Lord Durham arrived early, seemingly in a confident mood, but as the case proc hydrophobia this week and became so violent he had to be taken to Picton jail. He was seized with convulsions while engaged in family prayers, and before the neighbors arrived was raging like a madman, tearing and eating his own flesh until he presented a hideous appearance. When he became rational he stated he was bitten by a mad dog while traveling with a circus in Carthage, July, 1880. During the first four hours his fits were accompanied with barking, growling, heavy panting and during intervals barking of a dog. After being strapped to the bed by seven muscular men he got loose and cut his face badly in attempting to shave. He pulled off a piece of flesh hanging from a wound on his hand and chewed it, being apparently pleased with the taste of his own blood. Physicians think the case one of hypochondriac origin and at first quite under control. his manner became less so as Mrs. Gerard used by Lord Durham to her sister when he proposed, and as also her anxiety to know whether he had kissed her, for which inquiries she was snubbed by Miss Milner. A second laugh was scored at the expense of Giadys, Countees Lousdale, when Mrs. Gerard testified to Lady Durham's dislike of her after Lord Durham had stated that he had often kissed her. The effect of a change of government on the course of domestic affairs might not be so great, for the present, at all events, as most people would imagine. But its possible effect on foreign relations, at this critical time in Britain's affair, abroad, is something regarding which the general public have but very data for forming a judgment. As regards Britain's relations with Germany, Austria and Russia, Queen Victoria herself has information from inside sources, which are to a considerable extent closed even to the ministers of her cabinet. The main inference that we venture to draw in advance of the event being actually announced, is that foreign relations, and the dictum of the crown concerning them, will be the chief factors in determining whether Mr. Gladstone stays in or goes out.

The Money Power in Parliament.

That was surely a remarkable scene in the lobby of the British house of commons on Friday night, while the division on the motion of censure was being taken. Many valetudinarians who had not been seen in their places for months, had themselves brought in carriages and wheeled to their seats in invalid chairs. Others came on crutches, and after being assisted to their places by their servants, had their crutches taken out to the lobby, where the servants kept them in readiness for their masters use in case of a division. The lobby looked like the ante-room of an infirmary. A score of liveried footmen kept guard over a variety of chairs, crutches and other appliances for the comfort of the aged and infirm, including a patent stretcher on which Sir Watkin Williams Wynn had been conveyed to the house to cast his vote

People here may be curious to know how it comes that so many seats in the British house are held by aged and infirm men, who fact, we believe.

Mr. Gladstone has decided to remain in office. It is often affirmed regarding the United States that the civil servants elect the ruling parks. Possibly they do: but Mr. Gladstone has decided to remain in the ruling party. Possibly they do: but in England they do more—they maintain the ministry in office. He crept out of the asylum last December and before his absence was noticed constructed a rude raft upon which he crossed to Astoria. The keepers, who had followed fast, arrested him as he was entering a horse car. About 2.30 this afternoon the air became dark with smoke. The attendants discovered that three of the cots were in flames. The patients on noticing the blaze shrieked, gibbered and ran wildly about. The cool, firm bearing of the few attendants daunted the lunatics. After the fire the patients were carefully searched. One man had in his pocket an improvised knife made of a bit of rusty hoop iron with a soiled rag twisted about it for a handle. Nothing was found on any of the others. When Harnett was questioned he admitted that he had set fire to his cot. The place was a prison, he said, and heavented to gate was prison, he said, and heavented to go was successful.

A CASE OF HEART-BREAK

BY JOHN BAXTER. Children are a blessing, to be sure, but ometimes a man may be too much blessed. So Marquart Hough thought at least when Guro, his wife, presented him with num-ber nine. He would have liked to give the little one a decently cordial welcome; but for the life of him he couldn't. His smile turned into a scowl, and, instead of crowing for the child's edification, he groaned He had been too proud to beg hitherto, but this newborn thing took him by the throat, as it were, with its tiny fingers, and forced him down upon his knees. "Wife," he cried suddenly, "I am going to America." "But me," she answered. "What is to become of us?" 66 You will come after me," he said, " as soon as I have earned money enough to fetch you.' A week later he started and within a month he landed in New York. Then, as he set foot upon free foreign soil, the devil whispered something in his ear. Marquart turned about and said: "Get thee behind me," But the devil came back day after day and whispered the same thing. "Now you are a free man," said the devil, "a fool you would be to load yourself down with a wife and nine children, when you might just as well commence life unincumbered."

Two years later a queer sight was seen at Castle Garden. An immigrant woman eame trudging out of the open gate, carry-ing a babe on her arm and eight children, all between the ages of 2 and 11, she had all between the ages of 2 and 11, she had thed together with a long rope, so that the youngest came first and the eldest last. Very odd they looked, indeed, in their Norse costumes, pulling and dragging at the rope, tumbling down and scrambling to their feet again, staring with eyes as big as saucers at the new world which surrounded that.

saucers at the new world which surrounded them. The crowd outside jeered at the woman and roars of laughter greeted her wherever she turned. The street boys stole up behind the last boy in the procession, pulled his hair and knocked his cap off. He stooped patiently, picked up his cap and put it on his head again.

Well, now they were in America. The neighbors had collected funds to pay their passage for fear they should become a burden to the parish. Guro had not heard from her husband since he left her, and she from her husband since he left her, and she felt sure he must be ill. He needed her care, probably, for he was a very helpless man without her. She worried much to think that there could scarcely be a button left on any of his shirts now, and scarcely a stocking without a hole in it. He was such a good man, Marquart was; she yearned to see his face again and to hear his recipies with the search of the sea

Guro started up Broadway with the con tribution to the next census. She looked hard at every manghe met, boping it might be Marquart. But, strange to say, she did not meet Marquart. He must surely be ill, poor fellow. She must hasten to him. Her heart bled for him—ill in a foreign land without friends and without her to land, without friends and without her to

"Marquart," she said to the first policeman she met, "do you know where I can find Marquart, my husband?"
"I don't understand Dutch," said the policeman, and moved on.

It was terrible how big the world was!

She had never seen anything like it; streets upon streets, house upon house, the one bigger than the other. And such heaps and heaps of people, too. They made her quite dizzy. She clutched the rope with quite dizzy. She clutched the rope with all her might and dragged it after her. Sometimes she stooped to count and see if none were missing. No. they were all there; though the three-year old Larl was getting shaky on his legs, and fell at every tenth step. She stooped to pick him up: a newsboy ran against the rope, and knocked down the whole rows from the first to the last. The growd nressed on somebody stumbled. erowd pressed on—somebody stumbled over somebody else's legs and fell; then a second and third. The crowd increased; the sidewalk was blocked. The police came and arrested Guro and her brood as vagrants. She thought he was taking her to her husband and was astonished when they were locked up for the night. There was no help for it. There was a man with a dancing bear in the lock-up. There were also some drunken men, and two women, covered all over with bruises and scratches.

It was queer if Marquart kept such company. Yet she stooped with eager eyes over each postrate form; but he was not among them. He was such a good man, Marquart was. She would have to go somewhere else to find him.

The papers were full of her adventure on Broadway; and her trial for vagrancy was worked up into a two-column romance. Fortunately for the reporters she did not was worked up into a two-column romance. Fortunately for the reporters she did not speak a word of English, and thus in no way restrained their fancy. People called in to see her and gave her money. Somebody who had seen the papers wrote to her in Norwegian that Marquart was in Urbana, Ill. That made her very happy. She crossed the river and started on foot westward. She did not know how far it was to Illinote has a her how the thought she had bet. was to Illinots, but she thought she had bet-ter walk. She had never been on railroad trains, and she did not trust them. At the end of a week she fell down at the road side and could walk no longer; the children sat around her and wept. One fell asleep after the other, and she too slept. She thought she was going to die. Such a strange peace came over her. The only not found Marquart. He was such a good man, their father was, she told her children. And they sobbed, not because he was good, but because they could not find him. Then a farmer came along. He put them all in his wagon, gave them food and shelter for the night, and bought them a ticket to Urbane, Ill. It was late at night when they arrived children together as before, and started up the street. "Marquart Hough," she said to everyone she met; "where is he?" Finally a boy showed her the way to a pretty little frame cottage, the windows of which were lighted up. There surely was warmth and happiness within. How her heart leaped with joy when she saw it! Here was her Marquart whom she had sought so longingly, so lovingly, with such toil and weary walking. She opened the gate, and gathered her flock about her, untying them, one by one, smoothing their hair and rubbing their tired little faces. They must look tkeir best for their father, who had not seen them for two long years. Oh, how happy he would be to see them all again, to class them in his arms, to call all again, to clasp them in his arms, to call them his own once more! She knocked at the door of the cottage. A pretty young woman came and opened.

"What do you want?" she asked; "We don't give to beggars here."
"Marquart Hough," murmured Guro, reging with yague alarm at the woman. gazing with vague alarm at the woman.
Footsteps were heard in the porch without and Marquart entered. He was tall and well dressed.

dren began to romp, the older one looked frightened. There came a cry, a queer tiny wall from a corner of the room. Guro frightened. There came a cry, a queer tiny wall from a corner of the room, Guro staggered, a sudden sting pierced through her heart; she leaned against the door. In the corner between the windows stood a cradle. Slowly, painfully, she took the rope and tied her nine children together again. The young woman opened the door tremblingly, hesitatingly. It was very dark outside. A cold rain was drizzyling down; the wind shook the shutters. Guro looked for a moment into the dark; then with weary motion she took the rope and trudged out into the rain. She hoped the darkness would never lift. She seemed to herself to be a hundred years old. Heart-broken, benumbed by the shock, she seated herself at the roadside. She did not know whether she was awake or she slept. But she dreamed that God was dead.

Catarrh-A New Treatment. has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon treatment for catarrh, Out of 2000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been six months, fully ninety per cent, have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent, of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished, the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures offected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the presentseason of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure, the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King atreet west, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star, 28

CONFLICTING OPINIONS

Regarding the Whereabouts of the Miss ing Man Radford. The latest rumors regarding the probable fate of the missing man Radford are to the effect that he is alive and within reach of his friends. H. Clay Stephens, a lawyer of New York, was interviewed by a reporter last Friday. He said Mr. Radford stopped at the Bremont hotel, New York, in East Fourteenth street, which his sister, Mrs. Mayo, owned until several weeks ago. Mr. Stephens says that he was introduced to Mr. Radford by Mrs. Mayo, whom he has known for several years. Mr. Radford has no object in wishing people to believe he is dead. It is true that he owes about 315,000 in Toronto, but my knowledge of his business is such that I can say that he is worth twenty times that amount. He told me before he went away that a reputable business man here owed him $20,00. I me before he went away that a reputable business man here owed him $20,00. I don't believe he received that money before he returned to Canada. I think he had only a small amount with him then. Mr. Radford came here on the recommendation of his physician, who told him he was overworking himself and ought to take a vacation. He remained here longer than he intended because of the slokness of his sister. I believe he has been murdered or that he has fallen in with sharpers who are that he has fallen in with sharpers who are holding him. He left this city on Monday morning, Feb. 16, on a train of the Erie roac.

The stories published suggest that among the motives that Mr. Radford might have to wish the public to believe that he was not living is that he is insured for about $20,000 in Canadian and American companies. The cashier of the New York eral times during his recent visit to that city. The detective also said he believed Radford was still alive and he could find him without difficulty.

Death of D. McCraney, M.P.P.

D. McCrancy, M.P.P. for East Kent died at Oakville on Saturday after a painful illness. Deceased was second son o the late Hiram McCraney, of Trafalgar, and was born in 1834. He has represented East Kent in the local house since 1875, and was a warm supporter of the Mowat administration. His remains were interred at Oakville yesterday. A large number of legislators and other friends from this city were at the funeral, having gone out by special train. The cortege was a mile long.
