POETRY.

A Woman's Heart.

A woman's heart is a curious thing! You may bruise and break it and rough it, and it will mend itself again.

The bauble away as a useless thing; But the sunshine and warmth of a kindly word.

Will nourish the tenderly broken, And newness of life within it stirred, By a word so gently spoken.

O! woman's heart is of priceless worth. The tenderest love within has its resting place, and you'll find there is naught on earth.

That can comfort the sad, such joy impart, Though with grief her own is riven.

But woman's heart is a foolish thing! With never a doubt all its wealth 'twill bring.

And freely bestow. To its idol will cling. Though the world may condemn. Ah! a woman's heart.

To reason will never listen; She will part her soul, soon every art, And barter her hopes of heaven;

Will stand unweaved, through night and day, By the bed of pain; will tenderly lay Her own life down; through years will watch and pray

For the soul of one, who could never know, Could he believe, except in part, All the strength of love, all the joy and woe, That lie concealed in a woman's heart.

SELECT STORY.

At the World's Mercy.

BY EUGENE WARDEN.

CHAPTER X--Continued.

I knew what he meant, and I held my breath.

"Are you afraid? Delilah wouldn't write about it, for fear you would not come back; but you must know; so I thought it better to tell you. There is nothing for you to be afraid of. You won't want to go away again, will you?" he went on entreatingly, as I was silent.

"No, I am not afraid, only very sorry," said I, with tears in my eyes.

"Perhaps it is not so bad as we think. He has been harassed and worried lately. But things are looking better now, and I dare say he will get over it. It will all go right now you are back."

It was of no use to argue that this was absurd; he did not contradict me, but only stroked his moustache and quietly laughed.

"I won't answer for the consequences if you take such long holidays next time, Miss Verney. I've taken to going regularly to the City--and I hate the City--to fill up the endless three weeks."

"I am very glad," said I; "it is much better than doing nothing."

"I don't know whether you would say so if you knew the City. And I don't do much good there. Tom says I make the worst clerk in the office."

I thought this very probable; but I would not discourage his new industry; and in a few minutes we were spinning through the park up to the house.

Every one seemed pleased to see me, and I was glad to be back at Hawkstone, in spite of the aching at parting with Elsie. Tom was waiting in the schoolroom when I came down to tea after my rapid unpacking. He took my hands in both his and squeezed them heartily.

"Glad to see you, Miss Verney. You have to thank Hubert's stupidity that I did not inflict myself upon you on the journey down. I suppose you have heard all the news from him?"

"Yes," said I, a little archly.

"Ah, he has been talking about my affairs, of course!" said Tom, with a short laugh.

"May I congratulate you?"

"He did not know how eagerly I longed for him to say 'Yes.'"

"Well, you may in a few days, I suppose."

I stood perplexed. Had Lady Kate really thrown over Eugene, or was it possible that she was only playing with Tom, and had let the game go as far as this? My mind, now prejudiced against her, told me that it was possible; and I decided to summon courage to warn him, if it were not too late. For I thought I could guess what a terrible effect an unexpected rebuff would have upon his proud self-reliance. But the task was difficult. I had no right to betray Lady Kate's affairs, yet nothing less than an approach to the truth would do, I felt sure.

"Please don't think me impertinent or ill-natured; I have heard a report that she is engaged already."

He looked surprised at my gravity; then said confidently--

"Rumor has gone quite too fast, as usual; but fact will soon catch her up in this case"--with a laugh. "You will be glad to see me 'settled,' like all the rest of my kind friends; won't you, Miss Verney? I am, by law, made your influence has had to do in inducing me to settle," he went on, with sudden gravity.

I looked up at him in astonishment. "Because I am abrupt and brusque," he went on, "and don't melt at a word, like Hubert, you think my life is as tough as an elephant's. But you cannot know how strong the influence of a noble-minded man is to urge a man to make the best of himself. Don't look so meek and frightened. You must know what you have done for Hubert. During all these three weeks that you have been away, contrary to my expectation, I confess, I have never seen him anything but sober. I declare I thought him nothing but a lout-ill you came; and now I begin to think there is something in him. I hear Mr. Godfrey's voice; she is coming to welcome you back."

I thought her lovely face looked worn. She was very kind, and seemed glad to see me. So did Mr. Godfrey, whose look and manner were more restless than ever.

A few days afterwards, when he and Tom were talking "shop" at the breakfast-table, I heard something that interested me deeply. It was about the Bouches du Rhone. The thing had been brought forward again, with good names to back it this time, and some prospect of success. The Stock Exchange was in doubt whether to take it up; Mr. Godfrey spoke well of it; Tom was cautious. Then came what was the pith of the talk to me.

"That young Baruch has astounding pluck; his audacity is really splendid. Fancy coming back to worry the thing into life again, with the defeat still fresh in people's minds," said Mr. Godfrey.

"Then you think he is something more than the fly on the wheel?"

"Not a doubt of it! He went to the Comat himself and almost persuaded him to look into it--almost, so far as he deserves to succeed. They call him Sisyphus Baruch in the House."

"Yes; in the Foreign Market yesterday some fellow asked 'Who was Sisyphus?' There was a roar of course; but half of them had to hunt him up in Lempriere, I expect."

I struggled against my thoughts all through that day in vain; they would fly back again and again to Eugene Baruch. With all my heart I wished him good luck. I wondered whether he had forgotten me, whether this man, so strong in his energy and perseverance, was light of love; and I felt that it could not be. For the first time the thought sprang up in my mind that a will like his would make its way over the stoutest obstacles, and that the barriers between him and me must give way like the rest. Perhaps the great barrier was already broken; perhaps Lady Kate had set his free. If so, why had he not sought me out already? Of his power to find me, if he had the will, I had no doubt. I was saved from giving myself up to this anxiety by a nearer one.

Mr. Godfrey was growing day by day more morose, gloomy, and restless. Of late it had been impossible to content him. At one time he would have the house full of visitors, and be almost boisterously gay. Then he would insist upon his wife's getting rid of these as quickly as she could, saying he wanted quiet; then his sudden irritability would bring the frightened, helpless look into Mrs. Godfrey's eyes. At these times she would ask me to come and play the piano in the drawing-room after dinner; it seemed to soothe him, half stupefied as he generally was. His physician had prohibited "alcohol in any form," but he recklessly disregarded this caution.

Once, when I had gone to my room, my nerves being highly strung with a fear of coming peril for him, which had seized me as I saw a look of vacancy come suddenly into his eyes, I fancied I heard a woman's shrill cry--Mrs. Godfrey's--come along the passage from their room. It might be fancy; but it was only too probable. My heart ached for the poor little creature, at the mercy of a man who alternately neglected and tyrannised over her, and for the tyrant scarcely less.

He was ordered change of air, and went away for a fortnight to Paris, but came back in four days, fiercer, more sullen, irritated to frenzy by the grim welcome which met him. For Mrs. Godfrey and Tom were talking and laughing with some friends, I was sitting half behind a curtain, and Hubert was lounging not far off, when the master of the house walked quietly in. And the surprise brought--not welcome, but dead silence, while his wife turned ghastly white and caught her breath.

In another moment one of the ladies, with tact which should have been readier, gave the signal for a general expression of delighted astonishment. But the harm was done. In that terrible first moment, as he stood there, a feared and hated intruder in his own home, I longed to spring forward and tell him I was glad to see him. I tried to look so when he espied me in my corner and came up to speak to me; and he seemed pleased.

The next morning, when he came down, he asked me to tell him what had gone on in his absence, and I gave him an account of the small daily events as brightly as I could.

"Go on," said he, when I paused.

When he had finished breakfast, instead of going away, he drew an arm-ohair to the fire and told me to go on talking.

"I suppose you think I'm off my head, Miss Verney; but don't be afraid; I am not--yet. Never mind if you have nothing to say--just talk; it keeps me from thinking."

I dared not take up my work; I knew instinctively that would irritate him; so, taking a chair by the window, I chattered on. Heaven knows what I said--what never nonsense came uppermost--and it was not easy even to talk sense with the unhappy man's eyes fixed intently upon me, as if I held some charm to drive away evil thoughts or evil dreams.

So I sat for nearly two hours. I began to wonder restlessly when I should be free, for the strain was growing too hard, when he got up and came to me.

"You are a good little creature, and a sunbeam in this infernal dismal place. I must not keep you any longer." He patted my shoulder as if I had been a child; and, with a stretching and stamping, as if to shake of his melancholy, he left the room.

Of course I found the children in mischief; delighted at this unusually long play-hour, they had ended by a pitched battle, in the full enjoyment of which I fell upon and separated them.

But that day had brought for me a new duty. The long morning talk, which was all but a monologue, entered regularly into my day's work. Tom and Hubert were sometimes in the room, and then they helped me; but sometimes even their voices would jar upon him, and then they had to go. He would come down now early, now late; but I must always be ready with tea and talk; so Mrs. Godfrey, thankful to be able to count on a short time of peace, sent the children every morning for a long walk with the nursemaid. He had been advised not to go to the City for a time; but advice was less upon him.

"Ask the quacks what I am to do if I am not to go to the City, and not to hunt, and to sign the pledge. I'll kill myself my own way, and then let them prescribe for the body."

He hunted still; but, though the fatigue brought sleep, the exercise did not bring enjoyment. He had lost his nerve, his sons said.

"It brings a lump into my throat to see my father, who used to have nerves of iron, look twice at a fence, Miss Verney; it does indeed," said Hubert.

"You know he came a cropper out with the hounds last week? Well, it happened like this. For the first time in my life I saw him looking for a gate; he noticed my curious look, and I saw his face grow dark. He made straight for the fence--it was an awkward place; the brute he was on rushed at it, and the governor got pitched over his head."

Tom was most uneasy about his father's doings in the City.

"If somebody would only persuade him to keep away from the office for a few weeks, it would be better for him and for the business too. I can do everything there is to be done as well as he. He does no good in the state he is in now--only thunders at the clerks and makes clients uneasy. Do you think you could do anything, Miss Verney? It can do no harm to try; he won't mind anything you say."

I naturally felt shy of making such an attempt; but one day I did suggest, as he got up to go to the City, that he should take a drive instead; and he followed my advice.

When he came back early from the City, he would often send for me and the children. I tried to interest him in them and encourage them to prattle to him, which was difficult at first, as they stood in awe of their father. But the eager desire for distraction, which was so painfully apparent to my older eyes, made him treat them with a new gentleness and playfulness which reminded me of Hubert. I even dared to tell him laughingly that he ought to mind the doctors' orders, and not to drink between meals.

The change from the hearty, somewhat abrupt manner, which had seemed to denote self-reliance, to docility was touching and even alarming. I was glad of the little I could do to cheer him, and to avert the catastrophe which Tom confided to me that he feared--viz. that his father would break down from home altogether. This confidence shocked me.

"Does Mrs. Godfrey know," I asked anxiously.

I had often been annoyed by her helpless shrinking from her husband, which irritated him and made her rather a hindrance than a help to his recovery. As well as I could, without being obtrusive, I had calmed her fear of him, and introduced her under the brightest colors into my talk to him. At my question Tom looked down and answered shortly and gravely--

"I believe she does. But you must not count on her to help keep him at home."

This intimation, coming from Tom--who, to do him justice, was not fond of slandering--startled me.

"I must speak freely to you, Miss Verney; for you, who can do most, ought to know all. Mrs. Godfrey cares for nobody but herself. It is hardly surprising that the poor little characterless thing has got tired of being bullied; and she wants to be rid of her husband now that he has become her tyrant. He has been kind to her for years in his way, and it was the way of dimonds and indulgence, the way she liked best; but of course during the past two months she has had time to forget all that. He frightens her, and then she irritates him by little lies and prevarications. And now that her mother has put it into her head that we are going to fail, why, it is hardly worth while, you see, to continue to love, honor, and obey."

I looked up at Tom with a sharp glance of reproach; but it was not an idle sneer--it was the bitterness of his heart that had brought out the stinging words.

"Madam has set her heart--pardon me, Miss Verney; you have heard of such things--upon a sensation-scene in the Divorce Court. You must forgive me for speaking plainly; you may do something with her. Talk to her of her children, of her own modesty. No, no; use a stronger argument than that. Tell her that we are not going to fail, that riches are going to increase, that there will be bigger diamonds and older china than ever for her, if she will only wait a little," he burst out in sharp scorn.

"Oh, you are cruel!" I cried.

"Miss Verney, I can't help it. If I were married to a woman like that, I would blow my brains out. Anything but that fatal want of truth; it paralyzes a man. Heaven knows I pity my father!"

And this man loved Lady Kate! What would happen if he found her false? The thought flashed across me as she spoke, and haunted me when I was alone. Since the unhappy change in his father, Tom had developed rapidly, and he was now the real head of the house, at home and in the City. I had always admired his coolness and quick decision; but I had seen him too in his stormy moods, and I could guess the strength of the passion which would now and then break out so fiercely in the confidences he gave me. Did Lady Kate know what she was doing? Was Lady Kate off with the old wife? Had Lady Kate thought that both her strong-willed lovers would be like wax in her hands, when she made up her mind which she preferred? She was growing into a Fate in my mind, with the threads of the lives of men and women in her capricious fingers. Whenever I thought of Tom, Eugene Baruch, poor Hubert, or myself, like that of a baleful enchantress, rose in my mind the handsome face of Lady Kate.

CHAPTER XI.

I felt almost startled when, a few days after this talk with Tom, I received an invitation from Lady Kate to bring my pupils and spend an afternoon with her. When Tom heard of it, he said he would come home early and drive us over himself. He was back from the City soon after luncheon. I noticed that he had had his hair cut; and he said one of his boots pinched him, from which I opined that they were new. And he confided to me composedly, as we drove along, that he was "going to try his luck." Indeed, he looked as handsome and manly a suitor as even a spoiled beauty could desire. I believe I felt more anxious about her answer than he did. For my anxiety was threefold--for Tom, for myself, and--for Eugene.

THE ACADIAN.

WOLFVILLE, N. S., JUNE 29, 1894.

The Right Kind of Citizen.

A town or city is just what its citizens make it. Given the right sort of people and a desert waste will be transformed into a garden that shall bloom like the rose and a struggling settlement into a thriving city.

And what is the right kind of a citizen? He is the man who does not look across the continent for an investment, but spends his money at home and encourages home enterprises.

The right kind of a citizen believes in well lighted streets and good sidewalks for his own sake and for the sake of his neighbors.

Caught in a Squall.

EXPERIENCES OF THE MERIT.

The British barquentine Merit, Captain W. M. Gillmore, from New York to Natal, with a general cargo, and which is now lying in the Inner Basin awaiting repairs, had an unusually rough time of it when crossing the Southern Atlantic.

On the evening of which day, when the ship was in latitude 34 deg. 25 min. S. and longitude 17 deg. W. a moderate northerly gale sprang up. This was about nine o'clock, and the captain was on deck at the time.

In summer, autumn, winter, spring. If you'd be happy, wise and to your household pleasure bring home the Diamond Dye.

Central Baptist Association.

This Association, which comprises the four counties of Halifax, Hants, Kings and Lunenburg, commenced its 44th annual session in the Windsor Baptist church on Friday afternoon last.

A brief history of the Baptist Church at Hantsport was read by Bro. W. A. Porter, and which will appear in the Messenger and Visitor.

The new church at Kingston was received into the Association, and the right hand of fellowship extended to the Rev. Stephen March, pastor.

Committee on Missions reported through their chairman, Rev. A. C. Chute. The workers are fewer this year, on account of the home coming of some of the missionaries.

Mr. H. Y. Corey, who is soon to be married, will join the mission, and also Miss Clark, who has been training for the work.

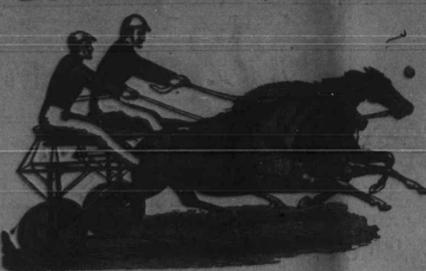

The Home Mission field, which covers considerable ground, has a debt of over $8,000 resting upon it, which has necessitated retrenchment.

Addresses on Missions were made by Rev. A. Coloon and Rev. A. Barwash, the latter from the Grande Ligne Mission.

The committee on denominational literature reported, and during the discussion which followed the Messenger and Visitor came in for a large share of attention.

The committee on statistics reported as follows: Present membership, 8,805. Admitted by baptism, 244.

On Monday evening about twenty-five members of Wolfville Division paid a fraternal visit to "Cornwallis" Division, at Canard. The evening was a pleasant one and a delightful drive was had. The visitors found the sister society at Canard in a flourishing condition, well located in a comfortable hall. An excellent programme of music, readings, speeches, etc., was given, and an enjoyable and profitable time was spent. It is expected that a return visit will be paid to Wolfville Division in the near future.

There is to be a grand concert in Kentville on or near July 11th, under the auspices of the I. O. G. T. Lodge, in which, ten or twelve of the best musicians in Kentville, Wolfville, Windsor and Halifax will take part. Among them will be Mrs. E. Frances Lear, Nova Scotia's celebrated soprano, of whom we have heard so much, our popular violinist Miss Fitch, Mr. Gillman, G. H. Borden and others from Wolfville. Can't some arrangements be made for a special train to give our townspeople a chance of hearing the entertainment?

FOR SALE.—A superior, double-seated Wagon. Apply to D. B. Shaw, Wolfville.

The Baptist Young People's Union excursion to Toronto is one of the finest and cheapest trips ever offered to the people of this Province. It is estimated that passage, sleeping, meals and hotels are included, with one seat over and on. The excursion party leave here on July 16th, and trip from St. John is made to Palace Sleeping cars, giving ample time to see Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Niagara Falls and Quebec also a sail from Kingston through Lake of the Thousand Isles and down the St. Lawrence river shooting the Lachine rapids in one of the H. & O. N. Y. Co. Steamers. Wolfville Station has through tickets for this trip.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the ACADIAN. Mr. Editor,—In the last issue of the Acadian Oracle Mr. W. C. Archibald makes the statement for the second time that University and Earncliffe avenues are closed to the public. In the Oracle of the 19th of June, I stated in reply to Mr. Archibald's communication, that "University Avenue was not closed to the public nor would it be." I again take the opportunity of this time, with your permission, through your columns, of contradicting Mr. Archibald's statement, and as a bare contradiction without facts made from either Mr. Archibald or myself may be unsatisfactory, I am necessarily compelled to make an explanation. In the spring of 1892 the Governor of Acadia University gave thirty-three feet of land running the whole length of an area parallel to the College authorities agreed to do and the College authorities surveyed their portion of the road, established a line and moved their fence back the required distance, where it still remains. A corresponding line was established on the opposite side of the avenue on the lands owned by the Company, J. L. Bishop, and E. C. Johnson; and the road was subsequently constructed by the Company over the whole extent of the proposed avenue. Since then the road has been open to the public and has never been closed. Since the management of the company has been given to another, there seems to have suddenly arisen in the breast of Mr. Archibald motives antagonistic and inimical to the Company's interests, of which I may be compelled to say more hereafter. Mr. Archibald says in his last communication, that "part of the land of University Avenue, that portion of the road which is private property and owned by two stockholders, Earncliffe Avenue has never been open to the public to my knowledge although the Company constructed a portion of the road for which Mr. Archibald was given to the Company a right of way thereof. Concerning part of University Avenue being owned by private parties. I say advisedly that they have relinquished their right to the land adjoining the road by signing their names to a requisition to the Town Council to take over the road without remuneration. Someone forcing the Company's interests in or annoying the present manager in prosecuting his work on the Company's lands, induced a stockholder to go to Mr. Bishop and get a deed from him of 12 feet of which portion of the road, 6 feet of which belonged to E. C. Johnson and of which Mr. Bishop had no power to convey. This little by-play has not accomplished its object, "rain, tricks and dark ways" seldom do. Mr. Archibald speaks of an agreement being arrived at on June 15th, by which the "streets will be made free." Earncliffe Avenue will be made free, but with University Avenue the agreement has nothing to do. No private owners can close it nor has it at any previous time attempted to do so nor will he dare to do so in the future.

The company will cheerfully give a bond of indemnity to the town indemnifying the town from all expenses in taking over the road. I say again that my former statement was correct. University Avenue has not been nor will it be closed to the public.

The intention that my behaviour is unprecedented will require an explanation on the part of Mr. Archibald before its meaning can be arrived at. Has my behaviour been good, bad or indifferent? Unless Mr. Archibald chooses to explain it will probably remain a mystery. I shall not fear investigation nor all the light Mr. Archibald is capable of focusing upon it. Yours truly, G. E. DeWitt.

We are now open for business at the Royal Palace, and we would extend a cordial welcome to all, both great and small, to come and visit our Warehouses, where we can assure them, they will get Fresh Groceries and New Designs in Glass and Crockery ware; and we trust that with close attention to business and the wants of our customers, that we will be favored with a liberal share of the trade. Minutes of Town Council. Special meeting of Council held Tuesday, 25th June, 1894, 7.30 p. m. Present: The Mayor, Councillors, Thompson, Starr, Sawyer, Davison, George W. Borden, Clarence H. Borden and Recorder.

Report read of chairman of supervisors. Letter read from Prof. A. E. Caldwell. Following accounts were entered to the aid: Beckwell & Co. $8.96. S. P. Benjamin 35.71. T. McAvity & Son 37.05. Aubrey Brown 10.60.

Resolved that the report of the supervisor in re the survey of the town be adopted.

Resolved that the requisition presented by the Wolfville fruit land improvement company and others, asking the extension of University Avenue to the south of the fruit land improvement Co's land and to be taken over by the town, be accepted, provided the Land Improvement Co. sign such bond as may be prepared by the recorder, indemnifying the town from any loss or expense in taking over the road.

Resolved that the townsmen be requested to have Main Street and Chapel Street as far as the north cemetery gate, surveyed in accordance with their report adopted at this meeting.

Men's navy blue skeleton coats and vests, just the thing for hot weather, at C. H. Borden's.

Times are quite brisk here this summer. Mr. Jehiel Martin, is building a fine barn, he has one of the finest places here. The barrel factory is running at full blast in anticipation of a big crop of fruit. Mr. John Brown is doing a big business in his mill; he has sufficient logs to keep the mill running all summer.

Mr. Albert Brown is building a neat cottage. Mr. James Simson is making extensive improvements on his house, and is also building a fine barn. Mr. James Hankins is in charge of the work.

Almost opposite Mr. Andrew Westcott is building a fine residence, having torn down his old house. Mr. George Beanson is master workman.
