's history, and calls upon all workers to follow the same road . . .

Further:

Only a violent defeat of the bourgeoisie, the confiscation of its property, the annihilation of the entire bourgeois governmental apparatus, parliamentary, judicial, military, bureaucratic, administrative, municipal, etc., even the individual exile or internment of the most stubborn, and dangerous exploiters, the establishment of a strict control over them for the repression of all inevitable attempts at resistance and restoration of capitalist slavery, only such measures will be able to guarantee the complete submission of the whole class of exploiters...

For all countries, even for most free, "legal" and "peaceful" ones, in the sense of a lesser acuteness in the class struggle, the period has arrived when it has become absolutely necessary for every communist party to join systematically, lawful and unlawful work, lawful and unlawful organizations . . . It is especially necessary to carry on unlawful work in the army and navy, police . . . and persistent and systematic propaganda and agitation is necessary in the army where communist groups should be formed in every military organization...

Again:

The proletariat must resort to an armed uprising...

Again:

Parliamentarism cannot be a form of proletarian government during the transition period between the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie and that of the proletariat. At the moment when the accentuated class struggle turns into civil war the proletariat must inevitably form its state organization as a fighting organization . . . The bourgeois parliament, which constitutes one of the most important instruments of the state machinery of the bourgeois, cannot be won over by the proletariat any more than can the bourgeois order in general. The task of the proletariat consists in blowing up the whole machinery of the bourgeoisie, in destroying it and all the parliamentary institutions with it whether they be republican, or constitutional monarchical . . . .

The elementary means of the struggle of the proletariat against the rule of the bourgeoisie is first of all the method of mass demonstrations. Such mass demonstrations are prepared and carried out by the organized masses of the proletariat under the direction of the united, disciplined, centralized communist party. Civil war is war. In this war the proletariat must have its efficient political officers, its good political general staff to conduct operations during all the stages of that fight. Mass struggle means a whole system of developing demonstrations growing ever more acute in form and logically leading to an uprising against the capitalistic order of government. In this warfare of the masses, developing into civil war, the guiding party of the proletariat must as a general rule secure every and all lawful positions, making them its auxiliaries in the revolutionary work, and subordinating such positions to the plans of the general campaign, that of the mass struggle . . .

If the communists have a majority in the local government institutions, they must carry on a wholesale opposition against the bourgeois central authority . . . Attempt to establish an armed working militia. . . Boycotting the elections or the parliament, or leaving the parliament is permissible chiefly when there is a possibility of an immediate transition to an armed fight for power . . . The communist members shall make all their parliamentary work dependent on the work of the party outside of parliaments . . . The communist member is answerable, not to the wide mass of his constituents but to his own communist party, whether lawful or unlawful . . .

I interject there that this Canadian parliament had reason not very long ago to see how thoroughly that command of the theses and statutes of the communist international was carried out under this roof. Sir William Mulock proceeds with another quotation from the theses and statutes reading as follows:

In order to overthrow the international bourgeoisie and to create an international Soviet republic as a transition stage to the complete abolition of the state, the communist international will use all means at its disposal including force of arms.

Again:

The class struggle in almost every country of Europe and America is entering the phase of civil war. Under such conditions the communists can have no confidence in bourgeois laws. They should create everywhere a parallel illegal apparatus which at the decisive moment should be of assistance to the party to do its duty toward the revolution. In every country where, in consequence of martial law or of other exceptional laws, the communists are unable to carry on their work legally, a combination of legal and illegal work is absolutely necessary.

Is there a single member in this house who today doubts that the communist forces in Canada are proceeding entirely in accordance with the spirit and the letter of this thesis and statute of thirty years ago? In concluding his judgment, Sir William Mulock said this:

The foregoing extracts from the theses and also the Worker are bristling with incitements to bring about a change in the governmental and industrial life of Canada by violence.

That, sir, is the offence of which the communists were convicted, and on which they were sentenced to a term in Kingston penitentiary. I have read these extracts at some length to emphasize and to illustrate the very point and nub of the amendment introduced by my leader today. On looking at the present state of the law, I remind hon. members that the state of the law in Canada today is not as it was when those communists were convicted of the offence of inciting the use of force to overthrow the governmental structure of this country. I ask, is the law today satisfactory? In the year 1936 when parliament amended the Criminal Code it eliminated the offences of which the communists, in the trial to which I have referred, were convicted. It substituted an amendment to the sedition section of the Criminal Code. By chapter 29, section 4, of the statutes of 1936, parliament simply substituted a further definition of the expression "seditious intention", and that is where the matter has stood since. It is for that reason we have not had prosecutions and convictions of communists since that time for advocating precisely what Tim Buck and his associates advocated, in respect of which they were convicted and sentenced in 1931.

During this session I put some questions on the order paper because I was anxious to get at this question of the efficacy of section 133, the section in relation to sedition in the Criminal Code, in the light of the position in which the legislation of 1936 left the law. These are my questions, and I read the answers immediately following the question instead of separating them:

1. How many prosecutions have been instituted for seditious offences since the 1936 amendment of section 133 of the Criminal Code?

Two on behalf of the government of Canada. There may be other prosecutions instituted by the attorneys general of the provinces of Canada of which the federal government has no record.

2. What was the nature of the offence charged in each case?

In one case the charge was speaking seditious words against His Majesty the King. The other case was one in which the accused was charged with being a party to a seditious conspiracy.

3. What was the outcome of the prosecution in each case?

The outcome in the first case was "charge dismissed." In the second, the accused was convicted but the conviction was later quashed on appeal.

It is quite apparent either that the present law is not being put to work, or that it has not adequate teeth in it, to strike at what we contend ought to be an offence, namely, the advocacy of the overthrow of the governmental institutions of the country by force.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was at pains today to try to put the burden upon the attorneys general of the provinces. I want to say a word about that, sir, because it is a fact that most of the counter-espionage work in this country, as is well known, is carried on through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The provinces have not attempted to duplicate the existing machinery for counter-espionage work in Canada. Then, sir, we always come back to this: that the attorneys general of the provinces, in carrying out their duty in regard to prosecutions, are only able to work upon the substantive law created by this parliament for the purpose. It is only an offence created under the legislation that parliament itself passed which will warrant the attorneys general of the provinces setting in motion the procedure designed to prosecute persons who are guilty of offences. The fact of the matter is, sir—we ought to be fair about it, because the return submitted by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to which I have just adverted makes it abundantly clear—the Criminal Code in Canada at present is not strong enough to warrant the attorneys general of the provinces launching prosecutions designed to obtain convictions in cases where people in this country are preaching the doctrine of overthrowing the government by violence.

Is there any hon. member in this house who doubts for one moment that the communists today are preaching the same doctrines as those which were the essence of the theses and statutes that were made exhibits, and upon the basis of which a conviction was obtained in the Tim Buck case in 1931? Today direction from Moscow is much clearer than it was nineteen years ago when Tim Buck was convicted. That fact has been exposed in the quarrel between Tito and the Kremlin. Tito is a communist, and he has set up a communist government in Yugoslavia, but the basis of the quarrel between him and the Kremlin is that Tito is not prepared to take orders from the centre of communist world authority, namely, the Kremlin.

It is quite clear that it is no part of the communist plan to wait until they have massed the support of the majority of the people in a country. They have never waited for that in any country in which they struck. What they have sought to bring about was a well-organized, well-trained, and well-disciplined minority, who knew their job and were ready to strike when the order was given. The communists have gone into a country under one guise or another to get control of the key posts in the government until the time was right. In Greece they nearly succeeded in establishing a communist regime in the beginning of 1945. They would have succeeded in doing so had it not been for the presence of British troops under General Scobie. In late 1944 and 1945, the test of the communist strength in that country was the free elections that were held. The communist elements knew they could not make any kind of a showing at that election, so they decided they would boycott the election. They asked everybody to boycott it. The election thereby became a test of communist strength, but over ninety per cent of the electors turned out at the polls.

When some of us were in Greece a year and a half ago, the Prime Minister told us that the communists were so organized that they could have established a communist regime in that country at that time, had it not been for the presence of the British army ensuring that a free vote would be held. In the name of freedom, the communists suppress freedom; in the name of truth, they preach lies and propaganda. Falsehood is one of the tools of communism in Canada as well as elsewhere, and the subjugation of our institutions is the declared purpose of the communists in our midst.

The world is in a disturbed condition, sir, and we are not, I am sure, likely to lose sight of the dangers offered by a fifth column in Canada, or in the other free nations who are parties to the North Atlantic pact.

It is high time that parliament gave serious consideration, and got some leadership from the government, in the implementation of some of those recommendations which came from the royal commission on espionage four years ago, and which have not been implemented by the government. Sir, let us not think for one minute that the determination to support Russia in the event of war is confined to the communists of European countries. Hon. members will recall the statement made in February, 1949, by Maurice Thorez, the leader of the communists in France, to the effect that in the event of war his communists would back Russia; or the similar statement made in March, 1949, by the red leaders in Australia and in Italy. But it is not confined to these countries because here is what Tim Buck said himself in November, 1946, at a meeting in Vancouver. I am quoting from a dispatch in the Evening Telegram of November 13, 1946, in which this appears:

> Tim Buck, leader of the Labor-Progressive party, made it plain that if Canada should be drawn into a war with Russia, he would not defend this country but "would go into hiding the same as I did at the start of the last war."

Then further on:

> Buck said if war were declared on Russia "under the same conditions as in 1939, I would fight against it—and I would go into hiding the same as I did at the start of the last war."

I was a member of the Toronto city council when war broke out. In those days we had communists in that council; and I shall never forget that in those anxious days, when the safety of our way of life was literally trembling in the balance, we had to sit and listen to communists in that council get up and denounce the war as an imperialistic war.

Mr. Croll: What did you do about it?

Mr. Fleming: What did we do about it?

Mr. Croll: That is what I asked.

Mr. Fleming: We answered them, and I think we answered them effectively. Then in due course these people who were traitors to the country went into hiding so that they might carry on their nefarious work under cover.

The question comes down to this, Mr. Speaker. I see that I have but five minutes left, and I shall be brief. What is called for in the way of attacking the problem? We ask the government to give some leadership in grappling with this problem. Some teeth must be put into the Criminal Code if we are going to grapple effectively with this problem. It seems to me that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) clearly recognized the necessity for strengthening the code in what he said to the Rotary Club in Montreal, in a speech on July 19, 1949; and I am reading from a Canadian Press dispatch.

> He told the Montreal Rotary Club the domestic threat of communism must be met "by strengthening, if necessary, our Criminal Code against actions which threaten the security of the state."

That is the kind of legislation that this amendment asks, the strengthening of the code. That is precisely what we are asking. I trust that this statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs means something more than "strengthening, if necessary, but not necessarily strengthening" the Criminal Code.

I took note of the statement made in my own riding during the election campaign last June by the then secretary of state, the Hon. Colin Gibson; and I put this before hon. members and ask them if this reflects on the part of members of the Canadian government and members of this Canadian parliament that vigilance that ought to characterize those who live in the kind of world we find ourselves in now, when communism is pounding on the doors of democracy. He said:

> If enough Canadians want a communist government, that is the kind of government we should have.

That is the statement of the then secretary of state, as quoted in the Globe and Mail of June 10, 1949, and in other papers. We want something more than a passive folding of the hands on the part of this government while these communists carry on their nefarious work right in the midst of our people today.

The situation becomes infinitely more critical, sir, when you realize what a dead set these communists are making today on these newcomers who are coming to this land to make this country their home, whom we are welcoming here but who as yet have not come to know our system of government and who as yet do not know the two languages that are spoken in this country. It seems to me that in the light of the fact that communist sources are simply spewing forth this propaganda today, seeking to poison the minds of these people—before they ever come to know this country or to know its institutions—against the institutions of this country and against our freedoms, it emphasizes more than at any time in our previous history the necessity for putting teeth in the law and putting every obstacle we can, by democratic methods, in the way of those who would undermine our system by that method.

Then, sir, let me say this in conclusion. Vitally important as is the strengthening of the Criminal Code, I do not suggest for one minute that if we get that strengthening of the code we can simply sit down and think that the problem of communism is licked. I do not suggest that at all and my leader did not suggest it today. What we recommend to this house is that this method of strengthening the code—the democratic method, so that all may know the law, that the law may be respected, and that the law shall have teeth in it—is the first and obvious step that ought to be taken. We do not propose to stop there. We must continue. Everyone has a duty in this regard in our search for justice and for freedom. This kind of legislation that we propose is designed to strengthen our freedoms in this country. In the face of communist threats against us from abroad and communist threats against us at home, we must be strong. The communists respect force. The people in the Kremlin respect strength, and we must keep strong.

It is in no maudlin sense that I say, as my concluding words, that in the last analysis in this cold war, this ideological war, this war that is a shooting war in many parts of the globe today, this war in which the lines are clearly drawn between the forces of freedom and of Christian civilization on the one hand and the forces of totalitarianism and the enslavement of men's minds and bodies on the other, there is presented an issue in which we shall need all these resources if we are yet to win.

There is one further resource that we have which the communists have not, and which in my humble opinion will yet prove to be the deciding factor in the outcome of this struggle. It is the fact that we are spiritual creatures. We believe that the issues in life are not to be determined by materialistic forces. We believe that the supreme forces in life are not the forces of materialism. It is my humble expression of opinion that that supreme resource, if we will but practise it and use it, will yet prove to be the deciding factor in this war of ideas.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): This afternoon and this evening, Mr. Speaker, the house has been discussing an important question, namely, what we in our country should do to combat the menace of communism. If I may say so, the discussion of that subject has been carried on in a way which reflects its importance. In the course of this discussion we have touched on an even more difficult problem, how to reconcile, in our complicated and modern state system, the security of the state with the freedom of the individual. I hope that those of us who feel that this amendment before us is not the solution to that problem will not be accused of favouring any policy or practice of appeasement in our attitude towards communism; that we shall not be accused of being supine in our opposition to what we all recognize to be one of the greatest menaces to our domestic and international security at the present time. There is, Mr. Speaker, a very real risk of that kind of accusation being levelled at people today who sometimes do not feel it desirable or necessary to take extreme action in the circumstances in which we find ourselves. There is a risk of this happening when we try to keep our heads and refuse to yield to prejudice and popular clamour. The fact that that can happen is shown, if I may say so, in developments in certain phases of the public life of our great friend and neighbour, the United States of America, where we have recently witnessed the spectacle of innocent and respected people being persecuted and almost destroyed by innuendo and unjustified suspicion.

In certain parts of the democratic world now it is impossible to reply effectively to the charge, "he is a communist", because any evidence that can be adduced by the intended victim to overthrow that charge can of course be attacked by those who make it with the suggestion that naturally if he were a communist he would be allowed by his superiors to act in such a way as to refute that evidence. This tactic, of course, creates in the body politic disunity, division, fear and at times and in some quarters something almost approaching panic. That of course, Mr. Speaker, is exactly what the communists wish to see created in our democratic system. I hope, and I know, that in our country we shall not find it necessary to copy methods of that kind.

The first objective of the communist party in any country is to weaken and eventually to destroy the mechanism of the state machine. That was made very clear, Mr. Speaker, in the long and I think significant debate we had at the United Nations assembly last November and December, on the essentials of peace. Today of course it is the policy of the communists to create within the borders of countries a feeling of insecurity, a feeling of fear, a feeling of suspicion that public officials and others in prominent positions may be disloyal. That feeling—and it is an asset to the communist cause, I suggest—has expressed itself in our neighbour to the south, in statements that the State Department of its government is riddled with communists, and indeed that the Secretary of State himself—who is one of the great leaders in the struggle today against communism, and is doing such a magnificent job of leadership in that field—may be a bad security risk. Thank goodness, we have nothing like that in Canada; and I hope that it will not be suggested in discussion in this country, in the press, on the air or in any other place, that there are communists holding high official positions in this government.

The detestation of communism and all that it stands for, which has been so eloquently expressed this afternoon and this evening, is shared by all of us in this house. The principles which were enunciated this afternoon in the discussion of this subject by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) will I think receive a very general agreement. I do not think that general agreement will extend to some of the evidence which he adduced to support his argument and to show that, in his view, the government was too complacent and not doing enough to meet this menace. And I do not think that all of us will be able to support the solution which he has advanced in this amendment to meet this problem.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition brought forth one or two facts in his very interesting statement with which I should like to deal very briefly because I think they misrepresent the position. He referred—and other speakers have referred—to Tim Buck. This afternoon the leader of the opposition said, and I think I am quoting him correctly: "We all know that he recently obtained a passport to go to a meeting of the cominform in Hungary." He said the same thing the other night at a meeting in Ottawa, but he went a little further at that meeting, unless the report of it was inaccurate. He said that the government gave Tim Buck an exit visa to proceed to this cominform meeting in Hungary. What is the suggestion behind that statement? It is that somehow or other this government has tried to facilitate the work of Tim Buck at communist meetings in Europe.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, I would point out in the first place that at no time did I say that the government had given an exit visa, because I know perfectly well that such a procedure is not in the hands of the government. I did say that Tim Buck had a passport, and I do not believe that that is open to question; and I did point out that the recommendations of the royal commission, which were under discussion, suggested a tightening of passport provisions, and it was in relation to that recommendation that I had made the statement that Tim Buck had proceeded behind the iron curtain with a passport from Canada.

Mr. Pearson: I am very sorry if the report in the press of the hon. gentleman's statement was inaccurate, because I quoted the report which I read in the press, which was the only one that I was able to secure. But what the hon. gentleman did say this afternoon was that Tim Buck had recently obtained a passport to go to a meeting of the cominform in Hungary.

The facts of the matter are quite simple. Tim Buck did not obtain a passport from the government recently to go to that meeting. The information in my possession—and I think it is accurate—is that Mr. Tim Buck has had a passport since 1947, and his present passport is a renewal of one which he had received many years before that time.

Also this afternoon the leader of the opposition made a reference to a very important matter, one which has been disturbing not merely to this government but to all free governments, when he alluded to the scientist recently convicted in London, Dr. Klaus Fuchs. In his statement this afternoon he gave me the impression that somehow this government had been at fault in dealing with this man; and that as a consequence of negligence on the part of this government—and it certainly would be an important dereliction of duty if it were true—very important, vitally important, atomic secrets had reached the U.S.S.R. The leader of the opposition said that a complete evaluation of information, or the significance of the name of Fuchs in the light of the special knowledge obtained by the royal commission, had not been made. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think this matter should be cleared up in so far as I am able to clear it up from the facts which are available. And I should like to put on the record what the facts are in connection with this particular man.

This man Klaus Fuchs was sent to Canada in May or June of 1940 as an internee picked up in the United Kingdom during that period of fear and panic when all German suspects or people who might even be suspected later were collected, put in internment camps, and later sent by the United Kingdom authorities, with the consent of the Canadian government, to this country for safekeeping. This particular internee remained in Canada for six months during 1940. He was returned by Canada to the United Kingdom at the request of the government of that country, and has not been in Canada since.

During the hearings of the royal commission on espionage, which has been referred to so often in this debate, some evidence came to light, from a notebook of one of those suspected of spying, a suspect who was later accused and acquitted. This particular notebook had some 600 items in it. Four hundred, I think, were names or addresses. Of those there were 150 names of persons resident in Canada, 163 of persons resident in the United States and five of persons resident in the United Kingdom. The names of those resident in the United Kingdom were turned over to United Kingdom authorities with all the evidence available in connection with this matter, including all the evidence we had at our command about the person who owned the notebook in which his name appeared.

The names of United States residents were similarly turned over to United States security authorities. The Canadian authorities naturally looked after and took the necessary steps to investigate the Canadian names in that notebook. I suggest that the responsibility of the Canadian government was discharged, and very effectively discharged, in sending those United Kingdom names to the United Kingdom government. And I hope that with these facts in the possession of the house there will be no further suggestion that the Canadian government was derelict in its duty in this regard in any single respect.

The leader of the opposition also made reference this afternoon to the Colombo conference and asked me whether I could throw any light on the discussions of that conference in so far as they affected communism, and whether possibly it was as a result of that discussion that action has been taken recently in Australia, has been proposed I believe in South Africa, and has also been taken in India to outlaw communism. He has asked whether that action springs from some discussion at the Colombo conference. Well, we did discuss communism at Colombo. I have already reported briefly upon that aspect of our discussion. It was generally agreed at that conference that the real menace to the peace of the world today is Soviet imperialism, using communism as the spearhead of its aggressive adventures.

The leader of the Indian delegation—and India was cited as a country which has taken somewhat drastic action against communists within their borders—emphasized more than once that it was not communism as an economic social doctrine which was so great a menace as it was Soviet imperialism. I do not think I can give the hon. member any assurance that our discussion at Colombo resulted in any action that has been taken since that time. The Indian action, as a matter of fact, was taken some time before the Colombo conference.

Reference was made this afternoon to the activities of what is called, I believe, the Canadian peace congress, to its president, Mr. Endicott, and to a delegation from that movement which is coming to Ottawa later in this week. I think I have made myself pretty clear as to what I think about this movement, and as to what I think about its leader, who has recently been visiting Moscow.

The delegation which is coming to Ottawa to present the peace petition—I believe that is what they call it—will, as the Prime Minister indicated this afternoon, be received for the purpose of accepting that petition. The Prime Minister indicated that possibly I might receive this delegation. I have telegraphed to them that I hope to be able to see them on Thursday at twelve o'clock; but as I have to attend an important meeting of a committee of the cabinet in the morning, I might not be available, in which case the under-secretary will receive them in my stead. That telegram, I may say, was sent before the beginning of the discussion this afternoon. Personally, I still hope I may be able to see this delegation, because I rather look forward to telling them what I think of their movement and what I think of the activities of their president in Moscow.

My own views in regard to this whole matter have been expressed outside the house, more particularly in a speech I delivered before the Rotary Club of Montreal some time ago, a speech to which reference has been made by more than one speaker this afternoon. So that there may be no misunderstanding as to what I did say, and so that no part of what I said can be taken out of its context, I should like to read into the record one or two paragraphs from that speech, which explain my own views, and I think will explain the attitude I propose to adopt on this amendment.

I said at that time:

In the absence of these disruptive domestic influences—

And I was referring to communist influences.

—we must constantly ask ourselves what we shall do to minimize them and protect ourselves. The first answer to that question, I am sure, is that we should not be led into hasty or ill-considered action, either at home or abroad. The communists gain part of the victory if they mislead us into thinking that we must always take short cuts in dealing with them, for by so doing we may ourselves weaken the very political institutions which they are seeking to destroy. In endeavouring to destroy the influence of communism, therefore, we must be careful not to throw the baby out with the bath water.

We have always hesitated in this country, sensibly, I think, to make it unlawful either to hold political ideas or to establish organizations to express these ideas. We have reserved the penalties of the Criminal Code for those who by some overt act have threatened the peace and security of the country. I think that this particular democratic tradition is wise in both principle and practice. Once we make it a crime to hold political ideas merely because they are thought to be dangerous, it will then be but a short step to suppressing political ideas because they are not liked. And from a practical point of view, it always seems to me that there is much to be said for having people like the communists organizing in the light so that the public may know who they are and what they are doing, rather than to have them hidden underground. I agree, nevertheless, that the danger from international communism is presently such that we have to keep examining and re-examining ways of meeting that danger.

We are meeting it on the international level by arranging for collective action against an aggressor; by combining national forces and pooling national resources.

And this was the sentence quoted by the hon. member for Eglinton, who preceded me:

We must meet it on the domestic level by strengthening, if necessary, our Criminal Code against actions which threaten the security of the state; but, even more, by keeping our democratic society so healthy and strong that the germs of communism cannot breed in it.

Mr. Speaker, nothing that I have heard or seen since, and nothing I have heard in this discussion, has caused me to desire to change any single word of that statement. I suggest there are two approaches to this problem. One seems to be that embodied—and I hope I am not being unfair in this—in the amendment before us, that we should act now to strengthen the provisions of the law against communists and communism, in the terms of this amendment.

I am not supporting the amendment because I think that kind of action under present circumstances is not called for. The amendment reads—and it has been pretty clearly explained to us by the hon. member for Eglinton:

This house is of the opinion that appropriate legislation should be introduced so that communist and similar activities in Canada may be made an offence punishable under the Criminal Code.

The question at once arises in our minds: What are the activities within the meaning of the amendment that would be activities similar to communist activities? It seems clear that the amendment does not refer to the outlawing of the communist party. I certainly gathered that from the remarks we have just heard from the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), who has said that it is not intended to interfere in any way with a person's beliefs or thoughts. Then we go on to ask ourselves whether under this amendment the statement of communist doctrines in word or in print by a member of the communist party would be an activity within the intention of the amendment. I do not know whether it is or not.

From the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton I drew the inference that what would occur under this amendment would be a return of section 98 of the Criminal Code. As has been said already, that section was amended in 1936. I ask myself the question: Has communism increased in this country since that section was amended? My answer would be: No, it has not increased, it has decreased. I suggest that one reason for that is that Canada is a better country to live in now than it was in 1936. If we can continue to make it a better country in which to live I hope we shall not have to restore section 98.

But what has increased is the imperialistic might of the U.S.S.R. and the danger of imperialistic aggression from that source. It is difficult to exaggerate that danger. At the same time I suggest that we should not be misled by a consciousness of that danger into taking action in respect of domestic policies which would not be desirable otherwise. I suggest that we use the laws that we have when they are required to be used and they will be found to be adequate. I hope we shall refuse to throw overboard our liberty, remembering that communism is declining in free countries, including Canada. It is declining in our country because it is being beaten by the good sense, the loyal patriotism, the belief in liberty under the law of our people; by the maintenance of prosperity and the eradication of social and economic injustices.

That in my belief is the way to defeat the domestic menace of communism. Let us then continue to follow that course which has already served us so well until it is clear, as I do not think it is now, that another course is required to accomplish the purpose which we all have in mind—the eradication of the communist menace from this country.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I for one am glad that the leader of the Conservative party has introduced this subject to the house, not only for debate but for decision. With quite a lot of what he said, and indeed with what the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) said, I am in agreement, but I disagree very much with the remedy which they suggest. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said that communism is not academic, and that is very true. It is certainly not an academic matter in the international field, and as we are confining our remarks to the national field I think we can say that it is not academic in Canada although not nearly so serious as he would have us believe. If communism is not academic we ought to remember that the essential civil liberties which we all profess to cherish are not academic either.

When the hon. member for Eglinton was speaking he said something with which I find myself in agreement. He said that we have one resource which communists do not have, the spiritual strength which is the legacy of Christian people. But immediately he started to tell us how he distrusted the power of that spiritual strength by insisting that there be legislation to bolster it. If we have that spiritual strength, as I think we have, I am not afraid of communism or what communists preach in this country.

Then the hon. member went on to point out certain key words in the amendment. I have picked out other key words which I think are more important. The amendment states that the practice of communist and other activities shall be a criminal offence. What are those other activities? As a member of the C.C.F. I am particularly interested because the Conservative party and individuals who supported that party, as well as individuals who supported the Liberal party, have said on more than one occasion that we in the C.C.F. are merely paving the way for communism.

Mr. Ferrie: You sure are.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Who said "You sure are"?

An hon. Member: The member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should have known better than to pay any attention to what he says. The hon. member for Eglinton went on to say that he wanted to punish overt acts. I think the real danger of communism is not in the overt acts which are committed, it is in the covert acts. I do not believe Tim Buck is the most important personality in the communist party. There are others in that party in Canada who are much more important than Tim Buck. He is merely one of the front men for that party.

The hon. member for Eglinton has suggested that we should bring back section 98 of the Criminal Code and it is there that I find myself in sharp disagreement. I have never liked the things which the Conservative party has done under that section of the Criminal Code. As I mentioned once before, we have the classic example of a Tory cabinet minister, Mr. Meighen, sending a telegram in 1919 to Winnipeg ordering the officials of that city to deport certain men who were among the strikers, and then going on to say that the act would be legalized. At times the Conservative party in its zeal against communism gets very red-eyed and I distrust its judgment in these matters.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, so that the hon. member may not be in any doubt—he may not have been in the house when I mentioned it this afternoon—the purport of that was very clearly defined by the C.C.F. party itself when an amendment to the amendment we had presented on the speech from the throne was moved. It was the C.C.F. party which added the word "fascist" to "communist" to give a similar generic description to actions of this kind, and that is what is intended in this present motion.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I am all in favour of curbing the actions of both fascists and communists, but how do you go about it? Certainly not by suggestions such as have been advanced by my hon. friend. As a matter of fact communism was at its peak in this country when a Conservative government was in power. The way to eradicate communism is not to pass legislation against it but as has been pointed out time and again, by curing all those things on which communism battens and fattens, by getting rid of social injustice, racial discrimination, slums and the needless poverty which exist. Get rid of these and there will be no communism in Canada.

I want to make my position amply clear. It is a pity I always have to when I speak on the subject. I am no friend of the communists. A couple of years ago I received a letter dated March 18, 1948, from the rather well known Mr. Tim Buck. I shall read only a part of it. It reads:

> Recent press reports indicate that the House of Commons may soon be considering the private bill presented by Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix, M.P. This LaCroix bill proposes that legislation be enacted to declare the Labor-Progressive party an illegal organization . . .

And so on. I replied as follows under date of March 20, 1948:

> Dear Mr. Buck:
> I am in receipt of your mimeographed letter of March 18, protesting the bill which is before the House of Commons sponsored by Mr. LaCroix. We shall oppose it, not because we like your party particularly much but because we like democratic freedom more. You will notice here the difference between democracy in the real sense of the word and what is happening in Czechoslovakia.
> Believe me your party is not unpopular because you are in the foreground of the current struggle of Canadians against profiteering, etc. The reason is that many suspect you are in the struggle just now because it suits you. Three years ago you were in the struggle during the general election, as you may remember, to elect the very party which you now condemn as the upholders of monopoly and the profit system.
> It so happens that you have decided to support the C.C.F. just now, because it is the current North American line to support a third party. You have even told constituents of mine in Winnipeg North that they have to support me. Let me tell you that your policy will change before the next election and that you will oppose me in Winnipeg North as you will oppose the C.C.F. in other areas. That prediction approaches certainty. Nevertheless, despite the known enmity of your party towards the C.C.F, over many years, we will defend your right to express that enmity, even when it is disguised under the cloak of friendship.

That is the position I took then and it is the position which I take now. I know something about communists because I have had to fight against them much harder than many members of the house. So far as I am concerned, the communist party is a very odd mixture of political treachery and intellectual lechery. They cannot be trusted in any sense whatsoever, but I see no reason for adopting communist tactics to defeat communism. If democracy is strong enough, as I think it is, we can defeat communism without doing what is suggested in the amendment. I have seen communists at work in Canada, and I have seen them at work in the country of my birth, in the coal fields of Scotland where they were very strong indeed.

We have seen what has happened in the United Kingdom as a result of a general improvement in the conditions of the people and as a result of a greater measure of social security for all the people. Today the communist party in the United Kingdom is a negligible factor. I think that is so in this country too, although it is always ready to spring into action again when the opportunity presents itself. Nevertheless it is true to say that the communist party in Canada today represents much less of a threat to Canada than it has for many years past.

One thing we have to remember, and which we are constantly inclined to forget, is that we cannot outlaw ideas. We have been told that we are not going to outlaw the communist party; we are just going to outlaw the activities which spring from that party; but I should like to point out again that we never can tell where such legislation is going to stop. It has been pointed out by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that there is a danger of infiltration. None of us will deny that. That danger is always present, but the danger does not arise from known communists. In my opinion it arises from those who are sympathetic to communism, those whom we do not know to be sympathetic. Certainly the dangerous ones are not the members of the communist party.

Again I think it should be pointed out that if by any chance communism is outlawed in Canada it will have one effect only. Communism will be driven underground, and there is a sufficiently lunatic fringe in every society who like some sort of perverted excitement and who would be encouraged to try to join such a group if it were declared outlawed, not because they like communism but because of the thrill which they feel they are getting. For my part I want to see communists put where we can point a finger at them, where we can watch what they are doing. If we want to find out how to handle communists adequately in this country all we have to do is to look at what the trade unions have done.

I said earlier that I believe Canadian democracy is strong enough to stand up against any subversive attempts such as communists, fascists, or any other group can bring to bear. I say that because I have complete faith in the common sense of the Canadian people. When we suggest that we must legislate to stop this thing then by inference we suggest that the Canadian people are not intelligent enough to withstand the lure and indeed the guile of communism. I hope that the amendment will be most thoroughly defeated. I hope so for this reason, if for none other, that it is high time the world saw that in one part of North America at least there is still, if I may mix my metaphors, a beacon of sanity.

On motion of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue this debate, hoping to reach a vote. As announced last night, two departments will be called, national health and welfare and post office. Then we would like to go into ways and means and have a vote on the amendment of the leader of the opposition. Then we will take up the budget resolutions.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 3, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

First report of standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria).

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

REPORTED PROVISION FOR COMPULSORY BLOOD TESTS OF INTOXICATED DRIVERS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): On Monday evening last the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked me a question, which is reported at page 2054 of Hansard, in reference to a report which had appeared in one of the Ottawa newspapers of that date, to the effect that a provision for compulsory blood tests for persons suspected of driving while drunk is being considered for inclusion in the Criminal Code. He wanted to know whether that report was correct. The newspaper report states that federal authorities now feel that the science of blood testing to establish alcohol content and relating the information to the driving capacity of a car operator has reached the point where it could be used in connection with prosecutions.

The source of this news report is not disclosed, but I should like to state emphatically that there is not the slightest foundation in fact for it. Neither the Department of Justice nor the Criminal Code revision commission has under consideration a proposal to amend the Criminal Code to compel persons accused of drunken driving to submit to the taking of a blood test.

Some time previously another newspaper contained a report that I had addressed communications to the attorneys general of the provinces proposing changes to be made in the law respecting drunken driving. I had not written any such letters, nor had I under consideration any proposal to do so. I concluded that this previous news report had some connection with the fact that the Criminal Code revision commission, which was sitting at Ottawa at the time, had given a direction to its secretary to submit two questions to the deputy attorney general of each province, asking first, whether, as a result of experience in enforcing section 285 of the Criminal Code, they would favour retaining the provision of the law that calls for a minimum sentence of imprisonment on conviction of drunken driving, and, second, what compulsory period of suspension of the driver's licence they would favour as a result of their experience.

At the present time these are the only matters relating to the drunken driving provisions of the Criminal Code that are under consideration.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I refer to the fact that, according to a press report, the attorney general of British Columbia, Gordon S. Wismer, announced on April 29 that amendments are being drafted to the Criminal Code to stop the many acquittals the courts have been forced to render.

The report goes on to say:

> He said the question was discussed with F. P. Varcoe, deputy minister of justice. Blood tests, balloon tests and other examinations for drunkenness were being investigated. Also being considered was placing the onus on the person suspected of drunken driving.

Mr. Wismer said:

> And I expect a letter any day now asking my opinions on contemplated code changes.

Mr. Wismer apparently thinks it was under examination.

Mr. Garson: Since my hon. friend has read that report, and notwithstanding its contents, I think I should again assert that the communication which I have given to the house is quite correct. I think in fairness to Mr. Varcoe I should say that he and I conferred in its preparation.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS TO ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the table copy of order in council P.C. 2044, of April 27, 1950, authorizing the appointment of T. H. Cooper, of Montreal, representing the railway companies, and A. J. 2. If so, what is the result of such discussions?

Mr. Howe: I can answer this question again orally. I have already answered it at least twice. However, for the third time:

The first discussion that took place in reference to the sale of 300,000 tons of Bell island iron ore took place in my office when the president of Dosco called to say that he was negotiating for such an order, and asking for certain help from the department, which was extended.

The second conversation took place about two hours later when Mr. Smallwood called me about the Bell island ore, and I told him of those negotiations. That ended any discussion on the subject from that day to this. I did exchange letters with Mr. Millard, head of the steel workers' union, with reference to the conversations.

Mr. Higgins: Did you give Mr. Smallwood the assurance that the sale had been made?

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

Mr. Howe: No; I told him exactly what I had been told by Dosco. Perhaps I should not have passed on the information, but I did. I said that the sale was under negotiation.

4. The proposed amendments to the treaty were varied in kind, and among them were proposals which, if sanctioned, would involve the halibut commission directly in the regulation of the halibut fishery for economic and marketing purposes as well as for conservation. This would mean a significant change in the original terms of reference to the commission. Strong differences of opinion have been expressed by different sections of the Canadian industry on the desirability of this extension of power to an international commission. Discussions with the fishing industry are still being held with a view to achieving some reconciliation of these views.

5. No data have been supplied, but in our estimates this year we are asking for additional funds to provide our share in increasing the commission's scientific investigations into this question.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

*JUDGES' SALARIES

Mr. Knowles:

1. Have representations been made to the Minister of Justice, at any time since January 1, 1949, by any judge, group of judges, or association acting on behalf of judges, requesting salary increases or changes in pension provisions?

2. If so, from whom have such representations been received, and under what date or dates?

3. What are the main arguments put forward in any such representations?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, having discussed this question with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I think that I should reply orally as follows:

We have had a number of representations made to us by individual judges, and by one group of judges, requesting salary increases or changes in pension provisions. Several of the individual judges writing to me have marked their letters "confidential", and some are not so marked. One of the most carefully considered requests for salary increases has come from the county and district court judges of Ontario, who certainly did not mark their material confidential; and, after discussing this matter with the hon. gentleman who asked the question, it was thought that we should not put in the letters from the individual judges, but that I should table a copy of the correspondence which has passed between the committee representing the county and district court judges of Ontario and myself.

This correspondence is lengthy, so I shall treat the question as an order for a return and table the return at once.

Return tabled.

Mr. Knight:

1. What provision under the National Physical Fitness Act has been made for the training of volunteers, part-time, and full-time paid leaders for community fitness and recreation programs at the national, provincial and local levels?

2. Have standards been developed for programs, personnel and facilities under the direction of the council during the past five years?

3. What matters have been investigated as provided for under section 10 of the act?
4. Are reports available concerning the findings of such investigations?
5. What recommendations has the council made to the minister with regard to the promotion of physical fitness, and what action has been taken on these recommendations?

2. If so, where to?
3. Are milling companies or feed companies permitted freight assistance or drawback on freight on oats or coarse grains purchased or handled by them?
4. If so, what companies during 1948 and 1949 obtained freight assistance or drawback on coarse grains, and what amounts?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

DENIAL OF THE USE OF MAILS

Mr. Knowles:

For a return showing the names and addresses of all persons, associations or companies in Canada denied the use of the mails at the present time, and showing also the reason and the authority for such denial in each case.

For a return showing the names and addresses of all companies or associations in Canada who are denied the use of the mails at the present time by virtue of any order or decision made since December 1, 1949, and showing also the reason and the authority for such denial in each case.

May I point out that these two motions, which on today's order paper are numbered 1 and 5, are similar. I have made certain changes in the first one, and I should like to ask that it be dropped in favour of the second. While I am on my feet I might add that the Acting Postmaster General has asked me to allow the second one to stand for today.

NAKUSP-EDGEWOOD, B. C., MAIL SERVICE

Mr. Herridge:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, contracts, and other documents exchanged between the Post Office Department, its officials, and any other parties in regard to the present mail contract governing delivery of mail between Nakusp and Edgewood.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—DAMMING OF BEAUVAIS LAKE, ALTA.

Mr. Hansell:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged during the past ten years between the dominion government, any minister, department, branch or official thereof, and any person or persons, together with inspector's reports and contracts, in connection with any proposed P.F.R.A. scheme for damming the Beauvais lake near Pincher Creek, Alberta, at any point.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on April 17 the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) directed a question to the Prime Minister in regard to any legislation not now indicated but which might be coming before the house this session. At that time the Prime Minister said he would consult his colleagues and be in a position to inform the house as to new legislation which might be expected. Can he now do so?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I immediately took the matter up with several departments. We spent some considerable time yesterday discussing the replies that had been received from departments. The discussion was not completed yesterday, but we hope to complete it tomorrow.

DOUKHOBORS

HOUSING OF CHILDREN AT PATRICIA BAY AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Has the minister authorized the use of certain buildings at Patricia Bay airport for the accommodation of Doukhobor children and families? If so, how many Doukhobors are being sent there, and what arrangements have been made for their accommodation and the security of public buildings?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The answer to the question is yes. The buildings at Patricia Bay airport are the property of the Royal Canadian Air Force, but the Department of Transport are the custodians. Recently representations were made to the department by officials of the department of health and welfare of the government of British Columbia indicating to us that they would require the buildings, for the purpose of housing some 300 to 350 children, and asking if we would place the buildings at their disposal. During the discussions it was indicated that all the requirements of the Department of Transport would be met, and furthermore that the provincial authorities would undertake to arrange for water, light and power as required, and that they would guarantee to return the buildings to us in as good shape as they are at the present time.

In view of that, the concurrence of the Department of National Defence was sought and obtained, and on that basis I authorized the officials of the department to grant a lease to the department of health and welfare of British Columbia. The lease is now in course of preparation. Meantime the buildings are available for those persons if they require them.

Mr. Pearkes: What is the period of the lease?

Mr. Chevrier: There is no definite time in the lease. No request has been made as to that, but I think it will be a lease at pleasure. The hospitals and adjoining buildings are sufficient for 150 or 200 people, but I understand the province wishes to move beds and the like to take care of these 350 people.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

TRANSFER AND REDUCTION OF STAFF AT WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What information can the minister give the house concerning transfers and layoffs, both current and pending, of T.C.A. personnel in Winnipeg?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I received notice of this question an hour or two before the house opened, and the information I am giving now is that obtained over the telephone from the head office of the Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Statements recently appearing in the Winnipeg press affecting Trans-Canada Air Lines require correction in order that both T.C.A. personnel and the citizens of Winnipeg may be under no misapprehension as to the company's actions and plans. T.C.A. has consistently stated that, other than the headquarters move in October, 1949, it did not contemplate any transfer of operating functions away from Winnipeg. T.C.A. has not transferred away from Winnipeg any such function, nor does it contemplate doing so.

Staff layoffs have taken place in recent weeks, and further layoffs will take place when circumstances justify that action as T.C.A., as with any other efficient organization, cannot retain personnel for which it can foresee no essential work. To refrain from layoffs under these circumstances would be unfair to the employee concerned, and, in the case of a publicly-owned company, unfair to the taxpayer.

The facts regarding the recent and immediately contemplated reduction in the staffs of various units in the company are as follows:

The strength of the engineering department has been reduced by 55 by means of the transfer of 16 employees to other departments within the company, the layoff at Montreal of 21 employees, and the layoff at Winnipeg of 18 employees. The development shop personnel will, by June 15, have been reduced by 19, 17 of whom will have been transferred back to the various shops from which they were originally drawn, and two of whom will be laid off. The strength of the metal shop has been reduced by seven employees hired on a temporary basis for a specific job. Ten other employees of the metal shop will suffer enforced layoffs due to the transfers from the development shop of more senior people.

The company contemplates the adoption of what is known as progressive major overhaul work. This practice is essential, since the company's twenty North Star aircraft all went into service within a period of two months. Therefore the amount of flying time on each aircraft in the group is about the same. If major overhaul work was undertaken only at the required interval of perhaps 10,000 hours of flying, all aircraft of the North Star fleet would reach this stage within a very few months of one another. This would impose an impossibly large work load at some time in the future, and would mean that the company would be temporarily deprived of the use of several of these aircraft simultaneously, to the detriment of its services. The adoption of this practice deprives Winnipeg of no work of this type which it has had, since no North Star aircraft has as yet attained the flying time requiring major overhaul.

Progressive major overhaul, as a practice, was not applied to the DC-3 aircraft, since it was expected that these would have been replaced by new aircraft before they had reached the number of hours requiring major overhaul. The rapid expansion of the company's services, however, and the resulting accumulation of service hours, made it necessary to commence a program of major overhauls of the DC-3 aircraft late last year, and this program will be completed this year. It is not expected that the DC-3's will reach a second major overhaul period—which would not occur inside of three or four years—while still in T.C.A.'s service, and therefore progressive major overhaul, if applied to this aircraft as a policy, would represent an unjustified expense.

The engineering and development departments were considerably expanded for the type of work always involved in the placing in service of any new aeroplane. These staffs were established to carry out the DC-3 development program and were retained until similar work was completed on the North Star. This task on the larger aircraft is now completed.

QUESTION AS TO REPORT OF RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or the chairman of the special committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, whether the final report of that committee will be presented soon so that the matter just referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) may be discussed in the house?

Mr. Hughes Cleaver (Halton): The report is being drafted and will be presented in due course. I expect it will be presented within the next week or two.

Mr. Knowles: Too late.

INDIANS

REPORTED REFUSAL OF AGENT TO ALLOW INDIAN TO VISIT SICK DAUGHTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Can the minister tell the house the conditions under which an Indian agent refused to allow an Indian to visit his seriously sick daughter at Hearst?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that question is prompted by an article which appeared in the press last evening. I called for a report at once, and have received an interim report which indicates that the newspaper article is far from complete. I would prefer to wait until I receive the final report and then give it to my hon. friend.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PACIFIC CONFERENCE

QUESTION AS TO CONSIDERATION OF A PACIFIC PACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, having to do with the departure of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) to attend the Pacific conference. I know the house will wish him well on his trip to represent Canada at that meeting. Within the last two days the press has stated that the governments of Australia and New Zealand intend to press at that conference for a Pacific pact, and will ask for the support of North America. What stand will the minister take at that conference on behalf of the people of Canada in reference to including Canada in the Pacific pact?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The conference to which my hon. friend has referred will open in Sydney on May 15, and, as has been stated, the Minister of Fisheries will represent the government at that conference. It is a meeting of the commonwealth consultative committee recommended by the commonwealth conference held at Colombo last January. This conference will discuss recommendations for economic and technical help through the commonwealth organization to the countries of southeast Asia. It is not expected by the Canadian government that political questions of the kind indicated by my hon. friend will be discussed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Indicated by the Prime Minister of New Zealand.

Mr. Pearson: The matter may be brought up by some member of the conference, and if so, the Canadian delegate will report that fact back to his government. As we did not expect that this subject would be a matter of discussion, no decision has been taken by the government as to what the Canadian delegate would do if it is brought up.

SUPPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

COMMUNIST ACTIVITIES IN CANADA

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that anyone can take part in a debate of this kind without a strong sense not only of the importance but of the great difficulty of the subject. It is so utterly repugnant to us to feel, as we have to feel, that there are fellow citizens, people who have enjoyed the immunities and amenities of our life, who are prepared as agents of a foreign power to try to destroy the civilization under which they have lived. It is natural, then, that on the one hand we may fall into the danger of impatiently feeling that we must take steps which will be sure to be vigorous enough to meet the situation, and that on the other hand we are haunted by the feeling that at our peril do we do anything which lessens or circumscribes the civil liberties which after all are the very cornerstone of our life.

It is in the face of these difficulties that we have to debate this question. I remember very well an anti-nazi German, who had become a Canadian citizen, coming to me in 1940, just after the war really began, full of alarm as to what might be done by way of sabotage. I remember well the words he used. He said: "You must regard nothing as fantastic". In other words he meant that the kind of thing which would be done might easily outrun anything we might imagine as possible. I think we owe a great debt to the police and others that his fears were not realized; but as we consider the present peril I think we are driven to the belief that in Russia we have a potential enemy even harder to grasp in our imagination, and that therefore we must deal with these things seriously and try not merely to jog along with the pleasant feeling that after all there are not very many people who will do these things. Surely we have learned in the last few years what can be done by a few determined men under direction.

Many hon. members have no doubt read a book which appeared some years ago entitled "It Can't Happen Here". It was an allegory describing fascism coming to the United States. I think everyone who read it had the feeling not that it could not happen here, but that it could happen anywhere if there was a let-down in the vigilance which we have to show.

I come now to the amendment moved yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I wish to recall to your mind, Mr. Speaker, for a moment the circumstances under which he introduced it. He recalled a letter written a year ago by him to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). He recalled the statement of the Prime Minister at that time, that the subject was under consideration by the Department of Justice, and that in due course we would be informed as to the result of the discussion. He recalled further that more than a year has passed and as yet no indication has been given by the government concerning the course it proposes to follow.

I might also point out that later in the debate reference was made to a statement made in the summer of 1949 by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). In a Canadian Press dispatch, referred to in the debate, there was the following:

> He told the Montreal Rotary Club the domestic threat of communism must be met "by strengthening, if necessary, our Criminal Code against actions which threaten the security of the state."

Therefore when the leader of the opposition raised the question yesterday he was bringing up something which had been under discussion with the government, and which there was every reason to consider was being seriously pondered by the government.

I think the debate has been a useful one. I will not complain too much that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs rather disregarded the terms of the amendment and set up straw men which they then had great pleasure in knocking down, but which, of course, were not men whom we had set up to be knocked down at all. For instance, the Prime Minister explained that he thought it was wise that labour had gone ahead in dealing with their own communist situation, but of course that is a matter with which we would all agree. The leader of the opposition would agree with that just as much as the leader of the government. We made no suggestion of a purge, and if any suggestion of the kind emanates from government speakers on the other side, that of course is quite irrelevant. It was not a purge we were talking about; it was an amendment of the law.

I should like to point out that the amendment was cast in broad terms, and that it was quite open to the officials of the Department of Justice to take whatever appropriate remedies the situation required. I want to emphasize again what was emphasized yesterday, namely, that what we are talking about is communist activities.

One other thing I should like to point out is that there was a good deal of suggestion that laws were unnecessary, that all we needed to do was to trust to our own good sense. Nevertheless the Prime Minister, as reported at page 2088 of Hansard, speaking of the spy trial said:

> I endured many a slap on the wrist in this house for the methods that were adopted to handle the situation.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that one of the reasons why there were slaps on the wrist at that time was that things were done which some people in the house at any rate thought were not consistent with parliamentary practice or with the gradually developed processes of constitutional government. Some members thought we had to go back prior to Runnymede to find a precedent for it. I am not overlooking the fact that it was mostly a question of procedure and perhaps not purely a question of law, but I suggest most earnestly that the Prime Minister's own words indicate this is not an open-and-shut matter, that it is one which should be considered carefully by all of us and not in any party fashion.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs also gave us some good advice. He made reference to keeping our heads, and gave us a couple of pages of advice about not indulging in witch-hunts such as they have had in the United States. I think we shall be able to follow the advice he gave us with quite considerable success, because nothing was further from our thoughts than either to lose our heads or to start witch-hunts, such as they have had in the United States. What he said about that was very true, if irrelevant.

He then made a statement which interested me greatly. In answer to a question as to what had been done about this matter at Colombo, he said that the point had been made there that communism was not as great a menace as Soviet imperialism, of which communism is the instrument. I found that interesting, but I also thought it was a little above my head. I had the feeling that that might be the kind of dialectics in which senior diplomats can indulge, but to ordinary people it does not mean very much. Assuming that communism did us grievous injury, I should think it would be very cold comfort if somebody said: Oh, don't worry; it is not communism that is the enemy; it is Soviet imperialism that is doing all this. I do not believe that would comfort us very much. Indeed I am inclined to think that the ordinary man would say it was the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee.

It remained for one or two of our C.C.F. friends, notably the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), to get on to the old question of freedom of speech. He took from his quiver that well-worn arrow and dispatched it again. I am sorry he is not here, because I really would remonstrate with him, that a man whose name begins with "Mac", a man who was brought up on the shorter catechism, should deal in such irrelevancies. I hope the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the C.C.F., will tell him that I venture to suggest his reference to freedom of speech was no more relevant than if he had told us he was against bigamy. It had nothing to do with this debate. We are just as much in favour of freedom of speech as he or anyone else.

Now I come to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart). In a way I liked very much what he said, except that it seemed to me it was a little unrealistic. He said we ought to rely on our spiritual strength and not fear communism, if I understood him correctly. I will agree with him that all the laws we can make will not be of any value unless we have spiritual strength on which to rely. I propose to try to say a word about that myself. But I also suggest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North that we rely a good deal on the good sense of our people not to indulge too widely in the practice of murder; nevertheless we have laws about it, and we take considerable pains to see that people are not encouraged in that direction. I suggest to the hon. member that he went a good deal too far when he suggested that we need not be concerned about laws but should rely merely on our own strong moral character.

Let us look for a moment now at the resolution. I have stressed already that it deals with activities. We are not indulging in any process of psychoanalysis. We are not going to try to analyse people and see if they have dangerous thoughts. We are not going to make thought a crime. What we are trying to do is to make certain that activities, overt acts, are sufficiently guarded against by our legislation. Going back to what I said a moment or two ago about labour, I would say the purpose of this legislation, if it is strengthened, would be to make it easier for labour to deal with its own situation, not to step in or try to interfere, but to create a climate which would be more favourable to labour looking after its own problems.

I come back for a moment to the C.C.F. and the use of the word "similar". Apparently that was a most alarming proposition to them. I hope they were reassured last night when the leader of the opposition reminded them that to some extent at least this was taken from an amendment they themselves had moved, and that in fact by the word "similar" was meant "fascist." I take it that, with the word "fascist" interpolated, the great alarm which was apparent would to some extent disappear; at any rate I would hope so. In passing, just as a matter of interest concerning our own party, I would remind the house that this resolution comes within the four corners of one we passed at our convention a year ago last autumn. If there are any who wish to see the light, I have copies of those resolutions here, and can give them to any who would like to read them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, for a moment I should like to turn away from the domestic aspect of this problem and ask that we consider the problem very earnestly in its broader aspect, because no one who is even semi compos mentis doubts that today we live in a very dangerous world. Years ago I was a practising member of the civil liberties association in Toronto. That is regarded by some of my hon. friends, I must admit, as a very strange organization; nevertheless I think it did no harm and considerable good. But we had some very strange members. Whenever an organization of that kind, good, bad or indifferent, is set up, the communists crowd in. I remember that I had a friend, quite a respectable businessman, come to me and say, "Don't you know there are communists in that organization?" I said, "Yes, I do know; they keep us there until twelve o'clock every night." One of the things about the communists is that apparently they have an unlimited amount of time to spend at meetings. My friend replied, "What are you going to do about it?" I said, "The only thing we can do is get you and a lot of other sensible people to come in and vote them down," but he thought that was a silly idea and never did come.

Sometimes we had a great deal of trouble with those people. At that time I became aware of something that has perplexed and puzzled me ever since; that is, that there are people whom you could hardly deny are agreeable people in almost every aspect of their lives—intelligent people, humane people, socially minded people—who still go after this crazy thing. I was rather naïve about it for a long time, I am afraid. I could not understand how men with civilized minds and sympathetic hearts could ever be attracted to a brutal dictatorship. At one time I was inclined to think they were just abnormal, and we did not need to pay any attention to them. Now, however, I do not think that is good enough. As a matter of fact we cannot wash out intellectuals like that, because when we take for the long pull, twenty, thirty or forty years, we may as well recognize that the people we sometimes criticize and are impatient with, people who can speak and write and at any rate appear to think, do exercise great powers of leadership.

At one time I had thought rather naively that if you could just meet those people and have a frank discussion with them, they would admit it was all crazy. Of course I was wrong; and, as I say, I went on being perplexed. But my trouble was to some extent resolved by a book that appeared recently, which I commend to all hon. members, called "The God that Failed." It is a recantation by six people, I think high-minded individuals, who went off after this creed but found that they were pursuing false ideals, and were courageous enough—and it takes some courage—to come out and expose the thing and give their reasons against it. I should like to read one or two brief extracts from the book; in fact I would prescribe a few pages of this book per day to anyone who is now thinking of following this belief. As a matter of fact, while it would be against my principles, I would be willing to become a dictator for the moment in order to force them to read this book. Perhaps I might have the support of the leader of the C.C.F. party for that purpose.

Mr. Coldwell: I have read the book.

Mr. Knight: Would the hon. member tell us the name of the author?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There are six authors. The preface is written by a man who is pretty far to the left, of whom some hon. members may be critical. I am referring to Richard Crossman, member of the British House of Commons. If anyone wishes to know the names of the six authors, perhaps I could give them later. They are well known, and include one Frenchman, one German, two Americans, and one Italian, perhaps the most interesting of all, whom I shall quote later on. I want to read one or two brief extracts, and I suggest that the considerations brought forward here are vital, and that we disregard them at our peril.

An hon. Member: What is the name of the book?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): "The God that Failed," and the name on the back is Crossman, who wrote the introduction. On page 6 of the introduction this question is asked:

> How could these intellectuals accept the dogmatism of Stalinism? The answer is to be found scattered through the pages which follow. For the intellectual, material comforts are relatively unimportant; what he cares about is spiritual freedom.

Let us not forget that sometimes, not always, this is true. Then the writer goes on to speak of—> —the communist novice . . . wearied and worried by the privilege of freedom—getting relief by subjecting himself to the canon law of the Kremlin.

Mr. Coldwell: Is that Crossman speaking?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes; he says the communist novice finds a release from this worry by subjecting his soul to the canon law of the Kremlin. It sounds crazy; yet here are capable men, some of them very distinguished, who did it. Then there is this brief further quotation:

> But it is clear that, as soon as the intellectual convert began to know more about conditions in Russia, his mood changed.

I shall have a little more to say about that later.

Mr. Stick: Send that book to Dr. Endicott.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He may have seen it; and he may be incorrigible. I want to read a sentence or two further, because I think they illustrate the great mental gulf that exists between ourselves and these people. Here is an extract from that part of the book written by an Italian named Silone, who was in Moscow a great deal between 1921 and 1927:

> What struck me most about the Russian communists, even in such really exceptional personalities as Lenin and Trotsky, was their utter incapacity to be fair in discussing opinions that conflicted with their own. The adversary, simply for daring to contradict, at once became a traitor, an opportunist, a hireling. An adversary in good faith is inconceivable to the Russian communists.

A little later he speaks of a conversation he had with a communist woman, who said to him:

> If you happen to read in the papers that Lenin has had me arrested for stealing the silver spoons in the Kremlin, that simply means that I am not entirely in agreement with him about some little problem of agricultural or industrial policy.

Later he speaks of other things along the same line. I have outlined these things to you and brought these points before you briefly because I believe they are things that serious people should be thinking about. After all, we all face the fact that at the present time the western world is competing with the communist world, you may say, for the minds and hearts of hundreds and hundreds of millions of other people.

It is customary to say—and of course there is a great deal of truth in saying it—that what we must do is to make it clear that our economic organization is better. I do not belittle the importance of that suggestion at all. But that is not the whole story. The economic condition in Czechoslovakia could have been improved until it was an earthly paradise and it would not have affected what happened there two years ago. That happened not because the men engaged in it were in want. As a matter of fact, most of the leaders in this movement are not in want. It is not people who are in want who head up these things. It is people with dominating personalities, with this strange aberration which I have brought to your attention. I say, therefore, it seems to me that we are just on the fringe of the problem if we content ourselves with saying that all we have to do is to make it appear that we are more prosperous in the democracies than others are under the communists. We all believe that we are immensely more prosperous than the people are in Russia today. I do not think anyone doubts that. But that has not been sufficient to affect the situation. We say, of course, that it is partly because they do not know; but it is much more than that. In the end we have to admit that,—I was going to say it is moral values, but it is a bit hard to use the word "moral" about a system that we detest and abominate so greatly, and so I change the wording a little and say it is non-material values which are going to control this situation in the end. After all, what have you in Russia today? You have a small number—I suppose there are less than five million people in the communist party, as they call it—who, by their cohesion, fanaticism and something which approaches faith, are dominating well on to two hundred million other people. That is what we have. We cannot bring ourselves to call it a faith but we must at any rate concede that it is a tremendous motive power. As I said a moment ago, we are competing with this, and the competition raises all kinds of questions.

Some hon. members will have seen it reported a couple of days ago—I think it was in the press yesterday—that Lord Boyd Orr at some meeting put forth the view that the world might as well face the fact that it had, as it were, to match deficiencies with surpluses or we would be in grave peril. As a matter of fact, we have been doing that for years with regard to western Europe and far east in Europe. Lord Boyd Orr raised the whole question as to whether our imagination has got to range much more widely. Without undertaking an expression of opinion on that matter I suggest that it is not a matter which any of us can disregard.

I have tried to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, this strange intellectual aberration which took these people into the communist fold—and then happily their better natures reasserted themselves and they came back. But we know that there are a great many people who have not come back. I suggest that we are "put on the spot" in no uncertain way to consider our own position. A striking speech was made about a year ago by a man who is well known to most hon. members. I refer to Bruce Hutchison. He made it in Winnipeg, and he says some things with which we may not agree; nevertheless they are said by a serious man to serious people. He was speaking to the St. Andrew's society, and I think you will agree that is serious enough. He says some things that I think we should not brush aside. He said:

> Now, clearly the idea of democracy is at war with the idea of dictatorship. Freedom is at war with slavery. Certainly, but what do we mean by democracy? What do we mean by freedom? And why do we fight for them? It's time we got down to examining our own motives . . .

The basic, the terrible and perhaps the fatal thing that has happened to our civilization can now be grasped and understood. . . It is that our western civilization is losing, if it has not already lost, its faith in its beginnings.

We are not going to admit that, but here is a serious man saying it; and it cannot be lightly regarded. I go on to read again. He gives what I think is a perfectly wise definition of the difference between our civilization and the Russian one. He refers to—

. . . the original assumption, common to Christianity and other religions, that the universe is managed by a system of invisible order, and that every man is protected by certain natural laws beyond the reach of human legislatures.

Then later on he says that the Russians reject this wholly, and he goes on to make what I think again is a searching statement:

Since there is no universal power,—

This is the Russian view.

—nothing is left but the power which some men can exert over others.

There I think you have it stated clearly. That is their faith: power, naked power and nothing else. Then he goes on to say:

It is this cardinal lie, this father of all lies, which spawns the Russian system and the Hitler system and every system of tyranny. It is this lie we are now accepting in the western world under the name of science or progress, or political panacea, or economic enlightenment or ultimate truth, or anything else you care to call it.

Then finally he says:

If this goes on we shall be trying to oppose the resurgence of a powerful pagan idea, which has destroyed many civilizations in the past, without any contrary idea of our own in a struggle which ideas, and not other weapons, will finally settle.

Some may feel that these are strange arguments to be using in a secular assembly on the matter of communism; but I make no apology for doing it because it seems to me that these are matters in which we have all got to interest ourselves, not merely the churches and not merely the educational institutions, although the responsibility is primarily theirs, and although I suppose we must look to them chiefly for leadership. But we must not forget our own part because there is the final challenge that we have all got to face.

I have been talking about matters which go far beyond any amendment or indeed far beyond any law. Yet the law cannot be disregarded because it enters into all areas and all departments of human conflict. It is for that reason that I shall support this amendment which, as I have said more than once, is not suggesting any witch-hunting or any psychoanalysis. It is merely suggesting that the department shall use its best endeavours to see whether the law can be still further improved to the end that, as to the efforts of all agencies—labour, business and every other agency—that are seeking to deal with this matter which threatens the very vitals of our existence, these efforts may be further assisted.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I was not here during the whole of the address of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) yesterday; I entered the house just before he moved the amendment under discussion. I have listened with a great deal of interest this afternoon to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) for whom I have a great respect, particularly because I have known in days gone by how forthrightly he has stood for civil liberty. I quite sympathize with him when he says that he belonged to a civil liberties association some few years ago into which the communist or Labour-Progressive party infiltrated, and described how these people remained until the dying moments of a meeting in order to get their kind of resolution through after the more democratic people had got tired and had gone home to bed, which is the usual practice of communists and others of like mind. He criticized the C.C.F. because, he says, on the address on February 20 we amended the amendment to a motion that was then before the house by adding words to it. Let me point out that the amendment when amended dealt with "harmful activities of communists and fascists in Canada". It was not the same, nor had it the same intent, as the amendment moved yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). If we examine the language of yesterday we find that it reads as follows:

Legislation should be introduced so that communist and similar activities in Canada may be made an offence punishable under the Criminal Code.

These activities were interpreted this afternoon by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) as overt acts, if I may use the term that he himself used. Let me point out to him that in all democratic countries, at least within the British commonwealth of nations, there is on the statute books today legislation adequate, I am sure the Minister of Justice would say, to deal with overt acts of sedition or conspiracy to commit overt acts. Consequently, as far as that goes, the two amendments were different in their conception. Perhaps I might go further and say that, in my opinion, the policy of the government under discussion at that time involved also failure to do certain things, we will say, for the unemployed, to improve our social security legislation and so on. But I am not going into that phase of it this afternoon.

I rose to say that I view with a considerable amount of misgiving the obvious intent of an amendment of this description placed before the House of Commons. Throughout the ages our forefathers have fought for certain civil rights, and I believe that the freer people are to express opinions, the freer to organize, even when we think the organization may be against the public interest, so long as there is no conspiracy to commit overt acts, and overt acts are not committed, the better it will be. Throughout the ages we have found the way of dealing with movements such as we are now discussing. Go back into our history, and we find that the foundations of the freedoms that we now possess were established in Magna Carta as long ago as 1215, guaranteeing to every man a fair trial by his peers. Then we have habeas corpus whereby no man may be arrested and incarcerated without charge and trial. Yesterday when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was speaking, he referred to criticisms of himself as minister of justice several years ago. The criticism that was made of the government and of the minister of justice at that time was that people had been picked up without charge and without trial, and incarcerated, and that no opportunity was given for their production in court to be properly charged under the law. I think that was the criticism that was made of the government at that time. On occasion we contrast that with what happened in the United Kingdom, where, for example, Dr. Allan Nunn May was picked up, taken into Old Bailey, charged, speedily tried and sentenced to a long term of imprisonment. That is the method which is time-honoured under our democratic procedure.

I do not like to see any suggestion introduced into this chamber which would seem to indicate that we are going to do something beyond what we have done so successfully to curb subversive activities in the past.

About a week ago I was asked by telegram to express an opinion on this very matter. Not knowing it was going to be introduced into this house, I replied by telegram in these words:

> Speaking as the leader of a democratic socialist party actively opposing communism, I believe outlawing of communist party political error of the first magnitude. All of our countries have seditious conspiracy acts under which subversive activities can be dealt with according to law. To drive the party underground encourages secret conspiracy, arouses ill-placed sympathy, jeopardizes legitimate political discussion and undermines faith in our democratic institutions.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the position that I want to emphasize before this house this afternoon. There is of course always a danger from people who do not believe in constitutional methods. That danger comes not only from the communist party, but from other parties right on the other side that today we lump under the heading of fascists. When we speak of safeguarding our Christian civilization let us bear in mind that the churches have recognized—and when I say "the churches" I mean all the churches—that communism as we know it today arises very largely out of the misery and want of depressed peoples.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Greenwood pointed out that often the leaders of those movements were not those who suffered poverty, misery and want. To some extent that is true; but the following which they gain is among the mass of the people who suffer from evil conditions; and we have to beware lest we confuse agitation against evil conditions with communist activities. Not so long ago practically everyone who criticized the evils of the present system of society was classified as communist, and sometimes was persecuted as such.

I have on my desk the report and encyclical of the archbishops and the bishops of the church of which I happen to be a member. In 1948, at Lambeth, 329 archbishops and bishops of the Anglican communion in all lands met to consider what they termed the nature of man and man's obligations to society. They have one or two things to say in that report that I think are pertinent to a discussion of this kind. They say this:

> Communism cannot be overcome by argument alone. It has to be outlived, not merely out-fought. Under the providence of God its truths will pass into the experience of humanity; its untruths and half-truths will be self-destructive. It is for the church to be faithful to the word of God and for Christians to live, and, if need be, die for the truth of God as He allows them to see it. But let us be sure that its martyrs die for the Kingdom of Christ and not for some lesser loyalty. By making common cause with anti-communist forces, the church might have some success but such a short-term policy would prove in the end to be disastrous to the church, both in the east and in the west.

And then this to the members of their communion:

> (Churchmen) must do full justice to the truth in communism, both its critical insights into history and its desire to help the oppressed.
> The church ought not to allow itself to be identified with social reaction. Its members should be ready for social and economic change and quick to welcome into the councils of the church men and women with the workers' experience of living conditions.

What is true of a church is true of this assembly. If I understand the basis of this institution, it is an institution in which ideas of various sorts may be expressed and advanced, sifted, accepted or rejected. It seems to me if we are going to agree that in this institution that is the democratic procedure, then by the same token we have to admit that this is the proper procedure in society.

What I am afraid of in regard to a resolution of this description is that legislation flowing from it may be used either now or in the future to prevent free discussion, free consideration, and activities that should be of a proper nature. Let us remember that in the long struggle for freedom of action and freedom of speech ideas have arisen from time to time which have not been acceptable to a majority of the people where they have arisen. That was true to a large extent of religious ideas a few short centuries ago. I recollect that in 1671 a man who became famous in the story of the great republic to the south, William Penn, and his colleague William Mead, became Quakers. They were execrated by the country in which they lived. They tried to propagate their ideas. They were arrested for preaching openly, on the street, to some three or four hundred people in the city of London. The magistrate who tried them instructed the jury to convict for causing a riot, although no riot had taken place. The jury—that safeguard, in my opinion, of the rights of the common people—refused to accept the instructions of the magistrate. Though the jury were confined by the magistrate, habeas corpus proceedings were instituted and they were released. The jury's verdict of acquittal then had to be accepted.

It is through age-old methods, old and historic customs which have grown up in our society, that we can protect it against subversive activities. We have the laws on our statute books today—and I have no doubt the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) can, and perhaps will, point them out to us in this debate. We have adequate laws dealing with sedition, seditious conspiracy and the committing of overt acts. But I believe we endanger the effectiveness of our laws when we drive underground the activities of subversive elements, whether they be communist or fascist.

I venture to say we would have heard very little of one or two of the leading men in the present Labour-Progressive party in this country had they not been arrested during a time of grave unemployment and difficulty in the thirties, and sentenced to terms of imprisonment. We created for the communist party—or the Labour-Progressive party, if you care to call it that now, for it is the same thing—certain martyrs. That martyrdom was held up across the country in order to attract attention and to bring persons of ill-founded sympathy into their movement to support their cause. Consequently I say the house would be well advised to vote the amendment down.

Let me repeat that we have on the statute books in my opinion all that we require in order to meet this menace of Soviet communism in Canada. Let me also point out that Canada's representative approved the universal declaration of human rights of the United Nations. Looking at the preamble of this document, in the second paragraph I find this:

> Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind, and—

And then these words:

> —the advent of a world in which human beings shall enjoy freedom of speech and belief and freedom from fear and want has been proclaimed as the highest aspiration of the common people.

Then if I look at the actual articles we have approved I find that article 19 of this declaration says:

> Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

Yesterday we heard the suggestion that there should be some limitation of certain parts of the press of this country. Let me repeat my belief that our democratic institutions and our democratic ways are sufficiently strong that we do not need to fear a handful of people who are circulating literature against our institutions, and who are engaged in propaganda against this institution of parliament and against those institutions which guarantee to us the freedoms we now enjoy, provided, of course, they do not propose their violent overthrow.

Then, article 20 states:

> Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association.

Assembly or association to discuss, to criticize, to plan, to forward and to promote our ideas within the law. Then, article 22:

> Everyone as a member of society has the right to social security and is entitled to realization, through national effort and international co-operation and in accordance with the organization and resources of each state, of the economic, social and cultural rights indispensable for his dignity and the free development of his personality.

And article 23(1):

> Everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment.

If we fulfil the articles of this declaration of human rights, then that, in my opinion, and not by legislating against activities of the type discussed in the house in the last day or two, is the manner in which to meet the threat of communism. And so I say that in the light of the long experience that we in these democracies and these institutions have had, with the legislation now on our statute books sufficient to deal with overt acts, we would be ill-advised indeed to pass new legislation comparable with that we had on the statute books under the heading of section 98.

I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but I did rise to say that if we are going to protect civil liberties and if we are going to place before the people of other countries Canada as a free nation, then let us not adopt any of the methods of countries behind the iron curtain. The more we suppress, the more ammunition we give them to fight us and perhaps if we give them enough ammunition, ultimately to destroy us.

The issue was raised, I think by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing), about the issuance of a passport to Mr. Tim Buck. The passport was not issued to him in order that he might go on his recent journey to visit Soviet satellite countries. I felt that that was a question that it was better not to have raised in this house. After all we do not want to be in the position of the countries behind the iron curtain where people are not allowed to move freely because of their political opinions. The farther we get away from that kind of thing the stronger we are in our ability to fight communism in all its forms.

Goodness knows, I have no love for the Labour-Progressive party or the communist party or any of their activities. Indeed, sometimes they describe me in their speeches as enemy No. 1. The very book quoted this afternoon by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) containing six essays by six former outstanding members of the communist party has a preface written by one of the leading democratic socialists of Great Britain, Mr. Richard Crossman, M.P. The words of that preface which the hon. gentleman read are words with which we can agree absolutely.

I was not here yesterday but my colleagues from Vancouver East and Winnipeg North said exactly what I would have said had I been here and what I have in mind today, that if we want to protect this country against subversive ideas then let us remove the conditions in which they may flourish and go forward confident in our free institutions and in our traditions of democracy. Then I am confident we can meet any threat from any quarter which Stalin may control.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in opening the statement which I think should be made today by the head of the Department of Justice may I first of all congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on having introduced for discussion a matter the importance of which I think every one will agree is quite beyond exaggeration. There may be those who will think that he placed too much stress upon the dangers with which politically free countries of the world are faced in the present world situation, but I am certainly not one of those who think so.

One has only to consider a few of the main circumstances of the situation to realize that today political freedom is in mortal danger of extinction. One has only to realize that the greatest land mass in the world with uncounted resources and millions of virile if untrained people, people who do not chafe under the lack of freedom because most of them have never enjoyed it, have been brought, if not under the direct control, certainly under effective indirect control of the masters of the Kremlin.

We have only to consider that the mounting of any kind of revolution against such a group of determined men is a vastly different thing from what it has ever been at any previous historic time. In the days of the Roman emperors any group of resolute and determined men who could possess themselves of a few relatively primitive weapons of that day could mount and sustain a revolution for considerable periods of time. The history of the later days of the Roman empire is filled with reports of efforts by the emperors to put down revolutions in various parts of the empire.

But now that war has become the end of a complicated series of assembly lines which stretch back, not only into the forests and the fields and the workshops and the mines but into the research laboratories where hundreds of scientists are working, with perhaps only a few knowing what the whole scope of their inquiry is about, it is apparent that once a group of men as determined and able and ruthless as the masters of the Kremlin have got into the controlling situation in which they are in Russia at the present time, it is almost impossible for anything except a palace revolution to upset their might.

That is the world in which the free countries live at the present time. We are living in the face of a proclaimed philosophy which has for its purpose the destruction of our system of government and our way of life and which states that it is impossible in this one small world for both our system and the communist system to survive. It may have been that a quarter of a century ago we would have been disinclined to pay too much attention to these warnings, but after having been through a great war which was caused in no small part by the fact that we failed to heed similar warnings by Adolf Hitler, I think few thoughtful people today will want to regard our present predicament as other than exceedingly serious.

Without wishing to traverse ground which has been covered at great length by preceding speakers who have dealt with what might be called the political philosophy aspect of this matter, I think it is rather important to state that free countries are abandoning one of their most powerful weapons, if not the most powerful in their whole arsenal, when they in any way abridge political freedom. Unlike the preceding speaker, I am not one who thinks that the resolution now before us would go very far in that direction. After the long and interesting and vigorous speech with which the leader of the opposition introduced this debate and in which he reviewed, although quite cursorily, what had been done in the way of legislation in Australia, South Africa and other countries; after he appeared to be making the strongest possible case for the introduction of repressive legislation in this chamber, I was very much surprised to find that the text of the amendment which he introduced rather dimmed the impression of what I thought was going to be delineated as repressive legislation; and any idea that repressive legislation might have been in mind was totally dispelled by the lucid presentation of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) when he rose to speak.

I think we will all agree that the hon. member for Eglinton is a good lieutenant to his leader. No leader could wish for better in my opinion, but the hon. member for Eglinton suffers from what, in relation to his leader, is a terrible handicap. He has a clear mind.

When he applies his clear mind in this case to the rather vague language limned in his leader's oratory of course he cannot help but let the cat out of the bag, and what a tiny kitten it proved to be. For the hon. member made it, to use a phrase he is fond of using himself, crystal clear that his party does not propose as in Australia to declare the communist party outlawed or to dissolve it or to appoint a receiver for its property with any surplus over liabilities going to the government. They do not propose as in Australia to permit the governor general to outlaw organizations, other than trade unions, which are dominated by the communist party; nor to provide imprisonment for officers and members of unlawful associations who do not cease their activities; nor to empower the governor general to publish the names of any members of the communist party or its organizations after May 10 whose activities he, the governor general, deems prejudicial to the government; nor that any person declared to be prejudicial will be barred from employment in the government or government authority. Nor does the Conservative party propose, as in Australia, that such a person may be banned from holding a job in any of the key industries of the country. These provisions that I have named are merely omissions from the speech of the hon. member for Eglinton, but let me list some of the express disclaimers taken from his speech at page 2106 of Hansard. He said:

> What this amendment proposes to illegalize is overt acts.

In another place on the same page he said:

> The acts at which this amendment is directed are acts which, as I have said . . . strike at the roots of our freedom:

Further down on the same page he said:

> There is no suggestion here of . . . purges of libraries . . . There is no suggestion here of destroying . . . books . . .

At page 2107 of Hansard he said:

> The people will want to know what are the essentials of that foul doctrine of communism.

He said that making communism an offence under the Criminal Code was not what was proposed by the leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Drew). Further down on the same page he said:

> There is nothing here that calls for a discussion of the padlock law.

On page 2108 he proceeds to spell it out even further. He said:

> If you simply passed legislation to declare the Labour-Progressive party to be an illegal organization, that would not get at the root of the problem.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, with all these statements of what the amendment does not mean it is quite clear that the sort of concept of legislation indicated in the amendment is certainly not very repressive. I do not think the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) has much to fear in that regard. I shall show—and on this point I entirely agree with him—that the amendment if drafted could not be an amendment to the law as it stands at the present time because everything that the amendment is designed to cover is in the law now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow one question before he goes on?

Mr. Garson: Certainly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He was dealing with Australia, and I followed him with great interest. Are there any other clauses or terms in this legislation to which he has not referred? I merely ask for the purpose of information. I was quite interested in what the minister was saying.

Mr. Garson: I should not like to say definitely whether or not there are. The source of my information was what I thought was the best source available at the present time, the New York Times. I have listed the main headings.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I saw that. I thought possibly he had the bill.

Mr. Garson: I suggest if we were to pass this resolution and if we were going to give it any effect, as we would have to do, that if we called in the most skilful draftsman we could obtain and he started to put the ideas in this resolution into an amendment to the code, and if he left out all that the hon. member for Eglinton has said is not meant by it, he would discover that there is not a single thing which is said to be meant by the amendment which is not prohibited at the present time by the Official Secrets Act or in the sections of the Criminal Code dealing with unlawful assembly, treason, sedition or seditious conspiracy.

I do not want to detain the house too long, and the time available to me this afternoon makes it impossible for me to deal in any great detail with all of these sections. Let me look for a moment at the crime which I think is most closely relevant to this discussion, that of sedition. It is covered at the present time by section 134 of the code, but it is not defined, and for very good reasons which were referred to by the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. They will be found at page 3900 of volume IV of Hansard for 1936. This is what he said on that occasion:

> "An intention to excite ill-will between different classes of Her Majesty's subjects may be seditious intention; whether or not it is so in any particular case must be decided upon by the jury after taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case. Sedition embraces everything, whether by word, deed, or writing, which is calculated to disturb the tranquility of the state, and lead ignorant persons to subvert the government and laws of the empire."

Later on the same page he refers to Halsbury's Laws of England, second edition, volume IX, and quotes the following:

> Sedition is a misdemeanour at common law consisting of acts done, works spoken and published, or writings capable of being a libel published, in each case with a seditious intention.
> Where the words are oral the offence is called the speaking of seditious words; where the words are written the offence is called the publication of seditious libel; where two or more combine for the furtherance of a seditious intention the offence is called seditious conspiracy.

Then it goes on to prescribe the penalty. This is a pretty all-embracing sort of crime, and as I shall indicate later by quoting from a source which I hope my hon. friends opposite will regard as accurate, Mr. Meighen, there is a very excellent reason why it has not been defined in the law.

I would point out the fact that in connection with sedition, as with all other crimes, the problem of enforcement arises, the problem of apprehending the transgressor, of prosecuting him, and in proper cases of convicting him.

In that connection there is an old saying which I do not think has ever been improved upon as a statement of the position. It is very sententious and covers the whole point, and is to the effect that the devil himself knoweth not the mind of man. So even if we were to pass a law, which would be contrary to our political principles, making the mere holding of seditious thoughts an offence under the code, we still would have no way of knowing what were the thoughts of any man, or of proving what they were in a court of law, until we could adduce what he had either said, written or done, to indicate what was in his mind. In other words that overt act would be on the one hand evidence of what he had in his mind and also, under our law, the basis of the charge of sedition against him.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that a careful examination of the sections of the Criminal Code dealing with unlawful assembly, treason and sedition will indicate, particularly in the case of sedition, that the law today is sufficiently extensive to support convictions in all those cases where overt acts can be proved, which I think was the point made by the leader of the C.C.F. party. And I suggest that in those cases in which overt acts cannot be proved, the mere creation of a new offence of communist activity, or similar activities, would not overcome the need of evidence to establish those overt acts, for without an overt act we have no evidence of wrong ideas or of communist activity or similar activities. That is a practical reason, I think, why in the other place, when the question of the repeal of section 98 was being considered, Senator Meighen said that even section 98 did not punish anyone for his ideas. Speaking of a memorandum which had been read to the members of the other place by the government leader there, from the then minister of justice, Senator Meighen put it in this rather pungent language:

> The memorandum quotes an opinion of Macaulay's that it is only when the individual, having harboured wrong ideas, gives effect to them to the detriment of the state that he ought to be punished. Who within the four walls of parliament or anything other than a lunatic asylum would ever entertain a contrary opinion?

That is to say, in line with what was said a few moments ago by the leader of the C.C.F. party, it is only for overt acts that punishment is inflicted. Then Senator Meighen went on, speaking of section 98:

This section never did, does not now, and never could punish anybody for harbouring an opinion, however foolish, lunatic or dangerous.

I believe I have heard or read somewhere, though at the moment I must confess I cannot recall when or where—and I hope my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, who is not in his seat, will correct me if I am wrong—that on occasion he has advocated the reintroduction of section 98 into the Criminal Code. Certainly during the present debate the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) had this to say, at page 2108 of Hansard:

It is worth remembering that in the past communists in this country have been placed upon trial for offences of the kind I have been describing here tonight. It was not when the law was in its present form.

Here I interject that as far as the law of sedition is concerned, the only recent time it was not in its present form was when section 98 was in the Criminal Code.

It was at an earlier period when there were some teeth in the law.

I suggest that up to this point in his argument the irresistible inference on the part of one who heard the hon. member for Eglinton was that he was in favour of the reinstatement of those teeth in the law; but in the very next sentence he backed away from it:

At the moment I am not advocating any particular and detailed form of legislation.

So we have had some strong words against communism, some references to indicate the great virtues of section 98, but a backing away from taking responsibility for suggesting definitely that it should be reintroduced. The hon. member then went on to explain at great length why in the case of Rex v. Tim Buck it was possible to get a conviction; and I leave it to hon. members whether the impression he left was not that this conviction was brought about because of the presence of section 98 in the Criminal Code. It will be recalled that I asked the hon. member what were the charges against the accused in that case. That question was evaded, although quite relevant to this discussion.

The fact of the matter is that in Rex v. Buck, the citation for which is 57 Canadian Criminal Cases, page 291, the accused was charged under three counts, two of which were under section 98 and the third a count of seditious conspiracy under the law as it was then and as it still is. The wording of the third count, and I am reading the exact form of the indictment, was that the accused——did become and continue to be members of the communist party in Canada, a section of the communist international, and did conspire together to further the objects and aims of the said party and the objects and aims of the said communist party of Canada, a section of the communist international, are of a seditious nature intended to incite His Majesty's subjects to attempt otherwise than by lawful means the alteration of the government of the Dominion of Canada and to incite persons to commit crimes and disturbances of the peace and raise discontent or disaffection among His Majesty's subjects, and promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of such subjects.

I put it to any reasonable person whether or not an indictment describing activities in those broad terms would not cover communist activities, under the law as it stands at the present time. The result of that case was very significant. The accused were found guilty on all counts. What did that mean? It meant that if there had been no section 98 in the Criminal Code at that time, in the absence of that section a charge of seditious conspiracy could have been laid, and, as the case turned out, a conviction obtained.

As I indicated earlier, I am somewhat fortified in my views as to the relative efficacy of section 98 as compared with the law as it stands at the present time, by the views of a man who I am sure shares the feelings of hon. members of the Conservative party opposite, on the subject of communism. That is Senator Meighen, to whom I referred a moment ago. What did he say about section 98 in the discussions that took place at the time it was being repealed? I quote from his address on that occasion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What date was that?

Mr. Garson: I can give it to my hon. friend afterwards.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You have not got it there?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I have it here, but I shall have to search for it. It was June 20, 1936.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank you.

Mr. Garson: He says:

Nothing forbidden under section 98 was lawful before section 98 was passed.

It was unlawful before section 98 was passed and unlawful after it was passed.

The section simply made specific and definite a certain line of conduct which always had been sedition; but it was put in the form of words, definitely described so that there would be warning to everybody that such a thing was sedition. In this connection I want to discuss what sedition is.

And this is an exceedingly important statement that he now makes.

In the common law of England sedition has not been defined, nor has fraud, for the very obvious reason that any definition that the wit of man could devise of either one or the other could be circumvented by some act which, while it would be sedition or fraud, would not be so within the definition. But sedition has always been a crime and heavily punished. The courts have decided on the facts just what constituted sedition, and out of those decisions there has grown a body of jurisprudence, which is in effect today in England, and indeed in all civilized countries, though not of course the same in all, that forbids sedition under all circumstances and at all times.

That law is in effect in Canada today.

Now let us look at the use that was made of section 98. Maybe I do my hon. friends an injustice, but it seems to me that the only possible interpretation that could be put upon the language which is used in the resolution is that it favours the reintroduction either of section 98 in its precise form or of some substantially similar provision. Let us see what use was made of it during, if I mistake not, the sixteen years it was in the code. Last year, in order to ascertain to what extent this section was invoked in the enforcement of the law as being one good indication of its value in stopping communism, I had my deputy write to the deputy attorneys general of the provinces to find out how many times it had been used during the whole period of its existence. I received the following report:

Use of Section 98

Prince Edward Island	none
Nova Scotia	none
New Brunswick	none
Manitoba	none

There was the following report from the deputy attorney general of Ontario:

In connection with your telegram of the 7th instant regarding section 98 of the Criminal Code, the only record we have of a prosecution—

He goes on to say that the only record he has of this is the case of Rex v. Tim Buck. Then he says:

This department does not keep statistics, and it is of course possible that there have been others, but a search of our files indicates only the one, and I have no recollection of any other prosecutions under that section.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, during the whole period of its existence, at a time when, I suggest, there was at least as much communistic activity and sentiment as there is at the present time—and I think a great deal more—the only single occasion of which there is any record —I should enter a correction there; we have no reply from Quebec, so we do not know whether it was invoked in that province or not—in these other provinces on which section 98 was used was in the case of Rex v. Tim Buck, and in this case it would have been possible to have secured a conviction, and a conviction was secured, on the third count of seditious conspiracy. I would therefore be curious to know what sort of provision, in line with the resolution which has been moved by the Conservative party in this chamber, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition and his legal advisers could produce which he would think would accomplish the purpose that he has in mind and which is not already covered by the existing law.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes, surely.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did he or anyone in his department have the draftsmen of his department, within the last year, draw a draft suggested amendment to provide for changes to be made in the law of sedition in order to cover the present situation with respect to communism?

Mr. Garson: No, I think not, Mr. Speaker. I am just speaking offhand, of course.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister would remember that.

Mr. Garson: No, I do not. I am sorry, but I do not remember.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right.

Mr. Garson: But in any case, it would not necessarily be relevant to the particular aspect of the matter that we are discussing at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was asking for information. I thought the minister would know what had happened.

Mr. Garson: In any case, Mr. Speaker, if such a section were drafted by my hon. friend I would feel that our proper course in this chamber—which was the course we followed not so long ago upon another occasion—was to refer such an amendment or such a provision to the attorneys general of the provinces by whom, and only by whom, under our constitution, the law is enforced and order maintained. The leader of the opposition seemed to be under a considerable misapprehension in this regard when he was indicating the other day that the Department of Justice was at fault in not having taken some action with regard to the foreign language newspapers in Toronto that, in his view, were guilty of publishing sedition. In making that charge against the Department of Justice, I think that he was taking a position which was rather embarrassing to himself, in that these same papers—I would not say all of them, but most of them—were engaged in publishing the same sort of matter, I suggest,—and probably he could tell us—during the time he was premier of Ontario and during the time his attorney general and his government had the responsibility for enforcing this section of the Criminal Code in that province.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has made a statement with which I should deal immediately. The quotations that I gave were quotations from Vestnik of this year. I used them as illustrations of the type of thing that is now being published. I definitely have information that there has been a steady acceleration of this type of production. When I said that this was something peculiarly within the responsibility of the Department of Justice, I would point out that there is a branch of the R.C.M.P., which is under his authority, which deals with this subject; and also that the provincial governments have not the translating facilities available to deal with this matter. But I know he has. I know that he is having translations made within his department—I hope with his knowledge—of these various papers at this time.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is quite right in saying that we have the translating facilities. But I should think that a man who has held himself out, for so long as he has done, as an authority upon dominion-provincial matters would by now, after these many years, have come to know, by contacts in the house or in the Ontario legislature, that it is the provincial attorneys general who have the administration of justice and not the Department of Justice which he has been criticizing.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, these statements must be corrected. It is not the provincial attorneys general. The provinces are responsible for the administration of justice, and the Minister of Justice has it within his authority to act in every single case where he knows of any offence under the Criminal Code.

Mr. Garson: I suggest to my hon. friend with all deference that he is quite wrong; that if and when we act we act on the authority and with the approval previously obtained from the attorney general, as we know to our cost, because on some occasions provincial attorneys general—I am not mentioning any province in particular here—wish us to appoint counsel, whom we pay, to represent them in such a prosecution.

Mr. Drew: Which you initiate.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend would take the trouble to get the British North America Act and read section 92 he would find that what I am telling him is quite correct.

In his interjection my hon. friend intimated that there has been—I have forgotten the word he used—rather a change for the worse in these publications. I hope it is not because of his departure from Ontario as premier that these papers have changed for the worse.

Mr. Drew: That is a silly statement, a typically silly statement.

Mr. Garson: Well, that was my hon. friend's statement, and I agree that it is silly. I am in entire agreement with that.

Mr. Drew: You are dealing with a serious subject. Deal with it in that way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Garson: May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the provincial attorneys general themselves who have this responsibility, and who discharge it when they feel there is occasion to do so, have made no representations to our department that the present sections of the Criminal Code and the Official Secrets Act are inadequate to deal with what we have been referring to in this debate here today. And I must confess with all deference that this fact carries considerable weight with me, because it seems to me that these men who have the responsibility are the ones best qualified to express opinions upon this point, and when we receive no general representations from them that amendments are required, we are inclined to feel that the law in its present state is satisfactory. May I say that we are confirmed in that view by the very resolution which we are discussing here today, because, as explained by the hon. member for Eglinton, it indicates no substantial change whatever in the law.

In the course of discussing this matter the hon. member for Eglinton said, as reported at page 2109 of Hansard:

> On looking at the present state of the law, I remind hon. members that the state of the law in Canada today is not as it was when those communists were convicted of the offence of inciting the use of force to overthrow the governmental structure of this country.

He was of course referring to the prosecution of Tim Buck and his associates. Then he goes on to say at page 2110:

> In the year 1936 when the parliament amended the Criminal Code it eliminated the offences of which the communists, in the trial to which I have referred, were convicted.

That statement, Mr. Speaker, is in part incorrect. It is true that in that year section 98 was eliminated; but the section providing for seditious conspiracy, under which the third charge against Tim Buck was laid, and upon which he was found guilty, was not eliminated, and is still in the law today.

I might add this point, that the repeal of section 98 did not in any way embarrass the prosecution of the communists and fellow travellers arising out of the Gouzenko disclosures. Under the law as it then stood, it was possible to convict, and we did convict, a number of those persons. And more than that, I say quite confidently that if section 98 had been in the Criminal Code at the time of those prosecutions arising out of the Gouzenko disclosures it would not have enabled us to secure a single conviction in those cases in which there happened to be an acquittal.

It is for these reasons that, while agreeing entirely with everything that the hon. members of the Conservative party have said with regard to the danger of communism—and I think I can speak for every member in this house when I say that interested as we were, and honoured as we were to hear the eloquent statements of the case which they made, there was not one of us who did not entirely agree with all that was said in that regard because we were of that view before they got up to speak at all—agreeing with all that, I suggest that whatever ideal merits the position which my hon. friends have taken in this matter may have—and I admit that the ideal merits are excellent—what they have completely failed to prove in the course of their arguments yesterday and again today is that the law as we have it now is inadequate; and more particularly they have completely failed to prove that any amendment along the lines of that which they are advocating would serve any purpose which the law as at present constituted might fail to serve.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister the unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Garson: In some cases I confess that what might seem to be actions warranting prosecutions are not prosecuted; but before we criticize the provincial attorney general and his law officers in these cases in the course which they follow, let us remember that there are many exceedingly bitter, and highly intelligent, enemies of communism who are quite as sincerely, and in some cases perhaps soundly, of the view—I think this view was expressed only this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell)—that communism underground is less subject to control by the lawful authorities; that communism underground can have more effective contacts with those whom they wish to convert; that communism underground is a much more sinister and dangerous movement than it is aboveground where it is now.

If in the exercise of their sincere judgment any provincial attorney general—I am not saying this to be unfair at all, but for example the attorney general of Ontario, when my hon. friend was premier of that province—sees fit not to prosecute in some such case, one should not immediately jump to the conclusion that this is necessarily an unwise action on his part.

Mr. Drew: Is the minister referring to any specific case?

Mr. Garson: No, not at all.

Mr. Drew: Well, don't leave an impression which is inconsistent with the situation.

Mr. Garson: In any case, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to my hon. friend who has just made the interjection that any representations which he has to make as to whether it is an unwise action or not should be addressed to those whose responsibility it is to take them.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the fundamental question which we have to decide here is this: Do we really believe in a free society? Are we seriously and sincerely convinced that the minds of free men possess convictions that are impervious to totalitarian attack? If our answer to this question is "No," we shall believe in repression by the state, approaching, as time goes on, more and more closely to totalitarian repression itself. But if we think, as we on this side of the house think, that the answer to this question is "yes, free men can and will resist communist ideas," then we shall follow the course which we have followed since 1936 of treating Canadian citizens as a group as free men; of leaving for example to the trade unions the matter of clearing their own ranks of communism in a democratic manner. We shall follow the course taken by the greatest exponent of liberty that the world has ever known, of a great nation in whose traditions I had thought the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) was steeped, the beleaguered people of Great Britain who, locked in a death struggle with totalitarian evil, carried on to victory with the weapons of freedom; whose free parliament, sitting almost continuously throughout the course of the conflict, kept repression of individual liberty to an absolute minimum even in the face of death itself.

And it is greatly significant, Mr. Speaker, that of all the countries which have had to contend with this evil of communism, there are none in which the efforts to contain it, judged on a purely practical basis, have been so successful as in Great Britain and in Canada, countries which, to combat totalitarianism, used not the weapons of totalitarianism itself but the weapons of freedom.

Mr. Drew: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Drew: Has the minister forgotten the Defence of the Realm Act?

Mr. Garson: But I will say in conclusion to the hon. member, who is so very fond of interrupting other people when they are speaking, that if we should ever have to change our policy in this regard, then I suggest that we should need something with more substance to it than that which is outlined in my hon. friend's resolution now before us.

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I shall try to be as brief as possible. My stand on this very important question was taken long ago. I remember the first occasion, in 1937, when I spoke about communism in the House of Commons, and when I saw in front of me people smiling with incredulity because I was telling the house that communism was very dangerous and was on our threshold.

I believe it was the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) who said this afternoon that he did not understand clearly the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) that what was to be feared most was Russian imperialism. I do not know if we must fear Russian imperialism more than we fear communism. But there is one sure fact and it is this, that Russian imperialism is and for a hundred years has been existing in the minds of the Russian government.

I remember that when speaking in the house in 1946 I read a few excerpts from a book written by Henri Massis of the French Academy the title of which, I believe, was "Russia", in which he stated that Pierre le Grand, Peter the Great, had been the most imperialist of all the Russians. I remember that Henri Massis in his thesis made very clear something which should be made clear to every member in the house, that communist imperialism was not more dangerous than the imperialism sponsored by Peter the Great in that time.

I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs was speaking truthfully when he said that we must fear Russian imperialism at the same time as we fear communist imperialism. I believe my stand in this matter has been made clear over a number of years in the house. I believe the situation was stated correctly by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) when, in his brief but interesting speech yesterday, he referred to the words uttered by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when speaking at Loyola college the other day: "We need faith by deeds; genuine brotherhood cannot be achieved without faith in God."

These words, sir, should stand as a beacon in a lighthouse to all the population of Canada. I believe we do not face communism in the way it should be faced. I realize I have been radical in the stand I have taken in the past. I thought the only way to stop communism from spreading in our country was to ban it. Now, however, after having studied very carefully the writings of many noted authors, I believe that there are different ways of stopping the spread of communism. The banning of it may be one way of dealing with it; but it is not the only way, and it is a dangerous way.

I remember speaking in the house on April 16, 1948, when, as reported at page 3035 of Hansard, I said:

> To hear some members in this debate one might think that a few of them—fortunately only a few—were ready to give equal freedom to evil and good.

I believe I was on very sound ground when I said that I was not prepared, and that the house ought not to be prepared, in its effort to give as great freedom as possible to our population, to give at the same time the same freedom to both evil and good. In giving that freedom we have made one of our mistakes—and this has been done not only in Canada but in the world at large. Then I continued on that occasion:

> In my province we are not ready to give equal freedom to evil and good. It is all right to talk about civil rights and freedom, even for those who are organizing from central Europe in order that they may be ready to break our back when they judge the proper time has come. In this country it is useless to name those who are getting ready to break our back and to do it more rapidly than the house seems to think.

Then I continued:

> That is why I would favour the passing of such a law—

I was then pretty radical.

> —not because I believe that that is the only way to stop the spread of communism, Mr. Speaker; far from it. But if that is one of the weapons we need to stop the march of that evil theory to which some of us are ready to give freedom equal to what they give to the real democrats in this country, then we should use it.

I still repeat that if we think that is one of the ways to stop communism, we should take it. As I said before, however, I believe there are other ways. The words the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) uttered were the best possible to tell the population and those who are fighting communism that they should start clearing away the dust that has gathered in their minds because of this evil philosophy.

I remember I took another stand when we were debating a bill that gave certain privileges to United States soldiers while in Canada. I remember that some of our C.C.F. friends did not like that bill and opposed it. I recall that one Conservative member opposed it, I am not just sure which one, and I remember also that the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) made a good speech against communism. At that time I said:

> The hon. member for Vancouver North stated that it would be foolish to ask this government and this parliament to extend to the U.S.S.R., Yugoslavia and Hungary the same privileges being extended to the United States, a great, powerful and friendly nation. We cannot compare the friendship of Russian toward Canada with the friendship of the United States toward our country.

The member for Vancouver North at that time is now the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair). I went on to say that you could not overlook the dangerous infiltration of communism into the United States and Canada. While that debate was going on Reuters sent out the following report from London:

> Moscow radio said in a news broadcast today that Canadians were getting "more and more uneasy" about impending "infiltration" of United States troops, consequent upon plans for United States-Canadian defence co-operation.
> "In this draft", the broadcast said, "United States troops are given such privileges that have never before been given to foreign troops on territories of other countries in peacetime."
> "Several articles of the Canadian Criminal Code will not be applied to the United States troops. Military and other United States authorities are granted full rights on the Canadian territory, providing only that they do not interfere with the local Canadian ones."

It is not enough to fight communism and to say that we are against communism; the fight should be intelligently conducted. At that time we gave to a friendly nation privileges that were necessary in order that they might help us if the time came when we would be needing help, and I am afraid that that day will come.

There are many things that should be corrected. A couple of weeks ago I spoke in this house about divorce and I hope I am not referring too much to a previous debate. One way that communism can enter our homes is through the disruption of family life. I think we all believe that the family is the basic cell of our society and we should do our utmost to see that it is not disrupted. I was reading about the new constitution proposed for Japan by General MacArthur. I realize that General MacArthur is doing his utmost to fight communism, but I do not think he should give communists a chance to enter the social life of that country. Article XXII of that new constitution states:

> Laws shall be enacted considering choice of spouse, property rights, inheritance, choice of domicile, divorce—

If you accept divorce in any declaration of human rights, you accept the possibility of the destruction of family life. You accept also the possibility of destroying that authority which we need so much, the authority of the father and mother over the family. In article 16 of the universal declaration of human rights of the United Nations it is stated:

> Men and women of full age, without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion, have the right to marry and to found a family. They are entitled to equal rights as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution.

Marriage cannot be dissolved; marriage is for life. If that article has remained in that declaration it is in absolute contradiction of good sense and common sense. It is stated in that declaration that the family is the natural and fundamental unit of society and is entitled to protection by the state. If we want to fight communism we must protect the basic cell of our society and not include in any declaration of human rights, whether it be Canadian, Japanese or otherwise, such declarations.

Karl Marx was quite unscrupulous when he spoke about religion, because among other things he said that religion was:

> The opium of the people.
> An intoxicating poison.
> Brain stuffing.
> A capitalistic stimulant.
> A bourgeois cure.
> A seducing idea to stupify the people.
> A repulsive ghost.

I think it is right to say that Marxism, and especially communism, is a religion. It is more than a philosophy, it is a religion. If you look closely at the organization in Russia you see that Stalin is set up as a god and they have the twelve apostles in the politburo. Images of these apostles and this god are distributed widely in schools and public places throughout Russia. They are trying to tear Christianity apart with their organization. They are trying to destroy God.

They know perfectly well that God cannot be destroyed but, at the same time, as was said yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), they are anti-God. I have no doubt they realize that they have a hard job to perform, but they do it just the same. They are keeping the people of Russia firmly in their grip. That is the only way to keep twenty million people in servitude in the concentration camps. It is anti-God when the clergy of any religion can be thrown out of the churches. Those who have been permitted to come back may enter their pulpits on the condition that they advocate communism and the policies of the Kremlin as being the best in the world, something that should be followed in Russia and throughout the world. Nobody can deny that, but sometimes Russia gives us a good lesson. I was speaking about divorce a moment ago. In article 122 of the Russian constitution I find the following:

> Women in the U.S.S.R. are accorded equal rights with men in all spheres of economic, state, cultural, social and political life.

To hear that, one would think that women in Russia are free to do what women can do in our country, work when they feel like working outside their homes, remain at home when their families are large in order to take care of them in the proper way. The article continues:

> The possibility of exercising these rights is ensured to women by granting them an equal right with men to work—

In giving women equal rights with men to work they do not say that their government very often forces women to go to work in whatever place the government thinks best in order to further the aims of the communist organization or communist country. The article goes on:

> —payment for work, rest and leisure, social insurance and education, by state protection of the interests of mother and child, by state aid to mothers of large families and unmarried mothers...

They believe in that now because of the costly experiences they have had as a result of their laxity with regard to divorce. I think I am in order in speaking that way because I want to prove that a weak spot of our democracy is the disruption of families through too easy divorce.

I think that there is another angle from which we can look at the amendment presently before the house. I refer to the constitutional side of the question which I believe was stated very plainly yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he took part in the debate. I have a newspaper clipping from the Montreal Gazette dealing with a forum in which the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), Mr. Paul Sauriol of Montreal, editorial staff member of the Montreal French daily newspaper Le Devoir, and others took part. The newspaper article refers to Mr. Sauriol's part in the discussion as follows:

> Mr. Sauriol argued that eleven bills of rights would be needed if all personal rights were to be covered. He was against amending the Canadian constitution to give jurisdiction to the federal government in the field of human rights. Such an amendment would be "contrary not only to the letter but to the spirit of our constitution, because the principal function of the provinces is to protect the personal rights of their citizens."

Our government did more than that. At the United Nations a firm stand was taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as to the constitutional aspect of the question when he stated:

> I wish to make it clear here, that in regard to any rights which are defined in this document, the federal government of Canada does not intend to invade other rights which are also important to the people of Canada. By this I mean the rights of the provinces under our federal constitution. We believe that the rights set forth in this declaration are operative and well protected in Canada. We shall continue to develop and maintain these rights, but we shall do so within the framework of our constitution which assigns jurisdiction in regard to a number of important questions to the legislatures of our provinces. Because of these various reservations on details in the draft declaration, the Canadian delegation abstained when the declaration as a whole was put to the vote in the committee.

It is plainly to be seen that the government has respected the constitutional side of the whole question. I said that the matter was very clearly put by the Prime Minister in the words he uttered at Loyola college the other day, and I repeat that everyone should keep those words in mind. We should be conscious of the constitutional situation in our minds, our hearts and our souls. I should like to read a few excerpts from a book by Monsignor Sheen, whom I have been following for many years and who is in my opinion a good author on this subject. The excerpt I am about to read will answer the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he said that all churches had admitted that the cause of communism was the poor economic situation. Monsignor Sheen has this to say:

> Neither is communism to be met altogether on the false assumption that if economic conditions were bettered we would do away with communism. Communism is not just an economic system; it is a philosophy of life. Conditions were very good in the garden of Eden, but Lucifer started his revolt there. Bad economic situations are only a condition but never a cause of communism.

Monsignor Sheen also said:

> There is much misunderstanding concerning what a nation and a people should do to combat communism. Immediately there come to mind four ways in which it should not be done. Communism should not be met by vituperation, name-calling, and personal hate. Hate is like a seed—it grows. By hating communists we advance communism, for communism grows in discord just as disease thrives in dirt.

He also said:

> Finally, we are not to think that we are called on to be God's agents to execute vindictive judgment on the communists, but to see the whole world as seated in sin. When a germ infects a body, it generally does not so localize itself that a surgeon can take out a quart of blood and liquidate the evil. The germs are so diffused through the body that the whole body must be saved. So, too, there is evil throughout the world; communism is one of its principal symptoms. The Christian point of view is to see ourselves as part of a guilty world. In fact, the more innocent we are, the more we are to feel that guilt, because then we better recognize our oneness with our fellow men. Our Lord was innocent, but He took on Himself the sins of the world.

I hope I am not tiring hon. members by these quotations. I think they are necessary. On education Monsignor Sheen has this to say:

Since communists infiltrate their philosophy through lies and myths, it is imperative that people in a democracy be properly informed concerning not only the errors of its ideology, but also the great truths of human nature, history and religion. Schools are in operation only about six hours a day, most of them closing at three in the afternoon. It would seem in the present crisis advisable to use the later afternoon and evening hours for adult education.

If we want to fight communism we should do so intelligently. I hear some members of the opposition vituperating the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) when he does not want to give all the information they would like to have. Sometimes we should not ask for too much information, for the same thing could happen here that happened in the United States. I have here a clipping from the Toronto Daily Star, a very good newspaper, of March 2, 1950.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It is a good newspaper, and I would say the same of the Globe and Mail. The heading is "Better than spy in F.B.I. is N.Y. trial to Russians," and the article goes on:

With no more effort than it takes to sit in court and listen, the Russians are learning these days about how the federal bureau of investigation hunts spies—Russian or otherwise.

What use do the G-men make of wire-tapping?

What sort of secret records does the F.B.I. keep on spy suspects?

How much does the F.B.I. know about the activities of known or suspected soviet agents in the United States?

Then it continues:

Miss Coplon, a former justice department employee, and Gubitchev, a soviet engineer, formerly employed by the United Nations, are accused of conspiring here to transmit U.S. secrets to Russia.

Yesterday, for example, extracts from thirty-four F.B.I. data slips figured in the evidence. These were supposed to be secret. Miss Coplon is accused of copying them without permission. They never reached the Russians—but the Russians know about them now. They are in the record.

That happened just because those conducting the inquiry were seeking too much information from the F.B.I. That is what we may do when we ask the Minister of National Defence to divulge too much information in the house; we may give very good weapons to those who are trying to destroy us.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe the best way to fight communism is to follow, to believe and to live up to the words uttered by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent); to lead our own Christian lives and live by our own moral standards; to try to keep those standards up and not bring them down. If we must fight them, let us do so with belief in God. I think that is the only way, not with too-radical measures. Let us put our credo right in the face of the communist credo, and I am sure at last we will win the war.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, since I was the first member of this house to recommend that the Canadian government officially recognize Russia diplomatically, in 1941, I feel that I should speak on this amendment. Since it is almost six o'clock, however, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will go into committee of ways and means and take up the budget resolutions. On Thursdays and Fridays we go into ways and means without question put. If those resolutions are dealt with we shall take up two resolutions on the order paper, one in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce providing for an additional vice-president of the national research council, and the other in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs concerning allowances, which was under consideration some time ago.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

STRAWBERRIES

QUESTION AS TO IMPORTATIONS OF FRUIT PULP FROM HOLLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. Anderson (Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have been informed that five hundred tons of strawberry pulp packed in sulphur dioxide are being sent to Canada from Holland, some of which has already arrived. I understand the reason given was that Holland prefers our hard currency to that of Great Britain where the shipment was intended to go. As our own strawberry season is approaching, could I have the assurance of the minister that further shipments will not be permitted?

Mr. Graydon: Could we have the hon. member's question again? There was so much noise we could not hear it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is a little longer than we generally allow at this time.

Mr. Graydon: It is important, though.

Mr. Speaker: If the house would like to hear it again, perhaps the hon. member would read it a second time. I would ask hon. members not to make so much noise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

(Question repeated.)

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I can confirm the hon. member's information that a quantity of strawberry pulp packed in sulphur dioxide has been exported to Canada from Holland. This fruit pulp would be imported into Canada under customs tariff 105c with a customs duty of 25 per cent ad valorem under the most-favored-nation rate.

In 1949 our exports to Holland were valued at $13,759,130 and our imports at $6,687,602. In view of this decided trade balance in our favour and the existing tariff protection to domestic producers, the government could not favourably consider the suggestion made by the hon. member that imports of this type from Holland be refused entry.

Mr. Graydon: You will kill the fruit industry if you admit them.

PRIVILEGE

MR. JOHNSTON—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN MONTREAL "GAZETTE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, May 4, there appeared in the Montreal Gazette an article—

Mr. Speaker: Order. When the last question was asked there was so much noise in the chamber the question could not be heard.

Mr. Chevrier: It came from over there.

Mr. Speaker: At the present time there is just as much noise. I would ask hon. members not to converse with each other at this time, so that the questions asked may be heard.

Mr. Johnston: On Thursday, May 4, the Montreal Gazette contained an article with a Canadian Press byline. This article is headed, "Privilege of franking said safe for M.P.'s," and it states, in the second paragraph—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot allow the hon. member to read a newspaper article at this time.

Mr. Johnston: It is a question of personal privilege. I am not asking a question.

Mr. Speaker: A question of personal privilege should have been raised earlier in the proceedings.

Mr. Johnston: I tried to, but you did not see me, sir.

Mr. Speaker: The time to raise a question of privilege is at the opening of the sitting.

An hon. Member: Any time.

Mr. Speaker: However, as the hon. member now wishes to bring up a question of privilege I think we should hear him.

Mr. Knowles: It is a good one, anyway.

Mr. Johnston: And it is a very important question of privilege. The first sentence of the second paragraph in the article reads:

> In the public accounts committee Mr. Sellar was questioned by C. E. Johnston (C.C.F.—Bow River) about a proposal to put the post office on a commercial basis.

I should like to draw attention to the fact that I am not a C.C.F.'er, I have never wanted to be, and I am quite content to be a Social Crediter.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Dion in the chair.

INCOME TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:

1. That for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, the provision under which the 10 per cent tax rate on the first $10,000 of income of a corporation applies only to one of several related companies be amended so that the test of relationship of companies shall be ownership of 70 per cent or more of all the issued common shares of capital stock of the corporation instead of mere control.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, before I begin the discussion of the Income Tax Act resolutions, there are one or two matters connected with excise tax to which I should like to refer. I believe this would be the appropriate time to do so.

The hon. member for Melfort asked an interesting question as to the status of American contracting firms bidding on Canadian projects, having success in their bids and then bringing their equipment across the line to work on such projects. Obviously if they were able to bring equipment across without duty and sales tax they would be in a preferred position in comparison with Canadian contractors. I referred this matter to the deputy minister of national revenue in charge of customs and excise, and perhaps, for the information of all hon. members, I might be permitted to put his opinion on the record.

Under the customs tariff the contractors' equipment mentioned would be subject to payment of customs duty and sales tax in the ordinary course, but where materials are owned by a United States concern who have been given a contract by Canadian interests to perform certain operations in this country and who require the use of equipment which is of a special nature and not available here, it is the practice of the department to submit the facts to the governor general in council with a view to obtaining authority for collection of the duty and sales tax on a proportionate basis, conditional on exportation of the equipment within a specified length of time. It is only where inquiries made by the department have established the fact that no Canadian interests would be prejudiced that such submissions are forwarded to council.

I should like to make a short statement with regard to the first income tax resolution to be found in the ways and means resolutions now before us. While I am piloting these resolutions through the committee, the Minister of Finance of course will actually put the bill through. I am not a lawyer, and income tax legislation is without doubt the most technical of all the legislation on our statute books. Nevertheless most hon. members are not lawyers, so it may be an advantage so far as the resolution stage is concerned to have the general intent of these resolutions explained in layman's language, and that is what I intend to do.

The Minister of Finance has told me that between the first reading and the second reading of the bill at least one week will be allowed to elapse, during which time hon. members who are interested in this type of legislation can study the bill. He has asked me to repeat the invitation he has given to all members of the house to avail themselves of the services and help and advice of the many excellent and competent officials in the Department of Finance and of National Revenue who have worked on this legislation.

The first of the Income Tax Act resolutions relates to the ten per cent tax concession which was made last year to small business. You will remember that before last year we had a flat thirty per cent tax on the profits of corporations, and it was felt that that bore down too heavily on the small businessman. So for the first time in the history of our tax legislation we introduced a graduated scale of corporation taxation somewhat similar to the graduated scale we have always had in connection with personal income tax.

The rates were changed to ten per cent on the first $10,000, and then, to ensure that there was no revenue loss, the rate was raised to thirty-three per cent on the profits beyond that figure. That actually meant that a company with profits less than $77,000 a year would gain under this legislation, while a company with profits over that would have to pay heavier taxes.

The intent of the legislation was not necessarily to help small business; the intent was to help the small businessman. There are many wealthy men in this country who have a great number of small businesses and who derive from those businesses large incomes of perhaps $50,000 to $100,000 per year. If this ten per cent rate were applied to all small businesses which had profits of less than $10,000 a year, it would be possible for such a man to have an income of from $50,000 to $100,000 a year and pay only this ten per cent corporation tax rate, whereas another man with the same income, but derived solely from one company, would be paying ten per cent on the first $10,000 and thirty-three per cent on the income above that.

If the ten per cent rate was to be applied to every company then it would be possible for certain types of businesses to break up into individual units. For example, chain stores could be broken up so that every store was a separate corporation which would pay the ten per cent rate. The result would be that the aggregate corporation income would be subject only to the ten per cent rate. On the other hand, there are many industries which could not be broken up in that fashion. In my own riding there are mines and pulp and paper mills where the final sales are at the end of their production, the sale of ore or concentrates or paper.

Last year we tried to devise legislation which would help the people we wanted to help, the small businessmen who were struggling to expand their businesses, by relieving them of this heavy thirty per cent tax and substituting the ten per cent rate. However, to protect against abuses such as I have mentioned we limited that to one of a number of controlled companies. The majority shareholders of those controlled companies will be the ones who will designate which of the companies shall receive this concession of ten per cent tax on the first $10,000.

When the minister was piloting the bill through the house, hon. members on both government and opposition sides pointed out some of the factors which were involved, and suggested that it might prove to be a hardship on the minority shareholders in controlled companies. At that time the minister gave the house assurance that if during the year experience showed that this was inflicting hardship on the type of businessman we intended to help, changes would be made, and made retroactive to cover the 1949 tax year. When I appeared before the Senate I gave the same assurance.

During this past year it has been found that the present legislation, while of good intent, has hurt one class of businessman in Canada. It often happens that someone, perhaps a returned veteran, wants to start a small business in a small town, possibly a garage. He cannot raise the money in the ordinary way, so he turns to what you might call the local capitalist, the man who has made his money in the town. This man not only has money; he has credit standing and managerial experience. I am sure that every hon. member who has small towns in his riding knows that that situation exists. Such a man may help any number of little industries to get going. He will retain control of the company during a certain period and exercise managerial control. Because of that the business is able to obtain bank and other credit.

Under the present legislation only one of such a group of small companies which had been helped by one or two local men of money would be able to obtain this concession. Whichever company was picked out would get the concession, but the others, the minority shareholders in the other groups, would not only be denied the ten per cent concession; they would be paying a corporation tax, not at the old thirty per cent rate but at the new level of thirty-three per cent. It is for that reason that we have introduced this new resolution to expand the idea of control, not to bare control, but, as is stated in the resolution, to ownership of not more than seventy per cent of the common shares.

It is hoped by this means to expand this concession to most of the genuine small businesses in the country. At the same time the seventy per cent stipulation does not make this concession available to some of the large corporations whose business is of such an order that they could break it up into units and so avoid the normal corporation tax.

Mr. Green: Will this be retroactive?

Mr. Sinclair: That is the assurance given by the minister, that it will cover the 1949 tax year. That was promised by the minister in the resolution speech he made last fall.

Mr. Fleming: On the face of it I think this resolution is likely to commend itself to hon. members. The parliamentary assistant, however, might expand the information given in some respects. In the first place, may I ask whether, under the terms of the proposed bill, this will remain the only definition of related corporations? In the second place, is the parliamentary assistant in a position to inform the house how many corporations have been affected by the provision introduced last year in the amendment to section 36 of the act? How many small companies were benefited by the reduction in rate?

Mr. Sinclair: So far as the latter part of the question is concerned, of course the tax returns are not in yet. Our only knowledge comes from the correspondence we have received. Generally the concession was greatly welcomed, but the one complaint was from this group of companies. Perhaps I should also mention that it was not in the House of Commons but rather before a Senate committee that the question was raised by various senators. I know at times the Senate is harshly dealt with in this house, but my experience in the last few years in the position I occupy has been that the Senate committees on banking and commerce and finance are of tremendous aid to our parliamentary processes. It was there that various senators put their fingers on the point that our bare control measure would inflict hardship on the very class of small businessmen in small towns whom we were seeking to aid. The actual definition of related companies will be spelled out most carefully in the bill which will be available once the resolution passes.

Mr. Fleming: That is not quite an answer to my question. I asked if this test, as proposed in the resolution, will now become the only and exclusive test to determine whether or not corporations are related.

Mr. Sinclair: Oh, no; this particular test has been applied only with relation to this special tax concession.

Mr. Fleming: Again may I say that I do not think the parliamentary assistant has understood my point. Is this going to be the only test under section 36 of the act whether corporations are or are not related?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes; that is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the parliamentary assistant say what restrictions or safeguards there are to protect the department against companies subdividing into other companies, and bringing the subdivided companies within the position contemplated by the act last year and the change now being made? As I understand it, when the Minister of Finance introduced the budget he said these changes were made for the purpose of encouraging small business, and that is a most commendable purpose. The parliamentary assistant has mentioned that there are numbers of businessmen who control a number of small companies. What is there to prevent any company in Canada today from coming within the shareholder provision of this section by subdividing into units? What is there to prevent a businessman with half a dozen small companies from continuing to operate those companies, thereby escaping the heavier rate of taxation? What is there to prevent larger businesses with the same type and percentage of control from breaking up and thereby ensuring an evasion of income tax?

Let me carry it one step further. What is there to prevent a chain store, taking the example given by the parliamentary assistant, from coming into this country, opening a dozen units, and, within the control limits provided under this resolution, establishing each one of those chain stores as separate incorporations? Has anything like that been done in the last year? Are any safeguards contemplated in the bill to be introduced to implement the resolution which will prevent such a situation from arising?

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps I did not explain sufficiently why we picked on seventy per cent. If it had been ninety or ninety-five per cent, then it would have been comparatively easy to do the sort of thing the hon. member for Lake Centre has suggested. With seventy per cent control, however, it is not merely seventy per cent control by one person but by one person or persons not dealing at arm's length. If in two or three of these companies one saw the same shareholder in the other thirty per cent of common stock, then the Department of National Revenue would say that these people are obviously not dealing at arm's length.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not a very strong safeguard.

Mr. Sinclair: I am assured that from the legal standpoint—and I know that is what my hon. friend is interested in—adequate safeguards have been worked out.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are they?

Mr. Sinclair: That is why I said so clearly that while I think I am competent to explain the matter in layman's language to a layman, I should not presume to try to explain a legal point to the hon. member for Lake Centre. I am quite sure the minister will do so when the bill is introduced. After all, resolutions are only expressions of general intent and not details of legislation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There will be safeguards?

Mr. Sinclair: There will be safeguards.

Mr. McLure: Before the resolution carries there is a matter I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary assistant. In the resolution it is stated that it is expedient to amend the Income Tax Act to provide certain things. I should like to mention a particular case having to do with income tax. If a married woman has an income in excess of $250 and under $1,000, the income of $250 is automatically deducted from her husband's exemption as a married man. That is to say, if the wife's income is $750 the husband has $500 taken off his $2,000 exemption as a married man. On the other hand, a widower keeping house, with a daughter living at home, has an exemption of $2,000 as a householder. His daughter can have an income up to $500 and it is not deducted from the widower's exemption of $2,000. This appears to be discrimination in the widower's favour to the extent of $250 compared to the situation of a married man. A married woman's income should be exempt up to $500 before any deduction is made from her husband's exemption. I believe this matter was brought up last year. Then there is the case of the married woman over sixty-five.

The Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member is out of order. We are discussing amendments to the Income Tax Act, not the principles of the act. We are discussing the principles of the amendments.

Mr. McLure: The resolution reads: "Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income Tax Act", I am suggesting amendments, and therefore I do not see how you can rule me out of order. I only have one more item. A married woman over sixty-five can have an income up to $1,500 before being taxable, but in this case any income over $250 has to be deducted from her husband's exemption as a married man. If her income is in excess of $1,000, in spite of the fact that she has an exemption of $1,500, her husband loses all his status as a married man and is therefore taxed as a single man. This certainly is an unfairness in the act that should be corrected. If an additional exemption of $500 is allowed on attaining the age of sixty-five, I believe that $500 should be reflected in an adjustment of the husband's income. The wife who is over sixty-five should have an exemption of $500 in connection with her income before the surplus income affects her husband's exemption, which would make $1,000 in all after the wife attained the age of sixty-five. This situation affects many people, and as a matter of equity it should be rectified. I hope the department will see it in that way; and any change should be made retroactive to 1949.

Mr. Sinclair: As you pointed out, Mr. Chairman, this first resolution has to do with corporation tax. In the second place, my job here is to explain the general intent of the amendments. The points the hon. member has raised undoubtedly would be pertinent on section 9, which has to do with income tax. In fairness to myself, the hon. member read these details—as he had to, when dealing with such figures—from a manuscript, and obviously he would not expect me to remember all the facts and figures he mentioned. When the bill is before the house, however; when we are dealing with the sections concerning personal income tax, and after the minister has had the opportunity to read the remarks of my hon. friend in Hansard, I am quite sure an answer will be forthcoming.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I want to ask the parliamentary assistant for some explanation with respect to the diminishing balance of straight-line depreciation concerning income tax, and perhaps he would tell me when such questions would be appropriate.

Mr. Sinclair: I can certainly tell the hon. member that the best time to ask the questions will be after he has had the bill in his hands and has seen the actual legal provisions contained therein. I am quite sure the minister will be only too anxious to explain anything that may be asked, now that we have had some little experience with that matter.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Thank you very much; I merely wanted to find out when I should ask the questions.

Mr. Drew: I want to mention just one point in connection with the explanations that have been given. As the parliamentary assistant has stated, he does not suggest that he has the legal training to give a strictly legal interpretation of some of these matters. He then goes on to say that he is not in a position to explain some of these details, but that if this resolution is passed now, when piloting the bill through the house later on the minister will be able to give the explanations that are required.

It may well be that the items now before the committee will be adopted without variation, but the motion before the committee is that it is expedient that certain things be done. I submit that we are not in a position to say whether or not it is expedient unless at this point there is some explanation as to why these things should be done. In fact if there is any time when the explanations should be given it is at this point, because this is the time the committee states in principle whether or not certain things should be done. Then the bill carries out the stated view of the committee in clear legal phraseology. For that reason, without raising any meaningless objection, I suggest that this is the time when every explanation that is requested should be given, so that before the committee decides whether or not something is expedient, hon. members may know about it. Then it will be possible for the legal draftsman to interpret that decision in legal phraseology.

Mr. Sinclair: The points raised by the leader of the opposition are the very points I tried to make in my explanation. This resolution actually states that it is expedient to extend our ten per cent corporation tax rate from bare control to seventy per cent control. I suggest that the argument by hon. members today should be directed to whether or not it is expedient that we should stick to bare control or whether we should extend it to seventy per cent, eighty per cent or ninety per cent control. I certainly suggest that at the resolution stage it is not proper for me, for example, to launch into a discussion of marriage exemptions in connection with personal income tax, or the application of the diminishing balance of depreciation. The intent of this resolution is to change the announced rate of last year of ten per cent on the first $10,000 and we must decide whether that shall apply to only one company which is barely controlled, or shall be extended to companies controlled to the extent of seventy per cent or more of the common shares.

That, I submit, is the intent of the resolution. I have tried to explain it in the only way I can, in layman's language, for the benefit of the laymen in the house, who are just as much interested in tax questions as the lawyers are. Certainly I would be the first to admit that I am not qualified, particularly at the resolution stage, to discuss the legal procedure by means of which this intent will be translated into effective legislative action. At various times there has been talk in this house about cutting down on our parliamentary procedure. One of the suggestions has been that we should get away from this resolution stage on money bills. Some are for it; some are against it. I see that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is just itching to rise to his feet—

Mr. Knowles: Just to keep the record straight, I think what the hon. gentleman is saying is confirmed in part by a report that was laid on the table at one time; but that recommendation was to do away with that stage of the debate when the Speaker was in the chair, not with this stage.

Mr. Sinclair: I quite agree; but on money bills we give this extra warning, if I may call it that. It is not just the warning given by the first reading of a normal bill; it is an extra warning, both with the Speaker in the chair and when we are in committee. Hon. members will recall that when the Speaker was in the chair nothing was said about this particular item. At that time the debate on the motion that we go into committee of ways and means covered quite a wide range, but no one mentioned the actual budget resolutions. Even here in committee, when I think we should stick to the intent of the various resolutions, there was a feeling—it may not have been the feeling of the majority—that this was another parliamentary procedure that perhaps was not as essential today as it was in the days gone by.

In any case, I have tried to explain the intent of this resolution, which is to extend this ten per cent corporation tax concession from just bare control to seventy per cent control. I have stated that as soon as these resolutions are passed the bill will be brought down, and there will be at least a week, between that time and the time the minister proceeds with it, during which the actual details may be examined.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Perhaps the hon. member would tell us whether any difficulties were experienced during the past year in connection with evasion of the regulations or the act as it was altered last session. While the parliamentary assistant was telling us about the difficulties and intricacies of the income tax regulations, a letter came to me from a farmer in Saskatchewan which bears out what the hon. member was saying. This farmer points out that the time has come in this country, because of the difficulties in connection with income tax forms, and, as he puts it, the necessities of the times, when some special course on income tax law should be made available in the public schools, so that the farmers would be able to make out their income tax returns and know what the forms actually mean. He said he was referring to the new simplified form that had just come into use. That is an aside, but it does bear out what my hon. friend says, that it is a difficult and abstruse subject. I believe he rather minimizes his own ability when he says he cannot explain the intricacies of the resolution; for he took some time in doing so, and all of us understand what he was trying to say, even though experiencing that mental shortcoming that we have in matters such as this.

The parliamentary assistant has explained at great length the change that is being made. Within the last year, were there any cases in which companies deliberately endeavoured to get away from the payment of income taxes by subdividing?

Mr. Sinclair: The Department of National Revenue has no official knowledge of such, because the returns are only now in for the year. All we can go on once again is the actual correspondence we have had concerning the difficulty in applying our present law to the small business set-up in Canada. Certainly by fall I think the Department of National Revenue will have an accurate picture as to how this tax change affects small business. I want to thank the hon. member for his earlier remarks.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That in order to permit a private company to pay tax on undistributed income so that it may capitalize the undistributed income, the company may elect

(a) to pay a tax of 15 per cent on undistributed income held by the corporation at the end of the 1949 taxation year and

(b) to pay a tax of 15 per cent on undistributed income earned thereafter equal to the dividends distributed from time to time by the corporation during the period when the undistributed income was earned.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps I should speak first on this resolution, because it has perhaps been most misunderstood in the press of the country. There seems to be a suggestion that this is a punitive section, and that it is the intention of the government to tax capital gains. On behalf of the minister I can assure you the government has no intention of trying to tax what are now understood to be capital gains. Mind you, if one pursues in academic discussion what a capital gain is, then the grocer who buys a can of vegetables for eight cents and sells it for twelve cents has made a capital gain. We say, however, that that is his way of doing business. The man who is a speculator in real estate, and who buys a property and sells it at a higher price, has also made a capital gain, but he derives his income in that manner. On the other hand, a man who makes a long-term investment and later realizes on it to his advantage is making the sort of increase in capital which, in the case of the grocer and the real estate man, is regarded as income. These things cannot be spelled out in the law, but have to be judged on the facts of each case.

There has been some suggestion that this resolution has to do with capital gains, but the actual effect of it is the very opposite. Far from being a punitive section, it is a beneficial section, with special effect on private companies. It may have some small application to public corporations, but because of the special financing problems of private companies, which in our present act are spelled out as being companies of seventy-five shareholders or less, it is more applicable to them. These companies have financial problems which public corporations have not got.

There are many men in this house who are in business in a small or large way who know, first of all, how hungry an expanding business is for money. There is no end to the money which has to be poured into a business if it is to expand. Public corporations, of course, because of their good credit, can float bonds and stocks, and have these methods of financing open to them. A private company is practically limited to the plowing back of profits into the company. This practice has been followed across the country as long as we have had private companies in Canada. The second reason why these companies have had to put back into the company an unduly large percentage of their profits rather than pay them as dividends has been the attempt to make the sale of their stock, when necessary, as attractive as possible. In some years they make money and can pay dividends out of profits. In other years they do not make money, but they have to put aside a fair proportion of their profits in the good years in order to maintain a steady dividend. All of you know what difficulty there is in attempting to realize on the forced sale of private company stock.

For these reasons these private companies, much more so than public companies, have had to pile up a considerable portion of their profits as undistributed income. If the principal shareholder should die, this problem becomes acute, because succession duties are levied and the estate must raise the cash to pay them, so the company has to be wound up. Under our present tax laws the entire volume of the undistributed profits must be assessed as income of that year. The company may have been twenty years accumulating that surplus, and yet the shareholders, because of reasons beyond their control, the most obvious one being the death of the principal shareholder, are forced, if the company has to be wound up, to pay income tax in one year at our present rates on that entire amount.

This problem is not new. It was with us during the war, and in 1939 the Ives commission was set up to ascertain in what way, fair to both the crown—that is, the people of Canada who expect to get a fair tax return out of these companies—and to the private companies who in good faith established these surpluses, this problem could be settled. The Ives commission made recommendations which were carried out. They provided, first of all, for a graduated scale of income tax to be paid on this surplus. It is detailed in the Income War Tax Act, section 94. Section 96 of the act gives the sliding rate which varies between fifteen per cent and thirty three per cent, depending not on the total income of the shareholder but on the actual dividend which he got from the company. Of course that is not quite the fairest way, because the actual shares he had in the company might not reflect his total income. A very rich man may have a small share in the company, and he would get by with a low rate. Another man may have his total investment in that company, and because of the graduated scale applied to the actual dividend payable, he may pay quite heavily.

The second thing which was noticed in consideration of the Ives commission report was that many of these payments were tax-free payments, such as payments to other corporations and payments to persons who are non-taxable such as including trustees of pension funds. We thought at this time it would be proper, eleven years after the Ives commission investigation, to bring forward another optional proposal for companies that want to avail themselves of it. There is nothing forced in this. Any private company that wants to do these things can relieve itself of this problem which will occur if it has a winding up. The resolution says that the company may elect to pay fifteen per cent on undistributed income held by the corporation at the end of the 1949 tax year, or it may if it wishes, pay a tax of fifteen per cent on undistributed income earned thereafter equal to the dividends distributed from time to time by the corporation during the period when the undistributed income was earned. In other words, it is a matching provision. Some companies may not care to avail themselves of this provision, but others will. At least we are now opening up an avenue whereby these private companies, with these special financial problems which public companies do not have, can put themselves in shape, if they so wish, to meet the problem which will occur if there should be a forced winding up of the company.

Mr. Fleming: On this resolution a question naturally arises as to its scope. The resolution specifies "private companies". It reads as follows:

That in order to permit a private company to pay tax on undistributed income so that it may capitalize the undistributed income, the company may elect—

—to do certain things. In dealing with this subject in a statement to the house at pages 1217 and 1218 of Hansard on March 28, the Minister of Finance did not make reference to private companies. The expression that he used, referring apparently to the same subject, was "closely-held corporations". There can be closely-held corporations that are not private in nature. Depending on the definition of "closely-held" there might be some private corporations that might not come within the definition of close holdings of stock. I think there should be some clarification of the scope of this resolution. In his statement the parliamentary assistant dealt only with private companies. The resolution mentions only private companies. We wish to know precisely what companies are included.

I was interested to note that the parliamentary assistant dealt with this question of freeing surpluses. There is some ground, of course, for what he said about the relative problem of private companies, on the one hand, and companies that are not private, on the other, as to their sources of further capital. However, when the hon. gentleman refers to certain disquiet in the mind of the public in relation to the intent of this resolution, may I say to him that that disquiet has its foundation in things that have emanated from the Department of National Revenue and from the government.

In the past the impression has gone abroad, and there is foundation for it, whether it was the intention of the government to create that impression or not, that the government proposed to wield the big stick and to compel corporations to distribute surpluses. For example, I refer to a Canadian Press dispatch of January 11, which appeared in most Canadian newspapers, and which reads as follows:

The revenue department has stepped up its campaign to free large surpluses of unused and undistributed income accumulating in corporation treasuries, a government spokesman said today.

There is that mysterious individual, "the government spokesman," who crops up periodically. I continue:

Corporations have been asked to use the surpluses for expansion and development or pay them to shareholders or face additional tax action by the government.

The government move is designed to help keep the economy buoyant by stimulating the flow of surpluses held by corporations for a period of years, the spokesman said.

Corporations showing a reluctance to free the surpluses are being told by registered letter that the department considers the undistributed income as being actually distributed to the shareholders as dividends, and that the shareholders will be taxed as having received this additional income.

This power is vested in the department under federal income tax laws. The spokesman said the corporations, for the most part, are co-operating with the department and the threat likely will not materialize in many cases.

The spokesman said a shareholder certainly would complain to the corporation executive if he were being taxed on money which he did not receive. The corporation thus would be forced either to pay the shareholder the amount of tax charged by the government or else actually distribute its surpluses as dividends.

Corporations which feel they have good reasons for retaining the surpluses are given a chance by the department to state their case, the spokesman said.

In some instances, corporations had put aside money for future building purposes or for purchase of additional property, or for other business reasons.

If they can show that the amount put aside is reasonable and is being put to use as quickly as possible, then the department would give them every consideration.

I have intimated, sir, that whether or not the government intended to create the impression, statements of that kind, and actions of the kind referred to in this government release under the name of threats, have created a feeling of disquiet throughout the country.

Where money is required, certainly it is within the function of this parliament and it is the duty of this parliament to enact laws to impose the burden of taxation, and impose it equitably. It is another thing, Mr. Chairman, to put in the hands of the executive branch of government a power which permits them to say: We are going to pass individual judgment on the way your executive or your board of directors does its business; we are going to say that in our opinion you are carrying an unduly large surplus, and because we entertain that opinion, we are going to require you to distribute that surplus. In the next case the government may look at another business corporation and say: Well, we will not take as stiff a view of your case; we are not going to interfere with you. There is a very great danger in a situation of that kind, where power is vested in the executive branch of government to discriminate between various taxpayers. It is a most serious matter; and when you find that power, which is capable of very discriminatory use, vested in those who talk in terms of threats, it is a matter of which parliament should take note.

I say, sir, that if the parliamentary assistant is right in saying that there is a feeling of disquiet throughout the country in relation to this resolution, it is not, I believe, so much because of the bare terms of the resolution as it is because of the history of what has preceded it. I wish to say simply this in regard to corporation surpluses. If a time comes when there is a severe business recession, we shall be very glad to see corporations that are large employers of labour in this country possessing some surpluses with which to carry on. Where corporations have been denuded of the surpluses which, with prudent management, they have put aside for a rainy day, and they find themselves in a depression or recession of business without adequate surpluses to draw on to finance operations, we cannot expect them to be able to carry on and maintain employment and their business as they would be able to do if they had those reserves to draw on which prudent management dictates should be available for times of reduced business.

There are corporations in this country today, particularly those that are interested in the export of certain commodities, where export markets have been closed to them, that are already very glad to have some reserves to fall back on. What I am saying in general is this: that it is the function of management, broadly speaking, in relation to the needs of a business, in relation to the desire to maintain continued stable employment and the position of the company in the community and the country, to build its stability on the creation of surpluses in good times. All wise corporations are doing it today; and it is the duty of management, in good times, to create that umbrella for a rainy day. I hope, sir, that this government is not going to inject itself, by arbitrary exercise of powers that are open to very discriminatory use, into those situations and say to company A: You distribute $100,000; to company B: We will take a different view of your case; you will distribute $20,000; to company C: We will not ask you to distribute anything. That situation, sir, is fraught with great danger of abuse, and I do urge that a statement should be made on the part of the government reassuring those who are concerned in this matter in all parts of the country that there is to be no wielding of the big stick; that the administration of the taxation statutes of this country is going to be fair and equitable, and that no attempt is going to be made to use powers that are capable of discrimination in this fashion.

I now turn to one other subject which the parliamentary assistant raised in his introductory statement on this resolution. He said it is not the policy of the government to tax capital gains. Then he went on, as I understood him, to suggest that in some respects the tax on income today can be regarded as, in fact, a tax on capital gains.

I should like to say a word or two on that subject. Again a feeling of grave disquiet has been created throughout the country on this subject of the taxation of capital gains, and this feeling stems directly from an authoritative interpretation placed upon the Income War Tax Act by the courts of this country. In his budget speech, as reported at page 1217, the Minister of Finance said:

> During the past year there has been considerable uncertainty in the mining industry with regard to the position of prospectors and those who are engaged in developing our mineral resources. From the early forties onward, it has been the practice to interpret the law as not subjecting to tax gains made by bona fide prospectors and developers in discovering and proving up mining properties. As the house knows, our Income Tax Act was completely rewritten, and the new act has been in force since the beginning of 1949. The new act contains no clear-cut authority for the practice which has been followed during the past decade. The position under the law of these important groups should be clarified, and we are proposing this year to introduce an amendment which should allay the fears of many who have in recent months been concerned about this matter.

I believe the reference there is probably to resolution No. 3. Then the minister continued:

> Perhaps I might also take this opportunity, in view of recent public interest in the question, to assure the house that it is not the policy of the government to tax capital gains. Under any income tax law there is always a very difficult problem in drawing a line between gains which are profits from carrying on a trade or business and those which are not. To my knowledge no tax legislation has ever been passed in any country that has removed all doubts on this score. In England, where our basis of income tax had its origin, the matter has been settled almost entirely by the courts, taking into account the facts in each individual case.

Then the minister adds these significant words:

> Much as I would like to introduce greater certainty, I do not believe that it can be done satisfactorily by legislation.

Then he proceeds, in effect, to put forward his panacea for this problem of disquiet in the public mind by saying that provision is being made for the more expeditious hearing of cases before the income tax appeal board, and permitting taxpayers in such cases to go directly to the exchequer court, if they so desire.

It will take more than the statement of the minister on that occasion or that of the parliamentary assistant today to allay the very grave fears and disquiet created in the mind of the public by recent authoritative decisions as to the meaning of certain expressions in the Income Tax Act. It comes down to this, that what have been regarded by the public as capital gains have been interpreted in a strict sense by the courts as not constituting capital gains but being, in effect, income. Therefore they have been made subject to tax.

In a technical sense the Minister of Finance may be quite right in saying that it is not government policy to tax capital gains. He might be quite right in a technical sense if he were to say, as the Minister of National Revenue said to me about a month ago in reply to a question I asked him when the orders of the day were called, that the government is not taxing capital gains—because the Minister of National Revenue did make that statement in the house. While it may be right in a technical sense, it is not right in the sense in which that expression has come to be understood by the public. That, it seems to me, is the feature of the situation which cannot be overlooked or sidestepped by the government.

The fact of the matter is that gains which have been regarded by people in the mining industry, those engaged in the development of that industry, and also by people in business generally, as being gains in the nature of capital, have now come as a result of certain decisions—one in particular—to be regarded as income by judicial interpretation of the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. Benidickson: I wonder if the hon. member would give the facts of the case to which he has referred?

Mr. Fleming: Yes, I intend to refer to that case, and I would hope that my hon. friend, whose constituency is interested in the development of mining, would have something to say about the case. The decision to which I am about to refer is one which has struck a serious blow, according to my understanding of the situation, at the development of the mining industry in Ontario and in other parts of Canada.

Mr. Sinclair: On a point of order, it would seem to me that we are now discussing resolution No. 3 instead of No. 2. I had hoped this matter would be raised, but I would suggest that the hon. member should continue his remarks on the third resolution which deals with the subject he is raising. In this way we would proceed in a more orderly fashion.

Mr. Fleming: If there is any disorder in the way we are going about it, then it has been due to the parliamentary assistant. I had expected to raise this matter on resolution 3, if my understanding of the relationship between the remarks of the minister, as they appear at page 1217, and the resolution is correct. But it will be remembered that it was the parliamentary assistant who, in introducing resolution No. 2, undertook to deliver himself of a statement about capital gains, and it is this question of capital gains I am discussing.

While I am anxious to contribute as best I can to orderly discussion, it seems to me that the parliamentary assistant having raised the question broadly this would be the proper time for me to continue my remarks. I am half-way through them now.

Mr. Sinclair: I did mention capital gains, but only in relation to this matter of the undistributed income of these private companies. The point to which the hon. member is now referring, where he deals with mining development, is clearly covered by resolution No. 3. If the hon. member wishes to discuss resolution No. 2, and the point as to whether this surplus is to be regarded as a capital gain, as he suggested in the early part of his remarks—and in that he was in order—well and good; but as for making a general speech on the subject, I suggest it should be made on resolution No. 3.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry, and the hon. member continue his speech on the next resolution?

Mr. Fleming: No. May I dispel the erroneous impression left by the parliamentary assistant when he says that I have been dealing with the question of capital gains as applied to mining. I was not confining my remarks to that at all, but rather to the taxation of capital gains in general. I was proceeding to cite a particular case which has to do with a tax of a gain from the development of a mining property, and was doing this by way of illustration of the very great harm that can be done, not simply by the taxation of capital gains in the strict sense of the word, but by completely upsetting the understanding of the public in regard to what is a capital gain.

In view of the breadth of the subject I suggest the discussion ought not to be confined simply to the terms of the third resolution. Having gone thus far in my remarks I cannot help thinking that it would be more orderly to continue the discussion of the subject at this time, and that we would probably save time in the end by doing so.

Mr. Sinclair: Very well, go ahead.

Mr. Fleming: I am anxious to contribute to the orderly discussion of the subject.

Mr. Sinclair: All right.

Mr. Fleming: The case to which I referred is the recent decision in the Exchequer Court of Canada in the case of W. J. McDonough v. the Minister of National Revenue. That was a decision by Mr. Justice Cameron and I think it is one which any hon. member would wish to treat with high respect. At the same time I submit that having regard to the very unfortunate effect that this decision has had on investment in—

Mr. Sinclair: Once again I am informed—I am speaking as a layman—that this case has been appealed to the supreme court, so when my hon. friend says that the decision is most unfortunate I submit that he is out of order.

The Chairman: If the case is being appealed to the supreme court it would be sub judice.

Mr. Fleming: The parliamentary assistant began this afternoon by disclaiming any knowledge of the legal aspects of these resolutions or any intention of discussing them from that point of view. I am not proposing to discuss whether this decision was right or wrong; I accept the decision as it stands. I am simply dealing with the effect of the decision on the mind of the public. I am not undertaking to say whether the decision is right or wrong. I just finished saying that I treat the decision of Mr. Justice Cameron in the exchequer court with the utmost respect.

Mr. Adamson: The department is acting as though it were correct.

Mr. Fleming: It is not my province in this house to quarrel with that decision, to argue whether it is or is not correct. It is not from that point of view that I approach the decision. The basis on which I do approach it is the qualifying words in the passage I read from the speech made by the Minister of Finance in this house on March 28 when he said this:

> Much as I would like to introduce greater certainty, I do not believe that it can be done satisfactorily by legislation.

[Mr. Fleming.]

We who are sitting here as a parliament must take account of situations that are created as a result of decisions delivered in the courts. Having regard to the situation created by this decision we must ask ourselves whether that decision ought or ought not to be redressed in this parliament by legislation. My argument is that it ought to be redressed by legislation. Wherever there is a situation at all comparable with that which was before the court in the McDonough case then I submit that parliament must take cognizance of it and by legislation remove the grounds that have given rise to a feeling in the mind of the public that we have entered a period where capital gains are being taxed, a reversal of the understanding in the past of the business and mining communities as to the basis of taxation of gains.

I think it is quite clear that what I have to say does not trespass in any respect on the rule followed in the house in connection with the correctness or incorrectness of matters before the courts or under appeal. In this case the taxpayer who was appealing had received some stock in a company in consideration of having conveyed to that company an interest in certain mining properties. When he came to realize on part of his stock the government stepped in and proposed to tax him upon it.

Mr. Sinclair: Which part of the stock? That is the key of the whole thing.

Mr. Fleming: If my hon. friend wants me to go into this in great detail I shall be happy to do so. Up until this moment he has been trying to confine me in my approach to this question.

Mr. Sinclair: My hon. friend referred to the decision as being an unfortunate decision. I may not be well versed in the law but I should think that when there is an appeal to the supreme court the fact that a member of parliament of the high standing of my hon. friend has referred publicly in a place where he is privileged to the decision as being an unfortunate decision could not help but affect the standing of the case before the court. Then when he comes to the actual case he does not go into it thoroughly. There were two blocks of stock, the stock the taxpayer actually got for his claim and the stock on which he had an option.

Mr. Fleming: Is the parliamentary assistant trying to make my speech?

Mr. Sinclair: It would be a better speech if I did.

Mr. Fleming: The parliamentary assistant attempts to stop me at one point from discussing the case and then in the next breath says that I should go into it further.

Mr. Sinclair: Go into it accurately if you have to go into it at all.

The Chairman: I do not think it is in order to discuss a case that is under appeal to the supreme court because it would be sub judice. It is difficult for the hon. member to discuss that case without affecting the judgment and I think it would be much better not to discuss it.

Mr. Fleming: I respect fully what you have said and your feelings in relation to it, but notwithstanding the difficulty which the parliamentary assistant has sought to create I wish to make perfectly clear what I am proposing to do. I shall be quite glad to go into the facts of the case in great detail, or to refrain from doing so, according to your direction. What I wish to put before the committee is an interpretation of the law and I can do that without further reference to the facts of the case. I urge upon the committee that the situation is such that it calls for an amendment of the act. That leaves me in the position in which I started. I am not attempting to quarrel with the decision, to argue that it is right or wrong. When I spoke of its unfortunate effect I was referring to the feeling of disquiet and fear that it has created in the mind of the public. Referring to certain authorities, the court said this:

> But the mere fact that a transaction is an isolated one does not exclude it from the category of trading or business transactions of such a nature as to attract income tax to the profit therefrom.

I pass over any reference to the application of that rule to the facts before the court in view of what you have said. Reference is made in this judgment to a statement of the law in another case of which I think parliament ought to take note. It is this:

> It is quite a well-settled principle in dealing with questions of assessment of income tax, that where the owner of an ordinary investment chooses to realize it, and obtains a greater price for it than he originally acquired it at, the enhanced price is not profit in the sense of schedule D of the Income Tax Act of 1942 assessable to income tax. But it is equally well established that enhanced values obtained from realization or conversion of securities may be so assessable, where what is done is not merely a realization or change of investment, but an act done in what is truly the carrying on, or carrying out, of a business. The simplest case is that of a person or association of persons buying and selling lands or securities speculatively, in order to make gain, dealing in such investments as a business, and thereby seeking to make profits. There are many companies which in their very inception are formed for such a purpose, and in these cases it is not doubtful that, where they make a gain by a realization, the gain they make is liable to be assessed for income tax.

I say with some degree of confidence that it has been the understanding of the business and mining communities that gains made on individual transactions in the development of mining properties or the realization of assets, gains from such transactions which are not carried on by traders or people whose business it is to engage in that kind of transaction, were not considered as income gains but as capital gains and therefore not taxable. I contend that the alarm created in the public mind is so serious that its remedy cannot be confined to the limited type of legislation envisaged in the third resolution. I submit that what is required is broader legislation in order to make it quite clear that the investing public, the public engaged in the development of resources, may be able to depend upon a continued application of the law according to the understanding that has prevailed for a good many years. In view of the fact that a decision has been made in the exchequer court to the contrary, that will now require legislation. As I understand it the third resolution offers some legislation, but it does not cover the whole field.

The subject of taxation of capital gains is one that can have the most widespread and unfortunate results, not simply if capital gains are in fact being taxed but even if there is in the mind of the public an apprehension that capital gains are or are about to be taxed. Therefore I urge that this subject be approached broadly in view of the way in which it has arisen and the fear in the mind of the public, and that we have ample legislation now to remove all fear and apprehension as to the result.

Mr. Thatcher: I rise to ask a question. I should like to say first that when the hon. member for Eglinton started to speak I thought I could agree with him almost completely. After his talk for forty-five minutes or thereabouts and going around the matter so much I am so mixed up I do not know whether I can or whether I cannot. When he said that people are concerned about undistributed profits, capital gains, or whatever you want to call them, he certainly hit the mark because it is a matter about which there is considerable concern throughout the country. I have read the resolution as many times as I think necessary and I am still not clear about it. It is still ambiguous even after the explanation of the parliamentary assistant. The clause seems to me to be important, not for what is offered but rather for what it threatens to do in the future. I still cannot see what a private businessman would gain by taking advantage of the provision unless at some time in the future the government is going to tax his undistributed income. The parliamentary assistant stated this afternoon it would allow a businessman to plow back profits. I cannot see that at all. He might as well keep his profits in surplus as have them tied up in capital. What advantage is there? Therefore I say again that I wish the parliamentary assistant would tell the businessmen of Canada in a nutshell how on earth they benefit from this clause. I cannot understand it.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, unlike the hon. member for Moose Jaw I kept notes of what the hon. member for Eglinton spoke about, and therefore I have the various headings of his remarks. First of all he raised the question of the difference in terminology, that I had referred to private companies and the minister had talked about closely held companies. The actual position will be spelled out in the legislation as to those companies with seventy-five or less shareholders.

Mr. Fleming: Will it be confined to private companies of that nature?

Mr. Sinclair: That is the definition of a private company so far as this legislation is concerned. So far as this section is concerned, the definition of a private company will be one with seventy-five shareholders or less.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask by way of clarification whether the expression "private company" will be interpreted here as it is used in the Companies Act?

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Fleming: That is the point. The expression "private company" has a very definite significance both under statute and in the business world.

Mr. Sinclair: So far as this section is concerned, it will be spelled out just as carefully as it is spelled out today in part XVIII, section 94 as to what it relates to so far as the taxation proposals in this section are concerned.

Mr. Fleming: Do I rightly understand the hon. gentleman to say that this provision will not be confined to private companies as that expression is defined in the Companies Act?

Mr. Sinclair: I will answer in this way. It will be confined to private companies as specified in section 94 of the Income War Tax Act. Once again, a private company for purposes of this act is one with seventy-five or less shareholders.

Mr. Fleming: It can include companies which are not private companies under the Companies Act but which have only seventy-five shareholders?

Mr. Sinclair: Quite right. It gets down to the other expression, "closely held".

[Mr. Thatcher.]

Mr. Fleming: It would have been better to use that expression because the expression "private company" suggests something quite different.

Mr. Sinclair: Turning to the next point, I want to speak with as much heat as he did when he read an unmentioned press clipping.

Mr. Fleming: I said it was a Canadian Press dispatch. It appeared in a number of papers, and I gave the date of it.

Mr. Sinclair: He quoted this government spokesman. When the government wants a spokesman the spokesman is identified by name. If there is going to be an announcement of policy the Minister of Finance or someone authorized by him will make it. I know the hon. member does not want to distort things. Having started off by describing it as a press release by an unmentioned government spokesman he then called it a government release. It was not a government release. Government announcements of policy will come from the Minister of Finance.

Turning to the hon. member for Moose Jaw, I will try to explain the matter by saying that if you want to be academic then the purchase of some small article by a grocer for 30 cents today and the sale tomorrow for 40 cents is a capital gain. On the other extreme is the example of a member of parliament who comes here at the beginning of a session and buys a house for $15,000. Four years later, because of reasons which the electorate think sufficient, he may have to dispose of his house and he sells it for $20,000. That is the other extreme of a capital gain. Without any doubt that capital gain is not taxable, but the actual income which comes from the daily or weekly buying and selling of goods and chattels, which is the business of the man, is certainly not a capital gain as the people of Canada understand capital gain. In between those two comes the borderline case, and the whole question can only be determined by the courts on the facts as to where that borderline occurs, whether or not a man is engaged in it as a business or whether it was an incidental investment.

Proceeding further, I will not touch on mining now but will deal with it when the next resolution is before the committee. As fairly as possible I tried to portray the difficulty which perfectly respectable private companies find themselves in when it comes to winding up. If they have accumulated a large surplus and do not know what to do with it there is nothing at any time which prevents them from paying dividends out of that surplus. They can do that at any time, and it is their problem. I want to refer now to another class of private companies, fortunately very small and generally tightly held, which for their own selfish reasons decided during the war, when personal income tax was very high, to pour out just as little as possible in the way of dividends which would of course then be subject to personal income tax. They decided to hold the money back in a reserve in the hope that after the war personal income tax rates would be lower, and then they would pump it out as dividends. Fortunately that has happened very seldom in this country.

Power was given not to the Minister of Finance but to the Minister of National Revenue under section 9 (6) to take action in such cases. Even after a warning was given such companies had the right to state their case. I believe that so far action has been taken in only six cases. As hon. members who follow this type of legislation will realize, after subsection 2 of the resolution is implemented there will have to be substantial changes in the entire section 9 which of course will be apparent to members when they get the bill on first reading. We are not thinking in terms of companies which pile up profits to evade personal income tax but of private companies who have the problem, which I tried to describe in clear terms, of having to accumulate working capital. There is the problem of what they are going to do in the case of involuntary winding up. The hon. member for Moose Jaw, who knows the problems of private companies, says he cannot see any real advantage in this today. All it does is give these companies an opportunity to put themselves in shape against a forced winding up. For example, if tonight while crossing Wellington street on the way home the hon. member were knocked down, I am quite sure his company would be better able to meet the tax on whatever undistributed income his company may have if he chose to take advantage of this resolution—

Mr. Knowles: Take advantage of being knocked down?

Mr. Sinclair:—because, having paid this 15 per cent on the undistributed income, the company could be satisfactorily wound up if necessary because of reasons beyond its control, or even within its control.

Mr. Thatcher: Then would the parliamentary assistant state categorically that it is not the intention of the government at an early date in future to force companies to get rid of their undistributed profits or surplus?

Mr. Sinclair: I am not the minister, though I am very flattered by all these references; and since I am only the parliamentary assistant all I can say is that what the government is doing today is giving these deserving companies who are in this position an opportunity to put their house in order if they wish to do so. No punitive action is being taken. They can do it if they wish, but they do not have to do it.

Mr. Thatcher: Why would they do it? The parliamentary assistant still will not say that in the mind of the Department of Finance, or whoever it is, there is not the idea that they will give us a year to get our house in order and at the end of that time, if we have not done it, we are likely to have undistributed profits taxed substantially.

Mr. Sinclair: I think the hon. member is confusing the report of the Ives commission with this resolution. There is no limit of one year here.

Mr. Thatcher: All I am asking is whether the government is getting ready to do something next year.

Mr. Sinclair: My hon. friend is asking me what is going to be in the budget next year. Hon. members know that even a week before the budget is presented people ask the minister the same question and one can only give them the bland assurance that these matters are under consideration. I cannot tell what is going to be in the budget next year, but in view of the fact that there will be substantial changes in section 9 of the act because of this resolution I would suggest that hon. members wait until the bill is brought down. Then they will have at least a week to study the implications of this resolution with respect to section 9 as it now stands.

Mr. Gibson: Just to go a step further with the happy suggestion of the parliamentary assistant with respect to the hon. member for Moose Jaw, supposing he were knocked down tonight, could his trustees take advantage of this provision after his death?

Mr. Sinclair: The answer is that if he had just one trustee that would be possible. If he has more than seventy-five trustees it is without the confines of this resolution.

Mr. Gibson: But it would no longer be a private company then.

Mr. Jeffery: When the parliamentary assistant first spoke on this matter he compared this suggested action to the first Ives distribution. I see a considerable difference, in that this is not a distribution; it is a capitalization. I think it should be pointed out that this is not money that will be distributed to shareholders. Rather it is money that will be capitalized, and cannot be distributed.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member is quite correct in that observation.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Following the questions of the hon. member for Moose Jaw I want to ask the parliamentary assistant this question. You say this simply gives an opportunity to these honest, small companies to put their house in order. To put their house in order against what? Against what the government may do to them if they do do not take advantage of it? Is that what you mean?

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I think that is the only inference one can draw.

Mr. Sinclair: The answer is, to get their house in order against involuntary winding up under section 9(1). That is where the problem arises. That is the opportunity they have, if they want to do it. If they do not do this, on winding up the undistributed income is going to be taxed as income of that year and, depending upon the income of the shareholder, it may be taxed at a high rate.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then we have it clearly that if one pays the 15 per cent now he is free of all further claims with respect to income tax against what may have been undistributed profits, which may have gone into working capital or elsewhere. If that is not done, however, the statement now is that the government will step in and in one year take this surplus, which probably has been accumulated over dozens of years, as profit in that year. Whether the parliamentary assistant realizes it or not, that is what he has just said. I can quite see the fears in the mind of the hon. member for Moose Jaw, that being so.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member realizes, of course, that this is the law right now, if a company has to be wound up. What we are trying to do by this resolution is what I attempted to explain in my opening remarks; that is, allow a beneficial option which a man can take but which he does not have to take unless he wishes. If he does take it, then on the winding up of his company he will not be faced with these further difficulties. That is why it is so important to private companies, because death does interfere with the plans of those companies. On winding up, then, they are free from this very heavy penalty under section 9(1) as a result of having the accumulation of years suddenly taxed as the income of one year. If they do not want to take advantage of this option, at least they cannot say they did not have the chance; and as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni pointed out, even then their trustee may take advantage of it.

[Mr. Jeffery.]

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Let us say I started a little company, made a little money and put it back into machinery or other capital expenditures. Unless I take advantage of this provision, at the end of the road the government comes along and takes all my investment. It can easily amount to that. They could take everything I had invested in my company, though it was in the nature of capital assets which were purchased with earned money, such as machinery and so on. The government could step in and take it all if I did not pay this 15 per cent.

Mr. Sinclair: Not take it all; tax whatever it would amount to as income received in that year.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Let us assume the parliamentary assistant and I have $100,000 in a company. I would have to borrow my $50,000 from you, I know, but we will assume we have that much invested. Of that amount $75,000 is in assets of various kinds, buildings, land, machinery, movable assets and so on. On winding up we must pay income tax on the whole of that, though it is not realizable, and that means the end of the enterprise. That is a situation which may easily arise, is it not?

Mr. Sinclair: Let us make one real distinction. The $100,000 you are speaking of must be in the form of capital equipment acquired by plowing back profits which have not been declared as the personal income of those owning the company. That would not apply to the original capital, or to any further capital which was raised in other ways.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): But the company has paid the corporation tax.

Mr. Thatcher: During the war years there were no personal taxes on these closely-held companies.

Mr. Sinclair: But that is the law as it now stands. Now we are at least giving them the opportunity of paying 15 per cent on that accumulation, if they wish to take advantage of it, which will relieve them of having that money regarded as income in the year of winding up.

Mr. Thatcher: The parliamentary assistant is getting us more mixed up as he goes along, and I would like to have this clear before we leave it. Perhaps I am a little more stupid than other hon. members; many may agree with that. Nevertheless I still do not understand the reasoning of the parliamentary assistant in the case of a person dying. If a person dies is it not simply a question of paying death duties, or whatever you call them? Could he not protect himself against the eventuality that the parliamentary assistant has mentioned by having a substantial insurance policy? I would think that would be the easier way.

Mr. Sinclair: I quite agree that that is another way if anyone wants to do it. I may point out that if it is a large estate, then the succession duties would be much more than 15 per cent which he would have to pay to clear it in advance. That again is a matter of business choice for the private business concern. Today we are at least giving them some opportunity if they wish—there is nothing forced about it—to put their house in order without taking out insurance.

Mr. Thatcher: Is the parliamentary assistant suggesting that a man must first pay succession duties, and then pay income tax or whatever you want to call it on the surplus—.

Mr. Sinclair: No, I am wrong on that, it is income tax.

Mr. Thatcher: He has to pay income tax on his surplus then, on top of that, succession duties?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): In other words, Mr. Chairman, a man can be very successful in his business while he is alive, but when he dies he may leave nothing but a cause for battle between the succession duty people and the income tax people?

Mr. Sinclair: Getting back to the hon. member's question, I unfortunately used the phrase "succession duties". The succession duties would have to be paid on the capital, but under section 9(1) of the act as at present that portion which goes to his estate in the form of undistributed income is regarded as income for that year, and would be subject to income tax according to the level of his income at the rates for that year, in exactly the same way as earned dividends.

Mr. Hatfield: All that he has built up over a period of years?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, so today we are giving him this beneficial provision, so that rather than face up to that, he can put his house in order by paying the 15 per cent.

Mr. Thatcher: The successful way of dealing with this matter would be by repealing this section 9(1), if that is the case. In spite of all that the parliamentary assistant has said, it still looks to me as though next year the government is planning to bring in a tax on undistributed income if they take advantage of this 15 per cent clause. Nothing the parliamentary assistant has said has dispelled that fear.

Mr. Sinclair: I certainly do not intend to attempt to forecast what the government is going to do in its budget program a year from now. I would suggest that if we repealed section 9(1), then no company would ever pay any dividends. The dividends would be salted away, and then when a firm wound up all of that profit would be capital, and income tax payments would have been avoided.

Mr. Thatcher: They can be caught today without that clause.

Mr. Sinclair: As I tried to point out earlier, because of the points that have been mentioned by the member for Eglinton, the member for Moose Jaw and the member for London, it is quite obvious that there will be substantial changes in section 9 (1) when the bill is brought down.

Mr. Adamson: It seems to me that this is an entirely new principle and a dangerous one. A shareholder in a private company, that is a company with less than seventy-five shareholders, may own 15 per cent of the shares of the company. Throughout the years the company may be able to build up through profits an undistributed surplus of say $100,000. The company in its wisdom plans to use that $100,000 at some time in the future for a project it plans to undertake when the time is propitious. The shareholder owning 15 per cent of that company dies. Under this regulation the surplus in that company which was built up, or at least 15 per cent of it, is considered taxable in the year of death as income.

Surely, that is an entirely new principle. The shareholder has the option of paying 15 per cent of what he may expect the surplus in the company to be, or have his share of the undivided surplus regarded as income in the year of his death. Surely that is a new principle and a wrong principle. It is the principle of a capital gains tax written right into the act.

Mr. Sinclair: Once again I shall try to spell it out. This company has accumulated $100,000 as a surplus. If this company had paid out of its profits each year the full dividends, the shareholder receiving those each year would have paid personal income tax which begins at 15 per cent over exemption. However, for good reasons which I tried to outline, the company has accumulated the $100,000. Now, not under legislation proposed but under existing legislation passed by this parliament, section 9(1) of this act says that the $100,000, representing accumulated profits which have not been pumped out and have not been subject to personal income tax when spread around the shareholders, is taxable when the company is wound up.

Using this example, out of the dividend which is taxable as income, the shareholder's $15,000 would be taxable at income tax rates for his category. Let us suppose the company took advantage of this proposal and paid 15 per cent. The company would then have $85,000 to distribute tax free. That would be his, instead of having to pay at his personal income tax rate on the $15,000. In that case it is obviously beneficial to that man if his company takes advantage of this proposal.

Mr. Adamson: But that is in the case of a company being wound up. I am speaking of the case of the death of a minority shareholder while the company is still in business and proposes to carry on business. It has $100,000 of a surplus, and the man who dies has 15 per cent of the stock. His stock is sold, and it appears to me that under this proposal his estate would be liable. I am glad to see the minister shaking his head. It seems to me his estate would be liable under this clause for the tax on the surplus, whether or not it had been distributed.

Mr. Sinclair: I pointed out that the application of this clause is on the winding up of a company. If the stock of the shareholder who dies can be sold, he is in exactly the same position as the shareholder of a public company who can sell stock. The normal processes continue after that. It is only because of the special financial problems in these closely held companies, when the principal shareholder dies and the company has to be wound up, that this clause is needed. If the ordinary shareholder dies and his stock can be sold, then the position is no different from one who holds stock in a large corporation whose shares have a market value. This section is only applicable on the winding up which is a problem that arises principally because of the death of the one who holds controlling interest in a small company. Then, not only the heirs of the person who died, but the persons who are left in the company, are forced to accept this distribution as soon as the company has been wound up. I think you have followed the illustration I gave. It is obviously to the advantage of the shareholder, in the example the hon. member put forward, to have this tax paid, but there again it is a matter of choice.

Mr. Hodgson: I should like to ask a question. It may not be in order. If it is not in order the parliamentary assistant may say so. Suppose an individual, or a private company, bought a block of land and timber. He does not take a timber lease; he buys the land and all. Of course he buys it on the instalment basis and pays so much each year. It takes every dollar he can make and scrape together to make his payments, which he must show as income. He pays income tax on it every year until he has probably 75 per cent or 80 per cent of the timber cut off, on which he has also paid income tax. He still holds the land and a certain amount of timber that he could take off if he wishes, which would pay for the land. On this land he has some lake property. He wishes to develop that lake-shore property and sell it for lots, but not individual lots. Does he have to pay income tax on the return from that land?

Mr. Sinclair: If the hon. member's case comes down to this— I find it quite difficult to follow it through—if he has bought a block of land for timber purposes, and part of it he later sold, that would be an ordinary capital gain and would not be subject to tax. If on the other hand he is a real estate promotor and does that all the time, then his income from that in that year is going to be taxable as income.

Mr. Thatcher: Just one other question to sum this thing up. I want to make sure that I clearly understand it. Do I take it that resolution 2 is an insurance policy which a man can buy for 15 per cent of his surplus and protect his family from a much larger tax in case he dies? Is that all it is?

Mr. Sinclair: That is pretty well the intent of this bill. That accurately sums it up. Once having paid the tax he has this tax-paid surplus, as far as the winding up is concerned, when this undistributed income is going to be distributed among the shareholders.

Mr. Thatcher: Will the parliamentary assistant state whether the treasury board discussed it at meetings which he attended? Did they discuss whether or not, if businessmen did not put their house in order, as he suggested, this year, next year there would be a substantial change in the budget?

Mr. Sinclair: To begin with, I am not a member of treasury board.

Mr. Thatcher: But you attend its meetings.

Mr. Sinclair: I occasionally attend. Whether I attend or not, there is obviously a pledge of secrecy as to what goes on there, so I could not tell the hon. member in any case. Getting back once again to the question, nobody here is able to forecast what is to be in the budget a year from now. That is why, as hon. members all know, there is intense interest in the budget. Anyway, all I can say is that this is the program of the government, and when the bill is brought down and the hon. member gives his usual studious care to section 9 he will find the appropriate changes being made to accommodate this resolution with the present section 9 of the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Fleming: There is one remark that the parliamentary assistant made a few moments ago that calls for some comment. It will be remembered that when I was speaking earlier I read a Canadian Press dispatch, giving the date of it, and mentioning that it appeared in a number of Canadian newspapers, in which extended remarks were attributed to a so-called "government spokesman." That expression appeared in the press article several times. I invited the parliamentary assistant, or someone speaking on behalf of the government, to disclaim any policy of the kind that was announced in the article. In his reply the parliamentary assistant began first of all by accusing me of quoting something without disclosing the source. Apparently he had quite overlooked that I had said that it was a Canadian Press dispatch, and appeared under a Canadian Press byline. I gave the date and mentioned that it appeared in various Canadian newspapers. In addition to that, without actually making the kind of statement that I invited him or someone speaking for the government to make, indicating to us that the kind of policy outlined in that article was not and is not government policy, he chose to berate any who would suggest that articles appearing in that form, attributed to a so-called "government spokesman," were in fact a form of government release, and said that when government releases were to be made they would be made by ministers, and they would make statements. I do not propose to let that remark pass unchallenged, sir, because every member in this house knows perfectly well that when the government wishes to pass out some publicity, to make a statement without committing itself too far to it, or to fly a trial balloon, they simply put out, through one of their multitude of publicity men in the various departments, one of these statements to the press, and the remarks are attributed to a government spokesman.

You had a very good example this afternoon, sir, of just the way in which the government abuses this method of publicity.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is what you think.

Mr. Fleming: That is what I am telling the minister; and if the article I read this afternoon does not reflect government policy, sir, then I invite the Minister of Public Works to rise in his place and say right now that that article does not represent government policy and never did. Second, I invite the minister—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The only answer I can give—

Mr. Fleming: —to say that that article—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You would not stop for an answer.

Mr. Fleming: I will give the minister ample opportunity in a minute, Mr. Chairman. Second, I invite him to say that that article, ascribed to a government spokesman, was not in fact authorized by any government department or any government official who had power and authority to issue such a statement. If he will do that I shall have some other interesting questions to ask him, either now or on another occasion.

The minister knows perfectly well, sir, and every hon. member knows perfectly well, the way in which the government abuses this practice. If they get something which they think is good—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is all good.

Mr. Fleming:—which they think will be popular, then, of course, the minister will make the statement and will take the responsibility or credit for it. If they think it may not be so popular, if they want to test public opinion, then of course the statement is ascribed to "a government spokesman." I am making this point perfectly clear this afternoon. I am not going to debate this matter further. When the parliamentary assistant this afternoon undertakes to say that the statement reproduced by the Canadian Press, and ascribed to a so-called government spokesman, is not equivalent to a government release, then he is just flying in the face of the facts. As every hon. member knows perfectly well, the Canadian Press would not take that statement and publish it in this form unless it came from an accredited government source. If that is the way in which the government is using all these expenditures on publicity which we discussed recently, then I think it is high time—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I hope we are not going to get away from what is under discussion. My hon. friend is just building up straw men by suggesting that when the government decides on a policy it needs someone else to announce it. I say to the hon. member that when the government decides on a policy there are enough ministers to make the announcement, and that is the way in which we proceed. If you will just keep to what is under discussion, and let the other questions that you have in mind come up in due course, they will be discussed.

Mr. Fleming: It is quite obvious that the minister was not in the house when the press dispatch was read.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am here quite often.

Mr. Fleming: I say this to the minister also: We are discussing the budget resolutions now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Which one?

Mr. Fleming: I was speaking a moment ago of subjects that were discussed in the budget debate, and which are properly before the committee now. If the minister had been in the house he would not attempt to suggest that this matter is not properly before the committee, because the parliamentary assistant has undertaken to challenge this particular press release as being something authorized on behalf of the government.

Now, sir, I am leaving the subject with this parting observation, that it is a pretty fair sample of the way the government plays fast and loose with publicity they put out; and we can ask ourselves at the proper time whether very heavy expenditures for government publicity in all departments are warranted at the expense of the Canadian taxpayers when we see this abuse made of such publicity on the part of the government.

Mr. Sinclair: I cannot let this pass unchallenged. The hon. member is very excited now, as he generally is when he gets worked up. He has left the inference that the Canadian Press was the publicity agent of the government. The government will make their announcements with regard to policy in due course, and the ministers will make the statements, as my minister did in the budget speech. But the hon. member is naïve when he makes the suggestion that a minister should get up and immediately deny any kite flown by the press, because—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Or the opposition.

Mr. Sinclair: Or the opposition—they want to lead these hard-working gentlemen of the press up some blind alley and fly a kite, because they want to challenge the government to put out government policy in advance. Any statement of policy from the Department of Finance will come from the Minister of Finance, and he need not rely upon unauthorized government spokesmen in press dispatches.

Mr. Fleming: Will the parliamentary assistant answer this question simply—because I asked it when I first spoke, if he would say this, or if someone would—will he say that the press dispatch from which I read does not reflect government policy?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member must think I am more naïve than most people. I have just tried to explain—and I am sure other hon. members who were not all heated up were listening—that it would be an easy way to find out future government policy to have the press fly a kite, and then get up and demand that the government either deny or accept this press release.

Mr. Fleming: Supposing for the moment that we have done with the article. As an innocent member I am asking a simple question of the parliamentary assistant. I say, regardless of whether it was a government spokesman or not to whom this statement of policy is ascribed, will the parliamentary assistant answer a simple question, yes or no, as to whether the policy outlined in that article is or is not government policy? It is a simple question; a yes or no answer would be sufficient.

Mr. Sinclair: Government policy today, so far as taxation is concerned, is governed by the present Income Tax Act. When the new act is brought down the hon. member will be able to know what new government policy there is, so far as taxation is concerned.

Mr. Fleming: That is not an answer at all. To call that an answer would be just to insult the intelligence of a schoolboy. If the parliamentary assistant desires to make any progress, then I suggest that instead of ranting, as he has been doing, and thrashing the air with his arms he accept my invitation on that subject we were discussing as to forcing the distribution of corporate surpluses, to say whether that newspaper article—and he must be familiar with it by now—does or does not reflect government policy. It is so simple it could be answered yes or no.

I make it clear to the parliamentary assistant that I do not propose to be given the run-around on my question. It is a simple question, it is relevant to the subject under discussion, and if the parliamentary assistant wishes to give information and wishes to expedite the proceedings it will permit of his giving a very simple answer.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, once again, these resolutions are to give the intent, and either decrease or increase the tax, and the change in regulations which cover any changes in legislation. The present act provides, in section 9(6), that the minister, in his discretion, has this right, which has apparently been used six times. As to whether or not that right, which is not the sort of material covered by the resolution, will be changed, the hon. member will find out when the new act, with the new section 9, is brought down for first reading. And when that first reading takes place will depend, of course, on how long the hon. member wishes to talk.

Mr. Fleming: The parliamentary assistant is dodging a simple question. We came here this afternoon prepared to be thoroughly co-operative and to obtain necessary information.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, we have been thoroughly co-operative. If the parliamentary assistant wishes to give the information, in reply to a simple question, then we will proceed very much more quickly than by having some hon. members opposite—and I sympathize with them, because they do not get a chance to do anything else—murmur in undertones. We will progress faster if the parliamentary assistant will give the information, which is of a very proper and relevant nature—and it is simple, quite simple. I have asked him what is government policy. We have had a statement as to what purports to be government policy. Surely in the face of that it would be competent for the parliamentary assistant to say yes or no, as to whether that is government policy. And if he does not know, then we shall accept a frank answer to that effect, and we shall ask the Minister of Finance—or the Minister of Public Works, who has undertaken to speak for the government on this occasion, I believe. We will ask him to give the information.

I am not going to pick and choose among the ministers. I would just as soon have the Minister of Public Works answer a financial question as any other minister—the Minister of Finance included. I am sure he knows as much about problems of finance in government as any government minister. So I should be very happy if the minister will answer my simple, straightforward, proper and relevant question—if, for the first time in his life, the parliamentary assistant is tongue-tied.

Mr. Adamson: I am always interested in any change or alteration in the English language. I think probably one of the functions of parliament is to call attention to any new usage. On behalf of the committee I should like to inform those who prepare Webster's dictionary that from now on "government spokesman" means "journalist's balloon".

Mr. Hatfield: In connection with a company which has built up a surplus of $100,000 over a period of years and decides to invest that money in an extension of plant: if I own 75 per cent of the stock of the company and die before the act comes into effect, what happens? Are my heirs assessed on the amount of that stock, that surplus, at 100 per cent?

Mr. Sinclair: In the case the hon. member has described, if on his death it were necessary for his heirs to take the money out of the company, then at present their share of the undistributed surplus—not the capital value—whether in money or plowed back into the assets, would be taxable under section 9(1) as income of the year. If this measure is passed he or his trustees have the option of getting that out tax-free by paying this 15 per cent—that is, tax-free, so far as income tax is concerned, on winding up. However, if the company is not wound up and goes on, there is no change.

Mr. Hatfield: Under that act you are forcing the company to sell the plant in which they have invested $100,000. If they have no other capital you are forcing the company out of business.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member has described exactly the situation which caused the request for this resolution, the purpose of which is to ameliorate that condition. It is quite true that if a company had put all its surplus into assets, and was forced to wind up, then on the death of one of the shareholders they were in that very difficult position. Today if they wish to they may put their house in order in the manner described by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, by paying what would be considered an insurance of 15 per cent on the undistributed income of the company.

Mr. Hatfield: Would it not be easier to repeal the present act?

Mr. Thatcher: If we are going that far, would it not be sensible to allow the estate, or the people who are the heirs, to take advantage of the provision and pay the 15 per cent, instead of lumping all income in one year? Is there anything unreasonable in that?

Mr. Gibson: He said that.

Mr. Hatfield: They should not be forced to sell the assets.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member will appreciate that there are two different personalities involved. It is not the individual who pays the 15 per cent on the surplus; it is the company. If for example the hon. member were to die, then before making distribution to his successors this 15 per cent could be paid by the company—even though he could not do it—on the company surplus. Then they could distribute it.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Fleming: I ask the parliamentary assistant or, failing him, the Minister of Public Works, whether the Department of National Revenue in January of this year or since has stepped up its campaign to free large surpluses and of undistributed income that have accumulated in corporation treasuries?

Mr. Sinclair: The answer to that is, "No". Of course the hon. member can direct a question tomorrow to the Minister of National Revenue, not to the Minister of Public Works or to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming: The answer is, "No"?

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, the answer is no.

Mr. Sinclair: The answer is, no, it has not stepped up the campaign, if those were the words used, since February, to force the distribution of surpluses.

Mr. Fleming: Then this report is wrong?

Mr. Thatcher: Would it not be feasible when someone who owned the majority of the shares in a private company died for the remaining shareholders to take advantage of this 15 per cent clause? It seems to me that the heirs then would not be taxed this terrific amount in one year.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps I should let the hon. member for Comox-Alberni answer that because he asked that very question fifteen minutes ago and the answer was that it could be done.

Mr. Thatcher: What is the necessity of having this at all? You told us a while ago that this was an insurance policy.

Mr. Sinclair: There are two clauses to this resolution, it must be remembered.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, there shall not be included in computing income amounts received in consideration for mining properties, by prospectors who have prospected, explored or developed the properties, or by persons who have financed prospectors to do so, other than persons who carry on the business of dealing with the public in shares or securities or who dispose of the shares after carrying on a campaign to sell them to the public.

Mr. Fleming: I understood the parliamentary assistant was going to give some information about this resolution.

Mr. Sinclair: The intention of this resolution is to codify the practices of the department. Since 1940 under the Income War Tax Act the matters covered by this resolution were not regarded as income. We are now intending to spell them out in the act so they will be part of the act. I may say that the mining industry welcomes having these in the act.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Fleming: I am quite sure the parliamentary assistant is right in saying that this has been welcomed by the mining industry. I think everybody would welcome this if it means what we have understood it to mean. It is a little surprising to find that the minister has found it possible to introduce such legislation after he said on March 28, as reported on page 1217 of Hansard:

Much as I would like to introduce greater certainty I do not believe that it can be done satisfactorily by legislation.

Those words were uttered largely in relation to this matter of taxing capital gains. The question arose from just such matters as fall within the ambit of this resolution. If the parliamentary assistant is right in saying that this resolution proposes to codify what has been the settled practice of the department since 1940, how does it happen that the Department of National Revenue took precisely the opposite position in 1949 in seeking to tax gains which under the settled practice he has referred to were always regarded as capital gains up until that time?

Mr. Sinclair: I think I have as close contact with the mining industry in my province as any of the British Columbia members. The general prospector and the mining company which is exploring and developing mining claims is covered by this. On the other hand, we have in Vancouver what we call the Pender Street mining men, and in Toronto I would call them the Bay Street operators. These people simply manipulate properties and buy and sell them in the same way that a real estate company would buy and sell real estate. Somewhere in between the two a dividing line must be drawn. My mail has been filled with expressions of appreciation from prospectors and the British Columbia mining industry, the people who are really doing the development work in British Columbia, that this is now going to be part of the law. On the other hand I have received, and no doubt other hon. members have also, letters from this mining promoter group that they should be included in this and that the gains they make from the buying and selling of stocks should not be regarded as income but as capital. The borderline or the dividing line will be most difficult to spell out, but the legislation when brought down will cover as much as possible and the borderline cases will be matters that may have to come before the courts.

Mr. Fleming: If it is possible to spell out legislation with respect to this particular case then it ought to be possible in a similar manner to enact legislation broad enough to meet other cases apart from mining. If the principle is sound that there should be no tax on capital gains or what the public has been accustomed to regard as capital gains in this instance, if it is possible to have a clear legislative enactment in this instance, then it ought to be possible to do it more broadly and enact a definition of income to make it quite clear that the benefits of the same sound proposals will be available to others.

Mr. Sinclair: The matter will be taken under consideration.

Resolution agreed to.

4. That special deductions from income to taxpayers whose principal business is the production, refining, or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products or the exploring or drilling for oil or natural gas or mining or exploring for minerals, be allowed for expenses incurred in the 1953 operations on the same basis as for expenses in the operations in the years 1949 to 1952.

Mr. Harkness: I presume this resolution covers the same deductions which have been allowed on a yearly basis in connection with special depletion and depreciation allowances?

Mr. Sinclair: That is correct.

Mr. Harkness: I cannot understand the reference that expenses incurred in the 1953 operations shall be allowed on the same basis as expenses in the operations in the years 1949 to 1952.

Mr. Sinclair: This resolution and the one following are on a year to year basis. Special consideration was given to these particular industries last year and we felt that the oil industry had expanded to the point where we could look a little further into the future. In order to help them we told them that the concession would be given for the next three years from 1949 to 1952. We are still going to give it for three years but we are advancing it one year more to 1953. In other words, we are continuing to give them a three-year assurance that this type of benefit is going to be available to them.

Mr. Harkness: I have urged the Minister of Finance for the past four or five years that this legislation should be put on a permanent basis. A move was made in that direction last year when it was put on a three-year basis. As I remember, last year the Minister of Finance said that consideration would be given before the next budget was brought down to putting this on a permanent basis.

Mr. Sinclair: Very detailed consideration was given to the request of the industry this spring. I can assure you that the department is most anxious to give the consideration due to this expanding industry.

Mr. Fair: There is one matter I should like to have cleared up although it is not directly connected with the resolution we are discussing. I refer to the depreciation rates allowed on farm machinery. I have been asked by some of my constituents to find out what could be done when a farmer made out his income tax return at the new rates without knowing that he had the privilege of using either the old rate or the new. Can he write to the district income tax office to have his return changed to the old rate?

Mr. Sinclair: Of course this is a matter for the Department of National Revenue, but I am assured by officials that he can file an amended return and have his rate changed back to the old rate.

Resolution agreed to.

5. That special deductions from income and taxes to taxpayers whose principal business is production, refining or marketing of petroleum or drilling for petroleum be allowed for expenses incurred in respect of deep-test oil wells in 1951 operations on the same basis as for similar expenses in 1950 operations.

Mr. Harkness: I understood the parliamentary assistant to say a minute ago—and I think it was probably a slip of the tongue—that the three-year provision had been extended to No. 5 as well as to No. 4. Of course that is not the case. I should like to ask why it was not extended to clause 5 which deals with the drilling of deep-test oil wells. This provision has been on a yearly basis for some eight years now. During that time there have been a considerable number of requests from oil men in Alberta that it should be put on a permanent basis. The situation as to deep-test wells is that you may start to drill a well this year and as you are going down, in many cases 10,000 or 11,000 feet, you run into difficulties of various kinds. Therefore it may take you a year and a half or more to complete the well. In fact in some cases it has taken more than two years to complete some of these wells. The yearly extension of this provision of course does not give protection to people in that situation. It would seem to me that placing this provision on a three-year basis is, if anything, more necessary than placing resolution 4 on a three-year basis.

Mr. Sinclair: As to the first question, it is the year in which the well is started. If a well is started in one year then they are protected in that year even if it should take a year and a half to drill it. The second reason why it is limited is that such wells are few in number. I think there were only six last year, and the total number all told since the beginning of the legislation has only been forty-seven. They are very expensive wells, and it is a substantial concession.

In Alberta today of course we have greatly expanding production in the shallow fields. There is not the same necessity to have drilling of deep wells today in view of the trouble of getting the oil to market. For these reasons, since there was a small number of a special class in which the expense is very great, it was felt that this provision should be continued only on an annual basis with the understanding that any well started this year will be covered until completion. Last year I remember the hon. member for Comox-Alberni caught me out with a very simple question as to how deep a deep-test well is. I had taxation information but not information of that kind. I am prepared now, however. It is a well at least 7,000 feet deep which has been assessed by the department of mines as coming in this category. In the plains where the strata are flat it is 8,000, 9,000 or 10,000 feet, but in the foothills where the strata are on an angle, and where drilling is more difficult, they take them as low as 7,000 feet. It is a special concession given to a small group, and a group to which too much attention is not being paid today. Because of the great expansion in the shallow fields it remains on an annual basis.

6. That for the 1950 and subsequent taxation years, section 73 of the Income Tax Act, which imposes a tax on income from oil royalty rights held by a trustee as if the trustee was a corporation, be repealed.

Mr. Harkness: Will the parliamentary assistant explain what the purpose of this change is, what the income tax people are trying to get at?

Mr. Sinclair: The income tax people, believe it or not, are actually being helpful in this case. In the old act oil royalties, although they actually are partnerships, were deemed to be corporations and subject to corporation tax. Oil royalties are one of the ways in which Canadians can invest in this field today. Therefore we are now going to say by legislation that syndicates formed for oil royalties are no longer to be deemed to be corporations but to be treated as partnerships as in fact they actually are. Therefore the effect will be most helpful and will be most welcomed in the province of my hon. friend.

Mr. Harkness: If that is the case I am glad to see that it has been taken care of.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Resolution agreed to.

7. That for the 1950 and subsequent taxation years, section 18 of the Income Tax Act, under which lease-option or hire purchase or like agreements relating to movable property are deemed to be agreements for sale and the payments to be purchase price and the purchaser to be the owner for purposes of depreciation, be extended to apply to all property except real or immovable property used in the business of farming.

Mr. Charlton: Will the minister explain this section?

Mr. Sinclair: This is a very interesting section. Again it is brought on by some of the problems of financing these days. I will use the example of a chain store which after all is in the business of buying and selling food. Some of them do not want their capital tied up unnecessarily in real estate, the property they have to buy and the parking space next door. Therefore the practice has developed of some of these institutions, such as chain stores or service stations, selling their properties for a capital sum to an insurance company and then leasing it back under an annual hire purchase agreement. For example, $100,000 is the value of the property. They pay $20,000 for five years, and at the end by a payment of a small sum, $1 or $100, they acquire the property. They may hope of course that the payment of $100,000 will be regarded as rent of the property and therefore deductible as an operating cost of doing business.

Of course that rate would be very much higher than the depreciation on a firm down the street owning a similar property and taking the ordinary depreciation allowed under the law. More than that, if the land is included in that they are actually in effect getting depreciation on land which of course is not allowed under ordinary depreciation schedules. Of course many of these deals are perfectly bona fide. The longer the term of the lease the more closely it approaches ordinary depreciation rates. The present act applies this principle to movable property. Now we are extending it a little further and applying it to immovable property as well, other than that used in farming.

Mr. Harkness: While I understand the explanation, I wonder why this clause has been put in at the end, "except real or immovable property used in the business of farming." Although this provision apparently was put in there to cover the chain stores people and so on, it would apply to everybody except farmers. Why are they specifically exempted?

Mr. Sinclair: I understand my hon. friend comes from a farming riding and I am a little surprised that he should raise that question. I believe he is a farmer himself.

Mr. Harkness: I am asking for an explanation.

Mr. Sinclair: One reason is that last year farmers were allowed to continue taking straight-line depreciation if they so wished. On the other hand, everybody else, other than farmers and fishermen, must take diminishing balance in which there is a recapture provision. That is one reason why farmers are excluded.

Mr. Jeffery: This section says that such agreements are deemed to be agreements for sale and the payments to be purchase price. In other words, in such contracts as are mentioned in this section no allowance is to be made for the deduction of any interest that may be involved in the payment?

Mr. Sinclair: Interest is regarded as a part of the purchase price in that the purchase price is spread over these periods.

Mr. Fleming: The parliamentary assistant has just raised a question about interest and has said that under these hire-purchase agreements interest is to be regarded in effect as a part of the purchase price. This situation has wider involvements and implications, and I think the committee should pause a moment to consider them.

In the Income Tax Act we have provision made for the deduction of interest on borrowed money used to earn the income of the taxpayer. To most people there should not be any difference between cases A and B. In case A the individual taxpayer, being possessed of a certain asset—it may be of the kind referred to in the resolution, the purchase of some equipment—in the course of his operations goes out, borrows money and pays interest on the money borrowed. In case A if the money is borrowed and used in the course of earning the income of the taxpayer then he will be allowed that interest by way of deduction as a business expense. But take the case of the taxpayer B who purchases some equipment, either under a hire-purchase agreement or subject to an existing encumbrance. Suppose he buys property, it may be either real or personal, subject to a first and second mortgage, or perhaps a third mortgage. If he simply assumes existing obligations and pays interest on those obligations, the taxing authorities of this country say they will not grant him any deduction in respect of his payment of interest on account of encumbrances existing when he bought the property.

That is an extraordinary situation, and I wish to express my regret that something has not been done in these resolutions to eliminate that anomaly, which is very discriminatory in its operations. An eminent writer on the subject of income tax asked this question recently in a well known publication:

> If a company buys a building for $100,000, assumes a $50,000 first mortgage and gives a $30,000 second mortgage, it has not borrowed the $50,000 nor the $30,000—

He is speaking now of the interpretation by our taxing authorities.

> —and, therefore, cannot charge the interest on these amounts as an expense.
> Or if a taxpayer agrees to pay $10,000 for a piece of plant, payable $1,000 down and $1,000 a month with interest, he cannot charge the interest as expense. Why? Because he did not borrow the money first and then pay off the $10,000 at once. If he had done so the interest would have been allowed.
> Must all the modern methods of buying assets be revised in order not to have the interest disallowed under this decision?

This very directly affects the farmer. Here is a situation that came to my attention not long ago. Attention is drawn here to an extraordinary tax situation under which a farmer who would purchase machinery and borrow money to pay for it is permitted to charge interest on the borrowed money as a business expense, while the farmer who buys machinery on deferred payments cannot deduct interest on the balance as a business expense; and the same thing applies to other purchases of capital goods.

The income tax appeal board has ruled that a man who bought a garage for $50,000, of which $10,000 was declared to be interest, should be refused permission to treat this as a business expense. If he had borrowed the money from some third party and purchased the garage for cash, he would have been entitled to treat the interest on the loan as a business expense.

That situation just reeks with anomaly. I do not think anyone could defend it as common sense. I must express regret that apparently nothing is proposed to meet that situation.

I refer to the decision in the McCool case by the Supreme Court of Canada last year. The full title is Minister of National Revenue v. T. E. McCool Limited, reported at 49 Canadian Tax Cases, page 395. In that case a situation of this kind came before the Supreme Court of Canada for interpretation; and what I have indicated in my remarks up to the moment is the interpretation that the Supreme Court of Canada placed upon section 5(1) of the Income War Tax Act, which in this respect is in terms similar to section 11(1)(c) of the Income Tax Act. In effect what the Supreme Court of Canada said in that case was that before the money regarded as being an obligation upon the taxpayer would be treated as a loan under that section of the act, so that the amount paid by way of interest on the loan would be considered by the Department of National Revenue as a business expense, there must be a real loan and a real borrower. That is the language used in this report, and I am referring now to the judgment of Mr. Justice Kellock at page 407. Then Mr. Justice Kellock went on to say:

> Here there is nothing more than unpaid purchase money secured by a promissory note which, in my opinion, is insufficient.

In that case the encumbrance had existed prior to the purchase by the taxpayer, and he was not permitted to treat what he had to pay on that money by way of interest as an expense. Then Mr. Justice Kellock goes on to say:

> It is not sufficient to say that if the company had borrowed the amount of the note and paid McCool it would have been entitled to the deduction. However that may be, that was not done and the statute does not apply.

Then at page 413, after quoting the terms of section 5(1) (b) of the Income War Tax Act in relation to the interest on borrowed capital, Mr. Justice Estey said:

> Terms such as "borrowed capital" "borrowed money" in tax legislation have been interpreted to mean capital or money borrowed with a relationship of lender and borrower between the parties. It is necessary in determining whether that relationship exists to ascertain the true nature and character of the transaction. In this case the promissory note arises out of an exchange in which, as already detailed, the purchase price was paid by assuming outstanding obligations, a small payment of cash, allotment of capital stock and the execution and delivering of this promissory note. Under such circumstances it cannot be held that the relationship of lender and borrower in respect to this note exists between the respondent company and the payee of the note.

That decision has been followed in at least one other case since, the Rhinehorne case, recently decided in the exchequer court. This is a situation which I believe demands immediate redress. It offends the ordinary common sense of all people to say that if a man buys subject to existing obligations and as part of the purchase price assumes those obligations and agrees to pay interest on them, and after completing the purchase goes on to pay the interest, he shall not be entitled to regard that as interest on borrowed money and therefore as a business expense, while at the same time if that man made an outright purchase without assuming obligations or encumbrances, and borrowed capital afterwards for use in the course of his business, for the purpose of earning an income, the interest on that borrowed capital may be deducted from his income as a business expense.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Under those conditions I say it offends against common sense to say that in their result the two cases should be absolutely and diametrically opposite in the view of the taxing authorities. For the purposes of that taxpayer the situation to all intents and purposes is the same, but the result for taxation purposes is exactly the opposite. This is going to affect a great many farmers and businessmen in this country, and I urge that the matter should receive immediate attention by the government in order that remedial legislation may be brought down. The proper remedy, of course, is not to deny to the taxpayer in the latter case the right to regard that payment of interest as an expense. The proper remedy is to permit the taxpayer in the former case to treat the payment of interest on obligations he has assumed as an expense within the terms of section 5 of the Income War Tax Act, or section 11(1) (c) of the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member will be very glad to learn that the supreme court decision has been brought to the attention of the government and remedial legislation will be brought down in the bill that will be introduced.

Resolution 8 agreed to.

9. That individuals who were resident in Newfoundland on March 31, 1949, may, for the purposes of computing tax payable by them, elect to report their actual incomes for the whole year 1949 instead of that for the period after March 31, 1949, which is now adjusted to an amount that would correspond to this income for the whole year for the purpose of computing the tax.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the customs tariff, being chapter forty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended, as follows:—

(a) By repealing subsection four of section five and substituting the following:—

"4. The said discount shall not apply in the case in which the duty does not exceed fifteen per centum ad valorem, or in the case of a specific duty or a specific and ad valorem duty combined in which the computed rate does not exceed fifteen per centum ad valorem, or where the rate of customs duty under the British preferential tariff is the same as the rate of customs duty under the most-favoured-nation tariff, or to goods admitted into Canada which have the benefit of reductions provided for in the Canada-West Indies trade agreement, 1926."

(b) By repealing section fourteen and substituting the following:—

"14. (1) The ad valorem rate of duty set forth in tariff item 84, 85, 87, 92, 94 or 95 in schedule A applies to goods specified in the item imported at any time except during a period in which an order of the minister under subsection two has applied the rate of specific duty set forth in the item in lieu of the ad valorem rate of duty in which case the rate of specific duty set forth in the item applies to goods imported during that period.

(2) The minister may order that the rate of specific duty set out in a tariff item mentioned in subsection one shall apply to goods specified in the item in lieu of the rate of ad valorem duty set forth therein for such period during each fiscal year as may be fixed by the minister not exceeding the number of weeks mentioned in the item: Provided, that, in the case of sub-items (b), (d), (e), (f), (g), or (i), of tariff item 87, the minister may order that the rate of specific duty shall apply during two separate periods in a fiscal year but the number of weeks in the two periods shall not exceed the number specified in that sub-item.

(3) The minister may exclude from an order made under subsection two, either at the time of making the order or at any time thereafter, goods to which the order would otherwise apply imported through ports in a specified region or part of Canada during the whole or any part of the period mentioned in the order in which case the ad valorem rate of duty applies to the goods so imported."

(c) By repealing subsection three of section sixteen and substituting the following:—

"16 (3) All such goods imported into Canada after the date of the coming into force of any such order of the governor in council which do not comply with the requirements of such order shall not be released from customs possession until they have been so marked, stamped, branded or labelled under customs supervision at the expense of the importer."

Mr. Thatcher: Is the parliamentary assistant going to make a statement regarding the situation at all? This resolution is rather ambiguous.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, I think most members appreciate the fact that these changes in the customs tariff are quite difficult to follow because, of necessity, they must refer in detail to the item numbers. These resolutions, all four of them, fall into three main categories. First, changes in the tariff brought about by reason of the Geneva and Annecy trade agreements; second, since the act was opened a great deal of cleaning up and removing of deadwood was undertaken; third, there is this section on wildlife which should be kept out of the country. I shall only have time to make a statement on the first resolution.

Section 5 of the customs tariff is amended to discontinue the discount of 10 per cent that applied to goods imported under the British preferential tariff direct into a sea, lake or river port of Canada, in regard to those products in which the British preferential rate is now the same as the most-favoured-nation rate. It must be kept in mind that this discount of 10 per cent, established in the budget of May 11, 1923, did not apply where the British preferential tariff was 15 per cent ad valorem or lower, and this discount never applied to imports of wines, malt liquors, spirits, spirituous liquors, liquid medicines, articles containing alcohol, sugar, tobacco, cigars and cigarettes.

Perhaps I should read the pertinent part of section 5. Subsection 4 of section 5 reads:

The said discount shall not apply in the case in which the duty does not exceed fifteen per centum ad valorem, or in the case of a specific duty or a specific and ad valorem duty combined in which the computed rate does not exceed fifteen per centum ad valorem, or to goods admitted into Canada which have the benefit of reductions provided for in the Canada-West Indies trade agreement, 1926.

During the negotiations at Geneva in 1947, it was claimed by a number of foreign countries that section 5 of the customs tariff was a hidden extension of our British preferential tariff system. The Canadian negotiators were strongly urged to discontinue the 10 per cent discount, and as a compromise it was ultimately agreed that the discount would not be continued on those items where the most-favoured-nation tariff was brought down to the level of the British preferential tariff. The actual effect of it is not very consequential. During the calendar year 1948, Canada's imports from all British countries of goods dutiable at rates exceeding 15 per cent ad valorem, with the same rate under both the British preferential and the most-favoured-nation tariffs, were valued at a little over $3,120,000. During that year our imports of dutiable and free goods from the British countries were valued at over $504 million, of which $182 million were dutiable and over $321 million were exempt from customs duties. I have here a list, it is not a very long list but it is too long to read, of the items which will be affected, that is those items on which the most-favoured-nation rates and the British preferential rates are now the same.

Mr. Green: Could you give us the principal ones, and then put the list on Hansard?

Mr. Adamson: I think the list might go on Hansard, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Sinclair: There are only three principal items, which are as follows: manufactured brass, $330,000—that was the value of the British imports in this last year; cotton clothing, $2,298,000; mixed clothing $422,000. The list is not very long and most of the items are small, but perhaps it could go on Hansard and then members will have it when the bill comes up.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to put the list on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sinclair: The list is as follows:

Imports from British empire countries during 1948 of goods dutiable at rates exceeding 15 per cent ad valorem but on which the rates were identical under both the B.P. and M.F.N. tariffs, the B.P. rate, however, having been subject to a 10 per cent discount which no longer applies since the implementation in the budget of March 28, 1950, of an undertaking given by Canada at Geneva in 1947:

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I have some rather extended remarks to make on this customs tariff schedule. Since it is now two or three minutes to six, will the parliamentary assistant and the chairman agree to call it six o'clock?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Before it is called six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I see we have made some progress this afternoon and we may get through with these resolutions some time during the evening. Last night I announced we would take up resolution No. 3 on the order paper, that is the amendment to the Research Council Act to appoint one more vice-president; that is not very lengthy. Then, I announced we would take up the resolution of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. This is a continuation of that matter, and there have already been fifteen speakers, so I do not think that will take very long.

I would suggest, in all fairness to the house, that if we complete those things before eleven we have three small bills with which we might deal, and I shall name them. One is the act respecting the appointment of the auditors for the Canadian National Railways. The second is the bill to amend the Manitoba Boundaries Extension Act, 1912, and the Ontario Boundaries Extension Act. I understand both provinces have passed statutes concerning the boundary, and they need a bill here to approve those things. There is a third bill, No. 18 on today's order paper, an act to amend the Department of Transport Stores Act. I understand the purpose of the bill is to increase the revolving fund, and to find a way of declaring obsolete a portion of the stores that they have on hand.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Thatcher: I want to make a few remarks on this resolution, but I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant in order to make one point clear. Could he tell me why the Geneva agreements, which were formulated about three years ago, have not yet been passed by parliament? Is there a special reason why?

Mr. Sinclair: Not only have they not been passed by this parliament, but so far as I am aware no other parliament of the signatory countries has yet passed them. As hon. members know, the Geneva agreements have been continued by further discussions at Annecy, and are now going to be further discussed at Torquay this summer. What we are doing as fast as we can is implementing actually in our legislation the undertakings given at Geneva, and these amendment changes are almost entirely because of the Geneva trade agreements.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, in a general way, as far as these customs tariff amendments now before us are concerned, this group is disappointed that the government has not seen fit at this time to proceed with further tariff reductions, particularly against British goods.

The parliamentary assistant and other hon. members will bear in mind that on numerous occasions over the past several years this group has asked in parliament that tariffs be lowered against British goods, so that the British might earn dollars to buy our merchandise, our farm products, and the like. I must say that I am getting just a little bit tired of listening to my goods friends in the Liberal party, in parliament and out of parliament, preach about the need for freer trade, for fewer restrictions, for lower tariffs, while they do so little about them.

The resolutions in front of us today are, in my opinion, a good example of that lack of action. For several years the Minister of Finance has argued in his budget speeches about the need for lower tariff barriers. And he has always admitted the need to help Britain sell more goods in this country. But every time he comes to parliament he has the same excuse for inaction. His reason for inaction last year is to be found at page 1801 of Hansard. He said:

> In view of the pending tariff negotiations at Annecy and other trade discussions which are envisaged, and in view also of the intention to introduce legislation at a later date to implement the general agreement on tariffs and trade, I am not proposing any tariff changes at the present time.

Well, a month or so later he brought down the Annecy agreements, but I am sure even the most ardent member of the government would not say that these were particularly significant changes. Then this year the minister had another reason for not doing very much about the tariff schedules, and I quote from his budget speech at page 1218 of Hansard:

> In view of the important tariff negotiations which are scheduled to commence in a few months' time—

He refers to Torquay.

> —the budget resolutions relating to the customs tariff which I am tabling contain very few changes.

I say this very respectfully. In my opinion the Minister of Finance is possibly one of the best exponents of double talk in this House of Commons. In his budget speech last year he said it was government policy to help British exporters regain their historic share of the Canadian market; and yet in his next breath he announced the reimposition of tariffs against British textiles. Look at his budget speech again this year. He went on for five or ten minutes at page 1218 of Hansard, if I remember correctly, to speak about the need of lowering tariffs. Yet on page 1219, a minute later, he announced an increase of 15 per cent in the tariff against British tinplate. I ask the parliamentary assistant to explain where there is consistency in these words. I ask him to give us more information as to why such a change was necessary.

Today, Mr. Chairman, two-thirds of Canadian exports are going to the United States. That fact is a cause for some satisfaction, but it is also a cause for considerable concern, because since the end of the war Canada has been seeing her usual and traditional markets in Britain, the commonwealth and Europe, shrink. The fact that we have been able to make up for these losses in the United States is probably an achievement. Yet at the same time we are subject to that old danger which often happens when we put all our eggs in one basket. It seems to me that this is what we are doing with our export trade today. The United States is by no means the most stable market in the world. Our past experience bears that out; because overnight, in the past, United States tariff changes have virtually wiped out our markets. An economic recession in the United States has had a similar effect. Therefore I say that since we are selling two-thirds of our exports in the United States we are vulnerable to several things—first, a change in the United States administration; second, a change in their tariff policy, and third, to economic conditions in the United States if they become worse. In view of the vulnerable position which I have pointed out, Mr. Chairman, I think that when the Canadian delegation goes to Torquay in a few months' time they must go there with that in mind.

I was interested in an article which appeared in the Financial Post about a week ago. It was written by Kenneth Wilson. I should like to quote it:

> A new battle over what's left of the empire preferential tariff system now looms for 1950-51 as 40 nations begin preparations for the full-dress trade negotiations scheduled for Torquay, England, next September.
> Canada has very few important preferences left to negotiate. But United Kingdom and empire preferences in the Canadian market are still substantial.
> These will be under heavy attack at Torquay, especially by European countries.

I am one who believes in freer trade, but I am also one who believes that we should guard these commonwealth preferential tariffs with a degree of care.

It seems to me that diverse markets are safer markets. Any action which would further increase our economic dependence upon the United States at this time is, in my view, to be viewed with concern. It is possible that the government may make a grievous mistake if it goes to Torquay and agrees to scrap commonwealth preference.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that Canada's No. 1 trade problem is still to regain our markets in Europe, to regain our commonwealth markets, to regain our markets in Britain. British leaders have told us repeatedly that there is only one way to do that, namely, to let them sell more in this country so that they can earn Canadian dollars. One of my criticisms of the customs tariff regulations which are now before us is that the government has been apathetic in this respect. The government has been lax in watching the British buyers gradually choked out of the Canadian market through their lack of dollars. If our main problem so far as tariffs is concerned is to get back some of these commonwealth markets, then I view with concern certain tendencies which seem to me to be prevalent in this country. Protectionists of various kinds seem to be more active. Not so long ago dumping duties were applied against certain Japanese textiles. I read in the newspapers that interests in British Columbia in the cement business are asking for dumping duties against Japanese cement. I heard this afternoon in the house, I believe it was the hon. member for Norfolk, ask for protection against strawberry pulp coming from Holland. These applications are bad enough, but there is one which should concern this house in particular. At page 1904 of Hansard I asked the Minister of National Revenue whether or not any application had been received for dumping duties against small English cars, and his answer was, "Yes." I then asked him what disposal had been made of such requests, and he answered, "The matter is under consideration." Mr. Chairman, I am amazed that a government which professes to believe in freer trade would consider for more than ten minutes such a high-handed request, because for several years our government has been urging British manufacturers to get their prices down and to become competitive, so that they can sell in this market. Apparently the British automobile manufacturers have been successful in doing that because they are able to bring their cars here, pay freight on them, pay sales tax and still compete.

Now, the automobile manufacturers, I presume, want dumping duty protection. I would remind the government of two things: first that Canadian cheap cars have roughly doubled in price since 1939, and secondly, that the Canadian automobile industry today has almost complete protection from American competition, (a) because of the tariff, (b) because of exchange differences and (c) because of import quotas. There is virtually no American competition, so far as Canadian cars are concerned.

Therefore I say that the request, whomever it is from, a short sighted, narrow-minded request made on the basis of self-interest. If Canadian automobiles are entitled to dumping duty protection, or to additional tariff protection, whichever you choose to call it, then every other industry in Canada in a similar position is entitled to the same protection.

Of course, if that protection were brought in, it is obvious what would happen to our trade with Great Britain. The whole proposition I say is absurd. If the Canadian automobile industry want to sell more cars in Canada, then let them get their prices down. Let them compete. I am sure the average Canadian consumer would welcome such a decrease in the cost of living.

Mr. Chairman, I refer to all pressure cases of this kind. I think they come at a most inopportune time—coming as they do a few months before the free nations of the world meet at Torquay to discuss eliminating trade restrictions and lowering tariffs generally. I think there are few things that would darken the prospects at Torquay as much as Canada's coming forward with further protectionist measures at this time.

This nation has to depend for its prosperity upon lower tariffs and upon fewer restrictions. To raise barriers just before an international effort to lower them would be, in my opinion, an act of economic folly. I hope the parliamentary assistant will give more information about these dumping duties. What is the policy of the government going to be in future? I wish he would give some assurance to the people of Canada that, so far as British automobiles are concerned, there is not going to be the imposition of any dumping duty.

In conclusion I wish to urge the government once again to translate some of its lofty words in the house and elsewhere about freer trade into some concrete action. Hon. members in this group realize, I think, as do members in other groups, that upon freer trade rests the best assurance for Canada to avoid a recession in the immediate future.

Mr. Wright: Before the parliamentary assistant replies I should like to second the comments of the hon. member for Moose Jaw with respect to these tariffs. There is just one further point I would bring to the attention of the committee, and that is a point which is brought out in the Auditor General's report. At page 11 we find in section 39 the heading, "Tariff items and customs drawback", and it states:

> The governor in council may, from time to time, and in the manner hereinafter provided, in addition to the other purposes and matters in this act mentioned, make regulations for or relating to the following purposes and matters:

(1) granting a drawback of the whole or part of the duty paid on articles which have been used in Canadian manufactures, or granting a certain specific sum in lieu of any such drawback.

And then at page 12 we find the Auditor General's comment with respect to P.C. 4793 passed by the governor in council on October 22, 1948——providing drawback of 99 per cent of customs duty paid on certain imported steel sheets, when used in the manufacture of stampings for automobiles.

Here we have a case where the government is giving a 99 per cent drawback to the manufacturers of automobiles in this country on certain types of steel being imported into Canada. At the same time the manufacturers come to the government asking for dumping duties on English cars, when they have American cars completely barred from the market. I am asking the parliamentary assistant what protection the buyers of cars have in this country. Who is getting the benefit of this 99 per cent drawback the manufacturer is getting on customs duties in connection with the steel used for the stampings going into the manufacture of cars in this country? It certainly is not the buyer, when we find that the same car, exactly, is selling for $400 or $500 more than it is in the United States, while at the same time the workman in the United States factory is receiving from 30 to 40 per cent more in wages than is the man doing the same work in the Canadian factory.

When the governor in council passed this order in council giving the drawback of this duty, what action was taken to see that that drawback is passed on to the Canadian consumer in the price of the goods the manufacturer makes out of the article on which he has received the drawback?

Mr. Sinclair: I shall deal first with the points raised by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. He has asked why we do not make further reduction in the British tariff at the present time. Under the Geneva trade agreements any reductions we now give the British we have also to give to all the other signatory nations. That is the basic principle of the entire Geneva agreement. We certainly are not going to do that until we have reciprocal concessions from them. That is another reason why we are not making any of these concessions before the meeting at Torquay. It is easy to ask these concessions for other countries, but I think industry in this country is also entitled to some reciprocal arrangement to assist them.

The next point, so far as the British tariff is concerned, is a most interesting one. The figures I gave earlier this afternoon show to what extent we have opened the door to the British. Last year our total imports from British countries were valued at $504 million of which $321 million, or over three-fifths, were exempt from customs duty. I think that is a pretty fair break, so far as the British market is concerned.

Then, the next point: so far as cars are concerned, British cars enter today free from customs duty. American cars are subject to—

Mr. Thatcher: But there is a sales tax.

Mr. Sinclair: And also a sales tax on Canadian cars. I do not think anyone would say that British cars should be sold in this country and not pay the same tax in that way as do Canadian cars. We put them all on the same footing in this country as our Canadian cars. American cars, on the other hand, pay a duty of 17 per cent on admission to Canada.

The next point he mentioned was that of tinplate. I should like to make a special reference to tinplate when discussing resolution 3. This is the only item since 1936 on which we have raised a tariff; and when the actual reasons are given, and when the figures are known, hon. members will realize how inconsequential it is.

Then there is the matter of the alarm raised by the hon. member because the government has given consideration to a proposal put forward by an industry in this country. I hope that day will never come when the government will not be willing to listen to the representations put forward by any industry, whether it accepts them or not. Of course the automobile industry, like every other industry in Canada—like the farmers in Canada and the fishermen in Canada—would naturally like to have special protection for their industry. When these requests are put forward the government has to give them full consideration and then, in due time, announce a policy with regard to them.

The last point was the one raised by the hon. member for Melfort with respect to this drawback on drawn steel used in the manufacture of stampings for automobiles. This item has been in the tariff since 1930, making provision for steel sheets, hot or cold rolled, or coated with lead or with lead and tin, ·064 inch to ·032 inch in thickness, 20 to 42 inches in width and 50 to 120 inches in length, if imported and used in the manufacture of stampings for automobiles, giving a 99 per cent drawback. The reason is that at that time we did not manufacture such sizes. The only change that has been made is made because of a difference in design. I am informed that because of the extra width of the present bumpers and fenders on the new cars these coated steel plates are now allowed in from twenty to fifty inches rather than the previous widths of twenty to forty-two inches and fifty to one hundred inches. That is the only difference in a tariff item which has been in effect since 1930.

As far as these drawbacks are concerned, naturally when a drawback is allowed the saving should go on down to the consumer. If the drawback was not allowed then I imagine the consumer buying that car would have to pay for the duty as well. Apparently what caused the comment by the Auditor General was that the change to increase the width of the plates from forty-two to fifty inches to provide for the extra length of bumpers was done by order in council.

Mr. Thatcher: Can the parliamentary assistant state whether the government is still considering this question of dumping duties? They were considering it some weeks ago and I was wondering if any decision has been reached. Can the parliamentary assistant also tell the committee which company or companies made the request?

Mr. Sinclair: The request was made to the Minister of National Revenue, not to the Minister of Finance. I cannot give the hon. member any information at the moment. I am sure the Acting Minister of National Revenue will be glad to give him that information.

Mr. Wright: The parliamentary assistant did not answer my question very fully. He said that this drawback was permitted in 1913. At that time the United States cars were coming into Canada in competition with Canadian cars, but now the importation of United States cars is under certain restrictions. The government should see to it that when a drawback is permitted on materials going into Canadian cars the benefit should be passed on to the consumer. This drawback is not being passed on at the present time or our cars would not be costing from $400 to $500 more than United States cars.

Mr. Sinclair: There are two points to consider. If the sheets were available in Canada the item would not be there and, secondly, if this drawback was not paid I think you know what would happen. Today Canadian cars are in keen competition, and if we did not allow this drawback on goods not made in Canada then the cost of our cars would be raised up by that amount.

Mr. Thatcher: I understand that dumping duties are part of the customs tariff schedule. That being the case I do not understand why the parliamentary assistant should refuse to give the information I asked for a moment ago. If he cannot give it, I suppose we shall have to wait. Perhaps his adviser would be able to give this information.

Mr. Sinclair: The Minister of National Revenue said that the government is giving this matter consideration. This would be just one of the many briefs which the department receives during the year on taxation matters. When a decision is reached the hon. member will have an answer. Just because an application has been made by an industry for a tax reduction should not cause the hon. member to assume that it is going to be granted.

Mr. Thatcher: Are dumping duties not part of the customs tariff schedule?

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member is quite correct, but this is a problem of administration by the Department of National Revenue. The items under discussion here represent changes in the customs tariff which the hon. members are free to discuss.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary assistant a matter which is of importance to a large number of Canadians. I have been interested in the fact that there has been a 20 per cent duty against penicillin since some time in 1947. I asked the following question about this some time ago:

1. Has a tariff been imposed on penicillin? If so, what is the rate of such tariff and when was it first given effect?

The answer received from the Department of National Revenue was as follows:

Yes. The present rate of 20 per cent M.F.N. has been in effect since April 1, 1947.

My second question was:

What was the value of penicillin imported into Canada for the years 1945-46-47-48-49?

The answer by the Department of Trade and Commerce was as follows:

Penicillin was not separately classified in Canadian trade statistics prior to January 1, 1949. Imports of penicillin and products during the calendar year 1949 were valued at $1,507,456.

We are charging a 20 per cent duty on a very necessary drug while under the third resolution to amend the Excise Tax Act we are providing for the removal of the sales tax from a number of articles and materials used by bona fide public institutions certified to be such by the Department of National Health and Welfare. I heartily agree with that because we are doing something commendable to reduce the cost of hospital administration and expense.

I do suggest that it is most unfortunate that we should continue to impose this 20 per cent customs duty on a necessary drug like penicillin. In going over the schedule at the back of these resolutions I find that there is a 20 per cent tariff against rough granite and a 25 per cent tariff against bagpipes. As far as I am concerned you could put 100 per cent on bagpipes and take it off penicillin. I notice that castor oil comes in free.

When you consider the customs tariff it is hard to see the logic of some of these items. When the parliamentary assistant answers my question I should like him to explain the 25 per cent duty on bagpipes and the 20 per cent duty on penicillin.

Penicillin is used to fight infection, and in this connection it has been used with great success in recent years. It is good for colds, pneumonia, bone diseases and other infections with which hon. members may be familiar.

I am informed by my doctor that where a patient is suffering from pneumonia he may require five or six injections daily for as long as three weeks at a cost of about $5 per day. The 20 per cent tariff on penicillin is an added burden on people who are sick and who can ill afford to pay the cost of this drug.

I should like to know the amount of penicillin manufactured in Canada and why this 20 per cent tariff is placed on such a necessary drug. I should like the parliamentary assistant to use his influence to have this duty on penicillin removed and thus lower the cost of medical treatment, just as we are doing under resolution No. 3 to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Bryce: I do not rise to defend bagpipes, as some people might expect I would. Even though there might be a 100 per cent duty against bagpipes coming in, they will still flourish. I support what the hon. member for Kootenay West has said. I think it is a shame that people should have to pay a duty on penicillin. I am not talking about this from a medical point of view; I am talking as one who has had to pay for it. I had to pay for it for twenty-seven weeks and when you have poor people like myself in that position it is quite a drag on them. From what doctors tell me this appears to be one of the finest things ever discovered. I join with the hon. member who has just spoken in urging that this 20 per cent duty be taken off this drug. I do not see how you can justify that. It is something for suffering humanity and you should let it in if it is at all possible.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps I should say a word. Penicillin comes under section 2 of the resolution. After seeing on the order paper the question of the hon. member for Kootenay West I made it my duty to get a very full answer for him which I will give at the proper time. Just to clear the air, so far as bagpipes are concerned, if they are brought in from the United Kingdom—and I would hope they would be brought from there—they come under the item brass band instruments of a class or kind not made in Canada; bagpipes and complete parts thereof, British preferential tariff, free. The most-favoured-nation tariff—I do not know what other nation would care to make them—is 25 per cent and the general tariff is 25 per cent.

Mr. Bater: Reverting to cars, is the devaluation of the pound the reason why British cars are coming in free at the present time?

Mr. Sinclair: No; British cars have come in free for many years. The devaluation of the pound has been a great help to the British since their currency was devalued more than ours. That has been one reason why they have been able to come into this market, but the freedom from tariff was in effect long before devaluation.

Mr. Knight: It may be a far cry from penicillin to fire equipment but I think the discussion arises because of the attitude of the government in keeping out of the country, by means of a prohibitory tariff, things which are necessary for the preservation of human life. I have been interested in this question for a year or two. Can the parliamentary assistant give us figures first as to the amount of the prohibitory tariff, and second the amount of such fire prevention equipment that is imported into this country? We constantly read of disasters affecting human life being caused in part at least through defective fire equipment or the absence of equipment altogether. I remember taking part in a debate once when the Minister of National Defence was concerned and he said that in his opinion the prevention of fires in Canada was an integral part of national defence.

That being so, and in view of the argument I have advanced that many municipalities have suffered disasters through loss not only of human life but also of property, I think that something should be done. If there is any way in which the government can facilitate a plentiful supply of equipment being made available in Canada to protect the lives and property of its citizens from fire, I think the government should take those steps. I do not think any government should desire to profit by putting a tariff on such items. In that way I think the matter is linked with penicillin and other drugs which people need in these times. What is the good of these things being in existence if people are prohibited from using them? To my mind it is undemocratic because it simply means that people who can afford these expensive medicines are in a position to have them while those who are not must do without. In the same way the poorer municipalities have to do without the means for fighting fire.

Mr. Sinclair: Of course fire engines do not come under resolution 2(a) now under discussion. While I have all the details connected with the amount and production of the things which are affected by these changes covered by these resolutions, I obviously cannot give my hon. friend at the moment the figures on the amount of fire equipment which is made in this country or imported. I can tell him, however, that under tariff item 424 fire engines and other fire extinguishing machines and chassis for same, complete parts other than chassis parts, are imported free from Great Britain. There was a 30 per cent tariff on them for most favoured nations which has been reduced by the Geneva agreement to 25 per cent, and there is a 35 per cent tariff for other nations. I would point out that perhaps this is an indication of the policy which his colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw, wants. He wants the British to have the edge on other countries, and we give them that edge by admitting fire equipment free from Great Britain and with a 25 per cent duty from the United States.

Mr. Thatcher: Is the parliamentary assistant in a position to tell the house tonight whether the Canadian delegation which will be going to Torquay will use the commonwealth preference tariff schedule as a bargaining point, or anything else? Is there any intention of scrapping that, or am I premature in asking that question?

Mr. Sinclair: Obviously a parliamentary assistant is not in a position to answer questions like that. I suggest that the hon. member direct his question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. McIvor: On a point of order, I think the parliamentary assistant has enough to do to look after one department without having to answer questions on two or three.

Mr. Thatcher: This is his department. I would suggest that he should not be piloting these resolutions unless he has the information.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): On behalf of the farmers, as possibly you might gather, may I say that I am learning things in the house every day, and I think possibly I can learn more. Being a farmer I always thought that, so far as tariffs and dumping duties were concerned, all the farmer needed to do was to pay them. I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant how the farmer benefits from dumping duties and tariffs.

Mr. Sinclair: If the hon. member will wait until we get to 1(b) I will give a very practical illustration because the change in 1(b) in connection with the importation of vegetables is pertinent to the question he has just asked.

Mr. Wright: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant if, when purchasing supplies, provincial governments are exempt from paying duties on their purchases.

Mr. Sinclair: No, neither the provincial governments nor the federal are exempt. It is only on sales and excise taxes within the country that exemptions are extended.

Mr. Wright: There is no rebate of the customs duty?

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Paragraph (a) of resolution 1 agreed to.

(b) By repealing section fourteen and substituting the following:

"14. (1) The ad valorem rate of duty set forth in tariff item 84, 85, 87, 92, 94 or 95 in schedule A applies to goods specified in the item imported at any time except during a period in which an order of the minister under subsection two has applied the rate of specific duty set forth in the item in lieu of the ad valorem rate of duty in which case the rate of specific duty set forth in the item applies to goods imported during that period.

(2) The minister may order that the rate of specific duty set out in a tariff item mentioned in subsection one shall apply to goods specified in the item mentioned in lieu of the rate of ad valorem duty set forth therein for such period during each fiscal year as may be fixed by the minister not exceeding the number of weeks mentioned in the item: provided, that in the case of sub-items (b), (d), (e), (f), (g), or (i) of tariff item 87, the minister may order that the rate of specific duty shall apply during two separate periods in a fiscal year but the number of weeks in the two periods shall not exceed the number specified in that sub-item.

(3) The minister may exclude from an order made under subsection two, either at the time of making the order or at any time thereafter, goods to which the order would otherwise apply imported through ports in a specified region or part of Canada during the whole or any part of the period mentioned in the order in which case the ad valorem rate of duty applies to the goods so imported."

Paragraph (b) of resolution 1 agreed to.

(c) By repealing subsection three of section sixteen and substituting the following:

"16. (3) All such goods imported into Canada after the date of the coming into force of any such order of the governor in council which do not comply with the requirements of such order shall not be released from customs possession until they have been so marked, stamped, branded or labelled under customs supervision at the expense of the importer."

Paragraph (c) of resolution 1 agreed to.

2. Resolved, that schedule A to the customs tariff be amended by striking thereout tariff items 16, 17, 28b, 77 99e, 101b, 206a, 208v, 209d, 446h, 480a, 520c, 558b (a) and (b), 558d (a) and (b), 605a, 607, 696a, 705, 705a, 709 (a) and (b), 779 and 779a, the several enumerations of goods respectively and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of the said items, and by inserting the following items, enumerations and rates of duty in said schedule A:

Mr. Sinclair: Since penicillin has been mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay West, perhaps I should give a fairly full explanation of the situation because it is one which is naturally of very great concern to the people of Canada. Our present tariff item 206a(1) provides for duty free entry from all countries of serums, antitoxins, viruses, toxins, toxoids, vaccines and allergenic products, n.o.p., for parenteral administration in the diagnosis or treatment of diseases of man. There is a second section applying the same thing to animals.

Last June a United States company entered two importations of penicillin S-R, duty free, under tariff item 206a at the port of Windsor, Ontario. On July 15, 1949, the importer was advised by the Department of National Revenue that antibiotics including penicillin were not considered to be biological products, and were dutiable under tariff item 711, the item covering unenumerated goods, at the most-favoured-nation rate of 20 per cent. The importer appealed this ruling to the tariff board and the appeal was heard by the board on October 4, 1949. It is to be noted that tariff item 206a covered biological products. These products, however, were limited to those for parenteral administration—I looked up that word, and it means an injection under the skin—and to those manufactured under licence of the Department of Pensions and National Health, now the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The tariff board rendered its decision, which was actually in favour of penicillin being admitted duty free, with one dissenting opinion. The deputy minister of national revenue has now announced that he intends to apply to the Exchequer Court of Canada for leave to appeal from the decision of the tariff board on questions of law.

It was quite apparent, therefore, that the wording of tariff item 206a was too ambiguous to be continued in its present form, and it is now proposed to revise the wording to specify by name the products this item was originally intended to cover. As the minister stated in his budget speech, he is going to refer the whole question of antibiotics to the tariff board for investigation and report under part I of the Tariff Board Act. It is felt that the present wording will meet this situation until the report of the board is tabled in parliament. Penicillin will therefore continue, as in the past, to be dutiable under tariff item 711 at the rate of 15 per cent under the British preferential tariff and 20 per cent under the most-favoured-nation tariff.

Now I want to go on to the next part. When penicillin was first developed, during the middle years of the war, the manufacture was started by the Americans to begin with, and we found we could not obtain penicillin from the United States sources. So as a matter of national security we encouraged the construction of laboratories in this country to undertake the manufacture of penicillin. These companies started operations in Canada in 1943; and when we speak of prices it is very interesting to see what happened to the price of penicillin and other antibiotics produced by these companies since that time. In 1943 they offered penicillin to the government at a price of $20 per 100,000 units. By 1944 the price had fallen to $7 per 100,000 units. Today the price to hospitals has been lowered to 19 cents per 100,000 units in 100,000-unit vials, or 12 cents per 100,000 units in the million-unit vials. I think it is very definitely in the national interest that the manufacture of penicillin and other antibiotics, such as streptomycin, be continued in this country, and so some protection is deserved.

I have the figures here as to production. I will not name the companies, but of the three producing these antibiotics the value of the penicillin produced last year in one case was $768,000, in another $2 million and in the third $160,000. Two of the three companies produced other antibiotics, the value of production of one amounting to $2,323,000 and of the other to $64,000 making a total production worth $5,310,000 in this country, adequate to supply our own needs and actually leaving enough for export to the amount of $1,829,000.

In the past penicillin was classed under tariff item 708, not as one of these biological products. This American company made a test case of it. All we are doing now, pending full investigation by the tariff board, is to continue in law what has been the practice. That is being done for two reasons, first because it has been the practice and second to protect this very important industry which has grown up in Canada, which was developed at a time when we could not get penicillin from outside sources, and which is adequate to meet our present needs. More than that, I believe the fact that the price has fallen from a high of $20 per 100,000 units in 1943 to a low of 12 cents to hospitals in 1950 is an indication that we have secured good results under this policy.

Mr. Adamson: Can the minister say why penicillin is still under prescription, why it cannot be bought without a prescription? I have been asked this question many times. It comes in certain strengths, but apparently a prescription is still necessary.

Mr. Sinclair: I cannot give the answer as far as the medical end is concerned. One of the difficulties with penicillin, of course, is the fact that it deteriorates very quickly. One of the reasons this United States company was so anxious to dump penicillin in this country was this price war in the United States, and also a desire to get rid of a surplus of deteriorated penicillin. However, I think the Minister of National Health and Welfare would be a better person to ask why penicillin is still sold only by prescription.

Mr. Adamson: Can the minister say what was the price of penicillin to hospitals in the beginning?

Mr. Sinclair: All the penicillin the hospitals got in 1943 came through the government, and the government bought it at $20. At that time penicillin was used only in military hospitals, because of short supply.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the parliamentary assistant if he is in a position to give us a brief analysis of the changes made in the tariff schedules? Those changes seem to be very few, and I wondered if there was a brief analysis available.

Mr. Sinclair: The only actual change in the entire schedule is the change in tinplate. That is the only instance in which there is a tariff increase.

Mr. Knowles: Then may I ask whether there are items in these schedules now before us in which there is no change at all, or is there in some instances a change in the designations?

Mr. Sinclair: There are many changes in numbers. I just gave an example. Item 206a included these biological products for injection into human beings, and a second section of the same item covered products for injection into animals. That now has been separated into two sections. Another example is potassium chlorate. There was a change in the tariff schedule in 1933, and the item read "all potassium chlorate imported into the country after July 1, 1933." That deadline is still carried in the tariff schedule, though obviously it is of no significance seventeen years later; and that has been removed. The greater part of this job is cleaning up things like that, the exceptions being the gums and tinplate in the next section.

Mr. Knowles: In other words there has been some change in every item in the schedule, even if it is only the number of the items?

Mr. Sinclair: That is quite right.

Mr. Thatcher: Regarding the tinplate item—

Mr. Sinclair: That is the next section.

Mr. Murray (Oxford): If I may enlighten the hon. member for York West, as one who has retailed penicillin for a goodly number of years, I may tell him that penicillin is available to the public in a strength up to 3,000 units for oral use; but its parenteral use is still under the direction of a doctor. As the hon. member will see, if it were available to the layman it could be used indiscriminately. I am sure that is the reason it is offered only to medical men for parenteral administration.

Mr. Adamson: Thank you very much. I am sure the committee will be glad to have that information. Since penicillin is unlike the sulfa drugs, since it is not toxic or habit-forming in any way, I wondered why a prescription was required, since apparently there is no possibility of an overdose.

Resolution agreed to.

3. Resolved, that Schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking thereout tariff items 5(a) (b) and (c), 7(a) (b) and (c), 8, 8a, 13, 22, 23, 26, 27, 28, 28a, 29, 29a, 30, 31, 39a, 39b, 41, 45, 47, 62, 62a, 66a, 74, 75, 76, 76a, 76b, 76c, 76d, 79b, 79c, 79d, 81(a) (b) and (c), 82(a) (b) (i) and (ii) (c) (i) and (ii) (d) and (e), 83(a) (b) and (c), 84, 85, 87 (a) (b) (c) (d) (e) (f) (g) (h) (i) (j) (k) (l) (m) (n) (o) and (p), 89(a) (b) (c) and (d), 92(a) (b) (c) (d) (e) (f) (g) (h) and (i), 93, 94, 95, 99c, 100, 100a, 105, 105b, 105c, 105d, 105e, 106(a) (b) and (c), 106d, 108, 109, 109a, 109b, 110, 111, 114, 120(a) (b) (c) and (d), 123, 123a, 141, 152, 152a, 152b, 152c, 154, 156, 160(a) and (b), 161, 162, 163, 163a, 167, 178 (i) and (ii), 178a, 178b, 179, 184a, 184b, (i) and (ii), 184c, 184d, 199b, 207, 207a, 207b, 208i (i) and (ii), 208j, 208t, 232, 232a, 247a, 254, 254a, 262, 264, 264a, 266, 273, 273a, 276, 276a, 276b, 277, 277a, 278, 278a, 278b, 278c, 278d, 284, 305, 306, 307, 326(i) and (ii), 353, 353a, 366, 366a, 366b, 368, 383(b), 384(a) and (b), 402b, 414, 414a, 414c, 429(g), 430b (I) and (II), 434, 440m (i) and (ii), 440g, 446g, 450, 451b (i) and (ii), 518, 519, 520, 522c, 523, 523b, 523l, 523n, 524a, 532, 549, 549a, 549b, 553, 554e, 568b, 569 (i), 569(ii), 569(iii), 569(iv), 569(v), 569a, (i), 569a (ii), 571, 571a, (i) and (ii), 597, 597a, 598, 598a, 604, 605, 607 Pt. 2, 607a, 611a, 616(i) (ii) and (iii), 619a, 624a (i) (ii) and (iii), 654, 655, 656 and 710 (b) and (bb), the several enumerations of goods respectively and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of the said items, and by inserting the following items, enumerations and rates of duty in said schedule A:

Mr. Sinclair: This is the resolution to which I should like to direct attention because of the comments that have been made and editorials which have appeared in several newspapers in Canada, about tinplate. In this list covered by resolution 3, there are I think a total of 435 items. Almost all of them are changes in numbering or the removal of obsolete language or changes in designation to fit designations agreed upon at the Geneva trade conference. There are however two of them to which I should like to refer. The first is the duty on gum compound. This is item 254, which provides for duty-free entry under the British preferential and most-favoured-nation tariffs of various gums. Under the most-favoured-nation tariff there is a 10 per cent duty applied if those duty-free gums are mixed before entry. That is one small change brought about by Geneva, that they now enter duty free. It is a small group, and not of much consequence.

The other group, tinplate, is a much more interesting example. Hon. members will recall that the object of negotiations during the 1947 discussions at Geneva was to reduce the general level of tariffs and eliminate tariff preferences on a mutually advantageous basis. Towards the end of these negotiations the United States requested the United Kingdom to give up the tariff preference it enjoyed in Canada on tinplate. The proposal did not originate with Canada. The United States requested it and it was the United Kingdom who agreed to this, and you will see the reason why not much objection was made. The United Kingdom agreed, and received in return tariff concessions from the United States in compensation for giving up this preference.

In order to facilitate the successful conclusion of United States, United Kingdom and Canadian trade negotiations, Canada agreed to the proposal that the British preferential tariff on tinplate be increased to 15 per cent, the same as the most-favoured-nation rate, thereby actually eliminating the preference. It was understood on all sides that when this change was made it would be of very little practical importance in trade between Canada and the United Kingdom. In the first place, the United Kingdom did not expect to be in a position, for many years in the post-war period, to export significant quantities of tinplate to Canada. In the second place, Canadian production had expanded to a point where we were supplying a very large part of our own requirements. Our present production of tinplate is in the neighbouhood of $35 million annually.

I shall give you the figures on imports. In 1947 our import of tinplate from all countries was valued at over $8 million, of which only $107,000 worth came from the United Kingdom, and the remainder from the United States. Even since that time our production has steadily increased. During 1949, imports from all countries have dropped from $8 million in 1947 down to $3,800,000, all of which came from the United States except $68,000 from the United Kingdom. We produced this year between $35 million and $36 million of tinplate ourselves. Last year's import from the United Kingdom was only $68,000. You can see, therefore, that when the Americans requested the British to make this concession, the British realized it was a trivial concession. Every indication is that we shall have a still greater Canadian production, and that our small imports are going to dwindle still more.

If there is any interest in the figures, I can put on the record the monthly importation during 1949 of tinplate from Britain and the United States. Actually, it just shows the story I have given, a steady dwindling of imports from both countries down, as I said, to the $68,000 last year from the United Kingdom, when our own production amounted to $35 million.

Mr. Adamson: Can the parliamentary assistant say when we began to manufacture tinplate in Canada?

Mr. Sinclair: We manufactured it in a small way before the war, but it was during the war that the manufacture of tinplate began on a large scale. Since the war, when tin from Malaya became available, the Canadian steel companies went ahead with the manufacture of tinplate, using the latest electrolytic method.

Mr. Thatcher: The parliamentary assistant has been plausible, but I still do not think he has given a logical reason for this increase. I think he said the amount involved was inconsequential, so it does not matter. If the amount involved is only $68,000, why put the tariff on at all? The parliamentary assistant pointed out that the United States asked Great Britain to agree to this, and the British did so. The British have had the gun put to them quite a few times in the last few years. With ECA aid and things of that nature, how can they refuse some of these United States requests? I think half the people of Canada should realize that, despite the verbiage which the parliamentary assistant used to dress this up, it is a straight increase and a protectionist measure to protect the tinplate industry in Canada.

Mr. Sinclair: It is very obvious, to anyone who gives the matter a little thought, that the British were horse-trading and did a good job of it. They secured these important concessions in return for the preference on tin which did not amount to anything. It is inconsequential so far as this country is concerned.

When one talks about ECA dollars, hon. members should realize that the leaders of the United States delegation have to satisfy the members of congress about the United States concessions, and here they could say that in return they secured the abolition of the British preference on tinplate. Our country did not ask for it. It was a matter arranged between the United Kingdom and the United States, and we gladly agreed because, as I say, it is inconsequential to this country owing to our greatly increased production of tinplate.

Mr. Knight: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant if he knows anything about these wire and tape recording machines used for playbacks in checking speech in educational institutions? I want to know if a duty is charged against those things, and if so, why they are not on this free list No. 696. Needless to say I am not an expert on picking out the various items. What are the conditions that apply to these machines used for educational purposes? The minister was asked about this, and he said a considerable number of these machines were manufactured in Canada. I have made some inquiries, and I find there is only one machine manufactured in Canada. He said they were available from various sources, and I should like to know what those sources are. My information is that there is only one machine produced in Canada and that it is sold under different names. I am further informed that the price of a machine in the United States is about $125, Canadian funds, and that the price in Halifax is $270, a difference due to these various prohibitions. I should like to know whether the importer of such an item has to have an official permit before he can import it.

Mr. Sinclair: These dictating machines today come under item 414a. There has been no change in that item, but there is a 10 per cent duty on machines of British origin, and 20 per cent most-favoured-nation, with 25 per cent other nations. The United States, of course, is a most favoured nation. Pardon me, I am informed that the most-favoured-nation is 20 per cent, but the United States has another rate of 12 per cent. I believe last year the minister did say that these machines were made here. I understand that at least two firms make those machines in Canada.

Mr. Knight: Is this information correct that two firms are making them, or is only one firm making them and selling them under different names? The minister mentioned several sources in Canada. What are they? What is the reason for the imposition of this tariff?

Mr. Sinclair: I have been trying to give all the information I can on the actual items that we have under review. It is information about these that I have here tonight. On an item such as the hon. member mentions I suggest that a question should be put on the order paper, and in that way he could obtain more information, because we could give the answer tomorrow or later.

Mr. Knight: May I ask the parliamentary assistant what in his opinion is the justification for having tariff charged on these things? Surely, if they are for educational purposes, for the use of schools and colleges, they should be treated in the same way as other things in 696.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps as the hon. member for Coast-Capilano you could give us your opinion.

Mr. Sinclair: I have given my opinion quite often. The main reason we put on taxes is to raise revenue for the desirable services which hon. members ask for. For example, the hon. member for Saskatoon is asking for federal aid to education. Well, if we are going to give federal aid to education we shall have to find money somewhere, and it can only be found through taxation.

So far as the use of these dictaphones is concerned, the great bulk of their use is undoubtedly in business offices, and we tax most of the equipment used in business offices as a source of revenue, and this class of thing comes in that category.

Mr. Knight: I do not see what my views on education have to do with this kind of thing. So far as I am concerned, I confess a desire for federal aid to education, and I have no thought of changing my views. Does the reply of the parliamentary assistant mean that we are going to get federal aid to education? We already have a tariff placed against these machines, and I should like to know the justification for it. Must a Canadian school or university have an import licence before they can import these things at all?

Mr. Sinclair: The answer to the second question is yes. The answer to the first question is that probably the hon. member did not understand my reply. That probably is the reason why hon. members, like the hon. member for Saskatoon, are continually making these demands for bigger expenditures, and have no realization at all that somehow, somewhere, the Minister of Finance has to find the money to finance these expenditures.

I used the example of education only because the hon. member has put forward on various occasions his thought that there should be financial aid from the federal government for education. That being the case, I would think that he should realize that somewhere, somehow, the federal government is going to have to find that revenue to maintain all these desirable projects.

I am informed that in Saskatchewan, for example, they very recently increased their sales tax from 2 per cent to 3 per cent for this very reason, not that they wanted to impose an extra tax on goods which may still be necessities, or used in schools or businesses, or in industry, but because they had to get extra revenue. Therefore again I say to him, as far as this matter of dictaphones is concerned, which is not an item covered by this resolution at all, that if he wants to secure more information on it he has only to ask the appropriate minister, the Minister of National Revenue. We have come here prepared to discuss every item on the schedule, but not to discuss policy or items which are not covered in these amendments.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, the avowed policy of this government, so far as I know, is not to charge tariff against these educational machines. I think my question was reasonable enough. Why is this item I have in mind not included among these other items for which the government itself has given us a precedent in the matter of allowing them in free? I am not asking for federal aid to education in this instance. I am asking the government to do away with something that is a drag upon education. Why should that one particular item regarding tape machines, or whatever the technical name is, not be on this list when there are on the free list many other things having to do with education? Personally I think it is a matter that has not been considered. I think it is carelessness on the part of the department concerned. I see no other reason. I believe it has not come to the attention of the government, or they have not given it consideration. If they had they would realize and see that it is simply one machine that should be free because of its similarity to the items that are free. I am not asking for anything; I am simply asking that the government follow its own precedent, the precedent of not charging tariff on educational machines. I do not see why we should have to pay $270 for a thing which, in the United States, is worth $125 in Canadian funds. I do not think that these remarks about the C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan and what it is doing there are applicable or relevant to the matter under discussion. It is simply the same old story of playing politics with a matter which in my opinion should be considered seriously. I am interested in the children of this country, and it has nothing whatsoever to do with politics, or with the C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Knowles: I think the parliamentary assistant should give a little thought to the nature of the answer he has given to the hon. member for Saskatoon. The hon. member for Saskatoon asked why educational institutions have to pay this particular tax. His answer was that the government has to collect that tax from educational institutions so as to provide funds for federal aid for education, which it is not providing.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member is very good at playing on words. I do not think anybody in the committee except himself took that meaning out of my words.

Mr. Knowles: That is what the hon. member said.

Mr. Sinclair: If the hon. member is no more accurate than that in phrasing things he has just heard, I can understand why he is so loose in paraphrasing things that happened weeks or months ago.

Mr. Knowles: You said it; now you straighten it out.

Mr. Sinclair: Getting back to this question, it is quite true that the sales tax and excise tax are remitted on a great number of things used by educational institutions. To my knowledge there has never been a request from any educational institution of standing in the country for exemption for these dictaphones for recording and mechanical use by educational systems in Canada. If that request comes forward and is supported by a good case no doubt the minister will give careful consideration to it.

Mr. Fraser: Just before we close this discussion, the assistant to the minister made the statement that these duties were imposed in order to raise revenue.

Mr. Sinclair: That is part of it.

Mr. Fraser: I do not think that is all the reason. I think the reason is to protect our workmen against other goods coming in here and stopping them from manufacturing them.

Mr. Sinclair: It is a combination of these two.

Mr. Fraser: Yes; it is to protect our men and secure their jobs for them.

Mr. Fleming: Would the parliamentary assistant indicate to the committee briefly how much of the Geneva agreement has now been carried into effect, first by order in council and second by statute, and what portion of the agreement may yet not be in effect in Canada?

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed that of the almost 1,000 items on the Geneva schedule we have now implemented, through this and other changes, some 435, and we have carried out, more than perhaps any other country, most of the undertakings which we gave at Geneva; and that will be one of the points which we will raise at Torquay, the fact that we have taken the lead. That is why we are anxious to get this through. We have taken the lead in trying to implement in our tariff schedules the concessions agreed to at Geneva. The fact is that out of almost 1,000 items we have implemented 435.

Mr. Fleming: That is to say, there are roughly 565 that have not been carried into effect. Is that correct?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, on which further negotiations will take place at Torquay.

Mr. Fleming: As to the 435, assuming the enactment of a bill to give effect to the resolutions now before the house, how many of the 435 will then rest on a statutory basis, how many on an order in council basis?

Mr. Sinclair: The entire 435 will then rest on a statutory basis, and as the other undertakings are agreed to at Torquay they too will be put on a statutory basis.

Mr. Wright: On a former item the parliamentary assistant said, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Moose Mountain, that he would explain on this item how the tariff and dumping duties benefited western farmers. I should like to hear his explanation.

Mr. Sinclair: It was not on this item. However, I might be permitted to revert to resolution 2. The hon. member for Moose Mountain asked if there was any instance where these dumping duties helped Canadian farmers.

An hon Member: Western farmers.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, western farmers. This matter connected with fruits and vegetables certainly is one which concerns the western farmers whom I know in my province. At Geneva the question of the protection of a country's fruit and vegetable farming industry during periods when it is in production was thoroughly discussed. Section 14 of the present Customs Tariff is being repealed and the new section 14 is being substituted therefor.

The new section authorizes the minister of National Revenue to fix the period when imported fresh fruits and vegetables are to be subject to the specific rates of duty provided for in the various tariff items covering fresh fruits and vegetables. The minister is also authorized to do something he could not do before, namely to apply it regionally. This is important in Canada where the various crops come in at different periods of the year. During those periods which are designated in the Geneva agreement by time, the length of the period in which these extra duties can be applied, the minister can regionally or nationally, by means of this extra specific duty, protect the Canadian farmer growing these fruits and vegetables.

Up until we concluded this Geneva agreement we had an agreement with the United States which, of course, this agreement now supersedes. That agreement called for three split periods for cabbage, carrots and beets. We were asked for the split period because of the nature of our problem. First in the season is when our own hothouses are producing these fruits and vegetables for the Canadian market, during which time they have to have a measure of protection against surplus coming in from the United States. Then there is the period later in the year, when there is field production, when we have to have similar protection.

That has now been extended. We now have a split period for beans, cabbage, carrots, beets, cauliflower, celery and lettuce.

Mr. Knight: Returning to the matter I mentioned a moment ago, I should like to draw the attention of the parliamentary assistant to something he said. His statement was that, so far as he was aware, no application had been made by any educational institution. I am prepared to accept his word in regard to his lack of awareness, but not as to the other matter—because an application was made.

I shall place on record, to just such an application by a professor at Dalhousie university, the reply from some assistant, apparently, of the Minister of National Revenue. This reply is dated at Ottawa, March 20, 1950, and states:

> I wish to inform you that the "Revere" magnetic tape recorder, per descriptive illustration submitted, manufactured by Revere Camera Company, Chicago, Illinois, a general purpose recorder for use in the recording of sound on a magnetized tape, incorporating provision for play-back thereof, is considered to be an article of a class or kind made in Canada, and, therefore, not admissible under tariff item 696 under any circumstance, but rated for duty under tariff item 445k, at 22½ per cent ad valorem, most-favoured-nation tariff, subject, in addition, to the consumption or sales tax of 8 per cent levied on the duty-paid value . . . The above magnetic tape recorder is restricted importation under the provisions of the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act and may only be imported under permit from the emergency import control division, Department of Finance, 490 Sussex street, Ottawa.

And then Mr. Abbott wrote, in reply, I believe, to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar on some date in 1950—I have not the exact date:

With regard to the duties and taxes, I am informed by the Department of National Revenue that these wire and tape recorders would not be classified under tariff item 696, which allows educational equipment to be imported into Canada duty free—

And I would ask the parliamentary assistant to listen to the reason given.

—because these machines are manufactured in Canada and are available from several sources.

The point I made, and which the parliamentary assistant has not cleared up, is that it is suggested that these machines do not come from several sources in Canada, but rather that one machine is made and sold under various names, giving colour to the suggestion that they come from various sources. I am not sure whether that is correct or not, but I presume it is the business of someone in the department to find out. I would ask for that information. If it is true then in all reason, leaving out all those wisecracks about politics, the C.C.F., and everything else, in the interests of educational organizations in this country I see no reason why that one particular item should be picked to be omitted from the list of items to be allowed in free under the heading of items used for educational purposes.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, before we pass this item, there is one comment I should like to make. Men can keep on repeating fallacies until they begin to believe they are true. One of the fallacies constantly repeated by ministers in the House of Commons is that all payments must come from taxation.

Just to give the parliamentary assistant something to think about, may I read from the proceedings of the committee on banking and commerce in 1939, the official publication thereof. At page 54 I find this:

Mr. McGeer: That is the theory that governmental expenditure must be made through the medium of taxation.

Mr. Towers: Governmental expenditure may be made either through the medium of taxation or through borrowing, or through the issue of currency . . .

I hope we do not hear any more of this parrot repetition of the fallacy that everything must be paid for out of taxation.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions 4, 5 and 6 agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 177, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 178, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Sinclair: The bill to amend the Customs Tariff will not be received from the printer until Monday, so I am not asking for first reading tonight. The other two bills are in the hands of the printer tonight and should be available tomorrow. The minister has asked me to give his assurance that the income tax bill will be before the house for at least a week so that hon. members will have a chance to digest it thoroughly.

RESEARCH COUNCIL ACT

PROVISION FOR ADDITIONAL VICE-PRESIDENT—DEFINITION OF "INVENTION"

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Research Council Act to provide for the appointment of an additional vice-president of the national research council, and to bring the act into conformity with the Patent Act as to the definition of "invention."

Mr. Green: Is the parliamentary assistant making a statement?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the legislation of which this resolution forms the basis is not extensive in scope. Hon. members will recall that the Research Council Act was passed in 1924 and amended in 1946. By the 1946 amendment provision was made for the appointment of two vice-presidents, one vice-president, scientific, and one vice-president, administration. In 1947 when the operation of the atomic energy project at Chalk River was placed under the jurisdiction of the research council the man in charge of that project was given the position of vice-president, scientific.

The result is that as far as the research council itself is concerned the one position of vice-president, administration, is filled but there is no position to which a person could be appointed to have similar jurisdiction over the scientific end of the operation. It is desired that there should be a vice-president having charge of the scientific work of the research council other than that of the atomic energy project, and the legislation proposes to create this additional position of vice-president, scientific.

The second part of the resolution simply deals with the definition of the term "invention." It will be recalled that the Research Council Act was enacted in 1924, whereas our patent legislation is more recent. The definition of "invention" in the Patent Act is wider and gives more complete protection than the definition in the Research Council Act. It is proposed by this legislation to bring the two definitions into line so that the research council definition will follow that of the Patent Act.

This is particularly important when one remembers that under the legislation patents of invention by technical officials of the research council vest in the council. With the current developments in chemistry and atomic energy it is particularly important that the definition be wide enough to include compositions of matter as well as apparatus and other mechanical inventions. The present definition is somewhat weak in this respect.

There is one other slight change being made by the proposed legislation which has to do with the term "national research council." The present legislation does not provide for the use of that term although it has been in general use since 1925 when it was authorized by an order in council. It is proposed to give its use legislative authority. I do not think there is any more I can usefully say on the resolution stage.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this seems to be a reasonable proposal the government is making to the house. I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that it would be helpful if after receiving second reading the bill is referred to the special committee set up to consider the working of the national research council. During the sittings of the committee last year which dealt with the atomic energy control board we had some evidence given to us concerning the need for another vice-president. There was some discussion which I think would be of assistance in considering this particular measure.

I suggest also that, when the house goes into committee on this present resolution, the parliamentary assistant give us further details of the functions of this new vice-president. I take it that at the present time Dr. Norman Keys of Chalk River is the vice-president, scientific; apparently the intention is to name him vice-president in charge of that project and to have some other scientist appointed vice-president, scientific. We ask that the parliamentary assistant clarify that situation. I hope nothing will be done to reduce the prestige of Dr. Keys. I think he has done a splendid job at Chalk River and I am sure all the members of the atomic energy committee of last year would be against any move which would injure his standing.

We would like to know also if this new vice-president is to be a member of the executive committee of the research council. There is provision now for an executive committee consisting of the president; vice-president, administration; vice-president, scientific; and at least three other members selected by the council. I suppose the bill will provide that the new vice-president will also be a member of that executive committee.

When the Research Council Act was amended in 1946 power was given to the council to set up crown companies. They could do it in two ways: either by procuring the incorporation of a new company or by taking over the share capital of an existing company. I do not know how many companies have been taken under the wing of the research council since that particular amendment, and I ask the parliamentary assistant to give us the story about these crown companies when the resolution goes into committee.

Finally, with regard to the definition of "invention". The research council are given very wide powers with respect to inventions by scientists and others in their employ and also very wide powers to sell those inventions. The parliamentary assistant has mentioned that there is to be a definition of the word "invention" to coincide with the definition of invention in the Patent Act, but in the Research Council Act reference is also made to discoveries and to improvements in processes, apparatus, or machines, and so on. It seems to me to cover more ground than would be covered by the one word "invention". When the house gets into committee I hope the parliamentary assistant will explain whether or not the definition of "invention" will do away with the word "discoveries" and the other words contained in the present Research Council Act.

Subject to receiving an explanation along the lines I have suggested when we are in committee of the whole house, the official opposition have no objection to this particular measure. I emphasize once more the desirability of having the bill, after it receives second reading, referred to the special committee set up to consider the work of the research council.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, dealing with the points raised by the hon. member I think I ought to say at the outset that, on the question of referring the bill to the committee now examining the operations of the national research council, I see no objection at all to that procedure if it appears to meet with the wishes of hon. members of the house. As to his remarks about the head of the atomic energy project at Chalk River, I think the hon. member can feel perfectly secure in the knowledge that nothing is being done that will in any way detract from the position held by that gentleman. I think we all rather share in common a high opinion of him and of the work he is doing there. The situation is simply that so far as the research council is concerned, exclusive of the atomic energy project, there has been no vice-president in charge of scientific matters. That was what was contemplated in the 1946 legislation, and by reason of the necessity of using that position for the man in charge of the atomic energy project there has been no position to which a man could be appointed.

One result is that a great deal of the time of the president of the council is taken up with general scientific meetings, and there is not sufficient time for him to give the close attention that is required to the supervising of certain of the scientific projects and the correlating of one scientific project to another. Therefore I think it becomes apparent that the position is necessary.

Mr. Green: Who is to be the vice-president?

Mr. McIlraith: As a matter of fact I do not know, but I do not think I would be in a position to say so even if I did know. I do not think we can discuss the matter of personnel at this point in the legislation. I think hon. members will agree that is most improper.

Mr. Green: I only asked because in the organization chart in the report of the national research council for the year 1948-49 there appear three vice-presidents, a vice-president, administration, a vice-president, scientific, and a vice-president and project manager. That is for the period expiring over a year ago.

Mr. McIlraith: What page is that?

Mr. Green: That is at the end of the report of the national research council for 1948-49. Therefore it would appear that there must be somebody at the moment who, while he may not be called vice-president, scientific, is doing the work.

Mr. McIlraith: I am afraid it is not just as simple as that. I am not aware of there being anyone occupying that position.

Mr. Graydon: Has somebody got the name with somebody else doing the work?

Mr. McIlraith: I do not think so. I do not know what the explanation of that statement is but certainly there is no one occupying the position now. As to the matter of the definition of inventions, I think that is something that can better be dealt with when we see the actual section of the bill when it is before the committee. The new definition is quite wide and retains the breadth of the present one. As a matter of fact it extends the present definition.

Mr. Green: What about crown companies?

Mr. McIlraith: There is just one crown company, and that is the corporation dealing with crown patents.

Mr. Green: There is only one crown company?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, the one dealing with crown patents.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, this gives me an opportunity to discuss another matter which I think is germane to the subject under discussion. I am sorry to have to do so in the absence of the Secretary of State. I raised the question during the last session and I do so again on this resolution because I fancy that if a change is to be made it should be incorporated in legislation such as we have envisaged here. I do not know for how many years members of the house have had continually to raise the question of the chaotic conditions of the patent office of Canada. I suggested at one stage that perhaps the government should consider carefully whether or not they should take the patent office and put in under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

I am not an expert on patent affairs, and there are not many in this house who are. I am looking at one member over there who perhaps has more experience than a good many. I know that he, along with many other patent attorneys with whom I have talked from time to time, cannot possibly be satisfied with the conditions existing at the present time in the patent office. I have been amazed that no concrete action seems to have been taken to bring the patent office abreast of modern conditions so far as business is concerned. In these days patents are a most important cog in our general industrial machine. If our patent office is seriously behind in its work, then of course it retards the progress of business and industry.

It has been stated from time to time in and out of the house that the patent office today, while perhaps improved in its operations over what it was during the war, still has not reached the point where it really is able to serve the industrial and business public of Canada and the general public as well, because they are all affected, in the way that I think a governmental institution should. In saying that I am not casting any reflection upon a single person connected with the patent office. My feeling is that right through the whole patent office there is a feeling of despair and discouragement because of the mountain of work that lies ahead of them which they can only chip off day by day. People may say the same situation has existed in the United Kingdom and the United States. I am not able to give the committee a very clear picture with respect to the United Kingdom patent office, but I am told that the patent office in the United States has been greatly improved as the result of a drive by the government of that country to clean up the backlog of work. I think this resolution should give this committee an opportunity to discuss the whole question of patents in this country.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I think we should be clear on this point so that we may know in further discussions, either on this resolution or on the bill that will follow it, whether or not it is in order to discuss the patent office and any other reforms that might be thought desirable in the Patent Act. As I see it, the resolution precedes a measure to amend the Research Council Act. In the latter part, where it mentions bringing the act into conformity with the Patent Act, it seems to me that act is being mentioned only by way of explanation—and incidentally, while this resolution may provide a good opportunity for one who desires to discuss the Patent Act, I do not think it would be in order to do so. That is my view, as I am able to analyse the resolution, and I should like that point clarified now.

Mr. Graydon: With great deference, Mr. Chairman, I differ with your ruling. I had a great deal more to say about the patent office, because I thought this a good opportunity to bring the matter before the Prime Minister and the parliamentary assistant. I do suggest that they seriously consider my suggestion and make a drive, as has been done in other countries, to clean up the patent situation.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. Fraser: Would the parliamentary assistant tell us what will be the salary of the additional vice-president.

Mr. McIlraith: I am afraid I cannot give that information at the moment.

Mr. Fraser: Why cannot the parliamentary assistant give the information?

Mr. McIlraith: I don't know it. However, I shall be glad to get the information for the hon. member.

Mr. Fraser: We will have the information?

Mr. McIlraith: I can give it tomorrow on the orders of the day.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I would have been glad of the opportunity to say something about the Patent Act, Mr. Chairman, but since that was ruled out of order as soon as the hon. member for Peel completed what he had to say, I will wait until the estimates are before us. In partial explanation, however, I may remind the hon. member that the patent office has been an orphan for many years. First it was under agriculture, then it was under trade and commerce, and now it is under the Secretary of State, and perhaps that explains why it is a little abandoned. But there has been progress.

Now I want to ask the parliamentary assistant whether he has a definition of "invention" under the Patent Act. That would perhaps clarify the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I think the important part of the definition is the fact that it includes composition in matter, to cover chemistry and allied sciences.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Fournier, Hull (for Mr. Howe) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 179, to amend the Research Council Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

PROVISION OF BENEFITS FOR CERTAIN FORMER MEMBERS OF FORCES OTHER THAN CANADIAN

The house resumed from Thursday, April 20, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Gregg—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, to provide benefits for certain former members of His Majesty's forces other than Canadian and for certain former members of the forces of His Majesty's allies or of powers associated with His Majesty, which forces participated with Canada in wars concluding on or before the 31st day of August, 1921, who have resided in Canada for not less than twenty years, and to provide further for decentralizing the administration of the act.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, when this resolution was discussed about two weeks ago I was not present, but I have read the statements made at that time and I must say that I heartily agree with much of the criticism and also with much of the praise offered on that occasion. This question of extending the war veterans allowance to other than Canadians is not a new matter to come before this house. I am very pleased indeed that this benefit is being extended to these men, most of whom are imperials, who have now become citizens of our country. This is something for which the veterans committee has fought on many occasions. If you were to go through the records of that committee for the past fifteen years I think you would find there was not a session during which the granting of the war veterans allowance to imperials was not brought to the attention of that committee and the government. I think it is only a matter of justice that these men should be included.

I have sometimes wondered just what was the reason for this change of heart, why after all these years it should be recognized now that these men are entitled to consideration. I have a feeling that it may have been brought about as a result of the matter being dealt with at the time Newfoundland was brought into confederation. I know one demand made by Newfoundland at that time was that the imperials in that province be granted the war veterans allowance. It would have been an anomalous situation in the rest of Canada if the imperials in Newfoundland were granted the benefits of the war veterans allowance and those in the rest of Canada did not receive the same treatment. I wonder whether it was on that account, and perhaps the minister will tell us, that after all these years these men have received the benefits to which they are entitled.

Now that this act is being amended, Mr. Chairman, I think the government and the department could very well have made some other amendments. I believe they were forced to make the amendment regarding imperials, as I say, owing to the fact that the allowance was granted in Newfoundland. When these amendments were being made, why was it that, after all these years, and after the pressure which has been brought to bear through the different veterans committees, the Canadians who were in England during the first war were not included? They had just as much reason, and perhaps more, to be included as the imperials. It is not necessary for me to argue this point. A reading of the record of debates in this house, as well as the record of debates in the veterans committees, will reveal the reasons why Canadians in England during the first war should be included. Many of our men who went overseas with the first contingent in the first war suffered a great deal on Salisbury plains. It has been recorded that more men died of disease and exposure on Salisbury plains during the first winter than were killed by bombs in England during the first war.

There are men who never even got to England—and I am not opposing this because I was strongly in favour of dual pensions—in the first war and the second war, who are receiving war veterans allowance. It does seem to me that the men who served in England are as deserving as the men who were not allowed to go to France, for many good reasons, and they have just as much right to receive the war veterans allowance as those men who served in Canada only. It was brought out in our committee that there are men, whose only service apart from training was in France after the armistice was signed, men who served in labour battalions, men who were on the war graves commission, and men who were sent to fill up battalions before they went into Germany, who are entitled to war veterans allowances. Yet the men who served four and five years in England during the first war, and who suffered on Salisbury plains, are denied the war veterans allowance. I do think that the minister, if he had wished to do a complete job, could easily have included in these amendments the Canadians who served in England.

Arguments have been advanced for increases in the basic rates, but I am not going to take up the time of the house by repeating those. They are all recorded in Hansard. Then there was a point brought up the other evening, I think by the member for Nanaimo, in connection with the widows of imperials who died before they had put in the twenty years' residence required in this country. I have often wondered just why the twenty-year period was chosen. We have been told that the War Veterans Allowance Act is a form of old age pension act. We know that in the Old Age Pensions Act a man had to be in Canada twenty years before he qualified for the old age pension. Just why we should say a soldier should have to be in Canada twenty years, I do not know. The War Veterans Allowance Act is not an old age pension act. When it was first granted, it may have had some resemblance to an old age pension act, but it has been changed so radically that today it cannot be considered as a half-sister or half-brother of the Old Age Pensions Act. I believe the minister should consider reducing that period of twenty years, and allowing those widows whose husbands were here the shorter period of time to have the benefit of the war veterans allowance.

Under the old age pension act in the United States, if a person is a resident in some of the states five years, he receives the benefit of the old age pension. In some other states one need only be a resident for one year to receive the pension benefit. Under our citizenship act anyone who comes to Canada can become a Canadian citizen in five years, so I think the five-year residence period could easily have been adopted under the War Veterans' Allowance Act for these imperials. After all an imperial soldier would be a British subject, and the five-year period would suffice to qualify. The widow of an imperial veteran who died after five years' residence in Canada could very well have been granted the war veterans' allowance. It would not have involved a large amount of money, because I think the minister will agree with me that there is not a large number of these widows, and as time goes on no doubt there will be fewer.

So far as the second part of the bill is concerned, I quite agree with the minister that the act could be better administered if it were put on a district basis. The district war veterans allowance authorities are given practically the same authority as Ottawa has. They can award, increase, decrease, annul or suspend an allowance, according to the act. All this is subject to review in Ottawa. I hope that there will be a careful supervision by the department in Ottawa to make sure that all parts of the country are being treated alike. We know that in certain provinces these matters are not always dealt with in the same way. I warn the minister he will have to be careful to see that the administration across Canada is uniform, and that there is no discrimination so far as any part is concerned.

There is another matter which I believe the minister might have taken into consideration, and that is in connection with the veterans who are indigent and live in the United States. If they come to Canada, they are required to have three months' residence here—

Mr. Mutch: Not now.

Mr. Brooks: That has been cancelled?

Mr. Mutch: That was cancelled in 1948.

Mr. Brooks: I was speaking more particularly about the old veterans who have to go to the United States because of health, or because they have to live with their families there. They have no families here in Canada. I think the minister knows of some of these people. I myself have some in mind. They have to leave this country on account of their health, or because they wish to live with their relatives in the United States, but they are not given the war veterans allowance. That is a matter which could very well have been considered when these amendments to the War Veterans' Allowance Act were being considered.

It is not my intention to labour these points any further, except to say that when the War Veterans' Allowance Act was being amended these points should have been taken into consideration. They have been brought before the war veterans committee time and time again. In the committee there was almost unanimous support for Canadians in Great Britain receiving the war veterans allowance, as there was almost unanimous support on some of these other points. As I say, these points could have been considered. I believe the imperials were included chiefly because Newfoundland demanded it when she came into confederation. It would have placed the department and the government in an anomalous position if they had not included them in every other part of Canada.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman, I was particularly glad to hear the hon. member for Royal speak tonight, because it has often appeared to me that hon. members from British Columbia particularly were the most difficult people that the government had to deal with in this house. I do not know whether we have a higher standard of living in British Columbia, or whether it is that we are hard to get along with and expect more. However, it is pleasant to know that in these representations to the government the members from British Columbia have the support of at least some of the other provinces in the dominion.

Out in British Columbia we feel that there is some merit in the contention of the veterans' organizations out there that our war veterans allowance does not come up to the payment that we make to old age pensioners. I am quite sure that the minister himself is greatly concerned on that point, because nobody likes to have it implied that we treat our war veterans in a more niggardly way than we treat our old age pensioners. We realize that the veterans get paid at an earlier age, and there are other advantages that are not given to the old age pensioners. I might say that our old age pensioners in British Columbia get hospitalization care, which is something we in British Columbia are proud of.

The minister might consider the value of establishing a standing committee on veterans affairs, as has been suggested so many times in the house. We can realize that when he goes to cabinet he finds that there are 15 or 20 other ministers there who think that they need money just as badly as he does. It must be quite a competition and no doubt the minister who can make the most strenuous representation as to need is the one who gets the most consideration. I was wondering whether the minister would consider the virtue of having a veterans' committee standing behind him to support him in his very able endeavours to obtain more funds for his old comrades whom, I am sure, he has taken care of in a magnificent way since he became minister.

There is one thing that I should like to say to the minister in regard to the payment of war veterans allowances to imperial veterans. This is a matter that the Canadian Legion has been pressing for a great many years. It is greatly to the minister's credit that he has finally been able to submit arguments to his colleagues and has been able to prevail upon their better judgment, and thus has been successful in obtaining that concession. It does seem to me that, so far as the widows are concerned, if the man did not live the twenty years in Canada he really must have aged more quickly because of his service in France than the others, because he was not able to stand up for twenty years afterwards. I do not think there would be too much money involved. I think the minister would probably agree with that. I do not think there would be any principle involved that would not be compatible with his views and with the views of the government. As there is not too much money involved I would ask him to see if he could not persuade his colleagues to meet the wishes of the Canadian Legion in this regard.

I think Canadians are particularly proud of the veterans legislation we have. It seems that every time we pass legislation some members of the opposition rise in their places and say it is too little and too late. I do not want to be placed in that position because, in my opinion, this government and the minister have done a tremendous job for the veterans. Within the confines of the money that we are able to secure from the Canadian people in the form of taxes, the Department of Veterans Affairs have done a magnificent job in administering it. So long as I have been in the house there has been nothing but first-class administration of this department. I am particularly proud to have had a small part—and probably a very small part in supporting the government since I came here in 1945—in this legislation; but I would ask the minister to give these matters all the favourable consideration he possibly can. This is a debt which the people of Canada owe and will gladly pay.

Mr. Knowles: Mr Chairman, as one of those who spoke when this matter was up before on April 20 I intend to take only a few minutes, and to confine my remarks to just one subject. I want to say further that this is a subject to which the two previous speakers have referred. I am speaking about it to help reconstruct, if I can, the atmosphere of the house the last evening this matter was under discussion. I refer to the discovery that we made that evening that with the bringing in of the imperials and others their widows are not to qualify unless they are widows of veterans who themselves lived in Canada the full twenty years before they died, even though the widow may have been here even longer than twenty years.

I fully realize that on the evening of April 20 the minister set it out clearly and seemed to take a very firm position. But I think he will realize also that there was a feeling in the house that somehow or other the position he took was not right. Several examples were given. For example, I gave two instances of imperial veterans who came to this country both in 1925, bringing their wives with them. The first veteran died in 1944, having lived here 19 years. His widow is now in need, but she will not qualify. The other veteran managed to live until 1946. His widow will qualify. Why not treat the two widows alike? In both instances you have a widow who probably herself came from the United Kingdom and has become a Canadian citizen like the rest of us. In both cases you may have widows whose sons served in the second war. It did seem to all of us, I am sure, the other evening, that this point of discrimination was not fair.

I say, Mr. Chairman, the reason I took to my feet to say the same thing that two previous speakers have said is that I did think it desirable to reconstruct that atmosphere that was here before, in the hope that the minister has thought about the situation in the meantime. As we all know he has had the opportunity in the meantime as well of meeting representatives of the non-pensioned widows groups in this country who were here in Ottawa last week. I am sure they expressed to him their pleasure at the changes that were being made, but also their dissatisfaction on this point. I have no doubt they expressed dissatisfaction on other points as well. I would back them in the other things for which they asked, but we know that we get these things just step by step: therefore I am rising to add my support for this one step that the house did seem to want the other night. It was asked for from all sides of the house. I hope that in the meantime, even since the minister saw the widows who were here last week, he has been able to think about this matter and move perhaps in the direction of the suggestion made that evening by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I shall try to be brief. Speaking as a member of the Canadian Legion, let me say that we believe sincerely, as the hon member for Comox-Alberni has said, that imperial veterans' wives should be given exactly the same treatment as is accorded Canadian veterans' wives. I sincerely hope the minister and the government will consider at least bringing the war veterans allowance up to that accorded old age pensioners. We all know the cost of living has gone up.

There is no partisanship where veterans are concerned, and we all know that while the people of Canada might question some kinds of taxation, they will never question taxation which will have the effect of giving veterans, and particularly the dependents of veterans, a fair deal.

Mr. Gillis: I do not wish to labour this matter. However, I have listened with a good deal of attention to what other hon. members have said. There are just two thoughts I would leave with the minister, and concerning which he may have something to say later on. I believe the worst kind of discrimination lies in the fact that the widow of the veteran of the first war who saw service in England, even under the present arrangement, is not entitled to the war veterans allowance. Those widows at this time are aged and in many cases incapacitated and not able to earn for themselves. On the other hand the widow of the veteran of the second world war, who is much younger, and perhaps in a better position to look after herself, can qualify under certain circumstances. I suggest that even yet the minister should consider preparing a regulation which would wipe out that kind of discrimination.

Then, I am also concerned—and I use that word advisedly—about decentralization of administration. I have known the minister for a long time, and I have never had any difficulty in arriving at a fair arrangement under the legislation. I have found in many cases however that when one gets down to the provincial level, where the act is administered, there is difficulty. I should like to have my mind clarified as to whether decentralization means that the minister wants to divorce himself from certain responsibilities and if, on the other hand, this change would pave the way for more jobs, more patronage and a more inefficient administration at the provincial level.

It is my view that the minister should retain as much power as possible to direct and supervise this legislation. I do not believe decentralization will make for better administration; I believe it will mean greater inefficiency. It will divorce the minister and the board in Ottawa from many decisions which will be made provincially, and in my opinion this move will not react in the best interest of the veteran.

I have agreed with the minister on many occasions. We have agreed to have certain things done, but when these matters have reached the provincial level it appeared that officials at that level had more authority than the minister had, or than the department in Ottawa had. The result has been a good deal of confusion—and I am not referring to veterans allowances, but to other problems.

I would ask the minister to clarify my mind as to the meaning of decentralization of administration as it is applied here. I should like to see the minister responsible to the House of Commons, where the basic legislation is written, placed in a position where he can come to the house and accept responsibility for any decision made by his department at any time and at any level.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I do suggest the minister should answer the various suggestions that have been placed before him. When the resolution was under consideration two weeks ago tonight I raised several points, and I have no intention of repeating them now. Toward the end of the sitting, however, several of us did suggest that further consideration be given to the eligibility of the widow of the imperial veteran.

Thinking the matter over during these two weeks I am convinced we were right when we said everyone thought the test would be whether the veteran came here twenty years ago. If he came here in 1930 or before, then he should be considered as qualified. As a matter of fact I do not know why we should insist upon his having been here for twenty years. But if that time is set, then surely the test for the widow should be whether the husband came here in 1930 or before. If he did, she should be considered eligible. Otherwise there are many of these widows who cannot qualify for the allowance. In my judgment that would be a most unfair situation.

I believe it is the wish of the house and certainly of all veteran members in the house that the legislation should be made to include the widow of any imperial veteran who came here at least twenty years ago, as was suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Then, I hope the minister will explain whether or not these payments are to be retroactive. I suggested two weeks ago that they be dated back to December 10, when the parliamentary assistant made the announcement. I would point out that for many months now investigations have been under way in the department. All imperials who were thought to be eligible have been asked to fill out forms and to give information. I would hope the allowance would be made retroactive at least to the date of the announcement last December.

I should like to have some clarification on the proposal to decentralize the administration. It has been explained that this means that decisions will be made out in the districts as to whether or not veterans or widows are eligible for allowances. Personally, I believe this is a wise change. But what is to be the position once a veteran is granted that allowance in the district? Will it then be possible for the war veterans allowance board in Ottawa to upset that decision, if it is favourable to the veteran?

I submit that if the veteran can qualify before the district officer or the district board, or whatever body is set up, then he should get the allowance without being placed in danger of having it upset by a board of review here in Ottawa. It is all right to have a board of review in Ottawa to look into the cases where veterans have lost out; but I hope we will not have a condition whereby many of these veterans will receive their allowances in the local districts and then be faced with the possibility of having them taken away by the board of review in Ottawa who have not seen the veteran and who could not possibly have the same understanding of the conditions he faces. The minister has not made clear what the position will be with regard to this review board and I hope he will do so this evening.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, before this resolution is carried I should like to say a word or two. I have received many requests from veterans' organizations in my constituency and I wish to add my voice to those that have been raised already and urge the minister to include the widows of imperial veterans in this amendment. I am not going to enlarge on the subject because matters affecting veterans are always well taken care of by the veteran members in this house and it is not necessary for one who is not a veteran of either war, like myself, to deal with matters with which perhaps I may not be as familiar as with other matters. But I do urge the minister to give favourable consideration to this request. I do not believe the cost would be great, and even if it were he would simply be doing justice to those widows whose husbands passed away before the government extended these war veterans' allowances to imperial veterans.

While I am on my feet I should like to refer again to a case I have mentioned on many occasions, particularly during the last session. I had considerable correspondence with the minister and with the war veterans' allowance board in connection with this case. This was a case where the income was not revealed and it was necessary ultimately to take the case to court and prosecute the war veteran concerned. I am glad that the case has been settled and I want to tell the minister that I appreciate very much what in my opinion has been a generous settlement. It was the wife of the veteran rather than the veteran himself who corresponded with me. She told me that the lawyer prosecuting was on her side as well as on the other side. Again I wish to thank the minister for the satisfactory settlement that has been made of what I believe was a somewhat difficult case.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to say one further word if I may. I heartily approve of the grant of the $500,000 that was provided last year to supplement payments under the War Veterans Allowance Act, but I should like to reiterate the objections I have taken to the administration of that act. The parliamentary assistant has done his best to correct many of the mistakes that have been made, but it is my belief that a more simplified form of administration should be brought into effect.

I have seen the forms and I have listened to the investigators questioning war veterans allowance applicants or recipients. I know of one case in my riding of a man eighty-four years of age. I will not say that the advice he received from me was particularly good, but with that advice he had the advice of the Canadian Legion and two lawyers to enable him to fill out the form correctly. If my memory serves me aright he was granted a supplementary allowance of $10 per month until the end of September.

I am urging that the payment of these allowances be made more readily available. It should not be necessary for a veteran eighty-four years of age to have to go through all this red tape in order to secure the allowance until the end of September. At that time he will have to apply again and go to the Canadian Legion or to other people in order to have it extended for another short period. I think it is the wish of this parliament and of the people of Canada that this supplementary allowance should be paid during the remaining lifetime of a man eighty-four years of age in order to bring him up to the maximum of the amount received by an old age pensioner in my province.

The regulations should be more reasonable. This particular veteran served in three wars. I do not believe in calling this a burnt out pension; I believe it is something to which these men are entitled as of right and the amount they receive should at least be equal to that given our older citizens who receive it without having to go through all this red tape.

Mr. Mott: Mr. Chairman, I believe there are nineteen returned soldier organizations and auxiliaries in my constituency and I do not think it is necessary for me to say how many requests I have received in connection with the payment of these allowances to widows of imperial veterans. I cannot help but support what has been said already in regard to this matter. I realize there are some complications and it may be difficult to find the proper solution. After listening to the discussion of a week ago I have reached the firm belief that a veterans committee should be set up so that we may go more thoroughly into this question and have more information than we are able to get in the house itself.

The Department of Veterans Affairs has done a wonderful job and the minister is to be congratulated. I have no complaints to make because I have been welcomed by all officials in the department. I feel that everything possible should be done to carry out what is an obligation to a certain extent to the widows of imperial veterans or of other allied forces who fought with us in the first war. Take a widow fifty-five years old. If she has been working at all she may be able to draw unemployment insurance, and that department will have to pay. If she cannot secure help from that particular department there is the widow's pension for which she may be able to qualify. If she can, naturally another department will have to pay. Then there are the social services of the municipalities towards which both the dominion and provincial governments contribute. She may be able to qualify for help there. In one way or another she will have to receive help from some government source. I think it is only right and proper that we should take this matter under consideration and do everything possible for the widows of imperial veterans and their allied associates.

Mr. Jones: As an imperial veteran who has had a good deal to do with imperial veterans in Canada for a number of years I should like to endorse what has been said by the last two speakers, particularly the member for Fraser Valley, as to the plight of widows of imperial veterans. I do not know how many are in distress but I assure you that several of them need assistance. I think it is rather degrading that the widows of men who served so nobly in the 1914-18 war must resort to charity or to the support of city councils in our smaller towns in order to live. As long as that blot remains it is most difficult for those who served in both wars to feel honestly and sincerely happy that everything possible is being done for these people. Our comrades who married these women have now passed on. I feel it is up to us who remain to fight for their widows. I am proud and pleased that the Canadian Legion women's auxiliaries right across the dominion have taken up the cudgels on their behalf. I appeal to the minister before it is too late to incorporate some protection in the bill for these widows that will place them at least on an equal basis with the widows of Canadian veterans since the service of their husbands burnt them out before their time.

As to the $10 bonus that has been given, in common with all other veterans I have noticed the small number who actually receive it. I feel that the red tape attached to the giving of the bonus should be lessened somewhat and that there should not be quite so strict an investigation into the needs of the person applying. I feel that many of these veterans are denied the extra $10 merely because they own a little home or get the odd job as a janitor and so on to help them struggle along. I did not think it was ever the intention of the house or the minister to make it so difficult to secure the extra bonus. I ask the minister to consider lessening the strings attached to the giving of the $10 in this measure, and also to look after the widows of imperial veterans.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, I had the privilege a week ago of attending a conference of imperial veterans from my riding and many adjoining ridings of western Ontario. I want to assure the minister that there was considerable jubilation over the prospect of this legislation being made effective and the possibility of the imperial veterans receiving the veterans allowance. They felt it was a victory and they thought much of the credit for it went to the work which veterans organizations had been carrying on for fifteen years. My information from them was that they had been fighting for at least fifteen years to secure this legislation. They were concerned about the plight of widows, but I think the position they took was a rather unfortunate reflection on the way in which veterans have been getting assistance. They took the position that under the present circumstances it would be unwise for them to press for any further advantages than were provided in the proposed legislation. They were afraid to press the claims of the widows lest in doing so they should delay the passage of the legislation.

Their one concern was that the imperial veterans should first secure legislation in their favour, and that once it was placed on the statute books they would then push for improvements. The feature of it which struck me as rather unfortunate was the impression that the only way in which veterans can secure such legislation is by continually pushing the government until finally it surrenders to their claims. Their feeling was that they would get this and then they would start pressing the government in order to get something for the widows. As an outsider my suggestion is that from the standpoint of the government it would be much more to their credit to make some of these concessions without veterans having to push the government for a number of years in order to secure what they want.

They raised two questions which I should like the minister to answer. I think I know the answers, which I was able to give to them, but it would be satisfying to have the minister put them on record. There appeared to be some doubt whether imperial veterans who qualify for this benefit in every respect except that they are not sixty years of age, who are incapacitated, in hospital, indigent, without any means of support, would be eligible for veterans allowance under the act in the same way as other veterans. The second question they raised was just what procedure imperial veterans should take in order to be sure of getting the benefits as soon as possible. What procedure are they expected to follow in order to be eligible to receive the benefits at the earliest possible date? Those are the two questions that were raised.

Mr. Gregg: First of all I should like to acknowledge the suggestions that have been made in the twenty-five speeches made two weeks ago and tonight. A good deal of the discussion has been partly directed at the resolution and partly at the War Veterans Allowance Act. I make no complaint whatsoever about that. I mention it merely as a preface to this suggestion. If the committee is willing, I should like to see the resolution moved forward tonight. I do not think the committee would expect me to deal in full with the many questions raised concerning the act. I shall take a moment to mention a number of the special points made about the resolution. If I miss any that were made two weeks ago or this evening I can assure hon. members that I shall be glad to deal with them at a later stage.

The other evening the hon. member for Nanaimo asked if I could state the number of widows who have resided in Canada for twenty years but whose husbands died before they had acquired that length of residence. I regret to say it is not possible to make anything like an accurate estimate of that number. The survey made by our department and the organizations that have been named dealt primarily with veterans. As hon. members know, in all our veterans legislation any benefits accruing to wives or widows come to them through their veteran-husbands, when alive, or after their death. In that connection, therefore, I reiterate what I said two weeks ago. In this resolution and the bill which will follow it we are placing every British and allied veteran who has been resident in Canada for twenty years on exactly the same footing, for all purposes with respect to war veterans allowance, as the Canadian-born or those domiciled in Canada before they enlisted. If we do that for the veterans then I repeat that we would be creating some inequity if we made some special arrangements on behalf of widows for whom we have no such arrangements under any other of our veterans legislation. I might add, further to what I said in reply to this question, that the understanding of the organizations which have worked with us for at least the last two years in studying this problem, that is the imperial division of the Canadian Legion and the British-Canadian Veterans Association of the Veterans' Council of Canada—headed by that very capable gentleman to whom the hon. member for Wentworth paid tribute the other evening—has been exactly on that basis. That is verified by some suggestions put out by their respective periodicals in advance of this legislation coming into effect.

Then in reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton South I would say that as the act now stands the minister has no authority whatever to influence the award of any war veterans allowance in any degree. I should like to reassure him, and others who mentioned the matter, that there will be uniformity in the administration of the act under the plan suggested. The decision will be reached in the district, but it will be a joint decision where in difficult cases it is necessary for the district authority to consult with one or more members of the board. There will be no division of authority as between the board in Ottawa and the district authority as far as assessing a claim is concerned.

Then the suggestion was made that the allowance should be retroactive. It was announced that when the act goes into operation it was the intention to have payments begin as of the first of this fiscal year. As has been suggested here, a great many of these applications have come into our district offices, either through calls or in letters, since the parliamentary assistant made the announcement at the end of last session. Perhaps most of them have come in by now. When this legislation receives the royal assent and the districts can then complete the work already started, it is our intention that those who have applied, whether formally or informally, prior to or by April 1, 1950, and whose applications shall be approved, will receive the allowance as from April 1.

I think I shall leave the other matters until a later stage, and again I assure hon. members that at that time I shall be glad to discuss them fully.

Mr. Green: Would the minister explain a little more clearly what he means by a joint decision? Does that mean that an applicant in Vancouver must go before some board in the Vancouver district, but that such board will not have power to grant the allowance; that he will have to wait for approval by somebody here in Ottawa? If that is the case not very much time will be gained by having these decisions made in the districts. My understanding was that the board in the district would have power to make a decision, one purpose being that in this way payment would be made more quickly. Now, apparently, someone here in Ottawa is to be involved in that decision; someone here will have a part in it. I should like the minister to give us some further explanation as to just how that will work out.

Mr. Gregg: I do not propose to attempt to state in detail what the administrative arrangements will be, but I may tell my hon. friend this. It is the intention that the district authority shall indeed assess and decide upon what one might call the ordinary applications.

Mr. Green: And put them in payment?

Mr. Gregg: And put their decisions into effect as soon as they are reached. As I stated the other evening, most of the recommendations sent to Ottawa in the past have been approved. However, there will be borderline cases, which would be those that would make for lack of uniformity, the warning against which has been stressed here this evening. In those cases the local authority will consult without delay with the visiting member or members of the board in order to reach a decision, and when that decision is reached it will be put into effect.

Mr. Green: If the local board makes a favourable decision will there be any danger of that decision being upset by the review board here in Ottawa?

Mr. Gregg: Any decision in connection with the war veterans allowance is subject to review at any time, but under this arrangement it will not be any more subject to review than it has been in the past.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Gregg thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 180, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 86, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Mr. Green: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Chevrier: May I make a statement in committee?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Auditors.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, this is the usual bill introduced every year for the appointment of auditors for the Canadian National Railways. It is in the same form as it has been for the last number of years. The bill is based on the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, but that act provides for the appointment of auditors by way of a joint resolution. Since that method has been found cumbersome in the past, it has been thought by the government that the method of appointment should be by bill, as in this instance.

This bill seeks the appointment of George A. Touche and Sons, a firm of chartered accountants whose offices are in both the city of Toronto and the city of Montreal. For all purposes, the bill is in the same form as that of last year.

Mr. Green: This is the first year a bill has been brought in in this particular form?

Mr. Chevrier: No, the form is the usual form.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I take it from the smile on the minister's face that he is expecting the question I am going to ask. Has consideration been given since last year, or the year before, to the proposal that has been made by various members in this house, including on one occasion the member for Coast-Capilano, that the auditing of the accounts of the Canadian National Railways be done by the Auditor General?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, the proposal has been given consideration, but for the reasons given last year and the year before the government has not seen fit to appoint the Auditor General for the purpose of auditing the accounts of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Knowles: Wrong again.

Mr. Adamson: What is the fee this company receives?

Mr. Chevrier: The fee is $55,000 per year. It has been increased since 1946 when it was $51,000.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Mr. Chevrier: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Chevrier moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

ONTARIO-MANITOBA BOUNDARY

AMENDMENT OF MANITOBA AND ONTARIO BOUNDARIES EXTENSION ACTS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the second reading of Bill No. 87, to amend the Manitoba Boundaries Extension Act, 1912, and the Ontario Boundaries Extension Act.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before this bill is read the second time, could the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) say whether this bill adds to or subtracts from the province from which he and I come?

Mr. Ralph Maybank (Winnipeg South Centre): The bill takes away a few feet from Manitoba. More or less jocularly I answered the member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) one day, and told him it took some away from Ontario, but it is the other way about.

It arises from this fact, that there was a point established between the two provinces, a point at either end of the line. At a later time a survey was made from the lower point towards the higher point. When the surveyors got up to the point they were a little out of the way from the point that had been originally established. Now, the boundary commission made up of representatives of Ontario, of Manitoba and of the dominion desired to monument that line. It is very much easier to ask that this boundary as now set out in this bill be established and be monumented at a cost of $12,000, rather than go to the very great expense of resurveying to make sure at which place the particular point ought to be. That is about all there is to the bill.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Construction of certain sections.

Mr. Herridge: Would the member for Winnipeg South Centre inform us as to the distance of the error in the survey and the area concerned?

Mr. Maybank: I think it is in the neighbourhood of about thirty feet.

Mr. Knowles: Linear, square, or cubic?

Mr. Maybank: It is only a few feet, at any rate. Then, of course, that makes one big triangular piece.

Mr. Knowles: There is no pipe line through there?

Mr. Maybank: No, and I do not think it is suitable to build a pipe line.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Coming into force.

Mr. Knowles: Can the hon. member say whether the two provinces have acted in this matter as yet?

Mr. Maybank: The provinces have indicated not merely their consent, but their desire. I do not think it has come in formally, but the act will not be proclaimed until the formal consent is in. It is for that reason the bill says it will come into force when proclaimed.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow is transport day. There is resolution No. 12 on today's order paper concerning the grade crossing fund. There is Bill No. 135, an act to amend the Department of Transport Stores Act, and Bill No. 153, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Mr. Green: We have had the latter bill for only a day or two. Could we have a little time on it?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We shall leave it, but it will be the last one, and we shall probably go into supply.

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. gentleman wants some time, he may have it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We shall go into committee of supply and take up the estimates of transport. If we conclude that we shall go ahead with the estimates of veterans affairs.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 5, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

PRISONERS OF WAR

REFERENCE TO ANSWER TO QUESTION ON MAY 4

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting myself and other members of the house. Yesterday I was informed that an answer had been given to a question I had placed on the order paper concerning Canadian prisoners of war. The question was in two parts. The first dealt with numbers and the second with the total man days Canadians had been detained.

The answer to the first part was complete, but the information I asked for in the second part was denied, the statement being made that this information could be obtained only by a review of each of the files of the 9,552 prisoners of war. Representations have been made to me and to other members of the house that Canadian prisoners of war be paid one dollar for each day of their internment, similar to the amount that it is claimed was paid in the United States. Without knowledge as to the total number of man days Canadians were detained, it is impossible to assess how practical this suggestion is. Therefore I would request that the question be replaced on the order paper, and that I be given the information I desire.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

TABLING OF BOOKLETS PREPARED BY DEPARTMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to lay on the table two booklets prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce, the first of which is entitled "Canadian Industrial Development Manual" and the second "Expand With Canada". These booklets were prepared for distribution abroad. The information contained therein is designed to assist foreign businessmen in the establishment of industries in this country, and also to further the expansion of the export trade to Canada. Hon. members may be interested in looking over these examples of Canadian publicity designed for our markets abroad.

PUBLIC WORKS

UNEMPLOYMENT—SURVEY OF GOVERNMENT PROJECTS

Mr. George Prudham (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, on May 1 the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) inquired about the answers given to a set of questions asked by him. The answers appear at page 1569 of Hansard. The hon. member suggested that some of the answers are contradictory, and referred particularly to the answer to the second question. That question was:

When was this survey made, on what date were the results thereof reported, and to whom?

The answer given was:

From April to September, 1949. The results were summarized in the annual report of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1949, page 506, tabled in parliament on November 14, 1949.

This answer is correct. However, I appreciate the point raised by the hon. member. The survey was made between the dates mentioned, which were after the end of the fiscal year covered by the report. Annual reports tabled by departments are prepared after the year has ended. By the time the report for the Department of Reconstruction and Supply had been prepared, the survey referred to was completed, and therefore a reference to it was made in the introduction to the report which was tabled on November 14, 1949.

Mr. Knowles: Should not that reference to the pages in the report be "pages 5 and 6" rather than "page 506"? It is only a sixteen-page booklet.

Mr. Prudham: It should be "pages 5 and 6" of the report.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to ask the Minister of Resources and Development a question arising out of the answer his parliamentary assistant gave to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He said that the report of the department for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1949, contained information with respect to a survey that had been made between April and September of that year. Is it understood that the reports of departments contain information beyond the dates which they are supposed to cover? This is a peculiar situation, and hon. members ought to be advised as to the facts.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): In his answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the parliamentary assistant said clearly that the reference to the survey was made only in the introduction to the report for the year ending March 31, 1949.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the Minister of Resources and Development to take a further look at this whole matter. I do not think the answers tally.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

STANDING ORDERS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Matthew MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria) moved:

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—RADIO BROADCASTING—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough) be substituted for that of Mr. Isnor on the special committee on radio broadcasting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to give to the house an indication of the measures it is expected that the house will be asked to consider during the present session in addition to those already on the order paper. Hon. members will recall that this information was asked for some days ago by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) mentioned it again on Wednesday.

There will of course be the budget legislation, the appropriation bill, and the usual measure respecting the financing of Canadian National Railways. The Minister of Finance also plans to introduce amendments to the following statutes: Foreign Insurance Companies Act; Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act; Tariff Board Act; Trust Companies Act; Loan Companies Act. I understand that all these amendments are of a minor nature to facilitate the administration of the statutes.

It is expected that there will be legislation to revise the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act and to implement the tax agreement with France.

The Minister of Agriculture plans to introduce a measure respecting the Cold Storage Act. This is merely to repeal part II of the act, which has never been applied, and for the purposes of which there is now other legislation which is being used.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration will have a bill to revise the Indian Act, and may also have an amendment to the Canadian Citizenship Act. The Minister of Justice may introduce an amendment to the Official Secrets Act, and a statute law amendment bill respecting proceedings by and against crown corporations, to facilitate the recourse of individuals against such corporations.

The Minister of National Revenue plans to bring in an amendment to the Customs Act. The Postmaster General expects to have an amendment to the Post Office Act.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce plans to present a bill respecting defence purchasing, as well as amendments to the following statutes: Canada Grain Act; Gas Inspection Act; Electricity Inspection Act.

The Minister of Transport has an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act, which has been referred to already in debate. In addition to legislation, it is expected that there will be resolutions to approve the international convention on northwest Atlantic fisheries and the world meteorological convention.

Various departments are giving consideration and have been giving consideration for some time to certain other measures, and it is possible that some of these may be introduced and given first reading so that they may be available for consideration by hon. members and the public during the parliamentary recess. It is not expected that there will be any desire to have them enacted into legislation at this session. It has frequently been found to be satisfactory to members of the public who are interested to have bills read the first time and distributed so that in the recess they may receive consideration and representations may be made in connection therewith.

While I am not in the confidence of my colleagues with respect to it, I understand that there may be a bill respecting a residence for the Prime Minister.

Hon. members will realize that unforeseen circumstances or developments may require parliament to consider some additional matters, but that does not appear to be likely. I think what I have indicated, together with what we have on the order paper, will complete the list of matters to which we shall be inviting consideration at this session.

INDIAN ACT

QUESTION AS TO PROPOSED REVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): May I ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of his recital of the various legislative matters that are to be brought before parliament this session? I have reference to the proposed revision of the Indian Act. I am sure that other hon. members have received many letters, as I have, with regard to this matter; and I could refer particularly to one letter which was directed to me by an Indian living in Saskatchewan.

From all provinces letters have been received from Indians, interested as they are in the revision of the act, asking that before the amendments are actually introduced they be given an opportunity to send representative chiefs and other head men of their tribes to consult with members of the government to the end that the source of their complaints may be removed in the amending legislation.

I make this suggestion in the spirit of trying to remove all resentment, unjustified no doubt as it is, in particular arising from the hunger strike of Jules Sioui. Apparently his action has aroused the representatives of the Indian reservations throughout Canada. If the Prime Minister can see his way clear to arrange it before the legislation is introduced, I think a meeting with the Indian chiefs would go a long way toward removing this feeling of resentment.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the tone of the representations made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and the spirit in which he made them. Nevertheless it is our understanding that the Indians are anxious to have this legislation brought before parliament. This matter has been discussed. The department felt it had all the information required for the drafting of the legislation, and that it would be desirable that the bill be given first reading and be distributed, and then that a sufficient lapse of time be allowed so that interested chiefs and other members of their bands may see what it contains and make representations. Of course it is legislation in the interests of the Canadian nation, but more particularly for the Indians themselves. If it appeared from their reaction to the bill that they would prefer not to have it adopted at this session but rather to have further discussions with them and further consideration of the legislation, their views would be given sympathetic consideration.

Without any date having been fixed as a target yet, I think we all hope that parliament will not remain in session for many more months. I believe it would be desirable, in order to respect a healthy tradition, namely, that bills should not be communicated to anyone before they are presented to members of parliament, that we should proceed with the first reading so that the bill may be made available, and then give it as wide circulation as may be desirable in order that the first citizens of Canada in chronological order may feel that we are doing our best to deal with the problems in which they are so vitally interested.

FISHERIES

RESTRICTED AREA FOR BOMBING RANGE OFF NORTH COAST OF P.E.I.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister established, or is he planning to establish, a restricted bombing range area for the R.C.A.F. of Summerside off cape Turner or Orby Head on the north shore of Prince Edward Island? If so, will the minister explain what this means, and how fishing interests will be protected?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member put the same question to my colleague the Minister of Fisheries, a few days ago.

Mr. McLure: And did not get an answer.

Mr. Claxton: I have nothing to add to the answer then given.

Mr. Fleming: Nothing plus nothing equals nothing.

TELEVISION

QUESTION AS TO PROVISION OF SERVICE IN VANCOUVER AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development, who is acting for the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Has the minister received any official representations from Vancouver seeking the establishment of television broadcasting in that area? If not, has any consideration been given to the provision of television service in the general Vancouver area?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I have received no such communication. I can assure the hon. member that if an application is received through appropriate channels, it will be given every consideration.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

QUESTION AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. In the earlier part of the session the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated that it was his intention to introduce amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The Prime Minister did not mention that in his list.

Mr. Ross (Souris): It is on the order paper.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There is notice on the order paper of the introduction of a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939. It was not proceeded with yesterday or today because, although the law officers had expressed the opinion that it did not require a resolution, we were afraid that there might be some discussion on the point. We thought it would be time lost to have such a discussion, and that it would be easier to bring in a resolution than to waste time deciding whether or not one was required.

SALES TAX

CIGARETTES AND TOBACCO—ABOLITION ON PURCHASES BY VETERANS IN MILITARY HOSPITALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Rooney (St. Paul's): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of National Revenue and have him take it as notice and give an answer as soon as possible, but before the session ends. For some time I have been asking for consideration of the question of abolishing the tax on sales of cigarettes and tobacco to veterans in military hospitals. I believe all members on both sides of the house would like to see this accomplished.

Mr. Speaker: Order. At this time the hon. member may ask a question, but he is not allowed to make a speech or advocate the removal of a tax.

Mr. Rooney: I should also like to ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid I cannot allow the hon. member to proceed at this time.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE ANNUAL GRANT TO GRADE CROSSING FUND

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Railway Act to increase the annual grant to the grade crossing fund from $500,000 to $1,000,000 for six consecutive years from April 1, 1951.

Mr. Green: Will the minister make a statement, please?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the object of the resolution is to increase from $500,000 to $1 million the amount which may be paid into the grade crossing fund. There will also be a provision to increase the payment which may be made in the case of any one project from $100,000 to $150,000.

I think it might be useful to the house if I were to give a short historical analysis of the grade crossing fund and the various changes, whether by way of amendment or otherwise, which have taken place from time to time.

The fund was established in 1909 by 8-9 Edward VII, chapter 32, section 7, which appropriated and placed to the credit of the fund $200,000 per annum for five years from April 1, 1909. Under this statute not more than twenty per cent of the cost of construction work could be paid out of the fund.

In 1914 the annual grants of $200,000 were extended for five more years. In 1919 those grants were extended for ten years from April 1, 1919, and it was provided that not more than twenty-five per cent of the cost of construction work could be paid out of the fund, with a further provision that not more than $15,000 could be paid in the case of any one crossing or for any one project. In 1926 the act was further amended to provide that the amount payable out of the fund in the case of any one crossing should not exceed forty per cent of the total cost, and should not in any case exceed $25,000. In 1928 the limit was increased to $100,000. In 1929 the annual grants of $200,000 were extended for ten years from April 1, 1929.

Between 1934 and 1939 additional amounts were credited to the fund under various statutes. No additions were made to the fund between April 1, 1939, and April 1, 1947, but by chapter 70 of the statutes of 1947 the fund was to be credited with $200,000 per annum for ten years from April 1, 1947. Again, by chapter 27 of the statutes of 1948, the annual amount to be credited to the fund for the nine years commencing April 1, 1948, was increased to $500,000.

As I have stated, this legislation will increase the annual grant for a period of six years to $1 million, beginning April 1, 1951. The house might like to have on record the amounts paid out of the fund over the last few years, which have been as follows:

1947-48	250,520
1948-49	293,916
1949-50	581,385

Mr. Brooks: Would the minister give the amounts by provinces?

Mr. Chevrier: I have those figures, but I think they should be given at the appropriate stage on the bill.

Payments authorized to be made out of the fund, as the house will have noticed from the statement I just gave, have increased consistently in the last few years, and because of that fact it has been found necessary to bring in the bill which will be founded upon this resolution. Many projects involving large grants from the fund are in prospect at the present time, and the board expects that over the next seven years applications for grants will continue to increase.

Another reason for bringing in this legislation at this time is the increase in the cost of construction. It is felt that the limit of $100,000 upon any one project, which was established in 1928, is no longer sufficient, because in 1950 costs have increased greatly, as the house knows. For that reason authority will be sought to raise the amount that may be allocated to any one project to $150,000.

There is more information that can be given at a later date, but I think what I have said should be sufficient for the resolution stage. I have no doubt this measure will commend itself to the house.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the railway grade crossing fund is always an interesting subject of discussion. In his review of the history of the fund the minister has indicated that the present resolution contemplates two broad purposes, the first being to increase the annual statutory amount available from $500,000 to $1 million per annum for the six years from April 1, 1951, and the second to permit $150,000 instead of the previous limit of $100,000 to be used for any one particular work coming within the scope of the act.

I do not propose to review the history of this legislation, except to say very briefly that these provisions, which are embodied in section 262 of the Railway Act, have been most beneficial in their operation during the forty-one years they have been in effect. The amounts made available under the statute, of course, do not represent all the money that has been paid into the railway grade crossing fund and made available for crossing protection. During the days of the depression, particularly, large sums of money were made available by parliament to supplement the annual statutory grant, which at that time was $200,000.

Hon. members will realize that during the forty-one years the railway grade crossing fund has been in existence a substantial total amount of money has been made available by parliament. The annual report of the Department of Transport for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1949, shows that total authorizations from 1909 to 1949 amounted to $14,062,000 odd. Certain of those authorizations lapsed, but total expenditures to March 31, 1949, were just under $12 million.

Hon. members will also realize, of course, that this does not represent the entire amount that has been expended on grade separation during this period. That total of some $12 million simply represents the contribution made by parliament toward the cost of grade separation and crossing protection works, under the direction of the board of transport commissioners. The minister has not given the total amount spent for this purpose, though he did so when the 1948 amendment was before the house. While I have not seen the latest figures I think they probably amount now to something like $50 million which has been spent in this period of time on grade separation works, which includes the contribution of $12 million from the railway grade crossing fund.

The uses to which the fund has been put in these years have been uniform. The fund has always been designated by parliament, and is still designated, as being for the following purpose: to aid actual construction work for the protection, safety and convenience of the public in respect of highway crossings of railways at rail level in accordance with the provisions of section 262 of the Railway Act. I infer from the statement the minister has made today that no enlargement of or changes in the scope of those purposes are intended.

On the subject of the limit on individual grants, sir, it is quite clear, from a review of this legislation in the forty-one year period it has been on the statute book, that the practice of parliament has been from time to time to increase both the percentage and the total amount which may be ordered by the board of transport commissioners to be contributed out of the railway grade crossing fund to the cost of any crossing protection. This has been a uniform development throughout the period. The direction of the change has always been upward, both as to percentage and total amount. It is interesting to hear the minister indicate that one of the purposes of the bill is to increase, not the percentage, but the total amount for any one work from $100,000 to $150,000, for the ample reasons which the minister has given.

In indicating the reasons why this measure should be entitled to support, I should like to say briefly that there are some factors that are readily apparent. When the railway grade crossing fund was first established, it was intended to assist in meeting principally the problem of maintaining public safety; that is the paramount consideration in the application of these moneys. On the other hand, there are additional considerations, such as the question of public convenience, more expeditious transportation on the part of both the railways and those using the highways, and, to some extent, employment. These have been factors worthy of consideration.

The report of the board of transport commissioners for the year ended December 31, 1948—the report for the calendar year 1949 is not available in printed form as yet—indicates not merely what has been the trend of accidents at level crossings in the past, but also how the accidents have been influenced by the type of crossing protection available at these highway crossings. At page 97 of the report we have the figures for the ten-year period 1939-1948 showing that at crossings of highways and railways in this period there have been 3,541 accidents, in which 1,342 people were killed and 5,024 people were injured. The year 1947 had the highest accident record in the ten-year period. In that year there were 638 persons injured and 162 killed in 442 accidents.

Let us just translate those statistics into other figures. It means that every day of the year there was an average of more than one accident at a railway crossing. In the year 1948 there were 414 such accidents, with 159 persons killed and 566 injured.

A further table on the same page of the report of the board of transport commissioners indicates how those accidents in the year 1948 were related to the type of protection existing at the crossings where the accidents occurred. I mentioned that there were 414 accidents in that year. This is how the statistics are broken down in the report: Number of accidents which occurred at crossings protected by gates, 8; number of accidents which occurred at crossings protected by automatic highway traffic signals, one; number of accidents which occurred at crossings protected by bell, 6; number of accidents which occurred at crossings protected by bell and wigwag, 40; number of accidents which occurred at crossings protected by flashing light signals and bells, 10; number of accidents which occurred at crossings protected by watchmen, 7; number of accidents which occurred at crossings unprotected, 342.

It will thus be seen that of those 414 accidents in the year 1948 over eighty per cent of them occurred at unprotected crossings. I submit, sir, that is a fact of great significance in our approach to this problem, and the question presented to us whether the house should authorize an increase from $500,000 to $1 million per annum in the fund.

I am sure hon. members of this house are going to approach this question from two points of view. Not the less important or less urgent of the two is the humane consideration. The fact that we have, as revealed in the figures I have just read, a record of death, maiming and tragedy to many families in this country, will give every member of the house cause for deep regret, and a desire to do what may reasonably lie within the power of parliament to meet the needs of the situation. I am sure I do not need to dwell on that aspect of the problem.

Because the problem has economic aspects as well, sir, I mention these briefly. As I understand them, every one of these economic factors favours the increase in the proposed statutory appropriation. As the minister mentioned, there is, first, the increased cost of crossing protection works, and that has been a factor of great importance. The limitation that has existed of $100,000 has meant that the fund has not been available to carry the full share that might well be expected of it when works of major importance and high cost have been directed by the board of transport commissioners.

The second aspect, sir, is the plight of the railways. The railways are faced with serious financial problems. I am not going to discuss any questions that are now engaging the attention of the royal commission on transportation, or have been engaging the attention of the board of transport commissioners. I do say that the railways are faced with serious financial problems, and they are not in a position to undertake the cost of a program of crossing protection in this country on any substantial scale.

A third factor, sir, and it is one to which importance must be attached, is the fact that throughout the years there has been an increased tendency, recognized in the legislation, for the public represented by parliament, to participate in meeting the costs of these grade separation works. Mention has already been made of the way in which the percentage and amount available out of the fund for any particular work have been increased by legislation. It is a fact that the invariable tendency of legislation pertaining to the fund since its inception has been to increase provision for public contribution to the cost of grade separation works. Indeed, even within the limits created by parliament, the board of transport commissioners, in awarding sums out of the grade separation fund toward the cost of crossing protection, has applied a similar tendency on its own part. In a decision of the board in 1928, the case of Toronto v. C.P.R. and C.N.R., reported in 34 Canadian Railway Cases at page 143, the board recognized that tendency in these words:

The tendency, on the whole,—

That is to say, the tendency within the jurisprudence of the board in relation to awards out of the fund.

—has been to increase the percentage contribution which the city or municipality is required to make.

That is to say, the portion that the public has been called upon to contribute by reason of the public use of these crossings.

The fourth factor is the great and extensive highway improvement program undertaken by most, if not all, of the provinces. This highway improvement and extension program is a factor that is going to have a direct bearing upon the question of crossing protection.

A fifth factor is the heavy increase in highway traffic. I have obtained some statistics on this subject, but the statistics for 1949 are not yet available. Anyone who has made a study of the increase in highway traffic will not fail to have been profoundly impressed by the tremendous increases that have occurred during the period of the life of the railway grade crossing fund.

The earliest figures on the numbers of motor vehicles registered in Canada go back to 1904, when there were 535 registered. In 1909, the year when the railway grade crossing fund came into existence, there were 4,809 motor vehicles registered in Canada. Every year, with scarcely any pause, save in several of the depression years, there has been a steady increase in the number of motor vehicles registered in Canada. I mention the figures for only a few of the years. In 1915 there were 95,284; in 1920, 408,790; in 1925, 724,048. The million mark was passed in the year 1928. In 1935 there were 1,176,000. In 1940 the 1,500,000 mark was passed. In 1948 the number of motor vehicles registered in Canada had passed the two million mark. The figure for that year is 2,035,352.

Parliament must have regard to that stupendous increase, during the relatively short period of time to which I have referred, in the number of motor vehicles using our highways in all the provinces, and in the number of vehicles that are daily crossing railways at grade.

A sixth factor that might be mentioned is the higher speed of motor vehicles today. The higher speed of motor vehicles has unquestionably been a factor in the accident toll at grade crossings; and the fact stares us in the face that more powerful motorcars are being turned out all the time, and that the degree of care exercised by drivers has not always kept pace with the increase in the power of the motorcars under their control.

Then there is one additional factor, although it has not always been as potent a factor as it was during the depression years when parliament was voting additional moneys for the purpose of providing employment while proceeding with the beneficial work of eliminating crossings. It is a fact that at different times during the depression years the fund was exhausted because so many grade separation schemes or crossing protection schemes were undertaken, and there was not always enough money in the fund to meet the demand. There are in Canada, more particularly in certain areas, problems of unemployment to which beneficial works carried on with the assistance of the railway grade crossing fund can help to contribute a solution.

In conclusion, therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say that the house must recognize the need for increasing the sums provided at the public expense to contribute toward these works of grade separation and crossing protection which are of general public benefit. We have a bigger problem in this respect today than we had in the past. The bigger problem justifies an increase in the funds voted by parliament.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express support of the legislation anticipated by this resolution. My only regret is that it does not go a bit further.

It so happens that the constituency I represent, Winnipeg North Centre, has the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway cut into it at the eastern end; and then that railway line, after forming the northern boundary of the constituency for most of its length, bisects it again at the western end. In other words, there are grade crossings in Elmwood at the eastern end of my riding, and in Brooklands at the western end.

I make reference to that fact because I think it serves to justify the principle which is at the heart of this grade crossing legislation, namely that the cost of these grade separation projects is a cost that should not be borne to any extent, if at all, by the local people. After all, the line of the railway to which I have referred is the main line of the Canadian Pacific running from Montreal to Vancouver. Since that line serves the whole of Canada, and since its revenues are derived from all over Canada in part because it is able to go through the two communities that I have named, surely it should not fall upon those communities to protect themselves against the hazards of grade crossings in those areas.

It seems to me there is no doubt as to the justification for this principle, namely, that at least a good-sized portion of the cost of the grade crossings should be paid for out of the general revenues of the nation rather than that that cost should be imposed upon the local people. In fact, when I think of a community such as Brooklands, at the west end of Winnipeg, or a community such as Elmwood, which, although it is part of Winnipeg, is at the east end of the city and is in a sense a community by itself, I cannot see any fairness in their having to pay anything at all towards the elimination of grade crossings on the main transcontinental line of the Canadian Pacific railway. So I earnestly hope that as time goes on it will be recognized that the cost of eliminating the hazards of level crossings in such areas should be borne, I would say, by two authorities, namely, the federal government and the railway concerned.

As it now stands, a community such as Brooklands could apply for the elimination of one or two grade crossings where the Canadian Pacific railway passes through the village. But the public finances of that particular community are limited, and they know it would be useless to apply, because, if the application were granted, in the end a portion of the cost would be assessed back to them by the board of transport commissioners. This makes it completely prohibitive so far as that community is concerned.

Elmwood is not in a much better position, because, although it forms part of the city of Winnipeg, and it would be the city that would have to make the application and therefore bear part of the cost, when the people of Elmwood go before the city council in Winnipeg they find themselves confronted with the fact that they are just one community at one end of the city. The city must think twice before taking money out of the city treasury to remedy a condition at one corner of the city, when they also have in mind the factor I have already indicated, namely, that the need for the grade separation in question arises because a transcontinental railway happens to go through that area.

The minister knows that from time to time I have raised the question of the grade crossings in the areas to which I have just referred, and have expressed the hope almost every year that necessary changes would be made in the legislation so that these particular grade crossings might be eliminated.

I am sure when I refer to Elmwood and Brooklands in Manitoba I am citing cases which are but typical of many like unto them throughout the country. There must be many a municipality, through which a main line or even a branch line of a railway passes, which cannot afford the money it would have to pay—the share of the cost that would be assessed against it—if it did make application to the board of transport commissioners for a grade separation and such application were granted. Yet in these cases the hazards are such that the grade crossings should be eliminated.

I must also express disappointment in the fact that the hope the minister held out to me a couple of years ago seems to have been put on the shelf—and I use that figure of speech advisedly. As late as April 20, 1948, as it is recorded at page 3167 of Hansard, the minister told me that, at the request of the then department of reconstruction and supply, the board of transport commissioners had made a survey of possible grade separation projects—and I quote the minister's words:

—so that there would be on the shelf a list of projects of a public nature upon which certain sums of money might be expended when the need arose.

The minister went on to make it clear that the projects envisaged when the department of reconstruction and supply asked the board of transport commissioners to make that survey were to be paid for not out of grade crossing funds, but out of other funds to be appropriated by the government. Nevertheless that statement from the minister did suggest to me the hope that the shelf concept of the government had not yet been put on the shelf, and that in due course provision might be made thereunder to eliminate the grade crossings in the community of Elmwood.

I still have on my files a copy of the front page of the Elmwood Herald of Thursday, May 6, 1948.

Mr. Fleming: Is that your picture on the front page?

Mr. Knowles: Thank you for drawing attention to it. The leading article of this issue refers to the discussion which took place in the House of Commons on April 20, 1948. This indicates the sort of hope that it gave to the people of Elmwood who were interested in the matter. The most important statement of the minister on that occasion was that although he could not see any way in which I could persuade him that the grade crossing in Elmwood could be eliminated under the legislation as it stood, still there was this survey that had been made at the request of the department of reconstruction and supply, and the chances were pretty good—since there were a great many of these grade crossings reported upon in that survey—that the ones I was interested in might be on the shelf to be proceeded with when the time came for the government to implement that shelf concept with respect to public works projects.

Well, I am afraid we have to come back to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). The shelf concept has been put on the shelf. We are not going to get public works projects, as was so clearly promised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) back in April of 1945, for the purpose of relieving unemployment and providing these necessary public improvements.

This means that so far as grade crossings are concerned we are left with only one means by which they can be built, namely, under the provisions of the grade crossing fund. This being so, since the matter is back on the doorstep of the Minister of Transport I hope he will give still more earnest consideration to the plight of communities such as I have mentioned—and I have referred to them because they are in my constituency; but I am sure there are many like them across Canada. I hope he will give more consideration to their plight and try to find some way to broaden the provisions of the grade crossing legislation so that the hazards experienced by these communities through which main lines of railways pass, hazards which are not the fault of the people in those communities, can be eliminated by the building of more grade separation projects.

I suggest that if the Minister of Transport will give more thought to this matter, not only will he be giving due consideration to the sacredness of human life, and to the points made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), but he will also be taking on at least part of the job of providing employment, with which his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce seems unprepared to proceed—even in a time of serious unemployment.

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I suppose all hon. members can make references to situations in their respective parts of the country, so far as railway crossings are concerned. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) having referred to a situation in his constituency, I am bound to say that there are other places in Manitoba where there is very heavy traffic, which are of equal significance and often present greater hazards.

He has referred to a railway crossing in an ordinary, settled community. I would place on record for hon. members, and for the benefit of the minister, another situation in our province which I believe deserves special consideration. Just west of Winnipeg the two main lines of railways approach the city of Portage la Prairie, and are crossed on both sides of that city by the trans-Canada highway. This, in itself, presents a serious problem in a rural part of the country where, for the most part, automobile traffic travels faster, and the ordinary means of protection, such as stop signs, are sometimes forgotten.

On those crossings there are the ordinary stop signs; no doubt most people recognize them. However they have the very serious disadvantage in that all cars are supposed to stop, thereby holding back for a considerable distance traffic that might otherwise get out of the way—and this might happen when there might not be a train within miles.

My point is that in places where there is heavy traffic it would seem to be common sense and perhaps economical in the end if the traffic were stopped only when trains were in the vicinity instead of requiring everybody to stop every time they come to a railroad crossing.

This brings me to one other thought I want to present to the minister, and in this connection I should like to give an illustration. Take where the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific main lines cross the trans-Canada highway at two different places. This would seem to warrant the argument that the provinces and the railroads, possibly with the help of the grade crossing fund, should bear a larger proportion of the cost for highway crossings in those places than might be the case in other places.

The trans-Canada highway is something affecting all Canada or all of a particular province, and it would seem to me that the local people have some right to ask that their proportion of any cost for protection of this nature should be lower than what others are required to pay. I submit that for the consideration of the minister and to those who may be interested, not only in the grade crossing problem by itself but also having regard to the trans-Canada highway.

I should like to make one more observation. There is a situation between Portage la Prairie and Winnipeg which is quite hazardous and I hope the minister will see that adequate stop signals are put on there at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: Before the debate continues I should like to point out that the house is considering a resolution which precedes the introduction of a bill. It does not seem to me that it is in order at this time to discuss individual cases or to make pleas to the minister that consideration be given by him or his department to changing conditions at particular points, where the railroads cross a highway. That would be quite in order at another time, but at the present time hon. members should discuss the general principle set forth in the resolution.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a word. I come from a riding which is crossed by the main line of the Canadian National Railways and where the situation is quite serious, both in hazards to human life and in the great inconvenience and loss of time on busy city thoroughfares traversed by this main line. I think the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have outlined the situation quite fully and the general considerations which should apply. I fully endorse what they have said and I should like to be on record as supporting the measure.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) upon his comprehensive remarks with regard to this matter. I feel that the amount being set aside for this purpose is entirely inadequate to meet the needs. I am sure that in my province for every crossing that is protected there are twenty where there is no protection at all. Perhaps this was all right in 1909 when we had only $200,000 provided for this purpose, but that amount at that time compares more than favourably with the $1 million being voted at this time. According to the statistics given by the hon. member for Eglinton, there were only a few thousand motor cars registered in 1909 whereas over 2,500,000 cars are registered today and that does not take into consideration the hundreds of thousands of cars that come here on visits from the United States.

I am sure it must occur to everyone that this amount is inadequate for the protection needs of this country. The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) referred to the trans-Canada highway. I think some provision will have to be made to provide protection in those towns through which the trans-Canada highway passes. We expect that that highway will pass through our town in New Brunswick—I see the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) smiling—and we have a crossing situation there which is very dangerous.

It does seem to me that the provisions of the Railway Act should be extended to protect those areas where gates, lights and so on are not sufficient. As the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa mentioned, traffic is often held up for quite long periods. With the trans-Canada highway going through populated centres like the one I have referred to there are going to be many holdups of traffic. Of course, that is not the serious feature as far as protection is concerned—the loss of life is the most serious—but it should be considered. More protection should be provided to the public at these crossings than is provided at the present time.

As I said a moment ago, $1 million is only a drop in the bucket. Perhaps some other means could be adopted to provide the necessary protection, but there is no doubt that the present protection does not meet the needs of the situation in Canada today. I hope that in future some other provision will be made for the protection of the public in this regard.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make just one observation. I think the figures that have been given indicate the wisdom of the government in acceding to certain pressure by myself to amend the Railway Act to abolish whistle signals in built-up centres. The huge majority of these accidents take place at stops which are unprotected. Protection by means of wigwags or bells is of extreme value and the measure which I fought for and which was finally adopted to stop the nuisance of whistle blowing in a particular area in my riding has been effective and has in no way been responsible for causing highway crossing accidents.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister going to answer some of the questions that have been asked, or does he want some more?

Mr. Chevrier: I think most of the questions raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre are of the type that should be raised when the bill is before us. We are dealing now with the principle of the resolution, namely, whether or not there should be an increase from $500,000 to $1 million. I think that matters that he and other members have raised as to particular projects might well be taken up when we have the bill before us.

Mr. Knowles: Or they might be taken up on your estimates later today.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 181, to amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, if it is the desire of the house we could go into a discussion of the bill now, and I could deal with the individual projects mentioned by hon. members. I am in the hands of the house.

Mr. Knowles: Have you enough copies of the bill for those of us who do happen to be here?

Mr. Chevrier: Has the hon. member not got a copy of it?

Mr. Knowles: It could not be distributed until it has had first reading, and that just took place a minute ago.

Mr. Chevrier: I am ready to proceed with second reading now if it is the wish of the house.

Mr. Drew: While I feel sure everyone is anxious to facilitate discussion of the bill, I think it would be well to follow the regular procedure and wait until the bill in printed form is before members of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time? Next sitting of the house.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT STORES

AMENDMENT OF ACT WITH RESPECT TO OUTSTANDING ADVANCES, OBSOLETE STORES, ETC.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 135, to amend the Department of Transport Stores Act.

Mr. Drew: Is the minister making a statement?

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if I could make the statement in committee. Is there any objection to my doing so in committee?

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. Fleming: It would be preferable to have it in the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Your leader has said there is no objection.

Mr. Drew: I was only speaking for myself. If anybody else has any objection then I would certainly suggest that we have the statement now.

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Outstanding advances not to exceed $5 million.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I think the house will expect some information with reference to the reasons why the department has seen fit to propose this bill to the house. I gave certain information when we had first reading of the bill, and I think that additional reasons should now be given for the proposed measure. The Department of Transport Stores Act was enacted in 1937 following the formation of the Department of Transport in November, 1936. There were at that time sixty stores depots scattered over Canada from coast to coast with as many as three, and in one instance four, in one city. There were also at that time ten separate votes in the department carrying their own stocks in a total of sixty stores depots. In the stores depots there were five or six separate compartments, and goods purchased under one appropriation were placed in one compartment and could not quickly be transferred to another compartment where the same stores were required. Now there is a consolidated account to meet stores requirements of fifty votes through thirty stores depots.

The purpose of the act was to enable the department to consolidate stores and stores depots, and to provide a centralized purchasing control over stores. To simplify the control and use of the stores the act provided for a single account called "Department of Transport stores account". This is the controlling account to which all stores are charged when purchased and to which all issues are credited.

In order to give the department working capital to be used for the purchase of stores in advance of appropriations voted by parliament the act authorized the Minister of Finance to advance to the Minister of Transport out of the consolidated revenue fund up to $1 million. This operates as a revolving fund. When the stores are issued for use in the various services such as lighthouse service, dominion steamers, air services, canals, etc., the value of such stores is charged to the proper appropriation and the revolving fund is credited with that amount. The fund is like the water in a well out of which the stores are drawn and which is fed by the appropriations. When stores are drawn the level of the water in the well is lowered but is restored again to its former level by new credits drawn from the appropriations.

There was a precedent for this fund in the Public Printing and Stationery Act amendment contained in chapter 5 of the statutes of 1928. Advances up to $700,000 were authorized to be made out of the consolidated fund to the king's printer to enable him to purchase materials and pay wages. This fund was subsequently increased to $2 million in 1946.

Section 6 of the Department of Transport Stores Act provided that the inventory of stores at the end of each fiscal year should not exceed the amount of stores inventory established as of April 1, 1937, which was $957,000. In 1939 the act was amended to increase this inventory ceiling to $1,250,000, and again in 1946 the inventory ceiling was further increased to $1,600,000. It is now considered that there should be no inventory ceiling at all and that it was a mistake to have one in the first place. The Right Hon. R. B. Bennett observed on second reading of the 1937 bill, as recorded at page 2488 of Hansard for that year, that it was a peremptory statement to put in a statute that the inventory must be reduced to the fixed limit, and that if in the course of business the minister did not find it possible to reduce the inventory he is confronted by a statute that says he must do it. The difficulty is that the officers of the department cannot foretell prior to March 31 what the inventory will be at that date, which would enable corrective action to be taken at the proper time. In commercial business a merchant can put on a sale to reduce inventory but the department cannot do this, and it cannot issue stores unless they are required. The tendency has been for the stores inventory to increase owing to increased prices and additional requirements in Newfoundland and elsewhere, and now it is far above the statutory limit, being estimated at $3,200,000 as at March 31, 1950. There is no machinery for reducing inventory except to stop buying and to issue out the stock on hand.

It is submitted that the proper control over the size of the inventory is found in the amount of money which is authorized to be spent on the purchase of stores and by a careful scrutiny of purchase orders before the same are placed. If hon. members will look at the bill they will see that there are four pertinent amendments.

1. It is proposed to increase the amount of the advances authorized under section 3 of the act as working capital from $1 million to $5 million. This is required for the following reasons: (a) Price increases. The $1 million will not go half as far as it did in 1939.

(b) Taking over Newfoundland stores estimated at $1,180,000.

Mr. Green: Where is that? What was the last one? Where were those stores?

Mr. Chevrier: I said taking over Newfoundland stores estimated at $1,180,000. What is the question?

Mr. Green: I did not hear "Newfoundland".

Mr. Chevrier:

(c) Expansion of stores services, particularly air services and government telegraph and telephone system transferred from public works.

(d) Contingencies and time lag between issue of stores and recovery from votes.

2. It is proposed to repeal section 6 of the act requiring an inventory ceiling. For reasons given above this requirement is considered impracticable.

3. It is proposed to amend section 8 of the act to provide for more flexibility in accounting practices. There have been disagreements over the interpretation of the act in relation to accounting matters, particularly in connection with the interpretation of the words "actual cost" appearing in this section. It would appear advisable to have the accounting practices determined by the minister of the department acting through his officers and the comptroller of the treasury acting for the Minister of Finance.

4. It is proposed to provide for writing off obsolescent, unserviceable and lost stores and to charge the value of the stores written off to appropriations made by parliament for this purpose.

Mr. Green: I believe there are quite serious objections to clauses 1 and 2, and if I may I shall put all the objections at one time, rather than divide my submission. Clause 1 provides that the amount of the advances to the Minister of Transport shall at no time exceed $5 million. Clause 2 deals with the value of the stores that may be held at any time by the department.

Clause 2 of this bill removes a restriction which has been in the act from the very start. I was very interested to hear the minister quote from the remarks of the late Lord Bennett when the original bill was introduced in 1937. He quoted the part that was quite innocuous as far as his own argument was concerned, but did not quote the parts which dealt with the other side of the story. In actual fact Mr. Bennett's submissions at the time were quite contrary to what one would gather from the extract read by the minister. When the original bill was brought in it was sponsored by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. At that time it was pointed out that quite a lot of excuses might be made for asking for $1 million, and Mr. Bennett had this to say at page 2488:

> I say to the minister in the light of experience that there is nothing more inviting to permanent officials than the possibility of having an advance of great proportions. The ease and facility with which they begin to buy supplies is known to everyone who has had to do with the department. If the minister can keep that item below $1 million I think he should so so.
> Mr. Howe: Today the stocks are about one and a half million. It will be my aim to see that at the end of the year there are no surplus stocks. Whether that is possible I do not know, but it was put at a million as a figure that will probably be necessary for a turnover of $3 million of supplies.

Later the then minister said:

> We are going to insist that no new purchases shall be made as long as we have anything in our total inventory suitable for the purpose. This consolidation will allow us to ship goods from our present stores to any part of the country where they are required.

Then Mr. Dunning, who was minister of finance, said:

> I am hoping that the minister will get it to even lower figures. I think he should be able to do so, having regard to the diverse nature of the present stores.

Then Sir George Perley asked some questions, and further on the present Minister of Trade and Commerce had this to say:

> The $1 million is a revolving fund. It is intended to purchase all supplies for stores, and then, as they go out they will be charged to the appropriation and the money will be applied from the appropriation to restore the $1 million fund.

Then there was an argument as to whether parliament should vote the money, and finally Mr. Dunning said:

> The way the matter will work is precisely the same as in the case of the king's printer's advance. That is to say, each year each branch of the Department of Transport will have in its vote what it requires for stores, but when it comes to purchasing them it will have to purchase from stores account, so it will be charged to the appropriation account of the department and credited to the stores account. The Minister of Finance is authorized to keep these stores up to $1 million but no greater amount.
> Mr. Bennett: To provide a working capital of $1 million.
> Mr. Dunning: A working capital of $1 million.

That has been the law ever since; we have had a revolving fund of $1 million. I quite agree that with Newfoundland coming into confederation, together with the general increase in costs there are reasonable grounds for increasing that amount. I believe both those reasons given by the minister have merit.

Mr. Chevrier: And, may I add, because of the air services branch being taken over.

Mr. Green: That same argument about air services was used in the previous debate. That was one of the reasons given then for having to put so much into the revolving fund.

Mr. Chevrier: But if I may interject, at that time the air services branch was in the Department of Transport, I take it, though I was not the minister then. As the hon. gentleman knows, it was transferred to the minister of munitions and supply, where it remained for a number of years, only coming back to transport in 1947, I think.

Mr. Green: But in his argument on that previous occasion the present Minister of Trade and Commerce gave as one of the reasons that there were aviation supplies to be purchased. No doubt there should be some increase in this revolving fund, but I suggest to the minister and to the committee that increasing it by five times, to $5 million, is not right. I suggest that the amount should be perhaps $3 million. I believe there is great merit in what Mr. Bennett had to say in 1937:

> . . . in the light of experience that there is nothing more inviting to permanent officials than the possibility of having an advance of great proportions.

Department of Transport Stores

Here they are being given a revolving fund just five times greater than the fund they have been getting along with since 1937. The other questionable feature about the bill is this provision in section 2 as a result of which there will no longer be any limit on the value of the stores held. In 1937 the limit was the value of the stores then on hand. Two years later, in 1939, a figure was set of $1,250,000. In 1946—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—the value of the stores that could be held was increased to $1,600,000. The amendment now before the committee wipes out that limitation; if it becomes law there will be absolutely no limit on the value of the stores that may be held.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this is a good place to do a little economizing. If larger inventories must be held than the value of $1,600,000, then the minister should name the figure and put it in the act. Instead of that he is asking for a provision which means, in effect, that the sky is the limit on the value of stores that can be held in stock.

That point was dealt with in the debate in 1937, and the present Minister of Trade and Commerce referred several times to the fact that there was no need for a larger amount. At page 2486 of Hansard of April 2, 1937, he said:

> Our annual purchases of stores are about $3 million and our stocks today are $1,500,000, which of course is an absurd figure. I have gone into the matter in an effort to have the stocks reduced and it has been explained to me that it is impossible to reduce them without legislation of this sort so that they may be combined for the various services.

As I said a few minutes ago, the minister said at page 2488 of the same volume:

> It will be my aim to see that at the end of the year there are no surplus stocks.

I do suggest that under these conditions the minister and his department are asking too much. There should be a lower figure set for the revolving fund, and a limit on the value of those stores which can be held by the department should be maintained. If this proposed amendment is carried, then we are just leaving the door open for extravagance and possible waste.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a few questions to help us understand the working of this fund. It has been referred to as a revolving fund. I take it that does not mean that any of those stores are sold, and the money received put back into the fund in that way?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Knowles: Rather, I take it that the Minister of Finance advances to the Minister of Transport this sum of money for the purchase of stores. Then, as that money is spent, the Minister of Transport gets it back into the fund by means of votes of parliament; is that correct?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: Does it work out that the Minister of Finance turns over to the Minister of Transport $5 million, and then the Minister of Transport waits until that gets down to a million or half a million, and has it then restored to the $5 million, or does the Minister of Finance keep the Minister of Transport supplied with $5 million at all times?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, with reference to the act as it now stands, the Minister of Finance makes available to the Minister of Transport the sum of $1 million, and that appropriation can be called upon from time to time as set out in section 4 of the act.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, the Minister of Transport can at the present time draw on the Minister of Finance for any amount up to $1 million to cover any items that have not yet been passed specifically by parliament?

Mr. Chevrier: That is my understanding.

Mr. Knowles: And that figure will be $5 million if this bill passes?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: It does seem to me that there is a case for increasing the amount for the reasons which the minister gave, but I wonder if the figure needs to be increased fivefold. Parliament meets six months out of the year, and there are supplementary estimates, and further supplementaries. It does seem to me that $5 million is quite an advance to have on hand. Will the minister also indicate, just as an example, where in the estimates now before us there are items that we are voting to pay for some of the things that have been bought out of these advances.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the first question, which will also I think answer the question raised by the member for Vancouver-Quadra, if there was not authority to increase the amount of stores that could be held by the department as set out in section 5, then we would be going contrary to the statute. The information that has been given to me is that at the moment, that is as of March 31, 1950, the estimated inventory stands at $3,250,000. That being the case—

Mr. Knowles: You are a lawbreaker.

Mr. Chevrier: —we would require at least authority to carry that amount. There are additional reasons for increasing the inventory, such as the expected expansion of the service stores required through the inclusion of the government telegraph and telephone system. They have been placed at $350,000. There is a sum required to cover the value of outstanding accounts receivable for stores issued, exclusive of Newfoundland, pending recovery from votes, $650,000; a sum required to cover the value of outstanding accounts receivable for issues from Newfoundland stores pending recovery from votes, $300,000; a sum required to provide a reasonable margin for unforeseen contingencies; for example, we have unusually heavy stock periodically to meet special service programs; and then there is the taking back into stores of stocks of materials not used on projects for which originally issued. There is a sum to cover further price increases, and other unforeseen contingencies, amounting to $500,000. It is in that way that the $5 million which is sought by virtue of section 5 is made up.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asks what votes there are in the estimates that provide for the purchase of stores. There are some 40 or 45 such votes in the estimates of the Department of Transport. For instance there are dominion steamers, marine agencies, canals, to name the ones I can think of as I go along. They are votes which cover amounts for stores required by those various branches of the department.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister know the approximate total of those votes to which he has just referred?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I do not.

Mr. Knowles: Do they amount to something less or more than $1 million?

Mr. Chevrier: They will amount to more than $1 million.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, unless we do pass this bill we leave the minister breaking the law.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think there is any doubt about it. It was for that reason I brought forward the amendment in 1946, in which I asked that the inventory ceiling be increased to $1,600,000.

Mr. Green: That is the limit of the stores held?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. When I brought in that amendment, I think the law as it stood indicated that at no time should there be stock on hand or an inventory of stores greater than that which existed at April 1, 1937.

Mr. Green: No, the minister is wrong in that. There was an amendment in 1939 that it be set at $1,250,000.

Mr. Chevrier: I was going on to say that the inventory of stores originally stood at $957,368, and that in 1939 section 6 was further amended to increase the inventory to $1,250,000. At that time, on April 1, 1946, the inventory of stores stood at $1,374,000.

Mr. Green: The war had something to do with that, I guess.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, the war had something to do with that. But at the time there were not in the department these items that I mentioned a moment ago and in my opening statement. There is therefore reason for increasing the amount, and the departmental officials, after consultation with the Minister of Finance, have come to the conclusion that the appropriate figure, having regard to the present position, should be $5 million.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure the minister will realize that what I am going to say is by no means personal, but I should like to get this point cleared up. It seems now to be clear that at the present time the department has exceeded both of the ceilings that are in the act: the ceiling as to the amount of advance, namely $1 million, and the ceiling as to the amount of the inventory which for the moment is $1,600,000. How long has the minister been breaking the law, if I may put it that way, and how has he managed to do it? Have there been orders in council? How do you get more money than the law provided you should get from the Minister of Finance and how have you handled these inventories in excess of the ceiling provided by law?

Mr. Chevrier: It has been approximately a year. My hon. friend will remember, I think, that I had on the order paper last year a bill to amend the Department of Transport Stores Act, but is was introduced toward the end of the session and it was thought there was not sufficient time to deal with it; it was therefore withdrawn and brought forward at this session.

Mr. Knowles: I still wonder what the legal position is. What will the Auditor General say about the fact that there has been this advance in excess of the amount provided?

Mr. Chevrier: It is the Auditor General who audits this stores account. The stores branch of the Department of Transport recommended this change after consultation, so I am informed by my officials, with the Auditor General and the Department of Finance and this proposed amendment results from the discussions. It is at the recommendation, I am informed, of the Auditor General that this is brought forward.

Mr. Knowles: To keep the minister out of jail.

Mr. Chevrier: Right.

Mr. Higgins: Would the minister mind going into this Newfoundland amount and explaining it to me? I think he said it is $1,180,000. Is that correct?

Mr. Chevrier: It is $1,180,000.

Mr. Higgins: What is that for? Is it railway alone?

Mr. Chevrier: It is not railway at all.

Mr. Higgins: What is it?

Mr. Chevrier: It is our stores that were taken over by the department following the entry of Newfoundland into the union, and consists mostly of stores at Gander.

Mr. Higgins: Gander stores?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Higgins: Not railway stores?

Mr. Chevrier: No. This has nothing to do with railways. The Canadian National Railways is a different matter altogether and is dealt with, as my hon. friend knows, in the annual budget and report of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Higgins: It is entirely Gander?

Mr. Chevrier: It is entirely transport. Part of it is in Gander and part of it is in St. John's; and there might be other stores as well.

Mr. Higgins: What would the $300,000 be? The same item?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No. I think we should give this matter a little further thought. It is perfectly clear, when you read the speeches which were made at the outset, that this thing had turned out absolutely differently from what was expected. I therefore think we should have another good look at it now before we greatly extend the scope of it. I should like to read from Mr. Howe's speech when expanding the thing originally. This is to be found in Hansard of April 2, 1937, at page 2486. I draw to your attention, Mr. Chairman, and to the minister's attention some of the things he said because I think, as has already been pointed out, that it is extremely easy to buy stores and to get them into stock and, I should think, extremely difficult to get the things cleared out. Incidentally, we shall not hold the minister too seriously accountable for having been a lawbreaker; of course, we are getting used to that sort of thing. Nevertheless, it does not encourage us to think that the thing is working excellently and then to learn that he has found it necessary to exceed by almost three times, if I remember aright, the amount he is supposed to carry. Let me read one or two things that were said, and I think we should consider them rather carefully because we are really plunging ahead further along a course which, I submit, up to the present, has proved to be not satisfactory. Mr. Howe said:

> As I said on the first reading, this is to simplify the bookkeeping and handling of stores in the Department of Transport. We believe that inevitably it will reduce the inventory of stores which are now carried—

And so on. Then he referred, as the minister has already done, to their having sixty store depots from coast to coast; and a little later on he said:

> Our annual purchases of stores are about $3 million, and our stocks today are $1,500,000, which of course is an absurd figure. I have gone into the matter in an effort to have the stocks reduced and it has been explained to me that it is impossible to reduce them without legislation of this sort . . .

The reason for that apparently was that there were complicated relationships among the different stores, and a lot of complicated bookkeeping, and the minister wanted to set up this one fund which he said was going to simplify things. Then he goes on and refers to the dominion steamers and the lighthouse service, and the canals; now of course we have the airports. Then Mr. Howe says this; I draw this particularly to the attention of the minister, and I think we should have some further information along this line before we go any further. Mr. Howe says further, as reported at page 2487:

> The bill provides that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Transport shall agree upon an initial price. That is necessary because some of these stores go back fifty years though they are still carried at cost price.

One of the things I should like to have before we go further in this is some kind of pedigree of the stores we have now. I should like to know what we have now that is, say, ten, twenty or thirty years old. Maybe this clean-up has been made. On the other hand I should like to know how much we have relative to what is used from time to time, because I understand the Hoover commission found that in one department in the United States they had stocked themselves up for fifty years into the future. You get it both ways. You have old stuff up to fifty years of age and then you have enthusiasts going ahead and buying away into the future.

Having said that, I should like to recall to you, Mr. Chairman, what the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has already said about how inviting it is to permanent officials to have money to spend. We all like money to spend, particularly if it is not our own money. I should like to get some kind of statement, not in exhaustive detail but nevertheless in a certain amount of detail, as to what is in there now.

There is another question I should like to ask the minister, and it is as to what extent the things that are in these stores are specialized things that cannot be bought elsewhere; in other words, which are not readily available through the ordinary channels of purchase. Have we got a lot of things in our stores which actually we could buy without delay in the ordinary course of merchandising? If that is so, why do we have these things? Because if we have them, it merely means that we are keeping up storehouses and paying people to look after them. These are things that occur to one offhand. I base them, to some extent, on the original expectation which was in the mind of the minister when this department was set up. I am just looking for another statement which Mr. Howe made. I have it now. Another thing Mr. Howe said was this:

> Today the stocks are one and a half million. It will be my aim to see that at the end of the year there are no surplus stocks.

To what extent have those aims been carried out? To what extent have we got a lot of people who are in the business of keeping stores and who probably like to keep stores? To what extent have we got stock that is piling up and perhaps should be cleared out? To what extent are we buying things away in advance? And finally, to what extent are we storing up things that we could buy in the open market in any of the places where we actually have these stores at the present time?

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member has asked some questions which I shall try to clear up. In the first place he would like to know what stores are on hand now. Of course, that is a little difficult to answer.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I admit I would not ask to get it down to the last detail.

Mr. Chevrier: He was kind enough to say he would not insist too much upon a strict interpretation of the question. There are at the present time some thirty stores depots in the department, from coast to coast. There would be a stores depot in Quebec, one in Victoria, another in Vancouver, another at Charlottetown, and now one at Gander. There would be in those stores depots all sorts of consumable stores.

It is difficult to give a detailed explanation of what they would be. But when the hon. member asked what the specialized stores might be, I can think of those in the radio service, those in the air service and those in the marine service. For instance, in marine stores at Quebec there would be all sorts of things required for the dominion icebreaking fleet, and for the steamers which take supplies to lighthouse keepers. Those are stores of a specialized nature.

It would not be easy, I think, to give a breakdown of the total inventory of the stores, although it is possible to give the total amount which, as I indicated a moment ago, is $3,200,000.

Then the hon. member inquired about a statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to the effect that an attempt would be made to get rid of obsolescent stores. I am informed by my officers that all obsolescent stores were disposed of back in 1937, and there are in our depots no stores purchased prior to 1937. At least one, and perhaps two, sections of the bill deal with obsolescent stores, and the manner in which they should be disposed of. I hope the house will agree that these provisions are a considerable improvement over what we had before.

Mr. Green: Does not the provision in section 8 make it easier to keep down the amount of stores on hand? My understanding of this new section is that it simplifies the procedure for getting rid of obsolescent stores. This means there would be fewer stores on hand, and that the ceiling could be that much lower.

Mr. Chevrier: It would not mean that there are fewer stores on hand, but it refers to the method by which obsolescent stores should be disposed of.

Mr. Green: It makes it easier to dispose of them.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, quite. But I wonder if we should discuss it before reaching that section.

Mr. Green: My understanding of the revolving fund is that it is required only for the purchase of goods needed before the appropriations are passed by the house; in other words, most of the purchases are covered by the appropriations put through the house. This revolving fund is merely to provide for goods that have to be kept in store, and that will be required before the appropriation can be put through?

Mr. Chevrier: I would not like to say that it is or is not. I think on the whole the hon. member is correct, but I did not follow his question as closely as perhaps I should have. The revolving fund is required not only to purchase stocks between the time the fiscal year ends and the amount is voted in the next fiscal year, but it is also to keep on hand stocks required from time to time.

For instance, about this time of year great quantities of stocks are required for our steamship service in connection with the opening of navigation. If the storekeepers of the various depots waited until this time to make their purchases, the ships would be held up. So that during the course of the winter, and even before that, they stock up with those things likely to be required by icebreakers and by the dominion steamers which replenish the supplies required by lighthouse keepers, and the like. So that the revolving fund is required for the purposes mentioned by the hon. member, but also for other purposes.

Mr. Green: But most of those purchases would be made out of money appropriated by parliament last year.

Mr. Chevrier: To a large extent.

Mr. Green: We passed estimates last summer, or last fall, so that the Department of Transport could buy most of those requirements. That point was dealt with by Mr. Howe in 1939 when, as reported at page 2642 of Hansard, he said:

> There are several departments that have revolving funds of that kind. For instance, the national harbours board is entitled to expend $1 million beyond its appropriation, with the understanding that this amount will be the first charge on the new appropriations. The printing bureau also has provision for a revolving fund, and I believe last year the Department of Mines and Resources set up a revolving fund for work among the Indians.

Will the minister tell us what other revolving funds there are at the present time? It looks as though this particular revolving fund of $5 million is the largest in the whole government service.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is; I understand it is the largest one. But the hon. member should not forget that the purchases of the Department of Transport, so far as stores are concerned, are perhaps the largest too.

Mr. Green: Of course the bulk of these purchases would be made out of moneys appropriated at the preceding session.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): One does not wish to have a lot of information just for the sake of having information; but I do think we are proceeding blindly at the present time. I am groping in my mind as to what would be a reasonable and feasible request—and perhaps the minister could improve upon it—but I would like to have at least a sample. I suggest that he might give us that information in respect of the larger stores—and he may pick out whichever he chooses, whether it be Montreal, Quebec, Toronto, or some other place. But we would like to have some idea as to the main categories of these stores, the value of them and, in particular, which of them are special things which could not be readily obtainable and would need to be kept in stock.

I suggest information of that kind should be given to us. I am quite ready to alter my requirements a little, if the minister would suggest something that would give me what I want, and which he would find easier to supply. I base these observations on the fact that this has turned out quite differently from what the minister had expected originally. While we are not labouring the point, he has told us that he has exceeded his authority—and I am sure he has done it in good faith, and has done it because he thought it was necessary.

As I say, however, I would like to have a cross section of these stores so that we may understand them. If the minister does not think that is the best way to give the information then, as I have said, I am quite ready to consider altering my question. We should have information of that kind; otherwise we are just becoming rubber stamps—which is not altogether unknown in this chamber.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think I can add much to what I said before. There are thirty or thirty-two stores in the department, scattered from one end of the country to the other. These stores have to do with marine services, canal services, air services, and telegraph and telephone services. Those again are broken down into other groups. I do not know that I am called upon to give an inventory of the different depots, and I do not know that my hon. friend wants that. I have indicated to the committee that the stores on hand are over $3 million. The section we are now discussing seeks authority to increase them to $5 million. I have given the reason why the officers of the department feel that $3 million would not be sufficient and that $5 million is required. I have indicated also that finance in consultation with treasury and the Auditor General's staff thinks that this is not only necessary but peremptory.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister in his usual nice way is trying to get this thing along. But, after all, all that the minister has done is to give us some generalities. He has asked us to accept his judgment as to the situation; he has referred to the finance department and to the Auditor General, all of which is quite impressive. But surely what I am asking is perfectly feasible. I am asking for an inventory of the main classes, let us say, in one of the largest depots, so that we may reach some conclusion and not merely be in the position we are so often asked to be in, of just accepting what the minister gives us.

The minister has given certain general reasons. I would point out to him that if we stick to general reasons I can go on and spend the rest of the afternoon quoting what the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said. Evidently the minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have entirely different ideas as to how this should be done. I do not think it is unreasonable to ask for the figures in regard to one of the depots.

Mr. MacInnis: I have not been present during all the time this bill has been before the committee, but I do not think it should be too difficult for the committee to have an understanding as to whether the minister is asking for too much. First of all, I think we ought to know the value of the stores bought and used during the year. Then we should like to know how the revolving fund comes in. When we know that we should be able to tell whether the amount the minister is asking for is too much or too little. If they are getting along or nearly getting along with $1 million, it seems to me that $3 million is rather high.

Mr. Knowles: He was not getting along with $1 million; he was breaking the law.

Mr. MacInnis: To what extent was he breaking the law? Was he getting along with a million and a half or with two millions? As long as the fund is properly handled I do not think it is particularly important whether it is a little bit too much or not. But the main thing is that it should not be so much as to create a tendency to buy goods that may not be used and be permitted to become obsolescent.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister give us assurance that if this clause passes the $5 million ceiling will be observed?

Mr. Chevrier: I think I can give the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the assurance that it will be observed.

Mr. Green: I think we are confusing the revolving fund, which is $5 million, and the stocks on hand, which at the present time are limited to $1,600,000. The minister has allowed the stocks to accumulate to a value greater than $1,600,000, but I do not think he has admitted yet that he has used more money than the old revolving fund of $1 million.

Mr. Knowles: He has admitted breaking both sections.

Mr. Chevrier: We are dealing with section 5. As I indicated, the value of the stocks on hand is $3,200,000, and according to the act it should be $1 million.

Mr. Green: Section 5 does not deal with the value of the stocks; it deals with the amount of advances to the Department of Transport.

Mr. Chevrier: We have exceeded the advances.

Mr. Green: By how much has the department exceeded those advances?

Mr. Knowles: A million or two.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that we have exceeded the appropriation by about $1 million.

Mr. Green: The minister has stated that up to date they have not required more than $2 million in this revolving fund, yet he is asking for an increase from $1 million to $5 million.

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, I do not think my hon. friend wants to create the impression that I have made that statement, because it is not so. It is just the reverse if anything. I have stated that the estimated value of the inventories is $3,200,000 and that, with the other items which I have given, we would require $5 million. I was asked by the hon. gentleman by what amount we had exceeded the advances, which is a different thing altogether.

Mr. Green: There are two different sections. One provides a revolving fund which at the moment is $1 million. The minister has said that his department has actually used in the revolving fund $2 million, which is $1 million over the amount permitted under the act as it stands at the present time. If the figure he gave was incorrect, let us have the right figure. If they have been using more than $2 million in the revolving fund, let us know what amount has been used.

Mr. Chevrier: The information I have is what I gave a moment ago.

Mr. Green: The information is that the most the department has used by way of the revolving fund is $2 million. I think even that figure is higher than the revolving fund of any other department. I suggest to the minister that his amendment, instead of calling for $5 million in the revolving fund which just gives the officials of the department that much more money to play around with, should call for $2,500,000 or $3 million. I submit that would be the proper business-like way to go at the question.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Department of Transport Stores

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No. I have asked a question to which I should like to have an answer. I do not know just where we go from here. I do not know whether I am going to be kept standing up and sitting down all afternoon. No suggestion has been made that my question cannot be answered, and so far as I know there has been no suggestion that it is unreasonable. If that is where we stand at the moment I suggest that the section stand until the information is available.

Mr. Chevrier: I indicated to the hon. member the information I had available, and the only information that I could give him. My officers inform me that they have not got here a detailed statement by items of all the stores from one end of the country to the other. They have the total and it can be broken down with reference to the divisions of the department. I cannot give the amounts as to the divisions now. I think perhaps I can get them for the hon. member, but I do not think he should expect me to give him a complete inventory of all stores in the department. I am sorry, but I cannot give it to him.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister might be a little more accurate. I think he remembers that I explicitly said I was not asking for that. I asked him if it would not be reasonable to get information about the stores in one particular depot. I shall be extremely surprised if I am told there is no record in general terms in the department at Ottawa. I am not asking about every last nail and bolt, but surely information as to the main categories of stores at Montreal, let us say, is available here. That is what I want to see.

Mr. Chevrier: I have not got it here but I can get it for the hon. member. For instance, I could get a breakdown of canal stores in the division, but I have not got it with me.

Mr. Knowles: I have one other question to try to straighten out the confusion which has arisen. We are now dealing with section 1 and I propose to stick to it. It relates to the amount of the advance of money that the Minister of Transport can get from the Minister of Finance. The present act provides for a ceiling of $1 million on that advance. The minister has said that at the present time, or at some recent date at any rate, the total amount advanced to him was $2 million. May I make it perfectly clear that that need have no relation to the value of the inventory. I am leaving that out of the question. I want to ask the minister whether the advance in money or in credit, if you like, from the Minister of Finance to the Minister of Transport has at any time been greater than $2 million. If so, what has been the highest figure?

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Chevrier: No, it has not been greater than $2 million.

Mr. Knowles: All right. We can still talk only about the money if my good friend, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, will not bring in the question of inventories. May I ask why, if at no time it has been necessary to have an advance greater than $2 million, which is $1 million more than the law allows, the minister is now jumping to the figure of $5 million? Would it not be reasonable to place it at some figure not too far above the $2 million advance which has been the experience thus far?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that at no time has there been a greater advance than $1 million. The amount referred to a moment ago was the amount that was obtained from the Department of Finance, namely, $1 million.

Mr. Knowles: What was the minister referring to when he used the figure of $2 million?

Mr. Chevrier: I think perhaps the statement I gave a moment ago was misinterpreted. As of March 31, 1949, the inventory as reported by treasury was valued at $2,029,859 which is $72,491 in excess of the maximum amount made available for stores purposes. The $1 million authorized to be draw from the consolidated fund has therefore all been invested in stores, and $72,491 more.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister understand that?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know that I do.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I think it is perfectly obvious that in asking for a revolving fund of $5 million the department is being very extravagant. There is no need whatever for a revolving fund of that size. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood:

That section 1 be amended by substituting the words "two million" for "five million."

Mr. Chevrier: I gave the reasons why that could not be done. I gave the reasons why we should have $5 million, and I cannot accept the hon. member's amendment.

Mr. Knowles: In support of the amendment I must say I think the minister has given reasons for the next section which we have not reached yet. I can see his case for raising the ceiling on the inventory or for there being no inventory at all. But with parliament meeting for as much of the year as it does, with estimates and supplementary estimates and further supplementary estimates, I cannot see the need of there being an advance greater than any amount the minister has yet had to get from the Minister of Finance. I think the suggestion that the figure of $5 million be reduced to $2 million is a good one, and personally I am going to support the amendment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wonder if we fully understand—I am not sure that I do—exactly how the advance operates. I want to ask the minister this question. At the present time the amount of the advance to the Minister of Transport shall at no time exceed $1 million. That is the law at the moment. The minister gets $1 million and spends it on stores. Then what happens next? Does he go back to treasury and say, "I have spent my million dollars and I want another". Is that what happens?

Mr. Chevrier: No; that is not what is done. I understand we get our money back through repayment from the various votes that were mentioned a moment ago, some thirty of them.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me understand that further. When you receive your advance of $1 million you spend it and therefore you have used that up for the moment. I do not think I understand how you get a further advance. Obviously you have got a lot more stores because you get more than $1 million in a year. Would the minister repeat what he said on that?

Mr. Chevrier: Stores are being issued from day to day, and by the time the $1 million has been exhausted by purchases of stores, the votes mentioned earlier have been passed by parliament, and from those votes are obtained additional funds to replenish the stocks required in the various depots.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What did your votes total last year?

Mr. Chevrier: The votes for stores? I have not the figures, but I am told we turned over more than $7 million last year in stores purchases.

Mr. Green: Apparently the position is that under the present law the minister can spend up to $1 million without a vote; that is, before any money is appropriated by the house. He has told us that the greatest amount by which he has ever had to exceed $1 million was some $72,000. Now, in this amendment, he is asking authority to spend $5 million without a vote, yet he has just told us that the total purchases, including what is bought without a vote and what is covered by votes of this parliament, were only $7 million. Surely there is no reason why his department should have power to spend $5 million without a vote, out of a total of $7 million required for the whole year. I believe that proves conclusively that if this revolving fund were made $2 million instead of $1 million it would be more than ample to meet the requirements of the department.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not accurate or fair to say that the department is spending $1 million without a vote, because all the money to be spent is shown in the estimates which will be discussed later on. Those estimates will contain provision for all the money the Department of Transport expects to spend during the fiscal year 1950-51; but before the money is voted it is necessary to have a fund from which money can be drawn in order to put stocks in the stores. As I said earlier, when the amount has been expended and we need additional stores, whether they be for steamers, for canal services or anything else, then it is necessary to obtain an appropriation from the Department of Finance. I believe the amount asked for is reasonable in the light of the figures I have placed on the record.

Mr. Knowles: May I come at it this way? We have before us now the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1951. In those estimates are many items for stores. The minister said the total last year was $7 million, and I presume it would be the same or close to it this year. Then do I take it this is the picture, that the department is asking parliament to vote some $7 million for stores in the regular way, the money to be available between now and March 31, 1951, but that before we can get around to voting the estimates for 1951-52 stores not provided for thus far may be required, and that is why this advance is necessary? If that is the case, what does this minister have that other ministers do not have, that he can get this kind of a fund?

Mr. Jeffery: I would ask the minister whether all he is asking for is not merely $5 million of working capital which, as in an ordinary company, would be replenished from time to time from the votes passed by this parliament.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): And in addition every item is accounted for to the house.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Last year the minister bought some $7 million worth of stores, and had a fund not exceeding $1 million. What inconvenience was suffered? Were purchases delayed? What was the exact inconvenience to the service last year by reason of this limitation? Was there delay, or was any other inconvenience suffered?

Mr. St. Laurent: My understanding is that these are stores from which supplies are drawn as required, and under the act these stores should never amount to more than $1 million. It has been found that a reserve stock of $1 million is not sufficient.

Mr. Green: I think the Prime Minister is confused. If I may point out to him, the amount permitted for stocks under the present law is $1,600,000, and we are not discussing that at the moment. We are discussing the revolving fund of $1 million, which is quite a different thing. The minister is asking that it be increased to $5 million, and I have moved in amendment that it be fixed at $2 million.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask whether the Minister of Public Works has a fund like this to cover expenditures which he does not anticipate?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, Mr. Chairman. Purchases made by my department come out of votes of this parliament. We may be committed to certain expenditures from year to year, but as far as I know we have no revolving fund.

Mr. Knowles: And the Minister of Public Works has stores, cleaning supplies and all sorts of things, which he must have on hand; but he must put his requirements in the estimates in the regular way.

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Public Works has stores but he does not have operating services such as we have in the aids to navigation branch, the radio branch, the civil aviation branch, the telephone and telegraph branch and so on.

Mr. Knowles: I could understand it if all the stores for these servicing departments were provided from a fund like this, but the minister has admitted that most of the stores that have to be purchased are provided for in the estimates. Apparently this is a fund for unanticipated stores that may have to be purchased before we get around to voting the estimates of next year.

Mr. Green: Surely this plan of having a revolving fund should be followed only in very rare instances. In 1939 the present Minister of Trade and Commerce instanced the printing bureau and the Department of Mines and Resources. It must be perfectly obvious to all hon. members that financing by means of a revolving fund is entirely out of line with our method of government financing, which should be carried on by means of appropriations. It is only in very rare cases that a revolving fund should be required. The minister already has a revolving fund of $1 million. He has told the committee that last year he required a few thousand dollars over that figure, so a revolving fund of $2 million should be more than ample to meet the requirements of his department; and I suggest that even at that figure it will be higher than any other revolving fund in the government service.

The use of revolving funds strikes at the very root of the authority of parliament, which is supposed to have control of the purse strings. The theory is that nothing may be spent by any government until that money has been appropriated by parliament, and particularly by the House of Commons. The use of these revolving funds derogates from that power of the House of Commons. Here we have an instance in which the minister himself admits that he has not needed even $2 million in that fund. So I urge that he accept the amendment and let the figure stand at $2 million rather than ask for this amount of $5 million in the revolving fund.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think the amendment should be accepted. At the same time I believe there are some further explanations due the committee, so perhaps at this stage I should move that we report progress and ask leave to sit again.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

459. Departmental administration, $1,012,455.

Mr. Green: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I have no statement to make. It has never been customary for the Minister of Transport to make a statement on his estimates: first, because there are a number of bills that come up from time to time; second, because many of the matters in which the house is interested have been discussed in committee. It has been the practice over the years, certainly over the years I have been in the department, to take the estimates item by item.

Mr. Green: I would ask, Mr. Chairman, that before this administration item is carried, the minister make a statement to the house about the present situation in shipbuilding and shipping. It is quite impossible for those of us who are responsible for dealing with the estimates to discuss these particular subjects until we have a statement from the minister. For example, with regard to shipbuilding, there was a bill passed at the last session which provided for accelerated depreciation for shipyards under certain conditions. We should like to know from the minister what results have flowed from that legislation, whether there has been an increase in shipbuilding in Canada.

We should also like to know whether or not any of the funds which have been held in trust for ship owners, who sold their cargo vessels to a foreign flag company, have been used for the building of new ships. We all recognize the great importance of having modern fast cargo vessels for Canada, and it was the understanding that this money was to be held in escrow by the Canadian maritime commission, and would be used for the building of these new ships. We would like to know whether any ships have been built.

The government announced a new policy for the Canadian merchant marine at the close of the last session. Roughly speaking, the plan was to reduce the Canadian merchant fleet to forty vessels, all of which were to be eligible for a subsidy. I believe there was to be an amount provided in the estimates this year for that subsidy. The plan involved the transfer of a good many ships from Canadian registry to United Kingdom registry. It meant also that many Canadian ships would be laid up, or put in mothballs, and a great many Canadian seamen would lose their employment, or as they say, "go on the beach". I ask the minister to let us know before this administration item is passed just what the picture is with regard to both those questions; first, the question of shipbuilding in Canada, and second the Canadian shipping policy. We have had no definite information on either of them since the last session, and the committee is entitled to have the facts and figures showing just how those policies are working out. If we do not get that, it is quite impossible for us to deal with these questions.

Mr. Chevrier: I agree fully with the hon. gentleman that he should get the information. He will remember that last year we discussed the matter when we got to the maritime commission items. The hon. member will recall that the maritime commission is responsible for the shipbuilding program, and the act respecting special depreciation that was passed at the last session is also under their jurisdiction. I hope he will find it possible to agree with me, and when we get to that item, which I hope will be soon, I shall be in a position to make a statement on it. We are now on item No. 459.

Mr. Green: We are on the administration item. These two problems are of such importance that I would urge the minister to make a statement with regard to them on this administration item, rather than wait until the Canadian maritime commission vote comes up, which may not be until a week or two before the house prorogues.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall give consideration to it.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): There is one item to which I should like to direct the attention of the minister, and I do so with no desire to hold up his estimates. It is the Crowsnest rates agreement. It has already been ruled that the matter is not debatable in this house. Western Canada is deeply concerned about those rates, so that some time when the minister is dealing with the matter of general administration I should appreciate a statement about the Crowsnest freight rate agreement. It is a statutory agreement, and I should like assurance that, as a statute of this dominion, it will not be dealt with until there has been ample opportunity for debate in this house.

Mr. Chevrier: I would hesitate to make a statement on the question of the Crowsnest rates at this time, because the matter is before the royal commission and has been receiving the consideration of that body. It has been a rule of this house that when matters are before commissions they are considered sub judice, and for that reason should not be debated. I have made statements before concerning the rates, which can be found in Hansard.

The house will know and realize, and I presume this is what my hon. friend has in his mind, that the rates cannot be changed except by statute.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): And there will be a full opportunity for this house to debate the matter before any such change is made.

Mr. Chevrier: They are statutory rates, and could not be changed without an amendment to the statute.

Mr. Drew: There is one point I should like to have clarified at this time. At the time both the accounts for the year before, and the estimates of the coming year, of the Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines were before the committee, the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke on behalf of those organizations on more than one occasion. Will the minister inform me whether they come under the Department of Transport or under the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr Chevrier: The Canadian National Railways items come under the Department of Transport.

Mr. Drew: What about Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. Chevrier: Trans-Canada Air Lines come under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Drew: How can that be, in view of the fact that Trans-Canada Air Lines is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Chevrier: By virtue of the assignment of duties act, the Trans-Canada Air Lines have been assigned to the Minister of Trade and Commerce just as the C.B.C. has been given to the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Drew: I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is the appropriate point at which to indicate the inconsistency of this situation. The Trans-Canada Air Lines is, in fact, a part of the Canadian National Railways, no matter what may be said to the contrary. The Canadian National Railways entirely own the Trans-Canada Air Lines. It would be quite proper for the accounts of the Trans-Canada Air Lines to be shown as part of the Canadian National Railways, as a wholly-owned subsidiary; and in fact I would think that in ordinary bookkeeping they should be.

The president of the Trans-Canada Air Lines is an official who gives his whole time to the Trans-Canada Air Lines. The controller of the Trans-Canada Air Lines, on the other hand, is a man who, according to his own estimate, gives one-twelfth of his time to the Trans-Canada Air Lines and the remainder of his time to the Canadian National Railways. A number of the officials hold corresponding positions in the two organizations. For that reason it seems both impractical and contrary to ordinary business procedure to have one minister in charge of the large organization which controls entirely, so far as the business end is concerned, the smaller organization, and to have another minister responsible for that smaller organization. Yet that is the situation. According to what the minister has now said, the Canadian National Railways comes under the Minister of Transport, and the Trans-Canada Air Lines, a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Canadian National Railways, comes under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. No matter what the arrangements have been, I suggest that it would be appropriate that a statement be made by the government that this situation will be rectified and that the Trans-Canada Air Lines will be brought under the same minister who is responsible for the administration of the Canadian National Railways.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. St. Laurent: Without rising at this time, Mr. Chairman, to deal with the suggestion that is made by the leader of the opposition, may I take just a moment to make a suggestion and ask hon. members to give it some thought. Here when we deal with the estimates, the first item is always general administration. Frequently on general administration there have been long debates which happened to be duplicated when we were dealing with the individual items. I am just asking hon. members to consider whether they would not prefer to have the item of general administration in each department deferred until the individual items had been dealt with. Then in the light of the information that would have been elicited with respect to each item, I think there could be a more satisfactory discussion of general administration.

I am not asking for a decision by hon. members at this time; but it has occurred to me that it might be helpful if, in committee, we went into the individual items and on those individual items obtained the information available. With that, I think we would be in a better position to discuss the general administration and it would also enable us probably to avoid some of the duplication. The detailed information would have been obtained on each of the headings, and everyone would then have had that information with which to enable him to form his own opinion about the general administration of the department. I think he would then be in a better position to make objective suggestions as to the way in which he might feel the general administration of the department could be improved.

As I say, I am not asking hon. members to agree to that procedure for the time being; but I believe that if they will just give it some thought, it might recommend itself to them. We on our part would be quite prepared to allow the item of general administration in each department to stand, and to have the general discussion after the individual items had been passed and after the information sought by hon. members had been given on those individual items.

Mr. Green: May I point out to the Prime Minister, Mr. Chairman, that there is one serious objection to any such plan, and it is this. Ever since I have been here, the practice has been that most of the estimates go through in the last week or two of the session, and there is absolutely no opportunity for a proper discussion on those estimates. Over the last year or two a system has been worked out whereby, on each department, there is a general review of the whole department on the administration item; one day has been set aside for each department. For example, today we have the Department of Transport estimates up just for that purpose, namely, a general review. When that review has taken place, ordinarily it does not take long to get through the individual items. If, on the other hand, we try to do the individual items first, I think the Prime Minister will find that there will be a long debate on every single individual item or on most of the individual items, and the result might be a great deal more delay than we have under the present system. Then when it came to a general review of the department at the end of the session, there would be no time in which to conduct such a review.

Mr. St. Laurent: There may be objections, but I would ask hon. members just to consider the alternative of taking the individual items first, getting the information about them and then having a discussion on the general administration of the department after that information has been obtained. There are objections to any course. There are objections to there not being more time available to deal with the estimates. But there are so many matters that hon. members wish to have discussed at considerable length on the floor of the house that I am sure each of us endeavours to have the best use made of the time available.

Mr. Drew: May I just suggest this. There is certainly a great deal to be given consideration in regard to ways in which we can facilitate the handling of the various items. There are reasons why it is advisable to discuss certain things at the beginning, and I can see reasons for deferring certain aspects of the discussion. But just before we rise, might I earnestly suggest that some consideration be given to the situation which arises from having the Trans-Canada Air Lines under one minister and the Canadian National Railways under another; because among the accounts that we shall be examining in the Department of Transport are the accounts dealing with aeronautics and civil aviation generally. I suggest that, even at this stage, the desirability of bringing these two together might be given some consideration.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS

PRAIRIE TRANSMISSION LINES LIMITED

The house in committee on Bill No. 9, to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited—Mr. Benidickson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, on rising at this time I cannot content myself with the negative statement that I had not intended to do so. I want to assert affirmatively that I had not intended to speak in these protracted debates on these bills to incorporate the pipe line companies. My reason for changing that intention is that a couple of hours ago a newspaper story published in this morning's Gazette was brought to my attention. This newspaper story is at page 11 of today's issue, and bears the title, "Gardiner Said to Be Demanding All-Canadian Pipe Lines Route". It purports to be a report of the proceedings of a Liberal caucus held last Wednesday morning.

Now, all hon. members know that the deliberations of party caucuses are confidential, just as are the deliberations of council. I am quite sure that no one who attended that caucus ever informed anyone, outside of party members, of anything that transpired within the walls of the hall where it was held. So the whole story about what goes on in our caucus, just as any story about what goes on in the caucuses of any other of the parties, must be the writer's guesswork in that respect.

He would not expect me, I am sure, and no one else would expect me to say anything here about what went on in that caucus, either by way of confirmation or by way of denial. I think the security and the confidential character of caucuses is best preserved by abstaining from confirming or denying any of these newspaper stories, and just leaving them, as it is best to leave any other trial balloons or kites, to explode or break up in consequence of their own inherent weaknesses rather than do anything positive to hasten that result.

But this story contained more than a purported report of what took place in caucus. It has this paragraph:

> The high degree of interest in these reports out of caucus stems from the fact that, up to the present, the government had made it plain that it felt that parliament should give the two companies a free hand in selecting the route along which they would build the huge pipe line. And both the Alberta Natural Gas Company and Prairie Transmission Lines, Limited, have made it equally plain that they would prefer to use a route through the United States to the Pacific coast, ostensibly because of higher costs involved for the Canadian route, but perhaps with an eye to tapping rich, inland United States markets.

I do not know what the companies have made plain. I did not attend the meetings of the committees. I have not seen any of the promoters of these companies. I have not read the testimony taken in committee, nor the report of the committee. I do know that if anyone in the press gallery had come to the conclusion that the government had made it plain that it felt that parliament should give the two companies a free hand to select the route along which they would build the huge pipe line others may have reached the same conclusion, and I feel I am called upon to point out that there was no such thing made plain by the government, nor ever intended to be made plain by the government.

The position of the government has been quite otherwise, and I am going to make a statement here, lest there might be others than members of the press gallery who might have assumed that there was anything of that character made plain in the attitude of the government.

The article goes on to say:

The Progressive Conservative, C.C.F. and Social Credit members, who have resorted to an outright filibuster to hold up the bills—and succeeded throughout last session—have offered many times to pass the bills without delay as soon as the government or sponsors of the bills gave assurances that the all-Canadian route would be used.

Well, I am not going to say anything about whether there has been a filibuster or not. There has been protracted discussion, we know, and it has gone over quite a long period of time. But, be that as it may, the sponsor of the bill cannot, of course, give an assurance where the pipe line will be built. The government can give no assurance whatsoever. To attempt to give such assurance would be practically contempt of parliament.

Parliament last year determined that this matter would be one to be turned over to the board of transport commissioners; and for the government to attempt to usurp the functions of the board of transport commissioners would be contempt of the will of parliament expressed in the Pipe Lines Act.

Now, so that there may be no doubt about that, let us see what we are faced with. These companies are to be incorporated, and to have certain corporate powers. The bills—this one and the other—are in practically the same terms; and those passed last year were in the same terms. This one states:

The company shall have all the powers, privileges and immunities conferred by, and be subject to all the limitations, liabilities and provisions of any general legislation which is enacted by parliament, relating to pipe lines for the transmission and transportation of gas and oil or any liquid product or by-product thereof.

And then it says:

The company, subject to the provisions of any general legislation which is enacted by parliament, relating to pipe lines for the transmission and transportation of gas and oil or any liquid product or by-product thereof—

Shall have such-and-such powers. Now, parliament determined that any company which is incorporated would be subject to the various sections of the Pipe Lines Act, which is chapter 20 of the statutes of 1949. The act provides that "board" in the Pipe Lines Act means the board of transport commissioners. Section 11 of the Pipe Lines Act provides that:

A company shall not, except as in this act otherwise provided, begin the construction of a section or part of a company pipe line, until,

(a) the board has by order granted the company leave to construct the line;

(b) the plan, profile and book of reference of the section or part of the proposed line have been approved by the board; and

(c) copies of the plan, profile and book of reference so approved, duly certified as such by the secretary of the board, have been deposited in the offices of the registrars of deeds for the districts or counties through which such section or part of the company pipe line is to pass.

Now, what has to be done when application is made for leave to build a pipe line, or any part of a pipe line? Section 12 of the Pipe Lines Act states:

(1) Upon an application for an order granting leave to construct a line, the company shall file with the board a map showing the general location of the proposed line, the termini, and all cities, towns, villages, railways and navigable waters through, under or across which the line is to pass.

(2) The company shall file a copy of the application and of the map with the attorney general of each province to which the application relates in whole or in part, and the board shall require notice of the application to be given by publication in newspapers or otherwise.

(3) Upon the application, the board shall have regard to all considerations that appear to it to be relevant and in particular to the objection of any party interested, to a public interest that in the board's opinion may be affected by the granting or the refusing of the application, and to the financial responsibility of the applicant.

(4) The decision of the board as to whether a person is or is not a party interested within the meaning of this section is binding and conclusive.

(5) Where the board grants leave to construct a line, it may impose such terms and conditions as it considers proper and may limit the time within which the company shall construct and complete the line.

When that application has been granted, that and nothing else can be done. If there is to be any deviation whatsoever, then under section 20 the same procedure has to be followed to obtain leave to deviate from the line. However, this is subject to the right of the board to give an exemption provided the deviation is merely intended to straighten out a curve or to lessen a grade. I quote partly from subsection 3 of that section as follows:

—if such deviation, change or alteration does not exceed 300 yards from the centre line of the company pipe line, located or constructed in accordance with the plans, profiles and books of reference approved by the board under this act.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I do not think you read into the record section 9 which deals with the interprovincial operation of the pipe line.

Mr. St. Laurent: Section 9 reads:

A company operating a company pipe line from a place in Canada to a place on the international boundary line may exercise, beyond such boundary, in so far as permitted by the laws there in force, the powers that it may exercise in Canada.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Which was explained to the house when the bill was passed.

Mr. St. Laurent: Those are the provisions that apply to any company that gets a charter from this parliament. By that statute parliament placed jurisdiction and responsibility for considering the whole question upon the board of transport commissioners. I assume that, at the time it was considered by parliament, the board of transport commissioners would be a competent board to discharge that kind of responsibility. I think it should be realized by the people of Alberta and the people of British Columbia, who are naturally gravely concerned about the proper development and use of their natural resources, that parliament has put upon the board of transport commissioners the responsibility of examining applications and objections and all information necessary to arrive at a proper decision.

This is the same board to which the people of those provinces applied with success not so long ago to have remedied one of their traditional grievances, the mountain differential in freight rates. That matter had been referred to many times in this house, but that also was something in connection with which parliament had placed responsibility and jurisdiction in the board of transport commissioners. The people of Alberta and British Columbia rightly went to that board and made their case and I am informed that the decision gave them satisfaction in respect of that grievance. It is the same board.

If parliament feels at this or any time that that board is not competent to do the right kind of job, the way to remedy that situation is to amend the Pipe Lines Act and not to attempt by discriminating in favour of one or against another company to do it in a partial way. Three charters in practically the same terms as those in the bill before us were granted at the last session of parliament and each of those charters is subject to the legislation then existing or to such future legislation as parliament might choose to enact with respect to pipe lines. If there is to be another tribunal or another board that would determine these matters, then the taking of such a step should be settled by amending the Pipe Lines Act.

As to the very interesting question as to whether the topography of our country is such that it permits the building of a pipe line without going outside our territory, I am sure that not only the people of British Columbia and Alberta but the people of all Canada would rejoice in that kind of decision.

It is not only the people of Quebec and New Brunswick who have deplored the fact that the Canadian Pacific had to run through Maine to get to New Brunswick; that was something which concerned the people of the whole dominion. It was because of their feelings in that respect that the Canadian National took the long course through the valley of the Matapedia adding a great many miles to the distance. Nevertheless they provided an all-Canadian route. It was for that reason that the route traced for the transcontinental railway when it was built some forty years ago goes through the county of Temiscouata and into New Brunswick without departing at any time from Canadian soil. That is a thing which I think is of satisfaction to us all.

I am not going to suggest that the protracted debates in this parliament about the desirability of an all-Canadian pipe line for the gas and oil of Alberta has been a waste of time. It has aroused public opinion as to the desirability of doing that if it is possible. I would expect that that would not be lost from the point of view of the members of the board of transport commissioners and that they would not lightly disregard the unanimous desires of Canadians that their own territory be used to the greatest possible advantage. I would expect that when they got an application and before they approved anything, they would want to be shown that there is or there is not a practicable way of doing it without going out of Canada. I would expect that they will require the applicants to satisfy them that surveys of the various routes mentioned in this discussion have been made.

I do not claim to know enough about the topographical conditions, about the mountain passes, to be able to formulate an opinion as to whether or not they present insuperable difficulties. But if I were a member of a board charged by parliament with the responsibility of making that kind of decision and were called upon to exercise my judgment, I would want pretty full evidence that it could not be done in Canada before I would put my signature to a plan or project that was not going to be carried out in Canada.

I suggest that unless and until we come to the conclusion that the board of transport commissioners cannot be entrusted with that kind of responsibility, because we do not feel that they are either competent enough to do it properly or sufficiently imbued with the spirit of the Canadian people to want to do it properly, the thing for us to do is to amend the Pipe Lines Act in a manner that will apply to every company that secures a charter for a pipe line and not in a manner that will discriminate in favour of one against another. Perhaps one has to say in words what one wants to have regarded as plain. I am speaking as one of the members of the government, and I want to make it plain that I have sufficient confidence in the board of transport commissioners to vote for the passage of these bills. I am not asking anyone to follow my example, but I am suggesting that my reason for doing so is not because I am determining where the pipe lines are going to be built but because I feel that the board which parliament selected only a year ago to discharge that responsibility is competent to do so, and will discharge it in a manner that will do justice to all Canadian citizens.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister has based his whole argument on the premise that the board of transport commissioners is the body which should decide the question whether or not the pipe line must serve the Canadian people first. May I suggest to him that if a similar attitude had been taken in the days of the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway across Canada the government of the day would have asked some board created by it to make the decision whether or not that railway should be laid in Canadian soil from coast to coast or whether it should cross into the United States at Sault Ste. Marie, thus avoiding the rocky northern shore of lake Superior. Another example is the one he has just mentioned.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Green: You can ask all the questions you wish when I am finished. Another example is the old Intercolonial railway to which the Prime Minister has referred. Surely the Prime Minister is not suggesting that the decision as to whether or not that line should be built entirely on Canadian soil should have been left to some board. Whether pipe lines should be laid in United States soil in order to serve other parts of Canada is far too important a question to be settled by any board set up by the government.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Why did you vote for the bill last year?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Why did you vote for that bill?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Why did you vote for that bill?

Mr. Green: This policy is the responsibility of the house, and more particularly the responsibility of the government, and cannot be evaded by passing the job to the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You did that last year.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You voted for the bill last year.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Public Works says that is what we decided last year.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You were one of them.

Mr. Decore: Did you not vote for it last year?

Mr. Green: Let me point out to the minister that when that bill was put through the house last year there was not the slightest suggestion that the board of transport commissioners would have the power to decide whether or not a route to the west coast should go through the United States.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is right in the statute.

Mr. Green: Furthermore there was no suggestion that the board of transport commissioners should have the power to decide that the main oil pipe line to eastern Canada should go through the United States by way of Gretna instead of going to our own Canadian cities at the lakehead. Incidentally, I think it was as great a betrayal of Canada as any since confederation when that oil pipe line was allowed to go to Superior, Wisconsin. It is folly to suggest that the board of transport commissioners can decide questions of that kind. They have no jurisdiction over these pipe lines once they leave Canadian soil. In the case of the oil pipe line to the east, all that the board of transport commissioners did was to say that the pipe line could be built to Gretna, Manitoba, and there their power ended. They had no power whatever to say where that pipe line would go once it left Canadian soil. If they are to decide whether or not the gas pipe line to the west coast is to go through the United States, they cannot properly do so because they can only say that it will go to Kingsgate on the Canadian boundary. After it leaves Kingsgate it comes under the jurisdiction of the United States federal power commission. If there is to be a stub line back to Trail then the board of transport commissioners can say that there will be a stub line for fifteen or twenty miles in Canada from the boundary, up the valley of the Columbia river to Trail, and then another stub line in Canada to Vancouver from Monroe on the United States west coast. The jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners is confined to that part of the stub lines lying within Canada.

When the Prime Minister suggests that the board of transport commissioners can settle all these questions as to where the route should be he is not being realistic. He is failing to face the facts.

Mr. St. Laurent: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he suggesting that parliament has any more right to determine where it would go outside the boundary of Canada than has the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. Green: We do not care where it goes after it crosses the boundary of Canada provided it has served Canadians first before it leaves our country. That has been the whole basis of our fight. Once Canadians are served we are only too glad to see the surplus gas go down to the west coast United States cities of Seattle, Portland, Tacoma, and it is even to be used 100 or more miles farther south at Eugene, Oregon. But parliament should say that the main line to the west coast must be laid in Canadian soil.

Mr. St. Laurent: The board of transport commissioners can say the same thing.

Mr. Green: That responsibility is the responsibility of this parliament. It does not require an amendment to the Pipe Lines Act although I think that act should have provided for the main lines of all these oil and gas pipe lines to be laid in Canadian soil. All that is required to bring about the end which we now learn from the Prime Minister he would rather like to see, in other words, the main line laid in Canadian soil, is to amend these charters to make that provision. We tried to do that in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines but the Prime Minister's own supporters to a man voted us down.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think they did right.

Mr. Green: It was a straight party vote and they voted us down.

Mr. St. Laurent: If I had been there I would have voted with them because I think the way to do it is not to amend private charters but to amend the Pipe Lines Act in a manner that will apply to all companies.

Mr. Green: The Prime Minister is willing to put up all these legal arguments and reasons as to why it cannot be done and why it should not be done, but let him not forget that in effect what he is doing is asking the people of British Columbia to accept a main line to the coast going through the United States. There is not the slightest doubt but that both these applicants for incorporation intend to build the main line in the United States if permitted to do so. The bulk of their market is in the northwestern states, and they want to get there by the shortest possible route. There is no question about that. I was going to suggest to the Prime Minister that there is no reason why these two bills should not now be amended to provide that the requirements of Canadians must be met first, and also that the main line must go to the west coast over Canadian territory. There is no reason, either—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am afraid some of my supporters, or erstwhile supporters on other matters, are interfering with my hon. friend's argument.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Green: I point out to the Prime Minister that it is still possible to amend these two charters, and that the other day the hon. member for Fraser Valley rose in his place and advised this house that the company which obtained a charter last year—and it only got that charter because it agreed to build in Canada first—is willing to have written into its charter exactly the same amendments that may be written into these other charters.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member knows that cannot be done.

Mr. Green: Why not?

Mr. St. Laurent: Because it is a private charter, and amendments have to be sought by petition from the incorporators.

Mr. Green: Well, the hon. member sponsored the bill to incorporate Westcoast Transmission Company last year, and I presume he spoke with authority the other evening when he said they were willing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, Oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, since my name has been mentioned by both the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the Prime Minister—

Mr. St. Laurent: No.

Mr. Cruickshank: Well, indirectly by the Prime Minister; and I can say now with authority—

The Deputy Chairman: I must ask the hon. member to state his point of order.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am stating it. It has been said that it cannot be done. The West-coast Transmission Company—

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is not a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. gentleman should await another opportunity to make his speech.

Mr. Green: Well, I have known the hon. member for Fraser Valley for many years. I know his courage on the battlefield was not exceeded by that of any soldier in the Canadian corps. When the hon. member takes a stand he does so because he is courageous; and when the other evening he said this company was prepared to bring in its charter and have it amended in exactly the same way the other two charters were amended, I believe he told the truth. This house can do anything by unanimous consent; and if the will is there—

Mr. St. Laurent: Do you think there is going to be unanimous consent on anything connected with pipe lines?

Mr. Green: If the will is there to provide that this pipe line must be laid in Canadian soil, that can be done, and there is no use making excuses of one kind and another to the effect that it is impossible.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Would my friend permit a question?

Mr. Green: No, I am not going to answer any of your questions until I am through.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must ask all hon. members to permit the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra to proceed with his speech. I would also remind hon. members that, without his consent, they may not interrupt the hon. gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. Green: The Prime Minister mentioned discrimination. Well, if that were done, if these three charters were amended in exactly the same way so that any main line to the west coast would have to be laid in Canadian soil, there would be no discrimination. I believe at this time it is possible to arrange to have these three bills become law in exactly the same form. I moved an amendment in the committee, and if the Prime Minister will look at Bill No. 9 he will see how that amendment would fit in. The amendment was to section 6, which sets out the special powers of the company, and which starts in this way:

> The company, subject to the provisions of any general legislation which is enacted by parliament, relating to pipe lines for the transmission and transportation of gas and oil or any liquid product or by-product thereof, may—

Then I moved that these words be inserted before the word "may":

> and subject to the condition that it may export gas or oil to the United States only to an amount in excess of the amount required by consumers in Canada—

A second amendment was moved to paragraph (a) of section 6 in these words, the words immediately preceding having given the company power to transport gas and oil within the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia or outside Canada, with various additional provisions—

> —provided that the main pipe line or lines, either for the transmission and transportation of oil or gas shall be located entirely within Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What happened to those amendments?

Mr. Green: Both amendments were voted down by the government members of the committee. I remind the Prime Minister just in passing that these companies are also asking the right to transport oil, and in the long run that may prove to be far more important than the gas. There are only three companies which have made it perfectly clear that their intention is to take this Canadian product to the west coast, so they are the only companies we need to consider. Those others which were incorporated last year mean to bring the gas or oil, as the case may be, to the east.

Mr. St. Laurent: Their powers under their charters are unlimited, however.

Mr. Green: Well, I do not think we can ignore the fact—

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The law is there.

Mr. Green: Oh, keep still until I finish. I do not think we should ignore the fact that only three companies want to take gas and oil from Alberta to the west coast. So if provisions of that kind are written into these three charters, they need not necessarily be written into the charters of companies bringing those resources to the east. The position there may be entirely different. There is no doubt, however, that these three companies are only asking permission to take gas and oil to the west coast, and that is the condition we must meet. I do not believe the Prime Minister and the members of this committee, in fact I do not believe parliament, can ignore certain other facts which we must keep in mind.

All three companies are now going to apply for the route through Yellowhead pass. The Westcoast Transmission Company has confined its application to that one route. Although in their petition the Prairie Transmission Lines Limited asked parliament to give them a charter covering the route through the United States, when they went before the committee they said they were also going to apply for an all-Canadian route through the Crowsnest pass, which is the pass in southern British Columbia through the Rockies. When the Alberta Natural Gas Company came before the committee, they said they were going before the board of transport commissioners with five routes. Tonight the Prime Minister said that any applicant must go before the board of transport commissioners and say which route he wants. The Alberta Natural Gas Company representatives refused to take that position. They said, "We are not going to decide which route we want."

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): How many routes did the Westcoast Transmission—

Mr. Green: Just wait a minute. They said, "We are not going to make that decision, we are going to the board of transport commissioners and say, here, we have five routes. We have one route that goes practically all the way through the United States. We have another route in which the main line goes all through Canada, and we have three more routes which cross the boundary two or three times." In effect they plan to say: "Now, we are not saying to you, Messrs. Commissioners, which route we want; that is for you to decide. Of course, you have no power to say where the route is to go in the United States, but you are the men who have to decide where this route is to go. We are not taking that responsibility." That was the absurd position taken by the Alberta Natural Gas Company.

Mr. St. Laurent: It may have been absurd, but if the hon. member were a member of the board of transport commissioners would he not say, "I cannot deal with that situation. You have to give me an application in which you have specified a route. You can file five applications with the attorney general and give me the five applications if you wish, and I shall deal with them one after another, but you cannot make an application in which there are three or four routes."

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I suggested that, and I was laughed out of the committee.

Mr. Green: I have stated exactly what they said they were going to do. The reason they said that was this. They knew there was bitter opposition to the all-American route, and to get away from that opposition they brought in these other four routes and said, "We are not picking any one; we are putting that up to the board of transport commissioners." When they get to the board, what will they say? They will bring in all possible evidence to show that it is much cheaper and more reasonable to go by the route through the United States. They will put all their arguments behind the United States route. The action of this company is just a subterfuge. It shows that parliament must step in to meet that situation.

Further proof that they are just trying to deceive the committee and the house is this. The member for Edmonton West and the member for Vegreville quite naturally were very much concerned, because they thought the route should go through the Yellowhead pass. They raised some objection in the committee about the Alberta Natural Gas Company not having said anything about going through the Yellowhead pass. Mr. Dixon, who is president of this Alberta Natural Gas Company—

Mr. Applewhaite: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I have no desire to be unduly technical, but I understand that, under the rules of the house, we are supposed to be debating the Alberta Natural Gas Company application on another occasion, and that now we are supposed to be debating the Prairie Transmission Lines bill.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member is quite right. We are discussing now the application of Prairie Transmission Lines Limited, and we are on the first clause of the bill. There has been a general discussion so far, and I understand that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is using the name of the other company for purposes of comparison.

Mr. Green: When the Alberta Natural Gas Company was faced with this opposition from within the government party, there was a bit of scurrying around and consulting with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Finally, Mr. Dixon got up and said, "I shall tell you what we will do. We will put in six routes to the board of transport commissioners; we will include the Yellowhead route." That satisfied the member for Edmonton West and the member for Vegreville, and they stopped making any further fight. It also showed the position being taken by these applicants.

When the Prairie Transmission Lines representatives came before the committee—they had been listening to what the other fellows said—they said the same thing. The committee was informed it was the intention of this company to apply for an American route, to apply for an all-Canadian route, and the representatives said, "We are also quite willing and happy to apply for the Yellowhead route." Now they are going to apply for three routes.

The fact that there are two all-Canadian routes available cannot be questioned. There is one through the Yellowhead pass, and one through the Crowsnest pass. The British Columbia legislature went on record unanimously in favour of an all-Canadian route, preferably the Yellowhead route, for the understandable reason that the route through the Yellowhead provides an outlet for our great Peace river district to the north. The route through the Crowsnest just shuts that Peace river district off for generations. The British Columbia legislature therefore went on record as favouring the route through the Yellowhead pass.

These are facts which should not be ignored by this house. I suggest to the Prime Minister that he agree to have the sponsors of these two bills now before the house, if they are willing, agree to insert amendments in their charters providing that the main line must be laid in Canadian soil. At least an opportunity should be given to have that done. Then the bills should be referred back to the committee, where the necessary changes could be made. The Westcoast Transmission Company should also be put to the test, as to whether or not they are willing to have the same amendments made to their charter. If that is done everybody would be happy. I am sure that the people of British Columbia would be happy about it, because I have never known opinion in my province to be so strongly behind one side as it is behind the all-Canadian route. The members of this house should be satisfied, and the applicants for these charters should be satisfied. They would then all have a chance of competing with each other for the right to build this line in Canada. The gas that is left over can go to the United States with the blessing of all Canadians.

I do suggest that that is the course which should be followed. Those of us who oppose these bills have asked for no more than that from the start. On the other hand, if these applicants for charters are unwilling to have amendments made which will force them to build through Canada to the coast, then they do not deserve any consideration and the bills should be voted down. This question is of too great importance to the people of British Columbia. Further, it involves the "Canada first" principle for all our natural resources, not only oil and gas but also such products as iron ore. We can see what is happening. The Prime Minister made a speech this week in Granby, and told the people there about these wonderful resources of iron ore. What did he say? Unless he is incorrectly quoted, throughout his speech he praised the great opportunity there was for getting this iron ore down to the United States. Not one word has been said by him, or by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, about building more steel plants in Canada to use the maximum amount of iron ore. They are not even thinking along that line. All they are thinking about is getting this iron ore down into the United States. What are the Americans doing about it on the other hand? All you have to do is to read the press practically every day now, and you will find some leading American getting up before the committee in Washington which is considering the St. Lawrence waterway and arguing that they must have that waterway so they can get Canadian iron ore down to their steel ports on lake Ontario and lake Erie. They say, "If we do not get the ore down there, it is going to go to the American east coast ports, steel plants are going to be built in Massachusetts and other New England states and our steel industry will move there." All of this development is based on Canadian iron ore. Yet here in Canada our own Prime Minister and our own Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Mr. Mitchell: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Green: Just wait till I finish.

Mr. Mitchell: You are afraid; that is why you will not permit it.

Mr. Green: No. I am nearly finished.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Green: Here in Canada we have our own Prime Minister not giving one word of leadership to the Canadian people in the direction of—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must say this. Although the discussion has been permitted to be quite general on pipe lines, I am afraid that it should not go into the field of iron ore and the general policy of the government.

Mr. Green: I will just say this in conclusion. Here we have the Prime Minister not giving the leadership that should be given in the direction of using these great resources in Canada to the maximum extent possible and thereby building this nation into one of the great nations of all time. There is an opportunity just being by-passed at the moment. What is proposed on the west coast in connection with this gas line is a perfect illustration of the failure to give Canada the right kind of leadership.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): We have only five minutes left to go before nine o'clock but possibly in view of the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra would not permit certain questions of mine to be answered, he may have to face in that five minutes "Canada first". We are astounded in this house to hear these statements from a member of this house who is much older than most of us—

Mr. Green: No, not older.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Much older in the house. If you are blushing about your age, do not apologize for it. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has repeated this "Canada first" cry.

Mr. Green: And I am going to keep on doing it.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Yes; you even repeated the medals that the member who is sponsoring this bill, the hon. member for Fraser Valley, won in the war.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The Prime Minister of this country made a plain statement when this debate opened.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I quite understood my friend. Am I sponsoring this bill?

An hon. Member: You voted for it.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You are the sponsor of the initial bill that passed this house under the original bill.

Mr. Cruickshank: You said that I was sponsoring this bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Will the hon. member for Yorkton and the hon. member for Fraser Valley please resume their seats. I should like all hon. members, when they take the floor, to address themselves to the Chair. As for the hon. member for Fraser Valley, unless he wants to raise a point of order—

Mr. Cruickshank: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member said that I was sponsoring this bill. I know that he has made several irresponsible statements in this house; but to accuse me of sponsoring this bill is beyond reason.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I will attend to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Fraser Valley has been in this house for quite a long time.

Mr. Cruickshank: And will be for a long time.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You think so; but I doubt it, Fraser Valley, knowing you.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I should think that this question is in the public interest and should be discussed at a much higher level than is being done.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The level that I intend to take is "Canada first". That is the level that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has tried to stress in the committee. That is the level that his own leader stressed in the house when, for instance, he mentioned Sarnia, and the fact that they now had a chemical works in Sarnia, built by the Americans, as a matter of fact, and you would not have a chemical works at Sarnia if it had not been supplied with oil by the United States. This "Canada first" policy is all right. We in western Canada would not have the market we have for our western Canada if it was not for trading with the United States.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What about the embargo?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Just a minute. If you Conservatives keep the flag waving that you have waved since 1911—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You waved it for a long time.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): All right. You did not wave it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You went there and waved the flag; because you did not get there—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I had left.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): But you waved a lot of flags in this house. You waved a lot of flags at the individuals behind you. We are speaking about a national problem. The statement has been made about a "Canada first" policy. I do not think there is a member in this committee sitting on any side of the chamber who is not in favour of a "Canada first" policy. But you have heard the statement of the Prime Minister in connection with this bill. The original bill passed by the House of Commons when some of us were not here was passed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, by the hon. member for Calgary West and by the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): And under that very act the hon. member for Fraser Valley introduced the first private bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It is nine o'clock.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): It being nine o'clock, the house will resume the business that was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

459. Departmental administration, $1,012,455.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra asked me earlier this afternoon for a statement on the results of shipping and shipbuilding policy. At short notice it is of course impossible for me to make a comprehensive statement at this time, but I can give him a few facts.

Canadian shipping policy was stated to this house by the Prime Minister on December 9 last. It is not necessary for me to give the reasons for such policy, as they were very fully stated at the time.

Mr. Green: We cannot hear.

Mr. Chevrier: In passing, however, I might remind the house that the Canadian costs of operation are about double British costs, and in order to maintain the Canadian shipping industry it was decided to permit owners to transfer to United Kingdom flag, and to subsidize not more than forty Canadian flag ocean-going vessels at a cost of not more than $3 million.

At the time of such statement there were 174 Canadian owned ocean-going vessels. Two were sold since that date and the proceeds deposited in escrow pursuant to the replacement plan, leaving 172 ships. Transfers to United Kingdom flag have been approved in respect of 93 ships, and transfers in respect of 23 ships are still pending.

Payment of subsidies are of course subject to vote of parliament, and the sum of $3 million has been included in the current estimates of the Canadian maritime commission for that purpose. Subject to such vote the Canadian maritime commission has approved subsidies in respect of 31 vessels and nine subsidy applications are still pending. Applications for subsidy in respect of 16 vessels have been declined on the ground that the applicant vessels do not employ Canadian crews.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. Green: Can the minister file a list of the vessels for which subsidy has been granted?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I can eventually, but I cannot do it immediately. It will take some time to get the list, because they are in course of being dealt with from day to day.

Prior to the coming into effect of the shipping policy there were forty Canadian vessels laid up for lack of employment. Today there are only twelve laid up, and I have no doubt that these will move shortly when employment offers.

I do not propose to comment upon the results of the shipping policy except to say that to my knowledge a number of Canadian shipowners have expressed themselves as being more than satisfied with such policy as being the only reasonable method whereby the shipping industry may be kept alive in Canada.

In so far as the shipbuilding and ship repair industries are concerned, there are at the moment about 9,000 men employed in Canadian yards. In its annual report last year the Canadian maritime commission stated that it would be necessary to maintain employment at a level of not less than 7,000 men in order to preserve the industry.

It is difficult for me to state what effect the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act has had upon shipbuilding generally. It is impossible for anyone to say that any particular ship owner has commenced building because of the provisions of that act. I think it may be sufficient for me to state that at the present time shipbuilding orders totalling more than $67 million are in preparation or under construction in Canadian shipyards.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, after the discussion of the last hour I wish to devote a short time to a matter which, I am sure, will be regarded as non-controversial, and it probably will receive the same support it received some three or four months ago when I spoke on this subject. I refer to the establishment of a Canadian coastguard.

I am certain this subject is of interest not only to my part of the country but, indeed, to every section of Canada; and I say that because the few words I delivered at the last session on the subject were of such a character that everyone in the house read them—they must have, because I heard so many comments from people who did not read them.

I hope hon. members will excuse my early return to this subject because of what is happening in connection with the coastguard. It is very difficult for hon. members to realize, in view of the size of Canada, the extent of our coast line. Canada is the third largest country in the world, and it has the greatest coast line of any country. By "coast line" I mean of course not only the sea coast, but the coast lines of the great lakes. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and British Columbia are bordered by the sea.

An hon. Member: Manitoba.

Mr. Higgins: Manitoba? Probably so. Then, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland are islands in the Atlantic. Ontario is bounded by the great lakes in the south and by Hudson bay and James bay in the north. It has a very extensive coast line. In fact, to my knowledge—not from personal knowledge, but from reading—the only provinces which have no coast line are Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Very obviously therefore there is necessity for a coastguard for a country like Canada. If this pipe line is built other than in Canada I would not be surprised if we were to need a pipe line guard for the pipe line. As all hon. members will recollect, there is over the doorway of the parliament buildings the inscription, "From Sea to Sea". In other words, Canada is a great maritime nation and, in keeping with the traditions of maritime nations, it should have a coastguard.

The understanding I gained at the last session from statements made by the Minister of Transport was that a coastguard service would be entirely too expensive and out of line with the duty it would perform. It must be obvious that such a statement is ridiculous. I say that in all honesty and without knowing the extent to which the minister has gone into the matter.

One thing we must remember is that a coastguard is a service for the saving of life; and when the saving of life and the saving of dollars are matters under consideration, there should be no alternative. I think all hon. members will agree with that, particularly when we see the tremendous expenditures being made every day for services not nearly as important as the coastguard.

As all hon. members know, the present coastguard service is being carried on by the marine section of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. As I said some months ago—and I say it honestly, as I am sure all hon. members will—there can be no question as to the reliability and the wonderful record of that great force. We have to remember, however, that this is a question of a sea force, and is not and should not be part of the job of the police force.

All hon. members are aware of the United States coastguard. In peacetime it operates under the treasury, and in wartime under the navy. As an adjunct to the navy it is of course very important, and plays a great part in time of war. I do not need to go into the question of what they did in the last war. Hon. members will recall the stories of submarine landings, or attempted landings in the United States, and the handling of them by the coastguard.

The suggestion of a Canadian coastguard has been mooted for many years. Back in the days of the Bovey commission they recommended that a committee be set up by the government to consider that matter. Since that time organizations throughout the country have requested the establishment of such a service.

The last time this matter was before the house was March 22, 1950, when, as reported at page 999, the hon. member for Queens-Shelburne directed this question to the minister:

1. Have any steps been taken towards setting up a joint committee representing the departments of fisheries, transport, and national defence, for the purpose of unifying and improving the coastal protection service?

2. If so, has such a committee been set up?

3. Has the committee been instructed to investigate improvements in the protective service for fishermen?

4. If so, will consideration be given to the provision of a radio-equipped and all-weather sea rescue and emergency towing service for small fishing craft?

5. When will the recommendations of this committee be made known, and when will action be taken to implement such recommendations?

The answer given by the minister was that such a committee had been set up. I understand it has been established for over a year now.

An interdepartmental committee has been set up to review the present arrangements for search and rescue and to make recommendations for improved and more efficient service.

The search and rescue is intended to cover all seafarers operating off the Canadian coasts.

The terms of reference of this committee quoted in part 2 above are sufficiently embracing to cover this consideration.

The recommendations of this committee will shortly be available when the action required to implement them will be considered.

That was a fair question to which a fair answer was made, but I wonder how long "shortly" is in the minds of the government. The committee has been at work now for almost a year and on March 22 it was stated the report was to be released shortly. If the minister cares to reply I hope he will tell us how long "shortly" is in the minds of the government.

On behalf of the newest province I ask the minister to consider, apart altogether from whatever the recommendations of the committee may be, the setting up of a coastguard service based somewhat on the United States coastguard service. Newfoundland has a coast line 6,000 miles long which is very rough in places and subject to nasty weather at times. There are sections in which there are very few harbours, and that creates dangerous conditions. The fleet which goes to the Grand Banks now faces serious competition from European trawlers who have increased tremendously and are encroaching on the grounds of our fishermen. There have been a number of incidents such as the cutting of a man's trawl and others which go to the extent of endangering the safety of our own fishermen.

Labrador is becoming of paramount importance to the economy of Canada mainly because of the iron ore deposits in the interior and the Goose airport. It also has a difficult coast line and this matter should receive serious consideration. This matter has been discussed on many occasions, but I think it has come home to us more forcibly in recent years. I conclude by reading from a resolution of the dominion council of naval officers of Canada passed last summer at Halifax which reads:

> It is not in accord with national dignity to be repeatedly obligated to the United States coastguard.

Those are my sentiments in this matter. It is time that Canada realized it was a maritime nation and we should lean less on Uncle Sam in connection with matters maritime.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to interrupt the speech of the hon. member on the question of air rescue or coastguard services. There was a fairly lengthy debate on my estimates last year, in fact only a few months ago, concerning this matter which is of keen importance to several hon. members in the house. I indicated at the time that the matter was under study by an interdepartmental committee composed of representatives from several departments. Apart from my own department, there were representatives from finance, Canadian maritime commission, and mines and technical surveys, fisheries, defence—army, navy and air force—and one or two other departments, but unfortunately I have to say that that committee has not been able to report as yet.

The hon. member for St. John's East asks how long is "shortly". Unfortunately it is not possible to do things as quickly as ministers, members of committees and quite often members of the house would like to see them done. I think hon. members will realize that there has not been a great deal of time between last session and the present to deal with this and many other matters that have had to receive the attention of the government. I am just as regretful at the fact that the committee has not been able to report as are those hon. members who are particularly interested in the subject of air rescue operations.

I indicated at the time that I hoped the committee would be able to make some recommendations that would co-ordinate and unify the services on our coast. My recollection is that the hon. member for Nanaimo made a valuable and helpful contribution to the debate. I do not want to be committed again by saying that the report will be brought down shortly, but I am advised by the chairman of that committee with whom I have discussed the matter that it is expected the committee will report very soon.

After the committee reports it will take some time to consider the recommendations, first from the point of view of the department, and then it is likely the matters will have to receive additional authorization if the recommendations are accepted. I thought I should make that statement at this juncture to avoid any debate. However, this is a general item and if hon. members wish to repeat what they said last year I am sure there is nothing I can do to stop them. But I do say that unfortunately there is no report that I can give to the committee at this time.

Mr. Pearkes: I do not wish to initiate a debate on this subject because I have spoken before. However, I should like to repeat what I said, that I believe we should proceed step by step to co-ordinate the various agencies we have at the present time which are working in this direction. I should like to stress that there is a degree of urgency at the present time because it has been announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that a treaty with Japan may be signed in the not too distant future. There will then be the possibility of Japanese fishing fleets coming to our west coast waters and there will be need for greater protection of our own British Columbia fishermen. I shall not say any more than that.

Can the minister give us some idea as to how far the recommendations of the Kellock commission are going to be implemented? About two weeks ago he said that we would soon have an opportunity to know how the new regulations would fit into the recommendations made by that commission appointed to investigate the Noronic disaster. Various statements have been published in the press on the west coast which would indicate that rather strict regulations are going to be applied. These will have a distinct bearing on those people who live on islands. As a matter of fact a great many of my constituents live on islands. Many of them are entirely dependent upon steamship service to move from one place to another and to receive all their supplies. Many of the steamships in this service have been in commission for a great many years. They are old vessels and if they have to add heavy new appliances it may be it will force some of them out of commission. They will be taken off the service with disastrous results to the people who are living on small islands in the strait of Georgia and also on Vancouver island.

I should like to point out that not only do Canadian vessels serve these people but also vessels under the United States flag which carry passengers and freight between these islands and the mainland. If our Canadian vessels were forced out of service by too stringent regulations then there would be an increase in the United States trade to the detriment of the Canadian service. I should like to have some explanation as to how far these regulations are going to be carried. I believe there is an escape clause. I do not know whether it will be helpful, but I have one suggestion to make. One of the greatest causes of fire at sea is the innumerable coats of paint which are put on vessels. Coat after coat of paint is placed on the sides and in the holds. I suggest there should be a regulation that there should never be more than four coats of paint on a vessel, and if there are any more they should be required to scrape them right off. Possibly the suggestion should be worthy of consideration because I know that an excessive number of coats of paint is one of the main causes of fire at sea.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think the hon. member for Nanaimo need fear too greatly that ships will be taken out of operation because of the regulations. I am not saying that such will not be the case but I know of no such case at the moment. Some weeks ago I made a statement in the house shortly after the new regulations had been gazetted. I do not think the hon. member would want me to repeat it because he saw it. Generally speaking, perhaps I might say that it is the intention by the enactment of the steamship regulations appearing in the Canada Gazette to implement the recommendations of the Kellock commission so far as it is reasonably possible to do so.

In order to do that it was thought that if the safety of life at sea convention, which was approved by many nations at London and which I hope will be introduced this session as amendments to the Canada Shipping Act, could be implemented in regulations, we would be going a long distance in carrying out the recommendations of the Kellock report. We have tried to do that in the regulations that have been enacted. Of course they are far more stringent and far more difficult of application that those in effect before the disastrous Noronic fire, so much so that there has been some objection on the part of operators. However, after they made their representations to Ottawa I believe they came to the conclusion that the regulations we were making were not on the whole unfair. Certainly they came to the conclusion that they would do everything they could to abide by them, and I already have the assurance that that is being done by a large number of corporations.

There are cases—and I presume it is one of these my hon. friend has in mind—where ships are providing a service of convenience to the public, and if they had to follow all the regulations it might well be they would be put out of commission entirely. I think that the steamship inspectors will use some judgment in that regard because it is not the intention to discontinue any service which is required for the public unless, of course, there is a refusal on the part of the owner to comply with those of the regulations which appear to our inspectors to be fair and reasonable.

I want to say one word about the escape clause to which the hon. member referred. The escape clause was naturally put in there because we realize that it is impossible to meet all these regulations for the coming season. Some companies can meet some of them; others can meet all of them. I know of one company that has met practically all of them except one or two that it could not implement before the opening of navigation, but there are other ships that have few or none of these appliances. The object of the escape clause was to give the steamship inspection board some discretion in the application of the regulations. I repeat that at the moment I know of no steamship service that has been put out of operation because of the regulations. I would not want the committee to feel, however, that it is not the intention to put them into force. It is very much the intention to implement them, and if not fully this season at least by the time ships are put into commission next year.

Mr. Pearkes: There will be a reasonable length of time allowed? I am concerned primarily with small companies servicing the smaller islands in the strait of Georgia. There will be a reasonable length of time?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, surely.

Mr. MacInnis: I would hope that we would not press the minister too hard not to enforce these regulations. If a disaster occurred in connection with the type of boat that plies between these islands and other points on the west coast it would not be of the same magnitude as the Noronic tragedy. Nevertheless it would be a disaster and the first thing that would be asked would be whether the regulations were in force. The minister would be justly subject to criticism if, after the tragic warning we have had, he allowed ships that carry passengers to continue in service without complying with the necessary safety regulations.

I agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo that a certain amount of time should be allowed; but the companies or individuals operating these ships should at least indicate by this time that they are taking steps to comply with the regulations. If the minister finds any attempt to evade those regulations he will be derelict in his duty unless he sees that they are complied with. There is no use having regulations and then permitting marine inspectors or others whose duty it is to enforce them to neglect that duty. If it is necessary to provide a service to any of those islands, and that service cannot be provided without endangering the lives of passengers and crew, then this government should provide the service and safeguard the lives of the people who want to travel to those islands.

I should hope that we would not on the one hand criticize the ministers for such disasters as happened last year in Toronto, and then say now that there is danger you may put some boats out of business if you enforce regulations considered necessary for the safety of those who use those boats. I want to be absolutely fair with the minister. As long as the regulations are not beyond what is required, I hope he will see to it that they are enforced.

Mr. Drew: There is one point in regard to the regulations governing shipping that I think it would be appropriate to mention here, in view of the fact that subsequently we will be considering this matter in more detail. As I understand, the regulations that have been drafted require the provision of certain water facilities at points where passenger ships of a certain size and type will be docking, so that in event of a fire water will be available for the fire hoses. The point I should like to place before the minister for consideration is that it is necessary to do something more than merely assure adequate supplies of water for fire hoses when ships are in port. In certain famous cases ships have capsized at the dock because water was poured into them without some measure of control and supervision by those who understood the particular job of putting out fires in ships. I understand, for instance, that in the case of the Normandie, which caught fire when in dock in New York, actually it was the excessive load of water that capsized it rather than anything directly connected with the fire itself. I believe the same thing happened in a very disastrous fire that occurred in a passenger ship at Chicago, and there have been a number of other cases.

It does not require very much imagination to see what might happen if enormous quantities of water were poured into a ship without an understanding of the difficulties that might arise. I am raising this question because it has been brought to my attention; and I merely place it before the minister at this time so that if it does call for consideration he will have an opportunity of going into it in some detail before we deal with the act itself.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the leader of the opposition for his suggestion. I do not know whether he has had an opportunity of looking at the regulations, but they are divided into a series of clauses which provide first and foremost for fire-resisting bulkheads. That is really the thing that protects the ship more than anything else. They also provide for the installation of a sprinkler system. If all ships had been provided with steel, fire-resisting bulkheads, plus sprinkler systems, I think we would have gone a long way in avoiding those tragedies that have occurred. The regulations also provide for public address systems, automatic fire alarm systems, patrol musters and so on.

While I am on my feet I want to say I am grateful to the hon. member for Vancouver East for the attitude he has adopted. One must not forget that these regulations are difficult to apply. It is one thing to make regulations; it is another thing to apply them. It is when you start to apply them that you have all sorts of people say, "Oh, don't touch me; you'll put me out of business," or, "Don't touch me; these people on the east coast or the west coast won't have the service." For that reason I welcome the views of the hon. gentleman, because they recognize the difficulties of trying to administer such regulations.

That applies, of course, to existing ships, not to ships that may be built in the future. New ships certainly will comply with the regulations, and most new ships are built in such a way that it is not necessary to even think of applying them. The difficulty arises in connection with the ships already in existence, which in the past have been exempt from all new regulations. Now we are trying to apply new regulations to those ships, and that is where the difficulty of application comes in.

Mr. McLure: I know I would be misunderstood by the minister if I did not have something to say in reference to transportation.

However, dealing with the last matter that was discussed, that is the regulations concerning safety devices for boats, I might just point out that if these regulations were put into effect within the next ten days we would have no water communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. The only way we would be able to get across would be by air. So when these regulations are put into effect these boats, two of which belong to the government while the others belong to private concerns, will have to be given sufficient time to comply with them.

If I had been the first speaker on this item I would have offered a suggestion to the minister, and I think I will offer it even now. It is this. When a minister has his deputies and assistants sitting before him on the floor of the house, I believe the first thing he should do is introduce those gentlemen to the committee, so that we would know who they are. All they would have to do would be to take their bow after being introduced. I think the hon. minister should do that, so that we will know the gentlemen who are before us.

As I said a moment ago, transportation is one of the problems in which the province of Prince Edward Island is most interested. We are therefore interested in all the transport items under the minister. I see that for the year 1951 the estimates are higher by $6 million than for last year. No doubt this can be blamed on the tenth province, Newfoundland. However, that province has the right to a fair share, and this increase is allowable if the $6 million is going to be spent to improve transportation conditions in the new province of Newfoundland.

I notice that there is still that old blank cheque in the departmental estimates this year, amounting to $10,116,752, for temporary assistance. I have brought it to the attention of the house for the last four or five years, and I am pleased to note that this year the department lists the number of permanent positions in each department, as well as the number of temporaries. In the past we were never given any idea of the number of temporary assistants. In that connection an unfortunate thing arises in the estimates, in that another new class has been put in termed "casuals". I never noticed it before. I did not know the meaning of the word "casuals" so I looked up the dictionary and found that one of the meanings is "happy-go-luckies". It seems to me that is a suitable term for this item of "casuals", covering a period after an election year. Surely some breakdown should be given of that item because it is considerable. It amounts to $2,445,227 for this new form of employees called "happy-go-luckies". We are called upon to give another blank cheque for over two and a half per cent of the total vote. I know the minister will explain that when he replies.

On April 20 a question was asked by the member for Prince about the dual ferry system, or as it is called the shuttle service, during the tourist season. I was astonished at the reply given by the minister. After granting the request for this shuttle system for a couple of months, he stated:

—I am instructing the Canadian National Railways to maintain records to establish the net financial results of the operation of the second ferry this year, and if the operating costs are not offset by additional revenues it is distinctly understood that the double service will not be authorized in 1951.

The minister has no right to make a statement of that kind. If he were to read the terms of confederation under which Prince Edward Island went into this union in 1873, he would find that the government is bound to give us that service. Neither he nor any other minister can say that if the service does not pay it will not be continued. The same thing could be said about the car ferry, yet the government of the dominion and the government of Prince Edward Island in 1873 pledged themselves to give that transportation service. As I have said many times on the floor of this house, there never has been a full implementation of those terms of confederation. The only attempt at implementation was the establishment of the car ferry operating between Borden and Tormentine by the government of R. L. Borden. When I hear the minister making statements of this type, that a second car ferry will not be operated in 1951 if it does not prove to be a paying proposition, I can tell him right now that if he tries to live up to that statement he will be subjected to a barrage that will make him think a second time before he makes such a statement.

I want to say this, and it has been said many times before, that men are on record with regard to our transportation question. I have an article here in which the Hon. Charles A. Dunning, while he was minister of railways and also representative of Queens county, made a statement at a public meeting in Charlottetown. He said this:

The only proper and satisfactory solution to give this island the service it is entitled to according to the terms of confederation of 1873 is an auxiliary service.

That means two boats. Remember this service cannot appear against us as a deficit as it now does, but I shall deal with that later. This article continues:

It is the essence of the Canadian partnership that the ferry rates as well as the service to and from the province should be such as to relieve it, in so far as possible, of the disadvantages of its island position. Anything short of this makes for insularity.

The minister said, in his reply to the member for Prince, that he is instructing the Canadian National Railways. Instructions should be given to the Canadian National Railways, who are the subcontractors in this case just as they are the subcontractors in operating the Abegweit, that they are to give us the service not to yield a profit but to fulfil the terms of union. That service can be nothing less than a daily service, satisfactory to the province, and it should be supplied at the lowest possible cost, not to exceed the cost of operating this ferry as a bridge.

In addition to that, according to the terms of confederation, we are entitled to free transportation for all our products. We have not fought for it, but we will never be satisfied, nor will the province of Prince Edward Island have the terms of confederation fulfilled, until there is a government in power that will live up to those obligations. Year after year when these estimates are being passed, one finds a reference to a deficit in the operation of the ferry system.

I have spoken about this time and time again on previous occasions. It is not a deficit. It may be a deficit to government operation, but let us contrast it with the canals in Ontario and in Quebec. How much money is spent annually on canals? This year I think for the operating of the canals there is provided the sum of $8 million. How much profit do those canals bring in to the government? I understand there is no charge whatsoever for freight moving on those canals. I am not urging that there should be. But it is a service that the government of the Dominion of Canada promised and they are carrying it out in this respect.

Yet when it comes to the province of Prince Edward Island, what do they do? As to the car ferry, we never see a statement showing whether it is a loss or a profit. We are obliged to take the word of the subcontractors. That deficit stands out like a sore thumb. It should be put in there, just the same as is done with reference to canals; it should go in there as a ferry service and not as a deficit; it looks to the rest of the provinces as if Prince Edward Island was getting a hand-out year by year on this deficit.

I am not going to labour this point much further. I still hope that some of these men in the offices, if the minister refuses to take it up himself, will see that it is a service and that the deficit can be charged back to the consolidated revenue fund, as it should be, the same as the deficit on the canals and canal systems.

I might also mention that we have every proof to show that our province has been discriminated against by all the different provinces. As we come along to the different items, I am going to deal with some of those then. At the present time I just wish to bring this matter to the attention of the minister, and I hope he will give my request some favourable consideration. I hope he will be able to see the difference between a deficit and a service.

Mr. Wright: Before this general item is carried, I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport one item which comes under his jurisdiction, namely the matter of the extension of certain C.N.R. lines in northeastern Saskatchewan. The lines that I particularly refer to are the C.N.R. lines from Saskatoon through Melfort to Carrot River and the C.N.R. line from Canora through Sturgis to Arborfield. Those two lines were built back in the period after the first war, between 1923 and 1926. At that time it was expected that the lines would be extended through to The Pas in Manitoba to connect up with the Hudson Bay railway at that point. It is some twenty-five to twenty-seven years since those lines were built. Today they still end at the same point as when they were first built; that is at Carrot River and Arborfield.

Today the settlement has extended out from those two points for some thirty or forty miles, and today they are two of the heaviest delivery points for grain in the province of Saskatchewan. Last year at both of these points approximately one and a quarter million bushels of wheat were delivered. As the minister will see, a great deal of this grain must be delivered from long distances. As a matter of fact the settlement now extends for some thirty or forty miles in a fanshape northeasterly from those two points and the settlement now has spread out so that it extends to about the economical distance from which grain can be hauled to any delivery point. The settlement will stop where it now is until these two lines are extended.

There are two good reasons why these lines should be extended at this time. Northeast of Carrot River there has been a large settlement of returned men established on co-operative farms. There are some seven to ten of these co-operative farms, with ten to twelve settlers and their families on each farm. Some 30,000 acres are being brought under cultivation there. These men in delivering their grain have to haul it a distance of from twenty-five to thirty-five miles to their nearest delivery point.

There is also in the province of Saskatchewan a tremendous demand for new land to which could be moved settlers from the dried-out areas who have for a great many years been receiving assistance under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. This is one of the only areas left in Saskatchewan of good land to which these settlers can be moved.

I have here a report of a speech made by Mr. L. B. Thomson, P.F.R.A. director. This speech was made at the 45th annual convention of the Saskatchewan association of rural municipalities. In it, in speaking of this development in the northeastern part of Carrot River, he stated:

"This development I regard as one of the most important; it will add greatly to the resettlement needs of Saskatchewan," Mr. Thomson said. The reclamation could be undertaken at a low cost per acre, according to the surveys now completed, he stated.

Mr. Thomson reviewed rehabilitation activities in Saskatchewan since 1935, and particularly since establishment of P.F.R.A. in 1938. There were still "hundreds of farmers" requiring resettlement and rehabilitation assistance, for all that had been done, he stressed.

Mr. Thomson has stated that in this area there are approximately one million acres of new land that can be brought under cultivation; but this land will not be brought under cultivation unless these railway lines are extended to the point where transportation will be available to new settlers.

I would urge the minister to take this matter up with the Canadian National Railways officials, if it is they who are responsible for the extension of these lines, and have something done in the near future. Here we have some of the most valuable land in western Canada lying idle simply because of lack of transportation which could be provided by the spending of a few million dollars for the extension of these lines through to The Pas in Manitoba, which would make it possible for this land to be brought under cultivation.

It would save the government money, through being able to re-establish in that area hundreds of families from the dried-out area in the southern part of the province to whom at present they are having to pay P.F.A.A. assistance practically every year. It is estimated by the prairie farm rehabilitation people that there are in the southeastern part of Saskatchewan approximately 4,000 families who need to be re-established. Here we have the land available. It is good land, land on which there has never been a crop failure; it is some of the most productive land there is anywhere in western Canada. As a matter of fact, over the past twenty-five years the average crop yield in this area has been, in many cases, thirty bushels to the acre of wheat. It seems a waste to see this land lying idle simply because of the failure of the Canadian National Railways to extend these branch lines through to their logical point at The Pas in Manitoba. I would urge the minister to give consideration to this matter.

Mr. Chevrier: I am glad to have the hon. member's representations with reference to these two branch lines. I have not had an opportunity of discussing fully the branch lines program of the Canadian National Railways this year. I am afraid however that it will not be any more extensive than it was last year. When I make that statement I have in mind a statement made by the president of the Canadian National Railways before the committee on railways and shipping—or perhaps it was before the royal commission on transportation, I am not sure. In any event I shall be glad to bring these lines to the attention of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Wright: Who is responsible for the extension of those lines? Does the government make the decision, or do the Canadian National Railways themselves make the decision?

Mr. Chevrier: The Canadian National Railways must first of all submit the extension to the government. The reasons for submitting the extensions I have placed on Hansard on more than one occasion. First they must have some guarantee that there will be favourable returns from the operation. Next there must be some assurance that because of the density of the area to be served, natural resources and the like, there is the possibility of profitable operation and, finally, if it is a railway which is exclusively built for the development of natural resources, and one which is not their concern at all, they will so indicate to us and we will have to decide for ourselves whether it should be built or not. But in all of these lines—and I am referring of course to lines of the Canadian National Railways—it has been the practice to get the opinion of the railways as to whether they should be advanced.

Mr. Hatfield: Has anything been done to relieve the Canadian National Railways from operating the Portland, Maine, division, and the terminal at Portland, Maine? This division and the terminal have lost money every year, and I understand they are still losing money. The railways own valuable property on the waterfront at Portland. They have eight or ten long freight sheds, which are not kept in repair. Why would it not be a good idea to get rid of this Portland, Maine, terminal? It is taking business away from Saint John and Halifax, and is being maintained at a loss to the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid if I were to go into the reasons in answer to the question the hon. member has brought up, we would get far afield. As the hon. member knows, there is a committee which deals with the affairs of the Canadian National Railways. Officers are brought before that committee for the very purpose of giving this information. I have not those officers before me, and neither have I that information. However, it was available before the committee. I do not know whether the hon. member asked for it, but it seems to me there was some discussion at that time on the Portland, Maine, interests of the Canadian National Railways. I hope my hon. friend will not insist upon an answer, because we could go on indefinitely in a discussion of that matter.

Mr. Hatfield: I asked the question in committee. Mr. Dingle said that we have had some offers for these sheds. I believe to date nothing concrete has developed. Mr. Donald Gordon said he would take my suggestion under advisement. However, this has been going on for years. They have been losing all kinds of money in the operation of that terminal. Why should the taxpayers of Canada pay for this loss, when it is only taking away freight which could go to the maritime ports of Saint John and Halifax?

Mr. Quelch: I should like to say a few words regarding branch lines, because I believe I have more unfinished branch lines in my constituency than there are probably in any other constituency. It is easy to understand why that is so. It is due to the fact that this has been a drought area, and a great portion of the population have moved out.

For instance, there was the line built from Eyre to Acadia Valley. A train has run over that line once a week. The grade went on in a southwesterly direction from Acadia Valley, and I think it was headed toward Buffalo, but apparently it got lost on the way, because it ends in the middle of the prairie, and has never been completed.

Another line was built from Coronation to Youngstown. That line was completed, but no train has ever run over it. Now it is quite a job to find the track; it is all grown over.

[Mr. Hatfield.]

Then, a line was built from Unity to Bodo, and a train has run over that once a week. The survey was carried on from there to Bulwark through Airways, and there is a lot of interest in that line. The farmers were anxious that it should be built. Some work was done, but nothing more has been done for many years. We are hoping that that line will be completed, because there is a considerable quantity of stock in that area, and when the Red Deer diversion scheme is carried out the whole economic picture will change.

I suppose we will have to wait for any more work being done on that line until the Red Deer diversion program is gone ahead with. The line I wish to speak about particularly is that from Loverna to Scapa. That line was built in the twenties, and for one year trains ran right through. But there was a stretch of twenty-four miles from Spondin to Hemaruka, which was never ballasted. After the first year no more trains were run right through. The trains ran from Unity to Hemaruka, and then turned into Saskatchewan. The train continued to run from Scapa to Spondin, taking wheat out from the elevators. No trains have since then been run from Spondin to Hemaruka.

There has been a good deal of agitation to have that piece of line completed by way of ballasting. I have had communications in the past with Mr. Vaughan, and he stated it would cost about $600,000 to complete it. He said, however, there was not enough business to justify that expenditure, owing to the fact that the line was paralleled by the C.P.R. about eighteen miles to the north, and by the C.N.R. line to the south. He admitted at that time that if the Red Deer diversion scheme were put through there might be sufficient change in the economic picture to justify completing that line. That was the picture two or three years ago.

This spring, however, the C.N.R. made application to the board of transport commissioners to abandon the line from Spondin to Hemaruka, and I understand that permission was granted. The thing the farmers in that area are concerned about is this: What will be the freight rates from the towns east of Hemaruka on freight going west? In the past the practice has been that, in view of the fact that the C.N.R. did not run the trains west, and in view of the fact that the farmers at Hemaruka and east wanted to ship their stock to Calgary and to ship in coal from Drumheller, they were given the same freight rate as though the trains had actually run west to Scapa.

The C.N.R. only charged a freight rate on coal shipped in from Drumheller via Saskatchewan as if it had gone direct through Scapa. The same rate is charged on stock shipped to Calgary. Now there is the fear that, in view of the fact that the railway between Spondin and Hemaruka is to be abandoned, that preferred rate will no longer be allowed. Many petitions have been sent in asking that the preferential rate be adopted in the future. I took this matter up with the minister a few weeks ago and he said he would take it up with the railroad. Can he give the committee any information as to what will be the policy in regard to freight going west on this line?

Mr. Fair: I should like to support the plea made by the hon. member for Acadia as the people in the south of my constituency are interested in this same line and I have had many representations from them. Just across the river at the north of my constituency there are two other lines that have been referred to by many hon. members during the past number of years; I refer to the Hindville and Bonnyville route. Perhaps the minister can tell us something about that.

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I cannot make any more of a reply to the hon. member who has just taken his seat than I could to the hon. member for Melfort. When we were discussing the motion of the hon. member for Gaspe a few days ago I stated the reasons given by the Canadian National Railways for extensions or new construction. This will be found on page 1697 of Hansard. I have not had an opportunity of discussing fully with the president of the Canadian National Railways the branch lines program of the railroad for 1950, but I am afraid it will not be any more extensive than it was last year.

The hon. member for Acadia took up with me the question of freight rates arising out of the abandonment of the line he has mentioned. I have received no report as yet from the officials of the Canadian National Railways. When I do, I shall be glad to convey it to him.

Mr. Drew: This afternoon I made brief mention of a point which I think should be referred to in some detail before we pass on to the general items. This subject matter is embraced by later items in the estimates without being covered fully by any particular item. I refer to the fact that while the Canadian National Railways is under the Department of Transport, the Trans-Canada Air Lines, which is a fully-owned subsidiary of the Canadian National Railways, is under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

I submit that it is not just a question of which minister is going to be charged with such ministerial responsibility as is necessary in connection with either of these activities. I suggest that there are obvious and strong reasons why it is of the utmost importance that these activities now under the Department of Trade and Commerce—the Trans-Canada Air Lines—should also be brought under the Department of Transport.

Within a day or two we shall have before us for consideration amendments to the Aeronautics Act. I do not propose to discuss them now, but without bending the rules too severely I think I can say that they are intended to extend the activities, both of the board and of the minister who will be responsible for the administration of the act. Having said that, I can then explain what I have in mind by reference to the act as it now stands.

The substantial amendments to the Aeronautics Act which were introduced in 1944 were the subject of heated controversy. Those amendments made the air transport board much more than a semi-judicial board dealing with problems presented to it in connection with the granting of licences and so on. The amendments of 1944 to the Aeronautics Act made the air transport board an agency of the minister who would be charged with administering that act.

Many of the most important functions of the board are stated to be subject to the approval of the minister. Regulations and various things of that kind are all brought under ministerial or governmental supervision. Moreover, the board conducts investigations and surveys for the purpose of determining where routes will go and where developments will take place, and that again is subject to the direction of the minister. All this means that the minister charged with the administration of the Aeronautics Act is also charged with responsibility for investigations which will result in the development of new routes, the extension of air services and things of that kind. Without going into the details of the proposed amendments, they will widen rather than diminish that administrative responsibility.

I submit that when government policy, right or wrong, has been to have a chosen instrument operate the main air routes of Canada, it is wholly unsound to have that chosen instrument under one minister and have the administration of the Aeronautics Act and investigations and surveys and inquiries relating to the extension of services called for by that act in the hands of another minister.

Let us take what is perhaps the least important aspect of the problem which is raised by this unnecessary divorcing of similar activities. It means that on the one hand you have of necessity experts in the department charged with the responsibility for Trans-Canada Air Lines dealing with their affairs—now the Department of Trade and Commerce—and you have on the other hand of necessity experts in aviation and in the practical problems of aviation carrying out duties assigned to the Department of Transport under the Aeronautics Act. That in itself is a wasteful separation of services which could much more effectively and much more economically be brought together.

Then again you have the situation where the extension of branch lines of the Trans-Canada Air Lines is determined at the present time by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with whatever approval is required from the government. On the other hand, under the Aeronautics Act the Minister of Transport is charged with the responsibility for conducting surveys, inquiries and other investigations which might lead to the extension of routes. Again, Mr. Chairman, without going into the details of the amending act, the responsibility of the Minister of Transport under the Aeronautics Act is now and will still more be, assuming that the amending act comes into effect, to reach out beyond the boundaries of Canada and seek arrangements under which air routes may be established for the chosen instrument and presumably for other air services as well. It seems to me this is unbusinesslike, wasteful of money and separates groups of experts who obviously should be brought together within one department so that their combined skill may be serving the one purpose of advancing aviation in Canada in every way possible.

Having said that, I am bringing this up in the discussion of the opening item of the estimates of the department because I still most earnestly ask the government to give consideration to the suggestion that the Minister of Transport should be the minister designated to supervise the activities of Trans-Canada Air Lines. I urge that this decision should be made before we reach the point in the estimates where we are discussing details of civil aviation and the Aeronautics Act, and that we should also have the decision made before we are called upon to discuss the amendments to the Aeronautics Act which will have a very great bearing on this subject. If we as Canadians had every reason to be satisfied with our position in the field of civil aviation today it might well be said that no convincing argument was put forward why we should be looking for any change in administrative arrangements or other details of that kind. But, Mr. Chairman, in the interests of the future of aviation in this country and the future of our air services extended beyond our own bounds, I think we should approach the problem with the knowledge that we have not succeeded as we should have in extending Canadian air services throughout the world in the years since the war.

I think it is time for us to face the situation frankly. We ended the war with the greatest pool of trained pilots, aircrew and ground personnel per capita of any nation in the world. I think history clearly demonstrates that there is something about the very type of country in which we live, the very kind of people that we are, which gives to Canadians some special skill in this great new field of transportation. In the infancy of aviation in the first world war Canadian pilots, some of whom are sitting in this house as members of parliament, demonstrated qualities not only equal but superior to any found in active service in that war. It was from among the young veterans of that war that our great bush air service developed which was an inspiration to the whole world in what could be done by the energy and vision of courageous young men.

Canada reached great heights in aviation in the years before the second world war. Today Canadians sometimes forget that, simply on the basis of the vision, courage and skill of such young men, this country was carrying the greatest freight air load in the world. That was not per capita. We were carrying the greatest air freight load in the world before the second world war. That was achieved because groups of young men organized air routes, and with the competitive spirit of vigorous young Canadians showed what could be done in the uncharted routes of the great north as well as the charted routes of the south. It is a glorious page in the development of Canadian aviation. Then the second world war came and once again this country demonstrated the peculiar qualities possessed by its people. Young men and young women again showed that Canada has special qualifications to lead the world in civil aviation. In this country the commonwealth air training plan not only brought together many thousands of young people from every part of the commonwealth to take their training together but also produced as a necessary part of that training an unusually large number of airports all through the country. Many of those airports are still available for uses to which they are not now being put.

In 1945 we ended the war with a tremendous reservoir of trained men and women ready to take their part in the extension of our air services. We had airports and buildings dotted all over the country in the smaller as well as the larger communities. Since that time many of these young men and women have been able to carry forward their training in civilian life. Because of that background Trans-Canada Air Lines has been able to establish a safety record second to none anywhere in the world. In addition there are other air services in this country which have also given the quality and kind of service that we would expect would be given by young men and women of the type trained here.

Having said that, one must say with a sense of realism that we have not gone nearly as far as we should have with the opportunities we possessed. We have a great trunk route across Canada. We have certain routes north and south. We have certain routes connecting the larger Canadian cities with cities in the United States. But if you look at a map showing the air lines in this country you will see that we have neither the number of routes we should have in Canada on trunk services, nor those feeder lines that we should have all over this country making use of those smaller airports, and some very large airports, which were built during the war in smaller communities.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise to a point of order. When the hon. gentleman commenced his speech I did not take objection because I thought he was going to deal with the administration item. However, he has gone on for almost fifteen minutes to deal with the Aeronautics Act, which I had hoped I might bring in this afternoon, and with Trans-Canada Air Lines. I repeat to the committee that I have no responsibility for Trans-Canada Air Lines, and I say now I know of no vote in the main estimates that deals with Trans-Canada Air Lines. It is true that some of the statements made by the hon. gentleman in reference to air policy generally would come under the administration item; but I am sure he does not want to enter into a discussion of the Aeronautics Act at this time, nor does he want to enter upon a full discussion of Trans-Canada Air Lines, because I do not think that would be fair either to the committee or to me. So, Mr. Chairman, I ask you to apply the rules.

Mr. Drew: I submit that I am completely within the rules and that this is the time to bring forward the proposals I have been making and others I had intended to make. It will not take me very long to complete what I have to say. However, this simply demonstrates the very difficulty I am seeking to emphasize, a difficulty that can be overcome by the government. Item 499 under the Department of Transport deals with civil aviation, including the administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations issued thereunder. The very next item has to do with airways and airports.

Mr. Chevrier: That is exactly the point I am making, that those are the items on which the hon. gentleman should make his speech; and he should make his speech, I suggest, without discussing the Aeronautics Act under a general administration item such as this.

Mr. Drew: I had not thought there was any doubt but that under the general item of administration it was the established practice and very well settled rule that one could discuss any of the items that must be administered by the minister whose department we are considering. Let us see why that is such a sound proposition. The item under discussion deals with departmental administration, which embraces every item under this department. Consequently, if we want to discuss a subject that touches more than one item the appropriate place to discuss that subject is on the opening item of administration, which necessarily deals with every other item in the estimates of that department.

I wanted to point out that I was not dealing with Trans-Canada Air Lines alone, nor with the new Aeronautics Act. I was dealing with the act for which provision is made in these estimates, and was seeking to point out why I hoped that before we finish these estimates, and before we come to a consideration of the amendments to the Aeronautics Act, the government will take a very simple step it can take and transfer Trans-Canada Air Lines to the administration of this department so that we will be able to discuss the whole subject at that time. That is why I was bringing up this matter this evening.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: Do I understand the hon. gentleman has completed his remarks?

Mr. Drew: No; the chairman rose. I did not intend to speak very much longer, but I do submit that I am entirely within the rules. I had hoped to be helpful so that my suggestions, if they were worthy of consideration, could be given that consideration over the week end in order that when we resumed our discussion the government might make its decision with respect to them.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no doubt the suggestions are worthy of consideration; far be it from me to say otherwise; but I do not think this is the place to discuss them. If I may say so respectfully, I entirely disagree with the hon. gentleman in the interpretation he places upon the departmental administration item. This is an item which permits the discussion of matters concerning the Department of Transport generally. The other, particular, items permit the discussion of those things to which they relate. My hon. friend has been discussing Trans-Canada Air Lines, which do not come under any item in the estimates. He has been discussing in detail the Aeronautics Act, which I submit with deference should not be discussed on the general item but on the two items to which he referred, and which will be up for consideration when the amendments are brought in. I do submit, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. Drew: Well, I am not going to take any unnecessary time in arguing the point. I believe I am entirely in order. I sought to place before the committee reasons why these matters should be given consideration, but rather than continue any argument about it I shall wait until the items come up, though I believe that will involve more time and do away with the possibility of bringing the whole operation into the position I think would be best in the interests of civil aviation. I would point out that I was not discussing any single item of Trans-Canada Air Lines, or any single item under the act. I was discussing the broad problem of civil aviation and the desirability of bringing it under one all-embracing organization, in the interests of the expansion of the services we need in this country. If the minister argues against a discussion of that kind at this time, however, rather than argue as to who is right and who is wrong in the interpretation of the rules I shall defer my discussion until we come to the items, though it will only lengthen the time necessary for discussion.

Mr. Stanfield: On this item last year the hon. member for Cumberland and I brought up the question of restoring ferry service across Minas Basin between Parrsboro on the one side and Kingsport and Wolfville on the other. At that time the minister said a suitable boat could not be had, or something of that kind. As he knows, that ferry service was carried on for many years, and was done away with during the war. I believe it is some 175 miles around the bay if you have to go by car, and if you are in a hurry that is a long way to drive. I wonder if the minister has given any consideration to the restoration of this ferry service in the near future. I am sure it would be of great interest to many people in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not in a position to give the hon. gentleman the information he desires now. This is a matter which concerns the maritime commission, and when we come to that item I will have the information.

Mr. Johnston: On March 8 and again on March 22 of this year I broached the subject of railways and trucking. If my memory serves me aright, on those occasions the minister said he would be willing to discuss that matter more fully when his estimates came up. I am not sure of the appropriate place to discuss that question. If the minister thinks it would not be appropriate under this item and will tell me the proper place in his estimates, I shall refrain from any further comment. Otherwise I want to go on and discuss the demand of the railways before the royal commission and any other body they can get to listen to them that some control be imposed upon trucking in Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: I would appreciate it if my hon. friend could postpone the discussion of that subject until we get to one of the Canadian National railway items.

Mr. Johnston: Would the minister indicate to me the particular item? I should be glad to do that to accommodate the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall indicate it in a moment. I think perhaps the most appropriate item would be the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Johnston: On what page is that?

Mr. Chevrier: Page 64, item 524.

Mr. Johnston: Of course, the minister realizes the difficulty of those of us who are on other committees. When that item is reached, there may be—

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to stop the hon. member from discussing it, and if he should not be in the house when this item is discussed I shall indicate an appropriate item under which he can discuss it.

Mr. Johnston: I want to thank the minister for that.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to ask the minister a question arising out of the control of airports. From the markings on them, I judge that the Department of Transport controls the airports. Presumably the department controls the landing, taking off, storage of planes, taxiing and all the other operations around the airport. Where is the division of authority between the Department of Transport and Trans-Canada Air Lines? Naturally each airport has a control tower, and in the control tower there is an officer in charge of telling aircraft whether they can land. I think it is important for the committee to have a statement as to where one jurisdiction ends and the other begins. Trans-Canada Air Lines is in charge of the aircraft. Is that company in charge of the aircraft once it is off the ground, or under whose authority is the plane operating when it comes in to land?

It seems to me that if there are two authorities there is possibility of duplication and unnecessary operational expenses.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think there is any difference between the operations of the airport in so far as Trans-Canada Air Lines are concerned and any other air line. The hon. member seems to think there is a distinction to be made between Trans-Canada and the other air lines, in so far as the arrival or departure at the airport is concerned, but there is not. I presume the airplane is in constant communication with the control tower if it is flying on the beam. If it has left the beam, then it is in communication I presume with other landmarks, so that it can steer its course appropriately. I do not think there is any distinction to be drawn. There is no duplication, because there is no service performed by the air line which is again performed by the control tower.

Mr. Adamson: I asked the question because I gather that most airports are used by more than one air line. At the appropriate time, or perhaps now, will the minister state how the Department of Transport is paid for the operation of the airport? Is it on a per plane basis, on a rental basis, a per passenger basis or how?

Mr. Chevrier: The department is not paid for the operation of the airport. Moneys are voted in these estimates that are now before the house for the operation and maintenance of airports. There are some exceptions to that, in that a municipality may own an airport. The department does charge landing fees and the like, which are paid by the air lines to the department.

Mr. Green: In the Vancouver press a day or two ago, there was a statement to the effect that the department was going to extend the runways at the international airport. Some action of that kind is needed in order to satisfactorily accommodate the transpacific planes. I believe they are having some difficulty there now because of the size of the runways. Will the minister say what the position is with regard to any such proposal?

Mr. Chevrier: I would rather do so when we reach the particular item.

Mr. Cruickshank: Move the airport to Abbotsford.

Mr. Green: Another question has to do with the regulations for safety at sea. When the minister made his statement concerning fire regulations on April 21, he mentioned that he was adapting them from the safety at sea regulations, which were agreed upon at the convention in London in 1948. Is it the plan to adopt all those regulations which were agreed upon at London, and will those regulations include some provision to force ships on the coast to carry a radio operator?

There has been a great deal of discussion on that point. Last fall there was a wreck on the shores of Stanley park within the city of Vancouver, and the radio telephone was not in operation.

Mr. Chevrier: The accident to which my hon. friend refers was not due to a lack of radio apparatus.

Mr. Green: Will the new regulations provide for the carrying of radio operators on those ships?

Mr. Chevrier: I was asked that question by the member for Vancouver East some days ago. I am afraid I shall have to give the same answer as I gave to him. It is impossible to give that information until the bill is before the house. It has been announced that the bill will be introduced in the near future. It is not ready at the moment, but I hope it will be ready soon. When the bill is before the house, there will be ample opportunity for discussion. I should not like to anticipate any information by giving it now.

Mr. Green: When the minister's estimates come up again, I hope he will give the committee a detailed statement concerning the benefits that may be obtained by the men of the merchant navy. So far as I know, the only improvement in their position since last session has been some extension of their right to vocational training. They still have no right whatever to educational training, pensions, hospitalization benefits, the Veterans Land Act benefits, civil service preference or any of the other benefits which are available to the men of the other services. Will the minister be prepared to make a statement on their position at the present time?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I shall make a statement.

Mr. Green: I hope he will say why those benefits are only available to the men who signed a pool contract. Apparently quite a few men were taken on at such a young age that they could not sign a contract with the manning pools and other men were taken on to Canadian ships without ever being asked to sign a manning pool contract. Yet for some reason or other both these groups are ineligible for vocational training. Will the minister also deal with that situation when he brings in his report?

Mr. Chevrier: I said I would give a statement.

Mr. Green: The minister will cover that in the statement?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not saying that I will cover that. I said that I will make a statement. The hon. gentleman is asking so many questions—

Mr. Green: I have not asked many questions. Do not get excited.

Mr. Chevrier: We have had a discussion on this time and again, and I know what my hon. friend's views and feelings are. If my friend gets one concession, he will ask for ten. I told him that I would give a statement. Now he says "Will the minister introduce this matter in the statement?" What else does the hon. member want?

Mr. Knowles: Pipe lines.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to see the minister get this item through by eleven o'clock, but there is something I want him to clarify. This is not only a matter of administration. I think it is a matter of change of policy. I am going to use that Sydney airport as an example. I think the Department of Transport owns that airport. You have the Dutch airlines planes landing there, and those of the American airlines; and there are planes from all over the world coming in. Since the inception of the port, under the minister's department, the cleaning and ramp service and all of that work which is of a labour nature was performed by local people and employees of the T.C.A. Within the last year or so there is moving in there an organization known as Allied Aviation Services, and they are taking over or attempting to take over the servicing of planes that are not Trans-Canada Air Lines planes.

I wrote to the minister giving him the whole story. I have before me a letter dated April 29 of this year. I do not as a rule read back letters to anyone in the house on a matter on which they have made a decision. But I think in this particular letter the minister is absolutely wrong. I know that he did not write the letter, that he obtained the information from his officials and that they relayed it to him. In this letter he makes the statement:

> There is nothing we can do about the situation existing in Sydney.

About which I had written him. The letter continues:

> As you know, Allied Aviation Services is a Canadian company, even though it may have American affiliations and backing and we cannot very well prevent them from soliciting business at Sydney or anywhere else.

It is my interpretation of that statement and it is my information that that particular organization is an American company; and in view of the fact that the airport belongs to the Department of Transport, I think it is the responsibility of that department to see that the servicing of ships coming into that port, their property, should be done by either members of the T.C.A. or the Department of Transport. Definitely, it should be Canadian labour.

I am merely bringing this matter back to the minister's attention so that he may have another look at it with his officials. I have been out to the port and have discussed this matter with the employees. If you let that American company muscle in there, it means that you are going to displace practically everyone who is performing that service at that airport at this time, and most of them are veterans of the recent war and have been there for some considerable time. I wish the minister would have another look at the situation and I hope that, some time before his estimates are finished, he will be in a position to tell me exactly what he thinks the situation is. I do not think this letter answers the question.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall be glad to take another look at it.

Item agreed to.

Canals service—

460. Canals service—administration, $97,950.

Mr. Green: As the minister got his administration item through, I suggest that we report progress.

Mr. Knowles: Progress? That is the first item passed this session.

Progress reported.

RIMOUSKI, QUEBEC—RED RIVER VALLEY, MANITOBA—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this last week end has been one of great anxiety, even suffering and distress, for a large number of our fellow citizens, especially in two separate areas of this country. When I heard yesterday of the terrible fire that was raging at Rimouski I sent telegrams to the mayor and to the archbishop, which perhaps I might read, because I feel sure that all hon. members would like to be associated with the sentiments I expressed in these telegrams.

The telegram to the mayor was as follows:

A Son Honneur le Maire Victor Lepage
Rimouski, Qué.

Je suis horrifié d'apprendre l'étendue du sinistre que vient de subir la ville de Rimouski. A la population de votre ville et en particulier aux familles, aux institutions et aux maisons d'affaires si durement éprouvées, vous voudrez bien transmettre l'assurance de ma plus entière sympathie.

Louis-S. St-Laurent

The telegram to the archbishop reads as follows:

A Son Excellence Mgr Courchesne, Archevêque de Rimouski, Rimouski, Qué.

La nouvelle de la tragique conflagration de Rimouski me cause un vif chagrin. Je tiens à vous adresser, à vous, ainsi qu'aux autorités du séminaire et des autres institutions religieuses qui ont été éprouvées, l'assurance de ma très vive sympathie.

Louis-S. St-Laurent

In this morning's Montreal Gazette the message to Mayor Lepage is translated as follows:

I am horrified to learn the extent of the disaster Rimouski has suffered. To the population of your city, and especially to the families, the institutions and the business firms so badly affected, I would ask you to convey the assurance of my deepest sympathy.

The message to Archbishop Courchesne is translated as follows:

The news of the tragic conflagration at Rimouski causes me deep sorrow. I would wish to extend to you and to the authorities of the seminary and of the other religious institutions which have suffered losses the assurance of my deepest sympathy.

Some hours earlier we learned that flood conditions in the Red river valley had taken a turn for the worse. Last Saturday I gave the following statement to the press:

From end to end of Canada, the people are deeply concerned about the anxiety of their fellow citizens in Winnipeg and the Red river valley. We are all anxious to have done whatever can be done to relieve the distress and suffering of those whose homes have been invaded by the floods. All agencies of all governments, as well as the Red Cross and other voluntary organizations, are doing all they can to help, and we all hope that the disastrous conditions may soon be ended.

Over the week end the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) went to Winnipeg to see that everything that could be done by agencies of the federal government was being done. He returned this morning and brought the following letter to me from the premier of Manitoba:

May 7, 1950

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, P.C., K.C., Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

As you will know by reports that have already reached you, our flood situation, which we had hoped would by now have passed its peak, is becoming increasingly serious. Recent heavy rains throughout most of the Red river valley area have added tremendously to the volume of water, the area of flooding and resulting damage. For two or three days during the worst of the rain and following it, extremely high winds caused still further damage, making relief activities very difficult and in some cases impossible. From the international boundary north to lake Winnipeg, an area some seventy miles long and varying in width from five to thirty miles is now covered with flood waters. This area includes many towns and villages, greater Winnipeg and the city of St. Boniface. In greater Winnipeg itself, in spite of emergency diking operations, several areas containing not only a large number of residences but three large hospitals and other public buildings, already have been in large part evacuated.

The situation took such a sudden turn for the worse late last Friday afternoon as to indicate the necessity of immediate action to evacuate two hospitals and two large residential areas; I therefore convened late that night an emergent meeting of representatives of some of the organizations most active in flood relief, including representatives of the army, the Manitoba Red Cross Society and of the police, engineering and health departments of the city of Winnipeg.

Hon. Stuart Garson, Minister of Justice, had just come to the city for the purpose of investigating the flood situation and conferring with our government regarding it, so we were fortunate in being able to have him sit in at this emergency conference.

Following a full discussion at this meeting, it was unanimously agreed that the situation had become so serious that all flood relief efforts should be centralized immediately. Acting on this advice, with the meeting still in progress, and with the approval of everyone present, I asked the army to take charge of the co-ordinating operation, it being understood that all other organizations and individuals would continue to give their full co-operation and assistance. Your colleague, the Minister of Defence, was good enough to approve of the army under Brigadier R. E. A. Morton acting in this capacity.

As you are aware, the province of Manitoba already has been receiving all the federal aid which we have asked for and that is a great deal. Practically a month ago army headquarters here and I had discussed the possibility of a flood this spring and had made full arrangements regarding the circumstances in which the army would be called upon to assist. The actual document covering this agreement was signed by me on April 13 last. Similarly, the navy and the air force, though not operating under a specific agreement, have extended to the province and to all other agencies at work on flood relief, the utmost co-operation. The R.C.M.P., in which of course both the federal and provincial governments are interested, has also given us service and co-operation, leaving nothing to be desired. It is unnecessary for me to mention other federal assistance, such as district engineers, department officials, and by no means least of all, your own two ministers, Mr. Claxton and Mr. Garson, having done everything possible to help in this emergency. I would like, therefore, to express to you our deep appreciation of the wholehearted assistance that has been so readily forthcoming from all federal agencies. Exactly the same is true, I am glad to say, of the municipalities, local and volunteer organizations throughout the area and the province.

In spite of all this effort, however, the situation became not only serious but critical last Friday, resulting, as mentioned, in my declaring a state of emergency, and asking the army to assume overall charge of all flood relief activity. It is still critical, and I feel that its effects are so great as to require in many cases expenditures so large that they are beyond the capacity of individuals, organizations, municipalities and even the provincial government, to assume.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Under these circumstances, and again assuring you that this province greatly appreciates the assistance already given, I would request that you formally recognize this situation as a national emergency and let us have your assurance of federal financial assistance commensurate with our needs. I am unable at present to state what these will ultimately be. All the people best qualified to prepare an estimate have been, and still are, too busy with the emergency of the flood for me to ask them to given even a casual estimate. In fairness to them, I feel that they should not attempt a considered estimate until the floods have subsided. Several of my cabinet colleagues, departmental officials and others have, however, along with me, conferred with Hon. Stuart Garson during his much appreciated three days here. We feel that he has a good understanding of our position in this matter. What I would request at the present time is that you give us the assurance that assistance will be forthcoming from the federal government. My officials and I will be glad to meet with your government's representatives in order to discuss details of the arrangement.

I wish to thank you in advance for the consideration that I know you will give to this request from the province of Manitoba which has had the misfortune to suffer such a catastrophe at this 1950 flood.

Yours sincerely,

Douglas Campbell

On receipt of this communication from the premier of Manitoba I immediately called a special meeting of council. Following the meeting I dispatched to the premier of Manitoba by telegram the following reply:

Ottawa, May, 8, 1950

Hon. D. L. Campbell, M.L.A.,
Premier of Manitoba,
Winnipeg, Man.

Immediately upon his return to Ottawa, Hon. Stuart Garson delivered to me your letter of May 7, 1950, outlining the present position with regard to the serious floods in the Red river valley in your province. We are glad that all of the federal agencies and authorities in your province have been extending to you any assistance which you required since this is what they had been instructed to do.

We have been following the development of this flood closely from the beginning. We felt that the heavy snowfall in the Red river valley, especially in the American part of it, coupled with the late spring break-up, was bound to create some measure of flooding on the Canadian side. The transformation of this serious condition into one of really critical proportions by the untimely and heavy rains and winds of the past few days is a misfortune of the first order.

In view of the serious news which comes out of the United States part of the Red river valley to the effect that heavy rains there may possibly create another flood crest, we entirely agree with you that the immediate efforts of your government and our own in this matter should be directed towards meeting this physical threat of flooding. But we can assure you that as soon as you feel free to open up the question of federal financial assistance, upon the basis of this being beyond your capacity to deal with alone, we shall be glad indeed to discuss it with you.

No doubt you will want to know now in general terms upon what basis financial assistance to you will be considered. Until the extent of your misfortune is determined, no one can be specific, but I can say in general terms that in arriving at the amount of our assistance to you, we shall apply the same principles as those upon which our assistance to the British Columbia government in connection with the Fraser river valley floods was determined.

Louis S. St. Laurent

In the case of the disastrous fire at Rimouski, the federal government has taken precisely the same kind of immediate action that was taken at the very beginning of the flood in the Red river valley and that has been taken in respect to other disasters. The special facilities of the armed forces and all other federal agencies in the area were made available at once to assist in emergency action and the provision of emergency relief.

I merely want to repeat that I am sure all the people of Canada sympathize with those who have had the misfortune to be overtaken by these catastrophic events.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members of this house will join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in the expression of sympathy he has conveyed to the citizens of Rimouski in the appalling disaster that struck that community during the past week end. We all regard that expression of sympathy as voiced not only on behalf of the members of this house, but on behalf of the people of Canada, following one of the worst and most tragic disasters that have occurred in this country.

Hon. members also will be pleased to learn of the steps that have been taken with respect to the situation in Manitoba, though I believe there is room for further comment on another occasion as to the way in which certain things might have been done, which this tragic event will emphasize.

These disasters bring vividly and dramatically to our attention the fact that any community in this country, large or small, may be visited some time by a calamity far beyond the power of municipal facilities to cope with, and far beyond the ability of the citizens of that community to deal with effectively. Rimouski is already looking to the future and seeing what may be done to repair the damage that has been done; it has been estimated locally that it will require at least a quarter of a century to do it.

There is still great emergency in Manitoba. These events, entirely different in character, nevertheless demonstrate the need in every community of some voluntary civilian organization to deal with emergencies of this kind.

For some years since the end of the war the need for civilian defence forces has been under consideration. These tragedies might well suggest to us that we should not limit our thinking in that connection to situations of a military or semi-military character, but should recognize that without warning a disaster as great as that resulting from war itself may call for the immediate well-organized efforts of the citizens of that community, of the surrounding countryside, or even of the whole country. So it would seem that these two events, having regard to their magnitude and the agony which has accompanied them, should impress upon all of us the desirability of creating the kind of organization that has been so clearly and ably suggested from time to time by General Worthington—not merely in order to deal with the direct or indirect effects of war but in order to deal with any emergency that may arise.

Both in Rimouski and in Winnipeg there are stories of the magnificent heroism of people who have risked everything, not only to save their own families and their own homes, but to help others; and in so doing they have been actuated by the most unselfish motives and worked to the point of utter exhaustion. But no matter how wholehearted and unselfish may have been their effort, the inescapable fact remains that no integrated municipal or community organization existed for this purpose.

As we extend our sympathy and the offer of the support and assistance of the people of Canada on this occasion, I would strongly urge hon. members to think of the lesson these tragedies have brought home, and consider the advisability of the early organization of voluntary civilian forces to deal with any such occurrence in the future.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we wish to join with all hon. members in expressing our sympathy to those who have suffered in these great disasters of the past few days. The sudden and overwhelming fire in Rimouski, bringing loss and tragedy, I think has pointed up the innumerable smaller catastrophies affecting many others in this country which we have suffered from time to time, particularly in recent months. This is one phase of the disaster at Rimouski that should cause us to think of fire protection and precautions against fire all across Canada, in order that property and human life may be saved.

I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will take the same steps with respect to Rimouski that he proposes to take in regard to the flood in the Red river valley. Those of us who know what was done in the Fraser valley in British Columbia under similar circumstances are glad to know that the government contemplates the same pattern of relief for the Red river valley. I hope that similar and generous assistance may also be extended to the citizens of Rimouski.

In mentioning Rimouski, may I say how much I regret that the member for Rimouski (Mr. Belzile) is lying gravely ill in a hospital in this city. His personal loss in the destruction of his home, and the fact that he is unable to speak to his constituency at this time, are circumstances which we deeply regret.

So far as the flood in Manitoba is concerned, I hope that steps will be taken immediately by the governments of Canada and the United States to ensure that disasters like those which have occurred in the Red river valley within the last century and a half will be prevented in the days to come.

We wish to express our sympathy to the people of the Red river valley, and to those who have suffered devastation and loss as a result of the fire in Rimouski.

(Translation):

Mr. J. G. L. Langlois (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, as representative of a lower St. Lawrence constituency almost adjoining that of Rimouski, I heartily echo the feelings of sympathy which the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. party have expressed for the people of Rimouski.

I was passing through Quebec yesterday when I heard of the catastrophe. I immediately got in touch with localities in the vicinity of Rimouski in order to find out about the situation and to make sure that the good people of the stricken city received the assistance they required.

I also contacted federal authorities, especially the Prime Minister's secretary in Ottawa. It was reassuring to learn that the Prime Minister himself was already giving personal attention to the Rimouski disaster.

This tragedy affects me all the more since for more than five years I had the honour of attending the seminary of Rimouski which was partially destroyed by the fire.

In addition I was pleased to see the dispatch with which, considering the lack of communications, the military authorities answered the appeal for help that had come from Rimouski, in order to provide every possible assistance, under the circumstances, to these people in distress. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) also placed the services of his department at the disposal of local authorities. The Montreal and Quebec divisions of the Red Cross dispatched relief groups with amazing rapidity.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

I should like also to congratulate the civil and religious authorities of Rimouski for organizing relief squads and providing valuable assistance and help to the stricken people.

Early yesterday, both on my own behalf and in the name of my constituents, I offered my sympathy to His Excellency Monsignor Courchesne, archbishop of Rimouski, to the civic authorities—the mayor and aldermen of the city—and I also offered to place myself at their disposal and to substitute for, if possible, their doughty representative (Mr. Belzile) who, as was pointed out a few moments ago by the leader of the C.C.F. party, is confined to the hospital by a serious illness.

I repeat the offer of service I made to my fellow citizens from Rimouski and assure them of my entire devotion in this respect.

And now, to His Excellency Monsignor Courchesne, to the mayor and aldermen of the city of Rimouski, to the authorities of my alma mater, to the clergy and the people of this prosperous lower St. Lawrence city, I once again express my most sincere sympathy.

(Text):

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I was inclined to express by applause that those who preceded me had said all I thought should be said or could be said on an occasion of this kind. On further thought, I would not want this opportunity to pass without expressing our sympathy, both to the people in the devastated Red river valley and to those who met with such a tragic experience in yesterday's fire at Rimouski. I compliment the government on the action that they have taken. I think that the faith I expressed last week in them and in their sense of fairness in this respect has been vindicated. I just want to say that we stand ready to back the government in advancing any financial assistance that may be required to relieve the situation, both in the Red river valley and in Rimouski, Quebec.

I was particularly happy to hear from the Prime Minister's own lips that the pattern of assistance established between this government and the government of British Columbia in respect to floods in that province would be used to assist the people in Manitoba and Quebec. We endorse that wholeheartedly, and extend our sympathies to those who have suffered.

Mr. L. A. Mutch (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, as one who comes from the Red river valley area, where for weeks the hearts of the people have been filled with anxiety, I want to say that the people in that area will find some relief in the recognition that, when they have dealt with the situation that confronts them at the moment, there will be assistance to begin again. While there will be gratitude, and appreciation of all that is done to compensate for the situation as it now exists, the persisting anxiety will be in relation to co-operation in the future to see to it that, so far as may be humanly possible, this thing does not occur again. But for the moment the thought that will be in the minds of my people, and of the people of the other constituencies in the Red river valley, will be gratitude for recognition of their problem, and for some assurance for the immediate future. The long-range hope will be that it may not stop at that.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I have the privilege of joining in the sentiment just expressed by the member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch), as well as the sentiments expressed by those who spoke earlier? It is not unknown for me to be critical of the government, but on this occasion I merely want to say, as one from Manitoba, that we appreciate the action the government has taken, and the assurance that the same pattern as that followed in British Columbia two years ago will be followed in the Red river valley and in the city of Winnipeg and its suburbs with respect to federal financial assistance.

I agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that this is no time to attempt to assess the actual amount to be offered, but I am sure I speak for the people back home when I say it will mean a great deal to their morale to have this assurance from the Prime Minister.

I have one or two questions to ask about this matter, and if Your Honour will permit them now, I would not have to ask them when the orders of the day are called. I am in your hands.

Some hon. Members: Orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: If we could dispose of the matter now, I think it would be advisable to do so. I would ask that members make their questions brief, and deal only with this matter.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you, sir. May I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? Will he tell the house what his department is doing to assist the local authorities in Winnipeg in caring for any illness that may develop, or in getting supplies to help prevent an outbreak of illness of serious proportions?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As I told my hon. friend, Mr. Speaker, when he asked me that question on Saturday night, the Department of National Health and Welfare has been in touch with the department of health in the province and has offered any facilities that it has in the matter. Under the circumstances it must be guided by the consideration and judgment of the provincial department of health.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a question of the Minister of Finance? In view of the fact that this situation is likely to last for some time, is there any way in which the minister can use his price control authority to see that there is no profiteering in the Winnipeg area?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I think the local government has full jurisdiction in that matter. Certainly no consideration has been given to the federal government's re-entering that field.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF ACT OF 1939—WITHDRAWAL OF BILL

On the order:

Introduction of bills—The Minister of Agriculture —Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939."

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, when this bill appeared on the order paper on Thursday last and the order was called, I asked permission of the house to have it stand. It arrived on the order paper by the usual course, through the law clerk. But we raised the question whether it should not be preceded by a resolution. While there is some doubt about it, in order to be certain we thought we should have it preceded by a resolution. I would therefore ask permission of the house to withdraw the bill, with the intention of having it reintroduced by resolution.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the Minister of Agriculture have leave to withdraw the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill withdrawn.

BARTER TRADING

REPORT AS TO PROPOSED ORGANIZATION—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY—REQUEST FOR LEAVE TO MOVE ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, a report of the Canadian Press dated May 5, 1950, which attributes to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) who sailed this morning to attend the commonwealth economic conference in Sydney, Australia, as the representative of Canada, a statement that he believes an organization will be set up in accordance with his recommendations to this house on March 13, 1950, that an organization be established to promote barter trading between Canada and other nations, which statement of policy is directly contrary to the statement of policy made on behalf of the government on different occasions by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and therefore suggests that at Sydney a plan will be put forward which violates the well-established constitutional principle of collective ministerial responsibility to the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Standing order 31 reads as follows:

(1) Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order No. 15) has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

It would therefore appear that the motion as presented at the present time complies with that provision. The second part of the order reads:

(2) The member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place, asks leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and states the matter.

The hon. member has done that. The third part of the standing order reads as follows:

(3) He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to Mr. Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order, and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

Mr. St. Laurent: May I, Mr. Speaker, before you express your opinion, venture some comment on the terms of the suggestion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: If the house would agree that the Prime Minister proceed—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, if that practice, which is not contemplated by the rule, is conceded, then I assume that you would offer me the opportunity to make my observations first in support of the motion.

Mr. Speaker: That procedure could be adopted if the house were agreeable to it. If the house agreed that the leader of the opposition should make certain representations before I decide whether or not the matter is urgent, and then that the Prime Minister make his remarks before I make my decision, I shall be glad to carry out the wishes of the house.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not want to ask the house to make any change in procedure. If it is not in accordance with practice, I do not want to ask it.

Mr. Speaker: The question that I must first decide is whether this matter is one of urgency within the rules of the house. The leader of the opposition wishes leave to adjourn the house to discuss a statement which appeared in the press, and which attributes to the Minister of Fisheries, who is on his way to the commonwealth economic conference in Sydney, certain statements which he is alleged to have made in connection with the setting up of an organization in accordance with his recommendation to this house on March 13, 1950.

Standing order 31(6) (c) reads:

The motion must not revive discussion on a matter which has been discussed in the same session.

My recollection of previous debates in the house during the session is to the effect that this matter was fully discussed at that time. My recollection is that the Minister of Fisheries referred to this matter when he spoke in the house either on the debate in reply to the speech from the throne or on the budget, I am not sure which, and that other hon. members also spoke on the matter at that time. Therefore it occurs to me that it is reviving discussion on a matter that has already been discussed during the present session. Moreover, there is also citation 176, in Beauchesne's third edition, which reads as follows:

The "definite matter of urgent public importance", for the discussion of which the adjournment of the house may be moved under standing order 31, must be so pressing that public interest will suffer if it is not given immediate attention.

There will be other opportunities to discuss this matter before the organization can be set up. In my opinion, a motion to adjourn the house under this standing order should be very carefully considered before it is put to the house. The business of the house is arranged from day to day, and that business is announced at the close of business of the previous day. A motion under this rule disrupts the arrangements previously made. Hon. members who have come prepared to discuss one matter are suddenly called upon to discuss some other matter. Therefore I think that the urgency must be such that the question cannot be discussed reasonably soon in accordance with the regular procedure of the house. With reluctance I must say that in my opinion the matter is not one of such urgency that it should be discussed at this time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN PRESS—INQUIRY AS TO REINSTATEMENT OF DISCHARGED EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Minister of Labour. I have given him notice of it. Press dispatches on Saturday indicated that the newspaper guild was certified as the bargaining agency for Canadian Press. Subsequently it was charged that the Canadian Press refused to bargain collectively or employ guild members in the Ottawa bureau. The government appointed a conciliator, Mr. Stitt of Ottawa, to investigate the charges. Before he could act, on Friday the Canadian Press discharged twelve employees.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Croll: I am getting to the question now, but I have to give the background, Mr. Speaker. That required closing the bureaux in Newfoundland and in Saskatchewan. My question to the minister is this: Is the minister aware of these difficulties, and will he inform the house what action is being taken, particularly in reinstating the twelve discharged employees.

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): What my hon. friend says is substantially true—I should not say "substantially"; it is true. I did meet a committee of the guild on Saturday.

Mr. Knowles: Louder.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend says "louder".

Mr. Knowles: We want to hear you this time.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Mitchell: Someone suggested to me that if you heard me you would not understand me. What the hon. member for Spadina says is true, Mr. Speaker. The newspaper guild has been certified by the Canada labour relations board as the official bargaining agency for employees of the Canadian Press. They did ask leave to prosecute, but I have always felt, in my judgment, for what it is worth, that the most important thing is to negotiate agreements and not to run off to the courts, for the benefit of the lawyers particularly. In my experience that policy has worked reasonably well. I appointed Mr. Stitt, a barrister of this city, as an industrial disputes commissioner—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Speaking about lawyers, what about your deskmate?

Mr. Mitchell: He is a good fellow, like yourself. Mr. Stitt is at the present time looking into that phase of the dispute. I have been informed that he has been able to get the two parties together at least to talk to one another. That is often sometimes difficult on both sides when the employees are first organized. I did meet a committee on Saturday at the request of the guild, which indicated to me that eleven of their members had been laid off. They requested that Mr. Stitt also look into that part of the dispute. I have already indicated to him that I wish that to be done.

I think everybody in the house, irrespective of party, will join with me in the hope that this dispute will be settled to the satisfaction of the members of the guild and of the Canadian Press.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour, especially in view of the good humour he is in today. Can the minister bring the house up to date, if not today, at some time in the near future, on the state of the negotiations between the railroad workers and the railroad companies?

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): I do not know whether my hon. friend has been asked by the parties concerned to raise this question on the floor of the House of Commons, which I doubt very much. As my hon. friend well knows, a board of conciliation was established and we went through all the machinery of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. If my hon. friend has not seen the reports I shall be glad to send him a copy of the majority and minority reports.

Mr. Knowles: I already have a copy.

Mr. Mitchell: That is how the matter stands at the moment, and further than that I do not wish to make any statement today.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

QUESTION AS TO EXTENSION OF SUPPLEMENTARY BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): May I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Labour? Have any representations been made to the minister's department requesting that the supplementary benefits under unemployment insurance made available by the recent amendments to the act be extended until such time as the unemployment situation is relieved?

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): I did not reach my office until a moment or two before the house assembled. I could give an offhand answer from memory, but I should like to check before I do that. If my hon. friend will wait until tomorrow morning I shall be glad to answer his question.

Mr. Gillis: I sent the minister notice.

Mr. Mitchell: It is my fault; not my hon. friend's.

SALES TAX

CIGARETTES AND TOBACCO—ABOLITION ON PURCHASES BY VETERANS IN MILITARY HOSPITALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Rooney (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of National Revenue. Will the acting minister give consideration to the abolition of the sales tax on cigarettes and tobacco sold to veterans in military hospitals?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of National Revenue): The hon. member gave me notice of his question but I believe that this is one that could more appropriately be directed to the Minister of Finance, and I have therefore communicated it to him.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): This is a question which has been under consideration for some time, but, as I have had occasion to explain in budget debates before, there are some difficulties involved. I shall give fresh consideration to it, and when the budget bills are under consideration perhaps I will be in position to give my hon. friend an answer.

ABOLITION OF SALES TAX ON MATERIALS USED IN OCCUPATIONAL THERAPY AND HANDICRAFTS IN MILITARY HOSPITALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Rooney (St. Paul's): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Will he give consideration to the abolition of the sales tax on materials which patients in the veterans hospitals purchase for occupational therapy and handicraft work, on which these patients make a few dollars by personal sales?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I shall give consideration to that too.

[Mr. Gillis.]

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 55, respecting the Limitholders' Mutual Insurance Company.—Mr. Lesage.

Bill No. 84, respecting United Grain Growers Limited.—Mr. Weir.

CANADIAN RED CROSS SOCIETY

Mr. A. A. Macnaughton (Mount Royal) moved the second reading of Bill No. 152, to amend the Canadian Red Cross Society Act.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before this motion for second reading is carried, as I am sure it will be, I think we should note that it is a most interesting coincidence that we should be dealing with a bill respecting the Canadian Red Cross Society on this day. As has already been made clear by the remarks made commencing at three o'clock, the Canadian Red Cross Society has been living up to its great traditions during the past few weeks, and particularly during this past week end in connection with the tragic disasters at Rimouski and at Winnipeg and throughout the Red river valley. It seems to me that everything that was said in this house the last time this bill was up has been more than vindicated. Your Honour will remember that on that occasion members on all sides of the house paid glowing tributes to the work of this organization.

In these two tragic occurrences we have had evidence of what the Red Cross can do and of the speed with which it starts to work wherever there is need. I am sure members of this house will be most anxious to see this bill put through. If I might suggest it to Your Honour, I think this bill will so readily meet with the concurrence of hon. members that this is one instance in which it is hardly necessary for you to suggest that the bill be referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills. I am sure that if the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton), who is sponsoring the bill, asks that we go directly into committee of the whole after it has received second reading, no one will object. Among other reasons I think it would be a good idea to get the bill through today so that we can make up for what happened last session. Hon. members will recall that we passed a similar bill last session, thinking we had done a good job, only to discover that our friends in the other place had emasculated the measure in such a way that by the time it got back to us it was not worth putting through. I should like to ask the hon. member for Mount Royal, when we get into committee, wherein the bill, as it has now been passed in the other place, differs from the bill they rejected last year. I think only a minor detail has been changed. At any rate I hope that the bill can be put through all its stages today, and we shall know this time that after it is passed by this house it will shortly become law.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the bill. As member for a constituency which is pretty much under water at the present time, I want to take the opportunity of saying "many thanks" to the Red Cross. They have come to the rescue again. It is brought forcefully to the attention of people in the danger zone that the Red Cross is doing a wonderful job. On behalf of the people of my constituency I thank the Red Cross for what it has already done in the evacuation of flood victims.

Mr. Macnaughton: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should remind the house that if the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, before the debate is concluded I want to make a few brief remarks by way of endorsation of what has been said by previous speakers about the Red Cross. I have a personal reason for being grateful to the Red Cross for their work in Canada. On various occasions I have seen their work in my own community. First of all I want to express my appreciation to the officers of the Canadian Red Cross for providing hon. members with an excellent brief on the history, constitution, policy and program of the Canadian Red Cross Society, prepared by them for members of the Senate and House of Commons. I have read the brief, and I find it quite informative. It is my intention to pass on to others some of the information contained therein, because I know that they will be just as much interested in it as members of the house.

My first direct experience with the Canadian Red Cross was in France during the first world war, and my second was in the Halifax disaster of 1917. Living in a pioneer community, I have noticed throughout the years the excellent work the Red Cross has performed in the isolated districts of my constituency. In 1948 there were serious floods on the Columbia river, and at that time the local organization of the Canadian Red Cross Society did an excellent and valiant job. Only today I picked up a local paper from my constituency and was pleased to find that the Red Cross is still ready to meet any emergency. In the Trail Daily Times of May 3, 1950, there is an article under the heading: "Flood committee prepares for action." The article reads:

> Following on the heels of a request for flood precautionary measures . . . a meeting of the disaster committee of the Red Cross Society was held last night at the city hall. Leo Levey, chairman of the committee, stressed the obligation of the Red Cross that the preparation for disaster must not await the occurrence of a catastrophe but must be planned in advance. The Red Cross committee discussed plans for rescue, transportation, communications, food, shelter, clothing and medical care, and discussed methods of co-ordinating the work with that of other groups in the event of a disaster.

I mention that, Mr. Speaker, to indicate that the people concerned in this organization are prepared to meet any emergent situation. Again I concur in all the remarks made by previous speakers about this most excellent organization.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks about this bill. I want to say at the outset that I am in favour of it. It is my opinion, and the opinion of many others, that the Red Cross has proven to be one of the greatest assets for good that we have in the whole Dominion of Canada. In my own riding it has worked wonders amongst the poorer people, those who have had problems of illness and other adversities with which to contend. The Red Cross has always come to their assistance in every way possible.

In the sparsely settled northern part of my riding there is a Red Cross organization which I do not think can be bettered or equalled by those in other parts of Canada. It is an organization of real people. The good they have done in the last fifteen or twenty years, and the service they have performed in gathering things together to send overseas, has been remarkable. About twenty years ago, a small Red Cross organization started in the village of Wilberforce, with one nurse; now we have a hospital almost in the centre of the county, with six nurses, and it has become inadequate to take care of the situation. We are working on a project for a hospital to take care of the whole county, one which will be more or less a county hospital under the auspices of the Red Cross.

I am wholeheartedly in support of the bill.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with hon. members who have already spoken in support of this measure, and of the suggestion that we endeavour to put it through the house this afternoon. There are two branches of the Red Cross with which I have come into contact from time to time. First there is the work of the Red Cross in many of the outposts. I have seen what they are doing particularly in the far northern part of Ontario, and I have come to realize of what great benefit the organization is to the people living there. I have also seen the work of the junior Red Cross in Canadian schools. I think that is a phase of their activities that has not been mentioned in the house, but it is one of great importance. From their brief I notice that today there are thirty million young people throughout the world who are members of junior Red Cross societies, and who are securing through that agency training in citizenship, personal health habits, social responsibility, and international amity.

With the world torn by factions as it is today, it is most encouraging to find that there is a voluntary organization comprising within its membership sixty-six nations of the world, an organization by means of which through its international conferences, international league and international committee, some sixty odd nations can get together and find a common basis of agreement. To me that is one of the great phases of Red Cross work, and certainly I will support any move that will strengthen this organization throughout the country.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: Under the standing orders this bill would be referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills. During the course of his remarks the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested that the bill should not go to that committee but should go to the committee of the whole. That can be done by unanimous consent. Does the house give unanimous consent to having this bill referred to the committee of the whole?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macnaughton moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on the said bill.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Limit of real estate.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member indicate now wherein this bill differs, if at all, from the bill passed by this house last session?

Mr. Macnaughton: There is one slight difference. The bill introduced last December had no limitation on the value of the real estate held in Canada. This bill has a limit of $200,000, which the society believes sufficient for their purposes.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

Mr. Knowles: Was this limitation of $200,000 set out in the bill in the form in which the society asked that it be passed this year?

Mr. Macnaughton: Yes.

Mr. Carroll: My recollection of the bill of last year is that there was no limit on the value of the property. In this bill the $200,000 refers not to the value but to the annual value. Is there any difference there, in reality?

Mr. Macnaughton: Perhaps it would be better if I gave one or two details of what the society means by "annual value". I refer to the résumé, which I am sure all hon. members have received:

> The general rise in real estate values and the extension of services has made it necessary that the limit on the annual value of the real estate which the society may hold under its present legislation be increased from $100,000 to $200,000 . . . Calculating the annual value at five per cent of the original purchase price or cost of construction, it will be seen that a limit of $200,000 would cover the real estate presently owned by the society and allow for some slight increase in its holdings.
> It should be appreciated that "annual value," as far as the Canadian Red Cross Society holdings are concerned, is only an academic term, as no revenue is derived from such holdings and as many of the properties are so situated—for example, outpost hospitals—that it is unlikely that they would have either rental or sale value.

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company—Mr. Maybank—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I call your attention to the fact that I adjourned this debate.

The Chairman: In committee there is no adjournment of the debate; an hon. member may speak as often as he desires.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member was on his feet when we adjourned.

The Chairman: Did the hon. member adjourn the debate on this bill or on the other bill?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Greenwood was on this bill and the hon. member for Yorkton was on Bill No. 9.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): As I understand it there is no adjournment of the debate in committee, and I was first on my feet.

The Chairman: That is correct.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): In connection with these bills I was interested to see in the Hardisty World a short article, part of which I shall read:

> Alberta is having enough troubles these days deciding how best to make use of her great resources of natural gas, without having the situation messed up by Ottawa too. And that is just what is happening with the present filibuster going on in the nation's capital.

The article goes on to say:

> What makes this all-Canada argument seem futile, at the present time at least, is that assurances have been given by a great many people that gas from Alberta will be guaranteed to British Columbia users before it is sold to Americans in the Pacific northwest. No one, of course, argues that the Americans are not going to get Alberta gas. Regardless of who builds a pipe line a great deal of the gas will have to be sold to U.S. cities. If it were not for the great gas market these cities are, there would be no pipe line because British Columbia alone does not represent a big enough market to justify building an expensive pipe line.

Then the hon. member for Calgary West made some remarks that I should like to place on Hansard. Speaking to the members of the Ottawa Gyro Club, he is reported as having said:

> Emphasizing the urgent need for markets, Mr. Smith stated that 67,000 barrels of oil per day are being produced where 150,000 could be produced daily but there is nowhere to sell that amount. "That is one of the tragedies of this business," explained the speaker. . . .
> The M.P. from the province that was "born lucky" explained that gas and oil are found together and so abundant is the latter that "enough gas to supply the needs of Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and all eastern Canada is being wasted in flares. If we had a market for our gas, we could continue our search for oil," said the speaker in conclusion.

Some of us in western Canada are particularly concerned that no misuse shall be made of this natural resource; and that if later on gas and oil are found in Saskatchewan or in the Peace river district of British Columbia, it will not be wasted or improperly used. We are not concerned, nor do I think most hon. members of this house are concerned, with any particular pipe line company. I do not know the representatives of these companies and have not been interviewed by them. I assume that applies to most of the members in this house. We are concerned, however, and deeply concerned in making sure that the people of Canada are first served with gas and oil. So far as the bill before the house is concerned, it applies to the building of a gas pipe line. The member for Calgary West says that there is an ample supply of gas to fill the needs, not only of Canada but of the United States as well, for a great number of years.

We are not altogether satisfied with that assurance. I should like to discuss this afternoon the steps that have been taken to safeguard Canadian interests. I want to stress that the duty of protecting the public is purely a provincial duty. The natural resources in all these western provinces were handed back to the provinces by the federal government. They have full control of these resources, and tomorrow or any day can say that not one gallon of oil or one cubic foot of gas will be sold outside the province. The provincial government has that power, and having the power the duty devolves upon the provincial government.

Incidentally the government of Saskatchewan, which has allowed a large number of leases to be granted to people coming from Houston, Texas, and elsewhere, if gas or oil is discovered in large quantities, has a duty to safeguard the public. The provincial government can prohibit the export of gas or oil. What we are considering here is the matter of the safeguards for the public. Those of us who were born in the western provinces, and have lived there, are deeply interested in the welfare of those provinces. We have watched the freight rates, which I am not at liberty to discuss today because that matter is before a royal commission, and we have found that the western economy has been sadly impaired by the fixing of fictitious rates. I cannot go into detail about them today, but those of us who have studied the rates are convinced that is so.

In the province of Alberta alone we have a great supply of coal, water power, natural gas and oil, yet there are no large manufacturing concerns in that province such as are located in other parts of Canada. In the city of Winnipeg we have cheap hydro power, perhaps the cheapest on the North American continent. In spite of this there has been no development of industry. Western Canada will not be developed merely by letting this gas and oil go out all over the North American continent. We must first try to develop industries in the province of Alberta, the province of Manitoba, the city of Winnipeg and the other provinces. It is vital to our province that any governmental agency, whether it be provincial or federal, that has any control over the matter, exercise that control to ensure that these natural resources are not lost to the people of Canada.

We must now see what safeguards there are before this house. The matter of the immediate sale of this oil and gas is a mere bagatelle. It will give employment for a short time, and it will give the people who hold the charters a great amount of money, but in the long run we may find as they did in Texas, Oklahoma, and the other states of the United States, that we have a bunch of dry holes and the communities are deserted because the industry has sold out all the gas and oil. We do not want that situation in the western provinces. We do not want our people to be forced to leave those provinces and migrate to the east or to British Columbia. If you are a bright lawyer now, you will go to the east or move to British Columbia and pay $1,500 for the privilege of entering a law practice. We do not want that situation in Canada. We look to the governmental agencies, particularly the provincial government that is in full control of these resources, to make sure that the people of the prairie provinces are taken care of first.

This bill that is before us is not a bill to fix a route. It is merely a bill to give the company a charter. It is being passed under the general Pipe Lines Act that was passed by a previous parliament, when many of the members who are sitting here today were not in attendance. As I pointed out in a previous debate, that bill was fostered and helped by those who are opposing this bill today. They were in favour of the initial bill that laid the groundwork for any private bill. These members gave that initial bill full support. The only question today is which route should be chosen. I listened with a great deal of care to the member for Edmonton West the other evening, and I should like to congratulate him on his presentation. If it became a matter of a route, those in my constituency and those to the west of me in Saskatchewan would certainly favour the Yellowhead route. We cannot understand why the government of British Columbia, which endorsed a certain resolution favouring the Yellowhead route for the pipe line, did not endorse that route for the trans-Canada highway as well. It would have meant that the highway needed to protect the pipe line would have been built alongside of it. The British Columbia government picked another route entirely for the highway, and it goes through Banff; it does not touch Edmonton at all.

In this house we are concerned also with the welfare of the consumer in Canada, whether he is in British Columbia or elsewhere. I am not in favour of this house deciding; and whether the bill before the house is approved or rejected, we will not be deciding the route at all. It will simply mean we are refusing one company a charter that we have granted to five other companies. Speaking again for the province of Saskatchewan, and I think possibly the Manitoba and Ontario members may take the same view, the bill that was before the house a year ago sponsored by the member for Fraser Valley concerning the Westcoast Transmission Company did not even cover the provinces of Saskatchewan or Manitoba. It was only concerned with British Columbia and Alberta. It made no provision for furnishing gas or oil to any of the other provinces, whereas the bill before the house today applies to the whole of Canada.

Mr. Cruickshank: And the United States.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): And the United States.

Mr. Cruickshank: First.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Not first; you are wrong there.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member interrupted me the other day about a dozen times.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I say again that if I were to speak in favour of any particular route, I would speak as the member for Edmonton West did, in favour of the Yellowhead route.

The attitude of the members opposed to this bill is not understandable to me. The member for Vancouver-Quadra is a lawyer, and a year ago in this house he spoke in high terms in favour of the general pipe lines bill. Yet in speaking in the debate in this house the other evening—

Mr. Green: Last year I did say that it had to serve Canada first.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The hon. member did not go that far at all. Here is what my friend said the other evening, and I do not suppose he wants to take this back:

> Let me point out to the minister that when that bill was put through the house—

That is the original pipe lines bill.

> —last year there was not the slightest suggestion that the board of transport commissioners would have the power to decide whether or not a route to the west coast should go through the United States.

That is what the hon. member says; yet in section 9 of the Pipe Lines Act we find this:

> A company operating a company pipe line from a place in Canada to a place on the international boundary line may exercise, beyond such boundary, in so far as permitted by the laws there in force, the powers that it may exercise in Canada.

I am going to stress too that despite the statement of the other evening, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra knew when he voted for this other bill that it was providing for the export of gas beyond the boundaries of Canada. He was quite clear on it then, but he was not the other evening. I do not want to requote what has been so ably said by the hon. member for Skeena, but I have here a number of quotations of what the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said in the house when that bill was passed by the government in this parliament. Then in addition it has been stated here that the house did not know that this was a very urgent bill, that they did not have much time to study it and they just slapped it through in the dying days of the session.

If you refer to the debate on that, the Minister of Transport said this, as reported at page 2512 of Hansard:

> While there is some urgency because of the importance of these projects, at the same time parliament is breaking new ground in the matter of general pipe line legislation, and the bill deserves the most careful consideration of the house.

He told you that, a minister of the government. Then he went on and said this, as reported at page 2510 of Hansard:

> I expect that these projected pipe lines will cross both provincial and international boundaries . . . The information which I have at the moment is that there are a number of private companies seeking to get special enactments for the purpose of proceeding almost immediately with the construction of these lines.
> Mr. Green: Could the minister say how many?

The minister named five. Then at page 2512:

> Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): The official opposition approve of the principle of this bill . . . We do hope that it will be possible to bring this Alberta oil into Ontario and also into British Columbia. I see no reason why eventually it should not be piped down to the Pacific coast. It is likely also that there will be a surplus which of course can be sold in the United States. It is a very encouraging picture, Mr. Speaker.

That is the bill that was passed by the government, passed in the very words, without any restrictions that you ask here, when you say, "We want an amendment to provide that the main supply will be kept in Canada".

Mr. Green: It says so there.

Mr. Cruickshank: Read on.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Then we go on:

> The bill we are now considering is a key bill based, as the minister has said, on the fact that the pipe lines will cross interprovincial and international boundaries.

Still no safeguards. Then again at page 2513:

> As the minister said, there are already five companies interested in applying for such acts . . . but I presume there will be more as time goes on.

And when they do he lets the other five through and turns the other two down. Then again the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said that special acts of different companies should be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. It was the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra who made the suggestion that this bill, upon which the present bills are based, be referred to a committee of the house for study. It was referred back from the committee unamended and passed.

An hon. Member: Who is filibustering now?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Then they conduct a filibuster in parliament claiming that the government has forgotten about "Canada first". They thought about that a year or more after the basic bill was passed in this house.

Mr. Cruickshank: What are you doing now?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I am telling you what you did in the other house, and you did the same thing.

Mr. Cruickshank: I was never in the other place.

Mr. Harkness: I would ask the hon. member to read Hansard far enough to show where I moved an amendment.

Mr. Cruickshank: He does not want to.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I will now refer to the C.C.F. stand on this bill. The then hon. member for Kindersley, as reported at page 2514 of Hansard, said:

> We also agree that the principle of the bill—

And you do not move an important amendment if you agree with the principle of the bill.

> —should be endorsed on second reading, and that it should then be referred to the committee on railways, canals, and telegraph lines for further consideration.

I want to point out, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said:

> The official opposition approve of the principle of this bill, Mr. Speaker, because we are strongly in favour of the development of the oil resources of Canada—provided of course that, once developed, they are wisely used. We believe that oil and iron can form the foundation upon which Canada could become a great world power. It will be remembered that there is no great power in the world today or in modern times which has not had a great production of iron and steel; together with oil they are of the utmost importance in these modern times.

Again, nothing about any restrictions.

Mr. Hodgson: We want to build in Canada, not outside Canada.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Yes; it is "Canada first" again from the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Mr. Green: Will you read what I said about "Canada first"?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): At page 2513, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said:

> The oil and gas should be used in Canada as much as possible. I would point out to the minister that two of the five companies which he has named are proposing to pipe gas from Alberta down to the Pacific coast, but their main purpose is not to pipe gas to Vancouver but to pipe it to Seattle and Portland in the west coast states of the United States. There is a far bigger population in those two states than in British Columbia, and I believe that the intention is that the main line of these pipe lines will be to these states with a branch up to Vancouver.

Mr. Green: On a question of privilege, will you go on and read where I said I would not stand for that, that it had to go through Canada first?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You did not say you would not stand for it.

Mr. Green: Yes, I did.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): On your question of privilege, you did not say in that whole debate that you would not stand for anything nor did you in that debate move any amendment that would give that bill any more power to protect the public than there is in it today. Not one such motion was made by you.

Now I want to point out to the committee that, in connection with this whole matter, which I think amounts to a tempest in a teapot, you are only opposing the matter of charters to companies to go along with five charters that you did pass.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, no.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is all you are doing.

Mr. Cruickshank: No.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The hon. member for Fraser Valley has stated "Oh, but the company I am now acting for will withdraw the application they made to build down to the states." But ten days after he passed the bill giving the other charter, they applied not to go through his own province but to go down to the United States of America.

Mr. Cruickshank: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is what they did.

Mr. Cruickshank: Just a minute. You mentioned my passing a bill. I am flattered to hear that I passed a bill. I did not know that I had that much control of this parliament.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): My hon. friend cannot say that he did not father the bill.

[Mr. Stewart (Yorkton).]

Mr. Cruickshank: I sponsored it, yes; for an all-Canadian route.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): No. The bill had nothing in it about an all-Canadian route.

Mr. Cruickshank: There was a guarantee.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): No.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The bill then in connection with the Westcoast Transmission Company is in exactly the same wording as this bill.

Mr. Cruickshank: They guaranteed that an all-Canadian route would be built.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): There was no guarantee whatever of anything.

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes, there was.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): There was nothing in that bill mentioning an all-Canadian route; and no guarantee of any sort was given.

Mr. Cruickshank: A guarantee was given.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Now the hon. member comes to this house and says: "I want you to take my word for it that this company ten days ago told me that they would withdraw their application, or have done so, to build in the United States; and they withdrew it." There is nothing in the world, legally or otherwise, to prevent that company from re-applying for that route. There is nothing to prevent any one of the five companies you did incorporate from transferring to any American company that they want to transfer to, taking their money and selling out the public even as these two pipe lines are doing. That is correct.

In addition, you also have on the statute books of Canada an act known as the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act. In connection with that, no person can export oil or gas without the permission of an order in council which is put through by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That was on the statute books long before this pipe line bill. It is still on the statute books. What I am pointing out is that we have responsible government in Canada. If at any time there is danger of that field being used to excess, or the gas going to the wrong places, there is that power with the government of Canada. Also under the Pipe Lines Act, the board of transport commissioners have the power to refuse a licence. If they refuse, the company cannot do business.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said that in his opinion the board of transport commissioners was a fine board and would do a good job. He appreciated the fact that the government had set up a board with power to pass on these things. He said that in the debate a year ago.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, you have a further safeguard in the persons of the government of the province of Alberta. I as a western member would call upon that government to make sure that there is no exploitation of this field, and that we do use as much of that gas and oil in Canada as can possibly be used here before the people of the United States get any of it.

In a previous debate the hon. member for Calgary West had a great deal to say about the conservation board of Alberta. He said that that board was amply seized of the whole situation. He said they were smart people who knew all about it. He praised them to the skies and said he was quite satisfied with the Alberta conservation board. This was said by an hon. member who has been opposing these bills. When the bill went through last year he praised the board and said he was satisfied with it.

Now let us see what the government of the province of Alberta has to say about it. Let us see what safeguards they give us. Just bear in mind that the law is quite clear, as laid down by the Prime Minister in the same debate. In effect he said that the government of the province of Alberta alone can export oil out of Alberta, and they have full control over it. He said:

> I cannot change the constitution. In my view the resources of a province are controlled by the legislation of that province. If there is legislation in the province of Alberta saying that the owners of fields where there is gas must comply with regulations made by a board set up under the authority of that legislation, I think as a lawyer they would have to do so, because that is control of property and civil rights within the province. The federal government has the right to control export but it cannot force export. It cannot say that property belonging to the hon. member shall be taken from him and exported.
> The laws relating to the hon. member's property are under the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, but if it is something that is free to be dealt with the federal government can say, notwithstanding that it is free to be dealt with, "We will not give you a permit to export it unless you comply with such and such regulation."

If there is any doubt as to what these companies are going to do the government of Canada could pass regulations, either under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act or under the present act, and enforce them, but the first duty is the province's. The hon. member for Calgary West says that the conservation board in Alberta is an intelligent one. So, there are your protections, and a lot of the talk that has been going on in this house I submit is far away from the point. We are not deciding a route. If we had to decide a route, as the Prime Minister has so ably stated, we would have to go into all the details. We do not want to build a pipe line around every valley in British Columbia in order to give service. We want to build it in an economical way so that the consumers will not have to pay too much for the pipe line and too high a price for their gas and oil. That is the situation. It can only be gone into and carefully examined by the board of transport commissioners. I had their names available a while ago, but I have mislaid them. One of the members is a former premier of my province, Mr. Patterson. I believe they have a representative from British Columbia, and there are three other other members. Judge Archibald of Nova Scotia is the chairman. Under the act constituting the board they have the power to examine the applications before any permission is given to export. There is the maximum of protection under the electricity and fluid act to which I referred a moment ago. Therefore there are these two protections as far as the federal government is concerned.

All this talk about Canada first should be directed first to the province of Alberta and then to the governments of the other prairie provinces, and then to those other two bodies to which I have referred. As far as this house is concerned, to keep on arguing in this debate as to whether this company or that company is going to build a pipe line here or there is to my mind, Mr. Chairman, absolute nonsense, because we could never agree on a route any more than some provinces have agreed up to date on a trans-Canada highway route. We would have the same troubles that have cropped up there.

Mr. Cruickshank: You still have ten minutes.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I am glad to know that the hon. member for Fraser Valley is enjoying my remarks. I appreciate a good audience, and I know of his intelligence.

Mr. Cruickshank: I want to know which United States route you favour.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): May I say to the hon. member that the only United States route I know of is the one mentioned in the bill he introduced. That is the only one we have seen in the house.

Mr. Cruickshank: Your company advertised it.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): So far as Saskatchewan is concerned, I have a letter from the commissioner of the board of trade of Saskatoon. We want protection in that province. We do not want it all to go to British Columbia. Sometimes you get some hon.

members from that province who take an all-Canadian view, and at other times, when they get west of those mountains, they take a very narrow view. They are isolated on the west coast—

An hon. Member: That is the Liberal—

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): There is another narrow view. I have even seen a broad-minded Conservative at times. In any event the commissioner at Saskatoon said this:

> The question was raised as to whether Saskatchewan's interests in getting supplies of gas for this province should not be protected. The thought was that, in any such bill authorizing the exportation of gas to centres in British Columbia, Saskatchewan's probable needs of natural gas should be provided for before any gas was exported to British Columbia.

Mr. Cruickshank: Who has the narrow view now?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is the view of the Saskatoon board of trade.

Mr. Cruickshank: A narrow view.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): But you want to hog everything for British Columbia. We could build a gas route much cheaper into Regina and Saskatoon than you can around the Rocky mountains.

Mr. Harkness: What about Yorkton?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Yorkton will be reached ultimately, because all good things emanate around that city; even the Minister of Agriculture comes from near there. I continue with the letter:

> Fear was expressed that, if the private bill passed the House of Commons providing for the construction of a pipe line to bring gas to British Columbia, a future bill requesting the construction of a pipe line to bring gas into Saskatchewan might be refused on the ground that there was not sufficient gas in Alberta to supply the needs of both pipe lines.
> I was instructed to bring this matter to your attention with the request that your department consider fully the consequences which may flow from the passage of the private bill in question.

That is the position of the Saskatoon board of trade. You cannot blame them for taking that attitude, when you take the attitude of a sponsor of that bill in this house—and I am now referring to the hon. member for Fraser Valley—which ignores the province of Saskatchewan, that beautiful province, and the province of Manitoba—

Mr. Cruickshank: Most people from Saskatchewan have moved to British Columbia.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I know, and at one time there was objection to that from some of your narrow-minded people. You did not want immigration from Saskatchewan, at one time, and you had to apologize.

Mr. Cruickshank: Who said that?

[Mr. Stewart (Yorkton).]

Mr. Hodgson: You just want selective immigration.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You remember the controversy which took place in the Vancouver papers about that.

Mr. Cruickshank: We did not want too many from Yorkton.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Since the westerners got out there with their western breezes you have wakened up quite a bit. That is all I wish to say on this bill at this time.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Yorkton has given us quite a scolding. After hearing what the Prime Minister said on Friday night I somehow thought that scolding was off, but we are back at it again because the hon. member has told us that this is all a tempest in a teapot, it is a filibuster. But then, as I understood him, he tried to indicate that he was really of one mind with those who wished to see the construction done in the Dominion of Canada. I could not help feeling at the end of the hon. member's speech that he was somewhat in the position of a man who was described to me some time ago, as a man who was ready to give all aid short of help. It seems to me that that is where we are.

When I made a few opening remarks the other night I said that I rose to my feet because I had a feeling, which I believe was widely shared in this house, that this bill was not what it seemed to be, that under the guise of being a private bill it was not so very private. I felt that the government, or at any rate some members of the government, or at least one member of the government, had a lot more to do with it than we were really allowed to know. I think this has become a matter of considerable public interest and I should like to read a sentence or two from Saturday Night which is not regarded as being partisan of the party I am associated with. Speaking of this matter Saturday Night says:

> Here is a question of deep-rooted principles. In spite of all the opposition's attempts the government has so far refused to debate it in the House of Commons.

Since that time the Prime Minister has spoken. Saturday Night continues:

> It looks like being settled in the secret conclaves of the board of transport commissioners and the cabinet. We think it would be a pity if the house let that happen: the Canadian public have some concern in the matter.

I think that expresses very well the feelings of a great number of people as well as members of this house. I think we are entitled and have been entitled to carry on this debate. On Friday night the Prime Minister took quite a different tone from what has been taken by those associated with him, and I shall have occasion to refer in some detail to what he said.

I have always hoped, and I think others of my mind have as well, that these charters might be granted. We believe that the Alberta government is quite right in saying that it wants to have more than one applicant available. That has always been said by the hon. member for Calgary West and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, but they contended that the charters should be granted on proper terms. That is also what was said the other night by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano.

Before I forget, I must say that the attitude which characterized the proceedings in the committee was not what it should have been. Hon. members will recall that we were urged to let this bill go to the committee when, as was represented, we could get all the information which was desirable and necessary and where the matter could be discussed. I shall have occasion later to describe what actually happened in that committee which certainly was a travesty of what we were invited to expect.

I should like now to put on record just what the Prime Minister actually did say, and I do this in the light of all the talk there has been about filibustering, which the hon. member for Yorkton has reiterated. The hon. member and the Prime Minister ought to have a caucus on this. I quote from page 2229 of Hansard of May 5, 1950—

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The hon. member is out of order in referring to another debate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will wait until the chairman calls me to order.

The Chairman: The hon. member cannot refer to a previous debate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am referring to what the Prime Minister said last Friday night.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On another bill.

The Chairman: As the two bills are now before the committee I think the hon. member should be permitted to proceed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. That ruling seems to me to be one which is eminently filled with common sense, but whether it will coincide with the hon. member's views as to technicalities, I do not know. This is what the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 2229 of Hansard:

> I am not going to suggest that the protracted debates in this parliament about the desirability of an all-Canadian pipe line for the gas and oil of Alberta have been a waste of time. It has aroused public opinion as to the desirability of doing that if it is possible. I would expect that that would not be lost from the point of view of the members of the board of transport commissioners and that they would not lightly disregard the unanimous desire of Canadians that their own territory be used to the greatest possible advantage.

I stress those words "unanimous desire of Canadians". I would think the board of transport commissioners might pay considerable attention to what the Prime Minister said. Whether he should have said it is another matter. At any rate it makes it more likely that what the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and others have been fighting for will in the end come about, but my concern is that it should not only come about but come about in the right way.

In order to give this committee an idea of the proper atmosphere of this debate it is desirable for us to recall that after all hon. members of this house have certain rights and privileges. One privilege is for the minority to debate. It is not for any member of this house to decide when the point is reached when the minority is to stop debating, except under the rules of the house. There have been plenty of cases where minorities have ended up by being majorities, and I refer now to particular enactments where public opinion had had time to catch up. It looks to me as if public opinion was catching up here, judging from some of the things that have happened in this house already.

I should like to go back to what was said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on November 15, 1949, and I quote from page 1807 of Hansard of that date:

> I should like also to say a word about what seems obviously to be a filibuster in connection with these bills. The government will not permit any small number of members to prevent this house as a whole from voting on a private bill.

I think we should ponder that. What was really meant was that the government was not going to allow private members to exercise the right which they have. That is what was intended to be said. I continue:

> If these bills continue to be talked out in the limited time permitted for private bills, the government will ask the house to suspend the rules and provide whatever time is required to finish the discussion and to obtain a vote on such bills.

One would think that a crime was being committed, yet I think it is within the experience of us all that the talking out of private bills has been indulged in by the government or by government representatives. We have seen what happened here in the case of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Resources and Development, who is really a man of distinction in that respect. He acted as a kind of shock trooper, and I suppose it might not be irrelevant to suggest that that brought him some political preferment. I am not objecting particularly to that being done; I am only saying that it works both ways.

When the Minister of Trade and Commerce said what he did to the house he said something which was quite improper, and something which in fact produced a result quite different from what was expected. I very much doubt, if he had not said what he did say, whether there would have been nearly as much debate as has occurred since. But he was not the only one. The Prime Minister had something to say about that, though it is quite true the Prime Minister did not put it quite as crudely as the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Prime Minister is a man of more—what shall I say?—delicacy of expression than the Minister of Trade and Commerce, although at times he can be delicate if he wants to. Here is what the Prime Minister said, and I quote from page 1999 of Hansard of November 21, 1949:

> The bills in question have been before the house on four occasions—

A terrible thing. I wonder if there are not members of this house who can recall certain bills which they wanted to get through and which were talked out more often than four times. I continue:

> —during the hour reserved for private bills, and on each of those occasions the time allotted proved to be too short—

What a pity.

> —to permit of an expression of opinion by the house.

Then here is what is really a model of understatement:

> It would perhaps be the feeling of hon. members that there should be an opportunity to permit of a decision being made by the house.

That is just another way of saying what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said. The Prime Minister did provide extra time, so there you have them working together hand in hand toward the same end and seeking to disregard the rights of the minority in this house. Since then we have had the Prime Minister's speech, from which I read you the sentence a moment or two ago in which he said, speaking of this debate, "it has aroused public opinion". I should like to ask if there is any more useful purpose which a debate in this house can serve than to arouse public opinion on a matter in which the public is interested.

I am glad that the Prime Minister has come to that view. After all, this house does not exist merely so that those who are not members of the government—and I speak now of all private members, not merely of those who ordinarily vote against the government—shall just be rubber stamps. Yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce came very near reaching that point. I think there was genuine surprise when there was a really firm attempt to stop this legislation going through. I think we have drifted along to that point in this house. The government does not want to do away with the opposition because that would give the whole show away if the opposition were not there. The public would then begin to prick up their ears if they saw that they were getting a one-party state. The government want to have the opposition but they want it to be tame. The opposition can make speeches and oppose but it must never do anything very much.

When a determined stand was taken on these measures I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister obviously were scandalized. They had not seen it happen often before and they did not like it. Indeed, I suppose this is probably one of the most successful efforts that have been made to let public opinion catch up, as it were. Public opinion is often difficult to arouse. The ordinary citizen has not got as much time as we have to study and familiarize himself with these questions, but this was a case where he was given some time and where he seems to have made quite a job. It almost seems as if public opinion had invaded the Liberal caucus, if we are to believe the newspaper article that the Prime Minister read to us the other day, although he finally had to tell us of course that it was all wrong. No—he did not actually say it was wrong. He merely said that it was not a thing that one talked about. In a moment I propose to read just what he said.

From what the Prime Minister said it is clear that it is quite respectable now to take part in this debate. I am sorry that the hon. member for Yorkton seemed to think that it was not but the Prime Minister has really made it respectable. I think we should be rather grateful to him for that because, as I say, it looks as though public opinion had even got as far as the Liberal caucus.

I should now like to say a word about what the Prime Minister said in the house on Friday night. He explained that he had not been intending to take part in the debate but his mind had been changed by reason of a news story in the Montreal Gazette. He went on to say at page 2227 of Hansard:

> This newspaper story is at page 11 of today's issue, and bears the title, "Gardiner Said To Be Demanding All-Canadian Pipe Lines Route."

It is very interesting to us to hear that. We all take a great interest in the views of the Minister of Agriculture, and of course we all hope this is true. I imagine this is one occasion when the Minister of Agriculture may not interrupt me, although he nearly always does.

Mr. Gardiner: I never discuss caucus out of caucus.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand that nobody is supposed to do that but it would appear as though people often do. Then the Prime Minister went on with rather extraordinarily well chosen words because as I read his words you will see that he did not say that anything reported in the article had not happened. He really just said to talk about it out of caucus was not the kind of thing that was done; at any rate it was not talked about in public. Here is what he said:

> Now, all hon. members know that the deliberations of party caucuses are confidential, just as are the deliberations of council.

I must say I think the deliberations of council are more confidential than those of party caucuses, but I think it is perhaps a strong statement in either case. The Prime Minister continued:

> I am quite sure that no one who attended that caucus ever informed anyone outside of party members of anything that transpired within the walls of the hall where it was held.

I should like to think that was true, Mr. Chairman, but I find very great difficulty in believing it is, and perhaps you do also. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> So the whole story about what goes on in our caucus, just as any story about what goes on in the caucuses of any other of the parties, must be the writer's guesswork in that respect.

Then he said something with which we will all agree. He said:

> He would not expect me, I am sure, and no one else would expect me to say anything here about what went on in that caucus, either by way of confirmation or by way of denial.

I think that is a very fair statement. I do not think we would expect the Prime Minister to say that, but there you have it. We have this indication, as I say, that public opinion has got into the caucus. We may never know if public opinion has had this extraordinary effect on the Minister of Agriculture except in so far as we can judge by his actions. It would certainly appear as if public opinion had had an effect upon the hon. member for Coast-Capilano. It would appear as if he, like Joan of Arc, had heard voices and as if those voices had had considerable effect on him.

I think that is all to the good. That is public opinion at work; that is what this debate has brought about in spite of the deliberate attempt of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to silence the minority. He does not think much of debates. I am sorry he is not here. I always like to have him here. I do not know where he is. Perhaps he is off making another trade treaty, and we may have another statement in the morning telling us that everything is O.K. At any rate I wish he were here because I always like his interruptions.

I should like to say a word about the proceedings before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I want to read what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said in that regard because his point was that if we would only send these things to the committee all would be well. The minister said that we were most unreasonable in trying to keep these measures away from the committee. At page 1806 of Hansard for November 15, 1949, he said:

> However, I do think that these acts should be studied and studied very carefully. I should like to know much more about the incorporation asked for in the bill about which I am speaking than I know at the present time. But the place to obtain that information is in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines to which this bill will be referred, and before which the sponsors of the bill will appear to make their case for incorporation.

At the moment that sounded quite persuasive to me, and I had great difficulty in not accepting that view. Indeed we have had a similar view expressed to us this afternoon rather persuasively by the hon. member for Yorkton when he described to us all these other boards—and they do exist—whose permission must be obtained. As I thought further about the matter however it seemed to me that none of that was an excuse for parliament giving a blank cheque and disregarding our own responsibility. If you remember what happens in the case of the railways, my information is that the board of transport commissioners is limited in its powers, that it has no wide-open power to give permission for the construction of long stretches of railway. I believe their power is limited to six miles, and that the power to do anything beyond that has always been vested in and exercised by this house.

Dealing with the question of the committee, there are one or two features which are rather interesting. Of course the star member of the committee was the parliamentary assistant who took a very definite line in the committee from the outset. He did not think much of the idea of information being given in the committee. In the early stages of the proceedings on the bill he told us that he did not know anything about it, and he evidently felt that nobody else needed to know anything about it either.

An hon. Member: What parliamentary assistant?

Alberta Natural Gas Company

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. I should like to read a few excerpts from the proceedings of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines of April 27 because other members apparently were quite ready to have the information given although the parliamentary assistant felt differently about it. At the very beginning of the meeting Mr. Prudham said:

I would then like to move that the chairman be empowered to call additional witnesses to give evidence as to route.

Apparently that indicated a change of heart on the part of Mr. Prudham because during the proceedings of April 26 Mr. Prudham said:

I think it is entirely out of order for us to discuss routes in this committee. But if we are going to discuss routes, then all routes should be discussed, including other routes which are not covered by the survey of this company.

While I do not agree with the first proposition I think his second one perhaps is right. So on Thursday morning the hon. member for Edmonton West said:

I would then like to move that the chairman be empowered to call additional witnesses to give evidence as to route.

A little later the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond said:

. . . I am sure there would be only one question that I would be interested in and that is the question of route. . . .

That seems reasonable enough so far, but here is what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre had to say:

Mr. Chairman, I think that if we bring in any more witnesses in reference to routes we will only waste more time and I do not think that the route question is germane to this bill.

Then certain other questions were asked; the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra did not entirely agree, and indicated his disagreement, suggesting that the statement as to wasting time should be withdrawn. The chairman, evidently wishing to pour oil on the troubled waters, said:

I see no objection to the withdrawal of it.

But the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre replied:

There is no objection to its being withdrawn excepting that I shall not withdraw it.

That was very clear. A little later, however, he changed his mind; he does change his mind at times. He said:

I think I have a right to say it. However, we will get along with this matter this way: merely to advance the action, I will withdraw it. It is on the record, though.

Apparently the chairman did not altogether like that. He said:

I do not think we will get further along like this.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Then the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said:

I do not know just how one does manage to make statements and have them withdrawn. It is on the record and the people who have heard it will, no doubt, continue to be influenced by it, some one way, and some another.

Hon. members can take that and make what they like of it. What I make of it is that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was seeking in every way to have the committee prevented from doing what we in this house were assured it was set up to do. However, that committee was very useful in one way, because it did enable a check-up to be made of a step that had been taken by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who had tried to help matters along by writing a letter to the Vancouver city council on April 4, in which he said:

While it is alleged that the Alberta Natural Gas Company, if incorporated, proposes to build a pipe line through the United States, this is not the information that the company has given me. My information is that the new company is proposing to build its lines through all-Canadian territory and to serve all Vancouver points before taking the line into the United States.

In examining Mr. Dixon, the chief witness for the company, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra asked about this very point:

Q. Will you give any pledge to this committee that your company, if it is incorporated, will build the Canada-first line, build a main line through Canada to the west coast?

A. No.

Q. Mr. Dixon, that is clear-cut and we are glad to have that statement, but I ask you if in your talks with the Right Honourable Mr. Howe, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that is the stand you have taken?

A. Just exactly. I have not said anything to Mr. Howe that I have not said to you.

Q. Mr. Howe wrote a letter to the Vancouver city council on April 4 of this year, in which he said—

That is the part I read.

Now, you dispute that, the terms of that letter by Mr. Howe?

A. I told him just what I told you, that we had the five routes, that we would build any line we would be permitted to build, that the board of transport commissioners told us that we would be permitted to build. If the board of transport commissioners tells us to build the all-Canadian route that will be the line that will be built.

Q. Did you assure Mr. Howe that you were going to build an all-Canadian route?

A. I wish we could have assured him that we were going to build any line.

Q. So you did not assure him you were going to build an all-Canadian route?

A. Well, we said we would build an all-Canadian route if the board of transport commissioners selected it. He was perfectly correct in his statement.

Q. If you were ordered?

A. If we were ordered.

So we have this curious action on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but I think it is very simple to explain. I think when the minister feels something has to be done, as far as he is concerned it is done; and, if it is done, why not say so? Sometimes I think that involves him in slight inaccuracies and optimistic statements. I think anyone looking at this record will realize that far from having given the minister any assurance that they would do what he said, all the applicants for the charter said was that they would do what they were ordered.

I could go further in speaking about the proceedings before this committee, but I do not think I need take time for that. There was constant unwillingness to give time, and at the last the committee was shut off by a resolution. I had never reflected upon it adequately before, but one of the things that struck me was that when you go from this committee of the whole to a committee of the house the minority loses all its rights. It is then subject only to the will of the majority, however high-handed; and I think anyone who reads those reports, as I have read them, will agree that when the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said the minority in this committee had been dealt with in a high-handed manner, he was making what the other evening I termed a conservative statement.

I do not intend to devote any time to the matter of route; I think that has been dealt with by people better qualified than I. But there is one thing I believe should be said. A very considerable number of hon. members have expressed their views as to routes, including the hon. member for Yorkton. A good deal has been said about the advantages of the Yellowhead route; but, to put it mildly, I think it was rather astonishing when the chief witness for this company, Mr. Dixon, admitted quite candidly that his only knowledge of the Yellowhead route was gained on a trip through it by train, though he had studied the other routes carefully. As the hon. member for Kootenay West pointed out the other evening, a very significant statement was made by Mr. Dixon when he said they had ordered some 400 miles of pipe. On studying the map the hon. member discovered that this was exactly the quantity required to take the pipe line to the United States border. That was interesting in two ways. It showed that while Mr. Dixon professed to be perfectly ready to build over whatever route they were ordered to build, nevertheless they were so sure in their own minds, and apparently so convinced that they were going to get their own way, that according to him they had ordered these 400 miles of pipe.

At the outset I said my reason for taking part in this debate is that I consider the House of Commons has been very shabbily treated in this matter. I believe there is a widespread feeling here that far from being a private bill this is in effect a public measure. I should like to refer to the words used the other evening by the Prime Minister, because they were rather interesting. A writer in the Gazette had said, as appears at page 2227 of Hansard:

> The high degree of interest in these reports out of caucus stems from the fact that, up to the present, the government had made it plain that it felt that parliament should give the two companies a free hand in selecting the route along which they would build the huge pipe line.

The Prime Minister dealt with that on page 2228 in these words:

> I do not know what the companies have made plain. I did not attend the meetings of the committees, I have not seen any of the promoters of these companies. I have not read the testimony taken in committee, nor the report of the committee.

It is rather a pity the Prime Minister did not read those proceedings; he might have had his eyes opened.

> I do know that if anyone in the press gallery had come to the conclusion that the government had made it plain that it felt that parliament should give the two companies a free hand to select the route along which they would build the huge pipe line, others may have reached the same conclusion, and I feel I am called upon to point out that there was no such thing made plain by the government, nor ever intended to be made plain by the government.

It will be observed that those are very carefully chosen words. I would have to agree that it had not been made plain, and my whole complaint about this business is that nothing has been made plain. We are left to inferences, which we would much rather not have to make in certain cases. But even there the Prime Minister, in these carefully chosen words, does not go the length of saying that there is no interest in the matter. The external aspects of the situation suggested that it was a government measure. I do not know whether the Prime Minister intended to give that inference, but when the bill was voted upon the other night you will remember that the Prime Minister stood up and voted first, just as he would for a government measure. I have made inquiry, and I am informed that is not usual in a private measure. I am informed that the former prime minister had an entirely different practice, but it may be that I am attaching undue significance to it. To support that same suggestion the government whip, on the occasion of that vote, came in in his usual way, which I have always understood to mean, "We are ready; the government ranks are lined up and are ready to do their bit." I assume that is the meaning of the bow which the government whip makes to the chair when he enters. As I say, it has all the appearance of a government measure.

I have practically finished my remarks, Mr. Chairman. What I allege, and what I stress, is that there was a deliberate attempt to disregard public opinion. We have this resolution from the British Columbia legislature, which I hold in my hand, unanimously passed, and going on the record in favour of what the member for Vancouver-Quadra and the member for Calgary East have been requesting. All that would have been disregarded long ago if there had not been a determined effort to stop it. I feel that this is of great importance, an importance beyond the issues of today, because to me it is a shining example of the duty of those who have minority rights to stand up for those rights to give the time, which may often be required, for public opinion to assert itself, as it is doing in this case in no uncertain way.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Chairman, public opinion is of course the great controlling factor, and time alone clarifies these subjects so that the people, sooner or later, get the facts. I hold in my hand a resolution passed by the associated boards of trade of British Columbia. It was forwarded to me on May 5, 1950, and reads as follows:

> Whereas the route chosen by the Westcoast Transmission through the Peace river district and south through Prince George through the Fraser valley to Vancouver would benefit more people in Canada, especially in British Columbia:
> Therefore be it resolved that the associated boards of trade of the Fraser valley and lower mainland appeal to other boards of trade throughout the province of British Columbia to unite in getting the provincial government and our federal members to advocate the route of the pipe line through central British Columbia to Vancouver.

This resolution is concurred in by all the other boards of trade in British Columbia, excepting those on Vancouver island. It affords us the amazing spectacle of the member for Fraser Valley advocating a route in opposition to the boards of trade in the Fraser valley, because he has filled Hansard with a score of commitments to the Yellowhead route which leads us through a wilderness of cactus and sagebrush down towards Trail, over hundreds of miles of country in which there is no development or no prospect of development for years to come. I suggest to you that the first route that was brought forward by the Westcoast Transmission Company was the suggestion that the pipe line would come from the Peace river area to Prince George, Quesnel and the Cariboo country to Vancouver. When the company proposed that to me, long before the election and before they got their incorporation, I said I was in favour of it. I said I thought it would be a splendid thing. The company received its incorporation, and on that basis it circulated maps up in our district.

After the incorporation of that company, other plans were decided upon. Everyone now seems to be talking about the Yellowhead route. The importance of bringing that pipe line through the Cariboo is simply this, that all the way along you have a considerable development, and there are great natural resources. At one point north of Prince George there is the largest stand of softwood left on this continent. It would be a suitable place for pulp mills, and other wood industries. Prince George is the centre of a community in which there are two hundred saw mills operating at the present time, so there is the possibility of obtaining cheap fuel in the utilization of the waste from these saw mills.

Going on to Quesnel, that area is heavily mineralized and forested, as well as enjoying a large ranch population. Then, you go across Chilcotin plains into the Bridge river country. In that area you have another great metalliferous region, in which there are several gold mines operating, and tungsten, iron and base metals in profusion. There is even cobalt and uranium. If one ever got cheap fuel into that Bridge river valley there might be a development equal to Trail itself, and in Trail you have the greatest metalliferous industry in the world.

You go on from there to Pemberton, in which there is an agricultural area as well as timber, and minerals back of Britannia, the great copper country. So that route going down through the Cariboo would service all those communities where development has already begun, and where the application of a cheap fuel such as natural gas and oil would cause a tremendous expansion. The boards of trade of British Columbia, therefore, being more familiar with this subject than a great many of the members of this house, have rightly passed this resolution urging that the development of that country with natural gas lines should be carried through. I am amazed that the member for Fraser Valley should spurn the expression of opinion of all those boards of trade. I am surprised that the member for Kamloops would not support that route, because the Bridge river valley is in the Kamloops riding. He is supporting the carrying of the pipe line down through the cactus country, in which there is little development and little possibility of the resources being used.

Mr. Cruickshank: But the hon. member supported the route through the United States, and voted for it.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Now, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member knows he is talking through his hat.

Mr. Cruickshank: No, check Hansard.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I never supported any route through the United States. I did support the idea of incorporating this company, because I think in Canada there should be free competition. These people promoted a company and they have come to parliament to ask for incorporation. Who am I to deny them that right? It is not proper to make a monopoly in this industry, and I do not propose to subscribe to it.

There is another important angle to the proposal that the line should be carried down through the Cariboo. The Canadian National Railways line runs from Jasper to the riding of my friend the member for Skeena, and that part of the line is not very profitable, although it services that part of the country. I believe the Canadian National is in the red possibly about $35 million a year. Would it not be in the public interest to promote trade and development along the Canadian National railway line in that area? The development of these natural resources would mean that more tonnage could be carried by the Canadian National railway to Prince Rupert on the west or eastward to Edmonton. It is of interest to the people of Canada, not merely the people of British Columbia, to make the Canadian National Railways prosperous. The building of a pipe line through that area, stimulating the activity of those industries, would be of direct benefit to the Canadian National Railways.

There is a much more important local angle to it than that in British Columbia. We have the Pacific Great Eastern Railway running up through that country that I have mentioned. At the last session we made to the Pacific Great Eastern Railway a subvention of approximately $2 million, to assist them in building from Quesnel to Prince George. The plans in British Columbia are to extend that railroad into the Peace river country. What better arrangement could you have than to have it running along or near the main pipe line conveying the oil and gas from the interior of northern Alberta and British Columbia to the Pacific coast? That is a project that will figure prominently in discussions in the future. I know that members of the legislature of British Columbia submitted a resolution on it, and I know that in drawing up that resolution they had in mind the salvaging of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway and the great investment of British Columbia in Cariboo, in Peace river and in that northern part of British Columbia. I would not be surprised to see this subject, which is now before this committee and is taking up so much time, become a prominent question in the next provincial election in British Columbia; and I hope that I shall be spared to be there to have an important part in the discussions.

Mr. Harkness: You had better talk differently than you have been talking so far.

Mr. Cruickshank: He has a new speech now.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Because I was broad-minded enough to agree to the incorporation of this second company and this third company, you suggest that I want to build a pipe line through the United States.

An hon. Member: Sure you would.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): You do not know British Columbia. You do not know the mountains of British Columbia as I do. You do not know those mountain passes. Do you know why those fantastic routes have been placed before you? It is a political idea, to featherstitch that pipe line to as many ridings as possible for political reasons. There are certain places where it will be cheap to build a pipe line. Those passes in the north are much more accessible than the passes to the south. That is known to everybody who knows the mountains of British Columbia. The Peace river pass is broad and low and it would be easy to build a pipe line through there; and of course it would be a simple matter to do the same north of Prince George to the Peace river. Peace river is very accessible, and it would be a simple matter to lay a pipe line in there. The same is true of the Yellowhead pass. As you go north, I can tell you that these passes are lower and more accessible, and any sensible engineer would tell you that.

There is just one weakness in that whole set-up and that is that they have not surveyed the various routes that we have been talking about. We know they have not surveyed the Yellowhead. Everybody admits it. Since it was brought up by the hon. member for Fraser Valley and others, there has been snow in the Yellowhead. You could not have sent engineers up there since last October anyway, to do any good in the Yellowhead. I doubt if they spent much money in these other explorations.

Of course, you have the engineering data of the railways. You know the altitudes and so on and so forth. But this is a big project. There are many millions of dollars at stake with regard to the oil in western Canada. I am sorry that at the committee, when I suggested bringing in Mr. T. Link, an authority on this subject, objection was made. When I wanted to bring in Mr. Stanley Slipper, who is a great geologist and who knows all about the work which has already been accomplished there, objection was made to that. I hope that these men and others will be brought before the board of transport commissioners, and I hope the board of transport commissioners will not only accept some route which is suggested to them but that they will lay down and decide which route will be taken in conveying this great resource from central Canada to the Pacific coast.

I have said what I wished to say on this matter. I hope that this bill will pass. I hope that we in the House of Commons shall not do anything to discourage the investment of American capital in this country. I would point out to the committee that the development of the oil and natural gas in Alberta and northern British Columbia has been done largely by American capital. We have had some examples of Canadian financiers who have vision and enterprise like my good friend Major James Lowery of Home Oil; but our Canadians are much in the minority in the development of that great resource in Alberta. It is time we woke up and took a little keener interest in the industry. There is no reason why we should call on any American company to build any route. We have here the money, the material, the men and the ability to carry this thing out for ourselves.

I will just close my speech with this remark. It has been said that Joan of Arc heard voices. I would say that some of our members here heard voices since they first voted on these things and the voices caused them to vote in a direction opposite to that which was indicated. I am prepared to make a little prophecy and it is that the final route for the construction of the pipe line will be through Cariboo, through central British Columbia to the city of Vancouver, and from that point on to two and a half million people in the state of Washington; and to the great industry at Trail and to the other industries which will provide some market for the surplus oil and gas of this country.

Before I close I want to point with regret to the fact that so much gas and oil are being wasted today in those western fields. Not long ago I was in Leduc, and at every producing gas well, flames were flaring high in the air burning off what was said to be waste material. All I can say is that it was waste material that certainly would not have been wasted in an American oil field. It was gas going to waste. I was up at Peace River crossing in the riding of the hon. member for Athabaska, or is it of the hon. member for Peace River? There is there an eight-inch gas pipe which has been burning, to my personal knowledge, for twenty-five years, the flame going high into the heavens, burning this gas.

Rome burned while Nero fiddled; and gas enough to light and heat Montreal and Ottawa together is going to waste while hon. members of this House of Commons are fiddling here, filibustering, discussing and debating over what they are going to do about it.

Mr. Hodgson: I do not think anybody in the committee can accuse me of filibustering, Mr. Chairman. This is only the second time I have spoken on any of these bills; and I would not have been long if I had not been interrupted a great deal when I last spoke. I hope I will not get quite so much interference this time.

Following the hon. member for Cariboo, may I say that I can quite understand that he really knows the area out in that country, as he has described it quite fully. But I am surprised at his speaking now, as I would say, in favour of an all-Canadian route; because in the committee, he was one of the members who had quite a lot to say, and many questions to ask, but when the vote came, he voted for an American route.

Mr. Green: Every time.

Mr. Hodgson: Yes, every time.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): That is not so.

Mr. Hodgson: That is a fact, and you cannot deny it.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I voted against petty motions that were brought in with the idea of endlessly delaying the discussion and keeping this bill from a vote in the House of Commons. I voted against filibustering in the committee.

Mr. Hodgson: No such thing. You voted for an American route every time, as the record will show.

In my last speech, on April 3, before Easter, I moved the adjournment of the debate. At page 1501 of Hansard I said in effect that I thought it would be well to adjourn the debate and leave it over until after the Easter recess so that hon. members could go home and talk to their constituents, which would give them a little more time to decide just what they were debating.

An hon. Member: It was a good idea.

Mr. Hodgson: I believe it had some effect, because since that time we have had hon. members who were in favour of the bill at that time now taking the same attitude as I am. No matter how smart we think we are as members of parliament, there are times when we can go to some fellow in the back concession and get a lot of information from him which would be valuable to us.

Other hon. members have come around to our way of thinking. One of these is the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, one of my keen interrupters on the day I made my speech. However, he has had a change of mind and of heart.

Mr. Cruickshank: He has seen the light.

Mr. Hodgson: When he read his speech the other night he read it so fast that I could not keep up with him. I had the chance neither to applaud nor to interrupt at that time. On looking up Hansard the next day I saw that he had a change of heart. I was very pleased that he had seen the light. Whether he had been home or on a trip to Europe, he certainly obtained some information which did him a lot of good. There were a couple of other hon. members, one from Edmonton East, and the other from Edmonton West, who seem to have had a change of heart in this matter. The hon. member for Edmonton West is in favour of the Yellowhead pass route. I was pleased with his speech until he made his last remark. He said he was in favour of it except that he was willing to leave it to the board of transport commissioners. The hon. member for Vancouver South made practically the same remark. We are not sent here as members of parliament to pass the buck when we get into difficulties. We are sent here as members of parliament to pass judgment on matters which affect our constituents back home. If anybody says he is willing to leave it to the board of transport commissioners he is certainly passing the buck, and is not facing up to the situation as he should in the House of Commons.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra asked for that.

Mr. Hodgson: No; that is what the hon. member says he asked for. Like an evangelist minister who just picks out certain portions of the scripture and preaches from them to his own liking, the hon. member for Yorkton picked out certain extracts from the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and said that is what he said. The hon. member for Yorkton may be a good lawyer, but he would make a good evangelist as well.

There was another hon. member who was also a member of the committee and who took a little part in the proceedings in the committee. He is a friend and colleague of mine.

Mr. Martin: Don't discredit your witness.

Mr. Hodgson: He left an inference, but I do not think it was intentional. He left the inference that it was the opposition to this bill as it stands that held up the committee to such an extent that they had to force the bill through the committee. The promoter of this bill, or the pilot I might call him, is an old railroad man. He has not forgotten a lot of his railroad tactics. Whether he worked on the tail end or the front end of the train, he was certainly the pilot of the railroad business in the committee. The hon. member for Fraser Valley, who opposed this bill from the start, was not a member of that committee. Another member of that committee was the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, who is also the lawyer acting for the company.

Mr. Green: He was not a member of the committee.

Mr. Hodgson: He was active there, anyway.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Wrong again.

An hon. Member: Just doing a little lobbying.

Mr. Hodgson: There was quite a lot of lobbying done. My hon. friend, the hon. member for Kamloops, left the inference that I spoke of a few moments ago. At page 30 of the proceedings of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, he said—

Mr. Fulton: What inference did I leave?

Mr. Hodgson: I mean hon. member for Kootenay East. He said, at page 30 of the report:

> Mr. Chairman, I cannot see any purpose in asking questions unless the person asking them wants an answer and wants to get some information, except it be a child asking questions of its mother merely to keep her busy. We have been sitting in the House of Commons listening to these pipe-line debates, yet I have been unable to get any information. I am here now and I want to get some information, and I would like to put some questions myself. Why would it not be permissible for the witnesses who are here and available to answer those questions?

He left the inference that we were holding up the committee by calling one witness at a time. It is not very often that you can get two witnesses in the box in a case before a jury or in any other case that I ever attended, and the hearing before the committee was similar to that of a case in court. The chairman ruled at that time that one witness would be called at that time. These are the chairman's remarks:

> There are two angles, the legal angle which Mr. Connolly is taking care of, and the practical angle. And with all due deference to your remarks, I do not think we are wasting time on it. I think we could dispose of the legal set-up of the company and then have Mr. Dixon. I think we would make more time that way in the long run. That is my personal opinion as chairman. So I think it would be quite in order to go on unless the questions become too involved for Mr. Connolly.
> The Witness: I shall simply have to pass on to Mr. Dixon any question which involves engineering.
>
> The Chairman: Let us clear up your end of it first.

And the hon. member for Calgary West proceeded with his examination.

Mr. Byrne: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I was endeavouring to complete my remarks on this pipe line bill. I was being interrupted by an hon. member who is not present at the moment. Perhaps that is just as well as I can finish a little more quickly. Since these pipe line bills have been before us there has been no evidence at all offered that a line directly through Canada would be built. It is only the one company that has already received a charter that has said definitely it would build over a Canadian route through the Yellowhead pass.

I think it was the hon. member for Edmonton West who said that the Yellowhead pass was accessible. I assume that he knows more about that than I. The Canadian National Railways runs through that pass and we would probably use our own government system in building a pipe line over this route. Some one has said that it will be necessary to build a highway alongside the pipe line. So much the better. Another road would be built through British Columbia which would probably attract tourist business to that area. I happen to live in a place that has been built up largely through the tourist business and I know something about it. If this road will create tourist business it will probably prove to be one of the best paying roads in Canada. Such a road would build up the cities and towns of that province industrially and commercially and more business would be created for our Canadian railroads as well as for the highway itself.

If this road is built and people decide to go into the tourist business you will have thousands of tourists coming up from the United States to view our scenery. These tourists can look at the same scenery as often as they like and it is never depleted. Scenery is not like a mine or a timber limit or anything like that which is gradually depleted; our scenery will be there for all time provided we protect it properly. You can use it as much as you like and there is no wearing out.

If this pipe line goes through British Columbia the towns and cities will be built up. British Columbia has the ore, the timber and all the natural resources to build up many industries. If cheap power and heat are available the development there will be an asset to the whole country. I know that if there were any chance of having this pipe line go through my riding I would be saying a lot more than I have. I would be working as hard as possible to get that pipe line run through my own riding or even close to it.

There must be a lot of money in the operation of pipe lines. One bill has gone through the house, another is in process of being put through, and another is to follow. The chances are there will be two or three more companies applying for charters. It is stated that the difference in cost between one route and the other is somewhere between $15 million and $17 million. That is a lot of money and it may involve considerable pressure on the board of transport commissioners. I submit that this matter should be settled in the House of Commons by the elected representatives of the people.

The Canadian National Railways is an organization already in existence and for the life of me I cannot see why this pipe line could not be built by that organization. At the present time the Canadian National Railways has a deficit of $42 million. Apparently everyone wants to build a pipe line. One of the engineers said it was like a horse race, it was a matter of who got there first. Why could not this pipe line be built by the Canadian National Railways and thus give a chance to balance that $42 million deficit in the years to come, from the profits from the pipe lines? The Canadian Pacific shows more profits from the operations of its other projects than it does from the operations of the railroad.

Mr. Decore: Is the hon. member talking about nationalization?

Mr. Hodgson: You can go a certain extent in nationalizing things as long as it is not socialization. We have a number of examples in our own country. In Ontario there is the hydro and we have the Canadian National Railways. There are many other projects, such as Polymer, which I mentioned the other evening. I think there is a lot of money to be made out of a pipe line.

Before this bill is passed the government engineers should survey the Yellowhead route and make a report on what it would cost to build the pipe line. It would not hurt to hold up this bill for another couple of months because it is not a killing matter. One hon. member said that they had been burning gas out there for twenty-five years but surely in another month there would not be much more wasted. If this route could be examined by government engineers probably an argument could be put forth that the pipe line should be built by the Canadian National Railways.

I do not think there was any doubt in the minds of all hon. members of the committee from the evidence given by Mr. Dixon that there was only one route they intended to follow, the one through the United States. Any hon. member of that committee who listened to the whole proceedings could come to no other conclusion. The engineers could offer no figures in connection with the Yellowhead pass, but they said they could get them. If they can get them, so can the government. I think that should be done before we go any further.

We have been selling our natural resources to the United States for a long time and it is time to call a halt. We should start to use these natural resources in Canada for the benefit of Canada as a whole. It does not matter whether an industry is built up in the east or the west, it is of benefit to Canada. I do not think I have anything more to say and as far as I am concerned the vote can be taken any time. But I would like to see this held over so that the government engineers could go out and look over that area.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, this is the second time I have spoken on these pipe line bills in the two sessions they have been before the house. I want to speak tonight for a few moments as a member of the committee to which these measures were sent. First of all I want to register, along with other members, my protest against the way in which, in my opinion, the bills were railroaded through the committee. As you know, the Monday of the week on which the bills came before the committee was taken away from us as a private member's day, and the first full private member's day was the Monday following the week on which these bills reached the standing committee.

It soon became quite apparent to members of the committee that there was a well organized group of Liberal members on it with the full intention of getting the bills back into the house on the following Monday. We have in the trade union movement a name for people who do the kind of work that I felt Liberal members of the committee were doing. In trade union language we call them hatchet men. In the very early stages of the sittings of the committee there was a determined effort to prevent the committee from considering routes at all. An attempt was made to point out that that was not the purpose of the committee although we had been told on numerous occasions in the house that the whole purpose of sending the bills to the committee was to secure all relevant information concerning the matter.

Then of course there was the attempt to protect the witness whenever any question was raised that proved embarrassing either to the witness or to the supporters of the bill. An onlooker would have thought that many members of the committee were there for the express purpose of protecting the interests of the company whose witness was before the committee. A deliberate effort was made and closure applied to prevent the committee from calling witnesses. A number of members asked for witnesses but if the bills were to be before the house again on the following Monday there was not time to call witnesses who could have given us much relevant information.

I have been a member of a number of committees of the house, and I think I can say quite frankly that this committee was the most political of any in whose proceedings I have taken part.

Mr. Knowles: You were not on the redistribution committee.

Mr. Noseworthy: I want to compliment the witness, Mr. Dixon, who appeared for the company. He gave us every evidence of being quite familiar with his field and he was quite frank. He told us frankly that he had given the Minister of Trade and Commerce no assurance that his company would build an all-Canadian line notwithstanding a letter to that effect which was put on the record of the committee. He stated quite clearly to us that his company was not prepared to have a clause inserted in the bill calling for an all-Canadian route. When asked bluntly if his company would consent to the inclusion of such a clause in the bill he frankly told us "No". I think he clearly showed his personal preference, and his company's preference, for an all-American route. He did that by pointing out to us the many disadvantages of an all-Canadian route. He frankly showed us that an all-Canadian route would take one year longer to build than an all-American route. He told us quite frankly that the all-Canadian route would cost $17,000 a mile more to build, or a total of $17 million on a route of approximately 1,000 miles.

He told us quite frankly that the Canadian route would be more costly to maintain, and that people on the Canadian west coast would pay more for their gas if it were piped by an all-Canadian route than by an all-American route. He said quite frankly that his company had given consideration to only one Canadian route while they had studied four wholly or partially United States routes. Of the five routes submitted, only one was all-Canadian. One was practically all-American and the other three to a large extent were United States routes. No evidence was given before the committee to show that his company had been concerned with finding the most economical Canadian route. Some statements were made by other members of the committee indicating that Canadian routes other than the one outlined by Mr. Dixon would possibly be more economical or would serve Canada better. The witness frankly admitted that his company had only been interested in the one Canadian route. Rightly or wrongly I gained the impression that the company was so interested in the United States route that it was not at all concerned about finding the best or cheapest Canadian route. It was quite evident that the company's interests lay in an all-American route.

A promise was given that a route through the Yellowhead pass would be considered. We were told that the company would require to spend at least two months in studying it before they could give us an approximate idea of what the cost of such a route would be. We were informed that the company had spent well over a quarter of a million dollars in surveying the routes outlined and that it had been three years in doing so. There was no evidence that they were likely to spend the time necessary to make a thorough study of any other Canadian route than the one presented to the committee. If this particular company is to get its charter from the house and secure permission to build a line in the very near future, they will not be able to give due consideration to other Canadian routes. I see very little prospect of this company studying or surveying alternate Canadian routes unless their charter is delayed for a year or two in order to give them time to do so.

This company appears to be a very capable, well-managed subsidiary of a United States company. Some seventy-five or eighty per cent of the capital necessary for this pipe line, we were told, is to be raised in the United States. Some seventy-five or eighty per cent of the gas transported by the line will go to the United States. In the light of those facts, and in the light of the quite evident interest of this company in the United States route, I see very little prospect of getting this company to build an all-Canadian line.

The question, of course, is whether the board of transport commissioners will order the company to follow an all-Canadian route. It was made quite clear to us that they would do so only if ordered by the board. In that connection I think we are placing upon the board of transport commissioners a responsibility that rightly belongs to this parliament. As western members have pointed out, the building of a pipe line is a matter of great concern to western Canada. I do not believe this government should leave the choice of that route to any private company. This matter is of such importance to Canada that I believe the government, through its engineers and geologists, should have some part in finding the most economical route for the line through Canada. A private company is interested in exporting as much gas as possible by the shortest feasible route, with the aim of making the greatest possible profit, and I do not think we have a right to expect such a private company to spend money in order to find out which of these routes will be most beneficial to Canada as a whole. That is not their job. Their job is to make money for their shareholders. I believe it is the responsibility of this government, as custodian of our natural resources for the benefit of our people, to take some steps to see that if our natural resources are exported, that export is done in the way that will be most profitable to this country.

We were told that a Canadian pipe line might cost $17 million more than a line through the United States. Well, $17 million may not be an exorbitant price for Canadians to pay in order to have that natural resource delivered through their own country, to promote the development of this country in the years to come. It has been pointed out already that if the fathers of confederation had taken the view now held by this company when it came to building the railway that was to connect Canada east and west, unquestionably they would have gone through the United States. But they did not take the view that the easiest and cheapest route must be followed. They were concerned with the future development of this country; and though the cost was greater, the railroad was built through Canada. It seems to me that this pipe line can be of enormous value to this country's future, and that the cost should not be the major consideration but rather the interests of Canada as a whole, even though that cost may be $17 million greater.

I am not satisfied that this company has lifted a finger to find the most economical route through Canada. Personally I do not think they are interested in finding such a route. I think their main interest is in finding the shortest and cheapest route by which Canadian gas may be exported to the United States market. As the previous speaker said, I am surprised that the Canadian National Railways, in particular, seem to have taken no interest in this project. Goodness knows we have loaded the Canadian National with enough bankrupt enterprises, and overloaded it with the capital charges of bankrupt enterprises, so it is about time we gave the Canadian National some enterprise that had a prospect of being successful and making a profit. I think it would be in the interests of Canada that the Canadian National as well as the privately owned Canadian Pacific Railway should enter into a project so important as this to the development of our country.

We are charged, of course, with supporting a monopoly. Before the committee Mr. Dixon quite frankly pointed out that there was no prospect now or in the immediate future of more than one company building a pipe line to the Pacific coast, and that the line would be a monopoly, no matter which company got the charter. The only place where there is any competition is in this house, to see which company gets the charter, in order that two of the three may have a chance to fleece the public by selling stocks and bonds. As far as the actual pipe line is concerned it will be a monopoly whether built by this company or another. My own feeling is that parliament made a mistake in passing the pipe line bill without insisting that any company applying for a charter should indicate the route it intended to follow. I think no company should be granted a charter to build a pipe line anywhere it chooses, in order to export our natural resources to a market in the United States to promote the development of cities and industries in the United States at Canadian expense. I think no company, under any circumstances, should be left to designate the route the pipe line should follow. I believe it is the responsibility of this government to see that whatever company builds the pipe line, it is built only after there has been an adequate survey of all the possible Canadian routes.

I am not nearly as hopeful as the Prime Minister. I wish I could have as much confidence as he appears to have in the board of transport commissioners. I think we are passing on to them a responsibility that this parliament should accept. I fail to see how that board could, of itself, determine that any pipe line is being built along the route which will best serve Canada, without some preliminary independent surveys and investigations having been made by government engineers. I greatly fear that the decisions in relation to these pipe lines will follow exactly the decision that was given regarding the oil pipe line which brought oil from Alberta to the east. There are a great many people in Canada, and in western Canada in particular, who believe that this government made a mistake in granting a permit to a United States company to build an oil pipe line terminating in United States territory instead of Canadian. I am afraid I have no more confidence that the board of transport commissioners will determine that these lines should follow a Canadian route any more than they did in the case of the oil pipe line.

One rather interesting feature in connection with this pipe line was brought out in the committee. It was pointed out to us by Mr. Dixon that this gas pipe line could be converted into an oil pipe line without very much difficulty, and in a comparatively short time. It was for this reason the company was asking for the privilege of building either a gas or an oil pipe line. Mr. Dixon pointed out to us that there was not much likelihood of this pipe line being converted into an oil pipe line except in case of war. In case of war, he said there would be a possibility that the conversion would be made. I think that is worth some thought on the part of Canadians. In the event of war in the foreseeable future, do we want a pipe line which conveys the major part of our gas through western Canada converted into an oil pipe line carrying oil down through the United States? I believe it is worthy of thought if one is looking into the future. History has a way of changing circumstances.

I would rather see this country have control of its own pipe line when it came to delivering oil in time of war. I believe that is one feature of this enterprise that should be taken into consideration, along with the other views that have been expressed. I suggest that this bill should be held up, and that the basic Pipe Lines Act should be amended by the government. The government can bring in an amendment to that bill and get it through this house on short notice. A private member could not get that amendment through this session. The government could amend the Pipe Lines Act almost overnight, insisting that no company would get a charter until the line it proposes to follow is indicated in the bill. Any company which has received the charter could be required to follow that course, and inform this house as to the line it proposes to follow. I believe this parliament has to take hold of this matter. It is slipping away from us, and it is slipping away from Canada. The fact that we let one bill through last year is being used as an excuse to let two or three other bills through granting charters to build pipe lines anywhere a company desires. I believe this government, and this parliament, has more responsibility to the Canadian people than to turn the distribution of these natural resources over to private companies, to do with them as they please, and for the most profit they can accumulate.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, speaking in the heat of the debate on Monday evening, I believe I may have said something that was presumed by the member for Victoria, Ontario, to be somewhat irrational. If so, I want to assure him that I felt what I said was true, and although it came in the heat of debate it was probably more truthful than some carefully considered statements. At that time I said that I felt there were some members of that committee who had an outright desire to forestall any action by the committee. I want to assure the member for York South that I have seen that type of tactic before in the labour movement also, a continuation of the debate in an effort to wear down and discourage the opposition, and it has been sometimes referred to as a communist tactic.

It is not my intention to rise and criticize any of the members who just spoke. What I want to point out particularly is the picture of the eastern portion of British Columbia, that part which includes Kootenay East, Kootenay West and part of Yale, that is the Okanagan valley. I should like to tell you what would happen to that portion of the country if this one company Westcoast Transmission were allowed to build a pipe line, and no other routes were considered. Those who have taken part in the opposition to these companies being granted a charter have based their arguments on the fact that the company that now has a charter is prepared to build the Yellowhead route. This certainly would be an all-Canadian route, and there is no dispute about that. However, in that portion of British Columbia I have outlined, there are approximately 75,000 to 80,000 people.

It has been pointed out that the potential market in British Columbia, particularly Trail, would consume as much natural gas as the city of Vancouver. I believe that is so, because this afternoon I contacted the head office of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, and the man to whom I spoke there was of the opinion that that was quite correct. As a matter of fact, he said he thought it was a conservative estimate. It is not only Trail. As I have said, there are these other places such as Kimberley, Fernie, Cranbrook, Nelson and all of these other towns which would be entirely eliminated by the route commonly known as the Yellowhead route.

To prove my contention that the Yellowhead route would not service the city of Trail or these other towns, I have here an excerpt from the submission of the Westcoast Transmission Company to the petroleum and natural gas conservation board session of April 13, 1950. Mr. Frere, counsel representing, I believe, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, asked this question:

Mr. Frere: I have a question or two, Mr. Chairman. I have not a copy of Exhibit 99, Dr. Hetherington, but would you mind telling me this. Do the peak day requirements of the Westcoast Transmission Company indicated in Exhibit 99 take into account the supplying of gas for consumers in the vicinity of Trail, British Columbia and Spokane and Hanford, Washington?

A. Mr. Sample presented that market estimate and he did not include gas for those cities.

Mr. Sample is the man who surveyed markets for the Westcoast Transmission Company.

This is proof that the Westcoast Transmission Company, the company who presently has a charter, did not even survey this potential market, so that it is obvious that they did not intend to service that area. During committee, when Mr. Dixon was on the stand, he was asked this question by myself, as reported at page 122 of the proceedings of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines:

Q. From the information you have available, do you think that the Yellowhead route would economically serve Trail in British Columbia?

A. It could not possibly serve Trail, not in my opinion.

Also, Mr. Gilman, consulting engineer for Prairie Transmission Lines, was asked this question by me, as reported at page 229 of the proceedings of the committee:

Q . . . In your opinion, and in the opinion of your technical advisers, following what is commonly known as the Yellowhead route, would it be economically feasible to supply Trail, British Columbia, with natural gas?

And when I say Trail, I mean all these other towns that I have mentioned would be eliminated; and also, I believe, the Okanagan valley. Mr. Gilman's answer was as follows:

A. In my offhand judgment, it would not.

There is one thing I want to point out to those who may feel that—because there is a popular misconception in this house and outside of it—the route will be determined by the passage of these bills. It is because of that misconception that I wanted to point out this matter. If it is true that the people who are opposing these bills are so greatly concerned about the consumption in British Columbia, then I think they should just consider this fact. A route through the Yellowhead pass apparently will not serve the eastern area which will consume more than the western area which is Vancouver and its environs. They therefore could not be giving a great deal of consideration to the people of British Columbia.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is not only wrong; but you are talking about a purely industrial load.

Mr. Applewhaite: At this time, Mr. Chairman, I should like to explain to this committee of the whole house the reasons why I, as a member of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, came to the conclusions in committee that I did come to. Incidentally, the majority of the committee came to the same conclusions that I reached. Whether or not they followed the same line of reasoning as I did, I am unable to say.

As I understand it, we of the committee were there to hear the evidence adduced; to weigh and consider that evidence; and, on the strength of that evidence and of the arguments presented in the committee discussions, to arrive at a conclusion. I might say that I felt that no small part of the job was to sift out the irrelevancies and to decide what was and what was not applicable to the matter in hand. We, of course, had to try to come to a conclusion—at least, I felt that I did—on the basis of what was in the interests of Canada. The interests of these applicants or of any of their competitiors are of no concern of mine. But the interests not only of the district of Skeena, of the province of British Columbia, and of the province of Alberta but those of Canada as a whole were, and rightly should have been, the interest of all of us concerned.

In this particular case, of course, the interests of British Columbia and Alberta are particularly closely affected, but they are not solely affected. When we come to base an opinion upon a proposal, I suppose that all of us do so largely whether we feel that the person telling the story or outlining the proposals is sound, competent and reliable. In other words, is the witness credible? Ought we to believe him? What I want to do this evening is to try to outline the evidence which was presented to the committee and upon which the majority of the committee came to its conclusion.

At the start of the hearing on this bill, there was presented to the committee and distributed amongst the members of it a memorandum signed on behalf of the applicant company. That was read to the committee by Mr. Connolly, who is one of the incorporators, one of these persons mentioned in section 1 of the bill; and he acted as parliamentary counsel for the applicants in this connection. In this memorandum there are several sentences which I think should be drawn to the attention of the committee. In the section which outlines the whole project generally, after dealing with supplying the consumers of Alberta, the memorandum goes on as follows:

> . . . to transport such surplus gas as may then remain available to the Pacific coast to serve first the maximum number of consumers in British Columbia who can be reached economically, and, secondly, with such gas as remains available to serve consumers in the United States Pacific northwest. It is necessary to include United States market because the limited market available in Canada would not in itself support the cost of a pipe line from any of the known Canadian natural gas fields to Vancouver.

Those two statements are absolutely clear and unequivocal. We in the committee had to come to a conclusion as to whether or not those incorporators mentioned in section 1 of the bill are not fit persons to become incorporated as a body corporate in Canada. Are they financially responsible and sound businessmen or are they a fly-by-night concern purely for promotion? The statement and Mr. Connolly's evidence showed that they were adequately and soundly financed; that Morgan, Stanley and Company had undertaken to underwrite the full construction costs of the project concerned, and that four outstanding Canadian investment banking concerns were associated with them in that, and Mr. Connolly had letters from all of those associations of those businessmen backing up that statement.

Then there was the question as to where the actual pipe is to be made. Are we going to build a line with pipe manufactured in Canada or with pipe imported? The statement shows, and Mr. Connolly's evidence confirms, that arrangements had been completed with the Dominion Bridge Company for the supply of the large diameter pipe and with Page-Hersey Tube of Welland, Ontario, for the small diameter pipe, both of which would be produced in Canada from plate produced in Canada.

Mr. Green: Only for the line in Canada.

Mr. Applewhaite: Mr. Chairman, I have sat here with the most marvellous simulation of patience and listened to the flights of fancy of my hon. friends for a long time. I would suggest that they accord the same courtesy to my statement of facts and reasoned argument. I want to say a word in connection with that pipe because I believe the hon. member for Greenwood quite unintentionally left an unfair impression this afternoon when he said that arrangements had been made for the supply of 400 miles of pipe; but he pointed out, and quite correctly, that that 400 miles of pipe would be required, irrespective of whether an all-Canadian or an all-American route was used. Of course he did not go on to state that in the first place the company had not ordered the pipe; that they had negotiated to make certain that it was available and at what price; and in the second place they have negotiated upon the minimum line they could be sure of, depending on the decision which is to be rendered by the board of transport commissioners.

The evidence of Mr. Connolly and the memorandum showed that these incorporators have already expended the sum of $350,000 in geological, transportation and market surveys, which, to me at least, looks like some indication of a sound concern which meant business. They have obtained cost estimates as closely as it is possible to do so until such time as the board of transport commissioners' final decision is rendered.

Now we come to the question of routes, which does not really belong to this bill at all, because as has been so clearly stated, the general over-all Pipe Lines Act has definitely left, and deliberately left, the question of route to the board of transport commissioners. However, I think I am justified in mentioning the question of routes here for two reasons. First, it is, or is supposed to be, one of the main reasons for the opposition to this and a similar bill; and secondly, it has certainly occupied a great deal of the time of the committee. On the question of routes Mr. Connolly said that his company, after some two years of preliminary survey and work, had data on five possible routes, one of which was an all-Canadian route. That is, an all-Canadian route as far as Vancouver. From there it must go down into the United States. Three of them were alternatives of the first route, whereby the line would dip back and forth across the international boundary and take advantage of topography, and one can fairly be described as an all-American route. In that connection the memorandum says as follows—and this is certainly a matter of importance to anyone trying to arrive at a decision on this bill:

> Matters touching engineering, terrain, cost of construction and maintenance of the line, the possibility of maintaining a continuous supply to consumers, markets, the price of gas to industrial, commercial and household users, are all matters which the board of transport commissioners must consider before any order is made approving a route.

[Mr. Applewhaite.]

Now listen to this from the same memorandum:

> The applicants for incorporation are prepared, if authorized by the board of transport commissioners, to build the first described route, which runs through Canada in its entirety to Vancouver. They are also prepared to build along any route which, after full consideration of all the facts, may be deemed to be in the best interests of Canada as declared by the board.

So far I have not mentioned the Yellowknife route—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Yellowhead.

Mr. Applewhaite: The company stated quite frankly that they had given some consideration to the Yellowhead route—my mistake—and had not any detailed information on it. They said, through the president of the proposed company, that it would cost approximately $25,000 to make a detailed survey of the Yellowhead route, and they undertook to make such a survey before they appeared before the board of transport commissioners. So what do we get from Mr. Connolly's evidence? Mr. Connolly, as I have mentioned, is not only a parliamentary counsel, but one of the provisional directors of the company. He satisfied me, and I think he satisfied the majority of the committee, that he was sound and honest in his answers, and that he was definitely, and so were his associates, interested in prosecuting this proposition to a successful conclusion to the best interests of Canada as a whole. He satisfied me, and I think the majority of the committee, that the United States market is essential to this proposition; that if we do not sell to the United States we cannot sell on the coast because there is not enough market in British Columbia to justify the building of a pipe line.

He satisfied me, and I think the majority of the committee, that this concern was financially responsible, able and competent to carry out the work which they would undertake if they were given the power to do it. He satisfied me, and I think the majority of the committee, that the pipe which they would use would be made in Canada, in Canadian factories from Canadian materials. He must have satisfied practically everyone in the committee of the thoroughness with which the concern had investigated scientifically all the angles involved in this concern before they applied for a charter. He satisfied us that his concern would go before the board of transport commissioners with five, since extended to six, alternative routes, and that they would build upon such of those routes as the transportation board approved. He satisfied us that arrangements had been completed for the satisfactory collection of the gas in Alberta, and for the distribution of that part of it which must be sold in the United States on the United States side of the line, and that companies had been organized to carry out both of these necessary details.

Now we come to Mr. Dixon. I suppose if there was one thing on which every member of the committee was agreed, it was that Mr. Dixon knew what he was talking about; that he was competent and capable. I have not the time to give this committee the full life history of Mr. Dixon, but I propose to give to this committee a short summary of it, and lest there may be any suggestion at a later stage, may I say now, that this summary of Mr. Dixon's career, together with all the rest of my speech, was prepared neither in Wall street, nor in Calgary, but is the result solely of my own efforts. This is Mr. Dixon: graduate of Harvard school of applied science, member of the firm of Brakow, Dixon and McKee, a firm in existence since 1919 as engineers in petroleum and natural gas and geologists. He has been a geologist since 1911. He has a very wide experience in construction and operation of pipe lines. He was geologist and engineer for the Houston gulf line from Corpus Christi, Texas, to Houston, the first such pipe line in the United States built by public financing. He started in 1924 his first work done for the American government during the first war. He has worked on many small enterprises, one of which grew into the United Gas Company, one of the largest in the United States. He was engineer and inspector on the pipe line from Houston to northern Louisiana in 1929.

There he was geologist for Southern Natural Gas Company, a pipe line about 800 miles long. For several years he was with the Missouri-Kansas pipe line which finally had some 3,000 miles of pipe line, counting double lines. He was one of the promoters of the Tennessee line from near Mexico to Buffalo. He was engineer for the El Paso line from Lea county, Mexico, to El Paso, and is still their consultant. He has personally investigated Alberta. He has been over the Kicking Horse, around the Big Bend, through Kamloops and down the Fraser; also from Radium Hot Springs to Cranbrook and Trail. He put in two summers of work in various possibilities between Alberta and Vancouver and hired other firms also to carry out some of this work.

Mr. Dixon's history and his personality and his bearing before the committee demonstrated most clearly that he was no fly-by-night promoter but a sound geologist and engineer who meant business. Now, as to routes. It must be remembered that Mr. Dixon is the president of the proposed company. He appeared before the committee and outlined the five routes to which I have referred. He told the committee the Kicking Horse pass route was utterly impossible at both ends. He admitted quite frankly that he had nothing but a superficial knowledge of the Yellowhead route. He undertook to have a survey made of that route to cost some $25,000, before any application was made to the board of transport commissioners.

He had detailed information of the Canadian route across southern British Columbia through the Crowsnest pass, and on the three alternatives thereof which, as I said, dip back and forth across the line to take advantage of good topography and avoid bad topography. In that connection here is an example of the evidence given by Mr. Dixon:

> They have a route that has been constructed there through Allison pass and they estimated the cost of $4 million but it cost $12 million because, as they cut into the side hills, the hill moved across. That makes for very difficult pipe line construction. That is what makes the line more costly in going through the Canadian routes. It is just the difference in terrain.

I suggest that no one wants to be utterly obstinate in this connection. If it were considered advisable to route the line partially through the United States to get away from a condition of that sort, I wonder who would raise an objection, even on principle. It was just such detailed knowledge as that that impressed upon us the fact that Dixon had a sound scientific and practical knowledge, not only of the business as a whole but of this proposition in particular.

Mr. Dixon had fairly complete figures on the cost of construction, as complete as they could be when subject to approval as to any particular route. Mr. Dixon gave us some figures which were interesting and others which were far from pleasant. It might be interesting to note that their estimate of the cost of the all-Canadian route through the Crowsnest pass, including compressors and everything, was $92 million to be spent in Canada and $18,500,000 to be spent in the United States, or a total of over $110 million. But the figures which will be of more concern were the comparative figures of the actual cost of construction of a line from the Alberta gathering point to the Pacific coast. The figures for the all-Canadian and all-American routes were $78 million odd and $61 million odd, respectively. Whether those figures are pleasant or not, they are unfortunately authentic and we have to take them into consideration when we consider this particular proposition.

Mr. Dixon brought out evidence as to the additional cost which it might be expected would have to be borne by consumers in the Vancouver district should it be necessary to build the more expensive line. He stated quite frankly that it was impossible to estimate exactly but that the figure would be somewhere between $700,000 and $1,200,000 which the consumers in the Vancouver area would have to pay year by year as a result of the more expensive construction. He was brought back later to this same question by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, but Mr. Dixon refused to change his estimate. As I said, Mr. Dixon did not have at that time up-to-date and detailed data on the Yellowhead route. However, on the second day of his evidence when he was pressed for full details about routes he gave the following answer to this question which was asked:

> Notwithstanding the fact that the Alberta Natural Gas Company have made a preliminary survey of five routes to the Pacific coast, if the board of transport commissioners determines that one or more routes covering different areas would be to the best advantage of the Canadian people having arrived at the decision that the gas will be economically saleable on the west coast, would they be prepared to build a pipe line on some such route as the board of transport commissioners may determine?
> Mr. Dixon: We would.

That is both clear and unequivocal, and so is this question:

> With regard to the Yellowhead route, which has been mentioned on several occasions as being one possible route, would Mr. Dixon say that his company would be prepared to build a pipe line on the Yellowhead route if the board of transport commissioners instructed him to do so?
> Mr. Dixon: I have already answered that and my answer is yes.

A little later another member directed Mr. Dixon's attention to the paragraphs in the memorandum dealing with routes and Mr. Dixon expressed his opinion in these words:

> We would be willing to build on any route the board of transport commissioners would direct.

In case any hon. member may wish to raise the question that they cannot go to the board of transport commissioners and say, "You tell us which route we are to build on", I would remind the committee that they can make five or six applications. Those applications can be filed all at once—other companies have done the same thing—and they could build on the one approved. The question of routes is not quite as simple as it might appear. It does not do very much good for any of us to get up and wave our hands and say, "That route should be followed in such and such an area". We found from Mr. Dixon's evidence, and he knew, that there is a lot more involved in a route than just the building of the pipe line. There is the matter of maintenance to be considered, a matter of prime importance because gas must flow continuously through the pipe line from the time it starts to operate.

In general terms, there is no equivalent in the gas business to the emergency or reserve storage facilities available in the oil business. If a gas pipe line breaks, the service is disrupted. Not only is there no gas at the point of consumption until such time as the pipe line is repaired; it is necessary to take considerable precautions against a possible catastrophe by making certain it is safe to turn the gas on again. There is not only the cost of construction; that also is one of the reasons why the terrain through which the line must go is a matter of such real importance.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Will the hon. member permit a question? Are you stating that Mr. Dixon said that if there is a break away back in the line it immediately cuts off the gas to the consumer? He did not say that. The answer is that the gas piped at 1,000 pounds pressure would continue to maintain the supply for a long time and give him time to repair the break.

Mr. Applewhaite: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member who has taken this, perhaps his first opportunity, to address the committee on this subject might give his ideas, which perhaps may be better than Mr. Dixon's, when I have finished giving mine.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I asked you if you were quoting Mr. Dixon to that effect.

Mr. Applewhaite: If it is necessary for the hon. member for Calgary West to get information from me to complete his knowledge on this subject would he mind if I requested him to ask me when I have finished with the line of argument which I am pursuing at the moment, whether it suits him or not. There is another factor of this subject which up to the present has not been discussed very much. It was brought up by questions in the committee by the hon. member for New Westminster. I refer to the fact that there is a real possibility of United States gas supplying the market at Seattle and Portland. There is a very real threat that wells may come in in Wyoming which will make it practical for the United States to supply its own market. In that case it would be impossible for anybody to finance a line from Alberta to the Pacific coast of British Columbia. In that case the Americans might or might not supply the city of Vancouver and other British Columbia markets, but whether they did or did not the province of Alberta would have lost its market for the gas which at the present time it has for sale.

Mr. Blackmore: Hear, hear.

Mr. Applewhaite: There is another unfortunate feature of this subject but one which we must consider if we are going to try to consider the matter rationally at all. If it were possible it would be a very nice thing to say: We will put a pipe line through some undeveloped or partially developed country and because that pipe line is there we will develop a country which is not developed. Unfortunately that is not possible. You have to have your market there before you can build a pipe line to serve it. On that question I should like to refer to what Mr. Dixon had to say. I have no apology to offer for quoting him because it is Mr. Dixon's company we are considering. Mr. Dixon said at page 87 of the proceedings of the committee of April 27:

> You cannot build a line relying on what might happen. You have to have your market there before you can build a line, otherwise no one will finance it. The returns are small and you cannot take the risk and have the line there eating its head off in interest and in depreciation without a market.

Either that is true or it is not. Whether we like it or whether we do not makes no difference as to whether or not it is true. Personally, with my small knowledge of Mr. Dixon's reputation, and from the apparent common sense of his remarks, I am inclined to believe that it is true. Later on with reference to Trail Mr. Dixon had this to say:

> This projected line will go through Trail, where there is already a wonderful market for gas. The figures given to us by officials from the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company are to the effect that there will be 3 billion a year as a minimum and 5·3 billion a year that they say is possible depending, as I said yesterday, on some developments that are going on there now, whether they can use the gas satisfactorily.

Mr. Dixon's evidence showed that their proposal was to serve what might be generally termed as the Vancouver, New Westminster area. Here may I say, to avoid later misunderstanding, that he made it clear that they did not intend to build a pipe line into the Fraser valley, but that the British Columbia Electric Company desired to build a pipe line into the valley and to take the gas from the Alberta Natural Gas Company. I do not know why that should be a cause for levity. That was Mr. Dixon's evidence before the committee. They would serve the Vancouver, New Westminster area together with approximately 32,000 people in the Nelson, Trail, Rossland, Kimberley, Cranbrook area.

As to the proportion of the gas to be sold in British Columbia and to be sold in the United States, apparently that does not depend at the moment on the amount of gas available, which is almost unlimited. It depends upon what the market is. Figures on the Canadian market were presented to this company by the British Columbia Electric Railway Company which I understand will do the retailing, and by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company. They are as follows: The Canadian market can absorb 11½ billion cubic feet per year plus 2·3 billion if Consolidated use their larger estimate. The United States market can absorb 63½ billion cubic feet per year. It should therefore be obvious that if Alberta gas is going to be sold on the Pacific coast arrangements must be made so that it can be sold in the United States as well as in Canada.

Then there was Mr. Dixon's evidence in connection with the pipe. He supported Mr. Connolly that arrangements had been completed with both the Dominion Bridge Company and the Page-Hersey Tube Company, Canadian concerns, for the purchase of pipe in Canada, and that they had correspondence —in fact he produced it—confirming that that was possible and would and could be done. On all phases of his evidence Mr. Dixon stood up to what I think it is fair to say was a very severe cross-examination by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and others. It was impossible to shake him in his knowledge, because it was knowledge, of the facts. He impressed me on the occasions where he had not any personal knowledge and refused to hazard a guess but quite frankly stated that that was a subject beyond his immediate knowledge and therefore he was unable to give a firm answer. That is the sort of thing that creates a much better impression with me than if he had held himself out as one of those people who know the answers to every question under the sun.

There is an aspect of this matter which has been bothering many Canadians, and I think quite legitimately. It is a matter that I believe should be taken into consideration. They have been worried, and perhaps with some cause, whether enough consideration was being given to the future requirements of Canada, not only the market today but what it may be ten, twelve, or some other number of years in the future. That question was put to Mr. Dixon and he had this to say at page 121 of the proceedings of the committee on April 27:

> Future needs. We have discussed and will discuss with the vital companies and authorities to try to get as nearly as possible what the consumption of gas say for the next fifteen or twenty years will be, and that amount of space will be reserved for Canada.

There is another most legitimate cause of worry to Canadians and that is the idea that possibly somehow or other it might happen that United States consumers might get their gas and Canadians might be left without gas. It has nothing to do with the order in which various places on the line are served. There is the fear that if the line is in the United States and these outlets are in the United States it may be possible that we may sell our gas to the United States and find that we have not got enough for ourselves. That matter was brought up and at page 122 Mr. Dixon was asked this question:

> Is it a correct interpretation of that statement to say that it would give priority to the Canadian markets over the markets in the United States?
> A. I would like to answer your question this way: there will be a priority on the Canadian market for their potential needs, and the rest of the pipe line capacity will be reserved for the American needs.
> Q. It does not follow from this statement that you intend to serve markets in the order given in the statement, Alberta first, British Columbia second and the United States third?
> A. When you have a pipe line and there is enough gas in the pipe line, it is not a question of who gets it first. Everybody gets it. But when gas is scarce due to some calamity or break or something of that order, nearly always there is a cut-off of the industries for the moment. I think no one would object to that. There is a cut-off so that the domestic consumers can be kept going. But as far as we expect, the Canadian market, up to a certain limit which would be as large as was needed, will have the priority. We have to have it in that way because otherwise we would never get by the federal power commission. There would be two markets, one called the Canadian market and one called the American market.

So what did we of the committee get from Mr. Dixon's evidence? First, I think he established to the satisfaction of all that he is a practical geologist with experience in and knowledge of all phases of the industry. I believe he established that so completely that should any hon. member attempt to belittle the standing of Mr. Dixon now he would find that he was actually belittling himself. He established to our satisfaction that he had detailed information on five alternative routes, one of which was all-Canadian, three of which were predominantly Canadian, and one of which was all-American, and that he had no authentic information on the Yellowhead route. He undertook to our satisfaction to get that authentic information on the Yellowhead route before proceeding with the application. He demonstrated to us a full knowledge of the costs of construction, and explained to us what I for one did not realize before, the important bearing of maintenance costs on the final cost of the gas. He undertook—and it was an undertaking—that all six routes would be submitted to the board of transport commissioners, and that the route approved by the board would be followed if his company were given the right to build it. He impressed upon us the importance of terrain in connection with maintenance cost and in connection with maintaining a steady flow.

Then he did not volunteer this, but as a result of his answers he impressed upon us the imminent danger of United States competition. In other words we might wake up some morning and find that Portland and Seattle are to be supplied by United States gas producers, while we have been sitting here talking about it. He established that an existing market was a prerequisite to the construction of a line. He satisfied us that his company was prepared and intended to serve the Vancouver and Kootenay areas with pipes made in Canada; that the future requirements of Canada were being allowed for and protected, and that at the moment the Canadian market has priority.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that as a result of the evidence given by these two witnesses before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, that committee was fully justified in reporting this bill, which is the same as saying that in its opinion these incorporators were a fit body of men to be formed into a company with power to apply to the board of transport commissioners for the right to build an international pipe line.

Now may I add just one or two thoughts of my own. I suggest to the committee that this matter is of a seriousness which perhaps some have not fully realized. We are dealing with a long-term proposal which embraces the whole future, as far as fuel is concerned, of a large section of British Columbia; and the whole future, as far as markets are concerned, of an important product of Alberta. This subject is too important to be debated here with vague generalities. Certainly it is too important to be discussed on the basis of ill-founded rumours or partial and distorted truths. I suggest with great respect to hon. members that we are in danger of not being able to see the forest for the trees, that we are overlooking the main object of this whole thing. The purpose of this legislation is not to build a pipe line. The building of a pipe line is not the be-all and end-all of what we are discussing today at all. We are discussing means of getting natural gas to the Pacific coast market, and the construction of a pipe line is merely incidental to that.

Mr. MacInnis: A pretty important incidental.

Mr. Applewhaite: I grant you that it is an important incidental, since you cannot get it without a pipe line. But it might be delightful to build a pipe line anywhere. The point is that we must build a pipe line to attain this great objective of delivering gas to the Pacific coast market. Therefore we must not only consider the pipe line. We could build a beautiful pipe line anywhere and just walk away and leave it, and it would not be worth anything. We have been so busy talking about a pipe line that many of us have forgotten that to some extent we should be interested in getting Alberta gas a market on the British Columbia coast; and I for one am impressed, and not pleasantly, by that threat of United States competition. I should hate to think we in this parliament had been in any way responsible—and I might be just as responsible as anyone else, since I am talking about the issue and not about personalities—for delaying this development so long that the Americans may decide to serve their own markets. The staunchest opponent of this bill—and there are honest opponents of it—I am sure will admit that we have to get into the United States market or we cannot build the pipe line at all.

The question of routes has come up, and I am going to make a statement that it would be much better policy for me not to make at all. That is, I am very much afraid that the Yellowhead route cannot serve the district around Trail. I wish to heaven that were not true, because the Yellowhead will come a good deal closer to my district than any route through the Crowsnest pass, but as yet no one has been able to satisfy me that they can reasonably connect the proposed Yellowhead route with the Trail district.

So for my part I am asking just this, that we allow these matters to be settled on the basis of their engineering, factual and cost data. I hope to heaven this line can and will be built in Canada, and I am very strongly of the opinion that it can and will be. But I for one am not willing to stand here and say that my pride as a Canadian will not permit them to take a dip of twenty or forty or sixty miles in the United States should it be necessary to get around Anarchist mountain or some other topographical hold-up which would add millions of dollars to the cost of construction.

Now I want to say just a word in connection with the claim that has been made that refusing to pass these bills would result in the creation of monopoly as far as Westcoast Transmission Company is concerned. That is the situation. If these bills are not passed the law as it stands today gives Westcoast Transmission Company the power—I do not say they are going to do so—to build just what the opponents of this bill do not want; that is, a line through United States territory. There has been a lot of talk and a great deal of criticism of the Westcoast Transmission Company. No one will believe me, I suppose, if I say I believe in a little honesty in debate once in a while. I am willing to admit that some months ago I was of the opinion that the Westcoast Transmission Company were, to some extent, opposing this and similar bills. To be frank, I thought that opposition might be based either on their inability to meet competition, or their fear that their plans might not, in the long run, really be in the best interests of Canada. I want to categorically absolve the Westcoast Transmission Company, or in so far as I am concerned, from any such accusation. It is not, and could not, be better stated than it was by that company's solicitor in the Senate committee on Wednesday, October 19, 1949. I would remind the house that up to that time the Westcoast Transmission Company had been opposed to this bill. On that occasion Mr. D. P. McDonald said as follows:

> Hon. Senators, the petition in opposition to the bill presented by the Westcoast Transmission Limited was prepared and based upon the fact that the proponents of the Alberta Natural Gas Company intended to build their pipe line through the United States. In the evidence which they have adduced before the committee they have indicated that they have planned a pipe line entirely in Canada and are prepared, if it is in the interest of Canada, to proceed with the pipe line in Canada. In view of this statement, the basis for the petition by my clients, which was that the interests of Canada required a pipe line to be constructed wholly in Canada before entering the United States, is not now applicable. Under the circumstances, therefore, I am instructed, with leave of the committee, to withdraw the petition as presented.

I think it would be equally fair, Mr. Chairman, at this time to meet another unfair criticism which has been directed at this Alberta Natural Gas concern. I have not the quotation but I do not think anyone will doubt that it has been suggested that this company has restated its views on this question as a result of the debate which occurred in this house during the last session, and which has been taking place during part of this session, to the effect that they were "all-American" until such time as this debate indicated it was poor business to be "all-American". That statement is also untrue because before this or the preceding debate ever commenced, on October 19, 1949, Mr. Dixon said to the Senate committee:

> One of the routes is entirely in Canada; all of the routes have a common starting point, near Pincher Creek, at a point near Yahk, British Columbia. One route follows an almost straight line from Yahk to the town of Osoyoos, hence to Princeton, then south to the border of the United States, hence to Holden, hence to Apple Grove, hence to New Westminster and Vancouver. That is the Canadian route, and it has a branch to Spokane.

Then he went on to outline the other routes just as they are at this time. It is not fair, therefore, not honest or just, to suggest that these people have changed their tune to suit some supposed political wind. I hope it is equally unfair to suggest that the opponents of this bill are opposing it because it might be found, in the long run, that some of their pet theories are also not wholly in the interests of Canada. In so far as the Westcoast Transmission Company is concerned, I wish once more to state that I absolve them from any such idea.

It has been suggested, Mr. Chairman, that in so far as British Columbia is concerned it is becoming increasingly popular to consider turning down these bills. On more than one occasion that has been suggested to me. Presumably the inference which I should draw is that if I hope to have success in another election it would be a good plan to do that which is popular. I do not want to indulge in any heroics about this, but so far as I am concerned I am far more interested in what is right, what is good and economically sound in the long run for the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta, than I am in anything that might happen to be popular at the moment.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I do not live in British Columbia, but I have a number of friends and acquaintances whose judgment I respect. I find that the thing which concerns them now is not where the pipe line is to be built, but how soon they can get oil, and how cheaply they can get it. As one put it in a letter, he does not give a blank where the line is built, as long as he can get gas and oil as soon as possible at the lowest possible cost. I think the general public should know that the dominion government is not paying for this pipe line, but I believe the people who are paying for it should have some say as to where it should go. Of course I should say that this government is paying something for the pipe line, because it has to pay for this discussion and filibuster.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say something about the way in which this bill, and the other pipe line bill, were dealt with in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. In the past five years I have been a member of quite a number of committees, but I have never seen one run in the way in which this committee was run. After we had partially, and only partially, heard the evidence of two witnesses for the one company, what amounted to a closure procedure was adopted. We were prevented from hearing the complete evidence these witnesses could have given, let alone calling any other witnesses.

The member for Coast-Capilano said a few days ago that he was surprised that Dr. Hume, the outstanding authority on natural gas reserves in Canada, had not been called. As I have said, we did not even have the opportunity of completing the questioning of Mr. Connolly and Mr. Dixon, to say nothing of calling Dr. Hume or any other expert. During the comparatively long debate which has ensued on this pipe line measure, speaker after speaker on the government side of the house has said that we should give these bills second reading and let them go to the committee. There could then be a full discussion in the committee, and members could obtain all the details. Actually, that is exactly what we did not get. It seems to me that the committee system, as I have known it during the past five years, was made a complete mockery by the way in which those two particular bills were pushed through without any reasonable amount of evidence being heard.

I have always understood that democracy is government by free discussion. The action of this committee was the complete negation of that principle. We were not allowed free discussion. We were not allowed what most of us have looked upon as our democratic right as members of parliament, the right to question witnesses who come before a committee, and secure the information we wish to have. As has been indicated before, that action was taken largely at the instigation of the member for Winnipeg South Centre. It was one which I hope he is now ashamed of, and which I hope will never be repeated in any committee of this house. The fascist and communist idea is that government by means of discussion is too slow and too inefficient. They do not allow government of that kind. We have had a taste of that sort of thing in this committee.

I was very glad to hear the speech of the member for Coast-Capilano the other night. He summarized in a complete fashion the arguments which those of us who have been opposed to these two bills have been putting forward for many months. In view of that excellent summary he gave, I do not think it is necessary for me or for anyone else to summarize again the reasons for our opposition to these two bills, and the reasons why an all-Canadian route is incontestably in the best interests of Canada and is one which we should ensure is followed by exercising the powers which we have as a parliament of altering the charters as they are presented here, to make sure that an all-Canadian route is followed.

I should now like to say something about some of the arguments that have been advanced and some of the statements which have been made by a number of the speakers during the past week. The hon. member for Edmonton West made quite a good speech. As a matter of fact, in many respects it was quite the reverse of the speech that he made previously, and I was glad to see that. Like the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, the only thing that I disagreed with was the ending. He said he was going to vote for these bills, although he made an excellent speech which would persuade most people to vote against them.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): That should be corrected, should it not, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Harkness: As I copied it down at the time the hon. member for Edmonton West was making his speech he said, "We heard evidence from experts". I should like to know who those experts were. We heard the evidence of one expert—an expert—and that is all. In addition to that, we heard the evidence of another man, that of Mr. Gilman, who is an engineer. But he admitted that he had never built a pipe line. I therefore do not think that he can be classed as an expert.

The only expert we heard was Mr. Dixon. I think it is quite apparent that if you hear the evidence of one expert only you do not get a good picture. In connection with this evidence that Mr. Dixon gave, as I say, we did not have any other experts there to contest the figures he gave us or the other statements he made. Certainly the costs that he gave were unduly slanted so as to indicate that it would be considerably cheaper to build this pipe line down through the United States than to build it by an all-Canadian route, although he had never made any survey of a Canadian route except one which runs straight along the border and which goes through some extraordinarily difficult country, as anyone who has been down in that part of the world knows.

As a result, the figures given by Mr. Dixon were not, I think, ones that should be swallowed holus-bolus. Certainly they should not have been swallowed until the committee had heard evidence from some other experts either corroborating those figures and costs given by Mr. Dixon or refuting them, particularly in view of the fact that these figures and costs and so forth were quite evidently given with the idea of showing that the American route was the best route as far as that company was concerned; and it was the one they wanted to follow.

The hon. member for Kootenay East on May 1 stated that we should have confidence in our civil servants—by that, in this particular case, I think he meant the board of transport commissioners—that they will determine the best route and that we should leave it to them and trust in them to do that. That is an argument that has been given time after time here by many people. What it amounts to is that we should abdicate our responsibilities and our duties as members of parliament and turn them over to this board of transport commissioners. In my opinion, if there is any responsibility and duty that members of the House of Commons have, it is in the matter of deciding on what you might call questions of policy which are going to have an important effect on the population of this country for fifty to one hundred years in the future, at least; and this is one of those matters. It is not a matter in which we should abdicate our duties and functions and turn them over to the board of transport commissioners. It is our job to decide here whether this route should or should not be an all-Canadian route, whether in the general interests of Canada we should insist that any pipe line should be built on Canadian soil or whether we are going to decide that we will let it go any place that the people who wish to build it want to send it, get it out of Canada as fast as possible, and at the minimum amount of good for the population of Canada.

On May 1 the hon. member for Vancouver South also stated, "We must get the first use out of our primary resources, including gas." I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if we grant charters to this company or the other one to let them go ahead and build the route where it is quite clear they want to build it, namely, down through the United States, the first use of our gas is just what we will not get. We will be at the end of the tap. At any rate, the people in Vancouver will be in that position; and in my opinion, the amount of gas they will get will depend, to a considerable extent, on how much gas is needed in the United States. Certainly, on the figures which were presented to us, if this route is built down through the United States, the best that could be expected is twenty-five per cent of the gas which goes through that line coming back into Canada and seventy-five per cent of it remaining down there for use in the United States, no matter what the development along the Canadian Pacific coast might be.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre on May 2 rose in his place and said that he took no part in getting this bill put through in the house or in the committee. If he did not take any part in it, I do not know what he was doing around the committee, all the time that we sat there, coming in and speaking to the members, giving them notes, and evidently instructing them and so on and so forth. In my opinion, he certainly was taking some part in trying to get the bill through; and he was extremely busy trying to accomplish that purpose during the time the committee was meeting.

This afternoon the hon. member for Yorkton managed to use a great many words but, as usual, without saying a great deal. He made a statement to the effect that all of us who were here in the last parliament were in favour of the general pipe lines bill under which this charter is asked. That statement is not correct. I was here at that time. I interrupted the hon. member and stated that I moved an amendment to that general pipe line bill for the purpose of protecting the interests of the present consumers of gas in Calgary and throughout southern Alberta; and in fact throughout all Alberta, but those people in particular. But the government refused to accept that amendment. After quite a bit of discussion, they maintained that it was out of order, and it was finally so ruled; and I was not allowed to re-introduce it in another form.

I think that is sufficient to indicate that certainly all of us were not in favour of this pipe lines bill; I mean, the general pipe lines bill in the form in which it went through. As a matter of fact, looking back on it now as we who have been opposing these bills had freely admitted on many occasions, we made a serious error when that bill was put through in that there was not a clause written into it laying down that the route to be followed by any pipe line company must be indicated in their application for a charter. That was a serious deficiency. There has never been any disposition on the part of any of us to deny that it is a deficiency. Shouting at us over here, the hon. member for Yorkton says, "You agreed with the principle of this bill. You all agreed with the principle of it." Certainly, we agreed with the general principle that the pipe lines bill should be put through under which it would be possible to control pipe line companies. But that is a different thing altogether from agreeing that the particular bill which was put in front of us was a perfect bill. It was not a perfect bill. As I said, I tried to amend it. One of the most important things which could have been in it, this matter of routes, was left out. It was far from being a perfect bill. But certainly we were in agreement with the general principle that a bill to control the building of pipe lines should be passed; and the passing of a bill was particularly urgent at that time because the rapidly-expanding production of oil in Alberta at that time demanded the construction of an oil pipe line to the east. This bill had to be got through before this company could be authorized to build. It was under that urgent necessity, and because it was the end of the session—and as a matter of fact, the end of parliament was only a few days away—that the general pipe lines bill and charters for the five companies which got them at that time were all pushed through.

The hon. member for Yorkton also said: "It is no use talking about routes here in the House of Commons." He said: "We could never agree on a route." Nobody has said that we could agree on a route. We have never tried to agree on a route. Nobody opposing these two particular bills has ever tried to say that here we should lay down definitely what the route should be for these particular pipe line companies. What we have maintained, and still maintain, is that it should be an all-Canadian route. That is all we asked in the beginning. That is all we are asking now. All we are asking is that it be an all-Canadian route. All this quibbling about our not being able to decide on a route here, as to where the pipe line should go because we have not the information, is just so much nonsense. We have never maintained that that should be done. All we say is that it should be an all-Canadian route, and that would satisfy us.

I should now like to refer to the hon. member for Cariboo. I find it somewhat difficult to say anything about him. He seems to be going around like a top these days. Perhaps it would be more proper to say that he resembles a whirling dervish. He made a speech this afternoon which seemed to indicate that he is now the strongest proponent of an all-Canadian route in the House of Commons. In the past he has been making speeches pooh-poohing any ideas we had along that line.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): That is absolutely false.

Mr. Harkness: He has been one of the strongest opponents we have had in trying to put over the idea that it must be an all-Canadian route. In addition to that, on every opportunity that he has had he voted against an all-Canadian route. Therefore, as I say, he seems to be going round and round in circles, and I cannot tell just where he is.

Mr. Cruickshank: He can't tell either.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Skeena, as usual, made a very good speech. However, I am sorry to say that much of his premises and information was inaccurate.

An hon. Member: Correct.

Mr. Harkness: He started out by saying that Mr. Connolly and Mr. Dixon must have satisfied everyone in the committee that the most careful consideration had been given by them to all matters affecting the construction of the pipe line, or words to that effect. Well, what Mr. Connolly and Mr. Dixon had to say apparently completely satisfied the hon. member for Skeena, without his ever hearing evidence from any other expert witnesses. He just took what these people said holus bolus and said: "This is what these people say; it must be right". He kept reiterating that time after time. He kept saying: "Mr. Dixon said this, and it was manifestly right. He told us this, and it is an incontrovertible fact." I do not think there is any question that we could have got two or three other witnesses as eminent as Mr. Dixon, possibly some of them more eminent, who I think would probably have flatly contradicted the assertions made by Mr. Dixon. This is another fact which shows that the hearing of only one expert witness in this committee was a very poor procedure to follow.

If the hon. member for Skeena would care to get a summary of the proceedings which have gone on for many months past this year and last year before the Alberta natural gas conservation board he would find in that a terrific mass of evidence by men who are conceded to be the greatest experts on the natural gas and oil business on this continent and perhaps in the world. If he went over that evidence he would find that a good many of the statements made by Mr. Dixon, and opinions that he has, are not shared by these other experts. I am not trying to say anything against Mr. Dixon specifically. We all know that experts are inclined to differ very frequently; particularly is that so in a legal trial where the question of insanity is involved, and the opposing sides bring in psychiatrists who state whether the individual concerned is sane or not. They always seem to be diametrically opposed in their opinions. I do not think it would be as bad as that with the experts in this natural gas business, but nevertheless there is a wide divergence of opinion on some points, and in that committee we certainly should have heard evidence from experts other than Mr. Dixon. In fact we should have had the evidence of Dr. Hume, and we should have had the evidence of at least one other outstanding geologist. But no; we were not permitted even to continue questioning Mr. Dixon.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question Did I not ask that Dr. Hume be called as a witness, and Mr. Theodore Link, and Mr. Stanley Slipper and Mr. Staver of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, and also a representative of the atomic energy commission of Washington?

Mr. Harkness: I would say yes to the hon. member's question, and I would ask him in return, who was it that objected to their being called?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The hon. member for Calgary West did not want Mr. Slipper and the other gentlemen whose names I have mentioned called. I say they will be called before the board of transport commissioners, if I have any power to call them before a route is determined.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Calgary West did not oppose anybody being called. I think the hon. member for Cariboo himself will admit that the reason none of these people was called, and that nobody was called, is that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre proposed a motion of closure that no further witnesses be heard, and the hon. member for Cariboo voted for it. The motion will be found at page 70 of the proceedings and evidence of the committee. I will not bother reading it. A list of the names of the people who voted in favour of not calling any further witnesses appears there.

Some hon. Members: Read it.

Mr. Harkness: Here are the people who voted in favour of the motion:

Messrs. Applewhaite, Bertrand, Bonnier, Bourget, Byrne, Cannon, Carroll, Carter, Darroch, Decore, Dewar, Douglas, Gauthier (Portneuf), Goode, Gourd (Chapleau), James, Jutras, Lafontaine, Maybank, McCulloch, McIvor, Mott, Murray (Cariboo), Nixon, Prudham, Riley, Robinson, Rooney, Ward, Whiteside, Wylie—31.

An hon. Member: Who proposed the motion?

Mr. Harkness: I will read the motion:

Mr. Maybank, of the committee, moved:
That the committee adjourn until 11 o'clock, tomorrow, Friday, 28th April; that the one hour between eleven o'clock a.m. and twelve o'clock noon be used for continued taking of evidence and thereafter the committee proceed to a clause by clause consideration of the said Bill No. 7.

Then they put the closure motion and the hon. member voted for it. As I say, he is going around like a top. He tries to give the impression that he wanted to call more witnesses, and then we find him on the record as voting against even continuing to hear the witnesses we heard, let alone calling any more.

To come back to the hon. member for Skeena. He was satisfied, and he said that everybody must have been satisfied, that the most careful consideration was given to all matters. I say that is far from the truth. I was not satisfied, and many other members were not satisfied. I was not satisfied first of all as to where this gas was to come from. Mr. Dixon kept talking about getting all the gas they needed from the southern part of the province. There are only two gas fields that amount to anything in the southern part of the province that are not being used. There is one at Pincher Creek and another at Jumping Pound.

Mr. Decore: What is the definition of the southern part of the province?

Mr. Harkness: I will come to that. The gas from the Jumping Pound field will be needed for Calgary itself during the next 30 years. I must say in fairness to Mr. Dixon that later on he said he considered the southern part of the province to be the area from Edmonton south.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): From 50 miles north of Edmonton.

Mr. Harkness: Nobody else in Alberta considers it along that line and I doubt whether Mr. Dixon did until this question came up. The hon. member for Skeena said that there were inexhaustible supplies of gas out there. He seemed to think that the question of how much gas there was was all settled, that there was nothing else to do but to just run your pipe into the ground and the gas would flow. That happens to be far from the truth. The Alberta natural gas conservation board has not yet decided that there is sufficient gas to look after Alberta's requirements for the next fifty years and permit export. These companies are trying to persuade that board to decide that question in the affirmative, but as yet they have not. I do not think that anyone who was not interested in getting gas from these two southern fields to the United States as rapidly as possible would ever contend there was enough gas to warrant the construction of a pipe line.

Most of the gas will have to come from what we in Alberta regard as the northern part of the province, from the area around Edmonton and to the north. I have no doubt that that is where most of it will come from. I mention this matter because the hon. member for Skeena does not seem to know what the situation is in Alberta. He heard the evidence of Mr. Dixon and then considered that everything was fine. He comes into the committee of the whole and makes a great defence of Mr. Dixon. I think the hon. member is a student and I recommend that he put some study on this matter.

We heard evidence from Mr. Dixon with regard to costs, but I was far from satisfied that the cost figures he gave were correct. For one thing he stated that the cost of the gas-gathering system in Alberta, which is really an integral part of the whole set-up, would be $26 million, and he said that he based that figure on steel costing $185 per ton. When he appeared before the Alberta natural gas conservation board he gave the same figure of $26 million as the cost of the gas-gathering system but said it was based on steel costing only $150 per ton. I tried to find out from him why the figures were the same when the cost of steel was so much greater in the one case than in the other, but never got a satisfactory answer. I think that is an indication of how accurate his costing was. I think a great many of the cost figures that he gave were no more than what the succeeding witness, Mr. Gilman, called educated guesses.

Neither the Alberta Natural Gas Company or the other company would say what route they wished to follow. The hon. member for Skeena said that it was not necessary that they should state what route they wished to follow, that they could make five separate applications. That is a different story from what we got in the committee. The Prime Minister stated on Friday night that any company which put in five applications to the transport board and asked for a ruling as to which one they should follow would be laughed out of the board. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary West in the committee, anyone making application to the transport board would have to state a definite route. It is just nonsense what Mr. Dixon and Mr. Gilman told us when they said they were going to apply for several routes and let the transport board decide. They refused to state what route they fancied. When we tried to pin them down as to what route they would rather follow, they would not admit any one particular route.

As the Prime Minister pointed out, they could not put in five applications to the transport board for five different routes. Naturally their application would stipulate the route that they fancy. They are going to have to declare themselves, but we could not get them to declare themselves. I submit that the witnesses were not entirely frank with the committee, as some people would have us believe they were.

According to Mr. Dixon, Vancouver will require only 8 million cubic feet of gas per day. The city of Calgary uses some 20 million cubic feet of gas per day. Vancouver, with a population two or three times that of Calgary with the towns to the south including Lethbridge, is to get less than half the amount of gas. That is just ridiculous. Figures like that indicate that this particular company either is going to give Vancouver and the surrounding area the absolute minimum amount of gas and use the rest for the United States cities, or their figures are not just right. I think everyone will agree that Vancouver with its large population is bound to use more than forty per cent of the amount consumed by Calgary. That was another point raised in Mr. Dixon's evidence which I was not able to swallow.

This debate has been going on for some considerable time, but I think it has served its purpose to a large extent because it has provoked a large amount of public interest in this question of whether these pipe lines are going to go through Canada. I am convinced that the people who want to build these pipe lines through the United States will by the force of public opinion never be permitted to do it. Therefore this so-called filibuster has served an extremely useful purpose in that it has kept this question before the Canadian people for about a year and has mustered so much public opinion behind it that our future supplies of gas will be conserved for the use of Canada first, with the surplus going to the United States.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest to the hon. member for Skeena and the hon. member for Kootenay East who made reference to the proceedings of the committee and apparently they were satisfied with what occurred there. I was far from satisfied myself because I felt that for a committee of that nature to call just one witness, the president of the company, an interested party, was not dealing fairly with the members of the committee. We could not get at the facts. We could not possibly get the truth from an interested party. We needed corroborative evidence, and we did not get it. We were blocked from calling such evidence.

I look at it this way. While the bill before us deals with a pipe line for gas, I look upon it as dealing with the lives of people. I look upon it as dealing with the lives of the people of British Columbia, their future welfare and the future development of that province. In my mind it has resolved itself into a question of whether we are to develop the state of Washington to the south of us or our own province of British Columbia. On it depends not only the material prosperity of our province but the future welfare of our youth as well. I know full well, as does everyone in this committee, that if these industries are developed in the state of Washington and not in British Columbia our youth will follow these developments, cross the border and become United States citizens. The only way we can keep them in Canada and make them good citizens is to see that their future is protected by having this vast energy, now about to be released for the use of man, made available first for the use of the people of British Columbia now and in future generations.

I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Coast-Capilano express his thoughts regarding the proceedings in the standing committee. I had the same reaction. I realized quickly that British Columbia was being sold down the river in the light of the evidence of so-called experts of both companies. I am not questioning their integrity but I do question some of the evidence we are asked to accept as to their work in surveying a route in British Columbia. I should like to quote from the evidence of one expert. At page 213 of the proceedings of the committee he was asked the following question:

> Q. In connection with the Yellowhead route the only observation you made was when you went through by train?—A. That is right.
> Q. Now, I just want you to answer this question. How fast was the train going when you were making those observations?—A. Oh, about 20 to 25 miles an hour.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the type of evidence submitted to show that this company had some interest in putting through an all-Canadian route. The expert travelled over the Yellowhead route at 25 miles an hour and made pencilled notes from a train window. I do not know whether it was at night. We did not ask that question. The result is that they are not prepared to go before the board of transport commissioners with a proposition to build a pipe line along that route. Naturally I question such things. It does not appeal to me as common sense.

I realize, having listened to the evidence given by these experts, that the people of British Columbia are being sold down the river. The hon. member for Coast-Capilano pointed out that we already have three railways making the crossing through the Cascades, Selkirks and Rockies between Alberta and British Columbia. I am not sure whether there are two or three completed highways. There are already routes in existence crossing the Rockies and the other ranges, and each of them is capable of accommodating a pipe line route at the side thereof from Alberta to British Columbia. Naturally there are one or two routes suggested. I appeal particularly to members from the eastern provinces to consider seriously how they are going to vote on this measure. Members from British Columbia know their own province far better than members from eastern Canada. We know the terrain, we know the difficulties we are up against, and we are satisfied that the proposal to follow an all-Canadian route is a sound and feasible plan. Because of their lack of knowledge we appeal to them to take our word for it. I am sorry that they cannot get expert evidence on the matter because the work of the committee is now completed. On this basis I am asking them to support our provincial government and the people of the province of British Columbia against the financial interests who seek to build a pipe line for profit rather than for the assistance of our people.

I should like to commend the Vancouver Sun and the Vancouver Province for their assistance in trying to get the pipe line constructed through our province. I should like to commend particularly the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the hon. member for Fraser Valley for the attitude they have taken, and especially the Vancouver members for their support of an all-Canadian route. It is quite possible that Vancouver could get cheaper gas by some other route, but Vancouver, one of the most prosperous cities of Canada, has become so because of the fact that the interior of British Columbia has made it so. We supply it with goods that are shipped out of there by rail, boat and aeroplane. We have kept it going for some generations. They know that a prosperous interior means a prosperous Vancouver. Some of the members from that city realize that. The city council realize it and fully endorse what we are trying to do. The provincial government has endorsed our proposition on behalf of the coast cities. Today I have received the endorsation of the council of the associated boards of trade of the whole of British Columbia. I do not propose to read the resolution, but it is endorsed by every board of trade except those on Vancouver island who were not at the meeting. They ask that an all-Canadian route be designated.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Will the hon. gentleman read the resolutions from the associated boards of trade of British Columbia?

Mr. Argue: Read them. That will take forty minutes.

Mr. Jones: The first resolution is submitted by the associated boards of trade of the Fraser valley and lower mainland to the council of the associated boards of trade of British Columbia and reads:

> Whereas applications are before authorities for the approval of route for natural gas transmission line from Alberta to the British Columbia coast; therefore be it resolved that the associated boards of trade of the Fraser valley and lower mainland request the government of the province of British Columbia to give full consideration to the location of the said transmission line so that it may serve the greatest possible number of communities in the interior of British Columbia, thus stimulating the expansion of industry throughout the province.

The next is a resolution submitted by the associated boards of trade of the southern interior to the council of the associated boards of trade of British Columbia concerning the route of the line. It reads:

> Whereas the route chosen by the Westcoast Transmission Company through the Peace river district and south through Prince George and the Fraser valley to Vancouver would benefit more people in Canada, especially British Columbia; therefore be it resolved that the associated boards of trade of the Fraser valley and lower mainland appeal to the other boards of trade throughout the province of British Columbia to unite in getting the provincial government and our federal members to advocate the route of the gas pipe line through central British Columbia to Vancouver.

Then there is this footnote applying to the two resolutions:

> Both of these resolutions, considered as one at the discretion of the chair, were unanimously endorsed by delegates from all portions of the province excepting Vancouver island which was not represented, and are respectfully submitted for your consideration.

I am fighting for an all-Canadian route, not necessarily that particular route, although that will suit me fine.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): You are opposing the boards of trade of the Okanagan.

Mr. Argue: You talked this afternoon.

Mr. Jones: I read the resolutions.

Mr. MacInnis: Why did you not quote the resolutions?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I submit that this resolution of the boards of trade of the province of British Columbia expresses the opinion of responsible businessmen.

Mr. MacInnis: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Jones: He is going contrary to it.

Mr. Argue: He cannot understand English.

Mr. Jones: Again I say that, unlike some members, the route of the pipe line means a great deal to my riding and I intend to fight for it in spite of other ridings that are not so keen about it. During the discussion of this all-Canadian route I was alarmed to find that the so-called expert had no idea that the Okanagan valley existed and that roughly 120,000 people lived there. He had not thought about it, had not surveyed it, did not even know where it was. So I claim that anyone coming before this house talking about an all-Canadian route who does not know of the existence of that potential market has not given the matter a great deal of thought. In other words I believe the all-Canadian route was an afterthought, when they found the strenuous objection to such a route not being included in their proposals. And, as I pointed out, you cannot survey a route of that kind, through mountainous country, bogs and so on, from a train or car or plane. It has to be done on foot to be done properly, and this has not been done in the case of a single route through the interior of British Columbia by either of the companies whose bills are being considered.

It is true that figures were given as to costs, but that was merely guesswork. In spite of the statement made by the engineer the shorter mileage involved in an all-Canadian route would more than make up for the extra cost. Whether it is built in British Columbia or in the state of Washington, the terrain is just about the same. You still have to overcome the Rockies, the Cascades and the Selkirks. They are practically the same in Washington and British Columbia; and actually the highest pass traversing the mountains to the coast is not in British Columbia but in the state of Washington.

For the past year we have been told that all our questions would be answered in committee. Like many other hon. members I hoped this would be true; but when we reached that committee we found it was not the railroad committee but the railroading committee. Certainly they railroaded it through without proper witnesses being called. Personally I doubt whether a serious survey was ever made of an all-Canadian route, from the evidence submitted. I am sure no survey of the potential market has been carried out, because even Nelson was an afterthought, though Nelson would be convenient to the route whether it went through British Columbia or through the United States.

Apparently this committee of which I was a member had no power to specify any route, or to change the bill in any way. We did not even have power to recommend a route. The only power we had was to listen to the evidence. Why that was so I do not know. I think it was a sheer waste of time for two or three days. And I claim the board of transport commissioners does not have a great deal more power. It has the power to scrutinize carefully and in detail all applications for licences, but that is all. It cannot say, "You must build through the Crowsnest pass" or by any other route. They are not engineers; they do not have a staff of engineers who have on file the details of various routes across Canada. They rely entirely upon the application being made at the moment, and the map accompanying that application. They must take it for granted that the data on the map is accurate, and it is on that basis that approval is given. It is not a matter of whim of the board, saying, "We do not like that route. We prefer the more scenic highway around Big Bend, so you must build in that direction." That is not it at all.

Frankly I am in a quandary as to the body that does control this matter of route. I have a very interesting article here on the same subject in Oil in Canada, a Canadian weekly which claims to be the most widely read authority on Canadian oil, published in Winnipeg. It says:

> In the House of Commons last Thursday, Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, is reported by the Canadian Press to have said that the government will not allow Alberta natural gas to be exported to the United States before it reaches potential consumers in neighbouring British Columbia.

Then, after conveying the idea that the minister can determine the route, it goes on:

> The Pipe Lines Act passed last year gives the board of transport commissioners authority over routing of lines, while parliament has control over incorporation of companies.

Se we have two possible controls over the route. Then at the end the editorial states:

> The Alberta government has full control over the export of natural gas by its own legislation. Surely it is in a far better position than any other government or any potential consumer to judge what is the best method of dealing with its own natural resources.
> The promoters of natural gas pipe line companies are familiar with the economics of supply and demand and the effect of construction costs on operating results. So far as we can recall, there has never been any suggestion that the Alberta government can't deal properly with the technical problems involved in making a decision whether to grant permission for gas export once a charter has been granted to a company.

So we have the committee, which I thought had power but had none; we have the board of transport commissioners, which I thought had power but apparently has not. Then we have the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who thought he had power, but apparently he has none; and the Alberta government have come out definitely and claimed they do have the power. But I have another statement that confuses the issue still further. This is from the Vancouver Province, headed "Mayhew backs Canadian route". It is quite an article, in which the Minister of Fisheries favours an all-Canadian gas pipe line from Vancouver to Alberta, and thinks an all-Canadian route will finally be selected. But he says it will be the people who buy the stock in whichever company builds the line who will determine the route. So now we have five groups claiming to have that power. According to the Minister of Fisheries it is the stockholders, but we also have the Alberta government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the board of transport commissioners and the standing committee of this house. All the time the logical body to have that power is the parliament of Canada. We are the supreme body, and that power should be re-invested in us if we have turned it over to anyone else.

In the circumstances all I can do is appeal to whoever has the power to see that an all-Canadian pipe line is put through. Let me quote still another point of view. I have mentioned five people or groups presumed to have some power over this route, but the hon. member for Vancouver South believes that public opinion will have that power, though just why I do not know. The hon. member said he had a great deal of faith in the petroleum and oil conservation board of Alberta. He intended to vote for these bills, but said he was going to do his best to build up an opinion in British Columbia that would demand that before any gas was exported to the United States the line proceed to British Columbia and end in Vancouver, as far as Canada was concerned. But this is the time to do that, not after the charter is granted. These people will not care a tinker's cuss about British Columbia once they have their charter. They are out for profit; and we must agree at once that the most profitable route is through the United States. But we are building our country for our youth, not for profits, and I claim our proposition is the proper one.

I was rather amused at the retort of one of the parties making application before the committee. He had been making obviously vague statements as to the route, and upon being asked for details, and why he was guessing at the cost price in Vancouver and the cost of the route without a proper survey, he said, "Well, it is like a horse race and I am entering a Canadian horse in this pipe line race." It seems to me he had a lot of donkeys to compete against. I do regret the lack of independent expert testimony before the committee. I am not questioning the integrity of the witnesses who did appear, but I do question the opinions given, because they were expressed by men who want to build a pipe line. If the committee pressed hard on any point they would agree to anything. After getting the charter they would agree that they would start to survey the Yellowhead route. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that such an obliging company as that is attempting to get our support in order to be done with the committee. They realized we were just a nuisance, and had no power.

What evidence have we that the company intends to build a Canadian route? A defence has been made tonight of Mr. Dixon. I am not questioning Mr. Dixon's character, but I do suggest that a closer reading of the evidence submitted by Mr. Dixon will not indicate one iota of evidence that shows this company intends to build a Canadian route. As I pointed out, part of the survey was made by train, part by car, and part by odd trips to here and there. Most of the evidence was based on a superficial knowledge, and in view of that I question it.

[Mr. Jones.]

On Friday the Prime Minister stated that our protection is in the fact that each applicant has to file with the board of transport commissioners a map of the proposed route. That is quite true, and that is what we are worried about. If any company is granted a charter by this house, it is free to submit any one route. There is no compulsion whatever. It goes to the board of transport commissioners as a business concern with a business proposition. I am satisfied from the evidence submitted by this company that it will favour the route through the United States. I know when the company comes to sell its shares the subscribers will not be satisfied with the evidence we got. They will want more detailed information and they will get it. In the action of the United States banking company I mentioned, which is prepared to underwrite the whole concern, you have an indication that United States people are interested in the route and the ultimate profits that will be derived from the undertaking.

In parliament we are supposed to protect the subscribing public, and also the consumer. Apparently we cannot assist either one. We cannot protect the subscribing public because we were limited in the committee as I pointed out, and we cannot protect the consumer because there is no rule that an applicant has to prove to us the price at which the commodity will be delivered at any given point. As I said before, we are wasting time because we lack powers. I am sorry that the Canadian National Railways did not see fit to enter this field, and render the service on a national basis, just as the railway does. It is the logical thing for a railway company to do, and not to wait for United States capital to come to our province.

Another statement with which I take issue is the statement made by Mr. Dixon that it does not necessarily follow that commercial development follows a pipe line. I should like to point out to him that history in the United States has proven that the different towns along the route of a pipe line have immediately been a source of interest to industries, and vast empires have been built, particularly in Texas and southern California. I should like to draw to the attention of the members a booklet which they found on their desks, entitled "Canada's Oil, Edmonton Centre". On the second last page—I am not going to read them—there are indicated the industries that are available if power and raw materials are available. In Edmonton they have the power, but they lack the raw materials. In British Columbia we have the raw materials, but we lack the power. The evidence on these two pages will show hon.

members the industries I have in mind that could be established on a prosperous foundation in British Columbia.

We have another vast interior area, the Cariboo. I really believe the Cariboo area has great possibilities. If the pipe line traversed the centre of that part of the country, one would find that these vast plains and undeveloped mines would develop rapidly. I frankly believe that if the member for Cariboo would support us in our contention that the pipe line should go through that area, he would be doing a service to his own constituency. The tendency today throughout the world, owing to the unsettled nature of our economy, seems to be to decentralize industry. I think you will find that condition, even in England, where the area for decentralization is very limited. Efforts are being made to take industries into places like Holyhead and Bangor in Wales. I saw them myself last summer, scattered all over the country, in order to bring an element of safety in case of war. The same thing applies to Canada. Industry should be taken away from the big centres such as Vancouver, Seattle and Tacoma. They should be moved into the interior where the raw materials are. It would be safer from the national point of view; conditions for the workers would be healthier, and it would be a cheaper haul for the raw materials.

By routing this pipe line through British Columbia, we would not only be increasing the earning power of our province, but we would be getting more revenue for the provincial government through income, provincial and corporation taxes. We could increase the population of British Columbia and give the people economic security.

I am going to ask the eastern Canadian members, and particularly the members who have not given this bill a great deal of thought, to consider how they should vote. The Prime Minister has said that the vote is free, and I appeal to you to use your free vote to do something for a province that is appealing to you for assistance. The councils of every town in British Columbia, the provincial government and the Legion in every town have endorsed our stand. The press of the province is behind us. I ask you to heed this and do what your conscience tells you is right. We are fighting for the province of British Columbia. Last year the proposal to build a bridge over the Canso strait was brought before us. The members from British Columbia did not question the need for the bridge or the cost of it. We felt that the people in that area knew far better than we did what their own needs were, and we were prepared to support the measure. We know our needs, and we are appealing to you to treat us in the same manner as we treated you on the question of the Canso bridge.

I know the statement has been made that a monopoly is liable to be created if these two companies do not get the line. But again, I should like to quote to you from the Minister of Fisheries, referring to the three companies proposing to build a pipe line from Alberta to the west coast. The minister said:

> "I'd give them all their bills. They're all alike to me, and if one fellow comes along and says he'll build an all-Canadian route, that's the fellow I'd give it to."
> The minister said: "If one fellow says he can build an all-Canadian route, there's no reason the others couldn't. They'd have to show us why they cculdn't build it through B.C."

But the minister says:

> Everyone knows there will be only one pipe line . . .

In British Columbia.

When you charge this particular company, which now holds the charter and is prepared to build through British Columbia, with having a monopoly that has no competition, I claim that from the statement of the minister himself it would appear that it is not a question of monopoly, but of which company is going to get the monopoly. Personally, I do not care which company gets that monopoly. Apparently it is predetermined that it shall be a monopoly; but I am satisfied that whichever company gets the final charter to build through British Columbia, it will have the blessing of a million people in that province.

Mr. Sinnott: It is not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to take up many minutes tonight owing to the fact that, from listening to the debates on pipe lines over the last two years, one could almost believe that almost everything about pipe lines could have been said in that time.

I must congratulate the hon. member for Skeena who tonight covered the question of pipe lines, pipe line building, charters and so on from one end to the other. My purpose tonight in saying a few words is to make clear my intention with regard to how I will vote and why. It has been pointed out that one of these charters has been given to the Westcoast Transmission Company, and it seems only logical that these other two companies should be given these same opportunities. Because one company has been given a charter is no reason to believe that it will be the one which will receive the final say from the Alberta government. Believing in competition as I do, I therefore think these three companies should have the same opportunities. After this vote is taken, if the house then desires a Canadian pipe line, I believe they should turn their attention to the amendment which I have brought forward in Bill No. 132, which reads in part:

. . . a map showing the general location of the proposed line whereof the main line shall be located entirely within Canada.

If we pass these two applications which are before the committee, and then amend the Pipe Lines Act, which is the intention of my bill, I think it will take care of any further discussion.

Mr. Drew: This debate, Mr. Chairman, has in some ways been one of the most reassuring things that has happened in this country in quite a long time. Two private bills, or what were described as private bills, came before the last session of parliament. When they were presented as private bills it was suggested that it was a waste of time for anyone to point out that they should be dealt with in another way. When members tried to get some definite information as to exactly where these pipe lines were going and some assurance that our own Canadian interests would be served first, those who raised those points were told that they did not have much faith in their own committees or in the board of transport commissioners and that those were mechanisms that would protect the public in regard to these things.

From time to time members of the government have shown some irritation that this debate should continue, both during the last session and in the present session. The debate has been called a filibuster and, on certain occasions, the suggestions have even gone so far as to imply that those who were opposing these two private bills, in their present form, were serving some particular purpose and were seeking to establish a permanent monopoly in the hands of Westcoast Transmission Company which, by mistake—and it was by mistake—got a charter last spring at a time when this house was dealing all too hurriedly with certain public business, under assurances which were not fulfilled. That point I should like to recall, because it has a definite bearing on the discussion that is now taking place. At a time when everyone knew that we were in the closing hours of the last session, the overriding pipe lines bill was introduced, and along with it four bills to incorporate pipe line companies.

Mr. Green: Five.

Mr. Drew: I will correct myself; several bills to incorporate pipe line companies were introduced. In the case of the Interprovincial, assurance was given that this was for the purpose of carrying oil to the refineries in eastern Canada, and that the reason that the pipe line in that case was going to Superior in Wisconsin rather than to the lakehead in Ontario was that of the economy and saving that would be effected.

Mr. Knowles: We did not find it out until after the election.

Mr. Drew: What we did not find out until after the election was that the main purpose behind its going to Superior was so that oil could be exported to the Chicago area in the United States, and that while undoubtedly oil will be shipped to eastern Canada—

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the leader of the opposition would permit me to make clear the point of my interruption. My point is that we did not know at that time that the route was going to go outside Canada at all. All we were going to build then was simply a route from Edmonton to Regina and down to Winnipeg. It was only in the summer that we learned that it was to go down to Superior.

Mr. Coldwell: After the election.

Mr. Drew: The hon. member who has just spoken is correct. No detail was given until later as to the fact that it was going to Superior. But when that information was given, and when that was put before the board of transport commissioners as a reason for getting that route, the assurance was then given that this was an economy in shipping the oil to eastern Canada. At the present time we have two bills before us which we have been discussing all the way through as gas pipe line bills. Let us remember that these are oil pipe lines as well. The bills cover both oil and gas. As to whether gas or oil will be the main commodity carried in these common carriers only those who have the ultimate responsibility of operating the pipe lines can possibly tell. Both commodities are produced in the same area.

One of the reasons I said that this had been a very reassuring debate is this. Hon. members, who a comparatively short time ago were extremely critical of those who asked for any information and for assurances that Canadian interests were going to be served, have with great frankness and after very careful analysis of what took place before the committee stated that they are not now satisfied with the information that came before the committee, and that they are going to oppose these bills because of the way in which the information was withheld in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. That in itself is a demonstration that we have seen right here of democracy working, where the public have an opportunity to understand what is taking place, to express their opinion, and through that expression of opinion to convey their own desires to the members who represent them in this house. There is much to be said for a procedure which gives the public time to understand exactly what we have before us for consideration here.

Hon. members will recall that when these bills were before us for second reading during the present session the Minister of Trade and Commerce, on more than one occasion, said that he could not understand the reluctance of hon. members to let these bills go before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, where it would be possible to get all the essential information in regard to these proposed operations. Finally the bills did get second reading; they went before the committee, and hon. members who previously were supporting the bills have come into this house and have said that no real information came before the committee upon which they could say where these pipe lines were to go and whether the Canadian interests were being protected. By devices that have already been described in very unflattering terms by those very hon. members who previously supported these bills, the committee completed its work and the bills are now before the house.

On Friday the Prime Minister came back and we have a new appeal to the house. The committee has done its work. This is what the Prime Minister said to us. We should pass these bills so that they could go before the board of transport commissioners, where maps must be submitted and where details must be fully examined. That is the next stage. Hon. members were asked to give up their responsibility in the first instance to let this go before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and they know the results. Now that the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines has done its job and kept information from hon. members and from the public, hon. members are asked to pass these bills and leave it to the board of transport commissioners to do the job that we should do here. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is an affront to parliament. Either we have some judgment to exercise and some responsibility to assume or we have not. If we have no responsibility, these bills should not be before us. If we have no responsibility then, as has been previously stated, this should be dealt with by the Department of the Secretary of State and ordinary company charters should issue, and this should be dealt with without any pretence that members of parliament are passing judgment upon a matter so important as this.

But there is one point that has not been sufficiently discussed, and I do not believe it has been emphasized at all. The government has the final responsibility, and the government is answerable to parliament. There is an act of great importance which was passed in 1907, and it is still on the statute books. It is known as the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act. Section 5 of the act reads as follows:

> No person shall export any power or fluid without a licence, or any power or fluid in excess of the quantity permitted by his licence, or otherwise than as permitted by such licence.
> 2. No person shall, without a licence, construct or place in position any line of wire or other conductor for the exportation of power, or any pipe line or other like contrivance for the exportation of fluid.

That is a positive prohibition. Section 6 reads:

> Subject to any regulations of the governor in council in that behalf, the governor in council may grant licences, upon such conditions as he thinks proper, for the exportation of power or fluid where a right to export exists by lawful authority.
> 2. Such licence shall be revocable upon such notice to the licensee as the governor in council deems reasonable in each case.

An hon. Member: Eleven o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the leader of the opposition, but it is now eleven o'clock. Unless he has unanimous consent he cannot continue.

Mr. Drew: If I may add one sentence to give meaning to that, it would not take me thirty seconds.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the leader of the opposition unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Drew: I think it would give meaning to these sections if I added this. These two sections mean simply this. Under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act of 1907, which is still in force, the government, which is the executive of this House of Commons, has the full responsibility for determining where a pipe line should be laid, whether it shall be laid, and under what conditions it shall be laid, if that pipe line in any way is to be used for the export of oil or gas. That brings the responsibility today, as it was then, right back to the government; and before any hon. member should vote on a pipe line bill the government should state its policy in definite, unqualified terms, and I believe that policy should be a clear statement of Canadian rights first, definitely assured, before any consideration is given to the exporting of these great resources upon which future development will so largely depend.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will move to go into supply with the hope of voting on the amendment of the leader of the opposition. If we are successful we will call three departments, post office, national health and welfare, and public works. For some time we will discuss the question of the denial of mail service to certain persons, which was brought up before. We would hope to take up certain small bills, the first being Bill No. 12, respecting grants of public lands, in the name of the Minister of Resources and Development. The second would be Bill No. 81, respecting crown lands in Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. I might interject to point out to the leader of the opposition that this is not the bill he had in mind. He had in mind Bill No. 90, to amend the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act. I have looked at that act and find it has only two sections and perhaps we can take that one up as well. That would be three small bills in the name of the Minister of Resources and Development.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 9, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

VILLAGE OF CABANO

REFERENCE TO DISASTROUS FIRE—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have learned with great regret that there is another disaster in eastern Canada. Fire is raging at the present time at the village of Cabano in my constituency. The Red Cross is sending supplies to help the people, and I ask the government to do all they can to send help to stop the fire and assist those who are victims of it. I hope something will be done at once for these people. I extend to them my sympathy, and express the hope that the fire will soon be under control.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member for Temiscouata that the government wishes all Canadians to be treated alike, and that, under conditions which require aid, immediate instructions are given to all federal services to provide as much emergency aid as they can. The Minister of National Defence will state what has been done since news was received of the fire.

(Translation):

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, like all members of the house I am very sorry to hear of this terrible disaster. Local authorities have requested our help and troops are already on their way to bring assistance.

Mr. Pouliot: I wish to thank the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) for their kind willingness to help the sorely tried population of Cabano.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries. What action does the government propose to take with respect to the setting of a guaranteed price to fishermen for Newfoundland salt codfish for 1950?

Mr. J. W. MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member for St. John's East was kind enough to telephone me and to send me a copy of his question. In reply thereto I wish to say that the world prices of salted codfish have remained through 1949 above wartime levels, while the prices of other primary products have had some downward adjustment. The world supply of salt codfish is still below the pre-war normal, and the people in the consuming countries are anxious to have this kind of diet. The going prices for 1950 will be determined by the output in other producing countries, such as Norway and Iceland, as well as Canada, and by the demand situation overseas during the year.

The fisheries prices support board has had and will continue to have this situation, as it may affect the Canadian salt fish trade, under the closest review. In the light of unfolding conditions and any needs that may later arise, the board will recommend to the government the course of action it believes the situation then calls for.

Mr. Higgins: The parliamentary assistant is aware of the present situation in Newfoundland and the need for price support now?

Mr. MacNaught: The officials of the fisheries prices support board are keeping in constant touch with the situation in Newfoundland.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

STATEMENT AS TO EXTENSION OF SUPPLEMENTARY BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): Yesterday the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) asked if the government had been requested to extend the date for the payment of supplementary benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. These benefits, by an amendment to the act approved at this session of parliament, were to lapse as of April 15.

I may say to the hon. gentleman that some municipalities did ask if the benefits could not be continued until a later date; I think May 31 was mentioned in one instance. However, we felt that we could not do this because of the special provision that had to be made to take care of the cost of the supplementary benefits up to April 15. We have also been watching the employment situation, and indications are that there are now increased opportunities for employment. As hon. gentlemen know, the act as amended provides for supplementary benefits in future years, to those qualified, covering the period January 1 to March 31.

Our main efforts now are concentrated on getting men and women back into gainful employment.

SUPPLY

COMMUNIST ACTIVITIES IN CANADA

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, when I moved the adjournment of this debate last Wednesday I stated that one of my reasons for wishing to speak was that I had been the first member of the Canadian parliament to advocate official recognition of the Soviet government. I did so on February 3, 1942, at page 299 of Hansard for that year, in these words:

> I suggest that we should immediately take steps to recognize the government of the Soviet union . . . We should welcome in this country a Soviet military mission and should send one of ours to Russia. I believe we have much to teach them, and it is more than likely that they have much to teach us...
> The Russians have been the first people to meet and defeat the blitzkrieg. It is to them we must look for the initial destruction of the German land forces. Their magnificent heroism has sent the brazen horde reeling in disorder from their capital. Today the Soviet power is the second or third most important in the world. Soviet Russia and Canada are near neighbours; we are both northern people living in an extreme climate; we both have a great country to develop. Yet one would think it was almost indecent to mention Russia . . .
> I am not afraid of the spread of communism in Canada, if we treat Russia as a full ally and welcome members of her armed forces in the same way as we do those of any of the other "united nations." I should like to see a Soviet legation at Ottawa; the hammer and sickle should fly proudly at the masthead instead of being considered an emblem of somewhat questionable morality . . . to refuse to recognize this great power is building up trouble for ourselves and is going to give great aid to subversive elements which are even now at work trying to undermine the security of the state. We are going to have to admit that the Soviet philosophy exists and that it has done great things; let us admit it openly and above the broad tables of government rather than have snivelling, subversive agents peddling anarchist literature to the adolescent minds of the students in our schools, universities and training camps. We have seen what anarchy has done in other countries. It can happen here.

The point stressed, it will be seen, was that official recognition of Soviet power, and, by association, of the communist party, would bring communism into the open, and any actions of communists or of the party therefore would be fully exposed to the public view. My point was that communism would then be considered as a system of government which, while we did not agree with it, had every right to co-exist with our democratic and free parliamentary system. This view was widely held at that time, even by such persons as the President of the United States and Winston Churchill. The fact that two communist members were elected to this House of Commons in the nineteenth and twentieth parliaments shows how far official acceptance actually went in Canada.

How tragically wrong subsequent history has shown this argument to be! The hopes we all had that Hitler's folly might have paved the way for Russia to become co-operative with the free nations of the world were almost immediately destroyed. Even while fighting for her very existence she treated the military missions of her allies with extreme suspicion and scant courtesy, and did everything possible to prevent them from gaining any firsthand knowledge of the tactical or strategic problems of the actual fighting. As an example of this, the only information we could get about the weapons and armoured vehicles with which we supplied her, and how they were standing up under actual combat conditions, came not from our mission—and when I say that I mean the British mission to Russia—but from our own agents in Germany. Her shocking ingratitude in regard to the appalling task of supplying her through the tremendously hazardous Murmansk convoy route was a high point of international bad manners without equal in history. Her querulous and carping criticism of everything we did for her right from the start showed that the communist soviet state, like the leopard, cannot change its spots or its disposition.

An interesting aside of those early days on the eastern front was that the people of the Ukraine welcomed the Germans as deliverers; and had Hitler promised a free Ukraine, and not behaved with such abominable ruthlessness and barbarity, there is little doubt that his endeavour to capture Moscow and reach the Urals would have succeeded. The arrogant nonsense about a master race in all probability can be said to have cost him the victory.

Irrefutable evidence shows that it was touch and go whether the Soviets started a shooting war after the end of the major hostilities in 1947, but they apparently thought that they could win with the Berlin blockade. With the tremendous aerodrome construction projects being rushed to completion in Germany for fighter and bomber aircraft at this very moment, who can reasonably doubt the real intentions of these people? Instead, Mr. Speaker, of judging communism by the remarks of such leaders as Lenin and Stalin, who have both made a fundamental point of their doctrine that communism cannot co-exist with free democracies, we made the fatal mistake of judging others by ourselves, and, assuming that because we and no other democracy had any designs on any communist state, it would therefore follow that no communist state would have any designs on us.

Two costly and fundamental lessons have been learned, at least by some of us. First, if you recognize communism it does not do away with its underground activities. The argument that to take steps against communism in the open would drive it underground is entirely specious. No matter what recognition we give to communism and communists, they will continue to have an active and extremely dangerous underground. The communist party is like an iceberg, eleven-twelfths of which is submerged. It is just as foolish to try to alter the nature of a communist as it is to try to alter the physical properties of ice. Ice will always float with eleven-twelfths of it submerged, and communism will always carry on most of its activities underground. This is true, strangely enough, even in countries where there is a communist form of government in power.

The second lesson that we have learned, and it is a bitter one, is that communism and freedom cannot peacefully co-exist in the world today. Every single doctrine of the communist ideology is diametrically opposed to every principle in which we in the free countries believe. This is not a case of communism versus capitalism. Today Russia has a capitalist oligarchy, and the difference in income of the various classes in Russia is infinitely greater than in any capitalist country. No; the quarrel is not between socialism and capitalism; the quarrel is between the dignity of man and the slave state. Were I a religious man, I would say that the difference is so fundamental that the Christian teaching is that man is created in God's image, whereas the communist teaching is that man is created to serve his master, Stalin, the narrow dogmatic Marxist view of man as a servile animal disciplined by fear.

For anybody in this house to say, as some speakers did last week, that to bring communism out into the open prevents it from being underground, and that communism and freedom can peacefully co-exist, is to show that they have learned nothing from recent tragic history. It can be classed as criminal stupidity.

There is another point which must be brought out at this time, and that is the belief, to use the Prime Minister's words, that the best way to destroy communism is to make democracy work. Nothing could be further from the truth. Even if all the card-carrying members of the communist party in Canada were put into the Senate and given a pension of $6,000 a year for life, they would still be communists, and they would still actively seek to destroy the land in which they live. A man or a woman who has been infected by the communist virus will be a communist, and will advocate communism even though he or she be a millionaire and lives in a marble palace. Why this is so is not the point at issue in this debate, but recent history has shown it to be true. To use the words "defeat communism by making democracy work" is to actually play into the hands of the communists. Their argument is that democracy does not work, and if we, by specious negative statements such as this, state even by inference that it does not work, the communists will use our words, as Kipling puts it, "to see the truths you've spoken twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools."

The danger of ideological appeasement is just as great as the danger of physical appeasement; in fact, it is probably worse. Communist Russia has never had to send an army across any frontier to make new conquests. She has only had to rely on subversive activity. This is the new weapon of the new warfare, and it is just as important for us to combat it as it would be to combat an invading army using infantry, tanks and bombs. The subversive war is going on now. This must be clearly understood. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope this is the last time we shall ever hear this method of defeating communism advocated, at least by members of responsible political parties in this house. I repeat that the three fundamental facts which recent history have taught us are: first, that communism cannot co-exist peacefully with freedom; second, that to recognize communism does not destroy its underground movement; and third, that communism cannot be defeated by economic prosperity.

One further gross error made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was in his statement that the prosecution of communist or other subversive acts was the duty and responsibility of the provincial authorities. For the first years of the war, that is from 1939 to April, 1942, I held the position of district intelligence officer for military district No. 2, with headquarters in Toronto. This district, as is known to members, was by far the largest military district in Canada. It was then, and still is, the centre of communist activity. The question of subversive activity was a direct responsibility of the intelligence staff. As I had the responsibility during all the time the United States was neutral, and there existed an active nazi organization known as the German-American Bund, as well as an active communist party, both in Canada and the United States, who did everything to hinder our participation in the war which was termed imperialist and capitalist aggression, I feel that my experience during those years gives me the right to speak on the subject of the prevention of subversive activity and enforcement of laws designed to combat it.

The first thing I wish to say is that during this entire period it was the federal authority who dealt with subversive activity; it was the federal police who made the investigations, made the arrests, laid the charges and presented the evidence in court. Naturally we in the army co-operated with them in every way, as did the provincial police. The point I wish to stress, however, is that it was the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who, in all cases, looked after the prosecution of persons charged with subversive activity. It is true that I did occasionally see the then attorney general for the province of Ontario, Mr. Conant, which at that time had a Liberal administration. He was, however, emphatic that all questions dealing with subversive activity were a federal responsibility. The provincial police did co-operate with us, but only when we asked them to do so. Our dealings with the Federal Bureau of Investigation were also on the Canadian federal level. I do not propose to enlarge on this work, because much of it probably still comes under the Official Secrets Act. The fact I want to make very clear is that subversive activity is considered by the authorities directly responsible for its prevention to be entirely a federal matter.

The officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police with whom we worked during the war frequently said to me privately that they wished there was an amendment to the Criminal Code similar to that envisaged by this resolution so that prosecution would be made more simple. When dealing with subversive activity, the aim is to prevent the act being committed, not to prosecute after the foul deed is done. Prevention, not prosecution, is the slogan of all who have the responsibility of dealing with treason and sabotage.

Another error I wish to correct in the statement of the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister is that England took no steps to prevent communist or other subversive activities. Nothing could be farther from the truth. While the communist party was, it is true, not officially banned, nevertheless under the Defence of the Realm Act—known as "Dora"—the widest possible powers were given both to the military and to the civil powers to arrest, and to hold without trial and without warrant, any suspected person. It may not be generally known, but the Defence of the Realm Act had in it clauses such as the one which allowed any officer of any of the armed forces in uniform to apprehend and hold any civilian for a period of forty-eight hours before he even had to report the arrest to his superiors. If the individual was suspected, he could be put away virtually without a trial in a concentration camp and held there at His Majesty's pleasure. With powers such as these, there was absolutely no necessity officially to ban the communist party, or even Sir Oswald Mosley's fascists; but Mosley himself was nevertheless quite effectively locked up.

I now come to conditions as they exist today in Canada. Section 134 of the Criminal Code deals with sedition; and while sedition is not defined specifically, one of the generally accepted definitions is "to lead ignorant persons to subvert the laws". Recently we have had a number of instances of this in Canada. I speak of the communist propaganda directed toward the displaced persons who have for the past year or so been entering Canada for the prime purpose of getting security from Soviet expansion and, in fact, escaping the communist state.

One of the instances was when a riot took place in Timmins and the displaced persons who wished to be free turned on the communists who were trying to subvert them. Most hon. members will have received communist bleats about this episode, with the usual nonsense that they had been turned on by fascist dogs. I believe that anyone who tries to subvert or to incite these people who are now coming to Canada, and whom we hope to make into free and useful Canadian citizens, should be prosecuted, and that the Criminal Code should be altered to make this possible.

Another example of the necessity for an alteration in the Criminal Code is what is known as the policy of separation from sensitive positions of persons in the civil service if they are thought to have subversive contacts, or even subversive inclinations. Such a matter as having in their possession or in their residence lists of addresses and telephone numbers of known subversives, or to have visited and been seen in the company of known subversives, is considered evidence enough to bring about separation. Thus the government can and does deprive people of their jobs and economic security without a trial and without recourse. If a man is subversive, he is just as subversive in a key position in a sensitive industry as he would be in the film board or in any government department, with the possible exception of the department of state and the Department of National Defence. If a man is not subversive and wishes to appeal from the decision of the investigating authorities, he should be able to do so; but to provide security and to prevent the methods used by the police from becoming known, an alteration in the Criminal Code would seem advisable.

To show that the government is aware of this fact, it was announced that an amendment to the Official Secrets Act is proposed this session. While I am not, of course, in a position to anticipate the nature of this amendment, it is obvious that recent events have shown the inadequacy of the present law. Whether subversive activity is an offence against the Criminal Code or against the Official Secrets Act, or both, is a question of legal and administrative argument. It is apparent, however, that the government considers the present legislation inadequate for the purposes at hand.

The motion before the house recognizes this situation, and is directed to the introduction of a preventive, not a punitive measure. I say again that the aim of all responsible democratic authorities is primarily to prevent subversive activities from taking place, rather than to punish those who have engaged in them. This amendment was drafted to bring this about. It is not aimed at outlawing anyone, nor does it in any way attempt to do anything to anyone because of his thoughts. I therefore support the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. A. J. Bater (The Battlefords): In rising to say a few words on this amendment, Mr. Speaker, I shall first of all read the amendment and then make a few observations.

The amendment reads as follows:

> This house is of the opinion that appropriate legislation should be introduced so that communist and similar activities in Canada may be made an offence punishable under the Criminal Code.

In speaking to this amendment I think we can again say that possibly we are trying to decide which is the right way to do the right thing. After listening to the mover of this resolution, I have been doing a little bit of thinking; and I have come to the conclusion that if the amendment were adopted we would be endeavouring to do the right thing in the wrong way. I thought that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) struck the right note when he replied just last week.

I recall some twenty-one years ago, being back in the country which gave me my birth.

I was walking down from Whitechapel to Westminster Abbey and the parliament buildings, and there I saw what I had often heard about, namely, a man standing on a box. He had an audience of only four people. I said to the guide, "What is that man doing there?" He said, "Oh, he is just having a little conversation with the three or four people who are his audience." I walked over to this man who was on a box near the parliament buildings in London. There was a policeman there, with no revolver. I said to the policeman, "Is this permissible?" He said, "Oh, yes, we allow it." He said, "It is quite all right. It is our law. He is just letting off a little bit of steam. He is not hurting anyone." But he was surely laying out the government of the day at that time.

It has been said by the fascist and communist countries that our system of democracy is slow. It is quite true that it is slow. That which I saw there in England was just twenty-one years ago. Subsequently some communists were elected to the House of Commons in England. How many were elected in the recent elections there? Not one. I therefore say, Mr. Speaker, that while our system may be a little bit slow, it is possibly in the best interests of the country in the long run.

Mention was made of what some other countries, including some of our commonwealth countries, are doing at the present time in respect to communism. I wish to read an editorial from one of our western papers. It is as follows:

Australia and Communism

The new Australian government is losing no time in carrying out its election pledge to ban the communist party. In the speech from the throne at the opening of parliament last week it was announced that legislation would be brought down to make the party illegal.

Other countries have sought to check communism by various legal means, but Australia will be the first English-speaking country to try to ban the movement altogether in peacetime.

There are undoubtedly substantial reasons for taking this step. The Australian communist party is the most active and aggressive in the commonwealth. Since the war ended it has organized a long series of disastrous strikes in the coal mines, on the docks and in other vital industries, and caused incalculable damage and suffering to the country. These strikes, communist leaders frankly acknowledge, were called not to remedy legitimate labour grievances, but for political purposes—to disrupt the national economy, and to sabotage defence preparations.

As a climax, the secretary of the party, Laurence Sharkey, stated openly last year that if Soviet troops invaded Australia he and his followers would help them. This was too much for the Labour government then in power, and Sharkey was convicted of sedition. As a result of all this, public demand for the suppression of the party has become almost irresistible.

[Mr. Bater.]

Nevertheless the wisdom of this move is open to question. Communist parties have been outlawed at various times in European and Asiatic countries, but always with indifferent success. Such laws may cause the party to disappear from view, but they do not destroy it. The members simply go underground and carry on as a wholly secret and illegal organization. In that situation they often do more damage than they could when their activities were partly in the open. Also, an active harrying of the Reds gives them the opportunity to pose as martyrs and win support among sentimental and ill-informed persons.

It is sometimes argued that "driving the communists underground" is of little importance because a large part of their work is secret and conspiratorial anyway. This is true. None the less the existence of the "legal" wing of the party, like the tip of a largely-submerged iceberg, has often been valuable to the authorities, as it makes it easier to watch the activities of the whole organization. It was for this reason that J. Edgar Hoover of the F.B.I.—an implacable foe of communism if ever there was one—recently advised the United States congress against trying to outlaw the communist party in the United States.

Then, too, there is the unavoidable fact that however vicious communist activities are, we are departing from our traditions of free speech and political liberty when we punish Reds merely for their speeches or their membership cards.

This Australian experiment will be watched with interest.

Now we have a stranger within our gates. According to the press the Red Dean was asked many questions last night as to what they have and what they have not in one of the communist countries. What was his answer? He said what they had in Russia, but we know what they have not that we have, and it is the No. 1 bulwark of our democratic system as we know it in Canada and in the commonwealth countries; I refer to free speech and a free press. The fact that we have a free press is in itself almost sufficient to justify our not passing the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition.

I think I should read what Franklin Roosevelt, son of the late President Roosevelt, said on being interviewed just a short time ago:

Liberal democracy will win over communism, not with hydrogen bombs but by the practice of our ideas and ideals.

That is a great statement coming from a man who is the son of the late president.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think we as a government, as a parliament and as individuals, have to play a sincere part in practising, not only in this House of Commons as members of parliament, but outside of this house, and endeavour to encourage in every individual in the country, regardless of his calling, the principles we profess to admire in our democratic system. If we do that, then the amendment which is now before the house will not be necessary.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater) when he described the operations of our British philosophy of freedom. With his remarks I am in general agreement, as are hon. members on all sides of the house.

This amendment and debate have been beneficial in that they have brought to the attention of the house and of the country a condition that challenges our way of life, not only within our own country, but generally everywhere throughout the world.

As I listened to the debate the other day I recalled that five years ago, at the United Nations conference in San Francisco on international organization, Mr. Molotov, speaking for the U.S.S.R. as its foreign commissar and representative, said that no longer would aggression be allowed among the nations of the world; that no longer would injustice be permitted to exist anywhere; that when the United Nations charter was finally completed and accepted by the nations of the world never again would there be aggression, or the possibility. That was five years ago. Events of the last six weeks have been the most challenging in the history of the democratic nations and in their fight for survival. I shall mention only one or two.

During the last six weeks the U.S.S.R. has adopted a more truculent attitude than ever before. She has asked Great Britain and the United States to leave Trieste. She has placed over the Polish army, officers of the U.S.S.R., and she has made the serious threat that on May 28 five hundred thousand communist Germans will cross into the British or the United States zones of Berlin. That indicates a state of mind and an attitude that challenges members in this house, and in all democratic parliaments, to view the threat of communism, and consider how its illegal and overt acts are to be met under the law.

As one who over the years has advocated the establishment in this country of a national bill of rights for the maintenance and preservation of our freedoms from within, and also the necessity of parliament accepting its responsibilities in connection with the United Nations charter by the adoption of the United Nations declaration of freedom, I view with deep concern the situation brought about through communist activities in our own country and in the countries that have been overrun.

There are one or two matters concerning which we are all in agreement. One is that conditions internationally are serious. No one need say in this House of Commons how accursed communism is; that is admitted. But where the division of opinion comes is in this: What measures should be taken to the end that communism and its activities within our country shall not be permitted to remain outside of jeopardy for the commission of wrongs against the state?

We ask ourselves the question whether the law, in its present state, does in fact meet the needs and exigencies of these times. When we face that problem the next follows naturally and it is this: What has the government, representative of the people of Canada, done in the last few years to enforce the law so far as illegal communist activities are concerned? Has the law been used? Is the law sufficient?

That brings one to the question of enforcement or non-enforcement of the law as it now stands. The next phase of the problem is to determine how far our country should go in protecting security and at the same time preserving freedom. After all, freedom is our tradition, and without it our parliamentary system cannot operate. Freedom does not mean licence. Freedom does not mean the right to do the things we will. Freedom, simply defined, is our right to proceed and to act in accordance with the dictates of our conscience, so long as in the exercise of our freedom we do not invade or interfere with the freedoms of others. Freedom consists of freedom of speech, of religion, of associations—and I think, too, freedom from unjust state control. Freedom does not mean that in the exercise of freedom of speech we must be right; it implies that we must do right. Freedom does not mean that we cannot be wrong; freedom under law denies our right to do wrong.

Measured in these terms one looks back over the last four years since Mr. Churchill made his speech at Fulton, Missouri. If ever a stateman prophesied what would happen, certainly he did when he spoke in that historic speech. He warned of the danger to the world and the serious threat to the preservation of the United Nations which is implicit in the expansionist policy of the U.S.S.R. In our own country within the last few days it has been stated in The Outlook of May, 1950:

> The communist offensive of 1950 is now in full swing. For the first time, Canada is a main objective. The Moscow politburo has ordered its agents to concentrate on wrecking the economy of Canada.

Then it goes on to say:

> The main communist objective in Canada—industrial collapse—is to be pressed with maximum effort.

What do the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) say? I shall refer to their remarks in a general way and then, if the Minister of Justice desires me to do so, I shall refer to them in particular. If I understood correctly the purport of the remarks of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice, it is this: that the law today is sufficient.

There are laws on our statute books—

Said the Prime Minister, as reported at page 2087 of Hansard.

—laws in the Criminal Code, which are sufficient, if applied—

And I accentuate the words "if applied".

—to deal with all overt acts directed against the security of the state.

The Minister of Justice, in the course of his remarks, referred to the sufficiency of the law, when, as reported at page 2139 of Hansard, he said:

The law today is sufficiently extensive to support convictions in all those cases where overt acts can be proved.

Then he goes on to quote with approval the words of Mr., then Senator, Meighen. Sir, it is indeed something to hear a member on the government side quoting Mr. Meighen with approval; but that is what the Minister of Justice has done. I know the minister has no ghost writer in his department who writes his speeches for him; he prepares his own speeches and delivers them as prepared. Referring to section 98 he quoted Mr. Meighen in these words:

Senator Meighen put it—

That is, the idea that even section 98 did not punish anyone for his ideas.

—in this rather pungent language: "The memorandum—"

A memorandum prepared by the late Mr. Lapointe.

"—quotes an opinion of Macaulay's that it is only when the individual, having harboured wrong ideas, gives effect to them to the detriment of the state, that he ought to be punished. Who within the four walls of parliament or anything other than a lunatic asylum would ever entertain a contrary opinion?"

I agree that a person should not be punished for what he thinks; but I would ask the minister this: How do you, as a member of the government, and believing that, from time to time join in the removal of people from departments of government, not for what they do but only for what you suspect they think?

Section 98 was introduced and became law in 1919. There are parts of that section that cannot be justified in days of peace; and when I say that, I have distinguished support, not only from the Minister of Justice, but also in the words of Mr. Lapointe, Mr. Bennett and Mr. Meighen. Came the campaign of 1935, and in it the Liberal party had as one of its fourteen points the repeal of section 98. When the election was over they introduced legislation to repeal section 98. Let me refer to the opening paragraph of the section, which reads as follows:

Any association, organization, society or corporation, whose professed purpose or one of whose purposes is to bring about any governmental, industrial or economic change within Canada by use of force, violence or physical injury to person or property, or by threats of such injury, or which teaches, advocates, advises or defends the use of force, violence, terrorism, or physical injury to person or property, or threats of such injury, in order to accomplish such change, or for any other purpose, or which shall by any means prosecute or pursue such purpose or professed purpose, or shall so teach, advocate, advise or defend, shall be an unlawful association.

The subsequent subsections provided for the means of proof and the presumptions. After the election of 1935 there had to be the payoff. The Minister of Justice smiles. I am going to cite as evidence in that regard the words of Mr. Meighen, who was accepted by the hon. gentleman as an authority on this subject, because he quoted from him, but abstracted a few lines to meet his own purpose. I do not know whether he read the rest of the speech, but he put violent hands on one portion and left his hands off other portions.

Mr. Garson: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I think I should put on the record that I quoted the whole of Mr. Meighen's speech that was relevant to the point I was discussing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It has been said that some can quote scripture to suit their own ends. My hon. friend quoted Mr. Meighen but he did not quote his words from the same page, page 619 of the debates of the Senate for June 20, 1936, where he said:

This bill repeals section 98, it is true, but in another section it restores section 98, or the full effect of it, after the repeal. To certain persons, some of them well-intentioned, but principally to the communists whose votes it was necessary to secure by a promise of the repeal of section 98, the government by this bill gives the repeal with one hand and from them it takes it back with the other.

That is in the second paragraph after the words quoted with approval by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if I might ask my hon. friend a question? If Mr. Meighen was right in the statement which my hon. friend has just quoted, then why is my hon. friend supporting the present amendment?

Mr. Diefenbaker: If my hon. friend will wait, I will carry on the argument, and I will ask him this.

Mr. Garson: Answer my question first.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will come to his point, because I can understand how he feels when, having abstracted a few lines out of the record, he deliberately left out the pertinent portions thereof.

Mr. Garson: Is that a pertinent portion?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I now come to the change that was made. Section 98 was repealed and a new subsection was added to section 133, as follows:

Without limiting the generality of the meaning of the expression "seditious intention"—

That is in connection with prosecutions for sedition.

—everyone shall be presumed to have a seditious intention who publishes, or circulates any writing, printing or document in which it is advocated, or who teaches or advocates the use, without the authority of law, of force, as a means of accomplishing any governmental change within Canada.

Section 98 was removed, and in place of it a presumption of guilt was created under the law of sedition against anyone who in any way supports or advocates the changing of the government of our country by force.

Mr. Garson: "By force." May I ask a question at that point?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Does my hon. friend support his leader's resolution objecting to that section he has just been quoting?

Mr. Diefenbaker: What I object to is that, having secured the removal of section 98, as Mr. Meighen said, by promises; having secured votes and then removed section 98, you created another section—and I am accepting the minister's argument—under which there is a presumption of guilt when any person or organization advocates, either in writing—

Mr. Garson: Are you against that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Wait a minute—either by word or in writing advocates a change of government by force. Now, what about the discharge by the minister of his responsibility? I am accepting his argument that the law is sufficient today. Why should seven foreign language newspapers in Canada, which go beyond the realm of freedom of speech, some of them advocating openly a change of government by force, be allowed to exist within this land with complete impunity so far as the government is concerned? Why is it that when communists travel the length and breadth of Canada and preach the doctrine of force, the section is not used? Why does it remain in mothballs? If it were used, many of those who with impunity are advocating a change in the constitution and the government of the country by force would be subject to prosecution and conviction. Section 133 as amended places the onus of responsibility on the accused. Is it used? In fifteen years it has been used twice. In fifteen years there have been only two prosecutions, while communism continues its work.

Even the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) over a year ago said that some change was needed in the criminal law. I am not going to advocate a change in the law.

Mr. Garson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am going to ask the government and the Minister of Justice to take the law and use it in Canada in order to meet wrongdoing and to see to it that wrongdoers shall not attempt to undermine the government of the country by advocating force.

Mr. Garson: I want to make sure I understand my hon. friend's argument.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right.

Mr. Garson: Is it his argument that under the subsection to which he has been referring it is now possible to prosecute and convict these newspapers without passing the resolution moved by his leader? Is that his argument?

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend is exactly in that position. That was his defence. We do not need amendment of the law and I am taking his argument.

Mr. Garson: Is it your argument?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not enforcing the law. I want to tell you if there was a minister of justice over there who was not exhibiting as to this matter some of the attitudes the minister assumed in connection with the millers, we would not have the communism and communist activities that we have in various parts of this country. I am taking his argument and using it to show that under section 133 prosecution is possible and conviction is possible, for under that section the accused lost the right to defend except by going on the witness stand and himself answering the presumption that was raised against him.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will permit me, I am having a great deal of difficulty getting answers. Does my hon. friend agree with that argument?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am agreeing with my hon. friend; I am using his argument.

Mr. Garson: Then if my hon. friend agrees with that argument will he say how many times prosecutions were initiated under section 98 while Mr. Bennett's government was in power? If he does not know I will tell him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There were prosecutions under section 98 during Mr. Bennett's administration; Buck, and those associated with him.

Mr. Garson: One.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And the Evans case in British Columbia.

Mr. Mitchell: Perhaps my hon. friend will let me ask a question. He puts me in mind of looking for a black cat in the dark without a candle. This question of Mr. Bennett and the prosecutions under section 98 has been raised. If my hon. friend will read the record I think he will find that those prosecutions were carried on by Mr. W. H. Price, then attorney general of Ontario, who was responsible for the enforcement of law and order in this province at that time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Speaker, you know if you throw a stone into a group of livestock, the one that yells is the one you have hit. I am not going to be deflected from this point, because I have something more to say. To the government of this country I say you have not used your powers; you have played with this problem under the law. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) asks about the prosecutions in 1932 or 1933.

Mr. Mitchell: From 1930 to 1935.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have a booklet in my desk which came out today, issued by the mounted police; I was trying to locate it while I was being interrupted. This is an old argument, and I was just waiting for that interruption; that is why I have the book here. It is called "Law and Order in Canadian Democracy", issued by the king's printer. It deals with the whole problem. The other day the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was echoing the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he said, in effect "Oh, we cannot do anything; the provinces have the responsibility." I ask this question. What is the organization in this country that investigates communists and their activities? It is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They have the organization; they operate every day of the week. I am informed they have every dangerous communist in this country of whom they have knowledge right under their thumb. They are the people who have the information. Does the Minister of Justice, who is in charge of the R.C.M.P., turn over to the provincial attorneys general each month a record of the activities of the various communists in their provinces? I am not going to ask him to deny that, but I know if he told the facts he could not say that was being done. Certainly the law is enforced by the agencies of the provinces, but those who lay the informations are members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They start proceedings; then the administration of justice is carried on by the province. Yet the minister tries to get away with the specious argument that the provinces have responsibility for this, when he has all the agencies under his control and he is not acting. What about the mounted police?

Mr. Garson: On a point of privilege Mr. Speaker, I just want to correct a statement made by the hon. member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister can correct my statements later.

Mr. Garson: It was a statement about myself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The other day I listened to the Minister of Justice making statements that were contrary to the facts, and I did not rise to deny them then; I waited for my opportunity.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If it is a point of privilege—

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend said—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member who has the floor may not be interrupted without his consent except on a point of privilege.

Mr. Garson: My point of privilege was this. My hon. friend asked me a question. It may have been a rhetorical question, but I would like to answer it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have asked the minister one question ever since last November, and we have not had an answer to it yet. Why did you hide the report on the millers?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend is going to attach so much importance to my not answering questions I should like to mention—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the minister still raising a point of privilege?

Mr. Garson: As I say—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend is going to attach so much importance to questions asked in the course of a debate I would like to answer his question, and my answer is this. As my hon. friend well knows—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lake Centre has the floor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not mind those jacks in the pulpit, Mr. Speaker, but at the moment I am completing an argument; and if the Minister of Justice thinks that by means of interruptions, contrary to the procedure of this house, he is going to dissuade me from quoting from this book—

Mr. Garson: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I want my hon. friend to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend built an edifice of fallacy in his speech; he said, in effect, "We cannot act; the provinces must do so." I repeat that he has the agency under his control, the R.C.M.P., which operates everywhere in this dominion and has all the information. Does he ask them to lay charges? If he did, those charges would be carried on by the attorneys general of the provinces affected. What is the authority of the mounted police? I read from this booklet to which I referred a moment ago, under the heading "Functions and Limitations of Police Forces":

> The R.C.M.P., the federal police force, is headed by a commissioner who reports to a minister of the crown who is designated "minister in control of the force." (The present minister in control of the force holds the portfolio of Minister of Justice.)
> Primarily this force is charged with the enforcement of all federal statutes anywhere in Canada, but by special arrangement with Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island, it acts as the provincial police in those six provinces.

Is there any wrongdoing in those six provinces, any activity on the part of communists?

Mr. Gardiner: The provincial police say that; it is the same police force.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are there activities in the other provinces? In every case if information is furnished to the provincial attorneys general, or an information is laid, then the procedure is to prosecute through the provinces. Why is that not done? Why is the law not enforced? In section 133, subsection 4, you have a presumption of guilt; you put it in the law, why not enforce it? There used to be criticism of section 98 on the ground that it placed an onus on the accused; yet the same thing was done in section 133, subsection 4.

My mind goes back to 1944 and 1945. I ask the minister, why do you not enforce the law? Having regard to what communism has done generally in other countries, without entering into a witch-hunt which I join with the minister in condemning, with all the evidence available, and there must be evidence available when one sees the activities of the exposed part of the iceberg, to use an analogy that was used today, why is the law not enforced? I well remember the interview given by Tim Buck on June 26, 1944, in which he said:

> . . . in an interview that his recent invitation to Prime Minister Mackenzie King to join forces with his party had been "misunderstood."
> "I merely suggested to him," added Mr. Buck, "that if his legislation become liberalized—and spell that with a small 'l'—that if he played down our alley now, we might throw our weight his way when the House of Commons is split many ways after the next election."

What did Mr. McLean, the Liberal organizer, say at that time? These are things that are in the record.

> The Liberal party welcomes co-operation from everyone in Canada in putting into effect Liberal principles and policies, because we are sure that these policies are the only real answer to the problems which face Canada—

That was the answer of Mr. McLean, the director of the federation. Then I remember the by-election in Grey North in that year. These men came out of the internment camp into the election. I ask why it is that in a period of fifteen years there have only been two prosecutions. Why, in the last four or five years, when the onrush of communism has become apparent everywhere in the world, when its activities within our own nation have been intensified—and all I am doing is asking for information—under those circumstances, the Minister of Justice hides behind the smokescreen he has created in order to explain why the law, strong as he says it is, has not been enforced. I feel, sir, that the law as it stands, if carried out, would bring results. I do not come before this house to prove untrue to the things in which I have always believed. I agree with the members of the government in so far as the outlawing of communism is concerned. Experience has proven that method to be unsuccessful where it has been tried—in Russia, Czechoslovakia, Italy and Switzerland. It was tried in Russia for seventeen years; communism was outlawed in Czechoslovakia, and in Italy for seventeen years under Mussolini. In Switzerland, it was outlawed for a period of several years. Outlawry is now to be tried in Australia. I believe the time has come in this country when the people are asking for action.

I think the time has come to try inlawry in this country in so far as those who would undermine by force are concerned. Where there are overt acts, where there are outspoken words, where there is, on the part of those who undermine, a declaration that they intend to destroy our system of government by force, surely the time has come, not for evasion on the part of a government, not for grandiloquent speeches on the evils of communism, but for a declaration of the intention of the government to enforce the law. We have had too much experience under the present Minister of Justice with laws not being enforced when he, under the direction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), felt that the law should not be enforced. The attorney general of this country has the responsibility of carrying out the law. The minister quoted from the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen that the transition from section 98 to section 133, in effect, still left the onus upon those who openly speak in favour of overt acts against the state. Then, sir, I suggest this to the minister. If what he says is correct, that the law is sufficient, then let him translate the effect of that declaration into action. Certainly if the law is sufficient it is being enforced in a way that no communist has anything to fear. Law on the statute books is only as strong, and only as powerful, as the will of the Minister of Justice to enforce it. He and the Prime Minister say the law is sufficient. I say enforce it; if not, bring it up to date.

Utilize and enforce the law as it is, and assure the people of Canada that our country shall not be undermined by those who have nothing to fear from the traps of prosecution, to which the Prime Minister referred. Declarations have their place. Laws are important on the statute books. When communists can go throughout our country advocating the undermining of our country by force, carrying newspapers with them to the same effect, I think the time has come to start enforcing the law—under law and not outside the law, to the end that wrongdoers will find they will be given an opportunity in this country, loving the iron curtain as they do, to be behind iron bars when they overtly break the law.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes of the time of the house to say how we view the amendment that is now before us. But before I do, I should like to make a few comments on the general subject of the discussion. During the debate, and I think it has been a worth-while one, a good many things have been said about communism. No one has yet described this evil thing, which is loathesome to me, in terms that are too strong to suit us. We despise it. We have fought communism out into the open ever since we were an organization. Some of us have fought communism since shortly after the first great war when communistic cells began to spring up like mushrooms in all the countries of the world.

We think that communism could have been destroyed in the shell in 1917, but perfidious men were responsible for nourishing it and spreading it from its infancy. That, however, is not the subject of discussion. We have kept the spotlight on communism ever since, in every single way that we could. In the early days of our organization we used to think that our efforts were somewhat in vain because we did not get much response; but now we rejoice to think that so many Canadians have become aroused to the dangers inherent in communism and the threat that it offers to the security of our country and the individuals who compose it.

For quite a number of years we have realized that communism is a way of thinking, a state of mind. Because that is so, it is quite obvious to me at any rate that it is something that cannot be banned by an act of parliament or by the proclamation of any officer of government. It is only when that state of mind is translated into action which may be a threat to the security of the nation that we can get at it through process of law.

By a good many speakers in this debate it has been said that communism has declined in Canada. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made that statement, as well as others I have heard. Perhaps that is so. I suppose the actual number of registered communists in Canada may have declined; it may be considerably smaller than it was a few years ago. But let me point out, Mr. Speaker, that it is not so much those who are registered as communists who constitute the danger to our security. The greater threat comes from fellow travellers and sympathizers. There may be a good many of them in our country, many more than some people suspect. That proved to be the situation in the United States, and I do not think that the United States is much different from Canada.

I have in my hand a report that appeared in the Citizen of Wednesday, May 3, under dateline New York and under the headline "Only 55,000 Reds but 500,000 'Travellers' in U.S." This is a report of a speech given by director J. Edgar Hoover of the Federal Bureau of Investigation when he spoke before some organization down in the United States. He said this:

> . . . the United States has only about 55,000 communist party members, but their real strength lies in 500,000 fellow-travellers and sympathizers ready to do their bidding.
> Hoover made his estimate of the number of card-carrying members of the country's force of traitorous communists and of their sympathizers, at a masonic gathering last night.
> Hoover's estimate of the communist party membership was in line with recent reports that the party had dwindled since the war from a previously estimated 75,000 or 100,000.

He said the subversives are a real danger to the U.S.—despite their relatively small numerical strength—and he predicted that their influence will be destroyed.

Let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Hoover's last declaration, that they will be destroyed, is a statement of fact.

What are we to do about subversive organizations and forces in Canada? We have in this country other subversives than communists. I have wondered a good deal just what we should do. I cannot say in full or in explicit terms what should be done to protect our country against these subversive forces. I would not attempt to outline a comprehensive formula or program, but I believe that I have some ideas which, if applied, would certainly go far toward lessening the dangers.

I think that perhaps the first and most important thing for us to do in this country, at least to start with, is to get an understanding of some things. There is no use in trying to fight a force that we do not understand. There is no use in trying to do things about this whole dangerous situation unless we have a thorough understanding of the soil in which communism and other subversive doctrines thrive.

I think that one of the conditions which provide food for communism is this. Any time you find widespread throughout a country or amongst a people a callous disregard for human life and suffering, that state of mind provides food for communism. During the war every country that was involved trained its young men to take a human life with as little compunction as if they were swatting a fly. They trained them into that state of mind. Hence, when the war closed, in practically every country over the earth there was a callous disregard for human life and for human suffering. Both sides in the struggle so trained their young men, so that one was no worse than the other. I say, therefore, in such circumstances, how could there help but develop a disregard for suffering and a decline in the value which is placed upon human life?

Let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, that years of training into that state of mind does not sublimate in one year or in five years. It takes a long and careful process of unlearning, followed by a good many years of education in the art of human relationships; in that art wherein high value is placed on human life and human rights; in that art wherein human souls are lifted, in the mind of man, to a dignity and respect much higher than we have ever known before. It seems to me that communism, which thrives in a climate of callous disregard for life and human suffering, would decline in a new atmosphere in which human beings are valued highly.

One way to eradicate communism therefore would be for our people to emphasize in their educational systems that a very high value must be placed upon healthy, happy, free and vibrant human beings, no matter what their colour, their race or their creed may be. If we are to do this then our whole approach to Canadian living must be permeated through and through with spiritual leaven. I was agreeably pleased and surprised to hear so many participants in this debate refer to the necessity of a return to the things of the spirit. Communism is Godless materialism rampant. We Canadians, I think, ought to take stock. Our idea might be just as materialistic as the one we are fighting; and I am convinced that it is not possible to launch an offensive against communism and these other subversive doctrines that can win in a cold war unless we dispel the fog and the delusion under which we seem to have fallen.

I think that envisioned, at least in the wording of the amendment that is before us, is the expression of that delusion. No anti-program will ever turn the marxists in any country. That ought to be clear. A positive overriding ideology, encompassing the full play of spiritual forces, will turn them. I have seen it. I wish I had time to tell you of some of the observations that I was privileged to make in Germany where an organization called—I think it could be more correctly called a movement—"Moral rearmament" worked amongst the miners and the steel workers, many of whom were communists, fascists and nazis. I personally witnessed some of these people coming to a realization that they had been following a Godless materialism, and when they approached their whole problem of living with a spiritual outlook they began to find a new vibrancy and satisfaction in living, and they turned from communism and joined in a movement and tried to influence their fellow communists to discover the art of satisfied living.

I am in agreement with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he says that one of our major tasks now is to make democracy work as it ought to work in the interest of individuals. If democracy is rehabilitated, strengthened and made to work as it ought to work, then I am satisfied that communism will not be a serious threat to our peace and our security. Mr. Speaker, never forget this: Strengthening democracy must include the provision of satisfactory and workable cushions for our economy against a depression. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if it has ever occurred to hon. members to ask themselves what would happen throughout the democracies of the world if Stalin suddenly should declare a reversal of his policy of recent years. If he should say to the people of the world: "Look, we have not wanted to conduct an imperialistic cold war; what we want is peace, and we will enter into a pact of peace for fifteen years". Well, of course at first we would not believe him, because thus far we have found no truth in him or in any of his following; so we might not take his word for granted to start with; but after a while we probably would.

A prominent Progressive Conservative posed that very question in a small group where I found myself just a few days ago. The smartest thing that Stalin could do today would be to declare that he and his country were seeking peace, and if he were to reverse his policy and enter into pacts of peace for a period of say fifteen or twenty years. Why do I say that? Because it would throw the democracies into a tailspin. The minute that they have to take care of the production of their countries without drawing off the cream of it for war purposes, how long do you suppose it would take them to get into a depression? Do not forget that Stalin is long-headed, and he knows that. Stalin and his Russians are going to take the action that will be best designed to spread Russian communism over the whole world. Let us do some thinking about it.

What would we do if we did not have to spend the $400 million or $500 million that we are now spending in preparation for war? If we are to meet this threat, Mr. Speaker, and really make democracy work, as the Prime Minister says it must be made to work, then we have to seek ways of expanding production for use and not destruction.

Second, we have to seek ways of closing the gap between the gross national production and the national income of our people so that they can buy and use the goods we produce. And third, we have got to seek fair trading and peaceful co-operation with all the nations of the earth, and help them out, as far as we possibly can, out of the abundance of our production.

Communists, that is, the trained agents of Moscow, want depression in the democracies because they know that their cause will grow best in the soil of unemployment, of want and of misery. Mr. Speaker, while speaking of a depression and unemployment, let us not overlook this fact, that as unemployment spreads in any country the first people to take action against it are the communist organizers. Let us not overlook that, and if we want to make communists in Canada, the best way to do it is to disregard these young men who, even if it is seasonal, are forced out of work by unemployment.

Just over a week ago I had an experience which I value very highly. I was invited by an organization called "The Canadian convention of unemployed workers" to go down and address them. I made as much inquiry as I could about them, and I found that some of the names were communist. But that did not deter me, for this reason: I wanted to see for myself exactly what their techniques were, and also see just exactly who appeared. So I went down. Unfortunately I was the only one from parliament who did go. I am not blaming hon. members; I can understand why those who were invited did not go. But I will tell you this, that when I went into that hall on Bank street south I saw a picture I shall not soon forget.

Scattered around the hall were small tables. Seated around those tables in threes and fours were young men—very young, in the main—and old men who, in the main, were quite old. But scattered among them were these smoothies who had probably been trained in Moscow, down to the finest technique of a magician. They were treating these young men and girls, and the older men, to coffee, cokes and hot dogs. In other words, they were catering to the comforts of the inner man, and posing as the friends of these young people.

It is much easier to think of a man as your friend if he is helping you to fill your stomach —especially if that stomach has not been accustomed to being filled. It is much easier to think a man is your friend if he sits down to chat with you and to give you a word of encouragement; even if they are lies, the young fellow does not know.

Because I went early I was privileged to watch the procedure for about forty minutes, with the result that I got a pretty good eyeful before I was asked to speak. I heard the organizer of this gang read to them for their approval the submission they were going to make on behalf of the unemployed in Canada to the Prime Minister of Canada. I hold a copy of it in my hand, and at that time I marked it so that I would be able to turn quickly to those things I wanted to say when I was given the chance to speak.

Finally I was called to the platform, and I spoke to them. I knew these were innocent young fellows, worthy Canadians perhaps, who had just been sucked into this thing by these trained operators. To those young men I said, "Are you interested in placing your case before the authorities?" They said that of course they were. Then I said, "All right; I can assure you that there are a great many people in Canada who are in sympathy with the problems you face; but you could not have undertaken a procedure better designed to get your case thrown out than the procedure you are now following." I then turned to their brief and pointed out how intemperate the language was, and how it was designed to arouse and to inflame, rather than to convince.

All the time these young people were listening, the fellows at the table were furious. Had it not been for the fact that these young people were there and were sympathetic to what I was saying, I might have been conked on the head and dragged out. However, that did not bother me, because I say these young men and women who are caught in the toils of these communist agitators and organizers are worth saving; and the only way they can be saved is to get the truth to them. That is why I say: any time we are invited to speak to these people, for heaven's sake let us go and speak to them and tell them the truth, no matter how many people there may be who disagree with us.

We must watch what is going on among the unemployed. In the years to come the most obvious manifestation of communism and communist activities will be found among those unfortunate ones in our population who have no work, and who have not incomes sufficient to meet their needs. It appears that the communists in our country have failed to take over Canadian labour unions. They tried hard enough. But, having failed in that direction, I am satisfied that the communists are turning their attentions to the unemployed. They have made it one of their major tasks to organize the jobless from coast to coast, and to inflame them and make them sympathizers and fellow travellers. Well, we know how to take care of that situation. I hope to God, Mr. Speaker, that we will have the courage to do what we know is right. We must see to it that these fellows, these smoothies, do not have a chance to organize very many.

I have not mentioned by any means all the things we should do, nor do I intend to. But may I add just this word in closing, that we must exercise the utmost vigilance. I do not need to repeat to the members of the House of Commons that vigilance has always been and always will be the price of freedom. Communism and these other subversive doctrines are designed to take away men's freedom, and to enslave them. For that reason every Canadian must be alerted to vigilance of the kind we have never exercised in our lives before.

I believe I am speaking what is in the minds of the people of Canada generally when I say that the people want the utmost vigilance on the part of those who are entrusted with government, and those who are entrusted with the application of the law. I say the people of Canada are demanding the most vigorous and yet—let me emphasize this—the most just prosecution of any seditious or overt actions which might threaten the security of our people, no matter from what direction those overt acts may come, whether it be communists or fascists or anybody else. We cannot just single out the communists, because perhaps there are others who are just as bad.

The Canadian people are demanding that those who are responsible for conducting the government of this country shall prosecute with vigour and yet with the utmost justice any act that is seditious or designed to render insecure our state or our country or any of its people. But I think the amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is not worded so as to state that purpose. As a matter of fact I had quite a hard time to figure out what it did mean. I think, though, the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition has served a useful purpose. It has certainly alerted parliament to the dangers of communism, subversive doctrines and other organizations which may be plotting to overthrow the state. I believe further that it has alerted the Canadian people to a greater degree than at any time since I have been a member of the House of Commons.

I believe it is good occasionally to arouse our people to the dangers that lurk unnoticed among us. So I compliment the leader of the opposition upon having moved his amendment. However, now that it has served its purpose, and because the wording is indefinite and does not state specifically what it wants done, I suggest that the house give the leader of the opposition authority to withdraw his amendment so that we may get on with other business.

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I agree with those who have said that it is well that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) should try to focus public opinion in Canada on the evils of communism. For that reason I think we have not misspent the few hours that have been occupied in discussing this matter. I have followed the debate fairly well. I am not going to suggest whether or not the laws of Canada are sufficient to deal with this menace that has been over our heads for the past fifteen or twenty years. I am going to suggest some things that might be done to allay the ravages of communism in Canada. I practised law in a town in Cape Breton many years ago. In 1915 certain frustrated young men organized something like a Fabian society. Before the first war ended there became the head of that organization a gentleman who I think introduced the tenets of communism in our part of the country.

Time went on, and eventually he was taken before the courts for having in his possession seditious literature which had been used to teach the young people and many of the older people of the town about the great thing that communism was. That man was sent to the penitentiary for two years for sedition. The purpose accomplished was that the school in which this literature was being used was disbanded. At that time I happened to be a member of the House of Commons, and a petition was presented to the house to obtain a ticket of leave for this man. I was one of those who went to the then minister of justice and suggested to him that he should grant the prayer of the petition and give this man a ticket of leave. I think that was a good thing because up till that time his role was that of a martyr to a glorious cause.

In my younger days when I went to college we had, in the third year of our undergraduate studies, a professor who gave us a course of eighteen lectures on communism as a philosophy. It is too bad that other institutions of learning in Canada have not followed that example. At that time communism of course was not looked on as a world-wide scheme of domination, or anything of that kind. I well remember our grey-haired professor suggesting to his class that the day was coming when this force of communism, which had not then spread to Russia, would in the end attempt to dominate the world. A few years later, when I had earned sufficient money to go to Dalhousie law school, I came in contact with another splendid professor there who was professor of international law. I do not know if there are any others in the house who went to Dalhousie university in those days. Dr. Weldon taught us international law, and one of the points he always dealt with was the danger of communism in international relations.

Coming back to the town where I practised law, Glace Bay, communism was fairly common there. Many of those who were interested in the movement were not really communists. They just thought they were communists. They did not understand the doctrine of communism. If the hundreds of them who joined the movement had known what communism actually was they would no more have gone to these meetings where communism was taught than they would have gone to a leper asylum.

The same college in which I was taught the evils of communism undertook a program in the mining and steel working districts of Cape Breton. They organized at their own cost what was known as an adult education program. They organized clubs, generally in the industrial centres, to deal with adult education. Organization was carried on from the economic standpoint in order to teach the old and the young something about economics, and how to help themselves by the co-operative movement. Those two things were joined together. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that movement did more to remove communism from that area, to the extent that it is removed, than all the criminal statutes and laws that can be put on the statute books of Canada, whether or not they can be enforced.

My own idea is that there should be a new religious crusade in Canada. All religious denominations should co-operate to carry on such a crusade as to awaken the minds and the hearts of the people to the evil influences of communism, not as an economic force at all but as an anti-Christian force. The great and small universities of Canada should also co-operate. Unfortunately, if reports are true, I am afraid that many of our universities are following a course of economy. I believe that there should be co-operation between local governments and the dominion government so far as universities are concerned. I believe that universities should be forced to organize and co-operate in this regard instead of having a situation where certain professors say: Oh, that is all right, and they allow their students to have communistic political meetings and so on.

Since the debate on this matter commenced I have had a conversation with a well-meaning man who has some ideas about communism. Of course he is not a member of the house. He said to me that it is turning back the hands of the clock not to let communists or anybody else have freedom of speech in Canada, a free press and everything else. He said, "Look what they are doing in England". I do not understand the expression "turning back the hand of the clock" as he does. I do not think the hands of the clock should be turned back so far as the matter of time is concerned. Neither do I think the hands of the clock should be turned back so far as eternal truths and verities are concerned. It is often pointed out that England is doing this and England is doing that. England took good care to turn back the hands of the clock so far as freedom was concerned when they cut off the head of Charles I. They turned back the hands of the clock in another sense when they did away with capital punishment for the theft of a loaf of bread. I do not want the hands of the clock turned back in that sense, but neither do I want the hands of the clock to remain as they were either in England or in this country.

We are all proud of the glorious institutions that came from the old land. We are all proud of the constitution that was given us by Great Britain. We are all proud of the just laws that came to this country from England. But I for one, Mr. Speaker, as a Canadian citizen am not content to maintain here the freedom they have in the old land as far as communism is concerned. I do not believe it is the right of any Canadian citizen to put forth the tenets of communism in any public place, through the newspapers or otherwise. If those tenets are properly understood I believe that is a criminal offence today.

I am not going to participate in the discussion as to whether this amendment is proper or whether we have sufficient legislation already. As I said before, I believe this discussion will serve a good purpose, and I believe the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is to be congratulated on having brought this subject forward so that the people may focus their attention upon this evil thing. I understand this is not the first time the hon. gentleman has had something to say about communism. I believe that some years ago some articles appeared in Maclean's magazine coming from the pen of the leader of the opposition, which should have brought to the people of this country an awareness that I am afraid many of us do not have even yet of conditions in Russia and of the forces of communism. I tried to get copies of those articles the other day, but could not.

A moment ago I mentioned a crusade. That crusade should not be conducted in the manner of the old crusades, with iron blades and swords; it should be conducted with the keen blades of logic and Christian ethics. But I have one other suggestion to make. When I was on the bench of Nova Scotia I was faced one morning with a habeas corpus proceeding in connection with seventeen men who were being returned from western Canada to their former homes overseas. No objection was taken to the actual proceedings, that is to the face of the papers. The application was for habeas corpus and certiorari in aid; and they took the ground that the persons who were being returned to their own countries had done nothing in Canada and there was no reason why they should be sent away, since they had been brought here as immigrants, and so on. I thought it well to give the Royal Canadian Mounted Police an opportunity to show what these people had been doing in this country, and there came to the witness stand a member of that force of whom many no doubt have heard. He had spent some time in the communist organizations in western Canada, while still a member of the R.C.M.P. but unknown to the members of those organizations. On that occasion he outlined to the court practically the whole communist organization, and proved that most of the men for whom habeas corpus was being sought had been connected with those organizations.

I needed no further evidence; though the case went to the Supreme Court of Canada, those men were sent overseas. I am going to suggest to the Department of Justice and the government that every known communist in this country who is not a Canadian citizen be sent back to the countries where communism is rampant. That could be done by co-operation between the Department of Justice and the immigration department. This is the only reason why the other day I thought I should take part in this debate. I do not want to make this a personal matter in connection with the case I am bringing to the attention of the government, but I would not be at all surprised if the people connected with some of those newspapers mentioned by the leader of the opposition the other day were communists, and not Canadian citizens, and this would be one way of dealing with this matter.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take much time because I think practically everything has been said that can be said. I believe the leader of the Social Credit movement (Mr. Low) put his finger on the main problem in his discussion of the matter. Lip service is not going to cure the trouble; neither can it be cured by legalistic means.

I would not have risen at all but for the fact that the last speaker provoked me into doing so. He cited a case in his own community in 1915 as proof that you cannot handle a problem of this kind by regular legal means; and that is my reason for taking part in this discussion. I disagree completely with the hon. member's statement that at that time a group of frustrated young men formed the Fabian society. I would remind the hon. member that his former leader, Right Hon. Mackenzie King, was a member of the Fabian society at one time. It was a non-political organization formed to study the economic problems of the country and work for reform within their respective communities. I would also remind the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that the late Gordon Harrington, who became Conservative premier of Nova Scotia, was also a member of that society.

The hon. member also referred to James B. McLaughlin, who later on went over to the communist party, and said that he was arrested because he was found with seditious literature. That statement was incorrect. I happened to be there at the time and know the facts. I went through that struggle, and I believe the hon. gentleman was a member of the house at that time. In that case the miners came out on a sympathy strike with the steelworkers. The international president of the mine workers expelled the executive board, and the statement that McLaughlin was taken up for was this: When it came to a matter of law versus the hunger of women and children, so far as he was concerned he was on the side of the hungry. If you will recall, at that time there were some four or five hundred thugs on horses who indiscriminately rode down women and children in a subway—

Mr. Carroll: May I ask the hon. gentleman to what year he is referring?

Mr. Gillis: I am referring to 1921 and 1923.

Mr. Carroll: I may tell him that I had occasion to look over the literature that was found in Mr. McLaughlin's possession.

Mr. Gillis: But that was not why he was picked up. The reason the miners entered that struggle—I was a miner and McLaughlin was the secretary-treasurer of the organization—was that four or five hundred thugs on horses indiscriminately rode down the women and children who were coming from church. It was because of a statement McLaughlin made in connection with that incident that he was arrested and sentenced to five years in Dorchester penitentiary.

I want to bring to the hon. member's attention that, during the course of the trial, Attorney General O'Hearn admitted that perhaps the case was not quite in order. He said that there was a time when it was a crime to tell the truth, and that was when it might inflame the people. I just wanted to set the record straight on that question. The Fabian society was not a body of frustrated young men. I knew many of them personally, and I always considered them the leaders in the community. As I said before, this business of attempting to suppress communism by legalistic means is practically impossible.

I should like to ask my legal friends in the house this question. Suppose the government took the stand that it was going to outlaw communism in this country, I do not suppose there is anyone in this house, or in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who could prove that anyone was a communist. It would be necessary to prove that he was a member of the organization. Every communist of any importance in this country today is instructed not to carry a card, or any means of identifying himself with the party. If Tim Buck were arrested tomorrow, and were made to stand trial as being a member of the communist party, how could his membership in the party be proven? It cannot be done. In my opinion, there is no way of combating communism except in the manner suggested by the leader of the Social Credit party. There are 400,000 unemployed in this country. Every one of those boys is a potential communist. Unless ways and means are devised of giving them something to do, or of maintaining them while they are unemployed, we shall not find the answer to communism. If that is not done the organizers and the "smoothies" to whom the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) referred can convert these men to their doctrine. These men will not say they are living in a democratic country, or that they have freedom, when they have not the right to work and the right to live as decent citizens. They are fertile soil for communist propaganda. This problem of unemployment must be solved.

Yesterday I suggested to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that the unemployment insurance supplementary benefits be extended for a month. The minister said that unemployment is decreasing. It is not decreasing, and the department's figures show that it is not. There are no greater employment opportunities today than there were a month ago. If the problem is allowed to continue in that way, then we are handing over that body of men to the communist party. The causes of unemployment have to be removed. Another problem is the refusal of employers in this country to permit trade union organizations. In the gold mining industry in the north, the employer stands with a stick over the head of the worker denying him the right to organize and enjoy collective bargaining. Today our greatest instrument against communism is the trade union movement. In both congresses they are fighting the communists; they are throwing them out and placing them in a position where they cannot do their work. Still the employer refuses his employees their democratic right in industry, which would permit them to take their place in these congresses and carry on the fight against communism in that way.

I do not want to delay the house, Mr. Speaker. The member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and three of our group have spoken. I agree with practically everything that has been said by them, and I merely entered the debate because the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll) provoked my thoughts on a point about which I do not believe he was quite accurate.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I shall be quite brief, Mr. Speaker. I intend what I say to be aimed at bringing this matter down to a point of reality. I am not going to enter into any discussion as to whether or not the statutes which we have today are sufficient. I have had considerable experience with this crime called sedition, and have on occasion had some part in finding quite a number of persons guilty of that crime. I am sorry that in this debate there has arisen any suggestion as to the division of responsibility, or a passing of responsibility from one set of authorities to another.

I say that for this reason. Sedition, under the old section 98 or any new legislation which may be proposed and passed, necessarily has to do with the security of the state, and the security of our form of government, from which necessarily flows the freedom and security of our way of life. I do not think it is sufficient for anyone to say this is not the business of the dominion. The enforcement of the law and the Criminal Code rests with the provinces, but that has not been so in many instances where the government itself has felt that action was necessary. For example, I know personally that counsel are engaged and paid for by the dominion government in prosecuting cases under the Combines Investigation Act, or under those sections of the code which to my mind roughly do the same thing as the act itself. That was done because our way of doing business was threatened, because competition had been stifled. Under those circumstances, the dominion government—I am not saying a political word—as an entity has gone into the courts and taken charge of prosecutions of that kind.

Some time ago I referred to the royal commission, or the spy trials, as they are called. The dominion government, and more power to them, had no hesitation in taking two judges from our supreme court bench, in retaining the best available counsel, or in retaining the whole structure of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on that investigation, and subsequently accepted responsibility and directed those prosecutions. What for? For the very same purpose that we are talking about now. A great many fancy expressions are used which are really meaningless, Mr. Speaker. For more years than I can remember, I had been told of the great danger of driving communism underground. Physically, of course, that is impossible. From a mental standpoint or from the activity standpoint, I was much interested in what was said by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) a moment ago, to the effect that if you arrested Tim Buck today you would have difficulty in proving that he was a communist because, although you have his many admissions, you have not a recent one. What is that but being underground? Let us stop this nonsense of filling ourselves full of fear of driving something underground when it is underground now, just as far underground as it can possibly get.

Where do I go from there? What inference do I think may be fairly drawn from the many things said here, one or two of which I have said myself? I think every member of the House of Commons must make up his mind on one thing first. Is this thing here? Is it a menace? May this cold war lead to a fighting war? Do we believe that it may? I do, and I have no hesitation in saying so. That being so, personal safety and the preservation of one's life is certainly still nature's first law. As I am one of those who believe that all we read of the cold war is a matter of gaining time for some other kind of war, and as I believe the great idea of Moscow is to dominate this continent, I am proud to be one of those who will say: "I will do everything I can—and I will not have great regard for the niceties of phrasing—to fight that thing which in time may attack my children and my grandchildren." That is my view of what is going on at the present time. And I am not pleased—let me put it that way—with some of the niceties that we have been debating.

Let us just take a look at what appears in tonight's Journal. I will not read this in extenso, Mr. Speaker, but I do not know how many have seen it. The heading is "Red Dean Predicts Red World" and the article reads in part as follows:

> Soviet might and manpower will smash the western democracies if war comes, Rev. Dr. Hewlett Johnson, the Red Dean of Canterbury, this morning told the Journal. He is a self-avowed communist.
> The Red Dean said further:
> 1. War was imminent.
> 2. The democracies didn't have a chance of surviving, "not a dog's chance."

Mr. Sinnott: Put him in the clink.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That goes on for two columns. It should be read by everyone in this house. I think it is about time that that hairy old goat was either put in jail or put in his favourite spot. I am going to mention names. I say the same thing about this man Endicott whose father was put up at my own home many times years ago when attending a Methodist conference. But to think that we are going to sit back—complacently, if you like—and permit that sort of thing to go on without taking advantage of what law we have is a mistake; and if we have not got enough, let us get a law to take care of blackguardism like that.

Any man in Canada, be he a Canadian or not, who recognizes and believes in some authority greater than that in his own country, I would certainly put in jail or put back in his favourite spot; and God rest his soul after that if these Russians ever got hold of him. We have got to put teeth in our law. I know that is an old expression. But as members of the House of Commons, let us make up our minds on this question: Is this thing real? That man quotes Stalin again and again in this interview as to what he thinks of it. He does not think war is imminent but it is inevitable. If it be true—and I am perhaps stupid enough to think that it is—that this cold war is a stalling for time for the shooting war that this beast of Moscow is going to let loose on this world when it suits him, he will have his Red Deans and his Endicotts commanding the fifth column legions right here in the Dominion of Canada.

No, Mr. Speaker, we cannot just sit back. We cannot just say, "This will wear itself out; it will wash away with the purity of our motives. It will wash away because we are going to grubstake them, we are going to sleep them and so on." That is nonsense. This is a bitter force being prepared to be unleashed upon us. We have done the best we can in the league of nations. Everywhere we have done the best we can, giving away and giving away; and at the same time giving away innocent souls in Europe and in Asia. So far as I am concerned, this is my reaction—and I think we would be all in agreement—on reading stuff like this, and as to believing it as coming from a man of God. Perhaps I should apologize for having used that expression; perhaps I should say from a man who assumes to be a man of God. In an interview the other day Endicott told our own Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) that Pearson goes on making war in his own way. Surely there is some pride left in us. Surely we do not need to take that. Surely we should put these rabble-rousing cutthroats where they belong—and that is in jail—or send them to some other country which, let me pray God, may be a long distance from here.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment. Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

Mr. Coldwell: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the amendment will please say "yea".

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say "nay".

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. Before putting the question on the main motion may I say that several times during this session members have entered the chamber after the question has been put and have voted, not having heard the question. I thought I should bring the rule to the attention of the house because the irregularity was brought to my attention a few minutes ago when a division was being recorded.

I did not interfere at that time because it is set forth in the rule that a point of order raised during a division should be settled after the division has been completed. That provision is found in citation 94 of Beauchesne's third edition. I would also remind hon. members of citation 89 in the same edition which reads as follows:

When the question is put, a member must be in his seat or else his vote cannot be recorded.

I would also remind hon. members of standing order 12(2) which states:

When Mr. Speaker is putting a question, no member shall walk out of or across the house, or make any noise or disturbance.

I bring these citations and the standing order to the attention of hon. members, trusting that in future they will be observed when a division is being taken.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, either as a matter of privilege or on a point of order let me say that, in view of the rule, I think there ought to be a bell in this building loud enough so that I can hear it in my office.

Mr. Speaker: I shall bring the representation of the minister to the attention of the Sergeant-at-Arms. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Selkirk.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, the purpose was just to call three items, which would be put off until nine o'clock. The intention of the government is to answer the questions concerning mail service to certain people in the country. We have been endeavouring for two weeks to get to that statement. If the hon. member had no objection, we would like to call those items.

Mr. Bryce: I have been waiting for two weeks to raise this question. It is too big to bring up on a question of privilege, and I have to straighten out this matter, for the benefit of the western farmers. I will be only about ten minutes.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY

The house resumed, from Monday, May 8, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company—Mr. Maybank—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes that I was speaking on the bill last night I had referred to the provisions of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act passed in 1907 and still the law governing the exportation of gas or other power from Canada. I had read the two sections directly affecting this discussion, sections 5 and 6, just before adjournment last night. I had pointed out that under those sections no person or corporation may construct any pipe line which has as its purpose the export of power, electricity or any fluid, without a licence granted by the government of Canada. It is in relation to that very clear provision of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act that I should like to read briefly from the statement of the Prime Minister on Friday, May 5, as reported at page 2228 of Hansard.

These are his words:

Parliament last year determined that this matter would be one to be turned over to the board of transport commissioners; and for the government to attempt to usurp the functions of the board of transport commissioners would be contempt of the will of parliament expressed in the Pipe Lines Act.

Further, on page 2229 the Prime Minister said:

By that statute parliament placed jurisdiction and responsibility for considering the whole question upon the board of transport commissioners.

[Mr. Winkler.]

I can only conclude that the Prime Minister was speaking without adequate consideration, because the words I have quoted are directly contrary to the actual situation. The bill passed last year, under which the present bills are brought before parliament to incorporate pipe line companies, did not by any stretch of the imagination place the whole jurisdiction and responsibility in the hands of the board of transport commissioners. That has been very definitely decided outside this parliament since that act was passed so hastily, with so little information and so little understanding of its effects, when it came before this house last spring. As hon. members who were present at that time will recall, and as hon. members who have been listening to this extended debate for some time, some of them very impatiently, will remember, one of the companies that received incorporation by statute was the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company. That company sought authority from the board of transport commissioners to construct a pipe line which among other things would have provided for the export of gas and oil. On September 12 of last year the board gave its judgment on that application, and I wish to read into the record the latter part of that judgment, which has a bearing on any clear understanding of what is the actual relationship of the board of transport commissioners to this whole question of final authority over the routing of the line and the export of gas and oil. The judgment states:

It will be necessary for the Interprovincial Company to have from the governor in council a licence to construct a pipe line which will carry the oil outside Canada and (2) that it will be necessary for the Imperial Oil Company to have a licence for the export of oil.

The acting deputy minister of the Department of Trade and Commerce was represented at the hearing by the assistant deputy minister of that department, and he indicated positively to the board that the Department of Trade and Commerce favourably considered the proposed pipe line and furnished the necessary recommendations. Here are Mr. Master's words:

"Mr. Chairman, I wish to state now definitely that any application that is required for the export from the Department of Trade and Commerce will be issued by the department—any permit that is required—and that the department favours the project in accordance with the applications. I wish to make that a positive and definite statement.

The Chief Commissioner: Have you any comments, Mr. Coyne, with respect to that assurance?

Mr. Coyne: No.

The Chief Commissioner: I suppose that covers the licence to construct to the border, the two licences?

Mr. Master: Yes, both."

This board therefore approves the application and a formal order to that effect (the said line to be completed on or before the 31st day of October, 1951) will issue as soon as certified copies of said licences have been filed with the board's secretary.

That judgment was perfectly clear. The board of transport commissioners have no authority to approve or otherwise where export is involved until, under section 6 of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, the government has granted an appropriate licence and approved the project. With that judgment of September 12 before them the government dealt with this subject on September 13, the following day. This is a certified true copy of the minutes of that meeting of the committee of the privy council:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report from the Minister of Trade and Commerce representing:

That under the provisions of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, revised statutes of Canada, 1927, chapter 54, no person shall, without a licence, construct or place in position any line of wire or other conductor for the exportation of power, or any pipe line or other like contrivance for the exportation of fluid;

That an application has been received from Interprovincial Pipe Line Company of Edmonton, Alberta, to construct a pipe line for the export of crude oil to connect at the border of Canada and the United States of America at or near Gretna, Manitoba, with a pipe line to be constructed in the United States;

That, in the opinion of the minister, the construction of the pipe line by Interprovincial Pipe Line Company is in the national interests of Canada.

The committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, advise that under the provisions of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, a licence, in accordance with the form attached hereto, to construct a pipe line to connect at the border of Canada and the United States of America at or near Gretna, Manitoba, with a pipe line to be constructed in the United States, be granted to Interprovincial Pipe Line Company of Edmonton, Alberta, accordingly.

Having regard to the statement by the Prime Minister on Friday last that it would be contempt of the will of parliament if the government sought to exercise some control over this matter, let me read the licence that was issued by the deputy minister of trade and commerce in accordance with that decision:

Pursuant to order in council—of the—day of—

I am simply placing the form on record.

—Interprovincial Pipe Line Company, carrying on business in the city of Edmonton in the province of Alberta, is hereby licensed to construct a pipe line for the exportation of crude oil, the said line to connect at the boundary of Canada and the United States of America at or near Gretna, Manitoba, with a pipe line to be constructed in the United States—

These are the words I wish to emphasize.

—as shown on a plan filed with the Department of Trade and Commerce on September 10, 1949. This licence covers the construction of one pipe line with an inside diameter of pipes of approximately 17$\frac{1}{16}$ inches . . .

Then it goes on with various details as to the type of pipe line, the location, and as to this line being carried through Saskatchewan and Manitoba to Superior, Wisconsin. The point I should like to make, and that I should like to impress upon the members of this house, is that before the board of transport commissioners was in a position to consider the exercise of its authority the government had before it a plan showing where the line was to go, and it was the government that approved the actual route and location of the pipe line. They issued that certificate and recommendation upon which the board of transport commissioners acted. For that reason, it is quite clear from the record of the proceedings in the case of the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company, which obtained its authority under the very act to which the Prime Minister was referring, that it is the executive of this parliament which has the real authority to say where a pipe line will go, and under what terms it will be constructed, where any question of export arises.

It was only after these steps had been taken that the board of transport commissioners finally acted on this matter. It was on Thursday, September 15, 1949, that they issued the following order. I shall quote the body of that order dated September 15, 1949, and I do so because this completes the actual transaction which gave the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company the authority to proceed.

Upon hearing the application at the sittings of the board held in Ottawa, September 8 and 12, 1949, in the presence of counsel and representatives for the applicant, the province of Alberta, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the city of Port Arthur and the board of trade of Fort William, . . .

It is ordered that leave be, and it is hereby, granted to the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company to construct a pipe line for the transportation of oil from a point in the vicinity of the city of Regina, in the province of Saskatchewan, to a point in the vicinity of the village of Gretna, in the province of Manitoba; the said pipe line to be constructed and completed on or before October 31, 1951.

That order was signed by Mr. Archibald, chief commissioner of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada.

In the event that there be any suggestion that this procedure related only to the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company, I would point out that exactly the same procedure was followed when the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited made application to the board of transport commissioners. On September 21 the board announced that it could not deal with the application on the ground that permission to export would be required from the federal authorities if the pipe line were to be built, in view of the fact that export was an incident of the running of this pipe line. Therefore we have this as an established practice. We know that these applicants in each case contemplate the export of gas or oil, or both, no matter what arrangement may be made for the construction of a pipe line within Canada and the use of that gas and oil, or both, in Canada. That leaves in the hands of the government the ultimate responsibility for the actual decision, although in the sequence of time the last order which is made is the order made by the board of transport commissioners. But as has been decided in the case of the Interprovincial Pipe Line, which did ultimately receive authority to construct its pipe line, and as in the case of the Westcoast Transmission, which did not receive authority, the board of transport commissioners made it clear beyond any shadow of a doubt that the government must exercise its judgment under section 6 of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act.

In view of the repeated suggestions which have been made, first of all by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and other ministers when this bill was in second reading, that we should just let it go through second reading and trust to the committee, which denied the full information when it did get there, and now that it has passed there the Prime Minister tells us we should let it go to the board of transport commissioners because they are the ones who can deal with it, it is interesting to go back to see how different an opinion was held on earlier occasions by another prime minister of this government. This subject of the effect of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act was under consideration in this house on March 10, 1938. At that time the then prime minister of Canada had introduced a bill, which was Bill No. 21 of that session, and which was approved by the House of Commons on March 25, 1938. That bill was passed for the purpose of bringing the control of export in detail before the parliament of Canada. Actually, that bill did not come into effect. It did not pass the Senate. I might explain that it was not one of those rare occasions when the Senate has exercised authority of this kind, but the bill did not proceed because of a letter received from Mr. Cordell Hull, then secretary of state for the United States. This letter informed the government of Canada that, with circumstances as they were at that particular time, it was not the intention of the government of the United States to press for the export of power to that country. There were reasons which were obvious in relation to the date of the bill itself why both countries needed all the available electric power they had.

It is interesting to read the views expressed by the prime minister of those days, whose opinions have been acclaimed on many occasions by those who are now so openly making this, in effect, a government bill. Mr. King is reported at page 1196 of the Hansard of that session to have read into the record a quotation from the Ottawa Citizen; and the Ottawa Citizen of May 5, 1925, to which he referred had this heading which is very significant in the light of the discussion that has taken place here. This was the heading: "Places Interest of Canada First on Power Issue". Then the Citizen of May 5, 1925, quoted by Mr. King in 1938, had this to say:

> Premier King Says This Chief Consideration in Reaching Decision on Export Question.
> Deputation Urges Carillon Scheme.
> Prime Minister Says It's National Problem.
> Cabinet to Discuss It.
> That the future of Canada would be the first consideration in the question of permitting the export of electrical energy to United States was stated by the Prime Minister yesterday afternoon in replying to a large and representative delegation from the the municipalities bordering on the Ottawa river. The delegates came to urge the administration to grant permission to export power from the proposed development at Carillon . . .
> The Prime Minister replied that the problem which the government had to consider was not local to the Ottawa valley, but had its national, international, and interprovincial viewpoints. The government had only one desire, namely, to further the public interest. When private interest could be helped without injuring the public interest, it was desirable to help it also.
> The main question for the government was to decide for the public interest, and in the export of power it was necessary to see that the future of the country was not prejudiced in any way.

It surely is significant and interesting, Mr. Speaker, that the prime minister who preceded the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) expressed an opinion which was condensed into these words: "Places interest of Canada first on power issue". That is exactly the view that has been stressed in the discussion that has taken place here since these bills originally came before the house. From the very first day that these bills were given consideration it has been made clear that the only purpose of the debate and of the extension of that debate is to continue to urge that, before these bills are passed, there should be written into the bills, or that there shall be a clear and unequivocal undertaking by the government in relation to its exercise of power under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, that the interests of Canada will first be served, that it will be a Canadian route and that Canadian requirements will be protected for all time in the future before we commit ourselves to an export of power which becomes a vested interest outside Canada which cannot lightly be withdrawn at any future date.

A great deal of concern has been expressed about the possibility that if there is delay gas and oil may go into the northwest American states from other Canadian sources. We in this parliament represent not only the communities from which we are elected. Collectively, we represent Canada as well; and collectively our interest should at all times be related to that broad concept of the nation which we seek to serve. But let us remember that while we most certainly want to see the legitimate export of oil and gas from Alberta which is consistent with their long-term advantage in that province, we should be much less concerned with the danger of someone else supplying gas in the northwestern United States than we are with the danger of the future requirements of a growing Canada not being met at some time in the distant future.

One of the points to which I referred, and which should be clearly understood in this discussion, is that if we start exporting power it is not like selling so many bushels of wheat, so many tons of coal or so many feet of lumber. When we start to export gas, then communities set up their public services related to the quantity which they receive; and any withdrawal of that gas affects those communities in a manner which could seriously reflect upon our good faith if at some future time we found ourselves forced to withhold from our friendly neighbours that gas which was the basis not only of the building of homes and the provision of services but of the construction of industries which may employ thousands of men. It is in that sense that I speak of it as a vested interest. I do not use the word in any improper manner, in so far as the purpose is concerned. It is an interest which becomes so deeply vested in the users of that gas that we would almost be in the position of being called upon to restrain our own use before we withheld that use from a neighbour to whom we had assured that supply.

In all these discussions we should have before us figures which leave no doubt that any conceivable demand of Canada twenty-five years from now or fifty years from now can be met from our available resources; because power, whether it be electricity, gas or oil, is the most basic and the most fundamental of all raw materials that we possess. We may withdraw nickel, copper or iron from the soil. We may refine it and send it in bulk to the United States, to the United Kingdom or to any other country in the world; and we have received the money for what we have produced. It would be a good thing, of course, if we manufactured the finished product in its final form, in every case. But as to power, we are not only exporting a commodity, something that comes from the soil; we are exporting the thing which in turn produces products of other kinds. We are exporting the power with which the wheels of industry can be turned and with which the great chemical plants can reduce the coal, the salts and the other resources into the finished products which today have their value in every part of the world. If there is one raw material which we should handle with the utmost care, which we should make sure is going to be preserved for Canadian use first of all and to whatever limit we can use it in an expanding economy, it is power, whether it be electricity, oil or gas.

Since the government must make the decision, since the government must pass on a plan, since the government must have a map, must know what is going to be done both in location and in quantity before the board of transport commissioners can deal with this at all, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that before this house is called upon to vote on bills of this kind the government should take the house into its confidence and fully disclose to us what its plans are, and what responsibility it is going to assume. Anything else is an evasion of that relationship and responsibility to the house about which the house should exercise its own authority no matter to what party any member belongs.

The government is only the executive of this house, and the executive owes it to the members from whom it draws its authority, the members whose confidence it must command, and whose confidence it should be able to command without any mere party adherence, to give to them, and particularly to those who habitually support it, that information which makes them more than rubber stamps in an important case of this kind.

We have been told on a number of occasions that the government itself is greatly anxious to see that hon. members are able to express their opinions; that they should not be denied the opportunity to express their opinions. But hon. members were denied an opportunity to get the information to which they were entitled when this bill was before the committee a short time ago, and hon. members are not being given an opportunity now to express their opinions with any of the knowledge that gives a discussion that exercise of judgment which it should be possible for hon. members to exercise before they give parliamentary authority to these bills.

It is very interesting how personal some of the ministers seem to feel about these bills, which every now and then they claim to be strictly private bills. As will have been noticed from the proceedings that I have read, the authority of the government was exercised, as it is to be exercised if it is exercised at all, on the recommendations of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Today's Vancouver Sun announces the arrival of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and contains a very interesting headline, which I quote:

Minister recommends unusual source for official information.

Under that heading which suggests that the official information was to be sought in other than strictly formal channels—

Mr. Knowles: Is this where they usually get their information?

Mr. Drew: In view of the occupation of the hon. member who has just spoken on other occasions I would not speak as an expert in this instance. The Vancouver Sun goes on in its afternoon issue with this report:

Federal cabinet minister C. D. Howe, queried Monday night in regard to his stand on the natural gas pipe line to British Columbia, curtly told Vancouver newspaperman to "Go to hell."

Mr. St. Laurent: Is that the unusual source?

Mr. Drew: That appears under the headline to which I have referred. I continue:

The angry retort came five minutes after the Canadian trade and commerce minister disembarked from a T.C.A. North Star at Vancouver international airport.

An hon. Member: A North Star?

Mr. Drew: Yes, a North Star; probably that is why he was so angry. I continue with the quotation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Apparently he lost his temper.

Mr. Drew: I continue:

"Don't talk to me any more" he added, as he turned his back on the newspapermen and walked away.

Reporters stepped up and asked Mr. Howe if he would like to grant an interview then or wait until morning.

"No, it's all right", he said. "What would you like to know?"

"What is your stand on the pipe line to British Columbia, Mr. Howe?" a reporter asked.

Immediately Mr. Howe's face darkened.

"Go to hell," he said. "Don't talk to me any more. We've talked enough about that back east."

Mr. Knowles: Obviously he lost his temper; did he lose his reputation, too?

Mr. Drew: That is the end of the quotation. I do not know whether he meant "pipe lines", or the location to which he referred when he said: "We have talked enough about that back east"; but, Mr. Chairman, this is more than a rather simple and forceful exposition of the manner in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce deals so briefly sometimes with the problems of the day. This is the way in which the minister who must assume ultimate responsibility in this matter—subject to the approval of the government, which he usually obtains, as the Minister of Justice knows—deals with those people in British Columbia who are so greatly concerned about the location of this pipe line.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it was an unusual place to suggest that the information should be obtained; but the fact is that if anyone here has access to that particular locality it will be the first place anybody has got any real information from, because we have not got it here. I do not know whether the government is waiting for the information to come from that source or not; but most certainly if the government have the information they are not taking the house into their confidence; nor are they taking the people into their confidence, whose interest is the final interest of this parliament and of its executive who serve them with the conveyance of full knowledge to those for whom they act.

An hon. Member: That is not where they told you to go, is it?

Mr. Drew: It is extremely interesting to find that even when the Minister of Trade and Commerce does suggest to hon. members who so slavishly follow him that he knows where to get the information, they are not prepared to follow his advice.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): There are three prizes for dumbness, and the hon. member who interrupted gets them all.

Mr. Drew: These bills deal not merely with the construction of pipe lines, not with just the transmission of gas and oil; they deal with power, from which there could be tremendous development in this country.

When I hear the concern which has been expressed in the house at certain times by those who seem to think they have gained some information from some source other than that mentioned by Mr. Howe, then we find that their concern seems to relate to the fact that we may have a great deal of this power here in Canada.

That same concern was expressed when the new hydroelectric development started in British Columbia. That same concern was expressed when the hydroelectric development was started in Ontario. That same concern was expressed when the great electrical development took place in the province of Quebec, which has the greatest reserves of electrical energy in Canada. And in every single case what appeared to be unconsumable surpluses have been fully absorbed in the expanding productive capacity of that country.

If the electric energy produced right across this country—in the maritime provinces, and in Quebec, and in Ontario, and in Manitoba and in the prairie provinces, and British Columbia—had been exported to the United States under long-term contracts, we would have found ourselves in a position where we could not easily have withdrawn that power; and we also would have found ourselves in a position where the enormous industries based upon that power would not have been constructed here.

One of the reasons why this country became one of the greatest armourers of the last war was that we had this power available, and because skilled industry had grown up upon the use of that power, with the realization that further power would be available in the years ahead.

Now we are dealing with another type of power, but a type of power which, if it is properly conserved, can be just as important to the future of this country as electricity has been in the past and is in the present. The possibilities in Alberta and British Columbia challenge the imagination of every Canadian who realizes what the possibilities are. If all the oil and gas available in Alberta alone were used for industrial and chemical production here in Canada, always with the hope that there will be gas and oil in Saskatchewan and Manitoba as well, millions of Canadians would find new employment in the years ahead. And upon the basis of that power alone there could be a new population of several millions of people in that part of western Canada.

The figures I am using are in no way an exaggeration. Perhaps it would be well for us to remember that both Ontario and Quebec have more than doubled their population since they started the development of their electrical energy. And what has happened there on the basis of that type of power can happen in Alberta and British Columbia as well. And in many ways there are advantages and opportunities which were not available at that time in Ontario and Quebec. In Alberta and in Manitoba are some of the greatest deposits of coal in the world. This coal is of extremely high b.t.u. content, although of a sufficiently friable type that in many cases they are regarded as unsuitable for shipment over long distances. I am not saying that that is so; but I do say that that opinion is held in many cases.

But those coals are of the type that can be used for liquefaction and for conversion into all the many chemical and synthetic products which have already been developed in Europe, and were particularly developed in Germany in the years before the war. And if we want one place where our expenditures in research foundations and in research generally in Canada can find new uses for our resources and new uses for this power, then it is in the application of the discoveries that had already been made in Germany several years ago, and the utilization of our vast coal resources along with this power that is available.

Then, there are minerals, there are clays and there are salts, all of which are waiting to be developed by energetic people, with power of this kind available for industries that can be built. But if we are going to have the kind of industries that can be built, then the thing we have to assure is that there will be not only the basic requirement of power but also an enormous reserve for the future.

If people are going to come in and spend $50 million, $75 million or $100 million on plants—and when I use figures of that kind I am using them with knowledge of investigations that are being conducted right now for the possible use of those resources in that area—if investments of that kind are going to be made, then the thing they have to be sure of is that as their production develops and new chemical processes emerge from research which, in every case, call for a higher use of power—whatever that power may be—then they must be able to plan 25 or 50 years or more ahead to know that through all that time, and longer, there will always be a surplus of power of that same kind available to them.

Then, in dealing with a subject of this kind, and on that scale, I believe members of this House of Commons, and particularly those on the government side, should say to our executive, to the government, "You have the authority; the board of transport commissioners has no authority or power—"

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Drew: "—to settle policy."

SUPPLY

FEED GRAIN—PROFITS BY DEALERS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) for committee of supply.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, as I said before six o'clock, I wish to discuss a matter of great importance to the western farmer, the eastern farmer and feeder, and myself. Two weeks ago, while speaking in the budget debate, I referred to the profit being made by dealers in feed grains in the eastern provinces. Evidently my remarks have been misunderstood, because I have clippings here from the Winnipeg Tribune and the Winnipeg Free Press, and many other papers, commenting on what I said.

The report in the Winnipeg Tribune is much shorter, and is a statement by Mr. Stanley Jones, president of the Winnipeg grain exchange. This newspaper report, which I shall read, is headed "Jones Denies Speculator Hike on Feed Grains." The article goes on to say:

Stanley Jones, president of Winnipeg grain exchange, said Tuesday it is "completely wrong" to blame speculators on the exchange for the high price of feed grain in Ontario.

His statement was issued in reply to a speech in the House of Commons Monday by William Bryce (C.C.F.—Selkirk). Mr. Bryce said there was a difference of $240 a carload last week in the western selling and eastern buying prices for oats. He blamed "speculation."

Mr. Jones said $240 a car is about 12 cents a bushel, and "apparently Mr. Bryce would have it appear that speculators profited to this extent. No. 1 feed oats were quoted by dealers at Toronto last week, on April 18, at $63.14 per ton or $1.07⅜ per bushel, basis delivered most Ontario points. This price is after deduction of freight subsidy rebate of $6 per ton or about 10⅛ cents per bushel. All shippers must buy their supplies from the wheat board, and purchases were made on the Winnipeg grain exchange on that date at 99½ cents per bushel in store Fort William. The net cost of delivering to most Ontario points, including balance of freight and loading costs, is 7¼ cents per bushel. This, added to the purchase price of 99½ cents, makes a total cost of $1.06¾—leaving a possible profit of ⅝ cents per bushel, or $12.50 per 2,000 bushel car—not $240 as stated by Mr. Bryce. Mr. Bryce should retract his statement since it has no foundation in fact."

I do not need to read the Winnipeg Free Press report as it is similar to that of the Tribune with the exception that it is attributed to the grain trade and not to Mr. Jones. Let me read what I said at page 1813 of Hansard so that I will not be misunderstood any more. I said:

If you compare the amount the western farmer receives for his oats, about $32.35 a ton at the elevator, and the $76 a ton the hon. member says farmers in his constituency are paying, there is a big difference. To my way of thinking the difference is much too great. I agree that the eastern farmer is paying too much, but I am sure the hon. member will agree that the western producer is not receiving too much. The situation is much the same with respect to barley; but let us deal for a moment with oats, which at last week's prices would cost approximately $59 a ton at Fort William. The freight to points in the vicinity of Montreal or Ottawa would be an additional $2.40. Loading would cost $1.50. Bags would have to be provided, but since they can be used several times, an allowance of $2 per ton for bags should be sufficient. This would give a total of $63.72 per ton at any point in my hon. friend's constituency. Taking the figure at an even $64, when my hon. friend pays $76 the difference is $12 a ton or $480 on a forty-ton car of oats. It would be a good thing if the eastern farmer would check into this and see if someone is not charging more than the traffic should have to bear. On Friday of last week I checked Ottawa prices, and found that wheat, in bags to the farmer, was $74 a ton, oats were $70 and barley was $69. I also checked the Montreal figures and found that wheat was $71, oats $70 and barley $69.

Taking oats again as an example, the price at both Montreal and Ottawa was $70, which leaves a profit of $6 per ton for the handling of a ton of grain. In other words, on a forty-ton car there would be an allowance of $240 for handling 800 bags of oats, which seems a good profit. I have known dealers in the west who were satisfied to handle oats at 10 cents a bag, and make money. Fluctuations in the market will also cause the dealer to charge the highest price in order to safeguard himself, but if we had steady set prices he could certainly cut down on his margin of profit.

On page 1815 I said:

I started out, Mr. Speaker, to try to show our eastern farmers and feeders that we farmers in the west are not charging them too much for our feed grains. The price is fair and reasonable. I have shown that there is a margin of $240 per car on Montreal and Ottawa prices. Surely grain could be handled more cheaply than that. If the dealers cannot do better than that, I suggest to them that they should set up a co-operative and get service at cost; then if you pay too much for your feed, you will get it back in patronage dividends. That is the solution to the problem; get your co-operative to handle your feed.

In concluding, I want to assure hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this debate on this subject of feed grain prices that the western producer is anxious to have the eastern trade, but he does not like to be accused of charging too much for his grain when that is not the case; and I hope I have proved to them that the producers are not getting too much. Even if the west again increases her hog production, there will always be in the west more feed grains than we can use. We realize that the eastern market is our best outlet for our feed grains, and we do not want to lose it.

At no place have I been discussing speculators' profits. I have been dealing with dealers' profits in eastern Canada. I said that oats to the dealers were costing $63.72. Mr. Jones said oats were $63.14. Therefore there is only 58 cents between his price and my price. His price is cheaper than mine and allows the dealer still more profit. When giving the figures in the house I gave the approximate figure of $59 a ton at Fort William. The freight paid by the dealer, $2.40, and the loading commission, et cetera, would cost $1.50, and then there would be about $2 for bags, making an approximate price of $64 per ton. The grain trade, however, has supplied the actual figures which have been published in the Free Press. They are as follows:

No. 1 Feed Oats, April 18

	$ per bushel	$ per short ton
Canadian wheat board lakehead sale price	.99½	58.529
Profit made on sale to eastern feeder	.00⅝	.3677
Total lakehead price to eastern feeder	1.00⅛	58.897
Elevator charges	.02⅞	1.691
Broker's commission	.00¼	.147
Net freight charges	.0408	2.40
Total price (most Ontario points)	1.07⅜	63.135

Mr. Jones ends his statement by saying:

Mr. Bryce should retract his statement since it has no foundation in fact.

I have nothing to retract, Mr. Speaker. It is unfortunate that Mr. Jones made his statement before he read mine in Hansard, or he would never have made the statement to the paper that he did. When I spoke before I only rose to defend the western farmer. When I heard hon. gentlemen complaining about high prices paid for feed grain, when I heard them blaming the western producer for charging too much, I made inquiries and found that oats were selling at $70 per ton in Ottawa and Montreal. If you take either Mr. Jones' figures or mine, there is still $6 between what the dealer pays and the price at which he sells. If you take a forty-ton car of oats at $6 per ton, you have a profit of $240; you cannot get away from that. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Gour) quoted a figure at $76 a ton. This would give the dealer $480 for handling a forty-ton car of grain. I said the dealers were taking a greater profit than they should and the western producer was being blamed for the high prices. If there is to be any retraction, Mr. Speaker, I think it should be by Mr. Jones, since no doubt he jumped to the conclusion that, if I were speaking on grain prices, judging from my past record I would be damning the grain speculators on the Winnipeg grain exchange.

When I spoke I only rose to defend the western farmer and show that I thought the dealer was charging too much for the services rendered. I still think $6 per ton or $240 per car is too great a profit, and it is not the fault of the western producer. I made the suggestion previously that the government should conduct an inquiry into the profits of feed dealers. The government is paying this money in subsidizing freight rates to help the eastern farmer and feeder so he may compete in the world's markets with his pork, poultry, cheese and eggs, and it should be the duty of the government to see that those it is planning to help are not exploited by unscrupulous dealers.

The Winnipeg Free Press came back with another editorial in which they were quite fair to me. They said:

Mr. Bryce strongly repudiated any imputation that he was suggesting western farmers should take less for their oats; his remarks were quite the contrary. He also pointed out that the government freight subsidy on oats meant that the eastern dealers never paid more than $2.40 a ton freight east of Fort William, regardless of where they were landed.

The same editorial contained the solution suggested by the grain trade:

Trade reaction to Mr. Bryce's charges of profiteering by feed dealers retailing to Ontario and Quebec farmers was this:

If the eastern consumer feels he is paying too much for feed grains to the private dealer, he has an obvious recourse—the open market for coarse grains. He can either arrange purchase himself and look after details of shipment, or a broker would be eager to handle the transaction for him at a charge of approximately one-half cent per bushel.

I can assure hon. members that this is not the solution to the problem. We have had that system too long. The system we have now may not be perfect, but it is much better than anything we had before, and I hope we do not go back to the old method.

I want to mention one more thing before I conclude. I have in my hand a clipping from the Stonewall Argus of May 3, 1950. This is a column under the title "The world of wheat" by H. G. L. Strange, and the article is headed "Growing Discontent". It concludes in this way:

The whole matter is becoming complicated by the dissatisfaction of eastern feeders who complain about the high prices they have to pay for coarse grains. Mr. William Bryce, member of parliament, recently asked the government to set up a board to investigate the whole matter of the purchase and sale of western grains.

Nowhere did I ask the government to set up a board to investigate the whole matter of the purchase and sale of western grains. What I did say appears at page 1815 of Hansard:

Perhaps the best thing to do is to have the government check the eastern prices. They are paying $6 to $23.80 per ton subsidy at different points to enable the feeder to get grain at his local point at a reasonable price in order to compete in the production of hogs, poultry and cheese. I am sure that all western farmers will support the eastern farmers in a demand for an inquiry into eastern feed prices. It would clear the air and expose anyone who is taking more profit than he deserves for the services he renders in the feed situation.

I hope I have made clear to hon. members my object in rising this evening. To the grain exchange people I would say not to jump to conclusions before reading what I really did say.

WINNIPEG POSTAL EMPLOYEES—CIVIC HOLIDAY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, there is a matter on which I wish to say a few words. It may seem to some to be a small grievance, but it is the kind of grievance that is most annoying to the people who suffer its consequences. The matter about which I wish to say just a word is set out very clearly in certain answers to questions I placed on the order paper, those questions and answers appearing on page 837 of Hansard for March 16, 1950. They relate to the observance of civic holiday, as far as the postal employees in the city of Winnipeg are concerned.

It so happened that in 1948, for the first time in recent years at any rate, the employees of the post office in Winnipeg were given the day off with pay. They dared to believe that at long last they were being put on the same basis as the employees of the post office here in Ottawa, who for a number of years have had civic holiday as a holiday with pay. But lo and behold, when civic holiday came along in August of 1949, these post office employees in Winnipeg were denied the holiday with pay. Some were given leave to take the day off and although their pay cheques for that month were not decreased as a result, they were made to pay back what they received for that holiday from the overtime they accumulated during the Christmas rush.

On taking up this matter with the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) by correspondence I received an interesting reply, to the effect that the Postmaster General had found it necessary to deny that holiday with pay to those employees in Winnipeg last August by virtue of a directive from the Secretary of State. That led me to ask these questions which appeared on Hansard for March 16, and the answers make it clear that in 1946, 1947, 1948 and 1949 the employees of the post office in Ottawa were given civic holiday as a holiday with pay. Those same answers make it clear that in Winnipeg they did not get it in 1946 or 1947; as I have already pointed out, they got it in 1948 and they thought that at last the discrimination against them was ended, but in 1949 they were again denied that holiday with pay.

It seemed very clear from the answers the Postmaster General had to give to my questions that this was a matter of discrimination. It is not the most important matter one could raise in this house; just at the moment the people of Winnipeg are not worrying about holidays, because they are literally in a state of siege and working very hard against the flood waters of the Red river; but it is one of those things that are very annoying.

One of my questions on March 16 looked to the future, and was in these terms:

Have any steps been taken to eliminate discrimination in this matter?

The answer to that question was:

The question is under consideration by the government, and a definite decision will be made prior to the observance of civic holiday next summer.

I have two requests to make in connection with this matter, and the reason I felt it necessary to raise this before Your Honour leaves the chair, although we are going to deal with post office matters when we get into the committee of supply, is the fact that it has been made clear that the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Lapointe) is going to deal almost exclusively with this question of the denial of the use of the mails to certain people. The two points that I have raised before by letter, without yet getting satisfaction, and the two that I now repeat, are quite simple: In the first place, I feel that these employees are justified in asking that the situation of last August be rectified, and that they be compensated for the day that they were forced to work last August, in lieu of not receiving the holiday as did their fellow post office employees in the city of Ottawa. The same request applies in the case of those who had the day off but had to make up for it at Christmas.

The other request is in terms of the future. I urge the government to make a decision soon, and to announce it as early as possible, as to what the policy will be with respect to civic holiday this year, and in future years. Surely, if it is possible to grant the civic holiday as a holiday with pay to post office employees, and other civil service employees, here in the city of Ottawa, and I think it should be, it is only fair that the same holiday with pay should be granted in other cities where civic holiday is declared for that city as a whole. I dare to believe from the answer that was given to me that that consideration may result in favourable action so far as the future is concerned. I hope so, and I hope the announcement will be made soon. But I want to say to the Acting Postmaster General and through him to the Postmaster General that the employees concerned will not be satisfied unless there is also a rectification of the discrimination against them in connection with civic holiday last August.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, the matter of the protection of the mails from being used for schemes devised or intended to deceive the public is one of considerable importance. From one standpoint it affects certain rights of individual brokers, and of course no government wishes to deal unfairly with them. From another standpoint it affects the efficient workings of a free society; for I submit, sir, it is important to a free society that the integrity of its methods in raising risk capital for the development of its natural resources should be protected from any corruption by fraud.

Not only the Roman law but every civilized law that has yet appeared in history has set forth a conception of property as being a natural right, and not a mere concession of the state. That being so, one of the most important functions of the law is to promote diffusion of property. Such diffusion is one of the most effective bulwarks of free society. The law, therefore, should be used for the protection of the small investor, who on the one hand can ill afford to lose his capital, but on the other, because he usually lacks both the breadth of investment experience and expert advice, is so often fair game for the unscrupulous.

Moreover, another aspect of this matter is that the unsurpassed reputation of Canada throughout the world for honesty and fair dealing, which has been so dearly purchased by us through long years of honourable conduct on the part of Canadian citizens, should not be besmirched or impaired by a few people for selfish and dishonest reasons. Therefore, when the member for Eglinton raised the question in the house as to the propriety and the validity of the postal regulation which had been made by the Postmaster General, he raised a matter which is a serious one, and which deserves careful and serious consideration.

Unfortunately at that time, as I then indicated to the house, the general counsel for the Broker Dealers Association had just written a letter to me dealing with these postal regulations, and which I had not had the opportunity to consider. The suggestion was made that on the next occasion on which we went into committee of supply a careful examination of the remarks both of the leader of the opposition and of the member for Eglinton, but more especially of the considered representations in writing of the general counsel for the Broker Dealers Association, would be placed before the members. I think that, because the statement made by Mr. McTague in the form of a letter addressed to me as the Minister of Justice is a considered, careful statement of the whole position of the broker dealers, and on that account is perhaps a little more thorough than mere extemporaneous efforts could be, the fair way to deal with these representations and to lay this matter before the members is to read the first points which Mr. McTague makes in this letter, and then read the reply to the first point, and so on. In that way we could dispose of the matter. Then I would hope that, if time permitted, I might deal finally with some of the observations made by the leader of the opposition and the member for Eglinton.

The letter from Mr. McTague is dated 220 Bay street, Toronto, April 26, 1950. The first point has had fairly lengthy treatment, and he starts it in this way:

> As counsel for the Broker Dealers Association of Ontario and acting only in that capacity and not for any individuals concerned, I wish to put before you certain submissions with respect to the action of the Post Office Department stopping the mails to people in, or remotely associated with, the security business here in Toronto.
>
> In the first place, my submission is that under the rule of law, to which we lawyers continually pay lip service, the procedure followed in the Post Office Department is totally without justification.
> The powers of the post office generally in so far as they appear to be relevant to the matter alleged to be involved here are, I think, to be found in the Post Office Act, section 7 (d), permitting the making of regulations—

He sets out the whole section, but I shall just refer to those matters which are relevant to the subject under discussion.

> —regulations "for marking on the covering of letters, circulars or other mailable matters suspected to concern illegal lotteries, etc. . . or concerning schemes devised or intended to deceive or defraud the public, for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences, whether such letters, circulars or other mailable matter are addressed to or received by mail from places within or without Canada, a warning that they are suspected to be of a fraudulent character, and for returning such letters, circulars and other mailable matter to the senders".

In other words, Mr. Chairman, that is the statutory authority for two regulations, Nos.

204 and 206, which Mr. McTague proceeds to set out in his letter in another paragraph commencing as follows:

The relevant regulations pursuant to section 7 (d) appear to be 204 and 206, reading as follows:

I shall not bother to read No. 204 in full, although I hope with the approval of members that Mr. McTague's letter to me of April 17, 1950, might be published in Hansard, as an appendix, along with my reply to Mr. McTague dated May 2.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Has the Minister of Justice the unanimous consent of the committee to put on Hansard as an appendix the letters to which he has referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of letters, see appendix, pages 2347-49.)

Mr. Garson: Regulation 206 reads as follows:

The Postmaster General has power, under the statute, to mark or cause to be marked upon the covers of letters, circulars, or other mail matter suspected to concern schemes devised or intended to deceive or defraud the public for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences, whether such letters, circulars or other mail matter are addressed to or received by mail from places within or without Canada, "suspected to be of a fraudulent character", and to return such letters, circulars or other mail matter to the senders.

I might interject again that the so-called orders complained of here consist of actions taken to mark these mail matters and return them to the senders under this regulation 204 passed pursuant to section 7 (d) of the act.

Mr. Fleming: You mean regulation 206.

Mr. Garson: Yes, regulation 206. My hon. friend is quite right. Then Hon. Mr. McTague goes on:

I think you will agree that it is trite law that the regulations cannot be extended beyond the authority given in the statute to make them. For the purpose of my submission to you I am not arguing that these regulations go beyond the statutory authority for them, but I do submit as strongly as I can that the deputy Postmaster General has gone far beyond what is provided for in the regulations or the statute in the most arbitrary way.

Without any warning whatever, and on the strength of representations made by the United States Post Office Department at the behest of the United States Securities and Exchange Commission and entirely ex parte, without the persons suspected having an opportunity to be heard, the mails have not only been arbitrarily cut off, but have been required to be forwarded to Ottawa where they are held for an indefinite period without any commitment or statement of intention to prefer any charges in the courts. Not only that, but in separate hearings of aggrieved persons before the deputy Postmaster General, their mail has been released upon the exaction of undertakings that they will not further deal in specified securities, or that they will agree to modify the language and terms of circulars sent in the future. The whole procedure is in substance a conviction by the deputy Postmaster General without a hearing, punishment by cutting off the mails and the exaction of undertakings as a condition on which the penalty will be suspended.

If there is anything in the Post Office Act justifying such procedure, I am unable to locate it. In addition to that, I cannot conceive of any government putting forward legislation to justify such action by way of amendment to the Post Office Act, and I cannot conceive of any parliament enacting such legislation if it were put forward.

That is Hon. Mr. McTague's first point upon behalf of his client. The answer to this point is as follows:

I have your letter of April 17 with reference to the action of the post office in stopping the mails of certain brokers. You are acting as counsel for the Broker Dealers Association and not on behalf of any of the persons against whom the "stop" order was directed.

I have inquired as to what took place. The order, which was made with the approval of the Postmaster General and therefore may be regarded as made by him, was to the effect that all mails addressed to or coming from the above (persons named) are to be intercepted and sent specially by first mail to the administration branch, Ottawa. It was stated that this action was being taken as a result of evidence received indicating that the mails were being used for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences. I am informed that contrary to what you state in your letter the order was not made at the behest of the United States Securities and Exchange Commission.

The action was taken under the authority of paragraph (d) of section 7 of the Post Office Act which authorizes the Postmaster General to make regulations "for marking on the covering of letters, circulars or other mailable matter suspected to concern" . . .

Then I go on and repeat the provisions of that subsection, and I indicate that "the mailable matter is marked 'nontransmissible' instead of with a warning that it was suspected to be "of a fraudulent character". I continue:

This marking was regarded as less injurious. The matter is returned to the sender.

My information is that each of the brokers named in the order was engaged in the sale of the securities of a single company. The "stop" order was made only after a careful examination was made by experienced officials of the literature which these brokers were circulating, making claims which were so extravagant and untrue as to raise a reasonable suspicion in the mind of the Postmaster General that they related to schemes intended to deceive or defraud the public, for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes, surely.

Mr. Fleming: He refers to experienced officials. Were those officials of the Post Office Department or officials of the justice department?

Mr. Garson: They were not of the justice department.

Mr. Fleming: There was no reference in that matter to the justice department for an opinion as to whether there might be any question of deceit?

Mr. Garson: No. That is quite right. Then my letter to Mr. McTague goes on:

I cannot discover any illegality in this procedure. The statute calls on the Postmaster General to refuse the use of the mails to persons whom he reasonably suspects of using the post office facilities to defraud the public. The only question is whether the Postmaster General had reasonable grounds for his suspicion. From the facts when they are disclosed I think you will have to agree that the Postmaster General did have good grounds for his suspicion.

And at the conclusion of my remarks tonight the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Lapointe) will give some of those grounds in certain cases to members of the committee in order that they may judge as to whether there were any reasonable grounds for suspicion.

The second point which Mr. McTague makes starts out in this way:

Mr. Turnbull—

That is the deputy postmaster general.

—seems to take undue comfort, in my opinion, in the Literary Publications case, I think it is, in British Columbia (58 C. C. C. 385), in giving him the right to do anything and considering that whatever he does is not reviewable by the courts. He does not seem to realize that the court in that case simply held that there was a right to exercise a discretion under the statute and the discretion having been duly and properly exercised, the courts would not review it. That case concerned an action for damages following an acquittal after a prosecution under the Criminal Code. It appears to me to be no authority for the proposition that the Post Office Department can legislate through the process of administration and in fact set up what amounts to a star chamber. I recall hearing a careful speech made by yourself on the rule of law with many references to the admonitions of Coke to King James. In this affair it is McTague humbly putting forward the same type of admonition to Turnbull through your good self as an understanding intermediary, I hope.

Mr. Drew: Who is writing this?

Mr. Garson: Mr. McTague.

Mr. Drew: To you?

Mr. Garson: Yes. He goes on:

There just cannot be two standards of fraud, one laid down by the courts and a different and private one by the Post Office Department. The Post Office Department has not, as yet, attained judicial status. It appears by its recent actions merely to assert that very untenable position.

The answer to that point is as follows:

Perhaps it should be remarked in this connection—

I say to Mr. McTague in my letter.

—that none of the brokers has seen fit to take action against the Postmaster General alleging wrongful action on his part, a remedy which the court of appeal of British Columbia held, in the case of Literary Recreations Limited v. Sauve C. C. C. page 358, to be open to a person against whom such an order has been made.

In other words, in the very case which Mr. McTague is quoting in his letter it was indicated that persons offended by a wrongful order had a right of action against the Postmaster General. My letter to Mr. McTague continues:

The next point made by you is that the post office cannot "legislate through the process of administration and in fact set up what amounts to a star chamber."

Mr. Drew: Who is saying this? Is that you?

Mr. Garson: I am saying this to Mr. McTague:

I am afraid I do not follow this contention since it appears to me that the Postmaster General was doing precisely what the statute authorized and required him to do.

Mr. McTague's third point is this, and I quote from his letter:

As you know, I have had a rather wide experience in the security business.

And he is quite right in saying that. Mr. McTague was one of the most distinguished security commissioners that the province of Ontario ever had. He continues:

It is my opinion, and I have comparatively recently put my opinion in writing for the benefit of the United States securities and exchange commission, that no provincial legislature has power to control or regulate international or interprovincial trade in securities. While I know of no case directly dealing with securities on the proposition, it has been laid down in reference to other commodities more than once that there is no such power in the province. I make brief reference to the Natural Products Marketing Board case in British Columbia.

On this third point I replied in my letter as follows:

You point out that the province has no power to control or regulate international trade in securities. That is certainly true where the post office is the medium used for carrying on the international trade in securities. But I suggest that it follows from your statement that in this case the Postmaster General is the proper official and the only official who is legally qualified to exercise such control under section 7, subsection (d), of the Post Office Act.

The fourth point of Mr. McTague's letter is stated in these words:

The only jurisdiction which can validly enact legislation to control and regulate the sale of securities internationally and interprovincially is the Canadian parliament. If the policy of enacting such legislation is determined upon the government can readily put forward a statute and take its responsibility in that regard. If it does not care to accept such responsibility, surely it should not permit or even tolerate the setting up of a securities commission de facto, but certainly not de jure under the present act within the Post Office Department. Yet that is exactly what is being done at the present time.

My answer to this fourth point is as follows:

You contend that parliament has not set up a "securities commission de facto" within the Post Office Department. I entirely agree with this contention. The Postmaster General's job is not to operate a securities commission. The Postmaster General's duty is to see that the post office facilities are not used to defraud the public. While his efforts to this end may result in protecting investors against the purchase of fraudulent securities, this result is purely consequential and is not, primarily, his responsibility. Under the law, his statutory duty and responsibility is to maintain the efficiency and reputation of the postal services which he directs. It is for this purpose that he is empowered to stop mail which he suspects is being posted for fraudulent purposes.

Mr. McTague's fifth point is as follows:

At this time there is no law in Canada prohibiting the sale of securities in the United States by circular or otherwise. If the circular is considered to be fraudulent under the laws of Canada let prosecution be brought in the criminal courts, but let us still maintain the fundamental principle of the rule of law and once again abolish star chamber methods from which already too many innocent people have suffered greatly.

To stop the mails and ruin people in business on the evidence of circulars, telephone conversations and other gossip, which have taken place many months ago, seems to me a most extraordinary procedure.

I am forwarding a copy of this letter to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and of course also to Mr. Turnbull.

The answer to this fifth and last point, as set out in my letter to Mr. McTague, is as follows:

As to the question whether criminal proceedings should be instituted, it is not the Postmaster General's duty to prosecute persons guilty of criminal offences. I do not need to remind you that it is the attorney general of the province who enforces the criminal law. The Postmaster General's duty is to take appropriate actions where he has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the mails are being used for fraudulent purposes.

In conclusion, I think I should say that where the state operates a public utility such as the post office, a railway or a radio station there is not thereby conferred upon each citizen an absolute right to utilize the utility, but a conditional right only, the condition being that there should be no abuse. The utility must be operated strictly for the public benefit. The government officials operating the same should have at least as wide powers to protect the public against abuse as the private owners of a public utility would have to protect their patrons. In the case of the post office, parliament has seen fit, in order to protect the service against abuse, to authorize the Postmaster General to refuse the use of mails if he has reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person is making an improper and fraudulent use of them. I am informed that this provision is one of long standing having been introduced in the act by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1889; that it has been beneficially invoked hundreds of times throughout the intervening years; and that similar provisions will be found in the post office statutes of other free countries.

Notwithstanding these facts, the government is quite open-minded with regard to this section and the powers created under it. For many months before this order was made, the government had been engaged in preparing the first general revision and consolidation of the Post Office Act since 1922.

In this connection, it has been giving special attention to sections such as section 7 (d) which vest rather wide powers in the Postmaster General. We are inclined to think from the consideration which we have given this matter so far that the experience of our own post office and the post offices of other free countries over the years indicates that the power under section 7 (d) should be retained. We are also inclined to think, however, that it might perhaps be advisable that a summary appeal should be provided from the order of the Postmaster General to the courts; and that upon the hearing of this appeal the appellant should have the right to adduce any relevant evidence in addition to that upon which the Postmaster General based his order. The appellate tribunal should have power either to confirm or discharge the order of the Postmaster General. Pending the hearing and disposition of such appeal, however, the Postmaster General's order should remain in effect and should also, of course, remain in effect if confirmed by the court appealed to.

We can well understand that the organization which you represent will have well-informed views upon this subject matter and if it wishes to present a brief on any of the matters under the Post Office Act in which it has an interest, I can assure you that the government will be glad indeed to give its representations the most careful and thorough consideration.

Now, so much for the points raised in a careful and systematic manner by Mr. McTague. I might spend a little time now upon the points raised by hon. members in this house.

Dealing first of all with the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on April 15 last, as set out at page 1562 of Hansard, where he is reported as saying this:

I wish to ask the Minister of Justice whether he has given consideration to the extent to which the Post Office Department is usurping the authority and responsibilities of the Department of Justice in acting as a court by making decisions as to the guilt or otherwise of certain people using the mails of Canada.

Now, I am not too clear as to the precise point the hon. member is making in that language, but I think I can answer all possible meanings that could be given to it by making two or three simple statements of fact.

In the first place I would point out that the Postmaster General cannot in this case be usurping the authority of the Minister of Justice, since the powers which are invoked here in this case are clearly those which the act vests in the Postmaster General and not in the Minister of Justice. And therefore in using those powers, whatever he is doing he cannot possibly be usurping the functions of the Minister of Justice.

Then, secondly, I point out that neither the Department of Justice nor the Post Office Department has the authority or the responsibility to act as a court, either by making decisions as to the guilt or otherwise of certain people using the mails of Canada or, indeed, in any other way.

Thirdly, I would point out, repeating what has already been said, that in connection with the postal orders under discussion and under criticism by the opposition it is the statutory duty of the Postmaster General, pursuant to section 7(d), where he considers that there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that mail matter coming under his charge concerns a scheme intended to defraud the public and is being sent through the mails, to make these orders that are under attack.

In this connection, I do not think it can be emphasized too strongly—having regard to the reference by the leader of the opposition to courts, and to other suggestions which were made that these people should be prosecuted—it cannot be emphasized too strongly that the Postmaster General decides nothing as to the guilt or innocence of these persons. He decides only whether or not there is reasonable ground for his suspicion that the postal service is being wrongfully used. And if he suspects upon reasonable grounds that the postal service is being wrongfully used, then he has the power to make these orders which are under debate.

Suggestions have been made, notably by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), that the Postmaster General, in acting as he did, usurped—I do not know whether that is the word the hon. member used; in fact I do not think he did use that word, but his meaning was clear—that the Postmaster General in making these orders was usurping or interfering with the functions of the securities commissioner of the province. The hon. member put it this way at page 1638 of Hansard:

> We have laws to deal with such cases. We have the Criminal Code, and, as to the rights between broker and client and the measure of responsibility that those engaged in the purchase and sale of stocks owe to the public, we have in all provinces—we certainly have in Ontario—securities laws and securities officials. This case may be, and no doubt is, one for the securities commission of the province of Ontario, which has ample power to deal with brokers who are carrying on their business in violation of the law without due regard for honesty in business dealings.

Mr. Drew: Whose statement is that?

Mr. Garson: It is the statement made by the hon. member for Eglinton in this house. This statement continues:

> Therefore in my submission it is not necessary for the Post Office Department to undertake to make laws in substitution for the Criminal Code of Canada as enacted by this parliament, and in substitution for the laws of the province in relation to regulation of transactions involved in the purchase and sale of stocks and the control and regulation of the activities of those engaged in that business.

This argument, as I shall show, is quite incorrect. I have already shown that the Postmaster General has the undoubted power under the Post Office Act to make orders such as those under discussion. I submit that the exercise by the Postmaster General of such powers as those under the Post Office Act is no interference at all with the authority of the provincial securities commission. Indeed, it is the discharge of a completely separate and distinct duty.

In discharging his duties the Postmaster General is not bound by the decisions of any provincial securities commission, nor does the law permit him to abrogate his responsibilities and functions in favour of a provincial securities commission, because it is a well established fact and principle, with which I am sure the hon. member for Eglinton would be the first to agree, that in exercising discretionary power an administrative officer must make his own decision and must not accept the decision of another person. The Postmaster General of course may have recourse to the provincial securities commission or to any other reliable source for materials upon which to make up his mind; but so far as the actual making up of his mind is concerned, he must do it quite independently of any provincial commissioner or of any other source of information that he may have.

And, sir, the point upon which he has to make up his mind is not as to whether or not the dealer should be licensed, nor as to whether or not trading in a certain stock or other security should be permitted. The point which the Postmaster General must decide is the simple one of whether or not there are good grounds for suspecting that postal privileges under the Postmaster General are being abused.

The second point in this connection I should like to make is that, quite unlike the provincial securities commission, the Postmaster General is not in any way concerned about the intrinsic value of the security that is being dealt in, except in so far as that intrinsic value of the security may create in his mind a legitimate and well-founded suspicion that the mails are being used to defraud. The Postmaster General's only duty is to concern himself with false and fraudulent representations made through the mails in respect of the sale of the security.

I think I should emphasize in this connection that while the provincial securities commission—and I am sure the hon. member for Eglinton knows about this, and will agree with it—license the dealer and approve of the security, and pass upon the prospectus, the provincial securities commission does not ordinarily or necessarily pass upon or even see a great deal of the advertising and sales literature put out by the brokers. They do not necessarily know whether that sales literature is true or false, objectionable or otherwise.

Moreover, as the Hon. Mr. McTague points out in his letter, one of the great problems of any provincial securities commission—and especially in cases such as we are discussing here, which involve the sale of Canadian securities internationally, in to the United States—the great problem of a provincial securities commission in respect of such traffic is that it has, according to Mr. McTague, who should know, and who is an expert in the field, no power whatever to control or regulate international or interprovincial trade in securities. Therefore when the hon. member for Eglinton says, "We certainly have in Ontario securities laws and securities officials, and this case may be and no doubt is one for the securities commission of the province of Ontario, which has ample power to deal with brokers who are carrying on their business in violation of the law", he is making a statement that is quite incorrect. It is incorrect because most of the transactions upon the basis of which the Postmaster General made the orders which are under debate, and under criticism by my hon. friend, concern interprovincial and international trade in stocks. As to this trade—and I am sure my hon. friend will agree with me upon reflection—the provincial securities commissions do not exercise any authority for the excellent reason that they have no power to do so. Their powers are intraprovincial powers. Moreover, not only have they no power to do so but the provincial legislatures have no constitutional authority, according to Mr. McTague, to clothe provincial securities commissioners with such power.

Thus, if these powers which the Postmaster General has invoked in the present case are not used in proper cases, which we contend the present ones to be, to prevent the misuse of the mails in interprovincial and international trade in stocks, there are no provincial powers of any kind that can be invoked to prevent such misuse. Thus, far from the Postmaster General having overridden or ignored the authority of the provincial securities commissions or invaded the field of provincial rights, as seemed to be implied by the remarks made by members of the opposition, the Postmaster General has instead merely prevented the misuse of the post office, which is his responsibility. In the cases which we are considering he has done this, for the most part, in cases with which, according to the Hon. Mr. McTague, neither the provincial securities commissions nor the provincial legislatures had power to deal.

Mr. Fleming: Let us say some of the cases.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend, the Acting Postmaster General, can speak more accurately on that point than I can. I doubt, however, if there are any purely intraprovincial cases, but I am merely dealing with the law. The Acting Postmaster General will deal with the facts. I think I should add, lest there be any misunderstanding, that no one should infer from what I have just said that the Postmaster General has not power, in relation to the use of the mails for the sale of stocks wholly within any province, to make such an order as we are now discussing. He has that power also, but there is the difference that in most of the cases we are discussing he has the power to make this order in respect of trafficking in stocks internationally and interprovincially, which is beyond the jurisdiction of the provincial securities commissions.

That comprises all the legal points which arise in this connection. My hon. friend, the Acting Postmaster General, will outline the facts upon which some of these orders were based in order to give hon. members information as to whether there were reasonable grounds for the exercise of the Postmaster General's discretion.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, my colleague the Minister of Justice has set forth the legal position in this matter of fraud orders issued against certain corporations and individuals. His statement to the house clearly establishes that the Postmaster General is empowered to prevent the mails from being used for fraudulent purposes. To this power given the Postmaster General by parliament there is a corresponding duty to prevent His Majesty's mails from being used as an instrument of fraud. The intention of parliament to protect His Majesty's mails in this regard was so definite that the Postmaster General is empowered to take the necessary preventive action when he has justifiable and reasonable grounds to suspect that the mails are being used to perpetrate fraud.

Therefore, in my estimation the point at issue is: Was the Postmaster General justified in taking action as he did in the specific cases which are before us and which are being discussed tonight? If I may, Mr. Chairman, I should like to dispose immediately of the imputation that the action of the Postmaster General of Canada was taken solely at the behest of United States authorities, and was based otherwise only on a few circulars, rumours and gossip generally in the brokerage field. As the bulk of the circulars in question were addressed to citizens of the United States it was only natural that the majority of the complaints received came from United States citizens. I feel sure it will be conceded that they had a right to protest against questionable actions by Canadian citizens or by persons operating in Canada just as I am sure that the Postmaster General had not only the right but also the clear duty to take appropriate action.

I want to emphasize that we did not issue fraud orders at the behest of the United States government or of its officials. Nor did we take the word of United States authorities as to these transactions about which complaints had been received. We obtained affidavits together with circulars and other material. We went further than that. Appropriate inquiries were made, investigations were carried out and expert advice was sought. I can assure hon. members who are interested in this matter that in every case the Postmaster General had good and sufficient reasons for believing that the mails were being used for fraudulent purposes.

Mr. Drew: May I ask a question? When the Acting Postmaster General says that expert advice was sought will he indicate the nature of the expert advice to which he refers?

Mr. Lapointe: If the leader of the opposition will permit me to carry on with my statement, which is quite short, I think he will find the answer to his question. It is not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to analyse tonight every single case where prohibitory orders have been issued, but I believe it would be useful to outline some of the methods used, and to quote from some of the literature issued. I have here the case of one company dealing in oil stocks, and using the services of a broker. Circulars issued by this broker-dealer and distributed by mail included the following statements:

> This company holds leases on a quarter section in the Redwater Bruederheim area between acreage held by Imperial Oil. In addition, the company holds fifteen well sites in the Lloydminster field, which has been growing at a phenomenal rate in the past two years. Since the astounding results at Leduc, Lloydminster and Redwater—and I'm convinced that the holdings of—

This particular company.

> —hold the promise of profits and fortune such as we have often dreamed about and hope to share.

Again I quote:

> This I believe is one of the greatest chances at a fortune that has ever been offered to you. Here, I believe, is your chance to make $25 grow to $1,000 —$250 grow to $10,000. Only now are the tremendous possibilities being realized—and we are getting in at the right time.

The dealer continues:

> In my last letter I told you that the experts estimate Redwater's recoverable oil reserves at 30,000 barrels per acre. As the holdings of this company in the Redwater-Bruederheim area comprise a quarter section (160 acres) that's sufficient to drill four wells, which, assuming comparable results, would work out to a potential of 4,800,000 barrels of oil. At the current wellhead price of $2.68 per barrel, the gross money value on this basis would be $12,864,000.

Competent authorities of the government of Alberta, in which this property is situated, state that instead of this material being called literature it should be called sucker bait, as the property of this company is strictly wildcat and is unproven. The suspicion of fraud lies in the extravagant and misleading claims. Although the literature refers to the Redwater area, the company has no property in that rich field but only in the Bruederheim or Lloydminster area. To talk about the Redwater-Bruederheim area, again according to the testimony of these officials, is sheer nonsense; and the holdings of this company in the Lloydminster area hold even less than a gambler's chance of rich reward.

These again are not the statements or opinions of the Postmaster General or of his officials; they are the recorded views of responsible officials of the Alberta government. The implication that the acreage is in the Redwater field is misleading, and is suspected of being intended to deceive. The information given in these circulars and letters shipped by the broker-dealer is not in accordance with fact. These are the grounds on which, in this case, the Postmaster General reasonably believed that the mails were being used with intent to deceive and defraud.

I have another case here, Mr. Chairman, of another company selling oil stocks in Alberta, using the services of two brokerage firms. The circulars issued in regard to this company by implication endeavour to link the properties with those of producing properties in the Leduc oil field. Statements are made with the intent of making believe that the wells drilled in this area are successful, to greatly enhance the company's assets. A few of the statements made concerning the possibilities of this company are as follows:

> There appears little or no doubt that all of the sixteen wells scheduled for this quarter section will be commercial producers.
> The company has every expectation of being able to look forward within the near future to eighteen producing oil wells.
> Although No. 5 well has been delayed, it is only a few feet from No. 3 producer and there is virtually no doubt that it will be equally successful.

The large amount of proven oil reserves below each of these wells has greatly enhanced the company's asset position.

Today these shares are backed not by just a few acres of grazing land but by ten successfully drilled wells of which three are producers and the others are to be put into production as soon as possible—over ten thousand acres—fifteen square miles—of potentially rich oil leases and reservations.

Thus you can see that no longer is this company a "chance" or a speculation.

Many other similar statements could be quoted. So much for the claims; what are the facts? All the rights in one of the fields exploited by this company are rank wildcat. No wells have ever been started near this acreage. The company has drilled a few dry or duster wells in the Lloydminster area. Some of the other wells are not commercially successful. Others have produced water when pumped, are worthless and must be abandoned. The three wells which are producing are pumped; that is, the oil does not flow but has to be pumped. The broker-dealer exploits this information by giving it an improper twist in order to mislead his clients. He indicates that the pumps are to control the flow, whereas in fact such wells as this company has producing do not flow; they must be pumped to get the oil, not to control it.

Again, the foregoing are not the statements of the Postmaster General or of his officials; they are the recorded views of impartial, competent and reliable officials of the Alberta government. The Postmaster General, I think, was justified in concluding that the mails were being used with intent to deceive or to obtain money under false pretences, and in acting accordingly. There again I think the facts speak for themselves.

Another gentleman who had his licence to operate as a broker cancelled by the Ontario securities commission continued to promote his own enterprises, selling his own stock direct instead of through a broker. This is the gentleman, incidentally, who forfeited $50,000 bail in the United States. Not at all abashed by the reasons which prevented him from acting as broker, he has made a great virtue out of necessity and now proudly proclaims in his literature that he employs no brokers and therefore all the money goes to the development of the property.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the few examples I have cited are sufficient to establish the unquestionable right of the Postmaster General to conclude that the mails were being used for schemes and devices intended to deceive or defraud the public. In some cases certain individuals may have been used as fronts for the real transgressors, but the fact that they were associated with the offending concerns and allowed their names to be used in the literature made it necessary to include them in the prohibitory order.

Much has been said about the Postmaster General usurping the rights and functions of the securities commission of Ontario. I believe this point was dealt with satisfactorily by my colleague, the Minister of Justice; but, as he pointed out, with the best intentions in the world the securities commission of Ontario could not act in these cases because it lacked jurisdiction. That does not mean, however, that it has not been aware of what has been going on, and has not regretted this situation. It is interesting to note what the commission, through its chairman, had to say on this matter in a report dated February 3 of this year:

It is not necessary to labour the fact that all aspects of trading outside the province have been a grave concern over a period of years since certain promotional houses have been financially able to use the mails extensively in soliciting inquiries or subscriptions for securities.

He adds:

In my view these facts afford a glaring example of over-reaching. They further demonstrate that dealers may readily resort to tactics outside Ontario as suggested in the notice of September 6, 1949, which they would not consider employing in Ontario where chances of detection would be much greater.

Before I conclude, Mr. Chairman, there is one point I wish to touch upon, and that concerns some of the remarks made by the member for Eglinton to the effect that a statement was made by the deputy postmaster general that he did not care what the Supreme Court of Canada, or any other court, might say about the matter. In other words, that power was given to him under the act and the regulations, and h would use those powers without the slightest regard for what the courts might say. This, Mr. Chairman, is a serious accusation. I have looked carefully into the matter, and find that the alleged statement is incorrect. At no time did the deputy postmaster general say anything of the kind. He is well aware that the power under the act is given to the Postmaster General, not to the deputy postmaster general. He placed all the relevant facts before the Postmaster General, who authorized the issuance of these prohibitory orders. All that has been said on this subject by anyone connected with the Post Office Department, from the minister down, is what has been pointed out here tonight, namely, that the law gives the Postmaster General the power to act, and that his right to do so has been upheld by the court, including the supreme court of British Columbia. To twist that statement into an assertion that the deputy postmaster general does not care what the courts might say is a misrepresentation made to the hon.

gentleman, which I have no doubt he accepted in good faith, but which he repeated without too much regard for his responsibility.

I now come, Mr. Chairman, to a statement made by the leader of the opposition on April 5, to the effect that the action taken had the effect of preventing the receipt by some people of securities and other documents to which they were entitled. I have no doubt that here again such information was given to the leader of the opposition, and that he accepted it in good faith, but that is not the case, Mr. Chairman. In every case where the companies represented that they had certificates to deliver for shares or securities bought and paid for, they were permitted to mail out such certificates. It would seem that some hon. members who are so deeply concerned in this matter are constantly trying to create the impression that some law is being flouted by the Post Office Department. In his statement the leader of the opposition used the words of the Globe and Mail I believe, and stated that the post office had set itself up as a court, presumably in defiance of the law. Let me again point out, Mr. Chairman, what has been made clear, that the law giving the Postmaster General power to act is explicit and unassailable. It confers on the Postmaster General not only the right but the responsibility to make sure that the post office facilities are not used as instruments of fraud. It has been on the statute books for more than sixty years, during which time it has been invoked repeatedly to prevent the perpetration of fraud and the irregular use of the mails.

It may be that the great majority of the members have never been aware of the existence of this section of the statute, and the regulations enacted thereunder. Certainly some of the remarks in this house, and some of the comments in the press, would indicate that many people were not aware of the exact purpose of this legislation which, in the words of Sir John Macdonald under whose government it was passed in 1889 as my colleague the Minister of Justice mentioned, was intended to give the Post Office Department the power to determine what was and was not deemed desirable under this act, and to prohibit the circulation of dangerous and improper articles. May I say that, in the light of such experience as I have so far been able to acquire, I am inclined to believe that the statutory power and the broad authorization given to the Postmaster General, as previously explained, may still be considered necessary when the taking of immediate action is of essential importance for the protection of the public. It is only fair, however, that the aggrieved party should be given the opportunity of submitting expeditiously reasons why the order complained of should not be maintained. For the present, and at least until some more effective means have been found of protecting His Majesty's mails from being used against the public interest, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this parliament and the public of Canada should hesitate to cast aside this old statutory provision which has rendered such excellent service in the past.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, we have had enough railroading on things of this kind.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Just a moment; two weeks ago the leader of the opposition stood up and made a statement, or put questions to the government, and we had no opportunity of putting a statement of our side of the question on the record before we got into committee. Then a speech was made by the hon. member for Eglinton, and he put his case before us. The Minister of Justice told him he would give him a reply later. I have been trying for two weeks to have these statements put on the record, and I called the item for the post office. I announced last night that we had a few bills to put before the house. This is not the last day of the session, and there will certainly be plenty of time to rebut or answer these statements. I move the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the motion that has just been made is entirely inconsistent with the representations that were made to me by the minister who has just spoken. There was no occasion to wait for two weeks if it was intended to present the facts in this way, and then stop discussion at that point. The positively ridiculous statements that have been made by the Minister of Justice and the Acting Postmaster General, and they are ridiculous, are statements that could have been made any day before the orders of the day were called.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Last night when I announced the business of the house for today I said that we would hope to take up certain small bills, and I gave the numbers of those bills some time during the evening. It is now ten-thirty, and I do not know why the leader of the opposition does not wish to co-operate to this extent. I am not making a request.

Mr. Drew: The minister has made a statement which now necessitates that I state what he repeated to me, not in the statement to the house. He explained that the reason he was not bringing this up before the orders of the day were called was so that it could be discussed.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When I moved two weeks ago that we go into supply, I said that we would call the post office, and, on the first item, we would have a discussion regarding the denial of mail service to certain people, and that is where I stopped. Now, there is no misrepresentation in that.

Mr. Casselman: Then the minister said he would not have a statement made on the orders of the day, because it would not be fair, owing to the fact the opposition would not have any opportunity of discussing it and he would, therefore, move to go into supply and take up the Post Office Department so that there would be an opportunity of discussing the matter then.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I think the hon. member is correct, but that is not misrepresenting what we had in mind. A statement has been made on the calling of the first item for the Post Office Department by the two ministers. You have seen us report progress on the first item and then continue at another sitting. I do not see how the gentleman—

Mr. Fleming: Why should this not be discussed now?

Mr. Drew: Without developing any heat on this, Mr. Chairman,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew:—and without precipitating a situation in which charges properly can be made, let us see what the situation is. The Minister of Justice made a statement. In the ordinary course of events it would have been proper for that statement to have been dealt with without anybody raising any objection; but the Acting Postmaster General followed that with another statement. Now an attempt is made to end this discussion with as erroneous an impression as could possibly be given to this committee left by the statements made by the two ministers.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You know, Mr. Chairman, that I would never try to leave an erroneous impression on the committee.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps you do not know how erroneous it is; but I can assure you it is erroneous as left by the two ministers.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Sinclair: This motion is not debatable.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, it is not debatable; but I should like to co-operate with the leader of the opposition.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Drew: Then let us go on until eleven o'clock.

Mr. Sinclair: Then you are breaking the rules of the house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have a minister here ready to go on with some small bills. I do not see what harm is done to the hon. member if we just postpone the discussion. You will have time to prepare a better speech.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes.

Mr. Fleming: What did he mean when he said last night at the adjournment of the house, as reported at page 2300 of Hansard:

> If we are successful, we will call three departments, post office, national health and welfare and public works. For some time we will discuss the question of the denial of mail service to certain persons, which was brought up before.

Is the minister going to say that discussion in the house means affording an opportunity for discussion to government ministers and denying it to members of the opposition? Statements have been made here tonight that reflect on members of the opposition; and in ordinary decency and fair play, Mr. Chairman, they should not now be denied an opportunity of replying to them.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming: To persevere in this way, as the minister is attempting to do, is in effect to throttle free discussion in the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fleming: I ask the minister not to do this sort of thing, in fairness to his own reputation.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I said "for some time we will discuss the question", and I understand that we did start the discussion. I am sure you gentlemen will continue the discussion. For tonight I am really asking you to let us study one of the bills announced under the name of the Minister of Resources and Development.

Mr. Drew: Before we go any further I should like, for clarification, to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works in relation to the remark he has just made.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No—

Mr. Drew: Oh, no questions either!

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If I do not withdraw this motion that the committee rise, I do not think we can discuss particular questions at this stage.

The Deputy Chairman: Mr. Fournier (Hull) moves, seconded by Mr. Gardiner, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Drew: It is the old steamroller.

Mr. Fleming: A shocking procedure.

Mr. McIlraith: Look at your unparliamentary language in Hansard tomorrow.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

Mr. Drew: On a point of order, may I address the chair?

Mr. Speaker: On a point of order?

Mr. Drew: On a point of order. The Chairman has just reported progress on the basis of a motion which was not put to the committee.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I moved, Mr. Speaker, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the committee have leave to sit again? Next sitting of the house. Next order of business.

Mr. Drew: We will know now how much we can rely on any assurances that are given.

Mr. McIlraith: Look at your language in Hansard tomorrow.

PUBLIC LANDS GRANTS ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO CONVEYANCE, LEASES, DEFENCE LANDS, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, respecting grants of public lands.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Drew: What is the explanation of the bill?

Mr. Winters: By this bill it is proposed to revise and combine the provisions of two existing statutes, namely, the Public Lands Grants Act and the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act. The purpose of this revision is to bring these laws up to date, to drop sections which have become obsolete and to consolidate the remaining provisions into one measure. In addition, several sections of the Dominion Lands Act are embodied in this proposed consolidation. Other sections of the Dominion Lands Act are included in the territorial lands bill. Upon the passing of that bill the Dominion Lands Act will be repealed.

The Public Lands Grants Act as it now exists is in the nature of a residuary measure granting power to the governor in council to dispose of or deal with lands for which no other authority exists. The three main sections of the present Public Lands Grants Act have been carried into the proposed new act. These three sections deal with (1) the use of words of limitation in crown grants; (2) powers of the governor in council; and (3) authority for the execution of leases.

The first of these sections is broadened; as it presently stands, this section applies only to the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory. The purpose of the amendment is to make the sections applicable to all provinces that have abolished words of limitation.

The second section gives the governor in council power to make regulations for the disposal of lands, to prescribe a tariff of fees and to fix a rate of interest to be charged on rent and purchase money. The last of these three sections authorizes the minister having control of the lands to sign leases. The essential feature of the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act is preserved in the proposed bill. This is to the effect that all lands required for the defence of Canada are not to be sold but may be used or occupied in such manner as the governor in council directs.

The provisions of the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act requiring that such crown lands be divided into class I and class II are dropped. By this separation into classes, a distinction was made between public lands, the title to which could be conveyed by the crown, and those public lands in respect to which there could be no conveyance of title. The bill now before this house removes the necessity for maintaining these classes.

At the present time the only provisions relating to the correction of letters patent are in the Dominion Lands Act and these provisions apply only to the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory. If letters patent for land in a province contain some error, it is often necessary to obtain a quit claim deed and issue another grant. The provisions relating to the correction of letters patent are therefore included in this bill in a revised form to make such provisions of general application and to prevent such delay and expense.

A new section provides that no title in public lands shall be acquired by prescription, that is to say, by long uninterrupted usage. Title by prescription has been abolished in many provinces and the old law of prescription has no practical application today.

Upon the passing of this bill and the territorial lands bill, the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act, the Public Lands Grants Act and the Dominion Lands Act will be repealed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Crown grant to convey fee simple.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I note the difference in wording from the previous section. Will the minister explain just what the impact of the provincial laws, if any, is on the section as it now stands. It seems prima facie to override provincial law.

Mr. Winters: This is just bringing the federal statute into conformity with provincial practices.

Mr. Wright: I am not a lawyer. I notice that the explanation here reads:

> The purpose of the amendment is to make the section applicable to all provinces that have abolished words of limitation.

What does "abolish words of limitation" mean? Can the minister explain?

Mr. Winters: I understand that words of limitation are such as are commonly found in a discharge, namely, "heirs, executors, administrators and assigns". These are commonly know as words of limitation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to know a little more about it as well, because it seems to me that it is a very radical departure from the previous one. We should like to know whether this wording has been considered and approved by the Department of Justice.

Mr. Winters: Yes, that is correct.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Sale or lease of public lands.

Mr. Drew: What is the effect of clause 4?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, this clause gives the crown the right to effect the disposition of public lands.

With respect to paragraph (b) of clause 4 I should like to make the following comment: As indicated in paragraph (a) of section 4 of the bill, it is intended that the governor in council shall have authority under section 4 to authorize only the disposition of public lands "for the sale, lease or other disposition of which there is no other provision in the law"; but while this limitation is made clear in paragraph (a) by the words which I have quoted, it is not made clear in paragraph (b) and on consideration it has been decided that the limitation expressed in paragraph (a) should also be expressed in paragraph (b).

[Mr. Winters.]

It is therefore proposed that paragraph (b) of section 4 be amended by inserting the word "such" immediately before the word "public" in the second line.

I would ask one of my colleagues to move the amendment.

Mr. Garson: I so move.

Mr. Drew: Just what type of lands does this actually refer to?

Mr. Winters: It refers to all types of land not otherwise covered by other acts; and this specific wording is made so that there will be no conflict with war assets, or as it is now called, crown assets disposal corporation. In addition to crown lands administered under the National Parks Act and the Canada Forestry Act, the Department of Resources and Development controls some 350 parcels of both ordnance and admiralty lands and other public lands. The majority of these are located in the eastern provinces, there being about 200 in Ontario and 100 in Quebec.

Many of these properties were acquired for defence purposes years ago and are either no longer required or are to be retained for future use. Owing to the nature of the crown's title, careful investigations are necessary before they can be sold or leased. In the past eighteen months 101 leases have been granted bringing an annual rental of $10,346 and 251 outright sales and agreements for sale have been completed from which the revenue amounted to about $200,000.

In addition to the foregoing, the department administers mines and minerals underlying several hundred parcels of former soldier settlement lands situated for the most part in the western provinces. As these are cleared by the Department of Veterans Affairs, leases of the petroleum and natural gas rights are offered at public competition. The revenue from these competitions since October, 1949, when leasing commenced, amounts to $54,725.

Mr. Drew: The minister has spoken about public competition for these leases. Is there any assurance in this bill that these lands will be publicly offered for sale before they are disposed of?

Mr. Winters: I would suggest to the leader of the opposition that that is covered by section 4, which gives authority to the governor in council to make regulations with respect to the disposal of land.

Mr. Drew: I am asking the question for a purpose. Certain lands have been disposed of without any offer for sale, where there was no opportunity for competitive bidding. I think that in any legislation we now deal with by way of amendment or otherwise there should be the clear provision that there shall be no disposition without the property being offered publicly for sale, and I would hope that an amendment would be included in this bill accordingly.

Mr. Knight: Paragraph (b) reads:

Make regulations authorizing the minister having the control . . . to sell, lease or otherwise dispose of them . . .

What about timber on these lands? Is there any authority to sell or lease timber rights on certain lands without selling the land itself?

Mr. Winters: I am told, Mr. Chairman, that in a practical sense it does not apply, because there is little or no timber on the land in question. But if and where there is timber it is covered in the general definition of the land.

Mr. Knight: Since the minister has given the definition of public lands as lands not already covered by other acts I suppose I need not ask whether national parks are included in these public lands.

Mr. Winters: That is correct, sir; the answer is no.

Mr. Hodgson: How are the sales made of these public lands? Are they put up for competition?

Mr. Drew: No, just sold to their friends.

Mr. McIlraith: Can't you grow up?

Mr. Winters: If that remark of the leader of the opposition was recorded, I think it should be stricken from the record or withdrawn.

Mr. Drew: I want some information as to what measure of protection there is. I have made a suggestion to the minister that he include in this act, or offer to include, an amendment that would assure that properties to be sold are to be put up for public auction. The way to deal with that remark is to offer to make that amendment; because I know and the minister knows public lands have been sold without tenders being called.

Mr. Winters: That is not the kind of advice we have to take at this time. I suggest that the leader of the opposition is sliding away from the point, as he usually does. If that remark is in the record, then it should be withdrawn.

The Deputy Chairman: Unfortunately here at the table I could not hear the remark supposed to have been made by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Winters: The remark was that these lands were given to "their" friends. Obviously—

Mr. Drew: No; use the right words. "Sold" was the word.

Mr. McIlraith: You didn't say "sold".

Mr. Winters: My memory is as good as the hon. member's.

The Deputy Chairman: I should like to have an exact interpretation of the words used. One says the word was "given" and the other says "sold". In any event, whether it was "given" or "sold" it implies a certain favouritism of which, of course, the leader of the opposition would not want to accuse the Minister of Resources and Development. I am sure if there is any offensive expression or word which in the opinion of the Minister of Resources and Development should be withdrawn, the leader of the opposition would want to modify it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the time has come to end any pretence that there is discussion here of affairs in this house. I made the proposal to the minister that there should be included in this act an amendment which would carry out the very words he used in regard to certain of these properties, but not all of them. The suggestion was that there be an amendment to this act which would provide that all public properties of this kind will be sold only where the sale is advertised and where there is an opportunity for public bidding. If the minister accepts that, then he disposes of any question in regard to this.

I pointed out before, and I repeat, that public lands have been sold without such public bidding. I am suggesting this, and I do commend to the minister the consideration of such an amendment which would prevent the possibility of anything of that kind happening.

Mr. McIlraith: What about the remark about friends—giving to friends?

The Deputy Chairman: Do I take it that the explanation given by the leader of the opposition corrects whatever expression was used before?

Mr. McIlraith: It does not come near it.

Mr. MacInnis: On the point of order raised by the Minister of Resources and Development, unless the statement made by the leader of the opposition was made directly to and reflected upon the minister, I do not think there is any violation of the rules of the house. As I heard it, the expression was "sold to their friends", not "to his friends". That would mean friends of the government.

While the government may not like it, I think it is neither here nor there. Whether the statement was justified or not is another question; but I do not think it is in violation of the rules of the house when in debate.

The Deputy Chairman: In all these cases I always try to secure agreement between the parties concerned. I have not made any ruling yet, because I did not hear the remark myself. I should imagine however that explanations have been given on both sides, and I thank the hon. member for Vancouver East for his kind remarks and his co-operation. I think we might proceed with debate. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Knight: The minister bridled a bit at the remark of the leader of the opposition—and I do not blame him, because I have no doubt that the minister is quite innocent of any malpractice. But from the point of view of taking any holier-than-thou attitude, I would remind him that the reason for my question has to do with timber on these public lands and as to whether public lands can, under any circumstances, be defined as national parks. Because I should like to remind the minister that many years ago there were certain timber leases granted, as the Minister of Justice well knows, in connection with a national park in the province of Manitoba. I understand that that lease is still in operation. When I inquired about it some years ago we were told by the government that it would go on as long as there was a stick on the place fit to cut. The result was that the company to whom it was leased have got the timber and the people of Canada got the stumps.

I hope that situation has ironed itself out. I hope the timber has now been all cut, and I hope the government is not going into any reforestation scheme to sell timber on that particular land for the purpose of the company. Perhaps the minister, if it comes under his department, could give us a word about that. My fear was that there might be a repetition of that sort of thing.

Mr. Winters: Would the hon. member say where and when the lease to which he refers was granted?

Mr. Knight: I have not the particulars here; but my former colleague, the then member for Dauphin, Mr. Zaplitny, brought it out on various occasions in the house. It is on record in Hansard.

Mr. Winters: It must have been before 1930, because there are at the present time no timber limits in the park to which he refers.

Mr. Coldwell: The point is that while the lease was granted some years ago, it seems to have been a lease almost in perpetuity. I think that was the discussion. There seemed to be no way of ending it. This company possessed the lease which was granted some years ago—perhaps prior to 1930. It seemed to have the right, and there was no way of ending it. But surely there must be a way of ending it. I see the hon. member for Dauphin is in his seat; perhaps he could throw some light on the matter.

Mr. Ward: Mr. Chairman, I do know something about the timber land that was discussed in the house some few years ago. If the former member for Dauphin had wished, he could have obtained the facts.

Mr. Coldwell: He did; and they were not denied in the house.

Mr. Ward: Well, if they were not denied, then someone did not know the facts.

Mr. Coldwell: The facts were given on the floor of the house, by the government.

Mr. Ward: The facts are—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being eleven o'clock shall I report progress?

Section stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue with this Bill No. 12 respecting grants of public lands. Then we will take up, if time permits, the following bills: Bill No. 81, respecting crown lands in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories; Bill No. 90, to amend the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act; Bill No. 83, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, 1946; Bill No. 179, to amend the Research Council Act.

Mr. Fleming: No place here for the discussion of the Post Office.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When do you want it?

Mr. Fleming: Tonight, at the right time; none of that hit-and-run stuff.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

COUNSEL

Hon. Charles P. McTague, K.C.,

The Honourable Stuart Garson,
Minister of Justice,
Department of Justice,

Re: Broker Dealers Association.

As counsel for the Broker Dealers Association of Ontario and acting only in that capacity and not for any individuals concerned, I wish to put before you certain submissions with respect to the action of the Post Office Department stopping the mails to people in, or remotely associated with, the security business here in Toronto.

In the first place, my submission is that under the rule of law, to which we lawyers continually pay lip service, the procedure followed in the Post Office Department is totally without justification.

The powers of the Post Office generally in so far as they appear to be relevant to the matter alleged to be involved here are, I think, to be found in the Post Office Act, Sec. 7 (d) permitting the making of regulations, "for marking on the covering of letters, circulars or other mailable matter suspected to concern illegal lotteries, so-called gift concerts, or other illegal enterprises of like character, offering prizes, or concerning schemes devised or intended to deceive or defraud the public, for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences, whether such letters, circulars or other mailable matter are addressed to or received by mail from places within or without Canada, a warning that they are suspected to be of a fraudulent character and for returning such letters, circulars or other mailable matter to the senders".

The relevant regulations pursuant to Sec. 7 (d) appear to be 204 and 206, reading as follows:

204—"If it be established to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General that any person is engaged or represents himself as engaged in the business of publishing any obscene or immoral books, pamphlets, pictures, prints, engravings, lithographs, photographs or other publication, matter or thing of an indecent, immoral, seditious, disloyal, scurrilous or libellous character or in the business of an illegal lottery, so called gift concerts, or other similar enterprise offering prizes or concerning schemes devised or intended to deceive or defraud the public for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences, or in the business of selling or in any wise disposing of counterfeit money or what is commonly called "Green Goods," or of drugs, medicines, instruments, books, papers, pamphlets, recipes, prescriptions, or other things with the object or with the pretended object of preventing conception or procuring abortion, and if such person shall, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, endeavour to use the Post Office for the promotion of such business, or if it be established to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General that any persons are using, or endeavouring to use the Post Office for any fraudulent or illegal purpose, then, in any such case, it is hereby declared that no letters, packet, parcel, newspaper, book or other thing sent or sought to be sent through the Post Office by or on behalf of or to or on behalf of such person, shall be deemed mailable matter."

206—"The Postmaster General has power, under the statute, to mark or cause to be marked upon the covers of letters, circulars, or other mail matter suspected to concern schemes devised or intended to deceive or defraud the public for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences, whether such letters, circulars or other mail matter are addressed to or received by mail from places within or without Canada, 'suspected to be of a fraudulent character,' and to return such letters, circulars or other mail matter to the senders."

I think you will agree that it is trite law that the regulations cannot be extended beyond the authority given in the statute to make them. For the purpose of my submission to you I am not arguing that these regulations go beyond the statutory authority for them, but I do submit as strongly as I can that the Deputy Postmaster General has gone far beyond what is provided for in the regulations or the statute in the most arbitrary way.

Without any warning whatever, and on the strength of representations made by the United States Post Office Department at the behest of the United States Securities and Exchange Commission and entirely ex parte, without the person suspected having any opportunity to be heard, the mails have not only been arbitrarily cut off, but have been required to be forwarded to Ottawa where they are held for an indefinite period without any commitment or statement of intention to prefer any charges in the courts. Not only that, but in separate hearings of aggrieved persons before the Deputy Postmaster General, their mail has been released upon the exaction of undertakings that they will not further deal in specified securities, or that they will agree to modify the language and terms of circulars sent in the future. The whole procedure is in substance a conviction by the Deputy Postmaster General without a hearing, punishment by cutting off the mails and the exaction of undertakings as a condition on which the penalty will be suspended.

If there is anything in the Post Office Act justifying such procedure, I am unable to locate it. In addition to that, I cannot conceive of any government putting forward legislation to justify such action by way of amendment to the Post Office Act, and I cannot conceive of any parliament enacting such legislation if it were put forward.

Mr. Turnbull seems to take undue comfort, in my opinion, in the Literary Publications Case, I think it is, in British Columbia, (58 C.C.C. 385), in giving him the right to do anything and considering that whatever he does is not reviewable by the courts. He does not seem to realize that the court in that case simply held that there was a right to exercise a discretion under the statute and the discretion having been duly and properly exercised, the courts would not review it. That case concerned an action for damages following an acquittal after a prosecution under the Criminal Code. It appears to me to be no authority for the proposition that the Post Office Department can legislate through the process of administration and in fact set up what amounts to a Star Chamber.

I recall hearing a careful speech made by yourself on the rule of law with many references to the admonitions of Coke to King James. In this affair it is McTague humbly putting forward the same type of admonition to Turnbull through your good self as an understanding intermediary, I hope.

There just cannot be two standards of fraud, one laid down by the courts and a different and private one by the Post Office Department. The Post Office Department has not, as yet, attained judicial status. It appears by its recent actions merely to assert that very untenable position.

As you know, I have had a rather wide experience in the security business. It is my opinion, and I have comparatively recently put my opinion in writing for the benefit of the United States Securities and Exchange Commission, that no provincial legislature has power to control or regulate international or interprovincial trade in securities. While I know of no case directly dealing with securities on the proposition, it has been laid down in reference to other commodities more than once that there is no such power in the province. I make brief reference to the Natural Products Marketing Board case in British Columbia.

The only jurisdiction which can validly enact legislation to control and regulate the sale of securities internationally and interprovincially is the Canadian parliament. If the policy of enacting such legislation is determined upon the government can readily put forward a statute and take its responsibility in that regard. If it does not care to accept such responsibility, surely it should not permit or even tolerate the setting up of a securities commission de facto, but certainly not de jure under the present act within the Post Office Department. Yet that is exactly what is being done at the present time.

At this time there is no law in Canada prohibiting the sale of securities in the United States by circular or otherwise. If the circular is considered to be fraudulent under the laws of Canada let prosecution be brought in the criminal courts, but let us still maintain the fundamental principle of the rule of law and once again abolish Star Chamber methods from which already too many innocent people have suffered greatly.

To stop the mails and ruin people in business on the evidence of circulars, telephone conversations and other gossip, which have taken place many months ago, seems to me a most extraordinary procedure.

I am forwarding a copy of this letter to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and of course also to Mr. Turnbull.

Sincerely yours,

C. P. McTague.

Ottawa, Canada,
May 2, 1950

The Honourable Charles P. McTague, K.C.,
220 Bay street,
Toronto 1, Ontario.

Dear Mr. McTague:

I have your letter of April 17 with reference to the action of the post office in stopping the mails of certain brokers. You are acting as counsel for the Broker Dealers Association and not on behalf of any of the persons against whom the "Stop" order was directed.

I have inquired as to what took place. The order, which was made with the approval of the Postmaster General and therefore may be regarded as made by him, was to the effect that all mails addressed to or coming from the above (persons named) are to be intercepted and sent specially by first mail to the administration branch, Ottawa. It was stated that this action was being taken as a result of evidence received indicating that the mails were being used for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences. I am informed that contrary to what you state in your letter the order was not made at the behest of the United States Securities and Exchange Commission.

The action was taken under the authority of paragraph (d) of section 7 of the Post Office Act which authorizes the Postmaster General to make regulations for marking on the covering of letters, circulars or other mailable matter suspected to concern . . . schemes devised or intended to deceive or defraud the public, for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences, a warning that they are suspected to be of a fraudulent character and for returning such mailable matter to the senders. The mailable matter is marked, "Non-Transmissible" instead of with a warning that it was suspected to be of a fraudulent character. This marking was regarded as less injurious. The matter is returned to the sender.

My information is that each of the brokers named in the order was engaged in the sale of the securities of a single company. The "stop" order was made only after a careful examination was made by experienced officials of the literature which these brokers were circulating, making claims which were so extravagant and untrue as to raise a reasonable suspicion in the mind of the Postmaster General that they related to schemes intended to deceive or or defraud the public, for the purposes of obtaining money under false pretences.

I cannot discover any illegality in this procedure. The statute calls on the Postmaster General to refuse the use of the mails to persons whom he reasonably suspects of using the post office facilities to defraud the public. The only question is whether the Postmaster General had reasonable grounds for his suspicion. From the facts when they are disclosed I think you will have to agree that the Postmaster General did have good grounds for his suspicion.

Perhaps it should be remarked in this connection that none of the brokers has seen fit to take action against the Postmaster General alleging wrongful action on his part, a remedy which the court of appeal of British Columbia held, in the case of Literary Recreations Limited v. Sauve, 58 C.C.C. p. 358, to be open to a person against whom such an order has been made.

The next point made by you is that the Post Office cannot "legislate through the process of administration and in fact set up what amounts to a star chamber." I am afraid I do not follow this contention since it appears to me that the Postmaster General was doing precisely what the statute authorized and required him to do.

You point out that the province has no power to control or regulate international trade in securities. That is certainly true where the Post Office is the medium used for carrying on the international trade in securities. But I suggest that it follows from your statement that in this case the Postmaster General is the proper official and the only official who is legally qualified to exercise such control under section 7 subsection (d) of the Post Office Act.

You contend that parliament has not set up a "securities commission de facto" within the Post Office Department. I entirely agree with this contention. The Postmaster General's job is not to operate a securities commission. The Postmaster General's duty is to see that the post office facilities are not used to defraud the public. While his efforts to this end may result in protecting investors against the purchase of fraudulent securities, this result is purely consequential and is not, primarily, his responsibility. Under the law, his statutory duty and responsibility is to maintain the efficiency and reputation of the postal services which he directs. It is for this purpose that he is empowered to stop mail which he suspects is being posted for fraudulent purposes.

As to the question whether criminal proceedings should be instituted, it is not the Postmaster General's duty to prosecute persons guilty of criminal offences. I do not need to remind you that it is the attorney general of the province who enforces the criminal law. The Postmaster General's duty is to take appropriate actions where he has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the mails are being used for fraudulent purposes.

In conclusion, I think I should say that where the state operates a public utility such as the post office, a railway or a radio station there is not thereby conferred upon each citizen an absolute right to utilize the utility, but a conditional right only, the condition being that there should be no abuse. The utility must be operated strictly for the public benefit. The government officials operating the same should have at least as wide powers to protect the public against abuse as the private owners of a public utility would have to protect their patrons. In the case of the post office, parliament has seen fit, in order to protect the service against abuse, to authorize the Postmaster General to refuse the use of mails if he has reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person is making an improper and fraudulent use of them. I am informed that this provision is one of long standing having been introduced in the act by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1889; that it has been beneficially invoked hundreds of times throughout the intervening years; and that similar provisions will be found in the post office statutes of other free countries.

Notwithstanding these facts, the government is quite open-minded with regard to this section and the powers created under it. For many months before this order was made, the government had been engaged in preparing the first general revision and consolidation of the Post Office Act since 1922. In this connection, it has been giving special attention to sections such as section 7 (d) which vest rather wide powers in the Postmaster General. We are inclined to think from the consideration which we have given this matter so far that the experience of our own post office and the post offices of other free countries over the years indicates that the power under section 7 (d) should be retained. We are also inclined to think, however, that it might perhaps be advisable that a summary appeal should be provided from the order of the Postmaster General to the courts; and that upon the hearing of this appeal the appellant should have the right to adduce any relevant evidence in addition to that upon which the Postmaster General based his order. The appellate tribunal should have power either to confirm or discharge the order of the Postmaster General. Pending the hearing and disposition of such appeal, however, the Postmaster General's order should remain in effect and should also, of course, remain in effect if confirmed by the court appealed to.

We can well understand that the organization which you represent will have well-informed views upon this subject matter and if it wishes to present a brief on any of the matters under the Post Office Act in which it has an interest, I can assure you that the government will be glad indeed to give its representations the most careful and thorough consideration.

Yours truly,

Stuart S. Garson.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 10, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ACQUISITION OF PREMISES OR BUILDINGS FOR FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PURPOSES

Mr. Fulton:

1. How many contracts or arrangements are now in existence, or have been entered into in the three years ending December 31, 1949, in each province, for the construction, purchase or lease of complete buildings, or space in buildings, for federal government purposes, including crown corporations?

2. Of these contracts or arrangements, have any been entered into without first formally advertising or calling for tenders? If so, how many in each province?

3. In the case of each contract or arrangement to construct included in the answer to question 2, what is (i) the date of the contract or arrangement; (ii) the location (city or town and street number); (iii) the name of the building; (iv) the department, departments, or crown company, etc., to be accommodated; (v) the name and address of the builder or contractor; (vi) the total or agreed cost of construction; (vii) the builder's or contractor's fee?

4. In the case of each contract or arrangement to purchase included in the answer to question 2, what is (i) the date of the contract or arrangement; (ii) the location (city or town and street number); (iii) the name of the building; (iv) the department, departments or crown company, etc., to be accommodated; (v) the name and address of the owner or vendor; (vi) the agreed purchase price; (vii) the amount of any agent's or negotiator's fee, or any similar fee or consideration paid, or to be paid, for negotiating the contract; (viii) the name and address of the person to whom such fee was paid, or is to be paid?

5. In the case of each contract or agreement to lease included in the answer to question 2, what is (i) the date of the contract or arrangement; (ii) the location (city or town and street number); (iii) the name of the building; (iv) the department, departments or crown company, etc., to be accommodated; (v) the name and address of the owner or lessor; (vi) the annual rental; (vii) the duration of the lease or agreement; (viii) the amount of any agent's or negotiator's fee, or any similar fee or consideration paid for negotiating the contract; (ix) the name and address of the person to whom such fee was paid, or is to be paid?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, when this question was put on the order paper a memorandum was sent to me by the chief architect of my department which reads as follows:

With reference to the above-mentioned question, may your attention be drawn to the fact that in order to completely and thoroughly furnish the answers will involve a considerable amount of work. There are a great number of contracts, and thousands of leases, which would involve an enormous amount of work in the way of checking and compiling statistics. In view of the detail required there is no doubt that it would take well over three or four months to answer this question intelligently.

After I received this memorandum I discussed the question with the member for Kamloops two or three times. In the last conversation I suggested that perhaps I could ask the officials to redraft the question in a manner that would meet the wishes of the hon. member. They did draft a question, which I sent over to the hon. member, but I am not satisfied that it would give all the information he seeks. If he needs more information I suggest that he drop this question, have the new question put on the order paper, and then perhaps draft another question covering the rest of the information he requires.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, as the minister has said, we have discussed this question on several occasions. If it meets with the approval of the house I would accept the minister's suggestion to drop the question as it stands now and substitute for it the question as drafted, while reserving the right to redraft the portion of the question dropped which is not covered by the new question.

Question dropped.

FISHERIES RESEARCH—POWDERED FISH

Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne):

1. Has the Department of Fisheries given consideration to research in respect of (a) development of powdered fish as a protein food concentrate; (b) marketing of same?

2. Has such research been carried on?

3. If so (a) at what places were investigations made; (b) under whose supervision; (c) will results be made available to the fishing industry in Nova Scotia and elsewhere?

4. If not, when will this research problem be considered?

Mr. MacNaught:

1. The Department of Fisheries has not recently considered research in respect of (a) development of powdered fish as a protein food concentrate, or (b) marketing of same.

2. Yes.

government laboratory at St. John's, by the United States at Seattle and by the U. K. department of scientific and industrial research at Torry, Aberdeen. (c) Yes.

REQUESTS FOR TRANSFER TO CANADA OF SOLDIERS BURIED OVERSEAS

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Have requests been made to the government by certain Canadian families with a view to repatriating the bodies of the members of such families who died during world war II and were buried overseas?

2. Were arrangements made for meeting such requests?

3. If not, for what reasons?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.

2. No.

3. The question of repatriation of war dead to their respective countries received most sympathetic consideration by the governments of the countries of the commonwealth during and at the conclusion of the great war, 1914-18. At that time, it was decided by all the commonwealth countries that all should remain together in the cemeteries which would be attended by the war graves commission acting in the interest of all. After the most serious consideration by all the governments concerned, the same policy has been continued in respect to the fallen of the second world war. While representations have been received from individual next of kin seeking to bring the remains of the fallen to this side, these have been relatively few in number and there can be no doubt but that the policy adopted has met with the support of the vast majority of relatives. Undoubtedly, one reason for this has been that it has been applied without a single known exception ever since 1914.

2. Answered by No. 1.

2. If so, what site has been suggested as being suitable?

2. The federal government has been invited to investigate certain areas with a view to determining their suitability. It is expected this investigation will take place in the near future.

2. In the past five years, on what products have dumping duties been applied?

3. In what year or years were dumping duties applied to each of the above products, and for what length of time in each case has it been applied?

Mr. Winters:

1. Dumping duty as provided by section 6 of the Customs Tariff applies in respect to all agricultural products of a class or kind produced in Canada.

Questions

2. Imposition of dumping duties as provided for under section 6 was suspended under the War Measures Act from 19th December, 1941, until March 31, 1947, except in respect to fresh fruits and vegetables.

3. In the fiscal years 1947-48 and 1949-50, fixed values for duty were established under section 43 of the Customs Act, with dumping duty, in respect to the fresh fruits and vegetables and for the periods as shown in the statement attached. In the calendar year 1948, importations of fresh fruits and vegetables were subject to the regulations under the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act and no fixed values were established.

3. Have any representations been received by the government asking for the establishing of a women's bureau? If so, from whom, and under what dates?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

1. In Canada there is no federally-operated agency which is comparable to the women's bureau of the United States department of labor.

There is, however, a division of the national employment service which corresponds to a degree with the women's bureau of the United States department of labor. This division is headed at head office by an adviser on women's employment. A brief statement of her duties is as follows:

(a) To deal with the special interests and problems of women in relation to their interests in the employment field.

(b) To develop and maintain liaison with women's national organizations which are interested in the employment of women.

(c) To represent women and to advise on the woman's viewpoint in regard to the establishment of policies and procedures in the national employment service.

(d) To functionally supervise all operations of the service dealing with women.

(e) Administrative and consultive duties dealing with the general administration of the service and with special projects such as female displaced persons, domestic service, et cetera.

There are similar positions at regional level, and the commission's policy is to have female officers deal with women in so far as possible. Where the volume warrants it, women's supervisors are female; and where the supervision is over a joint male and female function, the supervisory position is open to either males or females on equal terms.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—REQUEST FOR OPENING OF GATES AT LOCKPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, two hundred and fifty families have been evacuated from the city of Winnipeg to the town of Beausejour, Manitoba. I had to say those few words to indicate the importance of my question. Will the Minister of Public Works issue definite instructions that the gates which are used for navigation purposes at Lockport, Manitoba, be immediately lifted to alleviate flood conditions in Manitoba?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Just before entering the house I was told that a question would be asked concerning the opening of these gates. I have been informed that they are open to a certain extent, but that there is still some ice which prevents them from being opened completely, and there would be danger in trying to open them completely. As soon as they can be fully opened, instructions have been given that this be done.

I presume it was in the morning's mail, perhaps from the justice department in the Justice building. I should like to have an opportunity of perusing it before I table it. It will be considered shortly.

If consideration has been given, is the minister prepared to make a statement as to what action is contemplated by the government?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. A number of requests have been made for proclamation of this section and a number of recommendations have also been received to the contrary. The matter is being considered by the government.

PUBLIC LANDS GRANTS ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO CONVEYANCE, LEASES, DEFENCE LANDS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. 12, respecting grants of public lands—Mr. Winters—Mr. Dion in the chair.

Section 4 as amended agreed to.

On section 5—No title by prescription.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice that this section reads:

> No right, title or interest in or to public lands shall be acquired by any person by prescription.

Then the note on the other side of the page says:

> Title by prescription has been abolished in many provinces under the provincial land titles acts.

It does not say that all the provinces have that condition. I am under the impression that in Newfoundland at least there is no such act. Is the minister in a position to say how many provinces have a provincial land titles act which applies? Because if it does not apply, the effect of this section will be to bring in a prescription act that will affect property rights in a province in which a provincial land titles act does not apply.

Mr. Winters: I am not familiar with the particular situation in Newfoundland. I will attempt to obtain the information. This regulation with respect to prescription states that, where people occupy land for a period of sixty years, the land in effect became theirs. That is being abolished under this act.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is that not interfering with the jurisdiction of the provinces with respect to property rights? People who now have prescriptive rights on property will have their rights interfered with.

Mr. Winters: I do not see that it is, Mr. Chairman. This has to do only with lands held by His Majesty for Canada.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Suppose a man acquires property after this date, which is passed over to him by the province, but the people have already had prescriptive rights earned against that property. Then this act will apply, and they will lose whatever rights they had gained.

Mr. Winters: No; I cannot see that that would in any way be interfering with provincial rights. If it were turned over to the crown by the province, it would be accepted by the crown as property turned over by the province as of the date on which it was transferred.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Suppose, for instance, there is certain land in the province of Newfoundland at the present moment on which a person has been squatting for twenty years, and that land is then transferred to the Dominion of Canada. The Dominion of Canada, I suggest, would normally take that land subject to the right of twenty-five years; unless they take action about it, this will wipe out any rights they have earned.

Mr. Winters: The prescription in that case would run from the date of the original; and the example that my hon. friend quoted would run for another thirty-five years.

Mr. Knight: We had opened up an interesting discussion last night. I think the minister was to carry on with the discussion I had started under section 4—but it is perhaps more applicable to section 6—in regard to a timber lease in Riding Mountain park in Manitoba. I think the minister said that he was going to look the matter up. The hon. member for Dauphin had begun to speak about the matter when he was overtaken by the clock. Has the minister had any information on the status of that lease, whether it is still in operation, or whether it has been totally done away with?

Mr. Winters: I think I intimated last night, although probably not clearly, that there are no such leases now existing in Riding Mountain park; that there are only about eight or nine such leases in Canada, and that they are all in British Columbia. The problem therefore no longer exists in Riding Mountain park.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I must come back to the section again, Mr. Chairman. I am not satisfied with the answer I received from the minister. I suggest to him that any rights which a person has will be completely wiped out by this section. The note he has there does not give us the information we should have as to how many provinces are governed by provincial land titles acts. Are all the provinces except Newfoundland governed by provincial land titles acts which are supposed to have wiped out a person's rights under prescription?

Mr. Winters: No; not all the provinces have provincial land titles acts. I think the eastern provinces generally do not have them, but the western provinces do.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If they have not such acts, I suggest that the effect of this is to interfere with property rights in the provinces and that it is therefore unconstitutional. Has the minister had an opinion from the Minister of Justice on this section?

Mr. Winters: Yes, we have; and the opinion is that we are not interfering with the legal rights of the provinces.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What are you interfering with? You are interfering with something.

Section agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Defence lands.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I suggest that clause 7 quite clearly may take away certain rights. I also suggest one obvious mistake in the wording. I shall read the clause:

> Such of the lands mentioned in the schedule to the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act as at the commencement of this act are vested in His Majesty in right of Canada, by whatever mode of conveyance they were acquired or taken, whether in fee, for life, for years or for otherwise,—

The word "for" is obviously wrong.

> —and all appurtenances thereof, are and continue absolutely vested in His Majesty for the purposes of Canada.

I suggest that what this means is that a title which may now be conveyed for years, as indicated in the earlier part of the section, by reason of these unqualified words at the end, "are and continue absolutely vested in His Majesty," might very well be altered to extend the rights of the crown in a way that was never intended. I suggest there should be words added to the section to indicate that they are to be vested in His Majesty —some such words as these: for all of His Majesty's right, title and interest therein. Otherwise I suggest what you are doing is making what is now a partial title into an absolute title.

Mr. Winters: This section as drafted carries the judgment of course of the Department of Justice, and is, I believe, almost word for word a reproduction of section 2 of the old act, the act respecting ordnance and admiralty lands, which reads:

All the lands mentioned in the schedule to this act, by whatever mode of conveyance the same have been acquired or taken, whether in fee, for life, for years or otherwise, and all the appurtenances thereof, are and shall be and continue absolutely vested in His Majesty for the purposes of Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not interested in what other section there may be in another act. What I am interested in finding out is what this section means. What I want the minister to tell me is whether there is any substance in what I have said. I think there is. I have consulted with one lawyer of some eminence on these words. I want an answer, not merely a statement that it is in another section. So far as I can see on the face of it, it is wrong. I want an answer which has some reasoning attached to it.

Mr. Winters: As I understood the hon. member's question, it was whether or not this was correct and did what it purported to do. My answer is that in my understanding and to the best of the judgment of the Department of Justice, it does.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That again is a general assurance which carries very little value. I should like to see a definite opinion from the Department of Justice that indicates no such result as I suggest would ensue. If there is such an opinion, if this point has been considered, perhaps I can be answered, but I have not been answered yet. I may say, Mr. Chairman, there have been times, even in my short time in parliament, when governments were prepared to consider suggestions made from other quarters; but so far as I can see they are not even prepared to consider them now.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that remark was called for. We have treated the hon. member with deference, the deference which he deserves, because I think he is always anxious to improve, if he can, the legislative language that is used in the statutes we propose. I do not think he listened carefully to what the minister said. The minister said that in the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act there was a provision which declared that all the lands mentioned in the schedule, at whatever date they had been conveyed to the crown, were vested absolutely in the crown. That is a statute that has been in existence over the years. This has to do only with those lands, and purports to say that they will continue to be vested in the crown. That is, those that were declared by the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act to be and to continue to be vested in the crown are being declared by this section, which replaces it, to continue to be vested in the crown. It is not something having a new effect; it is something which continues the effect of chapter 115 of the revised statutes, which itself was a revision of a prior act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask the Prime Minister this question. After all, no one questions the Prime Minister's standing in the legal profession. Does the Prime Minister think there is nothing in the suggestion which I have made, that as this matter stands it might very easily convey a title which, though covered by the previous act, may still be a title for years, and can by these words be turned into an absolute title? Will the Prime Minister say whether, if there is no possibility of that, there would be the slightest objection to putting in the proper words to indicate that the title, which is to remain in the crown, is merely such title as they have had? That is my whole point, and I think the Prime Minister appreciates it.

Mr. St. Laurent: If this were new legislation we might be concerned about the possibility of its being construed as changing the title; but if the title was changed it was changed years ago by the previous statute. This is merely a repetition of what was in the previous statute. It is not new legislation. It was so drafted by the Department of Justice, which does, I think, endeavour to avoid in its drafting doing anything to which attention is not directed. May I send over to the hon. member the provision in the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act? This applies only to the lands mentioned in the schedule to the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act. It is the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act which was in force before the last revision of the statutes in 1927, and which, when it was originally adopted, might have been open to the objection the hon. member suggests; but that is something that was done I do not know how many years ago. This section merely restates what has been the effect of the other act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the Prime Minister says, as I understand he does, Mr.

Chairman, that this point which I raise may have been perfectly relevant and proper and practical at the time the previous statute was enacted, then I want to ask this question. Is it not possible there may still be instances of land held for a term of years, which under this continuation as we now have it, and which I assume does replace the present act, may be changed? Is there any reason, if we made a mistake a considerable number of years ago, why we should perpetuate it?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not conceding that there was any mistake made. This applies only to the lands that were described in the schedule to the previous act, and the previous act had the same language that is to be found here. If that is language which operates, it operated a great many years ago when the original statute was passed, and if it was something which could modify a title, the modification took place several years ago. There are no others than these with respect to which it did take place several years ago which can be affected by this new provision of the present bill. If the hon. member will just look at chapter 115 of the revised statutes he will find that, comparing the drafts of both, this does not and cannot do anything new.

Mr. Fleming: Do I correctly understand that the Prime Minister is saying that regardless of the nature of the title, whether in fee, for life, for years or otherwise, which was vested in the crown at the date of the coming into effect of the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act with respect to the lands in the schedule, the effect of that act was to vest in His Majesty in right of Canada an absolute title to these lands?

Mr. St. Laurent: No; my reading of it was that it merely vested in His Majesty the title that had been conveyed to His Majesty. Perhaps there might be grounds for another interpretation of the language that was used in the original Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act. But if there was, that is past history. If it was something which could change a title, the change was made a very long time ago, and no change is being made at this time.

Mr. Fleming: With respect, it seems to me we are left in this dilemma, that if the effect of the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act with respect to these lands was to vest absolute title in His Majesty in right of Canada, then these succeeding words in the present section 7 are quite unnecessary. All that would be needed would be a declaratory statement that the lands in effect continue to be absolutely vested in His Majesty. The other horn of the dilemma is this, that if absolute title was not vested in His Majesty in right of Canada by the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act, then it would be only fair and proper that this section should not go any further, and that it should be followed by some such words as, "for all the right, title and interest of His Majesty therein and thereto."

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think there can be any legal objection to adding as many words as you like to say that this does not give any greater title than existed in His Majesty at the date of the sanction of this act. If it is felt that such words should go in, it would not have any effect, in my view, but having no effect the additional words could not do any harm. If it will ease anyone's mind to have it stated that they are and continue absolutely vested in His Majesty for the purposes of Canada in the same manner and to the same extent as at the date of the passage of this act, then I can see no objection to putting in those words. I do not think that it is wise to add unnecessary words, but if hon. members feel they are desirable, there can be no objection to putting them in—because that is the purpose, merely to have these lands continue to be vested to the same extent that they are vested at the present time. Perhaps the words would be, "in the same manner and to the same extent as at the time of the coming into force of this act."

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the Prime Minister will agree to that, I should be very glad to see those words introduced. I do suggest that the word "for" in the fifth line, before the word "otherwise", should not have crept in. Would the minister care to make that alteration?

Mr. Winters: I agree that the word "for" does not appear to be necessary in that section. If an amendment is required, perhaps the Prime Minister would be good enough to suggest it.

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, I would not care to suggest an amendment, but if the hon. member for Greenwood wishes to suggest an amendment along the lines I have indicated, there could be no objection to its being inserted. However, I should not like to appear on the record as having thought it was necessary to put that language in.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I shall be very glad to move an amendment in the language used by the Prime Minister, which I shall have to get from Hansard.

Mr. Adamson: Why not let the section stand until the hon. member for Greenwood prepares his amendment?

Mr. St. Laurent: I would be pleased to move:

That the word "for" before the word "otherwise" in the fifth line of section 7 be deleted.

I believe that is just a misprint.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is there any reason why the schedule is not added to the bill to show precisely what lands are intended?

Mr. St. Laurent: This is a reference to a schedule which forms part of an existing act. I do not think we can go to the extent of saying, "When we refer to the schedule we mean the schedule which is appended to chapter 115 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and which is in the following form." We cannot be expected to rewrite into the annual statutes these schedules which are readily available and which form part of the existing legislation.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have not heard anyone tell us what lands are mentioned in the schedule to which this bill would apply.

An hon. Member: Read it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have not seen it yet.

An hon. Member: Get it.

Mr. St. Laurent: Perhaps when the hon. member for Greenwood has finished with it he would be good enough to hand the copy of chapter 115 to the hon. member for St. John's West.

Amendment (Mr. St. Laurent) agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the section as amended carry?

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member for Greenwood is preparing an amendment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This is my understanding of the language used by the Prime Minister. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton:

That section 7 be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"In the same manner and to the same extent as at the date of the coming into force of this act."

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): My understanding of this section of the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act is that it refers to all the lands. Why do we not say "all the lands"? That would make it clear.

Mr. St. Laurent: Because some of these lands have been alienated since. I should think parliament would not contemplate taking back lands from those to whom they have been granted since the original act was passed.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Amendment (Mr. Macdonnell, Greenwood) agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—Defence lands not to be sold.

Mr. Adamson: Subsection 1 states:

Public lands that are declared by the governor in council to be necessary for the defence of Canada shall not be sold, alienated or otherwise disposed of but may be leased or otherwise used as the governor in council thinks best for the advantage of Canada.

I should like to ask two questions of the minister which arise in connection with specific pieces of defence lands which I know have been considered for sale. I do not mind mentioning them; they are the Long Branch rifle range, which is just outside Toronto, and situated at the present time on an extremely valuable piece of building property in a built-up area. Representations have been made by the municipal authorities to the Department of National Defence for the release of these lands for building or industrial sites. I understand also that the small arms factory in that location, as well as the military camp used during the war, and which is now a housing project, are also situated on defence lands.

What is the procedure under this act for disposing of those defence lands? The subsection says they shall not be sold or alienated. What happens? Does the governor in council on the advice of the Minister for National Defence declare such lands as not required for the defence of Canada?

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Adamson: And after that happens they come under and are sold pursuant to the machinery set up in section 4 (b) which was amended last night. Which minister sells them? What department finally sells those lands, if they are to be sold?

Mr. Winters: As my hon. friend will see by referring to section 4 (b), it will be the minister having the control, management and administration of the lands in question.

Mr. Adamson: If the Department of National Defence decided that these lands were not necessary, they would be declared not necessary under section 8, subsections 1 and 2, and the governor in council would then declare by order in council that they be not for the use of Canada and the Minister of National Defence would sell them. But no machinery is provided, no method is set out, as to how those lands shall be offered for sale, at least so far as I can see from reading the bill. It would be entirely up to the minister to decide how they would be offered for sale.

Mr. St. Laurent: I know that in practice they go to the War Assets Corporation, because yesterday I had to deal with some lands that were declared to be surplus to requirements in the city of Quebec. They were turned over to War Assets Corporation which is arranging for their disposal.

Mr. Adamson: Could the Prime Minister state how that was done? These lands are extremely valuable. Were they advertised, or how were they sold?

Mr. St. Laurent: For something approaching ninety-nine years these particular lands were under lease and the department has now declared them surplus to requirements. The War Assets Corporation is negotiating with the religious order which has had a school on these lands for the sale of the lands. In that case negotiations are being carried on to determine what is a fair price. I am not in a position to inform my hon. friend as to what are the usual proceedings.

Mr. Winters: A considerable amount of this land is held by the Department of Resources and Development and administered for the Department of National Defence or some other department. If the Department of National Defence decided that certain lands were no longer necessary to the defence of Canada, it would then be the responsibility of the Department of Resources and Development to dispose of the lands as it saw fit. In such cases, unless there was occupancy of the lands in question, it would advertise through the press for sale to the highest bidder.

Mr. Adamson: I think this particular parcel of land is at least two or three hundred acres in extent, and it represents some of the most valuable property in the vicinity of Toronto. If the department does decide to dispose of it, great care should be exercised, because if things are not properly planned and developed, serious congested conditions may result. I strongly urge that if this or similar lands are to be advertised, the experts of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and of other authorities should co-operate. Care should be taken to see that restrictions are placed on the sale of the lands so that there may not be unplanned building on the property.

Mr. Winters: I can assure my hon. friend that the greatest care will be exercised.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to say just a word in connection with the matter raised by the hon. member for York West. As the minister perhaps knows, negotiations have been on foot for some considerable time in connection with the lands referred to by the hon. member, and the question of the advisability of the Department of National Defence getting some other location for these rifle ranges has been raised in the House of Commons. I think the Department of National Defence has pretty well decided that when it can get a proper alternative location, it will move from the presently congested area.

I only hope that that move will not be too long delayed. This piece of property has a considerable lakeshore frontage, and also fronts on the highway, but up to the present it has been a sort of blind spot in the development of the lakeshore area. The rifle ranges are no longer satisfactory to the military authorities because of the constantly increasing population of the area. I think the military authorities will agree that eventually some change will have to be made. All of us who come from that area are of the opinion that that change should not be held up any longer. Subject to the caution and the warnings which the hon. member for York West has sounded with respect to the method of disposal and the manner in which these lands shall find themselves under new ownership, the move should be made by the government as quickly as possible.

As the minister no doubt knows, in the metropolitan area of Toronto it is no longer a question of materials and labour; it is more a question of finding the right kind of land for building. I think this property is the right kind of land, and it will be sought after by builders generally as a preferred location. I hope there will be some expedition to this matter, because there is a great demand in that part of the country for the type of land which the Long Branch rifle range would provide. I should like to add my word to that of the hon. member for York West, who has so well placed the matter before the minister.

Mr. Winters: I am familiar with the deep concern of the hon. member for Peel in this problem. I have some knowledge of the difficulties in respect to the provision of new housing in Toronto, and I shall be glad to bring his representations to the attention of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. McCusker: The hon. member for Peel speaks most convincingly since he joined the rump.

Mr. Hunter: According to subsection 1 of section 8, once lands are declared to be necessary for the defence of Canada I do not see how they could be disposed of other than by lease.

Mr. Winters: The wording of the section is that they shall not be sold, alienated or otherwise disposed of, but may be leased or otherwise used as the governor in council thinks best for the advantage of Canada.

Mr. Hunter: Possibly I am not making my point clear. I suggest that once the lands have been declared necessary for the defence of Canada, under the wording of that subsection it would certainly be arguable whether they could ever be disposed of. In other words you could not alienate them once they had been declared essential for the defence of Canada, even though later they might be declared no longer necessary for that purpose. I am not pressing the point, but I think it is fairly clear that there could be an argument on the matter, so why let it go through when the point could be so easily clarified?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Following what the hon. member has said, should you not add the words "subject to the provisions of section 4" which gives the governor in council power to declare a sale?

Mr. Hunter: Or add something like "provided, however, that upon being declared no longer necessary for the defence of Canada the property may be alienated," or something to that effect.

Mr. Winters: I think it is clear that if they were declared no longer necessary for the defence of Canada they would come under section 4, in which event the governor in council could make regulations with respect to their disposal.

Mr. Hunter: I am not going to press the point, but I think you are leaving room for argument.

Section agreed to.

Sections 9 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On section 12—Repeal.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I see that by this section the Ordnance and Admiralty Lands Act is repealed. Would it not be advisable to have the schedule to that act attached to this measure, so that anyone desiring to look up the schedule would not have to go to an act that has been repealed? Since the Prime Minister has stated that some of the lands have been disposed of in the intervening years, I presume that schedule would be somewhat out of date; but I think it would be better to have the two things together. The government are revising the statutes again at the present time, so I should think this suggestion might be of some help to them.

Mr. Winters: The schedule to which my hon. friend refers is out of date now, of course, and is being changed constantly. I believe the terms of this act get us away from the need for a schedule, and in my opinion we might be better off without a schedule attached to this act.

Section agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to bring something to the attention of the minister, and ask a question. Many years ago a gentleman came to my district from the old country, purchased some land and settled there. Later he returned to England, and willed this parcel of land to the dominion government. That was a good many years ago, but I understand nothing has been done about it; I do not think the dominion government has even secured title. It is a small parcel of timbered land, but it could be used by present or incoming settlers. They are unable to purchase it, however, or get possession of it in any way. I should like to know why a small matter like this should have been delayed for so many years and not cleared up so that some Canadian citizen might make use of that land and timber.

Mr. Winters: I should think that would be a matter of probate. That problem would not come within the scope of this legislation.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

TERRITORIAL LANDS ACT

REVISION AND REPEAL OF DOMINION LANDS ACT —PROVISIONS RESPECTING SALE OR LEASE, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the second reading of Bill No. 81, respecting crown lands in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Could we have an explanation, please?

Mr. Winters: The purpose of this bill is to revise the Dominion Lands Act and bring it up to date under the name of the Territorial Lands Act. In the process of this revision all outdated and unnecessary provisions have been dropped. The Dominion Lands Act, originally enacted in 1872, was designed to assist in the proper and orderly development of the west and to provide appropriate regulations in connection with homesteading, the use of patents, and related matters. After the transfer of natural resources to the prairie provinces in 1930, however, the application of the Dominion Lands Act was restricted to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory.

The act as it stands does not suit conditions prevailing at the present time in the territories. It is considered desirable, therefore, to place in one measure all the powers of the Department of Resources and Development necessary for dealing with crown lands under its administration in the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory except, of course, lands under the Indian Act and lands in the national parks.

Since no homestead entry was ever permitted in the Northwest Territories, and since the practice of allowing homestead entry in Yukon Territory was discontinued some years ago, the sections of the act dealing with homesteading are now obsolete. Other portions of this legislation which have also become obsolete relate to school lands and Hudson's Bay land, provisions which applied only to the provinces. Provisions relating to the holding of public competitions for the right to cut timber in berths were discontinued many years ago; the practice at present is to issue a permit and to charge dues for the timber cut.

The proposed new act will apply to all lands in the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory under the control of the Department of Resources and Development, but will not in any way limit the operation of the Yukon Placer Mining Act, the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, the Dominion Water Power Act, or the National Parks Act. There is only part of one national park in the Northwest Territories, namely Wood Buffalo park.

In addition to repealing the Dominion Lands Act this bill also repeals the Irrigation Act and Reclamation Act. The Irrigation Act is now in force only in the district of Keewatin, where it has no practical application. The Reclamation Act applies only to vacant dominion land in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan; since the transfer to these provinces of all vacant dominion land, it has no practical application.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Sections 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On section 5—No sale of lands suitable for muskrat farming.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister explain the reason for this provision?

Mr. Winters: For which part of section 5?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Subsection 1.

Mr. Winters: Previously there was no provision in the act giving any protection to land which lent itself to muskrat farming. There is, of course, a need to protect our fur-bearing animals in the north country, muskrats in particular. This provision guards against the sale of the land so that it will be available for people who depend on muskrats to sustain themselves in the north country.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There are two questions which arise in my mind. It is quite easy to determine what lands are suitable and what are not. Is that the general practice? Is it a well-considered policy that none of these lands should be sold, and that muskrat operations must be carried on on leased land?

Mr. Winters: That is regarded as the best practice, Mr. Chairman. I understand that certain provinces, the province of Manitoba in particular, have decided also that that is the best practice and have made provision accordingly.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I notice in looking ahead to section 8 that a discretion is reserved to the governor in council, but in this section there is an absolute prohibition which ties the hands of the authorities. There is no option, and I wondered if that was intended?

Mr. Winters: Large areas are involved, Mr. Chairman, and the land is usually swampy. It is felt that, having regard to the size and nature of the land, the question of sale is not an important one. The department has felt that, in the best interests of all concerned, it should make a provision against the sale of this land.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Limitation on sale.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Again I want to ask why there is such a strong feeling against selling more than 160 acres. I see there is a power reserved to the governor in council, but nevertheless the policy is evidently against the sale of the land.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I ask the minister if he proposes to encourage a certain amount of settlement in the Yukon Territory? The territory of Alaska is shortly to be admitted as the forty-ninth state of the union. It is many hundreds of miles further north than Whitehorse and these settled areas of the Yukon, but thousands of settlers are moving into the fertile valleys of Alaska and developing agriculture there. I think the Canadian government ought to encourage settlement in these valleys in which there is fertile land, and where it has been proven that people can grow food and establish homes. I disagree with this clause that the land must be surveyed first. In the province of British Columbia it is possible for settlers to go ahead of the survey, and then make application to purchase or homestead the land. It should be possible to bring this legislation into line with the policy in British Columbia.

In so far as the defence of the country is concerned, it is in the interest of Canada to get as large a population as possible in northern British Columbia and the Yukon, especially in the territory contiguous to the Alaska highway.

Mr. Winters: In answer to both questions, Mr. Chairman, I should say that the former act said that parcels of land up to 640 acres could be disposed of without reference to the governor in council. That has been reduced to 160 acres, in order to ensure that a proper amount of land will be available for people who wish to develop the north country. I would say that it is definitely the policy of the government to encourage people to go into the north country and develop that vast and rich area.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Leasing of mining rights.

Mr. Adamson: Apparently the department is following the practice of the prairie provinces, in that the mineral rights are separate from the agricultural and surface rights. I should like to ask the minister why he decided upon that policy? I should like to explain to him that if ore is discovered in that area and a mine is developed, the surface rights are almost completely subjected to the mining operation. The mining operation really requires all the surface that it has. I want to know how the minister expects anyone to prospect in that area if the surface rights are separate from the mineral rights.

In so far as oil is concerned, it is quite a different thing. You dig a hole in the ground, but even so it upsets the surface rights to a considerable degree. In developing a mine you have the question of disposing of the refuse, you have houses and many other things which almost certainly preclude the use of the surface of the land for anything else but mining.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): In regard to oil I think the law ought to be made as generous as possible to encourage people to prospect for oil. I have been informed that at Norman Wells in the Northwest Territories there are approximately 31 million barrels of oil in reserve. There are 62 wells which have been capped, and one well is now being used to supply a small refinery. This oil field is merely a continuation of the field at Leduc, and simply because it happens to be just on the other side of the Yukon border or the Northwest Territories border is no reason why any reservations should be placed upon it. It should be made available to those who search for oil.

At the moment a pipe line is in existence in the Yukon Territory. We have heard a lot of chaff about pipe lines in this house, but the only pipe line of any consequence in this country is the one running from Skagway to Whitehorse and 500 miles north to Fairbanks, Alaska. It is not an all-Canadian route because it begins in Skagway, continues into Canada, and then goes on to Fairbanks, Alaska. The oil resources of the Northwest Territories are likely to exceed those of the province of Alberta, and the world should be invited to come in to search for and develop this valuable resource. Again this looms large in the defence of our country. We are all familiar with the fact that this very field which I mentioned was drawn upon during the war to supply the American refinery at Whitehorse, and the United States navy in the Pacific, at a time when the Japanese were in the Aleutians. One refinery has been dismantled and sent to the Leduc field, but the oil wells are there and can be called upon at any time in the defence of this continent. I say that prospectors for oil, oil companies, pipe line companies and so on should be encouraged to pay attention to the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Winters: In reply to the first question, may I say it has been the practice of the government since 1889, when the first regulations were made, to have the mineral rights and surface rights separate. What my hon. friend said, of course, is true. On the other hand, considering the manner in which the north country is being developed now, it is the mineral rights that are really important, and the surface rights are secondary.

Mr. Adamson: Actually, as to the McIntyre mine, one or two of the original claims were known as the Platt Vet claims, granted to veterans of the South African war.

On section 8—Reservation of strip of land to crown.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Section 8 begins by saying:

> Unless the grant contains a provision to the contrary, a strip of land one hundred feet in width—

And so on. If the provision of the reservation of one hundred feet is one considered to be highly desirable, as I imagine it is, then I raise this question. Who has the right to derogate from that provision? That seems to be wide open. In another case we have, I think, a reference to the governor in council. Yes, in section 6:

Not more than one hundred and sixty acres of territorial lands may be sold to any one person without the approval of the governor in council.

But here it seems to be wide open. Who can disregard the provisions of the section?

Mr. Winters: The section starts by saying, "unless the grant contains a provision to the contrary"; the grant would be authorized by order in council and may well contain a provision to the contrary.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would all those grants be authorized by order in council?

Mr. Winters: There will be some.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Perhaps I was under a misapprehension. May I explain to the minister that I was assuming that these were transactions carried on perhaps in a routine manner and perhaps by local officials. If I am wrong about that, maybe my question falls to the ground. But if I am not, does it mean that the local official has a right to put in a provision to the contrary? If so, may that not defeat the provision in ways that are not intended?

Mr. Winters: As my hon. friend has said, by reference to a previous section, if the area of land concerned is greater than a certain amount—and the reference he made was to one hundred and sixty acres—there must be a reference to the governor in council. If the area is smaller than that, it is a matter of regulation and in many instances can be done in a routine way. If there is to be some deviation, then it must be by regulation and must be referred to Ottawa for approval.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Am I right in thinking that one or two exceptions, let us say along a waterway of some importance, might be extremely serious to the whole result? I mean, if one or two people went right down to the water's edge, they might defeat the whole aim of this legislation, might they not? Again I question whether this section is not too wide open.

Mr. Winters: No, I do not think so. That would only happen with the approval of the appropriate authorities at Ottawa.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I think by section 4 the minister will be given authority by the governor in council to sell these lands, because the grant refers to a sale only. I do not know what the practice is in other provinces, but perhaps the minister may know. It is not generally provided, even though you have not a navigable river—because with falls and so on it may not be navigable—and is it not desirable that the crown should reserve the right to a strip of one hundred feet from the centre line of the river and so on? I am sure the minister is familiar with that provision. Do you think that is desirable?

Mr. Winters: Yes, I think that is desirable. Moreover, there is a section later which again has reference to something of the nature of what my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I come back to this, Mr. Chairman. I do not want to be too persistent, but I think there is a real point here; and it seems to me that it could be easily remedied. The provision for approval by order in council applies only to sales in excess of one hundred and sixty acres. Then let us suppose that, just by inadvertence, some sales of less than one hundred and sixty acres are made without this reservation. Then, it seems to me, real difficulty might be caused. What would be the objection—because, as I understand the minister, it is in accordance with the practice which will probably be followed—to saying "unless the grant contains a provision to the contrary evidenced by order in council." That, it seems to me, would avoid any difficulty. I do not want to suggest something that is not practical, but it does seem to me that you are opening the door here in a way you may regret.

Mr. Winters: While I do not think it is necessary—of course, I can give the hon. member the assurance that there will be the greatest control over this—I would have no objection to adopting the words he suggests. If he would care to make an amendment to that effect, I should be happy to accept it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then I will move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West, the following amendment. I am not sure that these words are the best, but for want of something better, I will say: "Unless the grant contains a provision to the contrary"—then I think there should be a bracket—"(which shall be evidenced by order in council)". That would seem to me to cover the matter. Shall I write it out?

The Chairman: It would be better to have it in writing.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Very well; I will write it out. I will now bring it to you, Mr. Chairman, myself because I may have to interpret some of my writing to you.

The Chairman: Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood) moves an amendment to section 8 as follows:

That the words "evidenced by order in council" be inserted after the end of line one.

Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Winters: I wonder if it would not be a little bit simpler as to wording and have the same effect if line one were deleted altogether and were replaced by the following words: "Unless otherwise ordered by the governor in council"?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I agree. That is much better.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I so move.

The Chairman: Mr. Fournier (Hull) moves that the first line of section 8 be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "Unless otherwise ordered by the governor in council". Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 9—Reservation of bed of body of water.

Mr. Herridge: Section 9 reads as follows:

> Unless the grant contains a provision to the contrary, the bed, below ordinary high water mark, of a body of water shall be deemed to be reserved to the crown out of every grant of territorial lands where the lands border a body of water.

Does the minister not think that wording is somewhat ambiguous? It does not describe the area of the body of water; and according to the section, as I read it, it could include a small body of water say within even a quarter of a section, which is not the usual practice in the granting of a title. Will the minister explain that section?

Mr. Winters: I think it is the practice, Mr. Chairman, with people who have a body of water, no matter how small.

Mr. Herridge: It is a most unusual procedure in the granting of title to land. Many farmers have 10 acres of land with a small pond upon it, possibly an acre in area, or they may have a quarter section with 20 acres or 5 acres of water on it. This is a most unusual section to apply, if it is to apply to all bodies of water regardless of size.

Mr. Winters: If the area of water is large enough to be shown on the township plan or the surveyor's plan then it is reserved under this section.

Mr. Herridge: Will the minister say what size a body of water has to be to be shown on the township plan?

Mr. Winters: The size may vary, as my hon. friend knows; but there is a great deal of water on almost all land in the Northwest Territories, and it is intended to reserve to the crown the rights of that water.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Does the minister mean to say that that applies to placer mining lands? Must the owner stop at the edge of the stream?

Mr. Adamson: Very important to use the water.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Yes, or the water may come under some other legislation. The hon. member for the Yukon has just told me that in the Yukon Territory alone, since the discovery of gold there, they have produced $220,000,434 worth of gold. Up until the end of 1949, 9,941,000 ounces of gold have been taken out of the Yukon, and they are taking it out now at the rate of many millions of dollars a year. It should be interesting to this committee to know that if there ever was a field for young men to go to, to get rich, the Yukon still offers that great opportunity. I would not like to see any legislation pass which would limit mining operations in any way, or hamper men who go in to stake property in good faith, and who desire to carry on with the placer mining of gold.

Mr. Graydon: Can they make any money at present prices?

Mr. Winters: Under this act the governor in council may make regulations which give rights to use that water for placer mining operations. There is an act called the Yukon Placer Mining Act which contains similar provisions.

Mr. Herridge: In accordance with the practice established for the seat in which I have been sitting this afternoon, I want to rise on a point of order. We have been using the word "carried" too frequently. I want to ask the minister another question with respect to the small body of water. I am much interested in this point. According to this section the water belongs to the Dominion of Canada, and I presume the land under the water also. Therefore, the public, the people of Canada, have a right to go on that property. How are you going to provide legal access to a publicly owned body of water surrounded by privately owned land?

An hon. Member: An airplane.

Mr. Winters: It would boil down to what is written in the grant. If the water is of sufficient size to be referred to in the grant as being exempted, then it would be exempted, and I have no doubt the proper words would be put into the grant to reserve, or grant the right of access to it.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Mines and minerals reserved.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask a question with regard to paragraph (b). It reads:

There shall be deemed to be reserved to the crown out of every grant of territorial lands

(b) all rights of fishery and fishing and occupation in connection therewith upon or around or adjacent to such lands.

Does that apply in the case of a small settler who buys a small amount of land which actually abuts on some fishing ground? To what extent is he limited from using his own lands? Is he committing a trespass if he fishes off his own land, or is it only to be permitted—

Mr. Winters: In some circumstances he might be committing a trespass, but in actual practice, he would certainly be permitted to fish the waters in question, if that would in no way interfere with the right of the crown to the fisheries in those waters.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Suppose the crown grants fishing rights in the whole body of water. That cuts him off entirely, does it?

Mr. Winters: I did not quite catch that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister said that as a matter of practice—and I would think he is quite right—notwithstanding the wording of this section, they would put their blind eye to the telescope, so to speak, in respect of any man fishing from his own ground. Would that still be true if in fact rights of fishing in the whole body of water were granted to some third party?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Are there not great commercial fisheries in both the Yukon and Northwest Territories? Naturally they have to be brought under some sort of control. I am told that the establishment of the fish trade on some of these great lakes is of very great importance and is part of the commerce of that country. For instance, from Teslin lake, Kluane lake, and Great Slave lake and on down in the Mackenzie valley they are shipping fish to Chicago and elsewhere by aircraft.

Mr. Winters: In reply to that question I would say that this applies only where there has been a grant of territorial land. There are of course large commercial fisheries in the north.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Grant does not convey water rights.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Does the minister not think that clause 11 is very poorly drafted? It says:

Unless the grant or other document establishing a grant, lease or other disposition of territorial lands expressly states the contrary, no grant, lease or other disposition of territorial lands shall convey . . .

Does the minister not think that this is unusually clumsy and could be improved?

Mr. Winters: As a matter of fact, it has already been reworded to improve it.

Section agreed to.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13—Timber regulations.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Are these regulations common? Do they follow practices in other parts of the country pretty well, or is there anything special in regard to them to which our attention may be drawn?

Mr. Winters: To all intents and purposes, Mr. Chairman, they follow the common practice, and are a matter of provincial regulations where the provinces are concerned.

Section agreed to.

Sections 14, 15 and 16 agreed to.

On section 17—Appeal.

Mr. Bater: Probably I am a little late in asking this question. Suppose someone should settle on some of this land with the intention of purchasing it after it is surveyed. Does he get a prior right to purchase? Does the squatter or settler get a prior right to purchase?

Mr. Winters: The governor in council has the right to make regulations with respect to the disposal of land. The chances are that if the man who was on the site in occupation is a desirable sort of person he will have a prior right to it, but there is no guarantee of that, of course. It depends on the circumstances.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Powers of governor in council.

Mr. Winters: There is no reference in section 18(f) to any authority for the laying of pipe lines through the area in question. Since I have heard it said in the house that it is highly desirable to make it possible to lay pipe lines through any area in Canada, I would suggest an alteration so that section 18(f) would read as follows:

Authorize the acquisition by any railway, power company or pipe line company, upon and subject to such terms and conditions as may be deemed proper, of a right-of-way for a road bed, for transmission lines or for pipe lines through territorial lands together with such other territorial lands as may be deemed necessary for stations, station grounds, workshops, buildings, yards, pumps, tanks, reservoirs or other appurtenances in connection therewith.

I would ask my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs to move the amendment.

Mr. Graydon: The Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Gregg: I move:

That paragraph (f) of section 18 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(f) Authorize the acquisition by any railway, power company or pipe line company, upon and subject to such terms and conditions as may be deemed proper, of a right-of-way for a road bed, for transmission lines or for pipe lines through territorial lands together with such other territorial lands as may be deemed necessary for stations, station grounds, workshops, buildings, yards, pumps, tanks, reservoirs or other appurtenances in connection therewith.

Mr. Graydon: Did the minister discuss this with Mr. Howe, before it was brought in?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): This is an excellent opportunity to decide whether it is to be an all-Canadian route, and to see how sincere certain hon. members in this committee are in connection with it.

The Chairman: I think the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I do not think it is out of order.

Mr. Graydon: That means you sit down.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): In all seriousness—

The Chairman: The hon. member may be serious, but I think this is not the proper time for that discussion.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I think it should be asked.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This paragraph refers to the authorization of acquisition. Is it necessary to have any reference to building? I suppose that is covered, is it? My thought is that the wording refers only to something in existence, and not to the building of it. How would the section read as amended?

Mr. Winters: There would be only a few changes. It would read:

Authorize the acquisition by any railway, power company or pipe line company, upon and subject to such terms and conditions as may be deemed proper, of a right-of-way for a road bed, for transmission lines, or for pipe lines through territorial lands together with such other territorial lands as may be deemed necessary for stations, station grounds, workshops, buildings, yards, pumps, tanks, reservoirs or other appurtenances or works in connection therewith.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That seems all right.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 19 to 24 inclusive agreed to.

On section 25—Amendment to the Dominion Water Power Act.

Mr. Winters: Just to be consistent I should like to suggest a change in section 25 so as to make it agree with the definition of "public lands" in the bill we have just passed, respecting grants of public lands. I would ask my colleague to offer this amendment.

Mr. Gregg: I move:

That for clause (a) of section 25 the following be substituted:

"(a) Paragraph (b) of section 2 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'Public lands'

(b) " 'Public lands' means lands belonging to His Majesty in right of Canada and includes lands of which the government of Canada has power to dispose."

Mr. Adamson: I suppose this covers the water power development at Yellowknife, does it?

Mr. Winters: Another bill will be introduced later today to amend the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act to make the services of that commission available to the Yukon. That will be dealt with later today.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Where is it proposed to put that definition?

Mr. Winters: In section 25.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Why not have it in the definition section?

Mr. Winters: This constitutes an amendment to the Dominion Water Power Act.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I see; this is an inset within the section?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

POWER COMMISSION—EXTENSION OF ACT OF 1947-48 TO YUKON TERRITORY

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the second reading of Bill No. 90, to amend the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. George Prudham (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to extend the provision of the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act to the Yukon Territory. The Northwest Territories power commission was established by statute in 1948 to construct and operate power plants in the Northwest Territories.

The commission has since October, 1948, operated on a self-sustaining basis a hydroelectric power development on the Snare river 94 miles northwest of Yellowknife, and now supplies power to gold mines at Yellowknife and to the Yellowknife Power Company Limited for distribution in the town of Yellowknife. Power is supplied at a cost calculated to meet operation and maintenance costs and interest charges on capital investment, and to amortize the capital cost over a period of twenty years.

At the present time the commission is constructing and will have in operation during the present year a plant to provide diesel-generated electric power at Fort Smith in the Northwest Territories, which will supply electric power on a financially self-sustaining basis to the town of Fort Smith and to the various federal government establishments located there. A similar plant will be constructed at Hay River in the Northwest Territories, and it is expected that it too will be in operation before the end of the present year.

From the earliest days of settlement in the Yukon, mining has been a vitally important industrial activity of the territory. It remains so today. As this industry grows, the need for electric power will increase. On the other hand, the availability of power would encourage and stimulate the mining industry. Both the extraction and processing of ore would be made easier and more economical.

The Northwest Territories power commission is functioning efficiently and it is considered inadvisable to establish another authority to supervise and administer any proposed development and distribution of electric power in the neighbouring territory.

The whole purpose of this bill, therefore, is to extend the application of the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act to Yukon Territory, and thus enable the commission, whose operations in the Northwest Territories have been of considerable value toward the development of the mining industry in that part of Canada, to render a similar service in the Yukon.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Powers.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We have had a general statement from the parliamentary assistant, but can he tell us if there is some special project in mind which makes this bill especially necessary at the moment?

Mr. Prudham: This is merely legislation to enable the power commission of the Northwest Territories to extend their operations to the Yukon. It is intended to cover all developments for the use of mining properties. During 1949 surveys and investigations were carried out by the government to determine the feasibility of hydroelectric power development on the Mayo river in the vicinity of one of the larger mines.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The parliamentary assistant stopped just when he was beginning to be interesting. Could he tell us a little more as to what use is to be made of these investigations?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Has the minister received applications for power from any new industry, such as the aluminum industry?

Mr. Prudham: No application has been received from the Aluminum Company. The United Keno Hill mines I believe are interested in obtaining power from any development that may take place.

Mr. Adamson: Could the parliamentary assistant give us the cost per horsepower year or per kilowatt year for power from the Snare river plant for delivery to Yellowknife? Also the maximum horsepower available from the Snare river plant, and the extent of the present development? Also the method of contracting with the mines, whether the life-of-mine contract or the sliding-scale contract in force in Ontario is used.

Mr. Prudham: The contracts with the mines are for twenty years. The cost is $100 per horsepower year which works out to about 1·53 cents per kilowatt hour.

Mr. Adamson: I know the original intention was to have a development of 5,000 horsepower. Is that all being used and is it the intention to instal extra generators? What is the maximum possible development at Snare river?

Northwest Territories

Mr. Prudham: The installed capacity of the Snare river plant is 8,350 horsepower and they are now using about 4,500 horsepower.

Mr. Adamson: What is the total estimated development at that site?

Mr. Prudham: The total possible development on the Snare river is 27,600 horsepower.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Could we have the same information with regard to the Mayo river project that has been given to the hon. member for York West? I imagine that there are no security reasons which would justify holding back this information.

Mr. Prudham: The location chosen for the power plant on the Mayo river has a possibility of developing 8,000 horsepower and the original installation would be for a capacity of 3,000 horsepower. The estimated cost of developing that 3,000 horsepower is about $3 million.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Where is the diesel power plant referred to by the minister to be located and how far has that been developed?

Mr. Prudham: There are two plants, one at Fort Smith and the other at Hay River. The first is well under construction and their completion is expected this year.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What is the capacity of the plant?

Mr. Prudham: 350 horsepower each.

Mr. Adamson: What is the estimated cost?

Mr. Prudham: At Fort Smith it will be $125,000 and at Hay River approximately $150,000.

Mr. Adamson: I was rather interested in the figure of 1·53 cents per kilowatt at Yellowknife because I rather think that is cheaper than the power being supplied in the United Kingdom by the socialized coal industry. It is rather interesting that power can be supplied so cheaply in these extremely out of the way places.

Mr. Prudham: The present cost of diesel power in the Yukon is approximately 6·8 cents per kilowatt hour and it is estimated that the new hydro project, if and when installed, will provide power at 2 cents per kilowatt.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do I understand that the full anticipated production at the Mayo river plant is only 8,000 horsepower as compared with 27,000 horsepower in the other case?

Mr. Prudham: That is the proposed Mayo river canyon development. No doubt there are other sites, but that is the one that has been surveyed.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How far has the project gone? Is there anything definite beyond the government having made surveys? Is it proposed to construct it as a public work, or are there private individuals who are ready to undertake it?

Mr. Prudham: The present proposal is that it will be carried on as a public works enterprise; in other words, by the government. There has been no decision yet as to whether it will be undertaken by the government.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not criticizing that; I am just interested in the considerations involved. For instance, I am not familiar with the Snare river plant. How was that done?

Mr. Prudham: The Snare river plant is a government operated enterprise under the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act, and we are now asking for power, under the proposed amendment, to do likewise in the Yukon Territory.

On section 2—Commission to investigate supply of power in Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When the parliamentary assistant said they were now asking for power, did he mean in this bill?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO ARTICLES OF PALLADIUM

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 83, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, 1946.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Explain.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in 1906 the Gold and Silver Stamping Act was passed to provide for the accurate stamping of articles made of these metals. This became known as the Gold and Silver Marking Act in 1913, and in order to include platinum, which was becoming increasingly important in jewelry production, the act was amended in 1928 to include this metal, and became the Precious Metals Marking Act. Various amendments were made in later years, and in 1946 those amendments were consolidated and the act generally revised.

Briefly, the purpose of the act is to provide that when articles composed of, or plated with, gold, silver or platinum are marked, such markings shall indicate the actual quality of the metal content. Licences are issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce to manufacturers to permit the use of the national mark on articles made of gold or silver and wholly of Canadian manufacture.

The Department of Trade and Commerce maintains a constant check on applied quality marks, and makes tests to ascertain the fineness of precious metals in articles. As a result, the illegal description of articles manufactured of gold, silver and platinum has practically disappeared. The group of metals classed as precious include gold, silver, platinum, palladium, ruthenium, rhodium, osmium and iridium. Until recently only gold, silver and platinum were used commercially to any extent. Palladium is a white metallic element of the platinum group. It is produced in Canada, and is a by-product of nickel refining. The by-products from such refining contain metals of the platinum family in a manner in which further refining is necessary.

In its pure state palladium is malleable and ductile, and is slightly harder than either gold or platinum. It can be hardened for jewelry manufacture by the addition of small amounts of other metal, usually ruthenium. This produces an all-platinum metal alloy that is resistible to wear, has the strength and toughness to retain gems permanently, is highly resistant to tarnish, and will retain a brilliant polish. Recently the jewelry industry has started the manufacture of articles composed of palladium. As it is the view of the industry that the use of this metal will likely increase as time goes on, it is desirable that it be brought within the provisions of the Precious Metals Marking Act, and that is the purpose of the present bill.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I want to make one or two brief general observations on the Precious Metals Marking Act. I did so when the act was under consideration in 1946, and the minister then piloting the bill through the house said he would give consideration to my suggestions.

The principle is very good, and there can be no objection whatever to having articles of jewelry, particularly, stamped with the fineness of the precious metal used in making the object. However, I believe a strong case could be made for the adoption of a Canadian hall-mark. This act, in common with the 1946 act, merely states that the fineness of the metal shall be stamped on a piece of jewelry, for instance. It does not provide that the jewelry shall be stamped with the date, the country of origin, or anything else. The English hall-mark, and some of the continental hall-marks, though not to the same extent, are extremely valuable and useful methods of marking articles made of precious metals, particularly gold and silver. As the age of the object increases, so does its value. These hall-marks enable those concerned to ascertain where the article was made, when it was made, and other pertinent facts concerning it, whereas under our system we merely designate the type of metal and the fineness.

I mention this point for the reason that in Canada today the goldsmithing and silversmithing industry is increasing rapidly, and a great deal of the very finest jewelry as well as flatware, silver, cutlery, and other things are now made in this country. In order to encourage this industry, and in order to show the rest of the world that we in Canada do produce high quality articles of great artistry, I believe a Canadian hall-mark should be devised which would not only show the fineness of the metal but also the year of manufacture and the fact that it was made in Canada. I feel that by including these markings on precious metals we would be aiding our craftsmen and our precious metals industry. We would also be advertising throughout the world the fact that we in Canada had a goldsmiths' and silversmiths' industry of which we were proud.

I mention that because the International Nickel Company, which advertises all over the world, is now making a special advertising drive in some of the quality papers of the United States concerning the use of this metal palladium. It is said to be one of the most useful metals for the setting of jewels. I think it would be of assistance if metals such as palladium were marked as being of Canadian origin by having a "C", or some other insignia, stamped upon it. I suggest that to the parliamentary assistant as a means of encouraging our own industry, and advertising our own craftsmen.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Palladium.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, is this amendment being made at the request of the jewelers' association?

Mr. McIlraith: That is correct.

Mr. Green: Is there only the one new metal, that is palladium? Has consideration been given to including any other metals?

Mr. McIlraith: There is only the one new metal being used commercially in the manufacture of jewelry. The use of it has only recently started. This new metal is a little harder than platinum, and has been used heretofore in the mounts for holding gems. It is now being used in the articles themselves. No other metal, apart from those mentioned in this act, is in that position. None of the other metals I have mentioned are being used in jewelry manufacture.

Mr. Green: There is one other question with regard to this section. I notice in clause 2 that a plated article is being made to apply only to articles which are plated with gold and silver. Formerly it also applied to articles plated with platinum. Why is that change being made?

Mr. McIlraith: The reason for that change is that there is no such technique as platinum plating in use. There is just gold and silver plating in use.

Mr. Green: The original act contained an error?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I hope this measure will assist in creating a market for sterling silver in Canada. It would be a great thing for the silver mines of British Columbia. If one reads the magazines and newspapers one finds that articles which are merely silver plated are described as being of silver. Even in the parliamentary restaurant, we have articles placed before us which are merely silver plated. Silver is not so precious that we could not have sterling silver in every household in Canada. The use of Canadian-mined silver should be encouraged. Anything that disguises, debases or misrepresents either gold or silver is a severe blow to the mining industry of this country, and to the miners who are engaged in that industry. Reference has been made to the Keno Hill mine which is producing thousands of dollars' worth of silver per day. Probably most of that silver goes to Belgium and the United States, although some of it remains in Canada. I believe very little of it goes into the manufacture of that splendid ware called sterling silver which, as I say, should be prominent in all homes in Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Can the parliamentary assistant give us some information as to the procedure which is followed in conjunction with the marking, and how it is regularized? Is it done by the public authorities? I notice there are stringent penalty clauses in this act, and I was going to ask one or two questions about that, but perhaps the parliamentary assistant would describe to us—it may be in the original act but I have not had time to read it fully—just how the markings are made and how infractions are dealt with.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, the applying of the markings to articles manufactured in Canada is done by the manufacturer. The actual working out, in conjunction with the standard branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, is not difficult, but perhaps I could best illustrate it by indicating that regular inspection is made of the manufacturing premises so that there will be no breach by the manufacturers. It is something that, in practice, works out rather easily.

Then, on the other side, the retail trade, imported articles can be picked up and dealt with from the point of view of infractions. Perhaps the best way of illustrating the whole matter is to give the committee the number of inspections made last year. I think that will perhaps more effectively answer the inquiry than anything I could say. During the year 1949 the total number of premises inspected under this act was 4,164.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Different premises?

Mr. McIlraith: The total number of warnings issued under the act was 49; the total number of items of advertising examined was 4,483; and the total number of assays of the materials and tests was 306. The total number of prosecutions under the act was nil. There was no need for any prosecutions. In this legislation the jewelry trade is very alert to protect itself against any debasement of materials, or anything even bordering on fraud or misrepresentation to the public. For that reason it is relatively simple to administer the act because, in effect, you have the benefit of the watchful eye of the trade at all times.

The history of the act is that it was brought in to prevent the false passing of articles as being gold and silver when they were not gold and silver. In fact, it has now become so well accepted and so generally recognized as beneficial to the trade that the trade itself does a great deal of the policing and sending in information as to suspected infractions.

Mr. Green: The industry polices itself.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. They are quick to pick up anything that appears like an irregularity and send in information. Then it is a simple matter to inspect from that point on.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understood the parliamentary assistant to say that over 4,100 establishments were inspected.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to know how many of those are what could be called manufacturing establishments, because I understood him to say that there were some 306 tests. I suppose they would be made perhaps in the manufacturing establishment. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant, when he answers that question, would also tell us how imports are dealt with, because that seems to me to raise a question.

Mr. McIlraith: It will be seen from the provisions of the act itself that imports are covered by certain sections; that is, imported articles. But they can easily be checked through the retail outlets. It is easy. As to any jewelry store selling an article if it does not comply with the act, first you have the jeweler himself who is probably alert to it and to see that it does meet the requirements of the act before he will handle it. And if it does get on the market, of course, there is quick complaint from others.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Am I right in thinking that articles may still be imported from countries in which there is no similar regulation or at any rate no exactly similar regulations? What is done with regard to markings there if they do not correspond with ours?

Mr. McIlraith: The effective point is that the retailer will not buy them. The trade channels will not purchase an imported article if it does not comply with them. That is the effective check in the trade.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then are these regulations international?

Mr. McIlraith: No, they are not international. They are Canadian regulations.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sorry, but I do not understand it yet. Suppose some article is imported. First of all, you test the jeweler and perhaps even more you test in another way. There would be a duty on some of these. They are not free.

Mr. McIlraith: I am afraid I cannot give the tariff.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My question, at any rate, is this. Is there a problem when they are imported? Exactly how is it ascertained that they comply with our tests or what alternative marking is taken as an equivalent?

Mr. McIlraith: As a matter of practice, the first check you have is the purchaser or the importer of the article. This act is well established in the trade. The trade finds the act beneficial. The first effective check is your purchaser; that is, the trade purchaser, the wholesaler, the person who may be importing. After that, there is no effective check other than—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I interrupt and ask what precaution the purchaser takes when he is importing? Does he raise the question of the markings?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, definitely. Otherwise he would be in the position of selling an article that was contrary to the act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then I understand the markings may not be the same, and that is my question. If there is no international convention, in importing, let us say, from Switzerland or the United States, how does the importer comply with the requirements of the Canadian markings?

Mr. McIlraith: He has the manufacturer put the marking on. That is a common practice in the trade, generally. It applies, for instance, in the car import. If you go into a foreign manufacturing establishment, you will see that there are certain things on the cars or bicycles going to different countries that are different. The same thing applies here.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As I understand it, in Canada the department carries out tests. They do not just take it for granted that when a marking is put on it necessarily complies with the requirements. The department makes tests?

Mr. McIlraith: It has tests made.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the department have similar tests made abroad or have they any arrangement whereby they accept some certificate from abroad?

Mr. McIlraith: I would ask my hon. friend just to wait a moment until my officials get here.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I suppose that question has to do with the protection of the public and the inspectors.

Mr. McIlraith: No; that question has not to do with the protection of the public, because the public is fully protected when the inspection is made; and it does not matter whether the inspection is made in Canada or abroad, as far as protecting the public is concerned. No inspections are made by our department abroad under this act. There are, by the way, samples sent in for inspection here; but no inspection is actually made abroad. I might add one supplementary part to my answer. They are not cleared by the customs, of course, until there is a clearance from the standards branch of our department, so that they do not get out where the public would purchase them.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I go back to my other question. May we be told just what the procedure is? Let us trace an article coming from Switzerland, and let us find out what the importer does, then how it comes into Canada, who scrutinizes it and how we are satisfied that the standards are maintained.

Mr. McIlraith: The actual practice is for the inspectors of the standards branch to go to the customs warehouse and to make an examination there. If the markings are in accord with the act, then an article may be released for assay.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Can they test quality on the spot in that informal manner?

Mr. McIlraith: I said that if the markings are in accord with the act the article may be released out of customs for assay; and that tests quality as well.

Mr. Green: Do they have inspectors in each of the main ports?

Mr. McIlraith: There are inspectors in the areas adjacent to all the main ports.

Mr. Adamson: The point is somewhat similar to the one I raised. In the United States marking of silver they use the word "sterling". As far as I know, there is no designation of the fineness on the article. Continental silver—Swiss, Austrian, German —has the fineness designated; I think it is 800 fine. I think that is the standard. The American regulations, before the word "sterling" can be put on a piece of silver, require a standard whereby it shall be of such and such a fineness; but that fineness, as far as I know—and I think I am correct in this—is not put on the article. Mexican silver has the fineness put on it. I think it has a national mark as well. Many of the manufacturers of silverware, Jensen and others that are internationally known, put their own mark on it, but—and this is the thing I am getting at—because the Jensen mark is on a piece of silver marked "sterling" or marked even with the fineness it does not necessarily mean that that piece of silver, as far as my information goes, was in fact made by the Jensen factories in Denmark. We should insist that a piece of Canadian silver shall have a distinguishable Canadian mark, giving both the hallmark itself, as in Britain, and the country of origin and the date. As far as I can see, the difficulty that the hon. member for Greenwood raises is that in the importation of a piece of silver or any precious metal, particularly a piece of artistic work, no definite custom in marking is followed, because each country has its own way of marking silver, or any precious metal.

Mr. McIlraith: I had intended to deal with the earlier remarks of the hon. member for York West on section 6 of the bill, but perhaps I can deal with them now on this section. I should point out that the practice in the European countries is to use the word "sterling" and indicate the fineness at the same time. In Canada and in the United States the use of the word "sterling" itself indicates that it is of a certain fineness, well recognized by the trade.

Mr. Adamson: What is it, 800?

Mr. McIlraith: It is 925/1000, so that the Canadian product in that respect is put in an advantageous position.

Dealing with the point raised earlier, it seems to me that it ignores the basic fact that this act is an act for the protection of the consumer. The point raised by the hon. member for York West, and it is an excellent one, had to do with bettering the trade advantage in the export markets; that is, by building up a reputation through identification of the product by a well-known identification mark that would, I presume, bear a very high reputation in the markets of the world. It seems to me that that problem is not something to be dealt with in this act, and is something that is not basically for the protection of the consumer in Canada, but for the improvement of the trade. It is something that should not be imposed in absolute terms in an arbitrary way by the statute but rather should be brought forward and developed voluntarily by the trade, and then applied under the terms of the national trade-mark legislation. On examination I think that that would be found to be the satisfactory way of achieving the desirable ends that the hon. member for York West hoped would be brought about.

Mr. Adamson: I do not want to labour this point at all. I thank the parliamentary assistant for his understanding of the problem which I did raise. This act deals primarily with the sale of bullion before it is manufactured into articles. I would imagine that is so particularly as it is dealing with palladium, and the huge percentage of the palladium produced in Canada is exported in bar form or bullion form for manufacture in the United States or in Holland, Switzerland or in the other jewelry-producing countries.

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Chairman, that is not quite the situation with respect to the act. The act is primarily concerned with the protection of consumers against wrongly labelled retail articles.

Mr. Adamson: If that is so, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the parliamentary assistant consult with the trade and see whether something of this nature cannot be written into the act at another session, because several people I know have started off in the manufacture of really first-class high-grade silver articles and have built up quite a business; and while they did not consider themselves penalized, they have wished that, as their product grew older, one could recognize its age as one can the date of a piece of Georgian silver in England. It has the Georgian hall-mark on it. It may be from the Dublin mint, the Birmingham mint, or the London mint, but it is valued as it grows older for the different hall-marks it bears. Since we are building up a very important jewelry trade in Canada I suggest that this protection, which seems to be so valuable for English silver and plate, should be granted our manufacturers.

Mr. McIlraith: I shall be very glad to see that that point is taken up with the trade.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have a point. I introduce it by reading just a sentence or two from section 13 of the original act, subsection (d):

> Every dealer is guilty of an offence who
> (d) makes, sells, or imports or otherwise brings into Canada, an article to which any mark not authorized by this act or by regulation is applied...

My question is this: Are there any standards of any kind anywhere else which are as well recognized as, and bear a reputation equal to that of, the English hall-marks? Are there any standards of any kind that we will accept as equivalent to our own, or must everything have our own markings?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Chairman, there are certain marks that we very definitely accept.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How does the subsection I have just read apply to them? Does not everyone who uses them and does not use our own marks come within the terms of the section?

Mr. McIlraith: Will the hon. member look at section 6, subsection 4, paragraphs (a) and (b), of the 1946 act?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have not got it now.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member will find it squarely covers the point raised.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What is the section?

Mr. McIlraith: Section 6 (4) (a) and (b). Paragraph (a) covers the point particularly.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The subsection says:

> Subsections two and three of this section shall not apply to any article
> (a) that is hall-marked in accordance with the laws of the United Kingdom; or—

And so on. In other words the parliamentary assistant is confirming what he said a moment ago to the effect that other standards are accepted. What is the test? How does he determine which one we accept? Do we test them in terms of our own requirements, or do we follow their general reputation? How many tests are there?

Mr. McIlraith: The practice in the United Kingdom is to have these articles assayed before the hall-mark may be applied. We in fact take the hall-mark without further assay.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What other tests are there?

Mr. McIlraith: That same procedure would apply to certain articles from Holland, Switzerland and France—other than the United Kingdom.

RESEARCH COUNCIL ACT

PROVISION FOR ADDITIONAL VICE-PRESIDENT—DEFINITION OF "INVENTION"

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 179, to amend the Research Council Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the parliamentary assistant, in his speech, give us the general background of the research council?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I did that rather fully at the resolution stage. After doing it I came to the conclusion that I had gone into a great deal more detail in respect of the bill than probably I should have at that stage.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I was not here.

Mr. McIlraith: Immediately this motion passes, it is my intention to ask that the bill be referred to the committee set up to examine into the operations of the national research council?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Very well.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee appointed to examine into the operations of the national research council.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: This is the first time I have been at a loss to indicate what we should do. If we were to use the short time left before six o'clock I would have to make the formal motion to go into supply.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps we might call it six o'clock.

Tomorrow we will take up Bill No. 178, to amend the Excise Tax Act. That is the only financial bill we can take up tomorrow, I understand. Then we will proceed to Bill No. 181, to amend the Railway Act. That is the grade crossing bill. We will then take Bill No. 153, to amend the Aeronautics Act. We will then go into supply and take the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 11, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

HOCKEY

WINNING OF CANADIAN SENIOR CHAMPIONSHIP BY TORONTO MARLBOROS

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The late respected and esteemed Tommy Church would have performed this duty best, as he had often performed it in the past. I have great pleasure in announcing that last night at Edmonton, Toronto Marlboros won the Allan cup, which is emblematic of the Canadian championship in senior hockey, by defeating the Calgary Stampeders.

I am sure the house joins with me in congratulating both the winners and those who went down to defeat. The cup will now rest in the city of Toronto, where all good things are found in abundance.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I have much pleasure in seconding the motion.

Mr. Harkness: On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, since I come from Calgary I should like to congratulate the Marlboros on winning the Allan cup for the first time in eighteen years. I understand that, in the five games played, a high degree of sportsmanship was exhibited on both sides. For the first time in a considerable period no blood was shed by high sticking or other rough play. In fact my private advice from Calgary is that the Marlboro club is probably the best club that has played in the west for some years.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that the honour of winning that cup goes to Fort William. Young Lewicki scored all three goals, and it would have been a poor Toronto team without Lewicki.

FEDERAL SALES TAX ON FOODS

Mr. Coldwell:

On what foods is the federal eight per cent sales tax now levied?

Mr. Winters: The structure of the act is such that all goods manufactured or imported are subject to sales tax unless they are included in the list of articles specifically exempted therefrom. It is therefore not possible to give a comprehensive list of articles to which the tax applies.

The question, however, might best be answered by enumerating the foods which are exempted from the tax, as follows:

Barley; bread; butter; cheese; cream; eggs, egg albumen and egg yolks; glucose; honey; ice; lactose; lard; rice; salt; soups; split peas; sugar; yeast; yogurt.

Baker's cakes and pies, including biscuits, cookies or other similar articles.

Cereal breakfast foods, not including beverages.

Fish and other edible products thereof.

Flour, including pastry, cake, biscuit, and similar mixes.

Foods prepared and sold exclusively for feeding infants.

Fruit, fresh, canned, frozen, dried or evaporated.

Grain grits and meals.

Jams, jellies, marmalades, and preserves.

Malt syrup, except when sold for beverage purposes.

Maple syrup; corn syrup; table syrups; molasses, and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture thereof.

Meats and poultry, fresh, cooked, canned, frozen, smoked or dried.

Milk, including buttermilk, condensed milk, evaporated milk, and powdered milk.

Peanut butter and shortening and materials for use exclusively in the manufacture thereof.

Spaghetti, macaroni, and vermicelli.

Vegetables, fresh, canned, frozen or dehydrated, not including pickles, relishes, catsup, sauces, olives, horse-radish, mustard, and similar goods.

Vegetable juices; fruit juices which consist of at least ninety-five per cent of pure juice of the fruit.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

There is now before the house a resolution providing for exemption from sales tax of the following foods:

Ice cream; drinks prepared from fresh milk, and prepared whipping cream.

FEED GRAIN—COST OF FREIGHT ASSISTANCE WEST TO EAST, 1948-49

Mr. Matthews:

What was the cost to the Canadian government of free transportation of coarse grains for feeding purposes in 1948-49 from western Canada to the eastern provinces?

Mr. Gardiner: The government does not provide free transportation for western feed grains to the eastern provinces and British Columbia, but provides freight assistance. The amount paid out during the fiscal year 1948-49 was: eastern Canada, $15,801,874.38; British Columbia, $1,753,757.02.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

PUBLIC DEBT, NATIONAL REVENUE AND COST OF LIVING

Mr. Bertrand:

1. What was the amount of the national debt, gross and net, at the end of each fiscal year from 1942 to 1950, inclusive?
2. What was the national revenue for each fiscal year from 1942 to 1949, inclusive?
3. What was the index number of the cost of living in 1935, and what have been the variations in the said index number for each year since 1935?

AIR DEFENCE ZONES

UNITED STATES—IDENTIFICATION OF AIRCRAFT ON SOUTHBOUND FLIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. It arises out of an announcement made over the C.B.C. this morning that the United States government is setting up a defence zone over the great lakes in order to intercept planes that did not make announcement of their flight into that country. Is this a general defence zone set up between the United States and Canada, and will the minister make a statement on it?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): My understanding, Mr. Speaker, is that this announcement relates exclusively to operations over United States territory With regard to the latter part of my hon. friend's question, I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. Fraser: It was definitely stated that it was over the great lakes.

Mr. Claxton: Yes; and the international boundary follows the centre of the lakes, as the hon. gentleman knows.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

AVAILABILITY OF RADIO NEWS BULLETINS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I should like to address a question to the Acting Minister of National Revenue. In view of the great anxiety of all citizens in the district of Rainy river, which adjoins the Red river flood areas, will the C.B.C. make its news bulletins available to the many relatives of the victims in the Rainy river district by utilization of Canadian National wire lines to Fort Frances station CKFI during the flood emergencies?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of National Revenue): It is not yet known whether the physical circuits are available. That fact is being determined. In the meantime, C.B.C. has authorized a connection between CBW in Winnipeg and CKFI in Fort Frances.

CO-OPERATION WITH MANITOBA HEALTH AUTHORITIES IN PREVENTION OF DISEASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Maybank (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the vast bodies of water which have covered fields and flooded houses in Manitoba, and the probability that it will be several weeks after the water level has become stationary before the water is drained away, can the minister make a statement with respect to disease possibilities, and whether the government is in full co-operation with the Manitoba health department with a view to guarding the health of the people of Manitoba?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. gentleman gave me notice early this morning of this question. I may say, first of all, as I said the other day, that the department of health of the federal government has been in touch with the provincial department of health and has expressed its willingness to do anything within its power to assist that department and that government in meeting the situation which confronts the province of Manitoba at the present time.

Dr. Jackson, who was the former deputy minister of health for the government of Manitoba, and who is an official of the Department of National Health and Welfare, has just returned from Winnipeg, where he was in consultation with the authorities there. From him I have this report. He points out that the principal health danger is from the contamination of water and food and the spreading of certain diseases, mainly typhoid. He states that the two ways to guard against this are, first, to vaccinate people against typhoid, and second, to provide purified water for human consumption. I may say to my hon. friend that we have been in touch with the principal suppliers of typhoid vaccine in Canada and have been assured that there is no risk of shortage.

Dr. Jackson further reports that through the experience gained in the modified flood in 1948 in the same parts of the province, but not affecting the city of Winnipeg to the same extent, it was possible this time for the provincial department of health immediately to step into the picture as soon as flood waters appeared at Emerson. Every provision was made for a reasonable standard of water for human consumption. Through the co-operation of army officials, chlorinating plants were provided in order that no community would be without properly protected water. The whole sanitary force of the central office of the department, including a sanitary engineer, two district sanitary officers and five sanitary inspectors, were given the responsibility of supervising the control of water supplies and the inspection of foods in the flood areas, as they developed.

I may add that we are following the matter closely in order to see what further co-operation can be extended in the situation.

EAST KILDONAN—REQUEST FOR NAVY AND ARMY ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): In view of the fact that flood conditions are getting worse hour by hour in the city of Winnipeg and in the constituencies along the Red river, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will he instruct the navy and the army to evacuate the people from East Kildonan, and will he set up tents for the purpose of housing them until the river subsides?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): As my hon. friend knows, the armed services under Brigadier Morton are co-operating closely with the provincial authorities and all other agencies, governmental and civilian; and the evacuation of certain citizens in the neighbourhood has been carried out in accordance with arrangements made on the spot. If other evacuations are necessary they will be made by means of those agencies, which, I can assure my hon. friend and the house, will take all necessary steps to ensure the greatest possible measure of safety and the least possible discomfort to those evacuated.

HUMAN RIGHTS

INQUIRY AS TO CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENTS—SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice arising out of certain evidence given by the deputy minister of justice to a committee on fundamental freedoms in the other place on April 28, as appears at page 125 of the proceedings of that committee. Is it the intention of the government at the present session to introduce amendments to the Criminal Code in order to protect such essential freedoms as may be protected under the Criminal Code, and to set up a committee of the House of Commons to consider a bill for the protection of fundamental freedoms, instead of introducing a declaration or before introducing a bill on the subject?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): My hon. friend gave me no notice of this question, other than to send to me across the floor the report of the evidence of Mr. Varcoe, on which he had marked what I took to be his interpretation of such evidence. I must say, from examining the evidence and its context, that I place a somewhat different interpretation on it from that which he places on it. Therefore I think I should take his questions as a notice, confer with Mr. Varcoe, and make a statement tomorrow.

POLAND

REFERENCE TO RECALL OF MR. MILNIKIEL AS MINISTER TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to address a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. A report in the press this morning and over the radio stated that the government of Poland was withdrawing its minister or representative from Canada, and gave certain reasons for it. Will the minister make a statement, either today or at some other time, as to the validity of these reports?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I know the hon. member was not able to give me notice of the question, but I expected that one might be asked. A note dated May 9 has been received from the Polish minister, Mr. E. J. Milnikiel, informing us that he had asked his government that he be recalled from his post as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary for Poland in Canada, and that he would be leaving this country on May 12. Mr. Eugeniusz Markowski would be in charge of the legation as chargé d'affaires.

The Polish minister explained that he had requested his recall because, in spite of his endeavours, a solution of the principal points of controversy between Poland and Canada had not been achieved. He added that, believing in the traditional friendship between our two countries, he was convinced that it would be possible to overcome the present difficulties.

A reply in acknowledgment will be handed to Mr. Milnikiel this afternoon by the undersecretary of state for external affairs, pointing out that the position of the Canadian government on the matters of controversy to which the minister referred but which were not specified in his note had been made abundantly clear to the Polish authorities on a number of occasions.

INSECT PESTS

QUESTIONS AS TO INFESTATION OF APHIDS IN SOUTHERN MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Matthews (Brandon): I desire to direct an inquiry either to the Minister of Agriculture or to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, as the case may be. In view of the serious losses sustained last year by many farmers, especially in southwestern Manitoba, from the infestation of aphids, and in view of the report that destruction from the same source is already evident in several states of the union directly south of last year's infested area in Canada, the question I want to ask is this. Is the combating of this insect invasion the responsibility of the federal government or of the provincial government? If of the former, what preparations are being made to meet what may become a serious situation again this year?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The responsibility for fighting insects of that kind is a provincial one, but the federal government has always co-operated in every possible way in giving assistance. One of the ways in which we have done that in the past is to examine into what has taken place in the United States and thus to be able to provide any information that may be obtained there which has not already been obtained here through research, to be applied in this country. We have at times assisted in the flying in, where it was necessary, of some of the chemicals which are essential and which are not available in sufficient quantity. We have assisted in every way possible in doing that, and of course we shall continue to do so in connection with this infestation. I believe that was done last year quite successfully, to the extent that it could be done when the infestation was new; and with the experience of last year I think the provincial government will be able to carry on even more successfully than a year ago. They may be assured of every necessary co-operation.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 178, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Part I repealed.

Mr. Fraser: Can the parliamentary assistant tell us what was the estimated revenue from this last year, or is there any way of checking it, in view of the fact that postage stamps may also be used for excise purposes?

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): This does not refer to the tax on cheques. When the private chartered banks had the right to issue bank notes in circulation there was under the revenue act a provision that they paid one-quarter of one per cent each quarter of the year on the notes they had in circulation. Now that all the note circulation is in the hands of the Bank of Canada this section becomes obsolete and is therefore being removed from the statute.

Mr. Fraser: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman; I meant to ask the question on section 2.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Die.

Mr. Sinclair: The only reason for the change is that last year in our tax amendment we permitted the use of a postage stamp meter to be used in putting the tax on cheques, but we did not alter the definition of a die. What we are doing in section 2 is to widen the definition to include a postage stamp meter.

In answer to the question of the hon. member for Peterborough West, there never has been an actual determination of how much revenue the Post Office Department gets through the use of postage stamps on cheques. It is not very wide practice with commercial firms, but quite wide in use so far as individuals are concerned. The only way in which it could be assessed would be to take a spot check of all cheques cancelled by all the banks of Canada over a week or a month; but that has never been done.

Mr. Fraser: It is an excellent idea to permit the use of the meter, but will not this meter cause the post office to gain more revenue instead of the customs and excise division?

Mr. Sinclair: It is quite true that the Post Office Department's revenue from this source will go up a little and the revenue of the Department of National Revenue down a little, but the net effect will be the same so far as the government of Canada is concerned.

Mr. Adamson: Then there is no accurate account or estimate of the revenue from this tax?

Mr. Sinclair: There is an accurate account of the revenue from the sale of excise stamps, but no accurate account has ever been kept of the use of postage stamps instead of excise stamps on cheques.

Mr. Adamson: Apparently this is an important source of revenue. Would it not be advantageous to know exactly what revenue is raised by the 3-cent and 6-cent stamp charge on cheques?

Mr. Sinclair: It might be of some academic advantage, but the banks would have to sort all their cheques in a different way for such a check, and there never has been sufficient interest to warrant the cost to the government and to the banks of making a check on cheques bearing excise stamps and those bearing postage stamps.

Mr. Adamson: I can understand that.

Mr. Fraser: What was the extent of the sale of excise stamps last year?

Mr. Sinclair: The following are the figures for the sale of excise stamps in the last few years:

1946-47	$15,551,793
1947-48	15,352,857
1948-49	13,605,236
1949-50	9,013,995

Mr. Fraser: The drop would likely be owing to the fact that postage stamps could be used for excise purposes.

Mr. Sinclair: Partly so, yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3, 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Goods purchased by an institution for its own use.

Mr. Fleming: This is the section which proposes to exempt from the sales tax goods purchased by certain institutions for their own use. With the general intent of the section I am sure there will be no disagreement whatsoever; on the contrary, there will be the fullest agreement. The question arises, however, as to the scope of the section; and as it appears in section 6 of the bill it seems to me it goes neither as far as was indicated in the discussion of the resolution preceding the bill, nor as far as the present situation warrants.

When the resolution was under discussion on April 27 the parliamentary assistant indicated, broadly, that there were two classes of institutions which it was intended to help by the amendment. The expression he used at page 1974 of Hansard was, "a group of institutions which are closely allied to hospitals". Then, at a later point he said:

The second class to which this section applies is orphanages.

He went on to indicate that it is unfair that institutions in those two classes, namely hospitals and orphanages, should be obliged to pay sales tax in respect of goods purchased by them for their own use. He concluded his remarks on the subject with these words:

But the group of institutions which are covered in this resolution will be carefully enumerated when the actual bill is brought down, and goods bought by those institutions for use in those institutions will be free from sales tax.

If we examine section 6 we see that the benefits of the section are extended to those institutions which are more fully defined in subsection 2. There we see that the exemption applies to institutions—

—certified by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in accordance with regulations of the governor in council to be

(a) a bona fide public institution whose principal purpose is to provide permanent or semi-permanent shelter and care for children or aged, infirm or incapacitated persons who reside in the institution, and

(b) in receipt annually of aid from the government of Canada or a province for the maintenance of persons specified in paragraph (a).

My concern directly is with the limitation set out in paragraph (b) in respect of institutions which are annually in receipt of aid from the government of Canada or a province. I submit those words unduly limit the scope of an otherwise praiseworthy provision. There are many institutions carrying on the most laudable charitable and philanthropic work, of a kind and in a manner which must commend itself to everyone, but which do not receive any annual grant in aid from the government of Canada or the government of any province. As a matter of fact many of the institutions doing the noblest philanthropic and welfare work in Canada are those which are dependent directly upon free contributions from individuals, and those whose only assistance from the public treasury is derived from municipal governments, not from federal or provincial governments.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe raised this question in committee of ways and means during the course of discussion of the resolution, when, as reported at page 1975 of Hansard, he asked:

Old people's homes that are run by a municipality will be included?

The parliamentary assistant replied:

If they receive grants from the municipality by way of assistance, that qualifies them.

I do not find in section 6 any provision which would warrant the drawing of that conclusion from the section. As I read paragraph (b), the scope of the exemption is confined to those institutions otherwise qualified, which receive annual grants from either the government of Canada or the government of a province.

I am sure many representations have been made to the minister in this connection. I know it is a matter of concern to many of the institutions and organizations engaged in welfare work. They are, of course, pleased to see this step being taken, so far as it goes, but in my submission there does not seem to be any reason, if the door is open to admit the exemption in respect of such institutions as receive federal or provincial aid, which would justify the closing of the door on institutions engaged in just as laudable and just as necessary work but whose only public assistance is derived from municipal governments.

Mr. Sinclair: I am glad the hon. member for Eglinton has raised this question. It is true that inadvertently I gave that assurance to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, but I corrected it later in Hansard. The reason I was guilty of this error arose from my background of knowledge of the fact that in the province from which I come any such assistance a municipality may give to a home of this type is matched by the provincial government. I am informed that this condition obtains in other provinces, but not in all of them.

The reason for this limitation to institutions receiving grants from either the federal or a provincial government lies partly in the fact that we find this the most practical way at the present time to define public institutions. In the resolution stage I pointed out that we saw no reason why we should try to help certain of the private hospitals or private old people's homes which are not operated on a charitable basis but rather for profit. We had that distinction in respect of hospitals, and we have carried forward the same expression in this section 105A. The test as to whether one of these institutions is public is whether or not it has been in receipt of a grant from either the federal government or a provincial government.

During the last three or four years at budget times we have been receiving large numbers of communications from such institutions across the country asking that this privilege be extended to them. I have been checking with my advisers, and we cannot remember any case brought forward in which this test was not applicable. Institutions which have communicated with us have said: "We meet the same test as hospitals, in that we receive a grant from the public treasury"—either from a province or from the federal government. Hon. members will appreciate that this is a new field which is not easy to control. That is one reason why we are postponing the actual bringing into effect of this amendment until July 1, so that we shall have another couple of months to work out the details of the regulations.

During the course of the year we shall be able to determine whether or not any real hardship is imposed on worth-while charitable institutions of this type because of this provision. If that should be the case, the matter will be considered again.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to make two brief observations. First, what I had to say applied to the test under paragraph (b). I accept the test under paragraph (a), which would confine the benefits of the exemption to institutions that are clearly public in character because of the beneficial work they are seeking to do. Of course that qualification will remain. It is the additional qualification which I submit is entirely too narrow and restrictive.

In the second place, I appreciate that this is a new departure. I think it is a praiseworthy departure, and I hope it will be regarded by the government as only the first step. I ask the parliamentary assistant to give us assurance that this particular aspect of the problem, namely, the possibility of extending exemptions to institutions whose only public assistance is derived from municipal governments, will be given serious study between now and the next session, and that in the light of the experience gained in the administration of the section the matter will be further reviewed.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Schedule III amended.

Mr. Thatcher: The general idea of this section is to remove the sales tax from certain food items. I should like the parliamentary assistant to indicate the principle behind this exemption that would prevent a similar exemption being granted to margarine as a foodstuff. I believe the parliamentary assistant would like to see that done.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member knows that the sales tax on margarine is a matter in which I have more than passing interest. The actual intent of this present provision is to assist the dairy industry. The argument advanced in previous years against making a sales tax concession in the case of ice cream was that ice cream was used as a confection rather than a staple food. Perhaps that argument is still a good one, but the Department of Agriculture has felt that in view of the competition which the dairy industry now faces from margarine, some help should be given through a relaxation of taxation. Since the purpose of this sales tax exemption for ice cream and other dairy products is to assist the dairy industry, there would not be much assistance if at the same time its principal competitor was given the same consideration.

Today margarine is still one of the food items on which the sales tax is applied, of which there are still a few, although perhaps these others are not as widely used as margarine. Those items are studied each year by the budget committee to see whether or not it would be appropriate to remove the tax. That is the explanation I can give for the fact that this exemption for dairy products has not been extended to margarine.

Mr. Fraser: When this question was up before I spoke about the problem of whipping cream. Since that time the parliamentary assistant has told me that the containers are now made in Canada. I was wondering at the time why the excise tax was taken off this product.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member was asking about this new prepared whipping cream which was coming in in United States containers. I have made inquiries since then, and I find that the containers are now being manufactured in Canada. Up until now the patent nozzles have been imported from the United States but I am informed that a licence has been granted for Canadian manufacture, and they will soon also be made in Canada. This exemption from sales tax applies to the cream; but I do not think it extends to the container.

Mr. Fraser: I looked at one of these containers, and it stated that the contents were made up of thirty per cent whipping cream; then it set out the other ingredients. The parliamentary assistant now says that the exemption would apply only to the thirty per cent of cream in the container.

Mr. Sinclair: I misinformed the committee a moment ago. I now find that the tax exemption applies to the entire packaged product.

Mr. Fraser: At the wholesale level?

Mr. Sinclair: At the wholesale level.

Mr. Fraser: In what city are these containers manufactured?

Mr. Sinclair: In Montreal.

Mr. Fraser: Where is the stuff prepared?

Mr. Sinclair: Granby, Quebec.

Mr. Charlton: What is the actual percentage of butterfat in this prepared whipping cream?

Mr. Sinclair: I will get that information for the hon. member.

Mr. Blair: If taking the tax off ice cream was to help the dairy industry, how can an exemption applied to a product made entirely of edible oils be of assistance to the dairy industry?

Mr. Sinclair: This exemption does not apply to any preparation made from edible oils. It applies to dairy products such as ice cream and the whipping cream, to which the hon. member for Peterborough West has been referring. This is put out in a small container with carbon dioxide so that the cream issues ready whipped. No product made of edible oils would come under this exemption.

Mr. Fraser: I brought this matter up before, because I wondered why the sales tax would be taken off an article containing only thirty per cent whipping cream when it was still imposed on prepared drinks, such as Ovaltine, which would contain at least thirty per cent milk products.

Mr. Sinclair: I am afraid I cannot follow the thirty per cent figure quoted by my hon. friend. The article I am thinking of contains cream along with a small amount of carbon dioxide which ejects the cream in a whipped state.

Mr. Fraser: I looked at one of these containers, which came from Montreal, and it stated that the cream content was thirty per cent; then it set out the other ingredients and the carbon dioxide; it stated that the amount of cream was only thirty per cent, with the other ingredients making up the seventy per cent.

Mr. Sinclair: Probably skim milk.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. Adamson: I understand that the tin cans containing packaged foods such as soup are still subject to the eight per cent sales tax?

Mr. Sinclair: The general rule is that the container of an exempted food is also exempt from sales tax. I am informed that soups were covered by the 1948 sales tax amendments.

Mr. Adamson: Would that include the label, the solder and everything going into the manufacture of the tin can? The container used to be taxable.

Mr. Sinclair: That is quite right.

Mr. Adamson: Are all the ingredients of the soup, spices and other essential flavourings, now free of sales tax?

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed there may be a very small range of goods, such as imported spices, which still pay tax, but the principal ingredients do not.

Mr. Goode: Has any study been given to the question of the removal of the sales tax on tea and coffee?

Mr. Sinclair: Of course consideration is given in every budget committee to removing taxes. Tea and coffee are a class of goods which has always had this tax. While they are very commonly used, they are not commonly regarded as in the class of staples of diet. Because of that there have always been special taxes on the importation and sale of tea and coffee.

Mr. Tustin: I should like to ask a question about ice cream. Before the war it had to contain a certain percentage of butterfat. During the war years there was a restriction on the amount of butterfat allowed in ice cream. What percentage of butterfat is contained in ice cream today? In fact I might go further and ask whether there is any cream in ice cream today.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member knows I am not an expert in agricultural matters. I remember that when the resolutions were before us the hon. member for Peterborough West took some credit because the butterfat content of ice cream had recently been raised.

Mr. Fraser: To thirteen per cent.

Mr. Tustin: I am afraid if the parliamentary assistant were to test some of it he would find it was very much below thirteen per cent. I should like to ask him the same question as to whipping cream. We are removing the sales tax to help the farmer. I believe in many of these instances we are giving the farmer an uppercut in a roundabout way. I believe we are doing him an injustice on a number of these articles. I should like to ask how much butterfat is contained in the whipping cream that we get out of cans with a nozzle, about which the parliamentary assistant was speaking.

Mr. Sinclair: I should certainly like to answer the hon. member, but he will remember that my preparation has been on the tax end of the question. I will direct his question to the Department of Agriculture, which no doubt will be able to give the information tomorrow.

Mr. Tustin: I thank the parliamentary assistant for that, but when these bills are introduced we should be able to get facts that it is really desirable to have. I think we should know whether we are helping the farmer or doing him an injustice.

Mr. Sinclair: All I can say is that for the last two years the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, farmers' groups across the country, and members of the House of Commons have been demanding this very exemption on behalf of the farmers. Therefore I would think that is the best indication that the removal of the sales tax from dairy products will be helpful to the farmer.

Mr. Tustin: I am afraid the parliamentary assistant misunderstood me. I am certainly in favour of having the sales tax removed from dairy products. The point I am trying to make is that we should see to it that these products contain cream and not the synthetic mixture which is going into a lot of them today. We should do everything possible to help the farmer, and we certainly should not allow a lot of this stuff to be sold to the public, thus practically putting the farmer out of business.

Section agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Fraser: Before the title carries there is one question I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant about section 6, wherein the sales tax is eliminated in the case of welfare institutions. If a children's aid society has occasion to go to a store to purchase dresses for a couple of its wards, the storekeeper cannot give them an exemption from sales tax; the society has to appeal to the wholesaler.

Mr. Sinclair: That class of people is not covered. The section refers to institutions where the actual people being cared for are in residence. It does not apply to children's aid societies which put children in foster homes.

Mr. Fraser: I know, but in the city of Peterborough we have a children's aid shelter, and when the children come there we have to buy clothes for them. Our women are making and purchasing clothes for them all the time. I was a director of the local society for years. I am an honorary director now, but I am still greatly interested in the society.

Mr. Sinclair: I presume of course that the Peterborough children's aid society gets assistance from the provincial government.

Mr. Fraser: Through grants, yes.

Mr. Sinclair: If it does, then that institution is covered. Under the terms of this section, when purchases are made by the children's aid society for use in their own institution, the bills are sent to the Department of National Revenue. If they are an approved institution, they will get a refund of the tax.

Mr. Fraser: That is the question I want to clear up. They would buy from a retailer.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: How do they submit the bills in order to secure the exemption? The retailer has to buy from the wholesaler, and it is at the wholesale level that the tax is imposed.

Mr. Sinclair: That is quite right, but the procedure to be followed is that the institution, probably monthly or quarterly, files with the Department of National Revenue the bills for the purchases it has made which are covered by sales tax. Between now and July 1, the date of coming into effect of this provision, auditors of the Department of National Revenue will get in touch with all these institutions to inform them about the proper way in which to prepare their claims.

Mr. Fraser: There will be forms?

Mr. Sinclair: There will be forms, yes.

Mr. Fraser: I think that is advisable; it will help.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): During the last two decades there has been a tremendous increase in the consumption by our people of so-called creams which were thought to have emanated from the cow but which may be found to have emanated from the coconut tree. I should like to reiterate the statement made many years ago in this house as to how such commodities replace the production of our dairy farms. Ice cream and creams of other kinds are foods of great value, but foods which do not absorb as much of our Canadian dairy production as we would like. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I want the department to know that I do not want any of these synthetic products imported from other countries to be left out of the category on which excise tax is payable. I want to see the real spirit of the idea behind the bill carried out, namely, that Canadian production of dairy products will be free of this tax. These things which are produced by our friends in the Pacific islands, Nigeria, Colombo, Ceylon and the other parts of the world, and are imported into this country, should pay their share of the tax. These people are willing to pay their fair share of the necessary tax to get their goods into this country. I want you, sir, as the person charged with the responsibility of collecting that excise tax, to see that you carry out your duties to the nth degree so these people will not avoid paying the tax.

I think perhaps, Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary assistant knows that in those mixtures that come down to us in the form of valuable food, full of calories and all that sort of thing, there are certain things which have not borne excise tax, which tax is supposed to protect the interests of the farmer members of this assembly, sir, and protect the dairy cow. I am not critical. I merely want to put these observations on the record again, as I did at great length in 1934, 1935, 1936, and every other opportunity I had; because we must protect our Canadian economy and help to protect the dairy cow if we can. It is not her fault, nor is it our fault, that we are in this northern climate. It is not our fault that, although the cow produces 100 pounds of milk, one only gets 5 pounds of butterfat, whereas a pickaninny can climb a tree and collect a palm nut from which he gets 45 per cent fat at very little cost to anyone. In that case Providence provides it.

These oils are sent to our warehouses, put through Canadian processing plants, and the resultant product is something which we, as consumers, think of as a dairy product. It is not a dairy product, it is a product of the miscellaneous nuts and fruits which come from the Pacific islands and the other parts of the world. I have no objection to it at all, but the excise tax is designed to help us get some revenue from the products which come from other countries. I say to you, sir, that there are more gallons, hundredweights, or tons, or any other unit of measure you wish, of this commodity coming into this country than our native cows will ever produce, and it will come in increasing quantities as the days go by. The parliamentary assistant has a duty to perform to those of us in Canada who depend on the government, in a small way, to collect our dues at the border from these tremendous importations of vegetable oil products from practically all parts of the world. Bring them in, of course, but let them pay their toll.

If it is the opinion of the government that this legislation in some degree helps to protect the producers of butterfat, then go a little further and do some research work to see to what extent that is being accomplished. I am not critical of it, but make sure —I am not talking, Mr. Chairman, to the minister or his deputy just now, I am talking to the deputies who are serving under them —that your administration of this particular act is such that it will approximate 100 per cent efficiency. When I pass a bakery shop window and I see a pie with some whipped cream on top, I want to know whether that is whipped cream or whether it is coconut butter made from coconut oil that came from some other part of this terrestrial ball, rather than from the milk cow of Canada. If the truth were known, nine times out of ten that whipped cream that is on top of that pie is not whipped cream at all but whipped coconut oil or some other kind of oil, which found its way into this country and was processed. It was looked after by some big packing house or soap industry, which in turn sold it to that bakery. For what reason? It looked good; it tasted good; and it would stay in the bakeshop window and remain in good condition for many more hours than would the whipped cream from the Canadian cow. When the consumer bought the pie, he thought he was eating a domestic product. In like manner the housewife is deceived when she buys shortening. She thinks she is getting something domestic, and she should know that there is hardly anything domestic in that particular shortening. It all comes from the other countries which I mentioned a moment ago. Why the laws of this country should allow the word "domestic" to be used to that extent, I do not know. Why we should permit the housewives to be fooled by a lot of these products, very often combined with other products, which evade these excise taxes, is something I cannot understand. I am saying to those who serve in that department that they should see to it that these products do not escape the tax. Eight per cent is a miserably small percentage of the whole thing.

In Montreal some years ago I saw one tank steamer loaded with Chinese peanut oil, and she was so heavily laden that they had to lighter the ship because she could not tie up to the dock. This product cost less than three cents a pound, and it was necessary to lighter that tremendous cargo to get it into Canada. I ask any ordinary farmer to tell me how butterfat can be produced at three, four, five or even ten cents a pound, to compete with products from these other parts of the world, and still permit our Canadian agricultural industry, our Canadian livestock industry, and our Canadian dairy industry to survive. We do not mind competition, but God put us on this North American continent and we have difficulty in pasturing our cattle. We cannot pasture our cattle the year round as is done in some other countries. We must build barns, but in many countries no barns are necessary, and the cattle can remain out the year round.

We cannot do that here. Yet we are here and we are a country by ourselves. Let us take charge and assume responsibility for our country. In these few words I am saying, I know I am getting a little bit away from the point. I know that you, Mr. Chairman, are getting ready to call me to order. I can see your fingers wobbling. I know I am a little bit away from the point, but I am putting this on record with your indulgence, sir, so that these gentlemen under the minister and under his deputy will see that this little excise tax is collected, that this law is carried out, that there will be no evasion or getting away from it. When I go past the next bakeshop window and see that whipped cream on a custard pie I want to know, Mr. Parliamentary Assistant, that it has paid its full excise tax, if it is not whipped cream; and I want to see the farmer protected if it is whipped cream, in order to help in a little way.

As one year succeeds another, I can see the fading—and I will say this in a voice that will be heard—of the dairy industry. That fading is coming about not through any fault of ours but owing to the fact that we in this northern zone and the other zones are backed up with these free trade ideas of all kinds of administrations across Canada. Through all the conferences that are being held at Geneva and what not, with the advent of that day and generation, I gave this warning to the people of Canada: as Geneva proceeds, and as these protections, if you like, proceed—you understand that word; that is why I use it, I do not think it means protection in the full sense of the word as it appears in the Oxford dictionary—this conservation of our livelihood and native industry, call it protection if you will, is not enough to stop what is happening in the universe in the production of these products. They are not synthetic. They are natural products. They will keep coming. But before this bill passes I want those in your department to see to it that there is no evasion, no mixture, no adulteration, that when it is stated to be whipped cream, it is whipped cream and when it is stated to be a filling of some kind or something else, it has paid its excise tax.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE ANNUAL GRANT TO GRADE CROSSING FUND

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 181, to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. Adamson: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Chevrier: As already stated on the resolution stage of this matter, the object of this bill is twofold: First of all, to increase the payment for any one crossing under section 262 of the Railway Act from $100,000 to $150,000 so that hereafter, where the cost of any one project does not exceed that amount, 40 per cent of the cost may be paid from the grade crossing fund. Where the cost exceeds $150,000, no more than 40 per cent shall be paid, and shall not in any case exceed $150,000. Then the other part of the bill provides that the payment made into the grade crossing fund by a vote of parliament shall be increased from the sum of $500,000 to $1 million for six consecutive years from the first day of April, 1951. I think that is all I need to say at this stage.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Do I understand that when we carry this motion, we are through with this bill?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Speaker: As I understand it, the house will then resolve itself into committee of the whole on the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Apportionment of money by board.

Mr. Fleming: This matter was discussed in committee on May 5, and I do not propose to review or to traverse any of the ground that was covered there. There is, however, one subject that I should like to bring before the committee. As the minister has said, the effect of this amendment to section 262 of the Railway Act is, first, to increase the annual statutory grant commencing April 1, 1951, from $500,000 to $1 million; and second, to raise the maximum available out of the fund, on order of the board of transport commissioners, from $100,000 to $150,000. There is, however, no change proposed in the bill with regard to the other maximum, namely the 40 per cent.

As I indicated when speaking on the resolution stage of this bill on May 5, there are good reasons why the maximum amount available out of the fund for any one work should be increased from $100,000 to $150,000. The cost of these grade separations and crossing protective works has increased tremendously, and the railways are having their own difficult time with financial problems, so that if there is to be any attack on the problem of level crossings in Canada, we must accept the fact that the railways are not in a position to bear the brunt of the burden. There are also good reasons why, apart from the financial aspect, they should not be called upon to do so. The fact that the problem is growing in its scope and in its intensity is largely attributable to increased highway traffic. I submit that there is good ground for increasing the present 40 per cent maximum. It has been increased in times past. An increase in that percentage is nothing new. It stood at 25 per cent for many years. The reasons that led parliament to increase to 40 per cent this maximum percentage have, I think, grown stronger in the interval since that last increase was made.

Lest any hon. member should think that there is grave danger in raising that maximum, I point out that it is still subject to the orders of the board of transport commissioners. No sum is available out of that fund except on order of the board. Such are the provisions of the Railway Act. All that we are doing, if we increase the 40 per cent maximum, is to say to the board of transport commissioners: If you think the circumstances warrant it, after you have heard the case and reviewed all the evidence, we are not going to impose so low an arbitrary limit on the amount available out of the railway grade crossing fund.

Sir, as I sought to indicate in my remarks on May 5, this fund has had a record of remarkable achievement. It has been a highly commendable piece of remedial legislation. I do urge that the time has come for a further relaxation of the percentage maximum that now is imposed under section 262. I think in that way we shall be taking a forward step. We shall be contributing toward the expansion in all parts of the country of the desirable work of grade separation and protective works at crossings, and we shall, I am convinced, contribute to the saving of life and the avoidance of those accidents which have taken many lives and maimed many persons.

It should always be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that there is no money available out of the railway grade crossing fund to assist in the maintenance of crossing works. The railway grade crossing fund is available only to assist in the construction of those protective works on crossings or actual grade separations. That is a further limitation, and when we measure, on the one hand, the necessity of works of the kind we are speaking of here, the great field that still remains for remedial operation of legislation of this kind and of funds of the nature of the railway grade crossing funds, and, on the other hand, the restrictions that still exist even if this percentage maximum were increased, the fact that $150,000 is the maximum amount in any particular case, and the fact that the fund is available only for assistance in construction, not toward maintenance, and in the third place that it is always subject to the orders of the board of transport commissioners, and not one copper comes out of that fund unless the board of transport commissioners is satisfied it ought to come out, and others who are to pay are contributing their share, then it seems to me the case is very strong for the increase in the 40 per cent.

There is one other aspect to this, and I mention it briefly in conclusion, Mr. Chairman. The increase that is being proposed in this bill for any one work from $100,000 to $150,000, with 40 per cent maximum, is going to be very helpful in the case of the large and expensive crossing protective works. But there are many crossing works of a protective nature that do not run into these very big figures. There are many crossings where protective works could be installed to the very great advantage and benefit of the public, where costly works of grade separation are not required. I am thinking particularly of cases of the kind where great local benefit will ensue when I urge that the present percentage maximum of 40 per cent should be increased.

I mention again that in doing so we shall be simply consistent with past history; we shall be simply taking one step forward in this respect, following steps of a similar nature taken in the same direction in the past, in the light of conditions, consistent with those which led to the increase in times past, and which have lately become intensified in their effect.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Chairman, I am happy to endorse what the hon. member for Eglinton has had to say. To save time perhaps the minister could reply to both of us at the same time. I have a few specific instances to mention, of which the minister has been well advised. Before proceeding to make some suggestions I should like to put on the record that from my point of view at least for over a quarter of a century the city of Toronto has been pretty well looked after with regard to the amount of money expended out of this fund to eliminate level crossings. Perhaps we have not had favours to the same extent as our friends from Montreal, but we have had certain favours. The occasion was the grade separation for the half million population in the environs of the city of Toronto from Queen street east, to the union station. These benefits were obtained by an organization known as the Toronto Terminals Railway Company, which was set up. But during this quarter of a century there has been a tremendous increase in the population to the east of where the Toronto Terminals Railway Company started in with their great work some twenty odd years ago.

In passing, the deputation which waited on the ministry at that time went from my humble office in the House of Commons, where they gathered their facts together. But the minister did a great job for us at that time. I think the amount was around $22 million, and you could not do the job today for $50 million. Populations grow. I am anxious to impress on the minister and on his department the tremendous growth of the population east of the area which you protected by the grade separation of that day and of that generation.

A new city has arisen in the area east of that, but the old railway line is still there. The level crossings are still there. At Woodbine avenue there is a level crossing; at Greenwood avenue, a level crossing; at Jones avenue, a level crossing; at Logan avenue, a level crossing. These are all main arteries giving ingress to and egress from the city of Toronto. Over them travel thousands and thousands of people, motorcars and vehicles of all kinds. They are protected to a degree, yes, by gates of a kind. But through you, sir, I say to the minister the time has come when another grade separation for the eastern environs of the city of Toronto is necessary.

In a moment of generosity and kindness, and after a plea to you, you did give us in my area the Victoria Park avenue subway. I thank you now for it; perhaps it is a little late. It has helped wonderfully, but between that subway and the end of a mile and a half there are four level crossings. Traversing these four level crossings are the people who are servicing the population and who must have ingress to and egress from the city of Toronto. I am safe in saying that in that area there is close to half a million inhabitants. Time marches on, and the minister must recognize it, and must give consideration to the elimination of those crossings one by one.

I know the Jones avenue crossing is approved. I know that Woodbine avenue is second on the list, and that other crossings are being given some thought. I know the engineers in the minister's department are doing a most efficient job in gathering the necessary information. I know the department is fully aware of these necessities. But my reason for rising today is, first, to endorse the thought behind the bill—although I agree with the hon. member for Eglinton that it is not broad enough. I agree that it has not kept pace with the extra costs involved, and all that sort of thing—and I am not criticizing in that respect. But I am asking through you, Mr. Minister, sympathetic indulgence from your department so as to get some speed on this job and get something done.

If you give us only one of them, I do not care whether it is in my constituency—

Mr. Chevrier: We have given you two.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Does the minister say we are going to get two?

Mr. Chevrier: I said we have given you two—Royce and Dupont.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Royce avenue? Where is that? Why, that is twenty-five miles from where I live.

Mr. Chevrier: It is in the city of Toronto.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I love all the people of Toronto, but I love my own constituents best. I got two? All right. Then I shall take full responsibility for the second one as well as the first one—because if John R. MacNicol were here he would take responsibility for it.

I do not wish to be facetious about this; I am as serious as I know how to be. I am not going to put on record the great advantages enjoyed by this country through having a city of Toronto. I am not going to recite figures showing post office revenue, customs revenue, railway revenue or anything else. I am simply asking through you, Mr. Chairman, that the minister's department give sympathetic consideration to these requirements. But before I finish that sentence I want the minister's department to know that we want some action. We want action, because there has been action in these communities to the point where the population has quadrupled. No doubt the city of Toronto would pay its fair share. The revenues are increasing all the time in that city.

I know the minister is faced with similar problems all across Canada. But let hon. members visualize half a million people traversing the crossing of the main line of the old Grand Trunk, now known as the Canadian National Railways. Let them visualize half a million people travelling in motorcars every split second of the day and without any protection by way of grade separation. Hon. members will recall that some twenty-five years ago those of us in suburban Toronto stepped aside so as to give the more thickly populated part of the city the advantage of grade separation. I hope there will be no complaint in this day and generation, a quarter of a century later, when we ask for some consideration.

The member for Danforth asks particularly for some consideration in respect of grade separations at Woodbine avenue, at Logan avenue, even at Pape avenue if necessary, and at Greenwood, so as to continue the good work begun twenty-five years ago. Let that work be continued into the suburban area where we live, so that we may protect our people. Not only do we live there, but in that area there have been developed industries to an extent as great as found in any other part of Canada. It is safe to say that two hundred industries have been developed there within the last twenty years. Millions of dollars—quite a few of them from the United States and the United Kingdom—have been spent on industries in that area. We now have a population which is more than quadrupled.

That being so the minister, the board of transport commissioners and other auxiliary services, including those in charge of this grade crossing fund, and who find themselves on the spot, must keep up with the times. All I ask is that those projects the minister has under way be given active and accelerated consideration by the members of his department. Meantime we thank him for what has already been done.

Mr. Weir: Mr. Chairman, now that the hon. member for Danforth has referred to his own constituency which, I think, was done properly, I suggest all hon. members should recognize the problems found in large industrial areas and the thickly populated cities in the matter of having proper facilities for grade crossing purposes, always keeping in mind the object of saving life and moving traffic more expeditiously.

I made reference to this same matter the other day when the bill was in resolution stage, and I would refer to it again now, developing somewhat further the thoughts I presented at that time. I hope that, like the hon. member for Danforth, I may be pardoned if my remarks are brought down to the constituency level. I do this because I believe what I have in mind must apply equally well to many other sections in Canada.

In Manitoba the railways concentrate largely in an area not far from the city of Winnipeg, particularly on the north side of the Assiniboine river. Leading out to Portage la Prairie we have the two main lines of the national railways, both the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. The topography is such that they approach the city from one side and go out the other. The highway crosses both those railways on each side of the city, and these are level crossings. They are hazardous because there is no adequate warning of the approach of trains. On one side we find an electrical stop gate, which works very well; but on the other side, where both railways are criss-crossing the highway, there is no such protection. In fact, the only protection afforded is an ordinary stop sign.

This may be warning enough, in one sense; but it has the effect, if the sign is properly recognized, of stopping all the traffic which comes along. Traffic for miles back may be affected by that stop sign, and it does not get away as quickly as it should when, in fact, there may be no train for miles back. My suggestion is that in the interests of the better movement of traffic something more should be done by means of this grade crossing fund to stop traffic when trains are approaching and not to stop it when there are no trains within some considerable distance.

The other feature I have in mind, one which no doubt affects many other hon. members, is that in this instance the railways are crossing what will be our trans-Canada highway, or what is likely to be recognized as such. So that in the end, while naturally the local municipalities are interested in having adequate crossings, the whole of the province—indeed the whole of the country—is interested in having there some facilities which will make traffic easier and safer. This brings in a new principle in connection with the grade crossings because now the trans-Canada highway is involved. My submission is that in those cases where the railroad crosses the trans-Canada highway, a highway which will be utilized by people from all over the country, the local municipalities should not be required to pay as large a proportion of the cost of any facilities provided as might be paid in other cases. Where it is in the national interest that the crossing should be eliminated more of the cost should come from federal sources as well as from the province, and not so much from the municipality.

I have no idea of the cost of these things and in the instance I have in mind I am not suggesting a subway or anything like that. I have watched the operation of these electrical signals and I think that would be quite adequate. I submit that this is a matter of considerable importance and I hope it will not be overlooked when we are laying plans for the protection of travellers on our highways and our railroads.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, like those who have gone before me I have a personal interest to serve when I speak about something in the city in which I live. But I first want to make a suggestion which will not cost the government any money. This is something I have been advocating for a number of years. I refer to the distinction in law which obtains in the United States and in Canada. I am not speaking now so much of the monetary losses that might be suffered by any government or railroad or person; I am speaking of the loss of human life, I am speaking of the injuries to human beings which occur when there is an argument between a railroad engine and a truck or motorcar at a level crossing.

Unless it has been changed recently the general law prevailing in the United States is that of stop, look and listen, while in Canada we leave out the word "stop". The overriding rule of law here is simply look and listen. There are many lawsuits because of accidents at crossing and the usual story is that the whistle was not heard or the train seen because of a bank along the side and that kind of thing. I am not concerned so much about that because anyone who has spoken to a Canadian Pacific or Canadian National engineer no doubt has been told of instances where motorcars have crashed right into the side of a train which was moving across a level crossing. Those are not isolated cases. On the line of railroad with which I am familiar I know that such a thing, hard as it is to believe, has happened again and again.

I do not know under what authority it is, but in the provinces there are laws that vehicles licensed to carry passengers must stop at grade crossings. Trucks stop at grade crossings, and so do the busses carrying school children which are now used in the new scheme of getting children to larger schools. I have never heard from anyone any real reason why we should not have the general rule of stop, look and listen. I repeat that I am not talking about what it may cost the railroad or the man who is injured; I am referring to the injuries which often result in death and which could be almost eliminated if the people could be persuaded to obey that rule. I think they would, once they knew it was a general rule, although it might take time.

If a person stops at a railroad crossing he is likely to look and listen. We would thus do away with the great majority of fatal accidents at level crossings. I am not expecting an immediate answer but I do ask the minister and those associated with him to give this matter their consideration. I intend to go on now to speak about the need for a subway in Calgary, but first I should like to ask the minister if the word "cost" as used in the amendment would cover the damages payable to the occupiers of adjoining properties?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it does.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I want to join with the hon. member for Eglinton, and I crave your indulgence to be permitted to describe a local situation. I have no doubt that the minister knows that the Canadian Pacific practically bisects Calgary from the east to the west. The main business street is Eighth avenue which is a block and a half from the Canadian Pacific. On Ninth avenue are many wholesale concerns and stores, and then comes the railroad, with Tenth avenue after that. The situation is that there is not only the main line but other necessary switches, and the construction of a subway would be rather an expensive operation.

For example, there is a huge flour mill which would be affected because at present they pull their cars across Fourth street, where it is suggested the subway should be. The net result is considerable congestion, much more than normally would be expected. On top of that, Fourth street west is practically the main lane from the north to the south. It is a heavily travelled artery carrying all sorts of traffic. No doubt the minister knows that heavy traffic prefers a level crossing because they like to avoid the steep grades of a subway. This was more particularly true when we pulled our heavy traffic with horses.

I know that it is largely our own problem. I also know that at that point there are gates which I think have been quite effective in bringing about a decrease in loss of human life and damage to property. The matter I have in mind is the suggestion made that in no case should the amount committed for that purpose be over $150,000. The sum of $150,000 will not go very far in the construction of the subway which I and practically everyone in the city from which I come have in mind. There are difficulties of grade that may require the raising of the neighbouring avenue slightly in order to get traffic through. I know that for many years we have been endeavouring to get something done. I know that we can get a substantial contribution from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I am quite sure they do not want to be bothered with the switching back and forth that goes on there resulting in holding up traffic and at times becoming liable to penalties for keeping the crossing blocked for more than five minutes.

I know that the T. Eaton Company, whose very large store is on this avenue, is ready to contribute. I also know what taxes I pay on my home in the city of Calgary. Before the hon. member for Danforth got a promise from the minister to build five or six subways in the outskirts of the city of Toronto I thought I should raise my voice—I think that is the usual expression—to ask for consideration from the minister in connection with this matter. I see that the mayor of Calgary will shortly be coming to Ottawa, and among other members of the government whom he intends to try to influence in the direction that we hope he may influence them he is going to call on the Minister of Transport. For him I bespeak the best consideration which the minister can give.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, while we are discussing this section there is one point I should like to mention. In doing so I recognize it involves the type of case where there is a joint interest between the dominion government and the provincial government concerned as to the particular problem. As mentioned by the member who has just spoken, there are many cases where engineers report automobiles driving right into the side of the engine or other part of the train, and there almost seems to be evidence that there was no regard for the fact that there was a track there. I think those who travel a great deal on the highways in any part of Canada know that many roads passing through wooded areas or where there is a rise and fall in the ground approach rail lines with very little advance notice that there is a track there. I do not care how careful a driver is. At the speeds now permitted by the law on open country highways a car approaches a railroad level crossing so fast that often it will be almost on the track before the driver is aware that the crossing is there.

Immediately the answer occurs to one's mind that there are signs on the highways indicating the presence of railway crossings. It is to the question of those very signs that I am directing my remarks because they are a part of the problem of protecting such crossings. Most of them are still in the same places that they were when cars travelled about half the speed they do today. All too often the sign indicating the presence of a railroad crossing is sufficiently close to the crossing itself that, travelling even within the maximum legal speed limit, there is scarcely time for the brakes to operate, particularly if the road surface is wet.

I earnestly suggest to the minister that consideration be given throughout the whole country in co-operation with provincial highway departments to the placing of the signs warning of railway crossings far enough back so that where there is a curve in a highway, a dip or anything of that kind, or in fact under any circumstances, the careful car driver will have plenty of warning that he is approaching a railway crossing. I have seen several crossings on highways in different parts of the country where the most careful driver really did not have adequate warning that he was about to go over a railway track. Perhaps it may be at the lower part of a depression where, with a wet hard-surfaced road, he will have great difficulty in bringing his car to a stop, if there is any possibility of doing so at all. I am simply taking the discussion on this section as an opportunity to urge the most careful and the earliest possible discussion of this subject with the highway department of each province with the idea of assuring the general practice that such warning signals are well back from the crossing in order to warn drivers of the fact that they will soon be crossing a railway track.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, there are one or two suggestions I should like to make to the minister on this subject having to do with section 1, the sum of $150,000 and the 40 per cent maximum. That will mean that a grade separation costing $266,667 will draw a maximum of $150,000 from the fund. Anything over that will have to be paid entirely by the railway company and the municipality. Under modern conditions of construction I am afraid we are going to find that grade separations, particularly on densely travelled highways, need a great deal more excavation. Grades, either for bridges or for subways, have to be much more gradual now than formerly because of the higher speed of traffic, and consequently the excavation and frontage used for grade separation necessarily are much greater. Therefore I suggest that consideration should be given to removing the maximum of $150,000, and letting the provision be 40 per cent of the over-all cost. I know of one or two grade separations which are pressing at the moment. I have talked to engineers about one of them, and have been informed that the cost will be in the neighbourhood of $350,000. Under the present regulations this would mean that the whole amount over $266,667 would have to be provided by the railway and the municipality, which would act as a deterrent to the immediate commencement of the work on the grade crossing in question.

Another suggestion I have for the minister's consideration is this. The province of Ontario has under consideration a program of new road construction, all of which covers the four-lane highways with a separation between lanes, restricted entrance to the highway from side roads, and which involves an expenditure of about $500 million. That will not be spent this year or next year, but that is the program that has been laid out. I suggest to this house that, in view of the tremendous increase in traffic and the enormous amount of new highway construction in the United States, this expenditure is necessary if we are going to provide arterial highways of a size to take care of the volume of traffic which will be debouched into Ontario from the major points of contact with the new United States highways. When grade separation is undertaken on these new roads I would suggest, therefore, that instead of the limit being 40 per cent of the total cost, it should be increased to 50 per cent or 60 per cent. If these new major trunk arteries are constructed, and for the sake of economy during the initial construction they are built with level crossings, the volume of traffic will build up to such an extent that grade separation will later become an absolute necessity, and the cost of dealing with it will be immeasurably greater than if it were undertaken at the time the road is constructed. I suggest it is a matter of true economy to have these roads constructed, wherever possible, with grade separation.

I come to one other point, and that is that I believe the new sections of the trans-Canada highway particularly should be constructed with the grades separated, and the cost of the work should be considered as an item of expense directly attributable to the highway construction. In my constituency there is a condition which exists in that warning signals, wigwags, bells, lights and other sound signals are frequently activated by freight trains, which are either shunting in one end of the yard or awaiting entry into the major freight yard. This condition has two evil effects. As a matter of fact, the board of transport commissioners did a lot of work with the C.P.R. in that connection, and at one crossing in particular, namely, the Dundas street crossing near Islington a remedy has been found. When a wigwag works because a train is standing there waiting to get into the yard, those people who habitually use that crossing become careless. There is a tendency to disregard the signal, because frequently the wigwag is working for a train which has been standing on that part of the track which activates the signal for periods of fifteen to twenty minutes. While I do not know of any specific accident that has taken place because of that condition, it is extremely dangerous. Frequently I have seen motorists cross the track when the wigwag was working without even glancing up to see whether there was a train coming. It is rather like calling "wolf, wolf", and eventually there will be a wolf.

I do not believe the compulsory stop sign is a workable law. I understand that the compulsory stop sign is used in the province of Quebec, but not in the province of Ontario. It is seldom obeyed in those provinces which have that law, and I feel it is possibly not a wise provision because it is merely written into the statute books, and then the law falls into disrepute. I believe that completes what I have to say on this question at the moment, Mr. Chairman, but I want to reiterate what I said before, because the evidence has shown that over 80 per cent of the accidents which have taken place in the last five years in Canada have taken place at unprotected country crossings where the whistle was sounded as a warning. In the urban sections where crossings were protected by wigwags, lights, or other sound signals, the accident incidence has greatly diminished.

I just want to bring that point out because this abolition of the whistle sounding at certain level crossings in my own constituency has definitely and specifically not resulted in any increase in accidents at those level crossings. The board of transport commissioners have insisted that where the whistle was done away with the automatic electric signal should be installed. The net result is that these crossings have a much better record over the past year than they had prior to the installation of the wigwag.

Mr. Chevrier: What I propose doing is to answer these questions on the second clause, if I may.

Mr. Cameron: The riding I have the honour to represent, namely High Park, like the riding represented by the hon. member for Danforth, is one of those ridings in which this problem is acute. The railways come into Toronto mainly from the east and the west, and when they go out to the north of Toronto they also usually go out through the east or the west end. High Park riding or constituency originally comprised part of the town of Toronto Junction, which fact might indicate to you, Mr. Chairman, that it was a railway centre. The railways coming into Toronto from western Ontario mainly come through High Park riding, as also do those going to the northern part of Ontario. The result is that I, like the hon. member for Calgary West, can say that we have railways running not only east and west but north and south. As a result of that fact we have many situations in which there are level crossings which are a danger to the people living in the riding and to those who come there to do business. I have particularly in mind the crossing at a place known as Junction road and Weston road. It is right where the Canadian National Railways station in west Toronto is situated. It is on the main line of the C.P.R. and of the C.N.R. It is a difficult crossing and one which frequently blocks traffic coming north and south into Toronto.

I have just made a short summary here while I have been listening to some of the debate, and I can easily think of nine or ten crossings which could be given consideration in High Park riding alone. There are four or five of major importance. All of them have been ordered by the board of transport commissioners to be done at some appropriate time although no time limit has been fixed. I am rising to my feet today only to call the attention of the Minister of Transport to the situation in that particular riding. I hope that due consideration will be given to these level crossings in that important part of the city of Toronto.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I might be allowed at this stage to reply to the suggestions and questions that have been put to me by various members who have taken part in this debate. First of all, I should like to tell the committee how greatly I appreciate the co-operation which it is extending on this legislation. Apparently everyone is in favour of the principle of this legislation, and I think everyone is in favour of the two clauses of the bill. From the discussion which took place, both on the resolution and today, I do not think there is any doubt that the bill meets with the approval of hon. members in general. It is true that some members during the previous debate, and again today, have urged that the amount of money for any one project should be increased as well as the percentage. With those suggestions I should like to deal.

The hon. member for Eglinton, the hon. member for York West and perhaps one or two others suggested that, because of the fact that today we live in an era which is far more advanced from the point of view of highway construction and the increase in highway traffic, the percentage amount payable from the fund to any one project should be increased. The answer to that suggestion is that the government has given careful consideration to this bill, has weighed the pros and cons and has decided to leave the percentage where it is, although it has recommended an increase in the maximum of the amount of a grant from $100,000 to $150,000.

If hon. members look at what was said in the debate on the resolution, they will recall that the percentage has been increased substantially since the inception of the fund. At first, when the fund was established, the percentage payment out of the fund for any one project was 20 per cent. Then it was increased to 25 per cent; then at a later date it was again increased to 40 per cent. The maximum payment of $100,000 has been increased to $150,000 because of higher costs of all projects. A greater percentage than 40 per cent, as has been suggested, would quickly deplete the fund. The other day I put on Hansard the balance in the fund as of March 28, 1950. It was $363,827. If the percentage were to be raised to 50 per cent or 60 per cent, as has been urged, it might well be that two or three projects would exhaust the fund in any one year. I think that certainly would not be the intention of parliament. The intention of parliament is that, as much as possible, these works should be undertaken not only in one particular section but in all parts of the country.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I ask the minister at this point if he has put on the record the number and the location of projects that have been approved by the board of transport commissioners and are now subject to construction in Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I have not.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has the minister those figures?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I have not those figures. I could produce them on the estimates. It should be an easy matter to obtain them.

The hon. member for Danforth and the hon. member for High Park spoke with reference to projects in which they were particularly interested in the city of Toronto. I think the hon. member for Danforth stated that while the city of Toronto had been fairly well looked after, it had perhaps not been looked after as well as the ridings of some of our friends elsewhere. I am sure that was not meant in any derogatory sense.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Oh, no. That is just natural.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to tell the committee what has been granted in the province of Ontario from the grade crossing fund as compared with what the other provinces have received. I have before me a statement which indicates the expenditure for protection of highway crossings from 1909 to December 31, 1949. The total for the provinces, not including Newfoundland, paid out of the grade crossing fund amounts to $12,098,000. Ontario received $6,003,000.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): We are glad to have a minister from Toronto, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chevrier: I need not go on and give the other figures by provinces. They can be obtained if need be.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Would the minister give the figures for Nova Scotia now?

Mr. Chevrier: It is $738,116. I should tell the hon. member for Danforth that six applications were made to the board of transport commissioners from the city of Toronto. Two of these have been approved by the board. One concerns the Jones avenue crossing, the estimated cost of which was $700,000, and the other the Royce-Dupont, the estimated cost of which was $645,000. Four applications are now before the board affecting the city of Toronto. One is Dufferin street, another is Symington avenue, another Woodbine avenue, and the fourth Bloor street.

The hon. member mentioned other crossings, as did the hon. member for High Park, in their respective constituencies, but so far as I am aware the applications have not been studied thus far by the board.

The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa made certain interesting suggestions with reference to the railway problem as it affected the city of Portage la Prairie; and he spoke about the fact that electric signs were installed at one end but nothing at the other end for the protection of those persons using the highway at level crossing with the railway. I think if an application were made for crossing protection, either wigwag or some other kind, by that city, the board would be glad to give it consideration. He raised another point concerning crossings of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific and the trans-Canada highway. He said he thought that local interests should not be required to pay for these projects as the result would be higher taxation so far as the municipality was concerned. Anything that affects the trans-Canada highway will, I take it, be looked after by the grant that is being made by the federal government to the provinces up to 50 per cent.

The hon. member for Calgary West, as did the leader of the opposition, raised the question of distinction in law as between the United States and Canada with reference to crossing signs. He stated that in the United States there are signs at the crossings which read "Stop, look and listen", whereas in Canada the signs simply state "Look and listen". I shall be glad to bring to the consideration of the board of transport commissioners the suggestion of my hon. friend, but I should like to point out to the committee that there may well be some doubt as to whether or not the board of transport commissioners have jurisdiction to order such signs on highways. Perhaps the board can require stop signs to be erected at crossings, but it is doubtful whether the board can enforce observance by highway traffic because of the jurisdiction of the provinces over traffic.

The hon. member for York West made some interesting and valuable suggestions, which I think I have answered in dealing with the observations of the hon. member for Eglinton. He made other suggestions concerning compulsory stop signs, wigwags activated by shunting and the like, which are really not covered by this section. I did not want to interrupt the hon. member, the leader of the opposition or the hon. member for Calgary West, who were dealing with stop signs, but this is actually a section to increase the maximum amount from $100,000 to $150,000 for any one project.

I think I have dealt with all of the questions and suggestions which were made.

On section 2—Appropriation for highway crossings.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I should like to direct one question to the minister in regard to a dangerous underpass on No. 2 highway west of Melbourne, known as the devil's funnel. There have been a good many fatalities there. Every time a fatality has occurred a survey has been made and a lot of talk of improvement has gone on. The underpass is very narrow and it is on a bit of a curve. In view of the fact that they are planning to make improvements to the highway there as well, can the minister tell me how far advanced the plans are, and is it likely that an improvement will be made there this year?

Mr. Chevrier: We are on clause 2, which increases the grant to the fund from $500,000 to $1 million, and really this matter is not pertinent to it; but during the consideration of my estimates I can get the information for my hon. friend. I should say this to him. I would not know at what stage the project is now; and even if the question were in order I do not think I could give him the answer offhand. For instance, I would not know whether an application has been made to the board, but I shall be glad to look into it and see that the hon. member gets the information.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO POWER OF MINISTER TO MAKE REGULATIONS, ETC.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 153, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

He said: This bill to amend the Aeronautics Act does not involve any basic changes in government authority or in the policy which the government has pursued in the field of aviation. Experience in the administration of the act during the period of rapid growth of commercial civil aviation since the end of the recent war has, however, brought to light a number of lesser changes and adjustments which if made will clarify the intent of the act and make it possible for the civil aviation authorities to avoid confusion in interpretation and to act with that degree of flexibility which rapid changes in flying require.

It is not necessary at this stage to review all these lesser amendments in detail since they are fully explained in the notes accompanying the bill. I will, however, mention a few of the more important in order to give the house some indication of the main points as well as the general nature and type of the changes proposed.

Part I of the Aeronautics Act represents the original framework of law approved by parliament for the development and regulation of civil aviation shortly after the first world war. It relates to the powers and duties of the government and the minister and, in consequence, of that part of the Department of Transport which deals with air matters and is concerned primarily with technical control; that is, such matters as airport and airway development and technical and safety regulation of all civil flying. It also concerns certain references to national defence in view of the fact that the civil aviation machinery was originally set up within a military framework.

Part II of the act, which was added at a later stage in 1944, provides for the economic supervision and regulation of commercial aviation in such matters as licensing, interrelationships, fares and rates, and describes the powers of the government, the minister, and the air transport board in this field.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Certain of the amendments in this bill are designed to clarify the relationship between parts I and II by eliminating possible duplication in coverage between the two sections. References to national defence are corrected or eliminated as well, in view of the fact that the necessary coverage in this field is now provided elsewhere.

Another point of some importance relates to jurisdiction over Canadian aircraft or Canadian air services operating outside the territorial limits of Canada. It is obviously desirable that aircraft of Canadian registry and Canadian commercial air services should observe adequate technical and safety requirements when flying outside the country as well as within Canada; and further, that in the general field of regulation of routes, economic policies, fares to be charged and similar matters, Canadian carriers should have some responsibility to the Canadian authorities. This is not a matter of maintaining a pattern for Canadian operations abroad that is consistent with the domestic pattern, but is a matter also of observing the commitments we have undertaken in relation to other governments under the international civil aviation convention and under various bilateral air agreements to which the Canadian government is a party. In the multilateral convention and the bilateral agreements, governments have assumed certain responsibilities with regard to the actions of their own aircraft and commercial air services when in the territories of other countries. In order to carry out these international commitments, the government's jurisdiction over Canadian aircraft and Canadian air services must not only apply within the bounds of Canada but should be general. The bill, therefore, proposes changes in both part I and part II which will satisfy these objectives.

The responsibility for the economic supervision and regulation of commercial air services in Canada is based upon the definition of a commercial air service as an operation for hire or reward. In view of certain doubts that have been cast upon the meaning of hire and reward in this context, a definition of this phrase which will eliminate doubt as to the general definition of a commercial air service is included in this bill.

The sections in both part I and part II of the act which deal with the imposition of penalties for violation of the law have been changed to make them more like similar provisions in other federal statutes, and to provide for somewhat stiffer penalties. This is considered desirable in view of the fact that existing penalties have been found to lack sufficient deterrent value to combat the seriousness of the offences committed. Fewer violations would occur and fewer prosecutions would be necessary if penalties imposed were somewhat more severe.

Part II of the act grants general jurisdiction over commercial air services, but the new bill would exempt military aircraft from this jurisdiction since these should not be put in the same category generally as commercial air services, even though upon occasion, for example in the air survey field, certain revenue may be received by the R.C.A.F. for the use of military aircraft on federal government work.

The act presently requires the air transport board to make a finding of public convenience and necessity in regard to the establishment of any scheduled air service. One of the proposed amendments will permit the board to waive this requirement in the case of foreign scheduled air services since provision for these services is made on the basis of a government decision through bilateral agreements between Canada and other nations. The additional requirement that the air transport board subsequently find public convenience and necessity before granting a licence to such foreign carrier is inconsistent with the carrying out of the obligations assumed by the government in these bilateral air agreements.

It is also proposed to change somewhat the powers of the air transport board with regard to investigation of possible violations of the law and to its powers to take corrective action without waiting on formal complaints in these matters. This should simplify and make more expeditious the remedying of difficulties.

As I stated above, the other charges in the bill are of a relatively minor nature and need not be detailed at this time. It is my intention, if the house approves, to refer the bill for detailed examination at the committee stage to the parliamentary committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) was waiting to make a few remarks at this stage. Unfortunately however he is now in a committee meeting and cannot be here for a few minutes. Meantime there are two or three points I should like to place before the minister and the house in connection with this bill and, in fact, in connection with the whole plan of administering civil aviation in Canada.

When the amendment to the Aeronautics Act was under consideration in 1944 there was a lengthy review of the situation, and the comment was made that the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was in effect dictator of civil aviation in Canada. Hansard for June 6, 1944, at page 3601, shows that I asked this question:

> But if it is administered under this act it will be very directly under the minister. In effect, it makes the minister a dictator in respect of all the airways in Canada, does it not?
> Mr. Howe: Perhaps so; but who would you suggest should be dictator?

That was a most emphatic statement, to which I replied:

> I do not think there should be a dictator, myself.

The Minister of Transport has not made clear to the house in his remarks this afternoon what the present position is with respect to control over civil aviation. I believe he now has jurisdiction under the Aeronautics Act, in his capacity as Minister of Transport. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in his usual way, has a finger in the pie somewhere; and we would like to find out just exactly where it is. I believe he personally administers everything having to do with Trans-Canada Air Lines, and I am told that at the meeting of the special committee on government-owned railways and shipping he stated bluntly that when there were new routes to be decided, he made the decision—although under the Aeronautics Act, as I read it, such decisions should be made by the Minister of Transport.

For instance, section 3 of the act provides that it shall be the duty of the minister to do various things, among which is the duty to prescribe aerial routes. Obviously it was the intention when the act was amended before that the very drastic controls would be in the hands of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. Now that he has gone to the Department of Trade and Commerce, we would like to know just what the position is, particularly when he still keeps a firm hold on Trans-Canada Air Lines.

I cannot understand why the Minister of Transport should not be in control of all civil aviation, including Trans-Canada Air Lines. We have this division of authority brought about only because of the dictatorial attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He has no business controlling Trans-Canada Air Lines. If he is going to do that he should be Minister of Transport, not Minister of Trade and Commerce. However, there is the picture; and before the bill passes we would ask the Minister of Transport to explain this situation.

Another aspect of the Aeronautics Act was discussed at some length in 1944. It had to do with the appeal from the decision as to whether or not a company would get a licence. That appeal is not to the governor in council, it is to the minister himself. At that time it was to the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). That minister had this whole aviation business tied up so tightly that you could not get within half a mile of an aeroplane without his permission. That may be stretching the point a little, but it illustrates my argument. That was the result of the amendments of 1944. As I read the bill before us there is no reduction in that drastic power which rests in the minister.

In fact those powers are being extended because now the minister will have the power to decide with regard to routes to be flown by foreign lines. Apparently the air transport board did have some power over those companies in so far as flying operations in Canada were concerned, but now a provision is to be written into the act to the effect that those companies can be exempted from any control by the air transport board. As I understand it, that means the control will rest in a minister. I have no doubt that that authority will be exercised either directly or indirectly by the Minister of Trade and Commerce because the routes to be flown in Canada will be in accordance with treaties entered into between Canada and other nations. That will mean that he will have a finger in the pie.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member's trend of thought, but let me tell him immediately that he is absolutely in error when he thinks that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is responsible for the final decision with reference to appeals. An appeal under the Aeronautics Act is to the Minister of Transport. All the suggestions with reference to the Minister of Trade and Commerce made thus far are not applicable save and except that Trans-Canada Air Lines is responsible to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The rest of civil aviation is covered by the Aeronautics Act.

Mr. Green: At the moment I was dealing with routes flown in Canada by foreign companies. As I understand it, they will now be subject to agreement between Canada and the particular foreign country, and the air transport board will have no authority. That means that the authority will rest somewhere in the cabinet to decide just what routes are to be flown. That power may not rest with the minister, and in fact it is not clear from the proposed amendment just where that power will rest.

Mr. Chevrier: The power will be with the government to decide the policy in connection with international routes.

Mr. Green: That is where the Minister of Trade and Commerce comes into the picture. He will still be in the government; he will still be running Trans-Canada Air Lines and I am quite sure he will have a great deal to say in connection with routes flown in Canada by foreign companies.

Mr. Chevrier: It will be a sorry day when we lose the advice of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on matters generally, and on these matters particularly.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Trade and Commerce is such a dictator that if he were to step out of the government there would be no government left.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is going pretty far.

Mr. Chevrier: That requires no answer.

Mr. Green: It is too true. Another point about which there should be some clarification is in connection with the amendments to section 12 of the Aeronautics Act. Subsection 2 of that section contains the strange provision that no licence shall be issued to persons engaged in other than aircraft transport. The subsection reads:

> No such licence shall be issued in respect of a commercial air service, owned, leased, controlled or operated by any person who is engaged in the transport of goods or passengers for hire or reward by means other than aircraft unless the governor in council is of opinion that it is in the public interest that such licence be issued.

That provision was written into the law in 1944 because the Minister of Trade and Commerce had stated that as a matter of government policy he was going to kick the railroads out of the air business, he was going to take away from the Canadian National Railways the control of Trans-Canada Air Lines, and he was going to take the Canadian Pacific Air Lines Limited from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and throw them into the Atlantic or the Pacific ocean or both.

At that time the minister had a grudge against the Canadian Pacific and it was the announced policy that no railway company, no shipping company, and I think it went so far as to provide that no trucking company, could go into the aviation business unless the governor in council was of opinion that such a licence should be issued. It was the declared government policy that the railroads had to get out of the air business.

Some of us fought this in the house strenuously. We pointed out that Canadian Pacific Air Lines were flying a route from Vancouver and Edmonton to the Yukon and giving excellent service; also a route along the north shore of the St. Lawrence. We pointed out that there was no one to take over those services. But in spite of all that, the minister repeated time and again that he was going to put the railroads out of the aviation business.

They were given a year after the war to get out of the air. What is the position today? Although that provision is still in the act the Canadian National Railways I believe still own the shares of Trans-Canada Air Lines. If I am wrong in that statement I hope the minister will correct me. Canadian Pacific Air Lines now have the blessing of the government. They are carrying on domestic flights, and in addition have been given a licence to fly transpacific routes. As the policy has worked out, it is exactly the same as we advocated in 1944 when the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) brushed us aside with such vehemence. I should like the Minister of Transport to explain why subsection 2 of section 12 is not repealed in the amending statute. It seems to me that provision is contrary to the actual policy of the government at the present time. The policy has been completely changed and yet that section remains in the act. So far as I can see the only use it can have is as a sword hanging over the heads of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Canadian National Railways and any other transportation company which may go into the air transport business.

When the Minister of Trade and Commerce introduced the amendments in 1944 he had a lot to say about the functions of the air transport board. His statement will be found at page 3599 of Hansard for that year. He pointed out that the board was to have the power to license aircraft. He went on to say:

> . . . In addition the board will function to advise the government as to ways and means of advancing civil aviation. The board will take the initiative in laying out routes, within Canada and overseas, which promise possibilities of profitable operation and will guide the government in seeing that these routes are operated by Canadians who are capable of carrying out such undertakings.

It would appear that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has now reached the position where he no longer needs any advice along these lines.

Mr. Drew: He has a special source of information.

Mr. Green: He has special connections with a subterranean place. That has to do with the pipe lines bills, however. Throughout his remarks he built up the air transport board as a wonderful body which was going to be at his elbow advising him about routes, finding new routes and getting new companies into the aviation field. In fact they were to be the main body in promoting civil aviation in Canada. Yet in the bill before us today we find that their powers are being restricted. Actually the situation is that the air transport board has never been given an opportunity to carry out the functions which it was intended it should carry out when created in 1944. I am afraid that is because of the overbearing and dictatorial attitude of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce with regard to the whole field of civil aviation.

My final point has to do with the judicial powers of the air transport board. When the amendments were passed in 1944 it was made quite clear that the board was not to be an independent judicial body like the board of transport commissioners. That would never do. Incidentally the board of transport commissioners had been administering aviation before the 1944 amendments, but the air transport board was never given an independent status. Although it acted as a judicial body in so far as applications for licences were concerned, it never had the final say. All its decisions were subject to veto or change by the minister.

Before the bill receives second reading I hope the Minister of Transport will make it clear to the house whether there is any intention to change that position. Is the air transport board to be made an independent body or is it to be still under the thumb of the Minister of Trade and Commerce? I have never been able to see how the board members have a proper chance to act judicially under the present law simply because they were not given any independence and all their decisions are subject to review by the minister. I hope the Minister of Transport will deal with the various points I have raised when he is closing the present debate.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I propose to speak on second reading. I will merely rise now and take the adjournment.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the amendments that are before us are amendments that are primarily intended to expand the functions and responsibilities of the board set up by the Aeronautics Act. At the time the amendments to this act were introduced in 1944, there was a great deal of discussion in regard to the structure of the board itself, as to the measure of actual control over the board which the minister was called upon to exercise. It was pointed out that the board would not be a judicial or semi-judicial body exercising independent authority in the manner of the civil aviation board in the United States, or of other boards of that type. The board, in fact, was really an agency which carried out its functions with the authority and under the direction of the minister.

Many of the statements made at that time, which expressed concern about the possibility of this board merely becoming an instrument of ministerial authority, have not been realized. They have not been realized, not because the dangers inherent in the act were not there, but rather because the board has not carried out the functions which it was intended to carry out at the time it was created by these earlier amendments.

My remarks tonight are directed particularly to my own conviction that the time has come for us to realize that civil aviation in this country has been stifled, and that it has not been assisted by the government in advancing in the way that it should have been. I believe that this is the appropriate time to make certain suggestions, which I do in all earnestness, in the hope that with the amendments which are before us the original purpose of this board, no matter whether or not it was properly planned in the first place, will be carried out in future proposals, to the extent of advancing in every way possible the development of civil aviation in this country and outside of it by Canadian aircraft and air crews.

I did begin to make some comments on this subject on an earlier occasion when we were discussing the estimates. Now that the bill is before us, perhaps I could best continue those remarks. Canada had demonstrated that there is something in the life of our people, something in the way in which we adapt ourselves to great spaces, something in the vitality of our people that comes from the sort of country in which we were born or in which we have come to live, that gives us a special opportunity of leading the whole world in this new type of transportation. Our sights should be high. We should be looking upward all the time we discuss civil aviation. In the first world war, in a completely new means of locomotion and in an entirely new type of warfare, young Canadians showed that they had qualities second to none in the whole world. Not simply to clarify military history but simply to leave the evidence as a permanent record of that fact before our people, it is well for us to recall from time to time that the top pilots of the fighter squadrons of the world were Canadians. It is a good thing for young Canadians today to remember men like Billy Bishop, Raymond Collishaw, Billy Barker and a number of other men who followed close to them, and whose names will forever be recorded on the pages of Canadian history. It was a gallant company.

These men did not let their interests in aviation end with the war. Many of them went out into new and unorganized fields, and created great civil aviation developments here in this country. Men who had taken their part in that war, young men like MacLaren, who in a few months rose to be the sixth ranking pilot in the allied air forces, took their place in civil aviation, along with Roy Brown, Punch Dickens, Wop May, Gilbert McConachie, whose names are all associated with the development of the air routes of this country. Canadians even today hardly realize the extent to which we were pioneers in air development.

The great Eldorado radium mine which played its part in the closing military history of this last war was discovered from the air from a plane flown by Punch Dickens. The great mineral developments of northern Manitoba were actually spotted from the air. Some of the great new developments in northern Ontario and northern Quebec were first seen from exploring aircraft. Aircraft played an enormous part in the discovery of the almost limitless iron resources of Quebec and Labrador. No country in the world has benefited more in a positive and measurable way than has this country from the employment of aircraft in the hands of young and vigorous men of vision and of energy who were prepared to open out new routes and new fields of endeavour.

Then in this last world war once again Canadians demonstrated those same unique qualities. There are hon. members in this house who took their full share in the glorious record of the R.C.A.F. We ended that war with the greatest pool of trained pilots, trained aircrew and trained technicians per capita of any country in the world. We had everything wide open to us. The United States was undoubtedly in the most favoured position, with their enormous numbers of trained men and women and their enormous productive capacity. But next to them, we certainly were in a position to go out and to take the lead in this new means of transport. Whether or not the amendments to the Aeronautics Act of 1944 were well conceived, at least it can be said that in setting up the air transport board at that time and in creating certain authority in the hands of that board, it was quite obviously intended that this, with the guidance of the minister, should be for the purpose of taking advantage of those very opportunities to which I have referred and those opportunities which were so clearly in the minds of our people at that time with all the activities that were going on in connection with the commonwealth air training program in this country.

Those opportunities have not been developed as they should have been developed. I say this now not for the purpose of criticizing what is past but with the hope that we shall recognize the enormous opportunities we have; that, with whatever amendments are made, the original intention of the air transport board will be carried out; and that we shall as a nation extend our air activities so that we may occupy in this new means of transport that position of leadership which our own native qualifications as a people make possible and which geography has offered to us with very special advantages.

Every young Canadian should be trained to look at the world by examining the circular globe instead of a flat map. If they get their idea of geography with a clear impression of our extraordinary advantages in air transportation, perhaps our people will realize the extent to which we have opportunities open to no other nation in the world. The shortest routes from New York or Chicago to Tokyo, to any great city of China, to Melbourne or to any of the cities of the east, lie through Canada. The shortest routes to London, to Paris, to Rome, to Berlin—yes, and to Moscow—are through Canada. East and west, geography has placed us on the main air routes of the world. We should be putting all the energy and initiative that we possess into the development of air routes out to those distant points—to South Africa, to South America and to every part of the world —so that Canadian aircraft may be known in every great airport where the commerce of the air moves back and forth.

This is no uncertain dream. This is no loosely optimistic expression of hope. This is something that can be done. We have seen how other people have done it. Holland, a tiny country across which fast aircraft can travel in from an hour to an hour and a half, ended the war during which it had been occupied by the forces of Germany with no aircraft of their own, and with relatively few trained pilots. Today they have a company which is the third air transport system in the world. The Dutch KLM is today flying air routes of 75,000 miles as against total air routes under the largest Canadian transport organization, Trans-Canada Air Lines, of 16,000 miles. The thing which should make every Canadian think today is the fact that a large part of the expansion of those activities of KLM was carried out by young Canadians, because a large percentage of the pilots and technicians of KLM, which is known in every great airport of the world, are Canadians who went there to use the special skill they had gained during the war or in the days immediately after. Everything that we do as members of parliament should, I believe, be for the purpose of unleashing the unbounded energy of our vigorous people in this special type of transportation for which we are so unusually qualified. What we should avoid, what we should fight against in every way we can, is anything of a restrictive nature which denies to young men and women of vigour and of vision the opportunity to extend the development of this great transportation system which we can build. For that reason we should examine more carefully what the functions were that the air transport board was supposed to carry out, and what has actually happened since that time.

The amendments now before us are intended to increase the opportunity of the board to do certain things which will be to the advantage of civil aviation in this country. It is intended to extend the power of the board:

> To undertake, and to co-operate with persons undertaking, such products, technical research, study or investigation as in his opinion—

—that is the minister's opinion—

> —will promote the development of aeronautics in Canada.

It is also intended to extend the power of the board:

> To take such action as may be necessary to secure, . . . rights . . . in international air traffic.

It is also intended to extend the power of the board:

> To investigate, examine and report on the operation and development of commercial air services within or partly within Canada or the limits of the territorial waters of Canada.

It is also intended to extend the authority of the board to recommend regulations which will be adopted by the government for the control or operation of aircraft registered in Canada wherever such aircraft may be. There are a number of other amendments to this act which come in the early part of the bill now before us. That sounds very well; naturally hon. members will feel that the extension of these opportunities will be of advantage to the board. But it would be well for all of us to remember that the board has not been exercising the functions which it was intended to exercise. One of the reasons for that became fully apparent in the evidence which was given recently before the committee on railways and shipping, where evidence was taken in regard to the activities of the Trans-Canada Air Lines. Just as an example of what I mean I would recall that when we were seeking to ascertain the manner in which Trans-Canada Air Lines opened up new routes, we learned that Trans-Canada Air Lines did not decide what new routes would be taken. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), not the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), made it quite clear that the decision in regard to new routes was under his direction, and in one of the typically forceful expressions that he is given to making from time to time he left no doubt about it that that was his responsibility.

Mr. Chevrier: While I am a member of the committee on railways and shipping, I was not present on the occasion to which my hon. friend refers, but the information I have—I wish my hon. friend had the evidence—is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not make that statement. He said that it was the responsibility of the government to decide new T.C.A. routes, and it was the policy of the government to do that.

Mr. Drew: I quite agree with the minister that he said it was the responsibility of the government, and I shall be very happy to make the exact reference to the evidence, but I point out that in explaining the way it was done the Minister of Trade and Commerce left no doubt whatever that he was the one whose views would be considered in that respect. After all, that is the very point I wish to make. We have this extraordinary situation, and I did mention it the other night. Actually I have been hopeful that the government would take some action in regard to this unusual situation. The Trans-Canada Air Lines is not an independent publicly-owned organization. The Trans-Canada Air Lines is a fully-owned subsidiary of the Canadian National Railways. It is an organization in which the total holding of securities is in the hands of the Canadian National Railways.

To a very large extent the directors of the two organizations are the same men. Yet we have the situation that while the parent organization, the Canadian National Railways, is under the ministerial responsibility of the Minister of Transport, the wholly-owned subsidiary, the Trans-Canada Air Lines, is under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That is not an argument as to the relative merits of the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Trade and Commerce. We, after all, are dealing with an act of parliament, a bill which is presented to us for consideration, which does not deal with individuals as individuals, but establishes a legal structure under which any minister, whoever he may be from time to time, must carry out the responsibilities assigned by that statute.

Under this bill now before us a board is set up which has the supervising authority over civil aviation. That board is under the Minister of Transport. That board is charged with the responsibility of investigating new routes, carrying out investigations and explorations for the purpose of extending the activities of our air services, not merely the chosen instrument, Trans-Canada Air Lines, but all air services; and nevertheless you have the situation that the minister in charge of Trans-Canada Air Lines, the chosen instrument in the domestic field and externally, is under the Minister of Trade and Commerce; whereas the Minister of Transport is not only the minister responsible for the parent organization, the Canadian National Railways, but is also the minister under whose authority the air transport board is bound to act, under the wording of this statute.

That can only cause confusion; that can only cause unnecessary duplication of discussion and duplication of representation, because you have the same men dealing with the Canadian National Railways on the one hand going to the Minister of Transport about their problems in relation to the railways, and incidentally their problems in relation to their subsidiary, Trans-Canada Air Lines, and you have the same men, or very largely the same men, called upon to go to another minister to discuss the problems of Trans-Canada Air Lines, the subsidiary, in regard to the very subject matter that by the Aeronautics Act is placed under the board, and the supervision of the minister in relation to that board.

I am convinced that part of the reason Canada has not extended its air activities as it should lies in the frustration created by this severance of responsibility. Whether it be the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) or whether it be the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), I am satisfied that good business sense suggests that it should be the same minister dealing with these two organizations which are interrelated in their legal structure, two organizations which very largely have the same directors, two organizations in which the officials perform in a number of cases the same functions. These two organizations should be brought under the same minister, whoever that minister may be.

Then if we do that, and the same minister in turn is the minister responsible for the activities of the air transport board, you have an integrated organization which can direct all its activities to the development and the extension of civil air services in this country. I would of course emphasize the fact that it is civil air services we are speaking about, because the military services are under the Department of National Defence, outside the field of this discussion.

It is not only in the air services out to the distant points of the world that we have failed to take advantage of the great opportunities we possess; it is also right here in our own country. Look at the air map. Look at the routes, and you will see that we have a single trunk line across the country. We have only a few lines running north and south—very few. We have none of those feeder services which today are an essential part of the full development of any great trunk system of air transportation.

Do not let anyone try to tell the Canadian people that we have not opportunities—great opportunities—for feeder services here in this country that we are not using today. Look at the British isles, and see how small they are when compared with the size of this country. Yet they have feeder lines running out from the large airports at London and Glasgow and all the other cities of England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales. Those lines not only supply a service to the people in those communities who wish to fly only short distances, when compared with our distances here, but they also provide additional passengers for the trunk routes flying to different parts of the world.

In Ontario and Quebec today there are well over eight million people; that is a substantial population. It is a population that is fairly well concentrated in those two provinces. There are tremendous opportunities for feeder lines in connection with the smaller cities, and to the airports which already exist as a carry-over from the war. Applications have been made for opportunities to operate those feeder lines. Such feeder lines would not only give a convenient service to those municipalities, and a new service to them, but they would feed passengers to Trans-Canada Air Lines and other trunk services as well.

The same is true in all of Canada. There are places where short runs are being made, and being made successfully. For instance, in the maritime provinces we find Maritime Central Airways.

Mr. McLure: The best feeder line in Canada.

Mr. Drew: I was just going to say that it is one of the most successful, if not the most successful feeder line in Canada, operating south to Fredericton and Moncton, and over to what we are told is the most beautiful city in Canada, the city of Charlottetown. It gives a type of service which not only affords an advantage to the various places it serves but also brings large numbers of passengers to Moncton to get aboard the Trans-Canada Air Lines service going both ways.

This should be encouraged. It should be an openly declared policy that private feeder lines will be encouraged where they apply. There should be no dog-in-the-manger attitude, that routes which cannot be operated by Trans-Canada Air Lines will not be operated at all. I hope no statement will be made based upon the question of the extent to which formal applications have gone. I am sure those associated with the air transport board are well informed in regard to those companies which have sought to operate these feeder services. But in most cases they were told that as a matter of policy it was not likely that they were going to be able to get ahead with that service. And for that very reason the formal procedure may never have been carried past that point. We have in this country, right across Canada, a number of organizations which are ready to carry out feeder services of this type in a way which would be helpful not only to the country as a whole but also to Trans-Canada Air Lines and to Canadian Pacific Air Lines on those main routes which they operate.

Although I do personally believe that the air transport board is wrongly constituted, and although I believe that it should be a semi-judicial body like the civil aeronautics board in Washington, not under the direct authority or direct instruction of a minister, but rather as an independent body passing judgment on applications with an even measure of consideration for all applicants, whether they be public or private organizations, nevertheless I recognize that the question of the constitution of the board is not actually before us in connection with these amendments. Therefore I leave the matter there.

However, I do raise these questions now, because I believe that this is the time, when we have before us these amendments extending the responsibilities of the air transport board, to say we believe that Canada can lead the whole world in developing this new type of transportation, if only opportunities will be thrown wide open to all who can use their knowledge and initiative in giving a service of this kind.

I would hope that, far from taking in a sense of criticism these remarks about the division of authority between ministers, the government would accept these suggestions as helpful, and that it will realize that we can go far ahead of the point we have reached if we are prepared to streamline these governmental services in every way, and bring the functions of the air transport board, the government air service, and all other organizations of that type under one minister and under one board—and then, in doing that, to have a declared policy of wide-open development of air services in this country.

We are not now arguing as to the merits or demerits of the chosen instrument of policy. The people of this country have accepted the fact that there should be a chosen instrument, the Trans-Canada Air Lines. But with the acceptance of that policy there should also be an insistence that because a chosen instrument has been set up the desires to advance the interests of that chosen instrument should not be a deterrent to the development of private enterprise in the way of feeder lines or trunk lines where such trunk lines will be to the advantage of this country.

I hope that, with these widened opportunities, with the increased measure of authority contemplated by the government, the government will now declare that we are going to extend air development in Canada in every way we can so that every community which can be served by air transportation will be served and that the aircraft of Canada will fly to every great airport throughout the world where air routes can be developed to the advantage of this country and to the extension of our commercial services.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a few words which will be addressed to the points made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) at the beginning of his remarks. I should like to echo what the leader of the opposition said as to the challenge and opportunity which is afforded to us by this new and wonderful means of transportation. A year ago I happened to be at Gander airport. One could not be there for very long, no matter how little one liked flying, however pedestrian one was by nature, without his imagination being kindled by finding there in a rather remote part of Newfoundland what could not be described otherwise than as one of the great crossroads of the world.

As the leader of the opposition has already indicated, in that great station there you will find offices of the Dutch air lines, the French, the British, the United States and many others. You meet every kind of people. There I met a journalist who said he could make a living just writing stories about the variety of people who come through that airport. I could certainly believe him after seeing those whom I saw there at that time.

Another point I should like to make is the aptitude of our own men for flying. I remember talking to a British air official early in the last war who mentioned some things which interested me a good deal. First of all he stressed the fact that our men excelled in the air. He said, "You know, your boys seem to have some special advantages. I think driving motorcars along your long straight roads has given them a sense of space and distance which perhaps the young men in England do not get." Then he said another interesting thing. "Every Canadian seems to be not only at home with engines but to be always prepared to rely on his engine. When he gets into a plane he seems to think that the engine is going to do everything he wants it to. Canadians have this feeling far more than our own young Englishmen." However, let no one suggest for a moment that the English flying men do not also excel.

There is another thing that comes back to me from the first war. I was at Salisbury plains in the autumn of 1914. All those who were there will remember those strange monuments at Stonehenge, but there were also other monuments there. A great deal of pioneer flying took place at that point and there were many monuments dedicated to the memory of officers killed while flying. One could not help but feel he was witnessing the evidence of sacrifices made by the pioneers. Many of the men who flew in this war felt that they would not have left the ground in the machines flown in 1914. At that time their only offensive weapon was a rifle, and many of them made what use they could of it as such. For photographic work they just took up an ordinary camera and used it over the side of the plane.

I had not intended to speak but the words of the leader of the opposition brought these things back to my mind and I just wanted to echo what he had said. I must confess that I hate flying. Every time I step out of a plane I do so with relief. But nevertheless when I see an airport like Gander, which in a real sense is one of the crossroads of the world, I cannot help but feel how wonderful an opportunity and challenge this new means of transportation offers to this country.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I shall speak briefly as one who did a fair amount of bush flying before the war. The debt of gratitude that this country owes to those bush pilots can never be adequately understood or repaid. To give you an example of the importance of the job they did in one or two years before the war may I say that the tonnage of freight moved by air from Osisko lake—now renamed Lac Trémoy—near the great mining centre of Noranda for a considerable period exceeded the tonnage of freight being shipped from the airport then serving New York, which was the Newark airport. Almost every fifteen minutes an aircraft came in or took off at that great mining area.

The aeroplane built northern Quebec. Those pioneers who flew what they contemptuously called "crates" developed the great extension of the pre-Cambrian shield which some of us think starts at Porcupine and goes right through to Bourlamaque and the great Sullivan area in Quebec. That area is just beginning to reach its maximum development, and I venture to say it is richer in the variety of minerals than any other area in the world.

I shall never forget the first time I flew away from that dock in an old Stinson plane. We flew in the first boiler sent to one of the mines in the Siscoe area. Not only did we fly the boiler, we also flew another most important part of a mining company's assets, the first cook. The cook had a small child and the only place to put the child in the aeroplane was in the fire box of the boiler. That is how the first boiler and the first cook left that lakeside aerodrome and were flown to a mine which has subsequently developed into quite a gold producer. These are the stories—and that is not a particularly good one—of the twenties and the early thirties. We must remember that the great Noranda mine was only brought to fruition about 1926 although the ore body had been known for some time before. That coincided with the development of the area which was quite impossible without the aeroplane. Now I believe there are very few aircraft leaving that base because of the fact that there are roads and there is a railway. The important part is that the policy of the present and the previous administrations has been so discouraging to the prospecting industry that speculative prospecting has almost ceased to exist. True, there are the big companies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Order. I must inform the hon. member he is not quite in order. I know he wants to pay tribute to the bush pilots but I would ask him to keep more closely to the subject under discussion.

Mr. Adamson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I merely wanted to point that out because as to the Aeronautics Act, about which I am speaking at the moment, I have on frequent occasions in the house taken issue with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on the policy of a chosen instrument. I took issue with him in the beginning when he wished to divorce air lines completely from the railway companies. Fortunately he and the government have changed their minds in that regard. He took the position he did because it was not the policy of the United States to have air lines and railway companies working together. Our conditions and problems in air transport are completely different from those of the United States. It is a most important thing to have the railway companies and the air lines working in co-operation rather than in opposition.

I merely want to add my remarks to those of my leader. Canada has led the world by flying where nobody else could fly. The strange native ability of the Canadian to take to the air is a phenomenon which I do not think the post-war generation fully understands. The problems we face today in the development of our north country, that great part of our country which is not suitable for either agriculture or forestry, depend for their solution on the aeroplane. As I have said, we have seen the gradual shrinkage of the small independent operation caused by policies which I have mentioned but which I will not go into in more detail. I suggest to the minister that our future depends on producing the things which the world must have, metals, the produce of the mines. Unless we have a more liberal—with a small l—policy as to aviation we are not going to carry on the development of our country in the way that the pioneers developed it before the war.

I should like to say a word as to KLM. KLM, largely officered by Canadians, is a prosperous, profitable organization. In this Canadian nation there must be, Mr. Speaker, a genius for flying which makes it possible to fly not only to inaccessible but also to accessible places under great competition, and to do so commercially and profitably.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay this measure to any great extent. I enter the debate merely for the purpose of posing a question to the minister. I refer to the advisability of continuing the trans-Atlantic service of Trans-Canada Air Lines. We are all aware of the fact that the Canadian mercantile marine has had all government support withdrawn from it, and that the ships of the Canadian mercantile marine were the flag carriers of Canada. We are also aware of the fact that Trans-Canada Air Lines is losing money on its north Atlantic service. We are aware also of the fact that the major American air lines are losing money on the north Atlantic crossing. We are aware also of the fact that one of the major air lines, American Overseas, has within the past twelve months endeavoured to sell out to Pan-American its transatlantic service. That being so, Mr. Speaker, and apparently there being no possibility in the immediate future of transatlantic air travel paying, are we to think of maintaining our pride in Trans-Canada at very considerable expense? I merely pose that question to the minister, and leave it at that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Chevrier: I have listened with keen interest to the debate which has taken place on the Aeronautics Act, both this afternoon and this evening, and I think that some good will be derived from the discussion. I am at a loss to understand some of the statements, which I want to deal with generally, and in some cases in detail. For instance, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) says that we are not going far enough; we should expand air services across Canada and internationally. The member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) says we should go slowly, because it is going to cost a tremendous amount of money. I shall deal with that a little later. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) smiles and laughs, but that is his privilege. Let me tell him that the policy of the opposition thus far has been to complain bitterly about government expenditure. The policy of the opposition, in this session at least, has been that we are spending tremendous sums of money, and I presume that if we are to do all the things the opposition wants us to do we cannot do them without the expenditure of funds. In other words, you cannot have all these advantages that many of us would like to have without a considerable cost to the taxpayers of Canada.

I should like to put on Hansard a brief statement of the development of the Aeronautics Act, before dealing with the criticisms and suggestions that were made.

Mr. Fulton: Why did the minister not do that before so that we could deal with it in debate?

Mr. Chevrier: I did make a statement; that was the first thing I did.

Mr. Fulton: Why is the minister making this one now?

Mr. Chevrier: In reply to the criticisms made by the opposition. I was going on to say that the Aeronautics Act, which was passed in 1919, dealt generally with the powers and the duties of the minister. Then in 1944 the act was amended and divided into three parts. The first part was substantially the act of 1919; the second part established the air transport board and gave authority, under the minister, to license commercial air services and regulate them; and the functions and powers of the board are set out more particularly in that part. Part III of the act dealt purely with technical matters regarding the tabling of regulations and the superannuation provision. I make that general statement, because I think it might serve some purpose in the remarks I have to make in answer to some of the charges that were made against the government.

The leader of the opposition and the member for Vancouver-Quadra resumed an old feud which they have with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe).

Mr. Green: I have not any feud at all.

Mr. Chevrier: They state that the responsibility for T.C.A. should be with the Minister of Transport and not with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The leader of the opposition made representations the other evening, and again tonight, that T.C.A. should be responsible to the same minister as the one who is responsible for the Aeronautics Act. I think I indicated in answer to a question asked by the leader of the opposition that the government had decided, under the assignment of duties act, to give to the Minister of Trade and Commerce full responsibility for Trans-Canada Air Lines. There is nothing abnormal about that procedure. There is nothing illogical about that procedure. It does not make for duplication of services as outlined by the leader of the opposition and other speakers. It does not make for irresponsible operation, because there are other operations of government which are in the same category and handled in the same manner. I can think of the C.B.C., which is not responsible to the Minister of Transport but to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). There is the national film board. It might be responsible to the Minister of Transport or the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). The government has seen fit to make it responsible to another minister.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to be interrupted, but I shall answer the hon. member's questions after I have completed my remarks, if I may be allowed. After all this is not a debate in committee; it is a debate on the principle of the bill with the Speaker in the chair.

I say, therefore, that these duties concerning Trans-Canada Air Lines were assigned to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in no wise differently than in the case of many other bodies under government jurisdiction. I do not see any difference between the operation of T.C.A. being under the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the operation of Canadian National Railways being under the Minister of Transport. I see no difference between that and the national harbours board, for instance, which is a government agency responsible to a minister; or again the Canadian Commercial Corporation, which to me seems to be along the same lines. I cannot see how that arrangement hampers in any way the efficiency of Trans-Canada Air Lines or of the operation of the Aeronautics Act. I cannot follow the argument because, in one word, if T.C.A. were made responsible to the Minister of Transport there would be no difference in the operation of the air line. The Trans-Canada Air Lines, is a wholly-owned government subsidiary of the Canadian National Railways, if you will, with full powers to operate along certain lines given in its charter. There would be absolutely no difference, if that change were made, from what is now in effect under the present arrangement. Having T.C.A. responsible to another minister does not in any way, I submit to the house, hamper the efficiency of its operations, because it is the government which decides the policy, with regard to both civil aviation generally and the T.C.A., and both the government and T.C.A. make full use of the advice which the air transport board and the civil aviation staff give it in dealing with matters of policy such as these.

I want to complete, if I may at this stage, dealing with the statement made by the leader of the opposition and then to come back to the statements of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. The leader of the opposition made an indirect suggestion or an implied suggestion which was not terribly strong, although it was more affirmative than it was the other evening, namely, that the government had not sufficiently fostered the development of civil aviation, that duplication and separation had hampered development of private aviation, and that there were not the number of private services that we should have or that we were entitled to.

I say to him and to the house that that statement is not accurate. I say to him that that statement is far removed from the truth. There is an extensive network of services. I see the leader of the opposition coming in now. I was attempting to reply to the second point he made in his statement, where he intimated by inference —although not terribly strongly at the beginning, more strongly toward the end— that the government had not sufficiently fostered the development of civil aviation, and that duplication and separation had hampered development of private aviation so that there were not the number of private operators that there should be. Before the hon. gentleman came in I was making the point that that statement was not according to the facts and that that statement was not accurate.

Mr. Rowe: According to your estimate; not according to the facts.

Mr. Chevrier: I see the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) does not like the kind of speech I am making, and therefore I get these interruptions which are hard to follow and even harder to understand.

Mr. Rowe: I am not intrigued with it.

Mr. Chevrier: I am making the statement now that there is an extensive network of services covering every area of Canada, over the most remote regions and areas of our country. Some of these services are scheduled air lines; others are non-scheduled and secondary air lines; and still others are charter services which operate from a fixed base covering the whole surrounding area without any regular route pattern. In fact, I have before me a statement which indicates that there are no less than some 650 licences granted as of this day to the various kinds of air carriers that I mentioned a moment ago, some of them scheduled air carriers, others non-scheduled, others charter air carriers, others flying clubs, and others specialty air carriers.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt the minister, but he is not suggesting, is he, that flying clubs can be regarded as charter service or route services?

Mr. Chevrier: No. Flying clubs are not regarded as such services. If I conveyed that impression, I should not have done so. I have a list of the charter services which I could give, but I do not think the house is interested. The development of private operators has proceeded at a far more rapid rate of expansion than the leader of the opposition led us to believe the other evening and again this evening.

Let me make a statement of today's position. There are at the moment some 200 operators. Some of those operators have more than one licence. About half those are small charter operators and the assets of those 100 operators were valued in 1948 at $6,300,000 as compared to 1945 when the value was placed at $434,000. That in itself shows a considerable development in this division of the air transport industry. The development of this group is also reflected in the number of employees, which increased from 128 in 1945 to 648 in 1949. Payrolls for salaries and wages increased in even greater proportion, from $200,000 in 1945 to $1,630,000 in 1949. Total passenger miles increased from 774,000 in 1945 to 7,866,000 in 1949. The carriage of goods to places otherwise difficult of access is reflected in an increased ton mileage, from 31,000 in 1945 to 754,000 in 1949. Mail services to remote areas also show substantial advances, from less than 2,000 ton miles in 1945 to over 12,000 ton miles in 1949. Total mileage flown in 1949 by 304 aircraft was 12,194,000 as compared with 841,000 in 1945 by only 26 aircraft. That in itself gives some idea of the expansion which took place in the field of civil aviation.

Private operators other than C.P.A. had gross revenues of less than $1 million in 1945 and today they have gross revenues of from $7 million to $8 million, which is a rate of increase far greater than that of T.C.A.

These services are expanding as rapidly as the economic position of the country will allow, and this without subsidy. That is something of which the country ought well to be proud.

The leader of the opposition seems to be of the opinion that this act is expanding or increasing the functions of the board. I put on record a statement indicating that the object of the act was to clarify the responsibilities of the board. In fact, we are not expanding the responsibilities; we are in one instance taking away some of the responsibilities of the air transport board.

The leader of the opposition says that civil aviation is being stifled in Canada, and he referred to what he thought should be done. I disagree strongly with that statement. I think that civil aviation, both within and outside Canada, has developed tremendously; it has developed by leaps and bounds in the post-war period and again within the last year. The leader of the opposition says, "If you look at a map of the air routes of Canada, you will be surprised at the lack of aerial routes in this country." I have a map before me now. I say just the contrary to what the leader of the opposition has said. Practically every part of this country is covered, in some form or another, by aerial routes today. There are the great Trans-Canada Air Lines operating from one end of the country to the other; air routes going north and south; and not just a few, as suggested by my hon. friend, but many feeder lines going into the northern part of Alberta and Saskatchewan, into northern Manitoba, up into the Northwest Territories, then on the coast of British Columbia and again in Quebec and the maritimes.

This map indicates to me that there has been considerable expansion. If my hon. friend means that the expansion has not been nearly that which he would like to see, and that which we would all like to see, I agree with him, because as a matter of fact I would like to see private domestic and T.C.A. routes and international routes taken on in far greater numbers. But we must have regard to the economic position of the country. We must not forget that these services are not directly subsidized as they are in the United States. We must not forget either that we cannot have a curtailment of government expenditure, as my hon. friend has been preaching and as he would want the government to practise, and still have these services both in Canada and outside Canada expanded, because it takes a tremendous amount of money, as my hon. friend knows, for the expansion of domestic and international air routes.

Again with reference to the question of expansion, I wish to deal with the two international air agreements which were entered into between Canada and the United States, and Canada and the United Kingdom, by which international aviation was expanded tremendously. Because of our agreement with the United States we received, over and above the routes which we already had, three new routes, a new trans-border route between Montreal and New York; a new route for C.P.A. between Canada and Australasia by way of Honolulu; a new route between Canada and the Bahamas by way of Tampa-St. Petersburg. These are expansions which were due in large part to the survey work done by the air transport board.

Then again our air agreement with the United Kingdom gave us several new routes and traffic stops which we did not possess heretofore. Because of this agreement, which was signed in August of 1949, less than a year ago, Trans-Canada Air Lines on its service to the United Kingdom from Montreal and Gander will be able to carry traffic between the United Kingdom and Ireland, the Azores and Iceland.

Canada, furthermore, because of that agreement, is given full traffic rights at Hong Kong, a new route which is operated by C.P.A. from Vancouver through Alaska, the Aleutians to Japan, China, Hong Kong and beyond. Some few days ago I announced that consideration was being given to an intermediate route because the United States defence forces were contemplating closing down the Aleutian base at Shemya.

Mr. Green: Is that still the position? They are closing that base?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not aware as yet of any change in the position from the statement I made the other day.

Then Canada now has full traffic rights at Fiji on its route from Vancouver to Honolulu and on to Australia. Again Trans-Canada Air Lines' position with reference to the Caribbean has been advanced tremendously, particularly on its route to Bermuda and the British colonies. It has been granted additional rights at Barbados, Antigua and British Guiana. Surely the leader of the opposition could not have had these in mind when he said that aviation is being stifled in this country. I think aviation is advancing—perhaps not as rapidly as we would all wish—but certainly in accordance with our economic position.

If there is to be a greater and a faster expansion the question arises as to who is to pay for it, if it be not the taxpayer of this country in some form or another.

I was making the argument when the leader of the opposition was not here that there seems to be variance among the members of the opposition with reference to aeronautics generally. By that I mean that some of the policies advocated by one member are in contradiction to those advocated by another. The leader of the opposition seemed to state that we were not going far enough or fast enough; whereas the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) asked a question which indicated that we were going too fast, and that the cost of expansion of T.C.A. services was too great.

I should like to deal more briefly with the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I am sure he will pardon me if I do not deal too extensively with those remarks. The hon. member repeated some of the arguments made by his leader, particularly those having to do with responsibility of T.C.A. and air services generally to one minister, and I shall not repeat my answer to that. But he criticized ministerial powers over the board. I would like to say to him that the ministerial powers apply to the licensing function of the board, and not to its general economic and administrative regulations with reference to carriers. One thing that must not be forgotten is that even the routes which are assigned to T.C.A. are approved by the government and not by any one minister.

The hon. member stated, as did the leader of the opposition, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) decided the T.C.A. routes. I have to repeat here what I said before. While I am a member of the committee on railways and shipping, I was not present when the statement was made. I would be surprised if it was made in the language that the leader of the opposition suggested it was made; but my information is that the committee records will indicate that the Minister of Trade and Commerce said the government decided what routes were to be operated by T.C.A.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Don't you remember he said that Polymer was his enterprise?

Mr. Chevrier: We are dealing with T.C.A. now. In fact that is what the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act provides, and it is a fact that the government also decides the international routes.

It was suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that a portion of the amendment which permits the board to exempt international scheduled carriers from a finding of public convenience and necessity is an undesirable limitation. Well, in fact, it is merely a simplification of the procedure for formal licence of such carriers in the United States. I think in fact the leader of the opposition made the same argument when he said that the air transport board should be an independent body just as the civil aeronautics board is in the United States. I would have some doubts about that position because we saw what the position of the civil aeronautics board was with reference to an application by T.C.A. which was before it for months before a decision was rendered. I think it would not be an effective procedure to have a finding of public convenience and necessity, when the government decides what the route to be followed is by virtue of an international air agreement. That is the position in Canada. We would like to remove that finding of public convenience and necessity in so far as that aspect is concerned, because we think that procedure would operate more effectively otherwise. There were a number of other suggestions, but I do not think it opportune to go into them at the present time. Perhaps there will be opportunity when we have discussion of the act, section by section, in committee.

Mr. Green: What about section 12(2)?

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member did make reference to that, and perhaps I should deal with it. He said he could not see the reason for the existence of section 12(2). I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that in making that statement I am entirely out of order, just as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) was entirely out of order when he made the suggestion. However, I suppose I should be allowed to reply to him. Much of the discussion which took place this afternoon was out of order, but I hesitated to bring it to the attention of Mr. Speaker, lest it might be thought I wanted to discourage debate.

It may be thought at first blush that the section under discussion should be removed. However, I should like to hear what the officers of the air transport board would have to say with respect to it in committee. There will be opportunity there for discussion of that section. I have no personal views one way or other in the matter, but I should like to be enlightened. It was put there for a purpose, and, by virtue of government policy, was changed when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who was then responsible for aviation, made the announcement with which my hon. friend is familiar.

However, I do not wish to close the debate without saying that I think much good will have derived from the discussion. I do not think the criticism which has been made is criticism which should not have been made; on the contrary, I welcome it because I feel that the Aeronautics Act and the administration of civil aviation by the air transport board and the Department of Transport can be enhanced by the discussion which has taken place. I do think however that some of the charges were inaccurate and unwarranted.

My suggestion is that at this stage the bill be referred to a committee where it can receive careful study section by section before it comes back here for further review.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I should like to learn from the minister what advantage he thinks would be gained by referring this to the committee. I am asking just as a matter of explanation.

Mr. Chevrier: I would be delighted to carry on the discussion here, but it was my understanding that it was the feeling of the house that it be referred to the committee.

Mr. Drew: I do not raise the point critically. That matter had been discussed, had it—the idea of putting it before the committee?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, frankly, I had not given it any thought other than that. My feeling was that a bill of this kind should go to the committee and receive consideration there. However, if it is the feeling that it should be discussed section by section in committee of the whole I would be delighted to proceed in that fashion, because it would save my appearing before the committee, and perhaps save several hours.

Mr. Drew: From what the minister has said, obviously it is the impression that it should go to a committee. Therefore I think that procedure should be followed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

460. Canals service—administration, $97,950.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, this is an item which deals with canals, a very important service to some parts of Canada. I do not see any special appropriation for the Chignecto canal, but there may be a general item which would apply to such expenditure.

I am not going to enter into a discussion of the merits or the desirability of proceeding with this work at the present time, because that has been discussed in the house on many occasions. It was discussed this session by my colleague the hon. member for Royal; it has been discussed by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, by the hon. member for Queens-Shelburne, and by several others.

This project is well known to the minister, and both last year and in recent months has received a great deal of attention from boards of trade, municipalities and individuals in the maritime provinces—indeed perhaps more attention and more consideration than ever before in the history of this country. The Chignecto canal has been under consideration since the days when the Indians were in possession of the maritime provinces and the Acadians first came to this country. The building of the canal was one of the conditions of confederation, and this project has been before parliament on different occasions since, but has always been brushed to one side.

The time has arrived when there should and must be a declaration of policy on the part of the minister and the government, which has been demanded throughout the maritime provinces. I am asking the minister tonight if he is prepared to make that declaration of policy, or if he is going to wait until a very representative and determined committee proceeds to Ottawa to make direct representations to himself and to the government—which I understand they are proposing to do. I think I need say nothing more about that.

Some complications have developed recently, conflicts concerned with the construction of the Chignecto canal, and where it was to be located. Information was placed before the house by the hon. member for Westmorland, when he made reference to the St. Mary's tidal project, which requires an enlarged dam at the mouth of the Petitcodiac river composed, I am told, of a natural rock cliff, which will enclose seventy square miles and which will be filled twice a day by the high tide. It will mean the damming of the Cumberland basin to enclose about sixty square miles which will be emptied twice a day. This power project has been supported by experienced engineers in the maritime provinces and has been placed before this house by the hon. member for Westmorland. It offers a potential power development of more than 2,200,000 horsepower which is greater than the potential development of the international section of the St. Lawrence river. It would provide cheap power to all the maritime provinces.

This proposal has had the recognition of the government and the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), and it has been agreed that a survey will be made of the project. I understand that a preliminary examination has been made already. We should have a report on that examination inasmuch as it may conflict with the proposed Chignecto canal and the reclamation of the large marshland area in the maritime provinces for which a large appropriation has already been made.

I should like the minister to make an announcement of policy as to the St. Mary's tidal project. I am sorry the Minister of Resources and Development is not in the house at the present time. If there is delay in making a report it will be construed by a great many people as an excuse for delay in making an announcement of policy with regard to proposals that have been before parliament on many occasions and pressed by those who are interested in the maritime provinces.

Mr. Chevrier: I want to say that I am happy to see the hon. member for Cumberland back in his seat. Hon. members were concerned at one time about the state of his health and we are delighted to see him in good form again and indicating his keen interest in a project which he has advanced from year to year since I have been in the department, namely, the construction of the Chignecto canal. The hon. member asked me if I should like to wait until I had an opportunity of meeting the delegation before making a statement. I understand from the hon. member and from other sources that a delegation is to wait upon me and others concerning this project.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): If the minister would make a statement of policy perhaps it would not be necessary for them to come here.

Mr. Chevrier: I understand the delegation is coming to Ottawa and I would not like to make a statement. Even if I did make a statement I do not think it would stop them from coming and I might be prejudging what they had in their mind and perhaps be taxed with being unfair. I am not saying I would not like to see them; on the contrary I shall be delighted to hear their representations. I think my hon. friend will agree that in view of my information perhaps I had better withhold any comment that I might otherwise make.

Mr. Brooks: Do I take it that the minister's statement would not discourage them from coming?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has the minister any statement to make with regard to the St. Mary's tidal power development?

Mr. Chevrier: My information is that as this is a tidal power development project it would not strictly concern the Department of Transport. I have not considered it in the light of its having effect on the Chignecto canal and would not want to say anything about it at the moment. I have received representations from the hon. member for Westmorland and the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and I have had a long brief on the matter. I have not been able to give it consideration in the light of the other projects and for that reason I would not like to have my remarks interpreted one way or the other.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I assure the minister that this proposal takes into account that the Chignecto or an alternative canal is essential. It includes the building of a canal across the Chignecto isthmus.

Mr. McLure: I should like to say a few words with regard to the Chignecto canal but I would only be repeating what has been said already by other speakers on different occasions. It is our great desire in the maritime provinces to see this Chignecto canal become a reality instead of a political talking point such as it has been for the last quarter century.

This item deals with the administration of the canal service. In commenting on this canal service I intend to scratch where it itches most. The canal system of Canada is one of the greatest in the world. For the transportation of free freight there is no canal service in the world to equal it. The large Suez and Panama canals charge commodity tolls ranging from 75 cents to $1.10 per ton, or perhaps more. I should like to indicate the position if our canals charged similar tolls, although I am not urging that that be done. I have received estimates of the total tonnage of freight moving through our canals yearly and these vary from 25 million tons to 50 million tons. In addition there are no charges for vessels of nations other than Canada. It is all free. If tolls were imposed on freight passing through these canals then at the rates I have quoted it would bring in a revenue to the Dominion of Canada of anywhere from $25 million to $40 million annually. As I said a moment ago, however, I do not want to persuade the minister to break faith with the people of the provinces for whom the canals were constructed by now taxing them and calling it a toll, freight charge or whatever you wish.

The point I want to make is that so far as canals are concerned they appear in the estimates as a service to the people, and that is the proper way to do it. Every time I see it in the estimates it brings to my mind the contrast that exists so far as the province of Prince Edward Island is concerned. Under an agreement with the federal government we were given the assurance of a connection with the mainland on our entry into union in 1873. The ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland should be listed as a service in the estimates. It should not be called a handout, and it should not be pointed out that there is a deficit on the ferry system from the operation of the boats.

We do not know whether or not there is a deficit. We never receive any statements concerning it, and we know nothing about it. It is true the Minister of Transport may get a statement from the subcontractors who provide the service. Whether he does or does not, the question is one of providing a service for which we paid well in 1873. When we ask for fulfilment of the terms of confederation, as we have often done, when we ask for extra service during the tourist season we are told that they will try it out but if it does not pay they will not provide it in 1951. The terms under which we entered union were that we would have proper communication with the mainland. As I have often said before, all you have to do is read the terms. If there is a deficit forced on us by the subcontractors, the Canadian National Railways, we do not want it to appear as such in the estimates and have it broadcast across Canada that there is a deficit. There is no deficit because it is a service that the dominion government should provide in payment of their debt to us in the same way that we have paid for everything we have got from them under the contract of 1873.

Let the service be listed in the estimates in the same way as canals. Over $8 million is to be voted this year for administration, operation, maintenance, construction and improvements with respect to canals. All these matters are covered by the word "service". On the other hand, when there is a small deficit of a million dollars or so on the ferry system between Prince Edward Island and the mainland we are saddled with it, and are told it is a handout and a deficit. It should be treated in the same way as canals. I am not going to go further into the matter. I hope that some day Couéism may have an effect on the minister and that he will see the matter from a bookkeeping standpoint. If he cannot do that, I hope he will look at it from the point of view of the fulfilment of the terms of confederation.

Mr. Chevrier: I am glad the hon. member has completed his remarks. I have no objection to his making that speech as often as he likes but I hope he will make it on the proper item. We are dealing with canal service now and not with the Prince Edward Island ferry.

Mr. McLure: Very well. That will give me a chance to say it again on the other item.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister tell us the reason for the increase of three in personnel resulting in an increase in expenditure of $11,000 this year?

Mr. Chevrier: There is an increase of $14,050 in this vote, and it is made up as follows: For annual increases, basic salary rate increases and minor salary adjustments, $3,720; for headquarters supervision of the maintenance and improvement program particularly the St. Remi tunnel now under way, and the preliminary investigation and planning of the Atwater subway, three additional and authorized positions and associated expenses, $10,330.

Mr. Fulton: They are temporary, are they?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; of necessity they are, because once the tunnel is completed they will disappear.

Item agreed to.

461. Canals—operation and maintenance, $4,398,395.

Mr. Fulton: There is an increase in expenditure of $553,315 this year compared with last year. Some of the more outstanding increases appear in temporary assistance, an increase of nearly $100,000; permanent positions, an increase of about $240,000; and casuals, an increase of $70,000. Will the minister explain that to us? I should also point out that there is an increase in materials and supplies of $99,000. Can the minister point out the reasons for these increases?

Mr. Chevrier: The increase of $553,315 is made up as follows: Salaries, materials and supplies, repairs to equipment and structures. Under salaries there are annual increases in certain cases amounting to some $30,000, $5, $10, or $20 a month. Basic rate increases amount to $212,000. Thirty additional positions—

Mr. Fulton: Why is that?

Mr. Chevrier: That is engineering, clerical maintenance—$62,000. Reclassifications and promotions, $11,000; other net increases, $19,000. As to materials and supplies there is the increased cost of items required in the maintenance of canal properties, uniforms for lockmasters, bridge men and canal men, totalling $99,000. As to repairs to equipment and structures, there is an additional provision for maintenance of canal mobile equipment and various types of structures amounting to $25,000. Then there are other net increases, $19,000 odd.

Mr. Fulton: Why is the amount for travelling expenses under this item so heavy? I notice that last year it was $26,625, and this year it is $27,825, an increase it must be admitted of $1,000. In view of the size of the item it is not so much, but why do they need that much for travelling expenses?

Mr. Chevrier: As the member for Kamloops knows, this item of operation and maintenance of canals covers not only the main canals extending along the route of the St. Lawrence waterway and the great lakes, but also secondary canals. In conjunction with the operation and maintenance of these canals, there is a great amount of travelling to be done. For instance, the cost of the operation of cars has not decreased; on the contrary it has increased. I am informed that explains the increase in that particular item.

Mr. Green: I take it there has been no increase in the mileage of canals. We still have only the same mileage to keep up, and it does seem strange that there would be an increase in the staff. Permanent positions have gone up from 794 to 836, that is an increase of 42. Against that, of course, there are 11 fewer temporary employees. Then, for the casual employees, who I presume are over and above the permanents and temporaries, there is an increase of $73,000. In this year, why should there be an increase in this vote of $500,000, when the total vote last year was under $4 million? It seems to me that is an increase of over 12 per cent. I wonder why it is necessary to have such a large increase? Surely, this work could be done with a smaller vote than the minister is requesting at this time.

Mr. Chevrier: With regard to the first question, namely, why should there be such an increase in positions, I am informed by the director of canals that is largely due to the number of transfers from temporaries to permanents. Then, my hon. friend asked why should there be such an increase in the vote of almost $500,000? He will remember that during the war we did really little or no repairs on the canal systems.

Mr. Green: But this is over last year's vote.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I know, and that is the point I am trying to make. We were not able to do all the repairs in one year that the canals required. I was saying that during the war years no repairs were made at all. We did not have the materials, we did not have the men, and the costs were high. With the normal period back again, we proceeded to do a number of necessary repairs which have to be made from time to time. Those repairs cannot be carried on right through the year, but some can only be made when the water is out of the canals. Other work has to be done at certain times in the year. On the main canals of the great lakes and St. Lawrence waterway, the costs of repairs and maintenance have increased, as have the costs of operation, because of the salary increases which have gone into effect from time to time.

Mr. Green: Why should there be that increase this year as compared with last year? Surely the price of materials has not gone up to that extent within the last twelve months? It looks to me as though this may be a case where the estimate has not been kept down as it might have been. It is a very large increase in the item in a normal year. At least this year should be no different from last year. The war has been over for five years, and the vote last year was $3,800,000, which was sufficient to carry out the repairs and maintenance. Why should we require an additional half million dollars this year?

Mr. Chevrier: A moment ago I gave a breakdown of the items which showed the increase of $553,000. I do not think I can explain it much more than that. It is not a detailed statement of the amount, and I do not think my hon. friend would expect me to give him that, but it is a breakdown under the various headings.

Mr. Green: But it is not for construction and improvement. They are covered by the next item. This is merely for operation and maintenance—ordinary operation and maintenance. Yet there is an increase in that vote of approximately 12 per cent.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that the maintenance and improvement of canals and canal services is rather closely interlocked. If my hon. friend looks at the other vote, which is No. 462, he will see a considerable decrease.

Mr. Fulton: It is under $200,000.

Mr. Chevrier: So, having regard to the fact that the two are interlinked, the increase is not abnormal.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, surely when we ask a question on one item we should not be tossed over to the other. This is getting into what the New Yorker calls the department of utter confusion. We should be able to say on this item 461 that last year you spent $3,845,000. This year you are estimating for $4,398,000. Now, without getting down to the last dollar, or even the last thousand dollars, surely it must be possible, and I think we should ask for it, to have a definite statement as to the reason for that significant increase. It seems to me unsatisfactory to have it said that we should look at item 462, where we do find a decrease. I think we should deal with each of these items on its merits, and we should have something which, on the face of it, shows the reason for the increase. At the moment we have nothing except what we are so often asked to take, the assurance of the minister, which I have no doubt is given in good faith.

We have had a strong indication that we should tighten up our belts. The Minister of Finance gives it as his considered opinion that we are not doing our job properly, and I doubt if we could have a more expert opinion than his, because he knows better than we do what we should find out and do not. I believe, therefore, we should get much more information than the minister has given us yet.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry I have no further information to give.

Mr. Fulton: In his first explanation a moment ago, the minister said one of the main reasons for the increase was the deferred costs of repairs and maintenance, which had been carried over from the war and which he was trying to catch up. It has been pointed out that the increase is some $550,000. If one looks at the details where one might expect to find the expenses of materials and so on, we find that materials have gone up just under $100,000; repairs and upkeep have gone up $5,000; repairs and upkeep of buildings have gone up $22,000, accounting for $127,000 out of $550,000; so it seems to me the minister's explanation that the main cause of the increase is an effort to catch up with repairs and deferred maintenance is hardly borne out by the detail which is given under this estimate itself.

I also point out that in the detail of the item at page 289—and this is apart from the staff itself; the staff is all set out in detail—there are twelve general items or charges for expenditure such as overtime; allowances; travelling expenses; telephones, telegrams and postage; printing, stationery and office equipment; material and supplies; rentals—land and equipment; repairs and upkeep of equipment; repairs and upkeep of buildings and works; express, freight and cartage; light, power and water; and professional and special services. One would have thought that, having gone through that list of twelve headings, each with its amplification and expansion, we would have covered about everything and that there would not be anything left. But we come to the thirteenth item, which is sundries, $31,170, an increase of about $2,300 over last year. After that expanded list of detail, I must confess that I cannot see what you could get in under the hearing of sundries and why you want $31,000 for it. In keeping with the fact that there has been no real explanation of why we should have a general increase of over half a million dollars—I do not think the minister has given us any reason to justify the increase—I think we should move a reduction. Perhaps the minister would like an opportunity to explain what these various things are for.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. The hon. member for Kamloops referred to a statement which I had made, that a large amount was for deferred maintenance. He himself read materials and supplies; and they amount to almost $100,000.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, I said that.

Mr. Chevrier: He read the statement, repairs to equipment and structures, which he said amounted to some $9,000 or $10,000. In the breakdown it is $26,000.

Mr. Fulton: No; I said the increase.

Mr. Chevrier: The increase on repairs to equipment and structures amounts to $25,960, which is almost $26,000.

Mr. Fulton: Not as given in the estimates. It is $22,000 in the estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: It is the breakdown of the increase of $553,315 which he is seeking, and I am trying to give it to him. One of the items of increase is repairs to equipment and structures, which amounts to $25,960. Before I come to that, perhaps I should give my hon. friend the breakdown of the item of sundries, $31,170. This is for miscellaneous expenses on the various canal units. In any event, there are several hundred miles of canals. The breakdown is as follows: Flowers and seeds $805; unemployment insurance, casual, $1,923; navigation charts, $3,000; icing $25; bonding, $40; garage rent, $220; damage claims, $2,800; advertising, $800; laundry and sanitary services, $1,482; compensation allowance, $500; removal of obstructions, $200; dockage, $375; other unforeseen expenses, $19,000. Then with reference to the general item which members interested seem to have some qualms about, the increase of $553,000 is due in large part, as I stated, to the work that we have had to do. The increase in labour rates alone amounts to at least $250,000 of that $553,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Now we are coming to it.

Mr. Chevrier: We have had to pay a certain amount of overtime.

Mr. Green: Why?

Mr. Chevrier: Because of reclassifications by the Department of Labour in working conditions in the various canals from time to time. The canal system is unionized and the organizations make representations to us for new working agreements. I should not say to us; they make representations to the Department of Labour. Any representations to us are referred to the Department of Labour and the Department of Labour fixes the rates. Very often we have to reclassify labourers, riggers, canal operators, canal men and lockmasters. More than half of this is due to increased rates.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I observe, for instance, at page 287, that there are quite a few instances of increases in staff. I notice, about halfway down the page, several new technicians. Does that arise through different labour conditions?—because we understand that we are dealing with exactly the same physical extent of canal system.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I gave to the hon. member for Kamloops a breakdown of the technical positions. No, the technical position would not arise from a reclassification of operating labour. The technical positions, I take it, are civil servants, and if there is an increase—I do not know which one my hon. friend has in view—it would result from a reclassification by the civil service commission. There have been a considerable number of reclassifications all along the line in the various departments, particularly in the large departments like public works, transport, trade and commerce and mines and resources, which is now divided into two new departments. But the question the hon. member for Greenwood addresses to me does not relate to the answer I have given to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Mr. Green: I notice that there has been an increase in canal men, grade II, from 104 to 123; and in canal men, grade I, from 68 to 82. As to the higher grades, there is no change. Why is it necessary to take on all these extra men?

Mr. Chevrier: No extra men—

Mr. Green: That is one question I should like answered. Another is this. The cost of having casual help is going up from $120,000 to $193,000. Why is there that increase in the casual help?

Mr. Chevrier: With reference to the canal men—and I did not catch the second question —the increase in canal men from 104 to 123, and the question as to why it is necessary to have the additional number of men, may I say that there are no additional canal men engaged. The 21 are temporaries who have become permanent. With reference to the casual help, more casual helpers or seasonal men have been taken on to do some of this deferred maintenance that I referred to a moment ago on the main line canals.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

465. Marine service administration, $18,970.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Under this group of headings, I should like to ask the minister a general question as to the way in which the organization of the marine service is set up. I understand there is a director of marine services, a marine superintendent, a supervisor of nautical services, a chief of aids to navigation. Then there is what is called pilotage administration which I assume is another officer. I should like to find how all these administrative officials relate to each other. For example, do they all report to the director of marine services, and how does that work out, because there is a great multiplicity of them? I should like to know exactly how the organization stands.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, Mr. Chairman, this vote covers marine services administration. This appropriation is a small one and provides for the salaries and other expenses of the office of the director of marine services. The office supervises the following branches of marine services: aids to navigation. Aids to navigation is a branch in itself, as we shall see later on. This vote does not provide for the expenditures of that branch, but for the direction of it under the supervision of the director of marine services.

Nautical services is another division which is responsible to the director, and later on we shall have a vote covering that branch. Marine agencies is also a fairly substantial vote.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is that vote 470?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister explain that a little; it does not explain itself.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. There are some 10 marine agencies across Canada. I will take Ontario first. There is one in Prescott, and there is one in Parry Sound. On the west coast there is one at Victoria and one at Prince Rupert. On the east coast there is one at Saint John, New Brunswick, and one at St. John's, Newfoundland; there is one at Halifax, there is one at Charlottetown, one at Montreal and one at Quebec. The responsibilities of the agents are to look after the maintenance of aids to navigation, and they have some responsibility for steamers, too.

Then I go on and explain the operation of the marine floating equipment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask the minister a question about these agencies first? I think he said that the chiefs of those marine services were responsible for certain things. Did he mean by that the agencies?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the agency what it sounds like, an independent man who is at arm's length from the department, and not an ordinary civil servant?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes; he is responsible for the marine agency in his branch. Again I take Prescott. We have a marine agent who is responsible for an area in the St. Lawrence river extending from Sarnia on the west to the Quebec border on the east.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The word "agency" does not suggest that he is at arm's length from anybody. He is an employee.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, no.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member still speaking on item 470?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, I am on item 465. The minister has answered certain questions which I asked with regard to the whole marine service administration. I have another question. What about purchasing done for all these various bodies? How is that done?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: It does not come under this item.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Excepting that I suggest it might be relevant to ask it in connection with the whole question of administration. However, if the minister prefers to answer later, that is all right.

Mr. Chevrier: No purchasing is done under this item, none whatever.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

467. Nautical service administration, $194,262.

Mr. Green: This item has to do with nautical services administration. When we turn to the details on page 290 we find that $300,000 of the reduction shown of $296,408, in fact more than the total reduction, is being taken off the vocational training for merchant seamen. The allowance is being cut from $350,000 to $50,000, and it is rather ironical to read the next two items in the details. They are, "campaign stars, $4,000; war medals, $6,000." The reduction means that there is going to be very little vocational training available for these merchant navy veterans during the present fiscal year. I would ask the minister to explain the present position with regard to this vocational training. I find in the annual report of the department for the year ended March 31, 1949, that this particular activity under the nautical service branch is described as follows:

> In association with the Department of Veterans Affairs, rehabilitation and vocational training of qualified merchant seamen who served at sea during the second world war.

And further down we find the last job of this branch is:

> Issue of medals to merchant seamen in recognition of service at sea during the second world war.

I am not going to repeat at length the stand I have taken for years with regard to these merchant navy veterans. But the picture is that only a very limited number of them are able to get vocational training, and none of them are able to get any educational benefits. In addition they get no war veterans allowance, civil service preference, hospitalization, or the various other benefits available for the men in the other arms of the service. I had hoped that while there was some extension of the regulations last year, during the present fiscal year much better provision would be made for those men who served in the merchant navy. I wish the minister would explain to the committee whether there is to be any further consideration given to these men and at the same time explain why the benefits are limited to those who had a manning-pool contract. We find at page 54 of the annual report of the department the statement of those who were eligible.

I have had young men come into my office in Vancouver who were too young to sign a manning-pool contract. They were not asked to sign a contract by the officials. I have had other young men come in who were put on a Canadian vessel without ever being asked to sign a contract. One man was transferred in Egypt. He had been in hospital there, had been on a British ship and was sent out on a Canadian ship, and nothing was said to him about signing any contract. As a result of not having a contract he is not eligible for any of those benefits. I think these restrictions are much too drastic. There should be a broadening of the qualifications so that more of these men could become eligible for the benefits.

Occasionally we encounter the reply that these men of the merchant navy did not want to serve, that they tried to escape war service and therefore joined the merchant navy. There is one effective answer to that, and it is that the casualties in the merchant navy were higher in proportion to those serving in that force than they were in any of the three other forces. It will be recalled that during the war a board dealt with young men who were called up. I had the opportunity recently to speak to one of our most responsible citizens who had served on a mobilization board in Vancouver; he told me that time and again young men came in who had been found unfit to join the other forces, and for that reason had been turned down, yet while they could have had exemption insisted upon joining the merchant navy because of their determination to do their bit.

It does not sit well now for anyone to say that men who served in the merchant navy were not willing to play their part. That certainly was not so on the Pacific coast, and I do not think it was so on the Atlantic or in the St. Lawrence. I have never been able to see why the Department of Transport has not taken the position that these men were the fourth arm of the service, and that they should be given every chance to be re-established.

This year the situation has been made much worse because of the fact that so many Canadian vessels—I believe the minister gave the number as ninety-three—have been transferred to British registry. In most cases the crews of those ships were discharged; they could not live on the British rates of pay. I think the minister will admit that most of them have lost their jobs as sailors and are now "on the beach."

Apparently there is no provision whatever to give these men vocational training. I believe they should be helped to re-establish themselves in some other fields. I shall not take further time of the committee, but I would ask the minister to explain the position, with the hope that it will be possible for him to recommend to the government a change in the provisions made for these men.

Mr. MacInnis: I, too, have been hoping that the minister and his colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, would have been able to do more along the lines of vocational training than has been done in the past. However, it appears now from the reduction in the vote for vocational training that, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has said, that work is just about wiped out.

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt the hon. member? I did not wish to say this when the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was speaking. I must point out however that there is no reduction in the vote. When the main estimates were prepared the policy had not been announced of extending vocational training. So that the hon. member may drop that from his remarks. I shall deal with this at greater length at another time. There is no intention however of not carrying out the statement made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs and by myself toward the end of the last session.

Mr. MacInnis: I am very glad to hear that, and I have no wish to labour the matter further. Would the minister tell the committee now what is being done in this connection?

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra closed his remarks by saying, having in mind the statement I made the other day on the merchant shipbuilding and operations program to the effect that a large number of ships—ninety-three I believe—had been transferred to British registry, that many men would be out of work. I also stated at that time that there were some nine thousand seamen employed, although the report of the maritime commission had suggested seven thousand, in accordance with its over-all program.

Then the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra states that no provision was made to look after these merchant seamen. The policy announced toward the end of the last session by myself, in conjunction with the Minister of Veterans Affairs, was to take care of that. In other words, the Prime Minister made it clear that one of the reasons for the policy of extending the vocational training to merchant seamen was to assist those who would be laid off. These estimates were prepared before that statement was made, because they have to be made up some time in advance.

Then I am sure hon. members would like to know how much has been paid thus far. The total amount reimbursed to the Department of Veterans Affairs up to February 28, 1950, for 225 applicants was $112,000. There would be in the supplementary estimates a substantial amount—I do not know just how much, but perhaps in the neighbourhood of $150,000. So that we intend to carry out the policy which was announced.

The hon. member says no further consideration has been given. Well, no further consideration has been given since the announcement was made to extend the benefits to merchant seamen. I do not think I can add much more at this time.

Mr. Gillis: What are the qualifications required by a seaman to receive vocational training?

Mr. Chevrier: I put that information on record last year. I would state roughly that a merchant seaman must have been in receipt of one of the two bonuses.

Mr. Gillis: What is the age limit?

Mr. Chevrier: Vocational training for the rehabilitation of merchant seamen under the order which was announced applied to those seamen under thirty years of age who were in receipt of either the war service bonus or a special bonus.

Mr. MacInnis: With the great decrease in the Canadian merchant service it follows that a great many merchant seamen will be thrown out of employment. Because of the nature of a sailor's employment I imagine it would be more difficult for him to fit into other kinds of work than it would be for the ordinary landsman. I am not going to criticize the minister for what has happened to our merchant service, because I do not know enough about it to criticize intelligently. It may be that no responsibility falls upon the minister. It may be that because of world conditions over which this government has no control it was found the Canadian merchant service could not be self-supporting.

I believe we are moving into a new position in matters of this kind. Where employment fails through no fault of the government, through no fault of the employer and certainly through no fault of the employees engaged in the service, there is a responsibility upon the government to fit these men for some other work. We may find it difficult to accept that, but we are moving into new times where the welfare of the individual worker is becoming of increasing importance to the whole question—I put it this way for lack of better words—of peace and war. It has become a part of our state policy of which we must take cognizance.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Let us not forget that for the past four or five years the United States government has been providing huge sums of money to sustain populations in other parts of the world. That is not done just because the United States government is kind-hearted, it is done because the welfare of workers in any part of the world is important for the peace of the world today. If it is important for one nation to take action because of conditions in another nation, surely it is much more important inside a country itself. In fitting these men for employment I think we will have to go beyond the narrow conditions that applied after the war.

I have no worked-out plan, but I submit the government should take the matter under advisement. It is not a good thing for this country to have men who are anxious to work looking for work and not finding it in their chosen employment.

Mr. Gillis: I do not think the government can explain their way out of the transfer of ninety-three of our ships to British registry.

Mr. Chevrier: A discussion of that will be entirely out of order. There will be a time and place for that discussion.

Mr. Gillis: The minister answered the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and in fact he raised the matter himself, and then there was the statement made just now by the hon. member for Vancouver East.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Cape Breton South will realize that if this matter was mentioned in the speeches of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the hon. member for Vancouver East it was in connection with unemployment which that situation had created and also in connection with vocational training.

Mr. Gillis: That is exactly what I am going to talk about. Seamen are unemployed because ships have been transferred to British registry. I am not quarrelling with the suggestion to retrain seamen in co-operation with veterans affairs, but I do quarrel with the reason why that should be done. This unemployment problem has been created by transferring ships to British registry.

This is not something new; this is just history repeating itself because we did exactly the same thing after the first war. We built up an effective merchant marine staffed with British officers but when the war was over those British officers were demobilized and the sailors were beached. Most of the ships were sold to Japan and other countries in the Far East. In the present case I have taken the same position as that taken by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. We have worked on this problem in committee and in the house. We have always taken the position that regulations and legislation applicable to members of the armed services should be made applicable to merchant seamen. They worked on ships that were armed and did what was perhaps one of the most effective jobs in the war.

Basic to this question of training seamen who are unemployed is the fact that ships have been transferred to British registry while others have been sold. I do not think that can be justified?

The Deputy Chairman: I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the item under discussion.

Mr. Gillis: I am confining my remarks to the item. I am simply following up the discussion which was permitted and which was raised by the minister in his answer to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, I cannot allow the hon. member to put in my mouth words which were not spoken. I did not raise the subject; it was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. However, the hon. member was speaking on the item and in the course of his remarks he referred to the ninety-three ships. If the hon. member wants to enter into a discussion of the policy adopted by the government, I can deal with the matter now but I do not think this is the time to do it. If the hon. member wants to speak until eleven o'clock all right, but there are one or two things I would have liked to say to the hon. member since there is perhaps some information he is not aware of concerning his statements.

Mr. Gillis: I have not made any statement as yet; I was simply beginning to make a statement which the minister apparently is afraid to let me complete. If the minister wants me to drop this subject so that he can take up something else, I am quite prepared to do so and bring it up later on in his estimates. I am sure I can show him that I know a lot more about this subject than he thinks I do. If he is sparring for time, all right. The minister is a very obliging fellow and I certainly would like to accommodate him. If he will ask me now to drop the subject and take it up later, I am quite willing to do that, but I am not admitting that I am out of order because this discussion has been permitted.

Mr. Chevrier: I am asking the hon. member to be good enough to postpone his discussion because he is out of order. When we reach item 525 concerning the maritime commission I shall be glad to deal with his statement. The hon. member will then have full opportunity to go into the subject which he wants to deal with under an item which does not concern it at all.

Mr. Gillis: The minister has asked me to drop this because I am out of order. I will not drop it because I am not out of order.

Mr. Chevrier: The chairman decides that, not the hon. member.

Mr. Gillis: It has been decided already by your raising the matter in answering the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. You should have been called out of order and we would not be wrangling about it.

Mr. MacInnis: Perhaps I am the one responsible for getting this discussion off on the wrong foot. I am quite willing to take the blame for that and perhaps the minister should have raised the point of order when I was speaking. In view of the fact he wants to make a statement tonight I will apologize for being out of order so that he can do so, and we will take up the other matter under the report of the maritime commission.

Mr. Gillis: That is not a point of order. That is a demonstration of impudence. He is attempting to tell the chairman how to run the committee. If the minister wants to make a statement I am quite prepared to give him the floor to do so and postpone this discussion, but not because I am out of order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I want to make it quite clear that there is no doubt in the chairman's mind that the hon. member is entirely out of order when he seeks to discuss the policy of the government in selling certain ships of Canadian registry thereby creating unemployment, and I so rule. When the hon. member mentions that situation in relation to the item under discussion, item 467, nautical service administration, I should like to point out that at page 290 there is a subtitle, "vocational training". If the hon. member wants to argue that vocational training would not have been necessary if that policy had not been followed, that is all right; but it is only complementary to the discussion of the item of vocational training. If he wants to argue with the minister whether or not the government was justified in following the policy it did, then he is entirely out of order. Of course it is quite difficult to settle these matters when some hon. members who are experienced stay on what I might call the borderline. They talk about a certain subject that is extraneous to the discussion and then mention vocational training every now and then. Every few seconds they turn to something else and then come back to vocational training. It is very difficult for the chairman to decide, and I ask the co-operation of the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I know he will relate his remarks to the item under discussion.

Mr. Gillis: I am quite prepared to bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, although I do not agree with the reasoning. If we had not sold the ships we would not have had unemployment and it would not have been necessary to have vocational training. We will continue this discussion later on under the proper item but I am still not admitting I am out of order.

Mr. Green: I think it would be most helpful if the minister could tell us what reduction there has been in the last year in the number of men in the Canadian merchant navy. We will then know how many there are who could be helped by vocational training. Of course in addition to that number there will be a further reduction as the policy is continued because the minister has said that the plan is to cut them down to 7,000 or 7,500. Which was it?

Mr. Chevrier: In the statement I made I said there were 9,000 employed.

Mr. Green: And that the commission recommended that be cut down to 7,000 or 7,500.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think they recommended a cut but in the over-all policy they thought that the number who should always be employed or provided for should be in the neighbourhood of 7,000.

Mr. Green: So there will be quite a few hundred more out of employment as that policy is pursued.

Mr. Chevrier: I hope not.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us how many merchant navy men lost their employment in the last year?

Mr. Chevrier: I could not tell the hon. member that under this item. I would not have that information. I shall have the information when there is a general discussion under the maritime commission item. I can tell the hon. member one thing, and it deals with the problem raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East who was complaining bitterly about the large number of seamen out of work. There have been only 239 applications following the statement made by myself and the Minister of Veterans Affairs toward the end of the last session.

Mr. Green: That may be—

Mr. Chevrier: Wait. That gives some indication of those who are affected, and heaven knows we have advertised enough in every possible way. When the number who have applied for vocational training is 239, that shows the house if there are tremendous unemployment problems being created by the transfers.

Mr. Green: It may also be an indication that the regulations are much too severe. The minister will remember that no men over thirty can apply for that training. It is also restricted to those men who signed manning pool contracts. Personally I think a great many men have not applied because they know they cannot qualify, and it is about that point I am complaining. We think the regulations should be made easier. This is a very important problem in the coastal cities, and I suggest to the minister that he let the item stand.

Mr. Chevrier: Why should the item stand?

Mr. Green: You cannot get it through by eleven o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: Certainly it should not stand because of what my hon. friend has said. If there is going to be more discussion on the item then the committee is entitled to that discussion.

Mr. Green: There are other points I should like to bring up in connection with the item, and I suggest to the minister that he let it stand.

Mr. Chevrier: It is one minute to eleven. Shall it carry?

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 12, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

MARINE INSURANCE

HUDSON BAY ROUTE—REDUCTION IN MINIMUM ADDITIONAL PREMIUMS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the house to the fact that, effective May 1 last, a reduction of 33⅓ per cent has been made in the scale of minimum additional premiums on hull insurance rates on ships trading between Churchill, Manitoba, and the United Kingdom. This is additional to a reduction of 25 per cent which was made last year.

These reductions have resulted from representations made by my department to marine underwriters organizations in London through the commonwealth shipping committee. Further representations will be made by my department with a view to the extension of the navigation period in which the minimum additional premiums will apply on the Churchill-United Kingdom route.

I think I am fully justified in saying that Canada is appreciative of the representations made on its behalf by the commonwealth shipping committee.

FIRE AND FLOOD DAMAGE

ORGANIZATIONS FOR RELIEF OF DISTRESS—CASH DONATIONS EXEMPT FROM INCOME TAX

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, many persons desire to assist in helping those who have suffered hardship and loss in the disastrous fires at Rimouski and Cabano, Quebec, and in the flooded areas of Manitoba. Organizations have been formed for the purpose of receiving money and supplies and applying them for this purpose. In response to numerous inquiries it is announced that organizations formed by local or provincial authorities or by responsible persons for the sole purpose of aiding the people in the distressed areas will be recognized as charitable organizations for the purposes of the Income Tax Act. Cash donations made to such responsible organizations, when evidenced by an official receipt issued by them for such donation, may be claimed by the donor as a deduction for income tax purposes, in accordance with section 26(a) of the Income Tax Act.

AIR DEFENCE ZONES

UNITED STATES—IDENTIFICATION OF AIRCRAFT ON SOUTHBOUND FLIGHTS

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) asked me a question to which I replied in part. I should now like to supplement the answer given.

As it is, of course, entitled to do, the United States government is establishing air defence zones in the eastern and the Pacific regions within its boundaries and therefore wants to be sure of the identity of aircraft entering those zones. The task of identification is greatly simplified if all aircraft entering the zones file flight plans, as the R.C.A.F., Canadian and United States air lines and many non-scheduled and private operators have been doing regularly for a long time.

In this connection, the civil aeronautics administration recently consulted the Canadian Department of Transport regarding the desirability of encouraging airmen to file flight plans prior to southbound flights across the international boundary between the 87th meridian in lake Michigan and the Atlantic coast, and between the 115th meridian a little west of Edmonton and the Pacific coast. As a result, on May 2, the Department of Transport issued a request to airmen, effective on May 5, to file flight plans prior to southbound flights across the boundary between the points mentioned. I understand that the United States authorities took similar steps at that time.

One of the main purposes of these notices was to take care of non-scheduled United States operators who constitute the bulk of the non-scheduled and private traffic crossing the boundary southbound. As I have indicated, the notices will not affect normal practice except as regards comparatively few non-scheduled and private operators, who will now be expected to file flight plans regularly for flights into the areas affected.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question respecting the statement of the Minister of National Defence? This relates to flights southbound. Is the Canadian government taking similar steps, and will it require similar flight plans to be filed by non-scheduled aircraft northbound?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Drew: May I point out to the Minister of National Defence that along with the defence aspect of this problem it is important to Canada that we know what aircraft are coming in, because of the necessity of protecting our fishing areas from non-scheduled flights of that kind. I suggest that consideration be given to our making the same requirement for the filing of flight plans of all northbound flights.

Mr. Claxton: I am sorry; I misunderstood the leader of the opposition—I thought he meant exclusively from the defence point of view, because this statement dealt with defence areas. With regard to the matter of ordinary flights north and south, and particularly north across the boundary, the ordinary rules apply, and I am sure the Minister of Transport will take account of the hon. member's question and see whether our regulations need any supplementation. From the defence point of view, of course, it is obvious that they do not.

HUMAN RIGHTS

INQUIRY AS TO CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENTS—SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Yesterday the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked me a question arising out of certain evidence given by the deputy minister of justice to a committee on fundamental freedoms in the other place on April 28, as appears on page 125 of the proceedings of that committee.

As hon. members will recall, I indicated in my response yesterday that I disagreed with the interpretation my hon. friend had placed upon that evidence. I now find, upon discussion with the deputy minister of justice, that it was his intention, which in my opinion was clearly indicated by the language which he used, to inform the committee that the Criminal Code revision commission might in a later stage of its operations hear representations from any persons who consider that the Criminal Code might be amended for the protection of fundamental freedoms. It was not Mr. Varcoe's intention to recommend the introduction of a bill to effect such purpose at the present session, and in my judgment his language is not capable of that interpretation.

POST OFFICE

DENIAL OF THE USE OF MAILS—OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether he will indicate when an opportunity will be afforded to discuss the statement which he made to the house earlier this week in regard to the suspension of postal services to certain citizens of this country?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I think it would be preferable for the leader of the house to answer that.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I have given a lot of thought to that question since the other evening, and in fairness I think at the first opportunity I should call an item in the Post Office Department so that the matter may be discussed, perhaps early next week.

Mr. Garson: In that connection, if I may have some part in this answer, in response to an invitation I have received from Premier Campbell of Manitoba I am leaving on a plane this afternoon. If possible I should like to be present when the discussion takes place, but I hope that that fact will not delay the discussion. I should be back some time in the early part of next week.

Mr. McIvor: The request of the leader of the opposition is not as important as the flood disaster. Go.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXCLUDE CERTAIN AREAS, ETC.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939, to exclude certain areas of land from the operation of the act; to repeal the limitation that the shape of blocks of sections brought into payment in ineligible townships should be rectangular in shape; and to provide further for the exemption from payment of the one per centum tax previously collected from certain flour mills.

Mr. Charlton: Is the minister not going to make a statement?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, there is not much of a statement required in addition to what is in the resolution itself. It states clearly what the intention of the amendment is.

As all hon. members know, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was first put on the statute book in 1939. The purpose of the act is to provide assistance to those who happen to live in what turns out to be a drought area. The method of determining whether it is a drought area or not is to check the crops in that particular area, and if the wheat crop is an average of eight bushels or less per acre, then certain payments are made. I would like once again to say that the payments are not made on wheat. They are simply made on the farm operations in that area, whatever they may be. Wheat is used only as a means of determining whether payments should be made.

We have been functioning under that act from 1939 down to the present, and considerable money has been paid out to those farmers. We have amended the act from time to time, and on this occasion we are making three simple but fairly important amendments to the act. The purpose of the first one is to avoid making payments where we think they should not be made. That is, our intention under this act is to assist people who of necessity must remain for a time in what might be called submarginal areas, but our hope is eventually to get them off those lands. Therefore we have been organizing the submarginal lands into pastures under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

In going over the areas this year in order to seek out new areas to organize into pastures, we did find that some persons were getting back on those submarginal lands by obtaining what are known as cultivation leases. Under those cultivation leases they were operating, and of course if operating under the terms of the act as it now is they would collect. This bill proposes to make it impossible for persons to collect who have gone on lands that are owned by the federal government, a provincial government or a municipality, our view being that if either the federal government, a provincial government, or a municipal council lease lands to individual farmers for cultivation purposes, they should lease them on terms that will pay as well without any assistance under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, as if they paid rent and obtained assistance. For that reason we are suggesting that payments should not be made on government owned lands.

We are making provision for the fact that there will be lands in those areas that to all intents and purposes are owned by the government through the Veterans Land Act. It is provided in the legislation that this exemption shall not apply to lands held under the Veterans Land Act. In other words, the payments will still be made there.

The next part of the bill does something which most members thought a year ago should have been done when this legislation was before the house. We then changed the unit that could be treated under the act so that it would be regarded as though it were an entire township, whether it was being dealt with because that particular area had more than ten bushels to the acre—in which case it went out—or whether it had less than eight bushels per acre, in which case it was brought in.

In the previous legislation we said it required nine sections or a quarter of a township to make it possible to bring areas in. Last year we amended that to say that it had to be only six sections, but we still continued the provision that it had to be rectangular. Under this amendment, whether an area is going in or coming out, under the terms of the payment the area may be six or more sections, and it does not require to be rectangular. It can be L-shaped, or T-shaped, or it can be some other shape, but it does not require to be rectangular.

The third part of the bill proposes to amend the section which provides for the collection of one per cent from all elevators and mills which operate in grain. This simply restricts the definitions of mills, so that it does not include all of what were termed "mills" two years ago. Prior to the war, all our larger mills were making flour from wheat for sale either in Canada or outside Canada, and the smaller mills were mostly engaged in the grinding of feed. During the war many of these smaller mills found it possible to make flour to sell to advantage, and did so. Under the act as it reads now, any grain delivered to these mills is taxed one per cent to assist in paying prairie farm assistance. Now the mills which have gone back to the milling of feed grains will not be taxed. In other words the tax will be confined to mills which are milling wheat which is to be sold into interprovincial and export trade, and perhaps also sold intraprovincially as well.

Those are the three amendments. I do not think there will be any great controversy about the need for putting them in the act. I suggest that since we are going to proceed with the discussion of the estimates there would be no necessity for discussing at this time details of payments, and so forth, because these matters can be discussed when the estimates are before the committee of supply.

I should like to say, however, that a very considerable number of members are not here this afternoon, because of a trip which was arranged and in which many of our members are taking part. I was asked by some of them, including the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) to assure them that we would not go beyond the stage of first reading this afternoon. I had hoped that we might have the resolution adopted and the bill presented. I have given the understanding that I will not suggest to the house that the measure go any further today, thus giving

hon. members who are now absent, but who will be here at the beginning of the week, an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. Argue: Will the minister send the bill to the committee on agriculture, as has been done in the past?

Mr. Gardiner: I did not think there was anything in the bill sufficiently controversial to make that necessary.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am of course very much in favour of the first suggestion made by the minister. But with respect to the other two, may I ask, for purposes of clarification if for nothing else, whether those six sections must necessarily be together?

Mr. Gardiner: They must be together.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They must be contiguous?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, they must be contiguous, and must lie alongside a township already in.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I followed that; but there is no arrangement about shape—or is there some discretion in that matter?

Mr. Gardiner: I think the hon. member for Calgary West, knowing western Canada as well as he does, will understand me when I say that if you have six sections just one mile wide and six miles long lying alongside a township already in, they can come in, and there is no question about it. That is rectangular. If you have them two deep and three across, they can come in because they are rectangular. You could have three running north and south and two across, and they could still come in. But, under the act as it now stands, if you had four lying alongside an area already in, and then two on top of that, it would be impossible for them to get in. So that you could have zigzagging to the extent that there would be one section dropped out, and still you would have six. Or perhaps there would be two sections dropped out, and you would still have six—or you could have five in a block, and one on top of it. But it would have to be a continuous block of land. You could not take five at the bottom and put in one away up at the top to make the six.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You could put six clear across?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Would it not be better if the house were to go into committee so that these questions might be asked?

Mr. Argue: Before going into committee I should like to speak briefly.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I have only one question, and if it is answered I shall be satisfied. In connection with these mills, did I understand the minister to say that a number of mills have gone back into the milling of feeds and out of the milling of flour?

Mr. Gardiner: That is so. If it has not already developed in connection with some mills, it is expected that it will develop as we go along. For the purposes of this section, a mill now, in order to be taxable, must be one that has been declared by the parliament of Canada to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. If it is so declared, it is in the same position as an elevator.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I understand.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the house will welcome that feature of the resolution which removes the rectangular provision covering six sections or larger blocks of land, which now can be joined to an eligible township. I am not just certain what is covered by the first part, which excludes certain areas of land from the operation of the act; but if I understood the minister correctly it would prevent people from going back on the P.F.R.A. pastures which contained submarginal lands, working that land and then becoming eligible for bonus. I certainly do not like to see at any time prairie farm assistance paid on submarginal lands; but I hope that this provision will not be used to prevent farmers, even though they have farmed on submarginal lands, from receiving payments as they have received them in the past.

I approve the removal of the rectangular provision from the six-section block. Since I was first elected to parliament in 1945, on every occasion I have brought to the attention of the minister the injustice that has arisen from adding only rectangular blocks. Crop failures in western Canada so often occur because of the way in which the showers happen to fall. They certainly do not fall in rectangles. I do not know whether they fall in L-shaped or T-shaped patterns, but certainly the T-shaped and L-shaped blocks would give more farmers the benefit of crop failure payments than the rectangular provision which is now applied.

I hope the minister will have this bill referred to the agriculture committee. In the past we have obtained real co-operation in that committee and have been given a good deal of information. Based on my experience I feel that the government has paid some attention to the proceedings of that committee, and as a result improvements in the act have been made from time to time. I repeat that I hope the minister will find it possible to send this bill to that committee. It took only two or three hours of the time of the committee last year, and as the committee has not met so far this year it certainly would not be a burden on its members to consider this bill in greater detail.

There is another discrimination under the act which this resolution does not seek to relieve. I refer to the taking out of certain blocks of land. As the act now stands, a six-section block may be removed from an eligible township if the yield is more than ten bushels an acre. As always happens, there are farmers who have complete crop failures under the provisions of the act, that is, a yield of less than eight bushels per acre. As long as the rectangular provision is maintained when taking out certain blocks of land you are going to take out a number of farmers who in fact have crop failures.

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. This applies to both.

Mr. Argue: I am glad it does. That is one more point in the minister's favour, and I hope he will keep on making others as I go along.

On March 23, 1950, as reported on page 1039 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Agriculture if consideration would be given, in the amendments to be presented this session, to making the half-township unit apply to all sections of the act. The minister replied as follows:

> We brought in an amendment last year which to all intents and purposes does that.

I have received a number of representations from farmers living in half townships where the yield has been less than four bushels to the acre, but who were not able to qualify under the act as it is now constituted. When an area is established as a crop failure area, if the department can find half a township outside of that area, perhaps in another province, perhaps a thousand miles away, then the people in the half township can obtain a payment based on the average crop yield in the half township. As I say, a number of instances were brought to my attention last fall in which a township had become eligible for the $1.50 per acre payment—the average yield in the township was between four and eight bushels per acre—but within that township there was a large area a half township or more in which the yield was less than four bushels to the acre. Those farmers could not obtain the $2.50 per acre payment because the average was based on the whole township.

I might demonstrate what I am trying to point out by referring to a specific case that was brought to my attention. I could give the legal description of the township, but I do not think it is necessary for my purposes. The average yield was slightly over four bushels per acre. As a matter of fact for all the farmers within the township the yield exceeding four bushels per acre amounted to only 288 bushels, according to information from the farmers concerned. That meant that because a farmer had one-fifteenth of a bushel per acre more than the four bushels, he was denied assistance to the extent of $1 per acre. It amounted to about ten bushels of wheat for each farmer. Each farmer had ten bushels too much and was thus prevented from getting the larger payment. In other words, because the farmers in that township had $15 worth of wheat more than they should have had, they could not get the larger payment, and were thus denied payments up to $200 in the form of prairie farm assistance.

The north half of this township had almost a complete failure. The south half had somewhat better crops, but the yield was still under 8 bushels per acre. The average for the two halves meant that no one in the township was able to qualify for the $2.50 payment. I would hope that the half-township provision which is now applied in certain areas as long as they are removed from the crop failure area will be made the basis of payment under the act.

There is no doubt that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been of real benefit over the years to western Canada, particularly to that part of it which comprises the high risk crop area. While the act has been of real benefit in many respects, it is becoming less beneficial with each succeeding year. The payments under the act have remained the same since 1939, while during that ten year period the costs of farm production have practically doubled. It is true the one per cent deduction has remained the same, but because of the much better price of wheat and other grains at the present time the government can expect to get almost three times as much revenue with this one per cent deduction.

The largest amount that any farmer can receive in the form of prairie farm assistance is $500. Where a man is farming 400 acres of land, $500 is just a drop in the bucket. It would not even pay his seeding operations, much less the varied farm costs and the farmer's own cost of living. I should like to see the payments under the act increased. On the basis of present farm costs they should be increased to at least $5 or $6 per acre.

The Saskatchewan wheat pool organization, at their convention last fall, supported an increase in prairie farm assistance, though half or more of the delegates came from areas where there were not crop failures last year, and where crop failures are not usually experienced. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, while I welcome some features of the resolution, I should like to see the amount of payment increased.

I hope also that the time will come when areas added to an eligible township may be added on the basis of a section of land. While the rectangular provision is being removed, apparently the area cannot follow a zigzag pattern if the crop failure which occurs follows such a pattern. I hope that the half township may be made the unit throughout the act, in order to remove the discrimination that exists in the present legislation between persons living within a crop failure area and those living in a half-township outside the crop failure area.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take much time in discussing the resolution now before the house. The matter has been considered at considerable length, both in the house and in the standing committee on agriculture, since the act was first passed in 1939. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) might have saved himself a lot of time and difficulty in the house if he had accepted many of the suggestions made from time to time in earlier years as to the operation of the legislation. I am glad to see that little by little he is accepting the views of many of his own supporters as well as members of the opposition, by bringing the act into conformity with requests that have been made.

As to the first amendment proposed by the resolution, I think we should wait until we have more information from the bill or otherwise before saying very much about it. We are in complete accord with the second part of the resolution, with the exception that we would like the minister to go a little further. He is learning to walk little by little, and if he could just take one more step it would be helpful. If he is not satisfied to bring it down to an individual basis, then let him bring it down to a section basis. Even during the past year we have had many complaints from farmers, who have had crops that were next to a failure, because they have been put into an area with farmers who had a good yield, and were thus denied the benefits of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I feel that is not the intention of the act, and if it were brought down to a section basis many of those in difficult financial circumstances would be able to receive the benefits of the legislation.

As to the third proposal suggested by the resolution, I do not feel that we have any complaint against it. Perhaps it will remove some of the complaints of eastern farmers about the high price of feed. If it does not have the desired effect, I suggest that the profits of the dealers should be investigated because I feel that there lies most of the trouble as to the high prices that the eastern farmer has to pay. Western producers cannot be expected to take lower prices than they are accepting at the present time, particularly in view of the sacrifices they made during the war and for many years prior thereto. When the measure goes into committee we may have further questions to ask in order to get definite information, particularly about the first suggested amendment.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Wright: I should like to ask the minister a question about the first part of the resolution, which reads:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939, to exclude certain areas of land from the operation of the act.

I understood the minister to say that this applies only to lands which have now been declared community pastures.

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Wright: If it does not apply only to community pastures, then does it apply to provincial lands sold under a thirty-three year lease? In Saskatchewan school lands are being sold to individuals under a thirty-three year lease. I believe some of the farmers' co-operatives hold their land under a thirty-three year lease. Would the amendment to the act exclude those lands from payment under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act?

Mr. Gardiner: It will exclude lands to which title is held by governments, whether they be federal, provincial or municipal. If land is sold to someone under an agreement of sale, I presume he will hold it in the same way as any person holds land under such an agreement; but if it is land to which the clear title is held by the government, and not by anyone else, payment will not be made. Our argument is that when the government leases it, no matter under what kind of lease, it must be responsible for seeing that the individual gets the land on a lease under which he can make a go of it. If it is the federal government, then we should not take money out of the tax payments of the people of Canada to help to pay rent on land that an individual is working. The same thing should be true with regard to a province or a municipality. If the land is not worth anything, there should not be any rent for it. If it is worth only fifty cents an acre, the rent should not be more than fifty cents an acre. We should not put people on land that is not worth anything, or is not worth the rent being charged for it, and then expect the taxpayers of Canada to help to pay the rent.

That is the general plan. It does not apply to the lands referred to a few moments ago by the hon. member for Assiniboia and by the hon. member for Melfort—lands that have already been taken into community pastures. It is presumed that individuals will not be able to go back on those lands. For example, we own the lands we have in community pastures in Saskatchewan, and we own them for the purpose of seeing to it that an individual does not get back on them. Once we put a fence around the pasture there is no difficulty about those lands. On the other hand, if we go to Saskatchewan, Alberta or Manitoba looking for lands to be put into community pastures, we may find that one or other of those governments has leased these lands to an individual, and therefore they are not available. We may be able to get possession of surrounding land, but that particular area is not available because it has been leased. We maintain that if it is going to be leased under those circumstances, then whoever leases it, whether it be the federal, a provincial or a municipal government, they should make provision for the individual, and it should not be made out of this fund.

Mr. Quelch: Do I understand the minister to say that all land in the special areas of Alberta which is under cultivation lease will not be eligible now for payment of the bonus? The minister knows that in Alberta land is divided into two classes. Land that is considered unsuitable for cultivation is leased on a grazing lease, and it cannot be cultivated. Land that is considered suitable for cultivation is leased for a period of twenty years under a cultivation lease. Do I understand the minister to say now that all that land cannot be eligible under this act? If so, it is going to affect adversely a great many farmers.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand it is perhaps two thousand quarter-sections, which is a considerable area of land scattered here and there, some of it in blocks; but if we permit that to go on I am afraid we shall not have a Prairie Farm Assistance Act at all in a very short time. Within the last few months we have found that as many as thirty-six quarters within one township have been leased in the areas where we are of opinion pastures should be formed. If that sort of thing is permitted to go on, I am quite sure the taxpayers in other parts of Canada are going to take very strong exception to it.

For example, we find this in certain areas—and I do not want to go into too many details, because in doing so I may tread on somebody's toes. We find cases in which individual farmers are unable to collect on more than one 400-acre area; but by leasing a piece of land alongside through some member of the family the amount can be doubled, or if two members of the family lease land it can be trebled. It was in checking lands in connection with that sort of thing that the difficulties were discovered, and of course that cannot be permitted to continue if we intend to keep this legislation in operation.

Mr. Quelch: The minister knows very well that originally that area was settled on a half-section basis. Over a period of time the farmers found they were not able to make a living on a half-section; many of them got into financial difficulties, and the land was offered for sale for taxes. The provincial government put up an initial bid; the mortgage companies claimed the land was not worth the amount asked, and let it go, which made it possible for the provincial government to lease back to the farmers areas of land considerably greater than a half-section. A half-section is not sufficient in that area to provide a living; so we find areas up to 2,000 and sometimes 3,000 acres being leased to individual farmers, and on that basis they are able to make a living. So far as cultivating land is concerned, the provincial government has made it a practice to grant cultivation leases only on land considered suitable for cultivation. The land is good; the only thing wrong with it is lack of moisture. In the initial stages those farmers were encouraged by the federal government of the time to go there and settle on a half-section basis. The government opened up the land and encouraged the people to go there. The people went there, and great sacrifices have been made in that area. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act was brought in to help out those farmers. Now I understand that under this legislation about eighty per cent of those farmers are to be declared ineligible for the bonus. Why, it is just going to cause a riot up there. The minister says the provincial government can pay, but he knows very well that is not the solution of the problem.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask what are the terms of those leases?

Mr. Quelch: They vary from one-eighth to one-fourth of the crop, a very small amount. Actually it comes to less than the taxes used to be. It is cheaper for the farmers to pay on that basis than it used to be to pay taxes, and far cheaper than the rate of taxes in other areas, where they run to $70, $80 and $90 per quarter section. The amount they pay is considerably less than that.

The minister knows the solution—it is irrigation. The government has been talking irrigation ever since 1922. It is true that certain amounts of money have been voted during each of the past three years or so, and they are doing a certain amount of work now, but we are still a long way from getting that land irrigated under the Red river diversion project. So far the only thing the government has done, apart from making surveys, has been to put up small dams to create reservoirs from the run-off water. Unfortunately, however, in very dry years there is no run-off water, and just at the time we need the water most for irrigation it is not available. Now the minister is just going to get out of the whole thing by declaring that no bonus will be paid on land under lease from the government, though all the land in that area is under lease with the exception of the odd section here and there which is privately owned. The minister is now asking us to support the proposal that this whole area in Alberta shall be declared ineligible under this act unless it is privately owned, and I do not think he can present one argument to show that this is fair.

Mr. Harkness: Do I understand from what the minister and the hon. member for Acadia have said that if there is a section of privately owned land in a certain area surrounded by land provincially owned and leased to the farmers, the people who own the land will continue to get the P.F.A.A. payments but that those who have leased land will not get those payments? Is that the situation?

Mr. Gardiner: The people who have title to their land or have it under agreement of sale, though they may not have clear title—that is, the people who own their land in the sense that land is owned all across the country—are entitled to payment under the terms of this act. But if such a person or some other person goes on a piece of submarginal land and takes a cultivation lease, with the land still belonging to the government, whether it be this government, a provincial government or a municipal government, the amount is not payable on that land.

Mr. Harkness: Let me get this clear. Take a township half of which is privately owned by individual farmers, with the other half owned by the provincial government and leased by those farmers for cultivation purposes. If they have a crop failure do I understand that they will get P.F.A.A. payments for the half they own but will not get those payments for the other half they have leased? In other words, though only half that township is privately owned, if there is a crop failure throughout the township so that the total amount of cultivated land produced less than four bushels to the acre, will those people get the assistance for the half of the land which they own?

Mr. Gardiner: They will get assistance on the basis of the land they own, which means they can be paid on half their cultivated acreage up to 400 acres. If a man is cultivating 800 acres it does not matter where it is, whether it is in that area or anywhere else; he is paid only on 200 acres, and that would continue to be the case with land owned in any part of the entire area. If he had land elsewhere, outside that area, it would not come into the picture. The sort of area that creates trouble for us, and which I am sure every hon. member would agree should not come in, is where you have an area that has been declared submarginal, or if it has not been declared so at least we have paid prairie farm assistance for every year but one of the eleven years we have been giving that assistance, which very definitely shows that people cannot farm in that area. Some of it is land which in the thirties, prior to the war, had been allowed to go back; the people left it, in some cases, and it remained uncultivated. In other areas the individuals who purchased the land simply dropped it and let the payments go, so they do not own it now and finally it has reverted to the government. A farmer and his son may live on a section alongside land of that kind. The farmer may have 400 acres broken, so we would pay him on 200 acres. Then the son gets a cropping lease on the next half section, and he has another two or three hundred acres broken there. By breaking that land you can bring in all that block. You can get it in two 400-acre blocks, and cause P.F.A.A. to pay on all of it. We find we have been doing that; and if we go on doing that year after year, and those cases keep multiplying, I can imagine what will happen eventually, and what would have happened if the opposition had found it out first. I was pleased that I found it out last summer when we were looking for areas to put pastures in; because I know what would happen to this government if we let it get out in the public accounts committee as something which was raised by someone else that we pay out thousands of dollars, and maybe it might run into hundreds of thousands of dollars on payments of that kind. We paid out $20 million last year. If we pay a considerable part of it out of the treasury on submarginal lands that are owned by the government, whether it be this government, the Alberta government, the Saskatchewan government, the Manitoba government or one of the municipal governments, I am quite sure that before we got through with the discussion, if we had not blown the act up, we would have come close to it.

Mr. Argue: As I understand the minister, it is not a case of changing the act now so that payment will be made only on land that is not submarginal. What the minister is saying is whether or not payment is made on a given piece of land will depend on what type of lease it is held under or whether it is held on a title basis. If the minister wants to change the act so that payments are made only on land suitable for grain and if at the same time he will do something else under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to rehabilitate these people who have been taken off submarginal land for wheat production, that is O.K. But what the minister is suggesting now, as I understand it, is not that they are going to remove submarginal land entirely from the application of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, but that the government is going to remove entirely land owned by the provincial government or other governments and leased to farmers within the various provinces. I think that kind of policy of the government is most discriminatory. I do not think this government should be attempting to dictate to the government of Alberta or to the government of Saskatchewan by what method they should dispose of provincial land. Over the last few years in Saskatchewan we have leased a great many parcels of land to young veterans on the basis of a 33-year lease. I should like to know if the government is going to continue prairie farm assistance to these veterans under that type of lease.

Mr. Gardiner: There is a special provision in the bill which says that the co-operative farmers are covered by the bill.

Mr. Argue: That is O.K. for the co-operative farmers. What about the veterans who are on individual farms?

Mr. Gardiner: There is a special provision in this amendment which provides for them, as I said in presenting the legislation.

Mr. Argue: That is O.K. for individual veterans. All right, then, what about the civilian who is living in an area where the land is not submarginal, where it is definitely good wheat land,—

Mr. Gardiner: Someone had better buy it.

Mr. Argue: —where the farmers and the government agree on the basis of past history, and remembering that they have a government at Ottawa not too sure that it is going to get rid of wheat at decent prices, that it is good business for the farmer and it is good business for the country for the farmer to have a 33-year lease under which he will pay from one-sixth to one-eighth share of the crop at the end of each year? At the end of ten years, he may buy it if he wants to. But this government should not tell any other government how it should dispose of its land. If this legislation goes through, I do not know what will happen; but I know that, as has already been said, a great many people will be angry. The Saskatchewan government may be forced to reverse its agricultural policy, even though it knows it is not in the best interests of the people, and sell that land. But are you going to ask a man to assume a large debt in order that he may qualify for prairie farm assistance? Another thing the minister said was that now in some families you have one or two sons that are renting lands that actually constitute one unit. We have had a long fight over the last few years to get the government to make that bonus payment on land farmed by young farmers, even though that land is rented. Does the minister mean now that no rented land can be eligible for prairie farm assistance?

Mr. Gardiner: I will send my hon. friend over a copy of the bill, and he will be able to discuss it to better advantage.

Mr. Argue: I appreciate that. But I certainly have the strongest possible objection to what the minister has already told us.

Mr. Quelch: I think the minister should clarify the position with regard to the last question asked by the hon. member. Does this definitely mean that all land that is leased will not now be eligible for the bonus?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Quelch: That is, under lease from the federal, provincial or municipal governments?

Mr. Gardiner: If it is under lease from the government under the kind of arrangement which the returned soldier has under the Veterans Land Act and that kind of assistance, then under the bill as it is at present drawn payments are not made on that land.

Mr. Quelch: This is supposed to be a drought bonus, to take care of drought in the area.

Mr. Gardiner: That has been repeated about four times, that it is supposed to be a drought bonus. It is no such thing in these cases.

Mr. Quelch: Originally it was.

Mr. Gardiner: No; it was not originally either.

Mr. Quelch: Whether the minister would agree with that or not, across Canada it has time and again been referred to as a drought bonus. I am not going to argue the technicality, but it was largely to compensate the farmer for loss of crops due to drought and other reasons, but mainly drought. Now, as a result of the passage of this legislation, it will mean that the majority of the farmers in the drought area will no longer be eligible for the bonus.

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Quelch: That is what it will mean in Alberta. Certainly it will mean that, because the major part of the drought area in Alberta is in the special areas; and the majority of the land in the special areas is already under lease from the provincial government, and now all that land in the area, is declared ineligible. That forces me to vote against the motion. I could not possibly support it.

Mr. Wright: I do not think there is anybody who objects to land which consistently has had to have P.F.A. paid on it being withdrawn and having something else done with it; either put it into community pastures or put it back into grass and move the people who are on it onto land where they can make a decent living without having to receive the P.F.A.A. bonus from year to year. But it is not on the basis of whether the land is marginal that we are excluding it. It is on the basis of the type of ownership that that land is held under.

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Wright: Yes, absolutely. That is what the act says or what the minister has said. He has said that if the provincial governments own the land and they have leased it to individuals for cultivating purposes, and if there is a crop failure, they are not entitled to payments under the P.F.A.A., whether it is in a marginal area or not. In the northern part of the province there is a good deal of school land which has been held under a 33-year lease from the provincial government. Occasionally we get a crop failure there; it is only once in every ten years, but we pay one per cent every year. Now you say that these lands, because they are held under a 33-year lease, or a 20-year lease, or whatever the lease may be, from the provincial government, are not entitled to payment. But every bushel of grain that is grown on that land has to pay a one per cent levy. Is the minister going to exclude the grain that is grown on this land from that levy? If he is going to withdraw the payments, certainly he should exclude the grain that is grown on this land from the one per cent levy, because otherwise he is puting a tax in perpetuity on the grain that is grown on that land and is saying to the people who are growing the grain, "You can never get a payment under the P.F.A.A."

Mr. White (Middlesex East): There are other lands in Canada that are submarginal besides those in Alberta or in the western provinces. Under the present set-up they never hope to get anything but they always have to pay something, as I understand it. I should like the minister to tell me how much payment has been paid under this act in each of the years from 1939-1949; because I understand the intention was gradually, and as far as practical, to remove from cultivation these lands that were not giving good yields and to put them into pasture. But if we were going to go on spending more money each year, as remarked by the minister some time ago, the people were going to object to these payments in time and they would find out that some of us were paying too much for this type of legislation. In fact, as I understand it, the two acts are working one against the other. One is trying to build up an area and the other is trying to keep people on land when they should be somewhere else. I should like to have the minister make a statement as to what it has cost each year. Does the one per cent that is collected cover the cost?

Mr. Gardiner: The one per cent that has been collected up to date has resulted in a fund of $45,008,887.31. Therefore we can say it is $45 million. The payment out has been almost $125 million; it is $124,749,758.15; but one can I think remember it best by saying that $45 million has been paid in on the basis of one per cent, and $125 million has been paid out up until now.

I think I should give the year by year payments in round figures rather than read them all over. In the first year it was $10 million; in the second year $6,750,000. The first year was 1939.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is that collections or payments?

Mr. Gardiner: These are payments. In 1941, the third year, the payments were $15,500,000. There was nothing at all in 1942, although the collection went right on that year. In 1943, $7,500,000; in 1944, almost $6 million; in 1945, almost $17 million; in 1946, $10,800,000; in 1947, $17 million; in 1948, $14 million; in 1949, $20 million, a total of $124,749,758.15.

I might indicate how the collections run. In the first years, of course, the price of grain was low, and while the total amount of grain marketed was much similar to what is still being marketed, the amount collected was much lower because it is one per cent that is collected and not so much a bushel. In the first year the amount collected was about $2,500,000; in the second year it was about $2,500,000; the third year was a very poor year, and about $1,500,000 was collected. In the year 1942, $2,700,000 was collected and in 1943-44, when the prices got higher, $4,700,000 was collected. In the next year, $5,300,000; in the next year, $3,400,000; in the next year, $5,100,000; in the next year $5,100,000 and in 1948-49, $6,600,000. In 1949-50, the year we are now in, it has amounted to $5,350,000 up to the present, but we have not completed the crop year yet.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Why not increase the payment of the one per cent? Why not increase it to three per cent and let the western provinces pay their own insurance? Why ask the rest of Canada to carry this?

Mr. Fair: I believe I can answer that question very well and save the minister the trouble of doing it because it might be embarrassing to him. I suggest that the amount paid to the western farmers on this insurance is not a drop in the bucket as compared with the losses that have been sustained by the farmers of the west in accepting government policy and the resultant low prices during the war years. I think that is a conclusive answer to the question. There is also free freight feed grains that many eastern farmers have taken advantage of; but do not let us forget that there are other subsidies that people would like to hear about. Perhaps we can give them a little later on in the debate.

Mr. Wright: I asked the minister whether he was going to continue the collection of the one per cent levy on the grain grown on those lands which he is going to exclude from payment under this Prairie Farm Assistance Act, under the proposed amendment.

Mr. Gardiner: I think probably I can best answer that by saying to my hon. friend that I can hardly conceive of his ever drawing anything on the land that he farms.

Mr. Wright: Quite right.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not conceive of my ever drawing anything on my farm.

Mr. Johnston: There is a chance.

Mr. Gardiner: Not much chance. We have gone on now over the worst years we have ever experienced, and we have not collected any yet.

Mr. Johnston: You are not excluded.

Mr. Gardiner: We are excluded in a sense. I had this all out with an area down at Gladstone, in Manitoba, the first year that we had the bill. I was invited there by the people of the area and they had the reeve of the municipality in the chair. They had the hall packed, and I was not supposed to have been able to get out of there with a whole hide when the meeting was over. I went and met the farmers there and I said to them: On the estimate that we made when we put the bill through this house we said that there would be about $3 over a long period, say twenty or more years, taken out of the treasury for every $1 that is paid into this fund. The house accepted that; and in answer to my hon. friend who spoke a moment ago, all the issues which he suggested a moment ago were then brought up in the house and threshed out; and finally it was unanimously accepted. I think I am right in saying that we finally got the amending bills associated with this matter through the house almost unanimously on every occasion.

What I said to those people then is what I say today. I said to them: "You tell me that because you have never had a crop failure, and you never will have one, you should not pay anything into this." I said: "If I have got to admit that, I have got to go back to the house and say that the people in Montreal and Toronto who never will have a crop, let alone a crop failure, should not be asked to pay into this." I said: "I do not know of any way that you can set up crop failure insurance in western Canada that could be carried on a basis of charging it up to the land itself." I do not know of any system under which it could be done.

Since, we have proven that it could be done in Manitoba. We have proven that it might be done in about one-third of Alberta. It could not be done over the whole province of Alberta; and we have certainly proven that there would be no possibility of doing it at all over the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Wright: It could up in northeastern Saskatchewan.

Mr. Gardiner: Still the province of Saskatchewan produces half of all the wheat that is produced in Canada, and wheat itself provides, if not the greatest, the second greatest medium from which we obtain new wealth year by year in the country; and it certainly provides the greatest tonnage of exports, with one possible exception, that is shipped out of this country to bring into the country new dollars or new wealth of one kind or another.

We argued at that time, and we still argue, that on that basis everyone in Canada has some justification for believing that it is a good thing to keep that country operating, and to give it a sufficient amount of insurance to carry along; but I do not know of any arrangement under which we could do it and argue that the farmer who is never going to have a loss in western Canada should not pay anything and the other fellow should attempt to pay it all; or even any basis upon which you can say that the farmers who are never going to have a loss should pay sufficient in in order to take care of the other group that are operating in the interests of all Canada. We have been able to maintain this legislation on a co-operative basis. I had hoped we would not get into a discussion of that general question. We have discussed it before; we have threshed it out; we have finally come to the conclusion—that is those of us who were here at the time. I am sure the same thing would happen all over again if we discussed it long enough—that this is one of the best pieces of legislation that we have in the country from the standpoint of all the people of Canada.

Mr. Argue: Don't spoil it.

Mr. Gardiner: The reason we do not want to do things that are unreasonable, that other people cannot accept, is that that would spoil it.

I am quite prepared to argue here in the house, or anywhere out in the country in the area that is concerned, or anywhere else, that to deliberately go on year after year making payments to make it possible for people, without investing any capital in it at all, to get onto submarginal lands in western Canada, which ought to be in pasture, and try to farm them is wrong. I am prepared to go anywhere and argue that payment under this act should not be made in such cases. Then, coming back to the questions asked, it has been suggested by most of the members who have spoken critically of it that if this was going to result in lands that are to be in pasture remaining in pasture, and lands which are submarginal being in pasture, and the private lands outside being in a position to be farmed, they would then be prepared to consider the matter more or less favourably.

Now the present position, as it has been stated by the hon. member for Middlesex East—and he has stated it correctly—is that we have been told in the house, I have told it to the house on many occasions, that we have two acts, one of which is the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and the other P.F.R.A.

Under P.F.R.A. we offer to take any lands that are submarginal, put a fence around them, regrass them, put water in them and then allow the farmers who are located round about to organize themselves into pasture areas and put their cattle up to the number of two-thirds of all that that area will accommodate into those pastures from year to year at a small fee. We have a million and a quarter acres of that land organized today on that basis. This government has purchased the lands that had to be purchased, and paid for them. They have assisted people to move off those lands and to go somewhere else. They have helped those people to get lands, and resettle themselves somewhere else. We have gone on to say that we are prepared to do that in Manitoba, prepared to do it in Saskatchewan and prepared to do it in Alberta. Now, so far, we have not got any lands in Alberta under that plan.

Mr. Quelch: The provincial government have leases.

Mr. Gardiner: If they wish to run some show of their own, then I have no objection to their doing it. But I hope they will not expect the taxpayers of Canada to pay for a plan which has not been worked out here and agreed to in the House of Commons.

Mr. Quelch: That has nothing to do with the cultivation lease.

Mr. Gardiner: It is a very simple matter for the government of the province of Alberta to organize those areas so as to bring them under the act, even as we are proposing to draft it today. But I do not think they should ask the government of Canada in Ottawa or ask this House of Commons to do for them what it is not necessary to do in order to have the matter dealt with as they want it dealt with.

I agree that there are lands all through the constituency my hon. friend represents—I have driven over practically all of them—which should never be farmed, as the hon. member knows. And I know he would never be a party to saying that they should be. Then there are other lands there which are very good, and ought to be irrigated. And both the provincial and the federal governments are working toward that end. Then there are lands in that area owned and operated by private individuals. They have been living there a long time, and by getting a sufficient area around under lease from the government or from somewhere else to be used for pasture, they can live there, and live just about as well as they could live anywhere else.

But I do not think any of us are worrying very much about what the proposed bill is doing to those people. We certainly do not want to do them an injustice. But we do want to put this legislation in shape whereby no one can come into this House of Commons and say, "You are paying money out on submarginal lands which are owned by a government and should be under pasture", this government is prepared to put it under pasture for the common good and someone deliberately goes on it and gets a lease, and makes it impossible to do that. I do not think the House of Commons wants us to pay to continue that.

I think there might be some good in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Assiniboia at the beginning of his remarks. There is just the possibility that out of the discussion which might take place in committee some who are now afraid of this legislation might be convinced that it is all right. There is just the possibility that some also may be able to bring forward some suggestions which would result in allaying to some extent the fears now held by some hon. members.

But I hope that nothing will come out of committee which will make it possible for anyone to continue going around and picking off pieces of land which they can get on leases, and into which they can put $100 or $200 or $300, and then pull out of this government $200 to $500 to make it possible for them to live there for a year. I hope that will not be permitted by anything that is done in committee or in the house. However, I am quite prepared to see that when the bill receives second reading we send it to committee so that we may have it threshed out in committee, so that we may know what the facts are, and then have our legislation go through with everyone understanding what is meant.

Mr. Wright: I agree with the minister that the bill under the circumstances should go to the committee on agriculture. However, I should like to clear up one point. There was one question which, by the way, he did not answer, although he spoke for thirty minutes. I did not say anything about the one per cent levy being paid in my constituency and in his own area by people who never hope to obtain anything out of the act. I have been in the house for some considerable time, and this act has been up for revision six times, and no one has ever heard me raise my voice against paying the one per cent levy, except in respect of a few individuals, so as to assist in making the act workable in the southern part of the province.

But now he is excluding lands in the southern part of the province where there will be crop failures, and where they will not have the money to pay the one per cent levy, as we have in the north, where we are fortunate enough to grow good crops. However, I do not wish to prolong the discussion now. That can be discussed in committee.

Mr. Gardiner: I shall answer the question. I do not think we should be agreeing to any lands in your district or in my district or any other district being under this act where the land itself will not show as much as one per cent earnings. And the suggestion is made that there are some of these lands on which they are paying up to one-ninth or one-eighth of the crop into the provincial government. It could be into this government or some other government. Well, one-eighth is not much and one-ninth is not much. But on some farms that would get close to being the $200 or $500 in some cases that can be paid out under this act. And in those cases I do not think anything should be charged by the government that owns the land, whether it is just a tax or what it is. If it is just a matter of making it possible for the man who lives alongside and owns some land to continue living there, then I think a man should have the use of that land, and that he would not need prairie farm assistance.

Mr. Wright: The minister has provoked me again. As I understand it, one of the reasons that P.F.A. was paid, and accepted by the rest of Canada, in the southern part of Saskatchewan or in the Palliser triangle, was that certain lands in that area were put under cultivation at a time when those lands were under the control of the dominion government. That was during the first war. They were put under cultivation to produce wheat, because we needed wheat at that time. Therefore it was the responsibility of the federal government that such lands were put under cultivation.

As some compensation to the provinces, when they took over the lands so as to maintain those people there, and to help them move out of those areas, the P.F.A.A. was introduced, and the P.F.R.A. was brought into effect.

Mr. Gardiner: But under the act as it now is, when a person refuses to move from pasture land he is not paid. I think that when people are deliberately moving back into the area that is known to be submarginal they should not be paid either. That is all this measure is intended to do, and that is what it does do.

Mr. Quelch: No one would contend that a bonus should be paid on land which is definitely submarginal, and if this measure were ordered so as to accomplish that it would get our support. But that is not what it does. It merely says that land that is privately owned, whether submarginal or not, so long as it has not been declared submarginal, shall receive the bonus; but land which is under lease from a provincial, municipal or federal government will not be eligible. You may have two sections side by side, one section of submarginal land privately owned being eligible for the bonus, the other section held under a provincial lease not being eligible. The minister says that it rests in the hands of the provincial government, that they can overcome the difficulty. I suppose the provincial government could sell the land back to the farmer. Is that what the minister is advocating? Is that what he meant by his statement?

Mr. Gardiner: I was the minister in charge of a lot of these things in Saskatchewan for a number of years and I have travelled over most of the province hunting for land which the provincial government owned and on which anyone could live. I challenge any hon. member in the other corner to tell me of lands anywhere in Saskatchewan that are not held by someone other than the government and that people would think of settling on and making a home. We hunted for land away up in the north. Some people now say there are a million acres that people could settle on. Certainly down in the part of the province we are talking about every acre of land on which anyone could make a home has been taken up long ago by homestead or pre-emption.

Much of the land we are talking about is land on which no one under any circumstances would have settled ten or twenty years ago. But some people take a cultivation lease on it now because it is close to their home farm and because it might be possible to obtain payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. We must stop that sort of thing if the act is going to go on.

Then there is land which people have settled on and have tried to live on. But they found they could not and they got off. In my constituency an application was made under this act in the first or second year the act was in existence. The act definitely provides under its terms and regulations that land which has been broken up and allowed to go back to prairie shall not be eligible. If any one had asked me if this particular block of land had ever been broken up I would have said it had not. I have been driving across that ever since I was in the district and it is quite a large area. When the protest was first made that no payment could be received because it had been broken up, I questioned that and took the trouble to go and look at the land. When you searched carefully you could still see the furrows running all through the land which showed it had been broken up away back in the eighties or nineties. That particular land had a gravel subsoil and it has been in pasture ever since. But in the early days they attempted to break it up and farm it. These safeguards are against practices such as that, to prevent people going onto land that no one should go on. It is to withhold land that should be organized into pastures to be utilized by the people in the area. It is to prevent people from being encouraged to go onto this type of land which has been proved to be not fitted for successful farming that the amendment is proposed.

Mr. Quelch: The minister knows very well that it goes far beyond what he has stated. The land I have in mind has been farmed consistently for twenty or thirty years or more. The only trouble is that it is dry. The minister knows these special areas probably as well as I do. There are large areas of this dry land that could produce good crops if irrigation were possible. Surveys have been made to see whether water could be put on these lands. The difficulty about this legislation is that it denies a bonus to land which is held under lease from the porvincial government, regardless of whether or not the land is good.

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Quelch: The minister shakes his head and I am a little more hopeful. I hope I am wrong, but I understood from the minister that any land held under lease from the provincial government would not be eligible for a bonus. Am I wrong in that? I hope I am.

Mr. Gardiner: I would not go so far as to agree that any particular piece of land that happens to be owned by the government would be out, but I will say that the general principle involved in the amendment is that it is not our intention that land that people would not take up to farm on their own should receive benefits under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act if leased from the government.

Mr. Quelch: The minister knows that the land I am referring to was considered good enough to be taken up. Because of circumstances some of these people were forced to lease their land but they continued to farm it. They proved that it was possible to farm the land. The minister says that not all land held under lease from the provincial government will not be eligible for bonus. Does he mean that there will be consultation between the federal and provincial governments to decide as to what leased lands will be eligible?

Mr. Gardiner: The provincial government will be free to handle the lands in such manner as to bring them under the act.

Mr. Quelch: Does the minister mean that the provincial government can sell the lands back to those who are leasing them?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that there are people living in that area who still own land but who lease other land from the provincial government, some for pasturing purposes and some for cultivation.

Mr. Quelch: Some of them live entirely on leased land.

Mr. Gardiner: There are a considerable number of people in the first group and I think it is true that most of them would be able to draw the full allowance under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act without taking into consideration what they have leased. They must have large acreages in that area if they are going to farm at all, and a number of them have quite considerable acreages in addition to what they lease. Those people would have no worry at all so far as this act is concerned as they will draw on their full acreage.

Then there is the other group who have been leasing all they have. It is difficult to state in an act that one man who leases submarginal land from the government can be paid while another man who leases submarginal land from the government cannot be paid. We have not said that at all, but to do what is suggested will work out to that in actual practice. What we have said in effect to the provincial government is this: "Are you satisfied that this is the only way in which these people can operate for a time until they get established?" I ask hon. members to consider what that means. If the provincial government replies, "There is nothing we can do to meet the situation; there is nothing that is going to help him, he must have this legislation." Then I would say to them, "You had better find some way of allowing these people the use of this land other than by leasing so that somebody else can do something about it." Under the other legislation we are prepared to take up a lot of that land and put it into pasture and make it available to these people without any capital outlay. Having offered that, I do not know why we should step in and adopt some plan that somebody else puts up and have to pay for it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): All the more reason for a committee.

Mr. Harkness: I take it that the real purpose of this legislation is to prevent people taking up submarginal land, or where they are already on submarginal land to force them off it or attempt to force them off it.

Mr. Gardiner: The latter part of the hon. member's statement is scarcely correct. We are prepared to assist them to get off, but not to force them off. If we had been trying to force them off we would have had them off long ago.

Mr. Harkness: With the general principle of taking submarginal lands out of cultivation I am in complete agreement. So far as the provision proposed by the minister at this time is concerned, I think the difficulty arises over the fact that a straight clear-cut provision has not been introduced to withdraw submarginal land from cultivation, land which, as the minister says, in many cases is leased. Instead it is being put on the basis of land qualifying or not qualifying for assistance payments on the ground of the kind of tenancy. It does not seem to me that is a reasonable way to do it. I suggest it would be very much better to change the provision with regard to withdrawing land so that it will be on the straightforward basis of no assistance being paid on land declared to be submarginal. Under those circumstances I think you would accomplish your purpose much better than by the proposed provision of getting people to move off submarginal land and preventing them from moving on.

The minister has said much about the desire to put a good deal of this land under the P.F.R.A. As long as you continue to allow farmers to farm submarginal land and make payments to them under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, you will not get them to agree to give up such land, move off and let it come under the P.F.R.A. From the point of view of general conservation measures, the protection not only of dry land but of other areas on the edges thereof from blowing, deterioration and so on, it would seem that a good deal of submarginal land still under cultivation should be withdrawn. With the exception of what I have suggested, I do not know what the particular means should be, but certainly from the point of view of long-range conservation measures there is no doubt we are still cultivating far too much land in the dry areas of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

As a boy I was raised on a ranch in southern Saskatchewan. It was beautiful ranching country, and it was opened up for homesteading. We then moved to Alberta. I have only been back once, in 1931, and I did not recognize the area. It was just a desert. There was a nice creek flowing through the place that always had water in it, and you could not tell where the course of it had been. It had been completely filled in. Great holes had been blown out of the land. That happened to be worse than most areas but there are many of that kind that never should have been opened up for cultivation. They should never have been homesteaded. It was a serious error, but since it was done the best course now is to try to repair the damage by putting the whole area back into grass as rapidly as possible. I do not think we will do that by half measures. I think it is necessary to put both the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act on a much more definite basis in order to make sure that submarginal lands will be taken away from the provisions of the P.F.A.A. and put under the P.F.R.A.

Mr. Argue: As I said before, I am not opposed to the government taking submarginal land out of wheat production provided that the people who are presently farming such lands are taken care of. I do object, however, to the minister attempting to dictate to provincial and municipal governments and to farmers as to how and on what basis they shall hold the land that they farm. It is certain that the land in the southwestern part of Saskatchewan presently owned by the provincial government is not all submarginal. I am sure the minister knows the area around Readlyn some of which is Sceptre heavy clay. The provincial government owns the odd piece of heavy clay land there, and it is certainly not submarginal for wheat production. It is some of the best wheat-producing land in the province of Saskatchewan.

The minister is saying that if a farmer wants to comply with the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act he will have to buy the land from the provincial government. Let us take the hypothetical case of a young farmer in the Readlyn district who owns a quarter section of land. He is just starting to farm and if he wants to expand he will have to go heavily in debt to buy more land. I am sure a half section in that area of that kind of land would cost $10,000. He will also have to buy a full line of equipment. Therefore he is most happy if he can get a half section of land from the provincial government under a leasing arrangement. Then he will only have to undertake the obligation of purchasing machinery, and goodness knows that is heavy enough for any man starting to farm at the present time. As I understand what the minister has said, a young man owning a quarter section of land and leasing a half section of Sceptre heavy clay land from the provincial government on a thirty-three year lease will not be entitled to payment under the act.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not talking about Sceptre or any other particular place, but I know Sceptre just about as well as my hon. friend.

Mr. Argue: I am not arguing that.

Mr. Gardiner: I think I know the whole southern end of the province, and I repeat that there is no area in that section belonging to the government that anybody would think was good enough and with sufficient area to start a settlement of people who were going to live on the land and cultivate it. A few moments ago the hon. member for Calgary East described an area in such a way that I am sure I could go there and walk over it, although I do not know where he came from. It may have been under a Conservative government but I believe it was under a Liberal government that some years ago after a lot of coaxing we permitted one or two ranches in that area to be opened up for homesteading. Just as my friend said a moment ago, if you go back there today you will not recognize the country. Everyone there will tell you it never should have been opened up. Some of the people own their land but it is altogether wrong to say that just because it is heavy land it is good land in the sense that we are talking about. Some of the very best soil I know of in Saskatchewan is south of Cadillac, about halfway between there and the border. We have 110,000 acres there in community pasture. It is much heavier clay land than a lot of the land being farmed in western Canada but it is on the ridge where the water runs both ways. On one side it runs to Hudson bay and on the other it runs down to the gulf of Mexico. It is rolling land and the water runs off so fast that no one can farm it for grain growing purposes.

We put 110,000 acres into pasture. Then we put 6,000 acres under water down in the valley at Valmarie, and today those people are living to advantage where formerly they could not do so at all. It is one of the finest areas in the southern part of Saskatchewan. I would not advise the house, and I would not do anything as a minister of the government, to encourage people to go onto that 110,000 acre pasture and settle there for cultivation purposes. I am sure anyone who has lived in the southern part of Saskatchewan would not suggest that should be done. You can go right over the area from one end to the other, and there are no lands owned by the provincial government that they or we desire to have put under a plow. I may say for the benefit of some of my friends who have been talking about this matter that if they will discuss it with the government of Saskatchewan they will find that they hold opinions quite similar to those I am expressing.

Mr. Argue: The minister certainly has not answered my question at all. I asked him if a young farmer, or any other kind of farmer, who had a half section of land leased from a provincial government, which land, according to the best economic survey by the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa and the university of Saskatchewan, is at least second best land in that province, would be eligible for a bonus.

Mr. Gardiner: The kind of land this bill really covers, and the kind I have in mind, would never get that sort of certificate from anyone who knew anything about land.

Mr. Argue: That still does not answer my question. Of course the minister does not have to answer it if he does not want to, but it seems clear that one of the main purposes of this resolution is to try and force the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan to adopt a different land policy than they have been following so far.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, no, it is not. My hon. friend's views are so coloured by the opinions he holds with regard to socialism—

Mr. Argue: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Gardiner: —that he thinks I am always fighting his socialist government. Some of the opinions I am expressing here this afternoon I got while sitting in with them, discussing this question. I believe most people who know the situation do not believe we should pay prairie farm assistance when everyone knows the lands to be submarginal.

Mr. Wright: I agree with the minister in regard to moving people from submarginal land; I have said so three times. The minister said he had sat in and discussed this matter with the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta. Did he discuss this amendment he is now proposing, with respect to excluding those lands?

Mr. Gardiner: I suggested to them that I probably would bring it in, and at the farm meeting in Saskatoon, at which representatives of all the groups were present, I said I was going to bring it in. I told them it was something they might find rather hard to take, but no one objected to it.

Mr. Quelch: I do not think the minister will claim that the government of Alberta is socialist. A large percentage of the land in the special areas, as he knows, is owned by the province. I believe he understands how that came about. He knows the history of that land; and he knows that the policies carried out in that area were very largely agreed upon and applied by Mr. Longman, of whom I believe the minister has a very high opinion. Under the act the bonus cannot be paid on submarginal land. That is definitely stated in the act.

Mr. Gardiner: On land the province declares submarginal.

Mr. Quelch: That is correct; and I would agree with the minister on any steps that might be suggested to take submarginal land out of cultivation, without causing injustice. But the problem is that under the resolution now before us a man who owns submarginal land can continue to farm it and receive the bonus, provided that land has not been declared submarginal by the provincial government. This resolution does not take care of that situation at all; it only applies where submarginal land is owned by a provincial government and leased to an individual.

Mr. Gardiner: No, it does not. As a matter of fact there is nothing we can do in regard to what the provincial government is going to say, but neither the government of Alberta nor the government of Saskatchewan has declared an acre of land submarginal since the act was placed upon the statute books. That is the first fact. They have never declared any of this land submarginal in the sense that this act says it must be declared.

Mr. Quelch: But they have taken it out of cultivation.

Mr. Gardiner: That was done long before. As a matter of fact the picture my hon. friend has in mind and that I have in mind began to be formed back in 1922. I believe it was commenced at least that far back. It was not under any of the gentlemen who have been mentioned when it was started, but it has gradually developed to the present position. It is only necessary to drive over that area to understand why that action was taken. When it comes to the other matter, however, knowing that both provincial governments had legislation on their statute books empowering them to declare any area submarginal and to commence to move people out of it, we put that provision in our statute. That was their own intention; those acts have been on the statute books of the provinces for a long time. So in this act we said that any land declared submarginal under that provincial legislation would not receive prairie farm assistance.

Then we set up the P.F.R.A., under which we organized this large area I mentioned a few moments ago, about 110,000 acres, some of which was owned by the government and some by individuals. We bought out the individuals, and the provincial government gave us back the leased land. We had turned it over to them for nothing in 1931, and they gave it back to us for nothing in 1939 or 1940. We organized it into pastures, and bought up other lands to put in with it. Then we irrigated lands alongside it, in the Frenchman river valley, and people are living there and growing fodder, and stock is run in this large pasture. To any individual who wanted to live inside that fence we said, "You are on submarginal land, and you will get no prairie farm assistance." We have done that in every pasture we have set up, and those pastures now total some 1,300,000 acres in that area. To every person who wanted to remain there we said, "If you stay you remain under these conditions. In the first place, you have to get out through our fence. Then you have to put up with other people's cattle running around your place. In addition, you will not receive any prairie farm assistance; that is provided by our act."

Now we are going into other similar areas and saying we are prepared to put a fence around them and make pastures out of their land. There are perhaps only half a dozen or so people in the area, and we would like to have them move out. But now we find that within the last two or three years as many as thirty-six people have moved into one township in that area, and taken up crop leases. I do not think anyone in this house will suggest that we should continue to pay prairie farm assistance on that land. The situation is different in the case of a man who has been living on a piece of land for twenty or thirty years; who settled on that land years ago, when he did not know and no one knew what the conditions were. That man owns his land, or is living on it under an agreement of sale of some kind. He has managed to get along up to the present. We are not saying to him that unless he gets inside the pasture fence he must move off the land. We are saying, "Until we can find some place to put you we will help you along and pay the prairie farm assistance. Sooner or later, by obtaining this other land that still belongs to the province, to the municipality or to someone else, we hope to be able to get it organized into a pasture, and then we will help you move into an irrigated area, or somewhere else." In such cases we have undertaken to help a man take down his buildings; we have trucked them for him to his new location, and have helped pay the cost of putting them up again. So it is a matter of persuasion rather than compulsion, as my hon. friend suggested it might be. As long as we are going along with that policy we do not think we should turn around and assist people to settle in these areas, by taking over cultivation leases, and getting prairie farm assistance. We do not think we should pay it.

Mr. Quelch: The minister stressed the fact that Alberta has not declared any land submarginal under the act. On the other hand he knows they have taken a great deal of land out of cultivation. They have carefully surveyed the land in the drought area. Some has been classified as grazing land and some as cultivated land. The land that should not be cultivated is kept under grazing leases. So, while they have not declared it submarginal under the act, they have taken it out of cultivation.

The minister has had quite a bit to say about what the federal government has done in Saskatchewan in connection with building up pastures. The provincial government of Alberta has done exactly the same thing in drought areas. One would think the minister would appreciate the fact that the provincial government has established these pastures without assistance from the federal government, and has thereby saved this government a good deal of money. They have established a number of community pastures, and no one within those areas is allowed to cultivate the land. If the provincial government now disposes of some of the land at present held under cultivation leases, however, it will not have the same control over that land that it has at the present time, and I think the minister will realize that in that area it is necessary to retain control over the method of farming that is adopted. There was a great danger that they would become a dust bowl and therefore certain policies were adopted in order to ensure that they be not turned into a dust bowl. But if you were to sell back to private individuals that land which is held under cultivation leases there is no saying what type of farming may be adopted, and serious situations might be developed. The provincial government has had thousands of acres of submarginal land seeded down to crested wheat grass and let out on grazing lease. That has been taken out of the benefits of this act. In view of the fact that there are many farmers who have resided in that area for twenty or thirty years, but who today farm that land under a cultivation lease instead of holding the title, I think the minister will agree that these men should be entitled to the bonus just as much as the men who hold title to the land. I am wondering whether or not the minister consulted the municipalities or the provincial government before that section of the resolution was drafted. Is it just one of his own brain waves or his department's, or did he arrive at this decision as a result of discussing the matter with the provincial governments and the municipalities out there?

Mr. Gardiner: Again I do not like to be repeating my speeches that have appeared in the press all over the country for months, but I did go to the municipal convention in Saskatchewan, and I went purposely to discuss this matter along with one or two other questions.

Mr. Quelch: Mainly section 2, the rectangular block.

Mr. Gardiner: No. I discussed the whole matter. If the hon. member wants it repeated just as I said it at the time, maybe I should do so.

Mr. Quelch: Go ahead.

Mr. Gardiner: The whole province of Saskatchewan was represented at the municipal convention; the representatives of the municipalities in Alberta were there and also the representatives of the municipalities in Manitoba. They come to these meetings from year to year. I rose to my feet and stated to them that they had been asking for this rectangular area in the act to be changed to a solid block which was not rectangular. I said, "It is my intention to suggest an amendment of that kind in the act this session." I of course got quite a hand for that. I said, "Probably I should have given you the bad news before I gave you the good, and got the clap last rather than the other." Then I indicated that it was the intention of the government to prevent lands which belonged to the government—whether federal, provincial or municipal—from benefiting under this act.

Mr. Quelch: I am glad you called it bad news.

Mr. Gardiner: I am quite candid to say that I did not get quite so much applause for that; but maybe they did not fully understand the situation.

Mr. Argue: That is probably why they applauded.

Mr. Gardiner: I went into it with them, and no objection was raised to the idea that that ought to be done. I am going to say this in addition. The one area in which it is probably most difficult to apply the amendment is the area that the hon. member for Acadia has been talking about. That area has been organized under a special organization, and I do not think there is any other part of western Canada to which you can apply the same arguments.

Mr. Quelch: The minister will agree that it is a good organization.

Mr. Gardiner: I agree that it has taken care of a difficult situation over a period of time. Probably some examination should be made into the circumstances that exist and of the extent to which this legislation would harm people who maybe should not be harmed. But that again is something which can be done if the bill goes to the committee; and if it does not go to the committee, it is something that I can look into a little bit further before I bring it back to the house. But I am quite satisfied that the principle involved in this resolution has got to be brought into being now. When I say what I have said to the hon. member, what I am thinking of is that maybe if we said, "Anything that has happened within the last twenty years should not be a consideration", it would cover the matter. Most of this set-up was put up years and years ago and has been an established thing there. I think the hon. member himself will agree that people have been coming in and starting to do this in the last five or ten years since this act became a statute, and that some care should be taken with regard to permitting that to go on in the future.

Mr. Quelch: I will agree with practically everything the minister has said this time; but I am more concerned for those farmers who went in there and homesteaded there in 1910 and 1911, and so on; who have tried to make a go of it, but who are now to be penalized under the act as a result of this amendment. With the assurance that the minister gave that this matter will be sent to a committee and discussed there, and that special consideration will be given to the peculiar situation that exists in that area, I will not object any further at this time.

Mr. Wright: There is just one other point to which I want to refer. The minister talked about the dominion government establishing community pastures. I believe in Saskatchewan the provincial government are establishing community pastures today. They have already established a branch to work in co-operation with the P.F.R.A. administration; and that is the one thing that I think is important. There should be co-operation between the dominion government and the provincial government in this whole matter of the re-establishment of settlers in western Canada under P.F.R.A. The provincial government have under their control land on which many of these settlers could be settled in Saskatchewan. I know the north-eastern part of the province fairly well, and I know the area to which the minister referred when he talked about some people saying that there were one million acres that could be put under cultivation. I know the people who said that. One of the men who said it was Mr. L. B. Thomson, director of the P.F.R.A., who had a party out there in the northeastern part of Saskatchewan and the northwestern part of Manitoba making a survey in the area. He said that there was land available there that could be put under cultivation for a cost of, as he stated, a few cents an acre. I think it will cost more than that to put in the necessary dikes to prevent the flooding of some of this land. But if P.F.R.A. is to be a success in the western provinces, it can only be a success when there is complete co-operation between both the provincial government and the federal government.

As to this amendment, may I say that I will be greatly surprised if the Saskatchewan government has been consulted and understands the implications, as the minister has explained them here today. I would urge that the Saskatchewan government be consulted. After all, the dominion government cannot make a success of the P.F.R.A. without the co-operation of the provincial government; and the provincial governments certainly cannot make a success of it without the co-operation of the dominion government. I would certainly hope that that co-operation would be available from both parties.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I want to say only one thing with regard to the matter, and I am glad to have an opportunity to say it. I find it a little bit difficult to understand that a government is trying to co-operate with you under these circumstances. We say we are prepared to spend all the money and do the job for you and leave the situation in the same position as the million and a quarter acres that are already fenced into pastures are in, namely that the federal government owns the land. We put up the fences and built them; we set up the organization round about it that has operated it now for ten years successfully, and we are quite prepared to go right on doing that. Then the provincial government comes in and says: "This has been a fine job; it has been well done; everything is fine. We would just like you to turn the job of doing that over to us now and let us own the land instead of you". I presume they say that because they like a government that calls itself socialist to be owning something rather than a government that does not call itself socialist to be owning something. They say: "We would like to do this now; we would like to do this, but we want you to pay for it." Probably if they said: "We want to do it and we are prepared to pay for it," it might be all right. We think co-operation goes along this line. Here is a thing that has been done well in Saskatchewan. It has been done well everywhere it has been tried, and nobody has complained about it. Everyone is satisfied. It has not cost the treasury anything outside of the original capital expense. It is paying its way every year right along, and we say, we are quite prepared to go along and operate it and take over the lands that you find you could not administer. I am not blaming the present government, because other governments found it the same. Prior to 1931 everyone in western Canada said—probably I should not say "everyone"; some of my hon. friends opposite perhaps do not agree—nearly everyone in western Canada said: "Turn the natural resources over to us. We are closer to them. We can administer them. We can pay for their operation better than anybody else." They were turned over to Liberal and Conservative governments, if you like, and they have been operated since by other kinds of governments. None of them has been able to find enough money to do the job at all.

Then the federal government comes along and says: "Well, we have got some responsibility in this, and we are prepared to go ahead and do the job. All you need to do is to turn back to us some of what was turned over to you, and we will go right ahead and do the job." When you get to that point they say, "Oh, well, yes, but we would like to do it now that you have shown us how, provided you will pay for it." I do not call that co-operation. If they will come right along and say: "Let us go right ahead with this thing as we have always been doing; let us make a go of it", they will get a hundred per cent co-operation from Ottawa. So long as they do not want to do that, we will not have any row with them at all, we will go right on administering what we have now, and go on looking after the people we have undertaken to take care of, and do everything we can to develop the other as time goes on—

Mr. Argue: Does that apply to irrigation, too?

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, well, we will discuss irrigation when we come to it.

Mr. Argue: Another principle then.

Mr. MacKenzie: There is a simple way to settle this problem. I have listened to the same discussion in the house I am sure for the last 15 years. It has not varied very much. I feel that there was some justification for establishing the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act when they were enacted. They have done a pretty good job. I feel that the two provinces have become very wealthy. They do tell us, when they are in different moods from what they are in now, that their farmers pay more income taxes than all the other farmers in Canada. That being true, I feel that this is not a federal field at all. It would be a good time to step out of the operations and let the provincial governments handle it. I think it actually is a provincial department.

Mr. Fair: Some years ago I told the hon. gentleman:

A little learning is a dangerous thing;
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring.

I think that applies today as it did the first time I told it to him. If he got a little education on conditions in the other provinces and found out how very very efficiently the Income Tax Act has been operated in our provinces and that it is not operated in the same way in the other provinces he would have the answer to his comment.

Mr. Blackmore: I have listened with great interest to the discussion up to the present time. It would be well to lay this down for the sake of the people of Ontario and the east who are more or less at a loss to understand what this thing is:

The time has come to lay it down definitely that in the days when the country was first being explored it was fully known by men who knew conditions, like Captain Palliser, that wide areas of Saskatchewan and Alberta were not suitable for settlement. That has already been referred to.

Alberta and Saskatchewan had nothing to do with settlers coming in and settling on that land. Alberta and Saskatchewan were not even yet born as provinces. They were territories in those days. A great deal of the settlement which is causing us our trouble today took place before 1905 when these two provinces were born as provinces. Well, then, there was evidently a serious problem on the doorsteps of the new provinces as soon as they were organized; no one knows that better than the Minister of Agriculture himself.

What was to be done in order to assist these new provinces? What we are really debating today has a great deal to do with that very question. I do not think any hon. member, or anyone in the country, would say that because the dominion government had settled wide areas of that land with settlers, and put prospective provinces in the position in which they would have to pay crop failure relief, seed grain relief and a number of other things of that sort, and provide social services, schools and the like in areas that were not able to support such services by their own production—I do not think there is any member in this house or anyone out in the country who would argue that we could consistently ask Alberta and Saskatchewan to assume the financial responsibility for providing these services. The problem has just gone on and on from there.

We have now got to the point where what the minister seems to be arguing is this: If the dominion government is going to come into the province of Saskatchewan and take over this bad situation which has grown up during the years, then the dominion government requires that as a price of that assistance, that remedy, the province shall surrender to the dominion government the ownership of that land which properly belongs to Saskatchewan. I do not think there is an hon. member in the house who believes that that is exactly the thing to be desired. The dominion government has created a situation in the province of Saskatchewan which is beyond the capacity of any province like Saskatchewan unaided to take care of financially or any other way. When it is discovered that the situation is beyond control and the dominion government comes in to discharge a responsibility which certainly morally they assumed when they put the settlers in the area, when the dominion government comes in to deal with the problem and assumes the responsibility, it says: You will have to give back the country to us.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask one question?

Mr. Blackmore: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: The dominion government has spent about $30 million in round figures on the job up to now doing what my hon. friend is suggesting should be done. Does he not think that under these circumstances, whatever government happens to be in power at the time ought to be absolutely assured that at the end of the work the same evils are not going to be created again? If he thinks that, does he think there is any other way than the government of Canada having control not for twenty years, fifty or a hundred, but for all time?

Mr. Blackmore: The only answer to the question of the minister is this: It is a matter that has been before the house many times. Can we rely on the people who are elected by the people of Saskatchewan to form their government, can we rely on them to assume responsibility for the good government of Saskatchewan? In other words, are the people of Saskatchewan capable of electing as intelligent people, as honourable and as well-meaning people, to govern them in Regina as they are to govern them in Ottawa? There can be only one answer to that. Surely, they are. Therefore I see no reason why the mere fact that the problem is taken over by the dominion government is a guarantee that the problem is going to be more successfully handled than it would be if it were in the hands of the provincial government granted financial assistance. As a matter of fact the splendid work which has already been done by Alberta—I am not so familiar with Saskatchewan but I presume it is just as good there—indicates that. The splendid work that has been done by Alberta in administering special areas is clear evidence that a province is quite capable of dealing with the situation. The only handicap a province has in confronting such a problem is that of financial commitments.

The minister may say, "Well, the federal government has to foot the bill; so, let the province manage the land!" There is no particular reason why that argument should be valid, because Saskatchewan is paying part of the money that goes to foot the bill, just as Nova Scotia or any other province. Saskatchewan pays abundantly in tariffs and by every other means of revenue to create funds at Ottawa from which costs are defrayed.

I fail to see why the mere fact that the dominion government provides the money should entitle it to take over the whole control and ownership of the land involved. I think that matter has to be understood. I would say that under the minister's control, while he has been in charge of the Department of Agriculture, it is only fair to say that he should have the credit that I am going to give him. I believe that he has handled this whole situation, including the irrigation question, with a vision which probably surpasses that which has been manifested by any of his predecessors in office. He is entitled to full credit, and entitled to that credit right here and now from a member who is not identical with him in political views or economic views, but who is anxious to see that a man gets credit for the things he does.

In my judgment, if the minister would just incorporate into his thinking the idea that I have intimated clearly in the few remarks I have made, he would have much more cause for satisfaction and happiness in the future, and so would the provinces of Canada, than would be the case if he does not accept that point of view.

Mr. Gardiner: We will apply it in a different bill from this one.

Mr. Blackmore: The reason I have risen lies in the fact that a question was raised by the hon. member from Ontario as to whether the other provinces should be called upon to pay money to help solve this special area problem.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

I rise partly to deal with that question, realizing that it is an honest question, honestly and understandably asked. The minister in his remarks dealt with the question as to whether the dominion government should contribute to the accomplishment of an objective which seems to be primarily of provincial concern and responsibility, without assuming some sort of ownership or control of the land involved.

I think the answer very definitely is that the federal government ought to be prepared to help any province solve any problem beyond the power of that province to solve, knowing fully that the stronger each and every province is, the stronger is the Dominion of Canada. It has not hurt us at all to provide assistance on a generous basis for the people who suffered from floods in the Fraser valley. It will not hurt us to help the people who are suffering as a result of the terrible floods in Winnipeg. It did not hurt us to help Ontario build great canals, to which reference was made by the hon. member for Queens, I believe it was, the other night. It will not hurt us to help any of the provinces with a great project which makes the economic life within that province better and, in fact, helps everybody.

For the benefit of the hon. member from Ontario, who raised the question, let me ask: What was the main reason for bringing population into those plains which constitute the Palliser triangle? Those who go back to read the words of men like Sifton and others, who were instrumental in causing the settlement policy to be adopted, will find that those men said something like this, "So long as those plains have no people in them, there is no market for our agricultural machinery, no market for our textiles, no market for eastern Canada. But if we can get people in there, we will have a market."

What was manifestly their primary object in settling people in those areas? It was to increase the economic stability of Canada as a whole through Ontario as a province. We have no objection to that; it was sound statesmanship. But part of the cost of providing those vast markets for Ontario and Quebec constitutes the very problem we are discussing today, the creation of a special area in which people were unable to support themselves because of drought.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The question I was about to ask is somewhat aside from what has been under discussion. I was surprised to hear the statement that veterans would be established in those areas under the Veterans Land Act. How did that come about?—because this came into being in 1939 and conditions were pretty well known at that time. How many are there established in that area under the Veterans Land Act?

Mr. Gardiner: The only reason veterans are being brought in is that it is assumed that all the land they are on was properly inspected before they went on it, and it was determined before they went on that they could make a living on that land. That was all determined by the inspectors under the Veterans Land Act. That being so, we concluded we should not rule them out if, in some particular year, they have a crop failure.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I just wished to be certain that a veteran would be protected in respect of his holdings.

Mr. Knight: I think perhaps the minister made some statements while I was out but to which I shall now refer. I understand the lands being thrown open in northeastern Saskatchewan are lands the title to which is in the name of the Saskatchewan government. These lands I understand are being leased to groups of young men, some of whom are veterans and some of whom are not.

My question is this: Do groups of young men, veterans or non-veterans, under those conditions of taking up land on a co-operative basis, become eligible for benefits under P.F.A.A.? Perhaps I might forestall what the minister might say by saying I know that that particular area is not likely to suffer from drought. However those of us who have lived so long in western Canada know that almost anything can happen there. If and when that does happen, what is the condition in regard to the class of men I have mentioned, namely young men who come together to lease land from the provincial government for the purpose of co-operative farming?

Mr. Gardiner: I believe I said earlier that the act as it is now drawn takes care of co-operative farms as such. But, on the other question, most of what I know concerning that northeastern area I have learned as a result of discussions with delegations who have come to see me for the purpose of persuading the federal government to spend money to open it up. I can assure the hon. member of this, that so long as I am here, at least, and have anything to do with it, there is not going to be federal money spent on it in order to open it up, until we are pretty sure that it will not come under prairie farm assistance. To begin with, that land is in a section of the province where there never has been prairie farm assistance, until now. When I was minister in Saskatchewan I had something to do with opening up that area. We put in the drainage which made possible the occupation of much of the land from the highway running north to Nipawin. None of those people have come in under prairie farm assistance and I am quite satisfied that the question does not apply to people up in that section.

We are referring to the people in probably a good half of the province of Saskatchewan in the southwestern section, to the people in about a third of Alberta and the people in about a sixth of Manitoba. The remainder of those provinces is not much concerned with this particular legislation except for the fact that they have to pay the one per cent.

Mr. Knight: Granting the correctness of what the minister has said, I still would like a more specific answer. Let us suppose that we have co-operative farms in northern Saskatchewan organized on the basis I have described. If drought should occur those people would not come under the P.F.A.A.

Mr. Gardiner: I have attempted to make it absolutely certain that these co-operative farms are not eliminated.

Mr. Knight: Will this amendment take them out of the act?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Knight: Is there any distinction as to non-veterans and veterans in connection with those farms?

Mr. Gardiner: Not if the man owns his farm, and the veteran is presumed to own his. Many veterans who own their land outright originally bought it under the Veterans Land Act. Others bought government land—this number is quite limited—but the land was properly inspected. Therefore we are prepared to say that such land would be classified as land in connection with which payments could be made.

Mr. Knight: The minister has emphasized the purchase of the land. He first referred to those who owned their land and then he referred to those who had bought their land from the provincial government. If he will remember, my question related to those who were leasing land from the provincial government.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member is confining his question to an area that will never come under prairie farm assistance and he wants to be able to go up into that corner of the province and tell the people that the Minister of Agriculture said that they will never get anything, no matter what happens. I am not going to answer the hon. member's question to permit him to do that. I am telling the hon. member that this is intended to keep people from going on submarginal land for the purpose of drawing prairie farm assistance.

Mr. Knight: I do not think the minister is fair in imputing motives. I can ask any question I like in this House of Commons.

Mr. Gardiner: Certainly, but I do not have to answer it the way you want me to.

Mr. Knight: The minister has indicated on many occasions that he does not have to answer, but my conception of the responsibility of a cabinet minister is that he is supposed to answer questions. Could we not discuss this thing without political tinge? The minister has not yet answered my question and I assure him that I do not want the answer for any political purposes or to be able to go up to talk to these people in that district.

Mr. Gardiner: I have listened to you before.

Mr. Knight: Perhaps that is what the minister would do if he had information which was against the party to which I belong. One of my greatest difficulties in dealing with the Minister of Agriculture is that I always feel that he never forgets politics. I am not interested in politics in that way. I have asked a proper question and I should have an answer. If a drought were to occur in that particular area would those people be permitted to draw P.F.A.A. benefits when they are on land that has been leased from the provincial government for the purpose of setting up co-operative farms? I have not yet got an answer and the minister says he will not give it so there is nothing I can do about it.

Mr. Sinnott: There is nothing wrong with this legislation the minister is bringing in.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That settles everything.

Mr. Sinnott: I know of many young fellows who have wanted to buy a quarter section alongside a farm which they own already but because it happens to be part of a school section the provincial government would not sell although they are ready to lease over a period of years. When you lease land you generally do not make any attempt to improve its productivity. A man generally tries to get as much as possible year after year out of such land, with the result that it deteriorates. If the Saskatchewan government does not want to sell this land, that is their business, but I think the minister is following a sound policy with this legislation.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 209, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

The house having reverted to the order for introduction of bills:

Hon. Robert H. Winters (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 210, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $293,670.

Mr. Charlton: There are a few questions I should like to ask on this item as it might be easier to ask them now rather than to wait until the various items they concern are before the committee. One matter has to do with the expenditures for miscellaneous, sundries, n.o.p.—not otherwise provided for—and contingent. Dealing with the Department of Agriculture alone they amount to a total of $198,159. Although it does not have to do with this department, I may say in passing that I have gone through all the estimates and I find the grand total for all departments is $17,382,354 for sundries, miscellaneous, not otherwise provided for, and in some cases contingent expenses. I believe that should be explained by the Minister of Finance if not by the Minister of Agriculture. If such expenses amount to so much then it would seem to me that they should be set out in greater detail or the departments should get together and agree on a common plan to deal with them.

The total for travelling expenses, for instance, in the Department of Agriculture for 1950-51 is $2,148,000, an increase of $171,500 over last year. I think the minister should answer these questions. I realize a great deal of travelling must be done by officials of the department but certainly not that much. In the case of sundries there is something else I should like to point out. It happens that thirteen out of the forty-five votes for sundry items are exactly the same as they were last year. They include such figures as $617, $513, $1,147, and they are identical with last year's items. I think that arouses a little suspicion and calls for an answer. Is the minister not going to answer?

Mr. Gardiner: I will wait until I hear more, if there is any more criticism. I want to look up these sundries.

Mr. Jones: I am not going to follow the criticism of the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth. Under this item I want to deal in a general way with an industry with which I am fairly familiar, fruit growing in the Okanagan valley. I should like to express my appreciation and that of the industry as a whole for the co-operation and assistance given to the industry by the Minister of Agriculture. I should like to point out, however, that if it were not for the disasters at Winnipeg and Rimouski you would probably be hearing a good deal more about the plight of the fruit growers of the Okanagan valley. While their disaster is not as great as those featured in the papers at the present time, they have received a terrible set-back through loss of markets and particularly because of the severe winter. I have heard from several of my friends in the industry saying that they have lost some of their orchards, peaches and apricots particularly. The value of their loss has not been completely assessed so I am not going to deal with that now. I should like to point out to the minister that I hope he has provision in his estimates to take care of the farmers who have suffered heavy losses.

I am also satisfied that the total amount of money received from all sales of apples up to date plus the $2 million generously given by the government will fall far short of returning to the farmers the cost of production. I hope if they come to the minister he will treat them in his usual co-operative way as he has in the past. I should like to review briefly the prospects for the coming year as it has a bearing on the situation of the fruit growers. I want to refer to the Penticton Herald of May 4. Mr. Embrey, an official of the British Columbia Tree Fruits Limited, is reported as saying that the estimate for the present year for apples is five and a half to six million boxes, which is roughly 70 per cent of last year's crop. He goes on to say that apricots and peaches will be practically nil. I do not think it is quite that bad but I am using his own words. He says that the cherry crop is expected to be about 30 per cent in comparison with last year's crop.

I merely point out that the fruit growers have suffered from loss of markets and conditions following a severe winter. They are battling natural obstacles plus artificial trade barriers. Mr. Embrey goes on to point out that the apple growers of Washington and other states, whose apples are in competition with our own over the border, are fighting hard to get Mr. Truman to place an import quota on Canadian apples. Nevertheless Mr. Embrey has hopes that will not be the case, and I think Mr. Truman has sympathetic feelings toward the Canadian growers. Our people are constantly in search of world markets, and I want to suggest some places where the government can help. One of them is by entering wholeheartedly into the principle of a world food pool. We feel that apples—and doctors have said so on many occasions—are needed as a part of any balanced diet. They are a necessity and should be used to balance the diet of every household the whole year round.

In the world as a whole there is a vast shortage of apples but in Canada, as is well known, we have a large surplus. I want to read a resolution passed by the growers at their convention last November concerning the suggestion I am endeavouring to pass on to the government. The resolution reads:

> Whereas the food and agriculture organization has adopted in principle the world food pool resolution submitted by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to and adopted by the international federation of agricultural producers at Guelph, Ontario, last June, which resolution conforms with submissions made by the British Columbia Federation of Agriculture during the last ten years, and
> Whereas the FAO international commodity clearing house seeks to establish—
>
> 1. "The maintenance of a high level of production and employment."
>
> 2. "The reduction of trade restrictions, including tariffs and quantitative and monetary restrictions."
>
> 3. "An increase in the standards of productive efficiency particularly in western Europe."
>
> 4. "International investment to finance export and import surpluses" and
>
> 5. "The restoration of convertible currencies and multi-lateral transactions as a basis of world trade"
> —all of which is designed to feed properly an undernourished world and thus utilize all presently available potential food and fibre production.
> Therefore, the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association in its 1950 annual convention commends the Canadian Federation of Agriculture for promoting so effectively the world food pool principle and the sixty-one countries which make up FAO for planning to put this world-essential principle into active operation, and urges the Canadian government to give this project its complete support.

On their behalf, Mr. Chairman, I am passing on the desire and hope that the minister's support will be given to this resolution. Under those conditions we would have no surpluses. Instead of embarrassing us, they would be converted into tangible wealth. It would help build up good will throughout the world, and would put the industry on its feet. I believe our ability to produce is a sacred trust, and if we violate it or destroy our production by waste or dumping, some day we shall have to pay the price and answer for our actions.

Since Canada is one of the world's leading agricultural producers, Canadians should give leadership, and by that I mean we should break all the economic red tape that is now tying us down to orthodox methods of trading with other countries. We shall be sorry indeed if the day ever comes when Canadian farmers, whether wheat growers or fruit producers, are asked to restrict their production. To me that is contrary to the laws of nature, and should not be done. In the light of that I ask the government to study the implications of this resolution, a copy of which was sent to the minister. My appeal is ably backed by Mr. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. He has summarized the matter in these words, and I quote from his statement in the Ottawa Journal of April 20:

"The problem, then, is largely a matter of distribution of food within each country and throughout the world. To have embarrassing surpluses of food piling up in one part of the country, undermining both producers' security and their domestic economies, while in some other parts of the world millions are hungry and undernourished, is a denial of everything that leads to human progress.

"Our farmers and farmers in other exporting countries will be compelled to restrict production against their better judgment if a world food plan is not undertaken to distribute abundance to people in great need. A continuation of this situation is a threat to the peace of the world, because you can't talk peace to hungry people nor can you argue successfully against communism, whose leaders take full advantage of that kind of situation," concluded Mr. Hannam.

As I have stated already, I bring up this matter in the hope that the Minister of Agriculture, who is capable of taking the lead and who is in the happy position of having these surpluses more or less under control, can step into the picture and present the case to the rest of the world. I should like to compliment the minister and his department on what they have done, but I understand the difficulties they are up against, particularly with respect to foreign markets. When I came to investigate what were the actual handicaps I understood those difficulties better than ever. I find that one difficulty is the lack of peace treaties, with which I shall deal later on. Recognition of countries which were formerly enemies, who are now in a position to deal with us, has not taken place owning to the absence of a peace treaty. Presumably that is a matter that will have to be dealt with by the Department of External Affairs. Then the Department of Finance comes into the picture of world trade, with our austerity program and the conservation of dollars. Into the same picture comes the Department of National Revenue, with its tariffs, quotas, duties and so on. So the Department of Agriculture has to make the best of a huge production and huge surplus, and battle against the interests of the other departments.

[Mr. Jones.]

I suggest that the department exercise the powers granted in 1946, which to me appear very wide, in order to overcome some of the obstacles to which I have referred. The Canadian Commercial Corporation Act gives that corporation power to assist in the development of trade between Canada and other nations, and to assist persons in Canada to obtain goods and commodities from outside Canada or to dispose of goods and commodities that are available for export from Canada. Then in section 5 it provides:

. . . the corporation may carry on the business of:

(a) importing goods or commodities into Canada, and

(b) exporting goods or commodities from Canada, either as principal or as agent, in such manner and to such extent as it deems advisable to achieve the said purposes.

To my mind that gives the department power to work in conjunction with the corporation to set up an import-export board or its equivalent to take care of the marketing of our fruit products overseas. I realize it has been suggested that we have trade envoys to do these things; or, as one minister suggested, the industry itself should have representatives seeking these markets. The trouble is that a small firm, or any firm as far as that goes, finds it difficult to obtain properly qualified people to send abroad, mainly because of the cost involved. You need men able to speak the languages of the countries in which you are seeking to do business. They must be trained to ascertain the trade requirements of various countries, and so on. For many years we in Canada were indifferent to the trade needs of countries such as Britain, for instance. Their timber dimensions vary widely from ours, yet we stubbornly kept on sending our own dimensions. As a result it was many years before we realized why we were not making headway in that market. We also need a body that will have power to advise Canadian manufacturers and producers as to the requirements of these markets. These would include such things as timber dimensions, which I just mentioned, and the type, quality and size of pack with respect to fruit. We have probably drifted into world trade; we have gradually caught up with the trend, but we are still in the drift.

In the absence of any such policy, such bodies as the Canadian chamber of commerce are doing their best to overcome the difficulties. I should like to quote from a letter recently received from this organization to show what they are doing to fill the gap in the absence of a department organized to look after our import and export needs:

. . . anything which diminishes the output of our primary industries is bound to affect all business.

Primary industries, as you know, are dependent to a large extent upon foreign markets. Fluctuations in foreign trade can be related directly to your business. A continued deterioration of foreign trade could have the same damaging effect on primary industries in this province as weather adversity.

Regardless of whether we sell to the foreign market or not, we should be concerned about it. It seems obvious that we as individuals can do little. We can, however, support an organization which has as its objective the study and development of improved foreign trade.

You may have read in recent press dispatches of the return of Mr. Howard T. Mitchell of Vancouver from Anglo-Canadian trade talks in London, England. This is only one of the efforts of the Canadian chamber of commerce in this field. Undoubtedly such continued efforts will benefit British Columbia greatly.

Item stands.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

PRAIRIE TRANSMISSION LINES LIMITED

The house resumed, from Friday, May 5, consideration in committee of Bill No. 9, to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited—Mr. Benidickson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to say another word, Mr. Chairman, on this bill before it gets out of committee. When I last spoke in the debate on the second reading of one of these bills—I think it was before the Easter recess—I said that I did not intend to take up any further time of the house in debating these measures. I spoke only briefly at that time.

When we were debating the bills on second reading, the chorus from the supporters of the bills was, "Let us get the bills through the house and to the appropriate standing committee where we can get all the information that our hearts can desire". Eventually the bills reached the committee, but once they got there the situation changed. Instead of making an attempt to get all the information required, the chorus began to get the bills back into the house. As I may mention later, that strategy had results which the strategists did not expect. Some members of the committee, and some who were not on the committee, but who were interested in the bills, were disgusted with what they saw and heard. The result was that they changed their minds, and their support for the bills is not nearly so strong now—at least not among the members from my province—as it was before the bills went to the committee.

On the order paper each Tuesday and Friday, and on private members days' on Mondays—I was going to say the perpetual private members' Mondays—these bills appear under the heading "private bills". In order to bring the heading of the bills in proper relation to reality, I think we should have a new page on the order paper, and put these bills under the title "privileged bills"; because I have never heard of a situation such as this one, where outside promoters can get greater preference in the House of Commons than can the members who were sent here by the electors of this country.

I think, however, that the long debate has had some good results. I notice that the hon. member for Vancouver South who, I am sorry to say, is not in his seat tonight, in an article written for a neighbourhood paper in his constituency said this:

> The tragedy of the filibuster has been that it held parliament in contempt to the extent that it prevented members from exercising their responsibilities.

Then he went on to say something that we have heard time and time again during the debate on these bills and to which I shall refer later:

> Parliament has no power to determine route of any pipe line but this authority is vested with the board of transport commissioners. Parliament has no authority to sanction either gas or oil for these pipe lines—this is the responsibility of the Alberta gas and oil conservation board. Export of these and like commodities is subject to statute of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

The filibuster, if the hon. member for Vancouver South wishes to call it that, has surely had at least one favourable result. It has held up discussion on these bills long enough for some of the British Columbia members, who were definitely in favour of the bills before they went to committee, to oppose them now in their present form at least while the others, with the possible exception of the one who is supporting the bills, do not know just where they stand.

To refer again to the hon. member for Vancouver South, in some remarks he made in the house in connection with the bills he said that he would vote for them and would go back to British Columbia and educate the people of that province into demanding an all-Canadian route. If there is need for education, it is the hon. member for Vancouver South that needs it. It is the people of British Columbia who are educating the hon. member for Vancouver South as they have educated the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and quite a number of other members who are at the moment sitting on the fence, not knowing which way they are going to fall.

The argument has been made and reiterated, that this parliament has no authority or power to designate a route. For my part, I would hate to believe that of this parliament. But whether or not parliament has the right to designate a definite route, surely parliament has a right to indicate what general route this House of Commons believes the pipe lines should follow in taking a Canadian natural resource from one point in Canada to another. Surely parliament has the right to say that. If not, we had better leave at once for our homes. The argument made by my hon. friends who are supporting these bills is that parliament need not do that. The board of transport commissioners will protect the interests of the people of Canada. Well, the board of transport commissioners have authority over our freight rates.

An hon. Member: They have made mistakes before.

Mr. MacInnis: My hon. friend says that they have made mistakes. A great many people in this parliament are not satisfied with the board of transport commissioners as they have dealt so far with freight rates. We have appointed a royal commission to look into freight rates because we are dissatisfied with the way the board of transport commissioners has been handling the job.

The board of transport commissioners was not sent to this house by the people of British Columbia to protect their interests. The people who were sent here to do that are the members from the constituencies in that province; and either we protect the interests of the people of British Columbia or we should stop making the alibi that that is the duty of the board of transport commissioners.

It is unnecessary to say a great deal on that point. When he spoke on this question a few evenings ago, the leader of the opposition made the point very clear, so clear, really, that there is no possibility of misunderstanding it. That is, that the first authority which must deal with the route the pipe line is to take is the government of Canada, and that the board of transport commissioners cannot and will not deal with the route until the government of Canada has made its decision in regard to it.

I read in a book once a saying that was attributed to the late Lord Randolph Churchill, father of Winston Churchill, to the effect that whenever you were in the position where you had to say a kind word about a political opponent in the House of Commons you should always be careful to do it with a kick instead of a pat. I have never accepted that philosophy, and tonight I want to say a good word for the leader of the opposition. I believe hon. members and the people of Canada should be grateful to the leader of the opposition for the clear statement he made on this matter when he spoke in this debate on Tuesday evening last. Let me draw the committee's attention briefly to what he said. I shall not quote from his speech extensively, but only a small part of it. He read from a minute of council, and this is the last paragraph of it:

> That, in the opinion of the minister, the construction of the pipe line by Interprovincial Pipe Line Company is in the national interests of Canada.
> The committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, advise that under the provisions of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, a licence, in accordance with the form attached hereto, to construct a pipe line to connect at the border of Canada and the United States of America at or near Gretna, Manitoba, with a pipe line to be constructed in the United States, be granted to Interprovincial Pipe Line Company of Edmonton, Alberta, accordingly.

That was on the 13th day of September, 1949. Until that order in council passed, the board of transport commissioners would not make an order in the case at all. On the 15th day of September the board of transport commissioners made this order as reported in the speech made by the leader of the opposition at page 2325 of Hansard:

> Upon hearing the application at the sittings of the board held in Ottawa, September 8 and 12, 1949, in the presence of counsel and representatives for the applicant, the province of Alberta, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the city of Port Arthur and the board of trade of Fort William . . .
> It is ordered that leave be, and it is hereby granted to the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company to construct a pipe line for the transportation of oil from a point in the vicinity of the city of Regina, in the province of Saskatchewan, to a point in the vicinity of the village of Gretna, in the province of Manitoba; the said pipe line to be constructed and completed on or before October 31, 1951.

Be it noted by those who believe that parliament and the government have no authority in this matter that that order was made two days after the order in council which I read just a moment ago was passed. In the face of those facts, in a similar circumstance, let us no longer quibble as to where the authority in this matter lies.

Another argument made by the supporters of the bill—and I think it was made by the Prime Minister when he spoke, but when the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra questioned him later he agreed that the point was not just exactly as he made it—is that the board of transport commissioners can decide in all circumstances the route the pipe line should follow. But leaving aside the point that I have already made, namely, that the board of transport commissioners can move only after the governor in council has moved first, may I say that the board of transport commissioners is limited in its decision to the route in the application made to it and in the plans which accompany such application. I suppose it could, in its wisdom, decline to grant an order for the construction of a pipe line over any route whatsoever. I do not know; but I would be of the opinion that if this parliament passes a bill that gives authority to this company to build a pipe line either through Canada or through the United States, the board of transport commissioners will consider that, parliament being indifferent as to the route the pipe line should follow, it could authorize the laying of the pipe line on the route, whatever it may be, that the company making the application lays before it. In my opinion that is a logical conclusion. Let me repeat it. If we members of parliament are unconcerned as to which route the pipe line should follow, if we do not care whether Canada should be served after the United States cities are served, or that Canada should be served before United States cities are served; if we are unconcerned in the matter and refuse to make a decision one way or another, the board of transport commissioners is justified in giving an order endorsing the particular route that is laid before it by the company making the application.

Anyone who has read the report of the proceedings of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines must be struck by the fact that, in so far as the companies making application having information in regard to the different routes are concerned, the great bulk of their information is concerning routes through United States territory. There is hardly any information at all in regard to routes through Canadian territory.

Let me quote briefly from the proceedings for Friday, April 28, where the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) was questioning Mr. William C. Gilman:

Q. You have made no examination of the all-Canadian route. You do not know whether a line can be built between Hope and Princeton or not, do you?

A. No.

Q. Why are you giving us figures in millions per year to the lower mainland in British Columbia when you have nothing to base it on at all?

A. It is just an engineering guess of the cost of construction.

But, remember, the application is placed before the board of transport commissioners, and the costs of the various routes are placed before the board. These costs will also be an "engineering guess." And the $17 million difference in cost between building a pipe line through Canadian territory and through American territory is also a guess. As the hon. member for Coast-Capilano said when speaking in this debate, they just took that amount out of the air. But let us remember that when they get a charter for a pipe line they have something far more important than anything that can be pulled out of the air. The questioning continued:

Q. What do you mean by an engineering guess?

A. Well, all estimates are guesses.

What do you think of an answer like that? —"all estimates are guesses." I do not care how wise and fine a citizen that man may be, my conclusion is that he took the committee for a pack of fools. I presume he thought the members of parliament on the committee, sent here by the electors of Canada to represent them in parliament and to make their laws for them, were intelligent men. Yet he tells them that all estimates are guesses. A guess is something one says in this fashion: "I guess it is going to rain tomorrow" or "I guess it will not rain tomorrow." What do hon. members think of that sort of evidence as something to make a decision on?

Then the questioning continued:

Q. It is a pious hope because you like the southern route? A. No, we have no preference at all.

And then later on:

Q. I do not know how I missed you, a distinguished looking gentleman like you.

A. I did not see you there either.

Q. The answer to that is I do not know why you should have. We will go on further: you have made no surveys whatever in the Yellowhead pass route?

A. No.

Q. So you do not know what the cost will be to take gas via that route, do you?

A. No.

Q. So you are talking about saving these hundreds of millions over a twenty-year period and you have no basis for comparison at all, have you, with the Yellowhead route?

A. I was not making a comparison with the Yellowhead route.

Then on the next page of evidence he was questioned by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore):

Q. In connection with the Yellowhead route the only observation you made was when you went through by train?

A. That is right.

Q. Now, I just want you to answer this question. How fast was the train going when you were making those observations?

A. Oh, about twenty to twenty-five miles an hour.

There should have been one or two further questions, such as, "Was it during the day or during the night?" and "Were you awake, or were you asleep?" All these questions would be equally relevant, because the answers they received were just the answers that had to be given in a situation where those replying had no answers to give. I could continue quoting questions and answers from these amazing proceedings, but it is not necessary. I have already quoted sufficient to show that the committee was nothing but a farce.

Another argument offered by supporters of these bills is that if we grant a charter to one company, and to one company only, we are creating a monopoly. The hon. member for Edmonton West was surprised that the Progressive Conservatives, who are in favour of free enterprise, should support a policy of monopoly, and that members of the C.C.F. who favour public ownership should also favour monopoly, or a course of action which would lead to monopoly.

Has anyone suggested that if we grant three charters three pipe lines will be built to the Pacific coast? Certainly no one has made that suggestion within my hearing. We know that of course no one has said any such thing, because there will be no business for three pipe lines to the Pacific coast. Consequently, no matter which company gets a charter to build a pipe line, it will have a monopoly. After all, a monopoly is not always necessarily a bad thing, and I think the hon. member for Edmonton West should know that. When the pipe line reaches Vancouver —should it reach there—I understand the distribution of gas will be carried out by the British Columbia Gas Company. A monopoly, if you like; but surely no one in this parliament is foolish enough to say that you could grant two charters for supplying Vancouver with gas. A monopoly is a bad thing when it is used to raise prices to the consumer through the elimination of competition. When you give one company a charter or a franchise to do a certain thing and keep control over what that company can charge, when you provide that they receive only an amount that is considered fair, reasonable for the service they give, that sort of monopoly is a good thing.

It is time we stopped talking nonsense. It is time we stopped trying to find alibis for following a course which reason indicates does not meet the requirements of the situation. I have heard it said on many occasions that Canada's resources are unlimited. They used to say years ago that the resources of the United States were unlimited. But the United States has consumed its resources to such an extent that it is looking more and more to Canada for raw materials such as ores and other raw materials to keep its industries going. So far it has been the policy of this country to be content to sell our raw materials.

This committee should not be panicked by the specious argument that unless we grab this opportunity to sell our natural gas at once the United States will get its gas from some other source. They used to put up the same argument in 1910 when they were selling lots in Vancouver. When a real estate agent was trying to sell you a lot he would tell you he had a dozen buyers for it when he didn't have one. We are being told the same thing here. That is another alibi we should stop using. We have not unlimited resources.

The people of British Columbia are anxious that they should be given the first opportunity to use this resource. If there is more than we need there is no reason in the world why our American cousins cannot have it. These gas resources are ours and we should have the first opportunity to use them.

I had no idea when I rose to speak that I would speak at such length because I do not believe it is necessary to labour this question. I have said already that this parliament has an obligation to at least give an expression of opinion. If it cannot give a directive, it can give an expression of opinion that it wants this pipe line to serve Canadian needs first. Because this parliament has an opportunity to give an expression of opinion, because the first order must be passed by the executive of this parliament, that will be a directive as to what kind of order in council should be passed. Then the board of transport commissioners will have its cue. Hon. members from other parts of Canada have an obligation as members of this parliament to protect the interests of British Columbia.

When we have done that I am sure that the pipe line will be built through British Columbia, but if we let this bill through in its present form there is no assurance that the pipe line will be built through British Columbia.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend for one moment to get into what I consider is a stew, such as the hon. member for Vancouver East has got into, by appealing to the sentimentality of the problem.

Mr. MacInnis: I object to the hon. member saying that I have got into a stew. I have not got into a stew—whatever a stew is I do not particularly know. I could not accept the situation as it existed at the moment and I simply decided that the time had arrived to make a forceful demonstration of the issues in this case.

Mr. Goode: I fail to see how the hon. member for Vancouver East can take exception to my remark when he admits that he does not know what he is talking about. This is a business proposition which has two angles. One is the companies who are interested to the extent of $150 million. The second angle is the fact that British Columbia, as the hon. member for Vancouver East very ably said, must be protected.

How are you going to protect the people of that province? Are you going to let the Westcoast Transmission Company have the only charter with which to go before the board of transport commissioners, or are you going to let in perhaps three or four other companies to practically tender on this business? Quite apart from the interests of British Columbia, if one company goes before the Alberta conservation board it puts that board in a rather awkward position. If these bills are permitted to pass it will mean that there are three companies before them. Disregarding entirely the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East, I think it would be far more valuable to have three companies rather than one tendering on this matter.

I had not intended to start out in that way and I shall come back now to the point from which I intended to start. I think every hon. member from British Columbia no matter on which side of the house he sits should place on record his feelings in regard to this matter. That should be done in order to be fair not only to this committee, but to the people back home. I am going to vote in support of these two charters because I believe it is the only possible thing a member from British Columbia can do.

I am not going to refer in detail to the proceedings of the committee because I was not satisfied either in regard to what went on. In reply to repeated questions from me Mr. Dixon told the committee that the cost to the people of British Columbia would be between $750,000 and $1,250,000 a year.

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Mr. Goode: The hon. member may say that, but he did not say anything in committee regarding it and the statement has not been denied. I realize that Mr. Dixon represents $150 million and perhaps his statement may be a little biased, but I must go along with it unless it is disproved. The only place to disprove it is before the board of transport commissioners.

Most of us have been in business at one time or another, although sometimes I wonder from the statements that emanate from the gentlemen on the other side whether they know what business is. As I say, this represents $150 million and I think this house should let this matter go before a board which has the responsibility of seeing that all the details are brought out, not only from the standpoint of the Alberta government, not only from the standpoint of the Westcoast Transmission Company, but from the standpoint of the Alberta Natural Gas Company and the Prairie Transmission Lines Limited.

I am of opinion that the Westcoast Transmission Company have never intended to build a pipe line.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Nonsense.

Mr. Gibson: That is not fair.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Why? Give one reason.

Mr. Goode: I respect greatly the sentiments of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. He happens to be a good personal friend of mine. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has listened to representatives of the Westcoast Transmission Company in his office just as I have done in mine. Their opinions did not interest me. Evidently they interested the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. In the interests of British Columbia I believe that every hon. member should allow these charters to be granted. I think if three companies appear before the board of transport commissioners to present their cases, in the same way that Mr. Dixon presented his case, it will be more satisfactory. I know that Mr. Dixon represents interests involving $150 million, but as a result of such deliberations before the board I am sure that its members can come to a more intelligent conclusion and I think British Columbia will benefit thereby. I intend to vote in support of the incorporation of these companies for the one reason that I believe three companies appearing before the board of transport commissioners will be more effective in the interests of British Columbia than one company.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): The hon. member who has just taken his seat has observed that we should approach the problem confronting us from a business point of view. With that I am entirely in accord, and I ask him to do a little research in a big broad way as to the business end of the problem which faces us not only for this year but for two or three decades to come. I ask him to try to think the matter through in the light of the next generations, those who will follow after us. I have tried to do that. I have no particular personal interest except that it has been my high privilege to preside over a board which has seen to it that during the last year we have spent $100,000 in Calgary in the promotion of a little industry which I hope will require close to $1 million in the next ten years and will consume many hundreds of thousands of cubic feet of gas from that great potential supply which Providence has placed in our lap for us to use.

It is my pleasure to be interested not from the point of view of monetary return particularly but from the point of view that there is one feature of our Canadian citizenship which makes our breasts swell with pride, namely, that from the business point of view we are making vocations and providing livelihoods not only for our own people but also for others. I have already transplanted a nephew of mine to Calgary in the last eight or nine months. On June 3 of this year three most prominent executives from London, England, are coming to Canada. One of them is Mr. I. H. Chayen, one of the most eminent engineers in the British isles, who is now operating some sixteen factories in different parts of the United Kingdom. He will be accompanied by an engineer, Mr. Page, and his general manager, Mr. H. W. Orwell. They are flying to Canada and will be my guests in Toronto. From there they will go to Calgary, Alberta, for the reason that they want to expand a little industry presently established there on seven and a half acres of land with half a mile of trackage and other railway facilities. This industry was inveigled to go there, and in fact was anxious to go there because of raw materials which they desire and because of power, in this case gas. There is an ample supply of gas so that they can in turn expand the industry by the use of steam units operated by gas available for that industry.

They are not promoters; they are not men who sit behind mahogany desks on mahogany chairs and make money out of our natural resources. They are men who want to establish an industry. Of course it is a private enterprise for their own benefit. They want to expand an industry which is world-wide. They will be here within a month, and I am encouraging them to come. While I am on my feet and thinking about this problem, there are hon. members in the house who say that we have no right to delay the passage of these measures, that we should turn them over to the board of transport commissioners. We have not only a right but also a duty to put on the record of the house anything we know which may be of some value to the economy of Canada. Some may say that the board of transport commissioners may not be influenced by what is said in this house, but I am of the opinion that they pay attention. I am of the opinion that hon. members of the house, anxious as they are to discharge their responsibility, pay attention to what their colleagues say. I do not see the sponsor of the bill in the house.

Mr. Green: He is not here.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Is the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River here or the hon. member for Simcoe East? As neither of them is here perhaps I may address myself to the Minister of Public Works. I see that the hon. member for Simcoe East is now in the house. I am anxious that he, as the co-pilot of this bill, should try to get the sense of what I am trying to say.

Mr. Robinson: That would be very difficult.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Well, I have got a measure of his intelligence. I think if I labour it long enough it will not be quite so difficult, and that on contemplation and reflection he will say that perhaps he made a mistake.

Mr. Robinson: I expect you will labour it at least until nine o'clock.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I am not so much interested in nine o'clock as I am in the people of Canada.

Mr. Robinson: And British Columbia.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I am coming to that. It is a long way around. The people should have some sort of idea of what is going on. I will switch to British Columbia right now. I do not care whether hon. members are from British Columbia or any other part of Canada. As the hon. member from one of the Winnipeg constituencies said a moment or two ago, this matter is the responsibility of all members of Canada's House of Commons.

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): And particularly is it the responsibility of hon. members from British Columbia.

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I should like to refer British Columbia members to a speech made by their premier on March 26 in London, England. He travelled 6,000 miles from Victoria to London to point out to the federation of the British timber interests that British Columbia is anxious about the development of its industry. He pointed out to the people of the British isles that in 1939 timber of one kind and another constituted only 5 per cent of their exports to the United Kingdom. It rose to 38 per cent and then it went up to 74 per cent. Since 1947-48, however, it has gone down again. Hon. Mr. Johnson was over there on a trade mission. He did a good job, and made a great speech on behalf of British Columbia. As I read that speech I could visualize the gas from Alberta coming down through British Columbia to be used in the plants making sash, doors, veneers and what not for the construction industry of the United Kingdom.

An hon. Member: What is a what not?

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Well, they used to have whatnots before you were born, when I was a boy. They were pretty nice pieces of furniture, too. I would not mind having one of them in my home now; they are handy places to put trinkets. In British Columbia they have wonderful lumber and wonderful veneers. They have perhaps the largest stand of timber of any country in the world. They make the finest doors and sash available in Canada, and those products should be going over to the United Kingdom by the boatload. Instead of that we have the United Kingdom government advising their people to use metal sash and doors and metal trim for their houses, though it costs anywhere from ten to twenty per cent more than the wooden products, which could be manufactured in the mills of British Columbia with the use of Alberta gas for power. That ought to be done, and promptly.

Not only do these steel doors and sash cost more; there is another feature about it. British Columbia, together with the rest of Canada, is anxious to use the metal products coming from that great workshop of the world, the United Kingdom. I am not like the absentee minister of barter, who is at present in Australia, but I would not object to any barter scheme that would bring us the metal products of the United Kingdom in exchange for the wood products of British Columbia. I believe this bill should be laid aside until such time as the minister, who knows more about the lumber business and about British Columbia than I do, returns to this house to tell us what we ought to do about these things. He is down in the land of the mugho pine, the land where the specific gravity of the wood begins where ours leaves off so that, if you threw a log of mugho pine in a river in Tasmania, it would sink to the bottom. But they have beautiful lumber and beautiful veneers down under. I have a sample in my office; I am sorry I did not bring it here. What an education the Minister of Fisheries will get in the manufacture of veneers—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I repeat, in the manufacture of veneers; that is the correct phrase, and I know what I am talking about. What an education he will get down under as a lumber man. I hope he brings back something of their technique and applies it to the production of veneers and other articles in British Columbia. If he applies his experience to conditions in this country I am sure it will aid our economy so that with the use of Alberta natural gas for power brought down through British Columbia instead of being taken down to the United States and then brought back up to British Columbia, we will have a greater opportunity to develop these God-given resources that are at our hand. When I refer to our resources I include gas and oil, about which I shall have something more to say before this bill is through.

This discussion has not been a waste of time. I say to my young friend over there, don't worry about its being nine o'clock. The bass fishing season does not open until July 1. We will be out of here by then, and I will be up to see you on July 2. I hope you will take me out to get some fish. Let the people of Canada—

Mr. Sinclair: And British Columbia.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I will not say Canada and British Columbia; I will just say Canada; but when I think of Canada now I think of British Columbia and her potentialities.

Mr. Sinclair: At times we wonder whether we are a part of confederation.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I do not like that suggestion, and I am glad it did not come from me. I have always loved British Columbia and every other part of Canada. I hope I shall never be that small; I like to think of Canada as a whole, and in my humble way I am trying to expand our economy in every possible way. Would that I were thirty years younger, Mr. Chairman. I would desert this city of Ottawa and settle in Alberta, in the hope that I might be able to help in the development of that province, bringing it closer to its destiny which lies ahead.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I move the adjournment of this debate.

The Deputy Chairman: Before calling it nine o'clock I would say to hon. members that great latitude is being given in the discussion of section 1 of this bill. I do hope, however, that when we come to section 1 of any other bill the discussion that is now taking place will not be considered as a precedent.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to the business under consideration at six o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—

1. Departmental administration, $293,670.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I had placed on record a letter from the Canadian chamber of commerce which suggested the thought I am trying to pass on to the minister; that this voluntary body has been doing excellent work trying to capture or recover some of our overseas markets. I pointed out that if a voluntary organization could do it, I felt that the government should either assist them to enlarge their work or step into the breach and carry on the work themselves. I think I should compliment them for what they have done and the public spirit they have shown in this one connection in trying to recapture our markets.

I should like to deal with one or two resolutions passed by the fruit growers of British Columbia along these lines. They also have ideas on how to go about recapturing the world markets that we have already lost. This is one dealing with marketing missions:

Whereas export markets for the products of Canadian farms have been contracting to an alarming degree which already has entailed grave losses to the agriculturists of the dominion, and

Whereas the threat of even greater losses is indicated by Ottawa, the United Kingdom and by other countries which formerly imported farm products from Canada, and

Whereas the continued absence of export markets will be disastrous to various important divisions of Canada's agriculture,

Therefore be it resolved by the British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association, in 1950 annual convention,

That the Canadian and the British Columbia governments be urged to set up special missions for the purpose of gathering exact information and constructive recommendations, with a view to developing markets outside of Canada, such missions to visit other countries in the course of their investigations.

That these missions supplement the operations of the four farm specialists appointed by the dominion Department of Trade and Commerce in October to speed up sales of Canada's foodstuffs in export markets.

I submit, sir, that that resolution is well worth consideration. It offers an alternative to the full responsibility by the government of doing that work which apparently they are not caring to do. At the same time I seriously suggest that the government consider the proposition made by several others during the last year for barter deals for our products and for products of other countries, particularly those countries that cannot produce the dollars. I am pleased to find in the

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin).]

Financial Times of March 3 this year what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said. I will read the quotation:

Trade Minister C. D. Howe on his return from a trip to Europe, stated in New York that he saw an over-all improvement in the outlook for increased trade there. Canada, he said, is encouraging private businessmen to arrange barter deals where such are found more desirable.

I do not know to what extent the minister intends to support barter deals, but I take it that he would consider assisting financially any company that is willing, on its own, to arrange barter deals or to assist with personnel or in some other way. In view of the statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, closely followed by a similar statement by the Minister of Fisheries, I would suggest that the cabinet as a whole reconsider its stand on possible barter deals. If it is the minister's wish that these various companies, and particularly in our case, the Tree Fruit Company Limited, carry on the barter deal on their own, then would the minister consider giving this company financial support and personnel support?

I would suggest, Mr. Minister, that at least this measure could be tried for one season; just try it for the coming season while the crop is not heavy and see what the result will be. I think that under the act I quoted this afternoon you have full power to carry out such an experiment. I feel that the looming fight for world markets today is such that the country that will get the market is that one that has the best trading plans. I would urge you, sir, to try this experiment for at least one year.

Another resolution that rather intrigues me is this one, and I think I should read it to the minister because he can take to task afterwards the minister involved:

Vitaminized apple juice:

Whereas Canada is producing surpluses of apples, with producers faced with serious losses if markets are not available, and

Whereas one economic and proper outlet is through the processing, distribution and consumption of vitaminized apple juice, containing an adequate measure of vitamin C (as noted in Diet Menu for Week, issued by authority of the National Health and Welfare Department, Ottawa, in September, 1949, volume 5, No. 9), and

Whereas the information services division of the above-mentioned department—

That is the Department of National Health and Welfare.

—excludes mention of vitaminized apple juice in its following bulletin of September, 1949:

"Citrus for health.—Drinking a daily glass of fresh or canned orange or grapefruit juice is the easiest and most pleasant way to be sure that the body's vitamin C requirements are met. The wish for variety sometimes leads people to choose other types of popular fruit juices, but none of these are as good an investment as the citrus fruits—either for economy or vitamin C content."

Naturally, when the fruit growers heard of this they were rather distressed because they felt they had the backing of the Department of Agriculture and through them the Department of National Health and Welfare. They went on record to this extent:

> Therefore the British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association in annual convention, January 17-19, 1950, recommends the National Health and Welfare Department:
> (a) to investigate intensively the relative merits of the vitamin C contents of the vitaminized apple juices and of citrus fruits, as taken from local retail markets, and also the canned citrus juices, and
> (b) to investigate thoroughly the costs to consumers of the vitaminized apple juices, citrus fruit and of citrus fruits, fresh, as taken from local "For economy and vitamin C content" as mentioned in the foregoing bulletin, and
> (c) to prepare a comprehensive report for examination and publication.

Mr. Gardiner: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, to be obliged to interrupt the hon. member, but I cannot hear all that is being said. I do not know whether it is because of the noise or just what it is. But what is my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. Jones: I am quoting from a resolution from the British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association convention held this year.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that you are reading a resolution which is critical of something that was published, and I did not catch what you were quoting from then.

Mr. Jones: The gist of it is that the Department of National Health and Welfare issued, in a bulletin, a recommendation for the people of Canada to use citrus fruits as the best possible form of fruit juices. We naturally feel that we have a product of equal merit at least in apple juice vitaminized as ours is in the market today. I should like to draw your attention to what the growers have done with waste apples. The apple juice industry started from purely cull and waste apples, and the pack of apple juice this year would be 490,000 cases and 40,000 gallons of concentrate and 40,000 gallons of vinegar. The industry has built itself up until today it has buildings and equipment of a total value of $546,000, and a turnover in cash and shares of $600,000, all from culls. So that, on the other hand, if we had neglected this form of development the cost of dumping those culls would have been $50,000 to the growers. My point, Mr. Minister, is that I want you to take the matter up with the Department of National Health and Welfare and get that corrected, and get them to investigate whether our claims are not correct, that apple juice is equal to if not better than the citrus juice that they recommend so highly in their bulletins.

Mr. Gardiner: Better.

Mr. Jones: I could probably put it more specifically. I shall be quite pleased and satisfied if the Minister of National Health and Welfare will issue either a special bulletin or, in his next bulletin, a correction and a recommendation that apple juice is equally good for the modern breakfast table. I know the Minister of Trade and Commerce, during a recent discussion, in answer to the hon. member for Kamloops—I forget the subject now—when the hon. member for Kamloops shouted, "What about apples?", replied: "That is a bright remark. We are talking billions, and my hon. friend speaks of apples which incidentally are hardly food. Their content is water."

I should like to take issue with him, because last year Mr. R. P. Walrod, who is in charge of the production of apple juice in the Okanagan valley, found a method of fortifying this juice. So effective and so good was the method that for several weeks he lived on nothing but the fortified apple juice. At the end of that period he was weighed and examined by a doctor and he was in first-class health. He had not lost an ounce of weight. From that evidence I can assure you that the product we have is sound and good. In view of the adverse publicity, I would also ask the minister to consider assisting this industry to advertise in the coming year, and if possible put in a word with the authorities so that the army and navy will also use this juice.

There is one other point that I should like to bring to your attention, sir, and that is van der Glessen Brothers Limited of Grand Forks, who are Dutch bulb and seed growers. They are finding certain difficulties which are common to many producers of seed in Canada. Before the war the export of seeds, both vegetable and flower, was relatively unimportant, but during the war a good market was developed between British Columbia and England. Naturally this market is now lost through the austerity program and their shortage of dollars. The customers in both Britain and Europe are willing to buy British Columbia seeds and we have the seeds ready for shipping. It would require negotiation at high level to overcome this difficulty. The difficulties facing private firms who try to negotiate international trade are obvious. There are such things as customs tariffs, quotas, exchange difficulties, shortage of dollars, taxes and everything else. In this particular instance this firm has an order from Germany for several thousand dollars worth of seeds, but they are up against a brick wall. I will deal with that subject later on, particularly in regard to Germany.

I feel that Germany has either to remain a burden or to return to the family of nations. Personally I am opposed to rearming Germany, but I favour giving them all assistance to let them recover their agriculture. In other words, let them get on their feet again. One way is to supply them with the seeds they need, but that cannot be done because we are still technically at war with Germany. I understand that it may be a long time before a peace treaty is signed. Other trading nations have overcome this difficulty by effecting a treaty of commerce between themselves and Germany. I would ask the minister to get the proper department—I presume it is External Affairs—to endeavour to effect a treaty of commerce between Canada and Germany, and not wait for a peace treaty, and thereby give Germany a chance to recover on an agricultural basis so that she may meet her obligations to the rest of the world and particularly to Canada.

I would suggest that in such a treaty of commerce, which is the customary thing to do, at least $100,000 be included for vegetable and flower seeds. At the present time the soft currency countries are capturing all this type of trade. I should like to quote from a letter I received from the Department of Trade and Commerce quite recently. The information came from that department on December 5. In it they tell me:

> The most recent information that we have received on the western German exchange situation as a whole is that they have been running behind to the extent of approximately $500 million a year, most of which deficit has been covered by grants from the United States. In these circumstances, we understand that they, like all recipients of ECA funds, have been under pressure to reduce and keep down their dollar expenditures. They have consequently had to direct their purchases, to a considerable extent, to soft currency sources, especially ECA recipients and countries which have the goods available and are prepared to promote imports from Germany by discriminating in their favour.

It goes on along that line. Then, this firm to which I am referring were advised that they could possibly get funds from other channels, ECA or any channels they could find. They have done their best and have found no channels with funds available. Funds are given to others with higher priorities, I believe. The letter continues:

> We do not have a bilateral agreement with Germany and are not in process of negotiating one; but if we were to negotiate an agreement with them at the present time, it is highly probable that they would demand that Canada should agree to buy much larger quantities of goods from Germany as a condition of maintaining German purchases even at the present level.

I suggest that our present trade, what little trade there is being done between Canada and Germany, is done with the grace of the United States of America, through the use of United States funds. I contend that we should stand on our own feet. We do not have to stand on the charity of the United States. We can do just what they have done for their own nationals to provide funds for our own commercial concerns that wish to do business in that country. Other countries have found it important to trade with Germany. I am sure that time alone would prove that we would be wise to do it as well. My information is that at the present time seeds for the free zones in Germany are imported by the military authorities, and most of the orders for the 1948 crop went to the United States. I have evidence—I am not going to read it into the record tonight—from German sources that they are very keen to get these seeds that we have for sale in Canada.

The remarks I have applied to Germany apply equally well to other countries with whom we are still technically at war, or have not a peace treaty. I suggest that in view of the serious situation in which our growers find themselves at the present time all efforts, some of which I have suggested, and others that I have not, which the minister may know of, should be tried in order to promote the trading of Canadian goods with countries that are hampered by the lack of dollars.

Mr. Quelch: I have one or two questions that I should like to ask the minister, but first of all I should like to make a few general remarks regarding the marketing of agricultural produce.

We have been told by the food and agriculture organization and other bodies that the population of the world today is expanding at a faster rate than our production of food. We are informed by the food and agriculture organization that the supplies of food per individual are today less than they were in 1939, and that even with expanded production it will continue to be less for the next six or seven years, and for a considerably longer period of time than that in so far as the Far East is concerned. Whether or not we benefit by that potential market will largely depend upon our own policy; that is, whether or not we adjust our international trade policies so that we are able to enter those markets.

During this session I think it has become quite evident that some at least of the ministers in the government lack confidence in our own international trade policy. I think that was shown quite clearly by the speech of the Minister of Fisheries when he suggested that in order to be able to increase our exports of certain products we should enter into barter agreements.

From time to time the Minister of Agriculture has expressed a certain degree of concern regarding our international trade. Today the farmers are being repeatedly told that they will have to make the price of their products competitive so as to be able to enter the markets of the world.

In order that farmers may make their prices competitive they will have to be in a position to reduce their costs of production. But unfortunately many of the farmers' costs are of an uncontrollable nature, and for the last few years those costs have been still increasing. Even as late as last fall the price of machinery took a sharp rise, freight rates went up and various other costs increased.

So I would say it is not so much a question of the farmers making the prices of their commodities competitive as it is of the secondary industries making the prices of their commodities competitive. Because, after all, if we want to sell farm products abroad we must enable nations to sell their products to us in order that they may obtain Canadian dollars with which to buy our produce; and in order to accomplish that tariffs will have to be kept down.

I think by now manufacturers in this country should be in the position to stand on their own feet. I was very much interested in a statement made by Professor Galbraith before the annual convention of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. The report in the Manitoba Co-Operator of February 9, 1950, contains this:

> If our manufacturers, both in the United States and Canada, feel they must continue to have protection from European imports then they must candidly admit the consequences of their demands. Because of their need for protection, they are denying Europe dollars with which to buy agricultural products. Europe is thereby being denied access to the efficiently produced farm products of the western hemisphere because the manufacturers of the west, their vaunted claims to efficiency notwithstanding, cannot stand the competition. The American and Canadian farmer is being asked to take the rap for them.

Again I stress the fact that instead of harping upon the suggestion that farmers must be prepared to make the prices of their products more competitive, we must realize that before that can be done the prices of products of secondary industries must also be made competitive. If the prices of manufactured goods fall, then the prices of agricultural products could also fall without any detrimental effects on the farmers. Because, after all, the farmer today is asking only for a price that bears a fair relationship to the prices of other commodities.

The government has set up machinery to provide support for the prices of agricultural products. This session that legislation was amended so that it shall carry on indefinitely. It is well for people to remember that the farmers have already paid for that support by accepting for their commodities, ever since 1942, prices which were lower than world prices. If one considers the amount of money lost as a result of taking those lower prices, one will find that it is a very substantial sum. My suggestion is that it should be regarded as a reserve established for the purpose of maintaining fair prices in the future. I would say that the main concern of farmers today is the fear that prices will not be maintained at a fair level in the future.

I agree with statements made from time to time by the Minister of Agriculture to the effect that our chief market is the Canadian market. Also I believe we can all agree that even today the Canadian market is not developed to its full capacity. It is my view that the government should give careful consideration to adapting in some form the Brannan plan, which is gaining more and more support in the United States. I mention this especially in view of the fact that we are constantly faced with the danger of surpluses of certain commodities in this country.

For instance, we have had a butter surplus. I think when a surplus occurs the government should be prepared to introduce a policy somewhat along the lines of the Brannan plan under which those surplus commodities can be sold to the consumers of Canada at a reduced price. To put it another way, we cannot afford to allow the fear of a surplus to reduce our production. No one could suggest that such a policy could be justified in a world where many people face the danger of mass starvation.

I understand when the Minister of Agriculture was out west he recommended a reduction in wheat acreage to the extent of three million acres, and that the farmers increase their production of coarse grains and grasses. But when the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke in the house on the wheat resolution he stressed the fact that we are having greater difficulty now in selling our farm produce. He visualized a certain amount of difficulty in selling our farm produce, other than wheat, in the future. In so far as wheat was concerned he pointed out that he did not expect any difficulty in selling it because it is the best wheat in the world and our price is competitive.

I ask this question: If wheat is the one agricultural product we can sell readily, and if the Minister of Trade and Commerce feels there will be no difficulty in selling wheat in the future, is it really wise to reduce our wheat production and to increase the production of other commodities which may not be sold so easily? After all, if we extend the production of coarse grains and grasses it is almost certain to result in increased production of dairy products and hogs.

I believe the farmers are concerned about the sale of dairy products. We have heard a good deal about it in the last year, and there seems to be some uncertainty as to the future of the hog market. From the point of view of sound agriculture I would agree with the Minister of Agriculture one hundred per cent that it is in the interests of agriculture to reduce our acreage of wheat and to have more grasses if for no other reason than to restore the humus to the soil, and to prevent soil drifting. It is time we adopted some form of crop rotation. But from the point of view of whether or not we can sell our produce, it seems to me it is better to produce a commodity we can sell readily, when we have already been told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as I have already pointed out, that there will be no difficulty in selling wheat because it is the best in the world and our price is competitive.

Therefore when the minister speaks I would ask him to tell us what he considers the prospects are in regard to the sale of hogs in the future. What does he expect the hog market to be? Does he feel that farmers should go ahead and expand hog production—because I believe that is taking place now in western Canada. I know in the part of the country from which I come hog production is expanding. Can they continue that expansion with a reasonable degree of safety? Can they also expand their production of dairy products? If the minister is not able to give that assurance, then does he not feel it might be safer for them to maintain the present level of wheat production? Because, even if wheat does become a surplus commodity, it is much easier to store wheat than to hold hogs, once they reach the weight of two hundred pounds.

Mr. Gardiner: Let me say first that I do not think this is the time to discuss in detail the marketing of specific products, because we will deal with them under the marketing items and other items as they are reached. However, as to the general question of wheat acreage, and the production of other products, let me say I was very sorry to see in a report issued yesterday from the bureau of statistics that farmers of western Canada are still insisting that this year they are going to seed about the same acreage as they sowed last year. I think probably some of the reasons are found in remarks similar to those made within the last few minutes. I have never at any time argued that there should be less wheat produced in western Canada, but I have argued that they will be able to produce more wheat with 3,000,000 acres less land provided what they use is properly farmed. The production will be greater under those circumstances than if they attempt to seed 27 million acres to wheat year in and year out in western Canada. I think the record indicates very conclusively that this is right.

We are not able to grow wheat on most of our land in western Canada every year or even every second year. First we must carry on rotation and then in addition to rotation we must enter into that rotation the summer fallowing of land. If we are going to grow wheat in considerable quantity throughout western Canada we must summer fallow in some form or another—I am not just talking about black top summer fallowing which some people do not like—over a very considerable area at least one-half of the land. In a very considerable part of the country about one-third of the land will have to be summer fallowed. In other areas the proportion is smaller, but it will average out not far from one-third of our land.

That means that something over 20 million acres of land must be summer fallowed. If we have about the same acreage in grasses and coarse grains and other forms of crop as in wheat, then we cannot have more than 22 million or 23 million acres left for wheat. I think the record shows conclusively that if we have about that, year in and year out, over any period of five or six years we will grow more wheat than in any other way.

Having said that, I want to make one or two references to the questions that have been asked. One was: Do you think we have come to the time when we should be going back into the production of hogs in a big way? In so far as eastern Canada is concerned, they are producing hogs in just about as big a way as ever. In other words, I think you will find that in the areas where they depend upon hog and dairy production for their existence they are producing just as many hogs this year as ever before.

But we have acted differently in western Canada because it is a different area. For example, in Saskatchewan we had some 1,700,000 hogs on the farms in 1944, and today we have only about a quarter that number. The change from 1943-44 down to the present time, a matter of only six years, has been considerable. Still I would not say at this moment that we should be rushing back into hogs in western Canada, but I see no excuse for anyone getting out of the production of cattle.

Instead of cutting down the number of beef cattle which we have upon our farms in western Canada we ought to be increasing it. There never was a time when higher prices could be obtained for beef cattle and there never was a time when more money could be made out of beef cattle than at the present. In western Canada it is not so much a matter of finishing cattle on grain because in many parts they can be finished off the pasture and sold at a good price. So I think we should be producing more and more cattle and we should be gradually getting into hogs.

You can get into hogs in about a year's time, but it takes about three years to get into two year old cattle, and it is the two year olds that we want to sell. So it is a mistake for farmers to be cutting their breeding herds down simply because they can get a good price and are afraid they are not going to be able to get it later. That is what I mean by saying that the kind of talk we have just been listening to is the kind of talk which gets people doing things which they would be a little better off if they did not do.

If you scare people into believing that they are not going to be able to sell their cattle at a good price next year, they will sell all they can this year. If you scare them still further with regard to the year after that, they will go right on doing what they are doing and eventually we get into more or less trouble in the marketing of our product not because of surplus but because of shortage.

Then my friend says, "What about dairy cattle?" I have said so many times in this house something which no one seems to believe and so I hesitate to repeat it, but we have no surpluses of either butter or cheese at the present time. To say that 20 million pounds of butter that is being held by the dairy board at the present time is a surplus of butter in this country is just absolute nonsense. You could not operate in the manner in which we are operating under the board if you did not have 20 million pounds of butter. When we started into the plan last year, which is the plan we are again operating under this year, we started in to correct a situation.

A representative of the Canada Packers came before the prices committee of this house and gave evidence freely and deliberately. It was indicated that they had bought butter at a certain price throughout the summer months and then had sold it throughout the winter months at another price level, clearing approximately twelve cents per pound in doing so. I do not blame anyone in business for carrying on business like that if he can. The representative of the company went further than that in giving his evidence. He said that they just could not avoid doing it under the conditions which then existed. He said that they did not desire that profit, but if they were going to carry on under the conditions that existed it would result in that kind of return.

We went into the market the next year for the purpose of stabilizing it, not for the purpose of either holding the price up at a high level or cutting it down to a low level. Our chief worry in the early part of last season was whether we were going to get any butter, not whether we were going to have 20 million pounds. Our chief worry was to get into our hands 30 million or 40 million pounds of butter at least so that when the winter came if anyone attempted to charge 75 cents a pound for butter we could deliver it at 58 cents plus the carrying charges. So throughout the whole of the winter months we delivered butter at 58 cents plus the carrying charges with the result that the consumers of the country paid a price which was based upon 60¼ cents at the wholesale level. They were able to buy at that price at any time during the year. In addition the farmer obtained a price all the way through the year, summer and winter alike, that never went below 58 cents for his butterfat at the creamery, basis Montreal.

That is what we started out to do and that is what we did do. Oleomargarine or anything else did not prevent our doing it. We went through the season doing it and at the end we had 19 million pounds of butter. In order to adjust the position down to the new level which we thought it was wise to have for another year, it would cost us five cents per pound generally speaking on the 19 million pounds we have. That would total something over $1 million, but even if it totalled $1½ million, what is that in seeing to it that 372 million pounds of butter were marketed in the country, giving to the producers a stabilized price of 58 cents and giving to the consumer a stabilized wholesale cost of 60¼ cents?

I cannot see how you could have any cheaper way of stabilizing the price both to the producer and to the consumer, if that is what you want to do. When we got to the spring of this year if we had not had butter at the time the adjustment had to be made we would be again back in the position where we could not put butter on the market in order to see that a certain thing was done or that a certain thing happened.

While we have butter we can adjust it as we think it ought to be adjusted. On this occasion we thought a downward adjustment of 5 cents ought to be made. I assume that over the years ahead of us in all probability for a time adjustments will be in a downward direction, but if the policy and plan continues over a term of years eventually we will come to a time when the adjustment may be down one year and just as likely be up a similar amount the next year. We may go down one cent or two cents one year and be up one cent or two cents the next year. One will balance against the other.

That is the plan which is in operation, and if we never get below 20 million pounds of butter we do not need to be worrying about it. If we never get above 20 million pounds we do not need to be worrying about it very much. The only time when you need to worry about being below that figure is around Christmas. Then one certainly should have about 40 million pounds of butter if you are going to take care of that market and see to it that nobody walks in and makes the consumer pay a price he never should pay. We ran into a difficulty which we did not expect to meet, and we have had a little experience which may suggest improvement. You will recall that for last year we set the end of what might be called the dairy year to correspond with the end of the financial year. That is not the natural end of the dairy year. The natural end of the dairy year is the last day of April, and the first day of May over a long period of years has been the first day of the new dairy year. We worked last year on the financial year in order to make it more convenient for those who were financing. When we came down to within a week or two of the end of that time we announced we were going to continue it for another month. A lot of people across the country who were running stores and taking more or less of a chance in connection with the matter, this being the first year of the operation, began to wonder whether they were going to be required to take the two cent, three cent, or five cent loss that people were talking about. Therefore they cut down their stocks in their stores so that they would not be loaded up at the end of the time and have to take a loss.

When it became apparent that we were going to take care of the adjustment, then most of them had their stocks provided in the ordinary way from their usual wholesalers without any great difficulty. I found, however, that a great many of the smaller stores around the country did not get stocks. When they were not getting stocks the really live agents of those who were putting out oleomargarine put that product on their counters. In country areas throughout the dominion during the latter part of last season a great many farmers who were accustomed to using butter on their own farms were using oleomargarine. It is all very well to criticize it, and I do criticize it; but at the same time I realize it was the first experiment in the new plan and that people were likely to do things which they probably will not do a second time. Therefore with that experience we are hopeful that when we reach the end of another season there will be no great difficulty.

I say that in order to get out of the minds of those in this house who are thinking in terms of surpluses the idea that there is any surplus of butter that ought to scare anybody away from continuing to make it. Over all the years that I have had anything to do with agriculture we have just made the amount of butter that we have been able to consume in this country, and we should go on aiming to do that. If we put enough of our enthusiasm and ability into the marketing of butter in this country I do not think we would need to be talking so much about oleomargarine, and by the very fact that we are talking about it more or less advertise its sale all over the country. Butter is the best food that is put on the market in Canada, and in accordance with food values it is the cheapest in these days of high food prices. That being the case, I do not see any reason why we should be worrying about any surpluses harming us in that direction.

Turning to cheese, it is a dairy product that has to be sold largely outside Canada. We have 17 million pounds, or we had a few days ago. I should not have said that we have 19 million pounds of butter. The last time I looked at the figures we had about 17 million pounds. At the beginning of the dairy year we had about 17 million pounds of cheese. The people of Canada eat close to 60 million pounds of cheese. We have 17 million pounds and the trade has 17 million which makes about 34 million, and we eat almost double that. We are requisitioning cheese to send to Great Britain. She has undertaken to take approximately 85 million pounds. We have been asked by the producers of cheese to requisition it until we fill the British contract, and that is what we are doing. Remember that the year before last we only produced 96 million pounds, and last year I think we produced about 114 million pounds. Since our production has been hovering around 100 million pounds a year, and if we are going to send 85 million to Great Britain, and we only have 34 million in storage, there is not going to be any great difficulty in marketing any amount of cheese which seems to be in sight during the year ahead.

In other words, what we ought to be doing in the house and elsewhere is telling the farmer to continue to produce as he has been producing and as he thinks he ought to produce. There has not been up to the present, and there is not likely to be in the immediate future, any great difficulty in selling. We can sell all our butter on the Canadian market if our production continues at the level it has been. We sell most of our cheese in the British market. If there is any danger at all at the present time in the figures which I have just given you, it is that we may run ourselves a little short on the Canadian market, although we are not going to be in any great difficulty at the end of the season if our production continues as at present seems probable.

Therefore in so far as cattle and dairy products are concerned I think we should be going right ahead with production. I do not know of anywhere that the farmer can make more than he can by going ahead and producing beef cattle at the present time, and at the moment returns are very good from dairy products as well.

As to hogs, I think eastern farmers will continue producing them. I think it was the director of livestock in Ontario, Mr. Watson, who said at our conference last December that Ontario farmers depend for 60 per cent of their income upon dairy products and hogs. He went on to say they just could not stay on their farms without producing dairy products and hogs. I think every Ontario farmer realizes that. So long as that is the condition there is no need to worry about their production being cut very much. They keep their production at about the same level all the time. They did so in wartime, before the war, and are still doing so. In western Canada hog production rises when we find a shortage in the United States or somewhere else which makes it possible for us to market great numbers outside our own country. Then hog production goes down when we find any excuse for letting it because we like to produce grain in western Canada a little more than we like to feed hogs. If we can find any really good excuse for cutting down on hog production we cut down and we stay down until we have reason to feed hogs again. I am not worrying about that side of it. At the moment all I am worrying about is that the cattle on our farms in western Canada are not in as great numbers as I would like to see.

Mr. Quelch: When the minister commenced his remarks he rather deplored the fact that I had made what he apparently considered a pessimistic speech. I was not being pessimistic for a moment; I was not even being critical. I was just referring to a statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that had been very optimistic in regard to the marketing of wheat but not so optimistic in regard to the marketing of other products. Therefore I asked the minister to give the house a statement of the situation as he saw it. I am very glad he has made this statement; I think it is a good thing. There is no doubt, however, that many people were worrying just as I was worrying, as a result of the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and particularly because of the statements that appear in the press periodically referring to our surplus of butter and the tremendous surpluses of farm products in the United States which they are liable to dump on world markets at any time and depress prices.

I think the minister will agree that one reason the farmers have not reduced their wheat acreage is that since the Minister of Trade and Commerce seems to have such a steady market for wheat, they decided it would be better to raise wheat. In other words they are following what they consider to be a recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. But I think the minister will also agree there is another reason the acreage of wheat has not gone down. The minister knows that last year, owing to crop failures, a very large acreage was tilled under. In the district from which I come the acreage is perhaps fifty per cent greater this year, because of the large acreage tilled under last year.

Mr. Gardiner: And throughout the previous drought period they found it to be a mistake to try to get back this year what they lost last year because of drought.

Mr. Quelch: Yes, but as the minister knows the situation last year was different from an ordinary drought. In that area it did not rain until after July 1, and hundreds of acres never turned green at all, even after the rain came. The wheat was sown; apparently it rotted in the ground, and even when the rain came early in July the wheat never came back.

Mr. Gardiner: I repeat, because I think it is most important, that this was the reasoning we followed from 1931 to 1937, and by 1937 we were growing an average of two and a half bushels to the acre on an average all over Saskatchewan. We do not want to reach that point again. We got our acreage up to twenty-eight or twenty-nine million; by ourselves trying to get back one year after another what had been dried out the year before, until eventually we had very little if any wheat. I think we will go through the same experience if we follow that practice again.

Mr. Quelch: But half of that area was already in summer fallow last year.

Mr. Gardiner: That was the case back in the thirties, too; it was in summer fallow just in the way you are talking about, because we had to summer fallow it. That is not summer fallow at all.

Mr. Quelch: Half of it was in summer fallow and the other half was sown to wheat. That crop never came up; after July 1 that ground was as black as the rest of the land. Is the minister going to suggest that that land should not be sown again?

Mr. Gardiner: I am going to suggest what I am sure my hon. friend has found in practice. The reason you keep land black all through June is to put the June rain of that year into the land and keep it there. But if you sow something on it and it grows during June, and then the crop dies out because there is no moisture, what is the use of saying that is summer fallow? It just isn't.

Mr. Quelch: You have it all wrong. I explained that the rains did not come until July 1 or July 3, so nothing grew.

Mr. Gardiner: They didn't come even then.

Mr. Quelch: The land that was sown was just as black as the land that was not sown. The wheat had died, moulded in the ground, so there was no difference between that land and the land that had been summer fallowed. As a matter of fact it was in better shape than the land that had been in summer fallow, because that land had to be cultivated.

Mr. Gardiner: If you follow your own argument you will argue yourself out of a crop.

Mr. Quelch: I would be prepared to wager that the land which was sown last year and produced no crop, this year will produce a crop as good as if not better than the land that was summer fallowed. The minister is fond of saying you can trust the farmers to do the right thing, and that is what they are doing. As the minister knows, the area around Drumheller is one of the best wheat growing areas in Canada, and that is the practice being adopted there. I will have to be shown that it is not sound.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend is talking about an area where it did not rain.

Mr. Quelch: Last year it did not rain until July 3.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: The area the hon. member has just described apparently does not need the amount of summer fallow that most of the land in western Canada must have.

Mr. Quelch: We summer fallow half the land each year in our area.

Mr. Gardiner: You are not doing that when you do what you are suggesting tonight.

Mr. Quelch: Nature forced an extra amount of summer fallow.

Mr. Gardiner: Anyway, we want three million acres less wheat. What is the use of asking for advice if you just argue after you get it?

Mr. Quelch: That is not the point on which I asked advice. I asked about the policy regarding hogs and dairy produce.

Mr. Harkness: The question before the committee seems to be when summer fallow is not summer fallow, but I would like to refer to the question of butter and hogs, which the minister was talking about a few moments ago. You know, the minister is an amazingly ingenious dialectician. For the first time tonight he brought forward the proposition that the floor price was put under butter to protect the consumers. The dairymen have been under the impression ever since this floor price was put in that it was done to protect them, to make sure the price of butter did not fall below 58 cents, which would make it impossible for them to produce, at any rate according to their own claim.

In addition to the dairymen I think up to this moment every member of this house was under that impression. We voted money, to the extent of some $200 million all told, as a sort of revolving fund which the minister could make use of to put floor prices under agricultural products. Not long ago he rose in his place in this chamber and said he had taken a certain amount of money out of that fund to put a floor price under butter. Certainly there was no question in our minds but that this support price was for the purpose of protecting the dairy farmers; but, as I say, the minister has now confided to us for the first time that it was not for that purpose at all but to protect the consumers. When the consumers read about this in the newspapers tomorrow I am sure they will laugh and laugh; but it is going to be a very derisive laugh. It will be very difficult to convince the consumers—

Mr. Gardiner: They will be laughing at you, because that is not what I said.

Mr. Harkness: —that the minister has put this floor price under butter for their protection. He went on to say there was a surplus of only twenty million pounds; in fact he said it was not a surplus but only twenty million pounds in hand. The hon. member for Greenwood suggests that it is just working capital, and hardly enough of that, so there is no need to worry about it at all. A little later on the minister said that during past years we have made in Canada just the amount of butter we could consume. That is more or less correct, of course; but I would point out to the minister that during those periods we were not consuming any margarine. I have not the figures at the moment, but if he will look them up I am sure he will see there has been a constant increase in the production and sale of margarine every month since it came on the market.

There is no use trying to delude the people of Canada or members of this house into believing that the sale of margarine is not going to reduce the sale of butter. Now that we are in the position of having twenty million pounds of butter on hand at the end of what you might call the storage period, when new production is starting and we are going to be building up our supplies of butter again, a year from now we probably will still have that twenty million pounds on hand, unless it is sold outside the country or used for industrial purposes or consumed in some other way. I do not think there is any other answer but that this twenty million pounds of butter is not going to be eaten as long as the relative prices of butter and margarine remain anything like they are at the present time.

In addition to this twenty million pounds, which in my opinion is an amount the minister is stuck with, we will say, and which he is going to have extreme difficulty in getting rid of anywhere, I should like to know how much of this butter which was taken over has already been sold abroad at cut-rate prices. I know that a certain amount has been sold to Germany. I do not know where else it has been sold, but certainly some has been sold abroad at prices considerably less than the going price. We therefore now find ourselves, Mr. Chairman, in the ridiculous situation in which the minister is using this agricultural floor support price money to protect the consumer of butter so that he will have to pay for it more than the Germans or other people abroad have to pay for it. Of course the dairy farmer thinks he is being protected by it too, but that is an error, I guess.

I should like to know just where we are going in this matter. Certainly it does not make good sense. It seems to me that, instead of trying to persuade the committee and the country that there is not a surplus of butter at the price at which butter stands at the present time, the minister should admit what the situation actually is, namely, that as long as margarine is being sold at the price at which it is being sold—some twenty cents or some figure in that neighbourhood below the price of butter—it means that we have not at home the market that we used to have, and that some other means must be taken of disposing of this butter. Otherwise the farmers must be persuaded to put their milk into some other form of production.

While I am on my feet, I should just like to comment on the minister's statement about hogs. It happens to be a subject I know something about. He said that hog production was quite satisfactory in the eastern part of Canada and he saw no reason why it would decline. In the west it has declined considerably, but he was not worrying about that. He did not think the farmers would go out of hogs any further than they had done—that is what I gathered from his remarks—and they were better to put their efforts into beef. With the present relative prices of beef and hogs, there is no question about the fact that a man is much better to be raising beef. There is no argument on that at all. I think the minister will admit that one of the main factors that discourage the farmer from growing hogs is the hog barley ratio, which means the price of coarse grains in relation to the price of hogs. In the last issue of this livestock and meat trade report put out by the minister's department, I notice that for the week ended April 29—which was the last one on record—the hog barley ratio at Winnipeg was 14·1. The long-time average is 17·4. The figure of 14·1 is the lowest point it has been at for some considerable time.

I would suggest to the minister that that is one of the reasons why a great many people—and they are already doing so, as far as that goes—will get out of the hog business. People are not prepared to put in the labour which is considerable in raising hogs, when the relationship between the price of hogs and the price of coarse grain is so unsatisfactory as it is at the present time. I think the minister is deluding himself and is attempting to delude others if he has any idea that people are going to increase or even anything like maintain the present hog production in Canada as long as coarse grains are so expensive in relation to the price of hogs.

Mr. Herridge: I make no apology, Mr. Chairman, for taking a few minutes of the time of the committee to bring to your attention and that of the minister some of the problems of my constituency.

Before proceeding with these few comments on the matters I wish to deal with, I think I can correctly say to the minister that, so far as my constituents are concerned, the fruit farmers are glad they have received some financial assistance from the dominion government towards the cost of the 1949 crop. The vegetable producers, I would say, are highly indignant over the unannounced removal of the import restrictions on vegetables, and the poultry producers are just plain mad at the mangling they have had in the last three or four months.

I think it is generally admitted throughout the country that the minister has wide knowledge of his department and that he is thoroughly conversant with and interested in agriculture; but I think his strict adherence to the principles of the Manchester school of Liberalism prevents him from facing squarely certain of the marketing questions that are facing this country and the world today.

This evening I want to deal briefly with the question of land conservation, the use and conservation of water, and the proper use or utilization of land for agricultural purposes. I want to make a few brief remarks about the marketing problems faced by the producers, by British Columbia and by my own constituency. Then I want to bring to the attention of the minister and of the committee certain problems that affect my own constituents and certain suggestions that they have asked me to make as an indication of the remedies they think might be given effect to.

I am not one who believes that our production problems, our marketing problems, or any of these problems, can be solved in some easy and quick way. I realize that if we are going to work our way through these difficult times and find a democratic and satisfactory solution to these problems, it is going to mean co-operation between governments and co-operation on all levels of those interested in solving these problems for the common good.

I want to say a few words tonight on soil and water conservation, and on land use as related to agriculture, because I believe that with millions hungry in the world, with thousands unemployed in Canada at this time, and with possibly thousands continuing to be unemployed at certain periods, we cannot continue to waste our land and water resources, to waste our opportunities for producing that necessary food and to waste the opportunity of providing labour if we aim to plan to give that labour something to do.

I wish therefore this evening to deal with a suggested national policy of soil and water conservation and land use which has been drafted by the Agricultural Institute of Canada and which I understand was presented to the minister about a year ago. I understand that this policy was the result of several years' work. It is the result of, shall I say, a combination of idealism, intelligence, brains, science, knowledge and hard work. I am a member of the organization myself; and personally, I am of the opinion that this worth-while professional organization of scientific agriculturalists in Canada have not performed a more useful service than they have in presenting this policy to the Minister of Agriculture and to the nation. Because I have been interested throughout my life in land and water conservation, in conservation measures of all types, I do not apologize in any degree for bringing this matter to the attention of the committee at this time.

Just to give one illustration, Mr. Chairman, of the great need of some national policy in this respect, I want to deal briefly with a situation that has existed in my own constituency for over 45 years. I know the great need on the prairies, in the maritimes and in other places; I know the general need, but in a few moments I can give an illustration of deplorable neglect and inaction because of the lack of a policy of the type suggested by the Agricultural Institute of Canada.

There is in my constituency a very beautiful valley known as Lardo valley, which is about 30 miles in length on the northeast of the Kootenay lakes. In that valley will be found some 500 million feet of uncut timber, matured. It should be cut now. It should have been cut many years ago. It is virgin timber. There will also be found some 10,000 to 15,000 acres of first-class land. There are abundant water supplies. There is everything in that valley to build up a stable agricultural and forestry industry over a long period of time, and to provide home sites and farms for hundreds of people. But today, because of a lack of a national policy on land and water use, and the co-operation required between federal and provincial governments, this great opportunity remains neglected; remains neglected, Mr. Chairman, while we have thousands of young Canadians who are anxious to secure farm sites and opportunities to farm under somewhat pioneer conditions at reasonable rates; young men who have not the $10,000, $15,000 or $20,000 required to establish themselves on an improved farm close to larger centres of population, but who are seeking an opportunity to establish themselves at a low cost and to develop a farm with little capital, but as the result of hard work and sticking with it.

In this valley we have this land, we have the timber, we have the water, and yet for years we have had federal government experts go in there and look the situation over for another department of government, not the Department of Agriculture. They reported the fertility was there, the water and the timber were there, but nothing could be done. They would not recommend settlement because 12 miles of a road had to be built to give communication from that valley to the outside world. Provincial government inspectors have done the same thing, and have reported that 12 miles of road were required, and there were no services. There was no small hospital; there were none of these services required to establish a small community.

This has gone on, as I say, for 45 years, because there is no co-operation between the provincial and federal governments and no interdepartmental co-operation. If we are to develop great assets like that in this country we must have a policy that provides for co-operation between federal and provincial governments and between departments.

Not only is co-operation necessary between governments to develop a project such as that, but it would require the co-operation of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Public Works, to look after the navigation and the draining of rivers. It would require the co-operation of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. But we lack that departmental co-operation—and I find, Mr. Chairman, so often that governments become extremely departmentalized. In this instance a question arose of removing a log jam from a river at a relatively small expense, so that boats could tow booms down the Duncan river. It would have meant an expenditure of around $4,000. I happened to mention to one public works official that this lowering of the dam would not only provide for navigation but would also lower the river at high water, and drain some 3,000 to 4,000 acres of beautiful black land in the Meadow Creek area. I was immediately told that I must not suggest that; that the Department of Public Works had nothing to do with draining land. If it was going to do that it could not be considered; that it must be strictly for navigation. And yet one little operation, and a little expansion of one operation, would have meant the draining, not of 3,000 or 4,000 acres only, but of 10,000 or 12,000 acres.

I give that, Mr. Chairman, as an illustration of the lack of departmental co-operation. I am not blaming the heads of departments; I am not blaming the officials; it just results from the lack of a national policy of soil and water conservation to make the best use of our land and water for agricultural and other developments.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to place this policy on the record. I am going to read it because I think it is a document which is well worth bringing to the attention of this committee and well worth bringing to the attention of the Canadian people. The policy reads as follows:

The Agricultural Institute of Canada therefore urges:

(a) that the dominion Department of Agriculture recommend to the government of Canada the immediate establishment of a national policy of soil and water conservation and land use for Canada, and that the government make provision for the necessary legislation;

(b) that under the act there be appointed a dominion co-ordinator of soil and water conservation and land use;

(c) that a national council on soil and water conservation and land use be established on a joint dominion and provincial basis, with sufficient powers to implement programs according to the need across Canada;

(d) that having regard for the variable nature of soil conservation, reclamation, and land and water utilization, procedure, and practices across Canada, and inasmuch as the land resources of Canada are for the most part vested in the provinces, the custodianship and conservation of our land and water resources available for agricultural purposes be the responsibility of the department of agriculture in the province concerned;

(e) that the provincial governments be asked to provide the legislation, administrative organization, and educational services necessary for the effective utilization, conservation and reclamation of soil and water resources and further that they be asked to design ways and means of encouraging cultural and land use practices which will maintain and enhance the productivity and usefulness of our soil and water resources;

(f) that the provinces provide such legislation, aid and guidance to municipalities and farmers as will permit them to effectively perform their duties resulting from soil and water wastage and deterioration;

(g) that under the provincial legislation there be established local autonomous committees to implement land use and soil and water conservation projects;

(h) that the dominion and provincial governments inaugurate an immediate program for the training of personnel adequate to provide an advisory service to farmers, and

(i) that in view of the immediate need for an advisory service to farmers, existing staff be trained and used to the fullest possible extent.

It is the opinion of the Agricultural Institute of Canada that under the above legislation and organization the necessary agreements between the dominion and the provinces can be implemented.

The above program is recommended by the Agricultural Institute of Canada to provide a broad national policy for the conservation of the land and water resources of our dominion.

I heartily agree with that policy, and it appeals to me in many respects. It does not ask the federal government to do everything or the provincial government to do everything. It means, if implemented, satisfactory co-operation between federal and provincial governments and farmers or, should I say, the rank and file concerned. I think it combines the opportunity for government direction and government guidance with self-help, local improvement and local interest.

That program has been presented to the Minister of Agriculture, and about 8,000 reprints have been sent to interested individuals and organizations throughout Canada. In a matter like this, which is a somewhat abstract question to many people who may not think deeply on these problems, problems which in many cases do not affect them directly because of the lives they lead, it takes time to build up public opinion in support. I know however from my acquaintance with large numbers of people in Canada, and my knowledge of a good many organizations and institutions, that there is a slowly growing interest in Canada at this time as a result of the efforts put forth in this proposed national policy by the Agricultural Institute of Canada, and that there is decided public opinion in favour of the establishment of such a policy.

This policy has been recommended by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Interest is being taken in it by universities and other educational institutions, by development organizations across Canada, by chambers of commerce, by labour organizations, by business organizations and so on. In fact, I have before me a list of twenty-nine major institutions, organizations or business concerns which are now taking a direct interest in the promotion, knowledge and understanding of the policy I have just read to the committee.

When the minister replies before his estimates are concluded I would ask him to tell the committee his opinion of this policy, and to state whether there is any possibility of the dominion government's accepting the recommendations and giving some effect to them in the immediate future.

I wish to deal briefly with world market surpluses. I shall be brief indeed because I support the remarks of the hon. member for Acadia, and I do not think it is necessary to repeat them, more than to underline what he said about the necessity for accepting the policies advocated by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and by the International Federation of Agricultural Producers with respect to the need for a world pool for the distribution of agricultural surpluses.

May I make a few brief comments with respect to the fruit industry of British Columbia. When I speak for the fruit growers I speak as one who has been interested for forty-five years, who has grubbed out stumps. So at this point I do not represent those farmers who ride on rubber-tired tractors and who use the big machinery with headlights, and all the rest of it. I represent the farmer who walks behind the walking plow, the farmer who uses the mattock, the shovel, the pickaxe, the axe, and other instruments of that kind. I represent the small farm hewn out of the forest.

But I do suggest that our fruit growers of British Columbia do urge that greater efforts be made by the government, particularly by the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce, to develop the potentialities of the British market for our fruit. We believe those departments have underestimated the possibilities of that market. When we read of Australia making a deal less than a month ago for three million boxes of apples, and of apples being shipped from Italy and other countries, we realize that when we were told a year or two ago by a representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce that Great Britain would be nearly self-sufficient in apples, because of heavy plantings, we were not told the facts. I think that in this connection it would be proper for me to quote Sheridan when he said that the honourable gentlemen were using their memories as far as their wit was concerned, but their imaginations as far as their facts were concerned.

I do urge that every effort be made to explore the future possibilities of the United Kingdom market, knowing of the difficulties which are created by the exchange situation. I wish to express my appreciation—and I am now referring to the United States market—of the work that has been done by the Canadian Horticultural Council and its sister organization in the United States in meeting together each year and coming to some sort of arrangement. I think the work of both organizations is welcomed and recognized by the government when they make a mutual arrangement with regard to the shipment of apples to the United States and possibly some importations into this country. They try to work out their marketing arrangements on a mutual basis. I think the method of working out quotas so far as possible, especially into an area where the need is found, and back again where the need is found, will be the development of the future, rather than dependence upon tariffs and tariff restriction.

Our growers believe that, if we are to meet the situation which will face us at the end of this crop year, the government should now commence to plan to implement its price support policy, and to give some evidence of the formula it intends to use in respect of certain crops. I am of opinion that we will get a satisfactory solution for this question only if we have co-operation between all governments and producer organizations. I believe all will agree that farmers are not unreasonable; the average farmer seeks to make only a reasonable living. He is not expecting more than his share of the total production of society.

But I do suggest that the time is ripe for the government to commence to study its floor-price program rather than to take action when the need appears urgent as a result of the necessity to dispose of our crop. In this connection I should like to read a resolution adopted by the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association which has to do with the Canadian subsidy for export fruits. This resolution arose because of the fact that Canadian apple producers, tree fruit producers, are meeting exceptional competition from American producers because those American producers are receiving the export subsidies. The result was that this resolution was passed in January by the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association:

> Whereas the offshore exports of fruit from the tree fruit area of British Columbia is of paramount importance to maintaining fair market conditions, and
> Whereas it has become increasingly difficult to enter the offshore export market, due to the devaluation of currency, and
>
> Whereas United States growers are able to enter these markets by means of a government subsidy on apples and pears shipped offshore,
> Therefore be it resolved by the 1950 B.C. F.G.A. convention that the dominion government be requested to give serious consideration to the giving of a subsidy on offshore shipments of Canadian tree fruits.

I bring that to the attention of the minister because our organization is of the opinion that it may be necessary as a temporary move to consider subsidies for some offshore shipments under these very uncertain world marketing conditions.

I should like to make brief reference to the poultry industry. I feel sorry for the poultry industry because it is not organized in the same way as the beef and dairying people are, and particularly as these grain growers in front of me are. Because of that they sometimes fail to make their voices heard with the government and with the trade as well as some other sections of agriculture do. Unfortunately they seem to be misunderstood by the consumers.

I urge that every consideration be given to the present position of the poultry industry and to the possibility of establishing satisfactory floor prices.

I think something should be done towards supplying feeds at reasonable prices. When I was home at Easter I had the opportunity to examine some feed wheat and feed barley and other grain which had been shipped in for poultry feeding purposes. I am of the opinion that the distribution of mill feeds for livestock and poultry is well worth the special attention of the Department of Agriculture. Some of the samples of wheat I examined were almost unfit for stock or poultry feed. I did not have the opportunity to get many samples, but I believe a high percentage of weeds and dust and so on would be found. I suggest that the minister have his department give particular consideration to this matter.

I am getting closer to home all the time and I have now landed in the Kootenays. I want to express the thanks of our people for the work of the officials of the department in connection with the little cherry disease. We think they are doing a good work and we realize the difficulties of the problem they are facing, but I have one criticism to make. Because of the interest of the cherry growers in the investigation it would be a good thing if the officials could keep the farm and fruit growers' organizations informed periodically of the progress being made in trying to find a solution to the little cherry disease problem.

I am not as pessimistic over this as some people are. When it first occurred many people threw up their hands and thought that was the end of the industry in the Kootenays. I think without question we produce the finest cherries in British Columbia. Personally I believe the disease is the result of soil unbalance caused by excessive irrigation, over-application of fertilizers and things of that sort. I am a great believer in barnyard manure and green crops in connection with the production of cherries. Our orchard practice of excessive irrigation and fertilization, especially nitrogenous fertilizers and leeching, has produced a soil unbalance that has affected the vitality of the tree.

I have knowledge of a tree which bore little cherries, that is cherries with less sugar content than normal, somewhat pointed in shape and lacking the normal colour, for two or three years, and then later on bore normal fruit. I repeat that in my opinion this is the result of lack of vitality occasioned by soil unbalance.

Our organization, as well as those in the Okanagan, are greatly interested in the research being carried on by the department with respect to the use of cull apples and little cherries, and also the possibilities for making cider. I come from a farm family in England and we used to make excellent cider from Pippin apples. We make a considerable quantity of cider at home for our own consumption but we have never been able to make the same grade as we used to make in England. It may be because of the different apple varieties that are used, but I do urge that more research be carried on with respect to cider production.

I support the hon. member for Yale when he suggests that the Department of Agriculture should put out some counter-propaganda against that of the Department of National Health and Welfare which is so eulogistic about citrus fruit juices to the disparagement of the possible use of apple juice.

Before concluding I want to make a plea on behalf of our vegetable growers. There are a number of vegetable growers who supply the local markets in the interior of British Columbia. In the spring of last year they planted their celery, their leeks, their cabbages, their carrots, in fact their usual crops believing they had the protection of the import regulations. They had ample markets for their crops provided they had that protection. They are most indignant at the fact that the import regulations were suddenly raised after they had been induced to plant those crops because of the shortages that existed in the district.

I want to point out to the Minister of Agriculture, in the hope that he will use his influence with the Department of Finance, that there are root cellars full of cabbages, carrots, beets, turnips, leeks and other vegetables at a time when carloads of similar vegetables are being brought in from the United States. Here is a case where the Department of National Health and Welfare could do something for the Canadian vegetable producer.

The consumer in the city believes that he must have fresh carrots and cabbages and lettuce from California. As a matter of fact, if you take one of these small bunches of carrots that you get at the present time and cut off the tops you will find what you are actually getting. Our people would be far better off if they would go out and buy good Canadian carrots that are now in root cellars waiting for a purchaser. The Department of National Health and Welfare could well direct the attention of the Canadian consumer to the value of vegetables that are grown normally in order to counteract the drift of the consumer toward the use of quickly grown vegetables which all nutritionists say are not as nutritious as those grown in a normal way with the normal moisture and mineral content, vitamins and so on.

I do hope the minister will give some consideration to providing protection by some means for our vegetable growers. I am not suggesting a tariff, but I do suggest that the quota system is an excellent thing. So long as we have unsold vegetables in Canada let them be sold first. If our local supplies had been allowed to come on the market in the normal way they would have been exhausted earlier last winter. When they are exhausted then there should be an arrangement between vegetable growers' organizations here and in the United States to import sufficient to meet Canadian requirements. I think many of these things can be settled by mutual agreement and adjustment particularly if the growers concerned can meet face to face as they have in the horticultural industry.

In conclusion I suggest that the matters I have brought to the attention of the house can only be solved as a result of co-operation between federal and provincial governments, producers' organizations and farmers as individuals. In British Columbia we have an excellent producers' organization in the British Columbia federation of agriculture. In Tree Fruits Limited we have a marvellous marketing organization unequalled anywhere in the world, and I make that statement without fear of contradiction. It is efficiently operated. The organization is controlled by the rank and file, and it is democratic from its head to its toes. It is well run in every respect. I suggest that if the government is willing to bring together all these great forces of democracy, federal, provincial, local and individual, then in solving our agricultural problems we will also be doing something to solve the problems of democracy as a whole.

Mr. Gardiner: One or two questions have been asked which I think I should answer tonight because I and those who asked them may forget them before we come back to the agricultural estimates. The first speaker this afternoon made some suggestions as to travelling expenses and miscellaneous items. He said that some $190,000 odd in the agricultural estimates was for different items which he said were sundries, n.o.p. and contingencies. I think most of ours are not classified under any of those heads but rather are described by a different name from any of the three which have been used. In every branch we have miscellaneous items. I presume that is the term to which my friend was referring. All I wish to say in reply this evening is that we will deal with each one of these miscellaneous items as we come to it, and will be in a position to give explanations as to the purpose for which the expenditures were made. Generally speaking the items are comparatively small or are ones that cannot be classified properly under any one of the other items in the branch, and they are all put in the miscellaneous item.

At the same time I might say that it is not a matter with which the officials of our department have a great deal to do. Those who have the responsibility of compiling the estimates put all items that they consider should be so classified under the different headings in the estimates, and those which they are not able to classify are put under miscellaneous. We have a complete explanation for every item in that category which we can give when we come to the different branches of the department, but at the moment I do not think I should go through all these items and select them. We will be prepared to make explanations as we go along.

As to travelling expenses, I note that the amount mentioned was $2,148,000. The item is fairly large but as the hon. member said at the time he mentioned it I doubt if there is any department where it is more necessary to have fairly high travelling expenses than the Department of Agriculture. Much of the work which is done has to be done in contact with farmers scattered widely over Canada, and if not directly with farmers then with organizations which are more or less localized across the country. For that reason considerable travelling expenses are involved. I should like to repeat what I said as to the other item, namely, that travelling expenses run through all the different branches of the department, and I think it will be much more beneficial to deal with them as we come to them under the different items. I think it will be better to explain them then rather than to attempt to give any general explanation at this time.

The last speaker referred to a report made by technical agriculturists throughout Canada. As everyone knows, technical agriculturists across Canada are largely officials of our department and the departments of the different provincial administrations from one end of Canada to the other. They also include professors of Canadian universities who are associated with the agricultural division of university work. These men and women are the ones who actually carry on the activities of the department. I have glanced rather hurriedly at the recommendation which they made. I have not had an opportunity to study it closely but I venture to say that their recommendation involves in large part pretty much what is being done in connection with agriculture in Canada.

I remember when I came to Ottawa fifteen years ago one of the first conferences I attended was a conference called for the purpose of discussing the overlapping of activities in different federal departments with relation to different provincial departments. It was generally admitted by all those who attended the conference, which was a general one covering all departments, that there was as little overlapping in departments of agriculture across Canada as would be found in any other department of government. In other words, there was very little of it found in any particular place. Wherever it appears to some people that there is overlapping it will usually be found on examination that a co-operative set-up has been established which makes it possible for our officials to do provincial work where it is better to have it done that way, and for provincial officials to do our work where it is better to have it done that way.

The system we follow in connection with grading inspection, for example, is to appoint provincial officials as our officials where we require to use them, and the provinces appoint our officials as provincial officials where they require to use them. There is every degree of co-operation that could possibly be brought about in that regard. We have joint plans throughout as to soil surveys, and work in co-operation with university staffs. We contribute toward that work, as do the provinces. We do a certain amount of the work here and a certain amount is done in the provinces but there is the most complete co-operation among those who are concerned with that particular kind of work.

The same thing is true as to research. While some of our research work is done by the national research council, by far the greater part of it is done in agricultural schools and colleges, and universities that have an agricultural campus in addition to the main university campus, as many of our universities now have. They are all working together in the matter of agricultural research from one end of Canada to the other. Having said that, I agree with the suggestion that there should be much more of it. If we could get the funds I believe a great deal more research work could be carried on in all parts of Canada with beneficial results. As a matter of fact we have representations from certain sections of Canada that not as much research work is being done there as somewhere else, and we are constantly being urged to speed up our research work in certain areas.

The same thing might be said of reclamation work. From time to time we have discussed the possibility of bringing down legislation which would spread P.F.R.A., for example, over the whole of western Canada in order to take care of reclamation work. We have had suggestions that other legislation should be brought down covering eastern Canada which would be more or less an enlargement of the legislation we now have dealing with the reclamation of the marshlands in the extreme east. At one time we had hoped to bring down legislation this session covering both those activities, but I am sorry to have to say that because of the delays in connection with the discussion of financial matters as between the dominion and the provinces, in all probability we will delay bringing down that legislation until after the conference that is to be held.

Let me say at once that this does not mean there is likely to be very much delay in the work that can be planned within the next year. In connection with P.F.R.A., for example, we have a sufficient number of dugouts applied for in the area described as the Palliser triangle to take care of all the work we could do in probably two seasons if we applied ourselves entirely to work of that kind. So there is no need for delay in anything that requires to be done, because of the lack of legislation this year. Again, probably all the money we would be able to obtain for that sort of work during the coming season is already required in connection with the reclamation work being carried on in the marshlands of the maritime provinces and other assistance we give here and there along the St. Lawrence, the great lakes and elsewhere. Much of that work is being carried on under special votes, so I think perhaps we are doing fairly well in that direction.

One matter was touched upon by two speakers from British Columbia that rather stirs my sympathies. I remember going to British Columbia many years ago and attending one of those summer picnics they have at the Summerland farm. For the first time I had the opportunity to drink apple juice, apart from the hard cider we used to drink down in Ontario in the earlier days. I came back an advocate of the drinking of apple juice in this country. The war came on shortly after that and we had no market for our apples, so we put on a strong advertising campaign to promote the consumption of apple juice. My particular part was that no matter where I went, east or west, when I went into a restaurant or hotel I asked for apple juice. Now I can get apple juice everywhere, except in one line of restaurants in Canada. At first I thought it must be a line of American restaurants—

Mr. MacInnis: Why don't you serve it during the estimates?

Mr. Gardiner: I do serve it sometimes; but there is one line of restaurants well established in this city and in most cities across Canada where I cannot get it. I go there less and less often because I require apple juice three times a day; but when I ask for it the waitresses tell me they just cannot get their management to provide apple juice. One of these restaurants is only about two blocks from where we are meeting tonight; another is in one of the prominent hotels of this city. I go right on asking for apple juice, however; and I think if everyone who went there, particularly those from British Columbia, would do the same thing in all probability we would get that management to provide apple juice. After all, one way to get these things used in Canada is to ask for them. When I see persons who come from apple-growing areas walk into a restaurant, particularly for breakfast, and ask for orange juice I rather resent it when they get up in this house and suggest that we are not doing enough to help them.

Mr. Herridge: I do not ask for orange juice.

Mr. Gardiner: Then I take that back as far as my hon. friend is concerned. Many others do ask for orange juice constantly instead of asking for apple juice, but I can assure my hon. friend I never do. I ask for apple juice every morning for breakfast and I usually get it, because I do not go to that restaurant when I want breakfast. The other evening I was there after the theatre and asked for apple juice. They did not have any, so I said there were about two thousand people around here with whom I had some influence, and I was going to suggest to them one of these mornings that they begin to boycott that place until they serve apple juice. I do not think it does any harm to talk that way occasionally; perhaps if we all did it we could get those restaurants to serve apple juice. I agree with my hon. friend that it is a delightful drink, even were it not nourishing. With the weight I have been putting on recently, however, not knowing anything else to charge it up to I think it might even add to your weight, as was suggested by an hon. member a few moments ago.

Mr. Low: That is not apple juice.

Mr. Gardiner: That may not be apple juice; nevertheless it is a delightful drink and

I think we should use more of it in Canada. Then something was said about the apples we produce and the apples they consume in Great Britain. I agree with my hon. friend that there is no better sales organization in Canada than the British Columbia fruit people. Last year, in spite of the fact that there was a large apple crop in the United States, they sold their products in thirty-two of those states in competition with the United States apple producers. They also sold their apples right across this country, and in addition tried to sell them in Great Britain. It is all very well to say that other people did sell apples there. British Columbia provides a good market for British products, and British Columbia apples are as good as any produced anywhere in the world; but they could not sell them in Great Britain last year. Even when Great Britain took some of their apples as a gift they did not sell them but gave them away to school children. There is no use sitting here and arguing that a market exists when it does not exist at all. When British Columbia apples were sent over there, as everyone knows, they were distributed to school children in different cities in Britain. So I suggest that we be a little more realistic and understand that something has happened to the market in which we used to sell our apples, and a condition exists there which did not exist before.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VISIT TO WINDSOR, ONT., BY MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, it is my wish to give voice to the appreciation of some fifty members of parliament and their wives who returned this morning from enjoying a magnificent trip to the great industrial city of Windsor, Ontario. This trip was arranged by the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown), and while there we were the guests of the Windsor chamber of commerce. I think it is good for members of parliament, if they are to legislate on a national basis, to take every opportunity of seeing, as widely as they can, the opportunities, industries and advantages of this country.

I cannot speak too highly of the courtesies that were extended us while we were there. Windsor calls itself the gateway to Canada's industrial progress, and I think those of us who were there are inclined to agree with that statement. That great city was a fortress for us in time of war, and we hope it will be of a source of expanding amenities in time of peace.

I find it difficult indeed to single out for specific mention any particular persons in connection with the great reception given us at Windsor, but in addition to the hon. member for Essex West, I should like to mention the other members of this parliament resident in the general area. I should like to mention the officers of the Windsor chamber of commerce. I should like to mention Mr. R. M. Sale, president of the Ford Motor Company, all his officers, and the other 14,000 men who combine to make it a great industrial team. I should like to mention Mrs. W. F. Herman, widow of the founder of the Windsor Daily Star. Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word for the Tigers and the Browns, who gave us two extra innings of superb baseball.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to move any amendment, but rather to join the hon. member, and others who were privileged to be present on this referred to occasion, in expressing appreciation of the opportunity and privilege which was ours, and of the courtesy and hospitality extended to us by the city of Windsor, the chamber of commerce of that city, the Border Cities Star, and the corporations to which the hon. member made reference. It was one of the most enjoyable and educational trips it has even been my privilege to take.

I join with the hon. member also in thanking the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown), who arranged the trip, and also the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), who spared no effort to make the visit a most enjoyable one.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, it is a very happy privilege to voice the gratitude of those of us of the Social Credit party who were included in the group who journeyed to Windsor and enjoyed that most interesting tour. Indeed, we concur in all that has been said by the two previous speakers. The courtesies extended to this parliamentary body by the Ford Motor Company of Canada, the Windsor chamber of commerce—and we must not omit the reception of Mrs. Herman—all these courtesies we shall never forget.

We wish to extend our appreciation to the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) for their untiring efforts to make the visit so happy and so successful.

There are two things about such tours which strike me as most valuable. They bring members from all parts of Canada into closer focus with the practical business world. They broaden our views. Then, such tours are of value from another standpoint which, I think, is not too insignificant to mention here. They bring members of parliament closer together in a social friendship which is not always experienced as we sit in the House of Commons or roam the halls of this building. That, to me, in a democracy, is of inestimable value.

May I repeat, on behalf of all those associated with me in this part of the chamber, to all those who were responsible for and so thoughtful in arranging this tour: thanks a million!

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I should not like it to be thought that members of the House of Commons were such narrow-minded guests that they would be afraid to mention that while in Windsor they visited the Hiram Walker distilleries. May I say that we had an opportunity of seeing how their product was made, and that we met in the canteen for tea and enjoyed their hospitality. May I offer them our thanks.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be left out of this. May I assure the house that the most enjoyable part of our reception in Windsor was when we were honoured as guests at the wedding reception of the most beautiful girl in the city of Detroit.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Before proceeding, however, with the point of privilege I propose to raise, may I be permitted to express on behalf of the city of Windsor and the county of Essex our appreciation of the honour conferred upon us by the visit of over fifty members of parliament and their wives.

I know I express the hope of the Ford Motor Company of Canada that other industries across the Dominion of Canada will make it possible, in as efficient a manner as it was done by the Ford Company over the past week end, for members of parliament to see the country and the people for whom we are legislating.

My point of privilege is that in the Ottawa Citizen of May 12, 1950, and repeated in the London Free Press of May 13, 1950—and I understand it also appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail on or about the same date—in making reference to the largest single exodus of members of parliament in memory on a trip to the sun parlour of Canada, it was stated that I was host to a group of automotive officials two weeks ago when they came to Ottawa to seek imposition of dumping duties on British cars.

Mr. Speaker, I was not host to any such delegation. I had no knowledge of any such delegation, and if any such delegation existed they did not communicate with me. This visit of last week end was conceived by the Windsor chamber of commerce and myself considerably over a year ago.

Further, the question I put on the order paper, and to which reference was made by the Citizen, was not at the request of the automotive industry, or any other industry or individual. It was placed thereon without the knowledge or consent of that industry. I am interested in providing markets for our products and work for the people of Canada.

The London Free Press stated that the trip was an "expense paid affair". This statement is not correct. The members of parliament were, I believe, pleased to travel at their own expense to our city and to enjoy our hospitality almost as much as we enjoyed having them.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

SOUTHERN MANITOBA—VISIT OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL—MESSAGES FROM LORD BESSBOROUGH AND OTHERS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members would like me to express the appreciation we feel of the keen and constructive interest shown by His Excellency the Governor General during his visit to Winnipeg yesterday, in the truly magnificent effort being put forth both by the armed forces and the citizens themselves to combat the ravages of the Red river flood.

This morning I received a cable from a former governor general, the Earl of Bessborough. I should like to read into our records the text of Lord Bessborough's message and of my reply, and in that way convey the message from Lord and Lady Bessborough to the people of Winnipeg and Manitoba. The cable is from Rowlands Castle, Hants, England, under date of May 13, addressed to me at Ottawa, and it reads:

> Much distressed at flood disaster in Manitoba. Through you would like to express our profound sympathy for the people of Winnipeg and province in this great misfortune.
> Bessborough

To this I replied:

> People of Winnipeg and Manitoba will, I know, appreciate expression of distress and sympathy from yourself and Lady Bessborough, which I propose to mention in parliament today.

Then, just before coming to the house today a message was received from the Prime Minister of Italy, of which this is a translation:

> Through my intermediary the government and people of Italy wish to express their sincere sympathy to the government and Canadian people, to which we are tied by bonds of friendship, on the occasion of the disaster caused by the Winnipeg flood.

I shall make answer similar to my answer to Lord Bessborough. I think these communications are a sign of the growing community of feeling that is spreading among the free peoples of the world, and one of the encouraging things which have followed upon this terrible disaster to our fellow citizens in Winnipeg and the adjoining area.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and I spent the week end in Winnipeg conferring with provincial, civic and Red Cross authorities, and with military forces, with regard to the Manitoba flood. I thought that hon. members might like to have a brief statement from me as to the present conditions that exist, and also as to the flood fighting activities that are being carried on.

South of Winnipeg is a lake, in some places over twenty miles wide, and averaging twelve miles wide, extending to Emerson near the international border and for very many miles beyond that point. The Wildwood area in Fort Garry, the Kingston Crescent area, and nearly the whole of the remainder of St. Vital and the large Riverview area, are almost completely evacuated. Much of East Kildonan is largely evacuated. Most of the hospitals have been completely evacuated, and the Deer Lodge and general hospitals partly so. The city of St. Boniface is threatened on two sides, from the Red and from the Seine river, and is being protected by dikes which are in constant course of repair and which in some places are as high as twenty feet. Because of the danger which that height of dike creates, a considerable measure of evacuation of women and children from that city has been recommended and carried out.

I am glad to report that the power situation is considerably better. The power stations and gas plant have been well diked; and there is at the present time considerable optimism with regard to the ability to maintain power and light and gas services unless the river should rise substantially beyond its present level. Even should the Rover street and the Mill street substations go out, they serve only certain areas in the city and there are other substations on higher ground which could continue to serve not only their own areas by connecting power lines but other areas as well whose own substation might be put out of action.

There is no trouble expected in connection with railway access to the city.

The equipment supply has reached a peak point except with regard to pumps.

I think it will be of some relief to those who are anxious to know to be told that a well worked-out and integrated plan for complete evacuation has been prepared. The personnel of the various committees which would be required to implement this plan is already established. Zone commanders have been appointed for each evacuation zone, who would take charge immediately if the necessity arose. Emergency caches of food on both sides of the two rivers have been established to take care of the situation in the event of food warehouses being flooded. Stores of such essential materials as gasoline and motor oil sufficient to last for a considerable time in the future have been established on railway sidings in high and dry places. Emergency loading platforms have been established at high places for use in the event of mass evacuation, and lights have been prepared so that the evacuation may continue twenty-four hours a day if necessary.

As an indication of the thoroughness with which arrangements have been made, it is interesting to note that arrangements have been made that bread, which is a perishable product, can be brought in on a day's notice from cities outside of Winnipeg. In order to bridge that one day gap, a one day's supply of bread has been baked and frozen and is being held in cold storage. Not even that one day gap will be uncared for.

All of this is the product of what I as a Manitoban can say without immodesty is a most amazing piece of co-ordination between the military and civil authorities. The military authorities are acting under provincial instructions and are co-operating to the greatest possible degree with the provincial authorities, the municipal authorities, the Red Cross and the various volunteer civilian flood relief committees which have been set up.

One of the most inspiring spectacles we saw there was the Red Cross headquarters in Winnipeg, where they have three shifts of workers of between 400 and 500 each, who were operating flood lighting auxiliary services, when less than two weeks ago this service did not exist. Within that time workers in these three shifts have been brought together and placed in different branches to discharge different functions; chiefs and assistants and other ratings have been established in each branch, with the whole of this activity brought under central over-all control. All of this has been established within this short period of time; and in these three shifts there are only ten paid workers in all.

Citizens and workers of every kind, businessmen, stenographers, teletype operators, chartered accountants, lawyers, doctors in the Red Cross medical units—all these citizens are taking part in this community effort and are giving almost the entire amount of their time and effort over long hours each day to fighting this flood.

Upon the dikes themselves the work is being maintained and has been maintained from the beginning by literally thousands of volunteer workers. The figure has been given as 60,000, and while I would not want to say that it is that high, it is certainly well over 50,000. Men and women, boys and girls —some as young as twelve who work in carrying up coffee and food to the dikes—are making their contribution. I think this can best be explained in the terms of a statement made to me by a widow in East Kildonan. She told me that she was greatly relieved to be evacuated from that place because her young twelve year old son had been working daily from morning until late at night taking coffee and sandwiches to the workers, and he felt he had not done enough if he did not continue to carry on that effort. She could not keep him away from the dike which, as hon. members know, burst a few days ago. Luckily through good management there was no loss of life, but nearly all the pumping equipment behind the dike was lost.

All the people of Winnipeg, from the humblest schoolgirl and schoolboy to the most eminent city father, are in this fight during long days and long nights. There are numerous citizens who over a period of weeks have not averaged more than four or five hours of sleep per night. About midnight on Saturday I stood and watched as a matter of curiosity the type of traffic that was going by. There was hardly any motor traffic except trucks and cars which were loaded to capacity with dike workers, either going to or coming from their work.

I think it is proper, and I am sure that the citizens of Winnipeg and Manitoba generally would wish me to do so, to pay tribute to the fine job which the Red Cross and the armed services have been performing. Right from May 6, the day on which Premier Campbell as head of the provincial authorities instructed Brigadier General Morton to take over, he and his staff have been performing a simply magnificent feat of organization and direction. Every afternoon at 4.30 Brigadier General Morton holds a briefing session, and I was privileged to attend one of them. Each of the flood fighting heads reports briefly, succinctly, comprehensively and clearly what has happened in his area since the day before. Through the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) I should like to convey to the army the deep appreciation of the citizens of Winnipeg of the work which the Department of National Defence has done.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has said, I also visited Winnipeg over the week end. With me was Lieutenant General Foulkes, chief of the army general staff. Vice Admiral Grant, chief of naval services was there earlier in the week, and Air Marshal Curtis, chief of the air staff, was also in Winnipeg yesterday. Our purpose in making the visit at this time was to see what, if anything, the armed services could do in addition to what they are already doing to help to relieve the situation. I deeply appreciate the remarks of the Minister of Justice, and also those of the premier of Manitoba, concerning the work of the armed forces. I shall be very glad indeed to communicate them to the services concerned.

At the present time there are actually engaged in this work in Winnipeg over 4,000 officers and men of the navy, army and air force, active and reserve. From the point of view of service participation it is a much larger operation than took place at the time of the Fraser valley floods of 1948. The services involved include some 700 of the navy, many of whom have been flown to Winnipeg from points as far distant as Esquimalt and Halifax; then there are over 2,000 army personnel, and 600 of the Royal Canadian Air Force, in addition to members of the air force engaged on the airlift. The airlift is probably the largest that has ever been carried out in Canada, with a total load already of over a million pounds, and thousands of personnel. Over thirty North Star and Dakota aircraft have been continuously engaged, with an amazing record of performance.

At the present time the aircraft are engaged in removing bed cases from the city hospitals consequent upon evacuation. By Wednesday it is expected that all Winnipeg hospitals will be evacuated, with the exception of Deer Lodge and the general hospital. These aircraft have also been carrying in large quantities of equipment of all kinds, particularly sandbags. The rate of consumption of sandbags at the present time is 300,000 a day. We have a sufficient supply available to feel that the situation is well in hand.

I should like to express to the citizens of Winnipeg the sympathy that I am sure everyone must feel for what they have gone through, and also the tremendous admiration that anyone would have who saw what we saw of the magnificent work of the civilians of Winnipeg and the adjacent communities. After all, the service personnel are doing their duty, which they are trained to do, and doing it very well indeed; but civilians are working long hours voluntarily because it is their community and their fight for their city. Leading that fight are the authorities of the provincial government, the municipalities—and there are more than ten involved—the Canadian Red Cross and dozens of agencies of various kinds, all forming a splendid working team.

I should like to conclude by reading a message I sent to Brigadier General Morton this morning on my return:

As I told the meeting of the Winnipeg flood control committee yesterday, the work being done under your direction by all personnel of the navy, army and air force, active and reserve, working with the closest possible co-operation with civilian authorities, is a credit to the services and to our country. Our visit brought home to us the tremendous efforts that had been made and still are needed to cope with the disaster. What was most striking was the warm and friendly relationship between service and civilians at every working level. Winnipeg stands today because you stood together. Will you be good enough to convey to all ranks my appreciation and thanks for the job they are doing, and accept my hearty congratulations on your fine personal leadership. Obviously there is a long, hard fight ahead but the way you are working is the best guarantee that you will win through.

PRIVATE BILLS

REPORT OF EXAMINER OF PETITIONS—PROCEDURE IN PRESENTATION TO THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that the Clerk has laid on the table the twenty-second report of the examiner of petitions for private bills.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: It has been customary, when I have informed the house that the Clerk has laid on the table a report of the examiner of petitions for private bills, for the Clerk Assistant to begin to read it to the house. He reads a few words, some hon. members say "dispense", and he does not proceed. Today, before the Clerk Assistant had an opportunity to rise, an hon. member rose on another matter. In future may I take it that, unless a member asks that such reports be read, it is the unanimous wish of the house that the Clerk Assistant should not read them?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATION OF NEW CONTRACT WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): In view of recent press reports that a renewed Anglo-Canadian wheat contract is being considered, and also in view of the fact that the farmers across Canada are vitally interested in such a contract, would the Minister of Trade and Commerce inform the house whether negotiations are under way, and if so, what are the possibilities of such an agreement being concluded?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I could give a very short answer—that no agreement is contemplated that will prejudicially affect the wheat growers of the province of Newfoundland.

An hon. Member: He is from Ontario.

Mr. Howe: Oh? Well, I believe the same thing might apply to Ontario. Trade discussions will take place covering a number of subjects, including wheat, but there has been no suggestion of an agreement concerning wheat other than the international agreement to which Canada is a party. I can assure my hon. friend that no agreement will be signed without full consultation with my colleagues in the government.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

CHARLOTTETOWN—QUESTION AS TO PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Will the Minister of Public Works make a further statement as to the progress being made in the matter of the construction of the dominion building at Charlottetown?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): The only statement I can make is that we are trying to acquire the site. If I remember correctly, there are thirty-two different properties involved, and the officials of the department are negotiating with the owners. The moment the site becomes the property of the government we shall proceed with all haste to put up the building.

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company —Mr. Maybank—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, in the discussion on this and the other private bill to incorporate a gas pipe line, the question at issue between those holding different views has remained unchanged. That question is whether or not the time has now come, and whether or not the opportunity should be taken in connection with these bills, to insist upon writing into this legislation, or into the legislation out of which these bills have arisen, the provision that in the construction of any such pipe lines Canada shall be served first. Those who believe that that should be done say that Canada's interests can be protected only by writing that principle into these bills. Those who take the other point of view say it is not necessary to write into the bills themselves any provision that these pipe lines shall serve this country before being built into the United States.

It is perhaps unfortunate, but certainly it is a fact, that we have been unable to reconcile those points of view. Therefore it is not my intention to dwell at any length upon the merits of one point of view or the other, because I take it that if after several weeks, to put it mildly, we have been unable to reconcile those differences of opinion, anything I may say can hardly hope to bring about that result. I do think it important, however, to emphasize that a very significant development has taken place in the course of the discussion. The Prime Minister has now considered it appropriate, as he did on May 5, to indicate that he personally is in favour of the all-Canadian route for these pipe lines, though he qualified his remarks to the extent of saying "if it should be found feasible to follow that route." In addition, two other hon. members who previously had either actively opposed those of us who felt that provision for the all-Canadian route should be written into the bills, or had deliberately avoided making any statement in that connection, have now clearly indicated where they stand. I refer to the hon. member for Coast-Capilano and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

As a member from British Columbia, a province which is most vitally concerned with these bills—though I submit I am no more concerned than any other member of this house is or should be about the principle of Canada first—I could certainly wish that other members from my province had seen the matter as these two hon. members have seen it, and had come out in favour of the all-Canadian route, taking the position that has been taken by these two hon. members, that they will support in this house the proposition to write such a provision into these bills. There are members from the province of British Columbia who hold different views. I do not think they should be criticized. It is not the right of anyone here to criticize other members because they hold certain views. We may regret that their views are different from our own; sometimes we may become somewhat heated in our efforts to persuade them to change their views. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that in any effort of that sort I have made in connection with this bill or any other measure, any heat that has entered into the matter is merely a measure of my own desire to persuade those members to change their views, and is no indication that I feel they are not entitled to have views which differ from my own.
