The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there were senators without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senators were introduced; presented Her Majesty's writs of summons, which were read by the Clerk; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk, and were seated:

Hon. William Moore Benidickson, P.C., of Kenora, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt and Hon. Mr. Roebuck.

Hon. Alexander Hamilton McDonald, of Regina, Saskatchewan, introduced between Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt and Hon. Mr. Boucher.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that each of the honourable senators named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

At 10.45 a.m. the Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 11 a.m. the sitting was resumed, and was then adjourned, pending the arrival of the Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General.

Hon. Robert Taschereau, P.C., Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated,

The Hon. the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that it is the desire of the Honourable the Deputy Governor General that they attend him immediately in the Senate Chamber.

Who being come,

The Hon. the Speaker said:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present Parliament of Canada until a Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen, according to law; but this afternoon, at the hour of three o'clock, His Excellency will declare the causes of his calling Parliament.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

COMMUNICATION FROM GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Ottawa
January 18, 1966

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General will arrive at the Main Entrance of the Parliament Buildings at 3.00 p.m. on this day Tuesday the 18th January, 1966, and when it has been signified that all is in readiness, will proceed to the chamber of the Senate to open formally the First Session of the Twenty-seventh Parliament of Canada.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler,
Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate

On motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard, seconded by Hon. Mr. Beaubien (Provencher), the Senate adjourned until 2.55 p.m.

SECOND SITTING

The Senate met at 2.55 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At three o'clock His Excellency the Governor General having come and being seated upon the Throne,

The Hon. the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that it is His Excellency the Governor General's pleasure that they attend him immediately in the Senate Chamber.

The House of Commons being come,

Their Speaker, The Hon. Lucien Lamoureux, said:

May it please Your Excellency,

The House of Commons has elected me their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.

If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who, through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their Queen and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all seasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favourable construction.

The Hon. the Speaker of the Senate answered:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to Her Majesty's person and Government, and not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants, and upon all occasions will recognize and allow their constitutional privileges. I am commanded also to assure you that the Commons shall have ready access to His Excellency upon all seasonable occasions and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

His Excellency the Governor General was then pleased to open the First Session of the Twenty-seventh Parliament with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I welcome you to the first session of the Twenty-seventh Parliament of Canada. As we meet on the eve of our Centennial year, it is fitting to reaffirm the values and purposes that unite all our people, and to work, with resolution and patriotism for their realization. We should be very proud to be Canadians.

Our country is continuing to make economic and social progress while playing a responsible role in world affairs. As a member of the United Nations, as a member of the Commonwealth of which our beloved Queen is the Head, and as a partner in the North Atlantic Alliance, Canada will strive to make the greatest possible contribution to improve international relations and assure peace with justice to all peoples. Our capacity for national achievement, like that of other countries, depends on the peace and prosperity of the world community.

Canada will continue strongly to support the efforts of Britain, the Commonwealth and the international community to bring an end to the present illegal situation in Rhodesia. My Prime Minister has recently attended a meeting of Commonwealth leaders in Nigeria, at which this critical issue was discussed and the value of the Commonwealth as a multiracial association confirmed.

The recent official visit to the Caribbean region made by the Prime Minister reflects the importance my Government attaches to strengthening relationships in economic matters between Canada and the Commonwealth countries in this area.

In the United Nations, Canada will continue its efforts, in concert with other countries, to develop means of keeping the peace and strengthening the influence of the world organization. My Government will also do everything it can to assist in finding a basis for negotiating a peaceful settlement of the Vietnam conflict. We shall do our utmost through the United Nations and the Disarmament Committee to foster arrangements for preventing the spread of nuclear weapons and for progress towards disarmament. For the security of the North Atlantic community and the stability of Europe, my Government will seek to preserve and strengthen the unity and effectiveness of the North Atlantic Alliance.

International objectives must be pursued by economic and social as well as political means. My Government will recommend to Parliament further measures to improve and develop international economic conditions and to strengthen the Canadian economy.

My Government intends progressively to develop its external aid programs. You will be asked to approve Canada's participation in the Asian Development Bank.

My Government recognizes that Canada has an obligation to share in efforts to prevent or limit armed conflict. Our object, within the limits of our capacity, must be to improve the prospects of world peace and prosperity.

My Government will continue to strengthen the capacity of the integrated Canadian Defence Forces to provide for the security of Canada and to contribute abroad to the preservation of peace. Amendments to the National Defence Act will be laid before you.

The preservation and strengthening of Canadian identity and unity is the most important trust and responsibility of Parliament and of my Government. That unity rests on a Canadianism based upon the two main cultural strands, British and French, enriched by the contributions of other cultural groups, and recognizing the essential contribution of all to the development of Canadian identity.

The approach of the Centennial of Confederation makes it of the utmost importance that Canadians in all parts of the country should look to Ottawa as its true capital where they can feel at home. To this end my Government will continue to work toward the broadening of the bilingual character of the public service. The national capital should increasingly reflect the nature of the Canadian society.

In its relations with the Provinces, my Government is guided by the conviction that Canadian federalism must draw its vitality and strength from the mutual respect and co-operation of the national and provincial governments. The Canadian people can be well served by their political institutions only if each element in our federal system is able to act effectively within its constitutional sphere. While respecting fully the responsibilities of the provinces, the Government is equally resolved to maintain the constitutional responsibilities of the federal authority.

The Tax Structure Committee, in which the federal and provincial governments, by a common effort, are making a fundamental review of their relations in matters of finance, is nearing the end of its task. The Committee is expected to present recommendations to the Federal-Provincial Conference which will meet later in the year to consider how fiscal relations between the federal and provincial governments might best be adjusted to strengthen each authority in the discharge of its constitutional responsibilities.

My Government will accordingly submit to you legislation respecting federal-provincial fiscal arrangements to become effective in 1967.

It remains the objective of my ministers to provide that the Constitution of Canada may be amended in Canada.

You will be asked to authorize my Government to provide that "O Canada" shall be the national anthem and that "God Save the Queen" shall be the royal anthem in Canada.

A measure will be placed before you to provide for the re-organization of certain departments of government, in order to adapt the structure of administration to new and changing conditions and so better meet the needs of our people. The purpose of this re-organization is to provide for closer and better co-ordinated action in the following areas of public policy: manpower policies, which are essential to the sustained growth of a highly productive economy and to the elimination of pockets of poverty within that economy; rural development programs, which are necessary to agricultural progress and a better rural life; integrated federal policies with respect to energy and resources; the special needs of the indigenous people of Canada and of the development of the North; the federal responsibility for laws relating to the conduct of business activity; the problems of corrections and crime, particularly in regard to the effective co-ordination of police services and intelligence in combatting organized crime; and improved management and administration within the public service generally.

For these purposes you will be asked to approve: the conversion of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration into a Department of Manpower; the broadening of the Department of Forestry into a Department of Forestry and Rural Development; the creation of a Department of Energy, Mines and Resources; the conversion of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources into a Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Affairs; the establishment of a new department responsible for the special areas of legislation concerned with the conduct of business activity; the establishment of the office of Solicitor General as a full department of government; and the establishment of a Department of the Treasury Board under its own Minister. My Government believes that these changes in organization will enable the processes of administration to respond more speedily and efficiently to the problems of modern times.

Our country is enjoying an unprecedented period of prosperity and growth. Production, investment and trade have expanded rapidly. Employment opportunities have more than kept pace with the rapid increase in our labour force. Unemployment has fallen in all regions of the country, and has been at the lowest level in many years. Canadians have benefited from good harvests and a high level of demand for our farm products.

The opportunities and the need for further sustained economic growth have been indicated by the Reviews of the Economic Council of Canada. My Government intends to pursue policies to ensure that our prosperity and growth continue. It is important that the benefits this can bring to all Canadians should not be jeopardized by excessive costs and prices which would endanger the stability of our economy. My Government therefore intends to continue its policy of stretching out its expenditure on public construction projects in areas of heavy pressure on the construction industry.

With a high rate of employment, our economic growth and living standards will depend increasingly on how successful we are in improving the performance of our economy. Our economic efficiency can be improved by concerted efforts to adapt and develop our institutions, both private and governmental, to our real needs. Improvements in the skills and efficiency of our existing working force, and of those entering the labour force will necessitate increasing emphasis on training, on education and in general on enabling and assisting our people to qualify for the best jobs available. We work and trade in a highly competitive world which offers many opportunities but demands the best performance. Improvements in productivity will permit our economy to grow faster and should enable us to achieve higher standards of living and a better balance in our international payments.

Banking legislation and related proposals will be placed before you.

A bill will be placed before you to amend the Railway Act, which has been modified in the light of consideration in the last Parliament and public discussion in the intervening period. You will also be asked to consider a measure respecting the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways.

My Government attaches great importance to improving the technical capabilities of Canadian industry. The program for the advancement of industrial technology, introduced last year, is well under way and a number of important individual projects have already been initiated. You will be asked to approve legislation to encourage research and development, which will enlarge and improve upon the present taxation incentive. You will also be asked to enact legislation to establish a Science Council of Canada in order to encourage further the progress of scientific research.

My Government will propose a vigorous program, in co-operation with the provinces, to foster the training of workers and to assist in bringing into productive employment those who are now unemployed or inadequately employed. You will be asked to consider a measure to improve the system of training allowances provided under federal-provincial agreements.

You will be asked to approve the creation of a fund for financing major rural development projects and, in order to facilitate wide-ranging action for rural development, amendments to the legislation regarding agricultural rehabilitation will be placed before you.

In order that farmers of this country may enjoy living and working standards comparable with those of Canadians engaged in other occupations, measures designed to raise and safeguard farm incomes will be introduced. Among other measures, my Government will propose a program for the purchase, redevelopment and resale of farms that are not now viable economic units. You will be asked to consider a revision of the Crop Insurance Act, for the purpose of enabling crop insurance to be available to all farmers.

Legislation to establish a Canadian Dairy Commission will be placed before you. A measure will also be proposed to provide cash advances for unthreshed grain when weather conditions prevent full harvesting. You will be asked to approve legislation to improve the movement and marketing of feed grain in Eastern Canada and British Columbia by creating a livestock feed agency.

The heavy demand for loans from the Farm Credit Corporation make it desirable again to increase the capital of the corporation.

In furtherance of the national fishery program, a measure for the development of the commercial fisheries of Canada will be proposed. You will also be asked to consider a proposal for income support for inshore fishermen in years of catch failure.

My ministers will continue their efforts to promote Canada's trade through programs designed to bring this nation's existing resources and growing industrial capacities to the attention of the world, and through a full participation in international negotiations.

You will be asked to increase the ceiling for long-term export financing under the Export Credits Insurance Act, to facilitate the continued expansion of our export trade.

A resolution will be brought before you concerning the Canada-United States Agreement on Automotive Products, which my Government regards as one of the most important trading arrangements ever made between Canada and the United States.

You will be asked to approve legislation to establish a Canada Development Corporation. My Government is initiating consultation with the provinces for the improvement of securities legislation, and will propose a measure to improve the effectiveness of the Bankruptcy Act.

It is the intention of the Government that the work commenced by the joint committee on consumer credit in the last Parliament will be carried on in the new Parliament, and that a special committee of the House of Commons on food and drugs be again established.

My Government will continue to work for the effective co-ordination of measures to reduce poverty and increase security across Canada. In this respect, the Canada Assistance Plan is intended to enable the provinces to provide, on a comprehensive and flexible basis, adequate assistance to individuals and families in need. Since the announcement of this measure by my Government early last year, satisfactory discussions have been held with all the provinces and legislation embodying the Government's proposals will be placed before you in this session.

It is the aim of my Government to provide young people with the opportunities they are seeking for constructive service to the community, at home and abroad, and to that end legislation will be placed before you for the establishment of a Company of Young Canadians.

In accordance with my ministers' belief that public policy should be directed to ensuring that all Canadians can obtain needed health services, irrespective of their ability to pay, my Government last July announced its willingness to make fiscal contributions to provinces which provide programs of medical care meeting certain criteria. When discussions with the provinces have been sufficiently advanced, legislation to carry out this proposal will be placed before you.

To provide for the expected expansion of health services, my Government has announced its intention to establish a Health Resources Fund of $500 million. You will be asked to approve a measure establishing this Fund.

While fully respecting the jurisdiction of the provinces in matters of education, my Government recognizes a pressing obligation to foster more effective development of the human resources of Canada by assisting the expansion of institutions of higher education, and by providing greater and more equitable opportunities for young Canadians to attend such institutions. A program of Canada scholarships and bursaries for students undertaking higher education will be submitted for your approval. Amendments will be proposed to the Student Loans Act. As an initial response to the acute financial difficulties encountered by the universities and colleges, you will be asked to approve a substantial increase in the federal financial assistance to universities for the academic year 1966-67. After discussion with the provinces, my Government will convene a meeting to consider continuing action in a manner that recognizes differences in the educational systems and institutions of the provinces.

Legislation on unemployment insurance will be proposed. You will also be asked to consider measures respecting the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act and Safety in Employment.

Arrangements will be made for you to decide the issue of capital punishment at an early date.

My Government intends to place before you legislation regarding Term 29 of the Terms of Union with Newfoundland.

My Government will propose legislation to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act, in order to ensure equality of rights for all citizens; legislation to make collective bargaining available to the Public Service; legislation revising federal superannuation and pension plans to integrate them with the Canada Pension Plan; legislation to remit to provincial governments 95% of corporation taxes on investor-owned electric utilities; a measure to help the development of a feature film industry in Canada; legislation to establish the National Arts Centre and measures respecting the National Gallery and Museums; the extension of the Export and Import Permits Act; and legislation to extend the construction period for the Trans-Canada Highway.

Other legislative proposals which you will be asked to consider will include amendments to the Judges Act, the National Energy Board Act, the Area Development Incentives Act, the Aeronautics Act, the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act, the Yukon and Northwest Territories Acts, the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, the Atlantic Development Board Act, the National Housing Act, the Defence Production Act, and the Post Office Act. Further measures may be brought forward in the course of the Session as a result of inquiries now pending.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required for the services and payments authorized by Parliament.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

The House of Commons withdrew.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

DEPUTY GOVERNMENT LEADER IN THE SENATE

APPOINTMENT OF HON. PAUL H. BOUFFARD TO SUCCEED HON. CYRILLE VAILLANCOURT

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, before the order of business is called and with your permission, I have a few words to say.

First, I should like to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on your election to the presidency of this chamber. I am sure that that is the proper way to start.

Honourable senators, we missed our leader on this side of the house yesterday. Senator Connolly, as you know, represented Canada at the conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in New Zealand. He became ill on his return to Canada, and has been obliged to go to hospital for many weeks. I regret his illness and, because we are all Christians, I hope that God will accept our prayers and give him prompt and complete recovery.

Honourable senators, before the end of the last session, I asked the Leader of the Government to appoint a new deputy leader, as my health was not very good. Senator Connolly told me then to wait until the next session. The next session has arrived now. Today I have the honour to present my successor, Senator Paul Henri Bouffard.

Senator Bouffard, at the beginning of a session, and particularly as this is the first session of a new Parliament, you will find the work arduous; but with your experience as a lawyer, and you have long been an eminent barrister in our province, I am sure you will carry out your duties without difficulty. I thank you for accepting this office. (Translation): A better qualified successor could not have been found.

(Text): I thank all my colleagues for their co-operation during the past ten years, and especially my two leaders, Senator Ross Macdonald and Senator John J. Connolly, who have treated me not only with great respect but also with the utmost kindness. I thank you all for your splendid co-operation.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: We were not too hard on you either.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: I thank you also for your co-operation. I am still with you and I am ready to work with you, but I regret I cannot remain as deputy leader on this side. To do so would be too arduous.

Thank you, and God bless you.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I know it does not come altogether as a surprise to us that Senator Vaillancourt has resigned as Deputy Leader of the Government in this house. On returning to Ottawa a few days ago we heard a rumour that he might do so.

As we all know, Senator Vaillancourt has been a faithful and conscientious member of the Senate for many years, and we are pleased to hear him report that it is not his intention to resign from the Senate, but that he will remain among us and carry on his work.

Last session we understood that Senator Vaillancourt's health was not good, but I must say that his looks must belie that fact, because he is looking very well indeed. I can assure him we are all very happy that he appears so much better.

It is not necessary for me to go into Senator Vaillancourt's record in this house; one has only to read it in the Hansard reports. He has had a splendid record. May I say further that I believe everyone who knows him regards him as one of the finest and most courteous gentlemen in Canadian public life.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: We are all aware of the many talents of Senator Bouffard, who is succeeding him, and I have no hesitation in stating that I am sure he will conduct himself in the fine manner of Senator Vaillancourt.

Honourable senators, perhaps at this point it would not be out of place to say a few words about the deputy leader because, in my opinion, he deserves much more credit than is generally received. No one knows better than the leaders of the house the value of the services he renders. Senator Vaillancourt mentioned the two leaders under whom he has served during the past ten years, and how grateful he is to them. I must say they had good reason to be grateful to Senator Vaillancourt.

It might also be of interest to recall that the deputy leader is not an official Government appointment. As I understand it, he is appointed by the members of his own party in caucus. His appointment is a kind of vote of confidence in him as a member of the caucus and of his party. He acts, of course, when his leader is away.

Senator Vaillancourt has mentioned the fact that the Leader of the Government in this house is absent because of illness. This we all regret very much. I join with Senator Vaillancourt in wishing Senator Connolly a very speedy recovery, and I hope he will be back with us soon in this chamber.

I have often told Senator Connolly that he had one great fault—I am sure all honourable senators have noticed it—it is that he works too hard, that he does not spare himself. While this may be a hard lesson for him, I am sure it will be nonetheless a good lesson, and a warning that he should not in the future use up so much of his strength.

At this time also I assure Senator Bouffard that we on this side of the chamber are very pleased to hear of his appointment. He can expect from us sympathetic understanding and co-operation in the transaction of necessary Senate business.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, when I learned that Senator John Connolly would not be present at the opening of this Parliament and would not lead this house during its opening days, I hoped that his absence would be limited to the opening days. Regrettably, we learn now that he may be absent during the opening weeks. However, we will rejoice with him when he is well enough to return, which will probably be within the next three or four weeks.

All honourable senators will agree with what the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) has intimated, namely, that Senator Connolly has worked too hard, and that he should not be in too great a rush to return. I wrote him a letter to that effect, in which I assured him that the members on both sides of this house would do all in their power to carry forward the legislation as it came before us.

At that time it was my understanding that Senator Vaillancourt would act as Leader of the Government. He was in good health when we saw him last in July. He had been ill before that time and, fortunately, had made a good recovery. I know of his capacity; I also know of his loyalty. It was my good fortune when Leader of the Government in this house to have Senator Vaillancourt as my deputy leader, and never once when I called upon him to take my place in the house or in committee, as I did often, did he hesitate to do so. No one could have been more willing, more faithful, or more competent than he.

I am sorry that Senator Vaillancourt feels his health will not permit him to continue, as I know we would have given him all the help he needed. He could have depended upon us to the same extent that I depended upon him.

Senator Vaillancourt has seen fit to retire from his office, but he has named a successor in whom we have confidence. We have seen Senator Bouffard in this house and as chairman of committees. We know that he is an able counsel, and that he has a complete grasp of the proceedings in this house. We know that he understands fully all the legislation that comes before us. At this time, when we have to get along without our leader and without the services of the one who has been the deputy leader, we are indeed fortunate in having a man of Senator Bouffard's standing in his community, at the Bar and in the Senate, and one of his capacity and understanding, to act as our leader.

While saying not goodbye but just au revoir to Senator Vaillancourt we, at the same time, say welcome to Senator Bouffard.

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, no one is more sorry than I am that the seat of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) is vacant at the present time, while he takes a necessary rest from his labours. I hope his absence from the chamber will not be a long one. Our deputy leader (Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt), who looks to be in pretty good health, is nevertheless withdrawing from that role.

Many people have asked me why I accepted the task of Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate at a time when I shall probably have to undertake the leadership for a few weeks to come. However, honourable senators, there is nothing I would not do for John Connolly—he deserves my best efforts.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: There is nothing I would not do for the Prime Minister, who after a long and arduous campaign decided to attend a far-away conference for the benefit of his country and in the cause of peace. If these gentlemen, who are extremely busy, think that it is in the interest of the country so to act, I myself feel that I cannot refuse the task that has been offered to me.

Of course, I am extremely pleased at the very kind words uttered by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) and Senator Macdonald (Brantford). My lack of experience will no doubt cause me to appeal to both sides for your collaboration in the execution of the difficult duties I shall have to fulfil.

I want to pay a special tribute to Senator Vaillancourt, and I will do so in his mother tongue.

[Translation]:

Honourable senators, I had hoped that the leader in the Senate would have been here to express to Senator Vaillancourt his admiration and his thanks for the services he has rendered as Deputy Government Leader for so many years. In the absence of the leader, it behooves me to do it, and I am pleased to pay tribute to the valour of Senator Vaillancourt.

As far as I am concerned, he deserves but one minor reproach and that is to have left a rather heavy burden on the shoulders of his successor, your humble servant. However, I am sure he could not help it, for he has never shirked any work or task which his many activities imposed on him.

It is on behalf of Senator Connolly that I thank him for all the tasks he has taken upon himself in order to carry out his duties with ability and dignity. Senator Connolly would want to express himself his deep gratitude to him.

I have known Senator Vaillancourt for almost 40 years. This is not to make him look older, but it will not make me feel younger either. His devotion to duty, his competence and his great dedication have earned him well-deserved praise from all those associated with him. He has always been the great protector of the little people.

Many years ago, his work on behalf of the maple producers was very valuable for the members of the recently established association. The maple producers of the province of Quebec, working individually and without cohesion, with little or no markets for their products, were beset every year by numerous ills. The production was often of a very low quality and there was no organization to improve production and merchandising in Quebec and elsewhere. For years, he worked to unite the producers and to raise the maple sugar quality and value to unprecedented levels. He organized a profitable market which spread not only within the province of Quebec but here and there throughout the world, and mostly in America.

In the field of the Caisses populaires—and this is where he was at his best—he did everything to convince the citizens of his province, more particularly the workers and the farmers, of the dangers of hiding their money in a woollen sock; he made available to them, in the remotest areas, safe places to deposit their savings.

In that field he also made credit available to those who needed it and did not have ready access to the financial institutions able to meet their needs.

Here, in the Senate, his courtesy made him one of the most popular members. Each time the occasion arose, he gave the help he could give on account of his post and, among the qualities which all the members of the Senate were to appreciate was the great courage he showed in any debate concerning the rights of his compatriots, as well as in all matters dealing with the part finance should play with regard to little people.

We are very happy to keep him with us; even though he had to relinquish, on account of his health, a burden which he felt had become too heavy, he will keep on helping us to promote the public interest in all matters, very complex at times, which we have to deal with. On behalf of our leader, I congratulate him on his wonderful career. I thank him for what he did as deputy leader and, in my name and on behalf of our leader, I hope he will remain with us for a long time to come.

[Text]:

I feel greatly honoured at having been designated as Deputy Leader of the Government, and I wish to take this opportunity to express my thanks to the Prime Minister, who has shown such confidence in me. I pledge myself to fulfil to the best of my ability whatever additional duties may be assigned to me by virtue of my new role.

Honourable senators, as you all know, the Senate will be for a short while without its customary leader. I know all of us entertain for Senator Connolly the highest admiration and affection, and we wish him a speedy return to his place here with us.

I know, too, that we will sorely miss his skilful leadership. It will be my responsibility as Deputy Leader of the Government to serve as acting leader in Senator Connolly's absence. I, of course, will do my utmost to discharge this responsibility, but I have no doubt that it will be essential to have the sympathy and collaboration of all honourable senators on both sides of the chamber if the business of the Senate is to proceed in its usual orderly manner, and I earnestly entreat your assistance to this end.

May I make a special reference to the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition here in the Senate. Senator Brooks and I have been friends since his coming to the Senate. I have had the opportunity to observe his great qualities as a leader. He has all my admiration and respect, and I hope that in time I will be fortunate enough to gain his confidence and respect. If in the days ahead we should reveal a certain diversity in political thinking and outlooks, I am sure it will not be considered unusual, and I am equally certain that it should not in any way alter our mutual respect.

Honourable senators, this is the spirit with which I propose to fulfil my duties. I pray again that our leader will be back shortly and will find the Senate conducting its affairs with the same spirit of collaboration and co-operation as when he left.

THE LATE SENATORS LAMBERT, WOOD, AND COMEAU

TRIBUTES

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, my first duty in my new role in this chamber is a sad one. I am charged with the responsibility of drawing to the attention of the Senate the toll that time has exacted from our membership since last we met. Death has claimed three of our most illustrious members—Senators Lambert, Wood and Comeau.

Senator Norman Lambert, who died early in November in his eighty-first year, was one of the Senate's most distinguished sons. His career is characterized by excellency and success in several areas. Early in life he achieved distinction as one of Canada's outstanding journalists and, indeed, journalism always remained one of his interests. Senator Lambert retained always his great mastery of prose style and was continually in demand as a reviewer and essayist. His journalistic background served him well in this forum also; his addresses here were remarkable not only for their grasp of subject matter but also for their precise and appealing use of the English language.

Senator Lambert was more than an observer of Canada's public life. He was also a participant in public life. His earliest political associations were in western Canada. He was Secretary of the Canadian Council of Agriculture in the active years preceding the creation of the Progressive Party. In 1932 he became the first Secretary of the newly created National Liberal Federation and directed the organization of the Liberal Party through its highly successful 1935 election campaign. Later that year he was elected President of the National Liberal Federation, succeeding the Right Honourable Vincent Massey. In January of 1938 he was summoned to the Senate.

His career in the Senate of Canada was one which reflected great credit on both himself and the chamber. There are many here who had a much longer association with Senator Lambert than I, and from whose remarks I know we will gain a more complete appreciation of the man. May I simply be permitted to observe that in many ways Senator Lambert epitomized what is best in the Senate tradition.

He was interested in all subjects which came before us, and was an active member of our committees. Moreover, he was a student of Parliament and of the parliamentary process, and in addition he was one of its most enlightened and effective critics.

Honourable senators, the funeral service for Senator Lambert was held on November 8. The Prime Minister of Canada was there, as was the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and numerous other public figures. I cannot help but reflect that that day—a day of national election—was a fitting one on which to mourn the passing of our late colleague Senator Lambert. While we in this chamber will miss him, I know his absence is most deeply felt by his dear wife and four children. It is to them that our hearts go out, and I offer them our heartfelt condolences.

Honourable senators, the month of November also took from us the Honourable Thomas Wood of Regina. Senator Wood had been a member since 1949. He was closely attached to the interests of his province and region and had an outstanding career in Saskatchewan before coming to Ottawa. His business activities were varied and highly successful. Senator Wood was also a man who found time for constructive service on behalf of the political party of his preference. For many years he was a principal organizer for the provincial Liberal Party, and shared a long and fruitful association with the Right Honourable J. G. Gardiner.

The interests of Saskatchewan remained dear to him here in the Senate. His first Senate speech after his appointment was directed towards the problems of the western farmer and to an analysis of the movement of wheat prices. He will be missed as a friend and confrère, and to the members of his family we express sincere condolences.

May I add that personally I knew Senator Wood very well. We met when he was appointed to the Senate. I never knew a man with a bigger heart and who was more ready to render services to all who offered friendship to him. I trust that his family will accept my most sincere sympathy.

Honourable senators, I wish also to refer to the death of Senator J. W. Comeau, which occurred only one week in advance of the opening of this session, and followed closely on his retirement from this chamber. With his leaving, at the age of 89 years, the Parliament of Canada lost its oldest member and Nova Scotia and Canada lost one of its most renowned public figures.

Senator Comeau had been active in the public life of this country since 1907 when he was first elected to the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia. He first became a member of the Executive Council of Nova Scotia in 1911, and he was a member of Premier A. L. Macdonald's cabinet immediately prior to his being summoned to the Senate in 1948. It is interesting to note that Senator Comeau also served for a short time as a member of the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia; so, in addition to having been 59 years in public life, he was one of the few living Canadians who had been a member of both a provincial Senate and the Senate of Canada.

His public career was characterized by devotion to the interests of his region and his race. And while declining health in recent years had restricted the extent of his participation in the deliberations of the Senate, his loss will be keenly felt by his friends and colleagues here. To Senator Comeau's widow and children I take this opportunity of expressing our deepest sympathy and regrets.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, as the leader has just mentioned, the opening of Parliament following a recess is usually a very sad time because of the death of some of our members during the interim. This occasion is no exception.

The most faithful services of Senators Norman Lambert and Thomas Wood were lost to us in the month of November, and only a week ago Canada lost the services of its oldest senator, who was also, I think, our oldest practising politician, the Honourable Joseph W. Comeau, known to everyone here and to all his friends as "Willie" Comeau. These were all very distinguished and able men, and this chamber is much the loser by their departure. Together they brought a wealth of knowledge and experience not only to this chamber but to Canada, ranging from the field of journalism in the case of Senator Lambert, the field of business in the case of Senator Wood, and the legislative and political fields, at both the provincial and federal levels, with respect to Senator Comeau.

Senator Lambert was a member of this chamber for 28 years, while Senators Wood and Comeau were members for 17 years. In total these senators contributed no less than 62 years of effort in this chamber, and when one views it from that standpoint, the gravity of their sorrowful loss to us takes on added significance.

I know that other senators, particularly those who knew him better, experienced as I did a feeling of sadness and surprise at the unexpected passing of Senator Lambert. Somehow one does not really expect men such as Senator Lambert to die suddenly. He was always so steady and sturdy; he always looked the picture of good health. Having met many men in public life, I think I can truthfully say that one of the most modest and most capable of these was Senator Lambert. I did not know him very well until I came to the Senate, but I could not help admiring his work not only in the chamber but on various committees. If one looks through the pages of Senate Hansard for the last 28 years one will find them replete with the many fine speeches made by Senator Lambert.

I did not know Senator Comeau for any considerable time, having met him after I came to Ottawa as a Member of Parliament and he came to this chamber, but I knew of his splendid record in his native Province of Nova Scotia. He was a real Maritimer and represented the Acadian people in the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia. He had a long and very interesting political career. In fact I feel that few men in Canada had as interesting a career as Senator Comeau. He was elected on many occasions, and when one met him and learned of his many fine qualities and attributes one realized that these were such that would certainly appeal to the people whom he represented. It was no surprise to anyone that he was able to win his seat on so many occasions.

Senator Wood I did not know. He was ill when I came to the Senate, and I only met him under the poorest of circumstances. But I knew of his record. Senator Bouffard has reminded us that in his native Province of Saskatchewan he was a very able businessman, and we all know of his excellent qualities and the work he did as a senator.

I join with Senator Bouffard in expressing to the families of these three distinguished senators the sincere sympathy of myself and those who are associated with me on this side of the chamber.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, it seems to me that this is a rather sombre meeting of the Senate. We miss our colourful and able leader who is absent because of illness. We do hope that he will soon recover and once again take his place as our leader in this chamber.

I am sure I speak for all members of the Senate when I say that we have long had a real affection for Senator Vaillancourt. He is a kindly man of courage and of judgment, and one to whom we all listened with great respect in this chamber. Now that further honours can be bestowed upon him, he is unable to accept them and is being permitted to withdraw from some of the burdens of his office. We all hope that the future will be good to him and that he will be with us for many years.

There are, however, a few bright spots to be considered at the opening of this session. We have a new Speaker who, I believe, will be eminently successful in carrying out the duties of his office. We congratulate him and wish him well.

Senator Bouffard we know as an able solicitor and counsel, eminent in his profession in his own province. We also know of his connection with national institutions. I have no doubt that he will be successful in carrying out the duties of deputy leader, and wish him well.

Honourable senators, I would like to speak now of those members of this chamber who have been gathered to their fathers. Senator Norman Lambert was a national figure, an eminent journalist and a leader in the councils of agriculture. He was a most capable man, with a wide knowledge of men and affairs which was of benefit not only to this chamber but to Canada. He was vigilant and active and gave wonderful service to his country.

Senator Wood I did not know so well. He came from the west. He had been ill for a long time, but we know of his fine character and record.

Of Senator Comeau I can speak with knowledge. He and I had been friends since boyhood. I knew him in the Legislature of Nova Scotia and in the Executive Council where we both served, and again when I came to the Senate. He was very happy to be a member of this chamber, which he felt to be his rightful place because of his many years of service to Canada. I think he had a longer career than any other public man in the service of Canada. As a member of the Government of Nova Scotia he was most loyal to his colleagues and also to his premier, the Honourable George H. Murray. However, he was not just a follower; he had great political sagacity and was consulted about various matters because of his knowledge and wisdom. He had very strong feelings about the liberty of the subject; perhaps this could be expected, because he represented the Acadians in Nova Scotia. We look with pride at his record in that province, where he always secured a large part of his majority in the Protestant and English section of his riding. In fact he always led at the polls because of the English vote. He was a strong man and loyal to his church, but he was also very liberal. He was not a man who was narrow or mean.

It was my privilege to drive over from Lunenburg to the County of Clare with a friend to attend the late senator's funeral. We first went to the home and met his widow and his numerous relatives and friends. He was the father of 14 children, all of whom proved a success in life. I believe his youngest daughter, whose mother tongue is French, received a gold medal for English at the Pictou Academy.

His people were very proud of him and loved him. Of course, they were sorry that he had passed on but they all felt that goodness and mercy had followed him all the days of his life; he had come to the end of a long life which had been productive and during which he had given grand service.

Then we set out for the magnificent church, one of the finest in Canada. The solemn Mass was celebrated before a multitude of people. The college is situated alongside the church, and the priests, professors and scholars of the college assisted at the ceremony. I was amazed at the culture and beauty of the Mass. In fact, I had never seen anything before like the ceremony which took place in that rural part of Nova Scotia. The service lasted almost two hours, and the fervent prayers and beautiful singing had a tremendous impact. As our late colleague was being carried from the church my thought was, "He is going to the unknown in a blaze of glory." We left our good friend "Willie" Comeau to be interred in the cemetery beside the church.

The many who gathered to pay their last respects showed the esteem in which the late senator was held by his fellow citizens. This high esteem was also exemplified in his first election, which was by acclamation, and his continued success thereafter in the Legislature of Nova Scotia.

I am sure we all miss him, and we send our sympathy to his wife and family. They can take comfort from his fine record, and with their faith I know they will be sustained. He was a great husband, a fine father and a distinguished public servant who deserved the best.

Hon. Fred M. Blois: Honourable senators; being another Nova Scotian, at this time I would like to pay my respects to the memory of the Honourable J. W. Comeau.

I agree with what has been said by previous speakers regarding the Leader of the Government, and join with them in hoping that he will soon return to his duties. I also congratulate the Deputy Leader of the Government on his appointment and, having observed the interest that he has taken in the Senate during the six years or so that I have been a member, I know that he will do an excellent job.

Honourable senators, as I said in opening my remarks, my chief reason for rising is to pay tribute to the memory of my very good friend J. Willie Comeau. I knew him in the early thirties, but I came to know him well when I sat across the floor from him in the Nova Scotia Legislature from 1937 to 1945. I remember well the first day I entered the house. He approached me and welcomed me, and we discussed one or two mutual friends whom we held in high esteem. He offered me a little advice that day which I recall vividly.

Perhaps a few anecdotes will illustrate the type of man he was. I think it was the second speech I made in the Assembly that I was tipped off by some members of the cabinet that I might speak on a certain subject. At that time I did not realize the side I was taking was opposite to that in which Mr. Comeau was interested, but through the laughter and pounding on the desks of some of the cabinet ministers he soon realized that it was a joke and that they had put one over me. Afterwards he came to me and said, "I think we are both victims of an innocent joke, but perhaps we will turn the tables on them one of these days." A few weeks later we did.

In those days I was Leader of the Opposition, and for the first couple of years I had four supporters and for the next four years I had three, so you will realize what a tough job I had. On one particular occasion when the gentlemen opposite had made things very tough for me, "Willie" Comeau said to me, "My friend, you must not be too gentlemanly. Lash out at them at times with both hands." The opportunity arose a little later, and I did lash out with both hands to the best of my ability. Afterwards he told me, "When I advised you recently to lash out with both hands, I did not mean you should kick them to death." I mention this to illustrate the type of man Senator Comeau was. We had many interesting talks, and he gave me good advice on many occasions.

He was a staunch member of his party, but he could also see the other side of the question. Nova Scotia and Canada have lost a great man. He was held in tremendous esteem in the area in which he lived, and all along that Bay of Fundy shore people went to him for advice.

The Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) and Senator Kinley referred to the way in which our late colleague ran his election campaigns. On one occasion I asked him why it was he rarely toured his constituency. His house was situated on a hill and he sat out on his veranda. He used to call to anyone he wanted to see, and they came and talked to him. On one occasion I asked him, "How in the world do you do it?" He replied, "Well, any time they don't want me, they don't need to vote for me." And that is just about the philosophy he adopted.

He was an honourable man and had a heart almost as large as himself, but he was never abused. A few people tried, but they never did a second time, for despite all his kindness he could put them in their place just about as quickly as anyone I know.

At this time I wish to extend my sympathy to his widow and large family of sons and daughters. They are carrying on his great name in that area. He was tremendously proud of the fact that he was an Acadian, and in discussing with him some of the things that he was doing he said, "You know, I am equally proud that I am an Acadian, a Nova Scotian, and a Canadian." Again, that emphasizes the type of man we down there knew as "J. Willie."

[Translation]:

Hon. Calixte F. Savoie: Honourable senators, as an Acadian, I cannot let this occasion pass without joining with the previous speakers and those who will follow to express the very deep sorrow we all felt upon hearing of the unexpected death of our distinguished and esteemed colleague, my Acadian compatriot, honourable Senator J. Willie Comeau.

Senator Comeau, as you have been told, was born in Comeauville, in the county of Digby, Nova Scotia, on March 12, 1876. His ancestors were among those who came back to Acadia after the great upheaval of 1755 and settled in that part of Nova Scotia commonly known as Baie Sainte-Marie. Senator Comeau was therefore a direct descendant of those Acadian exiles who came back home after having been deported.

He studied at Ste. Anne College of Church Point. Upon his graduation from college in 1896, at the early age of twenty, he took up teaching and, during four years, taught in the Acadian schools near his home.

In 1900, at the age of 24, he was appointed assistant commissioner of the Paris Exhibition. He was elected, in 1907, by acclamation, member of the Nova Scotia Legislative Assembly, re-elected in 1911 and 1916, and appointed Minister of State on June 28, 1911. Called upon to sit as a member of the legislative council of his province in June 1925, he was re-appointed in 1928 and in March 1933. When the legislative body was abolished, he became Minister of State in the MacDonald Cabinet, and fulfilled this role until 1945 at which time he resigned as member of the legislative assembly and Minister of State. He was appointed to the Senate in December 1945.

There were no outstanding events in the political career of Senator Comeau, but it was a long one and a very valuable one for his own people. If he was a member for the riding of Digby in the provincial legislature for so many years, it is because his constituents, both French-speaking and English-speaking, trusted him.

It would be superfluous to repeat everything that has been said about him, but I endorse all the praise addressed to him. Let me add only that all his life, Senator Comeau took an active part in all Acadian activities. He was always an admirer and benefactor of his Alma Mater, the Ste. Anne College. He was in turn general vice-president, general president and general chancellor of the Société l'Assomption, this great Acadian mutual society which has played an outstanding part in the economic and cultural life of the Acadian people. In short, he was a great Acadian and an exemplary Canadian. To his grief-stricken wife and to the members of his fine family, I extend my deepest sympathy.

[Text]:

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, it was not my privilege to have known, or to have known very well, the late Senators Comeau and Wood, but one other who is no longer with us, Senator Norman Lambert, was for a stretch of almost fifty years my cherished friend. As has been so well and feelingly said by the two leaders, Senator Norman Lambert's career embraced a number of fields, in all of which he pursued excellence. At university he was a noted athlete. He was a distinguished member of my craft. He was successful in business, and in the end he brought to politics and to this house a well-stored, capacious and civilized mind.

Norman Lambert was a partisan, but he was a partisan only because he had a deep and shining faith in our party system, in our parliamentary way, and he would never in any circumstances make a difference of opinion a cause for hatred. He was not a party bigot.

Over a long period of time his political thinking and mine were poles apart, but that never interfered with a dependable friendship. There was one thing about Norman Lambert of which you could be absolutely sure: he would be closer to you in your hour of trial than in your hour of triumph. Almost every Sunday he came to my home, and for an hour we would discuss old newspaper days, politics, of course, and books, poetry and literature—literature which he knew very well, the earthy worst and the heavenly best. He had ideas about journalism which, alas, are not too prevalent today. He believed that a journalist, whether he knew it or not, and whether he liked it or not, was, in fact, an advocate, and that when he refused to take up a position he was, in fact, taking up a position, but one that could not bring admiration.

Senator Norman Lambert was a Liberal of the old British school, of that high tradition which produced giants such as Cobden and Bright, whose speeches he all but knew by heart. In our own land the Liberal giants he reverenced most were George Brown and Wilfrid Laurier.

He was also a student of Lincoln, and he used to delight to tell how on the evening that Lincoln left Washington for Gettysburg he invited to go along with him a distinguished Canadian public man, the Honourable W. L. McDougall. He would tell how on the day after the speech, when the press of the United States was ringing the praises of the oratory of Everett, McDougall wrote back to the Toronto Globe saying that in his opinion it was the speech of Lincoln that would become immortal in history.

Norman Lambert was a forthright man. He was a blunt man. He never courted popularity, and he never tried to bribe anybody into liking him by showing them only a part of himself. There was about him a sort of Calvinistic dourness at times, and yet at other times he was a very, very human man. Chesterton once said that his idea of a wholesome man was one who could get into a towering rage if his morning egg were boiled too hard. By that test, Norman Lambert was, indeed, a wholesome man. It was an unforgettable experience to hear and watch him after he had missed a two-foot putt. But, cheerfulness was always breaking through, and you knew that after his first moment of fury it would be followed by gales of laughter about himself.

Some of us in this house during the last session, and after the session ended, saw the shadows closing around him—shadows that finally thickened into night. I was one of those who with members of his family—the family who loved him passionately, and whom he loved—and Senator Norman Paterson, and the Leader of the Government in this house, Senator Connolly, stood at his graveside on a bleak November morning and saw him return to the soil he loved so well. I thought then, and I will always think, that here would be the resting place of a great son of Canada, who loved and served Canada well, and one whose memory all of us in this house will keep until our own time has come.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, after the eloquence to which we have just listened from my honourable friend, I do not think there is much I can say about our mutual friend, Senator Norman Lambert. Perhaps I shall miss him more than most members of this chamber because for several years he was my deskmate, and no more pleasant or interesting a deskmate could any man enjoy.

I sat with Senator Lambert in this chamber for nearly thirty years. I was appointed a year before he was. What always struck me about him was one of the things mentioned by my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. O'Leary, Carleton), and that was his wide culture and his great appreciation of good literature.

Senator Lambert had wide experience in a number of capacities in various parts of the country. He had a good mind, and he applied that mind as such a mind should be applied, namely, in an active spirit of public service. I think it can be said that when Canadian politics can attract to its ranks men of the calibre of Senator Lambert, then there is no fear for the future of this country.

We shall miss him sorely in this house, and I can only add to the eloquent remarks of the leaders on both sides my sincere sympathy to those of his family who survive him.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, after the moving tributes that we have heard this afternoon to our departed and lamented colleagues I hesitate to add anything, but I cannot let pass this opportunity of paying my tribute to Senator Norman Lambert, to whom I personally owe very much. He was of great help to me after I was appointed to this house, and I am indebted to him for many kindnesses over the years.

When I first came here we developed a friendship, and that friendship grew as the years passed. In later years we became neighbours because he occupied the office beside mine, and we used to chat with each other almost every day. I learned much from his informed mind, for he had a mine of information. As has been well said this afternoon, he was a wide reader, a stimulating conversationalist and a delightful man to meet.

Honourable senators, I owe a great deal to the late Norman Lambert, and I feel that this chamber as a legislative body will be the poorer because he has left us. To Mrs. Lambert and his family we send our sincere sympathy.

Honourable senators, coming as I do from the Atlantic provinces, I cannot sit down without saying that we have lost a giant in the person in the late Senator Comeau. He was greatly beloved. We in New Brunswick had heard of his fame long before he came to this chamber. I feel that I cannot add to what has already been so ably said about him by previous speakers, except to convey my sympathy to the late Senator Comeau's widow and family.

Unfortunately, Senator Wood's career was a shorter one. He was stricken when he was at the peak of his powers, and the Senate had not the opportunity to know him long enough. To his widow and family, I wish to convey my sympathy.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I wish that I could condense in just a few words the intensity of my regret at the loss of my friend Senator Lambert. He was a journalist, and as such he and I both had long newspaper experience.

Perhaps I did not know Senator Lambert so intimately as did Senator O'Leary (Carleton) since I did not have the advantage of living in the same city. However, I knew him for perhaps half a century. Certainly, when he was connected with the Toronto Globe I knew him as a newspaper man, and for the 20 years that I have been in this chamber I had been closely associated with him and had the advantage of conversations with him and of the broad knowledge with which he was endowed.

Senator Lambert was a Canadian, an intense Canadian. He was a Liberal in the best sense of that word.

He was vigorous in thought, and perhaps that was his chief characteristic. He was my neighbour, for quite a number of years before his death, in the Hall of Fame which runs alongside the Senate chamber, and night after night he would drop in and discuss the questions of the day with the fullness of knowledge and vigorous thought that made his visits always so welcome to me.

Senator O'Leary (Carleton) said that in some respects he and Senator Lambert were as wide apart as the poles. Norman Lambert and I seemed to be able to agree on almost everything, whether politics, economics, or law. He was not a lawyer, but he was well posted in law, as he was in the history of his country, of the literature of Canada and elsewhere, as well as the classics, and so on.

I regret beyond all measure of expression Norman Lambert's departure, which was all too soon, because he possessed great mental vigour. Had he been spared he would have continued to contribute notable service in this chamber.

One of the outstanding attributes I should like to mention about Norman Lambert was his devotion to his own family. His solicitude for his wife, now his widow, always appealed to me. He would forsake almost anything on her behalf.

I wish to express my deepest sympathy for his widow and family.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, it was not my privilege to be well acquainted with Senator Wood, but like yourselves I did come to know him from time to time when he attended here. Unfortunately during the past few years he was unable to be here frequently. We all had a high regard for him.

I was better aquainted with Senator Comeau. He was indeed a great Canadian; he had served his country well, and he was a fine gentleman. It was always a delight to talk to him, for not only was he interesting but he recounted various things which you might have forgotten. I could put it briefly by saying that it was an education just to have a conversation with him.

I join with those who have already spoken in expressing my deepest sympathy to Senator Wood's family and Senator Comeau's family.

At this time I wish to associate myself wholly with what Senator Hugessen described as the eloquent tribute paid to the late honourable Senator Lambert by Senator O'Leary (Carleton). I am sure we all agree that it was a beautiful tribute, and I can add nothing to what he said respecting Norman Lambert's life and interests generally. However, I wish briefly to refer to my friendship, and perhaps to your friendship, with him. His passing is indeed a great loss to the Senate, but it is an irreparable personal loss to many of us who were privileged to be his close friends.

I had known Norman Lambert since his college days at the University of Toronto. He took a great interest in its literary society, and was one of its foremost debaters. The skill which he exhibited in debate there he developed in an even more decisive and effective manner in the Senate, where thoroughness and accuracy marked the many contributions which he made to the debates both in this chamber and in committee.

When I came to the Senate as leader, he was one of the first members, if not the first, to welcome me here and to assure me of his personal support, but not necessarily of support for all legislation which I would bring before the Senate. Indeed, from time to time he did not hesitate to take exception to bills, either here or in committee, if he felt they were not in the best interests of the country. However, he was always steadfast in his friendship and loyalty to me when I was Leader of the Government and later when I was Leader of the Opposition.

Honourable senators, one of the things we value and cherish most highly in this house is the opportunity of forming lasting and deep friendships. Senator Lambert was one of my dear and close friends. For me, and for others here, the Senate cannot be quite the same without him. I join with other honourable senators in expressing my deepest sympathy to his widow and family.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, I would like to associate myself with the remarks that previous speakers have made concerning the late Senator Wood.

It had never been my privilege to meet Senator Comeau, but on one or two occasions I did meet Senator Lambert and enjoyed those occasions very much.

Coming as I do from the same province as Senator Wood, indeed, from the same city, I knew him well. It was unfortunate that his physical condition was such that during the past several years it was extremely difficult for him to move about, and practically impossible for him to carry on a conversation. For that reason, many people today, not only in this part of our country but in Saskatchewan, are not aware of the contribution Senator Wood made to the business and public life of that province.

I would like to take this opportunity of saying thanks to the members of his family for the contributions he made, both in the political sense and in the business sense; and I would like to associate myself with the remarks of my Leader in extending our sympathy to Mrs. Wood and the members of the Wood family.

Hon. C. G. Power: Honourable senators, it is, perhaps, because my good friend Senator O'Leary and I are descendants of a very peaceable race that I find what is most remarkable in what he said about the character of our good friend Senator Norman Lambert was the fact that he was absolutely without venom and without acrimony in the discussion of political questions.

That he was a politician there is no doubt; that he was even what may be called a partisan politician there is no doubt; but throughout Norman Lambert's career, and I knew him for many years back, notwithstanding that he was the organizer and director of the political tactics and strategy of the Liberal Party, nowhere in my recollection do I find that even the most partisan newspapers, even the most partisan politicians, even those who were most opposed to the tactics and policies of his party and of his leaders, ever attacked him personally.

I think that was because all those who knew him, knew him to be the soul of chivalry. That he had strong ideas, that he had strong views, that he was devoted to the interests of his party, nobody will deny; but everybody felt that all through his career he was an honest, honourable, sincere, square man. He was a man whom they could trust on all occasions.

Honourable senators, I too offer my sincere sympathy to the members of his family.

RETIREMENT OF SENATORS ROBERTSON, TREMBLAY, BUCHANAN AND GRANT

TRIBUTES

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, there is another duty which I have to perform today and which is a more pleasant one, as we have not lost these senators. It is to say a word about some members of the Senate who have availed themselves of the option to retire—Senators Robertson, Tremblay, Buchanan and Grant. Perhaps I might be permitted to refer briefly to each one in turn.

I am certain Senator Wishart Robertson can reflect on his career in public life with great satisfaction. In his native Province of Nova Scotia he was a member of the Legislative Assembly from 1928 to 1933. He represented the riding of Shelburne, as did his father and grandfather before him.

Shortly after his appointment to the Senate in 1943, Senator Robertson was elected President of the National Liberal Federation, a position he resigned in 1945, in which year he became Leader of the Government in the Senate and a member of Mr. King's cabinet. He served with great distinction as Government Leader for eight years, and in 1953 he was appointed Speaker, a responsibility he discharged with tact, intelligence and charm.

Further honours came to Senator Robertson in connection with his outstanding work on behalf of NATO and the Atlantic Community, and he is in fact an honorary life President of the NATO Parliamentary Association.

I am sure I speak for all of us when I express the hope that Senator and Mrs. Robertson will have a restful and happy retirement.

[Translation]:

Another colleague of mine, Senator Leonard Tremblay, retired in September 1965, because of ill health, after a long political and parliamentary career.

Senator Tremblay is seventy years old. He is a veteran of two wars and of many political tussles. He was elected for the first time to the House of Commons in the general election of 1935 and was re-elected in 1940, 1945 and 1949. He was appointed to the Senate in June 1953, but his political activities started long before he entered Parliament. He joined the Liberal party as a young man and never left it. He has been one of the best speakers of that party and was in great demand throughout the province. He belongs in a class which is seemingly fading, for he could mix cheerfulness with political activities. This gift of his was due to his pleasant sense of humour.

In recent years, his poor health and the nature of his illness tended to lessen the qualities that made him so genial. All those who knew him will greatly miss him and we wish him and his wife many more years of happiness.

[Text]:

Senator John Alexander Buchanan, who resigned in October 1965, at age 78, is a person who might aptly be described as a pioneer builder of the Canadian Northwest. Born and educated in Ontario, he graduated from the University of Toronto in 1909 as a Civil Engineer. In 1910 he was invited by the Surveyor General of Canada to join a survey party for work in the foothills west of Alberta. In that journey he succumbed to the attraction of the north and returned to conduct surveys and provide engineering services, and to participate in much of the construction opening up this area.

His political sympathies lay with the party of the honourable gentlemen opposite, and I know we will be hearing more of that aspect of Senator Buchanan's activities a little later.

Senator Buchanan was summoned to the Senate in January 1959, and I have always thought it a happy fact that he was a member of this chamber when the legislation authorizing the construction of the Pine Point Railway came before us. Senator Buchanan had been a very early and ardent proponent of this project. His faith in this development has been fully justified, as indeed has his faith in the development of the entire northwest.

I would like to take this opportunity to wish Senator Buchanan and Mrs. Buchanan health and happiness in retirement.

Honourable senators, Dr. Grant of Prince Edward Island also availed himself of the opportunity to retire. Born in 1876, Senator Grant has known a remarkable life. In early years he was a school teacher and postal clerk. In 1908 he entered medical school, and upon graduation started a practice in his home area. Senator Grant was a country doctor in the truest sense of the word. He was the type of man who never refused a call to anyone, and who provided, in effect, health services to an entire area. He and Mrs. Grant also raised a very large and admirable family. They had thirteen children, and ten of these entered medical and related professions.

A lifelong Liberal, he was secretary of his county Liberal Association and a member of the provincial Legislature. He also served as a minister in the provincial government, and he resigned in 1930 to accept nomination for a seat in the House of Commons. Unsuccessful in his first attempt, Dr. Grant won election in 1935, and re-election in 1940 and 1945. He came to the Senate in 1949.

Senator and Mrs. Grant are spending their retirement in his native province and near his children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren. May they have comfort and true happiness.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader for the tributes which he paid to a Nova Scotian who made his mark in public life. Senator Robertson was a member of the Nova Scotia Legislature, as were his father and grandfather before him. One was Speaker of the Nova Scotia Legislature and one was Commissioner of Mines. His father was also at one time a member of the House of Commons here in Ottawa.

Politics was in his bloodstream and he moved forward rapidly. He was leader of the National Liberal Association, and he made his finest contribution here as Government Leader in the Senate and afterwards as Speaker. I think that is a very fine achievement. We regret that he has been obliged to resign because of ill health, and we regret it the more because he is still a comparatively young man. We know that he is thinking of us today and he will be glad that we are thinking of him. I know from what has been said of him and placed on our record of today's proceedings that it will be a great comfort to him to hear of his achievements in the past and to learn how much we appreciate the manner in which he has done his duty to his country in war and in peace.

I know that his wife, who is still strong, and his family will be a great comfort to him at this time. We hope that he will live long in combort and in peace and he will not suffer too much from the disabilities which have beset him.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. A. J. Brooks: May I ask the honourable senator if this is the same bill as was dealt with by the special joint committee in a previous session?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Did that committee make a report?

Hon. Mr. Croll: No. The joint committee did not conclude its hearings before Parliament was dissolved, and it is now intended to re-establish that committee to consider the matter again.

PRIVY COUNCIL

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I have a suggestion to make to the Government, and I will ask the Clerk of the Senate to send a marked copy of the report of this sitting to the Secretary of the Privy Council.

Most of you heard the beautiful things that were said about the living and the dead at the last sitting of this house. That occasion was made much less sad, because there is always great comfort and satisfaction in being told of the good that has been accomplished by those who were and those who are still with us.

Honourable colleagues, if the position of Speaker of this chamber and that of the Speaker of the House of Commons are a great honour, one may easily realize that those positions are just as arduous, difficult and painstaking as are those of the Leader of the Government and of the Opposition. I will not elaborate about that this evening, but I may speak about it again on some future occasion.

I come now to my suggestion. I believe there was no exaggeration at all in the good that was said about some of our colleagues, both the deceased and living. However, since what was said is evidently true, there should be recognition of some kind. My suggestion is, and I hope you will concur in it, that Your Honour should be made a Privy Councillor right now; that the same recognition should be given to the past Speaker, the honourable Senator Bourget, who has not yet been appointed to the Privy Council; that the Acting Leader of the House (Hon. Mr. Bouffard), who has to discharge most important functions—the functions of the whole Cabinet in this chamber—shall be appointed to the Privy Council, and as well the other acting leaders, both on this and the other side of the house, namely, the honourable Senator Vaillancourt and the honourable Senator Choquette. The same recognition should apply to the Speaker of the House of Commons, the honourable Lucien Lamoureux.

It would be a serious mistake to wait until after any one of those gentlemen is buried six feet beneath Canadian soil to recognize his merit. Therefore, I suggest, in all deference to the Government, that it take into consideration those suggestions at the earliest possible opportunity.

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved, seconded by Hon. L. M. Gouin:

> That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General to offer the humble thanks of this house to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament, namely:
> To His Excellency Major-General Georges Philias Vanier, Companion of the Distinguished Service Order, upon whom has been conferred the Military Cross and the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.
> May it please Your Excellency:
> We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

He said: Honourable senators, my first words in this chamber must be to thank all honourable senators for the warm welcome they have extended to me and also for the many kindnesses shown to my wife and to me since we came to Ottawa.

Secondly, I wish publicly to thank the Right Honourable the Prime Minister for having appointed me to this chamber. I can only hope that my endeavours will be such as to warrant that confidence which he has placed in me.

I would also like to say how sorry I am—along with all honourable senators, I am sure—that the Leader of the Government in the Senate is not with us at this time. We all know the reason why Senator Connolly has found it impossible to attend, and I am sure we all hope that his recovery will be both speedy and complete. However, his illness is such that only time can heal it completely; and I hope that Senator Connolly will be wise enough to refrain from returning to this chamber until his health is completely restored.

To you, Mr. Speaker, I extend my congratulations on your having been appointed to your high office. I consider this an honour not only to British Columbia but to western Canada and especially to my home province. As you were at one time a citizen of Saskatchewan, we too rejoice in the fact that you have been appointed to this high office. We wish you well.

To Senator Bouffard, who is the acting Leader of the Government in the Senate, I extend my best wishes. I know that he will have the co-operation of all honourable senators in endeavouring to dispose of Government business with dispatch during the absence of Senator Connolly.

I would also at this time refer to the fact that I am replacing a very distinguished senator from the Province of Saskatchewan, the late Senator R. B. Horner. Senator Horner was, as you all know, one of the pioneers of Saskatchewan. He made an immeasurable contribution to the agricultural life, the business community, the religious community and the political community within Saskatchewan. It is indeed a pleasure and an honour for me to follow such a distinguished senator from Saskatchewan.

During that period when I had the opportunity of serving as Minister of Agriculture in my home province, I had as my Deputy Minister a nephew of the late Senator Horner, Mr. Harold Horner, who is an able, devoted and faithful civil servant. He is one of those people who has added greatly to the good name of the civil service of my home province. It was a pleasure to have worked with him, and I look forward to his visiting with me on those occasions when he should find it necessary to come to the nation's capital.

My appreciation also must be extended to Senator Connolly for having asked me to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I realize that this is an honour that is extended not only to myself but to the people of Saskatchewan, and it is an honour which I deeply appreciate.

I would like now, honourable senators, to turn to the Speech from the Throne itself. I note in the opening paragraph of the speech that reference is made to Canada's Centennial which we shall be celebrating next year. In the Province of Saskatchewan we have just completed the celebration of our Diamond Jubilee, the sixtieth birthday of our province, and in my opinion the people who were charged with the responsibility of organizing those celebrations did an excellent job. I believe they have left a mark on our community that will be long remembered. It seems to me that the people now charged with organizing the activities of Canada's hundredth birthday will also leave a mark on this nation. Perhaps 100 years is not very long in the life of many nations, but I think it is an excellent time for us as Canadians to stop and pay thanks to the pioneers of this country for the contribution they have made, to review the progress of this nation, and at the same time to make plans for Canada's future development.

Of course in 1967 we shall be celebrating not only the centennial but also in that great City of Montreal we shall see the opening of Expo '67. On Saturday last I had the pleasure of journeying to Montreal wtih many honourable senators and members of the other place where we were privileged to view the site and to listen to some briefings from the people responsible for conducting the affairs of Expo '67.

I enjoyed that trip greatly, the more so because I had the privilege of being in Montreal last September and also about a year prior to that. On the first occasion when I saw the site I wondered what they were trying to do; they were moving huge quantities of earth into the area, but it was very difficult to visualize clearly what they were trying to do there. Then in September last one could see that the land had been prepared; the major expenditures had taken place in preparing the site and in putting in power, sewers and water. Most of this, however, was underground work and little was to be seen aboveground. However, on Saturday last for the first time one could see what was actually taking place.

As a result of that trip I have no doubt in my mind that the exposition will be ready to open on target date and that it will be a very fine exposition.

When one considers that this great exposition is going to cost approximately $600 million or $700 million, which is the total expenditure of all concerned, one wonders what its purpose is and what it will do for Canada and for the world. For myself, I never realized the extent of the undertaking until my visit to Montreal last Saturday. At that time reference was made to the Great Exposition held in Paris in 1889 when the Eiffel Tower was constructed. Previously I had not known what the Eiffel Tower really meant, but on Saturday last I learned that here was a demonstration to the world that a high-rise building could be constructed around a steel frame or superstructure. There has never been a second Eiffel Tower constructed, but imagine the numbers of buildings throughout the world that have been built using steel as the framework from 1889 to date.

What will Expo '67 do not only for Canada but for the world? If the people responsible are successful, and I am sure they will be, then I think Expo '67 will demonstrate to the world that we can rebuild the heart and what one might call the rotting core of many of our large cities. Most cities throughout the world are concerned with this problem today, and to date no nation has found an answer. But I believe that the people responsible for Expo '67 can demonstrate to the world a means of rejuvenating the heart of our great cities so that people can move back from suburbia. I want to wish the people responsible for Expo '67 well, and I thank the minister for having made it possible for us to attend the briefing and to take part in the tour of the site on Saturday last.

I want to refer next to the reference in the Speech from the Throne to the continuing economic prosperity of Canada. This prosperity is continuing and developing while Canada is playing a responsible role in world affairs. I think this point is worthy of some comment. It seems to me that we in Canada are fortunate in having two distinguished Canadians, recognized around the world for their leadership qualities, who have played such an active part in maintaining peace in our time. I refer, of course, to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and to our present Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Paul Martin. There are few nations as fortunate as we are in having leaders who have demonstrated the ability of these two gentlemen.

We Canadians for many years have played a very worthwhile part in international affairs. While it is true that we are not a great nation by virtue of the numbers of our people—our population amounts to twenty millions—and we are not a great nation as far as economic strength is concerned, since we are only now about to celebrate our 100th birthday, and our industrial capacity is not great, nevertheless we are one of the major middle powers in the world.

Since the Second World War Canada has played a worthwhile part in keeping peace throughout the world. Today we have Canadian troops stationed virtually around the globe, but our troops are not involved in a hot war. We have troops in West Germany, in France and in other areas of Western Europe; they have been there since the cessation of hostilities. What are they doing? They are preserving the peace in Western Europe. We have had troops in the Gaza Strip for many years, not fighting a war but keeping two hostile peoples from each other's throats. The same is true of the role of Canadian troops in Cyprus, in Kashmir, in India and in Pakistan. In all those places our troops are not fighting a hot war; they are simply endeavouring to maintain peace. We also have some representatives in Vietnam whose duties and responsibilities are the same as those of our troops stationed elsewhere.

It seems to me that this is the role that a middle power such as Canada ought to be playing; under the present Government and earlier governments this is the role we have played and I sincerely hope it will continue in the future.

The Speech from the Throne mentions the fact that during the coming year negotiations will take place between the federal Government and the governments of the provinces to bring about a new agreement on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. This new agreement will have to take effect in 1967 as the old agreement expires in the present year. This is a good point at which to reflect upon what has happened in Canada for some years past concerning dominion-provincial taxation relations, especially since it was many years ago that a Liberal government in this country recognized that Canada's wealth was not equally distributed throughout all areas of the country. They recognized that while some areas were very wealthy, other areas were known as "have-not" areas, and, through the dominion-provincial taxation agreements, arrangements were made whereby provincial governments, whether they were in the wealthy areas or in the "have-not" areas, were able to supply similar services to their people. I think this was a major step in the process of holding Canada together. How long would this nation survive if the governments of some of the more wealthy provinces were able to provide services to their people that the less fortunate provinces could not?

But, times change from year to year and new problems arise. I think it is well that these fiscal arrangements be reviewed, that we profit from our experience and make new suggestions to the provinces—and of course receive suggestions from them—and modernize the agreements to meet today's needs. So I am pleased that these conferences are being held and that a new agreement will come into effect in 1967.

The Speech from the Throne then makes reference to the unprecedented prosperity and growth we are enjoying in Canada. I do not think anyone can deny that we have increased our production, that ever increasing investments are taking place in Canada, and that our trade is expanding, but sometimes I am a little concerned when some people talk of foreign domination of our industry and of our life.

Honourable senators, I am not one of those who are afraid of foreign investment. In my humble opinion, there is only one thing wrong with it in Canada—there is not enough of it. Why do I say that? The Lord was kind when he created this part of the world. There are few areas in the world with more natural wealth than this country of ours, but how could we in the space of 100 years and with a population only now of 20 million have created enough savings to develop and exploit the resources of this nation? It is not possible. People do not create those kinds of savings in a mere 100 years. Savings are accumulated only over generations, one after the other, and we have to look to older areas of the world for the investment capital we need to develop our tremendous resources.

Some of the best examples of this are in my home province, where today we have some of the greatest developments that are taking place anywhere in Canada. I refer to the potash industry. We have now three potash mines in production, with another seven under construction. Each mine takes a capital investment from $50 million to $80 million. How on earth could the people of Saskatchewan, a mere million people, possibly have saved in sixty years sufficient money to develop this one resource? That resource is being developed by Canadians, Americans, Frenchmen, Germans; and personally, I am mighty happy that they are prepared to invest their money in Saskatchewan to develop our resources and give employment to our people.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: In Saskatchewan it is not only the potash industry, but the oil industry. When I think of the many millions of dollars that have been spent in the oil industry in the exploration field alone, I suggest to you it would be impossible to raise this kind of money in Canada to do this sort of thing in all our provinces.

Of course, apart from foreign investment, we are now getting some assistance through an Act of Parliament known as the Area Development Incentives Act. That has been of great benefit to Saskatchewan. Since the act came into effect we have been able to negotiate—again with a New York firm—to construct a pulp mill in the Prince Albert area, in the northern part of the province, which will mean an investment of about $65 million, but the main effect of this investment is that it will create 3,000 jobs in an area where we have had tremendous problems with unemployment, especially among the native people in that area, the Metis.

I want to say to honourable senators that I do not care where the money comes from; if it will come in and develop a resource that we have been unable to develop ourselves, and provide employment in areas where most of the people have lived on social aid—and I am talking about natives and the Metis—then we welcome that investment. I hope, as far as my province is concerned—and, I am sure, as far as Canada generally is concerned—that peoples of other lands will have enough confidence in Canada to continue to invest their savings here in order to make this a better place for all of us to live in.

However, we do have a really serious problem in Canada today, despite the fact we have this general prosperity, and that is the fact that all Canadians are not benefiting from the general prosperity under which we live. Some economists have gone so far as to estimate that 40 per cent of Canada's population are not enjoying this general prosperity. I do not know whether or not that figure is accurate, but I do know that today there are literally hundreds of thousands of people in all areas of Canada who are living in poverty, and I think it a crying shame that in a nation such as Canada we have done little or nothing to lift these masses of people out of that level.

I am not so foolish as to think that we can increase the standard of living of all these people; but I think a large percentage of them could be helped. There are in the Speech from the Throne three paragraphs which forecast programs the Government hopes to implement and which I believe would go a long way in solving some of the problems of poverty in Canada.

As I said a moment ago, I do not think poverty is confined to any given area. If we open our eyes wide enough we can find it scattered throughout the rural areas and the urban centres, regardless of whether you are in western, central or eastern Canada.

Of course we in Saskatchewan are not immune. That province has its share of poverty, and I am a little amazed at some of the articles I read in eastern newspapers. Reading them one is led to believe that the farmers in western Canada have money sticking out of their ears. Some of them have, but some have not.

In Saskatchewan today we have about 85,000 farmers, and I am happy that a good percentage of them are doing quite well. But honourable senators, do you know that out of those 85,000 farmers there are 35,000 who have a gross annual income of $2,000 or less—not a net, but a gross income of $2,000 a year or less. Of course, this condition is not confined to my home province. I know that to a degree it exists in my neighbouring provinces of Manitoba and Alberta. Apparently it also exists in Ontario. In the Globe and Mail of last Friday, January 14, there appeared an article headed: "Wanted: a plan for Ontario's 50,000 failing farms." The article does not point out what the income of these people is, but does indicate that there are 50,000 farmers in the Province of Ontario who are in trouble because of poverty conditions.

Honourable senators, I want to repeat that I believe some of the proposals in the Speech from the Throne, when implemented, will go a long way to assist in solving this problem. Many people seem to think this is a new problem, that we have to have brand-new policies to cope with it. I do not think we do. I often reflect upon what happened in this nation at the end of the Second World War, when we had many thousands of young men and young women returning to civilian life after having served in the armed forces, and I wonder what would have happened if these people had been just released into the private sector of our country without any provision being made for their education, training or re-establishment. I suggest that chaos would have been created in this nation, and that today we would still be suffering as a result of it. But rather than having these people return to civilian life without adequate training and adequate finances, certain programs—and all honourable senators are aware of them—were implemented. Consequently, the service personnel were absorbed into the civilian population without causing as much as a ripple.

I believe that part of the reason for the general prosperity in Canada today is that these policies were implemented. I am thinking of the many, many men and women who were retrained upon leaving the services and who have made and are making great contributions to the conditions under which we live today. Surely, when we talk about retraining many of our rural people and, of course some urban people as well, for a new place in the society in which we live, we can see a similarity between these policies and those implemented after the war.

Honourable senators, I mentioned a moment ago that some farmers in Saskatchewan were doing very well, but I also said that there were others whose incomes left much to be desired. It was only a few days ago that a report, based on a study of 424 Saskatchewan farms that are under a farm management group, came to my attention. The figures published in this study are interesting, because the average net annual income of the 424 farms in this group is $6,936. But the average net annual income of all the Saskatchewan farms is $4,300. I use this comparison to indicate to you that the survey was taken of farms that are above average in both size and managerial ability, and also in capital investment. However, the average labour income—that is, the return that the farmer receives for his labour—of the 424 farms in the survey is $3,556 per year. I arrive at the labour income by subtracting the investment capital from the net income.

If you take the average return for 38 per cent of the 424 farms in the review you find that it is $4,000 a year or better, but in the Province of Saskatchewan, according to this survey which was conducted by the provincial Department of Agriculture, 33 per cent of the farms have a labour income of $1,000 or less per year. This is not general prosperity; this is poverty, and I suggest to you that it exists in every province in Canada.

There are some other interesting figures in this study and, though it is not my intention to bore the house, some honourable senators may be interested in hearing them. The investment per cultivated acre in 1964 was $74.45. The investment in machinery per cultivated acre was just under $17. The average farm size today is 726 acres, and the average farm in Saskatchewan has an investment in lands, building, machinery and livestock of some $37,000.

As I said a moment ago, I do not want to imply that this is a condition that exists only in my home province. It is a condition that exists throughout Canada, and I think it can be alleviated by the implementation of many of the policies referred to in the Speech from the Throne.

I know that in the Speech from the Throne there are several references to programs that could be of great help to the western farmer, but it is not my intention to elaborate upon them at this time, because I would very much like to have the legislation in my hands before I make any extensive comments. I do want to refer, however, to that portion of the Speech from the Throne that says a bill will be introduced to amend the Railway Act. Of course this measure is of first importance to the people of the Province of Saskatchewan. They will be more affected, I think, by the new railway legislation than any other province in Canada, as the railroads have suggested that there are more lines in Saskatchewan which they would like to abandon than in any other area.

I am not one of those who believe that some abandonments should not take place, but I do believe that no nation or no province can be great without adequate railroad facilities. They are necessary to move the goods and services that are produced throughout Canada. I do not think there will be much objection from the people of Saskatchewan to this legislation, provided adequate facilities are left in that province to move the goods and services that are produced there in abundance. It will be interesting to see what is included in the new Railway Act, and I shall undoubtedly have further to say about it at the appropriate time.

The Speech from the Throne also forecasts that cash advances will be made available for unthrashed grain. This is a welcome addition to the cash advances legislation which has been of great benefit to the western farmers. This improvement will be very much appreciated, I am sure, by the producers throughout western Canada.

I was also interested to note that improvements will be made in the movement and marketing of feed grains in eastern Canada and British Columbia. This is of interest not only to the consumers, or the feeders, of feed grains in eastern Canada and British Columbia, but also to the farmers of the Prairie regions, the producers of the feed grains, because for many years they have produced feed grains in abundance and stored them but could not find buyers for them. There are many farmers in Saskatchewan who have had oats and barley—especially oats—in private storage for as long as ten years because they could not find a purchaser, and because they had no way of moving the grain had they been able to find a purchaser.

The reason for this was that for many years, when it was impossible to sell all of the wheat we produced, the lines of communication were plugged with unsaleable wheat. We had the feed in western Canada and were crying for a market, and the feeders in Ontario, Quebec, the Maritimes and British Columbia were crying for the feed but we could not get it to them.

We have now the reverse situation. Our lines of communication are not filled with an unsaleable product. We are endeavouring this year to move 600 million bushels of wheat out of Canada into the export market, and of course the lines of communication are filled with a saleable product, but still we are not able to move the feed grains from the area in which they are produced to the area where they will be consumed. So, the western farmer has as great an interest in this legislation as have the people who reside in eastern and western Canada.

The western farmer is also interested in the forecast of an increase in the ceiling for long-term export financing under the Export Credits Insurance Act, as this legislation is used to move western Canadian grain into the export markets of the world.

There is a promise in the Speech from the Throne of legislation setting up the Company of Young Canadians. I know that there is a place for the operation of this company in Canada, but it is my opinion that the major contribution they can make is not in Canada but abroad.

On two recent occasions I had the opportunity of making a trip around the world, and on each I endeavoured to contact Canadians wherever they might be found. I recall being in Malaysia in 1963 when I had the privilege of attending the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association gathering there. Most Canadians who were delegates to that conference contacted Canadian citizens who were stationed in Malaysia. Malaysia is a country of 20 million people, and it was hard to find a Canadian there because there were few of them. The important thing is that those who were there were doing a tremendous job on behalf of Canada and on behalf of Malaysia. The only criticism I could make was that there was not nearly enough of them.

I travelled from Malaysia to India. There are several hundreds of Canadians in India, but when they are mingled with 480 million native Indians they are hard to find. But when I did find an area in which there were a few Canadians—doctors, nurses, school teachers and engineers—I found that no matter what endeavour they were engaged in they were doing a good job for Canada, and their services and the contributions they were making were warmly welcomed by the people of India, as they were in Malaysia and any other area of the world in which Canadians happened to be serving.

Honourable senators, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, it has been a distinct pleasure for me to have the opportunity of moving this address. I hope I shall be able to make at least one improvement over the years, and that is that before too long a time expires I shall be able to speak to more of you in your native tongue.

[Translation]

Hon. L. M. Gouin: Honourable senators, I am most happy to support the motion which has just been moved so eloquently by our new colleague from Regina, Senator Alexander Hamilton McDonald. I wish to congratulate him most heartily for his first appearance in this Chamber and I am sure we shall always be happy to hear him.

[Text]

I wish to congratulate also most sincerely His Honour the Speaker. I am sure that he will be worthy of the long line of his industrious predecessors. I am convinced that he will preside over our debates with the good judgment and with the tact which characterizes him.

I must now pay my respects to our new Deputy Government Leader. I wish to emphasize his great qualities to which he owes his high position at the bar as well as in the business world. I am sure that Senator Bouffard will carry out wonderfully the duties he has just been assigned. He can count upon my full co-operation.

I now wish to express my regrets to Senator Vaillancourt about his resignation from the post of Deputy Leader. He is held in high esteem by all the members of this House. His whole career is proof of his enlightened patriotism, his social spirit, his devotion to his fellow citizens. He spent his life in good deeds and I do hope that Divine Providence will keep him long among us.

[Text]

Now I wish to express my regrets for the illness of our leader, the honourable Senator John Connolly. I have the greatest admiration for the qualities of his generous heart and his brilliant mind. I hope with all my heart that he will recover promptly and completely.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the very first paragraph of the Speech from the Throne says, and not unduly, that

> We should be very proud to be Canadians.

I remember that the right honourable Louis St. Laurent liked to say:

> It's great to be a Canadian.

Yes, we are justified in being proud of our country, since it continues to prosper in the economic as well as in the social field. However, we may find the chief reason for being proud is the important role Canada plays on the international scene. Our Government is always aware of our responsibilities towards the United Nations Organization. We have never failed to meet our commitments. In fulfilling our duty toward the world community, we set an example for the whole world.

Under the enlightened leadership of the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, who was awarded the Nobel peace prize a few years ago, and thanks to the constant action and the diplomacy of the Honourable Paul Martin, Canada pursues, in the international field, its benevolent and peacemaking activities, as a member of the United Nations, as well as of the Commonwealth and NATO. Thus, Canada assumed the mission of ensuring everywhere and always peace and justice for all peoples.

Recently, our Prime Minister attended in Lagos, Nigeria, a meeting of the Commonwealth in order to put an end to the situation existing in Rhodesia where, because of the unilateral declaration of independence, the Government of Salisbury was outlawed.

Mr. Pearson was opposed to immediate military action. He put his trust in stronger economic sanctions. Once again, Mr. Pearson revealed himself as one of the greatest diplomats in the world. His point of view prevailed again against military action. His proposal to form a sanctions commission, whose object is to control the effect of financial and economic sanctions, and of an embargo on petroleum was agreed to. These steps are meant to correct the illegal situation existing in Rhodesia.

At the time of the dispute between India and Pakistan, Mr. Pearson offered his services as mediator. With the Honourable Paul Martin, he keeps up with the development of the war in Viet Nam and follows any attempt to negotiate. I am proud, as a Canadian, of the efforts in the pursuit of peace undertaken by our present Government which always try to make sure that the rule of law will prevail in international affairs.

Honourable senators, everywhere our Canadian flag flies it is with honour. In order to get our new flag adopted our Prime Minister took his political life in his own hands. He overcame all difficulties and succeeded in this endeavour. I am confident that he will succeed also in getting our patriotic hymn, O Canada, adopted as our national anthem. For those two reasons the name of Mr. Pearson will have a place in history.

With a strictly distinctive Canadian flag and national anthem, the only trace of our past colonial status to remain is the need to go to London to get our Constitution amended. I am hopeful that we shall overcome this last hurdle which stands in the way of our attaining a full and complete sovereignty.

Now, let us take a look at the problems raised by the relations between the federal authority and our ten provincial governments.

Recently our distinguished Prime Minister defined the essential conditions for the smooth functioning of federalism, based on co-operation between the federal state and the provinces. According to Mr. Pearson—and I am trying to give a faithful interpretation of the thought expressed by my leader—the main thing to do, first, is to establish quite clearly the essential points on which Ottawa cannot and will not yield for, otherwise, Canada would run the risk of being destroyed.

Honourable senators, like the Prime Minister—

> We want the new and dynamic Quebec to play its full and honoured part in the development of a new and proud Canada.

The primary condition for the efficiency of federalism is the adoption by Ottawa of a flexible policy, considering variable circumstances and changing requirements in the federal system.

The second essential condition is that all provinces, and Quebec especially, give clear indication of their willingness to preserve and strengthen Canadian unity within the federal state.

In recent years the Liberal Government has undeniably proved its good faith towards the provinces, especially the province of Quebec. Unhesitatingly, our Prime Minister recognizes that my native province is different from the others due to conditions peculiar to Quebec. I would even say that we have in Quebec a different way of life.

Let us continue our analysis of the second condition stated, the willingness to preserve our federal union, which every province should show. Before granting other advantages to provincial governments, Ottawa should be convinced that > each province is bent on keeping a strong Confederation, led by a strong central government, able to carry out the responsibilities vested on it by the Constitution.

Therefore, it is necessary, along with Mr. Pearson, to differentiate between two kinds of separatists: on one hand, those who do not want to leave anything to Ottawa; on the other hand, those who want to leave everything to Ottawa. How will it be possible for French Canadians and French Canada to achieve their own aspirations, while preserving Canada's unity? This is the real problem which must be solved, while Canada moves towards the centennial of its federative regime.

I wish to congratulate Mr. Pearson for the noble principles he stated when he said:

> Our unity must also recognize the duality of our origin and the multi-racial character of our social, cultural and political development. It must be a unity based on the English and French speaking partnership of rights and responsibilities developed within the Constitution.

This partnership must allow the French-speaking Canadians to make a full and complete contribution to the development not only of Quebec but of Canada as a whole.

In order to achieve this, we must accept > wholeheartedly the fact that both our founding ethnic groups have essential contributions to make to the future of Canada.

And about this equal partnership, we can conclude with Mr. Pearson that:

> the government at the national level must be bilingual and bicultural, when that is necessary, to put French-speaking Canadians on the same footing as English-speaking Canadians. This is our national policy which must be based on the principles of co-operative federalism.

In truth, those who would force a monolithic unity upon us would not reinforce Canadian unity; they would weaken it and possibly succeed in destroying it. In stating this policy, in expressing these patriotic tenets, the leader of my party uttered unforgettable words. His was an historic gesture. Mr. Pearson, who taught history in his youth, is now making it.

In supporting the policies of the Prime Minister and of his colleagues, I know I am working for the complete fulfilment of our French culture side by side with the English-speaking culture, in all deference to other cultural groups.

Being myself a member of a minority, it is my bounden duty to be fair to all the other minority groups in this multi-racial mosaic that is our Canada.

The particular rights of those who have the same blood as I have in their veins—those rights sanctioned by the spirit of our Constitution and by three centuries of history—those rights, I repeat, will be best safeguarded by the maintenance of our Canadian country from coast to coast, in a rejuvenated confederation imbued with a more human and more brotherly spirit, in a unity based on the full respect of national traditions and ways of life of each of our ethnic groups. This unity in diversity presupposes a common desire on our part to maintain our federal union in the interest of all Canadians, in particular of French-speaking Canadians, living in Quebec or living outside the boundaries of our mother province.

During the first World War some people at the Quebec legislature tried to bring Confederation to an end. Opposing the Francœur motion, which asked for Quebec's withdrawal from Confederation, Sir Lomer Gouin concluded his speech on January 23, 1918, with the following words which I am bent on repeating, for they fully express my own feelings:

> That our country may remain great, that our sons' hearts may remain full of hope, that we may bequeath to them our forefathers' heritage, we must fight with stout hearts under the passing storm, we must work without cease, without flinching, to develop and maintain the Canadian nation.

THE ESTIMATES

FINANCE COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard moved, with leave of the Senate:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March 1966;

That the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records and to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the evidence received and taken at the preceding session be referred to the committee; and

That the quorum of the said committee be reduced to seven members.

He said: Honourable senators, this is only to permit the Finance Committee to continue the work it began in the course of last session, before Parliament dissolved.

The committee has been appointed and has elected its chairman, Senator Leonard. I would hope that we could adopt the motion today in order that the work may be resumed without delay.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I am not rising to oppose this motion. We realize that Parliament has had a long recess. I take it that during the interim money has been obtained for the most part through Governor General's warrants. We will also need interim supply for January and February.

I also take it that the committee had very few sittings last session, because the Estimates were brought down in May and we adjourned in July, expecting to be back in September. Therefore, I do not think we can expect the committee to do very much on these earlier Estimates, and we will be going on with the Estimates for the next year very shortly.

As I have said, there is no objection to the motion. I understand that the supplementary Estimates, the schedules and tables will also be before this committee.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 1, 1966 at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The reason for this motion is that there will likely be very little business to come before us tomorrow. I do not think that the senator who will move the adjournment of the debate on the Speech from the Throne today will be ready to speak tomorrow. It may happen that next week we will have to sit an additional day, because of the interim supply bill, which may come on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday or Friday. We do not know. There seems to be general consent that we adjourn from this afternoon until next Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: What are the prospects for business, besides the debate on the Speech from the Throne and the interim supply bill?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: It is difficult to say. It may be that we will start consideration of the Ottawa Terminal Railway bill. Also, we have six or seven private bills which may receive second reading next week and be referred to various committees. Also, we might have the Bankruptcy Act before us. There is no certainty about it, but should it come to us, we will start consideration of it next week.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: What about the bill respecting the Canada Labour Code? I think that has had first reading in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: We have not received it yet.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It is in the other place.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

LIGHTING IN SENATE CHAMBER AND READING ROOM

On the Orders of the day:

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, yesterday, as we all noticed, the lighting in the Senate chamber was very poor. It was impossible to read. Today there is a great improvement which is appreciated by all. Now I would like to point out that the lighting is also very poor in the Reading Room. Perhaps it is because of the way the windows have been built or perhaps the electrical equipment is not adequate, but it is very difficult to read there.

I would, therefore, ask Your Honour if you would kindly give instructions to bring about an improvement in the lighting in the Reading Room of the Senate.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I wish to support Senator Pouliot's request. It is not easy for me to read the French newspapers when there is a lot of light, but I find it almost impossible to do it in the Senate reading room where the lighting is very poor.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you very much.

[Text]

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, I think it would be a great pity to prevent a member of the Senate from reading the French papers in the Reading Room, and we will do our best to bring about an improvement in the lighting facilities.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, at the opening of this session a few days ago our attention was drawn to the fact that the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) had been and was still quite ill. We expressed our regrets at that time, and in doing so again today may I also express our gratification that his health is now improving.

At that time we were also informed that the Deputy Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt) had resigned, as to which we also expressed our sincere regrets. However, we are very happy indeed to see that Senator Bouffard has taken his place. I am sure we all feel that the business of the chamber is in very good hands.

There are always changes at the beginning of a session and more particularly at the opening of a new Parliament. We are pleased indeed to see you, sir, occupying the Chair as Speaker of this chamber. We have been very fortunate in the Senate—as indeed has been the House of Commons—in the choice of Speakers. They have all been very able and popular men. Our last Speaker (Hon. Mr. Bourget) was very highly esteemed, and I know that the present incumbent will be as fair and just in his decisions as was his illustrious predecessor. We all wish him the very best.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I mentioned the Speaker in the other place. I do not think it amiss to say that I have often pitied the Speaker in the other chamber. His is usually a difficult task, and it has been so especially with minority governments in the last two years. However, in the Senate the Speaker has a much easier time. The position is an honourable and responsible one, but I believe that taken in all it is a pleasant task. Senators seem to be very easy to get along with. I have been here for five years now, and I have not heard or seen anything untoward in the Senate.

Honourable senators, I now come to the mover and seconder of the address. I am sure all will agree that both made excellent speeches. I did not wholly agree with all the material that was contained in their speeches —that is not to be expected. I think they were a little biased and slanted in favour of the Government, but I am not quarrelling with that in any way.

We are all well acquainted with Senator Gouin. He has been here for a great number of years. He has taken an active and commendable part in the public life of his native province and that of Canada. We know what to expect from him: we expect the best, because he has always given the best.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: After listening to Senator McDonald yesterday, I am satisfied that he will make a very good senator. He is a fine speaker and presents his case well. Indeed, he must have received good training in the Saskatchewan Legislature. I might also point out at this time, that he has joined an outstanding group of men in the Senate, both past and present. Senator McDonald has served as Minister of Agriculture for Saskatchewan. I recall that at the time I was appointed to the Senate in 1960 two of our number were former provincial Ministers of Agriculture. As honourable senators will remember, both the late Senator Austin Taylor, who was from my native province of New Brunswick, and the late Senator John A. McDonald, from Nova Scotia, made wonderful contributions to the debates on agricultural matters. I feel certain we can anticipate a similar contribution from our new member, Senator McDonald.

Honourable senators, we have also in the Senate other men who are greatly interested in agriculture and, as I say, he has joined that group. Sitting to my right is Senator Aseltine who, besides being a distinguished lawyer, has been a highly successful farmer. We also have from western Canada Senator Pearson, who has made a great success of farming. From Nova Scotia we have my good friend Senator Welch, an outstanding Maritime farmer. I could name others. Perhaps I should mention the honourable Senator Roebuck who, I might say, is one of the gentlemen farmers of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: He is an agriculturalist.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I hope so.

It is obvious that most honourable senators are pleased to be back, to greet their old friends—and we always have a most friendly reunion—and also to meet the newly appointed members of the Senate. Frankly, I had expected there would be many more new senators. There are some vacancies, but I suppose they will be filled in due time.

May I, as a former colleague and associate of the honourable Senator Benidickson, tell him how pleased I am to see him sitting among us, and in the front row of the Government benches. Senator Benidickson was one of the outstanding members of the House of Commons, a good debater at all times and one to whom we were always very pleased to listen.

A few days ago mention was made of some of the resignations from the Senate. I intended to say a few words at that time, but what I had to say was largely said and better said by the Acting Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Bouffard), Senator Kinley and others.

I knew Senators Grant and Tremblay in the House of Commons for quite a number of years before they were appointed to the Senate, and I am well aware of the contributions they made. I knew Senator Robertson from his having been Leader of the Government and also Speaker in the Senate. We in the Maritime provinces were proud that Senator Robertson had contributed so much and had attained the distinction of being appointed to the two highest offices in the Senate.

I must also say that on this side of the house we very much miss Senator Buchanan who has also resigned. He is one of the most lovable men I have ever met. Despite the fact that he had a serious illness shortly after he was appointed to the Senate he always met you with a smile and worked to the capacity which his illness would allow. He was always in his seat, both here in the chamber and on the committees of which he was a member.

These senators contributed greatly not only to the deliberations of the Senate but also to the public life of the country, and it is appropriate, honourable senators, that men such as these who have served Canada so well, and for whom the time has come to retire because of ill health, can do so voluntarily with grace and with dignity.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: But I wish to emphasize the word "voluntarily," because while such men retire voluntarily, that privilege is denied many other senators, unless they conform to certain sections of the new Retirement of Senators Act.

Speaking personally—that is, expressing my own opinion—I believe that the Retirement of Senators Act should be amended so that those who were appointed for life are not compelled to resign at age 75 or lose the pension for themselves or their widow. I believe that is the correct interpretation of the act. I think the act is unfair and poor in that respect, and that some effort should be made to have that section amended.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I have nothing to add regarding that matter.

Honourable senators, we had a long recess of seven months. I suppose it is the longest recess that Parliament has had in a great many years. I cannot remember recessing for as long as seven months at any other time.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Not since the thirties.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I was not here then having entered Parliament in 1935; but there was not so much parliamentary business in the thirties.

The only interesting feature of the long recess was the election and, as we have heard on all sides and many times, it accomplished nothing. It was time wasted, and now we are back where we were seven months ago, with a tremendous backlog of business that should have been attended to long ago.

I do not think it out of place here to say that I believe the Prime Minister was very poorly advised. I know that many people were greatly annoyed and thought that instead of taking advice from the sources he did—sources which had given him very poor advice on previous occasions—he should have used his own judgment, and the country and Parliament would have been much better off.

We have started a new session, and I hope it will not be like the last two sessions. Over the past two years important business was held up. Many items mentioned in previous Throne speeches were not proceeded with. In my opinion the two previous sessions of Parliament dealt mostly with contentious matters that tended to provoke disunity in this country; matters that could very well have been dealt with at some future time. This is not a time for governments, and especially minority governments, to concern themselves with matters of a contentious nature. They do not have a mandate from the people to do so.

A moment ago I mentioned the fact that we have many problems to solve. Naturally, some are more important than others. From reading the press, the speeches of the provincial premiers and of our own colleagues here and in the House of Commons, it seems to me that we are becoming very familiar with the word "priority." Our leaders, both provincial and federal, realize that in legislation we must deal with first things first. I was very much impressed by the remarks made by Premier Duff Roblin of the province of Manitoba to the other premiers attending the recent Federal-Provincial Conference. He said that in his opinion priorities of legislation should be selected by the premiers of the provinces and representatives of the federal Government, so that we could deal first with the things that are needed most and those we can pay for.

In the so-called Deutsch Report, which I am sure all honourable senators have read, priorities are stressed. It emphasizes the fact that we must do first the things that are necessary and that we can afford, and not be continually expending large sums of money on programs of a temporary nature which are entered into for the sake of expediency.

From that report we learn that one of the first priorities is to make definite preparations for seeing to it that all people have an opportunity of living decent lives. This is most important, and it was mentioned by the mover of the motion yesterday. The report points out that more than one million Canadians are functionally illiterate. That is a great phrase, one which I do not remember hearing before. It means that more than one million Canadians are not prepared for good jobs. They can do only menial work. These people can read and write, but not well enough to enable them to obtain good employment. Lack of sufficient education confines them to the most menial type of work.

This report points out also that this is not the fault of these people. They are usually young men who come from overcrowded homes, urban slums, and farms where there are many children and small homes. It is impossible for them to get the education they should have.

A special secretariat set up by the federal Government has put these conditions in graphic form, and it outlines the causes which begin, naturally, in the school days. The report of the secretariat reads:

> There is no point in expecting adequate homework from a student who must do homework in a small, poorly lit room where the rest of the family live, eat and sleep.

Thousands of them have to do this.

> Similarly, it is not reasonable to expect attention in class from a student who has been kept awake most of the night because he was hungry or for other interfering reasons.

Honourable senators will of course understand that there are many children in some small homes.

A satisfactory education for the poor, the secretariat concludes, cannot be provided by the free public school system when some children are unable to take full advantage of it. The result is that they leave school in the early grades.

Honourable senators will recall that in the recent conference of the eleven provincial and territorial governments the experts divided poverty into three categories. This government, and the Government of the United States, is waging a war on poverty. One group of poor people, we are told, are those who cannot work because of age or physical disability. We know this. Senator Croll's committee has been digging into this problem for some time. The second group comprises those who can work but who cannot find jobs. I am happy to say that that is now a small fraction of the labour force, and it is usually found in a few depressed areas.

The third group includes employed workers who cannot earn a reasonable income. These are the people I was talking about a short time ago. Some are farmers—and I do not mean the farmers of Saskatchewan. I listened to the remarks of my honourable friend the mover (Hon. Mr. McDonald), yesterday when he gave the average income of farmers in Saskatchewan. I could not help but think how happy the farmers of New Brunswick, of Nova Scotia, or any of the four Atlantic provinces would be if they earned anywhere near that much. The honourable mover of the motion did say that there were certain of them who did not make more than $1,000 a year. Well, I understand that in Saskatchewan there is an area where even a rabbit would starve, but that is only a very small part of that province. The fishermen and farmers of the Atlantic provinces would be very happy if they could earn the sums he mentioned, such as an average net income of $6,936 in the higher brackets and $4,300 in the lower brackets.

The older people, say the experts, must be protected by state assistance—that is not news—adequate for support and self-respect. There have been votes in the other place during the past few days on motions by which the Opposition tried to increase the amount of the pension these people receive. I do not know whether the mail of other honourable senators contains correspondence referring to our older people, but I know mine does. It seems to be increasing as time goes on. The letters I receive point out that with the cost of living soaring as it is, these old people cannot pay their bills or live decent lives on the $75 pension they receive from this Government.

The two groups, the unemployed and the underpaid workers, require a manpower policy for high employment and a high productivity economy. This policy must involve increased mobility of labour, intensive training and retraining in modern skills, youth counselling and regional development programs. It must include also good housing and slum clearance. This goes back to the boys and girls living in poor surroundings. There must be more pleasant surroundings, giving the children in the slums and poor districts a chance to study and learn, and thus prepare themselves for something besides menial labour and starvation pay.

Honourable senators, there was a splendid part summary of the Deutsch Report in the Ottawa Journal of January 7. I like to read the editorials in the Journal; they are always good and very much to the point. This one compared especially the educational attainments in the United States and in the Canadian labour forces. The report calls it the widening educational gap and refers to the income gap in the two countries, and the ill effects this has had and is having on the Canadian economy. The report showed that in 1964 and 1965 the average income in Canada was at least 25 per cent below the United States level. That is not very flattering, I am sure.

I will read from the report:

> Over the past half-decade, the average years of schooling increased by about three-fifths in the U.S., but by less than two-fifths in Canada.
> In 1960, about 45 per cent of the U.S. male labor force had four years of high school or more education, compared with 24 per cent in Canada in 1961.
> The average number of years of schooling among Canadian male labor force increased by only two and one-half years over half a century.
> It will take many years for Canada to reach the average educational level already achieved in the U.S.; take decades to close the gap with the U.S.

The report goes on to say:

> There has been a substantial long-term rise in the educational attainments of the Canadian labor force. But the average level of such attainments has been considerably below that of the United States, and has increased more slowly than in the United States. There has thus been a widening 'educational gap' between the two countries.
> This gap appears to have widened particularly at the secondary school level in the inter-war years, and particularly at the university level in the post-war period.
> Differences in the average educational attainments appear to be an important element in the difference in living standards between Canada and the United States.

Honourable senators, I have emphasized the great need there, and explained why there is a priority.

Speaking of vocational training brings me to the question of higher education. This need has been recognized by the present Government in the Speech from the Throne as one of the most demanding priorities. Indeed, it was recognized as such by the former Conservative Government in its national plan for education—the first time a federal government had undertaken a massive educational project. It included both university and vocational and technical education, all in conjunction with the provinces and municipalities, for it must always be recognized that the provinces have first say in education. Today, however, it has become financially beyond their capabilities.

I was pleased to read in the Speech from the Throne that after allowing the scheme to lag, the Government plans to implement to a considerable extent the recommendations of universities for increased financial assistance. The Speech from the Throne says, in part:

> A program of Canada scholarships and bursaries for students undertaking higher education will be submitted for your approval. Amendments will be proposed to the Student Loans Act. As an initial response to the acute financial difficulties encountered by the universities and colleges, you will be asked to approve a substantial increase in the federal financial assistance to universities for the academic year 1966-67.

We are greatly pleased that the Government now intends to increase financial assistance to the universities.

An increased demand for professional and technical education in Canada has long been recognized. We are pitifully short of doctors, dentists, nurses, and engineers, and people generally who are engaged in providing medical services and hospitalization. Quite recently Premier Robarts of Ontario emphasized the particular need, and at the same time pointed out that until we have enough doctors, nurses and other services for our hospitals, it is not reasonable to press for medicare, such as it is being pressed for at the present time.

This is not surprising in the light of the rapid changes taking place in medical science and in our way of life. The challenge which has been and is confronting Canada, as well as other countries, is implicit in a famous statement by Alfred Whitehead, back in 1916. That outstanding English mathematician and philosopher had this to say:

> In the conditions of modern life the rule is absolute: 'The race which does not value trained intelligence is doomed. Not all your heroism, not all your social charm, not all your wit, not all your victories on land or at sea, can move back the finger of fate. Today we maintain ourselves. Tomorrow science will have moved forward yet one more step, and there will be no appeal from the judgment which will then be pronounced on the uneducated.'

That was said 50 years ago, and it applies equally today.

We are told that the per capita grant will at the university level be increased from $2 to $5. We have been asking for that for some time. That was the stand taken by our party in the last election. We hope that some of this money will go to lower tuition fees for students in the universities who are finding so much difficulty in meeting their financial needs.

The amount for scholarships and bursaries, we have also been advised, will be in the vicinity of $40 million. There will also be an increase in the Student Loans Act. All this is very much to the good.

The Maritime provinces are asking for further financial assistance. I forget the name of the character from Dickens who always asked for more—however, in this instance more money is needed, because in the Maritime provinces tuition fees are higher than in any other part of Canada. The percentage of students between 18 and 24 years of age is the lowest in Canada—which surprises me. The average salary we are able to pay our professors at the universities is also the lowest. We have the largest proportion of outside pupils.

With these facts in mind, and having heard that the Government is taking into consideration increased financial assistance to the universities of the Atlantic provinces, we are indeed grateful.

With regard to the needs of the individual student, I would like to recount an experience I had recently when I picked up some boys who were hitch-hiking home for Christmas from Mount Allison University. Up until my conversation with them I had an idea that perhaps we were doing too much for the students, with our loans, scholarships and bursaries, and so on, and that possibly we were taking away some of the initiative they needed to provide themselves with a university education. I checked this with some of our students, and they told me that, for one thing, jobs were scarce during the summer in the Maritime provinces, and that they were obliged to come to Ontario to seek work; that when they arrived in Ontario they were confronted with labour unions and that it was very difficult, not being a member of a union, to obtain work. One of the students told me that he required $2,000 for his schooling. He said, "I have a loan of $1,000, I earn $500, but the remaining $500 I find hard to obtain."

These young men also told me that they wanted to get married when they got through university, and they did not want to incur too large a debt over the years or have to borrow additional money which would have to be paid back. They said they might end up by owing $6,000 to $8,000 after graduating from university. After chatting with these students, and really trying to appreciate their problem, I found myself in sympathy with them.

Another problem which is sometimes mentioned is that when the people of Canada, through their Government, find that they are spending so much money to educate our young people, they ask what can be done to assure that their services will remain available to Canada and they will not be encouraged to go elsewhere. Possibly something can be done about that.

Another matter which should be high on the list of priorities is that of our national resources. I listened yesterday to the honourable mover of the address: he pointed out the immense wealth that we have in Canada. No country has such natural resources and potential wealth as we have. I want to speak particularly of our water resources.

Until recently, few people realized how important these are. Water was always taken for granted, just as the air we breathe. I am sure that the good Lord intended that every man and beast and bird and fish was entitled to water, to pure water. And it was so provided until man made it otherwise.

Take our North American continent. We had pure water up to, perhaps, the beginning of the century. I remember as a boy reading Fenimore Cooper's books, The Pathfinder, The Last of the Mohicans and others. He used to write about his ancestors visiting small streams, rivers and lakes filled with pure sparkling water. Today we are told that those same rivers in most of the states of the Union are nothing more than open sewers. We have read with dismay that, even in the case of our Great Lakes, Lake Erie in particular has hundreds of miles of dead water, that is, water where neither fish nor any other life can be preserved. People have had to move back from their beaches because of the stench and smell in the summertime. The shortage of water was brought particularly to the attention of the American people last year, in the City of New York and other localities. These people have destroyed their own water resources and are looking to Canada for help. Canada will have to make some provision; she will be compelled to work in some way with the United States regarding the supply of pure water in the future.

In Canada the conditions are not as bad. We have about 70 per cent of the fresh water of the North American continent. It is also estimated that we have about one-third of the world's supply of fresh water. But it is time for us now—indeed it is long past—to begin to preserve our water supply. I can remember that when I was a boy in my own province we had sparkling rivers, but they too, as my good friend Senator Burchill can tell you, are becoming polluted and very little if anything is being done to prevent it.

Honourable senators, I should like to add on this point that there is no body in Canada more capable of studying a matter of this kind than the Canadian Senate. Instead of appointing expensive committees and commissions, as has been done time and time again, I would like to see work of this kind given to our Canadian Senate. I am sure the people would appreciate it, and the Senate committees could do a very fine job.

Mention was made yesterday by both the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, of Canada in world affairs. In the Throne Speech we read:

> As a member of the United Nations, as a member of the Commonwealth of which our beloved Queen is the head, and as a partner in the North Atlantic Alliance, Canada will strive to make the greatest possible contribution to improve international relations and assure peace with justice to all peoples.

Those are very fine words. Our support of the United Nations, its principles and goals, has never been in question. Our peacekeeping operations have taken our soldiers, as was also mentioned yesterday, to troubled spots all over the world. They have a splendid record, one which is well known and of which we can be justly proud.

The attitude of political parties and the Canadian citizenry in general with regard to the field of foreign affairs has a peculiar characteristic. It is that political parties have enjoyed agreement on basic external policy, whether holding office or not, while, on the other hand, the Canadian citizenry have almost consistently given broad national agreement to these policies. This has been true under all Canadian governments, as it should be.

We are proud of our peacekeeping activities in Gaza, Korea, the Congo and elsewhere. We can be just as proud of our other United Nations activities and efforts, such as the endeavours towards eradication of disease, the elimination of poverty and hunger, the wiping out of illiteracy, assistance to trade and economic advancement to developing nations, and many others. In these activities of course we recognize that our collective prosperity and security can be guaranteed only within a framework of co-operative interdependence among nations. A policy of isolation is impossible today. Speaking in general, Canada has never been an isolationist country, and I am sure she never will be. Therefore, Canada finds herself holding membership in most of the world's great political, military and economic organizations where her presence is of benefit to the world in general and to herself in particular. I refer of course to the United Nations, NATO, the Commonwealth, United States and Canada joint defence program, the World Health Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization and many others.

I did intend to say something on Rhodesia but I will leave that to another time. This is not one of those problems where black is black and white is white. There is more to it than that. You cannot say one side is absolutely right and the other wrong. We all regret that Premier Ian Smith of Rhodesia is not more tractable. I believe and hope it is a problem that can be solved without too much trouble. It is one of the major problems in the world today. I do not think that getting tough is the solution. There must be some other way to handle it than those which have been suggested by Prime Minister Smith or Prime Minister Wilson of Great Britain.

Speaking of foreign aid, Canada contributed more than half a billion dollars—$528,678,000—in money, services and equipment as part of the Colombo Plan from 1951 to the end of the 1964-65 fiscal year.

It is extremely difficult to estimate the number of foreign aid programs under way around the world. Canada is serving in 50 to 65 countries. This does not include Latin America or sub-continental countries.

Some contributions to be appropriated in the 1965-66 fiscal year, as far as I can find out, are as follows: To the United Nations Special Fund, $5 million; to the World Health Organization, $1,382,000; to the United Nations Children's Fund, $1 million; to the Economic, Technical Educational and other assistance, the Commonwealth Africa Aid Program, the Commonwealth Caribbean Assistance Plan, the Commonwealth Scholarship Plan, etc., $48,500,000.

Canada's contribution to foreign aid is increasing. It is expected that an estimated $250 million will be appropriated for the current fiscal year. Even at this figure I understand that although we are making very large contributions, the per capita amount that we contribute is below that of the United States, the United Kingdom, France, West Germany, Belgium and, I think, Japan.

Honourable senators it is impossible to determine how much private agencies have contributed in terms of dollars in this field. The list which I have given comprises public agencies. The External Aid Office estimates that there are from 75 to 80 private agencies assisting people overseas. Their spending cannot be estimated but it is well up in the millions or perhaps in the tens of millions.

A matter which is not in the Speech from the Throne but which is being mentioned quite commonly in Canada is as to whether or not Canada should join the Organization of American States. This was prompted by Mr. Pearson's recent trip to Jamaica, and his subsequent statements. He implied that our acceptance of membership may depend upon whether Trinidad and Tobago, and Jamaica are asked to join. Both the United States and Latin American countries for many years have urged Canada to join, so this is not something new. Presumably our position would be that of a buffer between the South American countries and the United States. The United States, of course, have long wanted our help in handling many of the very difficult problems involved, and in this connection I would just mention the Dominican Republic and Cuba. This, in my opinion, is strong enough reason not to join. Canada should not be placed in the position of a buffer. Our relations with the United States have always been of first importance and we should guard them jealously, much more than our relations with Latin American countries. If we were to join the Organization of American States we might frequently be placed in the position where we would have to disagree with the United States, and in doing so take sides, as it were, between them and the Organization of American States or various South American states.

Our association with the Caribbean countries through the Commonwealth has nothing whatever to do with the O.A.S. These countries are part of the Commonwealth and we have responsibilities towards them, but we feel that should they decide to join the O.A.S. it does not necessarily follow that we must also join. In my opinion that would be the least important reason for joining. The Caribbean countries have much more in common with Latin America than has Canada. Our political and economic thinking flows more east and west than it does to the extreme south. As the Montreal Star stated in an editorial on January 21, 1966:

> Membership in the O.A.S. might make sense for the Caribbean islands. It might also make eventual sense for us. But not yet.

There is simply nothing to gain. There is hardly a stable government in the South American countries at the present time. If we were to join the O.A.S. at this stage we would, in my view, simply be borrowing trouble.

There are many other matters I could mention but I do not intend wearying the house for many minutes longer. There was mention in the speech of fair wages and hours of labour, and I understand a bill has been prepared which I hope will solve our difficulties in this field. We are having far too many strikes in Canada—we have even reached the stage where school children are going on strike. It seems as if everybody wants to strike.

Then, there is mention of the Canadian Vessels Construction Act which is to be amended. Unfortunately, there is to be a reduction in the subsidy from 35 to 25 per cent. Canada has to meet the competition of cheaper labour in other parts of the world. Nevertheless, we have built up a splendid shipbuilding industry in this country. In this regard I am thinking particularly of the Maritime provinces and especially of the City of Saint John where we have one of the best shipbuilding yards in Canada. When a subsidy of 35 per cent was paid, the employment in the shipyards in the City of Saint John increased from 300 to 3,000. This meant much to the people of that city and indeed of that area generally. I hope this 25 per cent which the Government is planning to contribute will assist our shipyards in meeting the competition from other countries.

There was mention of feed grain. This, honourable senators, is an old story. We very much need feed grain from the west and we should have storage. The mover of the address spoke about the Railway Act and what transportation and railways mean to Saskatchewan. We cannot overemphasize the importance of railroads and transportation to the Atlantic provinces. They mean our very existence, and we are consequently very much interested in the amendments to the Railway Act.

Then, there was mention of the Company of Young Canadians. I am pleased to see that young Canadians are to be sent to other countries and to different parts of our own great country. In my view there are no better ambassadors anywhere, and particularly in our own country today, than young men and women who go from one section of the country to the other the better to know their own country and their own people. We had quite a number of young people from the west come to the Maritime provinces during the summer. They received a tremendous welcome and went back home with great praise for what they had seen. Ours is a vast country and it is difficult for our people to get to know each other thoroughly. I read recently that fifty young people will leave Quebec for the west in the near future. That is the only way our people will ever get to know each other. As I have said, I do not know of any better ambassadors than our own young people. In many ways I feel they are better than some of our politicians or college professors and others who are sticking their noses into these matters.

There was also mention in the speech about Ottawa being our true capital where all can feel at home. Frankly, honourable senators, I do not know what that means. We want Canadians, no matter where they come from, to feel at home in all parts of the country, not only in the capital. How are we going to make them feel at home in the capital? I notice Mr. René Lévesque wants to change the face of Montreal. Montreal is one of the great cities of the world and the largest city in Canada. We in the Maritimes are very fond of Montreal. There was a time when we used to go to Boston or to New York, but now we look to Montreal instead. I may say that many of us feel more at home in the City of Montreal than we do in the capital. So let us hope that they will not change the face of Montreal too much.

Honourable senators, I have little more to say. I notice that there was reference in the speech to the Civil Service of Canada. I hope there will be no tinkering so far as it is concerned, and I am sure there will not be. People are appointed to the civil service because of their efficiency, as is only right. With the educational systems we have today in all parts of Canada, young people, no matter what part of the country they come from, are qualified to enter the civil service.

Speaking of young people brings to my mind the strike of teachers in Hull. There, when the teachers would not come to teach them, the young men organized themselves, prepared their own lectures and began teaching themselves. I would close by saying that as long as we have young people of that calibre in Canada we have no need to fear for the future of this country.

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, in rising at this time to participate in the debate on the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I of course feel the absence of our distinguished Leader (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West).

May I at the outset congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address. Senator McDonald made a truly noteworthy and exceptionally promising contribution to this debate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: He comes to us from the great Province of Saskatchewan, where he has enjoyed an outstanding career. He was a member of the provincial Legislature from 1948 until his resignation last year. Senator McDonald also served for a period of time as Provincial Leader of his party and as Minister of Agriculture. We look forward to his active participation in our work and are pleased to welcome him.

The reputation of Senator Gouin, the senior representative of the Province of Quebec in this house, is so well established that it is not possible to add to it.

Son of a former Prime Minister of the province of Quebec, he followed his family's tradition. His literary accomplishments, his knowledge of history and his philosophical turn of mind enabled him yesterday to make a most excellent speech which all the members of the Senate greatly appreciated. I congratulate him and thank him for it.

[Text]

I would indeed be remiss if I did not at this point offer sincere congratulations to our new Speaker. Mr. Speaker, we know your lengthy experience and contribution in this chamber qualify you in every respect for the high honour you have received. We wish you well in the discharge of your duties and anticipate with pleasure your benign and informed supervision of our deliberations.

May I add this very personal remark, that for the nine years the honourable Speaker has been a member of this chamber he has never been penalized for an absence and has never missed a meeting on account of sickness.

May I also say how very pleased we are that Mrs. Smith is accompanying you. We look forward to pleasant social relations with you and Mrs. Smith during this Parliament.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I would be remiss if I failed to mention Senator Maurice Bourget's term of office as Speaker of this assembly. During the few years he presided over our deliberations, Speaker Bourget discharged his responsibilities with ability and dignity. Furthermore, his charming wife was a great comfort to him in the carrying out of his functions by adding that feminine touch which is so necessary to enable the Speaker to discharge the often delicate tasks with which he is entrusted.

I am happy to welcome him back to the ranks of the private members of the Senate. No doubt he will be a great credit to this house and will add further to his stature.

[Text]

I also wish, on behalf of the Government and personally, especially to welcome among us Senator William Benidickson. Senator Benidickson has had lengthy parliamentary experience. Trained in the law, he was first elected to the House of Commons for the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River in 1945, after distinguished wartime service in the R.C.A.F. Senator Benidickson was re-elected at six successive general elections, and also served in the other place as a Parliamentary Secretary and as Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. In the Senate we need members who have had experience in the public affairs of our country, and we are pleased to see Senator Benidickson take his place here with us.

Before starting to talk about the Speech from the Throne, I would like to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) for the manner in which he has fulfilled his duties. I quite understand it has not been an easy task. Indeed, I think he would have been much better off had he spoken from my side rather than from his own.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: For different reasons!

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: For different reasons, yes. Within the very best traditions of the Senate, he has expressed his doubts and propositions with the dignity that suits this house and without the venom that sometimes one feels one must use. He can rest assured that the traditions will be observed on this side.

Honourable senators, before speaking to the proposals contained in the Throne Speech of the First Session of the Twenty-seventh Parliament, I would like to cast a glance backwards to the Twenty-sixth Parliament.

The Twenty-sixth Parliament recalls, I am sure, many memories and attitudes. It was a Parliament of near traumatic highs and depressing lows but, regardless of the political point of view one might have had, it was a Parliament of substantial accomplishments. Major legislative proposals were enacted. I am thinking of such items as the Canada Pension Plan, the Flag, integration of our defence forces, the establishment of the Department of Industry, the Columbia River Treaty, the Municipal Development Loan Board, Redistribution, the establishment of the Economic Council, reductions in personal income tax, and many others as well. Moreover, it was a period of strong economic expansion which benefitted all sectors of the economy and all sections of the country.

The Senate shared in a significant way in the workload of the last Parliament. Virtually every Government bill which within the limits of the Constitution could be introduced in the Senate in the first instance was initiated here. Excellent work was done by this chamber in relation to such matters as the twelve-mile limit, the Canada Shipping Act, the Harbour Commissions Act and the Companies Act.

In addition, our committees actively engaged in reviewing legislation and in conducting special studies. These studies conducted in the Senate have been and continue to be invaluable. In the recent past the Special Committee on Manpower produced an excellent report which laid the groundwork for Government action in a critical area. In the same way, the findings of its Special Committee on Land Use were of great service.

In the last Parliament the Special Committee on Aging studied one aspect of what is rapidly becoming a most important problem facing Government. As I indicated the other day, its findings are almost complete and we look forward with eager anticipation to its report. I am confident that the results of this committee's work will reflect great credit on the Senate and on the members of the committee who have been so assiduous in their study.

The Senate also played an active role in the study Parliament has been making of the problems of consumer credit. Our colleague Senator Croll has been a prime mover in this area as well. That joint committee, as the Throne Speech indicates, will be reconstituted during this session, and I expect that when its work is concluded it too will have proved to have been of great value.

The Twenty-sixth Parliament had an impact on the operation of this chamber in other ways as well. The state of political tension that existed in the other place and the manner in which they conducted their business resulted in highly irregular sittings here and in frustrations and delays that were not of our making. I am hopeful that the procedural changes adopted last session by the Commons and re-adopted with a few minor variations only last Friday, will produce a more regular flow of parliamentary business.

Of course, the most important act of the Twenty-sixth Parliament which bears directly on the operation of the Senate was the adoption of the Retirement of Senators Act. This act divides senators into two main groups: those appointed after the passage of the act, and those who were members of the Senate prior to the act receiving Royal Assent on June 2, 1965.

In respect of the first group I have isolated, those senators appointed after the passage of the act, the act provides that they hold their commission until they attain age 75, at which time they retire on a pension to which they have contributed. The pension referred to is that set out in the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. The level of benefit is directly related to the amount of a senator's contribution, and he must contribute in respect of sessions in more than two Parliaments to be eligible for a retirement and a survivor benefit.

I should also point out that senators in this category need not be in receipt of a retirement allowance in order that their widow or widower receive survivor benefit. The maximum pension available under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act is $9,000, and the maximum survivor benefit is $5,400.

In respect of the second group of senators I have referred to—those who were members of this house prior to the passage of the Retirement of Senators Act—the first and foremost observation to be made is that there is nothing whatever in the act which curtails the privilege of holding a life commission. In other words, there is absolutely no interference with the right to hold one's place here for life.

However, the Retirement of Senators Act also provides certain options and grounds for retirement for senators holding life commissions. The fact that since last June seven of our colleagues have availed themselves of the opportunity to retire, suggests to me at least, that these additional options are a welcome feature of the legislation.

Under the act a senator holding a life commission may, if he so chooses, retire within one year of his attaining age 75, or within one year of the passage of the act if he had already attained that age when the act became law. Additionally, a senator holding a life commission may retire if he is or becomes the victim of a permanent disabling infirmity. This second basis for retirement operates independently of any age requirement.

A senator who retires for either of the reasons I have just mentioned is entitled to an annuity equal to two-thirds of his sessional indemnity, and the widow of a senator who had been in receipt of such an annuity is entitled to an annuity equal to one-third of that which her husband had been receiving.

Honourable senators, the Retirement of Senators Act provides one further option to senators holding life commissions. It is available only to those under age 75, and must be exercised within one year from the coming into force of this act—that is, by June 2 next. This option permits eligible senators who so desire, to come under the provisions of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. The effect of this option is to place senators who elect such a course in exactly the same position as senators appointed after the passage of the Retirement of Senators Act.

Honourable senators, it is with some reservation that I have spoken at length of the last Parliament, and of the statute which has so many implications for the membership of this chamber. I have done so in order that there be on record a summary of how the act operates, and I am prompted to do this by the large number of queries received about the effect of the new legislation. I hope the summary I have given will be of assistance.

Turning to the Speech from the Throne itself, one finds in it, first of all, a confirmation that the increase the last decade or so has witnessed in the workload of Parliament continues unabated. The speech has come in for considerable comment, much of which appears to centre on the fact that there is little that is "new". Be that as it may, I am sure most honourable senators will agree that it contains much that is "necessary", and this, I believe, is a more valid point of view from which to examine the contents of the speech.

The same comment has been made with respect to the Speech from the Throne given at the opening of the Quebec Legislature yesterday. Nobody seems to be satisfied with a Speech from the Throne unless it contains something completely unexpected.

For example, the Speech from the Throne proposes parliamentary consideration of such subjects as banking, railways, agriculture, fisheries, rural development, reorganization of government departments, fiscal arrangements with the provinces, the Canada Assistance Plan, assistance to universities and university students, training allowances for members of the labour force, medicare and many other subjects as well.

These are subject areas of great importance. I know I speak for all when I say the Senate stands ready to give these matters its closest and most constructive attention. And while it would be too much to expect that there will be unanimity in this chamber over the courses of action the Government will be proposing—indeed, I am not sure that such unanimity, even if attainable, would be desirable—I am sure that our differences in outlook will be sincere, and the positions we adopt will be taken in the interest of Parliament and Canada.

Honourable senators, we must await the appearance of the resolutions and bills themselves in order to have the information that is necessary for a complete assessment and judgment of the Government's proposals. However, in anticipation of these details being made available to us, there are several matters referred to in the Speech from the Throne that I would specifically draw to your favourable attention.

The Speech from the Throne contains the sentence:

> Our country is enjoying an unprecedented period of prosperity and growth.

This deceptively simple statement is the key to much of what is proposed in the Throne Speech. It also sums up an amazing economic performance by the country. The year 1965 saw the broadly based economic expansion we have been enjoying, not only continued but in some areas accelerated. Final figures are not yet available, but it would appear that last year our gross national product increased a shade faster than the 8.9 per cent growth rate of 1964. With price changes excluded, real output rose by over 6 per cent, following gains of 6½ per cent in 1964 and 4½ per cent in 1963. The value of our gross national product in 1965 was for the first time in our history more than $50 billion. This rate of growth is encouraging in itself. It is also encouraging in comparison with the rate experienced in other western countries.

In respect to the labour force, the year just passed has been one of progress and continuing improvement. Unemployment dropped to the lowest point in nine years, and the unemployment rate for the year as a whole was 3.9 per cent. In recent months it has been significantly below that level.

I believe it fair to say that with the national rate below 4 per cent, the dimensions of the whole problem of unemployment have been substantially reduced. In fact, the combination of increasing job opportunities and declining unemployment has produced labour shortages in certain occupations and areas of the country. Our responsibility more and more lies in developing programs to aid those areas of the country and those people who are not sharing fully in Canada's prosperity, and programs aimed at realizing this objective will be placed before Parliament for consideration and action.

In the year ahead of us, we can expect higher levels of employment, production and incomes. Present indications are that the main sources of demand will continue to be strong, and a further major increase in business investment appears likely. However, with less slack available in our physical resources, expansion of output in 1966 will likely be somewhat less than the high growth rates experienced in the last two years.

In fact, with the economy working closer to capacity, the expansion in national output for 1966 will depend to a greater extent than in the past on a more effective use of available resources and manpower.

The Government is acutely aware of this, and rightly so, for it is only out of the increased revenues generated by an expanding economy that its vital proposals can be met.

The Speech from the Throne contains many references to the effective use of valuable resources. A new department of government, to be known as the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, is proposed; so also is a science council to further encourage scientific research; and effective rural development, to take another example, is also part of the proper utilization of valuable resources.

In another and related vein, the Speech from the Throne includes a passage which reveals the Government's determination to prevent the boom we are enjoying being jeopardized by excessive costs and prices. The Government's intention "to continue its policy of stretching out its expenditure on public construction projects in areas of heavy pressure on the construction industry" is a clear indication that it is prepared to do what is necessary to ensure economic stability.

The effective use of manpower is another critical necessity of an expanding economy. As such it has received a considerable amount of attention in the Speech from the Throne. A new department of government called the Department of Manpower is to be established. It will bring together the Immigration Branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and various sections of the Department of Labour— the National Employment Service, the Technical and Vocational Training Branch, the Civilian Rehabilitation Branch, the Manpower Consultative Service, and other services relating to manpower. This will make it possible for the Government's manpower policies to respond more quickly and efficiently to the ever-changing needs of the country.

There are many immediate tasks. Production in many industries is now being hampered by lack of skilled labour. These shortages must be relieved, preferably by up-grading the existing labour force, but, if this is not sufficient, through immigration. It is equally important to ensure that the available skills are in the places where industry wants them and at the time they are wanted. For this purpose, steps are being taken to improve the effectiveness of the Government's employment services.

Honourable senators, I would like also briefly to refer to another proposal in the Speech from the Throne which will be engaging our attention and is of the highest importance. I refer to the Government's intention—as the speech reads:

> ...to foster more effective development of the human resources of Canada by assisting the expansion of institutions of higher education, and by providing greater and more equitable opportunities for young Canadians to attend such institutions.

There is a tendency in many quarters to dismiss summarily this type of proposal as an invasion of provincial rights. It is true that the provinces have jurisdiction in relation to education, but for many years the federal Government has been assisting institutions of higher education in a manner which fully respects the jurisdiction of the province. The additional assistance envisaged in the Throne Speech will be very substantial—a 150 per cent increase in the per capita grant has already been pledged as interim assistance for universities in the academic year 1966-67, and will be rendered in a manner consistent with the jurisdictional position of the provinces.

Government assistance to individuals seeking higher education takes the form of scholarships, bursaries and loans. Student aid, originating with the federal Government, has a long history. Perhaps the best known example is the crash program developed for returning veterans in the years following World War II. But there are numerous other programs as well, and in the last Parliament we added to them. We adopted a system of youth allowances designed to encourage youth of 16 and 17 to stay in school. We also established a student loan program, which has been extensively used and very favourably received, so much so, that amendments authorizing increases in the amounts available will come before us this session.

What is now proposed is a comprehensive program of scholarships and bursaries to round out the student aid picture. The fundamental objective is to insure that no young Canadian of ability be deprived of higher education. It is an objective that all can subscribe to without reservation, and I am sure we all look forward to its enactment.

Honourable senators, I want to dwell for a minute on the reasons for the federal Government making additional resources available for higher education. It seems to me that there are two very valid reasons for the federal Government's concern and involvement. The language of the Throne Speech puts it on the basis of developing the "human resources of Canada". H. G. Wells put it in another and perhaps more graphic, way, when he wrote:

> The history of man is becoming more and more a race between education and disaster.

A second explanation of federal Government assistance to higher education can be developed from a view of education as investment. The Second Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada, published a few weeks ago, traces in detail the relationship of education to economic growth. Its analysis clearly shows that society's educational "stock" is a vital conditioning element of its gross national income. The Council concludes its analysis of this relationship by underscoring "the need for sustained and unflagging efforts to strengthen and expand the educational base for long-term future growth of the economy and the living standards of Canadians."

Before resuming my seat, there is one other subject referred to in the Throne Speech upon which I would like to comment. I am thinking here of the Canada Assistance Plan, which has been a subject of discussion of at least two federal-provincial conferences, and which will shortly come before Parliament for approval.

It is with some trepidation that I refer to this subject because it is now part of the great—and, if I may be permitted to so describe it—political debate about Old Age Pensions. In order to place the Canada Assistance program in its proper perspective, I must ask for your indulgence while I briefly review the actions taken in respect of pensions by this Government.

Since taking office in April 1963, the Government has increased the Old Age Security pension to $75 per month, and is reducing by successive stages the qualifying age for these payments to 65 years. Beginning in January of this year, they are paid to persons age 69, and by 1970 will be paid to everyone from his or her 65th birthday. In addition, Parliament has legislated that in future pensions will automatically be adjusted upwards in line with changes in living costs.

This Government has also established the Canada Pension Plan, which came into operation January 1 of this year and is the greatest single advance ever realized in providing adequate retirement income. It is an earnings-related pension plan with a ten-year transitional period, with a maximum pension of $104.00 per month available from age 65. Benefits from the Canada Pension Plan are, of course, in addition to the $75 per month payment out of Old Age Security funds. The combination of the Canada Pension Plan and Old Age Security will provide an adequate retirement income for the great majority of Canadians.

However, in the Government's programs for retirement income for our senior citizens there exists a gap which needs to be filled. This gap centres on those now retired and who, therefore, get no benefit from the Canada Pension Plan, and on those who will be retiring and who will get little or no benefit from the Canada Pension Plan.

The Government has two proposals to provide additional assistance for this particular group.

The first proposal is the Canada Assistance Plan. This is a program which has been worked out in consultation with the provinces, because it will operate in an area where provincial jurisdiction is paramount. In brief, the plan will help those who, because of age or other reasons, could not qualify for the benefits that will become available under the Canada Pension Plan or who will need additional benefits. It will help such people according to their needs without a means test, and there is no ceiling on the level of payment envisaged.

Under this plan the provinces, which certainly have exclusive jurisdiction in the matter of help to the poor and needy, will determine the amount needed to meet the cost of living in each province. This assistance will be available whether persons receive Old Age Security or not, whether they are young or old, whether sick or disabled—the only criteria will be the one of need, and the federal Government will share the cost of the contribution each province makes to its needy.

In this way, no pension will be paid to those who do not need it, as exists at the present time. However, every cent available will be paid to people who do need it, whether they receive the Old Age Security pension or not. If a province decides that the minimum that is needed in certain areas is $100 a month, and proposes to the federal Government that $100 a month pension shall be paid, then the federal Government will share the cost with the province, whether the $100 goes to a person of 65 or 70 years of age or more, or whether the person is disabled, or is only 20 years of age.

The second proposal which will assist senior citizens is medicare. When in effect—and the target date is July 1, 1967—it will relieve all pensioners of a major expense. Indeed, it will assist all Canadians in a most important area, that of developing and maintaining a high standard of national health.

Honourable senators, that is the framework within which Mr. Pearson's Government proposes to make additional assistance available to retired persons. It features an approach which is flexible and capable of providing effectively the additional assistance required.

In discussing this topic there is one other observation I would make. We in the Senate will shortly be in a position to examine this problem in a comprehensive fashion. I refer to the fact that the Special Committee on Aging, which has been studying this question, will very shortly be making its report. I know we all look forward to receiving its findings on this important topic.

Honourable senators, we are just beginning work in a new Parliament on the eve of the centenary of Confederation. When our forefathers decided to create a new independent country on the northern half of this great continent, they took upon themselves a heroic and difficult responsibility.

They had to strike a delicate political balance between the various regions of the country and between the two founding races. They found this balance in the establishment of a federal state and their creation has endured for almost 100 years. Indeed it has more than endured. It has flourished, and Canada has made the transition from a small agricultural community to a modern industrial state. Moreover, it has done this in a way that has served to strengthen national unity.

To the statesmen of Confederation and to their successors is due much of the credit for our progress. I say this in a very deliberate way, because Confederation itself was the product of a conscious political decision. The establishment of an independent nation was only one of the alternatives facing Canada in the period 1864 to 1867. But it was this alternative that commanded the sympathy and the enthusiasm of the Fathers of Confederation. It may be, in fact I am sure it was, that the task the Fathers set themselves was more difficult than even they realized. But in their efforts and desire for a strong, independent and free Canada they never wavered.

I think of Macdonald, the first Prime Minister, whose great contribution it was to ensure that Canada truly had Dominion from sea to sea. Sir John pursued this goal with every power and ounce of strength at his command and he changed the destiny of a continent in realizing his dream.

I think of Laurier, under whom the West was opened up to settlement and Canada's identification as an independent country advanced. And Laurier proved and did something else. He was the first Canadian prime minister of his race, and he proved for all time that his people are a fundamental part of the fabric that is Canada.

The successors of these men were also political statesmen of the first order. They each had a vision of a free, independent and strong Canada, and all of them conducted themselves to further this goal.

Honourable senators, the people and parliamentarians of the Canada of today are the heirs to a magnificent heritage, and it is good on the eve of our centennial to reflect on the legacy of our history. But how much better it is to resolve that we of this generation will be worthy of our history, that we will find within us the determination to go forward in peace and unity towards an even greater and more glorious second centennial.

To my French-speaking compatriots, I must say how proud I am of the steps they have taken in the last few years with a view to a greater participation in the economy and progress of Canada. They are proud of their cultural heritage. They want their culture to improve in all fields. They feel that the efforts they have made for a more general education, for higher, technical and specialized education are continuing; that is a vital investment. They want, and rightly so, to direct their own culture and to have complete autonomy in this field; besides, they have an absolute right to that. This is what has enabled French-speaking Canadians, in the last few years, to play, at least in an important part of Canada, an unquestionably greater role than they ever had. If we compare the Province of Quebec today with what it was even less than ten years ago, we are surprised at its tremendous economic and cultural progress and at the increasing respect which it has won through these attitudes from non-French-speaking Canadians.

Let us hope that English-speaking Canadians and French-speaking Canadians have more frequent contacts and that these result in feelings of increased mutual dignity and respect. I remain convinced that if so much progress has been accomplished in the space of a few years, a deeper and more complete knowledge of one another and co-operation in all fields will bring for us all, and especially for the whole of our country, the economic and cultural progress which, accompanied by an atmosphere of respect and dignity, will lead all Canadians whatever their languages to feel at home in each and every part of Canada.

Canada cannot expect such economic developments without the co-operation of one with the other and without an economic stability which will encourage foreigners to invest in our country the capital that we need and are obliged to get elsewhere. A Canadian unity which will respect the dignity and pride of both our great cultures is essential to the prosperity of Canada and each of its regions.

Let us hope that our politicians and our businessmen, our economists and our scientists, will succeed in creating such a climate in Canada, so that the second centennial of Confederation can bring to the two cultures all the advantages which Canada has to offer and which unity, stability and mutual respect cannot fail to provide to our country.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, January 26, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Edgar E. Fournier: Honourable senators, I appreciate the honour of your indulgence for a few minutes to discuss with you what I call the nation's number one problem.

Before I do so, I wish to compliment both the mover and the seconder of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, on the way in which they carried out their duties. All honourable senators will agree that they deserve much praise for their successful effort and for their ability, as there was so little to talk about in the Speech from the Throne.

May I congratulate the honourable Senator Sydney J. Smith on his new assignment as our honourable Speaker. Three years ago, when I was appointed to the Senate, one of my first acquaintances here was Senator Smith. He was our leader at the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association Convention at Lagos. It was then that I met him, worked with him, and learned to appreciate his wisdom and his friendship, and to know him as a true and devoted Canadian. I am sure that Senator Smith will carry out the duties which have been bestowed upon him with that same degree of success as did his predecessor, Senator Bourget, whose ability and wisdom we held in high esteem when he was our honourable Speaker.

May I wish a speedy recovery to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the honourable Senator John J. Connolly. May I also extend our best wishes to my own Leader, Honourable Mr. Brooks. May the good Lord protect them for a long time.

[Translation]

Senator Bouffard, who replied to Senator Brooks' remarks, also performed his task in a masterly manner.

However, I must admit that I was much more impressed by his eloquence than by his utterances.

We are well aware, for that matter, that if the shoe had been on the other foot, if Senator Bouffard had been required to criticize the Speech from the Throne, he would have shown the same eloquence, but he would have used a different vocabulary.

I should, therefore, congratulate him for the skill with which he fulfilled his task, and as we would say in French: Il parla avec éloquence; in English: He spoke with eloquence; in Spanish: El hablo con elocuencia; and as Senator Croll would say: Goot os ga Dreekt.

[Text]

Honourable senators, before I embark on this nation's number one problem, may I be permitted to make a few remarks on some other matters. First, I should like to say a few words about the Atlantic Development Board. I have some appreciation even for the little this board has done. Its grant of $20 million to the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission was a good move, and should be beneficial in reducing the cost of electricity in our province. But much more could be done. I am one who does not share the opinion of the board that some of this money should be spent to build highways or bridges. Highways and bridges should be built by using sources of financing other than the funds of the board.

I am of the opinion that this money should instead be used to assist struggling industries and so promote employment. For instance, a good move would be to allocate some of the board's money to fill the gap in shipbuilding assistance, which has been reduced to 25 per cent from 35 per cent by the Government of the day. This extra 10 per cent would greatly assist the Maritime shipbuilding industry and make it more competitive with that of central and western Canada, and thus promote the construction of ships which would not otherwise be built. Some of this board money could very easily be placed to assist railway passenger service in areas where such service has been discontinued. And, honourable senators, let us not forget that in areas where such services have been discontinued the economy is seriously affected. Some of that money could be used to give assistance to local or municipal airports, to assist our New Brunswick coal industries, which would result in cheaper electrical energy, and to assist other small industries.

Now I offer a word about the Saint John River development. This is a subject of great confusion at the moment. May I just say briefly that the upper Saint John River development has become a political squash, where the people of the northern region of the State of Maine and of New Brunswick are being led to support a white elephant under the pretense that a great new era of progress is in sight.

I am quite prepared to admit that during the construction, even if more than 80 per cent of the work and equipment does not benefit the region—as such equipment will be built hundreds of miles away at industrial American centres—there is no doubt that the construction period will bring some benefit, but after the construction nothing will be left but old shacks, debris and shrubs.

I am afraid that the people of that region have not yet understood the difference between peak power and firm power. This proposed dam—and I am referring to the Dickey Dam—is only for peaking power, except for approximately three months out of twelve when it will be firm power, because of a lack of water.

From experience I can say very frankly that peaking power does not interest or promote industries, but serves only to assist existing industries at peak load or at difficult load periods. What will it benefit the northern Maine and the New Brunswick region if this peaking power is taken down to Boston or the New England States, as is admitted in the plans?

I still cannot see how any responsible people will approve the spending of $227 million for such a power plant and $75 million to construct high-line voltage to carry this power hundreds of miles away to the Boston area—to build a hydro power plant depending solely on water where there is actually no water for the better part of the year. No one would like more than I to see this area energized with ample electrical energy to revive the economy of the region. If this is what we want, the answer is not the Dickey Dam but rather nuclear power which would not cost more than the initial cost of $225 million and then the area would have some millions of kilowatts of firm power, around the clock 365 days a year. This is the type of power needed to help these industries.

It is my hope that those interested would think twice before buying an "elephant" which could be more expensive to feed than the work which it will produce.

During my days as Chairman of the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission, the Dickey Dam was not even in sight or in contemplation, but a site some four miles east of the Dickey Dam, called Rankins Rapids, was the selected site. This Rankins Rapids site would include all the benefits of the Allagash River and its numerous lakes. And even at that, the Rankins Rapids power plant was rated as a peaking power plant to firm the tidal development of the Passamaquoddy. The Passamaquoddy has now been ruled out as being too expensive, and what is here is similar to the offer to firm the Dickey Dam power. I appreciate the ambitions of some politicians to build this huge dam but, dollar for dollar, is that the best project for the region?

I remember very well when we had the honour of building Beechwood Dam on the Saint John River, which dam depends entirely on the waters of that river.

While we were carrying out this project we were building a 60,000 kilowatt thermal plant at Grand Lake. Then we built another 100,000 kilowatt plant at Saint John, and while the Government of New Brunswick is building this new dam known as Mactaquac, 200,000 kilowatts of thermal power are being added at Saint John, because one cannot work without the other.

I would like also to say a word on capital punishment as one who twice had occasion to witness the carrying out of capital punishment. Those are experiences which cannot be described without some feeling of emotion. However, I must say that at this moment, even with these sad and regrettable memories, I still favour capital punishment.

I regret to say that up to now the group favouring its abolition have not convinced me of what they are proclaiming, and they have spent more time telling of the cruelty and inhumanity of this penalty than exposing the causes which lead to such action. As far as I am concerned, they have not yet arrived at a positive decision. To me there are only two aspects to this problem. Firstly, if capital punishment is abolished, what provision will be made to take proper care of the criminals who refuse to accept a free society, and what is there to protect society?

Secondly, if capital punishment is retained and carried out by the present method, is it the best humanitarian way?

Honourable senators, I come now to my main topic. Each and every one of us in this chamber who is over 50 years of age has lived during and witnessed a century of evolution. We can remember when we were boys and heard our parents talk about the possibility of carrying voices over wires, by which means you could talk and be heard at great distances, later to be followed by the telegraph and wireless. Then came the horseless buggy, followed by the lighter-than-air vehicle, the balloon and the airplane, and the submarine, and tanks of the First World War. Then there was phonograph—oh, that magical box, the motion picture first with its silent films soon to be followed by the talkie, the voices being recorded on a phonograph record and synchronized with the film, when synchronization became possible.

Then came the radio. I remember as if it were yesterday, when at home we had one of the first radio sets in the region and people would travel long distances in buggies at night to see and hear this curious invention which was nothing more than a complicated wired box which housed tubes, grids, condensers, resisters, coils, and fuses combined and connected to a series of hand-controlled knobs connected to a floor covered with batteries—A battery, B battery, C batteries. Then there was a 300-foot antenna running from your home to a neighbour's. When another neighbour across the road told you that this electrically charged wire connected to his home could set fire to his building, then you would have to find another location for your antenna. Or this neighbour would get so interested in your radio set problem and the fact that your antenna was attached to his property, he would spend more time in your home with all the answers than in his own, and again you would have to move the antenna to another location.

To add to all the commotion, this new invention would very seldom function when your visitors were at your home but, after a couple of hours of patience, finally you would hear the very weak sound of voices or music. Then you would call your visitors to approach slowly, to walk lightly so as not to disturb the radio, and you would all gather around one head-set earphone to listen.

What a change, honourable senators, to the transistor of today!

Then came television and, again, what immense progress there has been leading to colour television of today. Practically the same basic elements of progress which have developed electronics and nuclear fission, leading to the atomic bomb which now frightens our civilization, has taken place in transportation industries, where the horse and buggy of 15 miles per hour of 50 years ago has developed into jet transportation at 600 miles per hour and on to space ship travelling at 17,000 miles per hour.

With all this progress one sometimes wonders whether we really have accomplished anything, or are we racing toward a world-wide destruction.

Honourable senators, through this so-called progressive century the horses and buggies have been replaced by automobiles that have hurled us into a century of massacre, destruction and horror. Today there are hardly any families on American and Canadian soil which during the last 10 years at one time or another have not been victims of highway accidents.

Furthermore, it is a deplorable fact that over 75 per cent of those accidents could so easily have been prevented.

This year on Canadian highways some 5,000 people will lose their lives, some 150,000 will be injured, and the material loss will be in the vicinity of $600 million. I could add that some 14,000 hospital beds are used daily for the care of victims of highway accidents.

Today, honourable senators, this is the nation's number one problem, and it is a problem that is all the more serious because we have come to accept it as a part of our daily routine. On the highways of Canada one person is killed every two hours, one person is injured every four minutes, and an accident happens every 90 seconds. How have we failed? How have we arrived at this unhappy circumstance?

We have in Canada—and these are only approximate figures for 1966, but they will prove to be very close—approximately 7 million motor vehicles, including trucks, cars, motorcycles, and so on, driven by 7,500,000 drivers who will travel some 60 billion miles of road. This can be accepted as the nation's number one business. Of the 7,500,000 people driving motor vehicles, over 6 million are drivers like you and me, who obtained our driving permits some 30 or 40 years ago when the only requirement was that you were able to pay the required fee, and when you did not have to have any knowledge of the driving rules. In those days when the number of motor vehicles was limited that standard was acceptable. However, over the years the situation has changed, and we have failed to keep up with the pace of the evolution of the motor vehicle.

You may be interested to know that the worst year for motor accidents per capita was in 1935. It was in that year that the governments of the United States and Canada became aware of the situation, and since then much time has been devoted to the implementation of rules and regulations, and the commencement of a nation-wide road construction program.

It is interesting to discover from statistics that people like yourselves and myself who have been driving cars for 25 or 30 years without an accident would probably fail the driving test if we had to make a new application for our permit. Although we may have been driving cars for a great many years, our poor driving habits and lack of knowledge of the rules may not have led us into any accident, but may have led others into a fatal accident.

Let us see how we drive. We drive by routine and habit; we are guilty of carelessness, ignorance of the rules, nervousness, selfishness, fear, anger, revenge and, I could add, a disregard of the laws of motion and the laws of nature which involve kinetic energy, centrifugal force, gravity, traction and friction.

Let us look at some of these faults. What do we mean by "routine"? We drive by routine because when we get into our car we usually look at the clock and say: "Well, I have to be in Montreal in three and a half hours." This is all we think of; we drive with this thought in mind. We drive with the thought that we are going to be at a certain place at a given time.

We drive under pressure. We drive thinking of just about everything but the attention required of us when at the wheel. This is a habit we have acquired. Very few people while driving their cars think of the danger they are facing. Not only do they not think of their own driving, but they do not think of the oncoming car and the other driver over which they have no control. This is habit, and we have developed many such bad habits.

Then, there is carelessness. Routine and habit lead to carelessness. We are very careless, and I repeat that we do not think of the car or of our families. We think of about everything but safety as we drive.

Ignorance of the rules means lack of knowledge and poor judgment. In my opinion, governments at all levels have failed miserably in this field during the last 20 years. Governments annually have brought into effect new regulations and amendments to the existing regulations, and yet they have failed to pass this information on to the public. They have failed to educate the public as to the new rules. This reminds me of the school teacher who gave a handful of books to his pupils and said, "I will come back next June and ask you to write a test. I hope you will pass it." Such a teacher could not have much success.

Some people are very healthy, but they get nervous when driving a car. Many people who suffer from nervousness should not be driving. The situation in this respect is getting worse all the time. When you are driving a car you should be calm, relaxed and have full control of yourself.

Selfishness is one of the greatest offenders. We are selfish because we do not care about the other fellow. You are selfish when you adopt the attitude: I will not have an accident, but I believe you will have an accident; or when you say: I believe the rules are not for me, but for you—and the other person is thinking the same thing. This is selfishness, and it is a feeling we have acquired over a period of years. It is the feeling that nobody can make you believe you will have an accident.

We drive with fear, and this is a bad thing. Today we fear taking our cars out as we did years ago on a Sunday afternoon to let the family see the countryside. Our fear of other cars is a bad habit to acquire.

Anger or bad temper is one of the main causes of accidents. You cannot drive a car unless you have full control of your temper. You cannot drive a car if you are mad. You cannot drive a car perfectly or sensibly if you are irritated by some problem. I could tell you some stories about this, and of some most unfortunate accidents that occurred because of it. Temper control is within our own powers and not that of governments or lawmakers, and we can do something about it.

We have feelings of revenge if, while we are driving along the road at 60 miles an hour in our big and expensive car, we are passed all of a sudden by a little jalopy. What do we do when this happens? We say that we are not going to put up with that; we are going to teach him a lesson, and we pass him. He is driving at 65 miles an hour, and we have to drive at 70 or 75 miles an hour to pass him. This may appear to be humorous, but the number of accidents it causes is surprising, especially among the teenagers. You may be a politician on your way to Ottawa and be passed by a vehicle driven by your opponent. When such a thing happens you say to yourself: I am not letting this fellow get away with that. So you have a race. You are driving with anger and feelings of revenge. Courtesy is just about forgotten as far as driving is concerned.

I shall not go into the laws of motion because that involves other problems, but why is it that you cannot make a curve at 50 miles an hour as well as you can make it at 10 miles an hour? There you have the laws of motion coming into play, about which honourable senators know more than I. Drivers give in to the human laws and forget the laws of nature, but then the laws of nature take over and the outcome is not always good.

There is kinetic energy, which is a power or tendency of a body to keep in motion, and which has a great effect upon driving, as does centrifugal force and gravity. I want to say something about traction and friction, and point out that no matter how big or how little your car is, your only security is the spot between the tires and the pavement, and the area of road in contact with your tires at any given time is less than the size of a dollar bill. You have only that much area to depend upon. If the road surface is dry and clean, and you have good tires, then you can depend upon friction to a certain degree. But, if the surface of the road is wet, or covered with snow or ice, then you have not that amount of friction to depend upon, and it is a different story altogether. This is the reason why so many accidents happen during snow and sleet storms. People do not realize that very dangerous situations exist, and they continue to drive with all their bad habits.

It must be remembered—and this is something very few people think about—that when you get into your car there are only four points of landing. The first is your proper destination, whether it be your home or business. Second, it could be in jail, and that has happened to many people. Third, it could be in hospital, resulting from an accident. Lastly, it could be the morgue. Those are the four choices.

Then we have the problems of the teenagers—a serious problem which I will not go into detail tonight. For some reason or other, it seems to me that today they cannot enjoy themselves without alcohol—bottles and high speed cars—and you know the massacres that occur on our highways on account of that combination.

For a long time speed was blamed for all accidents. Often, a driver travelling at 60 miles an hour on a good stretch of the Trans-Canada Highway decides to raise the speed to 70, knowing that the increase in speed is not dangerous. However, not overlooking that speed kills, if someone drives out onto the highway from a back road and a collision occurs, nine witnesses out of ten will say that the driver on the highway was going too fast, whereas the actual cause of the accident might be misjudgment on the part of the other driver coming onto the highway in front of the other car. Speed should always be accompanied with judgment.

Years ago, we used to speak about our right to drive. A person would say, "I have a licence, so I have a right to drive." And we know that many people have died exercising their rights. Now driving is called a privilege. However, we fail to include with that privilege the obligation that should go with it.

Now they are talking about a defensive program of driving. Why not promote a preventive program?

Honourable senators, it is not my intention to lengthen the list of driving problems, but I deplore the lack of attention our Government gives to these problems. Today, and for the last five years, the general public has become aware of this situation, and we hear more people voicing their opinion that some measure must be taken to slow down the race to one last drive. Much is being said, but little is being done, and no one seems to have the answer.

Once again, I deplore the fact that the federal Government, whom I am confident wishes to do a good job, means well and proclaims itself as the great saviour of the nation, spends less than one cent per person to promote highway safety in Canada. The contribution of the federal Government to the Canadian Highway Safety Council is $25,000 as a grant to assist the great safety promoting institution. This institution has to exist on a skim budget of approximately $140,000, of which 38 per cent is financed by the federal Government's contribution of $25,000, and 13 per cent by the provinces. The balance of 49 per cent is financed from various industries.

The Canadian Highway Safety Council is capable of doing considerably more than it is now doing, and it is ready to do more. It already has plans to do more towards highway safety education and an accident prevention program, but the council is paralyzed by reason of lack of funds.

I urge the Government to take a serious look at the situation. If there is a better field where Canadians will appreciate an effort than that of curtailing highway accidents, I should like to know what it is. The Canadian Highway Safety Council needs an increase of at least $200,000 a year for the next three years, and eventually a budget of $1 million would be money well placed.

Honourable senators, before I close, let me offer a few suggestions. It is one thing to criticize, but it is another to give constructive suggestions. I now offer fifteen suggestions.

1. A special federal and provincial conference to initiate a full investigation of this problem. Incidentally, I note that the United States is discussing such an investigation.

2. A closer co-operation on the provincial level of all departments and personnel involved in highways security and law enforcement.

There is a great lack of co-operation between various departments. For instance, in New Brunswick the R.C.M.P. comes under the department of the Attorney General. Highway signs and markings come under Public Works. Other branches of the service come under the Revenue Department. These seldom come together for purposes of co-relation. Everybody works by himself in his own little corner. In business he would not get very far without the co-operation of all departments. Everybody involved should get around the table and find out how these problems originate and of what they consist.

3. A standard motor vehicle act for all provinces.

4. The introduction of some educational programs.

I have heard from top men in business that we have lost a generation as far as educational programs for training is concerned. They have certainly lost my generation. Perhaps we can do something for the new generation, by starting off with proper training, at the proper place and time for these young people. Whether they are going to school, in grade one or two, they will be the drivers of tomorrow.

5. A reform of highways accident judicial court.

There is need for reform of the highway accidents judicial court. You lawyers know what is going on in these courts, and I will leave that to you. There is need for reform. The patrol officers need better assistance from the court. Again I will leave that to your judgment.

6. More physical punishment to be implemented.

This can be done by means of a traffic court clinic. Fines of $10 or $15, or whatever the amount may be, in many cases do not provide an answer. A small fine to the great majority is something like an aspirin in water—it purports to clear up all the medical problems of the times. Often a teenager will go to court, and his father comes in, pays the fine, even if it is $25. If that teenager were sent to wash the speed signs on the highway with soap and water, and if a list of similar punishments were imposed instead of fines of money, it might be more helpful. A fine is not the answer in some of these cases. However, we have neither sufficient courts or judges, nor have judges the time to do what they would like to do. It is all a matter of rush —Next case! Next case! There should be more time devoted to finding out why a driver had an accident instead of looking in the book and saying so many dollars.

7. A program of highway safety with more effort directed to remove from the highways irresponsible drivers.

This is where we fail so many times. Patrol officers talk about bad drivers. They will say, "We were expecting that; we were not surprised." Every patrol officer knows that a drunken driver, sooner or later, is going to have an accident, there should be ways and means to remove such a person from the highway. Otherwise, such a driver eventually is going to kill someone, either himself or someone else. So we need an all-out effort to remove those irresponsible drivers from our highways.

9. A close co-operation with the car manufacturers so as to limit the speed and power for the safety of new cars.

Again, we are failing sadly in this respect, especially in the form of training or highway patrols.

10. A classification of roadworthy vehicles based on their number of years in use and mileage.

11. A special uniform training for the highway patrols. We need less specific rules and better judgment.

12. A much greater sum of money from the federal and provincial governments to promote safety.

13. A more realistic use of radar and speed traps, with a lighter view of using these instruments as a means of revenue.

In some cases, believe me, all they think of is revenue. In some instances, they have built a Berlin Wall between the speed of say 29 and 31 miles an hour, or 34 and 36, 39 and 41 and 49 and 50 and so on—if you go one or two miles above the mark, you have had it. Yet 75 per cent of the accidents are caused at a speed of less than 45 miles an hour. There is not enough spread between the mileages allowed and the margin of safety. A serious accident may well occur at 39 miles an hour in a 40-mile-an-hour zone. Yet the punishment is quite severe for a speed one mile above the limit.

14. A wider use of common sense and good judgment by the patrols, rather than being guided by some unrealistic and unacceptable, rigid rules.

15. To sum up, driving privileges will have to be harder to obtain and easier to lose.

Honourable senators, may I recommend that the Senate form a committee—perhaps like the Aging Committee which is doing so much to deal with the problem of the aged people—to study this nation's number one problem of highway accidents.

What a tremendous job could be done and what could be more welcomed by the Canadian people! Thousands of people are waiting for something like this. It could make a full study of accidents.

Our cars today are unsafe in many ways. Little attention is given to the safety of the drivers and of the car itself. Our car insurance cost has reached an alarming situation, with no modification in sight. By forming such a committee we must not expect an immediate cure of this problem, but it would be a step in the right direction.

Let us remember that there are always three sides to a story: the right side, the wrong side and the true side. Let us look at it from the true side.

Honourable senators, I feel that I have taken enough of your time and I do not wish to take advantage of your indulgence. This is a subject which I have deeply at heart and on which much more could be said. I have but scratched the surface. Perhaps another occasion will grant me the possibility to elaborate.

In closing, may I express a word of thanks to the management and staff of the local television station, Saint John, New Brunswick, CHST-TV, who made it possible, by giving me 30 minutes of free time weekly, to present a highway safety educational program called "It could happen to you." This is a semi-yearly program which has been continuous since 1961 and has some 375,000 viewers in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Maine.

I would like also to express my appreciation to the Canadian Highway Safety Council executive director and staff at Ottawa, who have assisted us by their co-operation and who have kept a fatherly eye on the program. Honourable senators, may I use now the usual formal closing phrase of the television program and say: "Drive safely, because it could happen to you."

On motion of Hon. Mr. Gershaw, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

AETNA CASUALTY COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald, for Hon. Mr. Cook, moved the second reading of Bill S-4, to incorporate Aetna Casualty Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I am sure that many of you will recall that this legislation was before this assembly on June 29 last. As a matter of fact, it proceeded through third reading and was sent to the other place, where it received first reading before that house adjourned. The fact that the house adjourned before it could be given second and third readings meant that it had to be reintroduced in this chamber at this time.

Honourable senators, you will probably also recall that this company has been doing business in Canada for the past 47 years and now wishes to incorporate in Canada for the purpose of transacting business here in the future.

The first directors of the company will be the provisional directors. The capital of the company will be some $5 million, of which the first $1 million in capital and surplus must be paid before the company can commence business in our country.

The head office will be situated in the City of Toronto. This company will be carrying on business in the fire, casualty and surety field, but not in the life insurance field.

If honourable senators see fit to give second reading to this bill, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, where the promoters of the bill will be present and all honourable senators will have an opportunity of questioning them at that time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

UNITED GRAIN GROWERS LIMITED—SECOND READING

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson moved the seond reading of Bill S-5, respecting United Grain Growers Limited.

He said: Honourable senators, ordinarily in presenting a bill for second reading I would confine myself to explaining the sections of the bill to the house and thereafter I would ask the approval of the Senate for second reading. However, in this case I am dealing with a company, an institution, an organization, which is one of the most important of the grain companies of western Canada. Its history coincides to a large extent with the story of the grain trade of the west.

Ordinarily, honourable Senator Crerar would be presenting this bill for second reading, because he is a past president of the company and was one of its early founders. The company probably owes more to Senator Crerar than to anyone else. Unfortunately, he is not here this evening.

Honourable senators, may I say a word or two about this most interesting company. I find that its predecessor was first incorporated by an act of the Legislature of the Province of Manitoba in 1902, under the name of Grain Growers Grain Company Limited. Indeed, I am proud to say that my grandfather, who was a farmer, was one of the early shareholders of that company. In 1911 there was incorporated by chapter 80 of the Statutes of that year a company by the same name, Grain Growers Grain Company Limited, one of its powers being to purchase the provincially incorporated company by the same name. The bill was assented to on March 19, 1911, and among the incorporators the first name is that of the Honourable Thomas Alexander Crerar. I am sure this fact is of interest to members of this house. The names of the other incorporators include John Kennedy and Roderick Mackenzie, those three being residents of the City of Winnipeg. Among the incorporators there are other names of persons all of whom throughout the years became outstanding leaders of the farming community of western Canada.

If I recall rightly the honourable Senator Crerar was the company's first president and remained its chief executive for many years. I think it must be said that he was the main architect of its future.

The company now has assets, as shown by its balance sheet for the year ended July 31, 1965, of $79 million. Consequently, you will see that it is a large company.

The company operates elevators at 600 points in western Canada and owns two terminals, one at Port Arthur and one in Vancouver. As I indicated previously, this is a farmer-owned company. According to the statutes which I have before me the qualification for shareholder membership of the company was to be a farmer, a lessee of a farm, or the wife of a farmer, and this provision has remained such throughout the years.

There have been various amendments to the company's charter over the years, and this afternoon I took the time to examine the various statutes amending the original act of incorporation of 1911. Amending statutes were passed in 1915, 1917, 1918, 1941, and 1950. It was a matter of great interest to me to observe that the provisions of the statutes generally conform to the growth and development and the new ideas which have come about in the grain-handling business of western Canada over the years.

This company has two classes of shares. Class A is essentially an investment share, on which it pays a dividend of a certain percentage to which I shall later refer. Its class B share is a membership share which is entitled to a percentage dividend as well as dividend based upon the production of the particular member. As my honourable friend Senator Vaillancourt knows very well, these are really patronage dividends.

I mentioned that Senator Crerar was one of the original incorporators of the company; he was the president of the company in 1911. Later, the Honourable John E. Brownlee, former Premier of the Province of Alberta, became president and chief executive officer of the company. His leadership of the company for many years was both successful and distinguished. The present president of the company is Mr. A. M. Runciman. Some honourable senators may recall that he appeared before the Senate Banking and Commerce Committee last year when a bill relating to the grain trade was being considered by that committee. I am sure honourable senators who heard him at that time will agree that he is an outstanding leader in agricultural activities in western Canada. He will probably be here again when this bill is presented before the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Now, honourable senators, I should like to refer to the bill itself and explain its provisions. The present capital of the company is $7,500,000, and subsection 1 of the operative sections of the bill proposes to increase the capital to $12 million. This will be divided into 550,000 class A shares of a par value of $20 each, and $200,000 class B shares of a par value of $5 each, the class B shares being designated as "membership" shares.

The purpose of subsection 2 of section 4 of the bill is to ensure that the rights and restrictions now attaching to present class A and class B shares shall continue to attach to the new shares.

Subsection 3 authorizes the directors of the company to increase the dividends on the class A and class B shares from its present limit of 5 per cent to 6½ per cent.

Honourable senators, I trust that with this explanation the bill will receive second reading from this house.

Hon. Mr. Paterson: May I ask the honourable senator if this company enjoys exemption from taxation by virtue of being a co-operative company like the co-operatives in Regina, or does it pay taxes like the rest of us?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Naturally, this company is subject to the provisions of the Income Tax Act in the same way as other companies and individuals are. It is known, however, that there are certain exemptions enjoyed by the co-operative grain companies of western Canada, which we ordinarily refer to as the pools—the Manitoba Pool, the Saskatchewan Pool and the Alberta Pool. Furthermore, as far as the profits of the United Grain Growers are concerned, the dividends they pay on class A and class B shares, as I understand it, are subject to the identical form of taxation that governs other corporations. However, as regards the patronage dividends, I presume that these dividends, so far as taxation is concerned, are dealt with in the same way as are patronage dividends declared by the pools. However, not having studied the question of taxation for the purposes of explaining this bill, I think this is as accurate an explanation as I can give of the taxation provisions applicable to this particular company.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Will the honourable senator allow me a question? I understand from what he has told us that the restriction on the amount of dividends that may be paid is to be relaxed by this bill. What was the purpose of the restriction? Was it in the interest of some parties and, if so, have those parties or classes of people consented to the increase?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I think I can say to my honourable friend that the increase has been consented to, because this bill comes before us as a result of a resolution of the board of directors which has been approved by the shareholders of the company. When I refer to shareholders, I refer, of course, to both class A and class B shareholders. I might add that we are all aware of the fact that a 5 per cent dividend on invested capital in this day and age is somewhat unrealistic, and consequently the company is proposing to remove this limitation and to provide for what I, at any rate, deem to be a very modest increase, from 5 per cent to a limit of 6½ per cent on its invested capital.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What was the purpose of the restriction in the first place? Other companies have no restrictions on the amount of dividends they pay other than the amount of the profits which they earn.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: They wanted money for expansion.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I can hardly explain the reason for the restriction to my honourable friend, except to say that this is not a commercial company in the ordinary sense; it was developed as and still is a farmers' co-operative.

Perhaps my friend Senator Vaillancourt could explain this further, but in western Canada we have always understood that the United Grain Growers Company was the precursor of the farm co-operatives that later became engaged in the handling of grain. This method of soliciting capital from farmers only consisted of the offer of a modest rate of dividend in order that the company could develop surpluses with which to expand its operations. We in western Canada are well aware that this company has been very successful, and paying modest dividends has been its method of reducing the cost of capital. This has made possible the great growth of the company's assets without a heavy capitalization, which is $7½ million. It is now proposed to increase this to $12 million.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Senator Aseltine said it was for the purpose of developing the capital of the company and thus extending its facilities. Is that the purpose?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Yes, that is the purpose of the bill, to give the company an opportunity to increase its share capital to $12 million.

Hon. Mr. Molson: May I ask my honourable friend a question? Would you not describe the Class A shares as preference shares? Is that not the reason for the fixed rate of dividend, because of the preference limitations?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Well, as a matter of fact, ordinarily one might believe that to be the case, but it is not. The Class A shares are not preferred as to payment of dividends over the Class B (Membership) shares. I have just read the statute of 1911, and find that the provision is that any dividend that is paid on the Class A shares must be paid equally on the Class B (Membership) shares. I might add that the par value of the Class A shares, which are the investment shares, is $20, and the par value of the membership share, the Class B, is $5, but both of them are entitled to the same dividend, and I believe the present bill thus provides.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I would like to ask my honourable friend a question. I do not think the bill does provide for that. If you look at page 3, the schedule to the bill, you will see that section 3(a) declares:

> That to Class "A" shares shall be attached the following rights:
> (a) The right to receive as and when declared by the directors a preferential dividend of five per cent on the amount paid up on the par value thereof payable as regards each year out of the profit earned in that year . . .

And under section 3(c) they have the right to rank in a winding up of the company. So, they are preferred shares in this sense.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There is no obligation on the directors to pay dividends.

Hon. Mr. Molson: They are non-voting.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: In answer to the honourable Senator Molson's question, I would refer honourable senators to subclause (3) of clause 4, which reads:

> Notwithstanding subsection (2), the directors of the Company may, for any fiscal year, declare an additional dividend of one-half of one per centum, or any multiple thereof to a maximum of one and one-half per centum, of the par value of the Class "A" shares, out of the profits earned in that year and available for dividends, as the directors may deem proper: Provided that, in the event of such declaration, provision shall be made for dividends for Class "B" (Membership) shares for such year at a rate not less than the total rate declared on the Class "A" shares for such year.

I hope that answers the question of the honourable Senator Molson, because as I read that it indicates to me that the dividend of both classes of shares is identical.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: To answer Senator Roebuck, the principle of the co-operative organization is not to pay high dividends to shareholders, because the shares are not placed on the market for a price, but in the co-operative organization we want to give, what we call in French the "ristourne"—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: "Kickback".

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: —to the producers because they are responsible for developing the company, and the interest on the shares is always at the same level, the price always being $20 or $5, as the case may be. That is all.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

THE PACIFIC COAST FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson moved the second reading of Bill S-6, respecting The Pacific Coast Fire Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill was before this house before dissolution last year and, if I remember rightly, it received second reading and then died on the Order Paper because of dissolution. Consequently, I am presenting it again.

The bill is a simple one, being an amendment to the act incorporating The Pacific Coast Fire Insurance Company. Clause 1 provides for a change of name to The Century Insurance Company of Canada, in English, and, in French, La Compagnie d'Assurance Century du Canada.

Clause 2 is the usual one which saves existing rights, providing that there shall be no impairment of the rights or liabilities of the new company.

Clause 3 provides that the capital stock of the new company shall be $2 million, divided into shares of $5 each, the previous capital of the company being $1 million.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

EVANGELISTIC TABERNACLE INCORPORATED —SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson moved the second reading of Bill S-7, to incorporate Evangelistic Tabernacle Incorporated.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a bill to incorporate a religious body under the name of Evangelistic Tabernacle Incorporated. The head office of the corporation, if it is incorporated, is to be in the City of Winnipeg.

The objects of the corporation, as they appear in the bill, are similar to those of many such corporations created by Parliament, namely, to promote, maintain and carry on various works and endeavours in accordance with the Christian faith. If this bill is passed by Parliament the corporation will have the power to establish missions, seminaries, schools, colleges, hospitals, dispensaries, parsonages, orphanages and other institutions for religious, educational, congregational, social or recreational purposes.

The corporation asks also for various other powers such as the power to erect and purchase houses of worship and parsonages, and the right to administer its properties in the manner of such bodies.

The bill would also empower the corporation to purchase real and personal property for the purpose of its various endeavours. The other powers requested in the bill are those with which corporations similar to the one proposed in this bill are usually endowed.

The petitioners for incorporation named in clause 1 are five persons whose homes are in the City of Winnipeg. The religious body referred to in the bill is not old, but it has already a missionary outside of Canada. There are ministers associated with this group in the United States and other parts of western Canada. The purpose of the corporation is to spread the gospel of Christianity in the manner in which it would present it, and in this respect it is similar to scores of others which are interested in the preaching of the Christian gospel in Canada and in other parts of the world.

Honourable senators, if this bill receives second reading I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, where it can be given further consideration.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

GENERAL MORTGAGE SERVICE CORPORATION OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard moved the second reading of Bill S-8, respecting General Mortgage Service Corporation of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is in all essential respects the same as a bill introduced at the last session of the last Parliament on behalf of the same company. That bill received second reading in this chamber on June 30, which was the last day of the last session, and consequently it died with Parliament. It is now necessary to reintroduce it. My explanation, therefore, can be very brief.

Clauses 1, 2 and 3 of the bill change the name of the corporation in English by omitting the word "Service". Instead of being called "General Mortgage Service Corporation of Canada", the corporation will be called, if the bill passes Parliament, "General Mortgage Corporation of Canada".

It is not necessary to change the name in French because the word "Service" was not in the French title.

Clause 4 changes the descriptive title of two classes of bonds that the company issues. These bonds are called Series A Mortgage Bonds and Series B Mortgage Bonds. The purpose of this clause is to have the word "Mortgage" omitted from that title so that the bonds will be called Series A Bonds and Series B Bonds.

The word "Mortgage" caused the title to be something of a misnomer inasmuch as the expression "mortgage bond" is generally used to describe a bond that is secured directly by real estate, whereas these bonds are secured by the mortgages, which, in turn, are secured by real estate.

If this bill receives second reading, I propose to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES

AUTHORITY TO PRINT FINANCE COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, presented the following report of the committee, to which was referred the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March 1966:

> Your committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its day to day proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON AGING

FINAL REPORT TABLED

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I beg leave to table the final report of the Special Committee on Aging.

May I have your permission to make a statement at this time?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I assure you my statement will not be as long as the report. I intend to deal first with the highlights and then summarize the report itself. I am one of those optimists who believe that all honourable senators will read the report, although at times I am not at all sure of it.

In any event, as this report represents a great deal of work by the members of the committee, it would be well that the house know who were the members of the committee. They were, Senators Blois, Brooks, Croll, Dessureault, Fergusson, Gershaw, Grosart, Haig, Hollett, Inman, Jodoin, Lefrançois, Macdonald (Brantford), McGrand, Pearson, Quart, Roebuck, Smith (Kamloops), Smith (Queens-Shelburne) and Sullivan.

The steering committee consisted of myself as Chairman, Senator Haig as Vice-Chairman, with Senators Fergusson, Lefrançois and Quart as members.

The committee, which was established in July 1963, was given broad powers to examine the problem involved in the promotion of the welfare of the aged and aging persons. The work of the committee turned out to be not only a responsibility but a great privilege. For all of us I think it was a labour of love, because we had all more or less relived the problem of aging, and some even that of aged.

We were very fortunate to have as our consultant Richard Davis, who is very well known throughout the nation as an outstanding authority in the social and economic fields. He planned and organized the hearings, and in the main prepared the report. We were also very fortunate—particularly I as chairman—in having Mrs. G. H. Josie as a researcher. Her contributions are reflected in the report.

We began our sittings in October 1963 and we finished about December 1964. The report was prepared and ready for September 1965. We held 32 meetings and we took 1,712 pages of evidence. We have several boxes of exhibits which were submitted to us.

We started out by extending a general invitation to anyone who wished to come, and witnesses of great experience and knowledge came forward willingly and at their own expense. We heard them; we considered their briefs ansd we questioned them. In all we received 98 briefs. Representatives from seven departments of the federal Government and representatives from nine provinces appeared before the committee.

After our committee was established the Province of Ontario established its own aging committee which held hearings and issued an interim report—an excellent report, I might add—and that province is now taking steps to implement some parts of its report. Our cooperation with the provincial committee was pleasant and we exchanged much information.

We heard from three provincial, 36 municipal and 60 national organizations, and from 13 individual experts. In addition to those individuals we heard from a half dozen persons in this particular area who appeared before us and told us of their own experience.

It took us six months to complete the accumulation of that evidence. We had 225 typewritten pages—it could have been a thousand—and the final report will be about 200 pages long. It has gone through many drafts.

The report contains 92 recommendations and, strangely enough, they are all important, because this was the first national examination of this problem that had taken place in the history of this country. True, there had been an inquiry in Saskatchewan and others elsewhere, but never before had the Parliament of Canada looked at this problem on an overall basis. Of necessity, the deliberations of the committee were lengthy because we had to examine so many problems and provide guide posts. I will admit that when we began we were apprehensive and had some misgivings about entering upon this virgin field, but in the end we weighed the evidence of the provincial governments, the national institutions and the experts who appeared before us, and we present to you today what I am prepared to say is a bold, brave and imaginative report, and yet one which is practical because what we recommend the country can afford. It will not strain the economy, it inflicts no inflationary pressures, but it does break new ground.

We are propounding a philosophy that may well herald our approach to social welfare and social justice as we enter the twenty-first century. The theme of our report is urgency: what we say over and over again is that the old cannot wait; what they need, they need now. Moreover, we take this country at its face value, and if the people of this country are interested in eradicating poverty, as we think they are, then we have located a considerable pocket of poverty that needs immediate attention, and we prescribe what we think is a remedy for that particular situation. It is our war on poverty.

In our report we do not, nor would we want to, deny that education in this country should be given high priority, for the need is overwhelming. If some of you will take the opportunity—and I am sure a great number of you already have—of reading the second review of the Economic Council of Canada, and particularly chapter 4 on education, you will realize that you have been mistaken in your views on education in this country. We have to educate our young people far more than we are doing at the present time in order that we may have increased productivity, that we may have increased growth, that we may be able to pay for some of these things we are suggesting here today.

There can also be no denial that there should be retraining of those who are no longer young but yet not old. Our retraining policy today, by all counts, has been somewhat of a flop. It needs new direction. It needs a new approach and a new plan. It may come under the manpower policy, but it has not come yet.

We spend a great deal of money on machines, but sometimes we forget that it is people who invent the machines, who make the machines, and who create the advanced technology. I think we have to do everything within our power to prevent student dropouts. Every student should complete some course, either professional or mechanical, and students, in the same way as those whom we retrain, should be helped financially if that becomes necessary.

It is not difficult in this country to spark interest in education which is associated with the young, and retraining which is associated with those who are somewhat older than young, but it is not as easy to direct attention to a program that involves the elderly poor. Yet, this report argues time and again that in sharing priorities they are entitled to share on an equal basis. We do not ask for an exclusive priority, but we do think that there can be no higher priority than that which we advocate in this report.

I said that our recommendations are bold and courageous. Our first recommendation is a very dramatic one, but if you turn it over in your minds I am sure it will make the same sense to you as it made to us. We recommend that the Government guarantee a minimum income as of right to all persons of 65 years of age who have resided in Canada for ten years, without a means test or a needs test, of $1,260 for a single person and $2,220 for a married couple; that the Government should pay the difference between these levels and the actual income, this to be adjusted annually on the basis of consumers' price indices.

We did not take this figure out of the air. We used a much-recognized and established figure that has been in existence for some time. These figures are the maximum incomes permitted under the Old Age Assistance Act.

With that recommendation we leave the door open for the extraordinary needs that may come from the Canada Assistance Act, that may come by way of increase in the Old Age Security allowance, and those that may come in some other way. We are talking about people who are 65 years of age and over. In this respect, who are we talking about? Well, frankly, I am talking about my own generation and your generation—the people who came through two world wars, a depression, a recession, an inflationary period, and now, finally, when they are retired they find that the standard of living on which they have retired has eroded because of the spiral in costs. We find also a new group coming along who are retiring but who cannot benefit from the Canada Pension Plan because it is a contributory plan.

I point out that there are 1½ million people in that group. They are not all in need, but the statistics in the report will indicate to you how great their need is.

I said their standard of living was eroded by the rising prices. They cannot keep their pre-retirement standard. They have already abandoned that in the face of rising prices and depleted resources, and they are having a struggle for the necessities of life. For them time is running out and they cannot wait. I repeat, what they need, they need now.

I know that most of these people equate their needs with money. Well, a study of the problem makes one realize that they are not quite right—but it is hard to convince them otherwise. They need our concern, our continuity. They need part-time work and they need retraining, if they are in good health. They need ways to overcome loneliness, and they need to feel that they are not redundant. Above all, they need to be looked upon as human beings and with dignity.

The problem that besets the aged and the aging in the second half of the century is so unlike the problem of the first half that it is largely unknown in realistic perspective. It is quite obvious that neglect and lack of planning and direction, in fact basic ignorance of what are the real needs of the elderly, economically, socially and culturally, has led us to recommend the establishment of a National Commission on Aging, whose purpose it will be to co-ordinate, plan and organize programs for the aged.

We were not unduly harsh on the departments concerned mainly because we felt that the civil servants are doing their level best without too much encouragement or direction. We did bruise the departments a little, which is our way of showing them our displeasure.

Again, I beg to add that we were not unmindful of the fact that if it were not for private voluntary agencies we would not have made the meagre progress recorded to date. We also recommend that a National Council of Social Research be established to do research on aging so that we shall know what we are talking about—this I will deal with a little later.

When we started the preparation of the report, we started with a philosophy. You either have one or you do not. When you get into this type of study you try to see where you are going. I think this was the underlying philosophy: The committee, generally speaking, did not treat the problems of the aging as welfare problems in the sense that we were providing for the poor or inadequate.

As pointed out in the foreword to the report:

> Only a small minority, perhaps 15 per cent of those over 65, are in receipt of public assistance. The great majority, although pitifully poor in many instances, manage on their own with the aid of the Old Age Pension and those who come to public attention are the exception, rather than the rule.

The attitude of the aging adult is summed up in this way:

> In their desire for continuity, the elderly are asking society to let them keep the image they have earned in their prime, and protesting the tendency to lump them all together. They are saying in effect that they want to be treated like other adults; that to segregate them on the basis of age is degrading. Since each human being is part of all that he has met, he asks the right to bring with him into his later years a lifetime of growth and experience. He asks not to be required to leave his comfortable old coat at the door, accepting in its place a uniform style worn by all those, and only those, who have reached age 65. Old people are individuals representing a cross-section of characteristics much like those found in the general population. Personal attributes are more pronounced than ever when we reach a time of life in which the need to conform is less important.

We had to take a look at the older people in our society and some of their characteristics, and we laid down some guiding principles.

While the number of old people is naturally growing rapidly, the proportion is not disturbing. In 1901, 5 per cent of Canada's population was 65 or over. In 1961, it was 7.6 per cent. It is estimated that in 1991 it will be just a little under 9 per cent.

Actually, Canada has a relatively young population. The proportion varies with the provinces, with a high of more than 10 per cent in British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, and less than 6 per cent in Quebec and Newfoundland.

As in every age group, there has been a trek from farm to city.

On the average, Canadians live longer than they did a generation ago. This is due to a change in infant mortality rather than in adult mortality. Women, on the average, outlive men, and there are more widows than widowers.

Older people are less likely to live with their own grown-up children.

One of the most serious and difficult problems faced by society in relation to older people is to help them maintain some satisfying foothold in the community and to have a sense of worth.

We laid down a few principles which we tried to steer by. The report has emphasized the need for a positive approach in planning for the aged, something which welfare programs, while they can make a contribution, can be only a part. For such planning it is essential that programs and services for older people be planned in the context of the whole community and its needs; that, while there must be authority to make and enforce decisions, the accent should be on co-operation and consensus. Planning bodies should have official status and involve responsible participation of governments. Over-all planning for the needs of older people should not be viewed solely as a welfare operation. While health and welfare measures are important, there must be the positive aim of creating greater opportunity for older people to lead satisfying lives and to continue as useful members of society.

The committee divided the responsibility for providing services and facilities for older people into three groups: the individual, when he or she has the means and capacity; voluntary agencies, where they can be financed this way and society is not prepared to make such services generally available; and government, to assure that older people have a sufficient income and a desirable minimum standard of living.

The committee found that 38.5 per cent of males and 85 per cent of females between 65 and 69 had incomes below $1,500. At 70 and over, 60.6 per cent of males and 84.7 per cent of females were below $1,500. This, however, includes married women supported or partially supported by husbands. The real problem of the policy-maker seems to be widowed and divorced women of which, in 1961, there were 287,000 over 65.

You will find in the report a couple of very interesting tables. These tables at this stage showed that the role of government payments has increased significantly in the last decade, and that there has been a relative decline in the level of investment income. If this trend towards larger dependence on transfer payments is extrapolated, it becomes clear that the aged must depend more and more on some kind of retirement pension rather than on labour income.

Families with heads aged 65 or over have an average income of $4,047 and a median income of $2,831. For those not in families the average annual income was $1,458 and the median was $829.

Another important source of income is private pensions and annuities. In 1961, 228,000 Canadians of all ages, 166,000 of them men and 62,000 of them women, reported incomes from this source. Assuming all of them would be over 65, this is 12 per cent of that age group. One-third of male pensioners had incomes of $5,000 or more and 11 per cent had incomes under $1,500. Of women recipients, 15 per cent had incomes above $5,000 and 28 per cent below $1,500.

In 1961, 77 per cent of households, whose head was aged 65 or more, lived in owner-occupied homes and over 90 per cent of homeowners of 65 and over owned their homes mortgage free. However, the quality of the housing occupied by elderly people is much below average.

The report says:

> To sum up, the committee, while recognizing and regretting the gaps and deficiencies in existing knowledge about the income status of older people is fully persuaded on the basis of the evidence presented to it and its own analysis of available data, that the economic problems of the aging population continue to present a serious challenge. Everything we learned confirms the view, expressed at the outset, that older people and more especially those denied the support of a family, are a low-income group, both absolutely and by comparison with younger adults. Not only so, but older people, unlike the younger adults, have little prospect of improving their condition through their own efforts. Only about one in six of them (one in four of the men) is in the labour force, and even this low rate of participation is definitely falling. Older people, therefore, are not able to benefit from the gains resulting from increased industrial productivity, while at the same time their meagre incomes are subject to erosion as the cost of living rises.

The committee points out that the Canada Pension Plan does nothing to benefit those already retired and that, on grounds of equity as well as need, something must be done. The report has this to say:

> Any suggestion that these older people, when the $75.00 pension is not sufficient, should be expected to depend for supplementation on public assistance after a needs test is utterly unacceptable. Public assistance should, of course, be available to them, as to others in the population, to meet residual needs and to deal with special circumstances, but it is the Committee's conviction that main reliance for meeting their ordinary requirements should be on benefits to which they are entitled as a matter of right and that the proportion of older people requiring needs-tested supplementation should be very small at all times.

We gave consideration to these suggestions but we felt, after considering them all and weighing them carefully, that a guaranteed annual income would best meet the present situation. With the adoption of that approach, the committee recommends as follows:

> (1) The establishment of a technically competent body to study the income needs of older people and to develop a socially acceptable minimum budget for single persons and couples, which would be adjusted automatically each year on the basis of a suitable index of consumer spending or of earning, with a review every five years to reflect changes in the relative circumstances of the working population and the retired population.
> (2) Until this study has been made, acceptance as a working standard of the maximum annual income permitted now under Old Age Assistance, namely, $1,260.00 for single persons, and $2,220.00 for married couples.
> (3) The establishment of an Income Guarantee program to provide allowances throughout life to all persons beginning at age 65 on the following lines:
> (b) That the program be administered and financed by the Federal Government and that applicants be required to complete a simplified tax return showing cash income from all sources (excluding the family).
> (c) That there be "sample checks" periodically, as under Unemployment Insurance, to catch abuses, but no means test enquiries on traditional lines.
> (d) That income, capital and deductions be defined and treated as for income tax purposes so far as possible, except that all public transfer payments other than temporary needs-tested supplements would be included.

It was difficult to know what exactly that would cost. We estimated the cost to be approximately $100 million. I said earlier in my speech that I felt we could afford it. There would be no unusual pressure upon the economy, nor would it lead to an inflationary trend.

One of the most difficult problems, in addition to income, which of course is the predominant one, is the matter of employment. The committee report emphasizes that no policy for employing the aging will be successful without an effective program for a high level of general employment. Simply improving the competitive position of the aging worker will tend to shift the problem to another age category.

The committee felt that the root of the employment problem for older workers in the mid and late 1950s was to be found in the relatively slow rate at which the economy was expanding. At such times the very young and older workers suffer most. The older worker is often not as well educated and less capable of meeting the challenge of modern technology. He is also less mobile. Home ownership and community relations are more important to him than to younger workers. Health factors often enter the picture, affecting both mobility and adaptability.

The problem of employment is likely to arise at any time after a worker reaches the age of 45, and becomes most serious at 65 if there is inadequate income for retirement. Where adequate pensions are available, many at 65 leave the labour force voluntarily and have no problem.

In an analysis of job vacancies, it was found that almost 100 per cent were closed to workers over 65 years of age; 97.6 per cent to those over 55; 88.4 per cent to those over 45; and 43.6 per cent to those over 35. In terms of actual placement experience in 1959-60, 27.6 per cent of the applicants were 45 and over, but this age group represented only 12.3 per cent of total placements.

There are many other statistics in the report. I am sure I have whetted your appetite sufficiently that you will want to read them. They are too long to read at this time. Regarding those statistics, the report then says:

> Several inferences may be drawn from the above figures: (a) People that work for themselves, as in agriculture and professions, tend to retire later. (b) The same is often true in occupations where judgment and experience are positive factors, as in management (although an important consideration here for the group beyond 65 might well be whether the manager controls the business); and where there is a shortage of skilled workers, as in certain manufacturing trades and types of office work. (c) The proportion of men and women in the service occupations rises with age.

That is most interesting.

> Most of the women were in a category designated by the census as "housekeepers, waiters, cooks and related workers," and it can be assumed that the majority of the men similarly were in poorly paid, and probably seasonal occupations.
> While in some instances the reluctance of employers to take on older workers may be well founded, the National Employment Service is convinced that much of it is due to the general tendency in our society, with its accent on youth, to underestimate the capabilities of people beyond middle life. Such attitudes, unfortunately, persist in spite of numerous studies which clearly show the relative advantage older workers have over younger workers for a considerable variety of work, and in respect of a number of characteristics like reliability, judgment and a low rate of absenteeism. Hiring and retiring practices, often related to pension plans, which discriminate against older workers are part of this general picture.

Limited schooling and the fact that vocational skills, adequate at one period of life, may become obsolete under changing conditions, have been important contributors to unemployment among the aging. Brief after brief submitted to the committee stressed the need to adapt the content and methods of training courses to the interests, attitudes and background of older trainees.

The report continues:

> Program 5 of the scheme (Manpower Technical and Vocational Training Programs) is central to our concern, since it is intended to provide training for the unemployed. Federal support for meeting costs of the program and allowances for trainees is generous. An initial problem has been the reluctance of provinces to commit themselves to their relatively small proportion of financial support. The program has also failed to attract participation. Not only has enrolment been low, but drop-outs have equalled completions. It is apparent that retraining of the unemployed has made very modest progress. Underlying this limited progress is the absence of known employment opportunities, so that there is little information on job possibilities for trainees. In addition, the program lacks adequate provision for compensation. Allowances are not paid in some provinces and are only minimal in some others. The chief difficulty in educational terms is the lack of basic education of most of the trainees.

Older workers may not always need or want full-time jobs, and part-time employment may offer a solution to the problems of many of them. Between 1953 and 1964, while full-time employment increased by 25 per cent, part-time employment increased by over 200 per cent.

The committee finds that programs under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act have met with only mixed success, that there are problems of inconsistency across Canada and lack of co-ordination between various provincial departments and municipal agencies involved.

The committee regards the following as essential characteristics for an effective attack on the manpower aspects of increasing employment opportunities for the aging worker.

Continued attention should be given to the problem at national and provincial levels. The problems surrounding manpower policy are extensive and complex. It would be useful to integrate and co-ordinate government study and action through the National Employment Service and its local offices throughout the country. This agency should be responsible for analysing basic demand and supply conditions and should develop programs to facilitate the adjustment and mobility of workers. The federal Department of Labour should undertake, promote and finance comprehensive research into aging and employment.

Financial assistance to unemployed employables should be increased and extended. The main elements of assistance in training and the provision of living and moving allowances and loans are now part of policy, but the incentive levels are inadequate.

A more realistic approach should be taken toward education itself. Training should be based not only on the skills required but on the characteristics of the trainees themselves.

While the report does not discount the importance of automation in assessing the problems of employment and recognizes that it will mean shifts and displacements, especially among older workers, it rejects the idea that in this generation at least the total volume of employment need decline.

Health status is, of course, very important. It is estimated that nearly eight out of every one hundred persons 65 years or over are residents of some form of institution and that at age 75 and over this might rise to about 15 per cent. Eliminating those in hospital for less than two months, this still leaves 90,000 or more long-term patients in general and allied special hospitals, mental hospitals, tuberculosis sanatoria, nursing homes, homes for domiciliary care and others. Canada is extremely short of facilities for these long-term patients. Many are occupying beds in hospitals when care in a nursing home only is required and, on the other hand, lack of nursing homes for the aged means that the bedridden are placed in municipal homes for the aged that are unable to provide for them properly. Even nursing homes of such poor quality that they should not be operating have long waiting lists. There are 1,500 homes for the aged in Canada.

> Moreover, nursing homes, with a few exceptions, are not included under the hospital insurance program, so that unless patients are admitted as indigents and paid for as such out of public funds, they or their relatives must meet the full cost which we are told runs on the average of $8.00 to $10.00 a day and may be much higher.

As a matter of fact it is much higher in many cases.

The committee emphasizes the need for a clear-cut policy to determine what facilities are necessary, to what extent they should be left to private enterprise, what standards are essential and what arrangements should be made to cover cost. Among other things, it recommends:

That provincial departments of health determine the place of nursing homes in the picture of health care and that, assuming they are accepted as essential, steps be taken to increase supply.

That approved non-profit nursing homes be eligible for federal-provincial grants, for operating costs under the hospital insurance program and training grants for training staff in rehabilitation nursing.

That all nursing homes be licensed and supervised and that local and provincial health departments make consultation services available on medical and nursing care, nutrition, recreation and other aspects of administration.

It is emphasized, however, that well over 90 per cent of all Canadians aged 65 or more are carrying on outside of hospitals and institutions, although many of them need some degree of health care.

> The Senate Committee subscribes to the principle that older people should remain in their own homes as long as possible. It is frequently better for them, they are generally happier there, and it is usually a great deal cheaper. We must not be inflexible in applying this rule, but old people's homes, nursing homes and hospitalization should be considered only if absolutely necessary. There is a great deal more preaching of this principle in Canada than actual practice!

I regret to say that is the situation.

> Until we give home care a real trial in . . . Canada, we must continue to be institution-oriented and the proportion of those unnecessarily institutionalized will keep ahead of European countries, where home services are much more liberally available.

The Canadian Medical Association, in its brief to the committee, has urged more organized home care and homemaker services as a desirable alternative to institutional care and believes that this should be a public responsibility. This was also a recommendation of the Hall Royal Commission on Health Services, and the committee fully accepts this point of view. It recommends grants under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act to finance programs for those either not admitted to hospital during illness or discharged early, which would include medical and nursing care, physiotherapy and other forms of rehabilitation, homemaker services and use of sick room equipment.

They strongly support the development of organized home care under any auspices and the cost should be shared with municipalities on a basis which would permit the latter to provide this important service free to all old people who have an income less than the figures I have already given.

It is recommended that homemaker services be accepted as a sharable cost under the Canada Assistance plan, not only for persons on public assistance, but also for all others to whom this service is provided free by the provinces and the municipalities.

The committee recommends that local health and welfare departments keep a register of all people in their community aged 65 and over and that public health nurses or social workers visit them periodically, if such visits are necessary or desired. More geriatric clinics and special clinics concerned with mental health, speech and vision defects, dental care and rehabilitation are urged where sick elderly people can be given on-the-spot assessment, treatment and counselling and that periodic health appraisals be more widely available. The report suggests that services be made available in rural areas by training lay personnel to assist.

We dealt with housing. The committee found that if the housing requirements of older people and older families were to be met with decent standards, Canada, by 1980, must have an additional 511,000 units, either new or converted, for this purpose.

Its conclusions generally can be summarized as follows:

The inclination of older people is to live in their own home as long as possible.

Very few older families double up with relatives, but this is a common pattern with individuals.

Forty-three per cent of all older people in 1961 were single, widowed or divorced. One-third of all older men and one-half of the older women were in this group.

Half of the older people own their homes or are the wives of homeowners and the majority of these homes are mortgage-free. However, the quality of dwelling is below average, with 7 per cent in need of major repairs, more than 25 per cent of them without separate toilets and close to 30 per cent without bath or shower.

For these homeowners, it is recommended that improved provision be made for loans for essential repairs and for alterations that would enable them to secure modest rental revenue.

> At present home improvement loans under the National Housing Act are not usually available to older homeowners on limited income who, for this reason and limited life expectancy, are not considered acceptable risks.

For those who do not own a home that is fully paid for, the problem of securing decent housing "may well be nigh insuperable without community aid."

> The poor among the old are the most seriously disadvantaged when for whatever reason they are compelled to move from their present dwellings. Necessarily, their search must be for cheap quarters, which are hardly to be had except in deteriorating neighbourhoods.
> So far public measures to help this latter group have not been very successful. Low dividend housing under section 16 of the National Housing Act, during the period 1946-63, yielded only 8,000 units for the use of old people and at present costs the economic rent for these runs at around $60 a month. Public housing is necessary to yield lower rents, but Canadian communities up to now have been slow to adopt this method of meeting the needs of low income families generally. Since provision for public housing was first introduced in 1949, only 13,000 rental units have been produced throughout the whole country and of these, precisely 167, mostly one-bedroom units for couples, were earmarked for old people.

In planning for old people, there should be no segregation. It should be a normal mixed community where young and old can mingle naturally. Accommodation should be within easy distance of transportation, neighbourhood stores, churches, libraries and so forth.

> In general, the net effect of federal and provincial policies in the area of housing for the aged has been to pass the burden on to the poorest and most hard-pressed level of government in this country, the municipalities, assisted by those voluntary organizations active at the local level. Theirs has been the task of awakening and maintaining community interest, of gathering the initial capital, of finding architects, builders and specialized personnel, of acquainting themselves with the complexities of the relevant legislations and bureaucracies. They have had to initiate and carry out often protracted negotiations with distant provincial and federal offices, to vouchsafe for the administration of the completed projects and for the deficits, if any, that could materialize. It is certainly a tribute to the public-spiritedness of many Canadians that so much has been done against such odds, even if much more still remains to be accomplished.

A strong argument can be made that the National Housing Act has so far benefited mainly the younger Canadian middle class. The conditions which may have justified such a policy in the immediate post-war period are now largely over. The important resources and knowledge available within C.M.H.C. must urgently be directed to that area which only the corporation can tackle: low income housing for Canadians who need it.

The C.M.H.C. should educate the public to the opportunities under the National Housing Act to provide new and converted housing for older people, including hostel accommodation, and that periodic conferences be held with public and voluntary bodies.

One or more persons with specialized knowledge in this field should be appointed to the C.M.H.C. staff to give advice and technical assistance to housing authorities and other sponsoring groups.

C.M.H.C. should consider establishing a national committee to advise on policy and programming in housing for low income families and for the elderly.

Provincial governments should establish departments or housing agencies to be responsible for low income housing, including the elderly and these should establish priorities for the variety of accommodation needed by old people.

Provincial grants should be sufficient to reduce to no more than token payments capital required by voluntary organizations under the limited dividend section of the National Housing Act.

Old people requiring hospital or nursing-home care should be allowed to retain for a reasonable period the right to return to previous living quarters in assisted housing projects. The committee found that many old people had been deprived of their homes through such a break, and this has brought to these people great anxiety which had seriously affected their recovery.

Now let me say a word about community services. Having recommended provision of adequate housing and shelter for Canada's older population, the committee report turns to the community services which should be made available. Home care and home nursing have already been discussed.

The committee recommends that service for shut-ins who need help with chores and meals should be made available.

The committee recommended that municipalities consider the need for sheltered work and workshops which would be open to everyone, including the aged who are unlikely to enter or re-enter the labour force, but require activity. It is suggested that grants be made available through a federal-provincial shared-cost plan for these as well as day-care centres and community recreation centres for training courses. It is recommended that the federal Department of Labour assist the provinces.

Facilities for old people who want something to do, social contacts or who are interested in educational, cultural or community services should be adapted to their capacity. The usefulness of old people's clubs and centres is recognized, but it is suggested also that schools, churches and libraries adapt their program to old people's interests.

Without the enterprise and devotion of voluntary agencies, very few of the services we now have for older people would exist at all. Their continued interest and leadership are essential and should be encouraged in every way possible. It is our view, however, that the accelerated development of community services, which is now called for, depends on the active participation of the public authority. Government support is also necessary for planning and co-ordination, the need for which was stressed continually in the course of the hearings.

We heard a great deal about research and planning, and the committee was very disturbed by the lack in Canada of any careful evaluation studies of programs for the financial support and care of older people in which large commitments of public funds are involved. In areas of housing, income maintenance and health care, major decisions are often made on the basis of much less complete information about the needs and wishes of the elderly and the merits of particular proposals than planners and administrators recognize as desirable.

We are convinced that, whatever may have been true in the past, the point has now been reached where deficiencies of this sort need no longer be accepted as inevitable. What is required, once we recognize the importance of scientific knowledge as a guide to sound planning, is a deliberate effort on a bold scale to stimulate the development of research on aging at all levels—basic, applied and operational.

A National Council on Social Research is recommended, which would include in a broader program research on gerontology.

The committee found that while grants were available through the Department of National Health and Welfare, and to a lesser extent through other federal departments and agencies, for research in the field of aging, few were being used and nearly all had to do with medical care rather than welfare and social policy.

The federal Department of Labour and the National Employment Service have studied employment problems. The Department of Veterans Affairs has a research program in geriatrics dealing specifically with veterans. The Ontario Department of Public Welfare has sponsored studies, and voluntary organizations have made contributions. But the committee found in that aspect that Canada was lagging behind the United States, the United Kingdom, the Scandinavian countries and New Zealand.

The United States had gone through this process. In the United States, dissatisfaction with the fact that federal expenditures on research on aging was mainly concentrated on health led to a recommendation for the creation of a National Institute of Gerontology. This was later replaced by a recommendation for a high-level Commission on Aging, which would have the conduct and promotion of research as one of its responsibilities.

We looked about us, and it appeared to us that Denmark had the best research facilities. In 1958 the government there established a Danish National Institute on Social Research as an independent body, with its own board but financed out of public funds. As the name implies, it is not confined to aging, but includes it as a major area of interest.

The committee, acting on the principle that problems of the older people are interlinked with those of the total population and that, while society has a particular responsibility for the elderly, it cannot neglect the problems of other age groups, favours the Danish plan as a model for Canada. It recommends:

(a) that a National Council on Social Research make specific provision for research on gerontology;

(b) that the Council conduct or commission research on its own, particularly in the area of social policy, and that it also make or approve grants for social research and training in social research to universities, professional schools and non-profit organizations;

(c) that one-third of the Council membership be respresentatives of federal government departments and agencies concerned with social research;

(d) that the responsibility for health research on the aging continue to be placed on the Medical Research Council;

(e) that the National Council maintain liaison with the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, departments of government and voluntary organizations, to improve collection and analysis of data and to stimulate research projects.

The Dominion Bureau of Statistics is urged to match its achievement in the economic field with an integrated system of social statistics to include a section on aging. It is suggested that it consult with federal and provincial government departments, as well as non-government organizations, to see what statistics are needed.

As a counterpart to the National Council on Social Research, the report recommends a National Commission on Aging to provide the over-all planning structure and to ensure effective organization of services. It finds misdirection of energy and proliferation of ad hoc projects with little regard to priorities and standards or the wise use of scarce resources.

In some twenty of the larger centres in Canada community welfare councils have been established to carry the principal responsibility for whatever social planning is taking place. The committee recommends that all municipalities establish officially recognized bodies to plan and co-ordinate programs, facilities and services for older people.

At the provincial level it is recommended that appropriate bodies be established to plan and co-ordinate, and that consideration be given to separating these from existing government departments.

The first assignment for the National Commission would be to examine and follow up the recommendations in the Senate Committee report. On a continuing basis, it would:

(a) develop working relationships with government and voluntary agencies concerned with the aging, and review needs;

(b) serve as a clearing house of information;

(c) provide technical and financial assistance in program development and staff training, and sponsor conferences, seminars and training courses.

The Commission would have a basic budget and would report annually to Parliament, but would be able to receive contributions from other public and private sources. It would have an advisory committee representing provincial planning bodies and voluntary agencies. At the end of five years its work would be reviewed, and consideration would be given to linking it with a broader body on social planning for the population generally.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I thought this explanation was going to take only a few minutes.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I did not say it would take only a few minutes, but I shall not take up much more time. Think of the time you will have been saved in not having to read the whole report.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Only an hour and a few minutes.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, if the majority of the recommendations of this report are implemented, that can well change the face of social welfare and justice in Canada. I feel that we have made a significant contribution that will appeal to all Canadians, and will show that, as they say in the "Pepsi" generation, we are with it. It can be proclaimed that we not only preach social justice, but practise it; that we not only talk about our war on poverty, but that we mean to eradicate it. This is a very good beginning.

I ask honourable senators, when have we had a responsible body come forward with so realistic and so feasible a formula for meeting one of our most pressing and distressing problems, a formula for meeting it effectively and with dignity. I know there are those who constantly take pleasure in harassing the Senate by introducing resolutions and bills, and talking about the need to lead the Senate into the twentieth cenutry. We are glad to take them by the hand to help them into the twenty-first century.

I said that this report is breaking new ground, but in it we have scratched only the surface. It seems to me that the tabling of this report is well timed. I assure honourable senators that we did not plan it that way, but the Government has a problem and we have a solution. It is now up to the Government.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I am not rising to comment on this report but to point out that the honourable senator who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Croll) has given us an excellent summary of the report of the Special Committee on Aging. I am advised that there are others who would like to speak on this subject. Rule 87 of the Rules of the Senate reads:

> Upon the presentation of a report no discussion takes place—

That is, without unanimous consent.

> —but the report may be ordered to be printed, with the documents accompanying it; or it may be placed on the Orders of the Day for future consideration.

I move, honourable senators, that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for future consideration. I so move because I know that there are other honourable senators who wish to speak with respect to it.

Hon. Mr. Croll: When Notices of Motions are called, I shall move that it be printed in the record.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: The honourable senator has covered already most of the material in the report.

Hon. Mr. Croll: But we must have it printed in Hansard before you make your motion.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I said that the honourable senator gave us a splendid résumé of the report, and that is all in the record. I am suggesting that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for future consideration.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Roebuck, with leave of the Senate,

> That the final report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging, tabled today, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date and form part of the permanent records of this house.

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, this is a magnificent report. So much work has been done in connection with it, and it contains so many recommendations on the subject, that I wonder if the report should not be printed as a book. That has been done in the case of many other reports. If the report were printed it could then be distributed not only among the members of the Senate but also to the various provinces, to attorneys-general, family organizations and ministers who have as their responsibility the making of recommendations for family allowances, and so on. May I therefore suggest that the report be printed as a separate book, instead of merely as an appendix to today's proceedings.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, the committee recommended that 2,000 copies be printed at the expense of the committee. It will then be on sale at the Queen's Printer at $2 a copy.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Will the report be printed in French as well as in English?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes; the French translation has been completed. It will be in both French and English. Of course, many senators are taking the precaution of ordering copies of Hansard in advance for their friends.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Will the report of yesterday's committee proceedings be presented to the chamber?

Hon. Mr. Croll: No. That is not the usual practice.

Motion agreed to.

For text of report see appendix, p. 89 et seq.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, my contribution will be extremely brief, because I shall be dealing with only one part of one subject.

First of all, I wish to congratulate the mover (Hon. Mr. McDonald) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Gouin) of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, on their eloquence and on the subject matters of their respective speeches.

I sincerely hope that the leader on this side of the house (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) will soon be restored to good health.

Mr. Speaker, I have long enjoyed your acquaintance and I know that you have always been an outstanding success in everything you have been called upon to do. Now that you are called upon to perform your present very important function, I am sure your record will prove to be equally good.

Honourable senators, the opinion of the doctors of Canada is very definite on the subject of medicare. In the first place, they believe in a policy of pre-payment of medical services, as expressed by the Canadian Medical Association, which in 1962 issued the following statement:

> Canadian doctors advocate plans of medical service insurance which provide for those who cannot pay and leave those able to insure themselves to do so voluntarily.

In order to give the opinion of another group, let me quote the following:

> The medical profession of Alberta wishes to make clear to the people of Alberta its position on medicare. We believe in medicare and have actively assisted the Alberta Government to develop a medical services program in the province. Under this program the people of Alberta enjoy benefits similar to those proposed under the federal plan. We sincerely believe that the Alberta Medical Plan type of program ensures high quality medical care while preserving for the individual citizen the important principle of freedom with responsibility.
> It is our belief that any federal assistance should not interfere with, or destroy, the right of the citizens of a province to provide the type of medicare for themselves which is best suited to their needs. The magnitude of a national medical services program is so great that it is vital to set up priorities, that is, to do first things first.
> The most important consideration for the citizens of Canada is to maintain and enhance the quality of medical care. For this reason we applaud the establishment of the Health Resources Fund which is designed to assist the provinces to provide the facilities for the training and production of all kinds of workers in the health field. This is properly the first priority.
> Any program which is to be successful over the years must recognize the right of the citizen to consult the physician of his choice without losing the financial benefits for which he has paid through taxes or premiums. This is vital because the physician of his choice may have found it necessary to practice outside the plan . . .

With regard to costs, I have tried to come to a decision concerning that. It is said that the cost of government administration is around 10 per cent, and that the non-profit organizations can operate at about 5.3 per cent. The association has this to say:

> We do believe that a government agency cannot administer a plan as efficiently and economically as do the existing competent and experienced agencies such as M.S.I.

We believe that taxpayers' money should be concentrated on providing assistance for those who need help.

The medical profession of Alberta will support a national medicare program based on these principles.

Now, I want to say one thing. Whether we have medicare or not we need in this country more doctors, more nurses and more hospital accommodation.

A recent article says in Toronto on one day 1,022 hospital beds were required, but were not available. Even in Ottawa, two hospitals reported 500 urgent cases waiting to get in. The City of Hamilton Hospital had a list of 147, and Calgary some 5,000 people on the waiting list. We all know that it is very difficult at times to get hospital accommodation. Therefore, no matter what is done, we need more doctors, nurses and hospital accommodation.

We also need more research. Many complaints, such as heart disease, cancer, backache and so on, need to be examined and to have specialized work done to find some solution.

I wish to say right here that doctors are not opposed to medicare by reason of income; in fact, they make far more money under medicare than under any other system. I understand that doctors in Saskatchewan make very large incomes. It is because they get paid for all they do, whereas in private practice a doctor will only collect about 65 per cent for the services he renders. However, doctors feel that this whole medicare scheme is an expensive and elaborate cure for a disease that does not exist, or hardly exists.

Hon. Mr. Sullivan: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: Few people suffer and die from lack of medical attention. All down through the years doctors have been most generous in attending to patients, whether or not the patients have funds to pay, and at the same time hospitals have admitted such persons. As I say, it is a disease that hardly exists. If there are people who cannot pay, then a scheme such as that in existence in Alberta will cover their cases.

Honourable senators, tuberculosis is practically a curable disease; we know the cause of it and how to prevent it and how to treat it; but last year 700 people in Canada died of tuberculosis. We should be spending some money in that direction.

Again, there are pockets of poverty in this country, poverty brought about by the sickness or the death of the income earner, by the large family, by old age, by alcoholism, by a number of different things. These pockets of poverty are where you find real suffering and hardship, and where help is very seriously needed.

We have heard Senator Croll tell us something about the aged people, people who are suffering loneliness, poverty, poor food, sickness of all kinds, and they need help and they need it very acutely.

It is said that 1.2 million of the people of Canada are functionally illiterate; that is to say, they can sign their names but they cannot read orders or carry out ordinary work. It is among those people there is the greatest unemployment. Everyone agrees we should give a lot more help along educational lines, as only 33 per cent of the young people of Canada get through high school.

Honourable senators, it is a long time since World War I and World War II took place, yet there are people going to doctors and saying, "Since the war I have been suffering, I have been sick." They are asked, "Well, why don't you go to a military hospital?" They reply, "We have been there and they say that it is pre-enlistment or that it is not attributable to war service. They say that the X-ray does not show anything." However, that suffering and that disability is real to them. Those few remaining men who, when Canada was in desperate need, offered their services, should not now be forgotten. They should be dealt with most generously.

There are some other things that doctors think about. For instance, everybody does not employ the ordinary orthodox doctor. There are different fields of medicine. The orthodox only takes in one of them. Some people employ chiropractors, osteopaths, Christian Science practitioners. What are they going to do? Are they going to be paid or to be neglected?

Furthermore, some doctors stay outside the scheme. Even in Saskatchewan about eight per cent are outside the scheme. If I want to employ one of those doctors, what am I to do? Must I pay him myself or will the government pay him? His fees may be high and I wonder how payment is to be arranged.

It is a long time since the system was established in England, away back in 1811, when Lloyd George instituted medical protection for men who were employed. In 1948 the national medical system came in, but every year, every month since that time, there has been friction, debate, negotiations; and even at this time there is trouble. It is said that that scheme is almost on the verge of collapse. Some of the doctors have put in resignations. Some are on a capitation system by which they get a certain form of salary, which does not seem to be very satifactory to medical practitioners and which, consequently, is giving constant trouble. The doctors do not like starting in on a system which means negotiations of this kind for years to come.

Also, doctors like to practise medicine and do not feel they should turn to filling in forms. With all these government schemes, many reports and many forms have to be completed.

As regards abuses, I do not think there will be very many needless calls. People do not call the doctor unless they really need him or at least feel that they need his services. I do not fear such abuse, but at the same time if you have a universal system with payment for every service you are putting a strong temptation before the doctors and before the people to make too much use of it.

Honourable senators, there are other considerations. I have tried to stick strictly to those that the doctors feel. It is generally believed that all responsibility should not be left to the state. It is in giving and in doing for somebody else that all life's splendor depends. If people can give something, even though it means a little self denial, it is something really worth while. To give to children or to sick people brings results. It brings a reward that makes a person feel at least not guilty and that he has accomplished something. When the children are grown up and gone there is always a certain amount of satisfaction, a feeling that when they were in trouble or when they were sick we got them what they needed, even though it meant some sacrifice and some efforts on our own part.

Therefore, honourable senators, I hope that when this subject comes up for discussion, the views of the medical men will receive consideration.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hollett, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

INTERPROVINCIAL PIPE LINE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson moved second reading of Bill S-10, respecting Interprovincial Pipe Line Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is identical with two previous bills, both presented in the Senate, considered at length in the Committee on Transport and Communications, and passed by this chamber.

The first one was presented as Bill S-42 and received second reading on November 25, 1964. After study by the committee, at which the president of the company and the general counsel appeared and gave full explanation, it was passed by this chamber on December 14, 1964.

The second occasion on which the Senate saw this proposed legislation was as Bill S-7 in 1965, when second reading occurred on May 11, 1965. After full consideration again by the Committee on Transport and Communications, it was reported and was passed by this chamber on May 25, 1965. Unfortunately, on both these previous occasions the bill did not come to a vote in the other place.

In the intervening time nothing has changed except that all arguments in favour of this bill are perhaps more valid today than they were previously.

I am sure that the opinion of this honourable chamber has not had any reason to be reversed. For this reason I do not think that I should take up the time of the house in the same lengthy explanations as were given on the two previous occasions. Those explanations were fully set forth in Hansard of November 25, 1964, pages 1121 to 1123, and again on May 11, 1965, pages 53 to 55.

Just to refresh your memories, honourable senators, I would state that the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company is asking Parliament to permit it to subdivide its shares on the basis of five for one, and to change from a par value of $5 each to a par value of $1 each in order that a larger number of small investors and a greater number of its employees may find it possible to invest in the shares of the company if they wish to do so. In the latter connection it is interesting to note that last summer the employees of the company were invited to express their opinion on the company's proposal to subdivide the shares, and an overwhelming majority expressed their approval, believing it would make it easier for them to participate in the company's future through investing in the company's savings plan. The company has for some years had a savings plan which permits the employees either individually or jointly to participate in its future through share ownership. Thus, we have the voice of the employees added to that of management in asking Parliament to look with favour on the bill.

There are just two matters I would like to emphasize. The first is that there is not under contemplation any issue of shares consequent upon the proposed subdivision. In other words, there is no suggestion that by being permitted to split the shares, five for one, the company or its officers or directors or anybody can in some mysterious way improve their own financial position. The real purpose of the bill, as is stated, is to bring the price of the company's shares down so that they become within the reach of a greater number of small investors and of their own employees.

Secondly, I would like to re-emphasize that all the thousands of Canadian companies who from time to time subdivide or split their shares do so by the very simple process of having a special general meeting of shareholders to approve the proposed split, and then seek supplementary letters patent from the Secretary of State. The splitting of the shares then becomes a fait accompli. They do not have to go to Parliament. The only reason this company has to come to Parliament and ask permission to do something which in the course of business has become a very ordinary procedure is because it is a special company incorporated by a special act of the federal Parliament.

Honourable senators, I believe the explanatory notes provide a clear statement of these points, and if this chamber is satisfied with the brief explanation I have given and with the explanatory notes, and gives second reading to the bill, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications—for the third time.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Can the honourable senator tell us the market value of those shares at the present time on the exchange?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: $88.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I can give you an approximate figure. I have not seen the market quotations today, but it is in the vicinity of $88. Obviously someone is watching the market more closely than I. They have been in the vicinity of $88 for the last few weeks.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Was this bill discussed in the other place?

Hon. Mr. Molson: I cannot say whether there was some discussion, but I think there were some words spoken on it. I am not sure whether it was talked out or lost its place in the line.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, it was talked out in the other place on one occasion, and on another occasion Parliament dissolved and it lost out on that account.

I have no intention of speaking on this bill. I have already spoken on it on two previous occasions, and this is the third time it has been before the Senate. On both occasions the Senate passed the bill, as was explained by the sponsor, and it went to the other place. It is a very important bill dealing with one of our great transportation systems, the pipe line. However, I would not like the public to think that we were passing it over without comment. It has already been discussed both here and in the other place. There were quite a number of speakers in the other place as I discovered on looking this matter up the other day.

The honourable senator has given the reasons for presenting the bill, and I think they are understandable. One is that if the company wishes to split the shares five for one, it cannot be done without coming to Parliament, as has been explained. The idea has also been advanced that the company wishes to have more subscriptions from the general public and also subscriptions under the employees' savings plan of the company. To my mind, this is an excellent idea.

I have also understood from remarks made by the honourable senator on previous occasions, that when this company makes large profits, as it has made in the past, it applies the profits towards a reduction in its tariffs. I think that is correct. The tariffs are lowered if the funds are available to do so. As we know, honourable senators, they have certainly had the funds. I think we may take it for granted that in the future when adequate profits are available the tariffs will again be lowered so that the public may have the benefit of the money earned.

I hope that large numbers of the employees and small investors will take advantage of this opportunity to purchase shares if the request to do is granted. In this respect I would like to ask the honourable senator to give us some idea of the number of employees in this company, and also what encouragement or what promotion is given to this plan so that the employees may take advantage of this opportunity. We all know that the Imperial Oil Company, the Shell Oil Company, and the British-American Oil Company own a majority of the shares. I think that out of some five million shares that have been sold, these three companies own at least 50 per cent. Could the honourable senator give some idea of the extent to which employees and others are likely to take advantage of this offer?

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I would like to thank the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) for his questions because they will do much, if I answer them properly, to bring out this information which perhaps I should have given you in the first instance.

There are 561 employees eligible to join the savings plan of the company, and the only test for eligibility is six months' service and participation in the company's retirement plan. So, of the 561 eligible employees, of whom 559 are participating, there are only two employees who have not an interest in the employees' savings plan. Purchases since the inception of the plan by employees amount to 46,280 shares.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Out of the five million?

Hon. Mr. Molson: Yes, out of the five million. As we know, the stock has always been high priced; as a matter of fact, that is a very substantial investment.

I stated that they had been asked their opinion and had backed the management in its application to split the shares. This occurred last summer, when the employees were asked two questions. One was:

> Would it be more attractive to you as an avenue of investment of your planned savings if the stock were subdivided?

The second question was:

> If you presently allocate your planned savings to cash savings, would the lower unit price of the stock encourage you to change your allocations from cash to the purchase of the company's stock?

To the first question 93.5 per cent of those who replied answered "Yes". This, as I said, is a very substantial majority. To the second question, which was a little more complex in form, 78.8 per cent of those who replied answered "Yes." It is obvious, therefore, that the employees look with great favour on the idea of having the stock at a level that is a little more easily reached.

As to the employees being informed that the stock would be more available because of price, that would certainly occur the moment the stock was officially split. It would of course be very apparent to any of them who happened to take a look at the price of the stock, to see how their investments are doing, because the day after it is split it will obviously come back at one-fifth of the price it was the day before. I am quite sure that, if it is $90 today and tomorrow morning an employee picks up the paper and sees it at 18, he would not just think there had been a weak market overnight. Certainly he would know the reason for the change.

Is there any other part of your question, senator, I have not answered?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: No, except that the small investor also has to be assisted. In splitting the stock the small investor is supposed to be helped. Have you any indication as to what extent he would be helped?

Hon. Mr. Molson: It is very hard to say, but in the research that has been done on this subject by investment houses, financial men, and so on, it has always shown a substantial increase in the number of shareholders when the price of the stock is reduced—or, at least, reduced from high levels like the $80 to $100 bracket. It has happened so many times on the market that a pattern has emerged which I think is undisputed. It is not commonly the practice of a person with a modest sum to invest, to buy one share or even two or three shares at $100. They would infinitely prefer to buy a stock of good repute selling in the range of $15 to $25, when they can get 20, 30 or 40 shares of that stock. So the impact of a split in a stock selling close to the $100 mark, such as this, could quite easily mean an increase in the number of shareholders to the order of 10 or 20 per cent. Certainly, it would invite a lot of smaller investors to participate who are not at present shareholders of the company.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Honourable Mr. Molson, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

OTTAWA TERMINAL RAILWAY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved the second reading of Bill S-2, to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company.

He said: Honourable senators, in the rather unusual circumstances in which this bill appears for a third annual session before this chamber, I am inclined to introduce it by referring you to a condition which existed in the English Parliament in the last century.

You may recall that during the whole of the last century it was forbidden for an Englishman to marry his deceased wife's sister. There was a member of the British Parliament for the last 30 or 40 years of the last century called Sir Wilfred Lawson who, being quite determined to change that position, introduced a bill to legalize marriage between a man and his deceased wife's sister. The bill did not get very far; it was only a private member's bill. It received no support from government, and there were some ecclesiastical objections, of which I do not really recall the basis. However, he was a persistent gentleman and every year, for years, he introduced his bill to legalize marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and it became the fact in British parliamentary life that no session of the House of Commons was deemed to have been complete without this bill having been introduced and there having been a debate upon it.

In fact, those of you who remember your Gilbert and Sullivan will recall that in Iolanthe, that comic opera which takes off the British Parliament, there are a couple of lines that are sung by the chorus about "that annual blister, marriage with deceased wife's sister."

I suppose some of you may be asking yourself what this has to do with an act to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company. Well, it has this to do with it. This is the third time in three consecutive sessions that this bill has been introduced and, unless we can get rid of it in some other way, I am afraid it is going to become as much an "annual blister" to this house as the deceased wife's sister bill was to the English House of Commons last century.

The bill itself was introduced in this house by our late lamented colleague Senator Lambert in 1964. It was debated in the house and then referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. It heard a number of representations, made a number of changes to the bill, and sent it back to this house, which eventually passed it some time in the summer of 1964. It then went to the House of Commons which gave it second reading and referred to its Standing Committee on Railways, which held a number of sittings but did not succeed in completing its examination before the session came to an end, and so the bill failed to pass.

Last year the same bill with the amendments that had been suggested by us in the previous year came before this chamber. It was then Bill S-3. It was again explained on second reading by the late Senator Lambert, and was again referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. That committee held two long and complicated meetings and dealt with every detail of the matter.

Honourable senators will recall perhaps that one thing happened in that connection, largely as a result of the activities of my present deskmate, the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), who caused the railway unions to become interested in the bill. This bill, as honourable senators know, provides for the incorporation of a railway company, of which 50 per cent is to be owned by the Canadian National and 50 per cent by the Canadian Pacific, which is to own and operate the new passenger terminal and the new freight terminal now in the process of construction by the National Capital Commission, as a consequence of the general relocation of the railway structure in and around the City of Ottawa, as proposed in the Greber report.

The railway union officials began to wonder what would be the position of the former employees of the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. who would be employed by this new company. They wondered whether they would lose any of their existing rights under their present union contracts, and so on.

The committee, in conjunction with the railway companies, was able to get these people together, and correspondence passed between the railway companies and the representatives of the unions, by which the unions became satisfied that their rights would be completely protected, and they withdrew any objections they might have had to the bill.

The bill then came back to the Senate, passed third reading, and was sent to the other place, but did not get any further before dissolution. That was the second time that this bill failed to pass Parliament.

The present bill corresponds exactly word for word with the bill which honourable senators considered during the last session of the last Parliament, with only one rather minor exception, which is perhaps a little interesting.

Clause 10 of the bill is a sort of omnibus clause giving various general powers to the company with respect to the carrying on of its operations, and is divided into a number of subclauses. Subclause (e) gives the company power to > acquire, erect, manage, operate or control restaurants, offices, shops, warehouses, storage and other rooms and conveniences and in connection therewith or any portion thereof, grant leases or concessions.

In the previous bill the word "hotels" was in that subclause.

I understand the reason for the omission of the word "hotels" is that both railway companies have agreed there is not the slightest likelihood of either or both of them wishing to establish a hotel in the new passenger terminal area.

As I have said, honourable senators, this bill has been considered twice before by the Senate. It has been considered in great detail by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. Under those circumstances it seems hardly necessary for me to repeat the details of it. To do so would be, perhaps, a work of supererogation. I suggest, however, if the Senate is willing to give second reading to the bill, that it again be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. At the last meeting of that committee in June the chairman of the National Capital Commission, General Clark, appeared and gave a most interesting explanation of what had been done and what was in the process of being done in connection with railway relocation in and around the City of Ottawa. If the bill goes again before the committee I am sure General Clark will be able to tell us about the further work that has been done in the meantime.

All I can do now, honourable senators, is to refer again to my old "deceased wife's sister bill", and say that the bill referred to earlier by me did finally get the approval of the British Parliament, and now it is quite legal for a man in England to marry his deceased wife's sister. I hope this bill will follow the same process and that we shall be able to get it on the statute books.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Did he marry the deceased wife's sister?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I think that what went on with respect to this bill during the last session is a good illustration of the services that have so often been performed by this chamber. I noted at the last session that the bill made no reference to the employees who would leave the employ of the two great railway companies and become employees of the new corporation. I called the Senate's attention to this at the time, and in consequence the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and the unions that follow Mr. Hall, were notified. They appeared before the committee in quite considerable numbers, and the committee heard from them at length and also from the employers at the same time.

Very largely due, I may say, to the skill and diplomacy of the chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), who is now introducing this bill the third time, the parties were brought together, and some kind of agreement was reached between them, which was confirmed by a letter from the railroads to the unions.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: And which was included in the report of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, and which was included in the report of the committee. I presume that that situation exists today. I approve very highly of this bill being referred to the same committee.

My honourable friend says that he will send notices to the railroads. I hope that the same notice will go to the unions—to Mr. W. G. McGregor, who was the representative of a number of unions, including the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and to Mr. F. H. Hall, who was the chief speaker for the non-operating unions.

Again I say, we performed a very great service on the last occasion, as we so frequently do when we look over bills of this kind. I agree that the bill should be referred to the committee.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, as time is getting on, I shall be brief. As the honourable sponsor of this bill (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) has told us, it is being introduced in this house for the third time, but coming from Ottawa, as I do, and having always taken an active part and a great interest in the development of the national capital area, I thought I should add my voice to what has been said already.

We have heard that on June 10, 1964 the late and esteemed Senator Lambert moved the second reading of the Ottawa Terminal Railway bill, which was at that time Bill S-33, to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company. His opening remarks were as follows:

> Honourable senators, Bill S-33, to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company, represents the attainment of an objective in the development of the National Capital area which has been discussed and recommended repeatedly during the past 50 years by official commissions and parliamentary committees.

He then proceeded to give us a picture of the background of this bill, and to refer to maps and illustrations showing the growth and development of the national capital area since the beginning of the century.

The late Senator Lambert had taken a very active part in the planning of the national capital area, and had become a personal friend of Jacques Greber who, in 1950, published a book entitled "Plan for the National Capital—a General Report". This report provided, among other things, for the relocation of railway lines and terminals, and it was well explained to us by the late Senator Lambert.

Then on June 11, 1964, the honourable Senator Grattan O'Leary had many constructive remarks to make concerning the bill. After that, as honourable senators are aware, we had prorogation.

The second occasion was on May 12, 1965 when a new bill, S-3, to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company was introduced.

Bill S-33 of the previous session was passed by this house on July 22, 1964, but failed to pass the other place before prorogation.

This bill, to my mind, is non-controversial. I think we all agree on that. In the plans made years ago to beautify our capital city some radical changes had to be made in its structure. One of the casualties is the old Union Station, which is presently situated in the very heart of the old city. The new railway station is to be located near what we commonly call in Ottawa the Hurdman's Bridge area, and the bill before us provides for the setting up of a company which would construct and operate a railway and related facilities in and about the City of Ottawa for the purpose of providing a transportation terminal.

I am sure that honourable senators will all agree that, technically, the new station will be located in the best available zone, although some complaints have been made by local businesses on the grounds that they would lose the tourist traffic by train, and also by many members of both Houses of Parliament who claim that the new location will require them to make use of buses, taxis and other less convenient methods of transport in order to reach Parliament Hill or their favourite hotel.

Since it is hoped that debate on the bill will finally conclude, and that the bill will be passed, I think that I should repeat in this debate a short statement made by the present sponsor (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) regarding this very point. On May 12, 1965, at page 75 of the Debates of the Senate, he stated:

> If I may speak again, some years ago I objected rather strongly to moving the station out from the centre of the city. My feelings were along the same lines as my friend Senator Macdonald (Brantford) has in mind. For this reason, I was particularly interested in the evidence given by both railway companies on this point at the sittings of tne Standing Committee on Transport and Communications last year. I had been very much concerned that they would feel that they were being pushed away from the centre of the city, and that thereby they would lose a considerable amount of their passenger traffic to the air line companies and the buses. However, the railway representatives did not take that view at all; they said, as an honourable senator said today, that the centre of the city is moving out in a southerly direction, and they felt that the majority of people living in Ottawa who desire to travel by train will be better served by the station in its new location than they are by the station in its present location where there is considerable traffic congestion. Apparently the new station will be situated where there will be a convergence of through highways which will make it very easy to get to.

I think it is as well to put those remarks on record again, because I hope that we are going to deal finally with this bill, to which I give my wholehearted approval.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask what is going to happen to the old station?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: There is some discussion as to whether it will be demolished, or whether it will be kept as a monument to old Ottawa, but nothing has been decided yet.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hugessen, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

INTERPRETATION ACT

BILL TO REVISE—CONSIDERATION TOMORROW

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, before we adjourn, may I have the privilege of calling to the attention of the leader (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) the fact that tomorrow, Thursday, Bill S-9, an act to revise and consolidate the Interpretation Act and Amendments thereto, and to effect certain consequential amendments to the Canada Evidence Act and the Bills of Exchange Act, will be before us. I am concerned about this bill. We had a similar bill before us previously.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Exactly the same bill.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I am concerned about it in this way: we are giving an artificial statutory meaning to words that will apply retroactively to all statutes now on the books, as well as to those in the future. The implications of such a bill are great, and it is something that we should watch with the very greatest of care.

I have looked in my file, but cannot see that bill. I do not know if other honourable senators have received it. Since this is a measure with which we should proceed with considerable care, I would like to see the bill before it comes before us for second reading.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Honourable senators, I have seen the bill; it has been distributed, and I cannot understand why my colleague has not yet received a copy. I did not look in my file, but the bill was in my office. However, the bill will be before honourable senators tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The bill has received first reading, and it is too important a measure to be dealt with lightly.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: The bill will be available tomorrow and presented for second reading then. Senator Macdonald (Brantford) will explain it, as he did last year. If the bill receives second reading it will be referred to a committee. If you want to discuss the bill, or if you have any question to raise about it on second reading, you will have ample time to do so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Thank you.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

Foreword

It hardly seems necessary to explain why the Senate of Canada decided to embark on this study. The problems of the aged and aging have been receiving attention in recent years in many parts of the world. There is ample evidence in Canada of public interest in the subject, and many organizations and individuals are involved in trying to improve the lot of aging citizens. Until now, however, no attempt has been made to examine the problems of aged Canadians as a whole on a national scale.

Special Committees of the Senate have in recent years conducted inquiries into broad issues of public concern. Among the many proposals now being made for the improvement of our parliamentary business is the provision of a small permanent research staff for the use of the Senate and the House of Commons. It would certainly facilitate inquiries of this kind if such services were available. Nonetheless some of the inquiries already carried out by the Special Committees of the Senate, such as the inquiry into Manpower and Employment and the Investigation of Land Use, have resulted in informative reports which have been judged by independent observers to be a useful contribution to public understanding of the issues. We are pleased to help in disseminating authoritative information on which Canadians can base their own opinions and judgment.

We have tried not to lose sight of the main subject of our inquiry, which is the problem of the aged and aging. It has been necessary to avoid being drawn into the wide and related area of welfare problems as such, or slipping into the trap of regarding the aged themselves as a problem group rather than a group beset by problems.

As our inquiry progressed, it became very clear to us that the word "welfare" had as many meanings as there were witnesses. There appears to be two broad categories of meaning for this word. There are those people, and the number of them is steadily increasing in our complex technological system, for whom "welfare" is an essential activity of the community, ensuring that every citizen is able to call upon community services that he may need as a right of membership within the community. The word "welfare" in this sense covers a wide range of services intended to provide for a condition of "well-being" for every citizen.

Then there are those, and there are still a great many of them in Canada today, who think of welfare services as those provided for the poor and socially inadequate. Our own position is closer to the first than the second of these two groups. We have concentrated our attention on the subject of the aged and of aging in its broadest sense. It is a normal and natural phenomenon of human life which concerns all of us and we have deliberately rejected the idea of defining "services" to the old people as "welfare services".

In pursuing its inquiry, the Committee has placed principal reliance on the knowledge of the many government and voluntary bodies throughout the country that have had experience in this field. The Committee is grateful to all of them for their assistance. The fruits of their labour are in a substantial degree incorporated in this Report. In addition, the main submissions made to us, as well as the verbatim proceedings, have been published separately in order to make this authoritative information available to all who are interested in pursuing lines of inquiry on particular topics.

May I repeat what I said to my colleagues when urging them to undertake this work? Senior citizens are not some indefinable group, separate and apart. They are our mothers and our fathers. They are ourselves in a few years. They are those who have made contributions to society and to our country. They are those who have given their energies, their skills and their children for the good of society. What the senior citizen needs is to retain his earned right in his own world.

In our investigation of ways and means of promoting "the welfare of the aged and aging persons," extending over many months, we have not only studied the wealth of material put before us, but being sensitive to the current social climate, we have tried to take a broad view of the whole question of aging. Our collective experience in living has helped us to place in perspective the problems raised and the solutions advocated.

Although some kinds of help needed by older people can be provided on a universal basis, many of their problems require individual attention. To ensure that this is available in a vast country with widely varying local conditions is a big order. It is always easier to suggest things for others to do than to point the finger at one's own responsibilities. We have, therefore, kept in mind the continuing part that all of us might play individually. Concern about the need to improve public services is evidenced by the number of official inquiries that have been going on into the division of responsibilities between provincial and municipal governments. But in addition to all that governments do to help the aged, there is need for the personal interest of citizens both in supporting public programs and in lightening the load of their own elderly relatives, friends and neighbors.

Our terms of reference, with emphasis on the need to develop "positive and preventive" measures which would enable older people to "continue to live healthy and useful lives as members of the Canadian community . . . .", clearly imply concern for all elderly people and not only for those who are in trouble. Moreover, we assume that older Canadians will benefit by any measures that promote the general welfare in its broadest sense.

Aging is a normal process that goes hand in hand with living. It is not a disease; neither is it an inborn handicap. What we see as problems of aging are the difficulties more likely to be encountered by people who have passed their 65th birthday. For those who are seeking work, we are convinced that, generally speaking, problems related to age descend into the forties.

Recognition that older people are vulnerable to certain kinds of threats does not imply—and we reject any suggestion of the kind—that the elderly are a problem group. A high proportion of people continue to enjoy and to contribute to life to the end, and they are the individuals most likely to live to an advanced age. Although ailments naturally accumulate with time, more than 90 per cent of the elderly are not physically or mentally incapacitated to the extent that they must be taken into care. And only a small minority—perhaps 15 per cent of those over 65—are in receipt of public assistance. The great majority, although pitifully poor in many instances, manage on their own with the aid of the old age pension and those who come to public attention are the exception rather than the rule.

What we believe to be the universal desire of the elderly was crystallized for us by the Canadian Association for Adult Education in the word "continuity". Continuity involves expectation of sameness or change that is planned for and, if at all possible, self-chosen. It gives a feeling of security to maintain as long as possible the continuity of life as represented by place of residence, employment, family, church, clubs, hobbies and personal care. It is open only to a small minority to continue at the same job after age 65, and the risk of losing the lifetime partner—often all that remains of the family of origin—it is very great at that age. It becomes increasingly important to bolster up those areas in which things can go on more or less as they are. And when a fundamental change must be made in the interests of health and safety, freedom of choice should be preserved in as many areas as possible.

In their desire for continuity the elderly are asking society to let them keep the image they have earned in their prime, and protesting the tendency to lump them all together. They are saying in effect that they want to be treated like other adults; that to segregate them on the basis of age is degrading. Since each human being is a part of all that he has met, he asks the right to bring with him into his later years a lifetime of growth and experience. He asks not to be required to leave his comfortable old coat at the door, accepting in its place a uniform style worn by all those, and only those, who have reached age 65. Older people are individuals representing a cross-section of characteristics much like those found in the general population. Personal attributes are more pronounced than ever when we reach a time of life in which the need to conform is less important.

Resistance to being identified as aged is very great in a youth-worshipping society, where the negative image of old age is almost universal. It is said to be fixed in the mind of a child by the age of 10 and to be so firmly rooted that a graduate student retains it even after a course in the psychology of aging. Even professional people are apt to have a distorted image of aging. Doctors and nurses see the aged sick, social workers the aged poor, employment officers the aged (and often uneducated) job-seekers. It is not surprising that these people—with so many other fields of activity open to them—are not generally attracted to working with the elderly. Furthermore, in this area as in some others, theory and practice are sometimes divorced. We were informed that employers support campaigns to encourage employment of older workers, but seldom see a place for them in their own establishments.

Our objective should be to keep to a minimum the number of old people who must have special attention, something that is bound to require heavy outlay in money as well as in time of scarce professional staff. Further investment in the preventive aspects of aging should pay big dividends.

The universal need, which only a small minority of old people can provide for themselves, is a floor of income security to maintain self-reliance. Organizations serving older people understandably concentrate on the need for services and on plans for improving the administrative structure, but the elderly themselves equate money with freedom.

The financial prospects of many older people should be greatly improved by measures taken since our hearings began. Particular mention should be made of the Government decision to reduce the age of eligibility for Old Age Security so that by 1970 it will be available to all at age 65. The coming into force of the Canada Pension Plan will help to ensure more adequate income in retirement for most of those who have been in the labour force. These will make retirement easier for the next generation of older people. They do nothing, of course, to improve the lot of those who have already reached their 70th birthday.

We deplore the tendency to confuse economic dependency with social or psychological dependency. To assume that one who needs financial help must be an inadequate individual will help to make him feel unworthy and preclude satisfactory solution of his plight. The elderly are particularly sensitive to any implications of that kind. The fact is that it is often the cost of expensive and lengthy health care that reduces elderly people to destitution. Institution of a comprehensive system of health services will save many from economic dependency.

The evidence convinces us that the great majority of older people continue to enjoy the love and support of relatives and friends. In modern industrial societies in which the family has long since ceased to be the common unit of economic production and consumption, this does not usually take the form of three generations living under one roof, an arrangement which is seldom desired by the elderly and is practically always less than ideal for the younger family. Some witnesses told of seeing "controversy and friction" in families where several generations share a small house. Almost intolerable strains are sometimes imposed by family loyalty.

It would hardly be realistic to represent old age as generally more satisfying than youth or the middle years. On the other hand, continual harping on the problems of old age is apt to make those for whom it is still ahead live in dread of it. Those who are already old need no reminder that the sands of time are running out. "The old men know when an old man dies." There is wisdom in the repeated warnings that fear of aging makes us reject the aged as a group. One way to allay these fears is to do all we can to eradicate the intolerable conditions under which many of the elderly now exist. It is the true situation of these individuals that provides the basis for the public image of old age. Because of their serious plight, there has been a tendency to consider the whole situation of the aging in a context of welfare. The Canadian Association for Adult Education suggested to us that to view aging in the context of welfare makes it "incapable of solution."

We have seen our task as assessment of the position of the elderly in today's society and consideration of what appears likely to be their lot in the foreseeable future. In Canada as in all advanced countries, the number and proportion of people who live to later ages is growing. At the same time, changing conditions have made it more difficult for the elderly to maintain their place in the community. Increasing productivity per worker, with fewer individuals required to do the nation's work, has created problems for them in the labour market even before the age of normal retirement, and we have yet to develop the attitudes and conditions necessary for older people to live useful and satisfying lives within the new circumstances of modern society.

The genuine interest of the committee members is attested by their faithful attendance, often at great inconvenience and during periods when the Upper House was not in session. Among them they brought to the subject not only their interest, but both breadth and depth of knowledge and experience. Some, but by no means all, could qualify for membership in a senior citizens' club. Those on the Committee included doctors, lawyers, farmers and businessmen. They were drawn from all ten provinces, and many are well acquainted with rural as well as urban life. Now that the older years are becoming in many ways a women's world since, as statistics indicate, women live longer than men, we are happy to report that four of the members of our Committee were women.

Chairman.

Acknowledgements

Reference has already been made in the Foreword to the generous co-operation accorded to the Senate Committee in its inquiry by governmental and voluntary agencies throughout Canada. In addition to extensive memoranda prepared on request by six departments and agencies of the Federal Government and presentations by nine of the Provinces, the Committee received briefs from some fifty citizen organizations. The latter, including societies of old people themselves, were located in many parts of the country and represented, not only the fields of health and welfare, but such varied interests as religion, education, business and labour. The Committee is grateful to all of these interested groups which, in most instances, went to great trouble and expense to share with us their knowledge and experience.

Acknowledgement is made here of the debt owed by the Committee to the members of its small professional and clerical staff who carried heavy and demanding responsibilities throughout. Their ability, hard work and devotion over the past two years have been important factors in bringing this Report to completion. We wish to mention particularly Mrs. G. H. Josie, who served so faithfully as Executive Assistant to the Chairman and prepared very helpful summaries of the Committee's Proceedings, as well as useful research, which is reflected in the Report. Appreciation should also be expressed of the wholehearted cooperation received from the Library of Parliament throughout the period of the Committee's inquiry, and not least of its specific contribution in preparing the index of the Report.

We should like to commend Mr. John A. Hinds and Mr. Dale Jarvis of the Committees Branch of the Senate, for the competence and despatch with which they handled the many administrative details relating to the Hearings, the meetings of the Committee and the translation and printing of the Report. To Mrs. Cathy Carpenter, Mrs. Susan Irvin, Miss Vera Fisher, and Miss Marion Ballantyne, who in succession served as secretaries to the Consultant, we wish to express thanks for the efficient and cheerful way in which they performed their duties.

Special reference should be made to the contribution of a small group of experts from various disciplines whose help was enlisted in the final stages of the investigation. Members of this group, on time taken from their leisure hours, worked with the Consultant in analyzing the mass of evidence submitted to the Committee. They are also responsible for the basic content of the Chapters comprising Part II of the Report as follows: Mr. Gilles Paquet, Department of Economics, Carleton University, (Chapter 9); Dr. Meyer Brownstone, Department of Political Economy, University of Toronto, (Chapter 10); Dr. Cope W. Schwenger, School of Hygiene, University of Toronto, (Chapter 11); Mr. André Saumier, Assistant to the General Manager, General Investment Corporation of Quebec, (Chapter 12); Donald H. Gardner, Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto, (Chapter 13); Dr. Peter C. Pineo, Department of Sociology, Carleton University, (Chapter 14); Mrs. Freda Paltiel, Ottawa. (Chapter 15); and Dr. Robert Kohn, whose experience as Assistant Director of Research for the Royal Commission on Health Services, was invaluable in many areas.

We were very fortunate in being able to retain the services of Mr. R.E.G. Davis as Consultant, whose knowledge and advice were of inestimable value. Upon him rested the overall staff responsibility for planning the inquiry, organizing the hearings, and preparing the report. To this task he brought his wide experience in the social and economic fields, which was of the greatest assistance to the Committee in the conduct of its study.

Introduction: Older People in Canadian Society

In this Report, which touches on many aspects of the life of older people, considerable information, in statistical and other form, related to income, employment, health, housing and social conditions, is presented in individual chapters. The purpose of this introductory chapter, based largely on demographic data supplied by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, (DBS),[1] is to indicate a few general but salient characteristics of the older population, which have enabled the Committee to view their situation in some perspective.

Growth and Geographic Distribution of the Older Population

1. Older people in Canada are a rapidly growing group. Using the customary, if arbitrary, age line of 65 years we find there are now nearly 1,500,000 of them (DBS estimate for June 1, 1964, was 1,468,000), five times the number there were in 1901. And looking ahead we can be reasonably sure the present figure will more than double in the next twenty-five years to yield a total in excess of 3,000,000 at the time of the 1991 census.[2] By contrast the total population of Canada only tripled between 1901 and 1961 and is expected not quite to double by 1991.

It may be observed further that the rate of increase shows some tendency to rise with age. The population aged 75 and over has increased nearly six times since 1901 and the estimates are that the present number will increase two and a half times by 1991. This, of course, is the group most likely to make heavy demands on health, welfare, and other services.

2. There are those who view these trends as alarming, economically, which is the reason for their concern about them. How, they say, shall we ever be able to support such large numbers of non-producing and needy people? The fact is, however, that numbers in themselves throw little light on the answer to this question. What we have to consider rather is the proportion of older people in the population and here the statistics are much less disturbing. In 1901, 5 per cent of Canada's population was in the 65 and over age group; by 1961, sixty years later, it had risen considerably, but only to 7.6 per cent, and in 1991 the estimate is it will still be less than 9 per cent.

Moreover, even if we lump together the whole dependent population, not merely the elderly but the children at school as well, and relate this total to the population of working age that must support them, the ratio will according to the estimates remain more or less constant in the foreseeable future.[3] Added to the fact that this ratio, roughly 40 per cent dependent to 60 per cent working, is not likely to change, there is the further consideration that the economy's output per worker can reasonably be expected to rise from two to three per cent each year. We need have no fear, therefore, older people in Canada will become an insupportable financial burden.

Actually, Canada has a relatively young population. As the following figures show, it is well down the list of Western countries in terms of the proportion of its population that is 65 and over. Using 1960 statistics, Sweden is at the top with 12 per cent, followed by the United Kingdom (1961) with 11.9 per cent, Norway 10.9 per cent, West Germany and Denmark 10.6 per cent, the United States 9.3 per cent, the Netherlands 9.0 per cent, New Zealand 8.6 per cent, Australia 8.4 per cent, and Canada 7.6 per cent.[4]

3. However, it should be noted that the proportion of older people in the population varies considerably by provinces; from highs of 10.4 per cent in Prince Edward Island and 10.2 per cent in British Columbia to lows in Quebec and Newfoundland of 5.8 per cent and 5.9 per cent respectively. This variation is tied in with a number of factors, notably inter-provincial migration. Since migration is most likely to involve people at working ages, the Maritime Provinces, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, which have lost more people than they have gained since 1941, have been left with relatively high proportions of older people. British Columbia is a special case due to its favourable climate which attracts people in later years. Although B.C. is the province showing the largest population gain due to inter-provincial migration, its population of older people is larger than that of any other province except P.E.I.

4. An important characteristic of population trends is the steady trek from farm to city, largely determined by industrial development, which has been most marked in Canada during the years since the outbreak of World War II. By mid-century this movement was well advanced in the industrialized provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and also in British Columbia, and it has continued in these three provinces since at an accelerated pace. The urban population had become the majority also in Manitoba and Nova Scotia at the time of the 1951 census, but the other five provinces at that time continued predominantly rural. By 1961 only Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan and New Brunswick had larger rural than urban populations and all provinces were moving in the direction of increased urbanization.[5]

Those trends are naturally reflected in the distribution of the older population. In 1961, 70 per cent of those aged 65 and over lived in urban areas, 20 per cent in rural non-farm areas, and 10 per cent on farms. Moreover, a comparison with the situation in 1951 reveals that during the 1951-61 period the number of older people in urban areas increased by 40 per cent, and in rural non-farm areas by 36 per cent, whereas the number living on farms declined 31 per cent, some 11 per cent more than the decline in the total farm population.

Note should also be taken of the distribution of the older population by sex. In rural areas, farm and non-farm alike, older men outnumbered older women, which has been the pattern for some decades, whereas in urban areas, older women in 1961 comprised 54 per cent of the total population aged 65 and over.

Sex and Marital Characteristics of the Older Population[6]

1. On the average Canadians today live longer than they did a generation ago, but this is due much more to the changes that have occurred in infant than in adult mortality rates. Deaths fell from over 100 in the first year per 1,000 live births during the early 1920's to a record low of 27 in 1961. The result is that at present according to the 1961-2 Canadian Life Table, a male infant at birth has a life expectancy of 68 years, and a female of 74 years, respectively, 8 years and 12 years more than in 1931.

However, life expectancy for adults has also increased over this period, notably for women. The latter at age 45 may now expect to live 4 years longer than women of the same age 30 years ago, and even at age 60 they have a 2.7 year advantage. By contrast men have improved their position very little. For those aged 45 the gain in life expectancy is less than 1 year and at 60 approximately only 6 months over that of their predecessors in 1931.

2. The fact that women on the average outlive men goes a long way to explain why there are so many more widowed women than widowed men in the population. Other reasons, are of course, the greater tendency there is for widowers to remarry, and their likelihood in doing so to choose younger women as partners. According to the 1961 census, 71.6 per cent of the widowed population aged 65 and over were women as compared with some 66 per cent twenty years earlier.

According to the DBS definition, "the urban population represents that portion of the total population residing in cities, towns, and villages of 1,000 population and over, whether incorporated or not, including persons residing in metropolitan areas and the urbanized fringe of urban centres of 10,000 population and over." The balance of the population is classified as rural and is divided into two sub-groups: rural non-farm, who are people living in communities whether incorporated or not, of less than 1,000 population and farm, people living on farms as defined by the census of agriculture.

Commenting on this general situation Mr. LeNeveu in his submission to the Committee remarked: "At all ages there were about twice as many widowed women as widowed men in the population of Canada in 1941, while in 1961 there were almost three times as many. This disparity in relative numbers of widowed men and widowed women in the older age groups is a factor of some importance in the consideration of family and housing problems of older people in Canada."[7] As will be seen in later chapters, the majority of older widows in 1961 had no other source of income than the Old Age Security Pension.[8]

The Social Setting of Older People

To round out the present brief review of basic statistical data something should be said about other aspects of the situation of older people, such as their income, employment and housing status. However, as the Report developed, so much of this material came to be included in the specialized chapters that it has seemed unnecessary to repeat it here. We conclude this background chapter with two or three general observations related to the social position of the aged.

1. Old people are not nearly as distinct and homogeneous a group as is sometimes imagined. Many of their needs and interests are very like those of other members of society, while in such obvious respects as income, health, cultural activities and social behaviour they vary widely among themselves. Even in the matter of age gerontologists are coming to distinguish between the young-old, the middle-aged old, and the old-old, and to recognize that these categories cannot be defined altogether in terms of years, but must take account of psychological and sociological factors.

What this implies is that older people can often satisfy many of their needs and interests through existing or emerging community arrangements, or could do so if the opportunity were as readily available to them as to other age groups, in areas like education and community recreation, for example. It also implies that where special provision has to be made for old people, as in regard to housing and health care, pains should be taken to ensure the widest possible variety of choice and opportunity.

2. Older people are less likely today than formerly to live with their grownup children. In the main this is due to the changed conditions of urban living, which in contrast to conditions in a rural economy make a large family burdensome. City families have smaller dwellings and a much narrower spread of social and economic functions. Another factor is modern mobility, which may mean the young family is located a long way from the place where the parents have their roots. And, finally, there is the consideration that many older people prefer to be independent and to maintain their own way of life.

[8] See Chapters 2 and 9.

The Committee discussed this latter situation on the several occasions when it met with older people and discovered some interesting attitudes, at any rate among the young-old and middle-aged old. What we were told was that, while older people want to be near their married children, they would prefer not to live under the same roof. This statement, it might be observed, is supported by census statistics. These suggest, although the data is not complete, that between 1951 and 1961, due no doubt to the introduction of the universal Old Age Pension, there was a shift away from older parents living with their children, even on the part of those who were widowed.[9]

The Committee's informants among older people also spoke of their wish to be financially independent of their children, except where the help could be mutual. The trend, which is supported by other evidence, seems to be for older people to turn for assistance of this sort, when they need it, to government and specialized community agencies rather than to members of their families.

3. One of the most serious and difficult problems faced by society in relation to old people is that of helping them maintain some satisfying foothold in the community and with it a sense of self-worth. In earlier times when old people had a scarcity value they not only enjoyed considerable respect, but were turned to as a source of wisdom and experience. Today, with the world changing as rapidly as it is, and moving along technical and scientific lines, such wisdom and experience tend to be at a discount. The result is that the older person, and more particularly the man, retired early from his accustomed occupation, frequently feels himself an economic and social supernumerary. He has ceased to belong in the important world of work and, consequently, has lost many of his social contacts. And his children, who could give him a sense of family rooting, may well at this point be at the other end of the country.

There is the further consideration, pointed out by Frederick Elkin that "when someone reaches the age of 65 or 70 others often define him as old; they treat him differently and expect different behaviour from him, and the elderly person may, no matter what his physical condition may be, accept this definition."[10]

Professor Elkin concludes that it is difficult in modern society to provide older people with "meaningful and satisfying" roles. Perhaps eventually the aged will work out this problem for themselves, or at any rate there is the possibility of it becoming less pressing, as we all learn to use more creatively the increased leisure the machine is now making available to us during our active working years. Meanwhile, there are many bored and lonely men and women in the old age group, which would seem to indicate the need for deliberate community planning and action to relieve their condition or prevent it arising. One obvious place to begin is with housing, recreation and institutional projects. In present circumstances these are often so planned as to segregate old people and remove them unnecessarily from familiar scenes and contacts.

4. Finally, it should be observed, and indeed emphasized, that many of the personal problems of older people are the result of social and economic trends that are affecting all of us. Old people may be in a particularly vulnerable spot but so, in varying ways and degrees, are the members of younger age groups. One has only to think of automation which, with its impact on early retirement, is giving a new meaning to "age" and "aging." A fact of life, significant for this Report, is that increasing numbers of people are retiring from the active labour force, or are being forced out of it, at ages when they are still relatively vigorous and resourceful. And yet people at all stages of the aging process wish to go on living as close to normal as possible, and to be regarded as still having a useful contribution to make.

Problems like these have to be considered in their broadest social context. What kind of a society is likely to be the outcome of our advancing technology? Will it be as mechanized and automated, and also as sterile, spiritually and culturally, as some thinkers and writers seem to imagine? Lewis Mumford was thinking along these lines in an article on Aging written as far back as 1956 which is still timely:

"The first step toward framing a sound program (for old people) is, I believe, to examine the human situation as a whole, not to center attention solely on the problem of destitution, chronic diseases, and hospital care. We shall not, perhaps, be able to care for the aged, on the scale their needs and our national wealth demand, until we are ready to put into the rebuilding of human communities something like the zeal, the energy, the skill, the dedication we give to the monomaniac production of motor cars and super highways . . . . but to say this is also to say that there is no easy shortcut to improved care for the aged: to do well by them, we must give a new direction to the life of the whole community. If we fail here we shall in prolonging life only prolong the possibilities of alienation, futility and misery."[11]

The Committee's outlook is not pessimistic. We believe that, without sacrificing economic growth or specialized efficiency, we can create in Canada a society where youth and age alike will find satisfaction and fulfilment. It is our hope that the present Report, which attempts to view the human situation in Canada through the eyes of the aged, may make some contribution to this larger task.

PART I

SUMMARY AND RECOMMENDATIONS

CHAPTER 1

Guiding Principles

In the course of its Hearings, extending well over a twelve-month period, the Committee has been brought into close contact with the situation of old people in Canada today. The many persons who have appeared at these Hearings, representative of governmental and voluntary bodies, and speaking usually from intimate knowledge, described this situation, or particular aspects of it, in considerable depth and detail. They also indicated, with some precision and an impressive degree of unanimity, what in their view should be done about it.

There can be no question of the important contribution made by the Hearings to the Committee's inquiry. Not only was a great wealth of material assembled, which could hardly have been secured in any other way; but also as the evidence accumulated members were made increasingly aware of the magnitude and complexity of the subject-area with which they were required to deal. The greatest difficulty arose when it came to assessing the proposals put forward by the different groups. As was quickly apparent these were based on a variety of premises that were not always compatible, and in the Committee itself differences were revealed in view-point and assumption that frequently stood in the way of easy consensus.

It cannot be said that the Committee made any formal attempt to resolve these differences. The focus throughout was rather on practical concerns, and it was in relation to one after another of these that matters of principle and philosophy were discussed and clarified. Out of this process certain generalizations were gradually evolved, which served to guide the Committee's thinking and planning and it would seem important to set these down in brief outline, as follows:

1. The welfare of older people is closely linked with the welfare of all Canadians.

Many of the problems older people face are the result of new developments in society, such as rapid technological change, which are having their effects on other age groups as well. This means that constructive planning for old people cannot proceed on an ad hoc basis but must rest on an analysis and understanding of the total social situation.

2. Society has a responsibility to protect and assist disadvantaged groups in the population, such as older people under present day conditions, but in doing so must also take account of the wider public interest.

David A. Morse, director-general of the International Labour Office, Geneva, speaking at the first Hearing of the Committee, enunciated this principle:

> "Older people", he said, "are more vulnerable to change than other groups . . . more defenceless, more liable to be discarded . . . Yet in justly recognizing the claims of older people . . we should do so, I suggest, through policies fully harmonized with the broad social and economic goals of the community as a whole."

Mr. Morse couples social and economic goals as though they are themselves in harmony, which is, of course, not always the case. His main point, however, is valid, namely that there is need for a total rather than a segmented view of the good society and for long-term as well as short-term objectives along the road to its achievement.

3. Every effort should be made to enable old people to maintain their independence as fully and as long as possible.

Not only is prolonged dependence likely to be debilitating but it is a condition which the great majority of older people are anxious to avoid. All the evidence received by the Committee supports this proposition. Witnesses from the health field laid great stress on the importance and potentialities of rehabilitation programs, and older people themselves spoke of their desire to manage their own affairs rather than become a burden to their families and the community.

4. There is no simple answer to the question of whose responsibility it is to provide the services and facilities required by Canada's growing population of old people.

Governments at all levels, voluntary agencies and associations, business enterprise and the individual citizen himself are all involved, but the roles performed by each are constantly changing, and at any given time vary according to the nature and extent of a particular need, and the social service pattern of the community or province.

Broadly it may be said:

— that the individual should be expected to carry a personal responsibility for his own health, welfare and happiness in old age as in earlier life up to the limits of his means and capacity.

— that voluntary agencies and associations may provide, or share with government in providing, services that are within the scope of private financing and/or are not yet accepted as requiring to be made generally available.

— that business enterprise should be free to cater to the needs and interests of those older people who have the means to pay for them.

— that governments have the overall responsibility to see that:

(a) older people have sufficient income to support a desirable minimum standard of living;

(b) the necessary range of basic services and facilities required by older people are provided and available to them;

(c) that under whatever auspices such services and facilities are provided acceptable standards are maintained.

5. It follows from the above that one of the great needs in the field of aging is for planning and co-ordination, not only in local communities but at the provincial and federal levels.

Vigorous and varied eflorts are being made everywhere across Canada at the present time to match the requirements of older people with appropriate services and facilities. To a large extent, however, these efforts are proceeding independently without reference to any central design. The result is a fragmented and unbalanced situation in which old people seeking help are often confused, and in which overall planning, evaluation and research are conspicuously lacking. Some disorder is to be expected in the early stages of any important undertaking, but if this disorder continues unduly, especially in an area as many-sided and complex as that of aging, there is an increasing risk of ineffectiveness and failure.*

CHAPTER 2

Income Status and Security

Income status of older people

Without question the most serious problem encountered by the Senate Committee in the course of its investigation was the degree and extent of poverty which exists among older people. Witness after witness at the hearings spoke of incomes insufficient to ensure proper food, housing and medical care; and every form of analysis made for the Committee, on the basis of the 1961 census and the 1962 survey of income statistics, supported the proposition that older people are a low-income group, and that many of them eke out an existence at or near the subsistence level.[1] The situation is elaborated in Chapter 9 but a few of the more striking facts may be summarized as follows.

* At a number of points in later chapters of the Report, the Committee returns to the question of guiding principles. This has seemed necessary, in relation to the particular problem under discussion. It will usually be found, however, that these later formulations are corollaries of the five statements presented here, which the Committee regards as basic.

[1] The chief source of data for this summary is a memorandum and subsequent tabulations prepared for the Committee by Miss J. R. Podoluk, Research Statistician DBS (See Proceedings of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging (No. 18), October 22, 1964.)

1. In 1961, 54 per cent of the population aged 65 and over, had gross money incomes of less than $1,000. Actually the percentage was higher than that. For one thing, persons reporting no income, some 8 per cent of the total, were not counted; for another the survey excluded farm residents, inmates of institutions, and persons living in non-private households, altogether another 18 per cent. Had these two groups formed part of the total, the 54 per cent figure would undoubtedly be higher. For all persons who were included the median income was $960: $1,440 for men and $830 for women.[2]

2. Fifty-nine per cent of Canada's older people in 1961 were members of families as defined by the census.[3] It may be assumed, although we do not have adequate data, that many of these older people are better off than their individual incomes would suggest. If the husband and wife are still together, which was true in 80 per cent of such families, the wife may have had an income as well as the husband, and unmarried children, if present in the home, may have been making some contribution in support of their parents. The median income of non-farm families with the head aged 65 and over, was $2,831, which, however, was only 60 per cent of that of families with the head under 65. A further finding of considerable importance is that although older families (with the head aged 65 and over) comprised only 12 per cent of all Canadian families, they accounted for nearly one-third of the total number with incomes under $2,000.[4] Some 37 per cent of older families are in this latter group.

3. If things are difficult financially for many older people living in their own families, they are much more so for those whose families are broken up through the death of one of the marriage partners and children moving out on their own. In 1961 there were 570,000 such "unattached" persons, over two-thirds of them women, and their median income on the basis of the non-farm sample was $829[5], with 60 per cent receiving less than $1,000 annually.

We know less than we should about how these people manage. Over 40 per cent of them, mostly on very low incomes, lived with married children or other relatives, who in many instances doubtless provided free room and board. The remainder, however, some 262,000 older persons, 63 per cent of them women, lived alone or with non-relatives and were, presumably, dependent for the most part on their own resources. Of this latter group, 53 per cent had incomes of less than $1,000. Among those aged 70 and over, 47 per cent of the men and 50 per cent of the women, received almost their entire incomes in the form of Old Age Security payments.

[2] Because of the concentration of pension incomes at $660 (the old age security level in 1961) it is probable that the correct median in this group is lower, possibly as low as $660.

[3] A family, as defined by the census, comprises a husband and wife living together with or without unmarried children, or one parent occupying a dwelling with unmarried children.

[4] It should be observed that the 1964 Annual Report of the Council of Economic Advisors (U.S.A.) regards as poor all families with incomes under $3,000.

4. Among the various sub-groups in the older population, "unmarried" women (single, widowed and divorced)[6] would appear to be in the worst economic position, which is all the more serious since in 1961 over 50 per cent of all women, 65 years of age and over, were in this category. Moreover, the prediction is that the percentage of women in the older population will continue to rise over the coming decades and that an increasing proportion of them will be widows.

An analysis of the income position of older "unmarried" women by household status indicates that for those who lived with relatives, usually their married children (one-third of the total group) 80 per cent had incomes of less than $1,000. Only slighter better off were lodgers (10 per cent of the group) with a median income of $844. For those who maintained their own apartment or house, (some 44 per cent of the group) the median was highest at $937. (Not included in the above classification were women in institutions, such as homes for the aged, nursing homes, etc., who comprised nearly 9 per cent of the unmarried female group, and employees and others who totalled 4 per cent).

Another informative statistic relates to Old Age Assistance. Of persons (between 65 and 69 years) granted such assistance in 1962-3, 56.6 per cent were women; and of these 7 per cent were single and 49 per cent widowed, separated and divorced.

In another tabulation (see Table 1) the Committee examined the incomes of older people by age beyond 70. It will be seen that among the present generation of older people incomes vary inversely with age, which suggests that those in advanced years, and especially the women among them, are in greater financial need than persons who retired recently.

[6] The census includes separated persons in the married group.

Sources of Income

An important question relates to the proportion of their incomes which older people receive from different sources. Census information on this subject, unfortunately, is not yet available but the Survey of Consumer Finance 1962 yields the following statistics:

Table 2.—Composition of Aggregate Family Income by Age of Head of Family[7]

Source	65–69 years	70 and Over
Income from employment	71.4	48.1
Old age pensions and old age assistance	3.2	26.1

All other sources	32.7	32.4
TOTAL	100.0	100.0

SOURCE: Unpublished data—1962 Survey of Consumer Finance.

In view of the fact that the incomes of children and other relatives living with the family head are included in Table 2, it is not perhaps surprising that employment should be the chief source of family income even for the group 70 years and over, or that government payments come to only 30 per cent of the total. Another reason why employment remains important as a source of family income is that most family heads are men and a considerable proportion of these (47.4 per cent aged 65-69 years and 17.8 per cent 70 years and over in 1961) continued to work.

[8] Individuals living alone or with non-relatives.

For individuals living alone apart from any relatives, some two-thirds of whom were women, heavy dependence on government payments is clearly seen. One-quarter of all income in the group 65-69, and over one half in the group 70 years and over came from this source. Miss Podoluk adds two other comments: 1) the proportion of total income received from government payments is much higher for women than for men (70 per cent of all women 70 years and over as compared with 40 per cent of all men had no other income than government payments); 2) for those individuals whose incomes were less than $1,000 (60 per cent of the total non-family group) government payments constituted more than 90 per cent of the total income.

It should be noted, however, that employment continues to be an important if diminishing source of income even beyond age 70. Older persons who continue to work, chiefly the self-employed, are in a much better financial position. Canadian figures on this point are not available but the situation in the United States in 1957 was described as follows: "Only about one-fifth of all men aged 65 and over, and 4 per cent of all aged women were year round full-time earners. Their average annual income was roughly two and a half to three times that for all aged persons."[9]

Unfortunately, it is not possible with the data now available to make an analysis of "income from other sources", which in three of the four categories given above is the second largest income component. Presumably the chief item is investment income, which accrues chiefly to persons at the upper end of the income scale. The other item of principal consequence is private pensions and annuities. Here we know that in the 1961 Census 228,000 persons of all ages, 166,000 men and 62,000 women, reported income form this source. Even if one were to assume that three-quarters of these persons were 65 years of age and over, only 12 per cent of the older age group were in receipt of income from this source. A breakdown of the figures by income indicates that of all male pension recipients, regardless of age, 35 per cent had incomes of $5,000 and up and 11 per cent had incomes under $1,500; and that of all women recipients 15 per cent had incomes of $5,000 and up and 28 per cent had incomes under $1,500.

Although cash income is the most important single measure of the financial position of older people, a complete assessment needs to take account also of income in kind, such as imputed rent on owner-occupied homes, and also of assets that may have been accumulated by older people during their working years. It is unfortunate, therefore, that recent data under this head are not available. The latest information is from a DBS survey in 1958 which shows that non-farm families with heads aged 65 and over had more liquid assets and less debts than families generally.[10] For most people in both groups, however, the amounts involved were small: 60 per cent of the older families, and 80 per cent of all families had liquid assets of less than $2,000; and 96 per cent of the former, as compared with 88 per of the latter, had consumer debts of less than $1,000.

It is probably true in Canada, as in the United States and Great Britain, that the most important capital owners among the aged are a small minority of the total group. This same 1958 survey shows that for the group aged 65 and over, 15.3 per cent of family units (families and unattached individuals) with incomes of $5,000 and more held 40.3 per cent of the liquid assets of the group. Similarly in the United States in 1960, (according to the Survey of Consumer Finances, University of Michigan), the top 20 per cent of the age group 65 years and over, ranked by size of income, held about 50 per cent of the liquid assets.

Owned homes are the principal asset that people bring with them into old age. In 1961, of 747,000 dwellings occupied by households, whose head was aged 65 and over 77 per cent were owner-occupied. In the spring of 1959 it was estimated that over 90 per cent of home owners aged 65 and over owned their homes, mortgage-free. This means, of course, that a modest cash outlay enabled such families to remain in their own homes. However, as pointed out by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in its submission to the Senate Committee[11], the quality of the housing stock occupied by the elderly is much below average.

Increases since 1961 in Social Security payments

What has been said up to this point relates chiefly to the situation in 1961 which is the latest year for which substantial data are available. It does not, therefore, reflect the two adjustments that have taken place since that date in the payments available to older people under the country's Old Age Security and Old Age Assistance programs. Today these payments total $900 annually for a single individual, and $1,800 for a couple, by comparison with $660 and $1,320 respectively in 1961.

It is, of course, important to examine the effect of these substantial improvements, and the Committee regrets that the necessary data for doing so are not yet available. (1964 was the first year in which the most recent change has had its full effect.) With regard to older families it will be recalled that 37 per cent of them in 1961 had incomes of less than $2,000. This percentage is now undoubtedly lower, although perhaps not as much lower as might be expected. For one thing, on the basis of past experience, only some 20 per cent of persons in the 65-69 year age group are eligible for benefit under Old Age Assistance. And for another, again on the basis of the past record, less than half the families with heads aged 70 and over are receiving the double increase of $480. A moment's reflection indicates why this latter statement is true. Since husband and wife are rarely of the same age, there is usually a period during which only one of them is eligible for Old Age Security. By the time both become eligible, the chances are that one or the other will soon be left alone. The period during which an elderly couple is in the happy position of receiving two Old Age Security cheques, therefore, is likely to be, on the average, a short one.

The proportion of non-family members (persons living apart from any relatives) with incomes below $1,000 may also drop considerably from the 1961 figure of 53 per cent. However, since most of this group were dependent chiefly on government payments, their incomes tended to cluster around the $660 figure.[12] To the extent that this was the case, the addition of $240 annually will still leave them in the under $1,000 class.

Financial Requirements

Finally, a question arises about the financial requirements of older people. How much must they have in order to satisfy their basic consumption needs? Unfortunately, this is an area of inquiry which has received very little scientific attention in Canada. Only two bodies that presented evidence before the Committee were able to furnish information derived from studies they had made.

The Ontario Welfare Council submitted a budget developed in 1958, which was designed to ensure "a modest but adequate living standard" for older people. According to their report, obviously out of date in a number of items, the monthly income required to meet this standard ranged from $86 to $98 for a single person, and for a couple from $135 to $149.

The Canadian Home Economics Association confined its attention to food costs in 1963 and presented allowances for elderly individuals on a monthly basis, in selected cities across the country, which ranged from $25.54 to $36.07.

In the United States, the Social Security Administration, back in 1946-7, developed a budget for a retired couple and estimates of the cost of this budget are published periodically by the Bureau of Labour Statistics, which prices the various items in some twenty large cities.[13] In 1959, the average annual cost of the American budget for a retired couple in the cities selected was estimated at about $2,500.[14]

To sum up, the Committee, while recognizing and regretting the gaps and deficiencies in existing knowledge about the income status of older people, is fully persuaded on the basis of the evidence presented to it and its own analysis of available data, that the economic problems of the aging population continue to present a serious challenge. Everything we learned confirms the view, expressed at the outset, that older people, and more especially those denied the support of a family, are a low-income group, both absolutely and by comparison with younger adults. Not only so, but older people, unlike younger adults, have little prospect of improving their condition through their own efforts. Only about one in six of them (one in four of the men) is in the labour force, and even this low rate of participation is definitely falling. Older people, therefore, are not able to benefit from the gains resulting from increased industrial productivity, while at the same time their meagre incomes are subject to erosion as the cost of living rises.

Recommendations of the Committee

What recommendations can be formulated to deal with the income problems outlined above? In facing this question the Committee was, of course, aware of one very important proposal that was before Parliament at the time in the form of an Act "to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and supplementary benefits in Canada payable to and in respect of contributors" (Bill C-136). Indeed, six members of the Committee, including the Chairman, were members also of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons appointed to study it.

In the circumstances, the view taken was that it would be inappropriate, and indeed a work of supererogation, for the Senate Committee to make recommendations related to this particular measure. It has, however, followed the Proceedings of the Special Joint Committee with keen interest and is impressed with the degree of economic security that the new legislation will afford to the great majority of older people retiring in the future. In the past the modest aim of government programs in this area has been to meet the basic needs of older people. The significance of the Canada Pension Plan is that it goes beyond this minimum objective and seeks to ensure to retiring workers, and their dependents, an income that will be related significantly to the family's pre-retirement standard of living.

It is not a criticism of the Canada Pension Plan, which is based on the contributory principle, that its benefits will flow to those who retire in the future, and, meanwhile, build up a record of entitlement. The fact remains, however, that there are a million or more older people in Canada, already retired, who are altogether outside the scope of its provisions, and that the majority of this latter group, as the figures show, are in serious economic need. Having lived through two World Wars, the great depression and a period of marked inflation, these older people find themselves now with few personal resources and dependent on the support of government programs to a much greater extent than the new retirees are likely to be. The concern of the present aged is not one of maintaining a pre-retirement standard of living, which for many was abandoned long ago, but rather of being able, in face of rising prices and depleted means, to secure the bare necessities of existence.

Note should also be taken of the recent action by Parliament which makes the Old Age Security pension available progressively at lower ages than 70 down to age 65 in 1970. While generally commendable, this action, of course, constitutes a further benefit to future retirees, amounting to $4,500 for those born in 1905 or later, without any corresponding benefit to those in the upper age group who, from all the evidence, are in greater need.

While the Senate Committee, in line with its terms of reference, has been concerned with "the welfare of the aged and aging persons" generally, it has felt a particular responsibility for old people already retired and has had their needs prominently in mind throughout its deliberations.

1. On grounds of equity as well as of need something must be done to increase the benefits available to persons aged 70 and over, and to ensure that the retired individual will enjoy future benefit increases that are in harmony with the upward movement of incomes generally. (It will be recalled that 70 per cent of all women in this group, and 40 per cent of all men in 1961 had no other income than Government payments.)

2. Any suggestion that these older people, when the $75 pension is not sufficient, should be expected to depend for supplementation on public assistance after a needs test is utterly unacceptable. Public assistance should, of course, be available to them, as to others in the population, to meet residual needs and to deal with special circumstances, but it is the Committee's conviction that main reliance for meeting their ordinary requirements should be on benefits to which they are entitled as a matter of right and that the proportion of older people requiring needs-tested supplementation should be very small at all times.

3. The question is how best to provide such benefits. One possibility would be to increase the Old Age Security Pension by some agreed amount as has been done at intervals in the past. It is obvious at once, however, that an adjustment of this type, however welcome it might be to retired people on slender means, will do nothing to improve their position relative to that of future retirees. The latter, in addition to their Canada Pension Plan benefits would be entitled also to whatever increase is made in the basic pension. Not only would the problem of inequity remain, but the cost of a general increase sufficient to relieve significantly the situation of retired people, would involve a very substantial outlay of public funds.

4. There is however, another possible way of dealing with the situation which the Committee has considered: viz., through the establishment of an Income Guarantee Program on the lines indicated below.

Income Guarantee Program

If this approach were adopted the following steps would be involved:

(1) The establishment of a technically competent body to study the income needs of older people and to develop a socially acceptable minimum budget for single persons and couples, which would be adjusted automatically each year on the basis of a suitable index of consumer spending or of earnings, with a review every five years to reflect changes in the relative circumstances of the working population and the retired population.

(2) Until this study has been made, acceptance as a working standard of the maximum annual income permitted now under Old Age Assistance, namely, $1,260 for single persons, and $2,220 for married couples.

(3) The establishment of an Income Guarantee program to provide allowances throughout life to all persons beginning at age 65 on the following lines:

(a) that the only conditions for eligibility under the Income Guarantee Program be age, as indicated above, ten years' residence in Canada, and net cash income from all sources, including Old Age Security and the Canada Pension Plan, below the above amounts.

(b) that the program be administered and financed by the Federal Government).

(c) that the procedure call for the completion of a simplified income form annually and that the amount by which the declared income falls short of the established minima in any year constitute the benefit for the year following.

(d) that there be "sample checks" periodically, as under Unemployment Insurance, to catch abuses, but no means or needs test enquiries on traditional lines.

(e) that income, capital and deductions be defined and treated as for income tax purposes so far as possible, except that all public transfer payments other than temporary needs-tested supplements would be included.

(4) The Committee is not in a position to estimate the costs of an Income Guarantee Program as outlined above. It is obvious, however, that to some extent these costs would reduce expenditures under the Canada Assistance Plan, although undoubtedly many needy old people would apply for supplementation under the new proposal, if implemented, who would be reluctant to do so where a needs test is involved. A further consideration in regard to cost is that the Income Guarantee Program is intended essentially for the benefit of old people already retired, who in such large numbers are dependent entirely on the Old Age Security Pension of $75 a month. It is assumed in spite of the escalation proposed that, with the benefits available to future retirees under the Canada Pension Plan, the numbers qualifying for income guarantee payments would decline considerably through time.

Conclusion:

It is the considered view of the Committee that the income guarantee approach to the income needs of old people has much to recommend it. Apart from its administrative simplicity (by comparison with public assistance) and the modest level of public expenditures that would be involved (by comparison with the equivalent increase in the Old Age Security Pension) the proposal in our view has two important merits. It avoids the indignity of the needs test to which we should not like to see several hundred thousand retired people subjected, and further it provides the most effective means we have discovered of correcting the present inequity in our treatment of the already retired and the about-to-be retired generations of old people, a matter which has given us grave concern.

RECOMMENDATION:

(1) The committee endorses in principle the institution of an income guarantee program for all persons aged 65 and over and recommends to the Federal Government that this proposal be given immediate study.

CHAPTER 3

Employment Status and Opportunities

Reference has been made in the preceding chapter to the role of employment as a source of income for persons even beyond the age of 65. That employment has important psychological values as well was stressed continually in the evidence received by the Committee. Said the Jewish Vocational Service of Toronto in its submission: "Work gives form, dimension and meaning to the life of the average citizen."[1] And there was Mr. W., a retired widower, on an income of $150 a month, who, when the chairman asked him what he missed in retirement, replied, "Mostly getting up and going to work in the morning, catching the bus at a certain time—and just general routine."[2]

Some Basic Statistics

1. The fact is, however, that today fewer people beyond age 65 are working. From about 60 per cent in 1921 the participation rate for men has fallen steadily until today it is around 25 per cent. Interestingly the rate for women has actually risen, but the percentages are small (5.8 per cent in 1963 as compared with 4.2 per cent in 1950) since most women withdraw from the labour force altogether at or around age 65. So far as men are concerned the decline in labour force participation begins to be observable at age 45 (10 years earlier than for women) but the first substantial drop, 10 per cent for men and almost one-third for women, occurs in the age group 55 to 64.

2. Another measure of the difficulty experienced by older workers in the labour market is the unemployment rate. In 1963, this rate for men in the age group 55 to 64 was 25 per cent higher (6.1 per cent) than in the age group 45 to 64. Surprisingly the rate for the group aged 65 and over was lower than for either of these younger groups, doubtless due to the fact that many older men, although wanting and needing to work, had given up trying to find it.[3]

3. Perhaps the most revealing tabulation examined by the Committee relates to the duration of unemployment among older people. Here the statistics are not broken down by 10-year age groups. They do show, however, on the basis of October and June averages for the years 1961-63, that the percentage of persons unemployed for over six months was twice as large in the age group 45 and over as in the age group 25 to 44. This suggests that while many older workers, by reason of seniority and other factors, may be able to hold their jobs reasonably well up to the time of retirement, once they have lost them they find it difficult to get back into employment.

4. Another matter of interest to the Committee was the kind of work older people do and the extent to which it differs from that of younger workers. The situation as revealed by the 1961 census may be summarized as follows:[4]

(1) Men aged 45 and over comprised 34.1 per cent of the male labour force, but they constituted more than this percentage of the men in managerial (47.7 per cent), agricultural (46.9 per cent), personal service (46.6 per cent), fishing and trapping (37 per cent), and construction (34.5 per cent) occupations.

(2) Women aged 45 and over comprise 28.9 per cent of the female labour force, but they constituted more than this percentage of the women in managerial (54.7 per cent) agricultural (41.1 per cent), personal service (35.5 per cent), commercial and financial (31.3 per cent) and professional (29.6 per cent) occupations.

[3] Dept. of Labour, brief submitted to the Special Committee on Aging, Proceedings No. 14, p. 959, July 2, 1964.

(3) Of men who continued in the labour market beyond age 65, two-thirds were concentrated in four occupational groups: agriculture (29.8 per cent); service (13.4 per cent); managerial (12.5 per cent); and manufacturing (10.8 per cent).

(4) Of women who continued in the labour market beyond age 65, more than two-thirds were concentrated in three occupational groups; personal service (40.3 per cent); professional (17 per cent); and clerical (11.5 per cent).

Several inferences may be drawn from the above figures:

(1) People that work for themselves, as in agriculture and the professions, tend to retire later.

(2) The same is often true in occupations where judgment and experience are positive factors, as in management (although an important consideration here for the group beyond age 65 might well be whether the manager controls the business); and where there is a shortage of skilled workers, as in certain manufacturing trades and types of office work.

(3) The proportion of men and women in the service occupations rises with age. Most of the women were in a category designated by the census as "housekeepers, waiters, cooks, and related workers", and it can be assumed that the majority of the men similarly were in poorly paid, and probably seasonal occupations.

The Problem Analyzed

Against the background sketched above, which is treated more fully in Chapter 10, the Committee attempted to analyze the problem of employment as it relates to older people. What is the nature and extent of it?

1. The term "older worker" cannot be limited to the age group beginning at age 65. Said the National Employment Service in its submission: "A person is an older worker only when he encounters, or may expect to encounter, difficulty in obtaining or keeping a job primarily due to his age . . . the problem is most likely to arise after a person reaches the age of 45."[5] It is most serious after age 65.

2. For many older workers there are no serious employment problems at all. They work out their days with no more difficulty than other members of the labour force and leave voluntarily at or around age 65 because of the availability of a pension, the attractiveness of retirement, or the disability of failing health.

3. Steady employment between the ages of 45 and 65 is of vital importance to the individual. To be out of work during these crucial years makes it impossible to accumulate savings for old age. The serious long-range effect of employment difficulties in the later years of working life was brought home to us in many submissions. Professor John S. Morgan, of the School of Social Work, University of Toronto, noted that continuous unemployment from age 45 on will result in "an unhappy, insecure and damaged person before he becomes 65."[6]

The experience of the NES is that "repeated rejection on account of age will eventually lead to discouragement, frustration, and loss of self-confidence, which will in turn affect the ability to make a good impression on the employer."[7] The evidence in support of these views is overwhelming.

4. Technological advance, by eliminating old jobs and creating new ones, causes serious problems of adjustment for segments of the labour force. Groups most seriously affected are the unskilled, the poorly educated and older workers. It needs to be remembered that "A majority of the workers who are now 45 years of age and over prepared themselves for work at a time when 40 per cent of all workers were employed in primary industries, as compared with 13 per cent today."[8] While many individuals because of native ability and superior initial training have adapted successfully to changing conditions as they have occurred, other displaced workers have had to be content with insecure jobs in low grade occupations.

5. While recognizing the seriousness of the adjustment difficulties created by modern technology, the Committee is of the view that the root of the employment problem of older workers in Canada during recent years, beginning in the middle and late 1950's is to be found in the relatively slow rate at which the economy has been expanding. As was pointed out in the First Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada issued in December, 1964, the averge rate of unemployment in this country has followed an upward trend throughout this period, and for the past decade has been higher than that of the United States and substantially above those of industrially advanced countries in Western Europe. While there have been fluctuations in unemployment throughout the post-war period, the average rate rose higher during each cycle up to 1962: 2.8 per cent in 1946-53: 4.3 per cent in 1954-57: and 6.7 per cent in 1958-62.[9]

The Economic Council maintains that, with appropriate policies, this trend can be arrested (In 1964 there was a drop to a seasonally adjusted rate of 4 per cent) and that "a realistic medium term goal for the Canadian economy" is 3 per cent. If this goal could be attained there would be more employment opportunities for older workers over age 45, particularly during the next decade, since, as observed in the submission of the Department of Labour: "The group considered most competitive, the 25-44 year olds, is expected to form a considerably smaller portion of the total male work force in 1971 then it did in 1951 or 1961."[10]

The Economic Council also points out (pp. 9-10) that the incidence of rising unemployment in Canada has been "highly uneven". "Thus the highest rates have always tended to occur among workers in certain regions of the country (especially in the Atlantic Provinces), in some sectors and industries (for example construction), in certain age groups (among teen-agers and older workers), and among some occupations (especially among the less-skilled)."

The Special Problems of Older Workers

While, as has been said, the main hope of providing continued employment opportunities for older workers must rest on the success of efforts to keep employment generally at a high level, it would be a mistake to ignore the special problems of older workers in the labour market. Indeed, these problems were the burden of most of the briefs received by the Committee and in our view are likely to persist, in degree at least, even under conditions of optimum economic activity.

Employer Attitudes

The National Employment Service laid particular stress on this factor which it regards as "probably the major cause of employment problems in the 45 to 64 age group."[11] While in some instances the reluctance of employers to take on older workers may be well founded, the NES is convinced that much of it is due to the general tendency in our society, with its accent on youth, to underestimate the capabilities of people beyond middle life. Such attitudes, unfortunately, persist in spite of numerous studies which clearly show the relative advantage older workers have over younger workers for a considerable variety of work, and in respect of a number of characteristics like reliability, judgment and a low rate of absenteeism. Hiring and retiring practices, often related to pension plans, which discriminate against older workers are part of this general picture.

The Committee recommends:

(2) That the National Employment Service (NES) continue and intensify its efforts to correct prevailing misconceptions and to overcome current resistance to the hiring of older workers through educational programs aimed at employers as a group, but more particularly through direct contacts with individual employers; and that in such efforts it enlist the support of management and labour, possibly through the holding of employer-labour institutes sponsored by universities and community groups, as is done in the United States with leadership from the employment service.

(3) That, on the initiative of the Federal Department of Labour, research be continued into the characteristics of older workers and the effect of age on specific abilities; and that efforts be made to get the findings of such studies translated into enlightened personnel policies and into conditions of work related to the changing capacities of the older worker.

[10] Department of Labour, brief op. cit. p. 971.
[11] National Employment Service, brief op. cit. p. 751.

(4) That the NES maintain a check on applicant qualifications as specified by employers, such as age and education, in an effort to ensure that these are realistically related to the requirements for successful performance in the jobs to be filled.

(5) (a) That studies be made by the Federal Department of Labour of experience with gradual retirement programs now in effect in private business and the public service and that the findings of these studies be used to stimulate wider interest in such programs on the part of management and labour; and

(b) That programs of counselling and planning in preparation for retirement be more widely adopted by private business and the public service, and that Federal and Provincial Departments of Labour provide to interested employers and unions the technical consultation necessary for their successful operation.

Worker Deficiencies

Limited schooling is a large factor here, and, while its importance can be exaggerated in relation to particular jobs, there is no doubt that in a technologically advancing society younger workers with more formal education are in a preferred position. Figures for the male labour force (Census 1961) indicate that 63 per cent of the group aged 55 to 64, and 66 per cent of the group aged 65 and over, as compared with 36 per cent of the age group 15 to 34, had elementary school education or less.

There is the further consideration that vocational skills adequate at one period of life may become obsolete under changing conditions and that the interest and opportunity necessary for older workers to acquire new skills may not always be present. In this context the submissions made to us by Dr. Roby Kidd and the Canadian Association of Adult Education are suggestive.[12] Both stress the need to adapt the content and methods of training courses to the interests, attitudes and background of older trainees.

Finally, among factors which have to be taken into account in efforts to help older workers improve their positions, is their aversion to being uprooted. The brief of the Federal Department of Labour referred to studies in the Maritimes which suggest "that when job opportunities in a community decline it is the younger and better educated who leave . . . . the strings that bind people to a community grow stronger with age,"[13] However, it would probably be a mistake to assume that this is generally true, at any rate for workers in their 40's or 50's.

The Committee recommends:

(6) That in line with the recommendation of the Economic Council of Canada, the NES, "as the key operational agency for implementing manpower policies" be responsible for analyzing basic supply and demand conditions and for administrating the range of programs required to facilitate adjustment to technological change and to assist the movement of workers from areas of declining to those of increasing employment opportunities.

(7) That, in particular, the NES seek the cooperation of individual employers, employers' associations and unions in developing procedures in relation to staff layoffs and adjustments from whatever cause which, unless planned carefully well in advance, may have serious if not disastrous effects on the employment prospects of displaced older workers.

(8) That the NES strengthen and improve its services to older workers in respect of counselling and job finding and that in larger centres a special officer be appointed to carry these responsibilities.

(9) That the Federal-Provincial Vocational Rehabilitation program be enlarged and strengthened to provide in greater measure for the rehabilitation of older workers, whose disability arises mainly from prolonged unemployment.

(10) That an examination be made of those training programs provided for under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act, which have as their object the upgrading of employed workers and the retraining of the unemployed, with a view to determining the reasons for the limited use currently being made of them, and that such measures as are indicated be taken to improve their effectiveness in attracting and holding students especially in the older age range.

Part-time employment

Frequently in the course of the Hearings reference was made to the need and desire of older people for part-time employment, especially after age 65, and the Committee was therefore interested to discover that opportunities of this kind are increasing in Canada. Between 1953 and 1964, while full-time employment increased by 25 per cent, part-time employment increased by over 200 per cent from 197,000 to 594,000 positions. It was not possible to make similar comparisons by age groups but unpublished material from the census shows that in 1961 some 9 per cent of workers aged 45 and over (4 per cent of the men and 23 per cent of the women) were in part-time jobs. For workers aged 65 and over the percentage stood at around 20 per cent, 16 per cent for men and 29 per cent for women.

There would seem to be an opportunity here that ought to be developed, having in mind particularly the needs and wishes of older people for employment on a part-time basis. Unfortunately, as things are, the field remains largely unorganized and the help provided by the NES in bringing jobs and workers together is on a relatively limited scale.

The Committee recommends:

(11) That the NES devote greater attention to the field of part-time employment with a view to discovering the nature of the demand and offering a more effective placement service.

Automation

In framing the above Recommendations, which are in the direction of keeping the doors of employment opportunity open for old people in Canada, the Committee may be accused of flying in the fact of economic realities. Have we taken fully into account the impact of automation on the economy and the extent to which it is likely to reduce the need for manpower? Dr. Schonning, Assistant Director, Economics and Research Branch of the Department of Labour reminded us that "less than two generations ago Canadians worked on the average of about three hundred hours a month to produce about one-half the per capita income which is now produced with about two hundred hours a month." "There is no reason," said Dr. Schonning, "to believe this trend will not continue; it may, in fact, accelerate."[14] And another witness gave it as his view, that "it (automation) is probably far and away the most important development with which this Committee must be concerned..... The future pattern, I would think, is likely to be one of entering the labour force later through remaining in school longer, and retiring from regular work earlier."[15]

The Committee was impressed by evidence of this kind and has endeavoured to appraise its significance. That automation as it proceeds will involve shifts in employment and some displacement of workers, especially in the older age range, goes without saying and measures to deal with this situation are among those we have put forward. It does not follow, however, that the total volume of employment will decline and, indeed, it is the Committee's view, in which we have the support of the Economic Council's recent report, that given the right combination of national economic policies this need not happen, at any rate in the foreseeable future. It may well be, as has been suggested, that in the long run goods and services sufficient to satisfy man's needs and appetites can be produced with a minimum input of manpower, but this would appear to be a problem for future generations to deal with. Clearly it is not our situation now, in a country where so much remains to be done to meet fairly obvious social and economic needs, and in a world where two-thirds of the population lack the basic necessities of life.

Moreover, even on the assumption that because of the rapid advance of automation less manpower will be required in production, there is still a basic question to be answered. How do we propose to share the leisure the new technology puts at our disposal? Should we give it mainly to the old by reducing the age of retirement in circumstances where the life span is lengthening, and to the unemployed who are squeezed out of the labour market? Or, would a more constructive policy be to distribute it among people of all ages through a shorter work week and longer vacations, with sabbatical leaves to workers throughout their careers for the purpose of continuing education and re-training? The Senate Committee would strongly support the second of these alternatives, or at any rate such a mixture of the two as would permit workers at the point of retirement "an effective choice between remaining in or withdrawing from the labour market."[16]

Health Status and Health Care

No adequate means exist to measure the health status of older people, but there are clear indications that many of them enjoy reasonably good health and get around well into old age almost as actively as when they were younger. We know that the incidence of acute illness is lower after age 65 than in any earlier period, and appreciably lower than for the group under 45, although for older people the period of recovery is longer.[1]

The real health hazard, especially in the later years, is chronic illness such as arthritis, diabetes, heart disease, cancer, and mental disorder, although here again it should be observed that one quarter of those suffering from chronic illness are under age 45.[2] Nevertheless, it is obviously true that as we become elderly, and more of us do than used to, the cumulative effects of many disabilities make themselves felt, and medical and health care become more important. According to the data from the Provincial Hospital Insurance Plans, length of stay in hospitals is twice as long for patients aged 65 and over as it is for those who are younger. The aged are the chief users of nursing homes, the principal recipients of nursing home care, and are heavy consumers of medical services and drugs.[3]

The many inquiries carried out in Canada in recent decades into problems of health services, the latest and most comprehensive being that of the Royal Commission on Health Services, reflect the growing concern with matters of the provision and the financing of health services among all groups of the population and in all parts of Canada. Having pointed out the health problems peculiar to older people, we should like to draw attention to the fact that these problems are generally aggravated for the aged who live in rural areas. The latter suffer the disadvantages of long distances, difficult communication and transportation, and frequently lack conveniences which are taken for granted in the urban environment. More study is needed into the question of how the various forms of health services could be made available more adequately to these people. Particularly, one should bear in mind the importance in the rural setting of domiciliary and ambulatory care and, when admission to an institution becomes necessary, the desirability of keeping the older patient in reasonable proximity to his community. The availability of ambulance and other transportation facilities, and of effective telephone communication is especially important in the rural setting.

The Senate Committee, in the course of its Hearings, received a great deal of information of this kind from the Canadian Medical Association, the Department of National Health and Welfare, and various voluntary health organizations. It was also reminded on all sides of the gaps and weaknesses in current facilities for meeting the health needs of older people. The whole subject is discussed at length in Chapter 11 which, however, by no means exhausts the wealth of fact and opinion found in the briefs themselves. For the purpose of the present summary, it would seem important merely to itemize and underline those areas of special concern to which our principal recommendations are directed.

Preventive and Supportive Services

As the Department of National Health and Welfare reminded us: "The primary purpose of all health programs is to prevent illness." And, for those who take ill, the objective is "early diagnosis, treatment and rehabilitation."[4] The Committee was impressed by these statements and also by the fact that on a given day well over 90 per cent of Canadians aged 65 and over are carrying on outside hospitals and institutions,[5] although many of them are undoubtedly receiving some degree of health care. It is for this great majority of older Canadians that preventive and supportive services are so important.

The question is how to provide these services and, human nature being what it is, make sure they are used. There has been long and successful experience with health supervision for certain broad groups in the population, such as mothers and babies, school children and industrial workers, but reaching the elderly, who frequently have limited group connections and are generally less mobile, may present special problems. Besides, as was suggested to us, if all persons, say from fifty on, were to turn up regularly for medical checkups, it would create a heavy burden for the physicians.

Development of geriatric "well-oldster" clinics might help to solve the problem, as would counselling for healthy living in a variety of settings, such as day care-centres and community clubs, and on occasions when older people visit their doctor or go to the hospital on an in-patient or out-patient basis. "Multiple screening", which consists of tests for a variety of chronic diseases given together is another means of saving time and money. Voluntary health organizations can also play an important role through mass education programs designed to encourage health habits and to alert the public generally to early symptoms of disease and disability.

The Committee recommends:

(12) That periodic health appraisals be more widely available to older people from physicians in solo and group practice and also on an experimental basis in out-patient departments and through programs initiated by local health departments: and further that the cost of such appraisals be covered by prepayment plans.

(13) That more experiments be undertaken with multiple screening for chronic diseases, not only by physicians in dealing with their patients, and by health institutions when patients are admitted, but on a broader community basis by local health departments and/or voluntary health organizations.

(14) That health counselling of people middle-aged and older, including such matters as diet, rest, recreation and living habits be provided through well adult clinics, day care centres, health services in housing projects, pre-retirement courses and health maintenance programs generally: and that initiative in establishing such programs and facilities be taken by the local health department.

(15) That mass education programs for people of all ages, with emphasis on the maintenance of good health throughout life as well as on the early detection of disease symptoms, be promoted extensively by governmental and voluntary agencies, with the advice and cooperation of medical associations.

(16) That research be undertaken into the effects of regular exercise, various types of organized recreation, and other forms of group and individual activity on the physical and mental health of older people, and that grants under the Fitness and Amateur Sports Act be made available for this purpose.

Ambulatory and Domiciliary Health Services

We return to the point that many older people are fairly well most of the time, or at any rate are able to carry on with what ailments they have, provided medical and health advice, and perhaps certain prescribed drugs, are available to them. Even when they become ill for longer or shorter periods from some chronic condition it does not follow that removal to an institution is always the answer. The experience of Great Britain and other European countries with the health problems of the elderly, a much longer experience than ours in Canada, supports the view that home care with adequate community services, both social and medical, will in many cases prove a better alternative. This is true not merely, or mainly, because of the financial saving to the community that is involved; the real advantage is to the patient himself who ordinarily will do better and be happier in his own home, provided he has assurance of adequate care and access to services and facilities which will prevent him becoming a burden to his relatives.

Many submissions to the Senate Committee supported this point of view, although it was, of course, recognized that even a combination of organized home care and community services should not be regarded as a substitute for hospitalization when the need for intensive care is indicated. The following recommendation made to us by the Canadian Medical Association[6] is in line with the testimony received from many other informed and experienced groups:

"The development of more organized home care and homemaker services is needed across Canada. They are essential components of any balanced program of health and welfare services and offer a desirable alternative or supplement to institutional care, providing there is a careful selection of persons for these services, based on skilled medical, social and nursing evaluation. . . .

"Whether individual programs are hospital or community based, it should be a public responsibility to ensure that this development takes place."

In the face of testimony of this sort, the Committee was surprised to discover what little use has been made up to now in Canada of an approach which would appear to be so promising, particularly for the care of the aged and the chronically ill. A few home care projects here and there, chiefly on an experimental basis, [6] Canadian Medical Association, brief submitted to the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging, Proceedings No. 5, 1964, No. 20, pp. 1349-50.

homemaker services in perhaps 50 communities across the country but on a limited scale; these in addition to the well-established and widespread home nursing service of the Victorian Order of Nurses in urban areas (half the people cared for being in the age group 65 and over) are about the extent of it at the present time. The Royal Commission on Health Services, on the basis of its investigations, made the following declaration which we fully endorse: "We believe," they state, "that in the interests of patients and of costs, full scale programs of home care should now be launched in every urban centre of, say, 10,000 population and over, and in smaller centres as resources can be mobilized."[7]

The Committee recommends:

(17) (a) That home care programs for elderly people be greatly extended for those who are discharged early from hospital or who would otherwise require to be admitted; and

(b) That these programs include medical and nursing care, physiotherapy and other forms of rehabilitation, visiting homemaker service and use of sick room equipment; and

(c) That the cost of such programs be provided for under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Service Act, through Health Grants or under a more comprehensive Health Plan.

(18) That facilities be provided more widely in the community to which sick elderly people could go or be brought for on-the-spot assessment, treatment counselling, rehabilitation and related services, such facilities to include outpatient departments of hospitals, geriatric clinics, and special clinics as required concerned with mental health, speech and vision defects, dental care and rehabilitation.

(19) That bedside nursing in the home be extended to urban areas now without them, and increasingly to rural areas, and that these services be provided or integrated closely with local or district health departments.

(20) That local health and/or welfare departments keep a register of all people aged 65 and over in their communities, and that public health nurses and/or social workers make contact with such older people and visit them periodically if such visits are necessary and desired.

(21) That arrangements be developed to make all these services available also in rural areas, by training lay personnel to assist the health professionals, and by ensuring prompt communication and transportation services.

Institutional Care

While the home and community services indicated above will go a long way to meet the needs of chronically ill older people and may, in many cases, provide all the help that is required, it would be a mistake to underestimate the importance of institutional care in the total spectrum of essential health services. According to the best estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare[8], "on any particular day nearly 8 of each 100 persons 65 years of age and over, were residents in some form of institution rather than in the community at large", and for the population 75 years of age and over it is estimated that the proportion might rise as high as 15 per cent. Excluding from the above total some 20 per cent who were in hospitals for less than two months as a result of accident or acute illness, we still have 90,000 or more long-term patients in general and allied special hospitals, mental hospitals, tuberculosis sanitoria, nursing homes, homes for domiciliary care, and homes the nature of which was unspecified.

The evidence received by the Committee emphasized the extreme shortage there is in Canada of facilities designed and equipped to meet the needs of long-term patients. On the one hand, we are told that many long-term patients are in hospital when all they need is skilled nursing home care. On the other hand, we learned that lack of nursing homes is causing the bedridden to be placed in municipal homes for the aged which are unable to provide for them properly. What we heard from representatives of the Province of New Brunswick appears to be true all over Canada: "A great number of people now in homes for the aged should, because of their physical condition, be in nursing homes." Furthermore, it was reported they are taking up accommodation that is badly neeeded by other old people in need of domiciliary but not medical or nursing care, who as things are, have no place to go.

The nursing home is caught in the middle of the squeeze, with pressures from the over-crowded hospitals on the one side and from people in over-crowded housing or inadequate domiciliary care on the other. So desperate is the situation that even nursing homes of such poor quality that according to the authorities they "should not be in operation" have long waiting lists. Moreover, nursing homes, with a few exceptions, are not included under the hospital insurance program, so that unless patients are admitted as indigents and paid for as such out of public funds, they or their relatives must meet the full cost which we were told runs on the average of $8 to $10 a day, and is often much higher.

What impressed the Committee most about this whole situation, even more than the dearth of facilities, is the lack of clear policy that still characterizes our approach to what has been termed "the gray area" of long-term patient care. There could hardly be a better illustration of what the Royal Commission on Health Services described as "a paradox of our age, which is the enormous gap between our scientific knowledge and skills on the one hand, and our organizational and scientific arrangements to apply them on the other."[9] What facilities precisely do we need? To what extent should their provision be left to private enterprise? What standards are essential and who would enforce them? And what arrangements should be made to cover the considerable cost to the individual and his family which long-term care inevitably involves?

[8] National Health and Welfare, brief submitted to the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging, Proceedings Dec. 10, 1964, No. 24, pp. 1654-5.

It would be unfair to say that these questions have not been faced in Canada. Evidence received in the course of our Inquiry indicates that they are under active consideration by medical and government authorities, as well as by many other equally concerned groups across the country. The fact is, however, that up to the present no clear-cut consensus exists regarding the answers. And, meanwhile, the great majority of older people in long-term care have the status of indigents in various types of accommodation, much of which is unsuited to their needs, or of doubtful quality, and some of which is downright disgraceful.

The Committee recommends:

(22) (a) That definite decisions be reached without delay about the range of institutional facilities and services essential for the short and long-term care of the chronically ill; and

(b) That particular attention be given to the definition of various kinds of sheltered accommodation; and

(c) That where essential facilities are in short supply the capital costs involved in providing them be eligible for assistance under the hospital construction program or such modification of the latter as may be necessary; and

(d) That in planning the above facilities due account be taken of the new possibilities of short-term active treatment and rehabilitation with early discharge home as contrasted with long-term largely custodial care, in dealing with chronic disease.[10]

(23) That patients with chronic illnesses be cared for in wards or wings of general hospitals, or in other facilities integrated with the hospital system, instead of in completely separate and often isolated institutions as so frequently at present.

(24) That in all institutional facilities a positive attitude be adopted toward the possibility of rehabilitating elderly people and that provision be made for programs designed to return them "from helplessness and dependency to self care and a considerable degree of independence."[11]

(25) That provision for meeting the needs of mentally ill and confused older people be greatly improved, inter alia, through adequate assessment, which is regarded by the Canadian Mental Health Association as "the first essential in a comprehensive program,"[12] a wider use of smaller facilities, including nursing homes and foster homes located close to the places in which the aged live, and "a more hopeful attitude" towards programmes of rehabilitation which should be extended, especially in psychiatric hospitals and psychiatric units of general hospitals.

(26) (a) That provincial departments of health and/or hospital commissions determine as quickly as possible the place and function of nursing homes in the total spectrum of required health facilities; and

(b) That, assuming nursing homes to be accepted as an essential health facility, vigorous steps be taken to increase the present supply of those capable of providing a high quality of nursing and rehabilitation care; and

(c) That approved nursing homes, operated on a non-profit basis, be made part of the hospital services system, and be included in the federal-provincial hospital insurance arrangements; and

(d) That approved nursing homes, operated on a non-profit basis, be eligible to receive from federal-provincial sources capital grants under the hospital construction program, operating costs under the hospital insurance program to ensure the maintenance of desirable service standards and training grants to provide training for staff in rehabilitation nursing; and

(e) That all nursing homes be licensed and supervised by a health agency and that consultation services be made available to all nursing homes by local and provincial health departments covering not only medical and nursing care including rehabilitation, but also nutrition, recreation and other important aspects of administration. The selection and in-service training of nursing home staff should receive particular attention.

(27) That, as in the case of nursing homes, study be given by the appropriate authority to the place and function of homes for the aged, and that in particular attention be given to prevailing admission policies, the possibility of alternative accommodation in sheltered semi-independent housing for relatively well ambulant patients, the place of rehabilitation or "reactivization" programs, and the careful selection and training of the staff.

The Cost of Health Care

If meeting the costs of health care is a problem for Canadians of all ages, it is in old age that it assumes its most serious and threatening proportions. Elderly people are at a double disadvantage; their incomes in most cases are minimal at a time when the risks of long-term illness and disability are at their highest. Besides, hospital insurance, important as it is, covers the cost of less than one-third of the group aged 65 and over who are receiving institutional care.[13] Over 50 per cent of old people in nursing homes and other "homes for special care," reduced to the status of indigents, have their costs met through public assistance.[14] We heard a great deal also in the course of our inquiry about the concern of old people out in the community regarding doctor and drug bills, which they can ill afford to meet on their meagre incomes. Indeed, we were told that many of them out of pride and feelings of independence neglect their health rather than seek help on the basis of "charity" or "welfare."

The Committee recommends:

(28) That the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act be extended to cover the use by the individual of all approved institutional facilities for health care, including tuberculosis and mental health hospitals.

(29) That, on the lines proposed by the Royal Commission on Health Services, a Nation-Wide Universal Health Service program be instituted to provide a comprehensive range of services including Medical Care, Nursing Care, Dental Care, Home Care, Prescription Drugs and Prosthetic Appliances: and that, if staging is required in the introduction of all or any part of this program, older people be given special consideration.

(30) That the above comprehensive program be financed mainly, if not altogether, by tax payments so that premiums, if any, may be kept to a minimum and the use of the means test, which we unequivocally reject, may be rendered unnecessary.

Professional Personnel

A serious bottleneck in the provision of health services for old people is the shortage of professional personnel interested and trained in this field, e.g. physicians, nurses, physiotherapists, occupational therapists, orthotists, prosthetists, social workers, podiatrists.

The Committee recommends:

(31) (a) That professional schools which train professional workers for the above specialties place greater emphasis in their curricula on the medical, social and economic aspects of aging; and

(b) That grants under the Health and Welfare Training programs of the Federal Government be used to increase the supply of workers equipped for work in the field of Old Age; and

[13] Department of National Health and Welfare, brief op. cit. pp. 1656-7.
[14] Ibid., p. 1654.

(c) That programs to stimulate greater interest in geriatrics on the part of the various professions indicated above be provided by the professional societies concerned in post-graduate refresher courses, in conferences and institutes and by means of professional literature.

Coordination and Planning

The comprehensive health services program recommended above will help to ensure planned and coordinated development which indeed, is one of its principal objectives. We would, however, call special attention to the need there is for team work all along the line, if we are to deal effectively with the health problems of the aged: team work among the three levels of government; between health and welfare departments at each level of government; between governments and voluntary organization and among the various professional, technical and ancillary workers that contribute to the program.

The Committee recommends:

(32) That at the local level devices be developed to ensure cooperative planning and action between the Departments of Health and Welfare in Municipal Governments and between them and other local Government Departments and the various voluntary and professional organizations in the community concerned with the health of the elderly.[15]

(33) That Provincial Departments of Health establish special branches to concern themselves with the health problems of older people and that there be a continuing liaison between such branches and corresponding branches in Departments of Welfare in order to ensure joint consideration of matters of mutual concern, such as rehabilitation service, care of elderly people in institutions, organized Home Care programs, etc.

(34) That, similarly, at the Federal level a special branch or division concerned with the Health Care of the aged be established under the Director of Health Services in the Department of National Health and Welfare, and that close liaison be maintained between this branch and the corresponding body on the welfare side, as well as with the staff of other Departments which carry responsibility for the health of older people, such as the Department of Veterans Affairs, and the Civilian Rehabilitation Branch of the Department of Labour.

[15] Note the following recommendation from the Canadian Medical Association, (Proceedings, p. 1352): "The leadership and responsibility for planning programs for the aged should emanate from the community through meetings of all interested agencies including the medical profession. A central committee representing various interested groups is possibly the best method of establishing community programs."

Research and Statistics

This subject, as it relates to the whole field of aging, is dealt with in another part of the report,[16] but with particular reference to the field of health the Committee recommends:

(35) That periodic surveys be made of the health status of older people in order to provide comprehensive, reliable and up-to-date information as a basis for health planning.

(36) That the data related to the aged which is provided by provincial hospitalization and health insurance schemes be more fully analyzed, interpreted and made more readily available.

(37) That statistics relating to the health of the aged, as currently assembled by the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, be reviewed with a view to their extension and improvement: and that in this connection particular attention be given to the definition of various kinds of sheltered accommodation.

(38) That greater financial assistance be provided for research into the nature of aging, the cause and control of diseases and disabilities with a high incidence among old people, and into the effectiveness of existing programs of prevention, diagnosis, treatment and rehabilitation.

Housing Status and Needs

No one who reviews the briefs submitted to the Senate Committee can fail to be impressed with the frequent and often lengthy references they contain to the subject of housing. The variety of groups and individuals that appeared at the Hearings, or sent in their views, including the elderly themselves, were virtually unanimous in flagging this as an area of major concern. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in its very comprehensive submission, spoke for all when it declared: "The statistical evidence on the housing situation of old people in Canada indicates that their need is large and widespread. There is a great gap between need and accomplishment."[1] And in another part of its statement CMHC comments: "Such a comparison between need and accomplishment makes it clear that, though we seem to be on the right path, an enormous task confronts us."[2]

The Committee, after a careful examination of the data available to it, endorses this authoritative assessment of the situation. It also agrees with the judgment of other knowledgeable witnesses who stressed the complexity of the problem with which we are endeavouring to deal. One of these witnesses was the Canadian Welfare Council. Speaking out of the experience of a recently completed study on housing for the aged, the Council said: "Living arrangements for Canada's aged is a complex and in some respects a controversial problem. It is related to such diverse things as physical planning, nursing and medical care, building standards, public finance, rehabilitation, recreation, social welfare, public opinion and attitudes, and the real estate market. It involves questions of the respective responsibilities of federal, provincial and local governments; of voluntary organizations; of private enterprise; of the individual, the family and the community."[3]

How Older People Live

Chapter 12 contains the Committee's attempt to analyze the housing problem of older people so far as existing information permits. Some of the findings that stand out may be summarized briefly as follows:

(1) The inclination of older people seems to be to live in their own homes as long as possible. In 1961 nearly 95 per cent of families with the head aged 65 and over were doing so, and even when the older person was single, or was left alone as widow or widower, with no children at home, nearly 260,000 or 43 per cent of them continued to maintain their own dwellings, men and women in about the same proportion. So far as families are concerned this is much the same situation as obtained at the time of the 1956 census, but for unattached individuals, and especially for women, the proportion with their own homes had increased markedly.

(2) Very few older families doubled up with relatives but this was a fairly common pattern with older individuals. The percentage of unattached individuals living with relatives in 1961 was 29 per cent which, however, is less than it was in 1956. Older women were more likely than older men to live with relatives. The respective percentages were 33 per cent of all unattached women and 23 per cent of all unattached men. The actual figures were 123,000 women and 52,000 men.

(3) In 1961, 43 per cent of all older people were single, widowed, or divorced. One-third of older men and over one-half of older women were in this group which numbered over 600,000. This is a consideration which has an important bearing on the kind of dwellings older people need, even when allowance is made for those who may prefer to live with relatives or to share accommodation. At present too high a proportion of special housing for the aged is for couples.

(4) About 50 per cent of older people own their homes or are the wives of home owners, and the majority of these homes are mortgage-free. However, the quality of the dwellings occupied by the elderly, according to CMHC, is "much below average". Nearly 7 per cent were in need of major repairs; well over 25 per cent were without a separate toilet; and close to 30 per cent lacked a separate bath or shower.[4]

Besides, many of the dwellings, acquired earlier in life, were ill adapted to the changed needs of their occupants. CMHC called attention to the low mobility of older people in the matter of housing: nearly 60 per cent of the households whose head was aged 65 years or over in 1961 were living in the same dwellings they occupied ten years ago."[5]

(5) It is unfortunately not possible, with the data available, to correlate the housing accommodation of older people with their incomes. We do know, however, that in 1961, as indicated earlier,[6] the great majority of the elderly, and especially of older women without husbands (over 50 per cent of all women aged 65 and over), had incomes below modest subsistence levels. When to this is added the fact that 70 per cent of all older people live in urban areas, where rents are often high, it will be seen that for those who do not own a home that is fully paid for, the problem of securing decent housing may be well nigh insuperable without community aid.

General Conclusions

The Committee after examining statistics like the above, and the great volume of evidence received from experts and others, reached three or four broad conclusions which form the basis of our Recommendations;

(1) Many old people have no recognized or urgent housing problem. Whether as tenants or as house owners, they live in accommodation which at the moment they regard as suitable, or in any case which they are reluctant to leave. It is well to remind ourselves that at any one time only a minority of the general population is in the housing market and that the same is true of the elderly. This, however, should not be allowed to conceal the fact that a substantial number of older people are very poorly housed and that steps are necessary to deal with their situation.

(2) The great problem faced by older people needing to change their accommodation is the limited choice open to them. This is true for those with means as well as for the poor, although naturally the restrictions on the latter are more severe. One example is that of parents who want to live near their married children but are frustrated by the absence of small houses, duplexes, or even apartments in neighbourhoods planned uniformly for young families. Another is that of the individual or couple who through failing health or strength is in need of a setup that will provide some relief from household chores and a measure of supporting care. Old people, regardless of economic status, have a great variety of housing needs and desires, greater perhaps than younger people, and these are not being adequately met.

(3) The poor among the old are the most seriously disadvantaged when for whatever reason they are compelled to move from their present dwellings. Necessarily, their search must be for cheap quarters which are hardly to be had except in deteriorating neighbourhoods.

So far public measures to help this latter group have not been very successful. Low-dividend housing under Section 16 of the National Housing Act, during the period 1946-63, yielded only 8,000 units for the use of old people and at present costs the economic rent for these runs at around $60 a month. Public housing is necessary to yield lower rents but Canadian communities up to now have been slow to adopt this method of meeting the needs of low-income families generally. Since provision for public housing was first introduced in 1949, only 13,000 rental units have been produced throughout the whole country and of these precisely 167, mostly one-bedroom units for couples, were earmarked for old people. An important point to be borne in mind is the large number of old people who are without partners. The Province of British Columbia, for example, reported that well over 60 per cent of their elderly in need of housing were in this group.

(4) One of the risks in planning housing for old people is, of course, that of segregating them from the community. Perhaps this is something that cannot be avoided altogether, especially in the later years of life, if institutional care is needed, but the Committee agrees fully with the Ontario Welfare Council that we should "encourage the mixing of housing types."[7] It is unfortunate that there are so few examples in our larger Canadian cities of what Lewis Mumford calls "the normal mixed community,"[8] where young and old can mingle naturally together and where in addition there is ready access to parks and gardens, neighbourhood stores, churches, libraries and pleasant places to sit and stroll.

Amendments to the National Housing Act

The Committee welcomes the recent amendments to the National Housing Act. These amendments, approved by Parliament in June, 1964, at about the mid-point of the Committee's Hearings, meet the principal criticisms of the legislation made to us in submissions received before that date. They also clear the way for the many sided attack on the housing problem of old people, which according to all the evidence is what the situation requires.

[8] Mumford, Lewis, "For Older People not Segregation but Integration", reprinted in Community Planning Review, the magazine of the Community Planning Association of Canada, September, 1956.

Several features of the new amendments are worthy of particular note:

(1) In the limited dividend and non-profit sections 90 per cent long-term loans, which were previously available only for self-contained housing, may now be obtained also for hostels and other forms of group living accommodation. Further, such loans can be secured not only for new construction, as in the past, but for the acquisition and conversion of existing housing.

These two changes between them will, we feel confident, produce a much greater variety of housing opportunities than exists at present for old people wishing to live independently. They should also stimulate the development of more group facilities, hopefully on a neighbourhood basis, for the elderly who are left alone and desire companionship, or who because of frailty are in need of supportive service, short of medical care.

(2) The second series of changes relates to public housing, an area in which up to now, as stated earlier, very little provision has been made for old people. Here again hostels are now admissible projects, as are proposals to take over and convert existing properties. Further, the restriction has been removed which previously limited to 20 per cent the accommodation especially designed for use by old people in any given public housing project. There is also provision for the advance purchase of land for public housing, which could, and we hope will, encourage a better blending of age groups in new developments.

Finally, a choice is now offered between two methods of financing public housing projects. Before the recent amendments the only method available was one that made the federal Government a joint owner with the province of any project undertaken, an arrangement not always welcomed by the province and even less by municipalities of any size or substance, which found themselves in the position of distinctly junior partners. The new alternative separates subsidy from ownership. It is now possible for a local or provincial authority to own and operate its own public housing, and at the same time enter into an agreement with the Federal Government by which the latter will meet 50 per cent of operating deficits. While this is undoubtedly a constructive move, a question which might be raised is why the subsidy should be 50 per cent in the one case and 75 per cent in the other, particularly if it is desired to encourage the new arrangement.

Mr. H. W. Hignett, in giving testimony before the committee voiced his belief that the numbers, types and quality of housing for elderly people will be increased very rapidly and very substantially in Canada during the next few years.[9]

The Committee commends this statement from the President of CMHC, which it interprets not merely as a confident forecast, but as a declaration of Corporation policy. In the past, due to conditions during and after the war, the National Housing Act has been used largely to meet the housing needs of young families in the middle income group. Today we are in a different situation. Thanks largely to the success of CMHC's program, many of the earlier pressures have now been relieved and the financial requirements for home purchase are of such an order that, for the most part, they can be handled satisfactorily by the established lending institutions. An opportunity, therefore, presents itself at the present time to redirect the important resources and knowledge of CMHC into an area that far too long has been neglected in Canada: that of housing for low income groups including the elderly.[10]

The recent amendments, which have transformed the NHA into a significantly better instrument for a task of this sort, is the first step in the new direction. The next, clearly, is a well conceived and carefully planned program of action, involving the cooperation of all levels of government on which, it is encouraging to observe, a beginning has been made.

Recommendations

The following recommendations, as is appropriate, having in mind the terms of reference of the Senate Committee, are directed essentially to the housing needs of older people, but since so many of the latter are in the low-income bracket what is proposed in most instances will fit into the program indicated above.

Federal Government

CMHC's contribution to the development of housing is not limited to providing funds, although this is its principal function as a federal agency. It is also looked to by provincial and municipal authorities across the country and by private entrepreneurs and voluntary organizations as a source of technical information and advice. Equally important the daily contacts of its field staff with planning and housing officials in their several regions have served to raise the level of expertise generally and produced a common body of knowledge and experience for which CMHC is the accepted clearing house.

We are fortunate in Canada to have achieved this situation of mutual understanding and support among the three levels of government, which permits the federal agency, without trespassing on provincial prerogatives, to play a positive role in the housing field. If that role has proved important up to now, it will be doubly so as we move forward vigorously into the field of social housing, where new policies and techniques may need to be developed and where carefully planned collaboration is essential.

[10] A study by the Ontario Association of Housing Authorities: Good Housing for Canadians (1964) estimates "that something in the order of 1,000,000 low income family and elderly persons units will be required by 1980 alongside a program of approximately the same dimensions of moderate income housing". (p. 8). The first of these categories for families with incomes under $3,000 would require subsidies; the second for those with incomes between $3,000 and $4,500 would be provided on a full-recovery basis. The study estimates the low income housing needs of old people during the 1961-1980 period as 286,000 units for elderly families and 186,000 for non-family elderly individuals.

The Committee recommends to the Federal Government:

In regard to Education

(39) That Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) conduct a sustained educational campaign to make everyone concerned aware of the opportunities, under the NHA as amended, to provide new and converted housing of many varieties for the use of older people, and that in such a campaign attention be called to such particulars as:

(a) The desirability of spreading housing for old people throughout the community and/or incorporating it in housing for other age groups;

(b) The additional opportunities available under the revised public incomes; and

(c) The importance, when hostels and other special group living arrangements are being considered for old people able to get about, of selecting a convenient site, ensuring a homelike atmosphere, keeping the size of the project as small as is compatible with economical operation, and of blending it in with the general housing of the area.

(40) That, on the initiative of CMHC, periodic conferences be held on a national and regional basis, made up of people from the variety of public and voluntary bodies concerned with old people's housing but also including architects, developers and builders, for the purpose of sharing experience, of discussing common problems and encouraging new and imaginative developments.

In regard to Technical Aid

(41) That CMHC develop plans and specifications for a wide variety of housing arrangements for old people and that the latter include low-cost one-bedroom houses suitable for couples and for two single people living together.

(42) That CMHC develop manuals for use by housing authorities and private sponsoring groups, giving precise information and advice regarding varieties of accommodation needed, housing designs including safety features, site selection, financing, and the procedures to be followed under the limited dividend, non-profit and public housing sections of the NHA.

(43) That CMHC appoint to its staff one or more persons with specialized knowledge relating to housing for old people and that their advice and technical assistance be available to housing authorities and other sponsoring groups.

(44) That a review be made of experience to date in rehousing within the area old people dispossessed by urban renewal schemes and that consideration be given to further measures, such as assistance with the purchase of small homes or rent subsidies for a limited period, which might be taken to ease the impact of the changeover and to assist generally in the process of resettlement.

In regard to Hostel Accommodation

(45) That insured NHA loans be provided to finance the construction of hostel, dormitory and similar type accommodation for elderly persons who could afford to pay a rent set by the normal operations of the market.

(At present loans for this type of housing are available only when the intention is to benefit persons who are unable to pay open market rates; there are, however, considerable numbers of older people, not in the low income group, who would welcome this type of accommodation.)

In regard to Research and Training

(46) That CMHC, in collaboration with DBS, review the present data collected and analyzed on the housing situation of old people with a view to filling the gaps that exist and introducing such changes as seem desirable in the definitions employed and the classifications provided. (Reference has been made earlier to the difficulty at present of correlating incomes and housing).

(47) That CMHC undertake or support, possibly in collaboration with the Department of National Health and Welfare, a major research project to determine the housing needs and preferences of old people, and their evaluation of existing housing opportunities. (The Age and Opportunity Bureau of Winnipeg, among other organizations, stressed the "deplorable" lack of information regarding the housing problems of the elderly).

(48) (a) That grants be made to universities and professional schools for special courses, seminars, conferences and other means of training with a view to increasing the supply of workers equipped to deal with both the social and physical aspects of housing for low-income families and for the elderly, and

(b) That to the same end scholarships be made available to promising students.

In regard to Organization

(49) That CMHC give consideration to the establishment of a national committee, analogous to the recently appointed national council on welfare, to advise on matters of policy and program in the field of housing for low-income families and for the elderly.

Provincial Governments

Since under the constitution welfare belongs in the domain of the provinces, it is on the shoulders of the latter that the chief responsibility rests for the provision of housing for old people. CMHC may be expected to make available its resources of money and technical knowledge and to perform additional functions, as indicated above, in the areas of education, research and coordination, but planning and the development of action programs are clearly matters for provincial initiative. The programs required in our view are of two kinds: the first directed to the provision of housing itself, and the second directed to the provision of those ancillary services that will enable the aged to avoid or postpone the necessity of institutional living. Our recommendations here relate chiefly to housing; services, which are the responsibility of provincial and local health and welfare departments, are considered in another section of the Report.[11]

The Committee recommends to the Provincial Governments:

In regard to Organization and Responsibility

(50) That housing programs for the elderly be integrated with those for low-income families and made the responsibility of a single department of government or of a provincial housing agency established by the department for the purpose.

(51) That consideration be given to the advisability of establishing a committee of knowledgeable citizens to be advisory to the minister and the department or agency on all aspects of social housing.

(52) That it be the responsibility of the provincial department or agency to ascertain and correlate information regarding housing needs and to develop a provincial plan calculated to produce within a reasonable time and according to an agreed order of priority the variety of accommodation old people throughout the province require.

(53) That it further be the responsibility of the provincial department or agency to negotiate with CMHC on its own behalf and that of municipalities and interested voluntary organizations regarding the size and nature of NHA assistance required. (This would ensure careful coordination of housing efforts within a province, the development of expertise on the part of the provincial authority and more effective communication between the province and the federal agency).

[11] See Chapters 4 and 6.

In regard to Technical and Financial Aid

(54) That the provincial department or agency appoint the necessary number of staff members equipped to assist the municipalities and voluntary organizations in the determination of need and the development and implementation of housing programs, and,

(55) That, in particular, funds and grants be provided in such amounts as to reduce to no more than token payments the capital funds required by voluntary organizations to qualify for loans under the limited dividend section of the act.

In regard to Policy

(56) That the provincial department or agency accept as a matter of principle the importance of enabling old people to continue in their own homes as long as possible and that where group living, short of medical care, is desired or required, it be provided in relatively small projects scattered throughout the community rather than in large institutions.

In regard to Program and Services

(57) That the provincial department or agency establish and enforce strict regulations concerning the design, siting and general operations of private homes or institutions offering individual or group living accommodation, short of medical care, to elderly people.

Municipal Governments

Historically municipalities, as the level of government closest to the situation, have been actively involved in housing problems, and in our view they should continue to carry substantial responsibility and authority in this field, unless they are too small to do so or form part of a larger administrative unit which includes housing in its jurisdiction. The recent amendments to the NHA which permit municipalities to own and operate public housing must be viewed as a constructive move.

The Committee recommends to Municipal Governments and other local area authorities:

In regard to Organization and Planning

(58) That, as at the provincial level, housing for the aged be entrusted to the municipal department or agency which is also responsible for low rental housing in general and that a committee of representative citizens be established to assist the department in an advisory capacity.

(59) That, with the advice and financial assistance of the two senior levels of government, each municipality survey the nature and extent of local need and develop a comprehensive and balanced plan for meeting it, with the understanding that such plan must fit in with that of the province, and at the same time be integrated with the municipality's own total housing program.

(60) That through the cooperation of municipal health and welfare departments and with financial aid from the provincial government, ancillary services be made available and accessible to elderly people. (These services, which would include essentially visiting nurses, homemakers, and day-care centres, are dealt with in other sections of the Report).[12]

(61) That the municipal department or agency responsible for housing cooperate with other municipal departments and voluntary organizations in the community in the establishment of advisory and referral centres to assist old people with their housing and other problems related to their changing conditions and needs. (It is to be remembered that old people may need a different kind of living arrangement at different stages of their later years).

(62) That changes be made in zoning laws where necessary to make a variety of housing accommodation, such as cooperative residences, small houses and flats, boarding houses, etc., more widely available throughout the community.

In regard to Technical Aid

(63) That the municipal department or agency include on its staff one or more specialized persons to assist voluntary sponsoring groups and, in particular, to provide information regarding monies available from all sources, building regulations, local bylaws, siting, procedures, etc.

This recommendation should be read in conjunction with Recommendations 54 and 55 to Provincial Governments. It is to be observed that, of 197 non-profit housing projects for old people built under Section 16 of the NHA between 1946 and 1964, 114 were built by charitable organizations, as against 68 by municipalities and 15 by private entrepreneurs.[13] Although this situation will undoubtedly change as municipalities assume greater responsibility for the housing of old people, it would seem important that voluntary groups be encouraged to continue their active participation, although possibly in modified ways.[14] For this to happen, however, more assistance, both financial and technical, will need to be available to them.

(64) That arrangements be made whereby old people requiring short-term hospital or nursing home care may retain for a reasonable period the right to return to their previous living quarters in assisted housing projects.

Community Services for Older People

Reference has already been made at several points to the need of older people for community services. Under the heading of health, and again under housing, we have stressed the part these services play in enabling the elderly to retain their independence and to postpone, or, it may be, to avoid altogether, the restraints and isolation of institutional living. Community services, however, have a more positive role than the prevention of dependency, important as that is. They also support the desire of large numbers of older people to continue as participating members of society and to find opportunities for useful and satisfying pursuits.

It follows that community services encompass a great variety of activities, which it is difficult to bring together within a single framework. Interpreted most widely they can be regarded, and indeed were regarded in some of the submissions, as embracing all the resources, outside his own family, on which the individual may draw for help and support. Our own use of the term has a narrower focus although we have not attempted to formulate a precise definition. The main difference is that we exclude the several large scale federal and provincial programs designed to provide basic economic security, hospital care and housing. When we speak of community services we are thinking, essentially, of what the Canadian Mental Health Association designated as "a wide range of small facilities (or programs). . . located regionally or locally, close to the place" where old people live. They may supplement or enhance the effectiveness of such major programs as those referred to above, or they may support interests and needs like recreation and satisfying social relationships, which call for an individualized rather than a uniform approach.

Community services, it should be recalled, were singled out specifically in the Senate Committee's terms of reference as an area to which special attention should be given, and we were fortunate in the wealth of information and suggestions that were provided to us in the submissions. There were few witnesses who did not lay emphasis on the importance of one or more "services and facilities of a positive and preventative kind" as a means of ensuring that "older persons may continue to live healthy and useful lives as members of the Canadian community."[1]

A full account of the Committee's investigation under this head will be found in Chapter 13 where in addition to examining the needs that exist and reviewing the current situation, we propose what we regard as a desirable pattern of services for the average community and indicate some of the considerations involved in its attainment. The following brief summary highlights the Committee's principal findings and conclusions as a preface to its specific recommendations:

(1) Not every individual in his later years requires help from organized community services. Here, as in other areas we have considered, many old people continue to possess the energy and resourcefulness necessary to manage their own affairs, with the help available to them on occasion from relatives and friends. There are those, however, especially among the very old, who are not in this fortunate position. Their needs may be simple ones, like a visit to break up a long day, help with letter-writing and a bit of shopping; or their condition may be such as to call for intensive and long-term care which is not easy to provide in the home, unless support is available from the community. Even among the "young old" there are considerable numbers who find life in retirement "flat and unprofitable" and who need the stimulus of organized programs.

(2) Some needs of old people call for specialized and separate services, but many of them can be met through resources that already exist in the community, or should be provided, to serve all age groups. A primary aim of planning should be to see that these resources are in fact available to old people, which may necessitate some adaptations in program and procedures. As things are, homemaker services, for example, tend to be restricted to families with children, and recreation programs in community centres and elsewhere are offered mainly for the young.

(3) The evidence we have received indicates that the majority of older Canadians live in areas where community services and facilities, whether designed especially for their needs and interests or available to them on equal terms with others in the population, are spotty or non-existent. This is more true in the smaller places but the Social Planning Council of Greater Toronto pointed out that even in that large city "there is a serious, continuing and growing gap between the social needs of the population and the financial and human resources rendered available to meet them".[2]

(4) The community services suggested to us as essential to the well-being of old people are of such variety that, as indicated earlier, they almost defy classification. Broadly, and not without some overlapping, they may be grouped as follows:

(a) Services in their own homes for old people requiring varying degrees of medical and personal care—
(Organized home care programs, home-nursing, rehabilitation services, homemakers, etc.)

[2] Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto, brief submitted to the Special Committee on Aging, Proceedings, No. 15, p. 1037, July 9, 1964.

These services are discussed in Chapters 4 and 11.

(b) Services in their homes for "shut-ins" who are not necessarily sick, but cannot get out much and need help with household chores and meal preparation, along with some companionship—

(Homemakers, friendly visitors, home help).

(c) Services and facilities in the community, preferably in the neighbourhood where they live, for old people who require advice, guidance and protected activity—

(Information and referral centres, case-work and counselling, legal aid, day care centres, sheltered workshops).

(d) Services and facilities for old people who want somewhere to go and something to do along with the chance for social contacts—

(Old people's clubs and centres).

(e) Services and facilities for old people who are interested in activities of an educational, cultural and community service nature which are adapted to their capacities and interests—

(Old people's clubs and centres have important roles here, but the major need is for the schools, churches, libraries, community centres and other existing organizations to adapt their programs to the interests of older people).

(5) Without the enterprise and devotion of voluntary agencies, very few of the services we now have for older people would exist at all. Their continued interest and leadership are essential and should be encouraged in every way possible. It is our view, however, that the accelerated development of community services which is now called for depends on the active participation of the public authority. Government support is also necessary for planning and coordination, the need for which was stressed continually in the course of the hearings.

The Committee recommends:

To municipal governments, local education authorities, and local voluntary organizations,

(65) That municipal governments accept responsibility for providing leadership and initiative in the planning and development of the range of community services required for the well-being of old people, themselves establishing or financing those services that fall under their statutory jurisdiction while working wth voluntary agencies or other levels of government in the establishment of others.

(66) (a) That on the initiative of the municipal government, the local welfare council or other appropriate body a representative committee, including appointees from the municipal government, be established for the purpose of surveying the local situation with respect to community services and facilities available to old people, and

(b) That this committee include in its investigation not only those health and welfare services, such as visiting nurses and homemakers. which would enable the aged to live in their own homes rather than in institutions, but also facilities and programs in the areas of recreation, education and community service which would enable them to continue as participating and contributing members of society, and

(c) That on the basis of the above survey, a plan be developed (i) to ensure communication and cooperation among all organizations and groups seeking to serve the aged and (ii) to extend and improve existing facilities and programs, and to establish new ones as required, and

(d) That in the implementation of this plan financial and technical help be sought from provincial and federal authorities along the lines indicated in later sections of these recommendations.

(67) That municipal governments take advantage of the municipal winter works program, the national health grants program, the national welfare grants program, the national fitness and amateur sport program, and also special provincial programs where they exist, to secure assistance with the cost of constructing facilities and developing services for the benefit of old people.

(68) That the municipal government, through its local public welfare department where such has been instituted, accept responsibility for seeing that an information and referral centre is established for the use of old people and others in the community seeking advice on their problems.

(69) That the municipal government, through its public welfare department where such has been established, and the voluntary family welfare agency, if such exists, extend and improve counselling services to old people, and that, under the auspices of one or both, a carefully supervised foster home placement service for old people be developed.

(70) That local institutions and agencies serving adults, including the schools and universities, the churches, social agencies, the public library, art galleries and museums, community centres and other recreational groups, experiment with changes in their programs and procedures with a view to encouraging greater participation on the part of older people.

(71) That municipalities, in seeking to fill the gaps between existing and needed services and facilities, give particular attention to the possibility of establishing homemaker's services and day-care centres.[3]

(On the basis of our inquiry we would give high priority to these two facilities which are at present in short supply everywhere. They can often prevent the institutionalization of old people and are a valuable resource also to patients after discharge from institutions.)

(See also recommendations 75 and 76.)

(72) That careful consideration be given also by municipal governments to the need for sheltered work and sheltered workshops open to all persons in the community, including the aged, who are unlikely to enter or re-enter the labour market, but who require work activity in a protected setting.

(See also recommendation 81.)

The Committee recommends to Provincial Governments:

(73) That, in line with their constitutional responsibility for the provision of essential health, welfare, educational and recreational services, provincial governments give particular attention to the serious gaps and deficiencies currently existing in all of these fields, as they relate to the needs of old people.

(74) That, with a view to bringing about the changes called for in the above situation, provincial governments through their departments of health, welfare and education provide strong leadership to local communities and in particular assist their efforts through initiating and publicising a program of technical advice and field service and through the preparation of materials for program planning and staff training.

(75) That grants be made available by provincial governments, independently or on a shared basis with the federal government, for:

(a) The construction and operation of day-care centres, community recreation centres and sheltered workshops;

(b) The conduct of training courses and institutes for professional, technical and volunteer workers in the area of community services; and

(c) Demonstration projects for old people in fields like meal service, recreation programs, camping, preparation for retirement and adult education.

(76) That the cost of homemakers be shared with municipalities on a basis which would permit the latter to provide this important service free to all old people who have a taxable income below a specified minimum, say $1,200 for a single person and $2,000 for a couple.

[8] Day care centres should not be confused with centres providing merely recreation. See page 151.

(77) That encouragement be given to local welfare departments to improve their counselling services and to make it available not only to people in financial need, but to all others in the community, including especially the elderly, and that the province share in the cost of this development.

(See also recommendation 83.)

The Committee recommends to the Federal Government:

(78) That the welfare branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare establish a special division for the purpose of providing technical advice and up-to-date information with regard to daycare centres, homemakers, meal services, counselling and such other welfare services for the elderly as come within the departments terms of reference.

(See Chapter 4 where a similar recommendation is made on the health side.)

(79) That the Department of Labour, similarly, through such of its branches as is appropriate, assist the provinces in the development of services for older people in occupational training, placement, and rehabilitation.

(80) That consideration be given to the possibility of earmarking for use in the field of aging a portion of the funds available for research, training and activity projects under the National Health Grants, The National Welfare Grants and the National Fitness and Amateur Sport Programs. (While it is true that grants are already available under these three programs for the purposes we have in mind, the fact remains that up to the present few grants have been so utilized. In our view, singling out the field of aging for special consideration would be an effective means of stimulating active interest).

(81) That the Department of Labour and/or the Department of National Health and Welfare give encouragement to the provinces and their municipalities in the provision of sheltered work and the establishment of sheltered workshops, and that this encouragement, in addition to technical advice, promotional aids and help in developing standards include Federal-Provincial sharing in the costs of facilities where indicated and in the provision of work activity allowances.

(82) (a) That homemaker service be accepted as a shareable cost under the Canada Assistance Plan. Since the Federal Government now shares in the cost of maintaining indigent old people in nursing homes and other "homes for special care" it would seem only logical to expand this arrangement to cover the area of non-medical care given to old people in their own homes.

(b) That homemaker service be accepted as a shareable cost under the Canada Assistance Plan not only for persons on public assistance but for all others to whom this service is provided free by the provinces and their municipalities.

(83) That counselling services provided by the local public welfare department for the elderly and others in the community be accepted as a shareable cost under the Canada Assistance Plan.

(See recommendation 77.)

Other Recommendations based on the Committee's findings as reported in Chapter 14.

(84) That research be undertaken with a view to learning more about the daily life of older people and, in particular, about their leisure time interests and their attitudes to community programs of various types in this area provided for their benefit.

(85) That in view of our present lack of knowledge about the leisure time needs and interests of older people, programs in this field be envisaged frankly as experiments with provision for the careful evaluation of the results achieved.

Research and Statistics

One of the first undertakings of the Senate Committee was a survey to discover the extent and nature of research on Aging being conducted throughout Canada at the present time, and to ascertain the degree of interest there is in Aging as a field of research among the pertinent professional disciplines. The results of this inquiry, which are contained in Chapter 15, reveal a rather disappointing picture. It would appear that Canada lags considerably behind the United States, Great Britain and a number of European countries in the attention being devoted to the scientific study of older people and their problems. According to our respondents, this is true even in respect of medical and biological research, but the most conspicuous lag is in the area of the social sciences, where the most that can be reported is the beginnings of interest and a handful of projects, mostly of the survey variety, conducted by individual investigators with very limited financial aid.

The Committee is concerned about this situation, especially as it relates to social research. Again and again throughout our inquiry we have been dismayed by the great gaps that exist in our understanding of old people and their problems. Equally startling was the discovery of how often, in areas like housing, income maintenance and health care, major decisions are made on the basis of much less complete information about the needs and wishes of the elderly and the merits of particular proposals, than planners and administrators recognize as desirable.

We are convinced that, whatever may have been true in the past, the point has now been reached where deficiencies of this sort need no longer be accepted as inevitable. What is required, once we recognize the importance of scientific knowledge as a guide to sound planning, is a deliberate effort on a bold scale to stimulate the development of research on Aging at all levels—basic, applied and operational.

The Committee has given considerable attention to the means by which this objective can be achieved and is convinced that the Federal Government has a major role to play.

Research in Federal Departments and Agencies:

It was noted that the Dominion Bureau of Statistics collects and analyzes an increasing volume and variety of statistical data with regard to the aging population; and also that several Federal departments and agencies, notably the departments of National Health and Welfare, Labour and Veterans Affairs, and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, not only supplement this information from their own records, but carry on independent studies in respect to those aspects of need for which they have particular administrative responsibility.

The Committee recommends:

(86) That the foregoing activities be encouraged and that particularly in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the Department of National Health and Welfare, staff and budget be provided to strengthen existing programs of research and fact-finding in the aging field.

Statistics on Aging:

The Committee in making its inquiry has had occasion to work closely with the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and appreciates the extent to which the latter has enlarged and adapted its program of old age statistics over recent years in response to mounting interest in this field. Out of our experience, however, we are convinced that further improvements and refinements are desirable, in respect of the data collected, the definitions employed and the classifications provided.

The Committee recommends:

(87) (a) That on the initiative of DBS consultations be instituted at an early date with appropriate Federal and Provincial Government Departments, and with non-governmental organizations interested, for the purpose of improving present statistics related to aging.

(A meeting of all parties concerned, called by the Bureau for the purpose of general review, would seem to be a desirable first step).

(b) That, further, DBS take the measures necessary to match its achievements in the field of economic statistics with an integrated system of social statistics, which would contain a section on aging.

Federal Grants for Research on Aging:

Another observation of the Committee is that grants are currently available through the Department of National Health and Welfare, and to a lesser extent through other Federal departments and agencies, for research projects which may be in the field of Aging. Indications are, however, that up to the present very few such grants have in fact been used in this way, and that of those which are so used nearly all have to do with problems of medical, rather than of welfare and social policy significance. Undoubtedly this is largely a reflection of the level of interest in Aging that obtains, at present, in universities, professional schools, and other research centres, but there is a question whether the attitudes and preferences of approving bodies may not also be a factor. One of our great concerns is the lack of careful evaluation studies of programs for the financial support and care of older people in which large commitments of public funds are involved.

The Committee recommends:

(88) That the Federal Government review the experience it has had with research grants in health, welfare, and related fields such as housing and rehabilitation, and give consideration to means that might be employed, possibly through earmarking certain of these grants, to encourage the development of research on aging, especially in those areas of major need and expenditure that are now neglected.

The Case for a National Centre on Social Research:

The above proposals, important as they are, relate to particular aspects of a research program. They do not touch a major need, referred to in a number of submissions to the Committee, which is for leadership and direction of the program as a whole. The Committee considered this problem with some care, and in doing so had before it the experience of a number of other countries.

It was observed, for example, that in Great Britain, where there has been a continuous flow of studies and research related to all aspects of Aging, the chief source of financial support and stimulus to integration has been a private organization, the Nuffield Foundation, which for many years "has devoted its largest sums to the 'care of old people' ".[1]

In the United States the great bulk of Federal expenditures for research on Aging are made through the National Institutes of Health within the Public Health Service, and are mainly concentrated in the area of health. Dissatisfaction with this situation of imbalance, and with the neglect of overall research planning, led the Special Committee on Aging of the United States Senate in 1961 to recommend the creation of a National Institute on Gerontology "with sufficient funds and staff to give the national leadership and recognition which research in the field of Aging requires and deserves".[2] This recommendation was later replaced by a proposal for a high-level "Commission on Aging" which would have the conduct and promotion of research as one of its responsibilities.

The arrangement in Denmark is on broader lines. There, the Government in 1958 established a Danish National Institute on Social Research as an independent body with its own Board but financed out of public funds. As the name implies, the Institute does not confine its attention to the field of old age, but it does include gerontology within its structure as a major area of interest.

The Committee's examination of these various patterns, in the light of conditions in Canada, gave rise to a number of questions:

(a) Should the integrating body we are considering concern itself exclusively with research, or should it carry responsibility also for leadership in the area of program and services?

It is the Committee's view that, if at all possible, the two functions should be kept separate. They are not of the same order, and there are marked differences between them in the type of staff and organizational setup required. Besides, there is always the danger, when research and services are combined, that one of them, usually services, receives priority over the other. It would appear unwise to run this risk when our needs in the field of research are so desperate. However, in Chapter 8, where we discuss coordination in the area of services, it is acknowledged that an agency carrying this latter responsibility might be expected at least to collect information derived from research, if our primary recommendation under this head is rejected, or until it is implemented.

(b) Under what auspices should the proposed research agency be set up?

The Committee's approach to this question was to ask where such an agency would be most likely to enjoy the status, financial resources and freedom of action necessary to operate effectively. Canadian experience of a number of struggling research bodies in the fields of education and social welfare lends little support to the belief that more than a meagre budget would be provided out of private funds, although private foundations should, of course, be encouraged to devote more of their resources to social research, particularly in regard to the problems of aging. On the other hand, the status and freedom of action accorded to the new body are likely to be limited if it is located in a government department. The type of arrangement favoured by the Committee is that adopted for the National Research Council which receives its budget from public funds but operates independently within the limits of its terms of reference.

(c) Should the proposed agency occupy itself exclusively with research on Aging?

The Committee found this a more difficult question than at first appeared. One of the practical objections to a research agency concentrating on Aging is that in Canada we already have the Medical Research Council, which is concerned with the needs of all ages in the area of health. This means that in order to avoid overlapping any new agency would have to confine its attention to the social problems of old people.

What we had to think about, therefore, was the desirability of a social research centre, focussed altogether on the needs of older people. That older people have a host of social problems goes without saying, and has been amply documented in this report. It is also true, as has been stated earlier, that planning for the needs of older people, in areas like income, housing and health, involves important policy decisions that should be informed by scientific research.

However, as the Committee quickly recognized, there are considerations on the other side. One of these is the fact, brought out in Chapter 1, (Principle 1) that the problems of older people are interlinked with those of the total population and have to be seen in their widest social context. Another, (Principle 2), is that while society has a particular responsibility for the elderly, it cannot neglect the problems of other age groups. A third consideration is, of course, the economical use of funds. And, finally, there is the very real deterrent created by Canada's shortage of professionally trained workers in the social research field. While the aim must be to overcome this shortage as quickly as possible through financial aid to graduate students and grants to universities and other training centres, it would be a mistake to encourage the proliferation of bodies in the social research field, of which there is some evidence already.

In the Committee's view, Denmark, with its National Institute of Social Research, provides the model for Canada to follow, and we have no fear that within such a setup the needs of the older generation would be neglected. Whether such an Institute, or Council, is established in Canada, depends on the seriousness with which we regard our obligations in the field of human resources, and also on the valuation government, and the public, place on the importance of research as a guide to social policy.

The Committee recommends:

(89) (a) That consideration be given to the establishment of a national council on social research, as recommended to the Government in the past by such national organizations as the Social Science Research Council of Canada; the Commonwealth Institute of Social Research and that specific provision be made within the program of the council for research in gerontology;

(b) That the council conduct or commission research on its own, particularly in the area of social policy, but that it should also make, or approve, grants for social research and training in social research to universities, professional schools, and non-profit organizations;

(c) That the council be composed of outstanding social scientists and laymen, including a number with specific interest in gerontology, and that it also include up to one-third of its membership, representatives of Federal Government departments and agencies that are concerned with social research;

(d) That the advice and services of the council be available on request to provincial governments, universities and non-profit organizations;

(e) That in order to avoid duplication in the health field responsibility for the conduct and support of research in geriatrics be carried by the medical research council and that the latter give high priority in its program to the biological and medical aspects of aging, and to those diseases and illnesses which have a high incidence among older people;

(f) That the proposed council maintain close relations with the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the various Government departments and agencies having responsibility in the area of social research, including the universities, with a view to reducing overlapping and ensuring that the efforts of all are mutually supportive;

(g) That, with particular reference to the field of aging, the council seek the cooperation of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and departments of the federal, provincial and local governments, and the major voluntary organizations concerned:

(i) in improving the collection and analysis of statistical data,

(ii) in stimulating and correlating research porgrams, and

(iii) in undertaking the variety of needed research that is recommended elsewhere in this report.[3]

CHAPTER 8.

Planning and Coordination

In earlier chapters we have dealt with particular aspects of the situation of old people, their need for economic security, for example, for housing or health care, and in relation to each of them have had something to say about the planning and coordination that is required. Here we are thinking of all those aspects together, the totality of services for the aged, and, as in our discussion of research, we wish to consider the sort of overall structures that are necessary in order to ensure the effective organization of these services and their continuing development within the framework set by the goals and priorities of the community as a whole.

The Need Examined

Three main considerations lie behind the Senate Committee's interest in this topic:

(1) The magnitude of the task that confronts us as a nation in providing adequately for the well-being of our older citizens.

While in no way minimizing the importance of what is already being done by governments and voluntary organizations, we feel compelled on the basis of our inquiry to emphasize as strongly as we can the wide discrepancy that continues to exist between the actual situation of our aged population and what it should and could be in a country like Canada. Our immediate concern is that action be taken as quickly as possible to implement the proposals put forward in this Report, which is not an outcome that can be taken for granted. Appropriate mechanisms are called for at federal, provincial and local levels, through which the necessary leadership can be provided and wholehearted cooperation made possible all along the line.

(2) The extent to which services and programs for old people are now springing up without the benefit of central planning.

Many witnesses laid stress on the problems inherent in this situation. All too frequently the result of these well-intentioned efforts is considerable misdirection of energy and the proliferation of ad hoc projects with almost no regard to priorities and standards or the wise use of scarce resources. This is to view things from the angle of the local community. At the provincial and federal levels we find much the same assortment of piece-meal programs, each designed to meet a particular need with little evidence of any general design.

(3) Finally, the Committee is impressed with the many difficult situations that are involved in sound planning for older people.

As an example, in the area of economic security which is crucial, we have hardly begun to analyze the problem, let alone find acceptable solutions. And, in relation to community services, a whole host of questions arise. Must we continue to follow the traditional pattern of organizing programs in terms of categories of people—the old, the disabled, the delinquent, etc.—an approach which is now being abandoned in the area of public assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan, or is a different structure called for to achieve the results we desire, such as a system of multiple service centres located in neighborhoods on some such pattern as we have now for our schools? The latter would seem to be a more ordered and efficient way of meeting the initial needs of all age groups with referral to specialized facilities when this is considered necessary.

Whatever organizational pattern is adopted, there is another series of questions around the appropriate roles of governments and voluntary agencies. Criteria are necessary to determine when a particular service is of a kind, or has reached the stage, where it should properly become a public responsibility, and any such criteria should, of course, provide not only for the actual transfer of functions but for a variety of patterns of public-private relationships that might be developed.

The foregoing are only illustrations of issues, affecting old people and the population generally, that are basic to the formulation of social policy. In our view, the continuing and concentrated attention which issues like these require constitutes an added if not the principal argument for more effective planning and coordinating structures than are to be found, generally, in Canada at the present time.

It is perhaps only natural, since ours was a national inquiry, that most of the recommendations received by the Senate Committee related, chiefly, to what should be done at the federal level. One of the few specific references to the need for local planning bodies is to be found in the Brief of the National Council of Women, which recommends:

> "The formation at the local level of coordinating committees on Aging to assist in planning and prevent duplication of effort and the inefficient use of available assistance, both volunteer and professional, and of financial aid. Such committees could be either under local government control or part of a voluntary agency."[1]

But even this Brief continues:

> "There needs to be at the federal level an information centre which would make available to local coordinating committees data concerning what is being done, and what needs to be done, and otherwise give them aid and assistance."[2]

When the provinces are mentioned at all, it is usually, as in the Brief of the Community Chests and Councils of the Greater Vancouver area, to stress the need for "coordinated efforts on the part of local, provincial and federal authorities, as well as those of volunteers," although here again the reference is quickly followed by a plea for "national leadership."[3]

One of the few briefs which attempt to spell out the responsibilities of the provincial government is that of the Age and Opportunity Bureau of Winnipeg from which we quote, in part only, as follows:

> "It is our contention that the Province must take the major responsibility for enacting appropriate legislation to provide municipalities with the proper framework for services for the aged. This applies to leisure-time facilities and programs, housing projects and other services. The Provincial Government should continue to give leadership to the lower levels of government, and to help equalize financial imbalances in various parts of the Province by special grants to municipalities."[4]

With regard to the appropriate auspices for the national planning body some difference of opinion is apparent among the organizations giving evidence. A considerable group looks to the Federal Government to assume this responsibility: through "a Bureau on Aging within the Department of National Health and Welfare" (Montreal Council of Social Agencies and the Canadian Medical Association): "through an office on Aging in some department of the federal government", (United Church of Canada): or "through a federal interdepartmental arrangement to include the services of health, social welfare, housing, education, parks, etc.", (Notre Dame Day Centre, Winnipeg). On the other hand, the National Council of Jewish Women made a strong case for a National Association on Aging with provincial branches to be established as an independent body but with grants from all levels of government (along with voluntary contributions) and government representation on the Boards.[5] Somewhere in between is the position of the Ontario Welfare Council's Section on Aging, which pointed to the need to involve a number of government departments as well as community groups and voluntary organizations, but took the view that a national (or provincial) coordinating body" might be an arm of government or the task might be undertaken by a voluntary agency, provided public support was available".

Regarding the functions of the national agency there was more unanimity among the witnesses, and a number presented itemized lists of which the following by the United Church is a fair example:

"(a) To keep under review both the problems and opportunities of older people;

(b) To coordinate the work in Aging carried on by all departments of the government;

(c) To work with provincial committees on Aging and voluntary agencies including universities and other educational institutions;

(d) To strengthen and extend existing services;

(e) To retain and extend the concern for older people which motivated the appointment of the Special Senate Committee on Aging."[6]

The Welfare Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare devoted a whole section of its Brief to the subject of planning and coordination for the aged, in the course of which it reviewed the experience of Great Britain, the United States and a number of European countries. Considering the Canadian situation the Branch laid particular stress on the need for "a positive focus" in planning and the point was made that welfare programs, although they can make "some of the contributions required", are only a part of a comprehensive approach. The latter involves "imaginative social planning, full cooperation between public and voluntary bodies, and, above all, a determination to create the conditions under which the aged make a maximum contribution to the community, in the process of which they retain their place in the scheme of things."[7]

Guiding Principles:

Reflection on the above, and other statements in similar vein, received in the course of the Hearings led the Committee to formulate a number of guiding principles:

(1) Programs and services for older people must be planned in the context of the whole community and its needs. The aim should be an integrated pattern of services for all age groups.

(2) Planning and coordination should be conceived and practised as part of the democratic process. Authority to make and enforce decisions is essential, but a high degree of flexibility should be preserved and the accent throughout should be on cooperation and consensus rather than on directives and control.

(3) In order to achieve maximum effectiveness planning bodies must receive official status and involve the responsible participation of governments as well as of voluntary agencies.

(4) Overall planning for the needs of older people should not be viewed solely as a welfare operation. As is amply documented in this Report, the great majority of the aged, although poor, are not welfare problems, and in their pride and independence reject this distorted image of their condition. Health and welfare measures are, of course, important but, as emphasized in the Brief of the Federal

Department of National Health and Welfare, they are only parts of a comprehensive approach which must have the positive aim of creating greater opportunities for old people to lead satisfying lives and to continue as useful and valued members of society.

(5) Finally, while bodies charged with responsibility for planning are required at federal, provincial and local community levels, close working relationships among them should be encouraged by all appropriate means.

Conclusions and Recommendations:

In the light of the foregoing principles the Committee turned its attention to the kind of planning and coordinating structures that seem to be called for in the interests of older people, with the following results:

At the Local Level:

Here, notice was taken of the fact that community welfare councils are now to be found in some twenty of the larger centres of Canada and carry principal responsibility for whatever social planning is taking place. Indeed, a number of councils were represented at the Hearings and the Committee was impressed not only with their accomplishments in the field of Aging, but also with the considerable understanding of the planning process that was revealed in their presentations. It would seem desirable to utilize these community councils, wherever they exist, in the planning and coordination of services for older people which means, however, that they must broaden the scope of their interest, as is already happening, to include other than strictly welfare concerns. There remain, of course, the many smaller communities and rural areas where such councils do not exist; in most instances they will require the intervention of the public authority.

The Committee Recommends:

(90) That in all municipalities and/or appropriate local regions, on the initiative of the public authority where necessary, an officially recognized body be established to plan and coordinate programs, facilities and services for older people and that the concern of such bodies embrace not only the areas of health and welfare but also living arrangements, employment, education and leisure time activities.

At the Provincial Level:

In Canada at the present time the only permanent provincial bodies concerned with planning and coordination as they relate to older people are the Ontario Welfare Council through its section on aging and a more recently organized council on similar lines in Quebec, both of them under voluntary auspices. This situation contrasts with that in the United States where, largely due to the stimulus provided by the White House Conference on Aging in 1961, a large number of states have established official Commissions or Committees on Aging which are doing useful work. The fact that Canada is to hold a National Conference on Aging in 1966 offers at least the hope of a similar development here. Meanwhile, it is important to note that nine provincial governments made submissions to the Senate Committee, most of them on the basis of extensive studies and surveys, which is clear indication of their interest and concern.

In considering what might be an appropriate form of planning organization at the provincial level, the Committee fortunately had before it proposals that have been made recently by official bodies in two provinces. It was observed that the Report of the Aged and Long Term Illness Committee of Saskatchewan (1963) recommended the establishment of an Institute on Aging so designed "that coordination of programs, services and facilities, as well as education and research, can be affected through one central agency."[8] The Institute was to be financed, so far as its operational costs were concerned, by the Provincial Government to which it would report annually but it would have its own board of directors and operate independently within its terms of reference.

The other proposal, which is contained in the Interim Report of the Select Committee on Aging and the Aged of the Ontario Legislature (1965), is for an Ontario Institute on Gerontology "which would have among its objectives the coordination and support of all provincial activities (including primarily research and training) in the field of Aging." The Ontario proposal is still under study by the Select Committee and information about structure and relationships is, therefore, not yet available.

The intent in both instances, however, seems to be the same: to create an officially recognized agency, separate from existing government departments, which would provide leadership in all areas of need associated with aging and devote itself principally to the assistance it could give to other organizations rather than to activities conducted on its own.

The Committee recommends:

(91) That provincial governments accept responsibility for the establishment of appropriate bodies for the planning and coordination of programs for older people within their jurisdiction and, that in doing so consideration be given to the proposals contained in the Saskatchewan and Ontario reports.

[8] Report of Aged and Long Term Illness Committee, Province of Saskatchewan, 1963, Chapter 12.

At the National Level:

With reference to the activities of the Federal Government recommendations have already been made to the effect that each department and agency, carrying important responsibility in the field of Aging, should have special staff, and perhaps a special office, to give visibility and focus to the needs of older people. Specific mention in this connection has been made of the Department of National Health and Welfare, on both its health and welfare sides, the Department of Labour, in regard to employment opportunities for older people, and CMHC, in regard to housing. Action of the sort thus proposed is in our view a prerequisite of planning, but provision must also be made for an organizational structure that will ensure clearance and coordination among all departments that share in the multiplicity of activities for the aged carried on by the Federal Government. The device that naturally suggests itself here is that of an inter-departmental committee, the ground work for which has already been laid in the Interdepartmental Committee on the Older Worker that has been in existence since the early 1950's. Such a committee, with members appointed by all interested departments, could be very useful as a means of exchanging information and facilitating voluntary cooperation. Made up of equal partners and with only limited authority, it could not, however, be expected to carry major responsibility for overall planning and coordination.

To perform the latter functions the Senate Committee is of the view that a special planning body needs to be established at the national level similar to those proposed at the provincial level for Saskatchewan and Ontario in the reports referred to above. The principal features of such a body, which might be called the National Commission or Council on Aging, are embodied in the Recommendations below.

The Committee recommends:

(92) (a) That the federal government establish a national commission on aging for the purpose of giving leadership in all matters concerned with a fuller life for older people in Canada;

(b) That the functions to be performed by this commission include the following:

(i) to examine intensively and follow up the recommendations contained in this Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging,

(ii) to keep under review the needs and problems of older people and to develop recommendations on policy and program for dealing with them,

(iii) to develop close working relationships with federal government departments and agencies, national voluntary organizations, and provincial government planning bodies concerned with aging, to the end that planning and coordination may be achieved.

(iv) to serve as a clearing house for information on projects, studies and developments generally in the field of gerontology, and to publish a bulletin and other literature for the dissemination of this information,

(v) to provide technical and financial assistance in the area of program development and staff training on request to provinces, local communities, universities, and other organizations, to the extent this assistance is not provided already through existing programs,

(vi) to sponsor and cooperate with other agencies in conducting conferences, seminars, and training courses for workers in the field of aging;

(c) That, until the national council on social research, recommended in the previous chapter, is established, the commission, in addition to the above functions, carry responsibility for the conduct, collation and support of research in the field of gerontology;

(d) That the chairman and members of the commission be selected because of their status, experience and competence, in various aspects of the field of aging, and that they include, up to one-third of their number, representatives of federal departments and agencies that carry major responsibility for services and programs for old people;

(e) That the basic budget of the commission be furnished by the federal government but that the commission be enabled and encouraged to receive contributions from other public and private sources;

(f) That the commission report annually to parliament;

(g) That the commission have associated with it an advisory committee including in its membership representatives of provincial planning bodies, where such exist, voluntary agencies, and old people's own organizations for the purpose of reviewing the activities of the commission and advising on policy and program;

(h) And, finally, that the work of the commission be evaluated at the end of a five-year period and that consideration be given at that time to the advisability of linking it with a broader body on social planning for the population generally which, in our judgment, is required if a comprehensive and an integrated system of programs and services is to be developed.

PART II

THE COMMITTEE'S FINDINGS

CHAPTER 9

Economic Security in Old Age

Introduction

For the purposes of this chapter old age is thought of as commencing at 65 years, which is now the age beyond which most people are retired from regular gainful employment, but it must be borne in mind that the economic position of the aged, like their social situation and their health status, is largely determined by their past experience and activities; the young and middle aged are father to the old. How well off people are financially on reaching age 65 depends on their earning and employment record, particularly during the period immediately preceding retirement. This period, critical not only from the economic but also the social and health points of view, will be discussed further in the next chapter dealing with aging and employment.

The economic security of the aged has been the subject of discussion and enquiry by the Parliament of Canada since the turn of the Century. Legislative provision began in 1908, with the passage of the Government Annuities Act, which offered favourable terms to individuals wishing to save for retirement, but it was not until nineteen years later that the idea of government-provided pensions, albeit on a means test basis, was incorporated in the Old Age Pensions Act of 1927. There followed very shortly the Great Depression and it was the impact of this catastrophic experience, coupled later with the bold reconstruction aims arising out of World War II, that in Canada as elsewhere aroused widespread public concern over matters of economic insecurity. Two major outcomes were the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1940 and the Old Age Security and Old Age Assistance Acts of 1951. So far as the welfare of old people is concerned, the Old Age Security Act marked an important milestone. Flat rate pensions were now available as a matter of right to all persons at age 70 who could meet a Canadian residence requirement, set originally at twenty but reduced since to ten years.

It is interesting to observe that scarcely had the above legislation been placed on the books than political attention shifted to the advantages of the American approach to old age security which relates benefits to contributions by the beneficiary, rather than, as in Canada, merely to his residence in the country. The former program, it was felt, held out the possibility of "higher benefits to be paid covering a wider range of contingencies at an earlier age."[1] A result of the Government's interest in the contributory principle was the appointment of Professor Robert M. Clark to analyse and compare the old age programs of the two countries. Dr. Clark's exhaustive report was transmitted to the Government in February 1959 and proved an important factor in lifting the level of sophistication at which pension problems were discussed in both governmental and private circles.

The next notable initiative relating to financial security for old people was that taken by the Government of Ontario in appointing a Committee on Portable Pensions, which it did in April 1960. The Ontario Pensions Benefit Act of 1963, based on the recommendations of this Committee's report, contained two main provisions: the first requiring every employer, with fifteen or more employees in Ontario, to institute by January 1, 1965, at least a minimum pension plan, the benefits of which would be immediately vested in the employee; and the second, establishing basic conditions which all supplementary pension plans would be required to meet after January 1, 1965, relating to such matters as vesting, solvency and the investment of funds. With the introduction by the Federal Government of a proposal for a Canada-wide pension plan early in 1964, and subsequent discussions of this proposal with the Provinces prior to its adoption by Parliament in the Spring of 1965, the Ontario Government withdrew the first of the above provisions, but the second is now in effect and has prompted similar legislation in Quebec.

Economic and Social Issues

While enquiries and legislation like those referred to above have focused primarily on the micro-economic aspects of the problem of social security, in response to the needs of the individuals affected, the macro-economic effects of such programs have been the object of study and discussion by economists, government departments, and of late also by the Economic Council of Canada. The use of funds accumulated in a public pension plan has not only economic but also, in Canada, political and constitutional aspects. How are such funds to be invested and by whom, with what effects? Increasing attention is also being directed to the problem of priorities among the major demands for social action which have arisen in the fields of economic security, education and health services. Further, there is the question of designing economic security in old age in such a way that provision of income security is linked most effectively with that of essential services and facilities, such as health care and public housing.

In the view of the Senate Committee, the introduction of the Canada Pension Plan should be accompanied by intensive studies for the evaluation of both its micro-economic and macro-economic effects. We would urge that such studies commence before the Plan is in full operation in order that the changes may be observed from the beginning. Such studies might well be among the major tasks of the recommended National Council on Social Research.[2] It will be of particular interest to assess the impact of the Canada Pension Plan on personal savings and on the growth of private pension plans: while some expect the Plan to curtail interest in privately contracted pensions, there is considerable evidence that old age security actually stimulates new interest on the part of the public in providing supplementation to ensure a comfortable level of living in old age. The past accomplishments and the future role of pension plans in industry will have to be re-assessed in the light of the Canada Pension Plan and the most recent changes in the Old Age Security scheme. It should also be noted that the presence in Canada's population of a growing proportion, and certainly greater numbers, of older people will have an impact on the economy in a number of indirect ways. The spending and saving patterns of this group, whose members are largely retired from the labour force and often free from family responsibilities, will vary from that of the rest of the population. The degree of economic security and independence enjoyed by the aged will also influence spending and saving patterns of other groups in society, especially those who would be supporting the aged in the absence of social action.

In studying issues like the foregoing, it is clear that account must be taken also of the accepted values of our society and the implication of these for social policy. As has been pointed out already, sixty years ago all that was thought necessary in order to bring economic security to the aged in Canada was a scheme under which, if they so desired, people could purchase annuities at reasonable cost. Senator Cartwright, in opening the debate on the Government Annuities Bill in 1907, stated: "I doubt extremely the expediency of having recourse to a system of old age pensions, but I do believe there is a great opportunity for the state to avail itself of the machinery at its disposal for the purpose of placing within the grasp of every industrious man in Canada the opportunity, at an easy rate and at a very small cost to the state, of providing a reasonable annuity for his support at an advanced period of life."[3] Even, then, however there were dissenting voices. In the course of the debate, Senator Fergusson expressed this view: "It does seem to me that it would be necessary that all wage earners should be required to contribute, let it be ever so little. Only in that way can we bring under the operation of the law a large number of people, who, if left to themselves, would neglect to make the small contribution required."[4] There is, thus, an early record of the argument over voluntary and compulsory participation.

Regarding the function of government pensions and their amount, Dr. Clark found "widespread agreement that the Government of Canada should provide a basic minimum pension for the Aged."[5] "The basic minimum", he elaborates, "should be determined on the basis of a statistical study of the minimum amount necessary for subsistence."[6] In Clark's view "it follows from the principle of basing government pensions on the minimum of subsistence that pensioners should not have the value of their pensions eroded away by the winds of inflation."[7]

Another principle on which the amount of the government pension might be based is one that would provide the recipient, not merely with a minimum, but with "a fair share" of the national income. Some, who contend for benefits related more nearly to existing standards of living, as indicated by wages, as against subsistence allowances tied to the cost of living of marginal families, do so in light of the fact that continuing mass consumption is essential to the health of the economy. This approach raises a number of problems in its practical application. For one thing, such a method strictly applied would mean that the pension should follow the downs as well as the ups in the national economy. Above all, there is the conceptual difficulty of determining the person's proper share. What is the rightful share of an older, usually retired person? Should it be related to per capita consumer spending or to per capita earnings; and, in the latter event, should per capita earnings be calculated in terms of the total population or only of the working population? Would one assume that the retired person during his working life actually has contributed his full share to the economy? And how would his presumably reduced financial responsibilities affect the size of his share compared with that of people in other age groups? Would there have to be some provision for supplementing the pension in case of its drastic reduction through a slump in the economy?

It is acknowledged by the Government that the Canada Pension Plan "is not intended to provide all the retirement income or survivors' income which many Canadians wish to have."[8] The intention is to leave ample scope and initiative to the individual to supplement the government pension through personal savings and private pension plans.[9] Under the Canada Pension Plan, which will be entirely self-financing, the maximum benefit at the end of a ten year transition period will be 25 per cent of earnings related to an earnings ceiling of $5,000. Thus the monthly maximum pension in 1976 will be $104.17, subject to adjustment in line with changes in price and wage levels. The Act also provides protection to widows, dependent children and disabled persons, but again on a severely limited basis.

We have already emphasized the need to determine the present economic position of old people. Without this data, it is impossible to foresee the effects of the Canada Pension Plan, or of recent changes in the Old Age Security Act. More generally, unless steps are taken to ensure an adequate analysis of the problems of the aged, the effectiveness of any measure on their behalf, present or future, will not be known. This admonition applies not only to the economic position of the aged but to all other aspects of their place and function in our society. Lacking such information, we cannot hope to arrive at definite conclusions on policy matters but must be content, as we are compelled to be in the remainder of this chapter, with merely an exploratory discussion which may, however, raise questions and issues for future study.

The Present Economic Status of Old People

Only some very basic data are available on the economic aspects of aging in Canada. With their aid we shall try to review briefly the importance of the old people in the population, their income status, and the degree of heterogeneity of this social group that we refer to as the aged. We shall also examine so far as possible the sources from which their income is derived. Finally, we shall attempt to assess the needs of the old people and ask ourselves to what extent these needs are satisfied under present circumstances.

Old people constitute a comparatively small but increasing proportion of Canada's population. According to the projection by A. Stukel for the Royal Commission on Health Services, 7.92 per cent of the population may be over 65 by 1971, compared to the 7.62 per cent in 1961.

One will notice in the above table the relative increase expected in the number of females in the population particularly over 70, between 1961 and 1971. This is important in the light of the statements made in several briefs regarding the special vulnerability of older women to economic insecurity. On the other hand, the trend in the rates of participation in the labour force has been rising for older women, while it declined sharply for the older men in the last decade. Moreover, one should be very careful in interpreting data which do not distinguish between unattached women and married women dependent on their husbands.

Both males and females show a definite concentration in the lower income brackets:

We see that 38.5 per cent of males between 65 and 69 years of age had incomes below $1,500. For females in the same age group, the percentage is 85 per cent. The situation shows a general deterioration with increasing age. For males over 70, 60.6 per cent of the group received less than $1,500 in 1961, while 84.7 per cent of the females were in the same position, and the percentage of females with incomes of $3,000 and over is lower than that of males in the same income groups. Such findings would tend to support the thesis of those who contend that older females are at a significant disadvantage.

This, however, requires some qualification. A breakdown of males and females into single, married, and widowed and divorced shows clearly that the single female is not significantly worse off than the single male. As for married women, they are supported partially or completely by their husbands and their incomes in most instances are supplementary. Only in the case of the divorced and widowed people do we find clear cut evidence that the males are better off. Nevertheless, it should be noted that in the age group 65 and over only 20 per cent of the men are widowed whereas this is the condition of approximately one half of the women.

In the face of such a structure, crude measures of central tendency should be used with great care because they obscure the actual distribution. In Canada, the problem seems to be with widowed and divorced women and, therefore, the policy maker should pay particular attention to their needs. In 1961 there were 287,000 such women in the age group 65 and over.

The above table is difficult to interpret without more knowledge of the family situation. For instance, with regard to family income from employment, who are the wage earners and what portion of this income is earned or received by the family head? For unattached persons, the interpretation is easier. Here we see the significant difference in the contribution transfer payments make to income, as we pass from the younger to the older age group. We observe, also, the relative importance of employment income: over 40 per cent of the income of unattached persons between 65 and 69 comes from the labour market. This percentage drops by more than 50 per cent when we pass to the group aged 70 years and over.

A definite trend in the structure of the sources of income of the aged can be observed, if we compare the data from the Surveys of Consumer Finances for 1951 and 1961.

Table 8 does not give as detailed a picture of the age structure as Table 7 and, therefore, we are forced to deal with the two age groups (i.e., 65-69, and 70 and over) together although, as we have shown above, they have different characteristics. But even with this cruder classification, it is quite obvious that the role of government payments has increased significantly in the last decade. This is to be contrasted with the sharp decline in the relative importance of employment income, a circumstance which tends to support our concern over the labour market situation and policies in regard to the aged. If the trend toward a larger dependence on transfer payments is extrapolated, it becomes clear that the aged must depend more and more on some kind of retirement pension rather than on labour income.

Another feature of the last decade has been the relative decline in importance of investment income for the aged. This leads us to inquire into the distribution and the form of their assets since, without such information, it would be very difficult to assess the importance of this element as a source of economic security. Information about asset holdings in Canada is very inadequate, and no survey has been made since the late fifties. It is possible, however, to get a general idea of the trend by examining the position of the older citizens in 1955 and 1958.

It seems quite clear that the proportion of "old families" with liquid assets below $500 has been reduced in the 1955-58 period. The liquid assets position of the aged should, however, be examined within the context of a broad study of their total assets. Some such data may be available, at least for applicants granted Old Age Assistance in Canada.

We have pointed out the need for great caution in the use of measures of central tendency in the case of such a heterogeneous group as the aged in Canada. However, bearing this in mind, it might be helpful to present some figures, if for no other reason than to define in a fairly general way some orders of magnitude.

For families with head aged 65 and over, the average income in 1961 was of the order of $4,047 per year, and the median income of the order of $2,831. For persons in that age group not in families, the average income per year was $1,458, while the median income was $829 (or even lower).[10]

Since, as has been said, it is difficult to interpret the income of families without more knowledge of their composition, one might regard the median income of people not living in families as a good indicator of the sort of income that accrues to old people dependent on their own resources in Canada today. In doing so it needs also to be remembered, however, that there is a concentration in the distribution of income at $660, the pension income, and that the amount of the Old Age Security pension has risen since 1961 to $900.

The question is whether such incomes are sufficient for an older person or an older couple. The answer, obviously, is dependent on our definition of adequacy. The briefs submitted to the Committee contain long sections on the economic needs of the aged, but in most cases we are confronted with assumptions regarding priorities which are unsupported by scientific knowledge regarding the tastes and needs of the aged. This is a reflection of the lack of studies on minimum adequate income levels in this country. In fact, very few local surveys[11] are available to provide estimates of socially defined minima in a form which would allow the observer to specify explicitly in the particular case of older people.

The bureau of Labor Statistics of the U.S. has attempted to build a budget for an old couple in the United States which would assure this couple of a "modest but adequate" standard of living. It found that in 1959 the old couple would need not less than $2,500 per year, in an average large American city.[12] How can this be applied to various areas in Canada? One could attempt some deflation procedure in order to pull the figure down to a level appropriate for Canada. However, if we keep in mind that our old people have expectations which are definitely tied to North American standards and that a recent conservative estimate[13] of the minimum family budget for a family of two persons in Canada (no age specification) is as high as $2,190, we might be tempted to use a very weak deflator if any.

The fact is we do not possess any specific minimum budget for a typical Canadian retired couple, let alone one which recognizes and reflects the older generation's pattern of tastes and preferences. The only way to get information about priorities as perceived by the aged would be to launch a series of extensive surveys not confined to financial matters. In fact the economic condition of old people can be perceived precisely only if questions as to the exact nature of contacts with relatives or friends are also answered.[14] Such information is necessary if policy makers are to provide economic security for the aged in a way that would assure a maximum of satisfaction to the individual at a minimum material and social cost.

[14] Some of the important questions pertaining to these surveys have been discussed by Dorothy Cole in July 1957 at the Fourth Congress of the International Association of Gerontology.—See also P. Townsend, The Family of Old People. London 1957.

If we accept the figure of $1,700 as the minimum budget for a one-person family, as suggested by the Jenness reference above, and if we compare it with the average income of older unattached persons which is of the order of $1,458, or even more meaningfully with the median income of the people in this group, some $829, it seems clear that old people, who are dependent entirely on their own resources, are in no position to satisfy their basic needs. For families with the head over 65 years of age, no definite conclusion can be reached without more information about the structure of such families.

Priorities and Values

Earlier we have mentioned the need there is to assess income maintenance programs for the aged in the light of Canada's overall social and economic policies. Even in the area of social policy, having in mind the demand there is for increased financial support of education, health services, and social security, it may be necessary to determine priorities. Clearly there must be integration in planning for the economic foundation of these various programs. Whether, in view of Canada's sound economic position and future prospects, the problem is really one of priorities would have to be determined in the light of the cost, particularly the net additional cost, of the programs in question related to the present and anticipated capacity of the economy.

It may well be that the net extra cost of these programs can be absorbed without establishing priorities in chronological terms and that the decision, therefore, would be one of degree within each program rather than of priorities between programs.

In any case, decisions about priority will require an appraisal of the values our society assigns to its various objectives and activities, in addition to the difficult enough distinction in the economic sphere between investment and consumption. This latter concept is by no means clear cut in its application. Neither health nor education, for instance, can be regarded solely as an investment in human capital in the economic sense: both include a strong element of satisfaction and utility to the individual. Education services, for example, are consumed by some individuals simply because of the satisfaction to be derived from acquiring knowledge, whether or not they actually apply it on a job. It should be remembered that the very objective of economic endeavour is to achieve a maximum of well-being for people and that considerations of economic investment must not be the only ones taken into account.

How a scale of social values is going to be obtained and agreed upon is not easy to foresee, particularly in the complex and intricate framework of Canada's political, social and constitutional machinery. It would probably have to come as a result of the interplay of many forces rather than through deliberate action by a Council of Social Values as proposed by Alvin Hansen.[15] It must also be recognized that social attitudes and values are as dynamic as society itself and its institutions, and are, therefore, subject to change.

In 1960, a study of American attitudes toward responsibility for the aged showed that in 20 per cent of the cases people believed that relatives should have the sole responsibility and that in 30 per cent the belief was they should have primary responsibility. Only 9 per cent of the respondents felt that relatives and the government should share the burden, while 6 per sent gave primary responsibility to the government and 21 per cent gave the government the sole responsibility.[16]

Two factors, however, might affect drastically the corresponding social preferences of Canadians, and indeed of Americans, over the next decade. First, the recent campaign against poverty in Canada and in the United States has focused public attention on the peculiarities of income distribution in North America. Whether the impact of such a campaign will be important enough to shift income redistribution from a secondary to a primary position among our social goals remains unknown for the moment, but it is not completely utopian to think it might, especially since many people are coming to realize that "poverty is expensive to maintain".[17] Secondly, other studies done in the United States have revealed that the attitudes of people toward the responsibility of government in the maintenance and assurance of economic security for the aged, or for any other handicapped group, is related, with a time lag, to the amount of money paid out by the government in the region. Thus, we might be faced with a certain feed-back effect, resulting in a shift of attitude.[18] Finally, there is the consideration, pointed out earlier, that purchasing power spread broadly throughout the population provides an assurance of mass consumption on which continuing prosperity depends.

Basically, there are two schools of thought about the means to achieve economic security and conditions of social welfare for the aged or any other group, within the framework of the existing economic order.[19] On the one hand, there is the group, best described as individualists, who resist the enlargement of the social services as likely to weaken the moral fibre, and consequently the productive capacity, of the nation. Members of this group would limit the responsibility of the state in welfare matters to that of caring for the small fringe of people who are utterly unable to provide for themselves, even with the help available from the voluntary agencies. On the other hand, there are those who lay stress on what Churchill called "the collective functions of society". While appreciating the advantages of a private enterprise economy, they are keenly aware of the social problems generated by its operations. Since, in their view, these problems cannot be solved by the system itself and are, moreover, of a magnitude beyond the capacity of private individuals and groups to deal with alone, the case for state intervention seems to them to be clear. Not only must economic activity be subject to some regulation, but social legislation and social services must be accepted as indispensable in the interests of human well-being. It may be considered that the first of these two schools, the inheritors of the laissez faire tradition dominant in the 19th Century, carries less influence today than it did formerly, and to an extent that is true. However, its importance has revived recently, in view of the alleged emergence of the "Affluent Society". Marshall draws attention to signs of this revival in England where he says: "It is argued that amid so much affluence poverty can only be an exceptional phenomenon, and that now it really is possible for all but a few to win for themselves all the amenities of a civilized existence".[20]

Nonetheless, it is probably fair to conclude that the development of social and economic thought throughout the 20th Century has brought these two groups closer together. Both now would appear to agree that there is a responsibility on the state to seek at least the reduction of insecurity within the limits imposed by the resources and general state of the economy. The real differences are about the extent of the responsibility and the appropriate means of carrying it out, but even here they find some common ground.

One observes, for example, more than a little convergence in the techniques accepted to ensure economic security. While the "individualist" would prefer to rely mainly on voluntary insurance, obtained through private carriers and supplemented by public assistance for the destitute and helpless, he is ready to settle for a state-operated insurance scheme, when no government subsidy is involved. Similarly, although "the collectivist" believes in government subsidy, on the ground that this is the only way for social aims to be given effect, he is prepared to accept a state-operated scheme, financed altogether through premiums, if the experts agree that this is an effective way of meeting the need.

There are questions about all of these various techniques which leave one uncertain about what form the provision of economic security will finally take. As has been amply documented, private voluntary insurance has failed to yield the desired results, even in relatively prosperous countries like the United States. On the other hand, those who wish to see the individual's sense of responsibility retained, raise strong objection to anything but a minimum use of government subsidies. Finally, if on the face of it social insurance would seem to be most acceptable to all concerned, this approach has been criticised on the ground that it has a tendency to develop, over time, into a mixture of compulsory self-insurance and public subsidy in which it is impossible to separate one component from the other.

Considerations for Future Policy

It is reported that in 1911 when Lloyd George was in the middle of preparing his Health Insurance Bill he made the following jotting on a piece of paper: "Insurance necessarily temporary expedient. At no distant date hope state will acknowledge full responsibility in the matter of making provision for sickness, breakdown and unemployment".[21]—and he might have added old age. This suggests the notion of a socially determined floor of protection which society at some point may be willing to guarantee to all its members. Even if this is still only a notion, which has yet to be clearly articulated, let alone accepted by responsible planners, it contains the germ of an idea which could revolutionize many of our current programmes and other arrangements for the provision of economic security.

There is no opportunity here to pursue this line of thought with any thoroughness, but it might be useful to explore it a little with particular reference to the needs of the aged. The cash income of older people, as we have seen earlier, comes mainly from government payments, employment, and investment. Further, trends suggest that the relative importance of all non-government sources of cash income has been declining, which is making government payments the chief, if not the sole, source of income for many of them. The question is whether it is possible to establish or find a consensus of opinion about the magnitude of public subsidy which, given existing institutional arrangements[22], would guarantee an adequate, if modest, standard of living for older people.

Many organizations, in briefs presented to the Committee, gave their ideas on this subject. The United Senior Citizens of Ontario Inc. stated that the old age security benefit should be $100 a month, while the Canadian Institute for the Blind Acquaintance Club asked for an increase to $125. The Montreal Council of Social Agencies suggested $1,260 a year as the minimum income required for an older individual and $2,100 for an older couple, but the Ontario Welfare Council felt that $80 to $95 for an individual and $135 to $149 for a couple would be sufficient. An older citizen, Mrs. S., stated before the Committee that nothing less than $100 a month would do, and that $125 per month would permit one to live comfortably.[23]

It goes without saying that these various groups attached somewhat different meanings to the concept of an adequate standard of living and also that on the basis of their experience the assumptions they make about the availability of supporting institutional arrangements were not always the same. However, if in order to be on

[22] By this proviso, "given existing institutional arrangements", we simply mean that the claims on resources which the aged now have in our system would be preserved; for instance, like other Canadians, old people are now receiving hospital care and other services; we assume that such claims on existing resources would remain effective.

[23] For references see the Brief for each of these organizations; Mrs. S. is one of the five senior citizens who came to testify before the Committee on Nov. 7, 1963.

the safe side we accept the maximum estimate put forward, the figure we arrive at for a minimum cash income from all sources is $125 per person per month, subject necessarily to adjustment periodically on the basis of a cost of living index.

It is not possible with the information available to calculate with any accuracy what such a guarantee would cost. Assuming that it would be given to all persons aged 65 and over, and that 40 per cent of this group, some 560,000 people, would need supplementation for an average amount of $400 per year, we come out with a figure of roughly $225,000,000, which represents between 25 and 30 per cent of what the government paid out in old age security pensions during the fiscal year 1963-1964. However, this amount is not altogether an additional outlay. There were also federal-provincial expenditures on Old Age Assistance in 1963-1964, totalling close to $80,000,000 and under the new Canada Assistance Plan, if it fulfils its promise, expenditures might well be expected to rise sharply above this figure, What we appear to be talking about, therefore, is a new expenditure of something in the order of $100,000,000, and even this amount would likely decline within a few years as benefits from the Canada Pension Plan become available, and also as the recent action by Parliament in lowering to 65 the age for old age security pensions makes itself felt.

The question is whether Canadians would be willing to divert sufficient of their resources to make this kind of adjustment possible. We recall the statement contained in the brief of the Saskatoon Welfare Council. "Our senior citizens", reads this submission, "who have founded and built this country have earned the right to a fair share in our affluent society". If one were willing to accept such a proposition as is here put forward, the $125 per month per older person guarantee could easily be rationalized, since it would represent a minimum cash income of $1500 per year for every old person in a country where the personal income per capita for the period 1959-1963 has been of the order of $1763. Whether such an amount represents what might be considered "a fair share" of the national income remains hypothetical.

There are regional differences in the level of personal income per capita, and significant differences also in the cost of living between regions across the country. This might raise the question of the equity of a uniform income guarantee, as providing equal treatment of equals. Such a policy would render older citizens better off relatively in the provinces which have a personal income per head below the national average, i.e., in the provinces that are in a position to do least for their aged. On the other hand, it would discriminate against older people living in the richer provinces, but these provinces, presumably, are in a position to make good the discrepancy, one way or another, if they wish to do so.

In the above discussion we have concentrated on the claim of the aged to a certain level of cash income, and in doing so have left out of account the variety of goods and services, as for example in the areas of health and housing, which may and do play an important part in ensuring their economic security. This problem of the total structure of the supply of economic security is a very complex one, as we have tried to indicate throughout. What is the appropriate balance between money income and the provision of services? What is the attitude of older people to one as against the other of these two approaches, and with regard to cash income, what degree of resistance do they feel to a means or needs test? How is responsibility for services to be most efficiently distributed between the public and private sectors, and among the various levels of government? These are only a few of the specific questions, the answers to which must await more precise information and a greater variety of expert studies than have yet been made. Finally, there is the problem of intermeshing social and general economic policies. This consideration may not have been important earlier, when welfare programmes were relatively small and subsidiary operations, but it cannot be disregarded today in a society which has assumed major responsibility for the well-being of its citizens and is prepared to devote a substantial amount of its resources to the fuller realization of this objective.

In a recent paper Titmuss[24] referred to the "iceberg phenomenon" in social welfare planning: the preoccupation there often is with the visible aspects of poverty, such as low income and lack of services, to the neglect of less easily detected agents of insecurity and inequality, such as the effects of the tax system, the way government subsidies operate, inflationary pressures and the like. In an analogous manner we have dealt in this Chapter with only a limited segment of economic security, omitting much above and below the water-line, and even in regard to this segment have confined ourselves mainly to an enumeration of issues that have yet to be resolved.

It would be defeatist, however, to conclude that nothing can be done for old people in the matter of income until all the facts are in. Already, as is clearly apparent, considerable that is constructive has been accomplished, including most recently the institution of the Canada Pension Plan and the lowering of the age of eligibility for Old Age Security. Together, these measures will do much to improve the lot of older people retiring in the future. The challenge is to match these achievements with comparable provision for the aged already retired, many of whom, as our analysis has shown, are in serious economic need. Our proposal which we believe Canadians generally would support, is a new program which, without resort to a needs test, would guarantee to this disadvantaged group a cash income sufficient to ensure a modest standard of living. The recommendation in detail is set out in Chapter 2 of this Report, and it is our hope that it will receive early and favourable consideration by the Government.

Aging and Employment

In the preceding chapter we argued that economic security for the aged was a primary social responsibility. Furthermore, we have seen that for those beyond the normal retirement age of 65 years, economic security cannot depend to a large extent upon employment. We believe, however, that general social and economic policy should extend beyond the provision of pensions to those over age 65 to include opportunity for employment to all age groups. It is also our view that, even if economic security provisions for the aged were adequate, the problem of aging and employment merits close attention.

This view is substantiated by submissions received by the Committee, indicating that the problems of aging in Canada do not arise suddenly at age 65 but begin to make themselves apparent at ages as early as 45, or even earlier. While in purely economic terms it might be difficult to justify the effort of finding suitable employment for those over 65 and the expense of fitting these people for employment, there are good grounds for arguing that the costs of manpower policy for the whole labour force, including the aged, can be more than outweighed by gains to the economy as a whole.

In this chapter we shall, therefore, consider the problem of aging and employment from two points of view: that of employment and the general economy; and that of employment and the aging worker.

The General Context

Since the 1930's the spectre of mass unemployment has influenced Canadian economic thought. Admittedly, the great depression of the 1930's, and the deep economic and psychological wounds it inflicted on a whole generation of Canadians have, to a large extent, faded from memory. But unemployment has remained a problem of grave concern. Despite generally stated objectives and various insufficiently co-ordinated government efforts, unemployment has persisted, reaching high levels in recent years.

This has particularly serious implications for the aging since it was well established in testimony before the Committee that the very young and the older groups in our labour force suffer most in periods of unemployment.

Clearly, no policy for employing the aging can expect much success without an effective programme for a high level of general employment. It is essential, therefore, as a first step, to give consideration to Canada's efforts and performance in attacking the problem of general unemployment. This was stressed time and again by witnesses. For example, the Canadian Welfare Council argued that "a high level of employment particularly in the crucial age from 40 to 60 is the first line of defense against the inability of people to provide for their own economic needs in old age"[1]: and further that "the ultimate objective of all Canada's manpower policies should be to ensure that every Canadian has the opportunity to engage in productive employment to the full extent of his or her needs, capacities, skills and potentialities."[2]

Recently the Economic Council of Canada provided the following definition of a tolerable level of unemployment: "In the light of careful studies, we have concluded that a 97 per cent rate of employment, or a 3 per cent rate of unemployment of the labour force would constitute a realistic objective to be aimed at over the balance of the 1960's."[3] And yet our unemployment rates have been above 3 per cent since the early 1950's and substantially above 5 per cent from 1957 to 1963.

The economic cost of this unemployment has been significant. A recent estimate by Prof. G. L. Reuber suggests that the potential full-employment level of the private sector of the economy (Gross Domestic Product) in 1961 was at least 12 per cent or between four and five billion dollars greater than the actual level experienced. The average gain in private output would be some 4 to 5 per cent for each 1 per cent reduction in the percentage of the labour force unemployed, up to the point of full employment.[4]

A substantial portion of the loss experienced is due not just to lower levels of employment but to the underemployment of those with jobs. The Economic Council of Canada has noted that between 1946-56, output per person employed rose 3.2 per cent per annum. Between 1956-63 it rose 1.0 per cent per annum.[5] In other words, the farther we are from full employment the less those already employed will produce. As we move toward full employment, we gain not just the production of workers coming into employment but also the increased production of those already employed.

The Committee is impressed with the argument that the fundamental factor at work in recent years has been insufficient aggregate demand leading to a high rate of unemployment and to the underemployment of those employed. However, it has been argued, and in fact reflected in policy, that to push levels of employment too high would result in price inflation. This has been a dominant influence in national economic policy for some time now. The Economic Council assumes a balance between prices and employment when prices are rising at 2 per cent per year and employment is at 97 per cent of the labour force, i.e., when unemployment is at a level of 3 per cent. In these terms, therefore, Canada could "afford" a level of employment approximating 97 per cent.

Apart from inadequate demand, it has also been asserted that unemployment in Canada has to do with labour market structure—regional problems, insufficient mobility of labour, inadequate or inappropriate labour skills, and so on. This has influenced the shape and emphasis of manpower policy. But here again recent evidence suggests either over-emphasis of the structural explanation or insufficient attention to a more balanced approach. Prof. Pierre-Paul Proulx of McGill has looked at the relationship between kinds of structural unemployment and general unemployment.[6] His results indicate that changes in the structural elements of employment are not significantly different from changes in employment as a whole. In their analysis of post-war unemployment, F. Denton and S. Ostry conclude that one may detect a sign here or there of a possible growth in the structural problem, though the overall impression is that the structuralist argument has received no strong positive support. It would appear, they maintain, that most of the increase in "residual unemployment in the latter 1950's and early 1960's was caused by growing slack in the economy, i.e., a growth of demand-deficient unemployment.[7] The evidence suggests that little will be achieved by a programme which is limited to attacking regional unemployment or age-group unemployment, without a general national employment policy attacking demand-deficiency problems. In summary, we can note at this point that the problem of employing the aging and aged cannot be resolved when the nation is in a position of high or even moderate unemployment. We can also note that national policy in recent years has provided limited scope for an employment framework within which we can grapple with aging problems. That such a framework is becoming more urgent is vividly illustrated by the labour supply forecasts of the Economic Council of Canada, which indicate a rapidly growing labour force.

We now turn our attention to the more limited sphere of the aging part of our work force in order to explore its employment characteristics. Granted that the essential condition is national full employment, the actual achievement of productive and rewarding employment requires other kinds of considerations and policies. In national economic terms, the question is how we can increase the economic contribution of the aging group, given its characteristics. In terms of the people involved, the question is how they can satisfy their employment goals—whether these be economic, social, or pyschological.

The Critical Years

One difficult question which arises is how we should define the aging worker. Public pensions are available at age 70 and will shortly be available at age 65. These would be convenient age limits for our study of employment. Yet at this age level the entire issue of employment diminishes since one could argue, as we have, in favour of economic security for this age group without specifying income from employment. It was brought forcibly to our attention, however, that the aging-unemployment relationship begins much earlier and assumes major proportions in the 45 to 60 age period. In real terms, therefore, consideration of the problem requires much longer time perspectives than those suggested by other criteria for aging. Unemployment for the aging begins before 45 and not at 65 or 70. "In terms of employment opportunities a worker is old at 45. In terms of normal retirement, he is old at 65—in terms of old age security, he is old at 70." [8]

The data for males indicate a "breaking point" in the 45-54 age interval. The same breaking point has occurred each year since 1950. Although exaggerated reliance cannot be placed on these data, it can be concluded from them that the relationship between aging and unemployment shows up long before age 65.

The lower unemployment rate after age 65 is explained largely by the withdrawal of this age group from the labour market. Such withdrawal is undoubtedly influenced by the unemployment experience of the people involved. Department of Labour data were revealing on this point.

Thus, higher unemployment rates and longer duration of unemployment are both characteristic of the worker 45 years of age and over.

Additional relevant evidence on the critical years was provided by the National Employment Service.[10] In an analysis of vacancies it was found that almost 100 per cent were closed to workers over 65 years of age; 97.6 per cent to those over 55; 88.4 per cent to those over 45; and 43.6 per cent to those over 35. In terms of actual placement experience in 1959-60, 27.6 per cent of the applicants were 45 and over, but this age group represented only 12.3 per cent of total placements.

This kind of information provided the Committee with ample evidence that the problem must be viewed in a time dimension which begins in early middle age. Professor John Morgan of the University of Toronto noted that continuous unemployment from 45 will make an "unhappy, insecure and damaged person before he becomes 65".[11] Other submissions noted that repeated frustration in attempting to secure employment beyond 45 will itself reduce the individual's ability to secure employment.

In defining the critical years, it is useful to identify the age-related factors which affect the worker's competitive position in the labour market, a position which becomes critical during conditions of less than full general employment.

Certain basic characteristics associated with particular age groups are involved in an evaluation of the competitive position of the aging worker. Education is one such factor, and it was raised most frequently before the Committee. In general the aging are less well educated than younger workers; which establishes a serious employment disability, particularly for higher skilled, higher income opportunities. This is related partly to improvements in education over time and partly to the termination of the educational process at particular age levels. Associated with age and a lower educational base is the whole question of learning ability which, in turn, is related to mental capacity, motivation, and a number of other social and psychological factors. A second characteristic of aging workers is geographical immobility arising from family composition, home ownership and community relations, all of which tend to grow in importance with aging. Thirdly, there are health factors associated with aging which affect mobility and adaptability.

The Critical Industries and Occupations

The competitive position of the aging worker in the labour market is influenced greatly by his ability to adjust to employment opportunities. These have undergone substantial change in recent years, and continued change related to industries, occupations, and locations is expected in the future. One of the general shifts has been from goods-producing to service-producing industries. The Economic Council of Canada reports that between 1946 and 1963, employment in goods-producing industries rose by something less than 3 per cent. During the same period employment in service-producing industries rose by 87 per cent.[12] The Council estimates, however, that between 1963 and 1970 employment in service industries will increase by 75 per cent while employment in goods-producing industries will increase by as much as 25 per cent. Yet, even if the older workers were initially distributed, industrially and occupationally as are workers on the whole, they would need to be equally mobile to adjust to rapidly changing labour allocations. Under such conditions, the aging worker would not be disadvantaged.

There is some evidence that the older worker tends to be concentrated in declining industries and low-paid occupations and is finding it difficult to shift. The evidence, however, is not conclusive.

Table 12.—Relative Distribution of Male Workers by Occupational Group and Age 1961

Occupational Group	Total	45 and over	65 and over
Managerial	9.6	13.4	12.5
Service	8.5	8.6	13.4

Manufacturing	18.4	17.7	10.8
Clerical	6.7	5.6	6.0

SOURCE: Department of Labour loc. cit., p. 14.

Table 12 shows the very heavy concentration of workers 65 and over in agriculture and a more than proportional concentration in managerial and service occupations. For the 45 and over group a similar, but somewhat less extreme, pattern obtains.

Concentration in agriculture implies participation in an industry which provides fewer and fewer opportunities for employment. Although there is considerable outward mobility from agriculture, the shift for aging and aged workers is difficult, since it involves both a significant change in skill requirements and a change between rural and urban environment. To the extent that older workers are concentrated in agriculture, they are faced with severe adjustment problems. If they stay in agriculture, the chances are that they will be underemployed and their living standards economically depressed.

The remaining evidence is less clear. Employment in service industries has grown enormously and this would appear to present opportunities for older workers who appear relatively well entrenched; but little is known of the kinds of employment found by older workers, in this broad field. Denton and Ostry[13] have noted, however, that in recent years, despite the rise in importance of trade and service industries, the rate of unemployment in these industries was relatively high. In manufacturing and construction, which are affected most by automation and which are "under-represented" by older workers, the rates of unemployment are relatively low.

All of this indicates that better data and sharper analysis with a focus on the older worker is necessary. However, it would appear that older workers are concentrated in declining industries and unstable occupations some of which are regionally concentrated. Older workers also appear to be concentrated in occupations the skills of which are not readily adaptable to alternative growth sectors of the economy.

Some Revelant Trends

So far we have attempted to identify the general nature of the problem and its age and labour market characteristics. It will be useful now to sketch developing trends with respect to labour supply and demand as additional background for a consideration of possible policy. The following population projections have been made recently by the Economic Council of Canada:

Table 13.—Changes in Population by Selected Age Groups 1963 to 1970

Age Group	Change

0–14	+11.5
15–19	+28.2

65 and over	+13.5

SOURCE: First Annual Review, Economic Council of Canada. p. 59.

[13] Denton and Ostry, op. cit., pp. 14-15.

The most striking feature of the projection is the large increase in the combined 15-29 age group, which will exert considerable pressure on employment opportunities. But the Group 40 and older will also grow substantially.

The Department of Labour projects the composition of the labour force as follows:

Table 14.—Percentage Age Distribution of Labour Force by Sex 1961, 1971—[14]

Males	1961	1971
14–19	7.4%	7.6%

SOURCE: Proceedings, p. 971.

Aging workers are expected to constitute a larger proportion of the labour force in the next ten years, both males and females. Although a relative decline in the 25-44 age group is indicated, its effect on the competitive position of the older worker will be offset by the increase in the 20-24 age group and the over-all challenge to employment posed by the general increase in the labour force. The Economic Council warns that we will need to find 1,500,000 new jobs between 1963-70. On balance, therefore, there is little prospect of a quantitative reduction in the problem of employment for older workers.

An analysis of participation rates throws further light on the employment prospects of older people. These rates reflect the relationship between the labour force and the whole population 14 years of age and over. Within the population, some individuals for a variety of reasons do not participate as either employed or unemployed. Young people 14 years of age and over may not participate because they are at school, while many aged workers retire and so do not participate.

In general, participation rates for men[15] are relatively low for the 14-19 age group and high for the 20-54 age group. Somewhere between 45 and 54 the rates begin to decline and are significantly lower in the 55-64 age group. Finally there is a drastic decline at age 65 and over. These differences have held historically, in very general terms, but some significant trends have developed amongst older men. These are shown below:

[14] Department of Labour, op. cit., p. 971.
[15] For data see Department of Labour, op. cit., p. 953.

Table 15.—Labour Force Participation Rates—Males 65 and over by Selected Years 1950-63

SOURCE: Proceedings, p. 953.

The observed decline in participation of older men reflects, to some extent, a reduction in their need to work. Presumably, an operating factor is economic security derived increasingly from sources other than employment. As noted previously, however, an undefined portion of withdrawal from the labour force may well be due to a persistent and discouraging lack of employment.

In contrast with those for males, participation rates for females have increased sharply in the past thirteen years; rates in the 45-54 and 55-64 age groups have doubled and, although the percentages are small, they have increased in the 65 and over age group as well. Undoubtedly, the main factor has been the increase in the service occupations.

On the demand side the Economic Council of Canada has laid down a bold challenge to the people of Canada: "In order to achieve our employment potential of 97 per cent employment by 1970, the economy must achieve a sufficiently large rise in employment to absorb not only the very large expansion in the labour force . . . . but also a substantial proportion of existing unemployment."[16]

The Council's report provides some projections relevant to the Committee's task. With regard to employment, the Council projects, from 1963 to 1970, an average annual increase in total employment of 3.0 per cent. It projects a yearly decline of 2.3 per cent in agricultural employment and a rise of 3.5 per cent in non-agricultural employment. The latter includes a rise of 4.8 per cent in employment in public and community services and a rise of 3.2 per cent in commercial employment.[17] All of these changes are in terms of annual averages, and, unfortunately, the categories are rather gross. In any case we do not have data for age distributions. We have, however, noted that there is a concentration of the aged in agriculture; and, according to Economic Council projections, there will be shrinking opportunities for employment in this industry and, perhaps, expanding opportunities in service industries. In its review of primary industries, the Economic Council projects declining labour input in these industries generally, stressing the importance of improved technology. Thus we can anticipate not only changes in the allocation of labour among broad industrial categories, but also a continuation of improvements in technology. The relevant general consideration is reduced labour input per unit of output. The relevant labour force requirements are technical adaptability to the potentials of improved technology. The existing and impending challenges to society are: the ability to generate and maintain demand; to provide a basis for labour force mobility—industrially, occupationally and geographically; and to develop equality of employment opportunities. For the aging worker we can expect continued confrontation by new skills, strong competition for employment in changing occupations and possibly changed locations of industry.

Some Social and Economic Consequences

We have presented to this point a review of the employment status and problems of older people and the implications of current trends. Before launching into a discussion of policy possibilities, it will be useful to state briefly some social and economic consequences of unemployment among the older workers and some broad policy objectives:

1. In a society geared to industrial production, work and lack of work represent social values, and the social position of a person deteriorates when he is unemployed. Any employment represents a status superior to unemployment, unless the lack of employment amounts to a socially acceptable retirement. Even leisure, which is now increasing, enjoys higher prestige when it is related to employment and is reflected in shorter work weeks than when it is the result of permanent withdrawal from work.

2. Working and its derived income have important psychological as well as material implications for the individual older worker and his family. In the words of the National Council of Women, one of the basic needs of all adults is "a productive occupation for gain or pride of accomplishment."[18] The Jewish Vocational Service said that "to deprive a man of the opportunity to work is to undermine the basic rationale of his life."[19] Unemployment erodes and undermines people and communities.

3. National economic consequences posed by a condition of unemployment among older workers is of two sorts. First, unemployment may reduce national output. Professor Reuber's estimates of losses have already been presented. The heavy incidence of unemployment among aging workers contributes to this loss. Second, these losses are increased because of underemployment among older workers. This underemployment occurs in such industries as agriculture, where older workers tend to concentrate.

4. Our society cannot be judged as one which has given full consideraton to the situation of the older worker in the labor market. For example, the Committee reviewed much evidence relating to age-discrimination practices among employers. To some extent these practices are due to the cost and regulations connected with employer pension plans, but more often to insufficient awareness on the part of the employer of the productive contribution which the older worker can make.

5. The committee suggests as relevant policy objectives the following:

a) Employment opportunities, even beyond age 65, for those who wish to work and an equitable sharing of employment opportunities.

b) Full use of our productive resources, leading to full employment.

c) Planned measures to offset the employment effects of major technological changes and measures to facilitate occupational, geographic and industrial mobility.

The fundamental policy requirement is a buoyant, fully employed economy. Even apart from the aging worker, this policy must be implemented if we are to cope with our rapidly expanding labour force. No substantial improvements in employment can be anticipated for the aging worker unless the general level of unemployment is reduced. Simply improving the competitive position of the aging worker will only tend to shift the problem to another age category.

The Committee cannot comment in detail on the precise policy measures required. Clearly, such policies will have to be shaped by the appropriate public and private bodies, but in this process the responsibility of the federal government is very great.

The major technique on the aggregate demand side is an expansionary use of monetary and fiscal tools, unhampered by some of the inconsistent and erroneous concepts of employment, price stability, and national production which have been influential in our recent history. The major technique on the labour supply side is a set of programmes designed to increase the adaptability of the labour force. Canada must face the necessity for a clear statement of national objectives and the need to provide federal government policies for their planning and implementation.

Matching Demand and Supply for Labour

The Canadian economy and its industrial structure are undergoing rapid change, and this is expected to continue. Under such conditions, even with high effective aggregate demand, unemployment and its consequences may result because of mismatching of the demand for labour and its supply. We have seen that the aging worker appears least able to adjust to the process of change. Our manpower policy has attempted to cope with this situation but with only limited success. Apart from the difficulties created by a high level of unemployment, a major problem lies in insufficient attention being paid to analysing, forecasting and planning demand. Canada has mounted programmes on the labour supply side but without sufficient precise knowledge of labour demand.

It is of vital importance to have a balanced regard for both sides of the market and to devise procedures and institutions to co-ordinate manpower policies. This becomes difficult as full employment is approached and as structural shifts become significant. The disadvantageous position of the aging worker makes all of these considerations imperative. As a general policy, Canada should make a consciously planned effort to gear demand and supply, thereby greatly reducing the risk of dislocation and discontinuity of employment and production.

Manpower Policy

The broader aspects of policy just reviewed should be considered prior requirements to manpower policy. Our manpower policy consists of a number of elements, including the general placement function of the National Employment Service and the range of programmes carried out under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act of 1960.

A review of the structure, functions, and achievements of the National Employment Service is contained in the First Annual Review of the Economic Council. The Council underlined the organizational and functional limits surrounding the National Employment Service and suggested an expanded role for this agency as a key institution in an integrated manpower policy. The Committee subscribes to the need for a comprehensive federal employment policy and for the integration of activities in a single federal agency.

The programmes under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act have met with mixed success. There are problems in developing consistency across Canada and further problems resulting from lack of co-ordination between the various provincial departments and municipal agencies involved.

One set of programmes provides for training of employed persons and those about to enter employment. In general, the programme has failed to attract participants, indicating substantial problems in attracting adults to a programme for developing new skills.

Programme 5 of the scheme is central to our concern, since it is intended to provide training for the unemployed. Federal support for meeting costs of the programme and allowances for trainees is generous. An initial problem has been the reluctance of provinces to commit themselves to their relatively small proportion of financial support. The programme has also failed to attract participation. Not only has enrolment been low, but dropouts have equalled completions. It is apparent that retraining of the unemployed has made very modest progress. Underlying this limited progress is the absence of known employment opportunities, so that there is little information on job possibilities for trainees. In addition, the programme lacks adequate provision for compensation. Allowances are not paid in some provinces and are only minimal in some others. The chief difficulty in educational terms is the lack of basic education of most of the trainees.[20]

The Committee regards the following as essential characteristics for an effective attack on the manpower aspects of increasing employment opportunities for the aging worker:

1. Continued attention to the problem at national and provincial levels. The problems surrounding manpower policy are extensive and complex. It would be useful to integrate and co-ordinate government study and action through the National Employment Service and its local offices throughout the country. This agency should be responsible for analysing basic demand and supply conditions and should develop programmes to facilitate the adjustment and mobility of workers. The federal Department of Labour should undertake, promote, and finance comprehensive research into aging and employment.[21]

[20] Pierre-Paul Proulx, loc. cit., p. 69.

[21] Note should be taken of a recent White House announcement (N. Y. Times, Aug. 28, 1965) regarding a new American government program to train and use older people, aged 60 and over, as "substitute parents" for children in institutions, as home health aides, and in other similar capacities. The program in its first stage will be financed by an anti-poverty appropriation of $41 million and is expected to provide employment for 18,200 older people. Employees will be paid a minimum of $1.25 an hour and will work four hours a day, five days a week.

2. Financial assistance to unemployed employables should be increased and extended. The main elements of assistance in training and the provision of living and moving allowances and loans are now part of policy but the incentive levels are inadequate.

3. A more realistic approach should be taken toward education itself. Training should be based not only on the skills required but on the characteristics of the trainees themselves. In this context the submission of the Canadian Association for Adult Education is most suggestive. The Association proposed a general approach to education based on a process of continuous learning.[22] This is a most attractive proposal and would have important implications in the long run for our aging population, and for society generally. Of immediate importance is an adjustment in our current training process to suit the qualities and background of the trainees, not only to provide better results but to attract more students and reduce dropouts.

Health Services and Institutional Care

Introduction

Most older Canadians are in reasonably good health. To overlook this, and to stress only the diseases and disabilities of later life is to develop a stereotype of pessimism and hopelessness which is not warranted. Actually the onset of a number of chronic diseases can be prevented or postponed, treatment if instituted early can bring many other conditions under control, and rehabilitation energetically applied can prevent many of the deformities and disabilities of old age (see Appendix I). These facts need more emphasis in the education and orientation of the healing and helping professions today, in view of the increasing proportion of older people among patients seen in doctors' offices, clinics, hospitals, and in home care situations.

It may be true, as was pointed out by the Canadian Medical Association, that "while there are diseases among the aged, there are no special diseases of the aged".[1] It is certainly true that aging and chronic disease are not synonymous; indeed, American statistics show that one-quarter of those suffering from chronic illness are under forty-five years of age.[2] However, there are some notable differences at older ages: the proportion of those suffering from chronic diseases is much higher than in the rest of the population; often there is a multiplicity of conditions; and symptoms and signs when they occur, tend to come on insiduously. For these reasons, among others, there have developed specialists in the care of the aged. These specialists include doctors, nurses, occupational therapists, physiotherapists, among others. There is some difference of opinion regarding the appropriateness of a medical specialty of Geriatrics. Whether, on the one hand, a new specialty of Geriatrics is instituted or, on the other, specialists in Internal Medicine devote more time (as they must) to dealing with the problems of aged patients, makes little difference. It is true, however, that until the rest of the medical profession fully accepts the challenge of caring for the aged there must continue to be a group of devoted clinicians with a missionary zeal and vision pointing the way to better care for the aged, and indicating that improvement and "control" in the old can be just as important and gratifying as correction and "cure" in the young.

That there is a challenge in preserving or restoring the health of an older person, that modern rehabilitation methods open up a wide new area of possible accomplishment, and that there can be a great deal of satisfaction in bringing health care to the aged, may, perhaps, best be illustrated by the many cases where older patients have been restored to a considerable degree of independence. The following is an example of what can be done for the patient and his family:

> "In one district an elderly patient, having suffered several strokes, had been in bed at home for over three years. He was paralyzed on one side and unable to speak. He was a heavy man and because the family could not move him out of bed, they left him there, fed him, kept him clean, and he did nothing for himself. Finally, because the family were exhausted, someone suggested calling the Victorian Order of Nurses. With the doctor's permission the nurse encouraged the patient to do some self-help activities and simple exercises. In a short time she was helping him out of bed. The family learned, in time, from the nurse teaching during her visits, how to do this easily and safely. In a few months the patient was walking from the bedroom to the kitchen and later outdoors. The family were amazed at the change in his mental and physical condition and regretted the fact that so much time had been lost."[3]

Health of the aged is intimately related to matters of employment (feelings of usefulness and well-being), housing (safety and sanitation), recreation (mental health), etc. The most important and crucial relationships, however, are between the broad areas of health and welfare. It is essential that workers in both fields collaborate closely in dealing with such common needs as rehabilitation, community services and institutional care.

[3] Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada, brief submitted to the Royal Commission on Health Services, Ottawa, 1962, p. 14.

The basic premise, laid out in the beginning of this report, that older people vary from one another as much as younger folk, is certainly true with regard to their health. We need a variety of facilities to enable the elderly to live as long as possible at home, and institutional care should be considered only as a last resort after all available home services have been exhausted. The older person must be given a real choice as to where and how he or she is to be looked after, when the condition is a long term one and institutional care is found to be necessary.

The U.S. Commission on Chronic Illness which studied the problems of chronic disease, illness and disability from 1949-1956 stated at the beginning of their four-volume report: "The basic approach to chronic disease must be preventive. Otherwise the problems created by chronic disease will grow larger with time and the hope of any substantial decline in their incidence and severity will be postponed for many years."[4] The very useful terms Primary Prevention (prevention of the onset of disease) and Secondary Prevention (prevention of the progress of disease) have evolved. Primary Prevention is ideal and is instituted, if at all possible. Secondary prevention is the second choice which is often the only thing available to us in dealing with many diseases of older people because, unfortunately, as yet we know so little of the specific etiology of the major causes of death and disability and, therefore, cannot prevent their onset. Here, an attempt is made to detect, by all possible methods, the early evidence of disease, and to start treatment as quickly as possible. Where necessary, suitable rehabilitation of the long-term patient is aimed at minimizing the amount of deformity and disability and, if at all possible, the patient is returned to the community. A residual small proportion must be cared for indefinitely in an institutional environment appropriate to the needs of the patient, be they social or medical or, as is usually the case, a combination of both.

Statistics

We are grateful to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics[5] and the Federal Department of National Health and Welfare[6] for some very useful new data on the health and welfare of older people in Canada. We have also benefited from the monumental compilation of the Royal Commission on Health Services which, although not devoted to the older group, has some very pertinent statistics.[7] Other most important facts and figures have been obtained from the pioneer provincial study of the problems of the aged by the Saskatchewan Aged and Long-Term Illness Survey Committee (1960-1963).[8]

The forecast of three million people aged 65 and over by 1991, representing 9 per cent of the population (Royal Commission on Health Services), does not need to cause undue concern since several western European countries already have a higher percentage than this and services are on a more generous scale there than here without apparently ruining the economy. Great Britain, for instance, is expecting 15 per cent over 65 by 1981. We must, however, realize that we cannot look for a great deal of improvement in longevity, especially in men, over the next few decades in spite of generalization by uniformed "experts" in the daily newspapers and elsewhere. The health brief of the Department of National Health and Welfare points out that from 1921-1961, although death rates for females aged 60 to 70 have fallen by over one-third in Canada, death rates for males in the same age group registered an actual increase.[9] It is sobering to note that in Scotland, where statistics have been kept for a longer time than in Canada, men over 65 added only six months to their life span over the past 100 years.[10] The discrepancy in life expectancy between men and women gets greater year by year. Perhaps this is the time to arrest the proclivity of men to marry women a few years their junior!

The lethal effect of degenerative diseases seems to be gradually decreasing in females. For males, however, we find significant increases in rates for cardiovascular disease, cancer and lower respiratory disease. Accidental death rates (the fourth cause of death for persons aged 65 and over) showed a drop for both sexes. By far the highest rate of accidental deaths in Canada, however, remains in the older age group, especially for women.

The most recent national morbidity statistics we have are from the 1950-1951 Canada Sickness Survey. They show that a much higher per cent of the population is sick and disabled in old age and that recovery from acute illness is much slower. We can, however, become unduly pessimistic because of such statistics. It is true that, on the one hand, 15 per cent of Canadians aged 65 and over in 1950-1951 suffered from severe and total disability (compared with 3 per cent in the general population).[12] This means, on the other hand, that 85 per cent did not, although they may have had minor ailments. It is true that in 1961 people aged 65, and over, spent six or seven days per person per year in hospital (compared with one to two days per year for the general population). This, however, means that they were out of hospital for 51 weeks out of 52. Unless we look at both sides of the statistics they become misleading and unduly depressing.

We are sorely in need of up-to-date statistics in Canada on the morbidity of Canadians over 65, and we would certainly subscribe to the recommendation of the Canadian Medical Association that "periodic health surveys of the elderly population should be carried out in Canada to obtain accurate appraisals of the number of persons with long-term diseases and facilities for their care." The U.S. has a continuous National Health Survey from which valuable comparisons can be made but they do not necessarily hold true in Canada. We must continually hark back to a survey now about 15 years out of date. The Europeans have done extensive sociomedical surveys of the aged at home and in institutions including not only the population of whole towns,[13] but whole countries.[14] Similar surveys should be carried out in Canada to tell us where we are as a basis for deciding where we should be going.

We need more people in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the federal Department of National Health and Welfare concerned with information about the aged and chronically ill. Prospective and retrospective studies should be encouraged. Population projections should be revised regularly and currently; we had to depend on the Gordon Report estimates of 1957, until they were finally superseded by those of the Royal Commission on Health Services eight years later. Surveys should be going on in different parts of Canada with suitable randomization and controls similar to a large number in Europe, where it is known much more precisely what the needs are, with the result that more adequate and appropriate resources can be supplied to meet them. These surveys will require the cooperation of sociologists, epidemiologists, geriatricians, and experts in preventive medicine and social welfare, to draw up suitable questionnaires and gather objective data about older people, in their own homes, in subsidized housing, in homes for the aged, and in hospitals. Until we get more accurate statistics we are simply not in a position to know where we are heading and must continue to deal with each problem on an ad hoc basis.[15]

Primary Prevention

Many agencies made recommendations concerning the usefulness of health education starting in youth, progressing through middle age (pre-retirement counselling) and into old age where it could be provided in housing projects, well adult clinics, senior citizens clubs, etc., as well as through individual counselling.

There is no doubt that physicians and community agencies must promote positive physical and mental health by individual, group and mass education methods. Proper nutrition, mental hygiene, adequate housing, appropriate balance between work and play and between rest and exercise, and a useful and productive place in society are among the best recognized factors contributing to the maintenance of optimum health.[16] While it is true that the individual must control his own food intake, consumption of alcohol, and smoking of cigarettes, advice from his doctor may be a great stimulus and this can be supplemented very usefully by mass and group education. We would agree with the statement of the Canadian Medical Association that "although health education is largely a matter between the physician and his patients, public education programs in the prevention of disease and maintenance of good health for older people should be encouraged through voluntary and governmental agencies in health education with necessary advice from medical associations."[17]

Considerable lip service has been paid to the principle of "pre-retirement counselling" but very little actual counselling has been provided, with the exception of some spotty developments in industry. Physicians are in a particularly favourable position to counsel their middle-aged patients about health and related problems in retirement. In doing so they should keep in mind the epidemiological pattern of health problems in the elderly, including the high rate of accidents and their causes, and also of suicides, both of which are, theoretically at least, preventable.

There is an increasing list of chronic diseases which can be specifically prevented. Members of the health professions must apply fully what is already known and develop newer means of primary prevention as quickly as possible, through research into the etiology of diseases in the elderly. The difficulty in preventing some of the more serious chronic diseases is that at worst the cause is unknown and at best multiple. Unfortunately, at this stage, we are unable to prevent the onset of some of the more important causes of death and disability in the elderly.

[15] We fully endorse the observations and recommendations in regard to Statistics by the Royal Commission on Health Services. Vol. I, pp. 82, 83, and Vol. II, pp. 133-150.

We must actively encourage research into some of the unproven areas of primary prevention. For example, why could not some of the five million dollars granted annually for physical fitness be allocated to investigating the beneficial effect, if any, of regular exercise on the health of the elderly?

Early Diagnosis and Prompt Treatment

A great deal of discussion has taken place recently, and a number of investigations have been undertaken in various parts of the world to prove or disprove the value of annual physical examinations to the middle aged and elderly. These are sometimes referred to as health inventories or appraisals and are recommended by many authorities for everyone over 40 years of age. Two things do seem evident: a) significant health defects may be discovered which have been previously undetected and have no overt symptoms or signs, and b) it is a golden opportunity for health education. On the other hand, if thorough, these examinations are expensive and time-consuming. With the present personnel shortage, doctors if required to do many such examinations would be occupied with little else and have no time for treatment. Physicians tend to be ambivalent about the value of these examinations and there has been relatively little encouragement given in medical schools. Patients are also notoriously ill-disposed to present themselves for examination when well, which slows down the demand. However, there has been a trend recently for executives to become interested in physical examinations for themselves and labour unions ask the natural question, "If it's so good for management why not for the rest of the staff?

It is accepted that personal physicians should be encouraged to do suitable periodic health appraisals.[18] For the health maintenance of the elderly we should also experiment more with clinics for well older people and can benefit from the experience in the U.S.A. with "Well Oldster Clinics", and in Great Britain with "Health Advisory Clinics" under the direction of the health department or, as the brief of the Canadian Medical Association suggests, with "Geriatric Consultation Clinics" in out-patient departments. A group practice setting would also be an admirable place for the provision of such a clinic.

There are interesting developments such as the pilot project started by the Medical Officer of Health in the city of London, Ontario, mentioned in the brief of the Ontario Welfare Council.[19] There, a health advisory clinic is operating very successfully in the Senior Citizen Recreation Centre. Every effort should be made to detect chronic disease and disability as early as possible through organized community effort.

[18] Ibid., p. 1343; also the Royal Commission on Health Services recommends periodic examinations as a medical service benefit under its programme.

[19] Ontario Welfare Council, brief submitted to the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging, No. 8, May 21, 1964.

An alternative to periodic health appraisals has been developed to bring the benefits of early detection to large groups of apparently well people who would not otherwise receive such investigations. This is called "multiple screening" and consists of several tests for various significant chronic diseases given during one visit in order to save time and money. Scarce professional time is also saved by using technicians whenever possible. The tests are, as stated, "screening" (not diagnostic) and the confirmatory diagnosis is made by the private practitioner. Certain individual screening tests are at present carried out by private practitioners and these are to be encouraged, e.g., tonometry for glaucoma and Papanicolaou's smear for cancer of the cervix. In a group practice several examinations of a screening nature can be combined and performed by technicians, much the same as on admission to a general hospital. Multiple screening clinics have also been carried out by health departments in the United States and more recently in western Europe. More encouragement should be given to health departments in Canada to experiment with this method which, as the brief by the Department of National Health and Welfare states, should be related to the planned development of comprehensive community health services. (See Appendix II).

Care of the Long Term Patient

Several principles have been enunciated in the briefs concerning the care of the chronically ill in cases where it has not been possible to prevent the onset or detect the condition at an early symptomless stage. First, there is definite agreement that the care of the chronically ill must be closely integrated with general medical care. Unless this is done, there tends to be medical stagnation and deterioration of quality. Second, there is the need to incorporate rehabilitation in all phases of the treatment of aged patients. Third, is the recognition of excessive institutionalization and a plea for keeping older people at home as long as possible with suitable and sufficient home care services.

There is a need for some agreement on the definition of different types of sheltered accommodation. "Nursing Home", "Home for the Aged", and "Rest Home" for instance may well mean different things in different parts of the country. It is, therefore, extremely difficult if not impossible to make comparisons, and this is one of the reasons our statistical tabulations are so inadequate. The federal Department of National Health and Welfare is in an admirable position to convene a conference to draw up generally acceptable definitions and standards.

In its brief to the Committee, the Welfare Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare presented us with an overall picture of the numbers and per cent of older folk in institutions in Canada as a whole.[20] In this brief there is a fascinating history of the development of institutional care stemming from the Judaeo-Christian tradition, in which the virtues of charity were emphasized as a religious duty and a manifestation of brotherly love. In Quebec which inherited the traditional system of monastic institutions from France, both congregational and specialized institutions operating under religious auspices have been developed. The rest of Canada has tended to base its experience on the English Poor Relief Act of 1601, its various amendments and its successor of 1834, The principle of poor relief was that of "less eligibility", implying that recipients of relief should not enjoy conditions of life as good as those of independent laborers of the lowest class. In Canada we still have a philosophic legacy of the English workhouse.

The closest estimate we have of institutional care, therefore, at the present time is that on any particular day 109,423 or 8 per cent, of persons aged 65 and over are residing in some form of institution rather than in the community at large. It was stated that for the population aged 75 and over this would rise to 15 per cent in institutions. There is a variation from 39.2 in Newfoundland and 45.6/1,000 persons in Nova Scotia aged 65 and over to over twice this rate (92.9) in Alberta. These statistics, although derived from a number of sources and, therefore, not fully accurate, are the most complete national compilations available up to the present.[22]

Hospitals

The brief by the Canadian Medical Association assumes the need for the ratio of 7 beds per 1,000 of population established in surveys by the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Provincial Health Departments in 1948. They make comparisons of bed requirements in Canada, the United States and Great Britain as follows.[23]

Table 18.—Estimates of Hospital Bed requirements per 1,000 Population in Canada, the United States and Great Britain, 1948.

	Acute	Chronic	Total
Canada	5.5	1.5	7.0
United States	4.4–4.7	2.3–2.6	6.7–7.3
Great Britain	3.9	1.4	5.3

One reason for these striking differences is that in Britain greater emphasis is placed on out-patient and home care services as alternatives to inpatient facilities. In 1960 there were 6.3 beds per 1,000 population in general chronic and convalescent hospitals in Canada divided as follows:[24]

Table 19.—Estimate of Beds Provided in Canada per 1,000 Population in General, Chronic and Convalescent Hospitals and in Nursing Homes, 1960.

[23] Canadian Medical Association, brief op. cit., No. 20, p. 1337.
[24] Department of National Health & Welfare, brief op. cit., No. 23, p. 1545.

Actually 2.7 beds per 1,000 are at present being used for long term care in acute and chronic hospitals. In addition, the Department of National Health and Welfare points out, 0.9 beds per 1,000 of population are provided in nursing homes, not to mention the chronic beds in mental and tuberculosis hospitals, nor the many nursing beds in homes for the aged.

In order to answer the crucial question of how many beds we need in hospitals for the aged sick we must first of all develop some system for defining the different levels of care and types of institutions and get agreement among the provinces. The Saskatchewan government submission quotes a comprehensive list of levels of care developed by their Aged and Long Term Illness Survey Committee which is given here in abbreviated form.[25] Other briefs have similar levels:

Level 1 - Self Dependent Care in the Community.

Level 2 - Sheltered Accommodation—Supervision and necessary personal care services—Hostels, Lodges and Homes for the Aged.

Level 3 - Nursing Homes—Basic nursing care and medical supervision.

Level 4 - Long Term Care Units of General Hospitals and Geriatric Centers—Skilled technical nursing care and regular and continuing medical supervision.

Level 5 - Long Term Care Units of General Hospitals and Geriatric Centres—Intensive rehabilitation.

The Saskatchewan submission recognizes that to provide for all these requires careful planning which must take into account "the needs of old people in respect to housing, sheltered accommodation, nursing homes, long term care hospitals and general hospitals". Many of the briefs asked for the development of an adequate range of facilities and services for the short and long term care of the aged adapted to their social and medical needs. The number of beds in one type of institution, of course, depends on the availability of beds in the other types. "It is important to consider housing, domiciliary services and communal care together, because a coordinated policy in the provision of all three is the only way to make the most effective use of them all, both from the point of view of the needs of older householders and from that of the cost to the consumer."[26]

The Senate Committee subscribes to the principle that older people should remain in their own homes as long as possible. It is frequently better for them, they are generally happier there, and it is usually a great deal cheaper. We must not be inflexible in applying this rule, but old people's homes, nursing homes and hospitalization should be considered only if absolutely necessary. There is a great deal more preaching of this principle in Canada than actual practice. Until we give

Home Care a real trial in both the United States and Canada we must continue to be institution-oriented and the proportion of those unnecessarily institutionalized will keep ahead of European countries where home services are much more liberally available.

We were greatly impressed with the Canadian Medical Association presentation which brought to our attention successful experiments in the United Kingdom with "dynamic programs for the chronically ill . . . developed in association with the general hospital or a general hospital complex by the late Dr. Marjorie Warren and Dr. Lionel Cousin".[27] This arrangement has spread widely in Great Britain; long range plans which are well advanced include a geriatric department (or unit) in every general hospital headed by well qualified, rehabilitation oriented, geriatricians in charge of the acute and chronic geriatric sick. The geriatrician acts as the consultant to local general practitioners. The Canadian Medical Association brief stated, "experience has shown that there are many disadvantages of segregating the sick older patient in isolated institutions". The present opinion of the medical profession as expressed in the Canadian Medical Association's submission to the Royal Commission on Health Services is that patients should be cared for in wings of general hospitals. We agree with this point of view. If the chronic disease section is not actually on the premises at least there must be a very close integration with the general hospital, as, for instance, between the Baycrest Hospital (chronic) and Mt. Sinai Hospital (acute) in Toronto.[28]

More imaginative and flexible admission and discharge policies could be developed in our chronic disease institutions. Some of the European procedures of "six weeks in and six weeks out" and summer admissions not only help the patient but also provide well earned relief to the relatives. Day and Night Hospitals are increasingly common in Europe where older people are brought in two to three times a week by "ambulance", given occupational therapy, physiotherapy, chiropody, meals, baths, etc., and then driven home. Night hospitals are provided in some places for the patient who is confused at night and can be home during the day. These principles have been used for some time in the psychiatric field, and are now being introduced into the field of geriatric care. We would subscribe to the briefs that ask for an extensive development of day and night hospitals.

Another item that has been emphasized in several of the briefs is the extension of out-patient departments for geriatric patients. The Canadian Medical Association brief advises more geriatric consultation clinics for diagnosis and evaluation where special services or equipment are required. A different type of orientation, philosophy and special training is needed than in the regular clinics. The matter of time, for example: older people hate to be hurried and indeed should not be rushed for fear of missing their basic complaints and prescribing inappropriate remedies.

An imposing problem which the community has not yet faced up to is the enormous increase in the number and proportion of mentally ill older people needing institutional care. In the past many older people have been certified insane and sent to mental hospitals partly under the misconception that they were mentally ill and partly because of the lack of other facilities. The trend now is to get them out of the mental hospital even though community facilities may not be equipped to handle them. For instance, in Ontario recently a bill was passed, the purpose of which was to transfer 5,000 older people as quickly as possible to some other type of custodial care.[29] It is suggested that a pilot project be useful, akin to the Geriatric Short Stay Unit in Amsterdam, where acute confused older people could be observed and treatment instituted. A large proportion of these cases return home rather quickly. Again, the day hospital principle for aged patients could be adopted by mental hospitals in the hope that this would lead to greater concern for the rehabilitation of the elderly. Also, special nursing homes for mentally confused older people could play a useful role. These must not be too large and there must be a continuous effort at rehabilitation.

We fully subscribe to the Canadian Medical Association recommendation that rehabilitation services for aged patients in psychiatric hospitals should be greatly extended.[30]

Nursing Homes

Elderly people in need of nursing and personal care are caught in a vicious circle. On the one hand, we are told that long term patients are in hospital when all they need is skilled nursing care. On the other hand, lack of nursing homes is causing the bedridden to be placed in municipal homes which were not set up to care for the ill. So desperate is the situation that even nursing homes of such poor quality that authorities feel they should not be in operation, have long waiting lists. The nursing home is caught in the middle with pressure from the overcrowded hospitals on the one hand and from overcrowded and inadequate housing and domiciliary care on the other. The Community Planning Association described the Nursing Home as "the bottleneck for housing authorities as well as for hospitals."[31]

The term "nursing home" is far from precise, although it is sometimes given specific meaning for the purposes of particular legislation. It has not the same meaning in all provinces. In Quebec, for instance, the term is not used officially at all. Nursing homes are, usually, under nursing rather than medical direction; they are thus distinguished from chronic hospitals on the one hand, or homes for the aged on the other, by their auspices with, however, very little difference in their clientele. By far the majority of nursing homes in Canada are proprietary.

Nursing homes have arisen to fill a vacuum that exists in the care of the elderly. No matter how bad they may be they permit a feeling of independence on the part of an older person who is paying his own way rather than accepting the "charity" of a municipal institution. Nursing homes have arisen as profit-making ventures and, as Mr. Ruth of the Jewish Home for the Aged told us, they appear to have been forgotten by charitable groups and by governments.[32] Dr. Charron says that 0.9 bed per thousand inhabitants in Canada is in a nursing home, against 1.6 per thousand in the United States.[33]

The least that could be done, in the opinion of the Committee, would be, as so many suggest, to set up much more stringent and specific legislation administered at the provincial level to license and inspect nursing homes with regard to both their personnel and physical facilities. Ontario at the present time appears to be the only province without any provincial licensing but does have a "model" by-law which has been adopted by many municipalities. In all provinces there is a need to raise standards and this does not mean that the home has merely met the requirements of the building code, the fire department and the sanitary inspector. Such simple requirements as adequate records (including accident reports) and medical control leave a great deal to be desired. Rehabilitation is non-existent in most homes and recreation is limited to television.

One method of providing necessary rehabilitation and recreation would be for nursing homes to pool their resources. This could, certainly, be arranged through nursing home associations wherever they exist. Why, for instance, could not occupational therapists and physiotherapists be shared among several homes? In the U.S.A. there is increasing awareness of the responsibility of state authorities for in-service training in rehabilitation for nursing home operators. The states of Washington, Wisconsin, Texas, and Illinois have teams of experts—physiatrists, nurses, occupational therapists, and physiotherapists—going from home to home, giving courses. There is no reason why the provincial authorities in Canada could not do likewise.

There is some difference of opinion as to whether the responsibility for nursing homes is primarily one for the welfare or health administration.The important thing is to ensure that the agencies in both fields co-operate in drafting suitable legislation. An attempt must be made in the legislation to ensure that the proprietor or operator is qualified for the task. In addition to suitable supervision at the provincial level in departments of health and welfare, the federal Department of National Health and Welfare could provide guides for building standards, rehabilitation facilities and training courses for operators. There is very little leadership in this area by any level of government.

All nursing homes should be licensed by a health agency in the province and grants should be provided for the building of more suitable homes to voluntary non-profit bodies which are now providing facilities for ambulant well older people who could be looked after better elsewhere. A strong case could be made for developing, as suggested in the health brief of the Department of National Health and Welfare, a system of skilled nursing homes which would be closely associated in a functional manner with hospitals.[34] Perhaps this is inevitable; as more expensive services and facilities are provided in accordance with provincial regulations the rates will have to rise. This will mean a bigger subsidy and with more financing the government will necessarily have to exercise more direct control. It is to be hoped that eventually nursing home care will be taken over as an extension of hospital services. According to the best estimates we were able to secure, care in nursing homes costs on the average $8 to $10 per day. This cannot be paid for by low and middle income groups. It is only a question of time before provincial governments develop more concern for the increasing subsidies they are giving to nursing home operators for indigent cases. The pressure is on the provincial governments to take action and the above are offered as alternatives.

There are undoubtedly a great number of ambulant patients who could be accommodated in sheltered home care if additional services and facilities were provided. At present there is no real choice offered to the elderly. When isolated older persons are only slightly disabled, they are often unable to cope longer at home and there are only two major choices available to them in Canada: the public home for the aged and the private nursing home, neither of which is appropriate to their needs and both of which tend to sap whatever independence they may have had on admission.

Homes for the Aged

At present there are 1,500 homes for the aged in Canada, according to a recent study by the Canadian Welfare Council.[35] One of the most encouraging changes occurring in homes for the aged is the drop in the percentage of so-called "normal" care. With the increase in the old age pension many more older people are now enabled to make their own way in the community in spite of the lack of services. There is no doubt that, in the future, residents of Homes are going to be increasingly older and sicker than at present. Whether we call it "re-activation" or rehabilitation, more and more of them will need physiotherapy, occupational therapy, and speech therapy. Medical and nursing care must be much more highly skilled and the need for a closer liaison with the general hospital will become increasingly apparent and necessary. Homes for the aged will then have turned into long term geriatric nursing units and (along with nursing homes) will be equivalent to the long stay annexes in the British geriatric units. Alternative accommodation must be discovered for the relatively well, ambulant patients in sheltered independent living: hostels, foster homes, etc., as suggested in the case of similar patients now in nursing homes.

[34] Department of National Health and Welfare, brief op. cit., No. 23, p. 1525.
[35] A Home after 65, The Canadian Welfare Council, Ottawa, 1964.

There is no general agreement regarding the ideal size of homes for the aged. We must be realistic. The size depends to a large extent on the people who have to live there. As they become more and more in need of special professional personnel, either resources of personnel and facilities must be pooled or else the institution must increase in size to warrant the full-time use of such personnel. Rehabilitation facilities and equipment can also be too expensive for a great number of smaller institutions unless they can be shared by several institutions.

The 1,400 old people's homes in Sweden, mentioned in the welfare brief of the Department of National Health and Welfare,[36] are perfectly delightful with their 20-30 beds but they are often inappropriate for the patients living in them who are increasingly mentally disturbed and chronically ill. These homes have been overbuilt and there is now a trend toward bigger institutions, more closely associated with hospitals. Old people will stay out of institutions, however attractive, as long as possible if they can live at home with additional services. With such sheltered home care there is no longer the need for the small institution for the merely frail older person who is not in need of continuous nursing care.[37]

An exciting new development is taking place in Jewish homes for the aged both in Canada and in the United States. Day care centres have been started to serve the old people on their waiting lists and the day care centre at the Jewish Home for the Aged in Toronto was described to the Committee.[38] Meals, baths, occupational therapy, physiotherapy, counselling, sheltered work, and other suitable services are offered. This is a pattern which might well be considered seriously by other residential homes, both voluntary and official. There is a great need to integrate such institutions with the community and one can envisage the provision of day care services emanating from suitably situated homes. Eventually, these could be co-ordinated with the day care centres in the geriatric departments of general hospitals. The likelihood of duplication in the immediate future is remote in view of the scarcity.

Much more concern must be shown for the selection and training of directors of homes for the aged. Great Britain has had a course lasting several months for matrons and assistant matrons. Sweden has been training administrators of homes since 1908, and the course lasts three years. At present the qualification of directors of homes for the aged in Canada remains dubious in most parts of the country.

Foster Homes

A number of suggestions was received concerning the use of foster homes and proposals that greater use be made of foster home care and boarding homes for older people, who need some degree of care or protection.[39] The committee agrees that more attempts should be made to place older people in suitable foster homes but a strict watch should be kept to make sure that the older person is not taken advantage of by unscrupulous "foster children". Also, increased use could be made of foster home care by homes for the aged but again under strict supervision.

Sheltered Care

There is a large and increasing number of older people too frail for completely independent living and yet not disabled enough for a home for the aged. We need much more housing and hostels with shared facilities, such as dining, laundry, and entertainment. Also desirable is a little supervision from a Canadian equivalent of the British "housemother" who supervises the residents of a group of flatlets. Not only do older people need shelter, they need also facilities for health care, recreation, education and sheltered employment. Some or all of these can be provided in housing developments and even made available, as in some other parts of the world, to the older people of the surrounding community.

Community Services at Home

The Royal Commission on Health Services recommends "measures to foster the implementation of home care plans".[40] The Royal Commission reports that, from the point of view of the agency financing either home care or hospital service, "in most cases home care will be cheaper than hospital care, where 38.3 per cent of the operating cost in general and allied special hospitals is accounted for by general services other than those provided by the service departments of the hospital." There is the further saving in capital cost due to the reduced expenditure for hospital construction if fewer hospital beds are needed. But from the point of view of the patient and the community, comparisons of costs would have to take into account the cost of keeping the patients at home which may be increased substantially where extensive housekeeping and other ancillary services are required.

A great many submissions to the Senate Committee supported the strengthening of such home care services as visiting nursing, occupational therapy, physiotherapy, chiropody, sick room equipment, etc. Several agencies made recommendations concerning the desirability of a more rapid development of home care and suggested the active role of government in its promotion, financed either as a part of a comprehensive health care program or under hospital insurance. Among the reasons given by the Department of National Health and Welfare for the lagging development of organized home care plans in Canada are:

(a) The pattern of medical practice in Canada places an emphasis on hospital and office practice, eliminating all but a minimum of house calls.

(b) Administration of hospital based programs proves difficult because of the lack of regionalization of hospitals.

(c) The lack of interest on the part of public health departments.[41]

One of the main reasons for lagging acceptance of home care is that the patient is insured for services which are provided in hospital but has to make his own arrangements for home care. Once this difficulty has been surmounted, more patients (especially older ones) would prefer to be cared for at home and would apply pressure on relatives and on the physician to allow them to stay at home if at all possible, providing, of course, that suitable services are available.

Among the health services provided in the home have always been the home calls by physician and, since before the turn of the century, the Victorian Order of Nurses has been providing for visits by graduate nurses on a national scale, followed by other visiting nurses associations operating in certain areas. In some of the provinces public health nurses also provide some visiting bedside nursing, a policy adopted on a province-wide basis in British Columbia. A new element has been added to home care by organizing the visiting nursing services together with other community services into organized plans. Such plans may be operated by an individual hospital (hospital based) primarily with a view towards an earlier discharge of some of its own patients, or they may be operated on a community basis without limitation to a specific hospital. The objective in the latter case is to keep patients out of hospital as well as to facilitate their earlier discharge, and also to mobilize the various community services for patients outside the hospital who may benefit from them. We noted that the Royal Commission on Health Services forcefully recommends the extension of organized home care.

We strongly support the development of organized home care under any auspices. When it is provided by voluntary agencies, higher subsidies and adequate payment for services must be provided to permit the extension of these services to all areas and, particularly, to rural communities where probably greater use will have to be made of the public health nurse in the provision of bedside nursing on a visiting basis. It is rather starting to find the lack of home services in Canada compared with Europe.[42]

Podiatric or chiropodist services are now considered essential for the aged. In Edinburgh, for example, five full time podiatrists are on the staff of the local health department. It is suggested that we need at least one podiatrist per 100,000 population;[43] their services are woefully inadequate in Canada. Physiotherapists and occupational therapists working in the home are almost non-existent in Canada except in a few areas. Until such services are available, including the relief of the crucial shortage of visiting homemakers, we are not able to offer a real choice to older people, or to the doctor as between hospital and home care.

---

[41] Department of National Health and Welfare, brief op. cit., p. 1547.
[42] Department of National Health and Welfare, brief op. cit., p. 1694.

Health Department

What we have said about the need for re-orientation of health agencies, in general, in order to provide the services needed by the aging applies, particularly, to health departments at all levels. As part of the assessment of its present and future role, the health department must effectively coordinate its services with the other agencies in the community.

We have already referred to the role of the public health nurse. Although the number of home visits to older people has increased in the past few years, a great deal more could be done. In Edinburgh, for instance, in a recent survey 38 per cent of old people needed the services of a health visitor and only 2½ per cent received them.[44] In some European health departments there is so much concern about the problems of the aged that a new speciality called Geriatric Public Health Nursing has arisen.

A recommendation has recently been made by the Royal College of Physicians in Edinburgh which has relevance in Canada. It suggests that a register be kept by health departments not only of needy older people (as many health departments in Great Britain are already doing) but of all people over 70. It is suggested that when the older person first receives the government pension his name be sent automatically to the health department. A routine visit could then be made and follow up visits, if necessary and desired, much as in the case of birth registrations to-day. No difficulties are envisaged since most older people love to be visited and there is no longer the same necessity for confidentiality.[45]

In Norwegian cities the Health and Welfare Centres get the names of all people in their area when they begin to receive the pension, and they are all routinely contacted either by letter or visit. As a result resources can be mobilized early to meet an old person's social or medical disability instead of waiting for an emergency to arise. Such a register would also yield the statistics necessary for the adequate planning and evaluation of health services to the aged.

It is strongly recommended that local Canadian health departments keep a register of all older people and that the staff of the health department visit these old people with a view to ascertaining their health status and needs. Consideration might be given to including with the first old age security cheque a letter informing the pensioner of health and other community services available to him.

FINANCING

Hospital Care

Ninety-eight per cent of Canada's population is insured for hospital care under the federal Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, with the federal government providing funds to meet approximately 50 per cent of the operating costs of general, chronic, and convalescent hospitals. The federal expenditure for 1964 is estimated to be $425,000,000.[46] There is no limit on length of stay if medical need is established.[47] Tuberculosis and mental hospital care, however, is not at present covered by this Act.

Medical Care

Saskatchewan and Alberta both have province-wide medical care programs; Ontario, and more recently British Columbia as well, have announced plans to set up medical care schemes. In Newfoundland approximately one-half the population receive physician services at home or in hospital under the Cottage Hospital Medical Care Plan, including all children under 16 years of age.

People of all ages come under the Saskatchewan Medical Care Insurance Plan which is financed from personal premiums, with contributions from general revenue. The plan covers 95 per cent of the population for benefit purposes. Excluded from benefits are a few groups otherwise provided for, such as some Indians, veterans on War Veterans Allowances, members of the armed forces and the R.C.M.P. The Department of National Health and Welfare reports that, "no premiums were levied in respect of 1962. For 1963 the annual levies were $12 per adult and $24 for a family maximum. For 1964 the premiums were reduced to $5 and $12 respectively. Special corporation and personal income taxes have been introduced to help support the program along with the use of a portion of revenue of a 5 per cent retail sales tax."[48]

The Alberta plan, introduced in 1963, is voluntary, covering those who purchase their own insurance and a large number—estimated at about 425,000 persons—who, though otherwise self-supporting, require help in paying for medical care insurance. The "65,000 pensioners and others receiving public assistance," continue to be cared for under the same arrangements as before. "Residents desiring a subsidy must establish that they cannot afford to pay the full cost of the premiums . . ."[49]

The method used in Alberta subsidizes individuals on a means test basis rather than applying the subsidy to a common fund, and thereby reducing premiums for all as in Saskatchewan. This approach was rejected by the Hall Commission as unacceptable. The Senate Committee agrees with their conclusion that if millions of Canadians were to be "subsidized and means tested . . . . this would pose a formidable task in terms of organized administrative machinery, extra costs which Canadians cannot afford, and a method of examining the individual which, in the opinion of many Canadians, is contrary to the dignity of man".[50]

In addition to the foregoing public plans, there are throughout Canada commercial insurance plans and prepayment plans sponsored by the medical profession available to older people usually, however, at a cost reflecting the greater risk in this age group.

To end this state of fragmented, incomplete, often excessively costly, and generally inadequate coverage of health care needs by insurance or prepayment, the Royal Commission on Health Services has recommended a universal and comprehensive Health Services Programme. Its objective, furthermore, is not merely the financing of health services but also to ensure the quality of these services and adequate resources in terms of both personnel and facilities. It also provides guide lines for a rational coordination and organization of all health services.

The implementation of the Commission's recommendations would add to the existing hospital and diagnostic services the medical services it specifies,[51] dental and optical services for certain groups, prescription drug services (with a $1.00 fee), prosthetic services (including appliances), and home care services.

The removal, as recommended by the Royal Commission, of the restriction of the Vocational Rehabilitation Act essentially to members of the labour force would clearly make this Act applicable also to the aging and aged.

PERSONNEL

There is a serious shortage of members of the healing and helping professions concerned with the problem of old age e.g., physicians, nurses, physiotherapists, occupational therapists, physiatrists, orthotists, prosthetists, social workers, podiatrists, etc. Part of this shortage is due to the general shortage of such workers for all ages, but it is also due to the lack of interest on the part of professional personnel and others in the whole area of geriatrics. Old age and chronic diseases are alike rejected. When they are combined there is a double rejection. When the chronic disease is mental illness this is the third strike which only too often counts the old person out as far as help is concerned.

[51] i.e., the various forms of physicians services; X-ray, laboratory and other diagnostic procedures, preventive services (incl. periodic examinations), appliances, therapists' services, podiatric and chiropractic treatment if prescribed, transportation services.

Part of the reason for the neglect of the aged is cultural but another important factor is the lack of training of professional personnel in the area of chronic diseases and gerontology. Teachers tend to be youth-centred, acute illness oriented, and efficiency focussed. There is a need to emphasize control rather than cure, management rather than recovery, and rehabilitation for the activities of daily living (A.D.L.) rather than for holding a job. There is also a need to emphasize the satisfactions, rather than the frustrations, of dealing with geriatric patients.

We would subscribe to the policy statement of the Canadian Medical Association Committee on Aging: "Greater emphasis should be given in the curricula of medical schools on the medical, social and economic aspects of aging. Programs for the aging population cannot succeed unless the medical student, the physician of tomorrow, is properly prepared for the handling of geriatric problems. The medical student should be indoctrinated to develop an interest in the problems of the aged and learn to assess the various factors involved in the illness of the patient: a) A form of continuing education in the area of aging should be maintained during the training period of internship and residency by formal guidance and instruction. b) Programs for the stimulation of greater interest in Geriatrics by the medical profession are essential."[52]

There should be a similar emphasis, in post-graduate training in all specialties having any bearing on health problems of the aged, in medical societies and associations, and in post-graduate refresher courses. It goes without saying that the programs of existing gerontological and geriatric organizations should be strengthened.

RESEARCH

Research in aging is divided into at least four categories: 1) Basic research into the nature of aging including biological, psychological and social aspects, 2) Basic research into the nature of chronic diseases including methods of preventing their onset, 3) Clinical research into the diagnosis, treatment and rehabilitation of chronic diseases, 4) Community health research; developing methods of applying the knowledge already known to the older people who need the services, e.g., the use of well oldster clinics, screening tests, home care, etc.

Much greater financial support is needed for the promotion of research in all the above areas. In regard to research, more particularly in the clinical field, the Canadian Medical Association's brief states: "Despite substantial and gratifying increases by government in the past few years, the funds available for medical research are still short of advancing requirements and lag behind the level of funds provided by the Governments of the United Kingdom, Sweden and the United States. Industry and commerce should supplement government support in the field of clinical research. The augmentation of an active program of clinical research would be a vital factor in the improvement of the standards of medical care for all of our citizens."[53]

COORDINATION AND PLANNING

Here again reference is made to the extensive studies and proposals by the Royal Commission on Health Services. There are several crucial areas in dealing with the problems of the aged where coordination and planning are not only desirable but essential in dealing with the problems of the aged, e.g., the inter-relationship of the fields of health, education, welfare, and labour, and the inter-relationship of the physical, mental and social aspects of well being.

Teamwork is imperative if we are to deal effectively with the problems of the aged, e.g., teamwork between medical and paramedical personnel; between professional, technical and ancillary workers; between voluntary, official and professional organizations.

In caring for the sick older person at home, teamwork should bring together the services of the doctor, nurse, occupational therapist, physiotherapist, social worker, visiting homemaker, chiropodist, friendly visitor, etc. Unfortunately, in the past education of the health professions has not always prepared their members for this role and, as said above, improvements at the undergraduate and graduate level are necessary, An offer of cooperation with far-reaching implications is contained in the statement of policy of the Canadian Medical Association Committee on Aging: "The Canadian Medical Association cognisant of the multiple aspects of Aging (e.g., the social, economic physiological and environmental) that extend beyond the purely medical facet, is prepared to cooperate and work with all groups which have these areas as their primary concern for the welfare of the aged citizen."[54]

LOCAL

It is felt by many workers that the health needs of the aged would be best served through local agencies and municipal departments combining the functions of health and welfare. However, the vested interests on both sides are great, professional lines have been drawn, and the positions have become established. An alternative is a close working relationship through committees and other devices to bring the two groups together regularly in considering provisions for the elderly. Also necessary is the coordination of other official, voluntary and professional agencies and individuals concerned with caring for the elderly. All can be drawn together at the local level in the Aging Committees of Social Planning Councils (where they exist) or in Senior Citizens' Councils, which have proven their worth in certain parts of Canada, although most of these councils are seriously understaffed and underfinanced.

Planning for the health of older people cannot proceed without considering the other facets of need, such as housing, welfare services and recreation. An increase for provision in one area will have an inevitable effect on others. A variety of facilities and services is needed, much of the planning for which must be done at the local level.

PROVINCIAL

Some 35 American States at the present time have permanent Commissions or Committees on Aging, normally set up by the Governor and reporting to him. No corresponding development has occurred so far in Canada, although it should be noted that over the past few years three provinces, Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia and Ontario, appointed official committees to inquire into the situation of old people, which may perhaps be regarded as steps in this direction.

A crucial need in the health field is for a Branch on Aging and Chronic Illness in each of the ten provincial departments of Health. It may be significant that while all provincial welfare departments sent in briefs to the Senate Committee none was received from a provincial Department of Health. The only submission from a health department came from the Department of National Health and Welfare. More assistance from the provincial level should be given to local medical officers of health in setting up new programs and services for the elderly in their areas. Health departments at present seem preoccupied with maternal and child health to the exclusion of other age groups in the community.

In addition to the Branch advocated above, there should be a continuing committee of the Health and Welfare Departments which would meet regularly to consider mutually important matters, such as nursing home legislation, home for the aged, etc.

FEDERAL

There is entirely too little emphasis on aging and on the overall care of the chronically ill at the federal level. The federal Department of National Health and Welfare is in admirable position to set up a committee on aging coordinating both Health and Welfare which would bring these two groups together to consider problems of mutual concern.

In addition there should be a special Health Services Division on the Care of the Aged and Chronic Disease Control under the Direction of Health Services. It is not sufficient to have this centred in the Division of Medical Rehabilitation. The concern and programs should be much broader than merely rehabilitation.

Secondary Prevention Through Screening Examinations

"Screening is the presumptive identification of unrecognized disease or defect by the application of tests, examinations or other procedures which can be applied rapidly. Screening tests sort out apparently well persons who probably have a disease from those who probably do not. A screening test is not intended to be diagnostic. Persons with positive or suspicious findings must be referred to their physicians for diagnosis and necessary treatment."[1]

Multiple screening is the application of two or more screening tests in combination to large groups of people.

CHAPTER 12

Housing for Older People

I. The Problem

A. HOUSING SITUATION OF THE AGED

Before answering the question whether Canada's aged population is adequately housed, it is important to secure a clear impression of the reality lying behind the words "the aged"—keeping in mind, of course, that we are concerned here not with the totality of the problems of the aged, but specifically with their housing situation.

1. Housing Status

The following table describes the living arrangements adopted by older people, according to the evidence submitted to the Senate Committee by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

Table 20.—Household Status of Population aged 65 and over June 1, 1961

SOURCE: Brief of the DBS to the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging, October 27, 1964, No. 18, p. 1253.

It appears from these figures that where husband and wife lived together, or where a married woman was still head of a family, the usual pattern was for the family to maintain its own home. A very small percentage of older couples doubled up with relatives, while an even smaller group lived as lodgers. A doubling of an older couple with their younger married children, popular stereotypes notwithstanding, appears rather rare.

The situation was different where a man or a woman was left alone. The most frequent solution was not to maintain a household:[1] 56 per cent of the single and widowed aged people followed that course of action. Half of these lived with relatives and thus became part of a family of sorts; this was more common among women (59 per cent) than among men (41 per cent). Those who maintained their own household lived by themselves in 66 per cent of the cases. From the table we can also see that about 55 per cent of the single aged were living alone in their own homes, or as lodgers, or in institutions. Among these men and women must be those who experience most intensely the crushing impact of solitude, whether their material needs are cared for or not.

2. Home Ownership

A noteworthy fact is that in 1961, 77 per cent of the aged heads of households owned the homes they lived in, and that the vast majority held a clear title to them. However, the median value of dwellings owned by older people was relatively low: $9,296 for non-farm single detached dwellings owned by persons in the 65 to 69 year age group, and $8,399 for similar dwellings owned by persons 70 years and over, as compared with a national median of $11,021.

Older people, not fortunate enough to own their own homes, paid comparatively high rents: the average cash rent paid by tenant households whose head was 65 years of age or older was $64 in 1961, only slightly less than the national average of $65; and in five metropolitan areas (Montreal, Quebec, Ottawa, Sudbury and Saint John) the average rent paid by the aged exceeded the over-all average for the metropolitan area. Elderly women, despite their generally lower incomes, tended to pay substantially more for rental accommodation than elderly men.[2]

3. Housing Conditions

Whether older people own or rent the place they live in is less important than the actual quality of the accommodation and the availability of essential facilities. The following table throws light on this subject and provides a comparison with the housing conditions of the group aged 45 to 64. It is to be observed that the figures relate only to households, and, therefore, take no account of the situation of some 27 per cent of the older population, mostly single and widowed, who live with relatives or in rooming houses, and in many cases enjoy fewer amenities than those available to heads of households.

[1] According to DBS definitions, "a household constitutes all persons occupying the same dwelling regardless of relationship to the head. It may comprise one family, two or more families or no families. It may also consist of one person maintaining a separate dwelling."

SOURCE: 1961 Census

These figures make it clear that a substantial number of older people live in less than satisfactory accommodation and that housing conditions tend to deteriorate as age advances. Why this should be so is related, of course, to the question of income, actual and prospective, which has been examined in Chapters 2 and 9. Our present economic system links together the strength of an individual's bid for suitable housing with the amount of money he is in a position to devote to this type of expenditure, and as we have seen the older person in this competitive situation is at a distinct disadvantage. Not only is there a major drop in average and median income after age 65, but also a considerable part of this reduced income assumes the form of fairly fixed payments, such as pensions, government allowances and the like, which are all very sensitive to inflationary trends.

4. Marital Status

In 1961, out of the 1,391,000 elderly persons 757,000, or 54 per cent, were married and 634,000 were single, divorced or widowed.

For various reasons, the rate of separation is higher among the aged than in the younger age groups and one out of every ten married elderly persons did not live with his or her spouse. Of the 757,000 married elderly persons, therefore, only 684,000 were members of traditional, husband-wife families. Of the latter, 493,000 formed 246,000 families where both husband and wife were 65 years of age or older, while the remaining 191,000 elderly lived with a partner who was less than 65 years of age.

Of the 634,000 unmarried elderly persons, 421,000 or 67 percent were women. Due to the different life expectancy between the sexes the proportion of unmarried women is very high in the older age groups. In the 75 to 79 age class, for example, 67 percent of all women were unmarried and only two out of every ten women over the age of 80 were married.

B. Housing Standards for the Aged

Most conventional housing does not readily facilitate the adjustments in living patterns required of the aged because of their declining physical, social and financial capabilities. This section explores standards for the design of suitable housing agreements.

1. Design

Essentially, housing for the aged should provide a greater degree of convenience, comfort and safety and this can be achieved by applying these criteria to all aspects of housing, i.e., relationship to community facilities, microclimate and site development, general layout and space requirements, and the details of illumination, finishes, hardware and electrical and mechanical controls.

The most critical design areas are:

Approach to the Accommodation—stairs should be avoided and wheelchair access should be provided.

The Kitchen—storage should not be placed higher than 63″ above the floor, and an electric stove with controls at the front is recommended.

The Bathroom—provide non slip floors and surfaces in tub or shower, seating for bathing or showering, strong grab bars and towel rails, bathroom doors which can be unlocked from the outside in an emergency and a direct, well lit path between the bathroom and bed areas.

Large scale multiple housing schemes should include features such as intercom warning lights, buzzers or bells for emergencies, temperature control with design temperature of at least 75°, elevators in structures of two or more stories and these large enough to permit access for wheelchairs and stretchers, smoke and fire detection equipment and a means of emergency evacuation or protection in case of fire.

2. Community Planning

One main objective of any housing policy must be the provision of a wide range of facilities and locations meeting minimum standards at reasonable prices. This applies equally to housing for the aged; old people should have wide choice among types of living arrangement.

Group residential facilities, whether apartments or hostel types, have a place within the desirable spectrum of accommodation for the aged. Their siting raises complex economic (which we shall ignore here) and community planning problems. It is now commonly accepted that the aged should not be segregated into "gerontological preserves." The ideal rather is to locate them in normal residential neighbourhoods. We must keep in mind that the overall objective is to create for the aged as natural as possible a "social milieu" in which they can continue to function as individuals and as members of various social groups; the disappearance of the natural "social milieu" provided by the family renders this task at once more difficult and more urgent.[3]

Public transportation (recall that few aged have cars and fewer still may care to drive them) should be within walking distance. Community services and facilities should be easily reached, and include laundry, dry cleaning, shoe repair, barber shop, beauty parlor, restaurant, library, churches, movie theatres, clothing and drug stores, physicians and dentists. The site or the immediate area should offer space for outdoor activities; the nearby shops and services mentioned would at the same time provide areas of activity for the aged to enjoy. These various needs clearly bar cheap sites in remote or isolated areas, and in recently developed fringe areas where services are not already available.

Little can be said about housing structures themselves, as long as the design requirements mentioned above are met. No one type of construction is ideal: it should be possible to provide an esthetically pleasing variety of one-storey, garden-type and multi-storey structures. If hostel accommodation is contemplated, the size could range efficiently from 25 to 250 units, although a spread between 50 and 100 units is, probably, to be preferred. Where a central kitchen and minimum personal services are provided, economical operation is difficult in projects of less than 50 units, and as the number rises above 100, the friendly, homelike atmosphere, which is so desirable, tends to disappear.[4]

3. Ancillary Services[5]

Assuming that we intend to maximize the old person's opportunity for independent living, the following special services, in addition to those normally available to everyone (viz. hospital care), need to be provided in the vicinity of their homes.

—Financial: including access to a financial counselor;

—Personal: a short incapacity requires arrangements with friends or through volunteers for transportation and assistance in shopping; homemaker services, meals-on-wheels and laundry service can go a long way toward delaying the moment when institutional care becomes necessary;

—Health: home care program with services of visiting nurse;

—Personal adjustment and family life: help of competent case workers and counselors for older people and also for younger families with aging relatives;

—Employment and rehabilitation counselling;

—Promotion of activity and of participation: through adult education programs, senior citizens clubs, activity centers, hobby and handicraft groups, etc.

C. Demand for Housing for the Aged

Predicting housing demand is a most elusive task: the estimates mentioned here should, therefore, be taken with due caution as informed guesses based on the most recent evidence available.[6]

Of the 1961 total of 516,000 elderly families, it is estimated that 30 per cent to 35 per cent are experiencing difficulty in securing decent housing at reasonable cost. Some 50,000 of the families are thought to dwell in unsatisfactory conditions: overcrowded dwellings or units requiring major repairs. A further 130,000 families are probably straining their resources to achieve reasonably adequate accommodations. This larger group may find their housing problems considerably alleviated by increased social benefits, larger pensions, etc. But, as things stood in 1961, their economically derived housing difficulties must be accounted for in any comprehensive low-income housing analysis. We thus arrive at an estimated 180,000 elderly families with housing problems.

Some figure must also be included for single elderly persons in bad housing. In 1961 there were 235,000 elderly non-family households, of which we can say that 117,000 have housing difficulties. The number of unsatisfactory dwellings occupied by this group has been estimated at 20,000 units requiring major repairs and 5,000 where there is overcrowding.

We thus arrive at a rough figure of about 300,000 elderly family and non-family households which, in 1961, were experiencing difficulties in their housing situation. This estimate is confirmed by a statement made by R. Adamson, CMHC economist, before the Senate Committee on Aging: he estimated indeed that at least 400,000 elderly persons as of that date were in need of housing assistance.[7]

Looking to the future, we can say the elderly population of Canada is likely to grow by some 990,000 before 1980.[8] At the 1961 average of 1.86 persons per elderly household, these persons would form some 360,000 family and 170,000 non-family households, and assuming no change either in income benefits or in the general effectiveness of our housing system meanwhile, we can expect that by 1980 some 126,000 new family households will be added to the existing group with housing problems. Similarly, assuming a continuation of the present situation, and, as in the case of the families above, making no allowance for vacancies, 50 per cent of the 170,000 new, non-family households formed by 1980 will experience housing difficulties. We have thus a need of 85,000 units for these households.

[8] Estimates given in Table 4-4, Report of Royal Commission on Health Services, (based on net immigration of 50,000 annually), Vol. 1, pp. 114-5.

In this fashion, we reach a total figure of 211,000 new or converted dwelling units for old people needed by 1980, if the housing requirements of the forthcoming aged are to be met in accordance with decent standards; and, adding this to the earlier figure of 300,000 for the current group of ill-housed elderly, yields a grand total of 511,000. The task before us is, therefore, of considerable magnitude and we turn now to consider how best it may be accomplished through a combination of public and private initiative.

II What Is Being Done

A. The Federal Government

The National Housing Act—1954, which succeeded previous statutes dating back to the pre-war period, is entitled "An Act to Promote the Construction of New Houses, the Repair and Modernization of Existing Houses, and the Improvement of Housing and Living Conditions." Its general aim, as stated by Mr. Hignett, President of CMHC in January, 1965, is "to bring to an end the existence of sub-standard housing conditions in Canada."

The NHA with its subsequent amendments (substantial changes were introduced in 1964) contains no specific provisions for housing for the elderly; indeed, that expression does not appear in it. A collection of speeches by the late Dr. Stewart Bates, President of CMHC from 1954 to 1964, published in the CMHC-sponsored journal "HABITAT", is equally barren of references to the problems of housing for the aged. It is, therefore, safe to state (not necessarily to criticize) that Canada does not have a federal policy dealing specifically with the problem of housing for the elderly.

Nevertheless, the general provisions of the NHA have relevance to the issue at hand, inasmuch as they address themselves specifically to sub-standard housing. The special benefits provided by the Act are available to assist the elderly as long as they fall within the category of "low-income persons."

General assistance for housing is provided through the National Housing Act in the form of loan insurance, guarantees, direct loans by CMHC, joint Federal-Provincial projects and direct grants.

(1) Loan Insurance

Insurance of Loan Principal (see particularly Sections 6-13 inc. of NHA).

The NHA provides for the insurance of the full principal amount of loans made by approved lenders for new home-ownership and rental housing. The same insurance provision is made for existing dwellings in designated urban renewal areas. Approved lenders are private companies (chartered banks, life insurance, and trust and loan companies) authorized by the Government to make loans under the Act.

In the case of home-ownership dwellings, the maximum loan insurable is 95 per cent of the first $13,000 of the lending value of the property, plus 70 per cent of the remainder, up to an established ceiling amount of $18,000. For rental projects, the loan is 85 per cent of the lending value, subject to a maximum amount of $18,000 for houses and $12,000 for each self-contained family housing unit in apartment projects.

Insured loans from approved lenders are available to individual home-owner applicants, to builders constructing houses for sale or for rent, to rental investors, to co-operative housing associations and to farmers. There is no age limit as a qualification for these loans.

The interest rate on NHA loans is established by the Governor in Council and repayment terms vary from 25 to 35 years.

CMHC is authorized under Section 40 of the Act to make direct loans for home-ownership and rental housing where assistance is not available through the approved lenders. By policy, such loans are made to any eligible home-owner applicant but direct assistance to builders is generally subject to the pre-sale of the dwellings to satisfactory purchasers.

(2) Guarantees

Guaranteed Home Improvement Loans (Part IV, NHA)

Loans for home improvement purposes made by the chartered banks in accordance with the terms of the Act are guaranteed up to a maximum of $4,000 in the case of a one-family dwelling. For multiple-family projects, the maximum guarantee is $4,000 for the first dwelling unit plus $1,500 for each additional unit in the building.

The effects of home improvement loans on housing for the elderly are difficult to assess. Since 1955, when the Home Improvement Loans Program was inaugurated, 272,145 loans in an overall amount of $348.2 million have been approved. It is impossible, however, to ascertain how many of these were for the purpose of improving or generating housing for the aged. There was some decline in the number of NHA-guaranteed home improvement loans in 1964, with the banks approving 19,800 loans for a total value of $36 million. Despite the decrease in loan value from the 22,024 authorized in 1963, the total value of the loans approved was little changed.

Guarantee of Annual Returns (see Sections 14 and 15, NHA).

Private investors building rental housing projects of not less than eight units can be guaranteed a certain annual return from rentals for a maximum of 30 years.

These provisions designed to make such undertakings attractive to large investors, were introduced during the immediate postwar years. No new guarantees of this kind have been made under these Sections since 1954.

(3) Direct Loans for Low-Rental Projects (Sections 16 and 16A)

There are special categories of NHA loans which may be used by organizations wishing to provide accommodation for individuals and families of low-income including elderly persons.

Prior to the June, 1964, amendments to the Act, CMHC was authorized under Section 16 to make loans to limited-dividend companies to assist in the construction of low-rental housing projects or in the purchase of existing buildings and their conversion into a housing project for families of restricted income and for elderly persons.

These limited-dividend companies were incorporated to construct, hold and manage a low-rental housing project with dividends established by the terms of their charters or instruments of incorporation at five per cent per annum or less of the paid-up share capital. The majority of these projects were entrepreneur sponsored. However, loans were also made under this Section to non-profit organizations or municipalities which incorporated a non-profit company to construct, hold and manage low-rental housing projects. In these cases, the organizations were permitted to construct hostel or dormitory accommodation for elderly persons on the ratio of one hostel bed for each self-contained unit constructed.

The intent of the June, 1964, amendment, which added Section 16A to the Act, was to segregate these two classes of borrowers.

Loans under Sections 16 and 16A are now made as follows:

Section 16 To limited-dividend companies seeking a profit. Projects consist of self-contained units for families of low income.

Section 16A To non-profit corporations. Projects, in addition to self-contained units may consist of hostel or dormitory type or a combination of both types and are to be leased to individuals or families of low income. While the Act does not specifically use the term "elderly persons" it is permissible to construct housing projects for individuals or families classified as elderly persons.

Projects financed under Sections 16 and 16A are designed for individuals and families of low income who are not able to afford open market rents. Such projects for elderly persons are intended to provide accommodation to the following categories:

Self-Contained Accommodation

An ingoing tenant's gross annual income may not exceed $2,700 for a bachelor unit, and $3,600 for a one-bedroom unit.

Hostel or Dormitory Accommodation

This form of housing is reserved for persons who are unable to obtain suitable accommodation within their means. Priority is given, to the extent possible, to those having lower incomes.

NHA loans to limited-dividend housing corporations, as of the end of 1964, amounted to $186.7 million, out of a total CMHC loan portfolio of $1.9 billion.

(4) Direct Loans for Public Housing Projects (Sections 35C and 35D).

CMHC may make a loan to a province, or to a municipality or public housing agency with the approval of the province, to construct, acquire and operate a public housing project for low-income families and individuals.

A "public housing agency" is a corporation wholly owned by a provincial government or agency, one or more municipalities or a combination of these, having appropriate power to undertake public housing projects. A "public housing project" includes land and buildings providing family, hostel or dormitory type accommodation whether the buildings are new construction or existing housing.

The construction or acquisition loan may be up to 90 per cent of the total cost as determined by CMHC.

The term of the loan, which is secured by a first mortgage on the project, may be for as long as 50 years but not in excess of the useful life of the development.

Loans are also available to assist proponents of public housing projects to acquire land for future public housing projects. The maximum loan that may be made for this purpose is 90 per cent of the cost of acquiring and servicing the property. The period for repayment of the loan may be up to 15 years at an interest rate set by the Governor in Council.

(5) Grants for Operating Losses (Section 35E).

Whether or not a public housing project is undertaken with a loan under the National Housing Act, it may be eligible under Section 35E of the Act for Federal contributions to assist in meeting operating losses incurred. Grants may cover up to 50 per cent of operating losses for a period up to 50 years but not exceeding the useful life of the project.

Rents in public housing projects subsidized under Section 35E of the Act are based on the income of the tenants.

(6) Joint Federal-Provincial Public Housing Projects (Section 35A)

Partnership agreements between the Federal and Provincial Governments are authorized under the Act for the construction of public housing projects for low-income families and individuals, the sharing of operating losses and the assembly of land. The agreement also makes possible the acquisition, improvement and conversion for housing purposes of existing buildings in any area of a municipality. Projects are initiated by a municipality through the Province.

For Federal-Provincial public housing projects the Federal Government assumes up to 75 per cent of the capital cost of the project, the remainder being borne by the Provincial Government which may call upon the municipality to meet a portion of the provincial share.

Provision is made for the sharing of operating losses on the same basis as capital costs. The Federal Government shares up to 75 per cent and the Province up to 25 per cent, depending on the agreement with the municipality.

Rents in such public housing projects are geared to tenants' income through the application of a graduated rental scale. Minimum rentals may be imposed for welfare tenants whose shelter costs are paid from public money by the municipality.

In the period from 1950 to 1964, the number of dwelling units approved in public housing projects was 12,674 with the Federal share of actual expenditures amounting to $97.4 million. Of these units 1,366 are suitable for, but not necessarily occupied by, senior citizens.

It will be noted that low-rental housing projects call for a means test of sorts. Current policy requires that the monthly income of a prospective tenant be at least twice but not more than five times the monthly rent. In recently completed projects, the monthly rent for a one-bedroom unit was about $60, thus pre-supposing a minimum annual income of at least $1,440. We must recall that the median annual income of persons aged 65 and more, in 1961, was $1,440 for men, and $830 for women.

The 1964 amendments to the Act have eliminated some of the provisions most strenuously objected to in several Briefs submitted to the Senate Committee. In particular, hostel and dormitory facilities can now be provided and subsidized; the maximum value of loans has been considerably increased; the limitations in the "housing for the aged" component of public housing projects has been removed; and assistance is available for the purchase and transformation of existing buildings into housing projects, hostels or dormitories. Old houses themselves can now be rehabilitated with public assistance (85 per cent of the lending value) in designated urban renewal areas; since many elderly own deteriorated homes in contemplated urban renewal areas, this provision may come to have considerable relevance.

It is impossible to evaluate, even in a preliminary fashion, the impact of the 1964 amendments to the NHA, as far as housing for the aged is concerned. These changes, if successful, will remedy a situation which is not one of unmitigated success. Under Section 16 of the NHA, 8,217 units for the particular use of old people were built between 1946 and 1963; the public housing provision of the Act, for its part, lead to the construction of 167 units reserved for aged persons, and of 1,366 more classified by CMHC as "suitable for allocation to elderly persons." Assuming that the last units are all occupied by aged persons, we arrive at a grand total of 9,750 units provided for the aged through federal action in Canada, after 17 years of effort.

Whichever way one looks at the consequences of federal intervention, then, it is not easy to escape a feeling of inadequacy.

B. PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES

A survey of provincial action in the area of housing for the aged reveals a mixed pattern. A few provinces have special programs, but these tend essentially to supplement the felt shortcomings of the NHA. At the same time they leave the initiative at the local municipal level, without providing much active guidance or leadership.

(1) Provincial assistance for the construction of various forms of housing for the elderly include:

(i) Manitoba

Legislation provides capital grants as follows:
For self-contained units:
2-person unit—lesser of $\frac{1}{3}$ construction costs or $2,150 per unit.
1-person unit—lesser of $\frac{1}{3}$ construction costs or $1,700 per unit.
For hostels:
New construction—lesser of $\frac{1}{3}$ construction costs of $1,700 per bed.
Existing buildings—lesser of $\frac{1}{3}$ construction costs or $825 per bed.
Personal Care Homes—lesser of $\frac{1}{3}$ construction costs or $2,000 per bed.

(ii) British Columbia

Capital grants do not exceed one-third of the total cost of the project and the limited-dividend housing company must provide equity in amount of 10 per cent of the total.

(iii) Saskatchewan

A provincial grant of 20 per cent of the capital cost is available for the construction of approved projects. Annual maintenance grants to assist finance the operation of the projects are also given. CMHC loans do not exceed 72 per cent of cost by provincial request. The province requires the applicant to provide an equity of 8 per cent.

(iv) Ontario

(a) Elderly Persons Housing Aid Act

Grants in the Province of Ontario may be made only to a limited-dividend company which has had a loan made to it under the National Housing Act, 1954. The grants are calculated at the rate of $500 for each dwelling unit or 50 per cent of the costs in excess of the Corporations's loan, whichever is the lesser.

(b) The Housing Development Act

A grant made under this Act is not defined. The implementation of the Act is the responsibility of the Ontario Housing Corporation and no set formula has been set out, each case being treated on its merits. Grants have been made for rent reduction funds on some projects in the amount of $1,000 per unit, but these are not to be taken as precedents.

(c) Capital grants equal to 30 per cent of the cost or $1,500 per bed are available for hostels provided the municipality concerned gives a subsidy equal to 20 per cent of the cost.

(d) Capital grants of 25 per cent of the construction costs (or $5,000) are offered for community centres which can be used as clubs or day centres for the aged.

(v) New Brunswick

The Province will contribute 50 per cent or $2,000 per bed of the capital costs (including furniture) of a home for the aged. Two NHA-financed housing projects for elderly persons received provincial capital grants of $500 per unit but these were approved by the Premier's office and not by Legislature.

(vi) Nova Scotia

The province will contribute $500 per unit of housing accommodation or 10 per cent of the cost of the project, whichever is the lesser amount.

(vii) Prince Edward Island

Elderly persons' projects are constructed and owned by the Provincially-owned Senior Citizens Housing Corporation. The province provides the 10 per cent equity.

(viii) Newfoundland

Legislation permits the province to guarantee repayments of principal and interest on borrowings of non-profit companies constructing housing for elderly persons under the provision of Section 16A of the National Housing Act. In addition, by Order in Council, the province has made construction grants but these are not defined and amounts vary.

(2) Provincial grants are made to non-profit corporations, religious, charitable or philanthropic organizations, or to municipalities.

(3) Most provinces appear to have licensing bodies which supervise privately or commercially-sponsored homes for the aged. These bodies are usually part of the provincial welfare department. Several provinces (British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec and Newfoundland) pay subsidies to boarding homes which accept aged persons of limited means.

(4) Only Manitoba has, within its Welfare Department, a senior officer entrusted with the specific duty of assisting local governments and local voluntary organizations in providing adequate housing for the aged. The effect of this has been striking: from 1955 to 1959, twelve housing projects for the aged were built in Manitoba; since 1960, when the post of Director of Elderly Persons Housing was created, fifty-six projects have been built, providing some 2,800 accommodations at a cost to the province of $3 million.

(5) The impact of provincial policies is difficult to measure since they are directed to supplementing federal assistance rather than to generating additional projects. British Columbia, for instance, has subsidized the establishment of 4,000 beds; in Saskatchewan the government has contributed to 48 projects in 40 municipalities, providing 1,087 dwellings for couples and 259 bachelor suites; in New Brunswick, one low-rental housing project has been built so far and three more are under way; in Prince Edward Island, four units have been constructed by the government sponsored Senior Citizens Housing Corporation, and eight more are being built; in Nova Scotia, the government assisted Halifax Senior Citizens Housing Corporation and is about to build a 63-unit project, the second housing for the aged project to be undertaken in that province.

In general, the net effect of federal and provincial policies in the area of housing for the aged has been to pass the burden on to the poorest and most hard-pressed level of government in this country: the municipalities, assisted by those voluntary organizations active at the local level. Theirs has been the task of awakening and maintaining community interest, of gathering the initial capital, of finding architects, builders and specialized personnel, of acquainting themselves with the complexities of the relevant legislations and bureaucracies. They have had to initiate and carry out often protracted negotiations with distant provincial and federal offices, to guarantee the administration of the completed projects and to meet the deficits, if any, that could materialize. It is a tribute to the public-spiritedness of many Canadians that so much has been done against such odds, even if much more still remains to be accomplished.[9]

C. The Private Sector

Private efforts, in the area of housing for the aged, are not easy to document. Non-profit organizations have tended to avail themselves of the NHA facilities and have, therefore, been covered. For instance, of the 8,217 limited-dividend units built for the elderly with NHA assistance, 1,017 were constructed by private entrepreneurs and 3,716 by charitable organizations.

---

[9] Ottawa Welfare Council, brief submitted to the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging, July 2, 1964, No. 14. (Read the evidence, as well as the brief.)

Unfortunately, there are no reliable and comprehensive data concerning profit-oriented "homes for the aged" and related institutions. Indeed, general disorganization appears to characterize this field in Canada, and we might hope that something will be learned from the Ford Foundation-supported efforts to establish, in the U.S.A., a national organization of owners and operators of homes for the aged. There seems to be no ground to assume, however, that private efforts are any more successful than public ones, even where they are carefully supervised by provincial bodies.

Conclusions

I Basic Philosophy

Society has a responsibility to see to it that every Canadian has decent shelter, and especially those who have toiled in the community for many years, and have reached an age where our social system no longer permits them to find through their own work the resources needed to secure adequate shelter.

An important goal of any housing policy must be to include a wide spectrum of accommodation and of location, so that the elderly person may be enabled to make the selection which is best adapted to his means and inclinations.

Another goal must be the maximation of personal responsibility, the minimization of state intervention, and the provision of the widest possible spectrum of complete independence—complete dependence facilities, so that the aged be not obliged to choose between "either-or" facilities.

Concurrently, a housing policy must be operative before the elderly person exhausts his own limited resources, becomes destitute, and is obliged to live as a ward of the state. Similarly, a housing policy must respond to the needs of the middle-income aged as well as to those of the poor.

Whenever the aged person has to be placed in an institutionalized housing arrangement, care must be taken to provide him with an adequate social "milieu" or "substitute family" to replace as far as possible the one he has lost.

II The Role of Government

The overriding concept should be that of a dynamic partnership among the three levels of government, each concentrating on that aspect which it is particularly equipped to carry out successfully. The following is an attempt at articulating such a partnership:

The Federal Government has vast resources and wide redistributive powers. Its primary responsibility in the area which concerns us here should be that of the banker of funds, of ideas, and of technical assistance, rather than that of the originator of detailed housing programs. It should, therefore, ensure that adequate funds and expertise are available and that minimum needs do not go unsatisfied for lack of resources.

It must always be remembered that the housing needs of the low-income aged are not substantially different from those of other low-income persons. To the extent that the aged need less extensive quarters, they are, indeed, less expensive to house than younger low-income families. There seems to be little justification, then, for the creation, at the federal level, of a bureau or agency specifically concerned with housing for the elderly. An effective and well-conceived general low income housing policy, if energetically implemented, will meet the legitimate housing needs of the low-income aged; it is doubtful whether any other approach can be successful.

A strong argument can be made that the National Housing Act has so far benefitted mainly the younger Canadian middle-class. The conditions which may have justified such a policy in the immediate post-war period are now largely over. The important resources and knowledge available within CMHC must urgently be redirected to that area which only the Corporation can tackle: low income housing for Canadians who need it. It would seem that the insurance companies, the trust companies and the banks—especially in view of the recent amendments to the Bank Act—can now very adequately respond to the mortgage needs of the young middle-class heads of family and are indeed doing so. The important money-management functions provided through the NHA can for the future be achieved in other ways, freeing CMHC for the tasks which it alone can undertake and carry out successfully.

The fact that the Federal Government would be playing the role of the banker of ideas and funds does not mean that it should take a passive attitude, quite the contrary. It must market aggressively the moneys and concepts at hand, within its constitutional prerogative. The current efforts of CMHC in the area of urban renewal indicates that an active stance can be taken, even if concrete initiative must, in the last analysis, come from elsewhere.

Provincial Governments, under the constitution, are responsible for welfare; they have the clear duty to formulate programs of concrete action in the area of housing for the aged. These programs are, basically, of two equally important kinds.

1. Physical Shelter

In close co-operation with local municipal agencies, the provincial agency concerned with low-income housing should make a survey of current housing conditions of the aged and of available private boarding and other homes for the aged. Consequent to this survey, it should establish and enforce strict regulations concerning the design and operation of these homes, and formulate a program of action which would effectively provide, within a reasonable time period and according to a specified order of priorities, adequate shelter for its aged in accordance with the basic philosophy sketched earlier. It should co-operate at all stages with relevant municipal and voluntary organizations and advise them on the steps to be taken to reach the stated goals; in particular, provincial grants should reduce to no more than a token amount the capital funds needed at the local level to secure NHA assistance, and cover as well all operating deficits not met under NHA. The provincial agency concerned, about which more later, would be responsible for low-income housing generally; its program of low-income housing for the elderly would thus be integrated within a broader one. This appears preferable to an independent venture by a specialized "housing for the aged" agency and can be accomplished through a semi-autonomous "provincial housing corporation" or through a regular government department.

2. Ancillary Services

A vast majority of the aged wants to remain in independent quarters and to postpone to the utmost entry into institutions. Considerable housing flexibility, and capital economies as well, will be achieved if services aimed at enabling the aged to remain comfortably in their current remodeled private homes are provided on a sufficient scale. These services have been mentioned earlier under I.B. 3. The fluidity of the needs of the aged, which often vary from year to year and from month to month, renders such ancillary services of the utmost importance.

It should be the responsibility of the provincial low-income housing agency to negotiate, on its own behalf and on that of the municipalities and/or voluntary organizations, with competent federal departments and agencies. This would ensure co-ordination of efforts within each province, implementation of the overall provincial housing plan, development of expertise within the provincial housing agency, and effective communication with the federal authorities. The advisability of setting-up a structure similar to that of ARDA, with provincial co-ordinators at the center of the whole structure, might well be considered.

Within the framework of the provincially elaborated plan for low-income housing, municipalities should be expected to evolve detailed and concrete plans for the provision of adequate shelter for the aged and of ancillary services in their communities. The administration of low-income housing (and of its housing-for-the-aged component) could be entrusted to either provincial or municipal officers; that of ancillary services would be left to the municipal authorities and local welfare agencies.[10]

[10] See Chapter 6, Recommendation 65.

To the extent that housing for the aged becomes recognized as a normal community service, the pioneering role of voluntary organizations will have achieved its purpose. Eventually, it is expected that local government rather than voluntary or charitable bodies would initiate action in this field, thus freeing the latter groups for new ventures in unopened areas.[11]

We must beware here of transplanting talis qualis and without the most careful evaluation certain ways of organizing specialized services, especially in the area of housing, which may have proved necessary in the U.S.A. The American tradition of strong local autonomy is grounded in neither Canadian law nor practice, and the creation of local semi-independent Housing Authorities appears neither necessary nor desirable. Whatever offices or agencies have to be created here should be branches of provincial or municipal departments or bodies. The financial participation of the provincial government, supplementing NHA funds, should, furthermore, eliminate the need for special borrowing at the local level in support of housing for the aged or, for that matter, of low-income housing in general.

The above proposals deal mostly with the creation of a co-ordinated federal-provincial-municipal structure in the area of housing for the aged. It is believed that without such a structure the present checkered and depressing situation will not be improved and, that, on the other hand, the kind of structure proposed is particularly adapted to the dynamic partnership which alone can solve the immense problem before us.

The Case for Community Services

This Chapter will be concerned with the contribution that can be made to the health and well-being of the elderly by that broad range of programs which, together with social security and health programs, constitute the social services of the modern community. Specifically we shall consider:

(1) Services in a variety of forms offered on an individual basis. Such services may be aimed at helping the older person to cope with his physical environment (e.g. housekeeping), to overcome his loneliness and isolation (e.g. friendly visiting), or to solve problems of social adjustment (e.g. casework).

(2) Services offered on a group basis. These services have as their object helping older people (a) to enjoy their leisure time; (b) to develop personally, and (c) to deal with their problems or needs. Services of this second type may extend from relatively simple and unsophisticated programs of entertainment and social activity to the conscious use of the group process to achieve specified therapeutic goals.

[11] Brief of Ottawa Welfare Council, op. cit., pp. 936-8.

There were few submissions to the Committee which did not stress the importance of one or more community services as a means of ensuring that "older persons may continue to live healthy and useful lives as members of the Canadian community."[1]

The Committee is aware, of course, that the rapid growth of Canada during the post-war years, and the far-reaching social changes accompanying it have created serious social problems for all age groups. Nevertheless, the weight of opinion submitted to the Committee has led it inevitably to the conclusion that the development of an adequate network of community services for the elderly must be one of the major objects of social policy in the years ahead. Without the types of services discussed in this chapter, efforts to sustain an active and healthy older population through the provision of income, housing and health care can be seriously frustrated. The substantial investment of resources we are now making in these major health and welfare programs requires a growing investment also in community services, if maximum returns from the former are to be secured. The development of community services, therefore, must engage the attention, not only of private agencies, where responsibility for many of them has rested historically, but also of government at all levels.

Need For Community Services

The need for community services by the older group is associated to a considerable degree with socio-economic changes of relatively recent origin, some of which have had perhaps a greater impact on older people than on society as a whole.

(1) Increase in Life Expectancy

Many more people today than formerly survive to retirement and beyond, which focuses attention on existing social arrangements for the well-being of old people. A major problem is created by the dependence and ill-health that are likely to occur in the later years. How best can the care the elderly require under these conditions be provided?

In several Western European countries, faced as they are with larger "geriatric" populations than Canada, programs which enable older people to carry on in their own homes are well developed. In Canada the idea of the "community service" or "non-institutional" approach, although commonly accepted, is not yet widely put into practice. Community services do more than keep people out of institutions. Experience has demonstrated that the pathological aspects of the aging process can be significantly reduced, prevented or postponed by the imaginative use of various resources at appropriate or critical times in the individual's life. Social planners should take this fact into account.

[1] Order of reference, "Special Committee of the Senate on Aging".

Adequate income and shelter are, of course, essential to the maintenance of health and well-being, but so also are opportunities for personal development and a meaningful way of life. The Committee agrees with the many submissions which contend that the later years should not be given over to rocking chairs and memories. Community services can help immeasurably to prevent the narrowing and eroding of the psychological and social environment in old age.

(2) Changes in Family Life

Industrial society has brought important changes in family structure and family relations. Instead of living together as was not uncommon in an earlier period, parents and grown children today usually maintain separate households, often in communities that may be a thousand miles apart. The Committee heard reports of neglect and sometimes actual exploitation of older parents by their children, but the overwhelming evidence was on the other side and suggested rather support and devotion, often to the point of sacrifice. There is still much rich intergenerational life.

Nevertheless, it appears to be true that the expectations of the elderly, their children and society generally have altered considerably over recent decades. Most older people at the present time do not wish to be dependent on their children, or even to live with them; and society for the most part emphasizes the family's responsibility for the rearing of the young rather than the care of the old.

Today family relationships between old and young are marked by ambiguity. Adult children and their parents are frequently uncertain and confused as to what is right. This situation can lead to neglect of older people, albeit unwitting, or to undue protectiveness. The churches and other bodies concerned with family relations and social values have an opportunity and a special responsibility here.

The Committee is of the opinion that it would not be realistic in the modern world to look to the family alone to provide emotional support and care for the aged. Unquestionably, the family is still a major resource, but where it cannot function in these regards, help from the community should be available. Moreover, it is one of the main objects of community services to help the family perform its functions. For example,* life in the home is eased if the grandmother has outside interests; and clearly a family looking after an aged relative who requires constant care, could cope more readily if help were available to give occasional relief.

(3) Living Arrangements

Statistics on the marital status and living arrangements of older people provide striking evidence of the need there is for community services. These reveal the extent of widowhood and the considerable proportion of older people of both sexes who live alone, lacking the support that home and family normally provide. Studies show the close relationship which exists between marital status and dependency; indeed a large part of the aging problem in modern society is a consequence of dependent widowhood. As already indicated, a significant proportion of elderly people live alone. When domiciliary aloneness is coupled with friendlessness, with infirmity and perhaps poverty, unhappiness and suffering can be expected. A primary aim of community services is to prevent or alleviate such situations.

* With increased longevity and early marriage, the modern family "system" as pointed out by Peter Townsend and others, is becoming one of four generations with marked effects on the pattern of kinship relations and responsibility. In the future the old people most in need of care and support may well be great grand-parents with children in their sixties.

A Review of the Present Situation

A comprehensive and up-to-date inventory of community and other services for the aged in Canada is not at present available. However, a review of such material as does exist reveals an uneven pattern of development and also a variety of approaches.

In a few communities a specialized agency has been created to plan and provide a variety of services for older people. The Age and Opportunity Bureau in Winnipeg and the Silver Threads Service in Victoria illustrate this approach. More usually a particular service or facility is specifically designed for the aged, examples of which are senior citizen clubs and centres, friendly visiting and "meals-on-wheels". Casework and home-maker services for older people are apt to develop as extensions of an already existing program. Regardless of the approach, the services available remain limited, as suggested by the following statement from the brief of the Canadian Association of Social Workers:

> ". . . . Few of its (C.A.S.W.) members are engaged solely in work with older people, which in itself, suggests the community neglect of this group. But many members are acutely aware of serious problems facing the aged, through their work in family agencies, social service departments of hospitals, mental health clinics, public assistance programs, information and service bureaus, group work and recreational centres, liaison with health services, visiting homemaker services and housing, and through sharing in the planning and coordinating efforts of welfare councils."

By and large the community services that do exist were initiated through the efforts of voluntary groups. In several provinces, however, Government financial support is available for certain services, notably recreation. Common to many submissions made to us was a call for more government action.

There is urgent need for the further development of services in both urban and rural areas. General community services, upon which services to the aged could be built, are already to be found in many cities. In rural areas, however, this foundation may not exist. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture pointed up the need that exists for social programs for older people in rural areas. Other briefs, also, brought to our attention the problems faced by elderly people living in the country removed from community facilities and services.

(1) Information and Referral Services

One type of community service advocated by a great many organizations is an information and referral centre. Such a centre where one can get a sympathetic hearing, information and advice, and where necessary referral to an appropriate community resource, is needed by people of all ages. It is especially important for older people, who often suffer needlessly through lack of knowledge about help that is available in the community and where it may be had. The elderly have neither the energy nor the means of transportation to run around from one agency to another.

(2) Counselling and Casework Services

Counselling is a service that should be more readily available to old people and their relatives. It may relate to very practical matters, such as budgeting or finding a place to live. It may provide skilful help when there are difficulties in family relations, or a supporting relationship for the lonely, discouraged or bereaved. For serious problems of emotional disturbance professional service from a caseworker or psychiatrist will be required. Counselling is recognized as an important element in the after-care of patients discharged from hospitals.

Family casework agencies, although limited in number, are an important resource on which old people can draw for help with their personal problems. A counselling service has also a place in the programs of day care centres for older people; the Notre Dame Centre in Winnipeg is a case in point. Also public welfare agencies, in some instances and in varying degrees, counsel those in receipt of financial benefit. It is the hope of the Committee that public welfare authorities generally will pay increased attention to this function in the years ahead. Because the need for counselling and casework is often associated with illness and hospitalization, a social service department is a necessary feature of a hospital program. At the present time, however, only a small proportion of hospitals has such departments.

In many communities, both urban and rural, it is the public health nurse to whom many old people turn for advice on their problems. Her primary responsibility is for health guidance, but problems of health are difficult to separate from problems of financial need, housing or loneliness. Greater account should be taken of this fact in the training of nurses.

There is evidence that although the elderly welcome help with immediate practical problems, they are less aware of the value of professional counselling or casework. Perhaps, as suggested by one family agency, there needs to be some modification in customary social work procedures, allowing more time in interviews, for example, and reaching out to old people rather than expecting them to come to the agency. There has been a suggestion that counselling and casework services could be most effectively provided in familiar settings, such as a church or a senior citizen centre.

(3) Guardianship, Protection and Legal Aid

Reference was made by several organizations to the need for some form of protection for older people who are not able to handle their own affairs or who may be exploited by others.

The Old Age Security and Old Age Assistance Acts both have provisions for trusteeship when this is absolutely necessary, and both Acts prohibit the assignment of the pension or allowance. These provisions, however, apply only to that portion of income which the allowance represents. The Department of Veterans Affairs, also, has power to administer a War Veteran's Allowance when this is necessary. In some provinces guardianship can be obtained by application to the Courts but this is a lengthy and costly procedure.

What appears to be required are legal arrangements whereby some public or private agency could assume responsibility for the protection and, if necessary, the guardianship of elderly people, such responsibility to pertain to the estate, the person, or both. This would, of course, require legislative action. It is a complicated matter involving the rights of the subject and little study has been given to it in Canada. The matter will become of increasing importance with the inauguration of the Canada Pension Plan.

Legal aid and legal counselling are needed frequently by elderly people who cannot afford to pay for it. The answer would seem to be the development of a system of legal aid for low income people generally.

(4) Homemaker Services

A visiting homemaker service provides trained and experienced personnel to assist elderly people, particularly the frail or disabled, with household tasks and, where necessary, with personal care. It may also bring relief to those who have continuing responsibility for the care of those who are sick and infirm. During periods of temporary illness a homemaker can help maintain a household and thus enable an old person to remain at home, who otherwise might have to go to an institution.

What is most frequently required by the elderly is part-time homemaker service. The homemaker may visit an old person one or more times a week for two or three hours on each occasion. The service may consist merely of taking over simple "housekeeping" tasks but, in other cases, under skilful supervision it may become a professional social service. In many cases the friendly approach is all that is required.

Homemaker services, generally speaking, are not widely available in Canada. They are most extensively developed in the Province of Ontario.[2] In the main the service offered is an emergency one, to families with children during the illness or absence of the mother, but limited staff and financial resources make it impossible to meet the demands of even this group. In consequence, homemaker agencies have found it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to extend or adapt their programs to include old people.

[2] See Report on Homemaker Service in Ontario, Ontario Welfare Council, February 1964. This report points out (p. 42) that the elderly and chronically ill are the groups most seriously affected by the lack of available resources.

Some impetus to the expansion of homemaker service has been given by the provision of public funds. In Ontario, the province, under the Homemaker and Nurses Services Act of 1958, will share with the municipality, up to a specified limit, one-half the cost of providing homemaker services to families with children, the elderly and the chronically ill, if they are on public assistance or fall below an income level determined by the municipality. The municipality may provide the service itself or contract for service with an approved voluntary organization. Since this legislation came into effect, there has been a moderate increase of homemaker services in the province. Our understanding is that many municipalities for reasons of cost are reluctant to take full advantage of the provisions of the Act.

(5) Other Home Services

Prominent among these are visiting nursing and organized home care (discussed in Chapters 4 and 11), "meals-on-wheels", friendly visiting and a variety of neighbourly services.

Meals-on-Wheels

The delivery of hot meals to older people, who are unable to cook properly for themselves, is a type of program that has been developed extensively in some European countries and in a number of American communities. The meals are prepared in a community centre, a church or other facility and are delivered in heat-retaining containers by a corps of volunteers This service is recognized as having value in preventing malnutrition, but it has psychological and social benefits as well.

A number of organizations have strongly recommended the initiation of programs of meals-on-wheels, but the Committee knows of only one such program in Canada at the present time, that operated in Brantford, Ontario, by the Red Cross and the I.O.D.E.[3] It should be noted, however, that there are alternative ways of meeting nutritional needs. For older people able to go out it might be better to provide meals in places where they congregate, as at centres and clubs or churches. The meals provided daily at the Women's Sheltered Workshop in Toronto, and at the Good Companions in Ottawa, are illustrations of this approach. The purchase of meals for home delivery from restaurants or commercial caterers constitutes another possibility.

[3] In April 1965, a Meals-on-Wheels program was inaugurated in Winnipeg for a three-year trial period (Canadian Welfare July-August 1965 p. 190); and in October, 1965 a similar program, offering a five days a week service, was launched in Toronto.

Friendly Visiting

When used with reference to community services the term "friendly visiting" denotes an organized program in which volunteers, on a regular basis, visit socially isolated old people, perform neighbourly services for them and encourage as normal a pattern of life as possible. The program can be organized and sponsored in a number of ways. It may be undertaken by volunteers through a church group, a service club, a community visiting committee or by members of an old people's club or centre. It may also be offered as a service under professional supervision by Public Welfare departments, family agencies, or by various health agencies. Friendly visiting need not, of course, be confined to the aged; it is a recognized service for shut-ins or the handicapped of all ages.

No matter how the program is organized, there is agreement that in order to ensure stability, continuity and sensitive approach, there must be careful selection and training of volunteers, thoughtful matching of visitor and visitee, a commitment by the volunteer to visit regularly for a prolonged period of time, and as well a ready channel to other community services when required. Reports received by the Committee indicate that a number of local welfare councils and social agencies, such as the Red Cross in Ontario and the Age and Opportunity Bureau in Winnipeg, provide systematic training to interested volunteers.

Neighbourly Services

During its hearings the Committee was informed of various other forms of neighbourly activity provided in response to the limited mobility of older people. These include regular transportation to a clinic, a club or to church; assistance with laundry and shopping; the delivery and return of library books; help around the house and property with tasks like snow shovelling, grass cutting, or putting up screens; or it may be a phone call to a shut-in older person at a certain time each day to make sure that "everything is all right". In some communities there is provision for a sheltered workshop or similar agency to deliver work to shut-ins at home.

All of these neighbourly services, apart from their immediate value, have the further advantage of maintaining communication with the old person, keeping him in touch with the community and lessening his possible feeling of being neglected. Moreover they offer to many volunteers the opportunity they desire to be of direct help to an older person.

(6) Leisure Time Services

In Canada, during the past decade or so there has been a wide-spread development under varying auspices of leisure time programs for the elderly. These programs offer social contacts and activities to replace those that were formerly centred in work, child rearing and family life, or that have been lost through the removal or death of relatives and friends. By alleviating boredom, isolation and anxiety, they help to maintain the physical and mental health of the older person.

Senior Citizen Centres

In many Canadian communities special centres for the elderly have been established. Some are operated by volunteer groups with financial support from the local United fund. The Silver Threads Centre in Victoria, the Good Companions in Ottawa and the Second Mile Club in Toronto are illustrations. Others are joint public-private projects like the Notre Dame Centre in Winnipeg. Sometimes, as in the Ontario communities of London, Scarborough and North York, centres are operated by the public recreation authorities.

Generally, senior citizen centres offer varied social and, less often, educational and cultural programs. Some include as well a meal service and counselling on personal problems. The aim throughout is to further the well-being of old people; to assist in their rehabilitation where this is necessary; and to encourage their active participation in the affairs of the centre and in the life of the community.

Senior citizen centres frequently require substantial capital investment. Ontario, through the Elderly Persons Social and Recreational Centres Act of 1962, provides for a provincial grant to meet 30 per cent of the cost of building or converting premises for use as a centre, if the local municipality will assume 20 per cent of the cost. This is the first legislation of its kind in Canada. It is understood also that the Province of Manitoba will make capital grants or loans in aid of senior citizen centres.[4] The government of British Columbia assists the establishment of community centres for the general population through capital grants of one-third the cost, and encourages such centres to make provision for senior citizens.

It is important to note the possibility that exists for the use of federal funds in the development of recreation programs for older people, in the Fitness and Amateur Sports Act of 1961. This Act was designed to promote fitness in all age groups. The Department of National Health and Welfare reported to the Committee that while considerable emphasis is naturally placed on the encouragement of recreational pursuits on the part of youth, recreational programs for older people can also be assisted.[5] Under the Act the Federal Government assists the provinces in carrying out projects by reimbursing them 60 per cent of the costs and under this provision, to give one example, leaders and instructors of different kinds can be trained and provided for group recreational activities for the aged. Research on fitness in the later years can also be financed under the Act.

Senior Citizens Clubs

These clubs, which meet at specified times for various informal activities or the furthering of common interests, are to be found in many Canadian communities. Some clubs have been formed by elderly citizens themselves, independent of any sponsoring organization; others, as in the Western provinces, have been initiated by Pensioners' Associations. They are also sponsored by church groups, service clubs or other community organizations. In some communities the initiative is taken by the local public recreation authority or by a voluntary recreation, welfare or health agency. There is now evidence that to an increasing degree large business firms are providing social programs for their retired employees, and in some industries the labor union assists or encourages its locals to establish programs for retired members. These latter two developments impress us as particularly promising, having in mind the importance of work experience and work contacts in the life pattern of many retired people.

Adult Education in the Later Years[6]

The importance of continuing education was stressed by several organizations and experts appearing before the Committee. Indeed in the years ahead, as the physical and material needs of old age are more completely met, the intellectual and social needs will increasingly engage our attention.

At the present time active participation by the elderly, in organized educational programs, is extremely limited.[7] This, no doubt, is related in part to the educational levels and experience of the present generation of older people,[8] but certainly not much effort has been made to encourage their participation in educational programs. Apart from what may be offered in centres or clubs, there are few if any programs of continuing adult education in Canada designed specifically for older people. Urban communities do provide opportunities for educational and cultural pursuits of which older people may take advantage: evening courses offered by Boards of Education, adult programs of recreation departments, University Extension courses, the programs of libraries, museums and art galleries come immediately to mind. Some of these are free or cost very little, but others like University Extension courses may be beyond the financial means of the old people interested.

It was suggested by one expert witness that because of lack of education, or fear of failure, many older people may do well only in special classes or activities planned with their capacities and interests especially in mind. Declining ability to learn,[9] he said, is not the problem.

[7] Old people, of course, get considerable educational stimulus and recreational satisfaction from television and radio. The notable contribution made by these media is referred to in Chapter 14.

[8] According to the 1961 Census 63 per cent of the population aged 65 and over had elementary school education or less. However, nearly 14 per cent were high school graduates or better.

Day Care Centres

Clubs and centres and adult education programs as described above serve primarily the active and more or less socially adequate person. There are, however, those who need special encouragement, assistance or a rehabilitative program. The physically or mentally disabled, those who are withdrawn, depressed or anxious, it has been found in many instances, can be maintained in the community through day care centres with therapeutic aims. Such centres may include in their program sheltered employment or other forms of meaningful activity, the provision of meals, health care and individualized personal services. They are regarded by hospital and mental health authorities as an important resource for patients after discharge from hospital.

A fully rounded day care centre is, in a sense, an institution without beds, although it might appropriately be located in a home for the aged. The day care program of the Jewish Home for the Aged, in Toronto, is an example. The senior citizen centres, described earlier, could very well incorporate in their programs at least some elements of day care as here outlined. In fact, a hard and fast line cannot be drawn between senior citizen centres and day care centres.

It is our conviction that day care centres, although not perhaps feasible in smaller places, should be established in all urban communities. Affiliated with them, or under separate auspices, there should be provision for sheltered employment and for a carefully supervised foster home program for the elderly.

Community Services Abroad

A number of countries in Western Europe have had earlier and longer experience than Canada in dealing with the needs of the aged. In the course of its investigation the Committee has attempted, on the basis of the literature, to familiarize itself with this experience, which has been helpful to us in assessing our own situation in Canada and in determining directions for future development. Space does not permit any detailed account of our findings, but, perhaps, a few brief remarks may help to set our Canadian experience in perspective.

First, it should be said that the aging of the population in Western European countries has been more extreme than in Canada. Secondly, basic programs for social security in old age were established somewhat earlier in most of these countries. Thirdly, centralized political structures permit more ready planning and development of services on a national basis.

[9] On the whole subject of continuing education for old people see the testimony of Dr. Roby Kidd, (Proceedings No. 5, Nov. 21, 1963) and the brief of the Canadian Association for Adult Education, (Proceedings No. 18, Oct. 22, 1964).

Given these factors it is not surprising that the development of community service, particularly in north western European countries, is in some respects more advanced than in Canada. This applies, particularly, to care and help in the home. Home-helps or homemaker services are much more broadly available in England, the Netherlands and the Scandinavian countries. National and local public authorities are more involved in both the financing and the operation of services. Thus in the United Kingdom home-help is available through all County and County Borough Councils. Charge for service is based on the ability to pay. Those who cannot pay receive free service, the cost being borne by the local authority.

A number of countries have also developed comparatively extensive meal services. These include meals-on-wheels, lunch clubs or reduced rates for meals in restaurants and government-owned cafeterias. Programs of meals-on-wheels under varied sponsorship, which may be public or voluntary, are well established in the United Kingdom and Sweden. Some government support of meals-on-wheels is provided in Australia and New Zealand.

As in Canada, recreational programs abroad are a prominent feature of older peoples clubs and centres. In the United Kingdom local authorities may contribute to voluntary agencies providing recreation or meals. Organized personal services, like chiropody and hair-dressing, are available in a number of European countries.

Community services in the United Kingdom are notable for the variety of supportive services that have been developed by local old people's welfare committees. Among these is a "sitter-in" service, to bring relief to families caring for sick or confused old people who cannot be left alone for long periods. Another feature is a good neighbour service, with the backing of an organization, carried by persons living nearby who call regularly and are prepared to do regular light duties. Both sitters-in and good neighbours are usually paid.

Experience in the United States

No brief account could do justice to the very great attention that has been paid to the needs of the aged in the United States and to the many efforts of local communities to expand or initiate services.

Increasingly, however, government funds from federal and state levels have become available to local public or voluntary agencies. Federal public welfare legislation, for example, provides for federal sharing with state governments in the cost of certain community services for public assistance recipients. Grants in aid of demonstration programs are also available under several programs administered by the National Institutes of Health of the U.S. Public Health Service. Many states have established special bodies, such as State Commissions on Aging, that are playing a leading role. They undertake studies, make grants in support of local services, offer an information and consultant service, and in some instances initiate state-wide programs.

New York State has particularly well developed programs for old people in the areas of education, recreation, pre-retirement planning and "post-retirement activities". Local governments and Boards of Education are encouraged to provide such programs, for which they receive consultative services, materials and financial assistance from the State Level. Mrs. Henrietta F. Rabe, Supervisor of Education for Aging in the State Education Department, described these programs for us in a letter as follows:

> "During the past year, (1963), 104 school districts in New York State (not including New York City) operated 401 classes for retired persons, with a registration of 17,963. Most of these classes were offered during the day and are an integral part of senior citizen clubs and day centre programs, which were organized under public school adult education and provided with over all leadership . . . . subjects include public affairs, languages, music instrumentation, painting, the crafts, health education, Great Books discussion, etc.
> "In addition to public school education, the State Education Department administers state aid for approved municipal programs of recreation for the elderly. By co-ordinating education and recreation, we in the Education Department are able to bring about genuine cooperation between the public school and local government in the development of education-recreational programs for older persons."

Some of the larger urban centres in the United States have also developed noteworthy programs. The services offered by the New York City Department of Welfare, for example, include recreation centres, homemaker services, foster home care and rehabilitation counselling.

A Proposed Pattern of Community Services

From the many submissions received by the Committee, from the testimony of expert witnesses and from the extensive literature on the subject there emerges with some clarity, at least in its broad outlines, the pattern of community services for older people which ideally should obtain in all Canadian communities. Clearly, the pattern cannot be developed over night. Serious problems of financial resources and personnel must be overcome in the years ahead. We need, however, a goal toward which our efforts can be directed, and the Committee would propose the following as such a goal:

(1) In every community, rural or urban, there should be an information and referral service for older people and their families. Depending on circumstances, this service might be located in a welfare council, the local welfare authority, the public health authority, or the family agency. In metropolitan areas there is much to be said for distributing information centres on a district basis throughout the community. The service need not be designed, nor perhaps should it be, for older people only. People of all ages may require information and referral services.

(2) In every community there should be available the variety of services which would permit an older person to remain in the familiar environment of his own home with the maximum of comfort and security, and render possible his return from health institutions as soon as possible. Among these services, the most urgently needed is that which might be provided by full or part-time homemakers. Existing homemaker agencies should extend service to older people, and where they do not exist, other auspices for the provision of such service should be found; the local public welfare or health authority, a visiting nurse organization, or a senior citizen centre are all possibilities. Homemaker services should be buttressed by meal services, friendly visiting and other forms of practical and neighbourly help. They must be closely co-ordinated with counselling services and with community health services and institutions, particularly hospitals. Administrative provision should be made for the integration of the various home-help services.[10]

(3) Counselling and casework services for the elderly should be available in all communities and on a district basis in metropolitan areas. Resources should be available to enable family agencies to extend their services to the aged. Hospital social services should be more extensively developed. Counselling should also be provided at senior citizen centres, either by centre staff or through arrangements with another agency. Public welfare authorities should also assume greater responsibility for counselling old people, whether in receipt of financial assistance or not. In fact, we would urge a general broadening of services to the aged by public welfare authorities.

(4) Varied leisure time programs in which the elderly can participate should be available in all communities. In this regard, the Committee would caution against segregating the elderly from the rest of the population. Clubs and centres should not be ends in themselves; rather they should restore or strengthen the individual's motivation for normal community involvement and participation. For this reason community services should include programs in which the elderly can participate with other age groups as well as programs designed primarily for them. In fact where recreation services generally are under-developed, the first step should be to establish a community centre which would serve the elderly among other age groups.

The Committee suggests that in each sizable community and in appropriate districts of large cities there should be at least one community centre with trained staff, a membership active in conducting its affairs and a corps of volunteers. The centre should not only provide for social activities and entertainment; it should also encourage the participation of its members in the life of the community, offer counselling and guidance, and encourage continued learning.

[10] It was suggested by some witnesses that a competent housekeeper, without the special training and supervision given to "homemakers", would be able to meet the practical requirements of many old people.

While up to now voluntary organizations have been the chief sponsors of recreation for old people and will, it is hoped, continue to make a major contribution in the future, the Committee envisages growing participation by local recreation authorities in order to ensure that facilities and programs are more widely available throughout the community and that special provision is made for the interests of the retired population.

(5) Wherever possible day care programs for old people requiring intensive and individualized service should be provided. They may be offered by an agency established for the purpose, or in homes for the aged, in day hospitals operated by chronic convalescent or mental hospitals, or through the enrichment and broadening of senior citizen centre programs.

(6) Finally educational authorities and adult education groups should experiment more imaginatively with ways of encouraging retired people to participate in educational and cultural programs. We would expect many other organizations to join in this endeavour: business firms, labour unions, the churches, and agencies, such as the Y's, community centres and recreation departments that engage in programs of informal education. The potential of radio and television, particularly for shut-in older people, should not be overlooked.

Requirements for Meeting Objectives

We have sketched broadly those services which, in the Committee's opinion, form the basic components of a program of community services for the elderly. The development of such a program raises a number of important issues to which the following comments are addressed:

(1) The realization of some of the objectives indicated calls for the strengthening of services to the total population; for example, information and referral centres, homemaker and counselling services. The Committee would not want to suggest that where services generally are under-developed they should be provided for the elderly at the expense of other age groups. Rather the aim should be the development and strengthening of resources for all. In other instances, like day-care centres, the development of specialized services for the elderly will be required.

(2) In the area of community services, as elsewhere, the question arises as to the respective roles of governmental and voluntary action. The Committee can find no clear principle for distinguishing one from the other. On the one hand, we would wish to encourage voluntary interest and activity, which up to the present have made such a vital contribution. On the other hand, we are persuaded that the existing spotty provision of services cannot be greatly altered without the participation of the public authority. As we see it, the pattern of public-private relations will vary from community to community and from time to time. In most communities at this time what is needed is closer co-operation between the two sectors and a flexible experimental attitude toward the need to be met. Among the immediate responsibilities of government are those of making greater financial resources available, setting standards, disseminating information, and providing a consultative service to voluntary groups.

(3) The development of adequate community services will require substantial investment of funds. In the voluntary sector, demands for service are outstripping available dollars; there is a sizable and growing gap between financial needs and financial resources. In some fields, as, for example, homemakers, the situation is well beyond the scope of voluntary financing alone.

Given a continuing favourable rate of economic growth, the funds required to provide essential services for older Canadians should not be beyond the nation's capacity. Though the Committee has conducted no analysis of costs it would suggest that the amounts involved are not substantial by comparison with what Canada is already investing in the economic security and health of its citizens. And it should not be forgotten that the cost of one hospital bed ($20,000) could provide some 10,000 hours of homemaker service.

It is clear from the evidence that community services for older people are most developed in the wealthiest provinces, and least in the poorest. Whatever the difficulties here, the fact must be faced that a balanced development of welfare services can only be achieved through a national policy aimed at the equitable distribution of the welfare dollar.

(4) Another problem to be faced in developing community services for the aged will be the securing of sufficient numbers of adequately trained staff. This again will be no easy matter. Large numbers of able and trained volunteers will also be required.

So far as employed staff is concerned the first necessity would seem to be a realistic analysis of the nature of the various positions for which paid workers are required, and an equally realistic analysis of the training required to fill them competently. Unfortunately, this is not an approach that has been used widely in the area of community services to date, with the result that professional workers, although in short supply, may spend much of their time performing non-professional tasks, and auxiliary workers, often tolerated rather than fully accepted, are used with almost no training except what they pick up on the job. For the extensive development of community services that we envisage, this sort of personnel policy, or lack of policy, will not do. We must know the kinds of people we need for the posts to be filled, seek them out vigorously in sufficient numbers, and make sure that the facilities needed to train them are available in professional schools, universities, technical institutes, and special courses.

Careful plans will also need to be devised for the recruiting of volunteers. Here the potential of older people to help one another should not be overlooked. Training for the volunteer is also necessary in order to ensure not only proficiency in the particular service to be rendered but also considerable familiarity with the psychology of the aged. In many programs, like friendly visiting, the volunteer deals directly with the elderly and in doing so frequently receives requests for advice on personal problems. This renders the task satisfying but it also underlines the need there is for sensitive understanding and the ability to recognize situations where professional help is required.

Conclusion

In this Chapter we have presented a review of the Committee's findings in regard to community services for the elderly. The current picture, it must be agreed, is not one with which we can be satisfied. Many old people who desire to remain in their own homes are compelled, for lack of supportive help, to live in institutions. Others, who with the necessary programs and facilities could continue as active members of the community, are condemned to an existence they often find pointless and dull. We have attempted to suggest ways out of this situation, and in doing so have drawn on the experience of other countries. There is clear evidence that, in Canada too, improvements are taking place. The chief requirements for accelerated progress would appear to be local initiative, inventiveness in social planning and a large measure of government interest and financial support.

Living in Retirement

In the previous chapter we have discussed Community Services for the elderly and recommendations have been made concerning the manner in which they might be extended and improved. In this chapter we concentrate more upon the problems of the elderly that can be solved by the normal mechanisms of our society. Community Services are again discussed, but the emphasis in this case is upon what these services can do to help those among the elderly who, for one reason or another, have lost their capacity to use the facilities offered by society to all its members.

For those working with the aged, planning for them, or endeavouring to understand them, two assumptions can be made, both of which dangerously over-simplify the situation. It is wrong to assume that the aged are in no way different from the general population. Gradual changes through the life cycle, not only in health but also in attitude, have occurred. As well, sharp transitions, such as retirement or widowhood, have taken place which, among other consequences, have had the effect of reducing the resources the elderly can command to cope with their situation. One must modify in part the description of the "average Canadian" if it is to be applied to the elderly.

But it is equally, or even more, dangerous to assume that the elderly are wholly unlike other members of Canadian society, and that their special conditions have produced for them a wholly new set of problems and needs for which completely new remedies are required. Many, or even most, of the problems faced by the aged are faced by all members of our society. Others are simply the human condition.

It is not possible to deduce from common sense the ways in which the elderly are similar to or different from others in our society. Actual field work is required before one can know.

These considerations are of particular relevance to the problem of leisure, which is mentioned repeatedly in the Briefs. We must reconsider if it is in fact true that this is a problem of particular urgency for the aged. At first glance, the Briefs suggest that the elderly do experience particular needs in this area. Remedial programmes, such as Friendly Visiting, are discussed. There are reports of loneliness and lack of interest in life, such as in the Brief from the Second Mile Club of Toronto,[1] the Special Survey of the Government of New Brunswick,[2] and many others. Yet this is not conclusive evidence. We cannot assume because the elderly report a lack of meaningful activity in their lives that this is a full and accurate diagnosis of their problem.

The additional facts which would confirm the diagnosis would be evidence showing a demand for and acceptance of programmes providing leisure activity for the elderly. Study groups would be common and successful. Creative activity such as clay modelling or painting would be frequent and enthusiasm among the elderly for such activity would be commonly reported. Rather, the Briefs suggest the reverse. Such activities are found to attract only a minority. A certain pessimism about their success is suggested. As an example, the Social Planning Council of Toronto states it "has not come to grips" with adult education for the elderly.[3] Other Briefs suggest that particular difficulties are found in establishing leisure programmes. Those which appear most successful involve quite simple social activities, as in the Golden Age Clubs. The Canadian Medical Association Brief is highly optimistic about these clubs and recommends the establishing of more.[4] Enthusiasm is reported for the Victoria City Silver Threads Club.[5] Still it is noted by the Ontario Welfare Council that so far only 5 per cent of the elderly in Ontario are involved in these activities.[6]

In general, the Briefs show that the problem of leisure is not solved at present and repeatedly recommend further analysis, research and experimentation within this area. It is clear that those working with the aged have been forced to depend too much for the development of ideas about what the elderly need or want upon common sense and deductive reasoning. Their task would be simplified and their energies better utilized if a programme of basic research into the nature of the needs of the elderly were established. A programme of research based on detailed questioning of the elderly can proceed independently of other endeavours and should be of great use. Emphasis might be placed on attitudes to leisure time, present recreational programmes and community involvement, as suggested by the Brief of the Community Chest and Councils of the Greater Vancouver area[7] and others. The need is even greater for more basic studies which ask what the elderly are like and what they need without pre-assuming that their problem is one of leisure, however.

A programme of research such as we have outlined above would not be enough. Complete dependence upon the capacity of the elderly to articulate what they need or want cannot be made. This is not because they are old; no one in our society seems able to communicate easily what unmet needs and hopes they have. The second recommendation we make, therefore, is that present and future programmes designed for the elderly should be more fully envisaged as experiments, again as suggested by the Brief of the Community Chest and Council of the Greater Vancouver Area,[8] and also by the Notre Dame Day Centre (Winnipeg)[9], and others. As is always necessary in experiments not only should there be innovations in design but also careful, objective measurement of the eventual success or failure of the programme.

We anticipate that some successful programmes may be found to resemble programmes or "leisure" only in the sense that this title is useful in recruiting new and shy members. The actual end product would in many cases become one of providing informal guidance, aiding mental health or increasing feelings of security. As the Notre Dame Centre of Winnipeg states of its programme;

> The real development of the Day Centre is seen in its members as they become more alert, creative and active citizens whose needs from the community are balanced by the community's needs for them.[10]

We further recommend that, insofar as it is possible, funds and time be allocated consciously for experimental programmes and that workers be encouraged to be imaginative and inventive in designing them. In discussing the development of their Sheltered Workshop, the representatives of the Jewish Home for the Aged and Baycrest Hospital[11] noted specifically that it was a willingness of their Board to allocate funds for experimentation that made the programme possible.

We recommend, for the time being at least, that in the design of new programmes concern about the secondary goals for them, which frequently involve either the attempt to make some clear contribution to society as a whole or to educate and broaden the elderly, should be de-emphasized. Instead we favour experimenting with ways to improve the meeting of the primary goal, namely, the provision of help to a sizable number of the elderly who report a discontent which they phrase as boredom, isolation, or lack of meaningful activity. In many cases the success of a programme will be shown in the swift return of its members to reliance upon those facilities which our society provides for all its members.

Analysis of the Briefs and of certain research publications suggest what is so far known or strongly suspected about the type of needs or problems which occupy the "leisure time" of the elderly. In many cases these are needs which the elderly share with the young, and the data serve as a reminder that there is similarity. In other cases the elderly are found to face distinctive problems. The description that can be presented at this time is, of course, extremely fragmentary. We have grouped the data under following headings:

1. The Family
2. The Church
3. The Work World
4. Community, Friends and Neighours
5. Education and the arts
6. Mass Entertainment and Specialized Activities
7. Morale and Expectations
8. Attitudes of Others.

Each is discussed in turn, below.

The Family

The family not only provides a variety of services for its members but also, for most Canadians, appears to be a good in its own right. Because of this, a major problem for the aged is the loss of the spouse. The problem of widowhood seems almost to overshadow that of old age, and it is among the widowed that reports of loneliness are most common, according to United States research.[12] Not only is there a loss of companionship, but labour which formerly was shared by two must suddenly be done by only one.

Figures provided by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics show that many who are widowed solve these problems by living with other relatives, generally their sons or daughters. Among the widowed women in Canada who are 65 years of age or older more than 3 in 10 were found to live "with relatives" in the 1961 Census.[13] This proportion is roughly equivalent to that reported for the United States by Ethel Shanas, as noted in the Saskatchewan Brief. Research should be done to determine if the relationships in such households are largely harmonious. Such research could suggest advice which would, as one of the elderly, Mr. W., suggested to the Committee, "help older people to understand how they can fit in their children's lives."[14]. Strategies might be suggested which would facilitate the formation of more of these households or prevent the breaking-up of those already formed.

For others who are widowed or old, a second solution is common. Although they live in separate households, the elderly are found frequently to live near married children or other relatives. While the full range of services that family life can provide will not be given under these conditions it appears to be an arrangement acceptable to many. Some authors, such as Peter Townsend, suggest that this arrangement is preferred to actually living with children. Townsend writes, based on his research in England:

> Old people were not against living alone. In fact most preferred it to living with married children, because they could maintain their own independence and avoid imposing on the privacy of the children's marriage. They made one big qualification. They did not mind living separately from their children, so long as they could live near them. Most parents mentioned this spontaneously.[15]

Care is reported to be taken by some agencies in Canada to achieve this desired proximity of residence, as mentioned by Dr. C. A. Roberts of the Canadian Mental Health Association.[16] This factor should also be considered in the relocation of the elderly owing to urban renewal.

For others who are elderly, as the Brief from the Department of Public Welfare, Province of Nova Scotia notes, the ordinary bonds within the family are weak.[17] Research is required to determine why this is so. An analogous problem concerns the reactions of the wife to the greater amount of time at home that is spent by a retired man. Again long-standing but evaded conflict in the family may become overt and the man will not be welcomed in the home.

For those without relatives, or for whom family bonds are weak, other solutions must be found. In work published in the U.S., Ernest Burgess has written:

> Whatever measure of personal maladjustment is taken—isolation, loneliness, death rate or suicide—gives findings indicative of the social disadvantages of the single state.[18]

Friends and neighbours, as we note below, may substitute for relatives, and programmes may facilitate the formation of friendships. Where this fails, direct dependence upon social agencies seems inevitable.

The Church

The churches in Canada are involved directly in the provision of welfare services. Without forgetting this, we concentrate in this section on the unique function of the church, the provision of spiritual guidance.

Some increase of interest in religion might be anticipated among the aged as a product of their realization of the imminence of death. This is suggested by Mrs. Stevens in discussion of the Brief of the Catholic Women's League of Canada when she stated, "I feel that as people get older their spiritual needs enter more into their thoughts."[19] Yet data available from other sources (Britain and the U.S.) suggest that there is actually only a slight return to church among the elderly.[20] In part the problem may simply be one of transportation. The Brief of the United Church of Canada reported surveys showing that many elderly people would like to have a "church visitor."[21] Mrs. Stevens continued, "I know many . . . homes (for the aged) have no provision for the solace of religion being brought to them. I feel that it should be encouraged by the provision of chapels, or at least a room that could quickly be cleared where religious services could be conducted if a special place for them could not be afforded."[22]

The return to the church may not occur because the elderly are not concerned with the imminence of death. U.S. studies suggest that the old are not greatly more preoccupied with death than are the young.[23] Because no opinion survey can probe very deeply, workers with the aged might do well to watch for subtle indications of concern with death and be prepared to find some cases requiring guidance and counselling.

The Work World

All Canadians are taught to take work seriously, and to respond to money as a reward for doing so. The Brief of the Canadian Association of Social Workers notes:

> The predominance of work as a central value in our society handicaps many people today in enjoying their retirement years.[24]

Any work, regardless of its real social utility, is seen as important activity and those who work have grounds for demanding concessions and deference from those who do not. Those people who do not work for monetary gain, such as those in school, many women, and many of the elderly, share certain characteristics. They report frustration and discontent. An obvious, simple and recurrent solution to this problem is entry into the work world; married women begin to work; children "drop-out" of school; those who have retired join the sheltered workshop programmes,[25] or take on part-time work.

Although it is the obvious solution, inclusion of all who wish it in the labour force appears to be increasingly difficult. Yet unpaid, but productive activity is only a second-best alternative since the practical and symbolic value of a money reward is of great importance to the old as well as the young. The definition of what is considered work could be broadened but little change in our traditional definitions of what is work seems to be occurring.

Withdrawal from the labour force has immediate secondary consequences. There are special side-effects of working, ranging from the companionship of co-workers or the "prestige" of the job (as suggested in the Department of Labour Brief)[26] to actual fringe benefits which come with the job. These are all lost and must be replaced. The loss of position in society because one has retired might be of less consequence if it were not accompanied by these secondary losses.

It must not be assumed without actual research that retirement from the labour force frees great amounts of time for "pure leisure." Any individual in our society has a great deal of necessary activity to perform outside his work role and this does not cease with retirement. In fact, with reduced income and sometimes reduced energy the elderly may find these activities occupy more time in the average day than they did formerly.

Two major types of activity fall into this category. The first is the problem of wise consumption. A considerable amount of time and information is required to purchase wisely; those on small and fixed incomes are particularly vulnerable to mistakes in purchasing. The second major activity is that of non-commercialized or only partially commercialized services. One typically must perform his own domestic service, small household repairs, house-hunting, etc. People in our society are dependent upon relatives, friends and neighbours for help and advice in both these kinds of activities—the elderly more than most. This is discussed in the following section. Giving an emphasis and legitimacy to these non-work activities might also help to reduce the problem of feeling less useful or less self-sufficient after withdrawal from the labour force.

Community, Neighbourhood and Friends

Evidence recurs in survey data that involvement in the community actually increases with age. Leadership in civic organizations draws heavily from among the elderly.[27] Voting increases throughout the life span until health factors intervene.[28] This may be an example of an area of interest which is common to members of our society but is frustrated in the early years owing to distractions of work and family. With more time, the elderly may spontaneously turn to these activities. Research is again required to determine how broad a spectrum of interests may be included in the category of "community involvement." If it is broad, many programmes could be developed which would be of immediate interest to the elderly.

Most individuals in our society appear to require some contact with friends and neighbours to ensure full contentment. For the elderly, there is an automatic loss of friends because of death. Many leisure programmes apparently provide an area in which, under the guise of pursuing some specified activity, new friends may be sought out. As friends are made, contact can become independent of the situation in which the first meeting occurred so that the leisure programme is no longer required. A shifting clientele may be an indication of a successful programme.

The elderly, such as U.S. writer Aldena C. Thomason, comments that:

> To become a burden upon others, sons or daughters, or other relatives, or friends, or neighbours, is so distasteful to us that we will to the last try to evade and resist it.[29]

[29] Aldena C. Thomason, "We who are Elderly", in Arnold M. Rose (ed.), Aging in Minnesota, Minneapolis, University of Minneapolis Press, 1963.

It must be recognized that two factors are involved here. On the one hand, physical ill-health, lack of funds, etc., can force the elderly into an unusual dependence upon other, younger people. But, on the other hand, it is also true that accepting help from friends, neighbours and relatives is normal in our society and occurs throughout the life span. The difference for the elderly lies in the fact that while the young can repay for this help in kind, the elderly face the problem that as their command of resources—income or health—becomes diminished they are less able to repay for these informal services. What among the young is a smoothly running and almost unnoticed exchange of advice, aid and services becomes conscious and a point of concern for the elderly. New friends, with whom new reciprocities can be established, are sought. Again the "leisure programmes" can be of importance.

The services which are typically provided informally could, in some cases at least, be replaced by commercial agencies. With many of the elderly on reduced and fixed incomes this is not a realistic alternative, however. Social agencies can deal with some of the problems directly. Forming social situations in which friendships develop may seem like an indirect and inefficient solution, but the multiplicity of services friends can provide for one another may in the long run make it the more efficient. Others among the elderly suffer such an accumulation of un-met needs that they are unlikely to be able, easily, to make friends. Direct help would be the first priority in these cases. But the final aim again should be the redevelopment of the informal social relationships. No society at this time could afford the cost of providing all these services formally.

Voluntary Associations, the Arts and Adult Education

Among both the young and elderly in our society, participation in most voluntary associations, interest in the Arts and in Adult Education is limited to those who are better educated. Some redesigning of these programmes may result in greater interest on the part of the less educated, as suggested by the Brief of the Canadian Association of Adult Education which recommended a "less formal approach" in education.[30] As well, an automatic growth can be expected as successive cohorts of the "elderly" will have had more basic education. Experimentation is clearly called for, but only slow growth in the immediate future should be expected.

The clear exception to the above statement is the Golden Age clubs. These are more attractive to the lower income and less well educated individuals. A recent U.S. study shows that while 41 per cent of the manual workers interviewed in a single plant would like to join a "Golden Age or Senior Citizens Club" only 25 per cent of the managerial group shared their interest.[31] For the majority of the elderly these appear to be the sorts of voluntary association that are desired. The U.S. White House Conference on Aging states clubs of this type are "the most extensive (planned) leisure-time activity for older people."[32]

In designing clubs for the elderly attention should be paid to the possibility that groups which include both sexes are not to everyone's taste. Women who are accustomed to female company may be ill-at-ease in groups including men. Men who are unsure of their masculinity now that they no longer work may resent involvement in "women's activities."

Mass Entertainment and Specialized Activities

The elderly in Canada, like all Canadians, depend principally upon television and radio for their entertainment. Data are given in the Government of New Brunswick special survey[33] and the V. S. Stevens survey, mentioned in the Brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.[34]

To some extent the listening preferences of the elderly are undoubtedly specialized and much information about this will be known to audience research agencies. Greater adaptation to their preferences should be expected in the non-commercial broadcasting systems as the lower purchasing power of the elderly must reduce their importance to the commercial systems. This is borne out by the fact that the elderly show a greater preference for the CBC than do the younger age groups.[35]

As the development of television has resulted in the disappearance of certain alternative entertainments, such as the corner movie house, virtually all members of our society are now dependent upon it. The acquisition and upkeep of receiving sets may present a financial problem to some of the aged.

Reading is also reported to be an important leisure activity among the aged. Help in getting books from the library must be of great importance to those who cannot go out.

While visiting and watching television are most frequent activities, research shows that many of the elderly are interested in gardening. Gardening can supplement a small income by providing vegetables and fruits at low cost and this may be part of its appeal. But as well it is an intrinsically interesting activity which demands, on the whole, only minor physical exertion and financial outlay.

Morale and Expectations

Studies of the morale of the elderly have been made in the United States.[36] Although the word morale is used, its meaning is not that of "group morale" but only general satisfaction with life. On the whole, the studies suggest that there is no sharp transition during the life cycle. Morale is found to reduce gradually through the life span, with the difference between youth and middle age being as marked as that between middle and old age. As physical and mental health problems increase gradually through the years people are found to reduce their level of expectations and ambitions so that the over-all effect upon their level of satisfaction is not marked. Again it appears that many of the problems of the elderly are extensions of the problems shared by those who are younger.

One consequence of this finding is that for those working with the aged the short-term result of a successful programme may be found to be an increase in expectations rather than satisfaction.

Attitudes of Others

The Briefs recurrently mention that the attitudes of the general population to the aged accentuate their difficulties. Dr. Roby Kidd reports that undesirable stereotypes of the elderly are found even among 10 year old children.[37] Many of the ideas about the elderly held by the general population are erroneous, as noted in the Brief from the Allan Memorial Institute of Psychiatry.[38] Commonly held ideas about the frequency of senility or its causes are false.

We have argued in this section that some of the problems of the elderly will disappear if they are able to retain normal informal relationships of aid, advice and companionship with other members of our society. These relationships are now made awkward through misunderstanding by younger people of what it is like to be elderly. Education of the general public is required. Care must also be taken to be sure that those working immediately with the aged are not influenced by the misinformation in the general population.

Summary

For lack of sociological research it is not possible to say exactly what life in retirement in Canada is like. One may extrapolate from U.S. and British data, with always a great risk of error. One may attempt to draw inferences from the statements of those who work with the aged or who have speculated about the problem. Using this procedure we have come to tentative conclusions. All would need confirmation through actual research before they could be accepted with confidence.

We have not concluded that there is no problem for the elderly in Canada. Rather the evidence is clear that there is a considerable amount of unhappiness and concern. But we have concluded that the ordinary definition of the problem that the elderly lack activities to fill their leisure time is false. Rather we feel that the boredom and lack of meaningful activity which the elderly report may be interpreted as a result of a lack of facilities to solve their problems and to make themselves more content or more comfortable. Like the young, the elderly have many jobs to do in taking care of themselves. Only some of these can be accomplished simply through the expenditure of money, although increased funds would help a great deal. At the present time any solution, involving the expenditure of money, is even less available to the elderly than to the young.

We conclude that through their lack of economic and health resources, as well as the loss of friends and neighbours who could help them, many of the elderly become apathetic and devoid of self-confidence. A vicious circle will develop as the strength of their needs makes them less attractive to those who could help. Someone in this position is unlikely to respond to a programme which, manifestly at least, offers only a chance to be "creative" or to "contribute to the community." In our judgment, programmes which offer a chance to be creative will only succeed after programmes which help in the solution of basic unmet needs are fully established At the present time, their appeal must be limited largely to those who, through fortunate circumstance, have not found themselves in the socially paralyzing situation of being unable to be sure of reasonable care for their basic needs.

Research on Aging

Society cannot always wait for scientific knowledge when framing its social policies and programmes. The fact often is, or has been in the past, that situations present themselves which have to be dealt with at once on the basis of what facts and opinions are readily available. This, however, is no justification for continuing to neglect the tools and techniques that modern science has put at our disposal, and the disposition to do so, which is still too common in many areas of social endeavour, must be viewed with concern by thoughtful people.

So far as aging is concerned, the Senate Committee in the course of its inquiry was made painfully aware of the slow rate at which research is developing in Canada, and this in face of the mounting public interest there is in the problems of old people and the increasingly large government expenditures to which these problems have given rise. The evidence brought before the Committee, as well as the gaps encountered in preparing the Report, have revealed clearly many fields where research is either lacking altogether or is inadequate in scope, content or co-ordination. As Elkin has pointed out in his recent study of information on Canadian families: "Our basic awareness of the problems of the aged stems primarily from our general knowledge and from reports published in the United States where literature on all aspects of aging is voluminous".[1] However, before we proceed to flagellate ourselves unduly, perhaps another quotation should be added relating to the American situation. The Sub-committee on Problems of the Aged and Aging (U.S. Senate) 1961: "found that much so called research in the field (of aging) is second rate, carried on by poorly trained and unsupervised personnel or by individuals not trained in research techniques at all.....It uncovered problems relating to the financing of research in the field of aging that are directly responsible for many of these shortcomings and for the haphazard development that has characterized the entire field of gerontology".[2]

In evaluating the progress achieved to date, whether in Canada, the United States or elsewhere, it needs to be recognized that research on aging—gerontological research as it has come to be called—is a relatively new field.[3] Among its antecedents were the social surveys on the condition of the aged undertaken at the turn of the Century, as a precedent to social action, mainly in England and on the European Continent. In 1922 what is believed to be the first English book on the psychological aspects on aging was published; and in 1943 the Nuffield Foundation initiated its extensive support for gerontological research and research fellowships.

Systematic activity on this Continent started in this same year, 1943, when the American Social Science Research Council instituted a Committee on Social adjustment in Old Age which shortly afterwards issued a report calling for scientific investigation of such areas of concern as retirement, employment, income maintenance and institutional care. The American Gerontological Society was organized in 1944, and in 1946 the American Psychological Association established a division dealing with problems of aging. Biennially since the war, meetings have been held in various parts of the world of the International Congress of Gerontology which have had an important influence in stimulating research interest and facilitating the exchange of information. Up to the present Canada has no national body devoted to research in the field of aging but a number of interested Canadians hold memberships in American organizations. It is worthy of note that Dr. E. David Sherman, of Montreal, is currently the President of the American Geriatric Society.

Research on Aging in Canada

In an endeavour to gain a broad over-view of the nature, extent and sponsorship of gerontological research in Canada, the Senate Committee in 1963, at the outset of its investigation, conducted a questionnaire inquiry directed to government departments, universities and voluntary organizations, throughout the country. The following table summarizes in a general way the responses received to these questionnaires:

Table 22.—Analysis of Questionnaires Regarding Research on Aging in Canada
(Distributed by the Senate Committee on Aging in the Fall, 1963)

Name	Sponsors		Projects, directly or indirectly related to Aging, undertaken since 1950

Universities	31	23	9	32	39	71
Voluntary Organizations	33	17	8	23	15	38
	118	78	24	65	64	129

The above table, we believe, provides a fairly accurate picture of the Canadian situation, so far as the number of research centres or sponsors is concerned. It will be observed that those not replying were, chiefly, certain voluntary organizations which a later check revealed are not a kind that regards research as among their customary functions. One of the striking findings is how few universities in Canada at the present are doing research in the aging field. A number of questionnaire returns, and the letters from department heads accompanying them in many instances, reported interest and hopes for the future, but up to the present no activity. It was also disappointing to discover the little research, directly or indirectly related to the problems of old people, which is proceeding under federal or provincial government auspices, and this in face of the very large public expenditures that are being made in this field.

With regard to the 129 research projects reported in the questionnaires several observations might be made:

1. The list does not include administrative reports made regularly by federal and provincial departments and agencies concerned with service to the aged, some of which contain relevant statistical and other information;

2. Research projects reported are divided about equally between the bio-medical-psychological and the social fields;

3 Research of bio-medical or psychological nature would appear, on the whole, to be on a more sophisticated level and to meet scientific standards more fully than those classified as social. Many of the latter were limited in scope to particular situations or to narrowly defined geographical areas and, therefore, yield few conclusions of general applicability. Broader investigations reported tended to be of a general survey variety, relating to the needs of older people in areas like housing, community services and institutional care, which tell more about the extent than about the nature and cause of the problems under investigation.

Government-sponsored Research

As pointed out above, various departments of the Federal Government, in the discharge of their administrative responsibilities, and also as a prerequisite to determining policy and long-range planning, conduct research into various aspects of aging.

Particular reference in this connection should be made to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics which, as a result of its data gathering procedures, has at its disposal a very considerable amount of relevant data drawn from the Census, the Sickness Survey, and many special surveys, where information on the aged is obtained, mostly as part of statistical studies of the general population.

The Senate Committee is indebted to the Bureau for the special statistical bulletin prepared for its use,[4] and as well for the two presentations made by members of its staff in the course of the Hearings. It would be our hope, however, that with the growing public interest there is in aging, the assembly, analysis, and dissemination of relevant information will be put on a continuing and regular basis. We feel, indeed, that the time has come for the Bureau to match its achievements in the field of economic statistics with a similarly well-integrated system of social statistics which, we would recall, is one of its specific obligations under the Statistics Act.[5] While a Health and Welfare Division already exists within the Bureau's structure, it has played a relatively minor role up to the present, and the statistics it produces relate to health only and not to welfare.

The brief submitted to the Senate Committee by both branches of the Department of National Health and Welfare is evidence of the serious research carried out by this Department on the various aspects of aging. Here, too, we recommend that organizational arrangements be made to co-ordinate on a continuing basis all projects related to this important field.

In the questionnaire return, the Department's Research and Statistics Division reported on intra-mural research studies "relating directly and indirectly to the aged and aging". Three studies were directly concerned with the aged: an information memo on "Services for the Aged in Canada, 1957", now out of date, a bulletin on "Legislative Measures Affecting Living Accommodation for Elderly Persons in Canada, 1961," and a bulletin covering "Legislative Changes in General Assistance, Mothers' Allowances and Living Accommodation for the Aged in Canada, 1958, 1959, 1960 and 1961". Five studies included in the response do not deal exclusively with the aged, but are reviews of Hospital and Medical Plans, Health Services for public assistance recipients, personal health care expenditures, and developments and trends in Hospital Care in Canada. Only one of these, an extensive memorandum on Rehabilitation Services in Canada (1960) includes special material on services for the aged. Two projected studies will deal with income and age.

In addition to intra-mural research, the Department supports research extramurally through the National Health grants, and more recently the National Welfare grants programmes, and the Committee has been interested to examine the record in this connection. The following table shows the distribution of health grants for research on aging by province, number of institutions supported, and total amount expended in each province:

It will be seen from the above that support provided by federal health grants for research on aging was confined to four provinces. The support in Quebec went mostly to the Allan Memorial Institute of Psychiatry, McGill University[6] for clinical, physiological studies as part of geriatric and gerontological research. Proposals for further study include a comprehensive epidemiological study of mental disorders of the aged, and the influence of retirement on the mental health of the aged individual. Health grant support has also been given to the Institute of Gerontology, University of Montreal, to study "all aspects of the process and consequences of aging".

In Ontario, grants were awarded for a psychological study of learning and attention disturbances in the aged, conducted by Queen's University; a socio-medical investigation of health and living conditions of persons over 75 in Metropolitan Toronto; and a policy research project carried out by the City of Ottawa, Health Department, "to assess and devise a service program to cope with the problem of chronic illness and aging".

[6] For a fuller account of the activities of the Allan Memorial Institute and the Gerontological Unit see Proceedings of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging, No. 16, July 16, 1964.

The Saskatchewan Aged and Long-Term Illness Survey[7] received financial support from the National Health Grants. Between the years 1959 to 1964 inclusive, over $79,000 was allotted to this project, which is to date the most extensive and comprehensive study of aging undertaken in Canada, and might well provide a model for other provinces willing to undertake similar studies, the incentive of a federal health grant being available. The Saskatchewan study covers such topics as basic population data, economics, housing, health and welfare, education and leisure-time activities, the role of the church, and research, and includes detailed recommendations for needed action.

The National Welfare Grants program was initiated in 1962 for the development and strengthening of welfare services and the prevention of dependency. The grants provided are of two kinds: for staff training and for research.

Fifteen Welfare Research Projects were assisted under this program in the year 1962-63, but only two of these could be identified as dealing directly with problems of the aged.[8]

The federal Department of Labour and the National Employment Service began to recognize the employment problems of the age group 40 and over after World War II "when the economy of the country was generally buoyant". An Inter-departmental Committee on Older Workers was formed in 1953 to give "continuing study to the problem and to devise remedial measures". The Committee sponsored several studies, one on Pension Plans and the Employment of Older Workers, another on Age and Performance in the Retail Trade. Other studies, carried out by the Department, include a statistical study: "The Aging Worker in the Canadian Economy" now in the process of being brought up to date, and a review of the literature and research findings by Professor S. D. Clark, entitled "The Employability of the Older Workers (1959)". Of the fifty-four references in the latter publication only two referred to Canadian studies.

In 1959 the Department established a Division on Older Workers, which has been producing pamphlets and other material for public education. Similarly, the Women's Bureau of the Department has exhibited a growing interest in problems of the older woman worker and her problems on re-entering the labour force in the "empty nest" years.

The Department of Veterans Affairs carries on an extensive intramural research program in the field of geriatrics; in 1963, the Research and Statistics

The Ontario Department of Public Welfare has, since 1962, sponsored geriatric and gerontological studies under the direction of the Advisory Committee on Geriatric Studies to the Minister of Public Welfare. Many of these studies have been carried out at the Geriatrics Study Centre,[9] Toronto. The most far-reaching is the long term study on Aging, entitled "Longitudinal Study of Aging Male Workers, Ontario, 1959-1978".[10] This research project is directed to a study of the social, economic and health changes which accompany aging, the adjustment made to changing conditions, and the use and effectiveness of services. Close co-operation is maintained with the Ontario Geriatrics Research Society, which is a private non-profit organization supported by the Ontario Government, "to study and carry out research into the causes and prevention of diseases and problems associated with aging".

Research by Voluntary Organizations

Although numerous voluntary organizations are engaged in providing services to the aged, or planning for their welfare, only a few of them apparently feel they have the staff or resources to do very much in the way of systematic research. On the other hand, it is interesting to observe from the questionnaire returns that some thirty per cent of the projects reported were either sponsored or conducted by these groups. One of the significant current developments is the forthcoming Canadian Conference on Aging (to be held in 1966), sponsored by the Canadian Welfare Council in co-operation with a dozen or more other national bodies, which has commissioned background papers on the topics of (1) employment and economic status, (2) health, (3) living arrangements, (4) leisure, and (5) community planning.

The Senate Committee, itself, has generated a good deal of research activity among the various organizations, public and private, which prepared submissions for it. Indeed, the body of fact and opinion assembled in this way, and contained in the some two thousand pages of the Committee's printed proceedings, will undoubtedly serve for a long time as a valuable resource to the student of matters pertaining to aging.

The National Council of Jewish Women, since 1953, has provided gerontological fellowships, as a means of developing a nucleus of professional workers in the field of aging. From 1953 to 1955, five grants were awarded, all to social workers, and from 1955 to 1963, sixteen fellowships to physicians and others engaged in hospitals and the public health field. These specialists in gerontology and geriatrics, most of them with the benefit of observation visits to other countries, are already making important contributions in the six provinces in which they practise.

Foundations in Canada are a relatively recent development and, according to the best of our knowledge, few of them up to this point, with the exception of the Atkinson Charitable Foundation and the Laidlaw Foundation, have made allocations, specifically, to the field of gerontology. In the view of the Senate Committee, it is of vital importance to secure resources for research that are not subject to the limitations and restrictions that usually apply to research supported by Government grants.

There is a great need and opportunity for private foundations to follow the lead provided by the Nuffield Foundation in Great Britain and the Ford Foundation in the United States, and to furnish funds for research and imaginative experiments in relation to the problems of Aging. Such interest on the part of Foundations would not only support essential research but would act as a stimulus to service organizations throughout the country to give some priority to the needs of the aged.

Perhaps, the work of the Senate Committee will inspire some philanthropist, or group of philanthropists, to establish a new foundation to be devoted wholly or mainly to this object.

Research in other Countries

The following brief review of the research situation in other countries, although of necessity incomplete, demonstrates clearly the distance we in Canada have to go to equal what even countries with less resources have already accomplished. It may also help indicate the advantages that are to be derived from the exchange of ideas across borders. While the results of studies in other social settings may not necessarily be applicable to conditions in Canada, we have much to learn from the planning, design and methodology employed elsewhere.

Reference has already been made to the beginning of gerontological research in the United Kingdom and the impetus provided by the Nuffield Foundation. Note should also be taken of a body, known as the National Corporation for the Care of old People, that maintains a register and publishes a catalogue of research in progress or planned. In addition, the Corporation publishes a quarterly summary of current projects, prepared by the Advisory Group on Surveys and Research, a technical body set up by the National Old People's Welfare Council to advise on the work to be undertaken and the methods to be used.

In the United States at the present time there is a wide and growing interest in research related to all aspects of the subject of aging. As reported by P. Paillat, "the main work is done either by the Federal Government departments, or by the universities, or by the two together"; but it is interesting to observe the support provided by the large foundations: "the Ford Foundation, for instance, has a specific program in this field: in 1962 it made grants of over $2,600,000 to universities, scientific associations, or welfare services", in order to improve the quality of community services for the aged.[11]

At the federal government level in the United States, through the Department of Health, Education and Welfare chiefly, but also through programs in the Department of Agriculture, Commerce (Bureau of the Census) and Labour, an extensive range of research projects is being worked on directly, or is receiving support. The most important government source of funds for extramural research is the National Institutes of Health in the Public Health Service, which have broadened their interest to include, besides the medical aspects of health, social and economic aspects as well.

Paillat lists thirty American universities featuring gerontological investigations and specialized training centres for workers in research. The number of these universities is increasing steadily through the stimulus provided by an Inter-University Council on Social Gerontology and by the Office on Aging of the Federal Department of Health, Education and Welfare. The University of Michigan and the University of Chicago have the two most important centres for research and training, but specialization at the Masters' and Doctoral levels is also available at Washington University (St. Louis) on the Psychology, and at Purdue on the Sociology of Aging.[12]

In response to the need for program planners, co-ordinators and consultants at all levels of Government and in voluntary organizations, the United States Department of Health, Education and Welfare has recently published a proposed two-year graduate curriculum in Social Gerontology for the use of universities and professional schools.

In France, the Centre de Gerontologie, established in 1957, is concerned with the development of biological medical research in Paris hospitals. The Centre is organized into four sections dealing with the biological, physiological, psychological and socioeconomic aspects of aging.

In Germany, the University of Hamburg has been engaged in a large research study on the relation between mental abilities and thinking processes of the aged in relation to their interests, activities, attitudes and adjustments. The Social Science Institutes are conducting a study of the characteristics of Old Age Security recipients.

In the Scandinavian Countries, where care of the aged has been developed to a very high level, scientific investigation into problems of aging is taking place, for example, at the Swedish Institute for Public Opinion Research and the Social Institute of Stockholm. Denmark, in 1958, established the Danish National Institute of Social Research which integrates and co-ordinates research projects by the government and universities. This has resulted in a more efficient use of scarce personnel. The field of social gerontology has a high priority in the research program of the Institute, which has an Advisory Council composed of representatives of municipalities, employers, labour, social welfare institutes and individual experts. Norway has a National Old People's Health Committee affiliated with the National Public Health Association. There is also a Gerontological Society.

Finland has an active Gerontological Society which publishes an annual journal.

In The Netherlands the body responsible for research in aging is the National Health Research Council of the Netherlands Foundation of Applied Scientific Research. The term "health" is broadly defined to include the social and psychological aspects of Welfare and Mental Health. On the basis of a stratified sample of all persons aged 65 and over, the Council can obtain a comprehensive picture of their characteristics and needs and establish priorities for studies in depth.

In New Zealand the School of Social Science at the University of Wellington in collaboration with the National Government undertook in 1962 a broad study of the needs of the aging for the purpose of improved planning in the field of aging.

As we have seen, Social Gerontology is a relatively new field of study. Until recently, systematic studies in the social aspects of aging were confined within national boundaries. Several years ago the Social Science Research Committee of the International Gerontological Association, mindful that comparative statistical data were becoming available from practically all countries in the world, promoted the undertaking of a Cross National Survey of Old Age, with participation open to all interested countries. Assisted by a substantial grant from the United States National Institutes of Health, Denmark, Great Britain and the United States are proceeding with the study. Field work in the United States is carried out by the National Opinion Research Centre, with data processing at the Operations Analysis Centre, both at the University of Chicago. Technical assistance in Great Britain is provided by the Government Social Survey, and in Denmark by the above mentioned National Institute of Social Research.

Conclusion

In conclusion, we would underline again the need there is for much more research in Canada in all aspects of the field of aging. Particular areas of investigation have been indicated in almost all the various specialized chapters of this report, and we would urge that these proposals receive the detailed consideration they deserve. In any plans for the development of research interest and activity, care must be taken to use as efficiently as possible what, at best, will be our sparse resources of money and personnel. This gives point and emphasis to the Committee's recommendation, in Chapter 7, for the institution of a National Council on Social Research. Such an agency, in our judgment, would be the most effective way to provide the leadership and co-ordination that are so greatly needed, not only in studies of aging, but in research related to social policy generally. It would also greatly facilitate liaison between Canadian gerontological research and its counterparts in other countries.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Donald Smith, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts, presented the committee's first report:

Your committee recommends that:

(a) direct long distance telephone service be available to all members of the Senate on a twenty-four-hour basis for outgoing calls originating in Ottawa to points in Canada which are served by the direct distance dialing system, when such calls are made through the special operator over the leased circuits; and

(b) with a view to treating all senators equitably, senators hereafter be reimbursed for charges in connection with their telephone calls originating in Ottawa to places in their own constituencies which are not available on the direct distance dialing system.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

DIVORCE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committe's first report:

Your Committee recommend:

1. That they be granted leave to sit during adjournments of the Senate, and also during sittings of the Senate.

2. That they be granted authority to appoint as many subcommittees as deemed necessary for the purpose of considering such divorce matters as may be referred to them by the committee and to set the quorum thereof, the subcommittee in each case to report their findings to the committee.

He said: Honourable senators, this report is in the form in which it has been presented for some sessions past.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration on Monday next.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Notice of Motion for adjournment:

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, it is very difficult to come to a decision as to the date to which we should adjourn. However, assuming that I shall receive no more bad news this afternoon, I move, with leave, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, February 7, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

I do not expect that we shall receive the interim supply bill before next Monday, and perhaps not then. To enable honourable senators to make whatever travelling arrangements they wish, this may be the opportune time for me to say that the Senate will likely have to sit all of next week. After next week we may be able to adjourn for a week, if nothing urgent arises. At the moment, I feel that we must be here on Monday in order to deal with the interim supply bill.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Does the honourable Acting Leader of the Government mean that we will be able to adjourn for the week after next?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: It may be that we shall not sit the week after next. This depends upon whether something urgent comes before us during next week.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I am not rising to object, because I know that the honourable Acting Leader of the Government has very little information. I do suggest that if the Senate were to obtain a crystal ball, then we might be able to determine what the other place is going to do.

Could the honourable Acting Leader inform us of the prospective business other than the interim supply bill? I understand that the main reason for our adjourning until Monday is to consider the supply bill. Interim supply for the month of February has not yet been placed before the House of Commons. Is it possible to give us some idea of the business we may expect in the near or immediate future? May we also be informed as to what bills will be initiated in the Senate? I understand that some Government bills are to be initiated here. It would be helpful to have this information before we go home for this prospective and hopeful short recess in the week following next week.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I will certainly give the Senate all the information that is available, which is not very much. The other place is dealing with the estimates, and has not yet completed those of the Department of External Affairs. After that they will be discussing the estimates of the Department of Transport and those of another department, before the interim supply bill is placed before them. That is why I say it is unlikely that we will receive the interim supply bill until Monday or perhaps as late as Wednesday next week.

We have also the bill amending the Interpretation Act to consider. That order will stand this afternoon. It is a very important bill in that it may affect other statutes. It is my hope also that the Bankruptcy bill will be initiated in the Senate, although I am not sure that it will be. Another very important bill that has to be passed soon is that extending the provisions of the Bank Act until later in the year, because there is no hope that the amendments to the Bank Act will be passed by both houses in time to renew the bank charters. This bill has to be passed within 60 days from the beginning of the session, which means before the middle of March. Therefore, I hope it will be coming to the Senate very soon.

We have also many private bills to go before committees, perhaps within a week or two. We have the report of the Special Committee on Aging to consider, and we have the continuation of the debate on the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

That is all I can tell honourable senators at the moment. As I said, I have not very much information. We shall do what we have to do, but if we have nothing before us we will not continue to sit. It may be that the recess will have to be extended for a couple of weeks. I just do not have enough information at the moment to advise the members of this house as to the length of the recess they will have.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, may I ask if there is a time limit for the interim supply bill to receive the Royal Assent?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I understand that it will be necessary for the bill to be passed before February 15; otherwise funds would not be available. The information I have now is that the bill will come to the Senate either next Monday or Tuesday. In any event, we will re-assemble next week and wait until the bill arrives.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES COMMISSIONS' REPORTS

INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have two questions to ask, and I hope that the answers will be given next week. The first question concerns the reports of the Redistribution Commission which were tabled in the House of Commons on the second day of the session and which bear the number 1A of the sessional papers of that house. I wonder if it would be possible for the senators to have a copy of the ten reports.

APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES AS COMMISSIONERS

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, my second question concerns the appointment of judges as commissioners. I would like to know if the Department of Justice, before appointing a judge as a commissioner, gets in touch with the Department of the Attorney General of the province, the provincial Department of Justice, or the Chief Justice of the province, or the Acting Chief Justice. It would also be very interesting to know what was the procedure regarding the appointment of the honourable Acting Chief Justice Challies as commissioner to inquire into the airplane accident which occurred at St. Therese. Further, I would like to know if the Department of Justice had been in touch with him or the Attorney General before appointing a commissioner.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: The honourable senator may rest assured that these questions will be referred to the competent authorities, and that he will be given the answers as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Malcolm Hollett: Honourable senators, after a somewhat lengthy period away from the Senate, it takes a little while to reacquaint oneself, and I do not think I have yet met again all the honourable senators. Also, we are at times apt to forget the customs and regulations applying to procedure. In any event, it is good to be back again in this distinguished gathering.

I wish first to extend my hearty congratulations to Your Honour upon your promotion to the chair of Mr. Speaker, in which so many distinguished senators have sat in the past, including, of course, the honourable Senator Bourget whom you have succeeded. I am sure we all join in a friendly welcome to the new senators, Senator McDonald and Senator Benidickson. I think that Senator Benidickson is the first Privy Councillor who has come to the Senate while I have been here. We all welcome both of them and I am sure they will add notably to the deliberations of this august body.

There have been several changes in the personnel of the Senate since we recessed in July. Some have passed on to the Great Beyond, very distinguished members they were; and other honourable senators have seen fit to avail themselves of the act passed last year, relative to the retirement of senators, and have relinquished their seats. Each and every one of us sincerely regret the loss of those men.

Honourable senators, while I am dealing with this point, I must express what is probably a late opinion with regard to the bill which was passed last year dealing with senators. I think that almost blackmail was placed upon us here—You get out at 75 or within a year of that time, or your widow will die of starvation, or words to that effect. It meant that a senator would have had to retire within a year if he wanted his widow to survive after him.

At any rate, all those senators are gone. They were personal friends of most of us; some of them were personal friends of mine and I regret their departure.

We regret the recent illness of honourable Senator John Connolly, the Leader of the Government in the Senate. At this point, I should like to congratulate Senator Bouffard on his elevation to Deputy Leader on that side of the house. Senator Bouffard is better known to other senators than he is to me, but since I have known him I have come to like him very much—and since I like him, he must have something good about him.

I am proud to see our own Leader on this side of the house looking in the best of health and as grey-headed as ever. We are happy to see him. We hope he will be spared so that we can see how he looks on the other side of the house.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: You will have to wait a bit for that.

Hon. Mr. Denis: One hundred years from now.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Honourable senators, with regard to Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) and also to Senator Bourget, our Speaker until recently, we congratulate them on the manner in which they conducted the business here. I know of no other gentlemen who perform their duties in a better manner, with such skill and such courtesy to each and every one of us.

As to the mover of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, honourable Senator McDonald, and the seconder of that motion, honourable Senator Gouin, may I join with other senators in offering them my congratulations.

The Speech from the Throne was a lengthy document and contained practically everything necessary to bring about the perfect society in this world of ours, especially for the younger generation. However, you must have noted that, in addition to the few recommendations, it contained all the suggested legislation brought in last April and supposed to be passed but which for various reasons never reached this house. Let us refresh our memories on this matter.

I believe there are 20 or 30 pieces of legislation which were brought in last year and which appear again in the current Speech from the Throne. I jotted them all down and I am surprised, as no doubt you were, that there were so many things which should have been done and were left undone. For instance, there were proposals regarding the Canada-United States Agreement on Automotive Parts, O Canada and God Save the Queen, the amendment of the Constitution in Canada—which, incidentally, now appears to be unwelcome in at least one province; there was banking legislation and amendments to the Railway Act. The railway legislation was referred to last year as recapitalization. It is referred to now as legislation having to do with "capital structure". I do not know if there is any difference between capitalization and capital structure. The abolition of capital punishment is suggested, and I am sure there are many different opinions on this. I shall say nothing about it now.

Last year the Government was going to train some workers and retrain others; it planned to bring in legislation relative to rural development, and to assist all needy peoples. There are also some suggestions in the current Speech from the Throne regarding assistance to needy people.

I should like to draw attention to the present Government's attitude towards certain needy people. I refer to the Newfoundland inshore fishermen, who last season had the most serious catch failure in many years. At the end of the season many fishermen found themselves with nothing to sustain them for the approaching winter months. I suspect you were aware of the great helping hand that the present Government—and I am not being sarcastic—extended to these people. The Government had no sooner heard of this tragic catch failure than it came across with assistance for the next three or four months to the amount of $200 for a married fisherman and his family, and $150 for a single fisherman. Can you imagine a fisherman with a wife and four or five children having to subsist on a total sum of $200 for a period of three or four months? This was the first offer of the Minister of Fisheries.

Needless to say, every Newfoundlander was disgusted, and nobody could understand how any government in this day and age, whose one declared idea is to assist needy people, could come up with such a meagre offer. Indignation was so deep that not only did the fishermen themselves, and their unions, protest, but so also did Premier Smallwood and his Liberal members of the Legislature on speech day when the provincial house opened several weeks ago. Their protest was so strong that the Minister of Fisheries has now raised his sights with regard to these fishermen and is offering them $350 for three or four months for a married man and his family, and $200 for a single man. Even at that, any of us would find it very difficult to feed our families for three or four months on that amount, much less clothe the children and send them to school during the winter.

Perhaps I should not say this, but I more or less see in this first ridiculous offer the story of the Government during the last session of Parliament. You remember the many changes of mind which had to be made by certain ministers of the Crown during that session, how legislation was introduced, altered and sometimes withdrawn. In other words, legislation was brought in by individuals who had not taken sufficient time to study the problems which they were trying to solve. In this instance, I am quite sure that if the advisers of the Minister of Fisheries had taken time to analyse the situation properly, the minister would not have made such a miserly offer to those unfortunate fishermen and he would not have brought ridicule upon the Government.

You will remember that there was supposed to be a national fisheries program brought in last year. This program is still in the Speech from the Throne, but nobody as yet seems to know when this fisheries program is to start or of what it will consist. Incidentally, I believe it was the honourable Deputy Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) who last week referred to the 12-mile limit legislation passed last year as one of the great achievements of last year's session. I am afraid that that 12-mile limit program is now being as much derided by our people as was the catch failure assistance offered a month ago.

I sometimes wonder why the present Government seems to look at our fishermen in the Atlantic provinces with a blind eye while at the same time it keeps both eyes wide open when it looks at our farmers across Canada. I have a quotation here from the St. John's Evening Telegram which I would like to read to show that I am not the only one who thinks along these lines. This editorial says in part:

> Look at the Ottawa Throne Speech, at the "host of items" for farmers and fishermen. For the latter there is one announcement—income support for fishermen in bad catch seasons. This, presumably, refers to the assistance already announced, and legislation will be passed to establish it in the statute books.
> Now take a look at what the Speech sets forth for the farm population.
> 1) Proposals for the redevelopment of uneconomic farms; 2) revisions to make crop insurance available to all farmers; 3) establishment of a national dairy commission; 4) proposals to improve marketing of feed grain in Eastern Canada and British Columbia; 5) increased loan capital for the Farm Credit Corporation; 6) extension of unemploymeent insurance to fulltime farm workers.
> Does this not indicate the relative importance of farmers and fishermen in the present government's view?

I do not know whether it does or not. I do not think it does, but at any rate it is worthy of notice.

Last year legislation was suggested to safeguard farm incomes and to assist needy people, and these suggestions are now brought in again in the Speech from the Throne; and, incidentally, the Prime Minister deems it to be so important that he will take direct responsibility for its implementation. That is for needy people, and I do wish the plight of our fishermen had come to the attention fo the Prime Minister instead of where it went. In fact, when I look at all the acts on the statute books relative to the farmer and compare them with the paltry efforts to assist our fishermen, who work under much more difficult and dangerous circumstances, I am amazed. I would appeal to the present Government on behalf of our fishermen to take a good hard look at the difficult circumstances, the risks and dangers relative to our east coast fisheries, and endeavour to give some assistance to these fishermen so that there will be some security in the occupation bequeathed to them by their fathers. Here I refer not only to Newfoundland but also to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

You will note also in this year's Speech from the Throne, as indeed in last April's speech, references to the proposed Canada Development Corporation, the Canada Assistance Plan, the Company of Young Canadians, and medicare. With regard to the Canada Development Corporation, I believe we should all take a good look at this legislation before allowing it to go through, as I have seen considerable criticism of it in recent days by people who are much better able than I am to assess its impact upon our economy.

With regard to medicare, I am quite sure that the thought behind it is good but there has been much criticism from various provinces of the method of bringing it about, and I am sure the Government will be taking a second look at that, particularly since the recent conference of provincial health ministers.

Then we have the matter of education assistance and the Student Loans Act. These plans, if implemented, will redound to the benefit of many of our young people, but I am quite sure that our honourable Premier of Newfoundland would tell the Prime Minister here that he is not going far enough. Mr. Smallwood, you will remember, in addition to paying for the tuition of all university students, intends to pay them a salary when they attend university. Did any honourable senator here present ever receive a salary for going to university? This will apply to all university students who come from outside St. John's where the university is situated. In other words, every student in Newfoundland outside of St. John's, having passed his Grade 11 examinations, will be able to go into the university, have his tuition paid and receive a salary of, I believe, $200 per month. I am not sure if that is the exact figure but at any rate he will receive a salary. My guess is that the present Liberal Government of Newfoundland will soon have to build another university, and if they do they will have to borrow the money to build it.

The Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act is again on the drawing board. I think it is one of those acts which might well be on the priority list. Term 29 of the Confederation Agreement with Newfoundland has to be renewed from year to year, as it is again this year, although I do not see the necessity since the Prime Minister, I believe, and certainly the Premier of Newfoundland, promised that the $8 million per year would be paid in perpetuity.

Then again we have the Canadian Citizenship Act which is to ensure equality of rights for all citizens of Canada. Why we should need this I do not know, for I was always under the impression that any citizen, at least in all Commonwealth countries, was entitled to equality of rights. We see again from the Speech from the Throne, this year as it was last year, that legislation will be brought in relative to collective bargaining for public servants. The Canada Pension Plan, the Atlantic Development Board Act and several other items have also been taken from last session's Speech from the Throne.

I come now to another matter which I take not to be too important, but being a Newfoundlander I thought it my duty to draw your attention to it.

Hon. Mr. Baird: What about being a Canadian?

Hon. Mr. Hollett: It applies to Canadians as well as Newfoundlanders. I am a Canadian and I thank God I am a Newfoundland Canadian. Canada is a great nation, but it is made up of many parts and many peculiar individuals. I am about to deal with that fact in this item. As I say, I was born in Newfoundland and I naturally watch very carefully how we as Newfoundlanders are looked upon by our fellow Canadians. But I must admit that I do feel somewhat perturbed over a news item which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of January 29. In order to let you understand fully why I should feel perturbed, allow me to quote from that news item, which is headed "Labrador Takeover Urged". It is datelined Montreal and reads as follows:

> The executive council of the Montreal St. Jean Baptiste Society wants the Quebec government to "take possession in effect of the territory of Labrador by the exercise of its power and the implementation of its laws."
> The executive in a statement made public by its president Friday, said it does not accept the 1927 decision of the judicial committee of the British Privy Council awarding what now is Labrador to Newfoundland.

They just do not accept it forty years later. I continue:

> Yvon Groulx, who heads the French-language patriotic group in Montreal...

Patriotic to what?—I ask myself as I read on:

> ...said the society's council "judged it opportune and even urgent to make its attitude known immediately, having learned that there was a question of Quebec's signing in February an agreement on the development of Churchill (formerly Hamilton) Falls in the supposedly Newfoundland territory of Labrador."

The group thus called on the Quebec Government:

> "To sign no official agreement, with any government or company, involving any explicit or implicit recognition of the 1927 judgment.
>
> To take possession in effect of the territory of Labrador by the exercise of its power and the implementations of its laws, notably the cities and towns act, the municipal code, the education act, taxes, the universal pensions plan, social security, the mines act and other Quebec laws.
> And more precisely, that from the point of view of mining fees, Quebec should consider as Quebec minerals all those minerals extracted from the supposedly Newfoundland territory of Labrador, and that it act in consequence."

They are going to be rather late with regard to much of the minerals.

> The society executive also asked that a public inquiry should be held "for a definitive study of the question of Quebec's sovereignty over the territory of Labrador."

You will understand now, honourable senators, why I felt it my duty to bring this matter up and to try to clear the air a little for the St. Jean Baptiste Society. I am not thoroughly acquainted with the primary objectives of that society, but from its name I should have thought that they are of a religious order and that the last thing in the world such a society would consider would be to take away from any province any part of its territory. You will note they recommend to the Quebec Government—and I am quite sure the Quebec Government has more sense than to listen to them, or, at least, I hope so—that they take possession immediately of this territory belonging to my province, your province, a Canadian province.

I am sure most honourable senators are well aware of the decision made by the Privy Council in March of 1927 relative to the boundaries of Newfoundland. I refer you to Volume XII, page 1026, of the proceedings held in that connection during that month, bearing the heading:

> In the Matter of the Boundary Between the Dominion of Canada and the Colony of Newfoundland in the Labrador Peninsula.

It is not between Quebec or the St. Jean Baptiste Society and Newfoundland, but between Canada and Newfoundland. There you will find the judgment delivered by Their Lordships of the Privy Council. To bring us all up to date on the matter I will quote from their decision:

> ...their Lordships are of opinion that, according to the true construction of the Statutes, Orders in Council and Proclamations referred to in the Order of Reference, the boundary between Canada and Newfoundland in the Labrador Peninsula is a line drawn due north from the eastern boundary of the bay or harbour of Ance Sablon as far as the fifty-second degree of north latitude, and from thence westward along that parallel until it reaches the Romaine River, and then northward along the left or east bank of that river and its headwaters to their source and from thence due north to the crest of the watershed or height of land there, and from thence westward and northward along the crest of the watershed of the rivers flowing into the Atlantic Ocean until it reaches Cape

Chidley; and they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

You will recall that it was on March 22, 1927 that His Majesty approved the necessary document. You will please note that the question to be decided by His Majesty's Privy Council is contained in these words:

> What is the location and definition of the boundary as between Canada and Newfoundland in the Labrador Peninsula under the statutes, Orders in Council and Proclamations?

That was the reference. Please note the words, "the boundary as between Canada and Newfoundland." At that time Quebec did not enter into the picture, except in so far as she was one of the nine provinces.

In view of this, we Newfoundlanders ought not to be too much perturbed when such statements are made, but unfortunately we are human, like, I gather, most of the people in the other provinces. But if the members of the St. Jean Baptiste Society have any doubts in their minds as to the true ownership of the territory in question, I should like to also refer them to the British North America Act of 1949 with reference to the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada. You will remember that was passed during the St. Laurent regime, the Liberal St. Laurent regime, and I am quite sure that you all agree with me that Mr. St. Laurent is one of the finest gentlemen who have had the honour of being Prime Minister of Canada, one of the finest citizens of Canada, and one who has done much to unite the peoples of this nation. He was the man who signed the act on behalf of Canada. This was enacted as recently as 1949, and Article 2 of that act, as contained in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, Volume VI, reads as follows:

> The Province of Newfoundland . . .

Now understand that this was an agreement between Newfoundland, a colony, and the great Dominion of Canada—not between Ontario and Newfoundland, not between Manitoba and Newfoundland, or any other province and Newfoundland, but the Dominion of Canada, which included all provinces.

> The Province of Newfoundland shall comprise the same territory as at the date of Union, that is to say, the island of Newfoundland and the islands adjacent thereto, the Coast of Labrador as delimited in the report delivered by the Judicial Committee of His Majesty's Privy Council on the first day of March, 1927, and approved by His Majesty in His Privy Council on the twenty-second day of March, 1927 and the islands adjacent to the said Coast of Labrador.

I do hope that I have made the position as between the Province of Newfoundland and the Dominion of Canada quite clear, particularly as to the boundaries thereof. I fail to see what other explanation is necessary to either Quebec or any province of the dominion. Of course, if any province can put together an army and invade us and try to take Labrador away from us, then that is another matter. Evidently that is what is required by the St. Jean Baptiste Society.

I point out that the Province of Newfoundland is a part of the Dominion of Canada, and to take any part of it from us, by either force or any other manner, is to take it from Canada as a whole. It would mean taking it from under the jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada, and I cannot conceive of this great and growing nation allowing any society or any province, or any outside nation, to perpetrate such a foul act as that advocated by the St. Jean Baptiste Society in urging the Quebec Government "to take possession of the territory of Labrador by the exercise of its power". What power, may I ask? Where is the power of Quebec, or of any other province, to do such a thing? All Newfoundlanders would fight any such action to the last man, and they would not have to be conscripted to do so.

Hon. Mr. Baird: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I want to make it clear that we are, and have been since 1949, a loyal province of the dominion, but we hate to hear these insinuations from certain areas concerning our right to that which is ours by law, by order of the Privy Council signed by His Majesty, with the agreement of the Dominion of Canada. It hurts. It would hurt any honourable senator from Manitoba, British Columbia or elsewhere if somebody was foolish enough to say about your province what this society has about ours.

Oh, yes, we are Newfoundlanders all right, but we are also Canadians, and I hope and trust we shall try to be good Canadians. But I do not call it good Canadianism when one group of men advocates taking territory from Newfoundland or from any other province.

That is not the way to act if we are to make this nation one of the greatest in the world, as we hope it will be. We have everything, the minerals and other natural resources, and we have men and women from every part of the world. Every nation is represented in the Dominion of Canada. If we stick together like men, as we did in years before, then nobody in the world is going to hurt us.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable Senator Hollett, if he takes seriously any statements to the effect that somebody is proposing to take by force any territory of his native province? Is there anything in such foolish suggestions as were made by this society? I ask that question because there may be somebody in his province who would take seriously the discussion that has gone on this afternoon. Surely, there is no such proposition before us, or before any other body of any consequence in the dominion.

Hon. A. B. Baird: That is what we are wanting to stop right now. In my opinion, Senator Hollett has made a clear, concise and proper statement of the position of the Province of Newfoundland.

Honourable senators, I wish, first of all, to congratulate my former deskmate, Senator Smith (Kamloops), on his appointment to the high office of Speaker of this chamber. I congratulate also the mover and seconder of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Our leader, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) is not with us today, but I know I can say without fear of contradiction that we look forward to seeing him amongst us in the near future with his health fully restored.

Honourable senators, it was my privilege to be the Canadian representative on the military committee of NATO which met in New York. One of the principal subjects with which the military committee deals is the standardization of military equipment among the NATO countries. This is a very difficult subject, in many respects. It is generally acknowledged, on the one hand, that standardization is desirable not only in economic terms but in terms of military efficiency. Indeed, some progress has been made towards this objective in certain fields. On the other hand, however, member countries, and particularly the larger ones, have a tendency to endeavour to remain as self-sufficient as possible in the defence production field, and are reluctant to purchase abroad anything that they think they might be able to make themselves.

The reasons for this are economic as well as military. The fact is that some of the most sophisticated work in such fields as electronics and engineering is being done for military purposes, and a government which wishes to promote and advance in industrial technology often finds it can best do so through defence research development and production. The result has been a good deal of duplication of effort, and a degree of competition among the NATO countries in that field.

The NATO Parliamentarians have expressed their concern as to this situation on a number of occasions in the past, and at this conference a special committee was established to conduct a detailed examination of the problems, and to submit a report to the 1966 session.

Aside from the discussion of specific matters which take place in committees, one of the most valuable aspects of the NATO Parliamentarians' Conference is the opportunity it provides for informal discussions and the exchange of views.

Represented at this conference were parliamentarians from most major parties in the various NATO countries, and in the week which we spent together there was ample opportunity for us to obtain a clearer understanding of the approach made by our NATO partners to the problems we face in common.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Inman, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, February 7, at 8 p.m.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 3, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, at this time I should like to congratulate the Honourable Sydney J. Smith on his appointment to the chair of the Senate. Senator Smith has been a member of this chamber for many years, and is highly regarded by all of us. We know that he will preside with graciousness and dignity, and we wish him and his charming wife a happy tenure of office.

To Senator Bouffard I extend my congratutations and best wishes on his appointment as Deputy Leader of the Government in this chamber. While we deeply regret the illness of our leader, Senator John J. Connolly, and wish him a speedy recovery, I feel we are fortunate in having Senator Bouffard taking his place at the present time.

All of us are pleased, I know, to see Senator Brooks, the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate and a popular member of this chamber, with us again.

To the mover and seconder of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I offer my congratulations on their excellent speeches. To the new members of this chamber, I extend a hearty welcome and I hope they will enjoy the peaceful and quiet atmosphere of the Senate for many years.

On many occasions we work much harder and longer than some members of the other place, but we do not have to run for election, so we are spared the nerve-wracking thought: Will I or won't I make it this time? A large amount of the work of the Senate is done in committee, and at times in camera, so that we are spared some of the hurly-burly of public criticism, such as we read in our newspapers about the other place. And, at this point I would say that at times it is my opinion that the freedom of the press has been rather over done.

I am going to speak on tourism. You have heard me speak many times on this subject; however, this time I am not confining myself to Prince Edward Island. That Island, of course, is dearest to my heart, and you all know about the replicas at Woodleigh, the like of which you cannot see anywhere else in the world. You know about our beaches, our fishing, hunting and scenery, so I will not dwell on those famous attractions; but may I say that in 1964 Prince Edward Island realized $12 million from the tourist industry. I wish to speak tonight of tourism as an industry—the third biggest industry in Canada.

The Speech from the Throne contained many items of interest. There is a great amount of legislation forecast in it, and all of it for the welfare of Canada. But I was disappointed that nothing was mentioned about our tourist industry—at least, no legislation was mentioned that would further promote this third largest industry in our economy.

Since coming to the Senate almost eleven years ago, I have consistently called for a Department on Tourism. It is, as I said previously, our third greatest industry, and with intensive promotion could be the second or perhaps even first.

We must be factual—we have almost everything in Canada that the tourist wants. Other countries have their attractions, mostly specialized; we have it nearly all. Name it, we have it, with few exceptions. From Newfoundland to Vancouver Island, Canada can well be the vacationland of the world. I am sure that everyone who is concerned with increasing travel to Canada and within Canada, whether private or public, realizes by now that this country has an unparalleled opportunity to attract world travellers.

It has been estimated that Expo '67 will bring one billion in tourist dollars to Canada. One billion dollars is a lot of money, and it will be most welcome in the till of the Canadian tourist industry.

While Expo '67 has been heavily subsidized as the central theme of Canada's centennial year, it should not be forgotten that Canada is a very large country with many and varying attractions. Also, while Expo reflects many aspects of Canada, there should be a widely disseminated advertising campaign urging the visitor to Canada in 1967 to enjoy the many joys which our geography offers: the pastoral beauties of our country, the less settled areas offering opportunities for fish and game activities, our tranquil countryside and broad uncluttered beaches, all of which should be promoted to the same extent as Expo '67.

This is not asked in the spirit of denying the importance of Expo '67, but rather is an acceptance of the fact that Canada is a large, multifaceted, unspoiled and an ever-interesting country.

It is noted with gratification that the Province of Quebec has, by mid-February this year, called for statements of charges to be made to tourists regarding food, accommodation and services. This is very important to tourists. The other provinces should consult their governments regarding the fixing of reasonable fees for the information of tourists visiting them. I hope that all our provinces will co-operate to make this the biggest year in our tourist industry.

Honourable senators, I wish now to refer particularly to the beautiful Atlantic provinces, with all their charms and attractions.

Let us start with the Province of Newfoundland, Canada's newest province. Newfoundland is unique; it is a wonderful spot. I travelled through some of it by train and by car. It is different from any place you could visit anywhere. It has grimness in its great bare rocks. It has beauty and majesty, too. It is wild; it is also peaceful. It leaves one with the feeling that nature is here supreme. The people extend to its visitors a warm hospitality, leaving one with the desire to come again. A visit to this province will linger in one's memory as a delightful experience. Newfoundland has much to offer tourists who spend a vacation there.

Crossing from Newfoundland by boat, one arrives at Sydney in Cape Breton which, until the Canso Causeway was built, was an island, although part of the Province of Nova Scotia. In this province, and especially in Cape Breton, they say to the visitor: céad míle fáilte—A hundred thousand welcomes! I wish I could say it better in Gaelic, as it is a beautiful expression.

Nova Scotia is full of history. I have seen the place where Champlain spent his first winter in Canada in a primitive fort in the Annapolis Valley. It has been rebuilt and is a perfect replica of the original one. Here, too, in Nova Scotia is the Land of Evangeline. Halifax is an old city, full of history. The hills and valleys, harbours and coves are the artist's paradise.

When you visit Nova Scotia you are following the trail of the Norsemen who landed there nearly one thousand years ago. There are still in this province massive forts, historical houses and museums to remind one of the old days. The Cabot Trail through Cape Breton National Park, although a modern highway, is nevertheless an adventurous drive through spectacular scenery.

In Port Royal was organized the first social club in America. If you spend seven days in the province you will be given a certification of membership in the Order of the Good Cheer. I have two of them, so I must have been there twice. It is difficult to say which part of this lovely province is the most beautiful, for nature endowed it with beauty spots at every turn.

And now we come to the "Picture Province", as the natives call New Brunswick. This province, while not surrounded by water as are the other provinces, has a number of lordly rivers; the mighty Saint John which rises in the State of Maine, flows through much of the province and empties into the Bay of Fundy. It is most certainly a lordly river. The Restigouche and Miramichi are noted for their salmon fishing. The Richibucto is also noted for salmon fishing; another picturesque river is the Petitcodiac, with its tidal bore sweeping up every tide from the Bay of Fundy, a spectacle well worth seeing.

New Brunswick has Fundy National Park, 80 square miles of scenic wonderland. Close by is Hopewell Cape, with its giant columns of soft red sandstone. Then, being built at the present time is the Mactaquac Dam, which is a tremendous undertaking, but when one looks at the beautiful farm lands and scenery to be inundated one cannot but feel nostalgic. But in the world in which we live today progress must not be impeded by sentiment.

With respect to the name of this dam I must tell you a local story about an Irishman and a Scotsman who each bought a duck. The Irishman called his duck Mike; the Scotsman named his Mac. They decided that each would train his duck to fight, and instead of having a cockfight they would have a duckfight. They would charge for admission and make themselves some money. After a certain time they got together to find out how the ducks were progressing with the training. The Irishman said that he was betting Mike to fight very well, but the Scotsman said, "I am sorry but I cannot even get Mac to quack."

A visit to these four provinces would be well worth while to those who plan to come to Canada or to people within Canada who propose visiting Expo next year. I am sure that everyone who is concerned with increasing tourist travel to Canada, and within this country, realizes that now is an opportune time to make every effort to attract tourists to Canada, the second-largest country in the world. I feel that our Government should take steps as soon as possible to set up a Department of Tourism.

It is my opinion that transcontinental tours for parliamentarians would do much for the tourist industry. I remember that such tours were promoted some years ago. They would give those people from the west an opportunity to know conditions in the east, and the easterners would learn about life in the west. Canada is a very big country and every member of Parliament and every senator should know as much as possible about it, the better to realize the great potential of our tourist industry.

This is more important perhaps for our generation than for the youth of today, who are being given opportunities under some of the Centennial projects that provide for exchange visits between students who live in different parts of Canada.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, knowing that the mind is never fully satisfied with what is seen through the eyes and what is heard through the ears, I would appreciate it if you would follow me when I make what I would like to describe as a tour d'horizon into the state of our country and the world. My remarks in this speech will attempt to interpret what has been seen and what has been heard in order to try to satisfy the mind.

Honourable senators, in rising to speak to this debate, might I first congratulate Your Honour on your elevation to the Chair of Mr. Speaker of this honourable assembly. I believe that I speak for all of us on this side of the house when I say that you will receive the most kind and courteous attention and respect, because we will remember that you were once one of us. It is only on rare occasions that the message of Christmas is so well understood by a Prime Minister that he picks on one who sits to the left of the Speaker to act as Speaker in this assembly. We know that your experience and knowledge of the function of this assembly will be a valuable asset and will assist you in your daily duties. Permit me to wish for you the kindness and patience of David and the wisdom of Solomon.

May I add a word or two to the compliments that have been paid to the honourable Senator Vaillancourt.

[Translation]

Honourable Senator Vaillancourt, allow me to tell you it is with regret that we have accepted your resignation as Deputy Government Leader in the Senate. Your competence and the sincerity with which you have always dealt with your colleagues were so great and appreciated that all join me in wishing you a well-earned rest. Could we but stop the hands of time, stop time itself, we would do it willingly as a token of gratitude for the esteem you have always shown us.

To your worthy and highly qualified successor, Senator Bouffard, we wish every success; we know his qualities and talents have made him one of the most prominent and sought-after lawyers of his province.

His great wisdom, we hope, will make him better realize that increasing successes obtained by any leader in a democracy are mainly recognized when he shows impartiality and a great deal of tolerance towards those who often have the unpleasant task of criticizing him, and this spirit is often more acceptable when the shoe is on the other foot.

First, a word of thanks to my superiors, I mean our distinguished and devoted leaders, Senator Brooks, who always performs his tasks with so much ability and kindness that it is a real pleasure to work with him, and the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, who continues with so much skill, vigour and wisdom, to dominate the Canadian political scene.

When one looks without partisanship and with sincerity at the lack of decision and constant hesitation of the government we have had since June 1963, one can only ask where is our nation going to and what will become of the Canadian Confederation. But I would rather stress the urgent obligation of all Canadians to have a feeling of interdependence, friendliness and mutual understanding and respect for the common heritage distinguishing every Canadian regardless of his origin or his faith.

This feeling shows the strength and the beauty as it demonstrates the authenticity of the ideal of our Canadian Centennial through its realization in that spirit of understanding and love.

What should we say about those who, on the contrary, as their contribution to political life, bring nothing but bitter eroding and systematic criticism?

What about those who question or deny the validity of the make-up of our beautiful Canadian nation as well as a traditional teaching of unity but who, on the other hand, advocate new and untenable ideologies?

What about those who, to be modern, find it nice, worthy of imitation and of defense everything they see in the opposite side but unbearable and debatable everything they find here?

My intention is certainly not to criticize the process of purification, improvement and renewal which is at work to uplift the Canadian thought.

I simply want to invite all those who feel the dignity and the responsibility of the word "Canadian", who strongly and deeply love the feeling of internal unity, to love and respect it by their words and deeds, so that we may continue to enjoy our Canadian nation for what it is, a magnificently united nation, and in order to develop the splendour which stems from it for the enlightenment of the world.

May I remind you briefly of the last hour of the year 1965, which is barely over, to tell you of all the happiness that I felt while listening to this great Canadian, the worthy and dedicated representative of our gracious Queen, who told us in his last message of the year that we should be more proud of our nation and of our Canadian citizenship.

This renowned and dauntless soldier repeated in well-chosen words, with his well-known sincerity and dedication, the same thing that the late President John Kennedy said in his inaugural speech to the White House:

> Do not ask what your country can do for you, but what you can do for your country.

Honourable senators, let me tell you all the happiness that I felt as a member of this house when I represented the Canadian government on the occasion of the historical visit of His Holiness Pope Paul VI to the United Nations. Noticeably moved, he who is called the Servant of the Servants of God went into this gigantic glass Babel tower proudly erected by the 20th century to the glory of peace in the new world.

An extraordinary event took place on that afternoon of October 4. The reason for this trip was a very simple one: invited for 1966 by Secretary General U Thant, the Pope accepted the invitation, but the fighting going on in Asia caused him to advance the date of this rendez-vous with the nations of the world. Indeed, it is a simple explanation, too simple. He is the only leader of a great religion who could afford to take this risk because Catholicism is the only religion with a single leader.

In other days not so long past, some would have cried: "Priest-ridden." Those days are now past, since a prophetic Pope called John saw in a lightning flash, a vision of the Church and the world reconciled. Man of fire and vision, he wanted to go far forward. But he was aware of the limitations he could not overlook without jeopardizing everything. John XXIII was the prophet of a new Church. Paul VI is the pioneer. First he visited the Holy Land six months after his election. It was a pilgrimage to the sources. Then he went to Bombay and this time the Pope was a missionary. In non-Christian land, he had a rendez-vous with poverty. For the first time the Church emerged from the ghetto. Suddenly, it went to meet men, regardless of religion. It descended from its royal throne—many believed this and sometimes rightly so it seemed—to throw a challenge contrary to the spirit of the gospel.

Bearer of the gospel, Paul VI wants to get in and take position on the problems troubling the men of his time, whatever their religion, the system under which they live or their economic situation.

More than that, he appraises to what extent the personality of John XXIII has changed the idea which the people of the planet have about the Church. He is no longer a guilty one. He may say what he thinks. If he engages the Vatican's authority, it is because he is convinced that the Church has nothing to lose, and that the cause of peace has something to gain.

Haunted by the spectre of war, it was the main reason for his trip to the UN. Why this haste? Because Paul VI was afraid of war. The facts are there. In 1950, many people were afraid of war; in 1965 nobody believed in it. The average man thinks that Russians and Americans get along rather well; that the wisdom and strength of the two Great Powers limit conflicts to small local wars without great danger. That is not the opinion of Paul VI. According to him, the evolution of the world is dominated by the rebirth of violent nationalism, by the thirst for power, and by the proliferation and dissemination of nuclear weapons. By the year 2000 the whole earth will probably be at the mercy of the madness of a head of state or of the collective hysteria of some nation if nothing comes before it is too late to establish order in the relations between nations. No country, be it the most powerful in the world, is immune from violence. That is his great concern and, to my mind, the reason for his trip. He is running a political risk because he feels that nations are taking a much more terrifying one.

Now the great moment is at hand. In the UN, 117 nations out of 122 are represented. Only the divided nations are missing —Germany, Viet Nam, Korea; also Switzerland, ever neutral, and China. The whole world is there, but it is a disunited world. The United Nations is 20 years old. In the last twenty years there have been forty wars; forty poorly held briefs are piled in the records of the UN, forty lost causes. That is the moment Paul VI chose for his visit—the worst moment. I did say "chose", for, despite the diplomatic amenities of U Thant, there is every reason to believe that the initiative came from the Vatican through its permanent representative at the UN, Monsignor Giovanetti. There is a double wager. The Assembly may be very cool towards the Pope's message. We shall see. It may subsequently not take it into consideration at all.

With the dignity of the head of a great and ancient church and the fervor of a simple man seeking peace, Pope Paul VI asked the United Nations to do away with offensive weapons and to build a universal authority. The Pontiff, a slim figure in white, stood at the green marble rostrum of the General Assembly, and cried in French, "No more war, war never again!"

The Pope, pleading for peace before the representatives of 116 nations, cast himself in the role of the ancient prophet—the man above mere national, racial or political loyalties. It is a role utterly fitting for one whose chief title is the Vicar of Christ on earth. For the highest conception of the man called Jesus, even among those who do not accept the theological claims of Christianity, is that of one who stood for the noblest aspirations of the human spirit, aspirations that transcend everything that divides and ultimately dishonours humanity.

Before him in the green, gold and blue Assembly Hall were the representatives of 116 of the United Nations' 117 members. Only tiny Albania, communist China's spokesman in eastern Europe, boycotted the papal address.

Peace was the dominant theme of Pope Paul VI's message. But he also spoke of the United Nations working at its best on a basis of universality, and he asked the Assembly to "bring back among you" those that have left and to study methods of "uniting to your pact of brotherhood, in honour and loyalty, those who do not yet share in it."

To a packed audience of about 2,200, the Pontiff pledged the authority of the Catholic church to the United Nations, which he called "the last hope of concord and peace."

The Pontiff's address, with its emphasis on universality, disarmament and the development of a world authority, went far beyond the simple plea for peace expected by most delegates.

He was heard in silence. When he finished with an appeal for a restoration of spiritual values in furthering civilization, there was a second of silence and then a long burst of applause. Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko of the Soviet Union was as responsive in his reaction at this point as was Foreign Minister Maurice Couve de Murville of France.

The Pope's reference to widening the membership of the United Nations went straight to one of the most bitterly debated issues of this General Assembly. "Those who do not yet share" in the "brotherhood" include communist China, whose admission is opposed by the United States and supported by the Soviet Union, France and a number of African and Asian states. Those "who have separated themselves"—in the Pope's words—include Indonesia, with a hundred million people.

The Pontiff's reference to the acute issue of communist China's admission, oblique though it was, provoked wide discussion among delegates. Two leading Catholic members of the world organization, France and Italy, have advocated Peiping's admission, and the Pope's apparent endorsement seemed to strengthen their position on this issue within the General Assembly.

The United States from the outset has opposed communist China's admission. American officials, while clinging to the belief that Peiping would be kept out, conceded after the speech that the Pope's support for universality in the world organization would have a significant effect upon many of the delegations.

One of the most pertinent comments during the United Nations debate on communist China's admission came from Chief S. O. Adebo of Nigeria:

> I am as distressed as anyone by China's present language; but while it is kept out its language will not improve.

This is the point many Americans are still unable or unwilling to accept. Many moderate governments voted for Peiping's admission not because they condone its behaviour but because they believe the long-run chances for improvement of that behaviour will be better with communist China inside the UN than outside it.

Most of the countries directly in the path of truculent China—Burma, Cambodia, India, Nepal, Pakistan—voted to admit Peiping. In Africa, which Premier Chou En-Lai calls "ripe for revolution," twice as many of the new nations voted for Peiping as against it.

Long before the Pope's entrance the delegations were in their places in the hall. The majority of Africans and Asians were in dark business suits except for a few in brightly coloured robes.

Heads turned when Mrs. John F. Kennedy arrived escorted by Richard Cardinal Cushing and her brothers-in-law, Senators Robert Kennedy of New York and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Amintore Fanfani, Italy's foreign minister and the President of the twentieth session of the General Assembly, called the meeting to order and then departed with the Secretary-General, U Thant, to escort the Pope down the central aisle to the platform.

As the white-clad figure appeared, the applause began, lasting for nearly a minute until the Pope had reached the platform. He acknowledged the welcome with the already familiar gesture, arms half outstretched as if to grasp every hand in the auditorium. He sat in a large beige-leather chair, last used by President Kennedy, while first Mr. Fanfani and then Mr. Thant welcomed him to the session. The Pope sat motionless.

Seated to the left and right of the platform were the cardinals of the Pope's entourage and of the United States. Their scarlet birettas and sashes added a vivid splash of colour. These princes of the church, representing every continent, were a reminder of the global influence of Pope Paul's church. Yet early in his speech, he told the audience, "You have before you a humble man, your brother." He said it was a great occasion, "great for us, great for you" because he was following the ancient command to his church to "go and bring the good news to all peoples."

For a world organization considered by many to be suffering from a loss of prestige, the Pontiff brought powerful reinforcement. To him the United Nations represented the unmistakable road toward peace. "Retreat," he said, "must never be admitted."

He saw progress in the admission of "the younger peoples" and in the adoption of the principle of universality, that is, the creation of a United Nations that embraces all countries.

"Go forward always," the Pope advised in beginning what was considered to be the most controversial part of his speech, that which advised the world organization to expand and to admit those who have departed and those not yet in. He declared:

> Strive to bring back among you any who have separated themselves, and study the right method of uniting to your pact of brotherhood, in honour and loyalty, those who do not yet share in it. Act so that those still outside will desire and merit the confidence of all, and then be generous in granting such confidence.

From this the Pontiff passed to an insistence upon the principle of equality among members. All members might not be equal he said, but in a passage presumably directed to the large powers—the United States and the Soviet Union—he declared that it was an "act of high virtue" to assume equality because man's brotherhood was impossible without humility. This humility, the Pope indicated, is essential for peace. But peace, he insisted, must be built as much by ideas as with politics and the balance of forces and interests.

The first step, the Pope declared, is disarmament. "Let the arms fall from your hands," he advised the nations, for "one cannot love while holding offensive arms."

Man, unfortunately, must retain defensive arms, the Pope said, but the starting point is the abandonment of offensive nuclear weapons that poison men's minds, demand enormous expenditures and divert men's efforts from the works of peace.

Pope Paul's appeal for outlawing nuclear offensive weapons came at a time when the United States and the Soviet Union, the two great nuclear powers, are deadlocked on the issue. The Soviet Union demands a ban on the dissemination of nuclear weapons which, to Moscow, means forbidding nuclear arms to the West Germans. The United States advocates a halt in the production of nuclear weapons and the diversion of fissionable material to peaceable use. Neither government has shown any flexibility.

The Pontiff's broad appeal for the junking of all nuclear weapons appeared to be an attempt to bridge the gap between the two positions and to end the long Soviet-American wrangle over the takeoff point for nuclear disarmament.

The principle of working "one for another" was seen by the Pope as a beacon of hope for the world. He described brotherly co-operation among the peoples as the United Nations at its best.

Respect for human life, "even with regard to the great problem of the birth rate," must find in the United Nations its affirmation and its defence, the Pope declared in introducing his comment on birth control. "You must strive," he said, "to multiply bread so that it suffices for the tables of mankind," and not rather favour an artificial control of births, which would be irrational, in order to diminish the number of guests at the banquet of life.

Man's dignity is as much a necessity as bread, he said, and in this field he praised the United Nations' efforts to hasten social and economic progress by harnessing the resources of science, technology and modern organization.

The Pontiff's final point, however, was that what the world organization did in the future must rest on more than material accomplishments. The hour has come, he emphasized, for inner transformation and renewal, for recollection, reflection and prayer. The dangers, he warned, come not from science, but from man, who now has the means of his own destruction.

The audience embraced every faith and every race. Directing it to a revival of spiritual principles, the Pontiff noted that faith in God could be founded upon "the unknown God" of whom St. Paul preached to the Athenians.

"Unknown to them, although without realizing it, they sought him and he was close to them, as happens also to many men of our times," the Pope said.

No one left the United Nations believing that the Pope of Rome had suddenly and unaccountably become an indifferentist in the battles being waged on the ideological level for the soul of man.

The present Pope remains as adamantly opposed to atheistic and relativistic systems of thought as any of his predecessors. What has happened is that the Pope has chosen to become a spokesman for man. It was the survival of mankind and the peace and well-being of man, that he emphasized in his speech.

Like his forerunner, the beloved Pope John XXIII, Pope Paul realizes that science and technology have annulled any purpose that warfare in the past might have served. In his encyclical Pacem in Terris—"Peace on Earth", Pope John pleaded again and again for reason and common sense to be put ahead of ideological claims, and he did so not in the name of Platonic abstractions but in the name of the survival of the creatures of flesh and blood who inhabit the earth.

Pope Paul has taken up where Pope John XXIII left off. The change from even the recent past is that the Pope no longer seems to look upon his church as a party in the world's quarrels or as a political partisan of any kind, but as a spiritual force upholding human dignity and the goodness of life.

Not too many years ago the Roman Catholic Church was looked upon by the Western powers as a quasi-political ally. There has been a tremendous change. Ecumenical Council Vatican II, for example, has carefully refrained from condemning Communism by name.

The present mood of Catholicism is to suspect its own power. Many of the present leaders are trying to break with the church's political past and to recapture its original purity. This is not easily achieved. Pope Paul, even as he spoke of his own lack of political power, must have realized that his words were still fraught with political significance. They will be read and analyzed as carefully as any ruler's.

In the main the Pope's speech will make life easier for those harassed statesmen who are trying to avoid violence and war. By removing the Church and, by extension, the force of religious zeal from the political energies of the cold war, the Pontiff may have cooled fires that frequently threaten to get out of hand.

By throwing his vast prestige and spiritual authority behind the United Nations, he strengthened the one means for peaceful settlement of burning political issues open to contemporary man.

Like his predecessor, Pope Paul VI seemed to be saying that before man can believe in God, he must first believe in himself. In this sense, his speech was a thundering credo—worthy of the great churchmen.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, debate adjourned.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1966

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-116, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1966.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, perhaps I should explain my request for leave to move second reading now.

As honourable senators know, this bill has just been received from the other place, and I thought it might be helpful to the members if I explained it now. It is not a large bill—only the figures in it are large. After my explanation, the debate can be adjourned, and proceeded with tomorrow. If that is in order and meets with the approval of the Senate, I shall, with leave, proceed to explain second reading now.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators, I think some copies of the bill have been distributed. In any event, I may be able to explain it so that you can follow it without the necessity of having the bill in your hands. It is cited as Appropriation Act No. 1, 1966, and is in the usual form of an interim supply bill. In point of fact, it is the sixth supply bill dealing with the estimates and, expenditures of the Government, for the current fiscal year, which began April 1, 1965 and will end on March 31, 1966.

Of the five preceding supply bills, two of them dealt finally with the Estimates that were contained in them. One was a supplementary estimate of $2 million, the other a supplementary estimate of $15 million. Both of those estimates were finally disposed of by two of the five supply bills.

The other three were interim supply bills which granted the Government the moneys to carry on from month to month until in total they added up to seven-twelfths of the total of the items in the estimates, that is, sufficient to supply the Government with money to carry on from March 31, 1965 until October 31, 1965. As all honourable senators know, Parliament was dissolved before October 31, 1965; therefore, by that date the amount of money that had been granted by Parliament had been drawn upon, and for the months of November, December and January, the Government carried on under the provisions of the Financial Administration Act, which permits the issue of Governor General's warrants. These Governor General's warrants are, of course, not in addition to the expenditures in the estimates. They must be justified in the same way as other expenditures and they must come either under the main or supplementary estimates, and furthermore they must be included in the first vote of supply when Parliament meets.

I think that all honourable senators will be interested in the general over-all picture of the Government expenditures for the year.

The Main Estimates that were tabled on March 22, 1965, proposed a total expenditure of $7,601,722,232. Of this amount $3,219,091,388 represented statutory payments and therefore did not require the approval of this Parliament. The balance of the main Estimates, amounting to $4,382,630,844, is the amount requiring authority of this Parliament.

In addition, there have been four supplementary estimates filed: Supplementary Estimates A, in the amount of $2,000,000, which, as I said before, has been finally approved by Parliament; Supplementary Estimates B, in the amount of $278,389,959, which are included as part of this bill; Supplementary Estimates C, in the amount of $15,000,000, which were finally approved last June; and Supplementary Estimates D, which were tabled last week, and which amount to $277,326,349. This brings the total amount of the main and supplementary estimates to date to $8,174,438,440. This does not include the Old Age Security Fund which, as you know, is a fund to which certain special taxes are directed. The expenditure for the current fiscal year on old age pensions is expected to be about $905,000,000 and the revenue from the taxes will provide a surplus over and above the amount.

I should also mention for your benefit that the total over-all figure for expenditure, amounting to $8,174,438,440, includes loans, investments and advances which total some $348,535,107.

Coming to the bill itself, Parliament had so far authorized, up to October 31 the release of $2,811,609,901. This is to say, out of the total amount that requires the authority of Parliament, namely, $4,940,930,485, there had been released up to October 31, the sum of $2,811,609,901. In this bill it is proposed to release a further $1,720,674,987, which will then carry the Government expenditures through to March 1 and leave for the final vote a sum of $408,645,595.

What the bill does, therefore, in general is bring all votes that have not yet been dealt with—all but those two that I mentioned which were finally disposed of—up to eleven-twelfths of the items set out in the main and supplementary estimates.

Honourable senators, the bill is in the usual pattern of interim supply bills. Furthermore, it carries with it an undertaking of the Minister of Finance in the other place and of the Leader of the Government, in this place, that the passing of this bill, representing as it does purely interim supply, is without prejudice to the right of any senator to consider and deal with the estimates on any future occasion as fully and as effectively as if this bill had not been passed. In other words, it is simply putting the Government in funds to carry on the necessary business of government until the estimates are finally passed.

The operating clause is section 2 of the bill, which releases this figure of $1,720,674,987 of the expenses, bringing them all up to eleven-twelfths of the items in the Main Estimates and the Supplementary Estimates A and B as set out in subsections (a), (b) and (c) of section 2. That is the whole purpose of section 2: it releases all payments up to an amount of eleven-twelfths of the items.

Then there is the proviso at the bottom of that section, on page 2 of the bill, which brings in the Governor General's warrants. It says that this release is deemed to include and is not to be in addition to the amounts authorized by the various Governor General's warrants, giving the dates and amounts of the warrants. Those warrants in all amounted to $920,591,467, which covered the expenses during November, December and January.

Section 3 of the bill is the usual clause dealing with the purpose and effect of each item. Sections 4 and 5 are also standard clauses in all these bills, dealing with commitments and with the rendering of accounts.

Honourable senators, in conclusion may I remind you that the estimates have again been referred to the Finance Committee and they have been and will continue to be under the scrutiny of that committee. As chairman of that committee, I would welcome the help and the assistance and the careful examination by members on both sides of this chamber in considering those estimates. We have here in this house men who are experienced in both business and government. On both sides of the house we have quite a number of men who have been federal cabinet ministers and who are familiar with the working of government and the efficient conduct of government business. If we can work together we can, by our combined experience and knowledge, make a constructive contribution to the efficient administration of the country's affairs.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, we all appreciate the explanation of this bill given by the sponsor, Senator Leonard. I do not propose to go on with the debate tonight. As a matter of fact, this is one of those very few occasions when we can take a little time in considering a supply bill. We are usually pressed because of the urgency to get royal assent for most of these bills. As some members wish to speak on the bill, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Could we have copies of the bill by tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: All honourable senators will have a copy of the bill by tomorrow.

Honourable senators, I ask that this be first on the Orders of the Day tomorrow, so that we may have time for a full discussion and perhaps passage of the bill tomorrow.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Brooks, debate adjourned.

DIVORCE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the first report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, which was presented on February 3.

On motion of Honourable Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, report adopted.

INTERPRETATION ACT

BILL TO REVISE—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill S-9, to revise and consolidate the Interpretation Act and amendments thereto, and to effect certain consequential amendments to the Canada Evidence Act and the Bills of Exchange Act.

He said: Honourable senators, last year I had the honour of introducing a bill bearing the same title and in substantially the same form as the one now before us. That bill received second reading, but on account of the adjournment and subsequent dissolution of Parliament it did not receive consideration in the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to which it had been referred. In consequence, this present bill is now before us.

The bill, as the title implies, deals with definitions. Now to some honourable senators that may not sound very interesting, but I can assure this house that this is a most important bill. Indeed, it is so important that a bill of the same title, the Interpretation Act, was the first to be passed in 1867. That act remains on the statute books to this day and, though there have been amendments from time to time, it is essentially the same now as it was then. This bill deals with a general revision of that act, which it repeals.

While this bill follows the previous bill almost word for word, there are seven important changes. I could read these changes, but I think it would be more helpful if I placed a list of them on the record so that honourable senators will have them before them when the bill is considered in committee. With the consent of the house, I propose to put them on Hansard.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The list of changes follows:

1. In clause 26 (5), the expression "slight deviations" has been changed by deleting the word "slight" which is felt to be unnecessary.

2. In clause 27 (1), the opening words have been changed to substitute the word "creates" in place of "establishes", to be more consistent with the terminology of the Criminal Code.

3. At page 12, the definitions of "land" and "real property" previously proposed have been deleted on the ground that it may be better to rely on the context in which these expressions appear in an enactment, in order to determine the precise sense in which they are used.

4. Also on page 12, the definition of "holiday" has been changed generally to accord more closely with the approach that is used in the "Bills of Exchange Act" (where non-juridical days are defined). The new definition is, I think, more accurate and also permits account to be taken of the fact that certain days are holidays in some parts of Canada, although not in others.

5. On page 14, the definition of "Standard Time" as it applies to different areas of Canada has been modified so as to make it possible to vary the definition by proclamation in order to take into account changes in time zone boundaries that may be made in the future (e.g., as a result of a change in a provincial law defining standard time for general purposes within a province).

6. The schedule to the bill, listing the countries that are now recognized as "Commonwealth countries" (see the definition of this expression in clause 28 (6)) has been updated by the addition of Singapore and Malawi, both of which have achieved independent Commonwealth status since June of last year.

7. The period of "thirty days" referred to in clause 22 (3) has been extended to sixty days—(30 days is probably too short a time to permit processing of some of these appointments).

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford): Honourable senators, this bill is what I might call a committee bill. Therefore to read over the clauses one by one would not be of much assistance. I feel it should go to a committee where it should receive the most careful and detailed consideration.

This bill is also important because the definitions set forth therein will be the definitions used in statutes, enactments, and regulations.

Last year when a similar bill was before the Senate one honourable senator—I believe it was Senator Roebuck—suggested that when the bill was considered in committee it might be advisable to set up a subcommittee to spend considerable time reading the bill word by word, and then to come back to the committee with a report. That, I realize, is a question for the committee itself to decide. But to me it would seem to be the most sensible way of dealing with the bill.

After the previous bill was introduced and received second reading in this house, I was contacted by several outside people who wished to make representations to the committee. I mention this so that honourable senators will see that while this bill may appear not to be very interesting, it has nevertheless received the attention and consideration of persons outside Parliament who are interested in legislation and the drafting of it.

Honourable senators, I do not think it is necessary for me to add anything further at this time. If the bill receives second reading I shall then move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, as the honourable sponsor has said, this bill is practically the same as the one which came before us last session. At that time it was known as Bill S-15. I have read both bills carefully and I find there is very little difference between them. Last session the bill received second reading and, as the sponsor has mentioned, Parliament adjourned and later dissolved before the committee reported thereon.

It was also suggested last session that this was essentially a committee bill, and that it would require very few remarks in the house on second reading. Furthermore, the suggestion was then made that it might be a wise course to set up a subcommittee to deal with the bill in the manner outlined to us by Senator Macdonald (Brantford). As he indicated, the suggestion was made by Senator Roebuck. Personally, I think this is an excellent idea; it is the most expeditious way in which to deal with this legislation. Five or six people who are well versed in these matters can do much better work than 25 or 30, especially if they have the advice, as they would have, of very experienced civil servants from the appropriate department.

I read the remarks of the honourable Senator Macdonald (Brantford) last year, and noticed that at that time he also told us that this was the first bill passed after Confederation. That, of course, would be quite obvious since it would be rather difficult to pass subsequent legislation without an interpretation of the phraseology and terms which later legislation would contain.

Senator Macdonald (Brantford) has indicated that there are a few changes. I remember that Senator Roebuck dealt with the definition of "land" as it appeared in the old bill. Somebody must have taken his remarks seriously and, I would add, with very good judgment, because I notice that there is no definition of "land" in this bill. The changes are not numerous, but such as there are give a very good idea of the variety of matters that must be discussed. As I have said, "land" was one of the definitions in last year's bill, and of course land is as old as time itself.

Senator Grosart pointed to the word "broadcasting". That of course is something which is very recent, and demonstrates the passage of time and the changes which have occurred since 1867.

I said last year, and I repeat, that I consider this bill has been well drafted and that the explanatory notes are good. I congratulate the Department of Justice on their preparation of this bill and its explanatory notes. I am also pleased that it is again being introduced in the Senate, and I hope that we shall receive for consideration many other bills of a similar nature.

The purpose of the bill was explained to us last year by the sponsor, namely, to bring up to date the subject matter in accordance with modern drafting standards; and, as a result, it would be of great benefit to the courts and all persons interested in the understanding and interpretation of federal statutes and regulations. The sponsor also said last year that it was timely legislation in that it would assist the commission in revising and consolidating the public general Statutes of Canada.

I would like to ask the sponsor of this bill: Has the commission been set up, and is it operating now? Also, has its work been held up in any way by the delay in the passing of this bill? Last year he emphasized the fact that it was timely legislation in that it would allow this commission to proceed with its work. I might read what the honourable senator said at that time, because if there was any urgency in passing this legislation it has certainly been thwarted, for we have had to wait almost a year. He said:

> Finally, I remind honourable senators that this is a piece of legislation which will be of benefit not only to ourselves but also to the courts, and all persons interested in the understanding and interpretation of statutes and regulations made by the authority of the Parliament of Canada.
> The legislation is particularly timely, since Parliament has now passed the necessary legislation establishing a commission to revise and consolidate all the public general Statutes of Canada. It is important that this legislation be dealt with as soon as possible, in order that the important work of that commission may proceed on the basis of the new Act as proposed by this bill.

Perhaps the honourable sponsor can tell us later just how much the work of the commission has been held up by the delay in the passing of this bill.

My attention was drawn to an article in this morning's Montreal Gazette under the caption "Quebec wants some time on its hands." There is a definition of "time" in this bill, and there seems to be some doubt as to whether the federal Government or the provincial governments have the say as to the setting of standard time, and so on. At page 14 of the bill I read this:

> "Standard time", except as otherwise provided by any proclamation of the Governor in Council which may be issued for the purposes of this paragraph in relation to any province or territory or any part thereof, means . . .

(b) in relation to the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, those parts of the Province of Quebec and the Northwest Territories lying east of the sixty-eighth meridian of west longitude, and the County of Temiscouata—

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks:

—including the Town of Cabano in the Province of Quebec, Atlantic standard time, being four hours behind Greenwich time. . . .

We are anxious to see that remain as it is, because I do not think we could have any better association with any part of the country than that which we have with the County of Temiscouata.

Reverting to the article in this morning's Gazette, it states:

The federal Government is apparently planning to introduce legislation this year governing time zones and standard time in a move to bring an end to time abnormalities which exist in many prairie regions.

It goes on to say that the Province of Quebec feels it also should deal with this matter of time. I just mention this to show that the committee might have some difficulty in defining "standard time". However, I hope it will be left as is and that there will be no trouble over that matter.

Honourable senators, I have only to say that I know this bill will be efficiently dealt with in the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce—an excellent committee, of course. I also know that from the membership of that committee a fine subcommittee can be selected and that it will do excellent work.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I did not object so much to the definition of "time", but it does seem to me that an interpretation bill is a strange place in which to define "time". If it is to be defined, I would like to know what statutes are to be affected by the change in the definition, but as long as we have a good time I suppose it is all right. However, honourable senators must realize that when we are proposing to change the meaning of words that have been used in statutes according to certain meanings since 1867, we should make speed slowly.

Take the definition of "land". I have no particular objection to the defining of "land", but I had a grave objection to the kind of definition I saw in the bill last year, and I am glad to see it has now been dropped.

I would like to adjourn the debate in order that I might have an opportunity of examining the bill closely. I have not been able to do so today, nor will I be able to do so before we meet tomorrow. Nevertheless, because the matter is so important, and I think everyone agrees that we should take the necessary time, I now move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, debate adjourned.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON AGING

CONSIDERATION OF FINAL REPORT— DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the final report of the Special Committee on Aging.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I was one of the twenty rank-and-file members of this committee whose report is before us, and it has been suggested that I might say a word at this time about the management of that committee, more or less on behalf of the rankers.

As honourable senators are aware, the committee was under the chairmanship of Senator Croll and the vice-chairmanship of Senator Haig. The Steering Committee was composed of Senators Lefrançois, Fergusson and Quart. My first purpose in rising tonight is to pay tribute to the work done by them in ordering the affairs of this committee. Like many of you, I have been a member of many committees in my time. More often than not I have reached the conclusion that committees are a waste of time, usually because they are badly organized and badly chaired. On the other hand, it is my view that this committee was a model of the way a committee of this kind should be conducted. I say that because we received the agenda a week in advance of meetings, and we also received in advance all the briefs that were presented to us. The result was that the level of the discussions with the witnesses and, in some cases, the examination of the witnesses by the majority of the members of the committee, had a good deal to do with what I regard as the success of this report.

I would like to pay special tribute to the two honourable senators on the distaff side, Senators Fergusson and Quart, who brought to the deliberations of the committee a great deal of experience, knowledge and, I would say, compassion in dealing with some of the major matters with which we were concerned.

I have been reading the press very carefully during the last week, and I am glad to say that for once an accomplishment of the Senate appears to have achieved a measure of public communication that bears some relationship to the importance of the achievement.

Senator Croll suggested that this report might break new ground, and he was obviously right because it so happens that the very next day a commission appointed by the President of the United States reported to the President, after exhaustive studies of this and other problems. In some respects this commission's report is so close in its thinking and its specifics to the report of Senator Croll's committee that I am almost sure its members must have been listening in on our proceedings.

This was no ordinary commission. Its membership comprised a cross section of some of the best minds in the United States, ranging from the point of view you might expect from Thomas Watson, the well-known chairman of International Business Machines, to that of Walter Reuther of the United Automobile Workers Union who is, if you like, at the other extreme.

The Senate committee's main recommendation is a guaranteed minimum income for every Canadian at the age of 65. The United States commission recommends a guaranteed minimum annual income for every family, regardless of age, of $3,000 per annum. This, having in mind the comparative average level of personal incomes in the two countries, is almost exactly our recommendation. Some would say it is a little more and some would say it is a little less, but it is very close to the recommendation we have made in terms of dollars, yet it covers everybody. The recommendation of the Special Committee on Aging covers, of course, only those who have reached the age of 65.

I have heard comments—some from my colleagues, some from businessmen, some from the press and some from social workers—and they break down, as is usual in a matter that deals with welfare or social justice, into two divisions. There are those who say it is too much, and those who say it is too little.

Those who actually say it is too much suggest an attitude embodied in the phrase, "What's a $100 million?"—because $100 million is the committee's estimate of the annual cost of this recommendation. I give only my personal view. I believe that the $100 million, for whatever number of years it may be necessary to expend it—and it will not be for many years, I think, for the reasons indicated by Senator Croll in introducing the report—will be one of the best bargains Canada has ever made. Perhaps I should not call it a bargain but should say, rather, that it will prove to be one of Canada's best investments.

We do not have to look far from this place to realize the pressures that are going to be brought to bear on any federal government, regardless of its complexion, tomorrow or the day after, for a minimum level of income for the aged approximating $100 per month.

The evidence heard by the committee made it abundantly clear that something in the neighbourhood of $100 a month is the minimum subsistence level for any Canadian at age 65, 70 or over. Some would say that this figure is low, but my view would be, having in mind the different viewpoints of many witnesses who discussed this matter, that that was a fair consensus of their opinion.

I would remind honourable senators that I am referring only to the minimum subsistence level. The evidence the committee heard was that there is a substantial number of Canadians now, and there will be more unless something like this is done, who are living below that minimum standard, who are undernourished and who are, therefore, aging prematurely. They are being rushed into hospitals at public expense because they are undernourished, because they have no money with which to buy food. That is only one aspect of the problem.

One of the most interesting items of evidence we heard came from the head of a large mental hospital in Verdun, I think it was, who said, speaking of a certain number of cases, that their experience was that they could discharge 30 per cent of all admissions of early senility cases in one month by feeding them properly for that length of time. Thirty per cent of the people who were brought into that hospital as mental cases could be discharged if they received the proper amount of vitamin B.

It is because of that one aspect of the problem that I am supporting this recommendation. It does not do everything. It does not answer all the questions that may be asked about this problem. But, I congratulate the steering committee and the consultant on the fact that they have tackled the essential problem, which is the plight of those now reaching the age of 65. They are the forgotten people. They get nothing now, unless they wish to beg for assistance—and it is a form of begging that is required.

One criticism that has been persistently made is that it is unfortunate the recommendation includes what some call a means test. I am not going to pretend there is not a test required in this recommendation, but I say that it is a very different kind of test from the traditional means test which over the years has, quite rightly, been opposed by the very best of our aging citizens—that is, those who are too proud to plead poor, but who are poor nevertheless.

Where the test in this recommendation differs from the traditional means test is in the fact, first of all, that it is not a test of assets. No old person, under the administration envisioned by the committee, will be required to go through the gruelling examination of his effects, his chattels, real and personal, which was one of the great disadvantages of the old system. He will be required only to file an income tax return, and I, personally, see no hardship whatsoever in this. Indeed, I would go so far as to recommend consideration being given to having everyone over 65 required to file an income tax return.

What will be the effect of this? It will, in effect, do no more than what is going to have to be done anyway. All those who at the age of 65 do not have the guaranteed minimum income—single persons under $1,260, and married couples under $2,220—these people at the bottom level would be filing an income tax return under the committee's recommendation, or should be if they are not too proud. Most of those above these levels would file income tax returns in the ordinary way. There would be only a very small segment of those in between who, in the normal course of events, would have no reason to file an income tax return. I suggest that if the filing of an income tax return were made compulsory for everybody over the age of 65, then the payment of the additional income to these people, particularly at age 65, would be automatic. Perhaps it would not be quite automatic; there would probably have to be some form of application but nobody would be put in the position of having to file an income tax return merely to get the addtional benefit.

I emphasize this problem of the over 65 age group, because the recommendation of the committee really only raises the total amount now available to an aged person of 70 years of age by $360 a year. Its great benefits will be felt by those in the 65 to 70 age group who do not came under the universal Old Age Pension.

Honourable senators, I believe this recommendation has many merits, and I am speaking now only of the main recommendation. It is politically practical, financially feasible, and I think sociologically sound. For those reasons, I recommend it to your consideration.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, it is not often that all of us in this chamber find ourselves in agreement, but I think on this occasion the Senate can be practically, if not entirely, unanimous. I can say now that I adopt in toto the speech made by my predecessor, Senator Grosart, and ask that you make his speech mine.

We in the committee studied this question for a long time. We held many meetings; we gave the matter considerable thought, and the report that has been tabled here was unanimously adopted by the committee.

Like Senator Grosart, I also was just one of the rank of file, one of the soldiers. I was not on the steering committee and had no other position than that of a member of the committee. Therefore, I think I am free to express approval of what was done by the committee, by its chairman and by the steering committee.

Let me recall that this is not the first time that a special committee of the Senate of Canada has examined some question of great national importance and reported its findings to the general membership of the Senate. The employment situation of only a few years ago was drastic. It is still a problem of great importance today. That subject impelled the Senate at that time to set up a committee which we called the Committee on Manpower, with special reference to unemployment. Our report was widely read, and very widely publicized. It brings together a mass of material, supported by many tables of statistics and research data. However, that report was a disappointment to me, because if you read it from cover to cover you cannot find one single suggestion that even attempts a cure of the disease, or of its control, or the amelioration of the woes and troubles, the disaster of vast unemployment.

No person can bring that criticism against this report. It is overflowing with suggestions. It contains a mass of material upon which the most generous type of advice is given by us to the dominion Government and such departments as Labour and Public Works, the municipal and provincial governments, the churches and other interested organizations. This report has had the courage to lay down in cold print very nearly 100 recommendations, covering a wide field, always within the pertinent lines, on a number of subjects such as housing, at very great length, health, loneliness of poor people, the place of the aged in the home and in society.

It was a frequent complaint made by the witnesses who appeared before us—and they nearly all represented some organization whose work was associated with the aged—that there was a lack of organization among those attempting to assist the aged, a lack of co-ordination, and a lack of knowledge of statistics with respect to the lives and the needs of older people. Well, this report seeks to ameliorate, if not actually correct, these conditions.

May I point out here that we should be careful, in view of the important financial features of this report, not to overlook the numerous suggestions, well thought out and well expressed, which are not financial in their character.

One suggestion which greatly interested me was that there be appointed local councils in the various provinces or municipalities, whose duty it would be to co-ordinate the efforts of the various organizations within the territory so that their work might perhaps be more effective, and to suggest, gather knowledge and statistics, and so on.

In addition to these local councils, you will find it suggested that we appoint a National Commission on Aging, a commission to give leadership in the field of aging, to broaden the lives and to reduce the more drastic wants and needs of older people. It would be a clearing house of information, of plans, of enterprises and of the need for them, and it would seek the support of the public by periodic bulletins and that sort of publication.

It is suggested that the membership on that commission include representatives of municipal, provincial and dominion governments, of interested organizations, of private individuals, because of their experience and knowledge over the years in this field.

Honourable senators, it occurs to me what an opportunity this would be for individuals so inclined, or for companies, or any institution of that nature, to take a lead in this matter to supply the drive, and perhaps the funds, that would be required to make such a commission a continuing and lasting success and benefit to the older people of Canada.

Now, I know that I do not need to plead for any particular interest in this chamber for this report. Why should we not be interested? I have taken a short excerpt from one of the paragraphs in the foreword to the report—and you can all guess who wrote it. It reads as follows:

> Senior citizens are not some indefinable group, separate and apart. They are our mothers and our fathers. They are ourselves in a few years.
> For some of us, not for very many.
> They are those who have made contributions to society and to our country. They are those who have given their energies, their skills and their children for the good of society.

Surely I do not need to tell you who wrote that—Senator Croll.

The members of the committee have shown an unusual interest in this broad subject, in the many hours that they have spent listening to the plight of the aged. We have heard the evils and the misery that have followed compulsory retirement—which I think is an outrageous thing in a modern civilization, an antiquated barbarity we should get rid of as soon as possible. We have heard of the lack of occupation of the older people, of the loneliness that some endure, and the lack of the necessary care on many occasions for these older people.

I know that growing old may be tragic, but it is the common lot of all, and I suppose there is little to be gained by talking too much about it. But I can tell you, my fellow members, that what haunted this committee as we studied this problem was the question of the indigent poor. That was the riddle of the sphinx, the riddle which not to answer was to be destroyed. The crucial question was how to find the basic necessities of life for the elderly citizens who were in actual physical need. That was the thing which stared us in the face.

A lavish expenditure on old people over 65 years of age? Well, that lacked common sense; that was so excessively expensive that it would arouse the opposition of the Canadian taxpayer. Personally, I am not interested—I am an old age pensioner. They pay me $900 a year, and I am not the slightest bit interested, I can assure you, in increasing it by another $25 a month. Oh, I could use the money, but the point is that I do not need money. There are thousands of others like me who are drawing $900 a year, $75 a month, as an old age pensioner, who have no need whatever of that money—none at all.

On the other hand, there are so many in such dire want or at least in such uncomfortable and perhaps unnecessary want, that a little common sense and thought to this whole problem has been an essential which we in the Senate are now giving to it. I am not interested in the old age pension for people who do not need it, but I am concerned, my fellow citizens, that the older men and women shall have enough food in their stomachs, enough warm clothing in this cold climate, and warm accommodation in which to enjoy what I hope is the sunshine of their declining years. That I am interested in, and I think this report solves that question.

In committee I expressed the opinion that it was pretty close to a flash of genius. We recommend the guarantee of a minimum standard of living so that we give help to those who need help and to no others, that we see to it that those whose income is now below what I have heard described as the bread line, shall be brought up to a certain modest standard.

We suggest that if the income of any single person is less than $1,260 a year, that it be raised to that amount; and to any married couple with less than $2,220 a year, that their income be raised to that amount. We will do that, as Senator Grosart has now so well said, not by a means test as we have known it in the past but by the person, the recipient, simply stating his income in an income tax report. I grant you, when anybody talks of an income tax report it raises the hair on the back of my neck, because I have been making a return for a good many years now and always with a certain amount of objection. However, if I thought that money was coming to me instead of my paying it out, I do not know that I would have much objection to making that kind of income tax return. At all events, if there were objection, it would be in private and not in public, as our past methods of means testing have been.

I think it is about the easiest way we could get to information publicly collected, in such form that it could be used for financial purposes. So the report solves the worst problem as regards the aged and the indigent, those beneath the breadline.

I submit to you that it is humanitarian to the last degree; it is moderate; it is not extravagant. The payment of $25 additional per year to all people over 65 years of age in the Dominion of Canada would cost the taxpayers some $800 million. That is why that suggestion has not yet been carried in the Commons and possibly would not be carried here. It is too extravagant.

Senator Grosart has told you the best estimate we have of the cost of raising the incomes already possessed to a modest standard of living would be only $100 million, which is not so much if you say it fast. It is only one-eighth of what has been proposed publicly and by a large number of people in Canada at this time.

I repeat, the proposal we have made is humanitarian, it is not extravagant, it is capable of implementation. And I tell you, my friends, my opinion is that it stands a very good chance of adoption. If it becomes law, as I think it will, it will take the tragedy out of penurious old age.

I am proud of this report. I did not have any more to do with the actual drafting of it than my friend Senator Grosart has said about himself. But I have been pretty close to it and I have been very interested in it.

Honourable senators, you will find it possesses a very great deal of common sense. You will find a mass of material in it. You will find that material expressed in excellent English and in a fine clear style. You will find that its excellence of appeal is remarkable.

Honourable senators, I would like to pay credit to those to whom credit is due. It is due to many of us and it is due to all of you who are within the range of my voice. Of those to whom particular credit is due in having produced this massive document, the first one I mention of course is Dr. Richard Davis, our consultant, who was a tower of strength throughout our hearings, who helped in their organization and helped very materially in the production of the document itself. With Dr. Davis I include the small professional staff which he had, and a very small clerical staff. I should add to that the members of the Committees Branch who attended our meetings and took care of many of the details.

Above all, I would like to give credit to all those witnesses who appeared before us, at their own expense, sometimes advising us orally and frequently by most careful and copious briefs. I would like to thank the organizations they represented. I do not know how we could have conducted the examination we made had it not been for the general help given to us by organizations and by individuals in very large numbers.

The over-all credit, the outstanding credit for this report, goes to the chairman of the committeee. He initiated the enterprise in the first instance. He presided over our deliberations most acceptably and carefully, and with a dedication that was remarkable. He has given a wealth of labour to this work, with a singleness of purpose, and he has finally produced what I consider to be a masterpiece of thought and service.

In conclusion let me say, as I said in committee when I moved the adoption of this report, that if it finds favour in the sight of the people of Canada, as I think it will—the press reports give me reason for that optimism—and if it becomes law, it will be the greatest achievement in public relations by the Senate of Canada since its inception in 1867.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard tabled:

Report on the Old Age Security Fund and of temporary loans made to the fund during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1965, pursuant to section 11(4) of the Old Age Security Act, chapter 200, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1966

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard for the second reading of Bill C-116, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1966.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, after the introduction of Bill C-116 yesterday by Senator Leonard, I congratulated him upon his splendid explanation of its provisions. The bill is in the usual form of an interim supply bill, and in this respect it corresponds with five other bills that Parliament has passed in connection with the 1965-66 Estimates.

Senator Leonard mentioned, however, that it differs in one particular, namely, in the very large amount of money to be voted. I do not know for certain, but I think the bill provides for the largest amount of money ever included in an interim supply bill, $1,720,674,987. By passing this bill we shall be voting four months' supply, which accounts for this huge sum. If I understood the honourable Senator Leonard correctly yesterday, the other previous five interim supply bills provide for supply up to October 31, is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: In general, that is correct. In some cases a larger amount of supply had been given.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Then this interim supply bill, which would provide for November, December, January and February, is the final interim supply bill?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: This is the final interim supply bill.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: So there may be other bills covering supplementary items?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Yes, the honourable senator is correct.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Have you any idea whether or not there will be other bills?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: We asked that question of Dr. Davidson in the Finance Committee the other day, and he said that generally there was a final supply bill to clear up any items that came up around the end of the fiscal year.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Then I assume we are safe in saying that the amount of $8,174,438,440, which is the total amount of the Main Estimates and Supplementary Estimates, is the aggregate of all that we have, including the Governor General's warrants.

Unfortunately, honourable senators, there was not time either for us to review in a general way or for our committee to review in detail the last Supplementary Estimates. May I say that I noticed that the House of Commons, in dealing with this bill, spent very little time on interim supply yesterday. They seemed to throw up their hands and say, "What is the use, the money is all spent anyway and there is not much sense in talking about it." We in the Senate of course have not had the opportunity to discuss supply as have the members of the other place. They have been discussing supply for the last three or four weeks, since the Minister of Finance moved his motion. Here we have but a short time for discussion of this subject. We are told that these matters are discussed in the Senate Committeee on Finance. I know that that committee, under the chairmanship of Senator Leonard, does an excellent job, considering the opportunity the committee has. It is, however, a perfunctory review of the Estimates that we get here in the Senate.

Honourable senators, from reading the press, the Hansard of the other place and certain Government publications, we know that there has been a very good review of the Estimates. Parliament could not do this, as we have been out of session for seven months—it is like seven months wasted. However, a review has been made by the Auditor General's Department.

We are fortunate in having such an independent department and such well qualified men to look into and inquire about expenditures. Over the years that department has given noteworthy assistance to all governments, and its services have been much appreciated.

I should like to comment briefly on some items which were brought out by Mr. Henderson, the Auditor General, and quote some of his statements.

The Auditor General and his department have become known as the watchdog of government spending. This financial expert, with his competent staff, digs deep into all corners of government business, looking for financial sins of omission and commission and for bureaucratic mistakes and oversights. I am very sorry to say that he has been finding a great many such unfortunate oversights and mistakes. A recent report following the Auditor General's examination has revealed some strange items.

One major conclusion by the Auditor General indicates that there is much to be done in the streamlining of government procedures in order to eliminate wasteful expenditure. He refers particularly to the Glassco Commission Report and points out that, of the 275 main recommendations by that commission, the Government has seen fit to implement only 100. That is a small proportion. In addition, only 24 per cent of the 450 specific situations involving outdated and uneconomic procedures pointed out by the Glassco Commission have been remedied. In 39 per cent of the cases no action whatever was taken. This scarcely seems good enough, and I am sure this is the general reaction throughout the country.

The Ottawa Citizen of February 3 pointed out:

> Perhaps the Pearson Government has good reasons to reject the bulk of the proposals—

We would expect the Ottawa Citizen to be very kind to the Government.

> —but it should at least make known just how much of the Glassco Report is to be adopted.

It should accept what is obviously useful and helpful.

The report finds "no lack of awareness" at the various departmental levels of a need to deal with these problems. Their attitude will not change until they receive the appropriate leadership from the Government, which first must inject into the Civil Service the need to become aware. This sounds reasonable: leadership should come from the Government.

The Auditor General also reported that last year administrative and financial mistakes in the Government and federal agencies totalled a loss of $22,737,000 to the Canadian taxpayer. Our attention has also been drawn to the fact that of the 50 recommendations of the House of Commons Public Accounts Committee the Government carried out only 10 and partially inplemented four others. This certainly sounds inadequate and emphasizes a laxness on the part of the Government. As we all know, this important committee works very long hours; it is a most selective committee, with the ablest men from all parties in the House of Commons as its members. It does an excellent job and makes worthwhile recommendations. Of course the majority of its members are from the Government benches.

I believe, as the Auditor General has also pointed out, that if more attention was paid to recommendations of the Glassco Commission and of the Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons, the Government could eliminate to a greater extent waste in financing. However, as I have pointed out, the Government has chosen to ignore the implementation of the majority of these recommendations from both these excellent sources. I would hope, therefore, that during the detailed consideration of future estimates in the other place the minister responsible for each of the departments of Government will give a complete statement of the accounts for his department and also indicate what action is proposed in order to prevent a recurrence of such waste. A loss of $22,700,000 deserves some sort of explanation.

I would like now just to mention the much-discussed new United States investment guidelines for subsidiaries of United States companies operating in Canada. This would be very difficult to explain in full and I would not attempt to do so. What is meant by "guidelines" and what effect will they have on our economy?

There are four matters which do stand out in their recommendations. First, the importation by United States parent companies from their Canadian subsidiaries had to be reduced. This is a direction from the United States Government. Secondly, that new direct investments from the United States would have to be moderated. Third, exports of raw materials and component parts from the United States to the subsidiaries had to be accelerated. Finally, that dividends and idle balances in Canada had to be repatriated to the United States.

We have heard much of the activities of Mr. Kierans, Minister of Health for Quebec and formerly a member of the Montreal Stock Exchange. He is a man who seems to be and in fact is very well versed in financial matters. In a well documented speech in Toronto a few days ago he expressed the opinion that these guidelines would cause considerable harm to the Canadian economy and to the financial structure of Canada. His views have been fairly generally accepted by financial men across Canada, and I wish to comment briefly on some of the significant effects.

It is clear that under these guidelines subsidiaries would have to look to the Canadian money market for financing. The bulk of our manufacturing, mining and petroleum industries are American-owned. These are vast complexes, requiring huge capitalization. We have been told, and I believe it to be correct, that the Canadian economy would be greatly upset. The subsidiary company would, however, obtain the financing because the money would be guaranteed by the parent company in the United States, and the banks in Canada would, in the interests of their shareholders, accept these guarantees as sound. Further, it has been estimated that the effect of the guidelines will be to worsen the Canadian deficit on current account with the United States by more than $300 million.

It is fortunate that this entire affair has been brought out into the open. We have the distinct impression that the Government did not take a stand to protect our interests and did not attempt to fight it. Statements made by the Minister of Finance have not disclosed how the Government proposes to attend to this. In answering questions in the House of Commons on the matter, the minister gave us no assurance that we have any position from which to retaliate. If it is necessary, as I believe it will be, he has indicated that we can have guidelines of our own, and that we will retaliate if we are hurt. After being questioned by the Opposition in the House of Commons he did not say what these Canadian guidelines were, but he did intimate that he was sending the Minister of Trade and Commerce to Washington to investigate as well as inform the United States of the effect on the Canadian economy. I also believe that he is investigating in Washington the effect on Canadian finance.

Canadian stock purchases abroad have been affected. Something else which I might point out in connection with these guidelines is the degree to which European and American investors are selling Canadian stock. As can be understood, this will have a most harmful effect on our own balance of payments position.

The latest Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures indicate that the effect is a staggering outflow of capital from Canada. These statistics indicate that for the first ten months of the 1964 calendar year the capital outflow of Canadian funds was $89 million. Compared to the same period last year, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that the total capital outflow of Canadian funds was $266 million; that is, $89 million as compared to $266 million, an estimated increase of just under 300 per cent in one year.

Two reasons have been advanced to explain this situation: first, Canada does not have a large enough defence industry showing attractive growth for investment; second, the imposition on most Canadian stocks by the United States of the interest equalization tax. Honourable senators will remember the furor that was raised over this tax a short time ago.

While there are certainly economic reasons for this alarming outflow of Canadian dollars, one cannot help but wonder whether foreign investors do not hold the policies of our finance ministers suspect as a result of their financial experiments of the past three years.

Turning to another subject, we have received some significant warnings in this country recently regarding the danger of inflation arising from our economic and financial policies. Dr. Deutsch, the often-quoted Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, speaking before the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in Toronto just a short time ago, called for a surplus in government budgeting and a cutback in spending to ease inflationary pressures in the economy. He also urged that businessmen and labour unions should resist any desire to seek excessive gains in profits or wages. He told his audience that the economy was operating at high speed, that business and labour could exploit the opportunity to make excessive gains in prices, profits and wages, and that immoderate demands could lead to general inflation. He pressed strongly for a budgetary surplus.

We read also in a Toronto paper a few days ago a headline which said, "Graham Towers Sounds Warning." We all remember Graham Towers, a former Governor of the Bank of Canada who is now chairman of the Canada Life Assurance Company, a man whose views are generally listened to and accepted by many Canadians. He warned the Government that they will have to pay more attention to the balance of payments problem than they have in the past, and he told the annual meeting of his insurance company that Canada's current deficit will probably be about $1 billion for 1965 and, as far as he can see, there will be no great improvement this year. He also said that the recent pace of credit expansion which has helped boost the Gross National Product by 40 per cent in the last five years cannot be maintained without causing trouble.

It is also interesting to note the remarks of J. M. Keith, who headed a delegation of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce to present the views of that body to the Minister of Finance with reference to the coming federal budget. The Chamber of Commerce brief said that the Government should hold spending plans and welfare programs in check as much as possible to ward off current inflationary pressures. The brief also said—and this has something to do with the guidelines I mentioned earlier—that unless Canada frees itself from a commitment to the United States to hold its foreign exchange reserves steady, it will either have to devalue the Canadian dollar further or set its exchange rates free.

The Chamber of Commerce, in advising on the preparation of the 1966 budget, pointed out some of what they considered to be the principal objectives. They are: First, to encourage domestic output of goods and services; second, to control government expenditures to the maximum extent possible; third, to restrain inflationary forces already evident in the economy; fourth, to remove impediments to the free use of monetary and fiscal policies; and fifth, to increase freedom, flexibility and competition in the financial system.

These men, who are thoroughly acquainted with the economic situation in Canada, voice the opinions and views of a great many people and much of the press of today. There have been some excellent articles and editorials in recent issues of the Financial Post, which I am certain all honourable senators have seen and read.

As I said at the outset, it is impossible to review the Estimates in the short time we have at our disposal. In speaking of these matters, one can only mention some general topics, which nevertheless are of great importance. I would like to suggest that these matters I have spoken of—namely, the effect on subsidiaries of parent companies in the United States, the comments by Mr. Henderson in the Auditor General's report, as well as some of the views expressed by the leading economists of the country on the danger of inflation—could very well be made the subject of the study by our Standing Committee on Finance. There is no doubt that this committee could have made available to it some of the outstanding experts in the Department of Finance and other departments of government.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I do not intend to take much time today, or even to say anything that will delay the passage of this bill. In the first instance, I congratulate my good friend Senator Leonard on the very efficient manner in which he introduced this difficult bill. I had the honour and responsibility for four or five years of performing this function, and I am pleased to say that on each occasion I received every co-operation from the senators on the other side. I am sure that we on this side of the house wish to extend the same co-operation to Senator Leonard.

What I have to say next is in no way to be construed as a criticism of the present Government, but I should like to mention the use made of Governor General's warrants. For as long as I can remember every government in power has issued warrants, and in this respect there is no criticism I can level particularly at the present government.

Governor General's warrants were issued to provide money for the carrying on of the business of the country during the months of November, December and January when Parliament was not in session. As all honourable senators know, supply had been granted for July, August, September and October. At the end of October the Government ran out of money and, Parliament not being in session, found it necessary to obtain the funds required by the issuance of Governor General's warrants. I refer honourable senators to the bottom of page 2 of the bill where we are informed that on November 1, 1965, a Governor General's warrant was issued for a large sum of money; another warrant was issued on November 29, 1965, and three more were issued on December 29, 1965, January 7, 1966 and January 17, 1966. The total provided by these warrants was something in excess of $900 million.

Yesterday Senator Leonard, in speaking about these warrants, stated that the Financial Administration Act provides for the issuance of Governor General's warrants. I agree with that fact, although I do not agree with the statement that the act provides for the issuance of Governor General's warrants in respect of the matters about which I have been speaking. My reason for disagreeing with Senator Leonard is that section 28(1) of the Financial Administration Act seems to me to be quite clearly to the contrary. It reads:

> Where an accident happens to any public work or building when Parliament is not in session and an expenditure for the repair or renewal thereof is urgently required, or where any other matter arises when Parliament is not in session in respect of which an expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently required for the public good, the Governor in Council, upon the report of the Minister that there is no appropriation for the expenditure, and the report of the appropriate Minister that the expenditure is urgently required, may order a special warrant to be prepared to be signed by the Governor General authorizing the payment of the amount estimated to be required for such expenditure.

My contention is that the issuance of a Governor General's warrant for the purpose I have mentioned—that is, to provide money for the carrying on of the business of the country—is not covered by that section at all. It has to be stretched quite a bit in order to make it wide enough—

Hon. Mr. Leonard: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Is that the wording of the section as it appears in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes, it is.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I think there has been an amendment since that time. Perhaps I may be allowed to deal with it when I make my reply.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I looked very carefully through all the amendments, but I could not see one that amended this section. I have asked people who are familiar with this subject about it, and I was informed that there has been no amendment to cover the matter. When this point was brought up in the other place no answer was given.

Section 28 goes on to say in subsection 2:

> A special warrant issued pursuant to this section shall for the purposes of this Act be deemed to be an appropriation for the fiscal year in which the warrant is issued.

I shall not read subsection 3. Subsection 4 reads as follows:

> For the purposes of this section Parliament shall be deemed to be not in session when it is under adjournment sine die or to a day more than two weeks after the day the accident happened or the other matter arose.

Honourable senators, as I said before, I do not intend my remarks to be at all critical of the present Government, because all governments have been following the same practice for as long as I can remember. What I am pointing out is that there is no direct authority in the Financial Administration Act for the continuation of this practice.

I say further that the legality of this was questioned by the Auditor General of Canada in his report of March 1963. I do not intend to go into that report fully—the reason I shall give later—but when it was referred to the Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons the issuance of Governor General's warrants for these purposes was discussed further, and, as I said a moment ago, it was mentioned yesterday in the other place.

My sole purpose in making these remarks is to bring this matter forcefully to the attention of the Senate. It is a common practice that has grown up over the years, but in my opinion it is a wrong practice and should be corrected by an amendment to the act. It is my suggestion that the matter of the issuance of Governor General's warrants for the purposes mentioned in this bill should be referred to the Standing Committee of the Senate on Finance. I am sure that committee could do a worthwhile job in dealing with it, and, if necessary, prepare a suitable amendment.

At this point I should like to say something else about the Standing Committee on Finance. That committee had a fine, well attended meeting on Thursday last. Dr. Davidson was present, and the committee had before it Supplementary Estimates (D) which were discussed at some length.

The Standing Committee on Finance is a very important committee and is doing valuable work. It seems to me that some honourable senators who are not members of the committee forget that they are entitled to attend the meetings of this committee when these matters are discussed. They have a perfect right to take part in the discussions and to ask questions. The only thing they are not allowed to do is vote on a matter when it comes up for decision, since only members of the committee may vote. I for one hope that senators who are not members of the committee will take advantage of their right to be present and to take part in the deliberations of the committee.

One matter which arose in committee, and which I thought was explained very well, was an item which frequently appears in supplementary estimates, known as a "$1 item." I had always thought that when a dollar item appeared it meant the spending of more money than was already in the Estimates. However, it was clearly stated at the meeting of the committee that such was not the case, but that it was rather merely a provision so that money which had already been provided for in the Estimates could be used for some other small purpose which was not exactly included in the item. It appeared to me to be a method of amending the act in some cases, without bringing in an amendment. As I am not sure that I appreciated fully the significance of the explanation, I would be pleased if Senator Leonard would deal with the matter when he replies.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It should be put in the Interpretation Act.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, that is all I have to say on this occasion. I intend to support the bill. I hope it will be given second and third readings today, and that it will receive the Royal Assent in due course.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: May I remind honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Leonard speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators, first of all I wish to thank the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) and the honourable Senator Aseltine for their constructive addresses and helpful suggestions. I must admit that I find myself in agreement with many things they said.

First of all, with regard to the Auditor General, Senator Brooks spoke very highly of him and dealt with some matters in his report. I concur in his praise of the Auditor General. Mr. Henderson and his predecessor have done invaluable work for this country by the conscientious, careful, independent way in which they have reviewed the federal accounts, and without hesitation and with a great deal of courage pointed out where mistakes have been made, regardless of what government might be in power and no matter on whose toes they might be treading.

Mr. Henderson has appeared before us in the Finance Committee on past occasions. I am sure he will appear before us again, because his knowledge, experience and advice are most helpful. While a good many of his recommendations have not been followed up or implemented, I think that in the process of the work of the Public Accounts Committee in the House of Commons, under the chairmanship of Mr. Baldwin, and with the contribution our Finance Committee can make, we can bring pressure to bear, certainly by reiterating the points Mr. Henderson makes, and perhaps the constant dripping will wear away some of the stone.

The Finance Committee dealt with the Glassco Report in its sittings and in the report we made last year. We shall continue to keep ourselves informed on the progress that is being made.

May I recall for the benefit of honourable senators that one of the things that resulted from the Glassco Report was that outside firms were engaged to go into four departments of Government to ascertain how the Glassco recommendations could be actually worked out in practice, but at the time of our last sittings, up until June 30, 1965, not one of these reports by the outside firms was yet available.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask the honourable senator if an investigation is still going on by any of these firms?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I am not fully informed on that to date. That is one of the things I should like to follow up. As soon as one of the reports is available, I think we should get some information on it.

Senator Brooks then dealt with the matter of United States guidelines. I suppose there are others in this chamber who are better able to speak to that than I am, and while I concur in the fact that we are all concerned as to what will be the effect of these guidelines on Canada, I should mention that the United States has a very serious balance of payments problem. These guidelines have been put in force by them for the purpose of rectifying that situation, and from what I have read in the press I gather they expect that by the end of this year the drain on their gold reserve will cease. In that event, one would expect that their controls, their restrictions, on their international balance of payments would ease. I think we should hope for that.

I noticed in the press today that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Honourable Mr. Winters, met with a substantial number of heads of subsidiaries in Canada of large United States companies such as Dupont, Union Carbide, Imperial Oil—pretty well covering the whole field—and discussed this situation with them. If I read the item correctly, my understanding is that in so far as these companies are concerned, these guidelines have not involved any change in the way the subsidiaries carry on their business in Canada.

I think we should remember also that Canada has a very strong exchange reserve. Therefore, notwithstanding the very large deficit on our balance of payments on current account with the United States, notwithstanding the sale of securities balance to which the honourable Senator Brooks referred, our exchange reserve still maintains its level and strength, even to a point where we ourselves have deliberately kept it down so as to conform to our part of the arrangement with the United States. If the outward flow of dollars, either on current account or on capital account, should become serious it will be reflected in that exchange reserve and we will then have warning and an opportunity, I should think, to take such action as the Minister of Finance says he will take to protect Canada's position.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask in that connection if the United States has not asked Canada to reduce her exchange reserve?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I understand the arrangement is to maintain it and not to increase it. I would not be absolutely sure on that. The honourable Senator Beaubien (Bedford) nods his head and seems to suggest we were to reduce it, but I doubt if we gave any commitment other than not to increase it.

Senator Brooks referred to the threat of inflation. Inflation actually is taking place in some degree at the present time. I share his views on that score. When an economy reaches a condition of full employment, there is a grave danger that the pressure will force prices up, and create a difficult situation. We should heed the warnings of Dr. Deutsch. I hope that some measures will be taken to ease some of the pressures which are sending prices upwards.

I notice that the federal Government has announced its intention to space out public works over a longer period of time, so as not to put any greater pressure on the construction industry. This is one step which can be taken, and there are others.

Senator Aseltine raised the question of Governor General's warrants. This is an important question and I am grateful to him for raising it. It is one which troubled me. I consulted the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, and saw the section he quoted. It seemed to be doubtful that such a wording would go so far as to cover the situation with which we are dealing.

According to Hansard of the other place, the chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, Mr. Baldwin, quoted the same section as did Senator Aseltine. According to the research that I have been able to make, the situation seems to be this: Section 28, as it appears in the Statutes of 1952, is in practically the same wording as it has been since Confederation. In 1957—I may bring back some nostalgic memories—there was an election in June of that year, which many senators will remember. There was a hiatus in the sittings of Parliament for six months and two days. The new Parliament came in, but within another six or seven months there was a second election. That meant two elections inside one year, which also brings back some memories. Because of these two elections and of the hiatus between Parliaments, there was a substantial use of Governor General's warrants in the two years—the 1957-58 fiscal year and the 1958-59 fiscal year.

In the 1958 session, at the first session of the new Parliament, the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Donald Fleming, introduced an amendment to the Financial Administration Act, taking out those first words which were in the old act, which said that when an accident happens to any public work or building, or when any other matter arises, etcetera—which suggested that it would be only in case of an emergency that Governor General's warrants would be used. It was amended by chapter 31 of the statutes of 1958, and assented to on September 6, 1958—and I have found no amendments since.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have read that amendment, and I did not think it applicable.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: It repeals the former section, which you read. The amendment provides:

> Subsection 1 of section 28 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
> 28(1) Where a payment is urgently required for the public good when Parliament is not in session and there is no other appropriation pursuant to which the payment may be made . . .

Then it continues, and follows the same wording as the earlier section. Obviously, the appropriations had been exhausted as of October 31, 1965, and therefore this method was not available. Salaries had to be paid, and also all the other expenses of government. I take it that Mr. Fleming felt that by this amendment he would cure the situation; and I must admit—showing I have no political partisanship—that I agree with him. I think this was the right thing to do and that he did it properly. I think that Senator Benidickson, who was then financial critic in the Opposition, would also be inclined to agree with it. I think this is the way it should read: The proper time for the use of the Governor General's warrants is in a period when, due to an election, Parliament is not sitting and appropriations have run out.

The other good point that Senator Aseltine brought up was the matter of these $1 votes. Again, he is quite right. These $1 votes are something we should scrutinize with care whenever we see them. Let me give one example. Although it is true that we legislate when we pass these supply bills, this is a form of indirect legislation. The better way would be to pass a substantive act of its own. In regard to the Supplementary Estimates D, to which Senator Aseltine was referring, this particular matter came up at our meeting and Senator McCutcheon also spoke to it. In the Loans, Investments and Advances, Vote L15d, at the top of page 17, it says:

> To provide that the total amount of outstanding advances at any one time with respect to loans to Indians under section 69 of the Indian Act, notwithstanding subsection 5 thereof, shall not exceed $1,500,000.

Then that is carried out at the end of the line as $1.

If you go back to the Indian Act you find that the original section 69 of that act authorized loans of this character to an amount of, I think, $350,000. Subsequently, in later years, by an amendment to that act, the authorization was brought up to $1 million. Now, by a supplementary estimate, we bring it up to $1,500,000. It may be that the authorities contemplate amending the Indian Act to take out the $1 million and substitute $1,500,000, and that in the meantime the fund or the loans or demands for loans may have run beyond $1 million. It may be that the Government is doing it this way until the act can be amended. In any event, I would suggest that the proper way is to do it by a substantive statute. For the time being I would hope that we would continue to watch these $1 items and note exactly what is behind them.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say. I thank Senator Brooks and Senator Aseltine for their contributions.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Ottawa,
February 8, 1966

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Robert Taschereau, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 8th February, at 5.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. G. Cherrier,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, this being the Throne Speech debate, it is my pleasant privilege to express congratulations to the mover (Hon. Mr. McDonald) and seconder (Hon. Mr. Gouin) of the address in reply. It is a pleasant custom which we follow here, although it did not originate here. Sometimes it may sound a little stultified, but I can assure honourable senators that I gladly congratulate my friend Senator Gouin although he needs no such congratulation. He has been in this chamber for many years and we have listened to many erudite addresses by him and have learned much from his wisdom and knowledge.

May I say with regard to Senator McDonald, and I hope no offence will be taken at my remarks, that some of us were surprised to learn, not knowing much of his history in the past, that our new member was a thoroughly experienced and competent parliamentarian. I think most of our members will join with me in saying that we look to him for great things in the future.

It also accords us very great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate you, sir, on your elevation to that high office which you now occupy and hope that you will have much pleasure in carrying out the duties of your office.

I would be remiss if I did not at this stage say a word of welcome to our new members. We have added greatly to our strength. I see on the front benches a former member of the cabinet (Hon. Mr. Benidickson), and others equally notable who have joined forces with us. I hope they will enjoy their privileges and responsibilities in this chamber as I have done for the last 20 or 21 years.

Before this debate closes, honourable senators, I would like to exercise a further privilege; I would like to address you on that much discussed and very important topic, the Constitution of Canada and the proposed so-called repatriation of that Constitution, as we find it embodied in the British North America Act.

As a practising lawyer with very nearly 50 years at the Bar, I am concerned about these various proposals for the repatriation and reform of the Constitution, lest our ship of state be scuttled on its way home across the seas.

For as long as I can remember there has been somebody offering, wishing and pushing to tinker with our Constitution. Of late, this took on a rather serious aspect when proposals for the return of our Constitution emanated from official sources, sponsored—if I may use that word—by two former Ministers of Justice in the last two administrations. However, I was somewhat relieved of late—indeed, greatly relieved of late—when, speaking at a meeting in Montreal not long since, the Honourable Guy Favreau announced that the Fulton-Favreau Formula for the so-called repatriation of Canada's Constitution was dead. There was a chorus of "hear, hear" all across Canada. I found it in the press; it was expressed in the other place, and I certainly met it on the street; and now, honourable senators, if you will permit me I will repeat that "hear, hear" in the Senate of Canada.

We are now told that that formula was dead as long ago as last July. Just who killed Cock Robin is not important in my judgment. It is not important so long as the bird is thoroughly dead and not likely to be revived. As long as it is as dead as the proverbial dodo, I am satisfied. It may be that I could serve some useful purpose, and I hope I am not overestimating myself in that regard, if I lay before the house some facts and attitudes and, having done so, ask the question, "Where do we go from here?"

The Fulton-Favreau Formula has been crystallized and expressed in a draft bill prepared for passage by the Imperial Parliament, which you will find set out in full in a book entitled The Amendment of the Canadian Constitution, by the Honourable Guy Favreau, Q.C. It is dated February 1965, while he was still Minister of Justice. The book contains much useful information, and I hope that nobody will interpret my remarks as a criticism of Mr. Favreau when I refer to his book, because as a matter of fact I hold him in very high regard. He is a very pleasant, approachable individual, a very fine lawyer and a man whose integrity has never been questioned. My references will be to his book rather than to himself.

The act to which I referred is set out in full at page 34 of Mr. Favreau's book. The amendment in the proposed bill of the Imperial Parliament is also set out in full in all its naked detail. Of course Mr. Favreau, as the writer of the book, was in favour of the formula; however, my own impression is it was very largely the Fulton formula rather than the Favreau formula, and of course he must have been in favour of his own bill.

My own guess is that it was this book and the information it conveyed that was the arrow that killed Cock Robin. I think so, because prior to the publication of that book we had little means at our disposal of discovering just what the formula was; and now, when it is set out before us with a certain amount of annotation, one can see it in full, in all its serious implications.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Would you mind stating the title of that book?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It is entitled The Amendment of the Canadian Constitution, by the Honourable Guy Favreau. I believe it can be obtained by any of us from the Queen's Printer. It came to me in the ordinary course of events, and I thank whoever sent it to me for the information I obtained from it.

Perhaps you will all remember the comment by Job, that grand old man of the Scriptures, when he lamented: Would that my adversary had written a book.

May I remind honourable senators that the British North America Act does not and never has contained any provision for its own amendment, as does, in fact, the Constitution of Australia. In accordance with the terms set out in the Constitution of Australia, it has been amended many times over the years without the intervention of the Imperial Parliament. Since the Canadian Constitution is a Statute of the Imperial Parliament it could, of course, be amended by the Imperial Parliament and that, I think was thought to be sufficient by those who drafted the act. However, the actual result has been that the adoption of some method for bringing about the amendment by the Imperial Parliament has been a matter of great difficulty. It was first a matter of considerable uncertainty as to what we did about it, and then, after satisfying to a large extent our uncertainty, it has been a matter of some embarrassment to us for not quite 100 years, but at least for more than three-quarters of 100 years.

The British North America Act gives to the provinces the power to amend their own constitution, with the exception only of the office of the Lieutenant-Governor. No such authority appears in the act with regard to the Dominion Parliament, with the exception of some more or less minor details such as the defining of electoral districts as they are set forth in the act, the number of members of the House of Commons of Canada, the salary of the Governor General, and perhaps some other things of that nature that I have not listed. Accordingly, it became necessary for us to settle upon a means of bringing about an amendment in the Imperial Parliament, and to settle upon some procedure that should be recognized by the Imperial Parliament as well as by the provinces and ourselves, particularly ourselves.

The first amendment was made in 1871, and was in respect of establishing the right of the Parliament of Canada to constitute new provinces and also defining to some extent the administration of the territories. That amendment was requested of the Imperial Parliament by the Government of Canada of the day without a prior reference to the Parliament of Canada, and so, following that, the Opposition raised very strong objections to what they argued at that time was a high-handed procedure, with which I agree. So, shortly after, when the House of Commons re-assembled, it adopted unanimously a resolution to the effect that no further changes should be made in the British North America Act or sought from the Imperial Parliament without the prior consent of the Parliament of Canada. That was prior to the election of 1873, that being the election in which the Mackenzie Government took office.

Notwithstanding this resolution with respect to seeking amendments from the Imperial Parliament, without reference to the Parliament of Canada the Government of that day requested of the Government in the United Kingdom an amendment to the British North America Act with respect to the powers, privileges and immunities of the Parliament of Canada and its members. That was obtained by the Government of that day, as I say, without reference to Parliament. Of course, similar objection was immediately taken by the Opposition, and properly so, and it was agreed unanimously that henceforth the only procedure which should be adopted or permitted by us was a request to the Crown and, through the Crown to the Imperial Parliament, by means of an Address duly passed by both houses of the Canadian Parliament, the Senate and the Commons.

This was the procedure which was followed immediately in 1886, and this has been the procedure which has been followed ever since, without variation—with the exception of one unimportant matter that I need not go into. It has been followed ever since, until it has become the settled law not only of Canada and Canada's Parliament but also of the Imperial Parliament. It is the common law of the Constitution of Canada that the only way to bring about changes in the Constitution is by Addresses duly passed by both houses of the Canadian Parliament.

I have traced briefly the history of our Constitution in that regard because I would like you to note that for more than three-quarters of a century the Parliament of Canada has been in complete control of the Canadian Constitution, excluding any possibility of changes except by these joint Addresses of both houses.

Further, I would like you to note that in the matter of the control of our Constitution the provinces are not necessarily parties, and they have played no part in these procedures. It is true that on, I think, four occasions provinces have raised objections or expressed opinions for the benefit of the Imperial Parliament, and on all these occasions these suggestions or petitions, or whatever they were, were totally disregarded. So that is the situation at the present moment. We have complete control, and we have been in complete control because during all that period of time the Imperial Parliament has honoured every request to the letter that we have ever made by means of this joint address system.

Up to the present this power of the Canadian Parliament, achieved by common consent and long-established usage, has not been abused. When amendment was sought with reference to increasing the provincial subsidies we obtained in advance, for the first time, the consent of the provinces. I fancy we did not have very much trouble in that, because the amendment increased, not decreased, the subsidies. We have continually and conscientiously followed this policy of consultation whenever the provincial interests, constitutions and rights, were affected. No matter what government was in power we have conscientiously and carefully followed this policy of consultation.

We have been careful even in matters within our own jurisdiction. In 1949, for instance, we obtained express authority to manage our own affairs in matters not within provincial jurisdiction, with the exception only of such subjects as the French and English languages, the annual sessions of Parliament, and the five-year term.

I have dwelt on the power of Parliament and its history at length because, I submit to this house, history proves that the jurisdiction of the provinces is perfectly safe in the hands of the Parliament of Canada, irrespective of what power Parliament may actually enjoy. The jurisdiction of the provinces is perfectly safe from encroachment by the dominion Parliament in every matter of local concern within the provinces, and in respect of the rights granted to the provinces by the Constitution as it now stands.

Secondly, I should like to point out that it is most important that we in the senior chamber, at least, realize the liberties and powers that we now enjoy, lest like the dog crossing the bridge in Aesop's fable, we drop the substance while grasping at the shadow.

I say, as a self-respecting citizen of Canada, that we should have the power to amend our own Constitution, as indeed we have, and without even the formality of consent by an outside authority. That is a simple proposition with which all honourable senators, I am sure, will agree; but, on the other hand and associated with this thought, I deprecate an appeal to national pride as a means of destroying the Constitution as we know it.

The repatriation of the Canadian Constitution is an exceedingly simple matter. If we wish to do this, all we need to do is pass the British North America Act as a statute of Canada, and then by a joint address of both houses of Parliament ask the Imperial Parliament to repeal its British North America Act. We would then have repatriated the Constitution in the exact terms in which it now exists. After we have accomplished what we think is necessary to our national sensibilities and pride, we can then turn to the amendment of the Constitution in detail, step by step, as it has been amended in the past, but not in association with some other extraneous idea that has an appeal to national pride.

I should like to close my remarks with a few thoughts on the future. If we are to repatriate the Constitution and exercise what authority we have now for its amendment, then I submit to this house that amendments should not be made in conferences behind closed doors by representatives of competing governments, each striving for addition to their powers at the expense of those of other jurisdictions. This must be done openly and in public; it must be such that appeals to the people of Canada as a whole, and not just to politicians considering for the most part their own political interests. I do not charge anyone with lack of patriotism, but I do say that the Constitution should not be amended with the idea of promoting the welfare and future of the politicians engaged.

I would lay down as a cardinal principle of the Constitution of Canada to be observed at all times, that, if we are to remain a nation as powerful as we are, and hope to be in the future—if, indeed, we are to remain a nation at all—we must insist on a strong central government possessing the authorities and resources necessary, first, for the carrying out of our own internal services, and, secondly, for the maintenance of our strength so that we may keep our influence abroad.

Canada will achieve her maximum happiness and power when her citizens learn to think of themselves as citizens of Canada, not as citizens of Ontario, Quebec, the Maritime provinces or the West—as citizens of Canada in its entirety.

Honourable senators, the federal Constitution, notwithstanding its complications and difficulties, nevertheless makes it possible for us to guard jealously the constitutions of the provinces in all matters of local concern, while at the same time we think and act strongly for Canada as a whole.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of the final report of the Special Committee on Aging.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, so much has already been said in this debate about the work of the Special Committee on Aging, its members and its recommendations, that there seems to be little new left for me to say. However, I should like to support what Senator Grosart has said about the excellent organization of the work of the committee. I agree that great credit is due the chairman, Senator Croll, and the consultant, Dr. R. E. G. Davis, for their leadership and planning which resulted in such interesting and informative material being placed at the disposal of the committee.

Senator Croll's industry and ability are well known to the members of this house, and I need say only that he gave freely of both qualities to the work of the committee over the two years that it heard witnesses and studied to evolve the report, including the recommendations, now before this chamber.

The committee was most fortunate to secure as consultant Dr. R. E. G. Davis who, at the time the committee was set up, had recently retired after 17 years as Executive Director of the Canadian Welfare Council, where he had accumulated a vast knowledge regarding social problems throughout Canada. Dr. Davis is a widely known and highly respected social scientist who received his B.A. from the University of Toronto and his M.A. in Economic Sociology from McGill University. He attended Columbia University, the London School of Economics, and received from Laval University the degree of Doctor of Social Sciences, and from the University of British Columbia the degree of Doctor of Laws.

Dr. Davis has held many important positions in the welfare field, as I learned on looking him up in Who's Who, for he is too modest to speak of them himself. In 1946 he became Executive Director of the Canadian Welfare Council, and he directed the work of the council for 17 years until he retired in 1963.

This widely experienced and practical gentleman who, with reason, is held in the highest regard by Canadians and others in the field of social welfare, both professionals and volunteers, gave the committee invaluable assistance by way of suggesting names and arranging for the attendance of knowledgeable and helpful witnesses, and through sifting, correlating and helping the committee to draw conclusions from the vast amount of evidence presented to it. The other members of Dr. Davis' small staff, and the members of the Committees Branch, also deserve high praise for their patience and devoted work.

Honourable senators who were present in this chamber on February 2, 1955, may remember that on that date I made a plea for consideration by the Government of the problems of the aging in Canada, and I suggested some ways the Government might provide leadership in helping to solve the growing problems of the ever-increasing number and proportion of older people in our population. In 1955 many voluntary groups throughout the country recognized, as they still do, the necessity of dealing with this problem, but it has seemed impossible for those voluntary groups to secure sufficient money or staff to enable them to give the necessary leadership on a country-wide basis.

Recommendation No. 92 of the report recommends that the Government give this leadership through establishing a National Commission on Aging. I am sure honourable senators have read this long recommendation, so I will not take time to draw it to your attention in detail, but I am heartily in favour of establishing such a commission.

On presenting the report, Senator Croll said that it was well timed. This is certainly true, for the committee found that throughout the world there is widespread interest in, and much activity toward improving, the lot of older citizens.

That this interest is shared by the people of Canada was demonstrated during the last week of January of this year when 550 Canadians—including Senator Haig, Deputy Chairman of the Committee, and me—spent four days in Toronto attending the First Canadian Conference on Aging. This was planned as a small working conference of professionals and volunteers, all of whom are interested and engaged one way or another in programs and planning for the aging. It was a truly representative gathering, for delegates came from all geographic regions of Canada. Besides the Canadians present, there were a number of recognized experts in the field of aging from Britain and France, and many from the United States of America.

In the United States there are several national voluntary organizations including the National Council on Aging, and in addition there has recently been set up within the federal administration an agency known as the Administration on Aging. Many, indeed most, of the states of the Union have set up Governor's commissions or committees to deal with these matters on the state level.

It may be of interest to know that today I received a letter from one of the American experts who attended the conference. He said that while attending the conference he had heard of the study on aging being done by our Senate committee, and he asked me to supply him with a copy of the report when available. Referring to the Toronto conference he wrote:

> I am still aglow with the recollection of what I think was a most significant conference which undoubtedly will have far-reaching effects both in your country and mine.

Miss Hope Holmested of Toronto was the very efficient chairman of the conference, and the executive secretary was Miss Marion Murphy of the Canadian Welfare Council staff, both of whom deserve great commendation for the many months of work they devoted to planning and organizing the conference. Although originally sponsored by the Canadian Welfare Council, the large number of co-sponsors show the wide interest in the subject being taken by many people throughout Canada.

Some honourable senators may not know the names of the co-sponsors of the conference, so I would like to enumerate them. They include the Canadian Medical Association, Canadian Hospital Association, Canadian Public Health Association, Canadian Chamber of Commerce, Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, National Council of Women of Canada, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Canadian Labour Congress, Canadian Catholic Conference, Canadian Jewish Congress, Canadian Council of Churches, and Canadian Association for Adult Education. Surely this diversified list of sponsors proves that many Canadians are aware that the needs of our older citizens are not fully met at present, and that they are interested in doing what they can to better the situation.

Most attention given by the speakers in this debate, and most press comment on the report, has been focused on the first recommendation, which provides for a guaranteed income for all persons 65 years of age and over. I believe this would be practical and would solve many problems regarding older people. Such a guaranteed income could well prevent many illnesses which are the result of malnutrition due to inadequate funds. It is not necessary to list the very many benefits that would accrue through every person knowing that he or she will have a guaranteed income at 65. I am sure these benefits are obvious to all without my drawing attention to them.

One which appeals greatly to me is that provision will be made for those nearing retirement who do not have enough working years left to enable them to benefit under the Canada Pension Plan, but who are still too young to receive Old Age Security.

I hope and trust that this first recommendation may be implemented soon. But I also point out to honourable senators that there are 91 other recommendations, all of which should be considered and, if found practical, followed if we are going to give adequate attention and care to Canada's older citizens.

Honourable senators may be interested to know that last summer when I attended the Commonwealth Bar Association Conference in Australia, I visited housing and other arrangements for older people and discussed with welfare officials in Australia, New Zealand and in Tokyo various legislative provisions made in those countries for their older citizens. I heard of some excellent legislation aimed at improving this situation. However, it is my opinion that if the recommendations of this committee are adopted and implemented by the Government, as I hope they will be, we in Canada will find we are among the most enlightened countries in relation to the treatment of older citizens.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Haig, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

PROPERTY QUALIFICATION OF SENATORS

RETURN PRESENTED

The Hon. the Speaker presented a return, submitted by the Clerk of the Senate in accordance with Rule 105, listing the names of members of the Senate who have renewed their declaration of property qualification.

MOTION FOR SUPPLEMENTARY RETURN

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move:

> That the Clerk of the Senate be authorized to receive the renewed declarations of property qualification from those members of the Senate who have not had the opportunity to make and file the same in accordance with Rule 105, and to make a supplementary return accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard presented Bill S-14, to amend the Bills of Exchange Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Have copies of the bill been distributed yet?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: No; but copies will be distributed before the bill receives second reading.

Motion agreed to.

MILLTOWN BRIDGE BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard presented Bill S-15, to authorize the construction of a bridge across the St. Croix River between the Province of New Brunswick and the State of Maine.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask when copies of this and the other public bill will be distributed?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I understand that copies of these bills will be distributed in a short time, certainly by the time the Senate reconvenes. This one is very simple.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: We would like to have it before.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: As I have said, the bill will be distributed very shortly. There is plenty of time, if you wish to suggest that second reading be postponed for a day or two. These two public bills are not very important, and there is no urgency about them.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: The one to authorize the construction of a bridge in New Brunswick is very important and I would like to see it.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: We will act accordingly.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

BANK OF BRITISH COLUMBIA— FIRST READING

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris presented Bill S-16, to incorporate Bank of British Columbia.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Honourable senators, I would like to have this bill pass second reading at this time so that it can go to committee where controversy, if there is any, should take place. The committee is the place for it.

Honourable senators will recall that I spoke previously on this bill. I have here a copy of the two speeches I made on this measure in 1964, and I have the page references. They were the longest speeches I ever made, so they are pretty formidable. I do not want to repeat them. I am not as well keyed up on this now as I was then. I would like to have the bill read a second time now.

The present bill contains some slight amendments of the previous bill, and they answer some of the objections which were made. I think honourable senators will find this measure in more strict conformity with the practice in regard to the introduction of bills.

Therefore, with leave of the Senate, I would move second reading now.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I have no objection to the bill receiving second reading today, but if that is to take place, I think the order should go to the end of the Orders of the Day. There are a number of bills on the Orders of the Day for second reading, many of which have been postponed until today. For that reason—and I have spoken to Senator Farris and I understand he has no objection—I think this bill should go to the end of the Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: We on this side of the house have no objection to giving second reading to this bill today, and we think the suggestion that it should go to the end of the Orders of the Day is a logical one.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: When can we expect to have copies of the bill available? I do not have a copy in my folder.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not see how we can give it second reading without copies of the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: I understand that the printing of a bill does not take place until after first reading. Since this bill has only now received first reading I do not think copies will be available today.

Hon. Mr. Farris: If there is any question about it I am quite agreeable to have second reading go to the end of the Orders of the Day, as the honourable leader of the house suggested. By that time I hope to have copies of the bill available.

Honourable senators, with leave, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

INTERPROVINCIAL PIPE LINE COMPANY— REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report:

> The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to which was referred the Bill S-10, intituled: "An Act respecting Interprovincial Pipe Line Company", has in obedience to the order of reference of 2nd February, 1966, examined the said bill and now reports the same without any amendment.
> Your committee also recommends that the Parliamentary fee paid upon the bill at the session of 1964-65 be applied to the bill at the present session. The petitioners again have paid the printing costs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: With leave of the Senate, I move this report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: If the Senate so decides, I have no objection to this course. We have already examined this bill three times.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

EVANGELISTIC TABERNACLE INCORPORATED —REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, presented the following report:

> The Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills to which was referred the Bill S-7, intituled: "An Act to incorporate Evangelistic Tabernacle Incorporated", has in obedience to the order of reference of 1st February, 1966, examined the said bill and now reports the same without any amendment.
> Your committee also recommends that the Parliamentary fee paid upon the bill at the last session be applied to the bill at the present session. The petitioners again have paid the printing costs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: With leave of the Senate, I move that this report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I would ask leave to have this bill read a third time now, for the same reason as was given in regard to the preceding bill. This bill was also considered by the Senate last year.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 2 to 113, inclusive.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall these reports be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, we have had a long adjournment, one of some 6½ months, and during that period divorce cases have been heard with great industry by the Commissioner.

We met in committee on Wednesday of last week and passed no less than 404 cases. The details are as follows:

Petitions recommended	392
Petitions withdrawn	9
Petitions rejected	3

We have been short staffed in the commissioner's office, although I am pleased to note that that situation has now been rectified through the co-operation of Mr. Dean's office and that of the Leader of the Government. We have sufficient staff at the present time.

I am producing now only 113 reports, and asking the Senate to adopt them. I have no doubt that the balance will be ready when we return the week after next. In view of the fact that we are to rise for a week, or so I understand, I ask that these 113 reports be adopted now.

However, if any honourable senator has an objection to them, or to any one of them, then, of course, their adoption can be put off for a week. But, honourable senators, some of the parties in this group have been waiting a very long time. I noticed one where the petition was filed four years ago and the report is only now coming before you, for various reasons which I need not go into, after having been approved by the Commissioner and the Divorce Committee. It is in the public interest that these reports be adopted now so that the 30 days may commence to run.

I move the adoption of these reports.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, last Thursday, February 3, I had before me the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of Canada, and intended at that time to ask certain questions with respect to the work of the Standing Committee on Divorce. The first report of that committee is at page

63 of the minutes of this house, and it reads as follows:

> Your committee recommends:
> 1. That it be granted leave to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate.
> 2. That it be granted authority to appoint as many Subcommittees as may be deemed necessary for the purpose of considering such divorce matters as may be referred to them by the Committee and authority to set the quorum thereof, and that the Subcommittee in each case shall report its findings to the committee.

I would like to know how many such subcommittees have been appointed since the enactment of the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act in 1963, and what have been their functions.

I do not know whether I am correct in my impression, but it is that at every divorce hearing there is a reporter in attendance who takes down in shorthand the whole of the evidence. Am I correct in assuming that that evidence is not transcribed in every case, but only in cases that are contested or where it is requested by the Commissioner so that he may review certain complicated aspects of the evidence? I want to be corrected if I am not right in my assumption.

My impression also is that the bulk of the work has been done by the Commissioner and his staff, and that the committee, to use a favourite expression of Senator Pouliot, is merely a rubber stamp. I may be in error here; I do not know.

I wonder if the chairman of the committee is able to give us some assurance that the Standing Committee on Divorce is really performing a useful task. If this committee has become obsolete—and I think it has—I would suggest that the many members of the subcommittees could join other important committees of the Senate, and thus perform much more useful work. I am not saying that the Chairman of the Committee is not doing his duty; on the contrary, he has always been one of the most devoted chairmen that this committee has ever had.

Another important question I ask is: Are the members of the committee reading the evidence before signing the reports? If they are convened only in respect of disputed cases, then I should like to know that. The list of the members of the Standing Committee on Divorce contains some impressive names. They are honourable Senators Baird, Blois, Bradley, Burchill, Cameron, Croll, Farris, Fergusson, Gershaw, Gladstone, Haig, Hnatyshyn, Hollett, Inman, Irvine, Isnor, Kinley, Macdonald (Brantford), the esteemed chairman, Senator Roebuck, and Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne). These are without doubt all industrious men who are active in the Senate, and who could perform more important duties on other committees. The question I pose today to the honourable chairman of the committee is as to whether these men—

Hon. Mrs. Inman: And women.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I apologize—and women, who are equally talented, are performing an absolutely necessary and important task. If they are not, then they might be asked to do some work on other and more important committees. Perhaps the number of subcommittees could be cut down.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: My honourable friend has asked me a number of questions, but I think I should address myself to his last question first. He asked whether this committee is now obsolete, or has become a rubber stamp. My answer is that so long as this house is responsible, as it is now, for the passing of these divorces, the committee has to watch what is going on and take such steps as may be necessary and as required.

It may be that with two Commissioners now hearing the evidence—a judge of the Exchequer Court, and a retired judge of the Exchequer Court—we might well amend the act to give them full authority. That involves a question not only of practicality but also of principle. I think my honourable friend would find some objection to the change from parliamentary divorce, such as we have given since 1867, and a purely court divorce, such as would be the case if we threw all responsibility on the judges.

Personally, I would favour placing all of the responsibility on the judges, but so long as the situation stands as it is today, and the Senate is responsible for the divorces that are issued, although they have always been so far, without exception, based upon the recommendations of the judges, then the Senate must take its responsibility and watch every case.

With respect to the functioning of the committee itself—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: How can the committee watch over each divorce, as the honourable senator says, if I am correct in my assumption that there is no transcription of the evidence?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I would not say there is no transcription. There is a transcription whenever the Commissioner, the committee, or the chairman of the committee, deems it necessary. When I drew, with the assistance of our Law Clerk, the rules under which we now operate I did not change the old rule that the evidence in every case shall be transcribed, but the committee which considered those rules did make that change. I secured the concession that the chairman, who was myself at that time, or the committee, or the Commissioner, should have the right to ask for a transcription whenever it was felt necessary. A number of cases have been transcribed, but for the most part these divorce cases are purely routine. That is, there are certain things that have to be covered including, of course, a satisfactory proof of adultery. So long as they are purely routine then it is not necessary to transcribe the evidence.

If my honourable friend will read any one of these 113 reports he will observe the form of the report made by the Commissioner to the committee. It is very full. It may be concise, but every point is covered.

As to the work of the committee, honourable senators will realize that Parliament has been in recess for six and a half months. In the old days when Parliament rose, the committee's work ended and everything stopped. But that is not so now. The judges go on hearing these cases, whether or not Parliament is sitting. It seemed to me when we rose last June that it was out of the question to allow all of these reports to accumulate until we next sat. So through all these months the reports have come to me personally, and I have read every one of them and perused them with care.

The correspondence between the Commissioner and me has been quite voluminous, and I satisfied myself that every one of these 404 cases that I have mentioned had been properly proved and that every point required was covered in the report. When the committee assembles, all the reports of course are not read again by each member. I approved these reports, and I am proud to say that the committee relied upon my examination of them and passed them. Therefore, the reports have the approval of the committee in its wisdom. I think you will find that my O.K.—my considered O.K., if I may say so—appears on every report, and now all of the reports are before us for passage.

I quite agree, however, that perhaps it would be better and timely if we were to amend the act in order to rid this chamber of this duty. It would be a great relief to me as well as the other members of the committee. My friend Senator Choquette asked me something about the number of cases. They are growing.

With regard to the functions of the committee, Senator Baird, for instance, has read some 20 cases for me since we returned from the adjournment. We have a schedule of points to be watched, and he has checked off every point required. A copy of that schedule is attached to every report and is available while the report is being read by one of the members of the committee, and each point is ticked off.

As I have said, Senator Baird read 20 cases. There are 25 or more cases now awaiting attention in my office. It can be seen, therefore, that the committee is functioning. I think that covers the questions asked. If anyone moves a bill to take this out of our hands and to leave it in the hands of the judges, I will vote for it.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: Will the honourable chairman of the committee permit a question? Is adultery still the only ground for divorce?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Unfortunately—and I am speaking for myself only in this reply—that is so. Perhaps I may divulge a little secret. It is my intention, not as chairman of the committee but as a senator who is thoroughly informed on the subject, to introduce a bill to change that situation. I can assure the house that it will be done before this session comes to an end.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I would like to know how many children are involved in those 113 divorce cases that were tabled today. The question arises, who is going to take care of these young Canadian citizens and what does the law provide for them?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have not counted the number of children involved in these cases. I could only give a rough guess. It is likely that there are children involved in about half the cases. If you will look at the reports made by the Commissioner you will see that in every instance without fail the question of the children has been raised. When I or any other member of the committee check off the items in a report, we take notice of the item as to children, and the next item as to their welfare. It must be understood that we have no authority in property and civil rights with the custody and care of the children. I do think that under the British North America Act that sort of thing is ancillary to divorce. In any event, we have never exercised those rights, for the good reason that the courts of the provinces are doing so, and properly so. When a divorce has actually gone through, application may then be made by either of the parties to the courts for the custody of the children and for maintenance by the father for their care. Let me assure my fellow senators, however, that in every case which comes before us we inquire as to the children, and we will not grant a divorce if we think the interests of the children have not been properly taken care of.

Hon. Sarto Fournier: I do not want to enter into a discussion with my honourable friend Senator Roebuck, who is a senior member of this chamber. I know that he has devoted a great deal of time to the problems of divorce. However, in these times we are witnessing a serious rise in juvenile delinquency. In many cases it happens that the parents of the young delinquent were divorced.

Honourable senators, instead of trying to correct the consequences of a bad situation, I think we should begin by correcting the cause. I am reminded that Bonaparte once said, the education of our children starts 20 years before they are born. Therefore, I think we should plan a campaign to tell young people not to get married before they are in a position to accept the full responsibilities of marriage.

Marriage means love; it also means children. Love is pleasure, but children are a responsibility. I do not know why we should allow people, merely because they are in love, to procreate children and afterwards to separate and become divorced, with the consequences that their children from an early age onwards are completely lost. Hundreds and thousands of Canadian citizens in Canada from a tender age onward have no parents, and have only the law and charity to protect them.

My most distinguished friend, Senator Roebuck, had the benefit of a mother and father to care for him, whereas hundreds of thousands of children start out with only the protection of the law. The same may be said for any one of us. Young people who marry must be prepared to assume responsibility for the proper care of their children; they must give them the love of a father and a mother. If they cannot provide this care and attention for their children, it is up to society to find other means.

Many thousands of children born in Canada in recent years have become completely lost because their parents have avoided their responsibility through divorce.

Honourable senators, we must think first of the child, whether he was born in or out of wedlock. Children born in Canada are Canadian citizens by birth, but I do not think that the law is sufficient to assure them a proper start in life toward becoming good Canadian citizens.

We must have adequate laws for the proper care of children. I would like every child born in my country to have the regular care and attention of a mother and a father. The child has a natural father and mother, of course, but if they desert the child, then in effect he has no father or mother.

It may be necessary to enlarge the divorce law. If a marriage is not successful, let us look for some solution. But if the children, the citizens of tomorrow, grow up without proper care, we will have to enlarge our prisons. These unloved children of today are the potential prisoners of tomorrow. If they are abandoned and do not know where to go, they will seek revenge and then commit crimes, even murder. Juvenile delinquency starts not only from divorce but because our society is not prepared to face the effects of divorce.

Honourable senators, those are the few remarks I wished to make. Perhaps I did not put them as well in English as I would have put them in French, but my friends have understood me.

Honourable senators, let us not forget the care of our children. If the mother and father wish to separate, let them do so. But let us take care of the young Canadian citizens, their children. The law is inadequate for this purpose for the heart and the brain must also be there.

Unless adequate provision is made for the care of the children, it is my opinion that the father and the mother should not be free to go their separate ways. The child of tender years needs a mother; he needs love. If his natural mother prefers to desert him, let us make other arrangements for his care. One cannot make a good citizen without love.

In Canada today the amount of crime is increasing rapidly—in Quebec, in Ontario, and everywhere, especially in the great cities. If we look behind each and every case we will see that frequently the criminal was denied the love of father or mother at an early age. Therefore, when the parents separate, society must provide adequate care of the children.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, Senator Paterson has a question. May we hear from him now?

Hon. Norman McL. Paterson: Senator Roebuck will recall an interesting statement he made here comparing the number of divorces which came before the committee to the number which arise in the other provinces. I would like to ask the senator if he has any recent figures comparing the number of divorces in, say, Ontario and British Columbia with the number from Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have not the precise figures before me at the moment. The divorce cases in the Province of Ontario for the year 1965 will, I think, number between 1,500 and 2,000; while for the same year the number of divorces that came before us, from the two provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland were 437. Some credit is due to Quebec and Newfoundland for the moderation in which they call upon us for our assistance in this matter of divorce. The number from the two provinces had run about 400 per annum, as compared with three or four times that number from the Province of Ontario. The number per capita of total population is even greater in the Province of British Columbia than it is in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I would like to point out that at the moment there are other causes for divorce in Ontario, compared with Newfoundland and Quebec. That may account for some of the difference.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: No, there are none.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Not in Ontario—only in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Then I have been misinformed.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Due to the fact that the pre-Confederation law there was carried over and is still in existence in Nova Scotia, cruelty is a cause for divorce in that province but it is almost never used.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, reports adopted, on division.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, sometimes we have a steady flow of work, but we have not much on the agenda at the present time. Therefore, I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 22 at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, I should add to this motion the condition that senators may be recalled earlier if urgent business should arise which makes it necessary for the Senate to reconvene.

Motion agreed to.

HON. JOHN J. CONNOLLY

GOVERNMENT LEADER—IMPROVED HEALTH

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, at this stage I would like to tell the Senate that I was able to spend a few minutes with Senator Connolly this morning. I am pleased to tell the house that his health is much improved.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: However, he is extremely lonesome, and misses you all very much. He asked me to tell the members of the Senate of the great esteem he has for every one of you and to thank you for your co-operation in dealing with the business of the Senate. He also wishes to express his gratitude for all the letters and good wishes he has received since he became ill.

I believe I was speaking for all of you when I told him to take his time and not to return to the Senate until he feels completely well.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I do not know how convincing I was in trying to persuade him to stay away from work until he has completely recovered. He is extremely anxious to come back to his friends, and I am afraid if he does so too soon there will be great danger of his overdoing himself. I understand he is shortly to leave for a few weeks' visit in the south. We hope that the warm climate will assist in his early and complete recovery. As I say, he asked me to express his gratitude to you for all you have done for him since he has been ill.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I suppose you did not tell him that he had a capable representative?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I did not talk about that at all. He was too ill to put this matter before him.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of the final report of the Special Committee on Aging.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, as this is the first occasion I have had to speak since the opening of this new Parliament, I would be extremely remiss if I did not congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on your elevation to your present high office. I know that you and your chatelaine will uphold the dignity and honour of that position. There are some slight differences between you and the former occupant of that office; there is a difference in size, a difference in the colour of hair and there is certainly a difference in your interpretation and pronunciation of the French prayers.

I wish also to congratulate Senator McDonald of Saskatchewan. I met him for the first time last week, and I am sure he is going to be a worthy addition to this house and also to the east wing of the fifth floor. In case honourable senators do not know, that is supposed to be the senior section of the Senate because we now have Senator Croll who has graduated from the third floor.

The honourable Senator Benidickson I have known for 33 years. I knew him first when he was President of the University of Manitoba Students' Union. That, I would add, has nothing to do with labour; it was the name of the representative council of the various faculties and colleges of the university. At that time I was majoring in law. He was know to his friends and colleagues in Kenora as "Billy Ben". I followed with considerable interest his career in the Commons as member for Kenora-Rainy River. I welcome him to this place.

I was very pleased to hear the good news about Senator Connolly (Ottawa West); I hope his recovery will be rapid and complete. I regret very much Senator Vaillancourt's resignation as Deputy Leader. I have always respected his humour, honour and dignity and I have enjoyed the nice maple sugar candies he gave us each year. However, I have pleasure in extending my congratulations and best wishes to Senator Paul Bouffard on becoming Deputy Leader of the Government. I knew Senator Bouffard for many years prior to my appointment to this place. I am also glad to see that Senator Brooks is back with us again, leading our side of the house, and also his cheery and dynamic Deputy Leader, Senator Choquette.

Honourable senators, I now propose to deal with the report of the Senate Committee on Aging. There has been much discussion about this report in this place, in the newspapers, on radio and on television. At the outset, let me congratulate Senator Croll who did tremendous work in setting up, organizing and managing the committee.

Yesterday Senator Fergusson paid a tribute to Dick Davis, our special consultant. Her remarks appear at page 129 of Senate Hansard, and I might say that she did not expand these matters any further than was absolutely necessary. He was indeed a leader, a helper and a director in all aspects of this subject.

There were other members of the committee who spent much time and effort on its work, as was explained the other day. The briefs and presentations of all individuals, governments and bodies were also given to the members of the committee a week in advance so that we could do some homework and prepare questions about the subjects which interested us. Various members of the committee paid particular attention to certain aspects: Senator McGrand and Senator Gershaw dealt with matters of health, while Senator Grosart dealt with matters of financing and counselling. I would add that the figure he came up with in committee was somewhat less than what we discussed here. Senator Quart was interested in housing and nursing homes, and Senator Fergusson was interested in matters relating to welfare.

Before leaving this subject I wish to draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that Senator Fergusson is honorary chairman of the Canadian Conference on Aging, and she was the chairman at a luncheon given in Toronto by that conference on Tuesday, January 27, when Miss Lola Wilson, the Consultant on Aging, Research and Statistics Division, of the Department of National Health and Welfare, gave us a very fine talk on "Unusual and Imaginative Services."

I would like now to deal with the second part of the resulting report. A talk was given to us by Charles Odell of the United Automobile Workers, as appears at page 175 of the evidence of Thursday, December 12, 1963. He spoke about the attitude of and the discussions the United Automobile Workers have had with industry in what they call preparing for retirement. Now, at the Conference on Aging held in Toronto one of the questions discussed was that of preparing for retirement. Mr. Odell, together with officials of the union and officers of the company, prepared the plan and its operation. Both the union and the company felt it would help those individuals who by reason of compulsory retirement were not in a position to help themselves; they did not know what to do in certain matters; they had been used to a certain daily routine and when they no longer had that routine they were somewhat at sea. As a result, these members of the union decided to attend a course for eight weeks, with meetings being held five days a week for two hours a day. The company paid for one hour of the time and the employee paid for the other hour, so there was an even division of the cost for the time spent on this subject.

This course has been in operation for the past three years, and the only dropout in that time was an individual who could not find a parking place in the parking lot. It has proven to be a very successful experience for the people involved. They have received counselling in investment, housing, nutrition, new living arrangements, managing their money, legal affairs, and how to make good use of their leisure time. There was also retraining for men or women who had the opportunity to avail themselves of it.

In my opinion that is something that management and unions will have to face very shortly. Some of the unions are doing it now for employees at age 50 and some at age 55. This is an effort by a large union and a large company to face up to the fact that when people are forced to retire during their normal working life they should have something to look forward to and to do.

Honourable senators, the other matter I would like to deal with is mentioned on page 438 of the evidence given on May 21, 1964 by the Chairman of the Social Policy Committee of the Canadian Association of Social Workers. The question under discussion was: What effect do social workers have on these problems of the aging? And I asked this question:

> . . . On page 1 of your brief, in the second paragraph you say: "As a matter of fact few of its members are engaged solely in work with old people, which, in itself, suggests the community neglect of this group."

I was quoting an excerpt from their brief.

> My question is, why don't more of the members of your group work with older people? Is it the fault of the faculties of social work or is it the fact that older people are being neglected there?

The point I wanted to make was whether these faculties in universities are contributing to this problem of the older people. The answer was:

> I would think that primarily it is the fact that the community generally has not—

I emphasize "has not".

> —recognized the need for individual services and social services for the older group of people, and therefore since the services are not set up the opportunity for work within the service is not present.

I believe there is another aspect to which the committee might devote its attention, and that is the question of the employment of these individuals after they have retired, related to the role of the social worker.

Major publicity or comment has been based on the income feature of the report, but there are so many other aspects which have not been fully dealt with—such as health, housing, legal counselling, nursing homes, hospitals—that I am suggesting that, after a comprehensive study of this report by honourable senators, this committee might be reactivated to consider some of these problems in greater depth. If the Government takes action in certain areas, that is all well and good; but I think that after further study has been given the report by individuals, communities or organizations who will have received a copy, we might examine the question further. I say that because, for instance, this report is going out to Winnipeg to a group called the Age and Opportunity Bureau. They held their annual meeting last month, and I gave them one copy of the report. They are holding a provincial conference in May, at which I am sure this report will be discussed. It is because of such further study by organizations, associations and Government too, that I suggest we should reactivate the committee and study certain aspects of the report in greater depth.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, on this the first occasion of my rising to speak in this chamber this session, I wish to join with the previous speakers in extending to you, sir, my congratulations on your elevation to the high office of Speaker of this house. I wish also to join in the welcome to our new members, for I believe they will prove to be a valuable acquisition. I am also pleased to hear that our Leader, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), is making a good recovery, and I hope that he will soon be restored to good health and take his place among us again.

I need add little to what has already been said concerning our regret that Senator Vaillancourt has resigned from his position of Deputy Leader. Because of the high esteem in which we hold him, we are sorry that he is now unable to fulfil that function. Senator Bouffard, of course, is performing in fine style as his successor.

As one who cannot claim any credit for the Report on Aging—I was not a member of the committee—I want to extend my warm congratulations to Senator Croll and the other members of his committee on their magnificent work in the production of a splendid and comprehensive report.

I remind the chamber that the matter of aging was first drawn to our attention in 1955 by Senator Fergusson, as she said last evening. I clearly remember the excellent speech she made on that occasion. So, we must give her full credit for being a pioneer in bringing this question to our attention.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: My main reason in rising at this time is to refer to one of the recommendations of the committee regarding nursing homes, of which, they point out, there are 1,500 in Canada. They also indicate that without these homes the only place for the bedridden is in municipal homes. The report goes on to say:

> . . . nursing homes, with a few exceptions, are not included under the hospital insurance program, so that unless patients are admitted as indigents and paid for as such out of public funds, they or their relatives must meet the full cost which we were told runs on the average of $8 to $10 a day, and is often much higher.

We have several of these nursing homes and homes for elderly people in New Brunswick. Various religious denominations have established homes. The United Church has established one at Sackville, and the Pentecostal Church one at Bethel. The Anglicans have established two types of home. They have built courts of apartments for both elderly couples and individuals at Sussex, and recently they have received a generous gift from Dr. Lockhart, who with his son operated a private hospital at Bath for many years. On the completion of a new public hospital there, Dr. Lockhart presented his hospital to the Anglican church, and that church is now converting it into a home for elderly citizens. I believe it will have accommodation for 80 persons.

In addition to those homes we have the Ganong Home at St. Stephen, established by the late George W. Ganong, a member of the House of Commons for many years. We have the Farraline and the Clark Homes in Fredericton, established by the King's Daughters and the I.O.D.E.; the Turnbull Home and the Courtney House in Saint John. These have all been established as a result of generous gifts and voluntary work. The Rotary Club of Saint John has built quarters for the aged, and the Women's Institute operates a home at Woodstock. These are just some that come to my mind.

I do want to emphasize, honourable senators, that there are elderly people knocking at the doors of every one of these homes. The waiting lists are long. There are many other nursing homes in the Province of New Brunswick with which Senator Fergusson and Senator Brooks are familiar, but I am particularly interested in the institution of Mount St. Joseph at Chatham, which is operated by the Sisters of Hôtel Dieu hospital in that town. This institution serves the whole of northern New Brunswick and, indeed, it is a haven for patients who seek its shelter from all over the province. It was built as a convalescent home, and as such received help from the government of the day. The provincial government made it a grant of $1 a day per patient; but it is outside the provisions of the Hospitals Act, and since that act came into effect it has received nothing. As the committee's report points out, such institutions as this are not included in the hospital program.

In the public mind today, as all honourable senators know, hospitals are a government responsibility, but the institutions that I have described—I am thinking particularly of Mount St. Joseph at Chatham, because it is one about which I know something—are forgotten.

Educational costs have mounted so much that municipalities are at their wits' end to find sufficient funds to meet them. These costs have to be met in addition to the routine expenses of the municipalities, and they are, therefore, unable to assume any responsibility for the operation of such institutions as I have described. The result is that these institutions operate at very serious financial loss. If the provincial government of New Brunswick had not made a grant to Mount St. Joseph last year, it might have been obliged to close its doors. Had that happened it would have been a serious matter for my section of the province and indeed for the whole of the province.

There are at present 87 patients at Mount St. Joseph. If honourable senators could visit that institution, as I do often, they would appreciate the wonderful work done by the sisters in the devotion and nursing care they give to the patients. The authorities at the hospital have discovered, and as is pointed out in this report, that as the patients get older they require nursing and hospital care. The result has been that the staff at Mount St. Joseph has to include several registered nurses and nurses' helpers which, in these days, cost money. This institution, as I have said, operates at a very serious loss at the present time. The situation is so grave that the County Council of Northumberland, at a session last week, was induced to make a grant which will help Mount St. Joseph to carry on.

What I have said about patients requiring hospital care as they grow older is borne out by the experience at the home of the United Church at Sackville, which has been operating for not very many years. That home finds it is now obliged to build a small hospital to take care of such patients. The committee's report points out that this condition is general, for it has been the experience of all of such homes.

The Special Committee of the Senate on Aging subscribes to the belief that elderly people should remain in their homes for as long as possible, and it reports that the Canadian Medical Association in its brief urged more organized home care and homemaker services as a desirable alternative to institutional care, and believed that this should be a public responsibility.

I agree fully with that. People want to remain in their own homes. They are very anxious to remain in their own communities. In fact, a person who is engaged in the management of the United Church Home at Sackville has said that one of the difficulties they encountered when that home was established was in inducing or persuading people from the various parts of the province to go to it.

Hon. Mr. Sullivan: That is the crux of the whole situation.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: My plea this afternoon is for help for such institutions as I have described. I give my wholehearted support to the recommendation found at page 34 of the committee's report, which is as follows:

> That approved nursing homes, operated on a non-profit basis, be made part of the hospital services system, and be included in the federal-provincial hospital insurance arrangements.

It is my hope that that recommendation will be implemented soon, because in providing better care for the aged in Canada in the future we must not overlook the conditions as they are at present. These nursing homes, which are doing such magnificent work all over this nation, need support and assistance.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Quart, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADA HEALTH AND ACCIDENT ASSURANCE CORPORATION—SECOND READING

Hon. Eric Cook moved second reading of Bill S-13, respecting Canada Health and Accident Assurance Corporation.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to amend the original incorporating act of the Canada Health and Accident Assurance Corporation, which was passed in 1945.

The corporation has its head office in the City of Waterloo, in the Province of Ontario. At the time it commenced business the corporation had a small office and employed a staff of four. Since that time its history has been one of steady and progressive growth. I am now informed it is a healthy and successful organization, having an administrative staff of 95, and selling its policies through 40 active agencies in all provinces of Canada, using the services of over 30 salesmen. The present number of policyholders of the corporation is in excess of 70,000.

At the present time the corporation offers policies of insurance covering all aspects of medical, surgical and time-loss insurance. The acceptance by the public of the services offered by the corporation is indicated by the annual increase in net premium income. In the first year of its operation the corporation had a net premium income of $73,000. That same year-end figure for 1965 approaches $6 million.

The last report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada discloses that Canada Health and Accident Assurance Corporation is the largest Canadian company engaged solely in the field of accident and sickness insurance.

Based on its past experience, the corporation feels that it can now profitably enter the field of life insurance, and when it does it will be more than able to meet the financial requirements as set out by the Department of Insurance.

The corporation has been transacting business in the province of Quebec since 1950, and has increased its net premium income from $160,000 to more than $760,000. It now feels that it should carry on business not only under its name in English but also in French, as La Corporation Canadienne d'Assurances Santé et Accidents.

The corporation desires also to increase its authorized capital stock to $2 million, divided into shares of $10 each, to satisfy the requirements of the Department of Insurance.

Sections 1 and 2 of the bill give the corporation its French name, while sections 3, 4 and 5 increase its capital from $500,000 to $2 million, and empowers the corporation to write life insurance when its capital alone, or its capital and surplus together, are not less than $1 million.

Honourable senators, if this bill receives second reading, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, at which time the appropriate witnesses will be present to answer any questions or to give any further information which may be required.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Cook, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

INCOME LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill S-11, to incorporate Income Life Insurance Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, this company was incorporated under the Corporations Act of Ontario by Letters Patent dated December 9, 1963 with an authorized capital of $10 million. A public underwriting of shares of this company was completed during the spring of 1964, raising approximately $2,750,000.

The company was licensed to carry on business by the Province of Ontario in January 1964 and is presently licensed in the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Ontario.

The present directors of the company are the persons listed as petitioners for the new federal company bearing the same name.

The head office of the company is at 75 James Street South, Hamilton, Ontario, where a full time administrative staff is maintained for the purposes of underwriting claims, accounting, actuarial and other required services.

The management staff of Income Life consists of full-time employees, each of whom is fully experienced in the insurance field.

Honourable senators, at this point I would like to state that my following remarks will apply not only to Bill S-11 but also Bill S-12. By so doing I think I will save the time of the house, for then I shall not have to repeat the remarks when I explain Bill S-12.

While the prime purpose of Income Disability is to underwrite accident and sickness insurance, and while the prime purpose of Income Life is to underwrite life insurance, the proposed federal acts of incorporation request that each company be empowered to underwrite "life, accident and sickness insurance." The existing two companies operate in conjunction with each other and the requested powers are required so as to enable each of the companies to be able to reinsure coverages written by the other.

The two companies share office space at head office and have certain sole employees and certain joint employees. The two companies in total employ 62 people on a full-time basis and, in addition, Income Disability is represented by 70 agents holding accident and health licenses and Income Life is represented by 87 agents holding life licenses.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the brief remarks I now wish to make are not related to the principle of the bill but concern rather the French names of those two companies.

I fully realize that it would be better to discuss this matter in committee. However, I shall merely make a suggestion to the sponsor of the bill and if he can act upon it, he might do so when the bill is considered in committee.

I think that all companies doing business throughout the country should also have

French names, but quite often those names are not really French.

I admit that in the case of a company incorporated many years ago, as was the Sun Life of Canada, the name was translated into la Sun Life du Canada, compagnie d'assurances, but when, as in this case a new company is involved—I believe it was incorporated in 1963 if I understood correctly—it seems to me an effort should be made to find a better French name than Income Life, compagnie d'assurance-vie, and especially Income du Canada, compagnie d'assurance-invalidité et de ré-assurance.

I tried to find an appropriate translation but it is not always easy to find one on the spot.

I would suggest to the sponsors of these two bills that a better sounding translation be found.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

INCOME DISABILITY AND REINSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA— SECOND READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill S-12, to incorporate Income Disability and Reinsurance Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, Income Disability and Reinsurance Company of Canada was incorporated under The Corporations Act of Ontario by Letters Patent dated September 19, 1960 as a private company. The original authorized capital was $1.5 million divided into 15,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. Initial capital of approximately $300,000 was raised. The company was licensed by the Province of Ontario in March 1961 to transact the business of accident and sickness insurance. Subsequently, the company was licensed to transact the same classes of insurance in Manitoba in May 1961, in Alberta and British Columbia in April 1962 and in Saskatchewan in January 1963. The original name of the company was Income Insurance Company of Canada and the same was a private company.

In February 1963, the company was converted into a public company and its name was changed to Income Disability and Reinsurance Company of Canada. The authorized capital of the company was increased from $1.5 million to $5 million and there was a public underwriting of its shares whereby an additional $2.4 million of capital was raised.

The head office of the company is located at 75 James Street South, Hamilton, Ontario and the company transacts business in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario.

The existing directors of the company are the petitioners listed in the petition for incorporation of the federal company.

If honourable senators see fit to give second reading to this bill, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

I would like to assure all honourable senators that I shall endeavour to have the French language version of the names of these two companies changed so that they will not be offensive. I do not know what success I shall have, but I shall certainly endeavour to do so.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. McDonald, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

BANK OF BRITISH COLUMBIA— SECOND READING

Pursuant to the Order of the Day:

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris: Honourable senators, I move the second reading of Bill S-16, to incorporate Bank of British Columbia.

Honourable senators, I wish to point out that there are not sufficient copies of this bill to provide one for each senator. I have 15 copies here and will make those available now.

If this motion is adopted, I propose to move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. The bill of last session was with that committee when Parliament was dissolved.

I made a long speech on this subject matter on the previous occasion, speaking until adjournment time on one day and continuing on the next day. I propose to give the reference to that speech, so that senators may have an opportunity to look at it. The speech commences at page 470 of Senate Hansard for May 13, 1964, and is continued at page 483 of May 14, 1964. I believe it was the longest speech I ever made—and that is saying something, as someone remarked.

I must apologize to honourable senators, because when I rose an hour ago I did not know that there were no copies of this bill available, other than the one I presented. There are 15 available now, and anyone who wants one may have one.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that they be distributed now? That would facilitate the passing of the honourable member's motion.

Hon. Mr. Farris: My honourable friend will understand that there is not sufficient to provide one for each senator.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: There may be enough for our purpose.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I am satisfied with that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Could the honourable sponsor indicate the changes in this bill as compared with the measure presented last year?

Hon. Mr. Farris: The changes eliminate certain clauses which were a matter of contention when it was before us. In particular, there is the elimination of any possibility of the Government of British Columbia holding shares in the proposed bank. Perhaps I should read the bill, as it is short.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: That is to say, the new bill meets the points of objection made to the previous bill?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Substantially so. I did not know I had to deal with this today, and anything I say must be taken with a grain of salt. I will read the bill.

BILL S-16

An Act to incorporate Bank of British Columbia.

Whereas the persons hereinafter named have by their petition prayed that it be enacted as hereinafter set forth, and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the petition: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

As regards incorporation, I do not believe you wish me to read the names of the petitioners. To my knowledge they are largely the same as before, perhaps identical. The bill continues:

2. The persons named in section 1 shall be the provisional directors of the Bank.

3. The capital stock of the Bank shall be one hundred million dollars.

4. The chief office of the Bank shall be at the city of Vancouver, in the province of British Columbia, and shall remain at all times in the province of British Columbia.

5. (1) A majority of the directors of the Bank shall be resident in the province of British Columbia.

(2) A majority of the executive officers of the Bank shall be resident in or shall have their ordinary residence in the province of British Columbia.

(3) This section shall have effect notwithstanding anything in or authorized by the Bank Act, unless and until otherwise provided by Parliament.

6. Schedule A of the Bank Act is amended by adding thereto the following—

Then the name of the new bank is given and the bill continues:

7. Except as provided in the Bank Act and in this Act, the Bank shall have all the powers, privileges and immunities and be subject to all the liabilities and provisions set forth in the Bank Act.

I have also the authority to state, on behalf of the premier of the province, that his government will undertake to hold no shares in this bank, if incorporated.

Honourable senators, this bill in similar form was introduced in 1964 and stayed on the Order Paper until it passed second reading and was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. The committee did not support the bill and it came back to the Senate. If my memory serves me aright, the Senate unanimously referred it back to the committee and it stayed there, not acted upon—I make no criticism of anybody for that—until Parliament prorogued.

If this motion for second reading is carried now, this bill, in its more restricted form compared with the previous bill will be referred to the committee, and I would so move at the appropriate time.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: When the honourable leader of the house spoke about this a short time ago, my understanding was that he gave permission to honourable Senator Farris to propose second reading now. As the honourable senator has explained to us, although it is not the same bill, it is practically the same as that which was before the committee previously.

As far as I personally am concerned, and I think as far as senators on this side of the house are concerned, we are not going to take objection on any technical point as to its having second reading and being sent to committee.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Except that we have not a copy of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: The bill was read and there is a copy here if the honourable senator desires it.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I can give my honourable friend one right now.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Hon. Mr. Farris, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 22 at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 22, 1966

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ACTING LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT IN THE SENATE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, we are meeting this evening under a deep sense of tragedy and loss as the result of the sudden passing of our colleague, Senator Bouffard, Leader of the Government in the Senate during the last few weeks.

I propose to say a few words about Senator Bouffard, but before doing so I hope the house will allow me to explain my present position. I received a letter from our leader, Senator Connolly, dated February 18, which with your permission I will read to you.

Dear Senator Hugessen:

I know that you will have felt deeply shocked at the sudden and tragic death of our colleague, Senator Bouffard. He has been with you in the Senate for nearly 20 years, and you have both been at the bar of Quebec much longer.

As you know, I am under doctor's orders, and I am required to spend a number of weeks in a warmer climate for the purpose of recovery from an illness. During this period I would be most grateful if you would assume the function of Acting Leader of the Senate. I realize that I am asking you to take on heavy responsibilities. However, since you assure me that your health is more than equal to the task, I feel that if you would do this it would carry the approval of all of our colleagues in the chamber. I can assure you, and I would be grateful if you would assure them that I will return to take on my normal responsibilities at the earliest possible date.

I received a similar request from the Prime Minister.

Honourable senators, you will fully realize that a request coming from those sources, and under the present circumstances, was one which I could not possibly refuse. I accept it and I will do my best.

Having for many years experienced the invariable kindness and generosity of the members of this chamber, I am quite certain that during the next few weeks members on both sides will adequately carry on the work of the Senate and will turn a blind eye to any errors or inaccuracies which may appear in the conduct of the acting leader.

I wish to direct attention to the last sentence of Senator Connolly's letter to me, in which he undertakes to return to take on his normal responsibilities at the earliest possible date. In that connection, I am happy to tell you —and you will no doubt be equally happy to recognize—that my tenure is likely to be short.

As most of you know, Senator Connolly and Mrs. Connolly left for Florida last Friday. I had a long telephone conversation with him on Thursday evening. He told me his doctors assured him that if he has three weeks of complete rest, basking in the Florida sunshine, he will then be in a position to come home and resume his place in this Senate and in the council chamber. Let us all devoutly hope that the doctors are right and that we shall have the great pleasure of receiving our leader back, renewed and refreshed, by the middle of March. Perhaps I should say at this stage that we would not want to hurry him back if he does not feel equal to doing so by that time; if he feels that a further week or two would be of benefit to him, then of course we will carry on.

In that connection Senator Connolly said something else which I feel I should repeat to you. He referred again to the countless acts of kindness and good will which he received during the period of his illness from so many of his colleagues in this chamber, and he expressed his gratitude and good will to you all.

THE LATE SENATOR PAUL H. BOUFFARD THE LATE HONOURABLE PAUL COMTOIS

TRIBUTES

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I started my remarks by saying that we are meeting this evening under a deep sense of tragedy in the loss of Senator Bouffard. Before paying my own tribute to his memory I want to place upon the record a tribute to him which I have received from Senator Connolly and which Senator Connolly wishes to be placed on the record of this house as his tribute. I shall read it.

> I greatly regret my inability to be in my place in the Senate tonight. Paul Henri Bouffard has been a colleague and a close friend of mine in the Senate for more than twelve years. His distinguished career in his profession and in public life, I am sure, will be thoroughly discussed in the tributes which will be paid to his memory. I should like to make special reference to the competence which he displayed and to the conscientious devotion which he gave to the work of the Senate and of its committees.
> I find it particularly distressing to think that death should have called him so soon after he had assumed the responsibilities of deputy leader in Canada's second chamber. In a short period of time he had not only endeared himself to his colleagues but he had impressed all with his great qualities, both as a parliamentarian and as a leader. The Senate is now deprived forever of his services. I, personally, feel the loss now for what I am certain would have been a close and fruitful association in the work of the Senate.
> The loss which the Senate suffers, of course, cannot be compared to the loss which his dear wife and his family have sustained. Our hearts go out to them in their tragic bereavement.

Senator Bouffard and I had been colleagues at the Bar of Quebec for more than 40 years, and I knew him as one of the ablest and most distinguished members of the Bar from the City of Quebec long before either of us was appointed to the Senate.

Senator Bouffard was a proud and loyal Quebecer, having been born in that city to a distinguished family, his father having been a member of the Superior Court Bench. He was educated at Laval University, and after graduating he continued his connection with his Alma Mater for the rest of his life, first as Professor of Commercial Law and for the latter years as a Governor and Member of the Board of Trustees. It was during his lifetime that that great change took place in the physical surroundings of Laval, when the university was moved from the centre of the city to the lovely site outside the western boundaries, known as Cité Université, of which all Quebecers have the right to feel so very proud.

Senator Bouffard started practising law in his native city, and very soon made his mark. He became the leader of an important law firm, and it was not very long before his colleagues at the Bar gave him the highest honour it was in their power to bestow. He was appointed Bâtonnier of the Bar of Quebec in, I believe, 1948, and shortly thereafter became Bâtonnier General of the Bar of the whole province.

His interests and aptitudes lay largely in the field of commercial and company law, and as the years passed by he became interested in a number of enterprises of which he became a member of the board of directors, much valued for his wise advice.

Though first, and always, and loyally a Quebecer, his interests were not bounded by the limits of the province. He was a good Canadian. Our colleague was not one of those new Quebecers whose views we sometimes read in the press today, people whose interests seem to go no farther than the boundaries of the province, people who seem to regard the rest of Canada with suspicion and distrust, only modified from time to time when more money can be extracted from the federal treasury for provincial purposes.

No. Our colleague, reflecting the views, I am sure, of the overwhelming majority of the people of our province, believed in Canada and believed that Quebec should take her full place in Confederation, in the development of our country and of the history that lies before us.

With regard to Senator Bouffard's political activities, Senator Connolly has made reference to these in the quotation from which I have read. We have known him here for nearly 20 years, assiduous in his duties, constant in his function as Chairman of the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee, courteous, attentive and kindly to all. We shall miss him greatly, but I think we can be happy in the thought that he had a happy, successful and useful life.

I am sure that I speak for everyone here when I express our deepest condolences to his devoted widow and the members of his family.

Honourable senators, perhaps it would be fitting for me to say a word about the second tragedy which took place early this week in Quebec, the sad death of Lieutenant-Governor Comtois, a man who was liked and respected by all.

When I heard of that tragedy, in conjunction with the death of our own colleague Senator Bouffard, I was almost irresistibly reminded of that famous sentence of John Bright in the British Parliament a little over one hundered years ago, at the time of the Crimean War. It was the worst period of the war. The House of Commons had just heard that one of its members had been killed while leading his troops into battle, and two or three more members had heard that their sons had been killed in the same battle.

John Bright referred to these matters, said a word of consolation to survivors, stopped and looking around the chamber said this:

> The Angel of Death has been abroad throughout the land; you may almost hear the beating of his wing.

Honourable senators, in these sad circumstances I think it would be advisable for us, after concluding the tributes to Senator Bouffard, not to carry on with debate on the various matters on the Order Paper. The honourable senators who are ready to proceed on these matters have all agreed to stand them until tomorrow, for which we are grateful.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, the honourable Senator Hugessen referred this evening to his taking over of the duties of Acting Leader of the Government. Of course we understand the sad reason for his doing so. May I say that we are fortunate in having him to assume those duties. It is not my intention to say anything further in that connection at the present time.

It was with deep sorrow that I, and all honourable senators, heard the sad news of Senator Bouffard's passing. I rise this evening to express my shock upon learning of that sad news.

I had known Senator Bouffard since coming to the Senate, and we had become very good friends. I got to know him best during the past month, and the better I knew him the more I liked him. I am sure that has been the experience of everyone who met him.

As Senator Hugessen stated, Senator Bouffard had many excellent qualities, one of which, as I am sure we all noticed, was his great modesty. He was a very learned man, a Doctor of Laws, a Queen's Counsel, a man whose interests leaned in a variety of directions. He was a professor of commercial law at the great Laval University at one time, a director of many commercial and industrial enterprises, and he belonged to many worthwhile organizations and clubs.

Despite his success, Senator Bouffard was humble. When he spoke regarding his appointment as acting leader in the Senate at the beginning of this session he said:

> My lack of experience will no doubt cause me to appeal to both sides for your collaboration in the execution of the difficult duties I shall have to fulfil.

The only person in the Senate at that time who felt he might have some difficulty in performing those duties satisfactorily was Senator Bouffard himself. Certainly there were no other senators who doubted his ability or his capacity.

There are other senators here who knew Senator Bouffard much longer and more intimately than I did—senators from his own City of Quebec who knew his contributions to the business, social and civic life of that great city, and to his Church.

I am going to ask Senator Flynn if he will speak for me and my colleagues in this connection. However, at this time I wish to join with the honourable acting leader, Senator Hugessen, in extending sincere condolences to Madame Bouffard and all the family.

Senator Hugessen has thought it appropriate, and I am sure we all do, to make some remarks and express our grief at another sudden and very tragic death which occurred in the City of Quebec yesterday. I attended the funeral of the late Senator Bouffard, and while there I learned of the passing of the Lieutenant-Governor Comtois of Quebec. The thought came to me at the time that Canada in general, and the Province of Quebec in particular, can ill afford the loss of two such outstanding and distinguished sons, especially in these difficult and trying times when all men of good will are badly needed.

I knew Paul Comtois well. I had the honour to serve with him in the House of Commons for a number of years. I was also a colleague with him in the cabinet of the former government. One of the most lovable men I ever met was Paul Comtois. I never heard him utter an unkind word about anyone. If he could not speak well of people, he just did not speak of them at all.

Paul Comtois was a very popular and efficient representative of the Crown. He was probably one of the best who ever held this high office at any time in any province in Canada.

As to his private life, his activities were numerous and varied, but in all successful. They are well known—in fact so well known and so many I would not undertake to enumerate them. They covered a great range and brought him in contact with many people.

His tragic death is greatly mourned by thousands of people, particularly in his native province which he loved so much, and also in every other part of Canada where he was known.

To all his family we extend our sincere sympathy and to Madame Comtois in particular. In this connection may I read a paragraph from today's Gazette which expresses, I am sure, the sentiment of all of us:

> At this time, in mourning the Lieutenant-Governor's tragic death, all sympathy will go out to Madame Comtois, who at all times shared her husband's kindly dignity, his unfailing courtesy. She also most worthily served, and she may at this time be comforted by the sincere sorrow, so widely felt, for her husband's death.

Hon. J. M. Dessureault: Honourable senators, as a senator from the Province of Quebec, especially as a representative of the City of Quebec, I fully share the feelings so well expressed by the Acting Government Leader in this house (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), as well as the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) who paid an eloquent and well-deserved tribute to Senator Bouffard.

I knew Senator Bouffard since his arrival in Quebec in 1930. A distinguished lawyer, endowed with good judgment, and an experienced businessman, he played a prominent role as a member of the Bar as well as in the field of business.

He achieved great success in many fields and his reputation extended beyond the province of Quebec.

He was appointed to the Senate in 1946, and in 1948, as was mentioned by the Acting Leader, he was appointed bâtonnier of the Quebec Bar.

Commander of the Order of St. Gregory the Great, trustee of Laval University, of which he was a former law professor, he was on the Board of Directors of the Royal Bank of Canada, of the Compagnie d'Administration et de Fiducie, of Canadian Breweries and of several other important companies.

I have lost, in the person of Senator Bouffard a personal friend, a highly valued colleague and adviser whom I always held in great esteem and admiration.

He had a great number of friends and well deserved the reputation of gentleman, which he had in the eyes of everyone.

He had an impressive funeral yesterday at which a large public, including the Speaker of the Senate and a dozen of his colleagues, gathered to pay him a tribute.

I wish to assure Mrs. Bouffard and the members of his family of my deep sympathy and to offer them my sincere condolences.

In another line of thought, one would be prompted to say that a tragedy brings on another one. Those of my colleagues who were in Quebec City yesterday were, as I was, greatly shocked by the tragic news of the death of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, the Honourable Paul Comtois, who perished in the fire of Spencerwood and whose charred remains were recovered only yesterday afternoon.

The Honourable Paul Comtois was a remarkable Lieutenant-Governor. He was a kindly, devoted, obliging man who was loved and respected by all.

I offer my deep sympathy and my sincere condolences to Mrs. Comtois and to the members of his family.

At the same time, I wish to congratulate my good friend, the Honourable Hugues Lapointe, who has just succeeded the late Honourable Mr. Comtois as Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec.

The choice could not have been better advised. I am sure that he will continue the tradition by fulfilling with tact this important office and by bringing credit to it.

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: It is with deep emotion and with a heart filled with anguish that I stand to recall, at this time, the memory of two good friends of mine, Lieutenant-Governor Paul Comtois, who has just passed away so tragically, and our colleague, Senator Paul Bouffard.

Mr. Comtois was starting his studies in agricultural economy at Oka at the time I was finishing mine. That is to say that all our lives and until these last few days we were very close.

Mr. Comtois was a real gentleman who always spoke with kindness and good nature, without any bitterness ever. He was the same with people in high office and humble conditions. He came from the land and he remained deeply attached to it, and he kept his farm at Pierreville. But when he came to live in the residence of the Lieutenant-Governor, he decided to take up again what a former governor organized at Spencer-wood: the maple sugar operations. Each spring, he saw to it that the 400 or so maple trees were tapped and each year he would send me a gallon of maple syrup, telling me that it was much better than what I could get from all the maple syrup producers in Quebec. I must admit that, with all the care he took, his maple syrup was delicious.

He also had an orchard which he sprayed himself each spring in order to harvest good apples. He was happy to give them to his friends to show that even the Lieutenant-Governor could set an example for all the citizens and all the farmers of his province. All his life he was a farmer and his great love was the land.

Last Wednesday morning when we attended the funeral of our lamented colleague Senator Paul Bouffard, everyone was talking about that recent tragedy. I can still hear our colleague Senator Flynn telling me: Last night at 11 o'clock, I was with Mr. Comtois. If Mr. Comtois had delayed getting home a little bit after the reception given for him at the Chateau Frontenac, he might still be alive.

To his widow, that great lady so kind and so charming, and to his children, I extend my deepest sympathy. I know that Mrs. Comtois and her children, with the deep faith that is theirs, will accept that painful ordeal, knowing that Mr. Comtois, who was always a paragon of virtue in his lifetime, has already received his reward. We may be sure that, from heaven, he will protect his own even more efficiently than he did during his lifetime.

It is also with deep emotion and sorrow that I recall the passing away of our colleague in this Chamber, Senator Bouffard. Little did I suspect what the future held when I asked the Prime Minister to appoint him to replace me. For, under the circumstances, I felt he was well qualified to become Assistant Leader and, after a while, Deputy Leader.

Senator Hugessen, you will be replacing him not merely as Deputy Leader but for a while you will be Acting Leader. Qualified people are needed to hold that office. This is why Senator Bouffard was selected and now Senator Hugessen is replacing him.

When two or three days after his appointment, I said to Senator Bouffard: "My dear senator, there are some very difficult circumstances in our lives, even for the person who asks another to replace him." I had to ask him to take my place. I told him he was more qualified than I was and I also knew that he would have to be here much more often. He replied: "It is my duty to accept; I cannot refuse the request of Senator Connolly or the Prime Minister." He added: "This is a duty I gladly accept."

Hardly ten days ago he was with us. On Tuesday of the previous week I inquired about his health, for at the beginning of the session he was suffering from influenza and had to fight against it. He replied: I feel very well today. Little did he think at that time that ten days later he would not be among us any more. Moreover, his wife said that he had a cough for some time and she advised him to see the doctor in case he had some lung infection. That afternoon, as usual, he played a game of dominoes at the Club de la Garnison, with lifelong friends. He was a champion domino player. He used to say: It is easy, you know, there are about 2,000 odd combinations; all you have to do is to learn them and then everything is all right. Personally, I could not learn them, whereas he knew them very well. The game is not very rough, but you have to know how to play it.

Under a somewhat cold appearance, he had a heart of gold, he knew not how to refuse his help to whoever asked for it. He was charitable, but without fanfare. When he made charitable donations, he never wanted his name to be advertised. He gave alms for the sake of charity, and not under pretense.

As was mentioned before, at the time Laval University organized its great subscription campaign, since it intended to move the campus where the new Cité universitaire is now located, Senator Bouffard was asked to organize the subscription, and I understand it produced some twelve million dollars, which is a substantial amount for the province of Quebec.

He kept on devoting himself to this work since he was a governor of this institution.

Senator Bouffard was the son of a famous lawyer from a rural area of Quebec, who later became judge of the superior court. Therefore, he had a good background. His father was a great lawyer, a great jurist and a great judge. He followed in his footsteps. Having appeared in court several times against the Quebec Power Company which was not too well liked in the area, he was recognized as a rather clever man and the Quebec Power Company decided to hire him.

It is at that time that he opened his office in Quebec City. Two years later all differences between the people and the Quebec Power were settled; Mr. Bouffard had found a way to resolve those problems.

With the disappearance of our colleague Senator Bouffard, we not only lose a friend, but we lose a great man, an enlightened and esteemed fellow citizen.

To his worthy spouse, and to his family, I extend my sincere condolences.

Senator Bouffard spent a lifetime doing good for his fellow citizens and the Great Master has already given him the prize He awards those who serve their country well and who have loved their fellow citizens.

Hon. Stanley S. McKeen: Honourable senators, I regret that my condition does not permit me to make a lengthy speech, but I cannot let the occasion pass without paying tribute to our late colleague and expressing my condolences to his family.

Senator Bouffard and I were sworn in as members of this chamber on the same day twenty years ago. For the past fourteen or fifteen years I have shared the same room with him. I knew him well. In paying tribute to his memory I express my condolences to his family who will miss him far more than we will. Paul Bouffard has done a great job for his country.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I happened to meet Lieutenant-Governor Comtois and our colleague, senator Bouffard, a few hours before they passed away. You can imagine the successive shocks I have received. I am still stunned.

At an informal reception given at the Chateau on Sunday night, I had the opportunity to have a pretty long conversation with Lieutenant-Governor Comtois, one of my good friends whom I had known at the other place and whom I had the honour to replace as Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. A few hours after having left us, he lost his life in the distressing tragedy about which we all know.

One could describe Paul Comtois by a short sentence: he was a good man, a kind-hearted man.

Kindness was written all over his face and even those who only saw pictures of him have noticed that kindness made up of simplicity, and graciousness. He had a brilliant career, of course, but he did not go looking for honours; they came to him because of his quiet efficiency, his desire to serve and his constant availability to all, his province and his country.

Paul Comtois will remain the prototype of the great landed gentry. He will be remembered as a very charming man. All those who came near him will not forget him easily.

I join with the people of Canada to express our sorrow to Mrs. Comtois and her children, to tell them that we mourn with them the passing of a beloved husband and father, who was also a man loved by all the people of Canada.

Early last Wednesday morning I met Senator Bouffard at the Quebec city hall. We both had things to discuss with the mayor. We talked about our coming back here today as planned and about the program of business of this house. He seemed in excellent health and yet, a few hours later, he died suddenly.

I would say that very few people really knew Senator Bouffard. His main characteristics, and I will speak of only two of them, were first of all a legal mind and I mean by that not only his knowledge of the law but a very sound judgment and then, generosity. From his father, Justice Pierre Bouffard, who was considered a great magistrate, Senator Bouffard inherited a love for the law, a legal mind and a sound judgment. Called to the bar in 1918, he practised law with his father for about ten years before founding in Quebec City his own law firm, which was to become one of the most important in that town. His clients were seeking Mr. Bouffard's services first for his qualities as a lawyer and his successes in every field have been truly remarkable. Then, gradually, he was sought after as a very wise counsellor, and that is how he was appointed director of so many boards of important commercial, financial and industrial organizations.

It is also his qualities as a legal expert that justified his appointment to the Senate, which has enabled us in this house to benefit from his great contribution during twenty years. Senator Bouffard's remarks always wore the stamp of a great wisdom. He did not seek to be brilliant but rather efficient in our discussions, especially before committees, mainly as chairman of the private bills committee.

I spoke about the generosity of our colleague. In this regard also his discretion never lessened his action. There are crowds of people from all classes, who benefited from his assistance. He was a devoted collaborator in every good cause. Mention was made of Laval University, and he was a member of the financial committee. I shall add the École supérieure de Commerce de Québec, of which he was the governor and more particularly the Quebec bar. He loved his profession more than anything else; he was a lawyer. He was for many years president of the judicial aid office as he believed, rightfully, that access to the courts must be provided for all people, notwithstanding their respective means.

His success in all his fields never made him triumphant, for he rejoiced just as much, and even more, when his fellow-citizens were successful.

He knew no envy; he applauded other people's success and very often contributed to it.

A generous man, he brought an open mind to bear on various problems. Being a Liberal in politics, he looked at his party only as a necessary framework for action. He always showed the greatest respect for those who did not share his views. Deeply attached to the language and to the heritage of the French Canadians, he foresaw a truly nation-wide role for his fellow-countrymen.

To both these essential qualities, I would add his extraordinary capacity for work; until the end, he worked without respite. And is it not on account of his sound judgment, which I mentioned before, that a call was made on him first of all to replace Senator Vaillancourt as Deputy Government Leader in the Senate, and, afterwards, to be acting leader in the absence of our Government Leader (Hon. Mr. Connolly). And is it not also because of his generosity, his sense of duty, that he accepted? Circumstances have born out that Paul-Henri Bouffard was a great-hearted man, a man of sound judgment.

Because he was my senior by a few decades and had not argued in a court of law for about fifteen years, I only knew him by reputation, until I came to the Senate. For a little over three years now, he showed me an esteem and a regard which allowed me to believe myself to be one of his friends. It is as a friend of his, more than as a fellow-citizen of Quebec City, or a colleague at the Bar or in the Senate that I want to tell again to Mrs. Bouffard and her children how much I sympathize with them in their grief and how deep I feel their cruel loss.

[Text]

Hon. Josie D. Quart: Honourable senators, what a dreadful shock to learn of the passing of Senator Bouffard. He seemed to be in good health and spirits when he left the Senate last Thursday.

It seems that I have always known him, for during our teenage days we used to skate together in the Quebec Skating Club.

Senator Bouffard was a shining example of perfect bilingualism, and because of it he was able to transcend all borders of geography and nationality. His passing means a very serious loss to the Senate. As we all know, he had recently been appointed Deputy Leader of the Government, and during his short term of office he proved that he had all the necessary qualifications for that position. Had he lived, he was slated to play a prominent role in the activities of the Senate.

To Senator Bouffard idleness was unknown; there was always work to be done and challenges to be encountered. He made a valuable contribution to the development of his native province, and was a director of a number of industrial and commercial firms. Senator Bouffard took an active interest in education, and was a Governor of the Board of Trustees of Laval University. It makes one sad to think that his hand will never again be outstretched in friendly greeting, and to realize that he will no longer take his place with us in this chamber.

Only those who have lost a loved one can fully sympathize with his loving wife, Margaret, his family, and the grandchildren who loved him so dearly. We shall long cherish his memory. Success crowned his earthly efforts, and may his eternal reward be great.

Honourable senators, this is a period of dreadful shocks: one of the saddest was the cruel blow which struck the Province of Quebec on Monday in the sudden and tragic passing of Quebec's Lieutenant-Governor Paul Comtois.

Mr. Comtois won the respect and admiration of all who knew him. His sudden and untimely passing means a great loss, not only to the province he loved so much but to the whole of Canada.

As a Quebecer and a personal friend of the late Lieutenant-Governor, and Madame Comtois, I was grieved beyond words to learn of the death of this kind and courteous gentleman who performed the duties of his high office with sincere dedication.

My sympathy and thoughts are with Madame Comtois and the members of his family. May Divine Providence comfort them in their hour of sorrow.

I wish the newly appointed Lieutenant-Governor, Honourable Hugues Lapointe, and his charming wife, the new chatelaine of Bois de Coulonge, every success in their new roles.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, may I just add a word as a long-time friend of Senator Paul Bouffard.

It is said that the exit from life and the passage into history are often sudden and always final. When I think that just a week ago Paul was standing here in this chamber, alert, kindly and full of life, which were his characteristics, conducting the business of the Senate, and that tonight we are putting on record our regrets at his passing, it makes one realize that time available is never as long as one might estimate it to be.

Much has been said tonight and much is known about the brilliance of Paul Bouffard in his profession, his outstanding position in the business world an in the political life of the country. I prefer to say a word about the other side of Paul Bouffard, his great friendliness and his love of the Senate. To his great friendliness, each and every senator here can bear testimony.

Paul Bouffard's love of the Senate was demonstrated in all the years that he had been in this chamber. He devoted himself assiduously to the work of committees; he participated most helpfully and always gave excellent advice in relation to the problems with which we were dealing. He gave up additional time when there were special sittings of a committee, even when the Senate was not in session, because he had a great love for the Senate and for its position in the Government of Canada. He felt its place was important, and he devoted himself to presenting that image in as clear and as bright a way as possible, so that the public would at all times appreciate the importance and value of this branch of Parliament.

Senator Bouffard had a good sense of humour. I noticed it, as I am sure other senators did, when from time to time tempers began to rise a little during discussion in committee, and a sparkle would come from that unfailing sense of humour and the atmosphere would change. His unfailing sense of humour just seemed to clear the air and make easier the passage of the measure under discussion.

These are the characteristics of Paul Bouffard that I recall after many years of friendship which goes back much before his coming to the Senate. He was a close and dear friend of mine, and I shall miss him. Certainly his widow and children and grandchildren will miss him. Time will not quickly erase the history of associations and friendships he made in the Senate.

[Translation]

Hon. Leon Methot: Honourable senators, may I join my colleagues in expressing my deepest sympathy.

Since the beginning of the year the Grim Reaper has too often visited us. Yesterday, we were in Quebec City to pay our last respects to a colleague and a friend. Senator Bouffard died on duty. His full and successful career came to an untimely end.

His sense of duty and his devotion to his work were proverbial. He was always ready to help whoever had need of him.

He was admitted to the Bar in 1918, around the same time as I was, and I had many opportunities to discuss complex matters with him. He shared his knowledge with me every time.

Elevated to the Senate in 1946, having wonderful attributes of heart and mind, he won the admiration and the sincere friendship of us all.

Allow me to offer, in your name and on my behalf, to Mrs. Bouffard and to all his family our heartfelt sympathy and to wish them the courage needed to face such an ordeal.

At the time when the Senate was struck by the sudden death of Honourable Paul-Henri Bouffard, the whole country and the province of Quebec were dismayed by the tragic death of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. The Honourable Paul Comtois devoted his entire life to public affairs, at the farm credit, as a member of the federal Government in Ottawa, or as Lieutenant-Governor in Quebec. All his life, he was pleased to do his duty. He gave his province the best of himself. I have deep sympathy for all his relatives.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, I have listened with great interest to the wonderful tributes paid to our late acting leader, Senator Paul Bouffard.

I should like to mention a personal experience which I think is appropriate on a sad occasion of this kind. Just before the Senate adjourned for the recess, Senator Bouffard sat beside me at the prayer breakfast of the Christian leadership group in this Parliament, a group which has been in existence for some time. It was an honour to have the Acting Leader of the Senate present, and from a personal point of view I felt it was a great example which would have far-reaching effects in religious co-operation, which is so sorely needed at the present time. It was evident that Senator Bouffard was trying his best to bear witness in that faith in which we are all equals, and where merit alone is the badge of religion. We felt that his presence there was a light that would shine forth with great effect, and which perhaps would do something for us that would strengthen us in a way that is of importance to us all.

Last week I was in Washington with a number of friends, led by the Minister of National Defence, Honourable Paul T. Hellyer, and attended the prayer breakfast of the President of the United States. There were 1,800 men present in the main forum. The ladies assembled with the First Lady in another place. It was indeed a wonderful occasion. It was perhaps the most powerful congregation of its kind. There were present the leaders of the Senate and of Congress, the armed forces, the judges, and many of the ambassadors of the world. It was an inspiring sight. Billy Graham was there—the man who we had always heard of as a prince of peace, as one who wanted peace at any price. Here he came as a prince in shining armour, backing the President to the last degree, and that great congregation stood and applauded him because he carried them with him, because he was a true patriot of the United States of America.

When I returned to Ottawa and heard of the death of Senator Bouffard, who was with me at our prayer breakfast here, I felt that we had lost a good friend. He had been my neighbour, occupying the next room to me in the Parliament Buildings for many years.

I knew Senator Bouffard to be extremely able. I felt that his speech in the debate for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne was generous. It was an excellent endeavour. Senator Bouffard did his work in a way that I am sure we all admired. He was doing so well, the last thing we expected was his sudden passing.

What I want to remember about Senator Bouffard is that he was present at the prayer breakfast and bore witness to his faith, to our Christian faith, without regard for any divisions we may have. We of the prayer breakfast group will remember him for the interest he took and expected to take, but which was cut off by his untimely death.

I have written to express our condolences and sincere sympathy to the late Senator Bouffard's widow and his fine family. I know their faith will sustain them, and that in their sorrow they will be proud of the memory of a fine husband and father who was so highly regarded in the Senate, in his native province and throughout Canada.

Hon. L. M. Gouin: Honourable senators, at the beginning of this session I had the opportunity to mention the success Senator Bouffard had as a lawyer and a businessman. He had just been appointed acting leader and I was convinced, like all of you, that he would discharge his duties admirably.

When I last saw—and unfortunately it was to be the last time—my lamented friend and colleague on February 9, he seemed in excellent health. Nothing foreshadowed his tragic death last week. It was a hard blow for us to learn of the passing of our new acting leader. In less than a month, he had done well in that capacity. He knew how to present clearly and convincingly the business submitted to the house by the Government. He also chose wisely those to whom he entrusted that task.

Were I called upon to bring out the most characteristic qualities of our colleague from Granville, I would mention at the outset his sound judgment and his perfect loyalty.

Senator Bouffard proved the soundness of his judgment each time he spoke in this House, each time he chaired one of our committees or took part in a discussion.

Senator Bouffard proved his loyalty to his leaders through each and every election campaign since I have had the privilege of knowing him. I recall with particular emotion the loyalty of our lamented colleague towards the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent who rightly trusted him implicitly.

Born in Quebec City in 1895, Senator Bouffard had all the best typical characteristics of a good Quebecer. This great business man combined devotion to his native province with a patriotism as big as the continent. He was one of our great Canadians, for he could face national problems with coolness and thoughtfulness. He considered them with a sound judgment and a clear mind.

Senator Bouffard enjoyed the respect of everybody in the bar and in financial circles, and of all his fellow-citizens.

By the demise of that former student who did them proud, the Quebec Seminary and Laval University have lost a patron and a great associate.

A professor of commercial law at the Quebec law faculty and a member of the board of trustees of his alma mater, Senator Bouffard deserves to be remembered always.

I hope his memory will be commemorated through the giving of his name to some foundation, some scholarship for law students or some award. I would be happy to bring my humble contribution to such a symbolic gesture. I offer Mrs. Bouffard and all the members of her family my deepest sympathy.

I also wish, in concluding my remarks, to offer my heartfelt condolences to Mrs. Comtois and her family. Our distinguished Lieutenant-Governor was the victim of the destruction of Spencerwood by fire. He was an honest citizen. He fulfilled with distinction his high office. He discharged his duty in a way that earned him the respect and the esteem of the whole population.

The whole country deplores the tragic death of the Honourable Paul Comtois at this time.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Senator Bouffard whom all of you, honourable senators, praised with emotion, was a sincere friend of us all. Our colleagues who made his eulogy spoke in tones of deep emotion. They will long remember this colleague who was an outstanding lawyer, a very able parliamentarian, but who was even more than that, a gentleman and a big-hearted man. He was a supporter of justice. He was interested in young people and that is why he devoted so much of his time to the university, hoping that his work would be useful to future generations.

I knew Senator Bouffard well, and he was extremely helpful to me before he was appointed to the Senate himself.

Furthermore, honourable colleagues, when I was appointed to this house, I had the honour of being introduced to Mr. Speaker by the Leader of the Government, who was the honourable Senator Ross Macdonald, and also by the honourable Senator Paul Bouffard, who was the senator for the division where I was living.

He always had a liking for the lower St. Lawrence; he had a place, a summer home, at Notre Dame du Portage, on the shores of the majestic St. Lawrence which, in my area, looks very much like the Juan de Fuca Straits near Victoria. The river in my area, at Notre Dame du Portage and Rivière du Loup, is 20 miles wide. As a backdrop, there are the gigantic mountains, the Laurentians, not unlike the Olympic Mountains that can be seen in the United States, across from Victoria.

The air is pure, it smells good, and the river on which there are numerous boats is dotted by a number of islands with picturesque names—Lièvre island, Pèlerins island, Blanche island, Rouge island and Brandy Pots—in memory of smugglers who used those islands in the past; that has long since disappeared.

Notre Dame du Portage is a very popular summer resort for its beaches near Rivière du Loup and St. Patrick, where the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent owns a summer villa. It was in that unforgettable landscape that Senator Bouffard used to come for a rest after his intense work at his law office in Quebec. We would meet him there, always modest always most happy, a grand gentleman he was. I shall always cherish his memory and I shall often remember that when I had difficulty in reaching a decision I asked his opinion on such and such a matter. In fact, his father and mine were both barristers. His father was later appointed to the bench. They were contemporaries, they were friends. The lamented Senator Bouffard was also my friend—the son of my father's friend. In speaking to you like this, you will please forgive me for recalling personal memories, but I do not hesitate to share them with you for your memories of Senator Bouffard are similar to mine.

He had an admirable companion who staunchly stood by him rain or shine. I join my colleagues in offering Mrs. Bouffard and the senator's family my deepest sympathy.

[Text]

Honourable senators, the Province of Quebec is in sorrow. We were grieved first by the death of an eminent colleague of ours who had made a sacrifice to accept the position of acting leader of this house. There is no more painstaking, difficult and arduous position. It is arduous for a good reason: the leader, or the acting leader in charge, has the responsibility here for all legislation that is sponsored by all members of the Government in the other place. This responsibility extends to legislation sponsored by the Leader of the Government in the Senate or by the acting leader, as well as to legislation proposed or introduced by any honourable member.

These duties present a tremendous task; it is a killing task. For that reason I congratulate our friend Senator Hugessen on his appointment, and at the same time I offer him my sympathy and my very best wishes.

Do you know, honourable colleagues, that when Senator Dandurand was Leader of the Government and the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen was leading the other side of the house, Senator Dandurand rose every morning at five o'clock in order to read the legislation sponsored in the House of Commons which was to come before the Senate. He worked all day without respite. It is surprising that he lived so long, when one considers the enormous amount of work he had to do.

When Senator Bouffard was invited by the Government to take charge and to replace temporarily our leader, Senator Connolly, he accepted the office as an honour although he knew what it entailed. He accepted it because of his loyalty to the head of the party, the Prime Minister, to his friend Senator Connolly, and to an institution for which he had the greatest respect, the upper chamber, the Senate to which we all belong. And what Senator Bouffard did for me by being so generous when I went to him for advice, he did, I am sure, for many others also.

It was also surprising that though Senator Bouffard had an iron will, he had at the same time an open mind. By that I mean he had no prejudices whatever, and he was ready to consider the pros and cons of every matter submitted to him. I regret his passing for that reason as well as for his remarkable formation as a jurist, which he received at home and by the teaching of his father and by working as hard as any one of us ever did.

I would also remind my honourable colleagues that we have in this Senate chamber the largest number of first-class lawyers to be found in any organization in this country. While a large number of lawyers from every part of the country belong to the Canadian Bar Association, there is not to be found in any legal organization in any province as many eminent lawyers as there are in this chamber.

Senator Bouffard was counted in that group. He was also Bâtonnier Général of the Province of Quebec, which meant he was the first lawyer of that province, elected by his confreres to that high office because of the respect they had for him. Senator Bouffard and Senator Hugessen were each in turn elected Bâtonnier Général de la province de Québec at the time when that title had real meaning.

That being said, I repeat to you that I could say much more in praise of Senator Bouffard, but I do not wish to delay you, honourable senators, after all the fine eulogies and well-deserved tributes that have been paid in this chamber.

As I have said to you, the Province of Quebec is in mourning for the loss of its first citizen, the Lieutenant-Governor, who was the representative of Her Majesty the Queen in Quebec City, the capital of that province.

Yesterday, when I went to Quebec to attend that magnificent tribute paid to our deceased colleague, I saw on the face of every man, woman and child that I met—and I met crowds of them—sorrow, sadness and consternation because of the death of the late Honourable Paul Comtois in such tragic circumstances.

This is the first occasion on which I have seen the flag flying at half-mast over this building for so long a period of time. It has been lowered since Thursday morning last, and will remain down until Thursday evening next, a total of eight days, or more than a week. It reminds us that life has not much meaning except for the work, the civic qualities and the patriotism that are shown by those who are gone to the Great Beyond and who will be remembered for what they did in their lifetime. Tomorrow is the day when we shall all remember that man is but ashes and dust. What are the glories of this world when we think that the only thing that counts is what is done for others? This is why the late Lieutenant-Governor Paul Comtois and Senator Bouffard will be remembered, and those who did not have the privilege of knowing personally those two great Canadians will know the legend that will surround their names forever.

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Bourget: Honourable senators, I should like to join with my colleagues from the Senate who so eloquently recalled the memory of the colleague who was, unfortunately during a too short period, the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I will not repeat everything that was said a few minutes ago about Senator Bouffard. Nevertheless, may I say that I agree wholeheartedly with what was said and that he deserved such tributes. To all of us, his passing means the loss of a sincere and loyal friend, a devoted colleague.

I avail myself of this opportunity to offer once more to Mrs. Bouffard and her family my most sincere sympathy in their sad bereavement.

Sunday night, a little past midnight, my wife told me that the Lieutenant-Governor's residence was all in flames. From the window of my residence at Levis, I was able to see the fire destroying that residence called Spencerwood. I was far from thinking that the flames were destroying at the same time the body of the man who, during the last five years, had with so much dignity represented the Queen in our province of Quebec.

The late Paul Comtois will long be remembered especially in our province and, I understand, across the country, as the perfect gentleman. I express my sincere sympathy to Mrs. Comtois and her family.

[Text]

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris: Honourable senators, the hour is late and I do not wish to prolong this sitting. I had breakfast this morning at home in Vancouver and I am here in Ottawa tonight. Before this sitting ends I wish to join with my friend Senator McKeen in emphasizing that these tributes, heartfelt as they are, are not confined to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. They represent the feelings of people throughout the whole of Canada.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-126, to extend the time for consideration of objections pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act with respect to the reports of commissions established for the decennial census taken in the year 1961.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

He said: Honourable senators, may I ask that this bill be placed first on the Orders of the Day for tomorrow? It is a very simple bill which merely extends the time for the House of Commons to give consideration to the objections to the reports of the provincial committees dealing with the redistribution of seats. It is rather urgent because the time is running out under the bill as it stands today. If this house is willing to give consideration to it and pass it tomorrow, the hope is that it will be possible to give it Royal Assent tomorrow evening.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen presented Bill S-17, to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Honourable senators, this is an important and intricate piece of legislation which will require a great deal of consideration.

My honourable friend Senator Hayden has very kindly undertaken to explain the bill on second reading. I thought that, in order to give him time to prepare his explanation and to allow honourable senators to read the bill and understand it, I would move that it be placed on the Order Paper for second reading on Tuesday next, March 1, if that meets with the approval of my honourable friends.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

HON. MAURICE BOURGET, P.C.

FELICITATIONS ON APPOINTMENT TO PRIVY COUNCIL

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, there is one event to which I should direct the attention of members of the Senate, and I am particularly happy to do so on this rather sombre day. I wish to advise honourable senators that this morning our former Speaker, Senator Bourget, was sworn in as a member of the Privy Council of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Maurice Bourget: Honourable senators, I wish to thank our acting leader, the honourable Senator Hugessen, most sincerely for bringing my appointment to the Privy Council to the attention of the Senate.

I would like also to reciprocate and to congratulate him upon his nomination as Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have no doubt that he will fulfil his duties with the ability and judgment he has shown throughout his long service to the Senate.

Also, with your permission, I wish to thank the man who was responsible for the great honour which has been bestowed upon me—the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. I hope that I shall be worthy of this high honour, which in turn reflects upon all the members of the Senate.

Through you, my acting leader, I want to thank all honourable members for the warmth of their congratulations.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

REPORT OF THE EIGHTH MEETING OF THE CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

Held at Ottawa and Montreal May 20-23, 1965

The eighth meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group was held in Ottawa and Montreal, May 20-23, 1965. Twenty-three members of the United States Congress and twenty-six members of the Canadian Parliament participated in the discussions. The Co-Chairmen of the United States delegation were the Honourable George D. Aiken, Senator from Vermont, and the Honourable Cornelius E. Gallagher, Representative from New Jersey. The two Speakers of the Senate and House of Commons, the Honourable Maurice Bourget and the Honourable Alan A. Macnaughton led the Canadian Delegation. A list of the Canadian and United States delegates appears as an appendix to this report.

Established in 1959, this group has quickly grown in the six years of its existence into one of Canada's strongest and most valuable interparliamentary links. Meetings are held alternately in Washington and Ottawa. The seventh session was held in Washington and Cape Kennedy in January, 1964.

As on previous occasions, the discussions of the Group were frank, informal and off the record. The object of the meetings is a free and unofficial exchange of views and ideas between legislators of our two countries on a wide range of matters of mutual interest.

Canadian delegates at the eighth meeting were drawn from British Columbia to Nova Scotia, and from the Arctic Circle to the Vermont border, while the United States delegates represented an even wider spread—from Hawaii to Maine and Alabama. This broad representation, together with the seniority of many of the representatives indicates clearly the appreciation on both sides of the importance of each country to the other in much more than a regional sense.

The opening plenary session was held on May 20, at which the United States delegates were welcomed by the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson. Following the usual practice, the meeting then resolved itself into two committees, one dealing with trade and related matters, the other dealing with defence.

The Trade Committee was under the joint chairmanship of Senator Aiken of the United States delegation and Mr. Speaker Bourget and Senator McCutcheon of the Canadian delegation. United States representation included—besides Senator Aiken—Senators J. S. Cooper, B. E. Jordan (North Carolina), Eugene McCarthy, J. B. Pearson and Hiram Fong, and Representatives H. T. Johnson, S. R. Yates, S. R. Tupper, Mark Andrews, Vernon Thomson and D. M. Fraser. Canadian representation included also Senators Méthot and Leonard and the following Members of Parliament: Honourable J. W. Monteith, Honourable Alvin Hamilton, Mr. Lucien Lamoureux, Mr. Stanley Knowles, Mr. George Chatterton, Mrs. Margaret Konantz, Mr. Gérard Laprise, Mr. Albert Béchard and Mr. J. E. Lloyd.

Subjects discussed in the three meetings of the Trade Committee included the following:

—transportation links between Canada and the United States;

—co-operative paving of the Alaska Highway;

—Canadian access to the sea through the Alaskan "Panhandle";

—continental water resources utilization projects; and

—aid to developing nations.

The Defence Committee was jointly chaired by Congressman Gallagher for the United States and Mr. Speaker Macnaughton and Mr. David Hahn for Canada. United States delegates on the Committee—in addition to Congressman Gallagher—included Senators Mike Mansfield, Bourke B. Hickenlooper, Leverett Saltonstall, P. V. McNamara, F. E. Moss and L. B. Jordan (Idaho) and Representatives W. T. Murphy, J. I. Whalley, R. T. Stafford and A. I. Selden. Also on the committee, for Canada, were Senators P. H. Bouffard, H. de M. Molson, S. J. Smith and M. Grattan O'Leary, and the following Members of Parliament: Mr. James E. Walker, Mr. Jack McIntosh, Mr. Heward Grafftey, Mr. Bert Leboe, Dr. Stanley Haidasz, Mr. Andrew Brewin and Mr. Gene Rheaume.

Subjects discussed in the three sessions of the Defence Committee included the following:

—the state of the NATO Alliance;
—U.N. Peace-keeping operations;
—defence production sharing; and —the general international situation.

Members of the United States delegation expressed a special interest in the re-organization of the Canadian defence forces, and, at their request, the Minister of National Defence, the Honourable Paul Hellyer, met with the members of both the Trade and Defence Committees and outlined for the benefit of Americans and Canadians alike the problems and progress toward unification of the Canadian military services.

While in Ottawa the United States delegates were taken onto the floor of the Senate, where tributes were paid by Mr. Speaker Bourget and by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Honourable John J. Connolly, and the Leader of the Opposition, the Honourable Alfred J. Brooks. In the House of Commons, the United States guests were seated in the Speaker's Gallery and recognized from the floor by Mr. Speaker Macnaughton, by the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, by the Leader of the Official Opposition, the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker, and by the leaders or spokesmen from the other Opposition parties.

In Ottawa the delegates and their wives were guests at several social functions including a luncheon given by Mr. Speaker Bourget, a joint Senate and House of Commons reception, a reception given by Mr. Speaker Macnaughton, a reception given by His Excellency W. Walton Butterworth, United States Ambassador to Canada, and an official dinner given by the Canadian delegation in honour of the United States delegates. The guest speaker at the Government dinner was the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Paul Martin.

A special program was provided for the wives of the delegates while the meetings were in progress. Among other things, the ladies' program included a scenic tour of Ottawa's Tulip Festival; the Gatineau Parkway; tea at Mr. Speaker Macnaughton's summer residence, "The Farm", at Kingsmere, Quebec; and luncheons given by Mme Maurice Bourget and Mrs. Jack McIntosh. The ladies also were graciously received at Government House by Her Excellency, Mme Georges P. Vanier.

On Saturday, May 22, the delegates and their wives travelled by private train to Montreal, stopping for lunch at the Seigniory Club in Montebello, Quebec, and reaching Montreal in time for dinner at the St. James's Club, where the Honourable Guy Favreau, Minister of Justice, the Honourable C. M. Drury, Minister of Industry, Senator Hiram Fong, of Hawaii, and Senator Grattan O'Leary were among the guest speakers. Sunday morning, delegates were briefed on plans and progress of Expo '67 by the Commissioner-General, His Excellency Pierre Dupuy, and senior members of his staff. A luncheon-reception was given by His Worship, Mayor Jean Drapeau, on Ile-Ste-Hélène, and delegates were given the opportunity to view by helicopter the preparations underway at the Expo site.

Thus ended the eighth meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, with the homeward departure of both delegations from Montreal's International Airport in the late afternoon of Sunday, May 23, 1965. All delegates seemed well satisfied with the results of this latest meeting and more than ever convinced of the usefulness of this vehicle for the exchange of views between legislators of two countries which have so much in common.

Once again, the presence and active participation of the wives added greatly to the success of the venture. These ambassadors of goodwill serve always to strengthen and confirm the social exchanges, the friendships and mutual understanding that are fostered by these meetings.

We would not want to conclude this report without expressing our warm appreciation for the excellent co-operation and assistance of the officers of the Departments of External Affairs and National Defence, and of the various other agencies of government who did so much to make the visits in Ottawa and Montreal such a resounding success. We wish also to record our gratitude to His Worship Mayor Jean Drapeau, and His Excellency Pierre Dupuy and their fine staffs for the excellent arrangements in Montreal, and to the Honourable Paul Hellyer, Minister of National Defence, whose department took care of the transportation arrangements. We should also acknowledge the excellent staff work by Mr. George Carty, Mr. Ian Imrie and his assistants who were in charge of all arrangements for this important meeting. A word of thanks should also go to Air Canada for making Mr. Gérard Lareault available to assist in the reception and transportation of delegates.

Respectfully submitted,

Maurice Bourget,
Speaker of the Senate

Alan A. Macnaughton,
Speaker of the House of Commons.

Ottawa,
September 15, 1965.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE PACIFIC COAST FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-6, respecting The Pacific Coast Fire Insurance Company, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendment:

Page 2: Delete clause 4.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave of the Senate, I move that this report be taken into consideration now.

Honourable senators, the amendment striking out paragraph 4 was made at the request of the promoters of the bill. A similar bill came before the Senate last year and provided for a coming into force date which was different from, and later than, the date on which the bill might become law. That provision was felt necessary at the time in order that they might prepare for the changes encompassed by this legislation. Between the last session and this session there was ample time to make that sort of preparation, and so the incorporators simply ask that the coming into force date be struck out, and the measure will come into force when it becomes law.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved the second reading of Bill C-126, to extend the time for consideration of objections pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act with respect to the reports of commissions established for the decennial census taken in the year 1961.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is rather urgent but, at the same time, not very consequential so far as the Senate is concerned. Its sole object is to increase the time within which the House of Commons will have the right to discuss objections to various reports of the Redistribution Commissions from the various provinces.

Under the bill passed at the last session, section 20 provided that the House of Commons shall, within the first 15 days after the expiration of the period, have a chance to consider the matter of objection. As honourable senators know, it has been impossible for the House of Commons to accomplish this at the present session. They are trying desperately to complete the discussion on the Estimates for the current year and they have not the time to consider the various objections which have been made to some of the reports of the provincial redistribution commissions.

This bill proposes to extend the period to 45 sitting days of the House of Commons. It is really a clearing-up operation for the House of Commons, and it is rather urgent because the time is elapsing. If the Senate is disposed to put the bill through the remaining stages this afternoon, it is hoped that Royal Assent will be given to it today. The bill passed all three readings last week in the House of Commons in less than a page of Hansard.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, as the honourable sponsor of the bill has told us, this is an urgent matter. He says it is not very consequential as far as we are concerned, but it would have serious consequences, if it were not passed. He also told us that the bill went through the other place in about seven minutes. This illustrates the necessity—and necessity is a hard master—and also that when something has to be done quickly, Parliament can move fast.

The Government undoubtedly was in some difficulty. The original bill required that the house deal with objections to boundary alterations, put forth by the Members of Parliament, within 15 calendar days from last Friday. This imposed a hardship on the Government, as it left insufficient time for approval and passage of spending estimates, which meant that the Government could find itself without funds. That is why I say that failure to pass this bill could be very consequential.

In my opinion, this is not altogether a complimentary commentary on the manner in which the Government has been handling the organization of its house business. We cannot blame it altogether on the Estimates. It was an unfortunate and embarrassing situation for the Government. This bill will change section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, by increasing the period of 15 calendar days to 45 sitting days, and that will give sufficient time to enable the spending estimates to be passed. It therefore gives a very necessary breathing space to the Government.

So as to avoid the possibility of undesirable and embarrassing consequences which necessitated this amendment, I assure you that we on this side of the house have no objection to the bill being given second and third readings and being passed today. We hope that this will have the desired results.

I might point out that the extension to 45 days makes very little difference as far as the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act is concerned. Redistribution is overdue by about four years or more and a few days longer will not hurt one way or another. We will co-operate in every way in the passage of the bill.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I ask permission to read the names of 33 counties which will disappear if the proposals of the Quebec commission is adopted:

Arthabaska—

Sir Wilfrid's county.

Bagot, Chateauguay—

The name of a remarkable victory over the Americans, if you so think.

Compton, Deux-Montagnes, Dorchester, Huntingdon, Iberville, Iles-de-la-Madeleine, Jacques-Cartier—

The name of the discoverer of New France, but apparently it was a hyphenated name.

L'Assomption, L'Islet, Maskinongé, Matapedia, Mégantic, Montcalm, Montmagny, Montréal-St-Henri, Napierville, Nicolet, Québec-Centre, Québec-Comte, Québec-Est—

The county of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mr. Lapointe and Mr. St. Laurent, which is also very well represented now in the House of Commons.

Quebec-Ouest, Rivière-du-Loup—

You must know about that great river and the city.

Rouville, Saguenay, St-Jean, Soulanges, Verchères, St-George, Wolfe, Yamaska.

All these names have now been struck out by the commission.

Honourable senators, so that you will not have to listen too long to my remarks, I would ask for your unanimous consent to table a Canadian Press dispatch dated August 26, 1965, entitled "Senator charges 'bungling' in electoral redistribution." With your permission I will place it on Hansard.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you. I have a further request to make, and I do so also in the interest of saving time. Again, I ask for your unanimous consent to table three articles which appeared in the Rivière-du-Loup weekly, Le Saint-Laurent, the first of which is entitled "The Folly of the New Wave"; the second of which bears the heading, "Quebec disfigured by the Langlois Commission", and the third one, which is rather snappy, is entitled "The rage to destroy everything". If you have the time to glance over these articles you will learn of some of the difficulties we have had.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

For text of newspaper articles, see Appendix, pp. 179-84

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I would also add that in my view it is a very serious mistake for the House of Commons to abdicate its rights, and for the members of that house not to decide what in fact is their own business, the establishment of county boundaries. I am sure that the representatives of all political parties and groups in that house could come to some arrangement. It has been done for nearly a century, and I feel it should still be possible for them to come to a compromise regarding the establishment of these boundaries. The results may not be perfect, but what is done by members who know their constituencies is much better than what can be done by judges who know nothing about them.

With your permission, I would cite a personal experience. I had to go to the town of Rimouski to appear before the Langlois Commission, and there I saw a stubborn chairman who would not listen to anyone. I was representing, as a friend, the county council of Rivière-du-Loup, and everybody was treated in a manner far removed from the rules of etiquette and fair play. Finally, when my turn came I told the Commissioner,

"I do not know you, but I have known your father who was my colleague in the House of Commons for four years. He was a notary public and a perfect gentleman; if he had lived to see you today he would be discouraged and he would deny you." I had to use strong language. It was very effective; afterwards I could speak as much as I wanted to.

The point I want to stress is that sometimes there are judges and chief justices who cry for respect for the Bench. I will comment upon that by repeating what was said by a student to a regent. The regent had said to the class, "You should respect me," and one boy answered back, "Won't you start by respecting yourself?"

It is very dangerous to impose upon judges this type of work that the commissions have done so badly, according to the countless complaints that appear in the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons. I shall not speak further, and I thank you very warmly for giving your unanimous consent for the tabling of these papers.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Honourable senators, I do not rise to withhold unanimous consent, but merely to ask the honourable acting leader, who introduced the bill, what exactly he meant by saying that the Government is desperately trying to do certain things. Would he be good enough to explain that?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Did I use the word "desperately"? My understanding is that the House of Commons is trying to get through the estimates for the current year before the end of the current year, and that being the case, and the debates continuing in the house for several days, they just do not have the time to consider these criticisms of the report of the various provincial commissions. That is the only reason. No doubt, when this original section 20 was passed last year it was not contemplated that the condition of the House of Commons would be such that this period of 15 days could not be complied with.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Will the honourable gentleman tell me what are the conditions in the House of Commons at the present time which make him use the word "desperately"?

Hon. Mr. Croll: It is merely a picturesque description.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I asked the sponsor of the bill, not Senator Croll.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I am not sure that I used the word "desperately." If I did it was perhaps a picturesque way of saying that the House of Commons is trying to get through the estimates and is finding that the time at its disposal before the end of the fiscal year is presenting a problem.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Honourable senators, I am not rising to object to Senator Pouliot being given unanimous consent to place certain articles on the record, but I understand that any objections to be made to the boundaries of constituencies are to be made by Members of Parliament and they are to be heard within this time limit mentioned in the bill. Senator Pouliot's request that these objections should go on our records does not seem to me to be altogether appropriate. I think the Members of Parliament individually are supposed to take exception to the boundaries under the act. I may be wrong.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 9, consideration of the final report of the Special Committee on Aging.

Hon. Josie D. Quart: Honourable senators, may I deviate from the usual procedure and express my congratulations at this time rather than wait until I participate in the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. In doing so, I follow the slogan: "Why wait for spring—do it now."

My first words are those of pride that once again His Excellency the Governor General and Madame Vanier presided in such a gracious manner at the opening of the Twenty-seventh Parliament. Who could fail to be impressed by the eloquent manner in which Canada's great hero of two world wars read the Speech from the Throne, His Excellency's perfect bilingualism symbolizing the two great cultures of Canada.

May I associate myself with the many honourable senators who have paid such glowing tributes to our distinguished colleagues who have passed on to their eternal reward. To their families I offer my deepest sympathy.

It is with sadness that I refer to the honourable senators who have resigned through age or illness. They will live on in our memory.

Now, for a joyful change of mood. I take great pleasure in joining the chorus of praise from both sides of this chamber and in echoing congratulations to our honourable distinguished Speaker. I wish him health and happiness in presiding over our deliberations, and trust his duties will not be too arduous in maintaining order. Mr. Speaker is very fortunate in having such a charming wife to assist him with his social obligations. Perhaps we should call Mrs. Smith the Perle Mesta of Canada—"the hostess with the mostest."

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Quart: Since the opening of the session we have missed the genial Leader of the Government, Senator John J. Connolly, and I was overjoyed, as we all were, to learn that Senator Connolly has now recovered sufficiently to be basking in the southern sun; and, after some toasting and roasting, he should soon be back again with us, looking hale and hearty.

To Senator Hugessen, who has taken on the heavy duties of deputy leader, I wish every success in his new role. Maybe I should not congratulate him, as Senator Pouliot has said, but you, Senator Hugessen, have both my congratulations and sympathy.

[Translation]

To Senator Vaillancourt, former Deputy Leader of the Senate, may I say that I hope he will be with us for many years.

[Text]

The leaders of our little band, Senator Brooks, and our deputy leader Senator Choquette, seem in fine fettle, and with their wide parliamentary experience they have already given tangible proof that they are on the alert to provide constructive criticism when necessary to improve Government legislation.

My next task is particularly pleasant. It is to congratulate most heartily Senator A. Hamilton McDonald, as mover of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Although a novice in our midst, he performed like a seasoned veteran.

[Translation]

I also wish to take this opportunity to congratulate our distinguished colleague, Senator Gouin, for his speech in support of the motion. It is always a pleasure to hear him, regardless of the matter under discussion.

[Text]

And last but far from least, it is a great pleasure to welcome our other new colleague, Senator Benidickson.

Honourable senators, although I know Senator Croll objects to further complimentary remarks, I must disobey him and congratulate him on the excellent summary of the highlights of the report he tabled on February 3. It covered almost all aspects of what could and should be done for Canada's senior citizens. There is really little that I could add without resorting to useless repetition to further endorse what the other speakers have said in favour of the report, and of the hard work, ability, and devotion of the chairman and the members of the committee, as well as the well-merited praise for Mr. R. E. G. Davis and his staff who assisted him in the preparation of the report.

As a member of the steering committee, I enter this debate with pride and gratitude that the report has been so favourably received. I feel privileged to have served on this committee with the other distinguished senators, under the capable chairmanship of Senator Croll, with Senator Haig as vice-chairman. It was a wonderful experience and it was most gratifying to read the flattering editorials which appeared in the newspapers across Canada. The Senate is not always so fortunate. Take this headline by Christopher Young in the Ottawa Citizen: "The senators show us how." I shall not read the long article but merely quote a few paragraphs:

> As Senator David Croll, the chairman of the committee, proudly said, the proposal breaks new ground. "It's a new approach, and it could well be adopted by government and perhaps lead to a new concept for the second half of this century."
> The Croll committee's proposal brings a decent income for the aged within the realm of financial practicality. It suggests that every single person over 65 be guaranteed at least $105 a month and every married couple $185. For every person or couple whose income falls below these floors, the government would fill the gap on the basis of a simple income declaration form.
> It is estimated that the plan would cost the federal treasury about $100 million a year, an amount that the country could afford...
> Among other things, the Croll committee's report triumphantly demonstrates to many doubters, including this one—

And, remember, I am not the one; this is Christopher Young speaking—

> —that the Senate still has a constructive function to perform when it has a mind to try.

Then this one from the Ottawa Journal under the headline: "Aged need planning as much as money." Again I shall read but a few paragraphs of this complimentary article:

> The Senate committee have chosen to give pride of place to their recommendation for a guaranteed income of $1,260 ($2,220 for a married couple) annually for all Canadians at 65.
>
> Actually the Senate inquiry, as might be expected, has produced far more than this simple—and expensive—proposal.
> Quite as important as the recommendation for minimum income is the advocacy of a national council on social research. The committee found 'a woeful lack of statistical information' and concluded that programs of financial support and care of older people, involving large commitments of public funds, were established with no evaluation of merit or the needs and wishes of the elderly.
> In addition to research on the aging by such a national council, the committee urged a national commission on the aging to co-ordinate planning. The committee found ad hoc programs today are misdirecting energy, being carried on with no regard to priority, standards or the wise use of scarce resources.
>
> These are sharp criticisms. To increase outlays on the aged by $100,000,000 without ensuring research and planning would not achieve the main purpose well stated by the committee. That is to allow the elderly to 'keep the image they have earned in their prime'.

And the article concludes as follows:

> The report gives an insight into the necessity of research and planning. It will be unfortunate if the impression grows that only money is required to improve the lot of senior Canadians.

In voicing my approval of the report, I feel confident that if a national council or a national commission on aging were set up it would make full use of its members and would, I hope, include volunteers to explore the angles involved in the promotion of Canada's aging citizens, particularly of those who find themselves in ill-health, financial or other difficulties or those merely alone or lonely; for although an adequate income is an important aspect which cannot be overlooked, money alone is not sufficient to assure a happy and useful old age.

Someone has said that all generalizations are false, including this one:

> . . . that only those senior citizens with low incomes are lonely—those with money can buy companionship and happiness.

Many problems other than money depend upon how people accept old age. There is the lowered status of the retired person in a work-oriented society, the loss of the friendly associations of work, the loss of a lifetime partner, loneliness, boredom, depression at the death of friends, ill-health and the deteriorating family relationships.

In my opinion, a major challenge facing old people these days is the callous attitude of modern society to old age. Millions of older women and men are haunted by many fears and anxieties which they keep to themselves, and ponder and worry about. Older people have a tendency to exaggerate slights, and to expect frequent visits from their family. When disappointed, resentment and a feeling of neglect set in; that they are unwanted becomes an obsession, and they bemoan the ingratitude of their family.

The world is different today from what it was, say, 50 years ago. Their memories of better days linger on. But this type of dismal thinking is most depressing. Older people should remember that life cannot hurt you unless you expect more from others than they are capable of giving. These characteristics of old age can be lessened by companionship of others in the same age group. Distraction, recreation and hobbies which are part of the programs of Golden Age clubs for senior citizens, help chase away their blues. Older people then take on a new lease of life due to a renewed interest in people and things.

It is said that the vital secret of happiness in old age is to keep moving; and, one might add, to keep thinking and working at something purposeful.

A few months ago Senator Sullivan pointed out, in an excellent speech, that "The mind need not age and all the experience of past years need not be fruitless."

Dr. Wilder Penfield says:

> Toward the close of life there is some misconception of the capacity of the human brain. Rest is not what the brain needs most at 60 or 65—it is a challenge. Aside from the normal rhythm of sleep, too much rest destroys the brain and even destroys the health in time.

Well, that is the time when clubs and activities for aging citizens fill a much-needed want. In these clubs for the aged, our elderly citizens are taught to forget the words 'retirement' and 'leisure' and to work at something to develop their talents and hobbies, to take up new careers, and make new friends among the members of the retired society.

Old age is of interest to everyone. We cannot dodge it if we live long enough. Old persons have a direct appeal to most volunteers, and great credit is due the volunteers who have organized clubs for senior citizens and who render invaluable services to help staff institutions for older men and women. They teach senior citizens handicrafts, take them out for motor drives, play games with them and conduct all these activities to keep the older persons active and interested in life.

Considerable funds have been raised by many voluntary national associations to furnish institutions with equipment, libraries and other comforts for the older folk and above all to make them feel they are remembered and not just discarded citizens. But voluntary groups alone cannot raise sufficient money or supply trained staff to enable them to provide the necessary leadership for a nation-wide program.

However, the briefs presented to our committee by voluntary groups throughout Canada expressed their willingness to recruit volunteers as required in co-operation with local welfare councils in the cities or municipalities which are appointed by the federal or provincial governments to co-ordinate the services of the various organizations and to direct their efforts.

Before concluding, I would like to suggest to the directors of Expo '67 that they have a Senior Citizens' Day to honour their contribution to Canada over the past 100 years. At the World's Fair in New York there was a pavilion called Dynamic Maturity, which was an on-the-site service and hospitality centre for older visitors. That was the only World's Fair pavilion to dedicate itself wholly to the needs and interests of older persons. A tour-service desk was installed at the pavilion to accommodate older people, and to provide information on exhibits of particular interest to older persons and to explain to them how to visit the fair without over-exertion.

Perhaps a small space could be found in Canada's pavilion to provide a few comfortable chairs and an information or hospitality service, which could be staffed by volunteers without any additional expense.

In New York there was also an international hospitality program, where older visitors from foreign countries registered if they wished to avail themselves of the hospitality of older Americans in the metropolitan area of New York. Perhaps the so-called Mothers of Confederation Pageant—they call themselves the Ladies of the Provinces—could be featured as a special attraction for a Senior Citizens' Day.

This group of 24 ladies, gowned in authentic Confederation costumes of 1867, represent the wives of the Fathers of Confederation. They made a great hit at the Charlottetown's Centennial pageant in 1964. What about these suggestions, Mr. Expo '67?

I wonder how many honourable senators saw the page in the Globe and Mail of February 9 entitled "Age and Criticism do not weary them," showing the pictures of seven of our distinguished senators from 75 to 88 years of age. I am sure Senator Roebuck saw it, because he is smiling broadly. They all looked wonderful and their quotes were priceless. After seeing it I concluded that instead of being referred to as the most exclusive club in Canada, the Senate should be called The Evergreen Club where, like the evergreens, the older senators never fade but just pass away.

Finally, to end my rambling remarks, I would like to read a clipping I received from a friend in Toronto. I presume it is from a Toronto newspaper:

> Some people begin to fear death at 30. That is the beginning of old age. Some people are still kicking up their heels at 90. They never grow old. Theirs is the ultimate wisdom.
> I knew a cranky woman of 30 who put a dead hand on everything she touched. I knew a man of 70 who loved the outdoors, simple folk, good talk, cigars, whisky and women—in that order. He said he wanted to die with his boots on.
>
> There isn't a livelier bunch in town than some of the folk at the Jewish Home for the Aged on Bathurst St. They're really swingers. They're not going to be left out of any of the new trends, dance steps, customs.
>
> They're putting on a spring fashion show next Friday. Two married couples are among the models—Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Gershkovitch, aged 90 and 83; Mr. and Mrs. Max Smith, 80 and 76, Mrs. Zirla Halman, 97, is also modeling.
>
> Their dance club does the monkey, the watusi, the frug and the hula. They danced the hula in grass skirts at a party given for a resident who went to Hawaii to visit his son.
> They ought to try a pop festival.

Honourable senators, how many of the problems of our older citizens can we remedy? And how effective will our 92 recommendations be in speeding up the necessary legislation? It will be up to you, Senator Croll, and the members of our committee who have influence with the Government, to keep pushing.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McGrand, debate adjourned.

MILLTOWN BRIDGE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Nelson Rattenbury moved the second reading of Bill S-15, to authorize the construction of a bridge across the St. Croix River between the Province of New Brunswick and the State of Maine.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a bill to authorize the construction of an international bridge over the St. Croix River, which forms part of the boundary between the State of Maine and the Province of New Brunswick.

The bridge will replace an old structure, long past its usefulness, between Milltown in New Brunswick and Calais in the State of Maine. It will be an international bridge, it will be toll free and it will be constructed, operated and maintained by the Province of New Brunswick and the State of Maine. Each government will pay half the cost of the structure. The cost of the approaches and the preparatory work on either side of the bridge will be borne, within their own boundaries, by the governments of the State of Maine and the Province of New Brunswick. I might add that the federal Government will assume no financial responsibility.

Federal authorization is required because the bridge is an international structure. The bill is modelled on earlier Acts of Parliament authorizing the construction of international bridges in similar circumstances. At an appropriate time it is expected that notes will be exchanged between the governments of Canada and the United States covering the international aspects of the arrangement being made for the construction of the bridge.

The Government of New Brunswick is anxious to proceed with the construction as soon as passage of the bill is obtained. As I mentioned earlier, the present bridge is outmoded and has long outlived its usefulness. I understand that this is the only step remaining to be taken before construction of the bridge. It seems important to accommodate the province as soon as possible, particularly since the federal Government has declined to share in the cost of construction.

It may help honourable senators if I go through the bill quickly, explaining it clause by clause. Clauses 1 and 2 are self explanatory.

Clause 3 permits the province to construct, operate and maintain a toll free bridge in co-operation with the State of Maine.

Clause 4(1) states that the bridge is to be constructed in accordance with such regulations as will safeguard navigation, as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council. So that the nature of the project may be fully understood, the province is to submit to the Governor in Council full details as to drawings, and a map of the proposed location. I understand the province has already provided this material which, subject to passage of this bill, has been found acceptable. Subclause (2) is self explanatory.

Clause 5 is the customary clause in such bills of an international nature, requiring that 50 per cent of the materials and labour be Canadian.

Clause 6 would prevent the province from assigning the powers described in clause 3, without the approval of the Governor in Council. For example, if the province were to assign its powers to a private party, this provision would allow the federal Government to impose whatever additional conditions were deemed desirable under these circumstances.

This bill is of considerable local interest. My colleague from New Brunswick, Senator McLean, knows personally the provisions of the bill and the conditions under which the residents of that area have had to live for some years. For example, when a fire occurred on the American side a few years ago, the fire department on this side wished to assist but could not do so, with the result that four lives were lost.

I trust there will be no difficulty in having the bill passed.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I wish to congratulate honourable Senator Rattenbury on his explanation of the bill to construct a bridge across the St. Croix River. This construction is not only very necessary, as he has said, but the river itself is most historic. It was one of the first discoveries of Champlain, who spent his first winter in America on Dochet's Island in the St. Croix River. The people of New Brunswick have long felt, and still feel, they would like to own this island as a monument to Champlain and his early discovery of the river.

The honourable sponsor of the bill has told us that the federal Government is undertaking no financial obligation for this bridge. As it will be an international bridge, I am rather surprised that the Government of New Brunswick has not asked for some assistance. Some years ago a bridge was constructed between Lubec, Maine, and Campobello Island, and at that time the federal Government paid three-quarters of the cost. It was a different situation there, however, as the federal Government had been operating a ferry service for many years.

Another aspect of the bill, as was pointed out, is that New Brunswick is to provide 50 per cent of the labour and 50 per cent of the cost of material. The federal Government is interested because it is concerned with all international bridges, and all bridges over navigable rivers, as it has the responsibility of ensuring that the bridge is so constructed that navigation is not hindered in any way.

There is a great need for this bridge. The present structure is very old, as I know from being in that area many times myself. I also know that the traffic on the bridge between St. Stephen and Calais is becoming more dense each year, and a new bridge at Milltown is certainly needed. I see no reason for objecting in any way to this bill.

Hon. A. Neil McLean: Honourable senators, I represent that part of the country and I am familiar with the need for this bridge. The present bridge is an old one and is tumbling down. Therefore, I concur in what has been said by Senator Rattenbury and Senator Brooks.

This legislation has had a long struggle in that it had to be passed by the Assembly of the State of Maine, and then by the Legislature of New Brunswick, and I understand it also had to be assented to in Washington. It has taken three years to reach its present stage. It comes within the jurisdiction of the federal Government because Maine and New Brunswick, not being sovereign states, cannot enter into agreements on such matters. However, the federal Government is not being asked to put up any money; this is being provided by the State of Maine and by the Province of New Brunswick.

It is quite true that a fire truck cannot cross the existing bridge. We have had a number of fires in New Brunswick and in Maine in the last year or two, and I have no doubt that if a fire truck could have crossed that bridge many lives could have been saved. I hope this bill will be passed as soon as possible so as to enable the building of the bridge to commence at an early date.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: Next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: If any honourable senator wishes this bill to be considered in committee, this would be the time to refer it there, would it not?

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: Honourable senators, I was hoping, because of the need for expedition, that the bill would not be referred to committee, but if any honourable senator wishes this course to be followed I would be happy to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Since this matter could be dealt with in committee within a very short time, and since three years have already passed since this project first came up for discussion, I think it would be better if it were referred to committee.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: As chairman of that committee I can assure my honourable friend that it would be disposed of within the next week, or as soon as the proponents are here.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: I move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Honourable senators, as there will be Royal Assent later this afternoon, I move that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 5.40 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators, I would like to remind you that the Standing Committee on Finance will sit immediately. The witness will be the Honourable Jean Marchand, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who is to be Minister of the Department of Manpower when it is set up. He was to have been here tomorrow morning but he has to leave for Quebec City. For that reason the Finance Committee will meet to hear him now. He will be accompanied by officials of his present department and others from the Department of Labour. The committee will meet again at 9.30 tomorrow morning when these officials will again attend.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Robert Taschereau, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bill:

> An Act to extend the time for consideration of objections pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act with respect to the reports of commissions established for the decennial census taken in the year 1961.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

NEWSPAPER ARTICLES TABLED BY HONOURABLE JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT

SENATOR CHARGES 'BUNGLING' IN ELECTORAL REDISTRIBUTION

Ottawa (CP)—An indignant senator, who had more than 30 years experience in the Commons before spending the past 10 years in the upper house, said Wednesday the new electoral maps drawn by 10 quasi-judicial commissions should be scrapped.

Senator Jean-François Pouliot said the new maps, particularly the one prepared for his native Quebec province, represent socialistic bungling, wipe out historic landmarks and have no co-ordination.

He said in an interview that rather than write the proposed electoral maps into law this winter, Parliament should throw aside the work of the redistribution commissions and revert to the old practice of having the maps prepared by a committee of MPs.

"It's disparaging to the members' knowledge of their own constituencies to turn the job over to these commissioners. It makes MPs out to be dunces. And the commissioners are, oh, so infallible-Jehovahs and Solomons rolled into one. Like the Queen, they can do no wrong."

Chief points of complaint that raised the senator's ire were changes in the electoral map affecting his old Commons constituency of Temiscouata and neighboring ridings and changes in the names of ridings in the Quebec City district.

The Quebec Commission headed by Mr. Justice Paul Langlois of the Superior Court drew the lines of the new constituency of Temiscouata in such a way that the old ridings' principal community, Rivière-du-Loup, now falls in neighboring Kamouraska.

But what is worse, the new map drops historic Quebec names and substitutes others, Senator Pouliot complained.

Gone are de la Naudiere, Madeleine de Vercheres' married name; Compton, the birthplace of Louis St. Laurent; Arthabaska, where the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier began his career; and both Wolfe and Montcalm.

New names on the map include Duvernay, the founder of the St. Jean Baptiste Societies, and Limoilou, the hamlet near St. Malo in Britanny where discoverer Jacques Cartier was born.

Don't Mention Quebec

And what the senator found even more upsetting, the new maps do not include the name of Quebec itself, anywhere. Gone are the old ridings of Quebec East, Quebec West, and Quebec South.

In their places are the names of Louis Hebert, the first Quebec farmer, and Langelier, a lieutenant-governor. Both have already been honored by having Quebec streets named after them.

What Senator Pouliot suggests is naming the three Quebec City ridings Abraham, Tresor and Sault-au-Matelot. Abraham would be named after Abraham Martin, a son-in-law of Louis Hebert from whom the Plains of Abraham got their name.

The Winnipeg Tribune, Thurs., Aug. 26, 1965.

THE 1965 REDISTRIBUTION—THE MADNESS OF THE NEW WAVE

by Jean-François Pouliot

The madness of the new wave is characterized by two well known symptoms, the desire for change and the rage to destroy everything.

Electoral redistribution is simply a readjustment of the limits of the ridings so that they may be represented as fairly as possible in the Parliament of Canada.

According to the statistics of the last census taken in 1961, on which redistribution is based, the population of the eastern section of the province of Quebec, from Levis to Gaspé, with the islands in the gulf of St. Lawrence, amounts to 478,842 and is divided in ten ridings. Here is the list with each riding's population.

(1) Magdalen Islands, 12,479; (2) Bonaventure, 42,962; (3) Gaspe (without Magdalen Islands), 61,862, Gaspe East, 41,333; Gaspe West, 20,529; (4) Matapedia-Matane, 70,664;

Matapedia, 35,586; Matane, 35,078; (5) Rimouski 65,295; (6) Riviere-du-Loup-Temiscouata, 69,318; Riviere-du-Loup, 40,239; Temiscouata, 29,979; (7) Kamouraska, 27,138; (8) Montmagny-L'Islet, 51,248; Montmagny, 26,450; L'Islet, 24,798; (9) Bellechasse, 26,054; (10) Levis, 51,842; Total 478,842.

The average representation would therefore be 47,884 for each of these ten ridings.

The population of four ridings is lower than the average. (Magdalen Islands, Bellechasse, Kamouraska and Bonaventure). To reduce the number of ridings in that region from ten to eight, and to increase the average population in each to 59,855, it would be enough first of all to join Magdalen Islands to Bonaventure, Kamouraska to L'Islet and Montmagny to Bellechasse, which would give the following result:

(1) Bonaventure (with Magdalen Islands), no change, 55,441; (2) Gaspe East and West (without Magdalen Islands), no change, 61,-862; (3) Matapedia-Matane, no change, 70,664; (4) Rimouski, no change, 65,295; (5) Riviere-du-Loup-Temiscouata, no change, 69,-318; (6) Kamouraska-L'Islet, Union of neighboring ridings, 51,936; (7) Montmagny-Bellechasse, Union of neighbouring ridings, no other change, 52,504; (8) Levis, no change, 51,842. Total 478,842.

It is obvious that joining Kamouraska and L'Islet and Montmagny and Bellechasse make much more sense than joining Montmagny and L'Islet with the two little neighbouring counties of Kamouraska and Bellechasse, provided, however, that nothing is changed in these constituencies before they are grouped together.

If the Commission had wanted to, it could easily have carried out its work without offending everyone. It would only have had to consult with the persons involved before designing its puzzle.

To hasten to complete anything without first seeking to know how is, to say the least, rather peculiar. If the same thing happens again, it deserves another epithet.

CHANGE FOR THE SAKE OF CHANGE

The spirit of the law concerning electoral redistribution was never to jettison everything. The only purpose of the act is to fix the number of members representing a given region.

The territory from Levis to Gaspe, including the islands in the St. Lawrence River and in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, is very representative. It now has ten members. It is proposed to reduce that number to eight, which would seem reasonable for a population of almost half a million.

To have a fair appreciation of a working method, it is not enough to take an isolated case at random; it must be considered as a whole. The official statistics of the 1961 census and of the proposed redistribution of 1965 are also significant. By comparing them, one finds the extent of nonsense of the project of the Langlois Commission.

Indeed, what should we think of anybody proceeding blindly to reduce every constituency at one end and enlarging it at the other end?

Complication without rhyme or reason of the simplest things shows a disquieting deformation of mind, does it not?

Bonaventure (without islands) would reach 58,012 from 42,962. Amqui and ten other important municipalities of the Valley (19,074) would be separated from Matapedia-Matane and added to Bonaventure. On the other hand, Port Daniel and l'Anse aux Gascons (4,024) would be taken away from Bonaventure and added to Gaspe.

Gaspe (including the islands)

Notwithstanding the annexation of Magdalen islands (12,479), Gaspe would be reduced from 74,341 to 54,180.

All Gaspe West, including Murdochville (20,529) and three municipalities in Gaspe East (3,220), would be detached from Gaspe to be added to Matapedia-Matane. On the other hand, Port Daniel and L'Anse aux Gascons (4,024) would be taken from Bonaventure to be annexed to Gaspe.

Matapedia-Matane (including large slice of Gaspe, but almost without Matapedia.

The Commission proposes to take 23,749 from Gaspe to add them to Matapedia-Matane and on the other hand, to take from Matapedia-Matane (1) Amqui and the ten other municipalities mentioned above (19,074) and to add them to Bonaventure, and (2) fifteen other municipalities (17,914) to add them to Rimouski. In summary: added: 23,749; deducted: 37,783. Matapedia-Matane would be reduced from 70,644 to 57,770.

Rimouski

On the other hand, Rimouski would be increased from 65,295 to 70,165. Fifteen municipalities from Matapedia-Matane (17,-914) added to Rimouski; ten municipalities (10,396) taken from Rimouski to be added to Temiscouata.

Rivière Du Loup–Témiscouata (not including the city or the name of Riviere du Loup)

Population reduced from 69,318 to 67,633. Area increased to the East by ten municipalities (10,396) taken from Rimouski. That number is almost identical with the population of Riviere du Loup city which, contrary to most elementary common sense, would be detached and separated from the county bearing its name, with three other neighbour communities (14,816) to be annexed to Kamouraska.

Kamouraska-L'islet

The population of those two counties together would increase from 51,936 to 67,911 following the annexation of the vital part of Riviere du Loup-Temiscouata (14,816) and of St. Apolline, which would be taken away from the former Montmagny county.

Montmagny-Bellechasse

The population of those counties together would increase from 52,504 to 68,432. St. Apolline would be deducted (1,159) in order to add twelve municipalities from Dorchester (17,087).

LEVIS

Increase from 51,842 to 70,196, with the annexation of ten municipalities from Dorchester (9,468) and ten municipalities from Lotbiniere (8,886). The total population of those twenty towns added to Levis is 18,354.

Neither Dorchester nor Lotbiniere were ever considered as lower St. Lawrence counties because they are in the central Quebec district.

In conclusion, was it necessary to take away 91,927, add 127,362 and dissatisfy the whole population of 478,842 in order to reduce from ten to eight the number of lower St. Lawrence counties, from Levis to Gaspe?

The redistribution made by the Langlois Commission in our area gives a good idea of the mess it made throughout the province of Quebec.

THE 1965 REDISTRIBUTION—QUEBEC DISFIGURED BY THE LANGLOIS COMMISSION

by Jean François Pouliot

The difficulties made up by the Langlois Commission result from the fact that the federal constituencies would not be completely superimposed on the provincial constituencies, so that the boundaries of the latter and the former would be identical, and also from the fact that it proposed to remove the names of 33 provincial constituencies from the designation of federal ridings. It completely overlooked the community of interests, both from the federal and the provincial point of view, of the entire population comprised within the limits of every riding.

As we have shown when reducing from ten to eight the number of ridings in eastern Quebec, from Lévis to Gaspé and the Îles-de-la-Madeleine, there is no need to know the law nor the case-laws by heart. It is not a point of law, it is simply a matter of common sense. Any schoolboy in primary school, with an average I.Q. but an open mind, who would know the four simple rules and a few elementary notions of geography, would have no trouble to understand that, in any field, it is important to avoid any needless trouble to anyone and that, in the present case, it is desirable to annex the smallest riding of the province, if not of the whole country, to the least populous of the seven other ridings of our area. The union of the Îles-de-la-Madeleine to Bonaventure is essential.

Between Rivière - du - Loup – Témiscouata, there are four small ridings whose population adds up to half the average of the others. There is no need to be as wise as King Solomon to realize that Kamouraska should be annexed to L'Islet and Bellechasse to Montmagny, but completely, that is, without changing the boundaries of any provincial riding in redistributing federal constituencies.

Instead, the Langlois commission, without consulting the parties concerned, changed all the riding limits, east and west of every riding, with the result that unanimous protests arose.

Mr. Olivier Gagnon, chairman of the Chamber of Commerce of Gaspé-Nord claimed that the new electoral boundaries set up by the Langlois Commission endangers the economic unity of the Gaspé area—Mr. Wilbrod Bérubé, chairman of the Chamber of Commerce of Port-Daniel stated that Port-Daniel wants to remain in the riding of Bonaventure for social and economic reasons.

Those are the reasons which were put forth by many personalities of Gaspé, Bonaventure, Matapédia-Mantane, Rimouski, Rivière-du-Loup-Témiscouata and Montmagny-L'Islet in protest against the proposals of the Langlois commission.

Mr. Philippe Michaud, on behalf of the Lower St. Lawrence Chamber of Commerce, stated that villages which are economically interrelated should remain so at the level of the riding.

Speaking for the Liberal Women of Matapédia-Matane, Mrs. Benoît Bérubé, of Amqui, said that the population of the riding objects to the new electoral map suggested by the Langlois commission which completely eliminates the riding of Matapédia.

Mr. Jean-Paul Légaré presented a new electoral map. Mr. Jean Ménard, speaking for the Rimouski Chamber of Commerce, recommended that Rimouski remain the hub of the riding and that the latter include the towns of Mont-Joli and Trois-Pistoles. Mr. Félix Gagnon, his son Marcel, Mr. Théodore Sirois and many others spoke along the same lines.

But the chairman of the commission was mostly against Mr. Beauvais Bérubé, who submitted an excellent brief from the Chamber of Commerce of Rivière-du-Loup, and against my learned colleague, Mr. Antonio Dubé, barrister, who represented the city of Rivière-du-Loup. We had been told that during the Quebec meeting he had constantly interrupted the objectors from Montmagny, L'Islet, and we saw that he was not well disposed towards the city of Rivière-du-Loup. Mr. Bérubé and Mr. Dubé advanced excellent arguments but Mr. Langlois would not listen to reason.

Many well-known people were present, such as Mayor Rosaire Gendron, M.P., Mr. Gérard Chouinard, reeve, and Mr. Paul-Emile Roy, secretary-treasurer of the county of Rivière-du-Loup, Captain Louis-C. Rioux, from the village of Isle-Verte, Mr. Réal Dubé, mayor of St-Antonin, Mr. Jean-Léon Marquis and alderman Bossinotte, of Rivière-du-Loup, Mr. Edmond Plourde, who represented the Société St-Jean Baptiste of Rivière-du-Loup and many others.

After reading the letters and resolutions of protest sent by all the municipalities of the riding of Rivière-du-Loup-Témiscouata, and to prevent the chairman from interrupting, I had to resort to exceptional measures and tell him that I had known his father well as he had been my colleague in Parliament for four years, and that I remembered him as a perfect gentleman; and I added: "If your late father were still with us he would feel very discouraged with you." I could say that because of my white hair.

After that, I was able to put freely to the commission the arguments set out in the three previous articles to prove that the report of the Langlois commission should be drafted again from A to Z, that is from Gaspé to Témiscamingue.

In this matter of redistribution, it is painful to notice that there has been no co-ordination between the Province of Quebec and its sister provinces. For instance, in all the provinces, at least two ridings bear the name of the provincial capital. It is a shame that the name of Quebec City, the cradle of our civilization, should be erased from the federal electoral map.

In all the other provinces, federal ridings have compound names made up of two or three provincial ridings. The Langlois commission wants to remove from the federal electoral map the names of 33 provincial ridings. If the plan of the Langlois Commission were approved by Parliament, we would have reason to say that Quebec is not a province like the others.

In a recent report, Chief Justice Frédéric Dorion suggested an amendment to the Investigations Act to give investigating commissioners the right to apply the rule of contempt of court.

Being aware of the facts that we drew to his attention, does not the reader of these four articles come to the conclusion that it would be much simpler and more practical to repeal the Investigations Act and to have these investigations carried out by parliament itself, as it is one of its primary responsibilities?

I do not know any single Member of Parliament who would have submitted a report as absurd as that of the Langlois Commission. Let us hope that the Government will realize this and act accordingly, after an experience which was as unfortunate as it was unpopular; let us hope that it will resume the custom of relying on parliamentarians for the redistribution of federal constituencies. P.S. For those who deliberately refuse to face facts and who keep criticizing: The official 1961 census statistics on the population of each municipality are the same in all publications of the federal Government. Obviously, they are also the same of course for provincial counties and federal constituencies.

The federal redistribution is based on these data.

THE RAGE TO DESTROY EVERYTHING
Redistribution in 1965 by Jean-François Pouliot

This article is the third of a series of four on the current redistribution of federal ridings. The first, entitled "Figures speak" gave the facts with regard to the ten ridings in the eastern region of the Province of Quebec, which are to be reduced to eight; the second, entitled "The madness of the new wave", was meant for those who did not care and those who had not understood; in this one, it will be necessary to cross the t's and dot the i's, because it is specially meant for the few who do not want to understand or admit anything. The only thing left after that will be to draw our conclusions.

Answer to two good questions:

We have been asked: Where do you get your figures? Answer: In official publications only, in the Canada Gazette, published by the Queen's Printer, and Bulletin 92-526 of the census of Canada (1961), which gives the population for each riding and each municipality in the country. The publication of that document was authorized by the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself. Of course, to understand the scope of the report of the redistribution commission, it is necessary to analyze all the figures and compare them, as we did.

Another question: By comparing so many figures, what are you driving at? Answer: The first paragraph of the first article contained the following sentence: We will see if the redistribution commission does a better job than the members. That is why the procedure followed by the commission was explained in great detail, so that you might base your opinion on hard facts. Personally, we feel that each member knows his riding better than a commissioner living in Montreal can know each of the 75 ridings of the Province of Quebec, even if he spends the summer at Trois-Pistoles.

We hope the Government will see that the proposals of the commission are not acceptable and will have enough common sense to resort to a parliamentary committee which will do a better job. It would only have to repeal the present act and to revive the previous legislation.

Redistribution commissions.

The 1964 act provides for the setting up of ten commissions, one for each province. "Each commission for a province shall consist of four members, namely a chairman, two other members appointed as provided in section 6, and the representation commissioner". (Section 5)

The chairman of the commission shall be appointed by the Chief Justice of the province from among the judges of the court over which he presides; the two other members of the commission are appointed respectively by the Leader of the Government in the house and the other by the leader of the opposition in the house. (Section 6).

All seems fine in theory but in practice, it is quite different. First of all, the representation commissioner who is ex-officio entitled to sit on all meetings of the commission of each province, is no other than Mr. Nelson Castonguay, the federal chief electoral officer who, with the best of goodwill, could not be everywhere at the same time, particularly when press reports continually suggest that a general election is in the air. Another member of the commission is in the same situation, that is Mr. François Drouin, Q.C., chief electoral officer of the Province of Quebec. Neither Mr. Castonguay nor Mr. Drouin were in Rimouski when the commission met there. We met their colleague, Mr. Ogden Glass, vice-principal of Bishop University, of Lennoxville, who, showed courtesy to all those who appeared before the commission. He took notes on what was said, but he did not have a chance to speak one word, because the chairman was always talking, either to make arrogant interruptions when people were trying to make him aware of the feelings of the people, either to speak in favour of his idea of completely upsetting all county boundaries in the lower St. Lawrence, or else to support other arguments just as stupid and nonsensical.

The reader is free to judge whether the person who appointed the chairman of that commission showed good judgment.

SHORTCOMINGS OF THE ACT

Under the 1964, Electoral Boundaries Act, the Commission first prepares its report, (Sections 12 to 15), and then, before completing it, it may, if it deems it necessary, hold one or more sittings "to hear representations by interested persons". (Section 17.) Now, the report we discussed was published in the Canada Gazette on May 22 last, and in that same issue, chairman Langlois gave notice of hearings on June 21 at Quebec City where it seems he spoke on "The Law", (as Seraphin Poudrier would say) on June 28 at Chicoutimi, on July 5 and 6 at Rimouski, where he was forced to hear the vigorous and well-founded criticism of the local public bodies, on July 13 at Sherbrook, July 20 at Three Rivers, and the tour is not complete. The commission will sit in Hull on August 17, at Amos on August 24, and in Montreal on August 30. We do not fancy those travelling commissions; they remind us of Mr. Perrichon's travels, and the travelling Boulinards, those ever so popular comedies of yesteryears. From what we have heard and seen in Rimouski, all observations interested parties may have made or might make at those hearings are nothing but a waste of time for the commission's report was published on May 22, before those so-called hearings, and no one can stop the chairman from firmly believing he is infallible.

The president's untimely outbursts seemed to be like some kind of mental cruelty on his colleague. This peaceful man would cloak himself in silence, in order no doubt, to avoid giving rise to further unpleasant scenes. The greatest weakness of the act is to provide that the commission shall be allowed to submit its report before consulting the people concerned. The biggest of the numerous faults of the commission has been to imagine that it could upset the territory of ten ridings instead of annexing the Magdalen Islands to Bonaventure; and it would have been far too simple to annex completely Kamouraska to L'Islet and Bellechasse to Montmagny, without submitting them to further changes.

QUEBEC IS NOT A PROVINCE LIKE THE OTHERS

Charlottetown, P.E.I. (18,318), Fredericton, N.B. (19,683) and Quebec (171,979 without the suburbs) are the only three provincial capitals the names of which were not given to federal counties by the commission. As regards our province, the commission proposed to do away with the historical names of Quebec East, Quebec Montmorency, Quebec West and Quebec South. It is regrettable that the Quebec Commissions could not co-operate with the commissions from the other provinces, as it would have seen in Newfoundland, St. John's East and St. John's West;—in Nova Scotia, Halifax,—Halifax East-Hants,—and Dartmouth—Halifax West; in Ontario, Ottawa, the country's capital, is divided into three counties, two of which will bear the names of Ottawa West and Ottawa East, and seven counties out of 88 will use the original name of Toronto, that of York; out of thirteen counties in Manitoba, four will have the name of Winnipeg; out of thirteen counties in Saskatchewan, two will bear the designations of Regina East and Regina Lake Centre; out of nineteen counties in Alberta, we find Edmonton East and two other counties bearing the name of Edmonton, and so on.

We asked a Créditiste member what he thought of the proposed removal of the name "Quebec", our provincial capital, from the federal redistribution map. With reverently, clasped hands and eyes turned toward heaven, he said resignedly: "It is the wish of the commission." But wait until the next election and you will see that he has changed his tune.

Let the reader decide whether or not it is an outrage to strike off the name of the cradle of our civilization from an official document of paramount importance.

DIVORCE (EXTENSION OF GROUNDS) BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to introduce a private bill on a public matter of great importance. I present Bill S-19, to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorce a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, in view of the significance of this proposed legislation, would the honourable Senator Roebuck give us an explanation of the bill at this time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With the indulgence of my colleagues, I should be very pleased to do so, but only briefly because I shall be speaking on it again, perhaps at greater length when second reading is moved.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Just a brief explanation.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Well, I want to make a sufficient explanation to cover what should be said about it at this time in answer to the question.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You were ready for the question.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I certainly was.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: But no one else was.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: To be perfectly frank, I was told before I entered the chamber that this question would be asked of me, and I prepared myself with the answer.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I have seen that done many times before, but not in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is there anything wrong with that?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: No, but I think that out of courtesy we should have known something about it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: You do know something about it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I point out to my good friend that I have been through this before, because I handled the Coyne bill, and when Mr. Coyne was asked questions he had the written answers ready and it took him 20 minutes to answer those questions—he took every bit of that time.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: If there is any implication in that remark that I arranged the questions with Mr. Coyne, you are quite wrong.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Coming events cast their shadows before them.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I arranged a good deal with Mr. Coyne, but not his questions and answers.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Well, he had the answers. He had them written down.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: He had two or three days of answers.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Have we a copy of the bill?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I do not know what this is all about. If anyone objects to my making a statement as to what this bill intends and why I have introduced it—

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Do we not usually wait until the motion for second reading before we hear an explanation of a bill? At that time we have copies of the bill before us, and we can ask questions about it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Then, you object to my making this statement?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is perfectly all right.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by honourable Senator Roebuck, seconded by honourable Senator Gershaw—

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: What is the motion? I am always suspicious of these motions.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by honourable Senator Roebuck, seconded by honourable Senator Gershaw, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

OTTAWA TERMINAL RAILWAY BILL

AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report of the committee on Bill S-2, to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company:

> Your committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-2, to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 170 to 226, inclusive, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Notice of Motion for Adjournment:

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 1, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, at this time may I ask the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) if he would indicate to the house what business we may expect for next week.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Next Tuesday evening Senator Hayden proposes to explain the Bankruptcy bill. I do not know how long the debate will take, but as soon as it is completed the intention is to move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for consideration. I understand that study of this measure in committee may be lengthy.

There will remain on our Order Paper today the Interpretation Act, which is very important. I believe it will be spoken to by my deskmate, Senator Roebuck.

I do not think we shall be asked to consider any further interim supply or any measure of that kind.

There are one or two additional bills before us. One is the bill to amend the Exchange Act, which Senator Cook has undertaken to explain next Tuesday or Wednesday. Another is the bill which my honourable friend Senator Roebuck introduced a few minutes ago. I think that we shall have enough to do, particularly in committee, next week.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Were you referring to the second reading of the Bankruptcy bill?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes; second reading will be moved on Tuesday evening. Of course, there may be debate on that bill, or an honourable senator may wish to adjourn it.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: In addition, we will still have the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne and consideration of Senator Croll's report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging.

Motion agreed to.

HON. W. ROSS MACDONALD, P.C.

FELICITATIONS ON AWARD BY JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct your attention to one pleasurable matter.

The Junior Chamber of Commerce of the City of Brantford is holding an annual banquet this evening at which the Citizen of the Year Award, which that organization gives annually, is being tendered this year to our friend, Senator W. Ross Macdonald.

I think that is the explanation of his absence from the Senate Chamber this afternoon. I thought it advisable to tell you of this event, and to say that on your behalf I sent an appropriate telegram to the Brantford Junior Chamber of Commerce.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON AGING

CONSIDERATION OF FINAL REPORT

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of the final report of the Special Committee on Aging.

Hon. Fred A. McGrand: Honourable senators, the report of the Senate Committee on Aging has been thoroughly discussed by those who served on that committee and those who have spoken on it in this house. Senator Burchill has sought some information concerning homes for the aged in New Brunswick. Senator Brooks and Senator Fergusson have spoken, and as the third member from New Brunswick on that committee I shall try to give the information asked for.

There are approximately 1,850 beds available for the aged in New Brunswick. They are located in five qualified nursing homes and 72 homes for the aged. Of these 72 homes for the aged, seven are operated by municipalities, seven by religious or church organizations, and six by service or charitable associations. These homes are all licensed; the plans must be approved by the fire marshal, and they must meet all the regulations of the Department of Health. A full-time supervisor of homes was appointed in New Brunswick in 1964. The province pays 75 per cent and the municipality 25 per cent of the cost for those who cannot pay their own way.

This report is the result of a thorough review of the problems of the aged in Canada. It goes much further than the need for financial assistance recommended in the report. Most of the briefs presented to the committee complained of inadequate incomes for food and housing, the loneliness of old people and the high cost of drugs. Some of the briefs mentioned the growing habit of placing elderly people in institutions because they are not wanted in the homes of their children.

Due to the mobility of labour, the frequent moves from place to place, often from province to province, the high cost of home building, a great number of families cannot take the aged parents with them. Institutional care is necessary in these cases, but it is not the complete answer to the problem of the aged. A bed in an institution may be a home away from home, but is it, in fact, a substitute for a home? The three-bedroom house in most housing developments makes it difficult for the family to take an aged parent with them because there is not room under the family roof for the grandparents and the growing family.

It has always seemed to me that the trend to separate grandparents from their grandchildren is not a healthy one; it is not good for the old people and it is certainly not good for the grandchildren.

Living in an institution with a number of people of similar age has certain advantages for the aged. They have company of a sort. There is assistance in case of a fall or any other accident. This security relieves their minds and also the minds of the immediate family. Someone else is looking after the parent—and therein lies the danger.

There are some disadvantages in living with a group of people with a similar problem—old age. They may have little in common, less than most people think. They share the same institutional food and the care provided by the home; they share the same idleness and the same loneliness. But each has his own nostalgic feelings which cannot be shared with the person next door who has his own past to live with.

In my view the very habit of talking about the past on the part of old people stimulates grandchildren to learn more about the personal things that happened long, long ago—long ago to a small child. Furthermore, children need to be taught responsibility. To be kind, and to run errands for a grandparent is often the first lesson in citizenship for a young child, and it is a lesson which every child needs.

Besides this, sitting in a home for the aged, next door to a person who has lost his identity or who cannot remember his name or the day of the week, in itself contributes to the aging process.

There are many people engaged in welfare work who believe that three generations should not live under the same roof. They argue that children annoy grandparents and that the grandparents annoy and frustrate children; that children are handicapped by the presence of people who are old and growing older. Evidence was submitted to the committee that children often object to the presence of their grandparents in their home and that was the reason it was necessary to send the aged grandparent to an institution. This is an attitude of our changing society which would bear further investigation. How common is this attitude, and is it on the increase?

So, honourable senators, I ask myself this question: Has an element of human nature emerged in our society that was absent or dormant in the long history of mankind? Is the contact of the old and the young only on an occasional basis a good thing?

There is much truth in the cliché, "The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world." In that forgotten day, the hand that rocked the cradle was usually the hand of the grandparent. It was the grandparents who taught children little games and old nursery rhymes, mended broken toys—something the busy mother did not have time to do.

There is another cliché, "The family that prays together, stays together."

I think we could find much evidence to prove that three generations praying and living under the same roof stay together and enjoy many of the worthwhile things in life that all people seek.

I know that many will not agree with me. I would be overwhelmed by all the arguments of the frictions and irritations that exist when three generations live under the same roof. However, they will find it harder to argue with Arnold Toynbee. In an article about the weakness of our western civilization, which appeared in a well-known publication about a year ago, he wrote:

> Of all the 18 or 20 civilizations that mankind has passed through, this is the first that has put the old people out of their homes, something that leaves calamity in its wake.

I am told that there is an old folks home on this continent with large grounds surrounded by a four-foot fence. It was necessary to raise the fence to six feet, not to keep the old people in but to prevent people from dumping their unwanted parents on the grounds of the old folks home.

Certain religious communities with well-knit family ties, including three generations, have less crime and broken homes than exist in a society where the grandparents are not part of the family. The largest Chinatown in North America, and certainly the most congested, has one of the lowest rates of juvenile delinquency on the continent.

If a boy grows up without the blessing of a grandparent in close association, how will he learn to respect the elderly? I would like to know how many of the young gangsters who roam the streets, knocking down and robbing old people, ever enjoyed the presence of a grandparent in the home.

I do not propose that three generations should live in the three-bedroom house with children sharing a bedroom with a grandparent. In this day, when home building is part of community planning, they should plan homes to serve families and not push families around to serve the plans of those who put emphasis on real estate and the marketing of houses for small families. They should provide a number of houses in each housing development to meet the need of those who wish to provide separate space for the grandparent—something less than a duplex, with a separate entrance.

Much has been said and mention was made in those briefs to which we listened, about growing old graciously. If education is to train the young to live a useful adult life, it should enable the middle-aged adult to grow old graciously. Education is a continuing process.

At no time in our history has society had the trained personnel or the means to make it available that it has today. Technology and automation have caused great emotional upheaval in every sector of the three generations that comprise the modern family. No one sector can be treated as a separate entity: the harassed father with an ulcer or a threatened coronary, or in debt to a finance company; the working mother; the children in a day nursery; the school child who needs help with his homework; the teenageer with a problem; the grandparent sharing the company of strangers in an old folks home. If the family is to survive, it needs all the talent the complete family can provide.

About three months ago a well-known authority in the field of social science in addressing a gathering of social workers discussed all the conflicts that are found in the present-day home. He mentioned the place of the child psychologist, the marriage counsellor and all the other counsellors who can be called in. Then he suggested, when they all failed, call in the grandmother, because she knew everybody best.

Perhaps Dr. Wilder Penfield had this in mind the other day when he said:

> A strong family culture is the cure of society's ills.

He went on to say:

> The way of life, the moral fibre, the depth of character and the capacity for disciplined work are derived largely within the family.

If the family is the unit of society, society must treat it as a unit.

This report is lengthy and it took a long time to prepare. So far, most of the discussion has been on one aspect of the report, and a very urgent one, the few extra dollars for those who need it; but it should not be the end of our investigation into the problems of the aged.

In conclusion, I want to endorse what Senator Brooks said about the capacity of the Senate to carry on certain investigations in the public interest. He mentioned a study of the water resources of Canada. I am sure we are interested in all the problems that will face Canadians, such as the high cost of drugs, the high cost of hospitalization and all the problems that will arise with the advent of medicare.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN BOARD OF MISSIONS OF THE CHURCH OF GOD—SECOND READING

Hon. Donald Cameron moved the second reading of Bill S-18, to incorporate the Canadian Board of Missions of the Church of God.

He said: Honourable senators, in explaining this bill may I just provide a little background information on it.

This denomination—which I am told is rather closely affiliated with the Baptist faith, and whose membership may be interchangeable with some sections of the Baptist faith—was formed around 1880 in the Indiana-Michigan area. At the present time it has some 120,000 members in the United States and about 3,000 in western Canada—the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and more recently spreading into British Columbia and Manitoba.

It was established in Canada in 1942 in a disjointed fashion, with a number of separate provincial boards. In other words, there was little co-ordination of activities among the provinces. In 1947 the separate boards were dissolved and their responsibilities were assigned to the Canadian Home and Foreign Missionary Board, and this is the organization which is presently petitioning for the incorporation of the organization under a new name, the Canadian Board of Missions of the Church of God.

This church or faith has four purposes or objects: firstly, to promote foreign missions, to select and train mission candidates, to provide bursaries, and to provide support for overseas foreign missions.

The second objective is the establishment of churches and the formation of home missions, and missions in various parts of the world. It will also be authorized to make loans and gifts to purchase property and to supplement the salaries of the missionaries who may be occupying the pulpits of this particular church.

The third objective is to raise funds for the churches and missions to assist them to expand their work, and to assist in the promotion of their Bible Schools.

The fourth objective is to make loans to the churches for building and to expand their activities into new areas, and to develop a program under what is known as the Memorial Loan Fund. As in the case of many churches, people make bequests to this corporation, and also donations and gifts, and this organization has set these moneys up in what it calls the Memorial Loan Fund, the proceeds of which are made available to churches and missions and others as may be required.

When the organization was originally set up in Canada in 1942 it had a board of three trustees. That number was later increased to seven, and under the provisions of this bill it is proposed to increase it to nine. Two board meetings are held each year. The church was incorporated in Alberta in 1954, and in Saskatchewan in 1956 under the Benevolent Societies Act. It is now spreading into Manitoba and British Columbia, as I mentioned a moment ago, and it expects to extend its activities to all of Canada. It has at the present time about a dozen foreign missions operating in various countries.

The bill is in the standard form. Clause 1 delineates the incorporators, and these include a number of ministers. They are the Reverend Henry Charles Heffren of the city of Medicine Hat, the Reverend Adolf Donald Semrau of the city of Camrose, the Reverend Larmour Wallace Chugg of the city of Edmonton, the Reverend Donald Gordon Snell of the town of Drayton Valley, Lloyd Warkentin, bank manager, of the village of Paradise Valley, all in the Province of Alberta, and the Reverend Gilbert Sommert of the town of Biggar, and the Reverend Wilhelm Paul Conrad Rabel of the town of Churchbridge, both in the province of Saskatchewan, and John Unger of the village of Plum Coulee in the Province of Manitoba. Those I have named constitute the board of directors. The head office of the corporation is in Camrose, Alberta, and its objectives are as I have indicated.

Clause 5 gives the corporation power to make the necessary by-laws, and clause 6 gives it the power to operate through management committees. In all other respects the bill is in the same form as previous bills governing similar organizations.

If this bill receives second reading today I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I should like to ask the honourable sponsor of this bill (Hon. Mr. Cameron) a question. "The Church of God" is quite vague. I do not know of any church that would not be considered the Church of God unless it be its counterpart, the church of the devil, and I do not know of any church of that name.

The honourable sponsor of the bill told us that this church was incorporated in 1954. Was it incorporated under that name? I ask that question because it was said that bequests could be made to this corporation. It would be most difficult for any executor, I think, if any such bequest were made to the Church of God, not to give it to his own church, or to the church of the testator, because he would certainly consider his own church a church of God. It is my opinion that the name itself is so vague as to convey the idea that any church might receive a bequest in a will.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Honourable senators, having had no responsibility for the selection of the name, I am not sure that I can answer the question. Certainly, the incorporators give to themselves a great deal of territory. However, when the bill is before the committee I am sure the honourable senator can obtain a better explanation than any I could give him. All I can say now is that these incorporators are good citizens whose intentions are of the best, and probably we would be living in a better world if there were more groups like them.

The name in the original incorporation was The Canadian Home and Foreign Missionary Board, and this bill changes that name to Canadian Board of Missions of the Church of God. It is a little more precise, but it still leaves that omnibus title.

Hon. Mr. White: Honourable senators, clause 15 of the bill gives the corporation broad powers in respect of the investment of funds. It is my understanding that the acts incorporating other religious bodies set out in detail exactly in what manner their funds may be invested. Bill S-7 of this session, to incorporate Evangelistic Tabernacle Incorporated, provides that that corporation may invest its funds in securities of or guaranteed by the Government of Canada, and so on, in first mortgages, and then in securities as defined by the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. I would ask the honourable senator why such a provision is not included in this bill.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I cannot give you an answer to that question, Senator White, but I shall make a note of it and have an explanation given when the bill is before the committee. I think the intention of clause 15 is to give this corporation the same rights and privileges that most benevolent societies have. However, I think it would be desirable to have the range of investments spelled out precisely, and I am sure this can be done.

Hon. Mr. White: If the honourable senator looks at Bill S-7 he will see that clause 17 sets these matters out in full, and a clause similar to that has been included in other such bills.

I bring this matter up because some years ago I sponsored a bill concerning the United Church of Canada when it made application to increase its authority to invest in common stocks. Even though the United Church of Canada had on its board some of the outstanding financiers in Canada, there were certain objections raised by the other side of the house. I was wondering if there had been some change in thinking since that time.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I have made a note of the point raised by Senator White, and I shall draw the attention of the incorporators to this particular clause.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 8, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators: Mr. Speaker, I ask you to accept my congratulations to you and Mrs. Smith on the occasion of your elevation to the speakership of this chamber. It is a position of great importance, and you act with fairness and dignity. We appreciate the fact that we are under the protection of the chair when we speak.

I am reminded of what Mr. Mackenzie King said one day in Quebec City when he was leaving for an imperial conference. He was Prime Minister at the time and he said, "As Prime Minister, I am the first among equals."

In the chair, sir, you are the first of all of us, and you can call any one of us to order.

I am sure that you will follow the great traditions of your predecessors, among whom is the former Speaker Senator Bourget, whose merit has been recognized by his appointment to the Privy Council. It should have been done before—but better late than never. He is worthy of such a recognition for the way he fulfilled his duties in the chair.

May I tell you that one of my most pleasant reminiscences is that one of your predecessors, Mr. Speaker Drouin, used to call me to order at times only when I had finished saying what I had to say. I appreciated the way he dealt with me on such occasions, for he did it with a twinkle in his eye.

The address in reply to the Speech from the Throne has been proposed and seconded by two of our most distinguished colleagues. They did very well and fully deserve all the nice things that have been said about them. The best way to appreciate what they said was not only to have listened to them when they spoke but also to have read their speeches afterward. We have found that they were among the best speeches made in this chamber. I could mention many other senators who have spoken on the address, and they have all done very well.

Honourable colleagues, I appreciate your kindness. I have been here for a long time. You have been good to me. You have said such nice things at times that, as I listened to you, I felt I did not belong to this world.

One of the most appreciated remarks that was made by one of my colleagues in this chamber was precisely what Senator Brooks, Leader of the Opposition, has said about me. He said last year that he recognized that I was a hard worker. I agree with him. We are all hard workers, and naturally sometimes we have to differ. What is to be regretted is that in this country very few people know what is meant by freedom and liberty, because those terms are not defined in the Bill of Rights. Therefore, no one knows exactly what liberty is. For me I want to enjoy the liberty and freedom to differ. I say that with due deference. Right now I have to differ with the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks), an old friend of mine from the time we sat together for two sessions on the Civil Service Committee of the House of Commons. Believe it or not, each time we made a unanimous report, which meant that we agreed together on certain reforms, they were never made.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: We had a good chairman.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Well, thank you, sir, I appreciate it; and you were one of my best helpers on that committee, especially with regard to veterans.

Now, the point on which I want to differ with my honourable friend is what he said yesterday with regard to the relevancy of my remarks about the Redistribution Bill. I know very well that the Redistribution Bill will not affect us personally, because we are not to run as candidates. Those who will be candidates will be members of the House of Commons. It is most improbable that any senator will resign his seat to run as a candidate for any party in a constituency at the next election, which may come at any time in the future. I do not know.

However as long as any piece of legislation comes before the Senate we shall not act as a rubber stamp; we shall not take for granted that what is passed by the House of Commons is binding upon us. We must keep our liberty to say whether it is right or wrong, otherwise all legislation would be like the reports from the divorce judges—we know nothing about them—and we would be here as rubber stamps. My contention is that we have the duty to scrutinize each piece of legislation that goes before the House of Commons. Of course, not all bills originate in the Senate.

Provision is made for money bills to originate in the House of Commons, but after such legislation has been passed by the House of Commons we have the right to discuss it. It is more than our right, it is our duty to analyze and express our opinions for or against any matter that comes before us, and vote accordingly.

The Redistribution Bill is a matter that may not affect us as senators, but we have the duty to study that legislation and to act upon it according to our best judgment. The matter interests us as citizens who have the right to vote, and we have the right to see that the members of the House of Commons are protected by someone, even if they do not protect themselves.

Well, what was behind the idea of redistribution being made by commissions? It was to make it independent, to make those commissions more independent than the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections or any other special committee, to study redistribution and to draft proposals for the adjustment of populations within certain boundaries.

Honourable colleagues, I wonder if you remember that an ex-minister of the Diefenbaker Government, the Honourable Leon Balcer, said that the draft of the new Constitution, or of an amended Constitution, should be made by the Senate. It was one of the finest tributes ever paid to the Senate.

If the Government had decided to appoint a committee of the Senate to draft the boundaries of the constituencies according to increase in population, the Senate would have done as well as it has done by the Committee on Aging, the Committee on Manpower and Employment or the other special committees of the Senate which have studied important matters and which have made useful suggestions.

Yesterday we listened to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration when he appeared before the Finance Committee, and today we heard evidence from an official of the Department of Labour. They were speaking about the winter works program. But where does that program come from? It comes from an excellent report which was made by the Senate Committee on Manpower and Employment. That committee performed a great service for the welfare of the Canadian people, especially the underprivileged class.

If, according to an eminent Conservative, the Senate was able to draft the amendments, or the new Constitution, do you not think that we would have been as able to submit worthy proposals for the adjustment of the boundaries of the various constituencies in all provinces? Honourable senators, many of you have been in politics and you represent each part of Canada. You are better informed about the regional geography of this country than any judge could be. From coast to coast there are senators who are familiar with our country. Many of them have been members of Parliament for many years. They have been in contact with the people, and know their needs. If the House of Commons was unwilling to take on that work, under fear of being accused of partisanship, do you not think that the members of the Senate, with their experience, their knowledge of the country, their knowledge of geography, would be eminently able to do that work—and at no cost?

It would not have been necessary to travel very much, because you know the country and the knowledge is in your minds.

The Government did not think of that and neither did the four parties in the opposition. Nobody thought of that. Everybody was in earnest with regard to having commissions make reports on redistribution. I do not blame the Government for that, nor do I blame the opposition groups. They were acting in good faith.

There has been little criticism about the way in which redistribution has been made during, mark you, a century. The Government decided, in their wisdom, to entrust it to ten judges to preside over commissions for each province in Canada. I do not know how the judges were selected, whether by the Government or on the recommendation of the chief justice of each province. But they were a failure.

I know a judge of the east who is a personal friend of mine, a colleague for many years and a man whom I respect very much. He is a very good judge, but he was a bad commissioner. Letters have been sent to the press to complain that the boundaries of proposed federal counties were not superimposed over the boundaries of the provincial counties—you know what I mean; they were zig-zagged in all provinces as they were in the Province of Quebec. What is the result?

I have checked the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons. You will see there the number of complaints that have been made not only for the Province of Quebec but for the other provinces. Those complaints came not only from supporters of the Government but from members of every group of the opposition. There are one or two members who call themselves independent in the House of Commons, and they also signed the petition, as did their colleagues.

The setting up of these commissions was absurd. In the first place, the judges knew very little about their business and they thought that they were the depositories of the Holy Grail or of the truth. I do not know who inspired them to make such reports, but they had no sense.

I made a particular study of this. I did the kind of legal research I have done since I became a young lawyer, since 1916, for 50 years.

Honourable senators, you have the answer there on your desks, the Senate Hansard of yesterday. It is a matter of public importance, it is a matter that will arouse the people. I want to prevent discontent and discrimination and this is why I show, from the County of Lévis inclusive to Gaspé inclusive, how wrongly the proposed redistribution has been made.

You may say that there was a great civil servant, Mr. Nelson Castonguay, the Chief Electoral Officer, who was there on the commission. What could he do? He was preparing for a general election. Do you see him preparing a general election and at the same time looking after the division of the various constituencies of Canada? He was physically unable to do that. He is a friend of mine, and as Chief Electoral Officer he has done an excellent job. When on election night you listen to the reports, you find it fantastic how quickly they come and how accurate they are; in two hours you know what party is in power, in spite of the fact that sometimes the votes are nearly even.

Mr. Castonguay is a very good Chief Electoral Officer but he was under the head of the commission who did set the boundaries of all counties. It makes nonsense. To show you that I have known Mr. Castonguay for a very long time, I may say I knew his father very well, Mr. Jules Castonguay. At that time, in 1935, he was assistant to another who was the son of a former Prime Minister of Canada and the heir to a great name. He had nothing to do, but he received $10,000 a year, and Mr. Castonguay, who belonged to an honourable but modest family, received only $4,000 a year to do the job of the other man, although he was the real chief for the election of 1935. I thought it was a scandal and I brought it to the attention of the House of Commons. It will be seen on Hansard Mr. Castonguay was awarded twice his salary, $8,000, but it was $2,000 less than the other fellow got for doing nothing.

In my county everything was well done by Mr. Castonguay the father, and afterwards by Mr. Castonguay the son, who looked after the election there. I made no complaint; everything ran smoothly.

I do not say this as a matter of personal criticism, but in my view the law is wrong; it is impossible for one man to do this job. It must be done by a group of men who would be willing to take advice from each other and who should be sensible and reasonable and always ready to come to a compromise or to an understanding when necessary.

The other commissioner was exactly the same; he was a very fine fellow. I have not met him personally but I have heard much about him that was good. He was Mr. François Drouin, chief electoral officer for the Province of Quebec.

The fourth was Mr. Ogden Glass, a very nice gentleman and Vice-Chancellor of Bishop's University in Lennoxville. He was a delightful man, but the judge kept talking on and on, and Mr. Glass did not have a chance to get a word in. It was an impossible situation.

That being said, honourable senators, you have some understanding of the situation. If during the weekend you want to learn more about it and in greater detail you can do so by reading the appendix to Hansard that came today in your mail. I am very pleased I had the opportunity of placing them on record because they give you facts and figures. They give so many that if I had read them yesterday in the Senate it would have been difficult for you to understand, and I would have been imposing on you. But if you have the time to read them you will know the facts—not just opinions—and you will be in a position to form your own opinion.

At home in Rivière-du-Loup, and in the county of the same name, and in the county of Temiscouata, I meet many people. They are all my friends and they all speak openly to me. They were disgusted at the situation. In my view the danger is that by putting judges in charge of matters that they are incapable of dealing with, we expose them to the danger of losing all the respect of the people.

If I may, at this stage I would like to tell you about the gift I received from the county council of Rivière-du-Loup, which I represented as legal counsel before the commission. I had not sent them any bill and I did not ask for any fee, but at Christmastime I received a long box with the compliments of the warden and secretary-treasurer of the county council. And, honourable senators, do you know what was in the box? No, it was not a gun. It was a cane—a good solid cane. I told them that they were very gracious for acting as ambassadors and that I appreciated their gift very much, and I added, "If I appear again before the commission I will make good use of your cane."

Honourable senators, I am speaking rhetorically because I have no intention of creating any harm for anyone. But there is some more information which I want to give you. In my long years under this roof I have realized that a government is like the Queen—it can do no wrong. It is impossible to make the Government admit that it has made a mistake, that it has been led in error even when it has acted with the best possible intentions. The appointment of ten commissions for the redistribution of the constituencies in Canada was a serious mistake, and now we have the proof. I did not say anything when this legislation came before us last year; I gave it the benefit of the doubt. I have heard many people repeat so frequently that this thing must be done independently of Parliament. You can see now that it is wrong. But is it possible to bring the Government to admit that they were wrong? Can they not admit that it was a mistake and that they should have it redone properly for the satisfaction of the Canadian people and those who belong to all parties in Canada?

Honourable senators, what was the necessity for the various commissions to strike off the historic names of constituencies that have been represented by illustrious men in this country? Why did they strike off names that mean something to our minds and to our hearts, and to the minds and hearts of the Canadian people, names that belong to history? They were struck off with stupidity. If you have the time to look at Hansard, to which I have referred, you will see that in the Province of Quebec alone the names of 33 historic counties have disappeared or will disappear if the report is adopted. It may not be possible for you to have a map, but if you look at the map of the Province of Quebec or if you look at the maps that were tabled with the reports of the commissions in the House of Commons on the second day of this session, you will see that this action makes no sense at all.

I wonder if there is anyone who could approach the Government—not only the Government, but the other parties in the House of Commons—to make them understand that the Senate would be willing to perform that work at no cost other than such travelling expenses as might be necessary.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Have you any idea what the cost of this has been to date?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I also want to ask that appropriate question.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It was money thrown away.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Money thrown away—absolutely. Here in the Senate we disagree at times; sometimes I am criticized and sometimes I am praised. When I am criticized I accept it with a certain degree of humility and I say "Perhaps the other fellow is right." When I am praised I think the one praising is speaking of someone else.

One day I asked a certain question when Senator Aseltine was Leader of the Government, and he appreciated that question. I asked him what were the special committees of the Senate during a certain period of time, meaning by that the special work that was done by committees of the Senate besides studying the legislation that we passed or that had been passed in the House of Commons and sent to us for consideration. He supplied the answer, and it was fantastic. People do not realize how much work all our committees are doing. We have excellent chairmen of committees, and our colleagues are always willing to work.

The attendance in this chamber and at various committee meetings is striking. I put my confidence in you. You may have your own views, but if any one of you takes the trouble to look at the ten maps drawn by the ten commissions you will be shocked. This is why I consider I am in order, not only in discussing the matter but in proposing that the Senate do the whole redistribution report, for the satisfaction of the Government, for the satisfaction of the other groups and for the satisfaction of the country.

I know very well that if any lawyer on either side of the house were appointed to the Bench, he would consider every matter objectively and according to his conscience. I have enough respect for you to think that, and I believe that the senators together could do an excellent job.

It is never too late. True, the bill has been passed, but if you say the legislation has been passed, what does it mean? Yesterday I opposed it in my own way. I did not have the time to explain my views before, and I registered my objection when I said, "On division." I did not want it to pass second reading, but as the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was to attend for Royal Assent at a quarter to six I did not insist. I wanted to put the facts on record in order that you could have an opportunity to judge them.

Some of you on the other side belong to the Progressive Conservative Party, and on this side we belong to the Liberal Party, but it makes no difference, and the members of the other opposition groups could rely on us for a fair judgment on such difficult and contentious matters.

I have spoken for forty minutes—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is all right.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: There is no time limit.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank you. I do not want to take advantage of your attention. There are other things to be discussed today, but I would also like to speak on two other matters, the death penalty and constitutional reform. I shall not do that today, but I wonder if you would have any objection to my adjourning the debate until next week, at which time I shall have another opportunity to deal with those two matters.

I have spoken without any arrière-pensée, without anything in the back of my mind; I have spoken to you sincerely; I have spoken to you as one could speak to friends and colleagues of high character who deserve respect. It is because I respect you that I have made that suggestion. If I had no respect for you, if I thought the Senate was worn out, that the Senate was finished, that we are no better qualified than are the judges and the others who sat on the commissions, then I would not have made that suggestion. It is because I am sure, because I have the conviction that the Senate could do a better job than anybody else, that the Senate could do a better job than the House of Commons, and could do a better job than any judges or bureaucrats, that I have spoken as I have.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, debate adjourned.

BILL TO REVISE—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Monday, February 7, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford) for the second reading of Bill S-9 to revise and consolidate the Interpretation Act and amendments thereto, and to effect certain consequential amendments to the Canada Evidence Act and the Bills of Exchange Act.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I have had an opportunity to read this bill during the adjournment and also to compare it in a very general way with the present Interpretation Act. I have come to the conclusion that little would be gained by trying to discuss it in the chamber, because the detail is too great. It is a matter for committee and, as I suggested last session, a subcommittee to go over clause by clause—almost word by word—and in doing so, to have the officials who drew the bill or who are taking responsibility for it, come before the committee and tell us, if they can, what is to be gained by amending the act in this way and the effect of any change that might be made on the meaning of words.

I am much interested in what is contained in the bill, and I am considerably interested in what has been left out of it. There are certain indications I do not particularly like. For instance, it is proposed to repeal the Demise of the Crown Act and insert the substance of that act in the Interpretation Act, which seems to me ridiculous. I do not understand what is to be gained by that. An interpretation act is something which professional lawyers must hold in their minds when reading an act so that they do not misunderstand the act because of the statutory meaning that is given to the words. Why people should have to hold in their minds the Demise of the Crown Act, I am sure I do not know. It seems to me completely out of place. There are other matters upon which I might comment in the same way; therefore, I think we had better conclude the debate and send this bill to committee.

I stood the matter for the last two or three days because I understood Senator Grosart had some comments to make, and I thought we might both speak on it on the same day. But so far as I am concerned, I can make no further contribution.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, perhaps I could leave it to the Leader of the Government to decide whether I should speak at this hour. There is no urgency in having the bill referred to committee.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Adjourn the debate.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I prefer to adjourn the debate.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is perfectly all right.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 1, at 8 p.m.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 24, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, at the outset may I call to your attention a happy event which took place during the weekend. It was the fiftieth wedding anniversary of our dear friend and esteemed colleague, the genial Senator Burchill and Mrs. Burchill. On behalf of my wife and the countless friends of both of them I wish them years of happiness, and long life.

When I adjourned this debate last week I told you, honourable colleagues, that I would speak to you about capital punishment and constitutional matters. I have changed my mind.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Good.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: It is not because I am afraid to speak of these matters, but because an evening like this is not the time at which to speak of capital punishment and dry constitutional matters, the more so because if we have a Constitution that dates back nearly a hundred years nobody pays any attention to it. Therefore, I do not see why tonight I should not put aside the remarks I intended to make in my discussion of the provisions of sections 91 and 92, and others, of the British North America Act. However, the time will come again in due course—be assured of that—when we shall have an opportunity of discussing these matters to the satisfaction of everyone.

Today it is my privilege and joy to welcome the senators who have just been sworn in. I do not know them all. I know some of them, who are good friends of mine, and I must remind them that their thinking of the Senate will be very different on the inside from what it could ever be on the outside. After their being sworn in tonight they, and those who were not absolutely favourable to the Senate, will realize that the Senate is an institution which is worth keeping for the welfare of the state itself.

Tonight I shall speak about party politics. The problem I have in mind is this: There is an eminent lawyer who happens to be a Liberal in politics; there is another equally eminent lawyer who happens to be a Conservative in politics. Is the Liberal lawyer less worthy of the confidence of his clients because he is a Liberal, and is the Conservative lawyer less worthy of the confidence of his clients because he is a Conservative? The answer is: No—a loud "No". But there has been a campaign in the press to the effect that appointments to the Senate should be made on a nonpolitical basis, just as if the lawyers, the doctors, the farmers and the tradesmen appointed to the Senate should have no affiliation whatever with any of the great political parties of this country.

This is why, honourable colleagues, I want now to introduce the Senate itself to the new senators. To assist me in this I have a very good book that you will get in due course, if you do not have it already, namely, the Canadian Parliamentary Guide. All the professions and occupations are represented now in this chamber. I shall give you some examples, and in honour of our Government Leader and our Acting Leader, and in honour of the former leaders of the Government in this chamber, and also in honour of the Leader and Deputy Leader of the Opposition, I shall start with the legal careers.

We have in this chamber as Acting Leader of the Government a colleague who is a former Bâtonnier Général, or President, of the Bar of the Province of Quebec; among the other offices he holds, he is the Chancellor of the Anglican Diocese of Montreal, and is one of the Governors of McGill University.

He is also the head of a very large law office in Montreal.

On this side of the chamber I see one of our front benchers who is a Bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada.

On the other side of the house is another Upper Canada Bencher, and also a former magistrate.

There are 16 lawyers and barristers in this chamber, including the eminent Leader of the Government, the Honourable John J. Connolly. One is a distinguished professor of Montreal, and there are eleven lawyers who are company directors. One barrister has been a professor of philosophy. One of the lawyers, and a very good one, is also a wheat farmer. I am sure he is just as successful a wheat farmer as a lawyer.

There is in this chamber a farmer and retired merchant; one general farmer, and one real estate and gentleman farmer. There is a farmer and auto dealer; two retired farmers; one horticulturalist and exporter.

Some of these gentlemen are on the Government side, while others are on the Opposition side. They are nonetheless respected because they belong to either of the main political parties.

Our new colleagues will be pleased to know that we have two university chancellors in this chamber. One is a barrister of high reputation, who in the past has been our leader, a former cabinet minister and a Speaker of the House of Commons.

Another is a shipowner and grain merchant. Two are principals of vocational schools; one is a teacher and company director; one a retired teacher, and one a university professor. The teaching profession is well represented in this chamber.

With regard to the press, we have here the Honorary President of the Press Gallery—a dean of the Senate; one newspaper and radio station president; one president of a daily newspaper; one journalist and company director; one former journalist, and newspaper owner and barrister.

The medical profession is represented by four eminent physicians and surgeons; one family doctor; two members of the Royal College of Canada; and one honorary surgeon to Her Majesty the Queen. We have two dentists. We also have—may I mention it here—one Blood Tribe Chief from the Blackfoot Nation.

Among our colleagues is the leader of the co-operative movement in Canada. We have two university graduates who are company directors, and one of them was the owner of the Club Canadien du Hockey.

We have with us two lumber merchants and manufacturers; one civil engineer and land surveyor; one business executive and fisheries expert.

That is not all. We have two stockbrokers and company directors; one insurance and real estate broker; one insurance supervisor; one banker and company director; one retired banker; one printer and company director; one pharmaceutical chemist and industrialist; one industrialist, and several merchants and farmers.

That is still not all honourable colleagues. If you want to know about yourselves—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would rather not.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: With regard to military service, I have taken notes of the military records of our colleagues.

One of you was a lieutenant in the navy. Another was President of the Great War Veterans' Association, Dominion Command. Another had service overseas during the Great War.

There are twenty-five veterans here. I could mention the career of the Leader of the Opposition; however, I will come to that later, for he has a remarkable military service record. I will say the same for the Acting Leader of the Government. And there were many others. I note that one of our colleagues enlisted as a private and rose to the rank of colonel, and gave distinguished service during the war.

One is a veteran of World War I; another served overseas in the service of the navy during the Great War as a lieutenant from 1915 to 1918. Another is a retired major; another served in the Royal Canadian Navy. Still another was lieutenant in the 5th Battalion of the Canadian Expeditionary Force and the Royal Air Force. Another was a captain who won the D.C.M. Another rose from private to N.C.O., to lieutenant, 1914-18, and is a Past President of the Canadian Legion, Brantford. Another was a captain who served in both world wars. Another served as a group captain in the R.C.A.F. from 1939 to 1945. Another was a lieutenant in the Royal Air Force from 1916 to 1919. Another served in the R.C.A.F. from 1942 to 1945. Still another was twice wounded, received his M.C. in 1915, and served until 1918.

Honourable senators, I do not want to mention names because I am not doing this for the publicity of anyone. It is in the book. I simply want you to know that the three branches of the armed forces are well represented in this house by Conservatives as well as by Liberals.

Another is a retired commander, 1945, of the Royal Canadian Navy. One of our colleagues, and perhaps there are others, was bereaved by the loss of a son during the war. Another holds the rank of lieutenant colonel. He was officer commanding of the 6th Quebec Regiment of the R.C.A.F., 1919 to 1926. Another received the Military Medal during World War I.

Are you satisfied with this? But that is not all.

There is experience which you, honourable colleagues, have in the municipal field. I see one of my friends across the chamber who was chairman of a school board and who was mayor of Rosetown, and I see another who was reeve of his township.

Another of our colleagues served in the Ontario Legislature for eight years before coming here. Besides that, he was councillor and reeve of his municipality.

Another was town councillor at Truro for six years, deputy mayor for eight years, an M.L.A. for eight years, and Leader of the Opposition in the legislature of his province.

Another of our colleagues was a reeve for 16 years, and director of the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities for six years.

Another was mayor of the City of Outremont for 18 years, from 1947 to 1963.

Another of our colleagues was M.L.A., Newfoundland, 1924; Solicitor General, 1929; Leader of the Opposition in Newfoundland, 1932-34; and Secretary of State of Canada for four years, 1949 to 1953.

Now I come to the honourable Leader of the Opposition, who was principal of schools; inspector of schools for 10 years; M.L.A., Fredericton; and a former Minister of Veterans Affairs, with a long experience in the House of Commons.

One colleague seated near me was warden of his municipality from 1913 to 1915, a member of the Senate of the University of New Brunswick, and a great friend of the late Lord Beaverbrook.

Another friend of ours was in the Nova Scotia Legislature for 19 years, that is, for 20 complete sessions; a cabinet minister from 1941 to 1954, and premier of his province.

Another of our colleagues is most respected and is dean of this chamber. He was Minister of Agriculture for two years, Minister of Railways and Canals, Minister of Immigration and Colonization, Minister of Interior, Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, Minister of Mines and Resources, and he is now one of the best debaters in the Senate.

I see a friend of ours who was Mayor of Windsor for seven years, M.L.A. in Toronto, for 10 years, Minister of Public Welfare, Minister of Municipal Affairs, Minister of Labour, and who spent 10 years in the House of Commons before coming to the Senate.

Another of our colleagues was a municipal councillor. Another was M.L.A. in British Columbia in 1916; Attorney General and Minister of Labour, 1917 to 1922. Still another was Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, and Minister of Mines.

Another of our colleagues was first elected an M.L.A. for New Brunswick in 1952; he was Président de la Commission Électrique du Nouveau Brunswick, and was a member of the House of Commons before coming here.

Another one of our colleagues was mayor of the metropolis of Canada, the City of Montreal. I see here a friend of mine who has been in the Halifax City Council, and he was also a school commissioner before entering federal politics.

As I said a moment ago, the former leader of this house, the honourable Senator Ross Macdonald, was in the House of Commons for 13 years, was Speaker for four years, was Government Leader in the Senate and Solicitor General of Canada. I see another gentleman across the floor who was Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Another honourable senator was a municipal councillor for 10 years, and a warden. He served as a member of the Legislature of New Brunswick from 1935 to 1955, and was Speaker of that legislature for five years, and Minister of Health and Social Services for eight years.

I come now to one of the deans of Parliament, Senator Power, who was in the House of Commons for 37 years. He was Minister of Pensions and National Health, Postmaster General, acting Minister of National Defence, and Associate Minister of National Defence.

Senator Roebuck was Bencher of Upper Canada, he was Attorney General of Ontario, and he sat for a number of years in the House of Commons.

His Honour the Speaker was a member of the Legislature of British Columbia.

My friend the acting Whip was councillor and reeve of his municipality. A friend of ours across the chamber was councillor and deputy mayor in the community where he lives.

I have kept for the last moment what I should have said in the first place with regard to five of our colleagues. I want to mention to the new senators that some of our most active members are the lady members of the Senate, for whom all of us have a great deal of respect and admiration. There is honourable Senator Fergusson who has been most active in the committee work of the Senate and has made important speeches on many occasions. During the last session she was joint chairman of a very important committee.

There is also the honourable Senator Inman, who is Past President of the Innkeepers Association of Prince Edward Island, and Honorary President of the P.E.I. Tourist Association. She also has expressed her opinions in clear, concise and effective language on many occasions.

There is honourable Senator Irvine, who is a most kind person. She is a former teacher, and when she speaks we always learn a lot from her.

There are two other ladies in the Senate whom we also like and respect. I refer to honourable Senator Jodoin and honourable Senator Quart. Although they are on opposite sides in politics, their careers have been quite similar. Both have been decorated with the M.B.E. for social, political and charitable good work. What they have done has been much appreciated. I may mention en passant that honourable Senator Jodoin has been President of the Deaf and Mute Institution in Montreal for 25 years.

I could continue by telling you about the sports that my colleagues indulge in; but you know them well enough to realize that they have the right spirit of sportsmanship.

I must tell my new colleagues that I am sure they will be happy in the Senate and that political considerations have little influence on the discussions in this chamber. Whether the newspapers believe it or not the Senate is an independent body and one of the last ramparts of freedom in this country. Last week the Senate was in mourning; tributes were paid to four of our colleagues who will be remembered for their independent minds, for their courage and for their sound judgment and patriotism. One of them was born in England but he had the mentality of a true Canadian. He lived in the Prairie provinces, but he was endowed with a true Canadian spirit as were the other colleagues I have mentioned, all of whom were real patriots.

My last word is: Do not be afraid to speak out, to express your personal opinion, and even if some of your colleagues disagree with your views at first, remember it is a normal occurrence. I will cite an example. Some years ago when I was a member of the House of Commons I criticized two deputy ministers. One of the daily newspapers in Ottawa thought I should be "tongue-cuffed." I said nothing. Later I was appointed to the Senate, as you were today, and then there was an editorial in the same paper to say, probably on account of the Irish love of Chubby Power, that Chubby and I were full of charm. So, do not worry about what is said about you; it has no importance at all. The only thing that will make you happy will be the satisfaction of having done your duty as senators of Canada. I wish you all a useful career as senators of Canada. I wish you the very best.

On motion of Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough), debate adjourned.

INTERPRETATION ACT

BILL TO REVISE—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 24, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford) for the second reading of Bill S-9, to revise and consolidate the Interpretation Act and amendments thereto, and to effect certain consequential amendments to the Canada Evidence Act and the Bills of Exchange Act.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, at the outset I join with the honourable senator who has just taken his seat in extending my own personal welcome to those who have been sworn in as members of this chamber this evening. I cannot presume to give them the same kind of advice that Senator Pouliot has given from his own experience, but I can say to them that I know they will find many friends here. They will have some frustrations at first, but they will get over them.

Honourable senators, when the bill now being considered was before the Senate for second reading in June last, I said that I hoped to bring certain matters to the attention of the committee to which it was to be referred. My main purpose in rising tonight is to say that I still hope to make the same suggestions. It is not necessary for me to detail them at this time, but they will be found at page 264 of the Senate Hansard of June 23, 1965. I say that because it may be that the committee will wish to have appropriate officials or authorities before them, as these are matters in which persons other than the members of the committee may well be interested. The two points which I have in mind—although I do not intend to deal with them at length at this time because I am aware this is not the time to discuss the bill clause by clause—are found in subclauses 4 and 6 of clause 28.

Speaking of the general purpose of the bill, I want to add my support to those who have already indicated that this is a very important bill, which I am sure will receive long and detailed consideration in committee.

It is not for me to comment at this time on the legal or judicial importance of the revision of this act. We are told it is the first revision since Confederation. However, looking at the bill from the point of view of the layman, there are one or two points which I feel I should make. As I look over the bill as drafted, despite the fact that I have the greatest respect for the draftsmen of the Department of Justice, it seems to me that the point of view of the layman has been overlooked in a number of places.

The trend today seems to be for acts of Parliament to enter more and more into the everyday lives of businessmen. Whether we like it or not we have to be able to read and understand acts of Parliament. To indicate the kind of thing that can cause difficulties I would refer to the fact that in the bill we find a definition of "broadcasting", a definition of "radio", and a definition of "communication". Now, I feel that the average layman having read these definitions would be entitled to assume that the meaning of the term "radio communication" was perfectly clear. It so happens that that definition is the subject of a case before the courts at the present time.

If one asks why this happens, it seems fairly obvious that one of the approaches to the drafting of a bill such as this is to go through the acts that are on the statute books and pick out words and phrases from the interpretative or definition clauses, and not to go much further. I hope, therefore, that the whole subject of definitions in the important and expanding field of communications will receive the very careful consideration of the committee.

I am not a special pleader for any particular viewpoint. It so happens there is a bill before the other place to amend the Broadcasting Act, to change one of these definitions in the interests of a particular type of broadcasting. I have no personal interest one way or another in that particular matter; but I do hope the committee will look at this whole field of communications, which is obviously one of the expanding areas of everyday experience of business and the average man, to make sure we arrive at definitions with which we will be able to live.

In my opinion, the notes we are given here are not at all adequate. In one case the notes say the definition is taken from the Radio Act. It so happens it is taken from that act and another act. In another case the definition is taken from these acts, and there is no note to that effect. I am not being critical, because I am quite sure that the draftsmen were aware of what they were doing and that they made these omissions. Again, I hope there will be very careful consideration given this particular set of words and phrases in the communication field, as dealt with in the act.

The second point I wish to bring to the attention of the chamber is the definition of "Commonwealth", which is supported by the schedule found on page 22 of the bill. I will not at this time quarrel with the wording of subclause 6, although I would like to speak to that in committee. But again speaking to the generality of the approach, I suggest that the inclusion of the names of 23 countries in an interpretation act as part of the definition of the word "Commonwealth" or "Commonwealth of Nations" is much more an attempt at description than definition or interpretation.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I say that for this reason. We have 23 countries whose names are to be enshrined in an act which might not be completely revised for another hundred years. Some of these countries have severed their connection with the United Kingdom. Some have now abolished their parliaments. The suggestion here is that we give some kind of permanence to this particular list of 23 countries.

I believe I am speaking to the broad principle of the bill when I say that we should avoid this kind of description which, in the future, might cause a great deal of trouble.

Perhaps I might illustrate this point with a particular example. Included in the schedule is Western Samoa. There is very grave doubt as to whether Western Samoa is in fact a member of the Commonwealth. I believe that when Canada was consulted as to whether Western Samoa might be admitted, Canada registered some reservations, which I will not deal with at this time.

Speaking further to that point, I am sure honourable senators are also aware that Canada is to be host country to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in September. This is another reason for being most careful about giving this kind of permanence to the names of 23 particular countries, because I believe and hope that one of the questions that will be on the agenda for discussion at that conference will be the qualifications for membership in the Commonwealth. Until we are in a more definitive position in that matter, we should be very careful before saying that these 23 nations constitute the Commonwealth, even as of this date or the date when the act comes into force.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the honourable Senator Macdonald (Brantford) speaks at this time, it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not intend to take much of your time in closing the debate. I am pleased that a number of senators have taken an interest in this bill and have spoken during the debate. Some excellent suggestions have been made which I am sure the committee will take into consideration.

All senators who have spoken have agreed that this is an important bill, and I am sure that those of us who have heard their speeches have come to the same conclusion and agree with their suggestion that the bill should receive detailed study in committee.

During the debate the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) asked a question concerning the commission set up under authority of an Act respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada which act received Royal Assent on March 18, 1965. I have information on that subject which I would like to put on record at this time.

This commission was established on May 4, 1965, and has been working since that time. It has responsibility for revising and consolidating the Public General Statutes of Canada. Up to this time, the committee has been engaged in consolidating the statutes, and the bulk of that work is now completed. It is now beginning the process of revising, and it is in this connection that the Interpretation Act has a special bearing.

To date, the work of the commission has not been delayed by the Interpretation Act, but subsequently it could be that its work would be delayed, or subject to review, depending on the form in which the Interpretation Act passes Parliament.

I am sure honourable senators will agree with me when I say it is desirable that Parliament should give consideration to the Interpretation Act as soon as it can conveniently do so. It is my intention, as I suggested when introducing this bill, that if it receives second reading in this house I shall move that it be referred for detailed study to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford): I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Honourable senators, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce informs me that he proposes to hold a meeting of the committee at 9.30 tomorrow morning to commence consideration of this bill. As it is rather late, he asked me to make that announcement in the house this evening.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford), bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eric Cook moved the second reading of Bill S-14, to amend the Bills to Exchange Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to amend section 6 and section 43 of the Bills of Exchange Act.

Section 6, as it now stands, provides that when the time to do any thing expires on a Saturday, it is deemed to expire on the next following business day. In other words, Saturdays are not counted. Furthermore, the present section 6 provides that a bill of exchange, note or cheque cannot be presented on a Saturday, and that failure to do anything on a Saturday does not give rise to any rights. Clause 1 of this bill will amend subsection 3 of section 6 in two ways.

The first amendment is to allow all things to be done on a Saturday or a non-juridical day if, in fact, the drawee bank is open for business on that day. This amendment will allow a bank to remain open on a Saturday, if the needs and requirements of the community which the bank serves require it to be open on a Saturday. It is felt that this will be of great benefit to rural communities in particular, because Saturdays are very often, by tradition and convenience, market days, and on such days it would be of great assistance to the general public if banking facilities are readily available.

The second amendment follows naturally on the first, inasmuch as it provides that a bank may close on what would ordinarily be a business day. Therefore, a bank which opens on Saturday could close on, say, the following Monday. It is necessary in order for the banks to comply with the provisions of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, in respect of holidays for employees, to close one day in each week. If, therefore, the bank does in fact stay open on Saturday it must close on some other day in the week. As the law now stands, all other days of the week are ordinary business days, and without the proposed amendment a bank is not permitted to close on these days.

Clause 1 of the bill further amends section 6 by adding a new subsection 4. This new subsection merely provides that if a bank exercises the privilege of closing on any day other than a Saturday, the day during which the bank is in fact actually closed is defined in the same manner as, and is substituted for, Saturday under the present act. Therefore, the day which the bank picks for its weekly holiday becomes a non-juridical day, and does not count in the same way as Saturdays now do not count, and all acts and things which normally would be done on that day are postponed until the next day on which the bank is open.

This bill also proposes to amend paragraph (a) of section 43 of the act, in such a way as to:

(1) remove Easter Monday from the list of non-juridical days, as this day is not a general holiday under the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, or in the business community generally; (2) remove Victoria Day and Dominion Day from the list of non-juridical days that are to occur on the next

Monday when they fall on a Sunday as, under the statute, these two holidays cannot fall on a Sunday; and

(3) add the birthday of the Sovereign to the list of non-juridical days that are to occur on the next following Monday, when the birthday falls on a Sunday and no other day is substituted by proclamation.

Honourable senators, if the bill receives second reading, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, March 2, 1966

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. A. K. Hugessen tabled:

Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, of Wednesday, February 23, 1966, pursuant to section 7 of the Regulations Act, chapter 235, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

PRIVATE BILL

THE TRUSTEE BOARD OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN CANADA—FIRST READING

Hon. John J. Kinley presented Bill S-20, respecting The Trustee Board of The Presbyterian Church in Canada.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Kinley moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

INTERPRETATION ACT

AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the following report of the committee on Bill S-9, to revise and consolidate the Interpretation Act and amendments thereto, and to effect certain consequential amendments to the Canada Evidence Act and the Bills of Exchange Act:

Your committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 283 to 337, inclusive, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

PROGRESS OF SUPPLY LEGISLATION

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the honourable Acting Leader of the Government a question. In view of the pending end of the financial year, what precise arrangements are being made in the other place regarding the financing of the business of government. I should like to have also any other information he can give us at this time.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I am afraid that the answer which I can give to my honourable friend may not be altogether satisfactory. As honourable senators know, the House of Commons at the moment is trying to finalize its examination of the Estimates for the year 1965-66. I almost said that they were "desperately" trying to do so, but when I used that word recently in this chamber I was badly mauled by Senator Hollett, so I will not use it now.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: The circumstances are desperate, then?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I understand it is quite possible that the House of Commons will finish their consideration of the Estimates not later than Friday. If they do so, they will then pass the final supply bill for 1965-66 and send it to us. It is at least extremely desirable that that bill should pass our house and receive Royal Assent as soon as possible, because I understand the money runs out at the end of this week.

Therefore, if we do get the bill from the House of Commons not later than Friday afternoon and if my honourable friends, with their usual kindness and courtesy, will under the circumstances agree to all three readings of the bill on that day, we may get Royal Assent on Friday evening, so that the business of the Government can be carried on. Under those circumstances, it may be necessary for this house to sit on Friday. I hope to be in a better position to answer that question at the opening tomorrow afternoon.

On the other hand, if the House of Commons does not complete their work by Friday, I think they will do so not later than Monday; so if we do not sit on Friday, we will have to come back Monday to consider the final supply bill. What effect the voting of the supply bill on Monday rather than on Friday would have, I really cannot say. It may well be that members of the cabinet who wish to subscribe to the collection plates in their churches on Sunday will have to borrow the money.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We are all in favour of that.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: So, honourable senators, we will contemplate sitting either on Friday or Monday, depending upon how the situation develops.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Considering the very desperate circumstances prevailing, I assure my friend that we on this side of the house will help to facilitate matters in any way we can.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I am grateful to my honourable friend for saying that and I can only add, after years of experience of his leadership on that side of the house, that is what I would expect him to say.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the subject matter of this bill, bankruptcy, has been very much in the public eye for a fairly long period now due to the exposures, and in other cases the suggestions, of illegal and improper practices by those who participate in some form or other of bankruptcy proceedings or bankruptcy administration, or who may be principals in the sense of being the debtor, the insolvent person, or a creditor.

The bill which we are now considering is not a revision of the Bankruptcy Act; it is an interim measure designed to provide direct and immediate authority in the field of investigation and inquiry, and is also designed to tighten the procedures and requirements in other areas, as, for instance, the area of proposals which an insolvent person may make to his creditors, or which a bankrupt may make to his creditors in the course of the administration of the estate. It also deals in a very heavy way with the matter of preferences where one creditor has been preferred, within a certain period of time, over other creditors by the action of the debtor. It also incorporates into the bankruptcy law those provisions which we have had for some time in the income tax law, that is, the provisions relating to non-arm's length transactions and related persons or related corporations, and also the transactions arising by reason of those situations which are made reviewable transactions.

You will find a wealth of rules set out in the first section of the bill, starting on page 1 and going through to about line 13 of page 3.

I do not propose to go through the whole series of situations which are there described, but at various places in the bill I will refer you to instances where if the relationship of the debtor with the creditor is of the character defined in this first section of the bill, then certain consequences follow which might not otherwise follow.

In addition to these features, which I will develop in a little detail but only enough to explain the principle, there are two items in this bill which were before the Senate in 1962, when, as you will recall, we had quite lengthy committee hearings and considerable public presentation of briefs. Then, in 1963 part of what we recommended in 1962 was incorporated into the 1963 bill, and in that year we passed the amending bill but it did not pass the Commons because dissolution occurred before the bill had progressed that far. So, we have in this bill these two items which were passed by the Senate in 1963. I do not propose to do more than mention very briefly what they are and the extent of the coverage which they have in this amending bill, because we have had two runs at them now, and though the personnel of the Senate has changed, I conclude that the view of the whole might be the same; in any case, there will be an opportunity in committee, as and when the bill goes to committee, to look at it.

One of the items was the summary administration of estates. When the bill came before us in 1962 provisions in the Bankruptcy Act relating to summary administration were being repealed. There is an authoritative section in the Bankruptcy Act which provides for summary administration where the excess of realizable assets over secured claims or secured creditors is not in excess of $500. As a matter of fact, the evidence presented before us at that time showed that a great many abuses had developed in this area. One can fancy this sort of abuse as, for instance, when the trustee in a summary administration could send out with the notice of the first meeting of creditors a notice of motion for the discharge of the trustee. That is pretty fast work, when before your creditors can meet you and shake hands with your trustee, you are applying for discharge.

The Senate and the committee which considered the bill at that time thought there was a place for this summary administration, but that there should be some safeguards. We suggested what they should be, and they appear in this bill even as they did in the 1963 bill which we passed. You will find them in section 15 on page 13 of the bill.

The other heading starts on page 17 of the bill and runs to page 28. So you can realize that when I say a few words on the proposed Part X—namely, the orderly payment of debts—we have already dealt with a substantial part of the amending bill which is before us. The new part X provides for the orderly payment of debts.

The history, as I understand it, is that in the Province of Manitoba and also, I think, in the Province of Alberta there was at one stage legislation which provided for the orderly payment of debts by a debtor. That legislation required you to appear before the Clerk of the Court, or whoever the proper officer was for the particular province, and furnish your debts within certain limitations, and other pertinent information. On completion of all steps provided in the Act, a consolidation order might be made which would provide for the orderly payment of the debts. The consolidation order, in effect, was a judgment which each creditor had against the debtor for the amount of his claim, with provision for orderly payments. If the debtor did not keep up his payments, the order fell by the boards and bankruptcy or an authorized assignment could intervene.

The Supreme Court of Canada declared that this legislation providing for the orderly payment of debts was ultra vires the province, and so, in 1962, and again in 1963, it was sought to incorporate this Part X into the bankruptcy law.

I have examined Part X and all the sections from 173 to 198, and I have checked the language that occurs in this bill against the language that was in the bill that this house passed in 1963. I think I am safe in saying that while there are some differences and some variations in language, there is no substantial variation in, or departure from, the intent and purpose of that bill, or in the machinery under which the orderly payment of debts will function.

As I was one of the critics of this in 1963 —the bill passed anyway—possibly I should tell you what my criticism was. With respect to the class of debts that may be the subject of this orderly payment of debts, there is a limitation of $1,000 in respect of a judgment for the payment of money. There must not be a claim in the form of a judgment in excess of $1,000, and there must not be a claim or a demand in respect of money or debt, or otherwise, in excess of $1,000. The objection I had then, and which I think is still valid, was that if a creditor devoted himself to the business of incurring debts, then as long as he kept a pretty strict account of all his debts, and did not let any particular debt within this area get above $1,000, he could have himself quite a time, and with a great accumulation of debts still go to the Clerk of the County Court and apply for a consolidation order, which he might or might not get.

Perhaps there is virtue in that. I felt it was pushing the thing too far, and that possibly in respect of this kind of orderly payment of debts there should be an overall limitation on the total amount that the debtor might accumulate by way of debts in respect of which he could move under Part X.

However, the bill passed the Senate in 1963, and here it is again with no substantial change. If there are any questions that the new senators would like to have answered I would think they could best be dealt with in committee, although I am fairly familiar with the matter.

That takes care of a little better than a third of the bill that is now before us, but before I start to deal with the other headings and the principle involved I should like to mention the concept of the bankruptcy legislation, and what it was originally designed for, because I think some of us may have lost sight of it. Circumstances change with the years. The styles of yesteryear may not be the styles of today, and similarly there may be conditions that dictate some change in this legislation.

The scheme of the bankruptcy legislation in the beginning was a statute by which there was creditor control in the administration of estates of insolvent persons and bankrupts. Following that design a Superintendent of Bankruptcy was appointed whose responsibility was in the direction of the appointment of trustees, the supervision of their administration and the proper discharge of their duties, the appointment of the official receivers and the supervision of their conduct and administration, and receiving reports from them. But, the moment you got down to a bankruptcy you had a trustee, and you then had the trustee functioning under the control of the creditors and under the control of the inspectors, who were creditors and who were appointed like a board of directors to represent the creditors. That was the scheme, and that is why you find that all the authority that is given in the Bankruptcy Act is given to the trustee for the examination of the bankrupt into the conduct of his affairs by him even preceding the bankruptcy, the causes of the bankruptcy, and all such things, with a lot of authority for the production of documents, etcetera. Then, he must report to the official receivers and to the Superintendent of Bankruptcy.

In the original concept of the act that procedure made sense, but it created also the situation which has also magnified the area which permits illegal and improper practices. We have to take another look at, and another approach to, this matter because if the trustee functions under the direction of the creditors and the inspectors, and the money is to be provided out of the estate or by additional moneys to be contributed by the creditors, then very often the creditors will take their loss rather than contribute more money for the purpose of uncovering some fraudulent practice. That is one of the factors, I would say, that permitted so much of this undercover fraudulent practice in connection with bankruptcies. It is a fact that inquiries and investigations have not been made because the people who could start them were not prepared to authorize them, or to provide the money for them. We have now a situation which calls for a greater authority to look into these matters, and that is the public interest which, since this is federal legislation, is represented by the federal authority. Since the Superintendent of Bankruptcy is the public representative in the administration of this act, it is now proposed to give direct power and authority to the superintendent for the purpose of causing inquiries and investigations to be made. He has also the full power of examination.

If honourable senators will look at page 4 of the bill, and at the new section 3A, they will see that the power which the Superintendent of Bankruptcy is now given is a power not only to inquire into the conduct and dealings and transactions of the bankrupt, the causes of his bankruptcy and the disposition of his property, but also, and without order, he can, under this legislation, examine the bankrupt or any person reasonably thought to have knowledge of the affairs of the bankrupt, or any person who is or who has been an agent, clerk, servant, officer, director or employee of the bankrupt, and can require the production of books and documents, etcetera. Any person who is called as a witness must answer the question. He is given the protection, of course, that the answers which he makes cannot be used later except on a charge of perjury. Under this new section 3A the superintendent reports to the Deputy Attorney General or other provincial officer designated.

The procedures under the act as it exists are that the trustee and the official receiver go to the court with the materials they have obtained, and ask the court to consider in the circumstances what, if any, procedures should be followed. This has now been supplemented, as I understand it, by an understanding reached in January of this year with the provincial attorneys general at a meeting in Ottawa. It was agreed that the Superintendent of Bankruptcy would make these inquiries and investigations as authorized in this bill, and if he uncovered any information in this area—that is, this broadened area of inquiry—in relation to the bankruptcy and illegal practices and fraud that might point to violations of the law, he would turn all that information over to the provincial authority at once, who would undertake to weigh the evidence and decide whether it warranted further investigation or prosecution. That of course is getting the administration of the criminal law back on the proper basis, because while the federal authority enacts the criminal law, the provincial authorities administer it.

This additional power of direct inquiry and investigation, direct report to the proper provincial authority, is by section 3A vested in the Superintendent of Bankruptcy. It will also be found by the new section 163A, which occurs in section 20 on page 17 of the bill, that the official receiver or the trustee, if he has reason to believe that an offence under this act or the Criminal Code has been committed, there is given to the trustee and the official receiver the power of investigation in this field without going to the creditors or the inspectors for approval. The official receiver or the trustee, as the case may be, is then required to report that information to the Deputy Attorney General or other appropriate officer in the Province, and a copy of the report goes to the Superintendent of Bankruptcy.

It is hoped that by this method there will be a closer supervision and a closer and more constant examination in relation to the bankrupt and his affairs, and in areas that might uncover the illegal practices and persons that contributed to the bankruptcy or who profited at the expense of the creditors and brought about the bankruptcy.

As I understand it, this is not intended and not put forward as being the absolute solution of this problem, but it is one very important aspect which is put forward to meet the situation until such time as there is a complete revision of the Bankruptcy Act. I understand that is in progress now, but it may be a year before we have a complete revision of the act, and shortly thereafter we shall have a look at it.

I do not want to get into the detail of sections, but there are certain rather important matters covered by this bill. One is on the question of the making of proposals.

I stated earlier that an insolvent person or bankrupt may make a proposal to his creditors, and the procedure under the act was that he would file a copy of his proposal, if he were an insolvent person, with a licensed trustee. Of course, if he were a bankrupt he filed it with whomever was administering the estate.

What apparently has developed at times, particularly in the case of insolvent persons, is that the proposal has really been a stalling tactic, I suppose, to provide time to permit more manipulation or covering up of transactions.

Under this bill, if and when it becomes law, the proposal in the case of an insolvent person is filed with a licensed trustee, but immediately there is an interim receiver appointed so that the assets of that insolvent person, who is not bankrupt at that time, are under a control so that he can no longer work with them or dissipate them. If the proposal is turned down under this bill, it is then deemed that the insolvent person has at that moment made an authorized assignment under the Bankruptcy Act, and at that moment the assets come into the possession of the interim receiver. If the proposal is accepted, then the courts approve, the order issues if the court thinks it is a proper proposal and the creditors also think so, and the order provides for the manner of payment and the security to be given. If, however, the proposal is not accepted, the debtor does not get any run at his assets; he is immediately under the Bankruptcy Act.

There are other provisions. For instance, if a creditor is related to the debtor, and related in the sense of the definitions in section 1, then at the creditors' meeting to approve the proposal the only right he has is to vote against the proposal, but he cannot vote for it.

Of course, in the case of the bankrupt, if the proposal is accepted as being satisfactory to the creditors and to the court, that operates to annul the bankruptcy, and in those circumstances the assets are revested in the debtor.

I have not given you in every detail what these sections in relation to the proposals deal with. However, I should state that in the act you will find the title "Proposals" in Part III, sections 27 to 38. Perhaps you will also refer to sections 5 to 9 inclusive found on pages 6 to 9 of the bill.

Another item of some significance deals with preferences, where a debtor prefers one creditor to another and within three months a bankruptcy intervenes.

It is provided in this bill that if the creditor who is being preferred is related to the debtor, then the three months become 12 months, and if the transaction occurred within a 12-month period antedating the bankruptcy, it is a preference which can be set aside. Such a transaction is referred to in the statute by the words "reviewable transaction".

In cases of this kind, where the trustee goes to the court and the court concludes that there has been a preference resulting in some person acquiring property from the debtor at less than its fair market value, or resulting in the debtor paying more for the property than the fair market value—in the case of services the same would apply—and the court determines the fair market value to be greater or less, as the case might be, than the consideration paid for the property or services, then the court may issue a judgment against that person benefiting for the difference.

In determining the fair market value the court is obligated to accept the statement of the trustee as to what the fair market value is, and the onus is on the creditor, who is a related person according to section 1 of the bill, to prove that the consideration that he paid is at least the fair market value of the property.

Another phase which may startle a few of the senators—I am dealing with a corporation now—is that if a company pays dividends or redeems or purchases sales for cancellation and the company is insolvent at that time, or if the payment of the dividend or the redemption of the shares or their purchase for cancellation results in or renders the company insolvent, then the trustee may apply to the court and the court may give a judgment against the directors who participated in that payment of dividend for the amount of the dividend or, as the case may be, for the amount paid on redemption of shares, or the amount paid on purchase of shares for cancellation and the directors would be liable for the amount of such payment.

The directors would still have a right, if it were worth anything, to attempt to recover from a shareholder, and particularly a shareholder who might be related to the corporation as provided in section 1, what he received out of that payment. The only escape for a director is by virtue of the language of the Companies Act, or as it now is, the Canada Corporation Act, and there the provisions for exoneration are similar to those incorporated in this bill; but the reason for their incorporation is that in the Companies Act, these provisions about directors paying dividends and doing those other things when a company is insolvent, apply only to federal corporations. Since there are also provincial companies to be considered, it was believed necessary—actually, as a matter of law, it would be necessary—to make such provision effective against provincial companies, and that it be incorporated in the Bankruptcy Act. The only way a director can escape under the bill is, if he is present at the meeting when the dividend was declared or when these other things are done, and he protests; or, under the Companies Act, if he is not present, but protests to the officials of the company as soon as he hears about it and sends in a written protest within a certain period of time afterwards.

This may sound arbitrary, but we are dealing with a class of operation and a situation where many illegal and improper practices have occurred and where the very circumstances surrounding a bankruptcy may be fraught with all kinds of manipulation, so prevention of such must be heavy-handed.

Of course, if the directors could prove that the company was not insolvent, they would escape, but the onus is on the directors to make that proof. That is about the only way they can resist a claim for payment in those circumstances, that is, by establishing that the company was not insolvent.

Honourable senators, there is another group of headings, called "after-acquired property". Under the act, the property of a bankrupt consists of the property which he has at the time of the bankruptcy and any property that may in any way be acquired or devolve upon him before his discharge from bankruptcy. But you will find a new section, section 39A on page 9 of the bill, containing a provision dealing with other types of after-acquired property, to the extent of salaries, wages or other remuneration that the bankrupt is entitled to receive from any person employing or using his services. The trustee may apply to the court directing the payment to the estate—that is, to the trustee—of such part of the salary, etcetera, as the court may determine should be paid—it is a form of garnishee—having regard to the family responsibilities and the personal situation of the bankrupt. There are one or two exceptions to that which I do not think it is necessary for me to deal with at the moment.

Honourable senators, I should point out to you also section 17, which you will find on page 14, and under which, when this bill becomes law, no corporation can apply for its discharge from bankruptcy. In other words, the only road out for a corporation which becomes bankrupt would be to make an acceptable proposal to its creditors.

I think I understand the reasoning behind this, although I feel it is a matter which should be discussed in committee. The reasoning is that very often when a company is discharged from bankruptcy, it resumes commercial operations. In the field of activity in which that company had been engaged, there may be many who were not aware of the past history of the company. The company then may get more credit in that way and this might lead to another bankruptcy. Therefore, the idea is to prevent the revival of that company by a discharge.

We put a provision in the Income Tax Act a few years ago, if you recall, that where a company is discharged—that is, where it gets its absolute discharge from bankruptcy—it cannot have a loss carried forward in respect of the losses that it has made prior to and during the period of bankruptcy.

The desire is to protect the creditors—not only those who have actually been caught but those others who might be caught because they have not enough information—and so the use of the same name after discharge from bankruptcy is not to be open to a bankrupt corporation in this case.

It also forces those who wish to make further use of the company, after it has been put into bankruptcy, to work out an acceptable proposal. Otherwise, they sit as a company in bankruptcy, without any right to operate commercially, except such as the court may grant to liquidate the position of the creditors.

On the question of information, I should tell you that under the bill a lot more information will be required to be furnished by the trustee to the official receiver and to the superintendent. You will find that in section 18, commencing at the bottom of page 14 and going through to the middle of page 16. There is a tremendous amount of information which the trustee must furnish within two months after his appointment. In reading that you will realize how far it goes. The trustee is even invited to express his opinion, not only in connection with the operations and the control but as to who, in his opinion, was responsible for the greater proportion of the debtor's liabilities or under whose direction the greater portion of those liabilities were incurred.

There is much more information required also, but that part of the information is also to be given separately to the Superintendent of Bankruptcy and he may provide that to those information centres, etcetera, which compile creditor information.

There is a protection in this bill against any such creditor information centre disseminating that information to the trade. This is a way in which those in that part of the public area—merchants and others—may more easily get information as to who were involved in certain bankruptcies, together with the names. The next time a new company or new person is applying for credit, the name might ring a bell and they may say, "This is the man who was involved in that other bankruptcy, we had better have a close look at this." Under these provisions, every effort has been made to protect the creditor to the fullest extent possible, and maybe even to an extent that he personally is not prepared to go.

However, the practice in this field has led to such illegal acts and fraud that, as I said at the beginning, it is a matter now of protecting the public interest. When the public interest comes into it, it is a larger question; and therefore the Government responsible for the administration of the act should redesign the act in the areas in which authority is needed now, and where right of inquiry and investigation is necessary in order that they may ferret out and make the administration and operation of bankrupt estates legal, proper and fair to the particular members of the public who are involved; and, may I add, underlying it all, to teach a more wholesome respect for the law.

Honourable senators, I doubt if there are other items here which I should tell you about. I emphasize again that I have not attempted to give you any detail. For instance, I had annotated all the references in the bill to related persons and "non-arms length" transactions and reviewable transactions. But that would be merely a recital at this time and it would have more value in committee than here. The extent to which a principle is applied is something we can get out in committee.

Honourable senators, I have tried to point out to you the principle use in establishing this area of reviewable transactions and "non-arms length" transactions.

Many people, in one of these relationships to the debtor which you find in section 1 of the bill, may by virtue of that relationship, and in collusion with the debtor, pay less than what he should have for an asset, or receive more than he should for an asset or a service, or in the field of management fees, where there is a series of companies. In such a case, the management charges are in some instances very substantial, very excessive, if you measure them in terms of fair market value as to what the charge should be. These are areas to be dealt with by this bill when it passes into law. By the administration which this bill will provide and with the co-operation between the Superintendent of Bankruptcy and the provincial authorities in the manner outlined, the protection of the public interest and the elimination of fraudulent practices may more surely result.

The way of the transgressor I hope, will be harder; and I would say that a great many operators in the field of fraudulent bankruptcies, who have found a way of accumulating money and gouging creditors, should find their activities more difficult, more risky and less profitable.

When you add these two things together and attempts to continue such practices continue, they may find the shadow of the law more quickly and surely catching up with them, by virtue of this machinery and the harnessing of the provincial authorities to this combined task.

I think I have said everything that I can usefully say at this time, but if there are any questions relating to principles I would answer them. If such questions apply to the details of the bill, though I could answer them now, it would be more appropriate, I think, to do so in committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I put a question to the honourable senator in the field of generalities? He has said that this is an interim measure. Will he outline what important subject matters the complete revision of the Bankruptcy Act would deal with in addition to those contained in this bill?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I have not sat in on the conferences in connection with this and so I have no specific information, but nobody has taken away my power of surmise and guess. I would say, from my reading of the Bankruptcy Act, that the movement to change the scope of the act from the original concept to the approach you now have, where at least it is double-barrelled with extra emphasis on checking the illegal and improper practices, results in much duplication in the language of the sections of the act. This bill does not attempt to amend the sections giving powers of examination to trustees and in certain instances to official receivers to apply to the courts. It superimposes other and broader powers with the obligation to report directly to provincial authorities.

I would say in that regard, however, following the alert study and analysis of this bill that these features could very well be combined. I would think that so much has happened and so much experience has been obtained since the last revision in, I think, 1949, when I had the privilege of being chairman of the subcommittee, that there are bound to be many ways in which this act and the effective approach to bankruptcy legislation could be improved, and I say that without reflection on anybody.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask a question? Under section 3A of the new section, at what stage does the Superintendent of Bankruptcy investigate?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The opening words, while they appear general, do say:

> "3A. (1) Where, on information supplied by an official receiver, trustee or other person, it appears to the Superintendent that there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person has, in connection with a bankruptcy, committed an offence under this Act or any other Act of the Parliament of Canada, whether before or after the bankruptcy—

Hon. Mr. Haig: In other words, the bankruptcy has to occur before the investigator can start to investigate what happened before or after.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No, I think the investigation could start prior to the bankruptcy, because the language used is:

> .on information supplied by an official receiver, trustee or other person...

Therefore, the investigator may get information from one investigation which might apply to another bankruptcy, for example, where a group of companies is involved.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson, debate adjourned.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Clement A. O'Leary: Honourable senators, in rising to speak to the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I join with those who have preceded me in congratulating His Honour the Speaker on having been wisely chosen for such a respected and distinguished role. I also congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply. As was to be expected, both Senator McDonald and Senator Gouin acquitted themselves in a manner befitting the honour extended to them.

I offer my public word of welcome to Senator Hamilton McDonald and Senator Bill Benidickson and to the seven honourable senators who joined our ranks just last evening. I am sure nobody will accuse me of being parochial if I extend a very special welcome to Senator Urquhart from my home province of Nova Scotia.

I extend my deepest sympathy to the widow, children and grandchildren of the late Senator Bouffard.

May I say that the business of the Senate is still in very capable hands, in the person of Senator Hugessen, who has already clearly demonstrated his diligence and competence. I compliment him.

Although in the other place the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne has been concluded for some weeks past, the Speech is still before us here and I intend to refer to a fairly large portion of it today, as briefly as possible.

I believe most of us have heard that the major criticism of the Throne Speech is that it contains a large number of items outlined in former Throne Speeches. Such criticism is undoubtedly based on the fact or the assumption that the legislation so forecast will perhaps once more not reach fruition, and this for a variety of reasons. First and foremost, even were these legislative measures already carefully planned and ready for presentation, they would face the peril inherent in a minority government, in that time might run out at an earlier date than anticipated by the Queen's representative when the Throne Speech was delivered. As we all know, such dissolution of Parliament could come about either by the action of the combined Opposition forces or by the express wish of the minority Government itself, as was the case last year.

Perhaps the next major reason for the failure of such proposed measures to come before Parliament is that the legislation is not always ready, and as a consequence it loses its priority position to other items which very often are of a highly controversial nature entailing long and protracted debate.

A third reason, allied to number two, is the failure of governments at times to establish proper priorities. They fail to see to it that the more urgent and demanding legislation is prepared well in advance of its presentation; and they fail to exercise at all times that necessary sense of priority which makes for responsible and efficient administration.

To my mind these are a few, but by no means all, of the commanding reasons why we have repetitive Throne Speeches. I could add, and I know all honourable senators appreciate, that in some instances postponement of legislation comes about by direct intent. This is understandable and certainly to be condoned, and perhaps to be commended, provided that it is in the best interest as a result of factors arising which could not be foreseen when such legislation was forecast.

Personally, I am not too disturbed that this Throne Speech is in part repetitive because, for whatever reasons certain items were not dealt with in the Twenty-sixth Parliament, if these measures are good in principle, as invariably they are, and relatively speaking rate high in priority, they certainly should be re-announced and the appropriate action taken as quickly as possible.

From a brief analysis of the Speech we immediately note and can quickly calculate that more than one-third of the measures proposed, and directly related to different segments of our economy, apply to the agricultural industry. Or to put it another way, and perhaps more correctly, emphasis has been placed on the growing and urgent need for Government to serve more adequately our rural population.

The legislation proposed would appear to aim basically at three groups and not necessarily in the following order:

Firstly, those who live on farms but do not necessarily work these farms other than to provide a few basic necessities for family use such as meat, dairy and vegetable produce;

Secondly, those who live on marginal or sub-marginal farms, attempting to secure the greater share of their livelihood income therefrom, but handicapped from doing so by reason of small uneconomic units, lack of equipment and facilities, inadequate farm buildings, poor soil, no finances to improve these conditions, and no credit services available from any source from which they can borrow money on a long, medium or short-term basis, at any interest rate;

Thirdly, those who operate recognized large and what should be economic farm units growing or producing the major portion of our agricultural products for Canadian consumers and our export markets. Depending upon the nature of their operations, some of these important producers are suffering a declining income, even with increased production, due to the burden of the constant rise in the overall cost of living and, more specifically, as it affects the instruments of production, without a proportionate and corresponding increase in the returns received for the produce marketed.

Dealing first with proposed legislation which is aimed to assist this latter group, we find several measures which appear paramount though not necessarily exclusive, namely: a further increase in the loan capital provided by the Farm Credit Corporation; an extension of unemployment insurance to full-time farm workers; crop insurance for all farmers; establishment of a national dairy commission; establishment of a feed grains agency in eastern Canada and British Columbia; and cash advances for unthreshed grain.

We could add a seventh, referred to by Senator McDonald in moving the address, namely, the proposed increase in the ceiling for long-term export financing under the Export Credits Insurance Act assisting, as it does, to move western grain into the export markets.

Thus, we see that seven of the nine measures proposed have direct application for the major farm producers of this country.

Coming now to those measures which are intended to improve the lot of the second category—namely, the marginal or submarginal farmer usually established on a small uneconomic unit and suffering under the handicaps to which I have already referred—it seems to be imperative that workable legislation be first set up adopting sound proposals for the redevelopment of such uneconomic farms, although I believe this has already been provided for under ARDA. True, some of the other measures proposed would have limited application at the present time for this group, but of themselves they would not provide any real solution. For many eastern farmers who unfortunately find themselves in this position, certainly a feed grain agency, a national dairy commission, crop insurance and unemployment insurance to full-time farm workers would be of some assistance to at least a portion of this group. I cannot see where the increase in the loan capital of the Farm Credit Corporation would be of too much benefit, because nobody lends money to farmers on an uneconomic unit.

Whether justifiably or not, I have at times in the past been critical of the Farm Credit Corporation and also of the Farm Improvement Loans Act, not so much as a result of the inactivity with this class of farmer but because of the failure to lend a hand to what might be called borderline cases. I readily accept the fact that in most instances if it can be determined that the requested loan cannot fulfil the objective sought and, as a result, cannot be repaid, then such a loan would be ill-advised. On the other hand, if, as happens certainly in some cases, the applicant feels that capital is his crying need and that any failure he may have evidenced is as a result of this lack of capital, then his application should be given serious consideration.

I would feel more satisfied with the operations of Government lending bodies of this nature if a greater degree of examination were given applications. I recall that when the last amendments to the Farm Credit Act were before the Senate's Banking and Commerce Committee—I believe in 1964—I was perhaps naïve enough to be a bit shocked to learn from questions I asked that neither the administrators of this act nor any other Government body has knowledge of the actual number of applications made for loans. If this is so, neither would they have any accurate knowledge of the reasons why certain applicants have been rejected. I do not think this is quite good enough, and I hope that some system of reporting can be set up to make this information available.

I note from the Farm Credit Corporation's last annual report that it had been decided to set up appeal boards in each province. I am informed that this has been done, and I hope that we will have their reports, with pertinent statistics included in the next annual report of the corporation—although I fully realize this would not give us the whole picture I am seeking, but it would at least give us some information on those who applied, were rejected and did appeal.

I now return to my original premise and I repeat it—namely, that the all-important measure in the Throne Speech for farmers seeking a livelihood on uneconomic farms is that which states that "proposals will be made for redevelopment of uneconomic farms." First, these proposals must be brought forward and spelled out in some detail. After the legislation is passed the proposals must be implemented. Following that, it is then a matter of waiting to determine what degree of success such a program is achieving. I am sure we are all hopeful and give the program our close support in every way possible. On its success primarily depends the degree of assistance that will eventually be given this class of farmer by the other proposals outlined. Of necessity, this must be a long-range program; results will certainly not be evident in the immediate future. This means that other measures—"stop-gaps," if you will—must be implemented now to save this class of farmer. When we have all the farm legislation before us, perhaps we will find that it may do just that. In so far as eastern Nova Scotia is concerned, I am going to suggest—and I hope I have the support of Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton) and Senator Urquhart in this—that immediately some way should be found to assist the fluid milk producers there. As it happens, they represent the core of farming in these six eastern counties of Nova Scotia. They do not live on uneconomic units in the sense that their farms are too small or inadequately equipped, or that the operators do not have the know-how. No, it is simply a case of their requiring a more realistic price for the milk they produce in excess of fluid requirements. At present this price ranges from a low of $2 per hundredweight to a high of $2.50. It is not supported under the national dairy policy as is manufactured milk at $3.50 per hundredweight and with respect to which, as we know, the producers in this category are seeking $4 per hundredweight.

The volume of this excess or surplus milk over and above fluid requirements is not large, and yet this ridiculously low price of from $2 to $2.50 per hundredweight is such a discouraging factor that substantial numbers are in the process of attempting to liquidate their investment in the industry. As I already stated, these fluid milk producers are not subsidized in any way other than by freight assistance on imported feed grains.

It is reliably estimated that to support their present excess production at a price of $4 would cost approximately $30,000 in the first year and, if guaranteed over a period of five years as is being requested, this excess would not rise beyond a required subsidy of $90,000 in the fifth year by reason of encouraged production resulting from the guarantee of $4 per hundredweight.

We all realize that it may be very difficult to devise a means for paying a direct subsidy to a particular area with, perhaps, a unique problem. Therefore, I am not advocating that this should necessarily come under the national policy, unless several other areas of Canada are so affected, which I rather doubt. I believe instead that a special agency under ARDA, or other legislation, could meet this regional problem.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Yes.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Do they not come under the Public Utilities Board of Nova Scotia with respect to an increase in the price to the consumer?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Yes they do, Senator Isnor, but the price to the producers of milk in the six eastern counties of Nova Scotia is set and established by the Cape Breton Milk Board which is made up of three members representative of the consumers, the distributors and the producers.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: But it is a local board?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): It is a local board, that is correct.

The third group that I referred to in my three main categories comprise those living on small farms but securing most of their entire income from other than farm sources. I have suggested that many of these people grow or produce a few basic commodities for their own use, such as milk, meat, butter and vegetables. I am certainly not referring to these people as farmers, nor would I expect that farm legislation should encompass this group which, in my province, constitutes a rather large number of people. I mention them only because they make up an important segment of our rural districts, and they play their full role in the growth and development of these communities which are part and parcel of our Canadian way of life. They too have their needs, such as adequate housing and full employment, and here other agencies of government can do much to assist. Perhaps their acreage could be put to good use in providing these families with much-needed supplementary incomes.

Honourable senators, I am not going to make any apologies for having taken up all my time discussing proposals for farm legislation. As I have already pointed out, the Government of the day has seen fit to devote over one-third of its legislative intentions to this important subject, and obviously I go along with those intentions wholeheartedly. In conclusion, I simply say that if it is the primary objective of the Government in its proposals in the Speech from the Throne to attack the problem of rural poverty, then those proposals which have a direct bearing on the uneconomic farm units will be successful only if they are implemented aggressively with funds, personnel and the co-operation of governments at all levels.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aird, debate adjourned.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Cook for the second reading of Bill S-14, to amend the Bills of Exchange Act.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, it is my intention to comment only briefly on this bill which, although short, is nevertheless of considerable importance to the business community of this country.

First of all I should like to commend the honourable Leader of the Government for his good judgment in arranging to have bills such as this introduced in this chamber. The bill to amend the Bankruptcy Act, which was introduced here, and spoken to this afternoon, is another example. This shows that while the other place talks about various other matters, some of more and some of less consequence, the main business of Parliament, which is legislation, can be proceeded with here in a very businesslike manner.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Senator Cook has explained the provisions of this bill, the main one of which makes Saturday a juridical day for banking purposes if a bank is open on that day. The practical consequence of this is that banks are enabled to become more responsive to the needs of the business community and the public generally—that is, more responsive to the requirements of business than heretofore.

Another provision enables a bank to close on a week day, which may be necessary in order for it to comply with the provisions of the Canadian Labour (Standards) Code which was enacted last year. The technical banking problem to be faced in this event is: what happens when a bill or note falls due on such a day? This bill provides that all rights are preserved by the presentation of the bill or note on the next business day.

The final provision of the bill is that certain holidays are juridical days for banks.

To my mind this bill, by and large, is important as it removes some of the present rigidities in banking, and gives the banks a greater opportunity for serving the public need. I am sure every member of this house will support it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Cook, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

PROGRESS OF SUPPLY LEGISLATION

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I think I should advise my colleagues of the situation in regard to our prospective sittings for the next day or two, as promised yesterday afternoon.

I am advised that the House of Commons is still considering some of the Estimates for the year 1965-66. The latest information I have is that the members are all determined to complete their consideration of the Estimates not later than tomorrow, and to pass the final supply bill so that we may receive it at some hour tomorrow.

I would therefore ask honourable senators to agree to sit tomorrow. When that time arrives we will see what we can do with a view to finalizing the interim supply bill and perhaps having Royal Assent later in the day. If that happens, I will suggest tomorrow evening that we adjourn until Tuesday next.

May I remind honourable senators that it is advisable to have a reasonable number of senators present at the Royal Assent. I would ask senators to be good enough, if their convenience allows, to be present in as great numbers as possible tomorrow, both for the sitting in the afternoon and for the Royal Assent later.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden for the second reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I adjourned this debate yesterday afternoon, but my friend the honourable Senator Walker, by virtue of the exigencies of time, would like to speak now in my place. I would ask leave of the house accordingly, and that I might enter the debate at a later stage.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. David J. Walker: I thank the honourable senator for yielding to me at this time, and I would like to commend, for all of us, the honourable Senator Hayden who made such a logical, comprehensive and lucid explanation of Bill S-17 yesterday. After all, he was the chairman of the committee years ago that went into this matter, and he did his work very well.

This is a most important bill because, I suppose, there is no piece of federal legislation which has been more often breached or contravened than the Bankruptcy Act —nothing, at least, since the days of prohibition; and, although Bill S-17 goes a long way in regard to certain branches of the bankruptcy jurisdiction, nevertheless, it does not go far enough and the inevitable result will be that we shall have to have a new and comprehensive Bankruptcy Act.

Just as this house so carefully passed the Canada Corporations Act, we require similar legislation with regard to the Bankruptcy Act. However, one must give credit for this interim piece of legislation for plugging many of the loopholes that are presently glaringly evident in the Bankruptcy Act. For instance, in the old act we find no distinction whatsoever between insolvency situations for transactions between a debtor and his creditors with whom he deals at arm's length, or where they are strangers to one another, and transactions between a debtor and creditors whom the debtor really controls, or what are called transactions at non-arm's length. It is a fact in bankruptcy, aside from theft or misappropriation of funds, that most of the frauds committed by debtors are the result of collusion between a debtor and creditors with whom the debtor does not deal at arm's length. For example, take the case of two or more corporations which are owned by one shareholder, and one corporation manages to get all the liabilities and another corporation gets all the assets, and then the corporation with all the liabilities goes into bankruptcy—a thing that is very common. There is also no question about this, that it is obvious where a person or corporation does not deal at arm's length with a debtor, such a person or corporation can establish a very substantial claim against the debtor by way of exorbitant charges or some other form of fraud to the detriment of the bona fide creditor. Honourable senators can see how people related by blood or marriage, or by joint association, can have a creditor build up exorbitant claims to the detriment of the bona fide creditors.

Clause 1 of this bill, which I think is the most important part of it, will make reviewable by the Superintendent of Bankruptcy all such transactions not made at arm's length. This will apply to all related groups. Whoever drafted this bill has gone into that aspect very fully in covering groups related by blood or marriage and those with corporate connections. No longer will any related group be permitted to enter into such transactions, free from the possibility of review by the Superintendent of Bankruptcy.

As I have said, clause 1 does put teeth into the act, and if properly administered the teeth could cut pretty fine. It is my understanding that we have now a new Superintendent of Bankruptcy, and this clause will give him a tremendous opportunity of fearlessly enforcing the act. I trust he will do so, and in doing so will have the backing of the government of the day without any fear or favour.

Clause 2, which honourable senators will find on page 3 of the bill, contains another very important change. It gives to the superintendent very wide powers by way of seizing property and banking the funds with the Receiver General, where, as so often happens, a trustee has died or has ceased to operate or is under investigation. This is a very important change and should afford protection to the bankrupt estate.

Honourable senators will notice how the draftsmen of this legislation are trying to close the gaps, and block the loopholes that have so flagrantly existed up to the present time.

Clause 3, which is on page 4, gives to the superintendent broad powers to investigate any person not only after a bankruptcy but—and this is very important—before a bankruptcy where there are reasonable grounds for suspicion. That is going a long way. I am not saying that I approve or do not approve the wording of that clause, but it does show that it is an effort towards blocking out the kind of fraud that has been so rampant under the act.

Honourable senators, clauses 7, 8 and 9 appear on pages 7 and 8 of the bill. I am reviewing these in order to illustrate the principle of the bill. These clauses provide for the efficient dealing with of approval or non-approval by creditors or by a court of a proposal by an insolvent person. Up to the present time this procedure has been very hazy and haphazard in the manner of its working.

Turning to page 9, I refer you to clause 10, which expands the power of the trustee to force the bankrupt to hand over newly-acquired assets after his bankruptcy, at least a portion of his income, to the trustee for the benefit of the creditors.

At page 10 we have clauses 11 and 12 which extend from three months to twelve months—and this is very important—the time prior to a bankruptcy during which any conveyance or transfer of property may be investigated, set aside or recovered. In other words, when a person is going into bankruptcy you often see that he starts getting rid of his assets a year before. At the present time you may go back three months; now this period is to be extended to twelve months. It is, quite properly, a step in the right direction.

In clause 13 on page 12 we find that a creditor not dealing at arm's length is to be prevented from voting as a creditor under certain circumstances. Honourable senators can imagine what a fraud it can be to have creditors who are friends of the debtor, and who might have built up fraudulent claims, sitting in and voting with the bona fide creditors. This prevents such creditors not dealing at arm's length from voting under certain circumstances.

Clause 14 provides that a creditor who has entered into a reviewable transaction—and I have gone into the transactions which are reviewable—prior to the bankruptcy shall not be paid until the other creditors are paid, unless, of course, the court finds the transaction to be a bona fide one.

Clause 15 was in the 1963 bill. It has been reviewed and already passed in this house, and therefore needs no comment from me or any other speaker.

Clause 16 gives the official receiver very wide powers of inquiry which he never had before; those powers are tremendously wide in scope.

Clause 18 which is also important, requires the trustee within two months of his appointment to give a report to the Superintendent of Bankruptcy—not just a haphazard report. He is obliged to answer categorically in full detail certain questions of the bankrupt estate which he is administering.

Clause 19 prevents anyone from soliciting another person to go into bankruptcy. In the past it has prevented trustees from doing so, but the trustee can get around that by having someone else solicit on his behalf. You can see the folly of not having such an amendment as we have here.

The provision also prevents such person from receiving any gift while acting as a trustee. One would have thought that would be understood by everyone, but it requires legislation to bring this to the attention of certain trustees, that they are not to accept gifts from the debtors or anybody else while the bankruptcy is under administration.

Clause 20 makes it obligatory on the official receiver or trustee to report to the Deputy Attorney General where he suspects any offence which might be contrary to the criminal Code. One might also expect that would have been provided in the old act, but it was not. Many trustees not only suspected but knew about crimes but would just say nothing about it. Now it becomes obligatory to report.

Clause 21 inserts into the Bankruptcy Act very detailed provisions, which my friend the honourable Senator Hayden dealt with so ably yesterday—provisions relating to the orderly payment of debts, similar to those which have heretofore been passed in certain of the western provinces and found to be ultra vires because bankruptcy is a dominion-wide matter.

Honourable senators, I could continue, but I simply take those clauses from the bill to illustrate how the principle here of widening the authority of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy and the trustees can make for a great improvement in the elimination of fraud.

In conclusion, the Bankruptcy Act, as we know so well, has been for so long thwarted and transgressed in so many devious ways in the past, that I for one cannot say that Bill S-17 plugs up all the loopholes, or even a goodly portion, in the present act. However, it is at least a step in the right direction. It is an interim bill.

I do not think that anyone would be in a position to pass final judgment on the bill at this time. However, in all conscience I do feel it is absolutely necessary to approve this bill in principle, subject to specific objections which I may have, and which certain others will have, when it reaches the committee stage. It would be advisable for this bill to be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee, and I am sure that the honourable chairman of that committee (Hon. Mr. Hayden) will give every opportunity to those who would like to be heard on this extremely important subject.

May I also add that I am happy to note that the drafters of the bill have incorporated in it many submissions of the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Toronto, which laboured very hard on this subject for many years.

However, such provisions as are now outlined in this bill are useless unless they are zealously enforced under the penalty clauses. I think such clauses may be changed later in the Bankruptcy Act, and certainly under the Criminal Code, particularly for fraud. The provisions must be zealously enforced or else the Bankruptcy Act will continue as a mockery.

The new superintendent is a lawyer. One perhaps cannot always commend that, but it is a mighty fine thing to have an able lawyer at the head of this particular branch. I sincerely trust that he may not only be aggressive in his efforts but zealous to enforce this act, and that the Government will stand behind him without fear or favour, because the public are behind anything which will improve the present situation. I hope the Superintendent of Bankruptcy will be given not only all the power but all the manpower which he requires to enforce this act.

Honourable senators, this legislation is long overdue.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. John B. Aird: Honourable senators, before I proceed with the main body of my remarks, I would like to congratulate both the mover (Hon. Mr. McDonald) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Gouin) of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Senator Gouin is, of course, one of the most distinguished members of this house and his address has enhanced that reputation. Senator Hamilton McDonald is also to be congratulated on his speech. I am sure that he will make a fine contribution to this place and, as he has already demonstrated, his legislative experience will be of assistance in its deliberations.

Most sincerely I would also like to congratulate the Honourable Sydney Smith on his appointment as Speaker. I am confident that I speak on behalf of all senators when I say that he is most worthy of our continued support and respect.

I also wish to record my sense of deep shock at the tragic loss of Senator Bouffard who, in the very regrettable absence of Senator John Connolly, had just assumed the role of Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate and was so ably performing his duties in his usual competent and pleasant manner. His death is a great loss to us here, and, in my opinion, a great loss to the country as well. He will be sadly missed.

It is a matter of some personal pleasure to me to extend to the new members of the Senate a warm word of welcome. Several of them are close personal friends of mine, but I feel that I speak on behalf of all honourable senators when I say that they are most welcome arrivals.

Honourable senators, I would like to develop for your consideration some thoughts that present themselves to me as a result of the Speech from the Throne and the remarks made on that speech by Senators Gouin and McDonald and by subsequent speakers. These thoughts relate in particular to the present performance of the Canadian economy and the activities of the Economic Council of Canada, together with some comments on federalism as I believe it should exist in our country today.

Following its excellent initial report of a year ago, the Economic Council of Canada in its second Annual Review has provided a good deal more useful direction towards the development of appropriate economic strategy for Canada over the next few years.

Once again the report has concentrated on longer-run considerations and has sought in particular to define ways in which the productivity of the Canadian economy could be significantly improved. However, much more so than in its first report, the council has also taken a close look at the recent performance of the economy; and, even though some important aspects of its analysis have been rather quickly out-dated by subsequent events, its attempt to partly bridge the difficult gap between the objectives of the longer run and the practicalities of immediate policy decisions is to be commended.

In its review of Canada's economic performance through to the later part of 1965, the key point brought out by the council is the heartening return towards full utilization of the country's productive potential which has occurred over the past five years.

Based on the council's careful calculations, the total economy, which had dropped from an operating level of 102 per cent of capacity in 1956 to 91 per cent in 1961, had improved to 97 per cent in 1965. In fact, with the sustained strength of expansion in late 1965 and into the present year, the calculated operating level now would be a little higher still and, having in mind the inevitable difficulties in making such calculations, it is clear that the economy has now entered a much different set of conditions from that which prevailed for the past several years. With a previous high rate of unemployment and much unused productive capacity, it was obviously appropriate to give primary emphasis to expansion and to the removal of slack in the economy. But now that the slack has been greatly reduced, the problem has become the much more complex one of how to sustain a somewhat more moderate but still substantial rate of expansion, an expansion that is roughly in line with the steady growth in the country's productive potential.

In this situation—as the Economic Council, the Bank of Canada and others have been pointing out—there are important new risks confronting the Canadian economy. Most important, undoubtedly, is the danger that continued rapid expansion, spurred on by the growing U.S. commitments in Vietnam, will seriously increase the strains on the economy that began to emerge in 1965. Undue pressure on resources can lead only to undesirable increases in prices and costs, to adverse tendencies in our international trading position, and to growing financial strains. Even moderate pressures, indeed, may still encourage the kind of distortions and instabilities that undermine the country's ability to maintain a healthy and adequate growth over the longer term.

Fortunately, a number of measures have been taken which will be working to hold demands within sustainable bounds during the year ahead. Here, I would include the deferral of some Government construction projects, the move to a less expansive monetary policy, and the initial impact of contributory payments into the Canada Pension Plan. But what we should be prepared for, I believe, are even further steps of this kind, should demand pressures continue to wax as strongly as they have in the past few months.

Most of the time, as I am sure you would agree, the arguments for measures of economic restraint are couched in the defensive sense of protecting the economy from the obvious damage and danger of inflationary conditions. But what I should like to suggest is the more positive view that, if only we can keep the economy on the path of vigorous but not excessive expansion, we have a much better chance to move ahead effectively on many of the longer-run objectives which the Economic Council has outlined for us. One of the most important lessons of postwar experience, in Europe as well as on this continent, is the way in which productivity gains are encouraged by sustained but non-inflationary growth. In this regard, too little expansion may be just as detrimental as too much expansion, but the dangers of excessive demands are still clear.

Moreover, it is obvious that many of the special steps which the Economic Council recommends for the longer-run improvement of Canadian productivity will be easier to achieve in conditions of healthy expansion.

The council lays great importance on the need for improving "the quality of productive input," and particularly of course on the crucial importance of education and training. But efforts in this direction require a considerable expenditure of resources, as well as a good deal of thought as to the best means of achieving the desired ends. In the first regard, at least, the maintenance of a vigorous economy can be very helpful. It can clearly be helpful also in such other matters as the enlargement of industrial research and development, in the supporting of longer-run trade and tariff negotiations designed to open up wider markets for efficient and lower-cost production, and in the development of more effective methods of promoting labour mobility.

In all of these matters, however, there are still a great many questions to be answered, and particularly with respect to determining appropriate priorities. In the area of education and training, for example, it is obvious that our total requirements for the next few years will be exceedingly great, not only because of the importance of raising our standards of knowledge and skill but also because of the sheer weight of numbers in the 10-to-20 year age group. Yet, in sorting out the kinds of education facilities that are most needed, and in organizing the types of educational and training arrangements that would be most helpful, I am sure that we need a lot more analysis, study and discussion than we have managed to date. Under the inescapable pressures that have already developed, decisions are of course being made, and many of them may turn out for the best; but there is enough in the way of unbalanced programs with resulting indecision and outright confusion to give any serious observer a good deal of cause for concern. In this regard, it is to be remembered that the Bladen Commission included a recommendation that one of the federal ministers of the Crown be given as one of his duties the responsibility of co-ordinating assistance to the universities and that he should appoint a small committee to advise him.

In relation to this specific situation, and in a broader sense as well, I have been very much impressed by an article I came across recently in Fortune magazine, in the January 1966 issue, to be exact. This article presents a most illuminating insight into what Mr. Max Ways, the author and one of the editors of the magazine, sees as a new "creative federalism" in the United States. It seems to me that this concept of "creative federalism" has obvious implications for Canada. And what is particularly striking about the article, apart from its obvious implications for Canada, is the degree to which it points up the parallel problems of management in present-day business and management in a federal governmental system. In both cases, the question of centralization versus decentralization has come up as a major issue. Yet more and more the realization has been growing that the real art of modern-day management lies in neither of these directions by itself, but rather in discovering what things to centralize and what things to decentralize and then in constructing the channels through which information and decision, generated at many levels, are to flow. Such thinking clearly has had its origin in large business organizations and has been spreading, the author suggests, by a process of osmosis into the U.S. governmental sphere.

Honourable senators, I do not believe there is any wide gulf between the requirements of effective management in government and in business. In fact, I believe that if there is any place that Canadians need to have good management it is in government. As a recent member of the Senate Committee on Finance—and this was demonstrated very clearly once again this morning—I have been most impressed by the calibre and dedication of the senior civil servants who have appeared before it, as each has reviewed the implementation of the Glassco Report as it pertained to the respective governmental departments. These are first-class men and Canada should be proud of them. I believe that, because of the Glassco Commission, certain business criteria and disciplines are being put to good use in the administration of government. Together with others, I would like to see this program accelerated.

Now, of course, there is no exact analogy between business and government, because governments do not operate on the profit motive; but I do believe that the revenues received from the taxpayer should be invested by the Government in those areas and programs which will be most effective and rewarding to all Canadians.

I believe that the same type of criteria and discipline that are now being introduced and implemented in government administration should also apply to government policy. A successful example of the kind of policy and action that I am speaking about has been the integration of Canada's defence program. In this program, action was taken to solve a large-scale and long-standing problem; the "politics" of integration was worried about only after the solution had been worked out.

If I may be permitted to quote one particularly revealing portion of Mr. Ways' argument, he points out that what "federalism" means is:

> a relationship, both co-operative and competitive, between a limited central power and other powers that are essentially independent of it. In the long American dialogue over states' rights, it has been tacitly assumed that the total amount of power was constant and, therefore, any increase in federal power diminished the power of the states and/or "the people". "Creative federalism" starts from the contrary belief that total power—private and public, individual and organizational—is expanding very rapidly. As the range of conscious choice widens, it is possible to think of vast increases of federal government power that do not encroach upon or diminish any other power. Simultaneously, the power of states and local governments will increase; the power of private organizations, including businesses, will increase; and the power of individuals will increase. "Creative federalism" as it is now developing emphasizes relationships between Washington and many other independent centers of decision in state and local government, in new public bodies, in universities, in professional organizations, and in business.
> This characteristic of the new programs is part of a rather belated application to government of the organizational habits developed by modern business. While everyone has been watching the influence of government policies on the economy, the impact of the economy's strength and its mode of organization have been quietly altering the way the government works. Tens of thousands of professional and managerial types, in and out of government service, are shaping and executing federal Government programs. This is as it should be, for professional and managerial men are oriented toward direction-choosing and problem-solving within a complex framework of many centres of decision.

Now, even with such a view of "creative federalism", there remain many difficulties in preparing public programs, determining priorities, and so on. But instead of wasting time and energy in fruitless theoretical debates about over-all degrees of centralization and decentralization, it is possible to concentrate more usefully on the practical questions of deciding in particular yet constantly-evolving situations which functions are best to centralize and which ones are best to decentralize.

Out of several specific examples which Mr. Ways uses to illustrate his general view, one of the most interesting is in the area of education, to which I referred earlier. For the U.S. problems in this area, which in many respects are similar to our own, Mr. Ways agrees that the federal Government has no pat solutions, or even any particular competence for finding solutions. Nor has it any set educational philosophy or policy to sell, whatever might be thought either by those who fear, or those who hope, that the federal Government is about to "take over" what has traditionally been considered as a local or regional responsibility. What is expected by the persons most actively involved, however, is that a heavy infusion of federal funds into the education sphere will stimulate innovation and improvement at the specific points where such progress can best be made, nearly all of which in fact are outside the federal organization itself. Analysis of common needs, together with more basic research and experimental activities which in the long run will clearly be in the general national interest, can thus be fostered by the federal Government, even though most of the use and control of the funds involved will in fact be delegated to local or regional authorities, or even to individual university or private research groups. Here, then, we can get at least some glimpse of the "constructive possibilities" contained in the processes of a creative federalism.

It has occurred to me, as perhaps it has to many of you also, that adaptation of this approach could be very helpful to this country in its long-festering concern about development of Canadian resources by Canadians rather than through heavy dependence on foreign-controlled enterprises. One of the oft-expressed concerns about the Government's controversial proposal for a Canada Development Corporation has been the fear that the federal Government by this means would intrude both obstructively and ineffectively into what is the proper sphere for private enterprise. Yet there is no immutable need for this to be so. The national need for more effective economic development by Canadian entities is widely recognized, and is thus an appropriate concern for federal Government strategy. But development is also an even more direct concern of various provincial government agencies, of private financial institutions, and of course of existing business enterprises. Why should it not be possible to harness all of these interests under a federal program which would set out the national objectives but which would delegate to the other interested entities appropriate responsibilities which they are particularly fitted to carry out? Here, to my mind, is one of the biggest challenges I can imagine to those who are seriously interested in a positive and creative federalism in the Canada of today. Even modest action along these lines would speak more loudly than any million words of good intention.

I am the first to recognize that most Canadians like to consider themselves rugged individualists, and I sincerely believe that a common Canadian characteristic is the desire to "compete," in every sense of the word. In fact, I believe that competition is basic to the Canadian way of life. In a country where we are still meeting the challenges of unexplored frontiers, it would be disastrous to stifle the individual spirit and competitive desires. But I do say that the ability of every Canadian to compete individually is a privilege; and, as with all enjoyed privileges worth their salt, there is a price to pay. In Canada's case, the price tag is a certain necessary amount of government involvement in the social and economic affairs of the country. I believe that this responsible, creative, government involvement is necessary to Canada's full development.

Needless to say, I do not believe in the absolute power of the state to resolve Canada's dilemma. But I do believe that the responsible use of the capacity of a unifying central authority can be a tremendous force and can achieve a strong national purpose; this, I believe, is the key factor in Canada's future development and success.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Quart, debate adjourned.

DIVORCE (EXTENSION OF GROUNDS) BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck moved the second reading of Bill S-19, to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorce a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief.

He said: Honourable senators, at the outset may I have your indulgence to say a word of welcome to the new senators who have joined us recently, and to express the hope that they will find satisfaction in the duties they have undertaken and pleasure in the good fellowship which they will find in this chamber. I wish them long life and success in their sojourn among us in their new environment, the Senate of Canada.

In addressing myself to the bill now under consideration, I would point out that this is not the first time an effort has been made in the Senate of Canada to widen the grounds upon which the courts of Canada may grant dissolution of marriage.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Would you mind explaining what a vinculo matrimonii means?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The Latin word vinculum singular, or vinculo plural, means bonds, ties—I suppose in modern language we call it "handcuffs." So vinculo matrimonii are the bonds of matrimony or, more accurately, the bonds of marriage. There are two types of decrees of courts, one from bed and board and the other from the bonds themselves. This is complete divorce in other words, a vinculo matrimonii.

I was going to say that as long ago as 1938 the late Senator McMeans introduced a bill entitled the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill, and the debate on that bill you will find commencing at page 84 in the Debates of the Senate of that year. You may accept my assurance that it is well worth reading.

Senator Aseltine will remember that occasion, for he had the honour of seconding that bill as long ago as 1938, and he made an address in support of the bill—and, I need not add, an excellent one. Senator Farris spoke on that occasion, and my deskmate, Senator Hugessen, was a member of the committee that considered the bill. If my information is correct, they not only reported it but did so unanimously. Perhaps Senator Hugessen will correct me if my information is incorrect. The bill was passed by this house. What happened to it thereafter, I am not sure, but I think it probably died on the Commons Order Paper, for there seems to be no further record of it. Had I been a member of this chamber at that time I would, of course, have voted for that bill. However, I did not enter the Senate until 1945, some 21 years ago.

That bill was followed by another introduced in 1955 by Senator Aseltine, which was also entitled the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill. It went a little further than the bill introduced by Senator McMeans, but it really was a similar bill. The debate on that bill you will find commencing at page 210 of the Debates of Senate of that year, 1955. I trust my colleagues will pardon me if I give a good many references as I go along so that the research I have done will be of use to those who may wish to read the material which I have read.

The motion for second reading of that bill was, of course, led by Senator Aseltine and in a masterly address. I have read what he said on that occasion and I am impressed with the mass of information he had marshalled and the breadth of his knowledge of the subject.

You will note the bill I have the honour to introduce is entitled the Divorce (Extension of Grounds) Act, 1966. It is not a matrimonial causes act, in the sense that it does not intend to enact a comprehensive matrimonial or divorce or marriage law for application in all Canada, as did those bills of my distinguished predecessors. Senator Aseltine's bill covered seven and a half pages, and it dealt with many phases of matrimonial relationships, such as the presumption of death, judicial separation, avoidance for non-consummation, and legitimacy; all, by the way, subject of consideration which I rather fancy we will later take up some time.

Mine, on the contrary, is a simple bill. It would not affect the law of Canada on divorce or other matrimonial matters as they exist today, with the exception only that it would extend the grounds upon which the courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii to three further grounds: desertion for three years, cruelty, and of unsound mind, which I will describe later. And note, please, it has no application in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland.

I believe there is yet another difference between the bill which I have now laid before you and those introduced by my predecessors. Senator McMeans and Senator Aseltine produced a great deal of evidence of public opinion in favour of divorce reform, and there was undoubtedly considerable public support for it at that time, but it would seem from what later happened in Parliament, that they were in advance of their times. I am not so surprised at Senator Aseltine, for I have found him way out in front on many occasions.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And ably so. I hope that times now have caught up to me in the introduction of this bill because, honourable senators, it seems to me that public opinion, as I find it in Canada, is now such that the time has come for extending the grounds upon which the courts may grant divorces, and also that restricting the ground to this one item of adultery is archaic, that it produces many evil consequences, and that it denies to many suffering from broken marriages for which they are not responsible the relief they so greatly require; further, that it leads to many immoral practices, such as "common law" marriages, adultery for court purposes, and the fabrication of evidence—and I think I could add other things besides those.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Perjury and collusion.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, thank you for the addition—and a good many other things.

How many "common law" marriages there are in Canada I, of course, do not know, and I think no one else does. There are no D.B.S. statistics on the matter.

When he was speaking in support of his bill Senator Aseltine estimated that there were 20,000, and someone in the Ontario Legislature quite recently, in a report published in the Star of February 23 last, estimated the number to be 250,000. Well, there are only four million marriages in Canada, so it seems to me that estimate is high.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think 50,000 is about correct.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Perhaps so; 50,000 is a substantial figure. It is impossible for us actually to know because we have taken no surveys of that nature. Fifty thousand "common law" marriages is something that should stop us for a moment to consider what it means from the human standpoint. Fifty thousand "common law" marriages in the dominion of Canada—I do not know how many there are in fact, but certainly there are very many, and very many too many.

I know from my own personal experience that there are simply thousands of people in this country who have been faced with living celibate for the rest of their lives, or the rest of the life of their opposite spouse, or, alternatively, firstly, of seeking divorce in the United States which is, of course, in almost all instances not recognized in this country, is very unsatisfactory, is illegal without question and, although in some respects socially recognized, is to be avoided; secondly, of bringing about in some way an act of adultery on the part of the opposite spouse, or waiting to take advantage of such immorality on his or her part, or, as was just suggested to me a moment ago, fabricating the evidence; thirdly, of living themselves in adultery in what is euphoniously known as a "common law" relationship. I have not mentioned a possible fourth alternative—I do not know whether it is an alternative or not—of free love or promiscuous intercourse, for those who have a taste for that sort of thing.

I suggest to you that this is an intolerable condition of law in this country. It is what this bill attempts in a modest way to correct, at least to some extent, by adding to this ground of adultery the further grounds of cruelty, desertion for three years, or five years of insanity while confined in an institution which I will define a little more fully later on. As I say, it will have effect in all provinces other than Quebec and Newfoundland.

I have in my hand a book entitled Marriage Breakdown, Divorce, Remarriage—A Christian Understanding in which, if you turn to page 113, you will read this passage:

> It is agreed:
> That this General Council—

That is, the General Council of the United Church of Canada.

> —urge the Federal Government to appoint a Royal Commission on Divorce to consider (a) Such grounds for divorce, in addition to adultery, as wilful desertion for three years, gross cruelty (both physical and mental, carefully defined), and insanity that fails to respond after five years of treatment in an institution.

I might tell you that I did not read that paragraph until after I had drawn this bill, but it does show a remarkable similarity of thought between myself and the General Council of the United Church of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Except for mental cruelty. I was going to ask my honourable friend about paragraph (b) of clause 2(1), which reads:

> has since the celebration of the marriage treated the petitioner with cruelty.

I was wondering there if it should not say "physical or mental, or both".

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I leave the answering of that question to the time when I shall be discussing these particular features of the bill itself? A quick reply is that the added words are not necessary, because this clause is phrased in the very words of the English act, and we have a great mass of judicial decisions awaiting us that would apply in the interpretation of this clause. I might tell you that in the English Act and in the English administration both physical and mental cruelty are prohibited.

I have another book here that is perhaps not as impressive, but it is certainly well done. It is entitled Canada's need for Divorce Reform, by Reverend C. Bernard Reynolds, M.A., B.D. of Victoria. I would prefer to leave a description of this book to Senator Farris who comes from that part of Canada and who, no doubt, knows Reverend Reynolds well. This book makes a most powerful case for reforming the situation as it now exists in Canada.

A somewhat similar resolution to that of the General Council of the United Church was passed recently by the Canadian Bar Association. There have also been many, many editorials on the subject in the newspapers. I have one here from the Toronto Daily Star which is headed: "Bring Divorce Laws out of Victorian Age." I will not go into it further because there are so many newspapers all over Canada which have expressed similar opinions.

The Toronto Daily Star reported—this is not an editorial but a report—on February 24, 1966 in these words:

> Justice Minister Lucien Cardin told a reporter that he had detected a new "climate of religious and social tolerance" towards divorce which would enable Parliament to liberalize the law.

I hope he is correct in that statement.

I have said that this bill will not change the law of divorce or of matrimonial causes other than in the additions which, up to this moment, I have only outlined. I think it would be useful in our consideration of the bill for me to say something as to what the law is now in the Dominion of Canada, because it is complex and not without difficulty in both discovering it and understanding it. Let me commence, then, with the Province of Nova Scotia.

The law of Nova Scotia on divorce is expressed in two pre-Confederation statutes passed in 1864 and 1866. Honourable senators will find them set out, if they wish more detailed information, in The Law and Practice of Divorce in Canada by Cartwright and Lovekin at page 469. This is a well-known textbook on divorce, and is an authority on the subject. You may take from the act cited there this phrase granting power to the courts of Nova Scotia prior to Confederation:

> The court shall have jurisdiction over all matters relating to prohibited marriages and divorce, and may declare any marriage null and void for impotence, adultery, cruelty, pre-contract, or kindred within the degrees prohibited in an Act made in the thirty-second year of King Henry the Eighth—

I do not wonder that somebody smiles to discover that the law of Canada relates back to an act passed in the reign of King Henry VIII.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: On divorce.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, on divorce at that. Well, he ought to know about it, of course.

Nova Scotia is the only province in Canada in which cruelty is a ground for dissolution of marriage. New Brunswick, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island all rely on pre-Confederation law which continues in force by virtue of section 129 of the British North America Act.

Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta operate under acts which were passed for their incorporation as provinces, and they all give authority to their courts in accordance with the law of England as it existed on the 15th day of July 1870.

An Ontario act was passed by the dominion Parliament enabling the Supreme Court of Ontario to annul or dissolve marriages in accordance with the law of England as of the 15th day of July 1870. That may be found in the Statutes of Canada passed in 1930. On the other hand, the courts of Quebec and Newfoundland have no jurisdiction whatsoever.

The law of England with regard to divorce, as it existed in July 1870, was enacted in the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857, 20-21 Victoria, Chapter 85. It is set out practically in full in The Law and Practice of Divorce in Canada, by Cartwright and Lovekin, at page 540. It allows a wife to apply for a divorce against her husband on the following grounds: incestuous adultery, bigamy with adultery, rape, sodomy and bestiality. That is the law so far as the statutes are concerned which we read into the law of Canada.

We have not hesitated, honourable senators, to amend the Imperial Act of 1870, to remedy in part the barbarity of those times.

In 1925 Parliament passed the Marriage and Divorce Act, to be found in the Revised Statutes of Canada 1952, chapter 176, which allows a wife to sue her husband for divorce on the grounds of simple adultery, and not adultery mixed with some other cause, in those courts in Canada having jurisdiction to dissolve marriages a vinculo matrimonii; and it places the husband and wife on pretty much the same grounds in basic law.

By the way, that act also removed the marriage disability of brothers and sisters of deceased wives and husbands.

Now, while clause 26 of section 91 of the British North America Act gives jurisdiction to the dominion Parliament on marriage and divorce, yet Parliament has for the past 99 years refrained from passing any comprehensive legislation with respect to divorce. There are four acts, and four only, dealing with this subject of divorce in all that time. The first of these Acts is that already quoted, the Marriage and Divorce Act of 1925, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, chapter 176. The second Act is the Divorce Jurisdiction Act, Statutes of Canada 1930, chapter 15, to be found in the Revised Statutes of Canada 1952, chapter 84.

That is an important act which we have used frequently in the Divorce Committee, and which is now being used here and elsewhere. It permits a married woman after two years of desertion by her husband to apply to the courts of her province on the ground of adultery, notwithstanding that her husband since the desertion has moved his domicile elsewhere. It is a humane and useful act.

The third act is the Divorce Act of Ontario, Statutes of Canada 1930, chapter 14, or Revised Statutes of Canada 1952, chapter 85, giving to the Supreme Court of Ontario power to dissolve or annul marriages in accordance with the law of England as it existed on the 15th day of July 1870.

Finally, there is a British Columbia Divorce Appeals Act, Statutes of Canada 1937, chapter 4, or Revised Statutes of Canada 1952, chapter 21, which gives to the Court of Appeal of the Province of British Columbia authority over the provincial courts of that province in divorce and matrimonial causes.

That is all; and does it not indicate hesitancy on the part of Parliament, having such broad powers to deal with a subject of such grave importance in the lives of our people?

Perhaps I may summarize in this way: There are four provinces that rely on pre-Confederation statutes—British Columbia, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island; three that rely on provisions in the act of their own incorporation —Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan; one, a special act, that of the Province of Ontario; then there are two where there is no jurisdiction.

Honourable senators, before turning to the bill itself, I should say that the bill was drawn in collaboration with Senator Croll—and it is unfortunate that he is absent from the chamber—who seconds the bill. He is entitled to the credit of initiating the present effort of the Senate to bring to many suffering souls in Canada marital peace and a measure of common sense and humanity.

I understand that Senator Croll worked on this subject for two years, without my knowledge, notwithstanding the burden which he has borne as Chairman of the Special Committee on Aging. This was before I had determined that the time was ripe for Senate action.

The bill was also drawn in collaboration with Mr. Robert McCleave, M.P., who until the change of Government in 1963 was Chairman of the Private Bills Committee in the Commons, having charge of divorce bills. I worked in closest association with him in those difficult times, and I owe a debt of gratitude for the co-operation he gave us in the Senate. Mr. McCleave has introduced in the Commons a bill similar in all respects to mine, and he has described it as such.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: How many bills of this nature have been introduced in the Commons this session?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Eight—and this is the ninth. I will come to that in a moment.

Let me now turn to the bill itself. You will note that the title as I have described it is, "Divorce (Extension of Grounds) Act, 1966". It is not a matrimonial causes act, changing in a comprehensive way the law of marriage and divorce throughout Canada. It is not that and is not intended to be that.

Honourable senators, you will observe that clause 2 affects only those courts having jurisdiction to grant divorce a vinculo matrimonii, that is, those provinces other than Quebec and Newfoundland.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Would the honourable senator permit me a question?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: It has to do with the Provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. Those provinces have no courts with jurisdiction to deal with divorce matters. If this bill passes, will a citizen from Quebec or Newfoundland be able to take advantage of these new grounds through a private bill, as is done now?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No. I think the answer is no, but it must be a qualified no. You will understand that a bill of divorce passed by the Parliament of Canada may be on any grounds, or no grounds at all, limited only by the practice which we have observed. We have complete power to do as we please in this matter, because the British North America Act gave us that power. So far we have exercised the power only in accordance with the law of England as it was on the 15th day of July 1870. We have seldom, if ever, stepped aside from those grounds; that is, nullity because of non-consummation caused by the inability of one or other of the parties, and divorce on the grounds of adultery, sodomy, bestiality. We have never yet, as far as I know, passed a bill on the grounds of desertion or cruelty.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: May I intervene? I do not think my honourable friend has grasped the question of the honourable Senator Deschatelets. What he wants to know is this, as I gather from his question: If this bill passes both houses, will anyone from the Province of Quebec or the Province of Newfoundland be able to avail himself of any of those four grounds? I think the answer would be "yes".

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The answer is no. As far as the bill is concerned, and as far as the new act, if the bill becomes an act, is concerned, they will not be able to avail themselves of it, except in this way, that I do hope that the widening of the grounds to a more reasonable extent will result in honourable senators, such as the honourable senator who asked me the question, taking action on behalf of their provinces amending this bill to extend it to those provinces.

We in this chamber, and in the Commons as well, have been careful in the years gone by never to pass laws which seem to be oppressive to the Province of Quebec. It is not our desire to force anything on any province. I am fairly confident that we have public opinion with us in the common law provinces. I hope we have it with us also in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. I am anticipating some action on behalf of the representatives of those provinces in connection with this matter. Does that answer the question?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Not to my satisfaction, I must say.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Where have I lapsed?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, so as to clarify this somewhat further, may I ask a supplementary question? Supposing this bill passes Parliament and supposing Quebec and Newfoundland continue to apply to Parliament for divorces, will these grounds apply to those two provinces?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: May I ask the honourable Senator Roebuck this question: would the Senate Standing Committee on Divorce not be influenced by the passage of this bill?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I think the answer is no. The committee so far and, as I forecast, in the future, will grant divorces according to law and according to the practice of the past. That is what we have tried to do over the years. Observe this, that these resolutions which I have been laying before you in such great numbers of late are passed in accordance with the Act of Parliament passed in 1963, the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act, which limits us to the causes expressed in the English act of 1870, and in the Canadian act which I have already referred to, which however adds no grounds to the English act. All those cases that you see here are limited, and all within the four corners of the law of England of 1870, and we have no power to go beyond that. We have the power, as I have just said, to pass a bill on any grounds that we see fit, because we are supreme in the Parliament of Canada; but so far we have restrained ourselves in that respect and have observed our limitations carefully and rigidly, as we have with regard to the resolution powers provided in the act of 1963.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Would it not clarify the whole problem if the word "now" were inserted after the word "court", to make it read "in any court now having jurisdiction"? It could not possibly apply to Quebec and Newfoundland.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, it does not apply to those provinces because of the insertion of the word "now".

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is the question that has been asked—does it apply to Quebec or Newfoundland? It would put it beyond all question if in the first line of paragraph 2 the word "now" were inserted after the word "court".

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: So as to read "In any court now having jurisdiction to grant divorce a vinculo matrimonii"?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That would make it still more sure that it did not apply to the Provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland, which I think a complete reading of the clause also makes clear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In the bill that you mentioned which I had something to do with, it was described that way. It did not apply to Quebec or Newfoundland either.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Let me read the clause:

> In any court having jurisdiction to grant divorce a vinculo matrimonii any husband or wife may commence an action praying that the marriage may be dissolved, on the following grounds in addition to any ground upon which the marriage may now be dissolved, namely—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That does not include the Senate. We decided some time ago that the Senate committee hearing divorce petitions is considered as a court; and I say that it is absolutely useless to pass this measure if we have only in mind to say to the provinces which are already dealing with divorces: "We are giving you the privilege of accepting these grounds"—such as we said in 1930 in the case of Ontario, for instance. We can delegate our power to Ontario courts to deal with divorces. Now, is that the procedure you intend to follow for those who are interested in this bill, to pass these grounds and offer them wholesale to the provinces who are already dissolving marriages?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I think the people are under the impression that we want to add to the grounds right here in the Senate to start with.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: For Newfoundland and Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes. That would be the purpose. May I add one more word? I am sure that my friend has already explained that the Senate has unlimited powers, and surely they will accept these four additional grounds. What is the use of saying no?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I intend to move later on that this bill be referred to a committee, and if my friend will move in that committee to extend these grounds to Quebec and Newfoundland, and if I feel that there is public opinion in those provinces which justifies my action, I would be delighted to vote for it.

It is not included in this bill because I am very careful not to do anything that looks like coercion with respect to those two great provinces. Now, let me go on.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Could I ask the honourable senator one question in that connection? I have understood him to say many times in the Senate that the basis of the granting of a divorce by the Senate, to take a short cut, is the right of the individual to petition the Crown. Does the honourable senator suggest that by the passage of this measure we will be in the situation where a petitioner from Newfoundland or Quebec petitioning the Crown will be told, "We have a different law for the rest of the country and a different law for you"?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is what we have now and have had since Confederation.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: My understanding is that the petitioner from Newfoundland or Quebec now petitioning the Crown is being put in the same position in respect to the right to dissolve a marriage as any other Canadian. Is that not the situation now?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: You mean that there is a public opinion in these provinces that desires to be placed on the same grounds as the rest of Canada? Is that what you are asking me?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: No. I am suggesting that that is the situation now, that a petitioner from Quebec or Newfoundland proceeding by way of petition to the Senate is actually obtaining the same rights with regard to the dissolution of marriage as any other Canadian citizen.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: He is not on the same ground at all. The citizen of Ontario goes to the courts of Ontario and, while the rules are much the same, his right to divorce is just as it was in England in July 1870. If he is domiciled in these other two provinces he may come to the Senate and get pretty much the same decision.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: May I try to make my question clear. Are we not at the present time by our procedures in the Senate granting to these petitioners the right to be treated exactly the same as any other Canadian? Is not that the present situation?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, from one point of view that is right. In all these provinces divorce is granted only on the grounds of adultery, with the exception only of the Province of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: And we in the Senate cannot deal with questions relating to children.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: We can. We have not done so up to this time. I am perfectly satisfied that the care of children, the division of property between the parties and alimony are ancillary to divorce. We have never exercised that power for the reason that the courts of the provinces in question have been dealing with this subject satisfactorily, and there is no need for us to go into it. Furthermore, we have no machinery here for enforcing our decrees. Therefore, in common sense, we have left these matters to the courts of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Could we not include a definition of the word "court" to include the Senate of Canada? After all a citizen of Newfoundland should be able to get a divorce on these particular grounds as well as a citizen of Ontario. Why not include the Divorce Committee of the Senate of Canada in the definition of the word "court"?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I would be delighted to do so if there is a demand for it from your province.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I think the honourable Senator Roebuck is very wise in refraining from including Quebec in his bill at this time. They have their own feelings there in this matter and I am glad that they have not been included in this bill.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: May I continue to try to clarify my question. Would the effect of this bill not be that the Crown, acting through the Senate Committee on Divorce, would be almost obliged to grant these petitions on the same grounds as govern divorce in the other provinces? Would not that be the effect? I should make clear that I am not opposing the bill, but I want to be clear in my own mind that the consequences of this would be that petitioners from Quebec and Newfoundland would, in effect, be getting dissolution of marriages on the same ground. Would that be the effect?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I hope it will be the effect, but it would require an amendment to the act. We are not doing that now, but we may have to amend it, and perhaps before we conclude this debate.

Section 2 of the bill sets forth three additional grounds. These words are taken holusbolus, almost verbatim, from the Act of the Imperial Parliament as it is now in force in England and as it was in force back in 1870. It is the act which has been in force in England since 1937 when Colonel A. P. Herbert, whom some of you may recognize as the author of the book Holy Deadlock, introduced his Matrimonial Causes Act. The substance of Colonel Herbert's bill is now embodied in the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1950, which is to be found in Rayden on Divorce, ninth edition, page 1381.

The purpose of using the wording of the English act is twofold. First, we in Canada have learned by long experience the wisdom of following the British draftsmen. They have proved themselves very skilful in the choice of words, and they have produced much wise and effective legislation. Secondly, there has developed in the United Kingdom since 1937 a vast body of jurisprudence interpreting and applying this legislation. Drawing this legislation in the same wording, we feel will be of great assistance to our courts which will use and undoubtedly follow the English jurisprudence on this question, both in the interpretation of the words and in the administration of the act.

Honourable senators, let us look now at the grounds themselves. The first is:

> (a) has deserted the petitioner without cause for a period of at least three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

There is no difficulty in understanding what desertion means and it does not require much interpretation. It has been held in the leading case of Froud v. Froud (1904) Probate 177, that "desertion" and "desertion without cause" are the same offence. I recall when we were discussing Senator Aseltine's bill he agreed that that meant unjustified desertion. There is no difficulty in applying that phrase. The second ground is

> (b) has since the celebration of the marriage treated the petitioner with cruelty;

Now, Rayden on Divorce says that the law of cruelty is comprehensively defined by the House of Lords in Collins v. Collins (1963) 2 All England Reports, 966, and Williams v. Williams (1963) 2 All England Reports, 994.

As I read these cases I picked this statement made by Lord Reid, one of the distinguished members of the Court of Appeal in England at that time. In Collins v. Collins, at page 969, Lord Reid said—

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Is he interpreting the word "cruelty" under the English bill?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Under the same wording as in the English act. He said:

> No one has ever attempted to give a comprehensive definition of cruelty, and I do not intend to try to do so . . . if one spouse sets out to hurt the other and causes injury to health, the means whereby that happens can hardly matter.

He adds that it is something "well beyond the ordinary wear and tear of married life."

He says further that "you cannot define cruelty; but you can recognize it when you see it." In this case "a husband fully responsible for his conduct, knowing that it was injuring his wife's health and yet persisted in it, not because he wished to injure her but because he was so selfish and lazy in his habits that he closed his mind to the consequences."

This is a borderline case, and there are many, of course, but I submit that any Canadian judge of normal intelligence would find no difficulty in recognizing conduct which would fall within this definition of "cruelty" on the part of one spouse which is intolerable to the other spouse and which makes continued cohabitation reasonably impossible.

The last ground is unsound mind, and I shall read it:

> (c) is intractably of unsound mind and has been continuously under care and treatment for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

I will read the next clause in a moment.

The Oxford Dictionary in volume 1 at page 1035 defines "intractably" as: "Uncontrollable, refractory, an unmanageable person." The Imperial Act says: "Incurably of unsound mind."

But it seems to me that this is pledging the future. Who can say what medical science will produce in the years to come and what may be accomplished? Five years in a mental institution in an intractable condition of mind should, I think, be sufficient to release the bonds of an unfortunate marriage.

Subsection 2 defines the care and detention required by the act:

> For the purposes of this section a person of unsound mind shall be deemed to be under care and treatment only while he is
> (a) detained in pursuance of an order or inquisition completely made or had under authority of a statute in force in the province concerned or as a criminal lunatic; or
> (b) receiving treatment as a voluntary patient pursuant to any statute in force in the province concerned, being treatment which follows without any interval a period of such detention as aforesaid.

It seems to me if any person is detained for five years as an intractable lunatic, that should be sufficient for us to act without trying to forecast the future.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: May I ask a question?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, senator.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Does that mean at least five years?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, at least five years.

Hon. Mr. Walker: May I ask a question of the honourable senator? Dealing with clause 2, subsection (1) (b), "cruelty", is the definition which you read from Lord Justice Reid's judgment, to be considered under the circumstances to include habitual drunkenness?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I do not know.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Because that is not included in the English act, is it?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It would open the door to many such things, I suppose. It would open up the door to incompatibility, as far as that goes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I said I did not know. If a drunken man abused his wife, the fact that he was drunk would not influence any judge in deciding that he was guilty of cruelty. If he just becomes a sot, it might be something different, but I do not know. However, you will notice there are many causes expressed in the newspapers and elsewhere that are not included in this bill, for obvious reasons. I have tried to make it a simple bill. If we can pass this bill the time may come when amendments may be made to it intelligently, modifying or extending it. In the meantime, it is the English act as simply as it can be expressed.

Of course, it is necessary to provide the opposite pleas. Section 3—which, by the way, is taken directly from the English act—says:

> If the court is satisfied by the evidence that the case of the petitioner has been proved on any of the grounds added by section 1, and, where the ground of the petition is cruelty, the petitioner has not in any manner condoned the cruelty, and that the petition is not presented or prosecuted in collusion with the respondent, the court shall pronounce a decree of divorce, but if the court is not satisfied with respect to any of the aforesaid matters, it shall dismiss the petition: Provided that the court shall not be bound to pronounce a decree of divorce and may dismiss the petition if it finds that the petitioner has during the marriage been guilty of adultery, or if, in the opinion of the court, the petitioner has been guilty
> (a) of unreasonable delay in presenting or prosecuting the petition; or

(b) of cruelty towards the other party to the marriage; or

(c) where the ground of the petition is cruelty, of having without reasonable excuse deserted, or having without reasonable excuse wilfully separated himself or herself from, the other party before the cruelty complained of; or

(d) where the ground of the petition is unsoundness of mind or desertion, of such wilful neglect or misconduct as has conduced to the unsoundness of mind or desertion.

These are quite close to the pleas that are well established in petitions based on adultery.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I interrupt the honourable senator?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: This is very interesting, and I know all honourable senators are very much interested in it, but it seems to me there is considerable further explanation the honourable senator would like to make. I know there is a previously arranged meeting some honourable senators wish to attend shortly after 5 p.m., and it occurred to me that the honourable senator might adjourn the debate.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Far be it from me to stand on any rights under such circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It is a very important matter, I may say.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I do not like to divide an argument, but if this item could be placed first on the Order Paper tomorrow, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Thank you.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I think my colleagues would like to know what is the present situation with respect to the progress of the supply legislation.

It is still doubtful whether the House of Commons will have completed the Estimates for last year in time to submit the final supply bill to us this afternoon. Under those circumstances, the only course that I can suggest to honourable senators is that, when we have finished our Orders of the Day this afternoon, I move that we adjourn until the call of the bell at approximately half-past five. At that time, I think we will know definitely whether or not the House of Commons can finish the Estimates in time for us to act and for the Royal Assent tonight. If they do finish in time, then we will have the supply bill and the Royal Assent will, we hope, take place tonight. If that is the result, I will then ask the Senate to adjourn until Tuesday evening next at 8 o'clock. If, unfortunately, the House of Commons does not finalize its discussions today and goes over to Monday, then in the interests of the country and of the certainty that we will be able to deal with the supply bill when it is ready, I shall have to ask the Senate to adjourn until Monday evening next at 8 o'clock. That decision can only be taken when the Senate reconvenes about half-past five this afternoon.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: If we do not receive the supply bill today, is there any limit to the time required to carry out the provisions of the bill?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I am not clear as to what the situation is in that regard. I am told that unless the supply bill is passed today there may be some difficulty in issuing salary cheques to some civil servants next week. That is why the attempt is being made to get the supply bill through by this evening. If passage of this bill should be protracted until Monday or Tuesday, it may mean that some civil servants will have to wait for payment of their salaries.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: My understanding is that the cheques are usually prepared in advance, that it is not necessary to wait for authority before preparing them.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: It is more a question of sending them out to the recipients than merely having them prepared.

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck for the second reading of Bill S-19, to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators—

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, before my friend resumes his explanation of the bill he so ably commenced yesterday, I would like to ask a question that was asked in various forms yesterday by several honourable senators.

Clause 2(1) of the bill reads in part:

> In any court having jurisdiction to grant divorce a vinculo matrimonii

That expression was explained quite well by the sponsor of the bill.

I recall that a few years ago there was a case heard before the Senate Standing Committee on Divorce in which two private detectives were alleged to have committed perjury. Subsequently, they appeared before Magistrate Strike in the City Magistrate's Court, and he had no difficulty in finding them guilty of perjury. Then their solicitor appealed to the Court of Appeal of Ontario, and that court decided that these witnesses had not committed perjury in the sense that they had not been before a tribunal or properly constituted court; therefore, the appeal was allowed and the action dismissed.

Then my friend, the sponsor of the bill now before us, decided to remedy that situation by introducing a bill, which was subsequently passed, to the effect that henceforth the Standing Committee on Divorce would be considered a court and a tribunal for every purpose.

That bill of some 12 or 13 years ago, providing that thereafter the committee would be considered a court in which someone who gave false evidence could be found guilty of perjury, having been passed, I ask this question: Does the Senate committee—and the more so now that a judge of the Exchequer Court is appointed the Commissioner—hearing divorce actions constitute a court? If it does, then I say the phrase "in any court having jurisdiction" will include the Senate Divorce Committee and all petitions that are heard by that committee or by the Commissioner may invoke any of the new grounds proposed in this bill.

If that is not so, then I suggest that this bill should be amended to read:

> In any provincial court having jurisdiction to grant divorce . . .

In the light of the facts I have outlined, it would be most ambiguous to say "in any court".

It is my opinion that the Senate Committee on Divorce has been constituted and recognized as a court for some 12 or 13 years, and that this bill would entitle people in the two provinces that are excluded to come to the Senate and ask for a divorce on these extended grounds. My question is, am I correct in so thinking? I hope I have made myself clear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The honourable senator has made himself very clear, and I think he has a point.

It is true that the amending act, which amended the Criminal Code, described the Senate as a court for the purposes of the code. I must admit that my honourable friend has made a point and that there is a possibility of confusion in this matter. When this bill goes before the committee, if it ever does, my offhand opinion is—and I reserve the right to consider it further—that we should insert, as has been suggested, the word "provincial".

I assure the honourable senator it was not the intention of the drafters of the bill to include the Senate, or the "court" which we are presently operating in connection with the Senate. It was not the intention to do that, and I thank my friend for the skill with which he has analyzed the situation and has revealed that possible confusion. I am sure the committee will take care of the matter thoroughly.

While I am answering this question let me say something more with respect to this particular clause. Senator Aseltine suggested yesterday—this will be found at page 238 of Hansard—that we should insert the word "now" in that clause, so that it would read:

> In any court now having jurisdiction to grant divorce a vinculo matrimonii . . .

He said that that word was in the bill he introduced in 1955. I have not put the word "now" in this bill, and my reason is that if we made that clause read:

> In any court now having jurisdiction to grant divorce a vinculo matrimonii . . .

we would fix it to those provinces that are now possessed of that type of court. I think I have reason to hope—just hope—that the time will come, be it sooner or later, when one or other or both of the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland will constitute a court having such powers. In that case I would wish this bill to apply to such courts and I have no doubt that if the province went the distance of constituting such a court the province would not wish the court to be restricted to the ground of adultery only, but would wish the provisions of this bill to apply.

Therefore, I think the words "In any court having jurisdiction" should remain as they now stand. The clause would then apply to those provinces, should they take the action I have described.

Honourable senators, before I adjourned the debate yesterday I was reviewing the grounds of desertion, cruelty and unsound mind, and I need not repeat what I said then about my proposal to add the new grounds to those already established. Some senators were not present in the chamber yesterday and therefore did not suffer at my hands. As it would be quite impossible for me to review what was said in an hour or more of debate, I would ask those senators who were absent yesterday, but are present today, to read in yesterday's Debates of the Senate what was said by myself and others, and in consequence I shall be able to proceed as though all senators present knew all that was discussed yesterday.

I concluded my remarks yesterday by reading section 3 of the bill. All I wish to add now is that the statutory defences described in section 3, that is, collusion, condonation, cruelty, desertion and undue delay, are quite similar to those which have long been established in connection with petitions for divorce based on adultery.

I can conclude quickly, therefore, by saying that section 4 gives authority to the courts to make rules. That of course would involve adding to the rules already made, should that be deemed necessary. I know that in the Province of Ontario, for instance, there are quite extensive rules made by the courts with regard to matters of divorce.

Section 5 provides that the act shall come into force on a day or days to be fixed by proclamation. The purpose of that possible delay is to give the courts of the province the time and opportunity necessary to make the revision of the rules, or make new rules if they so desire.

May I conclude with some general remarks.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: May I be permitted to ask the honourable gentleman a question before he continues?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I am from Newfoundland, and of course the honourable senator knows how the law applies in that province. What would have to be done in order that Newfoundland might get the benefit of this bill now before us? Is the bill an amendment to the British North America Act of 1949?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No. I am quite sure that if the honourable senator could lay before the committee information to the effect that the Province of Newfoundland is in favour of this bill being applied to Newfoundland, the committee would be delighted to extend its provisions to that province. Just how he could establish that to the satisfaction of the committee is for him to decide and for the committee to judge. However, I think he will appreciate the diffidence of the committee members and myself, and later this house, should this bill become law, not to do anything to which the Province of Newfoundland might object. If we have any real grounds for believing that the Province of Newfoundland would like to have desertion, cruelty and unsound mind as described added to the grounds for dissolution of marriage within that province, I am sure we would all be very glad to act accordingly. There is no need for any amendment of the British North America Act. We will amend the bill as the province desires.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I asked the question because I know quite a number of cases in Newfoundland where there is desertion and the parties cannot remarry. In other words, one of the parties is undergoing a hardship, and I think this should be taken into consideration in regard to my province.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes. Not only so, but we have a long experience in regard to Newfoundland, and we know of the difficulties encountered by petitioners from that province. Because of the distance between Ottawa and Newfoundland there is considerable difficulty and expense in bringing cases from that province before us. We have done everything in our power to facilitate the handling of divorce cases from that province. For instance, we accept affidavits from both Newfoundland and British Columbia, whereas in other cases we would require the parties to appear in person. We have readily granted to the defence the money necessary to prove a defence when one is desired. We have done what we can.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: While we are on the question of Newfoundland, may I ask my honourable friend a question? In 1949, when Newfoundland joined Confederation, was an offer made by the federal Government to authorize the provincial courts of that province to hear divorce actions? If such an offer was not made, why was it not made? If it was made, did Newfoundland give any reason for its decision? I know that in the Province of Quebec there are objections on religious grounds to provincial divorce courts. That is their right and privilege. Although there are but a few cases a year from Newfoundland that come to the Senate, why, if the offer was made, did that province not accept divorce jurisdiction for its provincial courts.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Of course, I did not negotiate the agreement and I was not present at the negotiations. I cannot answer the question as to whether an offer was made. I can only state that in the Act of Confederation of that province the right was not extended to those courts, and we have acted in accordance with the act ever since. Why it was not offered, I cannot say. I simply know that it was not, and such is the situation now. Newfoundland has no courts so constituted.

Honourable senators, in conclusion, I wish to set myself straight with all those wonderfully happily married people, my fellow citizens all over Canada, by saying that while I have acted as the Chairman of the Senate Standing Committee on Divorce for the past 12 years and have had some hand in the passing of many hundreds of cases, and am now sponsoring a bill to extend the powers of the courts to grant divorce, nevertheless, I am all for marriage and I am opposed to divorce.

Marriage is an institution about which the sweetest and noblest sentiments cluster, and divorce is a choice between evils arising when the marriage is broken by human failure, human faults, by human weakness, and not infrequently human viciousness, immorality and sometimes criminality.

This bill will not detract from the sanctity of marriage. It will apply only when marriages are dead and gone. In many instances the bill would open the way to successful, decent, wholesome marriage and the consequent care of the children of the former marriage as well as those of the second marriage. It does not affect the principle of divorce, because divorce has been established since time immemorial—in Israel, Greece, Rome, England, and in Canada both prior to and after Confederation.

This bill does not interfere with the sanctity of marriage or the principle of divorce: it is simply an effort to make the law of divorce more just, more reasonable, more humane and more honest. It is an effort to remedy some glaring defects in the administration of the divorce law as now constituted.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say in connection with this matter, with this one exception. Eight bills have been introduced in the Commons by private members, and the substance thereof has been referred to a committee for study and report. Does it seem reasonable that the Commons should proceed to consider the subject of divorce in the absence of the Senate, which has administered the divorce law since 1867 and is administering it now, and is administering the more recent law as provided in the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act of 1963?

Senator Aseltine and I have dealt with this subject of divorce as chairmen of the committee for the last 22 years. He served for 10 years and I took it over from him 12 years ago. I do not think we are claiming too much when I say that in those years we, and our fellow members on the committee, have acquired a vast experience in this field. I may add, sir, that we and the members of the committee have acquired a knowledge second to none on Parliament Hill. Would it not be disrespect of the Senate—perhaps not intended—for the Commons to proceed in our subject in our absence?

If the Commons committee reports, it will of course refer the subject matter to a committee. The committee may call evidence and report. Then, if the Commons sends its bill to us, we will refer it to a committee and we may call evidence and we will make a report. On the other hand, if we pass this bill after it has been referred to a committee and after we have received the report, it will then be sent to the House of Commons and that house will probably send it to a committee and also get a report.

That does not seem very reasonable, does it? Would not the sensible procedure at this point be for both houses to refer the substance of these bills—not only mine but all of them—to a joint committee of both houses? We would then receive one consideration and, I hope, co-operative action in coming to a final decision.

This seems to me to be the sensible procedure, and I call now for a joint committee of the two houses. I shall very gladly accept my friend the leader's action in this matter should he refer the substance of this bill, of which I have the carriage, to such a joint committee.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is not the bill introduced by Mr. McCleave identical to the one before us today?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes. He really introduced my bill, with my consent. I am sure you can all understand the reasons why a member on the other side of the house—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That would not be collusion, would it?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, that is connivance.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: At any rate it is not cruelty.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have discussed this proposal with our leader, and he has no objection to the course of action proposed. When we hear from him, he may go further than that. But at present I have his approval in calling for this joint committee. While this debate continues, I shall continue my negotiations in the hope of achieving a decision along these lines.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I see by yesterday's press that a committee of the other place has already been set up under the chairmanship of Mr. Cameron.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes; and he was reported in the Gazette of the day before yesterday as saying that they were going to get down to work at the earliest possible moment. I would point out, however, that the reference of the bill to that committee is not irrevocable. The personnel of that committee may form part of a joint committee. I do know that the suggestion I have made has been favourably received by the powers that be. I think it is our duty and our right, as well as being proper procedure, for us to require a joint committee of both houses to consider this legislation.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I read in the newspapers a few days ago that a military officer was getting his fifth divorce. Is it limited in Canada, or can a person obtain divorce after divorce?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have never yet heard of a fifth divorce being applied for or granted by us. However, it could be so. There is no statutory limitation and none in common law.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Some are incorrigible.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: While I know of no such case as that mentioned by my friend Senator Reid, I have known of several cases where previously divorced and remarried people have come here for relief. And I have known some cases in which petitioners have sought divorce from spouses who have been divorced and remarried.

Honourable senators, I have no further comments to make at this time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, debate adjourned.

MILLTOWN BRIDGE BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. J. Harper Prowse, for Hon. Mr. Rattenbury, moved the third reading of Bill S-15, to authorize the construction of a bridge across the St. Croix River between the Province of New Brunswick and the State of Maine.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden for the second reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, at the outset let me express my satisfaction, as others have done, that this legislation has at last come before Parliament, and also that it has been introduced in the Senate. I say that because I believe that the Senate is peculiarly fitted to study and perhaps improve, if improvement is possible, legislation of this kind. I have no doubt that when this bill goes to committee every effort will be made to improve it in any way possible, and to put even stronger teeth into the legislation so that enforcement of our bankruptcy laws can be further strengthened.

The provisions of the bill have been clearly and lucidly expressed by Senator Hayden and Senator Walker, and in consequence, rather than dealing with any details of the bill, it is my intention to direct my remarks to the very serious problem of bankruptcy in Canada, and the enforcement or lack of enforcement of our bankruptcy laws.

Honourable senators, this bill has been introduced for the purpose of dealing with some of the very grave abuses which have been discovered in bankruptcy matters in this country over many years. Consequently, what I say about the administration of bankruptcy laws will not apply to any particular government or to any particular Minister of Justice; it will apply equally to all governments of the past 10 or 15 years.

In my view, this legislation is long overdue. Having said that, I want to add that this legislation will be of no value whatever to this country unless something is done, and done effectively, to strengthen the administration of our bankruptcy law. That is the key to the whole issue. I think the same point of view was expressed by Senator Walker in his speech yesterday: that this bill is of no value unless zealousness is exercised in the administration of this legislation and of our bankruptcy law generally.

For many years past, the people of Canada, the newspapers of Canada, and innumerable organizations in this country, have been screaming at government to improve our bankruptcy administration. It is unquestioned that in this field there has been a lamentable breakdown in business morality. There have also resulted enormous losses to the business community of this country and to its people generally. The criminal element in matters concerning bankruptcy is at an all-time high, and has been for some years. What is more serious is the fact that there has been a complete blackout in the punishment of bankruptcy offenders during recent years. There has been a fantastic number of frauds committed in this country. Not only have there been frauds, but there have been murders. Not only have there been one or two murders, but the last figure I saw in that regard was eight.

Honourable senators all know these facts; I am merely reviewing what you all have personal knowledge of from what you have read in the newspapers and heard on the radio and seen on television. Not only have there been murders, bodies have been buried in shallow graves in remote places and have been mutilated and burned in order to prevent identification.

Probably what is worst of all is that there have been repeated warnings to governments during the last few years that something must be done in regard to the bankruptcy laws of this country; not just to merely amend the bankruptcy laws, but more particularly in regard to their proper administration. There have been briefs submitted to the Government and to the Department of Justice by many institutions and individuals. In particular, I cite the fact that there have been very well-thought-out briefs presented to the Department of Justice by the Canadian Construction Association, the Canadian Lumbermen's Association, the Canadian Credit Men's Association and the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. Presumably, all these briefs have been considered, but so far as I know, nothing whatsoever has been done to correct the terrible abuses that undoubtedly have crept into the administration of our bankruptcy laws.

I have here a copy of one of these briefs. This brief was presented to the Minister of Justice in October 1963, by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. I would like to read a few excerpts from it because this and others presented to the department and to the Government, many of them several years ago, have pleaded for the type of legislation that is now contained in Bill S-17. That is why I say we are happy to be considering this bill, but it is years overdue, as is also the proper administration of the act many years overdue.

There is reference in this brief to an editorial that appeared in the Globe and Mail of June 14, 1963. I will just recite one phrase contained in it:

> Twentieth century highway robbery on a grand scale—

That is how the Globe and Mail referred to these bankruptcy matters nearly three years ago.

Then, after dealing with some of the facts of the situation at that time, the accountants' brief continues:

> These facts, when examined in terms of the Bankruptcy Act, revealed that, while the Act needed certain amendments, one of the principal areas requiring corrective action was in the field of administration.

So, honourable senators, the two things go hand in hand now, as they did three, six or ten years ago, namely, a good law and the forceful administration of it.

Allow me to quote just a few more sentences from that brief. In regard to administration, it states on page 26:

> Appropriate steps are seldom, if ever, taken to bring dishonest debtors and other parties involved to justice.

That statement is as true now as it was three years ago.

On page 27 the brief states:

> For many reasons this system is unsatisfactory as:
>
> (i) The Superintendent of Bankruptcy seldom takes part in investigations of alleged fraudulent actions relating to bankruptcies.
>
> (ii) In fraudulent cases, one or a number of creditors may themselves be involved in the fraudulent action.
> (iii) In fraudulent cases, by the time secured creditors are paid, there is often nothing left to finance an investigation and creditors are loath to "throw good money after bad".

The brief goes on to indicate a series of improper transactions which were generally known in every part of this country many years ago, and even prior thereto; but, in particular, I refer to this brief to indicate that the problem is not only one of legislation; it is also one of enforcement. Consequently, I for one plead for the full and effective enforcement of the bankruptcy laws.

It might seem peculiar. But despite the fact that the Bankruptcy Act is federal legislation, it was a provincial government that a year and a half ago took the initiative in regard to this matter and launched an investigation into bankruptcy frauds. It was taken by the Government of the Province of Quebec—in which province these frauds have been so prevalent. They have been prevalent not only there, but in other parts of Canada as well, although they have not perhaps made the headlines to the same extent in other parts of Canada.

However, let me first indicate to the house the size and extent of this bankruptcy problem in Canada. I have here the report of the Commission of Inquiry in the Province of Quebec. The Order in Council appointing the commission is dated October 16, 1964, and it was directed to Mr. Lucien Mercier, C.A., to act as a commissioner under the Inquiries Act of that province.

Incidentally, in regard to that commission, the Province of Quebec could not legally hold a full-scale investigation into all aspects of bankruptcy by virtue of the fact that the Bankruptcy Act is federal legislation. However, it was apparent to the Government of Quebec that it lost tremendous revenues because of frauds committed in bankruptcies. So, the royal commission was appointed to investigate the effect of these frauds on the revenues of that province.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And the criminal law. They administer the criminal law.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: That is quite right. Although the first Order in Council was only directed to the revenue aspects, a few months later the terms of the Order in Council were expanded. In any event, there was a complete investigation made by Mr. Mercier and he reported in July 1965.

However, in order to give you the extent of the problem I should like to cite the annual amounts of liabilities in commercial bankruptcies in Canada in millions of dollars starting with the year 1956:

Year	Liabilities
1956	$ 64 million
1957	79 "
1958	72 "
1959	95 "
1960	174 "
1961	116 "
1962	149 "
1964	208 "

The figures for 1965 are not yet available, but I observed recently in the press an estimate that they might be as high as $500 million. It is to be pointed out, of course, that that figure includes an amount in respect of the rather fantastic failure of Atlantic Acceptance Corporation. In any event, it would appear that the figure of $208 million for the year 1964 is going to be greatly exceeded in 1965, apart entirely from the default of Atlantic Acceptance Corporation.

I have cited these figures, honourable senators, to indicate the magnitude of this problem. I do not know whether the problem exists with the same severity in other countries or whether the figure is anything like what it is in Canada in, say, the United Kingdom or the United States. I do not believe it is. I think this is a situation which is, at the moment, peculiarly Canadian in its magnitude in relation to our population and wealth, and that it is the greatest scourge facing our people at the present time.

I should like now to quote some of the findings of the Mercier Commission of Inquiry. This commission, as I have said, considered this problem for a period of approximately nine months, from October 1964 until its report was issued in July 1965. Under the heading of "General Remarks" on page 4 of the report, I quote the following:

> The inquiry directed by this Commission revealed a very deplorable if not alarming situation which existed in bankruptcy and liquidation matters in Quebec and more particularly in the judicial district of Montreal.

Honourable senators, I repeat, it is true that this report refers only to the Province of Quebec. It is my opinion that the government of that province should be highly commended for having taken these steps. I believe that the Government of Canada should have appointed a commission to investigate these matters many years ago. It should have appointed it when these frauds first became prevalent and known to the authorities in charge of bankruptcy matters.

On page 7 of the report, under the heading of "Bankrupts, bankruptcy rings and fraudulent dealings" there is this:

> To illustrate to what point certain bankrupts mocked the law with impunity, let us notice the failure to keep proper books even when operating under the cover of a proposal allowed for by the Bankruptcy Act.

The importance of that, honourable senators, is that even when acting under the eye of officials, appointed by the Minister of Justice through the Superintendent of Bankruptcy, these frauds were apparent. This is only a general statement, but I shall read more detail later on.

Then, continuing on page 7:

> The inquiry revealed, more particularly, the existence of fraudulent bankruptcy rings, that is to say a direct or indirect connection of many persons or companies whose sole aim is to appropriate funds, merchandise or other benefits, and to have recourse to the Bankruptcy Act to completely dissolve their business.

I read another paragraph which says:

> These adventurers proceed usually by incorporating a series of many companies—we traced as many as sixty companies in one ring—the operations of each company usually lasting only a few months. By astute means, the first company buys on credit all that it is possible to acquire. These goods are sold at minimum prices to other companies in the ring and these specialists in fraud appropriate the receipts in different ways as soon as they are paid in. When the sources of supply are exhausted, just enough goods are left with the company to pay the costs of the trustee, thereby leaving the creditors without the necessary funds to open an inquiry.

On the same page contains the words:

> The inquiry of the Commission also uncovered the game of cunning profiteers who, in fact, form a clandestine partnership, buying for a good price a flourishing business, acquiring from unaware suppliers all the goods possible, disposing of them and disappearing with the money, leaving the helpless creditors to search and to take recourses against these defrauders.
> There are also well organized rings of bankruptcy specialists for whom the principal occupation is to locate debtors, for the purpose of suggesting bankruptcy to them as an easy means of liquidating their debts. The inquiry established that in many of these instances, the proofs of claim supporting the petitions are often false.

I have read these excerpts to indicate that these were frauds against the Bankruptcy Act without amendment, and that although the purpose of the amendments contained in Bill S-17 is to put additional teeth into the act, the facts referred to by the commission were fraudulent and should have been prosecuted, and could have been prosecuted under the Criminal Code. Although Bill B-17 puts additional strength into the Bankruptcy Act, it is also true that the act has some strength now. After all, it has been in effect for many years, and it should have been enforced. But there has been lamentable failure in that regard.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Whose duty would it have been to prosecute—the provincial government's or the federal government's?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: That is one of the problems, and I shall have something to say about it. That is one of the difficulties in bankruptcy matters, and one that we shall have to look at. I would suggest that when this bill goes before committee we will have to look at this very difficult problem of enforcement.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The administration of the Criminal Code is surely in the hands of the provinces, but it being dominion legislation, a prosecution could have been instituted by anybody, including representatives of the dominion Government administering the Bankruptcy Act. Is not that the answer to the question?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I agree with that. There is the other problem, however, that traditionally, and in most fields, the administration of the Criminal Code is in the hands of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is so under the provisions of the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: The office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy is a federal organization, and it is in duty bound to execute the laws of the federal Government. The honourable senator is quite right. It is a divided jurisdiction, but nevertheless that is one of the problems in the whole field.

The report of this Commission of Inquiry also says:

> The inquiry further established that the specialists of one of these rings operated with the knowledge of the trustee allowing him to hire one of them regularly at the taking of the inventory.

When reference is made to the knowledge of the trustee, let us not forget that the trustee is an appointee of the Minister of Justice, through the Superintendent of Bankruptcy.

Then, here is a whole section, covering nearly two pages, devoted to the trustees. Let me read just a few excerpts from it:

> In a general way, the suspect activities of many trustees in the execution of their mandates particularly preoccupied this Commission.

Then, again:

> Because of their extensive knowledge in bankruptcy matters, they usually manoeuvre the unsuspecting inspectors as if they were puppets. In many instances, it was established that certain trustees had cleverly arranged the appointment of one or more of the inspectors. It is all so easy that the creditors and the inspectors in good faith showed a disinterest that the Commission has already brought to light.

I read now from page 8:

> Amongst the many grievances lodged against the trustees during the inquiry, the Commission held the following: To begin with, there is the conflict of interest. On this point, it seems necessary to remember that in many instances of assignment or proposal, a conflict of interest is found between the trustee, who acts for the bankrupt and who is in fact his client, and the creditors whom he has the obligation to protect. In a number of cases, the trustee was paid his fees in advance from the bankrupt or obtained a bond; this situation presents itself particularly in summary matters where there are practically no assets. There is a real conflict since, for the trustee, it is no longer a question of protecting the creditors but of liberating a debtor.

The report then refers to conniving with some inspectors, who could be called professional inspectors. It says, at page 9:

> ...some trustees were given fees well in excess of those provided for by the Bankruptcy Act.

And from the same page:

> Testimonies, including one by a member of the Bar, revealed that it is current practice, for certain trustees, to require and receive hush-money from lawyers representing the interests of secured creditors or of bidders promising in return not to oppose proceedings taken by the latter.

Another section deals with the inspectors. In some cases, inspectors are found to be just as fraudulent as the trustees. Page 10 of the report says:

> The inquiry has also revealed serious conflicts of interest in many instances where former directors of bankrupt companies served as inspectors: The appointment of the auditor or of the solicitor of the bankrupt as inspector has not always been fortunate; too often, in such cases, the inspectors were trying to give protection to the bankrupt rather than serving the creditors' interest.

Then a little farther on:

> Unfortunately, in this field as in many others "The tares grow amongst the wheat." It has been established that some of these inspectors were paid under-the-table gratuities at the rate of twenty per cent of the trustee's fees; we must add that this is a usual and not exceptional practice.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is bribery, and an offence under the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Yes, that is bribery —absolute out-and-out bribery.

Another section of the report referring to the purchasers says, at page 10:

> In its scrutiny of the affairs of reputed fraudulent bankruptcies, the Commission discovered that the purchasers of assets of persons under bankruptcy proceedings or of assets of bankruptcies or liquidations are not above suspicion of complicity to defraud.

Mr. Mercier, the Commissioner, then mentioned the craftiness of the parties involved and their experience in this nefarious business of defrauding creditors.

I now read a paragraph under the heading "Judicial Administration," at page 11:

> If, as a general rule, the Commission was far from being satisfied with the management of bankruptcies and liquidations by certain trustees and inspectors, it was surprised to find such a great disorder in the records of the Bankruptcy Court of the District of Montreal. In all fairness, we must add, however, that since several months, praiseworthy efforts have been made to correct this state of affairs and one can already notice an appreciable improvement.

Honourable senators, I have read these excerpts to illustrate the gravity of this problem, and particularly to indicate that something ought to be done by the federal Government, and done right away, in regard to the investigation of these bankruptcy matters.

These are official disclosures resulting from a nine-month investigation, obviously made by competent people in the Province of Quebec. This report came out in July 1965. Surely the Department of Justice, surely the Superintendent of Bankruptcy, must have seen the report. I ask what, if anything, has been done by the Government of Canada, by the Department of Justice, to inquire into and investigate this problem? Why, for instance, have the names of these fraudulent trustees and inspectors not been published, and why have proceedings not been taken against these people?

There must be a transcript of the evidence which was heard before this commission—I have no doubt there is. All I say is that I hope that the investigations that even might be made in a preliminary way by the Banking and Commerce Committee of the Senate might have some influence, some effect, in ensuring that the federal Government acts in this situation with determination to destroy this evil.

The fact is, honourable senators, that these matters are no longer screaming headlines in newspapers; they are no longer the subjects of credit grantors' associations, which present briefs to the Government. Now we have an official report indicating what the problem amounts to and of the nefarious trade that has been carried on by these people under the very eye of the Department of Justice of this country.

I say again that this is a matter which transcends party considerations. It has been going on for a long time, and we have facts before us which have now become official.

May I conclude by saying that if one thing in Canada indicates the need for the appointment of a commission to investigate crime, this situation under the bankruptcy laws is that one thing.

I was interested in an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette this morning, entitled, "Cabinet Undecided on Study of Crime." I hope the Cabinet does not remain undecided in regard to the study of crime, for people throughout Canada are crying aloud for these things to be investigated. I would certainly want to add my voice, and I hope the Senate will add its voice too, and its influence, to have a commission appointed for the study of crime in this country.

The Minister of Justice of the Province of Quebec, Mr. Wagner, has already requested that such a federal commission be appointed. I shall read the last paragraph from the article in the Gazette to which I have already referred:

> Mr. Wagner said in Quebec City Wednesday that he believes the Federal Government eventually will set up a Royal Commission but he assailed its position now as timid.

Two or three days earlier he pleaded in the Quebec legislature for the appointment of such a commission by the Government of Canada.

Another report from this morning's Montreal Gazette indicates that the government of the Province of Quebec is really wrought up more than ever about the situation. The caption reads, "Bankruptcy Investigation Continuing, says Wagner." The articles refers to the investigation into the bankruptcy of the Rec-Stone Company, in Ville d'Anjou in these words:

> The Rec-Stone Company in Ville d'Anjou declared a $1,800,000 bankruptcy in 1964 after having borrowed $1,075,000 from the city through the Industrial Development Fund.

I read also a report from the Globe and Mail of March 1. Its heading is, "Quebec opens offices to study bankruptcies." Then it gives details of the offices which that province has opened for the purpose of studying bankruptcies. I believe that the purpose of this investigation is essentially to protect the revenue of the province, but let us recall that the Bankruptcy Act is a federal statute and the first responsibility in regard to investigation of the operations under that act lies with the federal Government.

Honourable senators, as I have said, there is urgent need for the appointment of a federal commission on crime. Bill S-17, which we have before us, is worthless without a strengthening of the administrative process of the Bankruptcy Act. In that regard, and without any criticism of the former superintendent, it is heartening to know that there has recently been appointed a new Superintendent of Bankruptcy. One hopes that he will be a broom that sweeps clean. I for one would offer hope and encouragement to the new superintendent, that he may begin clearing up the deplorable mess which exists in regard to the administration of the bankruptcy laws in Canada.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton), for Hon. Mr. Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor

General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Josie D. Quart: Honourable senators, in being repetitious, I take comfort in the fact that we are all anxious to express our congratulations and best wishes to our new senators. It was indeed heartwarming to see our seven new colleagues greeting old friends and new acquaintances after they were sworn in. It was a happy occasion, and the Senate was in a joyful mood. I trust their role in the Senate will be full of activities, and I am sure they will make a great contribution to the debates.

Honourable senators, among the marvels of technology which human genius has discovered and which have a tremendous effect on men's minds and morals, are the inventions which facilitate the communication of news, knowledge and learning. The most important of these are the media of press, radio and television. They reach multitudes in minutes, even in seconds, and their power and impact are such as to mould society as a whole and influence people for good or bad.

It is of great concern to parents and those responsible for our young people that the television and radio can prove detrimental to their morals. Indeed, the social evils which too frequently result from the corrupt use of television and radio are the greatest dangers of our present-day society, and contribute to the breakdown of morality.

On the other hand, great benefits can accrue to all our citizens through the wise and moral use of TV and radio, and here one should include moving pictures. But my concern today is about television and radio.

The proper use of TV and radio depends greatly on the program planners and their sponsors, for despite the ordinary caution, the public, young and old, can be taken unawares, and if the program is presented in a convincing manner they can scarcely reject its influence to some degree. Hence, the danger, especially to the unsuspecting young people, particularly when such questionable programs are shown at an early hour when even the very young are captive audiences of our TV age.

And again, certain major social problems are debated frequently which require, on the part of the viewers, a special adult knowledge of the ethics involved and are a danger to the youthful mind. I am not endeavouring to deprive anyone—young or old—the right to information and entertainment, or to the imparting of news items. But there is a difference between what are called "rights" and the "norms of morality" and common decency. Let us not subscribe to false ideas of ethics. Complete respect at all times should be shown for moral laws, especially if the subject matter is such as to demand reverence.

However, effective support must likewise be given to good TV and radio programs, especially those programs which are suitable for the entire family. Many programs of the C.B.C. television and radio measure up to a high standard, and are to be congratulated. But it is utterly disgraceful that our good people stand idly by and do not protest when undesirable programs are shown.

It is not my intention to storm the gates of C.B.C., nor heap adverse criticism on all C.B.C. programs for, goodness knows, in recent months a great deal of criticism has been levelled at our national network. In fact, I would like to put on record how much over the years I have enjoyed the majority of programs. And, incidentally, I wish to give full marks to the afternoon programs, such as "Take Thirty", which is doing an excellent job on a limited budget, helping to educate John Q. Public in many areas. Also "Password", "To Tell the Truth" and other programs that are greatly appreciated by the older people, the shut-ins and the patients in hospitals. These programs are instructive and interesting; they provide good clean entertainment for all ages.

But there are other programs produced by blasé, decadent but clever people who should not be permitted to use our tax dollars to spread their negative and harmful philosophies. There are enough forces of evil at work in the world without our subsidizing others; and, to add insult to injury, the objectionable programs seem to have a much larger budget to put across their damaging propaganda. Now, I fully realize that in producing plays, the C.B.C. cannot be expected to meet with 100 per cent popular approval on all counts.

However, there is a fundamental difference between the publicly-owned C.B.C. and the privately-owned broadcasting stations. The private stations cannot afford unfavourable audience reactions if they wish to survive. Now, we are told, "You can shut off the TV or radio programs if they offend." Sure you can, but as a taxpayer we cannot stop paying for them. If you do not like what is published in a newspaper or magazine, you can cancel your subscription. If you do not approve of a movie or stage play you cannot be forced to buy a ticket; but the C.B.C. goes on its own way, spending public money, regardless of praise or criticism.

Honourable senators, I am sure you have heard about a clean-up TV campaign called "The Declaration of Women", and the delegation of six women who presented a brief to Prime Minister Pearson and the Honourable Maurice Lamontagne on March 24, 1965. These women wheeled a supermarket grocery cart stacked with bulky volumes containing over 76,000 signatures of Canadian women from every province who endorsed the declaration. From east to west of Canada we received so many letters that we probably could have brought this number up to a million.

The brief requested Parliament to end the domination of a minority who misuse the C.B.C. to spread propaganda for perversion, pornography, free love, blasphemy, narcotics, violence and crime. I was indeed honoured to have been chosen to act as chairman of the delegation. Mrs. J. E. Houck of Toronto, a former member of the Board of Directors of the C.B.C., was a member of the delegation, and she told the Prime Minister that the support for the declaration was a spontaneous effort, with information about it being passed merely by word of mouth to women across the country.

Mrs. O. J. McNeill of Regina, a member of the national executive of the Dominion Drama Festival, said that the C.B.C. had tried to create the impression that the sponsors of the Declaration of Women were witch hunters and prudes. She told the Prime Minister that: "We do not expect the C.B.C. to sermonize or to engage in explicit moral platitudes, neither do we expect the C.B.C. to wallow in pornography and vulgarity."

Mrs. J. R. Hoag, chairman of the City Planning Commission of Regina, told the Prime Minister that "fortunately our criticism did not apply to all departments of the C.B.C. but to some objectionable programs." She said that Mr. Lusher of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation stated "that the C.B.C. welcomed public expression of opinion"—"yet", Mrs. Hoag continued, "the evidence does not bear this out." The C.B.C. has been flooded with protests and it has all been to no avail! In fact, she continued, "the C.B.C. has used its privileged position to label those like ourselves who would dare to criticize them as crackpots, narrow-minded, ignorant and prudish."

Madame Guy Lepage, of Levis, and Madame Maurice Marchand, of Montreal, the other two members of the delegation said there are programs on the C.B.C.'s French television network which they would like to see "cleaned up."

We had an excellent meeting with the Prime Minister and the Honourable Maurice Lamontagne, the minister in charge of the C.B.C. at that time. The exchanges were frank but friendly, and Mr. Pearson was visibly and agreeably surprised at the quality of the submission and the sincerity of those presenting the brief. He seemed impressed by the signatures endorsing the brief. In fact, when the Prime Minister read some of the names he commented: "My wife would sign this." Mr. Pearson requested Monsieur Lamontagne to arrange a meeting for us with the Fowler Commission for the next morning. Mr. Fowler was in Vancouver, but we had a most satisfactory two-hour meeting with Mr. Steele, the vice-chairman of the Fowler Commission, and Mr. Shepherd, at which we gave details as to the objectionable programs. Mr. Steele questioned us at length on various aspects of how to retain artistic freedom and yet protect the public against offensive programs. Mr. Steele was most sympathetic.

We then met with Mr. Diefenbaker, Mr. T. C. Douglas and Mr. Robert Thompson and, in the absence of Monsieur Réal Caouette, with Monsieur Gilles Grégoire. Each was most helpful and courteous, and all agreed that something had to be done. We talked with many members of Parliament, and it was indeed gratifying to know that all those to whom we talked were concerned about current programming trends and how to change them without using political interference. Mr. Pearson felt that we should wait until the Fowler Report was made public before taking any further action.

Well, the Fowler Report has now been released for some time. It needs to be studied carefully, and guidance given to our representatives as to its strength and weaknesses. Rest assured, as one of our sponsors said, "that tremendous pressure will be exerted by the broadcaster, both private and public, to destroy or mitigate its recommendations." So, for the present we are following a course of watchful waiting.

The national sponsoring committee of the Declaration of Women is composed of 35 women from many geographic regions in Canada. They belong to a variety of religious faiths and support varying political philosophies. They are knowledgeable, responsible, community-minded women with a very high degree of prestige in their own areas. The sponsors had no idea when launching our TV "clean-up" campaign that support would be so spontaneous or widespread. We are not an organized group—have no financial resources, and thus it was impossible to do a publicity or saturation campaign. But the results were beyond all expectations.

I am sure, honourable senators, that you read countless articles and editorials in newspapers from coast to coast, written by men, which prove that the responsible male is not any happier with some programming habits of the C.B.C. than we are. And we have a huge scrapbook with hundreds of editorials and letters of protest to the C.B.C.

We were very encouraged by a report of an address by Dr. Wilder Penfield, President of the Vanier Institute of the Family, who sharply criticized the C.B.C. for a November program entitled: "The New Morality." In an address to the Men's Canadian Club in Vancouver, Dr. Penfield stated that "to preach such a doctrine over our nation-wide hookup is an anti-social act in Canada." The program in question was an interview with Dr. Albert Ellis, who, Dr. Penfield says, "is what is called a practising psychologist, a counsellor in matters of sex." Dr. Penfield said that Dr. Ellis stated that "religion does more harm than good, and pre-marital and extra-marital sex relations are often desirable and proper." Dr. Penfield noted that such sentiments "endanger the integrity of the Canadian family", and called the program "ill-advised on the part of someone associated with the C.B.C., to invite this man to speak." Dr. Penfield added that "Morals are not old-fashioned, and young people must be taught the meaning of honour and discipline, and must be given a working religion whether orthodox or not."

And here, I would like to refresh our memories as to Senator Vaillancourt's speech of protest about the biased manner of the coverage by the C.B.C. of the Queen's visit to Quebec. Those of us who were in Quebec at the time know how false and unjust that was; the coverage hit a very low degree in both commentary and presentation.

And once again, our simmering discontent reached the boiling point when "This Hour Has Seven Days" presented that horrible skit on the October visit of His Holiness Pope Paul VI to the United Nations. The C.B.C. had to admit that their Toronto and Montreal switchboard operators answered hundreds of calls of protest—and finally the C.B.C. published an apology.

We also object to the disparaging and revolting satire of those in the highest public offices. These offices are symbolic of our democratic institutions and should transcend personalities. They represent the contributions and sacrifices of countless Canadians. Such juvenile exhibitionism as has been portrayed in some of these programs and interviews is no credit to the producers.

In concluding, on behalf of the sponsors of our Declaration of Women I wish to repeat that we have no desire to interfere with the free and full dissemination of news information. We do object, however, when it is done without dignity and good taste.

News and information is one thing, but entertainment is another matter. Surely it is not too much to expect that, when so many these days are exposed to the stress of financial, social and administrative pressures, our entertainment should be of the kind to inspire, amuse, inform and prepare us for our daily tasks. More and more of our people are becoming neurotics, and little wonder! For we are constantly being subjected to the most emotionally devastating diet of crime, sex and insubordination in the news, and now it is being fed to us as entertainment! We are getting too much of the same thing.

Surely in this country of 20,000,000 people we have some creative souls who can produce good family drama and honest-to-goodness clever comedy that can be enjoyed by the whole family, regardless of age. We have produced outstanding musical and dramatic talent, and we believe there is also good creative talent if the C.B.C. will give them the opportunity to produce it. Our national network must set the standard and it should be a high one.

The Declaration of Women is an honest and carefully considered effort to persuade our publicly-owned C.B.C. to perform its democratic function, that of serving the Canadian people, not dominating them!

If the general public is as deeply concerned as we are by the decline in national morals and in national pride, let them speak out before it is too late.

On Motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien (Provencher), for Hon. Mr. Rattenbury, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, having come to the conclusion of the Orders of the Day, I can add little to what I said at the beginning of the sitting. Apparently the House of Commons have been discussing the Department of Justice estimates practically all afternoon, and I do not know whether or not they have completed their considerations. It may be that they will agree upon some method of concluding their consideration of the Estimates. Normally, private members' hour begins at 5 p.m., and were it dispensed with they could continue. In the meantime all I can do is move that the Senate do adjourn during pleasure, to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately half-past five.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Why stipulate an hour? Why not just say, at the call of the bell?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: At the call of the bell, at approximately half-past five.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If the bell rings earlier we should commence our consideration of the estimates immediately.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.20 the sitting was resumed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I regret to inform the Senate that the House of Commons has been completely unable to reach agreement as to completing the Estimates tonight, so there is no possibility of our receiving the supply bill today.

In those circumstances I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 8, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 8, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 8, 1966

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

DIVORCE (EXTENSION OF GROUNDS) BILL

The Senate resumed from Friday, March 4, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck for the second reading of Bill S-19, to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few remarks with respect to this bill. which was sponsored by the honourable Senator Roebuck and dealt with quite fully by him on Thursday and Friday last.

Whenever I speak on divorce I am reminded of an old Arab proverb which says that marriage is like a besieged fortress: those outside are desirous of getting in, while those inside want to get out. However, like many proverbs, this is partly true and partly false. It is true that most single persons would like to be married, but it is quite untrue that most married people desire to become single again.

Honourable senators, I made those remarks in almost the same words about ten years ago when I addressed a meeting of the Toronto Divorce Reform Association. I have in my hand the notes I used on that occasion, and they contain a summary of the history of marriage and divorce from time immemorial up to that time. I assure honourable senators that I do not intend to repeat that speech. However, I delivered a similar address in either 1936 or 1937 in the Senate.

Honourable senators, I welcome Bill S-19, because for many years I have been intensely interested in matters respecting divorce, and particularly in having our antiquated divorce laws modernized.

Before coming to the Senate I had considerable experience in the Saskatchewan courts in the conduct of actions for divorce. Perhaps that is why almost immediately after I was sworn in I became a member of the Senate Standing Committee on Divorce and was active on that committee for many years thereafter. Indeed, I remained a member until the beginning of this session, at which time I asked to be relieved of those duties. Since I relinquished the chairmanship of the Senate Committee on Divorce about the year 1953, and those duties were taken over by Senator Roebuck, I have not been as active on the committee.

Naturally, honourable senators, I intend to support this measure, for the reason that when the law of England was amended in 1937 and certain grounds for divorce were added, Senator McMeans, who was then Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce in the Senate, and I in the following year, 1938, were instrumental in bringing forward a bill which, if passed, would have resulted in amending our law by adding several grounds to that of adultery.

Before introducing that bill, we consulted the Law Clerk of the Senate, Mr. W. F. O'Connor, a distinguished constitutional lawyer. I also wrote to Mr. A. P. Herbert, a member of Parliament in England, whose private bill for divorce was finally passed. He had his secretary send me a copy of the 1937 English bill. He also sent me certain other documents, and some of the debates which were delivered on the question. Following that, Senator McMeans had Mr. O'Connor prepare the 1938 divorce bill, which became known as the "McMeans' Bill", but actually was Bill B in the Senate, an Act respecting Divorce and Matrimonial Causes.

In addition to enlarging the grounds for divorce, that bill, had it passed, would have constituted the divorce law of the Dominion of Canada, and instead of relying upon and adopting the law of England in regard to divorce, as we had been doing and are still doing, we would have had a measure that went considerably further than does the present Bill S-19.

Senator Roebuck, in giving his explanation of Bill S-19 was kind enough to refer to Bill B, and also to another bill which I introduced on the same subject in 1955. I thank him for the kind remarks he made about me.

Bill B went considerably further than does Bill S-19. In addition to the three new grounds for divorce—desertion, extreme cruelty, incurable insanity—Bill B provided for other matters. Senator Roebuck briefly explained the difference, but as these are important differences I should like to put them on the record in more detail.

Bill B provided that no petition for a divorce could be considered until after the lapse of three years after the date of marriage, except on the ground of adultery. That was included in Bill B to discourage hasty marriages.

That bill provided also for a petition by a wife on the ground of rape, sodomy or bestiality committed by the husband. The bill also dealt with laws with respect to the presumption of death and with respect to judicial separation. That bill also dealt with grounds for avoidance of a marriage, such as non-consummation, unsoundness of mind of the respondent at the time of the marriage, the respondent being affected by venereal disease, or pregnancy of the respondent by some other person at the time of marriage.

That 1938 bill also dealt with alimony, domicile of the wife when deserted by the husband, and certain procedural rules and regulations.

Honourable senators, if that bill had become law, it would have given us our own law of divorce. I trust I will be pardoned if I say it was a better bill than that before us now.

Should this question of the divorce law be referred to a committee, a joint committee or a royal commission, I hope all these points will be taken into consideration.

Before dealing with what happened to Bill B, I believe it would be interesting and informative to place on the record the explanatory notes which appeared opposite page 1 of Bill B when it was presented for second reading in 1938. Those notes were explained briefly by Senator Roebuck, but honourable senators would find it more satisfactory to have those notes before them when they are making a decision in this matter.

The explanatory notes are as follows:

> Dissolution of marriage is of statutory origin.
>
> The other familiar matrimonial causes had not statutory origin. Any court in Canada which has jurisdiction in divorce has jurisdiction also in the other matrimonial causes.
>
> The only courts in Canada to which this act applies—

And I am referring to Bill B.

> —are courts which now have jurisdiction to decree divorce.

That now refers to the time that Bill B was presented.

> A court in Prince Edward Island has had that right since 1835 as the term "divorce" was then understood.
>
> A court in Nova Scotia has had that right since 1758.
> A court in New Brunswick has had that right since 1791.
> No court has that right in Quebec.
> A court in Ontario has had that right since 1930.

I am reading these notes, honourable senators, because the copy of Bill B which I have in my hand is the only copy known to be in existence at the present time.

> A court in Manitoba has had that right since 1870.
> Courts in Saskatchewan and Alberta have had that right since 1905. Before then the right was inchoate in the N.W. Territories. Hence the right of Saskatchewan and Alberta although these provinces were only formed in 1905 is to the divorce law of England as of 1870.
> A court in British Columbia has had that right since 1858.
> Prince Edward Island may now exercise its right under its own act of 1835....by virtue of section 129, B.N.A. Act.
>
> Nova Scotia, under the same authority, now exercises its right under its own act of 1866.
> New Brunswick also operates under its own preconfederation act of 1860.
> Ontario operates under Dominion Act, chapter 14 of the statutes of 1930.
> Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta operate under the terms of the respective acts of 1870 and 1905 which erected them into provinces. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has confirmed their right, which extends to the divorce law of England as of 1870.
> British Columbia yet operates under a proclamation of Governor Douglas made in 1858, which, it has been held, extends to that province the divorce law of England as in force in 1858.

I might say that this information which I have just given also appears in the 1955 bill.

I wish to deal briefly with the point raised by honourable Senator Choquette on Friday last. In that regard I would point out that the 1938 bill and also the 1955 bill respecting divorce for matrimonial causes contain this definition of "court" in paragraph 2 of those bills:

> "court" means any of the courts described in section three and includes a judge of such court.

That compels me to read section 3 which is as follows:

> (1) This Act shall apply to and in those provinces of Canada wherein there are now constituted and maintained courts of divorce and matrimonial causes having jurisdiction to decree dissolution of marriage, and to and in such provinces only.

Subsection (2) reads as follows:

> In each of such provinces this Act shall apply to and confer jurisdiction upon the court described in subsection one of this section (subsequently in this Act termed "the court") and to and upon that court only.

Now after the question was asked by Senator Choquette on Friday as to whether or not the Standing Committee of the Senate on Divorce was in the nature of a court, I looked up the 1964 edition of Crankshaw's Criminal Code to find out, if I could, just what a court was. I found that section 99 of the Code, subsection (c) reads as follows:

In this Part,

(c) "judicial proceeding" means a proceeding

(i) in or under the authority of a court of justice or before a grand jury,

(ii) before the Senate or House of Commons of Canada or a committee of the Senate or House of Commons, or before a legislative council, legislative assembly or house of assembly or a committee thereof that is authorized by law to administer an oath,

(iii) before a court, judge, justice, magistrate or coroner,

(iv) before an arbitrator or umpire, or a person or body of persons authorized by law to make an inquiry and take evidence therein under oath, or

(v) before a tribunal by which a legal right of legal liability may be established, whether or not the proceeding is invalid for want of jurisdiction or for any other reason.

Then I read further to see what was the definition of "perjury". "Perjury" is defined in section 112 of the Code as follows:

Every one commits perjury who, being a witness in a judicial proceeding, with intent to misleed gives false evidence, knowing that the evidence is false.

So I have come to the conclusion that the Senate Divorce Committee is not a court. The proceedings of that committee are and have been judicial proceedings, made so by this section on Interpretation which I have read from the Criminal Code. However, be that as it may, the whole question could be discussed at greater length when this bill receives second reading and is referred to a committee of the Senate or to a joint committee of both houses.

I would like now to deal with Bill B of 1938, that is the McMeans bill. It was read the first time on March 8 of that year, and in addition to speeches made by Senator McMeans and myself, 20 other senators took advantage of the opportunity and spoke on second reading, all of whom, I am sorry to say, are now deceased.

I shall just take a moment to name those who participated in the debate. Senator Dandurand, the Leader of the Government in the Senate at the time, and the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, the then Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, spoke at length, as did Senators Coté, Horsey, Hughes, Quinn, E. D. Smith, Bourgeois, Pope, Beaubien, Tanner, McRae, Calder, Leger, Little, Lacasse, Horner, Rainville and Ballantyne.

At the conclusion of the debate on second reading the bill was endorsed in principle by a vote of 40 to 29. As the honourable Senator Roebuck said, it was then referred to a special committee, which committee reported the bill without any amendment. Further discussion then ensued in the chamber, and the bill was referred back to the special committee for further consideration. That committee reported the bill again, with one or two minor amendments. Then there followed a further debate, during which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House. If I remember correctly, Senator Murdock was the chairman, and I presented certain amendments which were adopted. The report was then adopted. On third reading Senator Hugessen and Senator Farris made what I considered outstanding speeches. They had not spoken on second reading, but they spoke eloquently and to the point on third reading. The bill was given third reading by a vote of 33 to 29, not a large majority, and was passed.

The bill was then sent to the Commons for consideration. It was then very late in the session, sometime towards the end of May, and that year Parliament prorogued on July 1—we did not sit the year round then. It received first reading in the other place, and there followed a short debate on second reading. Then a motion was made and passed that the bill be not read a second time at that stage but that it be read a second time six months hence, and Bill B died. That was the end of Bill B.

I thought this information might be of interest to honourable senators, particularly as we appear to have plenty of time at our disposal. In a moment I shall deal with Bill 0-6, which I eventually introduced in 1955.

When Bill B was defeated in 1938 I intended the following year, and possibly each ensuing year for some years, to introduce a similar bill—just as Senator Croll has been doing in connection with Consumer Credit. But, as honourable senators will recall, World War II intervened in 1939, and things did not get back to normal, in so far as the introduction of a bill of this kind was concerned, until some time after hostilities ceased in 1945, at which time there were perhaps other more important matters than amending the divorce laws to be considered.

However, I had not abandoned the idea of introducing another bill. In fact, I was in England in 1953 and during my stay in London I spent several days in the divorce courts listening to cases being tried. I talked to the officials and was even able to visit several barristers in the Inns of Court. We discussed the whole question of divorce, particularly with respect to how the amendments made in 1937 were working out. I was told there was no difficulty whatever, and that they had another royal commission sitting even then. I have in my hand a copy of the report of the Royal Commission on Marriage and Divorce of 1951-55, in which one of the recommendations was that there be no change in the law which had been put on the statute books in 1937. Of course they made several other recommendations. So, honourable senators, I returned from England with my mind made up that I would introduce another bill as soon as possible.

In 1954 I went to the Canadian Bar Association convention which was held in Calgary that year. Towards the end of the convention the question of divorce arose and was debated on the floor for some time. I happened to make the last speech, and I told the delegates that if they would pass a resolution on divorce along the lines I had outlined, I would promise to introduce a bill in the Senate the following year, which I did. I refer to Bill O-6 of 1955.

I may say that before introducing the bill I wrote to several important people. At that time there was a Divorce Reform League in Toronto. There was another such League in Vancouver, of which the Reverend C. Bernard Reynolds was president. He is the gentleman to whom Senator Roebuck referred, and I read his book of 1953 and also received some letters from him. There was also a Divorce Reform League in Edmonton and other places. I obtained all the information I could from all these sources before introducing Bill O-6, which was almost identical to Bill B, introduced in 1938.

The honourable Senator Gershaw seconded that bill, and he spoke following me in the debate on second reading. Twenty-three senators took part in that debate, nine of whom are still living. However, there was still much opposition, I am sorry to say, in spite of the fact that public opinion was behind me; the bill was well advertised in all the newspapers of Canada, and I received hundreds of letters expressing support for the bill. When the vote was taken, the motion for second reading was defeated by 37 to 20. Needless to say, I was quite discouraged and I threw in the towel for the time being.

In 1956 I sponsored another bill, which had nothing to do with the subject matter of this bill. That was a bill to amend the Exchequer Court Act, to give that court jurisdiction in divorce, and it met the same fate. Had it passed, it would have done away with Parliamentary Divorce.

I am indeed pleased that we have now this bill before us, with the likelihood that we shall make some progress with respect to it. Senator Roebuck has said that there are seven or eight bills before the other place that have been referred to a special committee, and that he is doing everything in his power to have the whole matter dealt with by a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons.

I have in my hand an article which appeared in the Brantford Expositor, entitled "Divorce Reform", and which reads:

> After Parliament's years of evasion, hypocrisy and political poltroonery about divorce law reform, it is as astonishing as it is encouraging that the Commons took only five minutes the other day to authorize the first inquiry in nearly a century into Canada's cruel and obsolete divorce laws. Equally welcome to enlightened citizens, a majority we believe, will be the vote for a parallel inquiry into the birth control and abortion sections of the Criminal Code.

I noticed also a report in the Ottawa Journal of March 3 last with respect to the committee of the House of Commons, which said that a committee composed almost entirely of lawyers has been set up in that house. I do not think such a committee should have so many lawyers among its members. Lawyers are supposed to understand divorce matters because most of them have appeared in such cases before the provincial courts, but I do think there should be some laymen on the joint committee, if and when it is set up, as there are on the Standing Committee on Divorce of the Senate.

Honourable senators, I support this bill completely. It is a step in the right direction. As I said before, I do not think it is as good a bill as was Bill B or Bill 0-6, but by bringing forward all these bills and so stirring up public opinion we are going to get somewhere. It is my hope that many honourable senators will speak in this debate, that the bill will eventually receive the endorsement in principle of this house, and that a joint committee of both Houses of Parliament, a royal commission or some other form of enquiry will be instituted to deal with the whole subject.

Before resuming my seat, I would like to take this opportunity of welcoming the new senators who have recently been summoned to this chamber. I know that they are well able to make a valuable contribution to this branch of government. They will find the work interesting and rewarding in many ways. I hesitate to use the word "rewarding" in view of the fact that the newspapers recently have been mentioning almost nothing else but the financial reward that senators receive. I assure the new senators that after the Department of National Revenue has deducted 50 per cent of their indemnities for income taxes and after paying their other expenses they will not have much left. On the other hand, they will have the satisfaction and honour of having been appointed senators, and a sincere desire to carry out their duties.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Gershaw, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Friday, March 4, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden for the second reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, as a preface to my remarks may I use a truism in saying that this legislation, considering the many frauds exposed recently in the field of bankruptcy, is important and urgent. The object of this act is to meet the most pressing needs first. As the sponsor of the bill, Senator Hayden, said, this is only a partial revision of the Bankruptcy Act; it is not a complete revision. It is obvious to everyone who knows this legislation, that many other provisions of the 1949 act need correction, precision and changes.

I say that the object of this bill is to provide for the most urgent needs. It is true, except that the part which concerns the orderly payment of debts is, substantially, the same as the legislation we passed here a few years ago, but which was not adopted in the other place. This part of the act is intended only to rectify a situation which concerns particularly the province of Manitoba, as pointed out by Senator Hayden.

Besides, I want to congratulate him for his clear explanation to which we have grown accustomed.

The purpose of the act is to try to correct what is most apparent in the faults that were brought to light following the exposure of those frauds. To prevent frauds, certain transactions between what the act calls "related persons" are annulled. A transaction can be annulled if it is made autrement qu'au mieux des intérêts des parties. That is the French translation of "at arm's length". In my opinion, the translation in inadequate for the simple reason that the expression "at arm's length" cannot be translated.

Surely, we need such provisions to prevent transactions like those, which could not be annulled under the 1949 legislation, from continuing to be the source of frauds which often achieve monumental proportions.

The object of the bill is also to extend the authority of the superintendent or his representative in the distribution of the bankrupt estate by the official receiver, by allowing them to sequestrate the bankrupt's property and books while the trustee is being investigated or while an investigation concerning offences under the Bankruptcy Act or the Criminal Code is being carried out.

In the area of proposals we suggest some rules which would give more adequate protection to creditors. In particular, I agree with the principle under which a proposal under the Bankruptcy Act is an assignment of property held in abeyance. If the person making the proposal does not abide by his proposal, the latter is cancelled forthwith and he is considered as having made an assignment. Thus bankruptcy becomes automatic in the case of a petitioner who does not respect his commitments.

It has also been provided, or made clear if you wish, that the bankrupt is obliged to give the trustee an adequate portion of the property he might acquire after the bankruptcy for the benefit of his creditors.

The new machinery proposed by the legislation, and which I received, will be studied by the Banking and Commerce Committee. I think that this committee is well qualified to make a thorough and efficient study of the matter.

We already know that a number of people, groups or corporations will come before that committee to express their views. The first one that comes to my mind is the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants which, a few years ago, submitted to the Government recommendations about the Bankruptcy Act, several of which are incorporated in the bill under consideration.

In addition—I mention this because it is a recent occurrence—the judges of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec met in a plenary session Friday and Saturday last and studied the bill; they indicated that it was their intention to make representations.

At this point, what I wish to ask above all, is whether the provisions of the bill intended to prevent fraud are fundamentally broad enough under the present circumstances. I should answer, in all simplicity and frankness, that I am not at all sure of this, that in fact I doubt it very much.

What is the source of frauds in bankruptcies? Essentially, I think it lies in the lack of interest shown by the creditors.

Let us remember that the purpose of the Bankruptcy Act is twofold: first, to distribute fairly the assets of an insolvent person among creditors according to the rights of each of them; secondly, to free the bankrupt who has become insolvent for reasons more or less beyond his control.

This is the twofold purpose of the Bankruptcy Act.

In the past, bankruptcies were much more scarce, because only tradesmen could use the act. Anyway, they were the only ones, in practice, who could obtain credit. Nowadays the act applies to everybody. Besides, anybody can obtain credit. Just think about the increase in consumer loans by various finance companies in the last 10 or 20 years. Their volume is fantastic. As a result, the bankruptcy problem does not arise only in the case of large enterprises, of big business, but also of lots of people who are, in many cases, wage-earners. If large corporations experience substantial losses when bankruptcies occur, in the case of some individuals you find that some people who suffer are perhaps poorer than the bankrupt. We must not only think about large bankruptcies but about all bankruptcies.

Therefore, the problem does not arise solely out of transactions between related persons. I am of course very happy that the bill suggests corrective measures in this respect. But I think the problem is much wider than the one suggested by the amendments respecting transactions between related persons.

I said that bankruptcies stem from the lack of interest shown by creditors. Generally, bankruptcies bring in almost nothing because a dividend higher than 10 per cent is very seldom declared. In addition, although I have not looked up the statistics in this respect, in a great number of cases, for that reason, there is no dividend left for the creditors. The creditor then says: I shall not throw good money after bad. He loses all interest and, as a result, the debtor is tempted to defraud his creditors and to remove from the estate what he can, knowing that no investigation will be carried out and that no one will take the trouble to try to recover the property which rightfully belongs to the creditors. It must be pointed out that even though many trustees are very honest, they can hardly resist temptation in such circumstances, precisely because of this lack of interest on the part of the creditors. The trustees are tempted beyond their power to resist.

What then is to be done? I submit we have reached the point where Parliament must recognize the change that has taken place in the field of bankruptcy. We now have an act, simultaneously civil, administrative and penal, but mainly based on the principle that the problem between the debtor and the creditors is of a private nature. The problem is to settle equitably a situation between a debtor and his creditors. This is civil law. The administration and penal aspect is secondary. But when the creditor shows a lack of interest, the problem is no longer a private or civil matter, but a problem of public order. Similarly, as in some provinces there is a public trustee or other similar institutions to protect those who are disqualified, we must also consider the creditors in cases of bankruptcy as unable to look after their own interests or having no interest whatsoever. Consequently, the state must protect them since they do not want to look after themselves. If not, the state would be encouraging fraud.

Therefore, I say that eventually, and the sooner the better, we will have to take away from the trustee the care of property; the trustee will no longer be able to hold the bankrupt's property in trust—the Government will have to do it instead—so that the bankrupt, the trustee and all those who have anything to do with the bankruptcy will feel the constant presence and supervision of the government. I think there is no other solution. We are getting nearer and nearer to it.

I might add also that the bill seems to be guilty of sins of omission with regard to the discharge of the bankrupt, which can be obtained too easily in some respects and not easily enough in other respects.

The divergent jurisprudence which varies from one place to another suggests the need for certain amendments. However, the most pressing need is to recognize that the Government must protect the interests of creditors by taking charge of the assets of a person who goes bankrupt, since the creditor himself is unable to take care of them.

Anyway, we shall be able to study the bill more closely in committee, for I see a noticeable improvement in the basic idea of some of these amendments. I hope that next session the Government will suggest that Parliament make a thorough revision of the Bankruptcy Act. It has attended to the most pressing things first. I think that it should have gone further. There is much more to be done, even though the amendments to this act are most welcome.

PRIVATE BILL

THE TRUSTEE BOARD OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Kinley moved the second reading of Bill S-20, respecting The Trustee Board of The Presbyterian Church in Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is brought to us by petition of the Trustee Board of the church and the Administrative Council. The subject matter of the bill arises from resolutions passed by the General Assembly of The Presbyterian Church in Canada.

The purpose of subsection (1) of the proposed new section 2A is to enable the General Assembly to fix the membership of the Trustee Board at from seven to fifteen members, with the membership fixed at nine until the General Assembly otherwise determines. At present the board consists of seven members, the number established under its act of incorporation, but it is now considered desirable, because of the increasing work of the board, to make provision for its enlargement to a maximum of fifteen.

The purpose of subsection (2) of the proposed new section 2A is to make mandatory what has hitherto been the practice, namely, to provide that the chairman of the Administrative Council and the treasurer of the church shall be appointed to the board. However, it is possible that the position of treasurer might become at some future time a permanent paid position, or that it might cease to exist under that name. In either of these events, the chairman of the finance committee of the Administrative Council, by whatever name he is called, is to be appointed to the board in place of the treasurer, but only if and so long as the position of chairman is unpaid.

The purpose of clause 2, which adds paragraphs (g) and (h) to section 15 of the act of incorporation, is to empower the board to consolidate such of the investments of the church as may be consolidated under the terms of the instruments creating them, so that a greater income may be derived therefrom. The board, while retaining overriding control, is also empowered, by paragraph (h), to employ professional advisers to assist in the making of its investments.

The purposes of clause 3, which amends section 21 of the act of incorporation, are twofold. Subsection (1) brings section 21 in line with the amendments made in the proposed new section 2A, and incorporates reference to the new regulations for the government and control of the board recently approved by the General Assembly. Subsection (2) authorizes the delegation by the General Assembly of its powers and jurisdiction over the board to the Administrative Council of the church, or the executive thereof, between sessions of the General Assembly. The General Assembly meets only once each year and decisions are required to be made concerning the board's work when the General Assembly is not in session. The General Assembly has the power to revoke any such delegation at any time.

Honourable senators, this bill was passed by the Senate last year but the dissolution of Parliament intervened before it could become law. Since that time the General Assembly has made it more in keeping with the resolutions of that assembly. I commend the bill to the Senate and I ask for second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Kinley, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the following report of the committee on Bill S-14, to amend the Bills of Exchange Act:

> Your committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-14, to amend the Bills of Exchange Act, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendments:

> Page 2: Immediately after clause 2, add the following as clause 3:
> "3. Sections 113 and 114 of the said act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:
>
> '113. Where an inland bill has been dishonoured, it may if the holder thinks fit, be noted and protested for non-acceptance or non-payment as the case may be; but it is not necessary to note or protest an inland bill in order to have recourse against the drawer or endorsers.
> 114. Where a bill does not on the face of it appear to be a foreign bill, protest thereof in case of dishonour is unnecessary.' "

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave of the Senate, I move that this report be taken into consideration now.

Honourable senators, these are simple amendments. The first, which adds the words "throughout Canada," has to do with a provision that is presently in section 43 of the Bills of Exchange Act. Section 43 reads, in part:

> ...the following and no other days shall be observed as legal holidays...

The particular part of section 43 to which the additional words in the amendment relate, namely, "throughout Canada", in defining what are legal holidays and non-juridical days, is that part which states:

> ...any day appointed by proclamation for a public holiday, or for a general fast, or a general thanksgiving throughout Canada...

In the bill which came before the Senate and was considered by us in committee, that language had been changed a little to read as follows:

> ...any day appointed by proclamation to be observed as a public holiday—

That is almost the same language. Then follow the words:

> —or as a day of general prayer or mourning or day of public rejoicing or thanksgiving.

It will be noted that the words "throughout Canada" were omitted. On reflection, the departmental officers felt that as there may occasionally be proclamations in relation to holidays that are limited geographically to a certain area of Canada, and it was not intended that those should come within that description, they should restore the words "throughout Canada". We therefore restored those words.

Another matter is the repeal and re-enactment of sections 113 and 114 of the Bills of Exchange Act, which provide that where a bill of exchange has been dishonoured—in effect, at the option of the holder—the bill may be noted and protested.

During all the period we have had legislation in relation to bills of exchange there has been an exception in relation to the Province of Quebec, in which province it was necessary to note and protest. We were told in committee that this is a practice that even antedated Confederation. There have been efforts from time to time to have that exception removed.

When this proposal was before the Senate, the late Senator Bouffard suggested removal of the exception so that throughout Canada there would be a general rule, that noting and protesting would be at the option of the holder. Accordingly, in the Province of Quebec, it is the notary who notes and protests. La Chambre des Notaires of Quebec was consulted, and we were advised that they unanimously approved the withdrawal of the exception. I understand that both the Premier of the province and counsel for the Premier were consulted and that they approved. With that backlog of support, it was felt that one could safely remove the exception. The second amendment contained in today's report places the law in relation to noting and protesting generally the same throughout Canada—that is, in effect, at the option of the holder.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Cook moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO MAKE INQUIRY

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson moved, pursuant to notice:

That the Standing Committee on External Relations be authorized to inquire into the question of Commonwealth relationships with particular reference to the position of Canada within the Commonwealth;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the evidence received and taken on the subject at the preceding session be referred to the committee; and

That the Committee be instructed to report to the House from time to time.

He said: Honourable senators, a motion in almost identical terms to the one now standing on the Order Paper in my name was moved by me during the last session of Parliament. The only difference is the addition of the third paragraph, which reads: "That the evidence received and taken on the subject at the preceding session be referred to the committee."

After that resolution was presented in this house it was spoken to by, among others, Senator Roebuck, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), Senator Brooks and Senator O'Leary (Carleton). These gentlemen all made excellent presentations in regard to the subject matter of the resolution, and they broadened the extent of the matters that I had referred to in my speech. Their suggestions are most valuable to the future work of the committee.

Subsequently, the committee held two meetings. At the first meeting we were addressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Paul Martin. At the second meeting our witness was Mr. H. O. Moran, Director General of the External Aid Office. These were the only two meetings held because, as honourable senators are aware, Parliament adjourned shortly afterwards. Consequently, this subject matter is being renewed in the present resolution.

Inasmuch as the subject matter of this resolution was referred to both in specific and general terms in the speeches made last year, I do not intend to detain the house long with regard to the motion. Nevertheless, I desire to examine some of the important events that have occurred within the Commonwealth during the past eight or nine months.

In the remarks I made, as reported at page 41 of the Debates of the Senate of last year, under date of May 6, I referred in general terms to the present membership of the Commonwealth. However, as honourable senators are aware, the Commonwealth consists in part of monarchies and republics and there is one member who comes under the classification of independent monarchy. To provide background for the committee meetings which are to follow, I wish to place on the record the names of the members of the Commonwealth falling within these three classifications.

At the present time there are eleven monarchies acknowledging allegiance to the British Crown: The United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Ceylon, Jamaica, Trinidad and Tobago, Malta, Sienna Leone, Malawi, and the Gambia. There are ten republics: India, Pakistan, Ghana, Nigeria, Cyprus, Tanzania, Ugandi, Kenya, Zambia, and Singapore. Singapore seceded from the Federation of Malasia in August 1965, and it is now a republic in its own right. There is also one independent monarchy, the Federation of Malasia. I wish to emphasize that this is the present membership of the Commonwealth excluding, of course, the various colonies situated in various parts of the world.

As I said a moment ago, I propose to review briefly the developments that have occurred within the Commonwealth since the adoption by this house of this resolution last May.

The first event to be noted is that the regular conference of Prime Ministers and Presidents was held in London, June 17 to 25, 1965. One of the decisions arising from that conference was the appointment of a Commonwealth Secretariat, and on June 23 last Mr. Arnold Smith of Canada was named the Commonwealth's first Secretary-General. It will be recalled that prior to this appointment Mr. Smith was an Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. Another of the developments at that meeting was the discussion concerning Rhodesia, which, although not a member of the Commonwealth as a self-governing entity, was at that time a self-governing colony.

On August 5, 1965 the long-time dispute between India and Pakistan over Kashmir again erupted into war, thus threatening the very foundation of the Commonwealth, one of whose principal values lies in its potential for settling disputes internally and avoiding open warfare between its members. Ironically enough, it was the Soviet Union, rather than the Commonwealth, which eventually succeeded in arbitrating between the two countries. The Prime Minister of India and the President of Pakistan met on Soviet soil at Tashkent, where a truce was signed on January 10 last. The day after the truce had been signed, Prime Minister Shastri died while still on Soviet soil. He was succeeded on January 19 by Mrs. Indira Gandhi, the second woman prime minister in the Commonwealth, indeed, in the world.

On November 11, 1965 the crisis in Rhodesia came to a head by a unilateral declaration of independence by the Prime Minister, Mr. Ian Smith. The British Government immediately took certain steps, including the initial imposition of sanctions. Later, on December 11, oil sanctions were imposed. Dissatisfaction with British policy towards Rhodesia—namely, the refusal of Britain to use military force against Rhodesia—then led to a resolution being proposed at a meeting of the Organization of African Unity calling for member states to break off diplomatic relations with the United Kingdom. Two Commonwealth states, Tanzania and Ghana, complied with the resolution and broke off diplomatic relations on December 15 and 16, respectively. This development may thus raise the academic question as to whether or not the breaking off of diplomatic relations with a state whose Queen is the head of the Commonwealth is consistent with membership of the Commonwealth.

Another interesting development is that on December 16, 1965, the day on which Ghana severed diplomatic relations with the United Kingdom, Mr. Harold Wilson addressed the United Nations on the Rhodesian crisis. All the diplomats of the African countries, with the exception of Malawi, pointedly walked out as Mr. Wilson mounted the rostrum.

On the initiative of the Prime Minister of Nigeria, Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa, a special conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers was called in Lagos on January 11 and 12, 1966 to consider the Rhodesian situation. Canada's Prime Minister was, of course, among the Prime Ministers attending this conference. Ghana and Tanzania did not send representatives, and Australia sent only observers. The conference was generally regarded as a success for Mr. Harold Wilson, who was able to persuade his Commonwealth colleagues to accept, at least temporarily, the British Government's proposals for dealing with the Rhodesian crisis.

Shortly after the Lagos conference, on January 15 last, a coup d'etat took place in Nigeria, overthrowing the Government of Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa who was subsequently found murdered. This development was a serious blow to the Commonwealth, as Nigeria had been regarded by western states as the most promising example of developing democracy in Africa.

On February 24 last a coup d'état in Ghana overthrew Dr. Nkrumah, whose regime, if not democratic, had at least appeared to be one of the most stable and firmly based on the African continent.

The latest significant development in the Commonwealth is the calling of a general election in the United Kingdom for March 31 next. Should the election result in a change of government, a change in policy towards Rhodesia and, in consequence, towards the Commonwealth, could follow.

It is apparent that among the Commonwealth African states there is already a conflict of loyalties respecting the Commonwealth and the Organization of African Unity. Consequently, there is real speculation as to what the result of these various conflicts could be with respect to the immediate future of the Commonwealth.

Another development which should not be overlooked was the retirement of Sir Robert Menzies as Prime Minister of Australia on January 20 last, and his succession by Mr. Harold Holt. Sir Robert had been Prime Minister of Australia without interruption since 1949, and as one of the Commonwealth's elder statesmen he has been throughout his career one of the pillars in the maintenance of this association.

Honourable senators, I have summarized these developments in order to have them on Hansard as background for the commencement of the committee's meetings to deal with this resolution. It has been my purpose also in making these remarks to indicate to the house that a study of the Commonwealth, such as is envisaged in this resolution, will not be a study of something static and without momentum, but rather a study of a subject that is alive with possibilities, new problems and new developments in a fast moving world. That is why I have given this summary of events over a period of only nine months of Commonwealth history.

There is one further matter to which I should like to allude in regard to the new Commonwealth, and that is the conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association which is to be held in Ottawa in September of this year. As all honourable senators are aware, the President of the C.P.A. is the leader of this house, Senator John J. Connolly. This is a great honour for us, and we all hope that his health will permit him to preside over that conference, which will bring many hundreds of delegates from every part of the Commonwealth to Canada. These delegates will not only attend the general sessions in Ottawa but will visit all parts of this country.

I would hope if there are others who wish to speak to this motion, that they will do so. In any event, it is expected that the committee will start its sessions at the very earliest opportunity.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I thought my honourable colleagues would like to know what the situation is as to the prospective work of this chamber for the next few days. I am told that the House of Commons are still considering the Estimates, but I understand it is their hope that they will finish this afternoon; that is, that some time this afternoon they will send us the final supply bill.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It is with respect to the next few hours that you are giving us this information?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is right, this is for the next few hours. In those circumstances I do not quite know what to advise the house. I think the thing to do would be to carry on with our Order Paper, and after its completion to adjourn until 8 o'clock this evening. By that time we should have the supply bill, and perhaps we can have Royal Assent later on in the evening. The only difficulty is that if we are to have Royal Assent this evening the House of Commons will have to agree to sit, because normally they adjourn at 6 o'clock on Wednesdays. As we have to accommodate ourselves so much to the House of Commons these days I would think that this time they should give us that facility.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Is it necessary that we receive this bill today and have Royal Assent in order that the business of the country may be carried on? Surely, if that is the case, the House of Commons will agree to sit.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I could not agree more with my honourable friend.

With respect to the immediate future of the Senate it is my hope that the debate on second reading of the bill to amend the Bankruptcy Act can be concluded today or tomorrow, so that the bill can be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. When that is accomplished our Order Paper will be fairly clear.

I am told there is very little likelihood of anything coming to us from the House of Commons next week. So, in those circumstances, and unless something unexpected transpires within the next twenty-four hours, I hope to be able tomorrow afternoon to suggest that the Senate adjourn for the coming week, to reassemble on March 22.

There is one other matter of which I should like to remind honourable senators. There is a meeting to welcome the new senators in the Railway Committee Room at 5 o'clock. This was arranged long before these troubles developed, and I do hope that all honourable senators will avail themselves of this opportunity of meeting the new senators.

SPOKESMAN FOR FRENCH-CANADIAN LIBERALISM

NEWSPAPER REPORT—PRIVILEGE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

Some time ago a press reporter wrote in a local daily that in 1941 the Quebec Liberal caucus strongly opposed naming an outsider to be the spokesman for French-Canadian liberalism. The article had reference to the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent. Nothing of the sort happened. At no time did the Quebec caucus do anything like that in regard to the entry of the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent into the cabinet. Furthermore, according to my knowledge during the long years I have sat in Parliament, nothing has ever happened in any caucus, positively nothing.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck for the second reading of Bill S-19, to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, may I, first of all, in a humble way add my welcome to the new senators. I feel sure that they will live up to the traditions of the Senate, and that they will see to it that the great principles that are embedded in our Constitution are not disregarded but, rather, are reflected in the laws which we pass in this chamber.

I might say also that it is the duty of the Senate to look after the rights of minorities. The members of the Senate, sitting in the various committees, have an opportunity of speaking to the rich and the poor, to the producer and the consumer, to the employed and the unemployed, of finding out what their thoughts are and making sure that legislation is not unfair to them.

This brings me to a practice which has been going on for many years in connection with the divorce cases which come to the Senate, which I think is very unfair, and at this time I want to thank Senator Roebuck and Senator Croll for bringing it to our attention. It has been my lot to adjudicate, if that is the proper word, in as many as 2,000 divorce cases during the last few years. Every one of them has been a domestic tragedy. I am supporting this bill because I believe it is a step towards a fairer and better way of dealing with divorce cases.

Some divorces that should not have been granted have been granted, and in other cases divorce has been refused or made impossible. For some it is too easy; for others it is very much too difficult. In England some years ago a royal commission said in its report that divorce is not a disease, but a remedy for a disease caused by the conduct of persons.

No law should be so harsh that it is disregarded generally, and no divorce law should be so lax that it lessens regard for the sanctity of marriage. As I see it, the practice and the methods we have been following here have been too harsh for some people and much too easy for others.

In what way is the present law harsh? For one spouse life may be long, continued sorrow, suffering and misery. The example to the children in their impressionable years may be terrible. Yet there is no relief except by one or the other committing adultery or pretending to commit adultery. Adultery is a moral crime, and there are good reasons why it should be a crime according to the laws of our land.

In the Divorce Committee one of the parties will come in to give evidence, is warned that he or she need not admit to having committed adultery, and having expressed a willingness to answer questions pertaining to adultery, openly admits without blush, shame, regret or guilt the commission of adultery. To me that is shocking. It is a hard route for divorce.

However, there is an easier route. Let us suppose that a couple decides to get a divorce. They talk it over, and it is arranged that one of them will meet a person of the opposite sex and register at a hotel or motel. A detective is hanging around, sees them enter the room together, puts a piece of scotch tape on the door, goes away and calls his mate, because he wants to get some corroboration of the story. After a while he and his mate return, go up to the room and knock on the door. One of the occupants comes to the door, perhaps at 2 o'clock in the morning, and in state of being partly dressed or wearing a dressing gown or housecoat opens the door; the detectives walk in or force their way in, perhaps under the pretext of having a telegram for the occupants. One of the detectives holds up a photograph and says, "Is that your picture?" If the answer is yes, the party becomes identified. The detectives then look around the room and note that a person of the opposite sex is in bed. It looks as if the bed had been disturbed and occupied by two people, that the unoccupied pillow is indented. They look around the room and see men's and women's apparel; perhaps on a table is a bottle of whisky, or something of that kind.

However, they identify the two people, get their names, and the case is made. That is all there is to it. The detectives go away, and later the case comes before the Divorce Committee. The plaintiff gives evidence, and assures the committee that there is no connivance, collusion or condonation.

Of course, honourable senators, the planning and conniving has already been done by somebody who is not called to give evidence. In some of these cases we know very well that it has been a put-up job. But what can we do—there is the evidence of adultery, and presumably the plaintiff is entitled to a divorce.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Would you agree with me, sir, that 50 per cent of the cases that you describe now were collusive, and that you might have turned them down?

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is pretty difficult to do that.

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: If there is evidence of adultery, what else can we do? Many of these cases are so-called common law marriages, and are genuine. What I am trying to say is that some people get off too easily.

Regarding the bill itself, it seems to me that the provision in the bill of five years in relation to a person of unsound mind is too short a term. New methods of treatment of insanity have brought about remarkable results. Marriage is supposed to survive during sickness and health. It seems to me that unless there is a very strong proof of permanent insanity, beyond hope of cure, the period of five years specified in the bill is not long enough.

On the question of people being submitted to blood tests before marriage, it seems to me that perhaps a young couple might well go to a doctor, get a blood test and think it is a big joke.

My view is that if a marriage shows signs of breaking up, a marriage counsellor might be able to exert a strong influence for good and impress the parties regarding the sanctity of their marriage.

Honourable senators, I support this bill. I feel that if the committee would adopt a procedure more satisfactory than the present one it would be a great step forward and would add to the general welfare and happiness of our society.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I say for the sake of the record that the 50 per cent mentioned is altogether too high.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Grosart, debate adjourned.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden for the second reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, we have already heard four speeches by high-powered legal lights on this bill. May I commence by saying that the last amendment to the Bankruptcy Act was made in 1949. That is a long time ago. From 1949 to 1957, when the Progressive Conservatives came into office, nothing was done. They just went along with it in the normal way.

In 1957 the Government changed. Then in 1962 the government of the day offered some amendments. We discussed the bill when it came to us, but the bill applied to an extremely narrow field. We were told in 1962 that this was an interim measure, that general revision would come later. I mention that because it was also said in 1963, and it is still being said in 1966.

At that time I spoke to the bill and pointed out that we could not wait, that times were changing. There were new competitions, goods and services were available, and business methods had changed. However, over the years most businesses had clothed themselves in corporate garments which have neither bodies to be kicked nor souls to be damned.

I was highly critical of the bill. That did not go down well with those sitting to the right of His Honour the Speaker in 1962. Well, the Government changed in 1963—there was a new Government. Within 90 days afterwards we had a bill with a few improvements, but it was still patchy and tinkerly; there was nothing pointed in it; and strangely enough, at that time I was again highly critical of the bill. At that time they promised this would be an interim measure and that we would deal with the Bankruptcy Act at some later time.

At that time I suggested there be a bankruptcy fraud squad composed of the R.C.M.P. That suggestion caught the imagination and attention of people who were interested, but nothing came of it and nothing was done.

Now, honourable senators, I gave you the anatomy and chronology of the bill. It is an unlucky bill, and that is the least I can say for it. We have gone 17 years without an effective amendment. As a result, deep rot has set in. It will take a strong and determined administrator to make some improvement. It may take longer than normal, because there have been continuous disastrous policies. To change policy was, for some, to admit an error; and the change seems to come only when you move those persons responsible for the failure. We need, and I hope we have it now, someone in charge who has some spark, some imagination, because caution will get him nowhere.

Even as far back as 1960 it was evident that the act could not cope with modern-day shenanigans in high finance, coupled with fraud. In 1962 and 1963 we examined this question—the records contain many pages concerning the activities of these people— and we felt that if we exposed these conditions we would frighten off some of those who might be thinking of participating. However, it seems that the discussion gave them new ideas. They must have read Hansard and the press reports carefully, because bankruptcy fraud increased after 1962 and 1963. We have no alternative now but to throw the book at them. That is what we are doing by the extensive powers proposed under the act. Those powers are frightening. If it were not for the fact that extreme measures are necessary to deal with an extreme situation, it would be difficult to justify the giving of these powers.

We discussed this question in 1962 and 1963, we had extensive hearings in committee, responsible people came from all over the country and gave damning evidence; yet we were not able to reach the minister or his department. There was incredible apathy, which I find hard to understand.

This is a far-reaching bill, and there can be no excuses now if the administrator is determined to apply the law. It is my view that Canadian people loathe these bankruptcy frauds and want them stopped, and they will not tolerate further passing of the buck. If those in administration do not take advantage of the opportunities afforded by this bill, they will find that the "heat" will be on very quickly.

We need today, more than anything else, a good administrator. In addition, we need help from the attorneys general. The administration is federal, the prosecution is provincial, and attorneys general in some of the larger provinces have not been completely helpful. We need help from the crown attorneys, and this can come only through the attorneys general. Some are always too busy; they say this is a civil matter, that they cannot bother about it. Therefore, I repeat, what we need is co-operation from the attorneys general.

It is necessary also to provide a proper staff to deal with this situation. I was amused on reading yesterday that a decision has been taken to establish a fraud squad—one man has been sent to Toronto and one man to Montreal.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It is like the truth squad.

Hon. Mr. Croll: And about as effective. It is necessary to provide a dedicated staff, a trained staff, one that is not easily influenced, is composed of hard-headed, hard-nosed people who understand what is happening today.

In 1945 the income tax authorities were experiencing difficulty in educating people regarding income tax, and consequently they formed a special investigation squad. That squad's activities resulted in the collection of millions and millions of dollars. I do not need to tell the lawyers in the Senate how often their clients have paid, as my clients have paid. I do not suggest that that squad effected a cure, but they made tax evasion unpopular and costly, and some people ended up behind bars. I am sure there were few repeaters.

A similar method is needed in regard to bankruptcy now. The staff must be composed of experienced people, not merely human bodies. The chartered accountants on the staff must have inquisitive noses and vivid imagination to delve into these things. There is need for expert investigators of the "show me" type, to get down to the basis on which these people operate. We have to deal with a bad bunch, who defile what they touch. In trying to deal with them by a model T bankruptcy law, in a financial jet world of automatic data processing, we have no chance of success. We should put this new law on the statute books and start administering it.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Does the honourable member's criticism apply to all parts of Canada?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I said "two provinces". The honourable senator may rest assured I would not say anything like that about New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: You could not very well say so.

Hon. Mr. Croll: To make sure of it, I say now that the chief racket in the two largest provinces is the bankruptcy racket. Is that clear?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Yes. It is abundantly clear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: This bill makes it clear that fraudulent bankruptcy is a crime, not a civil matter, and that it must be prosecuted by the Crown in the same way as theft or burglary, to which it is akin. The victims, for many reasons—and one reason is the cost—are reluctant to take action. They should not have to do so: it is the duty of the Crown, and that should be recognized from now on.

Honourable senators, those who have read the Mercier Report made in the Province of Quebec, dated August 1965, will have found some portions of it far more thrilling than any James Bond novel, and worth twice the money. That report was made by a royal commission, yet no one seems excited about what is going on. Thus, it is our duty, not only to get excited but to serve notice that action is needed.

The reasons given for bankruptcy are overexpansion, overproduction, easy credit. These are the breeding grounds for bankruptcy racketeers. We should make sure that we pass a workable bill. Those with ideas should come before the Senate committee, so that all useful provisions may be put into the bill.

Honourable senators, this is a heavy responsibility that rests on our shoulders. There are no limitations on this bill and it is for us to make sure that we give it careful consideration, with painstaking determination on our part that when it goes to the other house they will realize that we have done a good job. If we produce a good bill, if we find a few good examples and if a few good people are thrown into jail, that will slow them down.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: A few good people?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I use "good" in that special sense. We need more and better people to administer this law. We need higher standards for trustees and inspectors. We need co-operation between the federal Government and the provincial authorities. We also need more consideration by businessmen as to whom they extend credit. We should also add a provision to the bill so that trustees and inspectors would know that they too are liable if they favour the interests of the bankruptcy racketeer; and in doing so we can bring to their attention the fact that they have a responsibility, so that in the immediate future we can bring this nefarious practice to an end. If we do that we will be serving a very useful purpose indeed.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I am sure you will all agree that considerable courage is needed for a layman to enter into a discussion on a measure such as this. We have in this house brilliant legal talent, members to whom I always listen with pleasure and from whom I receive much information, trying to follow them, as I do, at a distance.

Senator Hayden, as usual, made a brilliant speech when explaining the bill, and other splendid speeches have followed. I enjoyed listening to Senator Walker, to Senator Croll and to the other speakers. This house, as I have said, contains an abundance of legal luminaries; the front benches on both sides contain many brilliant lawyers, not to speak of those in the other benches and in particular the eminent legal lights seated near me in this chamber. Here in this section we are businessmen surrounded by lawyers.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Too many.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: It is right that there should be so many lawyers because in my experience the greater part of the work in this house must fall to the legal profession, and it is a happy thing for the Senate of Canada to be blessed in this respect as it is at the present time. I think this situation has prevailed throughout its history.

In addressing my remarks to this bill, and they will be brief, I want to make a plea to our legal friends to make this act as tight as possible in the interests of the poor creditors, the people left holding the bag having supplied materials to a job, such as a construction job, after a bankruptcy has occurred. I have in mind a case in a small community in my own province where a large plant, involving millions of dollars, was being constructed with the blessing of the provincial government. Under such auspices no one would for a moment think that there was any question or any difficulty about being paid for the articles and materials they supplied. But, lo and behold, a contractor who was erecting one of the buildings in connection with this plant went bankrupt. Some of the suppliers, sensing that something like this might happen shortly before it did, through their legal advisers put a mechanics' lien on this particular building and so were assured that their interests were protected. But when the bankruptcy actually occurred they found that the mechanics' lien was only good for about 50 per cent of their claim. The people who unfortunately had not been wise enough to put on such a lien received nothing. The result was that in that small community there was a loss of several hundred thousand dollars owed to the creditors. That did not leave a very good taste in the community.

For this reason I would ask that our legal friends should see to it that when this bill goes to committee every possible provision is included in it to protect creditors such as I have described.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Bourget): I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Hayden speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, I have just a few remarks to make at this time.

First, I wish to comment briefly on some of the points made by Senator Croll. Here we are dealing with a situation and with a subject matter about which one is justified in using strong language and in indulging in very graphic statements, when one considers the situations arising under the guise of the Bankruptcy Act and the fraudulent bankruptcies which have resulted.

There used to be a saying that a person should speak softly and carry a big stick. I think when we are dealing with bankruptcy law we should talk the toughest language we possibly can and not just carry the big stick but swing the big stick. We should strengthen in every way possible the provisions of the bill so as to achieve its avowed purpose, which is, in the public interest, to cut down the number of fraudulent practices which have developed in the course of bankruptcy operations. We are all agreed on that, and Senator Croll has expressed it more forcefully than perhaps some of the other speakers.

I should also point out to Senator Burchill that while we are using the toughest and most effective language we can in the provisions of this bill and in incorporating the additions we think should be made, there is no use fooling ourselves; we cannot legislate against business failure. As long as there are people, there will be some who are not as smart as others, and the strongest law of the land will not prevent business failures. The most we can do is to provide such legislation as will make it unprofitable or unattractive for people to practise fraud in relation to the situations that exist between a debtor and his creditors, and to that end I am sure the committee will apply itself.

We had a very interesting contribution from Senator Walker, who analysed the substance of the bill and presented the important sections in a concise way which made it easy to understand.

Senator Flynn, as usual, made a useful contribution which I enjoyed hearing, as I always do. I think he struck a note of reality when he pointed out that we all know the jurisdiction of the federal Parliament in relation to bankruptcy law. This is a statute which governs relationships and practices as they relate to affairs between a debtor and his creditors. That is still bankruptcy law. To that extent we must also point out the duties and responsibilities in this area of trustees and official receivers and the functions of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy.

I would mention another aspect which has developed out of the Bankruptcy Act and the inability or the lack of interest on the part of creditors to finance investigations of fraudulent practices in this area, which is the area of public interest having to do with criminal violations of the law. In that area there is opportunity for provisions aimed at closing the door to that sort of thing and making the possibility of exposure so great and the penalty so severe that there will be few who will want it for any length of time.

Senator Thorvaldson referred to the Mercier Report, as did Senator Croll. I think you will find—and I may say that I too have read the report—that some of the things stated in the report we have long suspected, but they are presented very graphically.

Senator Thorvaldson was wondering why no action had been taken on the Mercier Report. I believe that when we consider the bill in committee the Superintendent of Bankruptcy will tell us that as far as he and his department are concerned he knows of no proceeding in the provincial courts in Quebec against trustees, based on what is contained in the Mercier Report. And, secondly, I think he will tell us too that his department has not been furnished with any information substantiating the allegations contained in the Mercier Report as to the corruption and the connivance of trustees, although a request has been made for that information. By that I do not want to be taken as casting any doubt on the authenticity of the report, but I just wish to entreat you not to formulate conclusions too quickly.

Undoubtedly, the Mercier Report has been a most valuable contribution in this area, but there may not be full substantiation of the practices it has reported. This is a job which is to be done from now on through the added powers being given to the Superintendent of Bankruptcy and by the relationship of his duty and his obligation to report to the Attorney General's Department of the province concerned, where the investigation will be continued and where prosecutions will take place.

However, the department has not been idle recently. For instance, I am wondering if you know that since April 1964 the audit services of the Comptroller of the Treasury have been engaged and used in the auditing of the books of the trustees; and also that since 1959 a full check has been made by the R.C.M.P. on all applicants for the position of trustee. So there has been a better screening, in effect, as of and from 1959. Possibly that may be why, if you look at the statistics, the number of rejections of applicants for the position of trustee has substantially increased since 1959.

In addition, there is the system by which annually a trustee's position, conduct and operation are reviewed when he applies for renewal of his licence; and now if there is anything in the operation of his trusteeship which requires study or examination he is given a restricted renewal of licence, which means that he can only function in relation to estates which he has then and cannot take on any new business until he is cleared and given a full licence or, if the circumstances warrant it, his licence is not renewed.

Usually what occurs in many of these cases is that the trustees keep taking on work and they do not maintain sufficient staff, with the net result that their organization, their sysem of bookkeeping and accounting, gets into a hopeless mess. But, to the extent that you can correct the difficulties at the level of the trustee, that situation is under control and there will be more authority in that direction when these amendments become law.

In the course of his remarks, Senator Thorvaldson referred to the briefs that were submitted in 1962 and 1963. At page 248 of the Debates of the Senate, Senator Thorvaldson said:

> Presumably, all these briefs have been considered—

And immediately preceding this remark he had enumerated the sources of the briefs.

> —but so far as I know, nothing whatsoever has been done to correct the terrible abuses that undoubtedly have crept into the administration of our bankruptcy laws.

So far as the briefs are concerned, may I say this—because I referred back to them and examined them—that the briefs that were submitted in 1962 and 1963 were addressed, in the main, to the Summary Administration procedures and the abuses under that head; and that, as you will recall, applies or may apply in situations where the realizable assets of the debtor are not more than $500. That was the sort of situation I criticized the other night when I said you would find a trustee in a situation of that kind calling the first meeting of creditors and at the same time enclosing a notice of application for the discharge of the bankrupt. So, these briefs were addressed to that point and also to the matter of the orderly payment of debts.

One of the briefs to which my friend referred was that submitted by The Credit Granters Association of Canada in 1962, in which it was stated:

> It is not the intention here, to condemn the Bankruptcy Act with respect to the use made of it, or abuse as the case may be, by the salaried debtor. On the contrary, the Bankruptcy Act, is in general, good legislation and offers to the Creditor many remedies against abuse, such as the protection afforded such creditors who have rights in property in the possession of the bankrupt; the right of the trustee and/or creditors to after-acquired property of the debtor . . .

The brief continues:

> However, the main obstacles that Creditors encounter in availing themselves of such remedies, seem to be:—
>
> (a) The Legal Costs Involved. . . .
> (b) Lack of Supervision in Summary Administration. . . .

In conclusion, the brief states:

> From the foregoing, it becomes apparent that the Bankruptcy Act was a better act with respect to wage-earner bankruptcies, prior to 1949, than since.

That was the year in which the summary administration procedures were invoked.

When we condemn the wholesale continuation of such fraudulent practices, we must not lose sight of the fact that every person, I feel sure, is anxious to contribute in every way possible to making that course of conduct in the future impossible or at least very difficult. But at the same time we must remember that we are dealing with a piece of legislation that covers relationships between a debtor and his creditors; and I suspect it is only in the large bankruptcies, where there is much money involved and much money to be made, that you find these truly fraudulent practices that have developed.

I believe we have enough genius in Parliament to provide penalties of such proportion and proper authority of such extent that we should be able to restrict in large measure the practices that have gone on in recent years.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Friday, March 4, consideration of His Excellency The Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Nelson Rattenbury: Honourable senators, I should like to begin my remarks today by congratulating His Honour the Speaker, not only on his appointment to the honoured position he holds, but also on the manner in which he is discharging his duties. Every member of this chamber is, I know, very happy to be associated with him here.

I join with the other honourable senators who have spoken in welcoming our new colleagues. Some of them are friends of long standing, but all of them are well known Canadian citizens, prominent in the public life of this country.

In the same vein I should like to join my colleagues in congratulating the mover and seconder of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. My good friend, the honourable senator from Moosomin (Hon. Mr. McDonald) was making his maiden speech in this chamber but, as was said by a previous speaker, it certainly was not his first effort at delivering such an address.

I was particularly moved by the beautiful thoughts expressed so eloquently by Senator Gouin; so much so, that I decided to make some reference to the same situation that exists in my own province at this time. To some extent, tensions, heretofore practically unknown in New Brunswick, have developed along racial and religious lines. Such tensions are largely, I regret to say, the result of a degree of irresponsibility among my English-speaking friends, and I can only hope and pray that sanity of thought will soon return and that all New Brunswickers, Acadian and English alike, will once again work toward a common goal as they have done in complete harmony for so many years.

I will return to the reason for all this dissension in a few minutes, but first I would like to discuss some of the items of the Speech from the Throne itself, particularly as they affect the economy of the Atlantic provinces. The speech, to use a phrase which could be termed redundant, was all-encompassing. It contained many proposals for new legislation that will be of benefit to all Canadians. For example, the few words it contained about the Atlantic Development Board should please every resident of the Atlantic region. I believe this board has done so much to help the economy of our provinces that it stands alone in the field of achievement. The board itself has shown great imagination, and I feel that the dedication of its director Dr. E. P. Weeks and of his staff deserves special mention.

The extent to which the Atlantic Development Board has helped the growth and economy of our provinces can best be illustrated by mentioning a few of the projects they have helped to become realities.

In all four of the Atlantic provinces it has allocated funds to assist the fishing industry to establish better marketing conditions, as well as to expand, by providing funds to make fresh water available to fish plants. Of equal importance, in my opinion, is the assistance it has provided for the establishment of industrial parks. Manufacturing firms already have taken advantage of these parks, and many more are negotiating for sites within their boundaries.

Substantial assistance has been given in the construction and rehabilitation of trunk highways, and I hope more will follow.

The board's participation in the cost of construction of the two huge power developments at Bay d'Espoir on the south coast of Newfoundland and Mactaquac on the Saint John River made both projects possible and, of course, assisted materially in the creation of a very competitive power rate. In all, the Atlantic Development Board has approved an expenditure of sums in excess of $71 million for regional projects, and an additional sum amounting to $30 million for the trunk highway program.

The references in the Speech from the Throne to proposed legislation dealing with agriculture will be welcome in the east. The farmers of our area have struggled for too long a time to eke out a minimal existence. I hope that, before too long, needed assistance arising from the various proposals will result in a more abundant living for all agricultural workers.

Honourable senators, never before in Canada's history is so much being done in our fisheries as at present under the Government's fisheries development program. Initiated two years ago last January, at a federal-provincial conference on fisheries development, these activities reflect a wide range of new development and assistance action, on which the Government is willing to embark in co-operation with the provinces, to improve the lot of individual fishermen and to make the industry itself more efficient.

Indicative of the scope of these programs are the announcements which have been made in recent months, including such experiments as that of towing a new kind of float by helicopter to find concentrations of fish; the vacuum forming of fish blocks, and freezing under pressure to cut costs; the exploratory fishing for crab and shrimp on Canada's Atlantic coast, and for herring in the Gulf of St. Lawrence; the development of a light attraction system for sardines with a view to increasing the production of weirs. While these are mainly concerned with the Atlantic coast, similar action is being taken on the Pacific coast and in the inland areas. Encouragement is being given to the utilization of the offshore groundfish resource. Exploration is also under way on ways and means to use dogfish and other presently unused species in order to put more money into the pockets of fishermen.

Many more important programs have been initiated to make operations more efficient in all phases of activity from the time the fish is caught to the time it is on the table of the consumer.

Fishing experts from many foreign countries have been brought to Canada to demonstrate to Canadian fishermen new techniques which would assist them in their particular operation. They are assisting in the development and testing of new vessels, new fish catching methods, new processing and handling techniques, and also in the development of new fishery products.

Two classes of financial assistance for the construction of vessels are currently in effect. The first, administered by the Department of Industry, provides a 50 per cent grant towards the construction of steel trawlers large enough in size to fish the offshore banks in competition with other nations of the world. The second scheme, administered by the Department of Fisheries, provides assistance in the building of larger and more modern wooden vessels. This second program is designed to move fishermen away from the traditional small boat operations to one which allows them to work more days per year in heretofore inaccessible areas.

The fishing industry has always been of prime importance in New Brunswick. The new program for assistance which I have outlined will increase the abundance and quality of the product. However, there is one area in which, in my opinion, the Government needs to move without delay, and that is the training of personnel. I am informed by those in the business that properly trained officers and crew, who are prepared to make a career of fishing, are becoming increasingly difficult to obtain. To overcome this situation I would recommend the immediate establishment of additional training programs both afloat and ashore, and in this age of manpower shortage it would undoubtedly be necessary to institute subsidized apprenticeship training, similar to that already being carried out by Canada's coastguard. In fact, I would suggest the facilities now being used by the coastguard could be used to train fishermen.

I return to my own province. In recent months, the province which I represent has been the focus of an unusual amount of attention in the national press and on the airwaves. As honourable senators well know from many speeches in this chamber and from the history of the present century, we in New Brunswick are not always accustomed to such interested concern. Indeed, in the past we have chided our fellow Canadians for a certain amount of inattention, perhaps contributed to in some degree by ourselves.

The current situation is one, however, which has been generated on our home grounds and which, within the province itself, has caused a great deal of discussion. It would not be out of the way to say "controversy" is a more descriptive word.

I am referring to the Robichaud government's plan for equal opportunity. It is worthy of some consideration here because what the Government of New Brunswick is preparing in its legislation constitutes a fundamental change and advance in Canadian provincial and municipal affairs. This is the first time since Confederation that any province has undertaken such a fundamental reconstruction of its municipal, educational and taxation structure.

It is undoubtedly the most far-reaching plan to provide educational equality for all those capable of learning; and it is a program which recognizes the dramatic changes which have come in our social and economic life since the municipal structures were established in Canada a century ago.

The New Brunswick program constitutes something else: it is a bold attack on the poverty which has plagued so many parts of my province. It is a key campaign in the war on poverty, and other provinces have already noted that New Brunswick is leading the way. This is the sort of pleasant comment we have not always heard in the Maritimes, where we more often than not have been accused of being behind other regions.

The Toronto Telegram has called the New Brunswick program: "The most exciting experiment since Confederation." The Kitchener-Waterloo Record says: "New Brunswick shows the way." The current issue of the Financial Post carries an editorial about the program.

The Globe and Mail of March 3 carried a most interesting article, which stated in part:

> It has been easier to oppose Mr. Robichaud on emotional and racial grounds than on the substance of his program.

I would like to explain what the Government of New Brunswick has as its objectives, because I believe that what is happening there is relevant to other parts of the country.

The program is a sweeping one, of which the Schools Act and the Assessment Act are the keys. There are—and I know it is difficult to believe this—more than 500 one- and two-classroom school houses in New Brunswick. Not only are thousands of pupils making futile attempts to learn in such structures, but teacher training for those teachers in such rural areas has been highly inadequate. The provincial government proposes to do away with all such schools, substituting consolidations in area centres and providing full transportation. It is part of the plan that a uniform wage scale be established for teachers throughout the province. This will permit in time a very high level of competence in every part of the province—city or rural, rich or poor. The proposals are to modernize also and centralize the handling of health and welfare.

What is being proposed in my province is a major campaign against poverty in the War on Poverty. The Government of New Brunswick has taken literally the idea that the only way to defeat poverty and its social side-effects is to fight it.

I need hardly say that such advanced, imaginative and reformist proposals have not been universally welcomed. There are opponents, as there are for every reform in every age and place.

No reform, no change of fundamental nature comes without difficulty. No government which has the courage to get to the roots of long-standing inequalities and outdated systems fails to meet resistance. The government of the day under its leader, the Honourable Louis J. Robichaud, has studied the problems at all levels for four years; it has heard from and accepted many recommendations of a royal commission which held lengthy sittings and made most intensive studies. Some of the commission's recommendations have been rejected, but many have been accepted.

In putting the legislation before the house, the government provided an opportunity for debate and discussion, including representations from the public through public hearings by a Law Amendments Committee. It laid proposed legislation before the house with the purpose of having it seen and discussed and to be introduced again at a second session. Every opportunity has been given the opposition to know, understand and make recommendations. Yet, unfortunately, some have used such words as "dictator" and "dictatorship" in referring to the proposals.

It is not surprising that those who have raised such cries have not always understood the proposals, but have used this as a cloak for their own failure to offer solutions to difficult and very old problems. They have offered no alternatives of their own, and they work at the process of destruction for its own sake.

The legislation, as originally proposed, was subject to some revision, and revisions are being made and have been announced. Some of the representations made have been most useful and have been gladly accepted. In essaying a program which touches all aspects of life in the province, it would be incredible if there were not many places for improvement in the first drafts of proposed legislation. Indeed, improvement of such proposed legislation is the function of our parliamentary and democratic practice. I am proud of those who have initiated such broad and valuable reforms. I am convinced they will be passed and will succeed.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask the honourable senator if Premier Robichaud has called a general election in New Brunswick? I ask the question, because the honourable senator's address sounds to me very much like a stump speech.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: No.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: And a good one!

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Well, the premier is afraid to call one, and that is why I asked the question.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: My province has long suffered from the shortcomings of undeveloped resources, of inadequate opportunities, of earlier obstacles of geography which no longer exist. It has suffered because the original nature of its economy and social development was such that it was out of tune with much modern progress and had to be changed before full advantage could be taken of modern opportunities.

This province, perhaps more than any other, has taken advantage of broad and useful federal measures to assist such regions. But, more than that, its people have decided to take things into their own hands and move history where history would not move itself.

I am proud of the proposals now before the people, especially those which recognize that the young people of this country are its greatest resource and their training the prime essential. The day is not far ahead when a small province, one of the traditionally poorest in the nation, will be an educational model for Canada.

Its municipal structure, as reorganized, will be an example for other provinces to consider and follow. The fairness of its taxation will, I am confident, prove itself also a national model. Our economic advance has been spectacular. Measures taken in the last half dozen years have enabled private enterprise to help develop great riches in the interests of the people.

Investment has doubled in five years; revenues have doubled; unemployment has been cut beyond any anticipation and the province is progressing at a splendid rate. The Robichaud plan for equal opportunity will, I am sure, follow the pattern of growth, development and reform which has been established.

In closing these remarks, I want to pay a personal tribute to the Premier of New Brunswick, the Honourable Louis Joseph Robichaud, who has contributed so much to the development of understanding between the founding races of Canada. Lately he has undergone severe attack on the part of a very few for trying to bring economic and educational equality to all people of his province, including those of his own Acadian ancestry. Let me assure honourable senators that economic inadequacies in New Brunswick are evenly distributed among people of both founding groups. Indeed, I regret to say that 59 per cent of the one- and two-room schools in the province are in areas peopled by those not of Acadian ancestry.

Premier Robichaud has been a force in this country for national unity, a force against separatism and nationalism. He has in the past used his own province as an example of what national racial harmony can become. It is nothing less than tragic if a vindictive few should turn to the tactics of racism and division against one of the leading exponents of unity in our nation.

New Brunswick, traditionally and historically, has been a model of people getting along together. That a province whose people are 60 per cent non-French should on two occasions elect an Acadian premier is proof enough of the majority's feeling.

I am confident that, despite the not inconsiderable opposition of the moment which this new legislation has quite naturally engendered, New Brunswick will go forward in this last half of the twentieth century as a leader and a model of a province eager to provide equal opportunity for all its citizens.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, we have concluded the business on the Order Paper. I am about to suggest that the Senate stand adjourned until the call of the bell at approximately 7.45 this evening.

I am told it is likely the House of Commons will finish discussion of the Estimates this evening and send the supply bill to us. I cannot guarantee that will happen. Our meeting at 7.45 may be futile if the House of Commons does not agree to sit late, but I feel we are doing our duty by showing our willingness to carry on the business of the country as and when necessary.

Therefore, I move that the Senate stand adjourned during pleasure until the call of the bell at approximately 7.45 this evening.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 7.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1966

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Maurice Bourget) informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-140, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1966.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is moved by honourable Senator Hugessen, seconded by honourable Senator Hayden, that this bill be now read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: On division.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Honourable senators, the bill which is now before us is the final appropriation bill for the year 1965-66. Honourable senators will find on their desks a two-page memorandum which I think will give you the outline of the bill itself. If you refer to the second page headed in part "Estimates, 1965-66 (as reduced in the House)", you will see the totals for the main Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1966. These include the book volume which was tabled in the Senate just about a year ago, on March 23 of last year, and the Supplementary Estimates (A), (B), (C) and (D), involving a total expenditure of approximately $8,150 million. Extending off from that you will see how much of these expenditures were statutory, that is, not requiring the approval of Parliament, totalling $3,220 million approximately, and how much of each of these required parliamentary approval of both houses. This you will see totals $4,930 million.

On the first page you will notice how much of these estimates that require a vote has already been voted by the various interim appropriation acts which this house has had to pass during the last nine or ten months.

There have been six of these, which are noted on this memorandum as Appropriation Act No. 1, 1965, which granted interim supply for April and May; Appropriation Act No. 3, 1965, which granted interim supply for June; Appropriation Act No. 4, 1965, which granted supply for Supplementary Estimates (A); Appropriation Act No. 5, 1965, which granted supply for Supplementary Estimates (C); Appropriation Act No. 6, 1965, which granted interim supply for July, August, September and October, and Appropriation Act No. 1—

Hon. Mr. Reid: Why is there no Appropriation Act No. 2 shown on this memorandum? Why does it skip from No. 1 to No. 3?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Appropriation Act No. 2 covered final supplementary estimates for the previous year.

As you will observe, these six appropriation bills covered expenditures totalling $4,532 million, which compares to the total to be voted, as I mentioned a moment ago, of $4,930 million. So, in effect, what the present bill does is to vote that difference of $398 million. The details of that will be seen in the second tabulation on the first page, from which you will observe that this bill will grant the balance of the main Estimates, the balance of Supplementary Estimates (B) and the balance of Supplementary Estimates (D), totalling $398 million, which together with the amounts already voted by the six previous appropriation bills comes to this figure of $4,930 million.

You will observe that "the balance of the main Estimates" carries the note "as reduced in the House." There was an item in the main Estimates which you will find under, "Loans, Investments and Advances" in the Department of External Affairs, Vote L20, "Loans to Governments of countries other than members of NATO to provide defence support assistance," in the amount of $20 million. That amount was deducted from the Estimates at the request of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have the House of Commons Hansard in which this item was being considered, and there the minister said:

> Mr. Chairman, changes in circumstances since these Estimates were prepared have rendered this item unnecessary. I therefore ask my colleague the Minister of Transport to move that item L20 be deleted.

That is the reference to the reduction made in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: A deduction from what?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: From the total of the main Estimates.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Which African Republic had revolted at that time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I am afraid I have no information on that. The form of the bill is similar to that of all such bills we receive. There are no special comments required on the wording of any of the sections; I think it is purely the formal wording to which we are accustomed.

I should direct your attention to the fact that there is no authorization asked for in this bill for further borrowing on behalf of the Government. You will recall that in various of the previous appropriation acts we have given the power to the Government to borrow fairly substantial sums of money. I have a statement on these borrowing powers which might interest the house, showing the authority under which this borrowing is carried out. It reads as follows:

> The Financial Administration Act, Section 41, requires that "no money shall be borrowed or security issued by or on behalf of Her Majesty without the authority of Parliament".
> The authority to borrow for the purpose of refunding maturing issues is Section 43 of the Financial Administration Act. This section provides that the Governor in Council may authorize the Minister to borrow such sums of money as are required for the payment of any securities that were issued under the authority of Parliament and are maturing or have been called for redemption. (Section 44 provides for authorization by the Governor in Council of temporary borrowing by the Minister in special circumstances.)
> The authority for the Government to raise new money through the issue of securities must, however, be obtained annually. About the beginning of each fiscal year an Appropriation Bill provides for cancellation of any unused borrowing authority under previous Appropriation Acts and seeks new authority for the Minister of Finance to raise new money by the issue of securities. Additional borrowing authority is sought later in the year if the amount authorized is likely to be exceeded.
>
> The terms and conditions for such borrowing are authorized by the Governor in Council. Section 42 of the Financial Administration Act reads as follows: "Where authority is conferred by Parliament to borrow money on behalf of Her Majesty, the Governor in Council, subject to the Act authorizing the borrowing, may authorize the Minister (a) to borrow the money by the issue and sales of securities in such form ... as the Governor in Council may approve, and (b) to enter into such contracts ... relating thereto ... as the Governor in Council may approve."
> New money raised through the issue of securities is used in the financing of the ordinary operations of the Government, including non-budgetary cash requirements such as loans and advances to Crown corporations.
>
> The types of securities issued by the Government include treasury bills, marketable and non-marketable bonds, including Canada Saving Bonds.
> Appropriation Acts Nos. 1 and 6 of 1965 provided borrowing authority of $1,750 million. By the end of fiscal year 1965-66, this authority will have been used to the extent of an estimated $820 million.
>
> This year as in other years, the full amount should not be required. It is important, however, for the Government to have flexibility in its debt management planning and operating. The Government's practice is to have available at all times sufficient unused borrowing authority to enable it to finance, for example, the unpredictable requirements of the Exchange Fund Account and to provide for other new expenditures which may be introduced.

The total borrowing authority authorized annually by Parliament in the last few years has been as follows:

1959-60	$ 1,500 million
1960-61	1,500 "
1961-62	2,000 "
1962-63	2,500 "
1963-64	2,000 "
1964-65	1,750 "

That is perhaps a little out of the way, because of the fact that there is no such section in the bill we are now considering, but I thought the house would wish to have it on its record.

I do not think there is anything more I can say in connection with this bill. It is based almost entirely, as you realize, upon the Estimates for the fiscal year 1965-66. It is in this sort of connection that we realize what valuable work is done by the Standing Committee on Finance which has the Estimates under general consideration. I do not think anybody expects the Finance Committee or the Senate as a whole to conduct exhaustive inquiries into every single item of every estimate, but the Finance Committee is a body which has kept a careful eye on the Estimates. This year that committee—and I refer you to my honourable friend, the Chairman (Hon. Mr. Leonard), if I am wrong—has had a good number of meetings, and has in fact conducted a number of inquiries into certain items of public expenditure that appealed particularly to certain members of the committee. The committee has inquired extensively into the details of the winter works program, the National Parks program, External Aid, and so forth.

I think any member of the Senate who is particularly interested in any item or group of items in the public expenditures and wishes to have details of those expenditures should realize that all he needs to do is to go to the committee or to the chairman of the committee and that information will be provided publicly, and the answers to his questions will be recorded in the published reports of the committee.

I do not think anybody ought to take the attitude that because the Senate happens to pass this enormous item all at once and without any lengthy discussion that we have not our own methods of checking into Government expenditures and into the way in which they are made.

The Standing Committee on Finance has made exhaustive inquiries from the Auditor General and the Secretary of the Treasury Board. I do not think I need add anything to that.

If there are any questions with regard to any of these Estimates which I can answer, I shall be glad to do so; if I cannot answer the questions, I believe you will find that the Chairman of the Finance Committee can.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I note that the $8,149 million-odd does not include payments from the Old Age Security Fund of $905 million, which makes the total expenditure for this fiscal year ending March 31, $9,054 million. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is so, yes.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am leading up to a question. How much more does that amount to than the previous fiscal year?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators, leaving out the Old Age Security Fund, and also loans and investments, the amount of increase is $607,628,781 and the percentage increase in 1965-66 over 1964-65 was 8.4 per cent.

In both cases the figures for loans and investments are omitted, because these amounts can vary greatly from year to year. The Old Age Security Fund payments are also omitted.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is the answer I wished to obtain. Thank you.

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, we are engaged this evening in the ritualistic performance in which we take part from time to time. We have listened to the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Hugessen). He has told us really nothing except that tonight we are to vote $4,930 million, and that we should not ask too many questions because, after all, it is late in the day, and also our friends in an other place have spent some considerable time in consideration of these matters.

The Acting Leader said that he is quite prepared to answer questions on any details of the Estimates. I am not going to embarrass him by asking that kind of question, because I think that is the kind of generous statement the Acting Leader would make, and he would not expect anyone on this side of the house to be so mean as to take it at its face value.

I am certain that if I started to ask him questions we would not have to waive the rules of the house, which we are doing. We have waived them once tonight, and I have no doubt that the Acting Leader will ask us to waive them again. By my calculation, if we sat 24 hours a day we could observe the rules of the house and pass this bill on Friday evening—and it may be that that would be the proper time to pass it. Certainly, if we waited for the answers to the questions that I could ask, and that some of my friends could ask, we might not even pass it by that time.

Honourable senators, there are some comments I should like to make. I have great admiration for the Clerk of the Senate, who was able to tell me that this is Bill C-140, because neither copy that I have has a number on it. Therefore, I am glad to know that his perspicacity has ascertained that this is Bill C-140. It is now Bill C-140 to which I will address my remarks.

I had an opportunity, thanks to the Acting Leader of the Senate, to review a copy of Bill "blank", between the very pleasant party that he put on and our meeting here this evening. I noted that on 12 pages in that bill there were items for $1. I began to read those items. After all, when you are dealing with an appropriation bill of $4,930 million, you tend to overlook an item of $1. I looked first at page 15 and under Vote 48 I saw an item which starts:

> To authorize, notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act and section 11 of the Surplus Crown Assets Act, the payment into a special account . . .$1.

The Acting Leader of the Government referred to the work of the Finance Committee and its chairman. As a member of that committee I will not extol what it has done, but I agree that its chairman has discharged his duties in a manner creditable both to himself and to the Senate.

This matter was raised in the committee and it should be raised here. I do not pretend to know the effect of that sentence, but I do know that it changes the law of the land, that it crosses existing legislation. I know also, from listening to the Secretary of the Treasury Board and the Auditor General, both of whom appeared before the Finance Committee, that this is not a temporary piece of legislation, but legislation which continues in effect until the statutes are revised in the dim and distant future.

As I have said, these $1 items appear in a number of places. I wish to refer only to those which clearly change the law, and change the law in an insidious way as if a member of the other place or a member of this place would say "Well, that is just a dollar."

On page 37, item 8b does not alter the law; it is simply new law. It does that sort of thing for which one would normally introduce a bill in the House of Commons or in the Senate, which would have its three readings in both houses and eventually be approved by the Governor General.

Let us turn to page 38, where there are two $1 items. The first is item 35b, which I am not going to read in full. I merely draw your attention to the words "notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act." In other words, notwithstanding the law, this is what we are going to do; and to justify it we will put a $1 item in the Estimates. And, as I say, the Secretary of the Treasury Board has assured us that that means the law is changed until the statutes are revised.

Let us look at the second one on page 38, item 83b. There we read, "Notwithstanding any limitation that may be contained in section 265 of the Railway Act..." The law is changed again. Then we turn to page 43. I am not reading all the $1 items. I am not reading, for example, items which say that Mr. Jones shall be considered as being entitled to his pension when in fact he is not, because I do not consider those important enough. That is why I am not referring to item 22d on page 43, because that is exactly what that item does.

I next refer to item 5d under Fisheries. That item amends a treaty between Canada and the United States. Is the Government completely ignoring Parliament?

Honourable senators, we have gone through this performance for all the years I have been here: we have been sitting around, with the representative of the Governor General waiting in the wings, and have done in a few moments what the House of Commons should have done some time ago, but which that house has only now passed, after several weeks of agony. Yet we are expected to give sober second thought to these many items. Moreover, tonight we are amending statutes, and we have no idea what the implications of those amendments are; we are amending them for good until the statutory revision takes place. Honourable senators know how little any member of this house or of the other place has to do with a statutory revision.

That is all I have to say except that it is announced in the press that the other place is going to be much more expeditious in its dealings with Estimates in the coming year. If one can believe what one reads, there is going to be a supply motion shortly and the Estimates are going to be parcelled out among committees, and time limits are going to be imposed.

I agree with the Acting Leader of the Government that this is not the place to go through the Estimates line by line. I am not suggesting that at all. I do suggest, however, that one might have 24 hours—and it seems to be a modest request—so that one might be able to ask a few questions and not be told, "Well, we will get the answer in a couple of days, but in the meantime we have to get the bill through tonight."

Another matter I want to touch on is this question of loans and advances, and I believe I have mentioned it before. If you will look at page 48 of the bill, Vote L15d, again you will find that we are amending existing legislation by an item in the Estimates. Vote L15d is:

> To provide that the total amount of outstanding advances at any one time with respect to loans to Indians under section 69 of the Indian Act, notwithstanding subsection 5 thereof—

I interject the remark that section 5 thereof puts a limit on the total.

> —shall not exceed $1,500,000.

What is the Government afraid of? Is it afraid to open up the Indian Act? Is it afraid to bring in an amendment to increase the allowable loans? Is it afraid to subject its administration of the Indians to the scrutiny of members of the House of Commons and the Senate? That is the only conclusion anyone can come to, and yet we are being asked in the dying hours of this evening to pass that item, to amend the legislation with no opportunity for any Senate committee to consider what has been accomplished under that section of the Indian Act or what will be accomplished. We are amending legislation, with no opportunity to discuss or consider it at all.

Why this has not been protested in the other place, I do not know. But I am protesting it tonight, and the next time I protest it, unless the Rules of the Senate are changed in the meantime, I can make my protest much more effective than I propose to do tonight.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: There is only one other matter on which I want to touch.

At some stage during the consideration of these appropriation bills to which the leader referred, and which are listed in the memorandum—I say at some stage, because it is not included in this bill—we apparently authorize a loan, reading from the 1965-66 main Estimates, page 522, item L10, of $14 million to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation "for the purpose of capital expenditures subject to terms and conditions prescribed by the Governor in Council."

When the Government of which I had the honour to be a member came into power, we found that there was an accumulation of such loans on the books of the Government, and we knew—as the Acting Leader of the Senate knows and as every honourable senator knows—that those loans were not the kind of loans which anybody would guarantee. They were not the kind of notes on the back of which anybody would put his name. Then by a budget item, we wiped them out. From then on, when the C.B.C. wanted money, whether it was for capital or current account, it was a budget item.

It took the present Government only a few months to decide to revert to the system of loans and advances. I said in this place two years ago that this was a fraud on the Canadian public. I repeat it now.

I look at the Estimates for 1966-67 and I see that we are going to lend the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, for the purpose of capital expenditure, $30,424,000. Surely a government that is, to say the least, increasing its expenditures in accordance with the increase in the gross national product—and I suspect it is doing so without giving effect to price increases; in other words, it is on the top level and not on the bottom level—surely a government that is spending $8 billion plus, nearly $1 billion of which, as Senator Aseltine said, is from the Old Age Security Fund, can afford to be honest with the people of Canada and admit that it was erecting for one purpose buildings which were useful for nothing else, and spending such amounts as $14 million this year and $30,424,000 next year. What is the reason for this? Is it ashamed of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Of course, I admit that the corporation has not been quite as friendly to the Government as it was initially, but why conceal the fact that on some day in the future some minister of finance is going to have to put in a budget item, and explain it by saying: "Well, the money was spent long ago by my predecessors, and they called it a loan. I am just putting a cross entry in to get it off the books." Honourable senators, I suggest that that is not the way to run a broadcasting company, nor the way to run a railway.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Honourable senators, I rise to deal with only one or two of the points raised by the honourable Senator McCutcheon, and particularly the matter of the $1 items. Senator McCutcheon did raise that question in the Finance Committee. He pointed to the item of $1 dealing with the additional member on the International Water Commission, and at that time called attention to the fact that this was legislation through the Estimates.

The question of the increase in the loans to Indians—the increase in the maximum amount that can be loaned from $1.2 million to $1.5 million—was also raised in the Finance Committee. At that time the witness, who was Dr. George Davidson, Secretary of the Treasury Board, dealt with the questions as they were raised.

When I moved the second reading of the last interim supply bill, I too dealt with this question of the $1 items. The remarks I made then were based on the same principle that Senator McCutcheon has outlined tonight, namely, that these $1 items are used on occasion, and possibly too often, for the purposes of indirect legislation. At that time I referred to the same case that Senator McCutcheon mentioned tonight: that in raising the maximum amount that can be loaned under the Indian Act the Government was bringing about indirect legislation. There is no disagreement in principle.

The explanation that is given, and it is an explanation which can be given at any time these questions are raised in the Finance Committee, for there is ample opportunity to ask questions at that time from the Treasury Board, the Auditor General or any of the officers of the department—

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Not from the minister.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Yes, and the minister. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration was before us two weeks ago on labour questions. The minister can be there at any time we want him, subject to reasonable convenience.

On this particular question the answer was that in the first place the loans to Indians had had a splendid record of repayment and the maximum amount had been reached, and the applications had to be dealt with. There was a question, therefore, of the urgency of the matter, and as we all know the agenda in the other place did require priority for supply.

The other place also had other subjects to deal with, such as redistribution. Just how long it would take legislation to pass amending the Indian Act, one cannot know, but it would of course be unfortunate if applications for legitimate loans were delayed. When we get an explanation of that kind, I think it is a reasonable one and everyone understands the reasons for the $1 item and agrees that it is in order to put through legislation in this way.

I think that is the answer to the question raised by Senator McCutcheon. We do not like, any more than he does, Estimates in the form of interim legislation, but in some circumstances it may be the best way to deal with them, if we are given the proper explanation to show that it is the right thing to do.

On the question of the pressure of time for debate on the Appropriation Bill, I would point out that any question at all with respect to the Estimates could have been brought before the Finance Committee at any time within the last nine or ten months, as long as Parliament was in session. These items Senator McCutcheon mentioned were either in the main Estimates or the supplementary Estimates. They have all been before the Finance Committee, and we have had the opportunity to deal with them.

The Appropriation Bill is based on these Estimates and, provided that either the House of Commons or the Senate has passed them, there is no reason why, from the standpoint of the money involved, the Appropriation Act should not be an almost automatic procedure. That is the situation in the House of Commons.

So far as I know, the Estimates were passed in the other place late today. Apparently the Appropriation Bill went through its three readings in less time than our discussion will take this evening. Why? The reason is that when you have dealt with the Estimates and have approved them, then the Appropriation Bill must automatically follow.

That is also the situation here. The main Estimates have been before us since last May. We now have a Finance Committee which can go into these Estimates in a practical way in probably greater detail than can the House of Commons. In that place, as we all know, supply bills afford an opportunity for raising grievances. Indeed, that is one of the main reasons for debates on supply bills there.

In the Senate we have other opportunities to raise grievances. We can do so by a simple motion. In the other place the Estimates afford the best occasion for raising grievances, and the question of the actual items themselves are not gone into to the same extent as can be done by a smaller committee dealing with them. Of course, the Commons is changing its method of dealing with the Estimates, and will be referring them to a number of committees.

As I have said, I do not disagree with Senator McCutcheon on the question of the proper use of the system of $1 items, but in this particular case we had an opportunity to scrutinize them and there is no reason why we should be too deeply concerned about them.

Hon. James Gladstone: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words on this subject, as my learned colleague has brought up a matter concerning Indians.

I lived a long time on my reserve, and did so until eight years ago. A fund was made available by the Government for loans to all Indians and it has grown from $300,000 to $1 million. I understand it is now $1,500,000. It was only in 1961 that one of my tribe was able to use that fund to get a loan. My boys applied for it and had to have backing. We had integrity which was good enough, and we should have been trusted, but we never succeeded in obtaining the loan.

I am glad that today people are beginning to realize that Indians are Canadians and that they want to take part in Canadian life. They want to be able to go to the bank and borrow money. In the last 30 or 40 years, however, the Indian Affairs Branch, instead of trying to make our credit good, turned us down, as we were considered to be minors or children. Very few Indians have got any credit yet. The few whom I have tried to assist in the last few years, since I was appointed to the Senate, went to the bank. As for myself, my biggest asset is my integrity. But I had to fight and fight before I could get any credit for myself at the store in my area. Because I was an Indian, my credit was no good. I had to fight, and today my integrity is the greatest asset my family has.

Honourable senators, I am trying to induce my people to realise, and I am trying to project to my people, that they must pay their debts before they can be trusted.

I am very glad that Senator McCutcheon mentioned this item. I should like to attend some of the Senate committee meetings more often, especially when anything about Indians is discussed. I did not know about this particular item until tonight; therefore, I thought it my duty to rise and say a few words about it now.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, before this bill receives third reading I wish to lodge a solemn protest about the manner in which we get it. This session of Parliament opened on January 18. There have been 37 sitting days—today is the 38th day. Yet we have but two hours to discuss the formidable amount which has been voted on second reading. A speech could be made on each item, but I do not intend to make them tonight.

My colleagues who were here at previous sessions have heard my protests against such a procedure. It is an outrage for the Senate to have to swallow billions of dollars in two hours. It makes no sense. On the agenda of the House of Commons there have been subject matters of useless and futile discussions. I wonder why the Government did not take up the Estimates in the first place, and postpone the debate on the address in reply, in order to give an opportunity to the members to speak and to ask questions about the Estimates. It would have been the normal and right thing to do.

We have had a very good explanation from the Chairman of the Finance Committee who is willing to do his best. Last session we heard the Secretary of the Treasury Board who gave us lectures about the manner in which Estimates are prepared, and it was a good thing to know. This session we have had before us no less a person than the Auditor

General, Mr. Henderson. I asked him to try to help us to find a way so that the Senate would have an opportunity to discuss those matters, or at least to have some information about them in a better manner than has been done since I have been a member of the Senate. In previous sessions the same situation arose, and the Senate had to take it or leave it.

When I was coming to the chamber this evening I met civil servants who said to me, "Don't make a speech; do not delay the passage of the bill, so that we can get our cheques in due course." It is a saddening fact that civil servants are waiting for this bill to pass to buy bread and butter—and jam, perhaps, if their salary is high enough. The result is that we cannot have a full discussion here because these people are anxious to be paid. Everybody is in a hurry, and it comes before us in a kaleidoscopic manner. That word is in the dictionary and it means a thing that passes before the eyes like cinema—not an ordinary cinema, but one that is turned so fast that one cannot see what it is. It looks like the picture on a TV set which is in need of repair. You see clouds and various other images instead of the picture.

Coming back to the Finance Committee, I know very well that the chairman and my colleagues who sit on the committee do all they can to supply information in the reports of that committee. Do you have the time to read them? I hope so. If you have, you will have noticed that the members of that committee are doing their best to try to improve a situation which has been wrong from the very beginning. The Senate is the last to be served; the Senate is the last to be informed. Nevertheless, the Senate is the body which can study the Estimates in the most serious and competent manner, because we have no afterthought; we consider matters objectively and upon their merit.

Now the bill will pass; it will pass after the protests of some of my colleagues and myself. I did not want to speak tonight, but I must protest and warn the Government that if there is no better way of obtaining information we will have to make a speech on each item the next time supply comes before the Senate at the last minute when the Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General waits in an anteroom to give the bill Royal Assent. It is ridiculous; it makes no sense.

Let us join together to try to make the Government and all those concerned understand that the Senate has a word to say in the study of supply and that we have the right to ask questions. I have numerous questions to ask about the appointment of judges on commissions, a thing that goes on in a most incredible manner; questions about the redistribution bill, about unemployment, and about all sorts of things that concern people very deeply. We have not had a chance to ask those questions, and we have to vote the money that has been already spent.

Perhaps you share my views in this respect. If you do, I am your interpreter. I wonder what you think, but I am not sure of it; I have no power of attorney for you. When any man considers a thing objectively and without prejudice, he needs the opinion of others who have no prejudice and who consider the same matter upon its merits and objectively. I wonder if any one of you will rise to criticize me for making this protest. I would be surprised if you did. Is there anyone who tells me that I am wrong about this?

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Honourable senators, have I received an invitation to rise?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Then I will say that I agree 100 per cent with what the honourable senator has said. We have before us a bill with certain amendments that we are supposed to pass. We have not had an opportunity to ask questions or say one word about anything, and we are not going to get that opportunity.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I must interrupt the honourable senator to ask if he is going to put a question. If not, I presume the honourable Senator Pouliot would like to continue.

Hon. Mr. Hollet: I was about to ask a question of him. I rose because I was wondering if he was quite sure of the statements he has made. I want to tell him I agree with him.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Hollett for his intervention. What he has said is an eloquent peroration of my speech.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Notice of Motion for Adjournment:

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 22, 1966, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

I believe that honorable senators would wish to know what our position is. The Order Paper is now quite clear, except for the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I understand that Senator Pearson, in whose name the debate stands adjourned, wishes to speak after the proposed adjournment.

We wish to give the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce all the leeway possible to go ahead with their examination of bankruptcy legislation. I understand we are likely to receive from the House of Commons a bill to extend the expiry date of charters of chartered banks. This legislation is necessary awaiting new legislation to amend the Bank Act.

Otherwise, I do not think there is any special business for next week, but the committees will no doubt have various other things to do. I understand that some further Government legislation may be introduced here.

I am led to believe that the House of Commons will consent to the constitution of a joint committee to consider all the bills concerning divorce, submitted in both houses. We may have a resolution to that effect from the Commons at our next sitting.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: May I ask the honourable Leader a question about the setting up of joint committees? The proposal to set up a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on divorce legislation appears in the notices of motions of that house.

Other committees are being set up also. There is to be a joint committee of both houses on penitentiaries; and I presume that some senators who were on the previous committee will be on the new committee.

Also, the Joint Committee on Consumer Credit is being reconstituted.

I note from the Commons Hansard that there are several other items under consideration. There is the Bank Act, as the honourable leader has told us, and the Bretton Woods Agreement Act, which I take to be rather important. There is the Fisheries Act and some others, all of which will be taken up in the other place during our recess. So, it appears we shall have quite a lot of work to do when we return.

I would like to ask the honourable leader if he knows of any public bills which will be initiated in the Senate. We have had the Bankruptcy Act. Are there any others in prospect? I am sure no member of this chamber objects to our taking a recess once in a while—and I think it is a wise policy when there is no work to be done—but I think also many would prefer to have more to do and not to have so many recesses. Therefore I would ask the honourable leader if he can indicate whether any bills are likely to be initiated in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I have no specific knowledge of any Government legislation that may be introduced in the Senate. I am told there is a possibility of one bill being introduced, but I do not know what it is about. I agree with the honourable Leader of the Opposition when he says that we will likely have sufficient work to do when we reassemble on March 22, but in view of the present state of the Order Paper I think we are justified in taking a short holiday.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: This recess will not delay, for instance, the work of the proposed joint committee on divorce?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No. With regard to the various joint committees which are being considered by the House of Commons, I understand the procedure to be that they adopt a resolution which they send to us informing us that they agree to the setting up of a joint committee to which they will appoint so many members, and they ask us to join with them; we then return a message saying that we agree, and that we will appoint so many members to that committee. I understand that is the procedure which will be followed in regard to the various joint committees.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Am I correct in thinking that there will be no meetings of any of those committees during the recess?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No, there will be no meetings of the committees before we return.

Motion agreed to.

DUTCH ELM DISEASE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I call attention to a matter which I think is of considerable public interest. On May 31 last I called attention to the death of the elm trees in Canada and asked that some action be taken in the matter. At page 168 of the Hansard of that day I said this:

> I am sure all honourable senators share my concern at the disappearance in Canada of the elm tree as a result of the Dutch elm disease. In my view they are the most beautiful and picturesque trees we have. In the past the only way of protecting them against this disease was to spray them, an operation which later became quite impossible because of their size. However, I have recently read in the newspapers of the invention of a drug which is hypodermically injected into the sap of the tree and thus protects it from the ravages of this disease. I am sure the honourable Leader of the Government—

That refers to the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), and I am sorry that he is not present to continue what we were discussing on that occasion.

> —has very little, if any, information on this subject, but I would like a report if it could be had from our Department of Agriculture and Department of Forestry on the value of the remedy, and what the departments are doing to assist in its success.

As a result of the leader's activities in that regard, I received a reply which is summarized, I think by the Department of Agriculture, in these words:

> Bidrin—

That is the name of the drug that is inserted hypodermically.

> —is extremely toxic both to plants and animals. It acts as a systemic poison, that is, it is transported throughout the vascular system of the plant. It does kill bark-beetles that attack treated trees but whether or not insect suppression takes place before the beetles have transmitted the infection is not clear. Because of its high toxicity to trees, it is difficult to achieve a favourable balance between effective control of bark-beetles and poisoning of the tree.
>
> The Departments of Forestry and Agriculture are not recommending the use of Bidrin for Dutch elm disease control because: (a) It is extremely toxic to mammals and birds. (b) Its high toxicity to trees makes it difficult to use. (c) Insufficient evidence of its effectiveness in desease control is available

Until it is proven to be effective, the present recommendations for the protection of elms from Dutch elm disease should be followed: a combination of vigorous sanitation (removing and burning dead and ailing trees) and the application of DDT or Methoxychlor in the spring.

When that reply was made I pointed out that while it answered one-half of my question as to the value of the newly-found medication, it did not answer the other half as to what we were doing to assist in the preservation of these valuable trees. I expressed the hope that by the time we met again we could have some further information from these departments as to what they were doing to assist in the suppression of the disease. Apparently, nothing has been done that is of public knowledge, at all events, and the ravages of the disease are continuing apace.

I have in my hand a clipping from the Toronto Globe and Mail of January 12 this year under the heading: "Disease strikes. Province to axe 1,800 elms." The article reads in part as follows:

Nearly 1,800 trees killed by Dutch elm disease will be removed from Ontario highways this winter.

The Department of Highways awarded two contracts for the removal and disposal of the elms last month. The cost of the contracts total $51,700 for removal of 201 trees in the Ottawa district and 960 trees along highways in the Port Hope district.

Still to be let is a contract for removal of 636 elms in the Toronto district.

So you see that unless something is done we are going to lose all the elms in the Province of Ontario, and there is no guarantee that once the elm disappears the disease will not attack some others of our wonderful trees. Therefore, I request that the Acting Leader take this matter up once again with these departments, and that he call attention to the fact that the answer last year dealt with only one-half of the question. I would like to know what we are doing. If we are not doing anything then let them say so.

I suggested also, when this answer was given us last year, that in my opinion an appropriation for the efficient handling of this inquiry and perhaps the discovery of some medication that would serve our purpose, would be justified on the part of the Government of Canada. I for one would be very glad to vote for such an appropriation, and I rather fancy that everyone within the hearing of my voice would also vote for it.

Perhaps my words did not reach the appropriate departments at that time, but I hope with the co-operation of my honourable friend, the Acting Leader of the Government, they will now, and that we may have a comprehensive reply which will show some activity on the part of the Canadian Government in the control of this disastrous disease, which is removing from our countryside the most beautiful and picturesque of our trees.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, it might reassure the honourable Senator Roebuck if I tell him that extensive research is now being carried out by the Faculty of Forestry of the University of Toronto under Dean Sisam, and that they are hoping for results some time in the near future.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I know that we are all extremely sympathetic with the suggestion that my honourable friend has made. He has spoken about the disappearance of elm trees. Of course, I am about to disappear as acting leader of this house, but before I do I will have his inquiry made in the department with a view to getting an answer to his question as soon as possible.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: May I ask the honourable gentleman who brought up this question if it would not be also the responsibility of the various provinces? I know that in my own province—and my good friend Senator Burchill will confirm this—we suffered from the budworm scourge, and still do. The province and the dominion shared the expense of trying to eliminate that pest, and I think some large corporations such as International Pulp and Paper and Fraser's, made some contributions. It seems to me that it is not only the federal department that has the responsibility; it is a matter for both the federal and provincial departments.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: My inquiry is wide enough to allow the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Forestry to say what the provinces are doing, as well as the federal authorities.

My honourable friend the Acting Leader indicates that he is disappearing from the house. I would remind him that he is disappearing, not from the house, but only as Acting Leader of the Government. He has been a most efficient and acceptable leader. Of course we all look forward to the return of Senator Connolly as soon as his health permits.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Eric Cook moved the third reading of Bill S-14, to amend the Bills of Exchange Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 22, at 8 p.m.

APPENDIX

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Presented by Hon. Mr. Leonard

(See p. 293)

Thursday, 10th March, 1966.

The Standing Committee on Finance to which was referred the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1966, has in obedience to the order of reference of January 26, 1966, examined the said Estimates and now reports as follows:

1. On May 13, 1965, your committee was authorized by an order of reference adopted by the Senate to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1966. Your committee held a number of meetings prior to the adjournment of the Senate on June 30, 1965, but it was not able to conclude its consideration because of the dissolution of the Twenty-sixth Parliament. Subsequently upon the convening of the Twenty-seventh Parliament, the Senate on January 26, 1966, by a further order of reference authorized the committee to examine the said Estimates and directed that the evidence taken at the previous session be referred to the committee.

2. Your committee has heard evidence with respect to the said Estimates from the Secretary of the Treasury Board, the Auditor General, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and senior officials from the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the Department of External Affairs, the External Aid Office, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the Department of Labour.

3. Your committee continued its consideration of the recommendations made by the "Royal Commission on Government Organization," in what is commonly called the Glassco Report, to which special attention was given in the Report of the Finance Committee dated November 25, 1964. It is evident that progress is being made in the implementation of those recommendations, but much remains to be done. Perhaps the most significant recommendation in the Glassco Report was that departments and agencies be given the necessary financial authority and be held accountable for the effective management of the financial resources placed at their disposal. Essentially, this involves the delegation of a substantial amount of the central authority now vested in central agencies such as the Treasury Board and the Comptroller of the Treasury, to the operating departments under suitable and adequate financial control mechanisms. In seven departments of government, surveys are being conducted to examine the feasibility of implementing the Glassco Commission recommendations. To the extent that they are implemented, they will involve changes in the form and control of the Estimates presented to Parliament. It is too early as yet to know what form these changes will take but this is a development that should command the continued close attention of your committee.

4. Your committee has not attempted to make any detailed study of the Estimates, department by department. It has considered the Estimates as a whole, their total amount, their form and content and the method of presentation of expenditures. Also by questioning the officials that appeared before us, much useful information as to individual items of expenses was obtained and has been recorded in the printed proceedings of the meetings. However, your committee did give special attention to certain expenditures which appeared to members of the committee to call for a closer examination. These related to such matters as the operations of our National Parks, the contributions of Canada to the United Nations and its operations, the participation of Canada in assisting developing countries, and winter works programs designed to reduce unemployment in Canada during the winter months.

5. Evidence with respect to the municipal winter works deserves special mention. This program is having its greatest effect in the Province of Quebec, due to the fact that the government of that province supplements the federal grant by an additional 40 per cent of payroll cost, so that a municipality in that province receives from 90 per cent to 100 per cent of the total payroll cost of an approved winter works project. On the other hand, provinces in the Atlantic area, which are known to have relatively high winter unemployment, receive comparatively little benefit from the federal winter works municipal program, presumably because it is not sufficiently assisted by the provinces and municipalities in the area. Your committee therefore calls attention to this anomaly and suggests that the federal program might well be reconsidered, not with a view to changing its effectiveness in Quebec or other provinces where it is achieving its purpose, but rather to adapt it to assist unemployment in those provinces where it is not now making any substantial contribution to the relief of winter unemployment.

With respect to the winter house-building employment program, the evidence adduced to us was to the effect that the federal contribution of $500 to assist in the construction of houses in the winter time was accomplishing its purpose of spreading house-building employment throughout the whole calendar year.

6. The overall expenditures of the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1966, included in the main and supplementary estimates totalled $7,825,903,333. This figure does not include Loans and Investments; nor does it include payments out of the Old Age Security Fund. The disbursements of that fund during the current fiscal year are estimated to be $905,-000,000 and the receipts by the fund from the special sales and income taxes are well in excess of that amount. The figure of $7,825,-903,333 is an increase over the previous fiscal year of $607,628,781. In percentage, the increase over the 1964-65 expenses was 8.4. It is inevitable that a country's government expenditures will grow as its population and its wealth grow, but it is very important to measure the percentage of a country's production that is taken by the governments as their share. In your committee's report of November 25, 1964, dealing with the 1964-65 Estimates, a comparison was made between the growth in federal expenditures and the increase in the Gross National Product of Canada. For that year, the expenses increased by a little more than 3 per cent over the preceding year, but the country's gross national production advanced by approximately 8 per cent. In the period now under review, the increase of federal government expenditures is 8.4 per cent over the preceding year while the gross national production in 1965 is estimated to be about 9 per cent above that of 1964. The deduction to be drawn is that the federal government's proportionate share of the country's total production is not increasing, and in this last year remained at about the same percentage as in the preceding year, namely 15.3 per cent. Historically, this is not a high percentage. In the committee's last report there was also appended a table showing the Budgetary Expenditures since 1955 and their percentage increases from year to year, and this is brought up to date by a table attached to this report.

7. In the report in 1964 it was mentioned that in the United Kingdom 26 days before August 5 of each session are given for the consideration of the Annual Estimates on Supply, thereby limiting the debate and setting a deadline for the final passing of supply. In Canada, supply for the current fiscal year did not receive final approval until the twelfth month. This is due to a completely unsatisfactory and archaic procedure and your committee notes with approval that new rules in the House of Commons provide that the Estimates for 1966-67 will be referred to a large number of committees to enable the examination of them to be done more expeditiously.

8. In view of the constitutional responsibility of the Senate to participate in the enactment of the various appropriation acts authorizing government expenditures, your committee is of the opinion that the annual Estimates should continue to be referred to the Finance Committee for examination. Limitations of time and professional personnel do not permit such an examination to deal with the Estimates in detail, department by department, but the Committee can continue to give the kind of scrutiny set out in this and its preceding reports.

9. Your committee has not in recent years examined the financial affairs of Crown companies or emanations of the Crown such as the Canada Council but is prepared to do so should the Senate see fit to grant the necessary authority.

10. Your committee desires to thank the witnesses who have appeared before it for their courtesy and co-operation.

All which is respectfully submitted.

T. D'Arcy Leonard,
Chairman

LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT IN SENATE

STATEMENT ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, before tabling certain documents and with the indulgence of the Senate I wish to thank you all so much for the tremendous welcome you have given me on my return to this chamber. I really thought Senator Walker of Toronto had a corner on standing ovations. I am very happy to be among you again.

Approximately one week ago I landed in Toronto to be welcomed by more brilliant sunshine than I had left in Florida, and I was sure it was spring. Because of what was happening at that time I thought of the days when Senator Choquette and I were small boys growing up in Sandy Hill, when one of the surest signs of spring was the appearance of the organ grinder on the streets. I knew that day spring had come to Toronto because everywhere there was the "hurdy-Gerda" sound.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, before proceeding further I must thank you all for the kindnesses extended me during my illness—the inquiries, the messages, the notes, the flowers—from every segment of this house and, from the other house as well. In circumstances like those one cannot help but think that even serious illnesses have their great compensations.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The co-operation of all honourable senators that has been evident during these past two months has been something that should inspire confidence in public life. Certainly, it has been proven that the rule of the indispensability of any one man does not apply to Parliament.

Perhaps you all know that about a year ago Senator Vaillancourt came to me and asked to be relieved of the responsibilities of deputy leadership. I agreed to this, but not until the end of the session. Now as this is my first opportunity to do so, I wish to thank Senator Vaillancourt, not only on my own behalf but on behalf of other leaders—Senator Ross Macdonald, for one—who were my predecessors in office, for the immense service he has rendered to this chamber and to the Parliament of this country, and for the great prestige he has added to the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I believe the appointment of Senator Paul Bouffard to the deputy leadership of the Senate was a natural one. I had looked forward, as I am sure all honourable senators had, to many years of fruitful work with him in that position.

Of Paul Bouffard I think it can be said what Napoleon said of his private soldiers, that in the gunny sack of every one of them there was a field marshal's baton. Over a period of 20 years of devoted service to Parliament, to this chamber and to the country, Paul Bouffard proved that he had a baton in his gunny sack.

May I thank also Senator Brooks, the leader opposite, the whips, the officials and the staff. I know there was some consternation resulting from the fact that while I was still the Leader of the Government, I was not here. I do thank all of them from the bottom of my heart because they assumed extra responsibilities and did much additional work.

Senator Hugessen is not here tonight, but I should like to say that I hope the comparison between the leadership he gave and the leadership that I shall give will not be too invidious. We all agree that Senator Hugessen is one of the greatest parliamentarians Canada has every produced.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate you upon your appointment to your high office. This fact has been acclaimed universally. Peut-être dois-je remarquer aussi que le français que vous parlez s'améliore chaque jour.

At the moment I am not certain whether my very close friend Senator Bourget is in the chamber, because I am not yet familiar with the seating arrangements that were made at the beginning of the session. I am sure all honourable senators were as delighted as I was in the recognition of Senator Bourget's twenty years of service in Parliament by his being summoned to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

The Senate is not exactly the same place it was when I was last here, and I should like now to welcome the many new senators we have in our midst. I welcome them not only to the comradeship of the Senate, but also to the opportunities for service which the Senate presents.

It was not long after I was introduced here that I realized that the issue of the Patent did not make the senator. The senator is made by the kind of work he does in the chamber, and in committees, whether he is a member of those committees or not. The new senator is greatly assisted if he takes advantage of the opportunity of reading the Debates of the Senate and the Journals of the Senate. There he will find the history of the Senate and the speeches of the great Canadians who have stood in this place and spoken with magnificence on important issues. The new senator can help himself by reading the literature about the Senate, such as Dr. Mackay's book, and a more recent publication by Professor Kunz, both of whom are studious and learned men. But perhaps new senators can gain most from the good will, experience and wisdom of the members of this chamber, regardless of whether they occupy the front benches or back benches, or on which side of the chamber they are seated.

I should tell them, too, that at times the party line does run here but it is not very pronounced. To illustrate this I might be allowed to tell a story.

During the days that Senator Ross Macdonald and I were in the Opposition, sometimes called the bad days, Senator Haig's late father was the leader on this side of the house. On one occasion he brought in a bill entitled the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act, a highly complicated tax measure. Quite properly he said, "I think this bill is more of a committee bill than a Senate bill, and perhaps instead of debating now we should give it second reading and refer it at once to a committee."

Senator Ross Macdonald, however, thought differently and said, "Oh, no; let us have a debate." After he had spoken to the bill and adjourned the debate, Senator Haig came to me and said, "Will you explain this bill?" Of course I was happy to do so, although I did find myself in the anomalous position of sponsoring a bill proposed by our political opponents. The bill was recommended by the committee, went through the regular stages and finally became law.

A few weeks later Senator Haig came to me and expressed his appreciation for what I had done. And he added, "I want to tell you, Connolly, that the other day when I spoke in our general caucus about the kind of co-operation I was getting from the Opposition in the Senate, I used this as an example." I replied, "I appreciate your kindness, but you have really put me in a terrible dilemma. What in the world am I going to be able to tell St. Peter when I reach the pearly gates, and he says to me, 'You were well spoken of in the Tory caucus'?"

There was an aftermath even to that. I told this story to a Conservative friend, and he put his hand on my shoulder and said, "John, I don't know what you were worried about. Even if you had got by St. Peter, you would not have found any Liberal friends there!"

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, while we have pleasure in welcoming new senators here, there is also a certain sadness which I experienced this evening. The first is in connection with some of our colleagues who retired since I was last here.

I remember Senator Leonard Tremblay from the days of the war, when leave from his military duties allowed him occasionally to come to the house in uniform. He visited me the day he retired, and I assure honourable senators that the emotion he experienced as he realized he would never again meet his colleagues here was very deep indeed.

Senator Buchanan also has retired. He was not with us for long, but during that short period he earned the esteem, and indeed the affection of members on both sides of this house. We shall miss him.

It is difficult to add to what has already been said so well about Senator Wishart Robertson. He had been Speaker of the Senate, and he was leader at a time when the Senate was going through a transitional period. The recent book by Kunz gives particular emphasis to that aspect. I think it should be remembered, in connection with Senator Robertson's leadership, that he for the first time involved more senators in the work of this chamber than perhaps any other leader theretofore in the history of the Senate.

Senator Robertson's work in the foundation of the NATO Parliamentary Association was significant. It seems a strange commentary upon that great step which has done so much for the Alliance that his greatest source of assistance came from the parliamentarians of France. It might not be so now, unfortunately.

Honourable senators, only today I learned that Senator Allan Woodrow, whom we all loved and respected, and who was introduced to this chamber on the same day as I was, felt obliged to retire.

I know I am expressing the sentiments of all honourable senators when I say that I hope the senators I have mentioned will enjoy contentment and happiness in their retirement.

In addition to retirement there have been deaths. I refer to Senator Tom Wood, whom I had known from the time he first came to the Senate, and indeed before that time. He exemplified the successful initiatives of the real sons of the West. Unfortunately, he suffered ill health some years before his death.

Senator J. Willie Comeau also died. He had almost as long a parliamentary career as any other Canadian, having served in the Nova Scotia Assembly and in the Legislative Council of that province, and as well in this house.

I am sure that the Acadians, as do many others, think of J. Willie Comeau the way Henry Wadsworth Longfellow expressed himself in Evangeline, in speaking of Benedict Bellefontaine of Grand Pré.

> Stalworth and stately in form was the man of seventy winters; Hearty and hale was he, an oak that is covered with snowflakes;
> White as the snow were his locks, and his cheeks as brown as the oak-leaves.

Perhaps the greatest void for me personally is the absence from this chamber of my very dear old friend Senator Norman Lambert. At the risk of an invidious comparison with the beautiful tributes that were paid to him, particularly by Senator O'Leary (Carleton), who knew him so well, I wish to say how much I owed to him. He was indeed for me a guide, a philosopher and a friend. Perhaps more than any other he convinced the powers that be, at the time of my appointment, that perhaps I had a place here which could be of value and of service. He sponsored me in the chamber, he advised me constantly, and like Senator O'Leary, he often disapproved of many of the things that I said and did. However, when I look back upon his career, I think it encompassed an approach to an achievement which the ideal senator at any time could well emulate.

Maurice Baring once wrote four lines about a friend who had died, and I think some of Norman Lambert's old friends would feel as Baring did when he wrote:

> When Spring shall wake the earth
> And quicken the scarred fields to new birth—
> Our grief shall grow. For what can spring renew
> More fiercely for us than the need of you?

Honourable senators, I have had the benevolent brainwashing of dedicated people of the great profession of medicine. In many ways I think they worked miracles. Indeed, I feel fortunate to be here. However, I think nothing has encouraged me more than the kindness which has been shown to me by all of my colleagues in this honourable house.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable Senators, I realize that words of mine to welcome our honourable leader are not necessary, after the applause he received a short time ago when he rose to make a routine motion.

Senator Hugessen was Acting Leader of the Senate during part of the absence of Senator Connolly. If Senator Hugessen were here now, he would give utterance to the feelings which I am sure are shared by my honourable colleagues. Therefore, on behalf of my colleagues, may I say that we are indeed happy to welcome Senator Connolly back. We are pleased to note that apparently he has fully recovered from his serious illness. If he has not, I must say his looks belie him.

Senator Connolly has mentioned the work done by those senators who represented him while he was away. The late Senator Bouffard did excellent work, and we were saddened by his decease. Senator Hugessen, who is a past master as a parliamentarian, also did very good work. I am sure that Senator Connolly would agree that they carried out the duties as efficiently as he himself would have done.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Honourable senators, I have not had an opportunity until now to welcome the new members of the Senate. They have been introduced at different times, and I think most of them are in now. I join with Senator Connolly in welcoming them to the Senate.

As a maritimer, I am particularly pleased that my very good friend Dr. MacKenzie has joined us this evening. I wish him and all the new members enjoyment in the Senate. I feel sure they will enjoy their work here, and there is no doubt that their presence will be a marked addition to this assembly.

Honourable senators, I see our very dear friend Senator Crerar in his place in the chamber. May I say how pleased I am to see him here. He has arrived at the right time, as we will need him to help us tell about the outrageous expenditures and extravagances of the Government. I expect that he will point out ways and means whereby the Government can help the economy of this country.

We are all delighted, Mr. Government Leader, to see you back in the Senate and in such good health.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL TO REPEAL—FIRST READING

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot presented Bill S-22, to repeal the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES AS COMMISSIONERS

INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot inquired of the Government, on February 3, last:

I would like to know if the Department of Justice, before appointing a judge as a commissioner, gets in touch with the Department of the Attorney General of the province, the provincial Department of Justice, or the Chief Justice of the province, or the Acting Chief Justice. It would also be very interesting to know what was the procedure regarding the appointment of the honourable Acting Chief Justice Challies, as commissioner to inquire into the airplane accident which occurred at Ste. Thérèse. Further, I would like to know if the Department of Justice had been in touch with him or the Attorney General before appointing a commissioner.

Hon. John J. Connolly: The answer to the honourable senator's inquiry is as follows:

Where a judge is appointed a commissioner under the Inquiries Act, the appointment is made by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister responsible for the subject matter of the inquiry, or the Prime Minister. In some cases a statute provides a different mode of appointment, as for example section 558 of the Canada Shipping Act, which authorizes the Minister of Transport to appoint a judge as a commissioner to hold formal investigations into shipping casualties. The practice is to obtain the prior approval of the judge to be appointed and also the Chief Justice or Chief Judge of the court to which he belongs; in the case of county court judges in those provinces where there is no Chief Judge of the county courts, the approval of the Attorney General of the province is obtained. Normally, the Minister of Justice or the Department of Justice is the channel of communication between the department concerned and the Chief Justice, Chief Judge or Attorney General, as the case may be, although occasionally this is done directly by the department concerned.

In the particular case referred to, namely, the air accident at Ste. Thérèse, Quebec, on November 29, 1963, the appointment of Associate Chief Justice Challies was made by the Governor in Council under the Inquiries Act on the recommendation of the Prime Minister. There was no communication between the Department of Justice and the Commissioner in this case prior to his appointment, but I am informed that officials of the Department of Transport called the proposed Commissioner and discussed with him the draft terms of reference for the inquiry.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 9, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, I am sure I express the feelings of all honourable senators when I say we are pleased to see the honourable Leader of the Government in his place in the Senate. We wish him well, but I would caution him to take life a little easier. He works too hard and tries to do too much. I hope he will accept this word of caution, for we shall appreciate his presence here just as much if he is not working too hard.

Mr. Speaker, permit me to congratulate you on your appointment as our honourable Speaker. You have fulfilled the duties of your high office so well up to now that we feel confident you will continue to do so during the remainder of your term of office. We are very happy indeed to see you occupy the Chair.

I congratulate both the mover and the seconder of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I have known Senator A. Hamilton McDonald for many years. He is a good speaker, and he has had much experience in the Saskatchewan Legislative Assembly. He is an energetic man. He has suffered some ill health, but we are pleased to note that he seems to have overcome it and now looks very well. His speech in support of this motion was an excellent one.

Honourable Senator Gouin, the seconder of the motion, performed his duty with considerable skill. He has been a member of the Senate for over 25 years and during that time he has made many valuable contributions in this chamber. He comes from the Province of Quebec, and his speech in seconding the motion was one of which the people of that province may be proud.

I shall now speak on one or two points in the Throne Speech. In the Speech it was suggested that the federal Government would increase the grants to universities and colleges from $2 to $5 per capita, and that there would be more money for student loans. Personally, I am quite in agreement with both these proposals. I think they are most deserving and are needed.

I think, however, that students should be warned that the money they borrow has to be paid back with interest after they set out on their life's work. As this is the beginning of their productive period in life, if this debt is too heavy it might become a millstone around their neck.

Honourable senators, my point is this: does everyone need a university or college education? It seems to me that this is the cry all across this land, that everyone must have a university education or otherwise he cannot get a job worth anything. Does a bricklayer need to have a B.A. or a B.Sc.? Does a steelworker, or a postman, or a restaurant waiter need a university degree? Yet all these occupations are necessary to our present-day society. So, too, are the farmers, the fishermen and the foresters—they need to know how to increase their returns from the land or water, as the case may be. They need to know all about the modern methods and improvements which are taking place in their particular vocation.

Honourable senators, I feel that in this day and age something is lacking in our educational program, especially in the primary grades. I have recently read some case histories of farmers in rural slum areas in a report prepared by the Canadian Welfare Council on behalf of the ARDA program with which, I am sure, all honourable senators are familiar.

With the permission of honourable senators, I shall read a short excerpt from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture bulletin, found on page 12 of that report. They were analysing a report on rural poverty which was done by the Canadian Welfare Council. As I have mentioned, they interviewed some 290 families. These families were based in the following four areas: the Interlake area in Manitoba; Lanark County, Ontario; Gatineau, Pontiac and Papineau counties, Quebec; and Inverness County, Nova Scotia. Each of these districts was what they called a "disadvantaged area" from a statistical standard. The report says:

> In Inverness County the average income of the families interviewed was about $28 a month per person. In Lanark it was $44. In the Interlake area the average per capita income was $36 a month. In the Quebec counties the families interviewed had on the average a monthly income per person of $41. With varying sizes of families and varying circumstances, of course, some monthly incomes per person were exceedingly low—as little as $11.71, including family allowances.
> That almost all poor people would be prepared to make changes in their life to improve their position, but are desperately hampered by lack of knowledge; by fear of getting into a worse mess than they are already in if they move to the city or some unknown place; by educational and physical shortcomings; and by lack of clear-cut opportunities for betterment, and of people to work with them to help them realize the opportunities. Many of the poor, however, are very attached to the locality in which they live, and would not like to move from the friends and surroundings they know.

It seems that it is difficult for the people in many of these rural slum areas to give their children an education. Some of them live a considerable distance from their school and are transported by bus. Others who are less than three miles or so from school have to walk, and in the wintertime there are many days on which they cannot attend because of the weather, and so miss quite a bit of the schooling. Again, the children from a very early age are required to do chores on these farms. This delays them so that often they are late for school and, as we all know, if there is any excuse the average child will stay home rather than go to school.

The finding of the Welfare Council was that primary education is very poor in these slum areas.

It strikes me that when a school in a slum area endeavours to teach the children certain subjects, such as a language other than their own, they are spending time on something that will not be necessary in later years to enable those children to earn a living for themselves. I have many times discussed this matter with numerous people and, while they do not all agree, they think there is need for some change in our curricula.

I feel that children who live in Newfoundland, for instance, or elsewhere along the seacoast, should at a very early age be given some instruction in how to make a good living from the sea. Those in interior Canada, such as the Interlake area in Manitoba, should be given instruction at an early age in how to make a living from the land, and how to make a farm pay. It is my feeling that if our rural population is to remain on the land, rather than migrate to the cities in search of big jobs—and this is where our present educational scheme seems to point them—we must in our rural areas paint a better picture of farm opportunities; thus, at an early age the child will realize some of the benefits that can be gained by living in the country.

Let us take, for example, the story of the Interlake area in Manitoba, which is part of the report referred to above, and copies of which can be obtained from the Department of Forestry. In case after case in that area families who are very hard up expressed the wish that they could move to the city, or said that their children had already moved to the city and would not come back to the farm to help them.

Under the ARDA program the federal and provincial governments are putting on an educational program to instruct fishermen and farmers on how they can make a better living. This is somewhat like closing the barn door after the horse has escaped. I admit it is most necessary at the present time to assist these people in new methods of farming and fishing which will gain for them a better living, but it does seem to me that we should also bend our efforts in our educational program so that the children of these people will be instructed in the benefits which can accrue to them if they apply the modern and proper methods to their particular vocation, be it forestry, fishing or farming.

Our teachers, however, are all trained along academic lines and, necessarily, they think along those lines. To them education is a training in the Arts, leading the student inevitably to the city for a professional life or maybe just a job. My contention is that we must start training our children at an early age in the arts of farming, fishing, forestry and mining.

This Canada of ours is wonderfully endowed with opportunities in each of these resource areas. Why should all our early schooling lead only to the professions? We would do well to encourage young farm boys, at an early age, to learn new methods which will lead to a better life on the farm. The same can be said for the fishing and forestry industries.

In a semi-monthly report on Modern France which came to my desk and which, I presume, comes to each honourable senator, I was struck with the idea of a new scheme being tried in France for child instruction. With your permission I shall read a short excerpt from this report:

> Accompanied by their teachers and a nurse, and usually travelling by train, these lucky children, mostly between nine and eleven years old, for very nominal fees go off to a winter resort. There they have their school classes in the morning and early evening, and have skiing and in some cases skating lessons and other outdoor activities through the afternoon.
> There is a slight subsidy from the Government—last year it amounted to some five per cent of the total costs—but it is local initiative and financial support which allow parents to send their children to these "snow classes" for between $18 and $40, covering transport, housing—in snug rooms—food and special sports equipment.
> This year, from greater Paris alone, a new record of 587 school classes have departed for a grand time and good classroom and snow-covered hillside learning at some lovely mountain spot in the Alps, Jura, Massif Central or the Pyrenees.

Seldom, teachers and nurses report, is there any case of homesickness.

Educators have found that far from being distracted from their normal school work, their grades actually improve in this work and play atmosphere. So, of course, do their appetites and their health.

A recently published report found that: "Both teachers and parents are enthusiastic about the advantages. From the teachers' point of view the main advantage seems to be that the children do for once get enough sleep. Far from the temptations of television, they are firmly put to bed at about 8.30, get 11 hours of sleep and are markedly more receptive than usual in the morning."

In the very early days of Canadian settlements a young man was apprenticed to a farmer and he paid for the opportunity to learn farming. Then came the great rush of immigration to take up homesteads, and everyone who could stand the lonely life called himself a farmer. There were many misfits, but many too were successful. Now that the population explosion in some areas of the world is reaching unmanageable proportions, we have to take another look at our assets on the farm, in the forest, and on our lakes and coastal fishing areas, as food will become proportionately scarcer and a serious shortage may well develop in the not too distant future. For these reasons, we who are guardians of these great resources cannot afford and, I might say, have no right to allow our future farmers and fishermen to be drained off into our great metropolitan areas. We must train our country youth at an early age so that they will love and enjoy their country life and all their surroundings; and train them also at an early age in the new methods employed in the arts of agriculture, forestry, fishing and mining.

I strongly urge that the federal and provincial governments make a study of a new type of education which, it seems to me, is essential in rural Canada. I believe that a special committee of the Senate, such as the Land Use Committee, could and should be formed to make a study along the lines I have indicated. There could be a committee of the Senate on education in Canada.

I might also quote an excerpt from an article which appeared in the February 17 issue of the Family Herald, apparently written by J. C. Cram, Senior Associate Editor of that paper:

> At no time in our past history has so much serious public attention been focussed on the quality of our educational system. What was once considered primarily a social problem is now being viewed, more and more, in economic terms. For the first time, education is being granted its proper status as an influence in maintaining a productive economy. The close relationship between levels of education, employment and income has been duly documented by such organizations as ARDA and the Economic Research Council.
> As an industry with a declining level of employment and a chronic problem of low income, agriculture is vitally involved in any program to improve our educational system. With this article the Family Herald begins a series designed to give readers a better perspective of past performance, present problems and future potential of our nation's schools.

Honourable senators, I come now to the question of crop insurance, which is also mentioned in the Speech from the Throne.

Crop insurance was instituted in 1961 and its objective was to stabilize the income of the farmer. Originally, it was meant only for the prairies, to cover cereal crops. Manitoba and Prince Edward Island were the first two provinces to apply this particular type of crop insurance. In Manitoba there were certain selected areas where they decided to try out this insurance, and they have been gradually expanding there and now cover a large part of the province as far as cereal crops are concerned. However, in many areas of western Canada crop insurance premiums were considered too high by the local farmer. The risk was also considered too great by the Government to allow insurance coverage in these areas, and rightly so. In such cases the farmer had the choice either of participating and paying the crop insurance premiums, or of continuing to pay into the P.F.A.A. the 1 per cent deducted from the cash value of any grains he sold at the elevator. In those cases where the risk was heavy and the premium too high, the farmers all preferred to continue operating under the P.F.A.A. scheme.

It is now suggested that crop insurance should cover a much wider area, in fact, all of Canada, and I thoroughly agree with this. This idea has been largely forced upon the attention of the governments by the extreme drought conditions which have almost ruined the farmers of eastern Ontario and western Quebec during the past few years. At the present time my feeling is that rather than rush in and place crop insurance on every type of crop, it would be better for the provincial governments to continue to assist the individual farmer by providing him with feed or seed for the time being, using the crop insurance plan in certain selected areas and expanding its application as the premium costs and risks involved become apparent.

Another item in the Throne Speech refers to the appointment of a royal commission to study the cost of farm machinery. I rather think this would merely be a matter of bringing in a report and doing nothing, because anyone can figure this out without having a royal commission. Machinery costs are affected by wages, profit and taxes, and also transportation which, in turn, comes under the heading of wages and profit.

I think most farmers will agree that high wages are necessary for the worker because of the rising cost of living. If a worker has an adequate income he generally sits down to a good meal of beef and other farm products and by buying the farmer's products he assists the farmer. If his wages are too low he cannot afford all the farm products he would like to have on his table, and consequently the farmer's market is reduced.

I now come to the question of profit. Profit is an incentive for people to organize factories and build machinery. Consequently, profit is most necessary, though there might be some cases of excess profits which could be controlled without much trouble.

This leaves the last item—taxes. To my mind, taxation is the main item in the cost of all machinery, and is the only one that could be readily controlled by government, whether provincial or federal. It had been my hope that the Land Use Committee would have continued for another session or two because it was the intention of its steering committee to make a study of taxation as it pertained to the farmer. Even the Canadian Chamber of Commerce feels that that committee should still be working. In fact, in the Statement of Policy, 1965-66, of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, at page 32, item 134 states:

> We recognize the contribution that the Senate Committee on Land Use in Canada has made to date. It is urged that there be a continuing study of this subject.

It seems to me that the royal commission which it is suggested should inquire into our machinery costs would be better advised to make a thorough study of taxation—which I understand is being done—both federal and provincial, pertaining to farm costs.

Honourable senators, at this time I wish to register a protest. With your indulgence I will relate a little of my early history.

Many years ago, during the First World War, I happened to be in the Royal Flying Corps, and later in the Royal Air Force which replaced the Royal Flying Corps. In those days the training we took in England was on two airplanes, the Maurice Farnam Longhorn and the Maurice Farnam Shorthorn. These planes were differentiated by the fact that the Longhorn had bamboo guards built out in the shape of a U to protect the nose of the airplane from hitting the ground on landing. The Shorthorn had the bamboo poles as well, but they were somewhat like you might see on a toboggan, with the curve in the front only—not connected to the upper part of the wings but merely extending out from the undercarriage.

From these two airplanes our next move was to the Curtis, an American machine, and then on to the Avro, a British machine, and then on to various other types before we arrived in France.

My experience, and I think the experience of most flyers in those days, was that the British airplane of all types was of a greatly superior quality to any American or French airplane. This continued during the early days of the Second World War. Britain always seemed to hold the lead in the construction of aircraft, and in the ability of their machines to manoeuvre over those of other countries. She has always been supreme in the making of airplane engines, and I see no reason why there should be any difference in the situation now from what it was during the last two wars.

I am giving this brief outline as a lead-in to a protest I want to register, particularly as a farmer from western Canada. I have before me some newspaper clippings, one of which, dated January 29, 1966 and taken from the Financial Post, reads as follows:

> France's Mystere Falcon was chosen over its closest rival, Britain's De Havilland 125 executive jet, and this has created tricky problems for Ottawa. Ordering Falcons will do a lot to improve relations with France but buying De Havilland 125s would have done just as much to help Anglo-Canadian relations.
>
> Now the British can—and likely will—complain that even when Canada had a legitimate chance to buy British it didn't.
>
> As a result a major study has begun in National Defence to see what British military equipment could be ordered as soon as possible. The two main prospects:
> Another Oberon-class submarine.
> Two or three VC-10 jet airliners.

Honourable senators, from reading the various press releases issued by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and other members of the Government, I gather it is proposed to buy certain airplanes for VIP use, and that it has been decided that the French Mystere Falcon is preferable to the British De Havilland 125 for the particular purpose in mind. We in western Canada recognize the fact that France is a competitor of ours in the sale of wheat, and may very well, if France has her way, almost completely cut us out of the European market. Britain, on the other hand, has been a heavy purchaser of our wheat for many years and has complained bitterly at times at the disparity of trade between herself and this country, and many times has pressed the Government of Canada to purchase more British goods.

The Government of Saskatchewan which, by the way, belongs to the same side of politics as the Government here, has pressed for an increase in the purchase of British manufactured goods to even up the purchase of our wheat by Britain. Are we to jeopardize our trade with Britain merely to improve relations with France, and then rely on the goodness of Britain to buy our goods in spite of the fact that we do not reciprocate? On behalf of western Canada I register a very strong protest. I feel we should do everything in our power to buy British goods, and so build up reciprocal trade with Britain, one of our best customers.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Irvine, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. John J. Connolly presented Bill S-23, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting. This bill merely extends the term for which the act is to apply. It is a brief bill and I would hope that second reading could be given tomorrow, but if it is desired to adjourn the debate on second reading I would have no objection.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Is it merely a question of extending the time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: There is no other principle involved?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No. It consists of but one clause.

Motion agreed to.

REDISTRIBUTION

OBJECTIONS FILED BY MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT PURSUANT TO ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT—FURTHER INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I hold in my hand a publication entitled "House of Commons, Ottawa, Canada, First Session, Twenty-seventh Parliament, Objections filed with the Speaker pursuant to the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act January 1966 to February 18, 1966."

This publication is incomplete because there is an omission of names, and there is nothing to show the number of members who have filed such an objection.

A detailed answer to those questions was given by honourable Senator Hugessen in his capacity as Acting Leader of the Senate on March 3 and is to be found in the Hansard of that day. I wonder if it would be possible, with leave of the Senate, to publish the answer then given by Senator Hugessen with an alphabetical list of the names of the members who have filed their objections. Also, I wonder if the Senate would have any objection to having those two documents printed together as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of today?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I am not sure that I understand the proposal that the honourable senator has made. Will he allow this to stand until tomorrow, when I shall have had an opportunity of looking at it? Unfortunately, I am not familiar with what Senator Hugessen said on that occasion. If the honourable senator agrees I shall deal with it tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank the honourable Leader. I will send him the papers which I have in my hand, copies of which I have already given to his executive assistant.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

BANK ACT AND QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Louis P. Gelinas moved the second reading of Bill C-3, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill which is before us proposes to extend the charters of the Canadian banks and of the Quebec Savings Banks Act until December 1, 1966, or 60 days thereafter if Parliament does not sit for at least 20 days during the month of November 1966.

As honourable senators are aware, there were two extensions during past sessions of Parliament to permit study of recommendations of the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance, better known as the Porter Commission.

The Bank Act is the charter of each of the eight existing banks enumerated in this act and their charter would expire on the sixtieth sitting of Parliament after December 31, 1965, unless extended by legislation.

The Quebec Savings Banks Act describes the banking powers for each of the two banks enumerated in this act, and thus the power to carry on business would expire the sixtieth day of Parliament after December 31, 1965.

May I add that today is the forty-seventh sitting day of the present session, which leaves only thirteen days before the expiry date. It is advisable to provide enough time to permit careful consideration by Parliament of the proposed extension to revise the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act which will be introduced later in the session.

May I indicate to honourable senators that on many occasions authority has been granted to extend the application of the Bank Act beyond ten years. It will be recalled that in 1911 the application of the Bank Act was extended for one year, and in 1912 for a further year. In 1933 the application of the Bank Act was extended for a period of one year, and in 1944 it was extended for a period of three months. Again, in 1964 it was extended for a period of one year, and in 1965 for a period of six months. Now, in 1966, a further extension has been proposed until December 1, 1966.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the urgency of this bill is quite obvious, as has been explained by the sponsor, since there remain only 13 sitting days in the other place before the charters of our banks expire. Therefore, it is not my purpose, nor is it the purpose of anybody on this side, to delay the passing of this bill; I merely want to point out that the revision of the Bank Act is becoming more and more urgent because of the delays that have been encountered since the time when this legislation should have been before Parliament.

An illustration of the urgency is the fact that we had last year to deal with three bills tending to incorporate new banks, and when we came to consider them we did not know what was the policy of the Government in this respect. I understand that tomorrow the Banking and Commerce Committee will be considering a bill to incorporate a new bank, and one aspect of that bill is whether the Government intends to prohibit the purchase of bank shares by provincial governments. Last year it was indicated by the then Minister of Finance that such a prohibition would be included in the Bank Act as revised, but as the proposed revision has not yet been laid before Parliament we do not know if the Government has or has not changed its mind in this respect. Consequently, we are going to discuss this bill tomorrow without knowing exactly where the Government stands and what we should do in respect to this proposed new bank.

In any event, there is no choice with regard to the legislation now before us but to have it passed as quickly as possible in order not to add to the uncertainty which exists presently, and so as not to provoke the confusion which would ensue if the charters of the present banks were allowed to lapse.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Gelinas: Honourable senators, following Senator Flynn's remarks, I would ask for leave that this bill be read the third time now. I would like to state that there is urgency about the matter, as banks with branches outside Canadian territory require that notice of authority be produced for the continuity of their operations.

In order to expedite matters, I would move, with leave, that this bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

DIVORCE

APPOINTMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly moved:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament to inquire into and report upon divorce in Canada and the social and legal problems relating thereto, and such matters as may be referred to it by either house;

That twelve members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the said Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to engage the services of such technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the committee have the power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee, and to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that house accordingly.

He said: Honourable senators, there has been on the Order Paper of the House of Commons a number of bills proposing extension of the grounds for divorce. We have a bill in this house to the same effect. It is generally agreed that both houses of Parliament have an interest in this subject.

Upon consultation with Senator Roebuck, he felt that his bill should also be before this committee, and in due time an appropriate motion will be made. It is not intended at this time to seek approval for the names of those who will serve on this committee. That will be done very shortly.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, as the Leader of the Government has said, it is not necessary to comment extensively on this motion. The Chairman of the Senate Standing Committee on Divorce told us of his hope that a Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons would be established, and we are pleased that it is being set up. No group of people in Canada, in the legal profession or elsewhere, know more about this subject than those who have been members of the Standing Committee on Divorce.

The terms of reference of this proposed committee are broad, as they should be, and they cover the whole of Canada. While most provinces have the same divorce laws, there are some differences in the courts in some provinces. Some time ago, my seatmate (Hon. Mr. Choquette) asked the Chairman of the Divorce Committee if it would not be possible to take divorce entirely out of the Senate. I should like to know if the terms of reference of the proposed joint committee are broad enough for it to make a recommendation to that effect. I think we are all very axnious that divorce should be taken out of Parliament, and I hope that the joint committee will be able to make some recommendations along that line. That is all I have to say.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I do not wish to deliver myself of a free legal opinion here: it would probably be worth as much as is paid for it. From the terms of reference, it appears that any matter touching the field of divorce would be within the ambit of consideration by the joint committee. In my opinion that would apply particularly to the point raised by Senator Brooks. It is a matter which the joint committee might very well consider.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, as Senator Brooks has said, very little comment is required at the present moment. I wish to express my satisfaction that this resolution has been brought before us and in the fact that the Government and the Commons have acceded to the request that I publicly made for this joint committee. That is particularly satisfactory in view of the stand which I took, that a revision of our ancient divorce law is overdue. I am hoping for some real progress as a result of the establishment of this joint committee.

On the question raised by the Leader of the Opposition as to whether the terms of reference are broad enough, I may say, without studying the actual phraseology, that I think they are. I recall the question asked of me by Senator Choquette and my reply to it, that the time was ripe for some move, such as that suggested now by the honourable Leader of the Opposition.

It is time that the entire decision on these resolutions be left to the professional jurists we have employed to hear the evidence. We should throw the entire responsibility on their shoulders.

Honourable senators, I would not make the motion myself, as it would look as though I—and the members of the committee also—were trying to avoid work. Therefore, if that move is to be made it will have to be made by somebody else, not by a member of the present committee. My own impression is that it is time we gave the jurists complete responsibility in this matter.

Honourable senators, during the last year or more of hearings, the jurists have become expert. There are two of them now. Mr. Justice Walsh is the leader and his reports are very full, complete, detailed and precise. While Mr. Justice Cameron's reports are somewhat longer, both jurists are thoroughly competent to handle this work at the present moment.

Motion agreed to.

PENITENTIARIES

APPOINTMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly moved:

> That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a joint committee of both Houses of Parliament to consider the state of penitentiaries under the control of the Government of Canada and the plans of the Government in relation thereto, and to report from time to time its observations and opinions thereon;

That nine members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the said joint committee;

That the joint committee have power to send for persons, papers and records; to adjourn from place to place; to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate; to print from day to day such papers and evidence as may be ordered by the joint committee; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that house accordingly.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Who designates the members?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It is done after consultation with the whips and the leaders.

Motion agreed to.

CONSUMER CREDIT

APPOINTMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly moved:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament to inquire into and report upon the problem of consumer credit, more particularly, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing, to inquire into and report upon the operation of Canadian legislation in relation thereto;

That twelve members of the Senate to be designated by the Senate at a later date be members of the joint committee;

That the said committee have power to call for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses; to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable, and to engage the services of counsel, accountants and such other clerical and technical personnel as may be deemed necessary, and to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the minutes of proceedings and evidence given before the joint committee during the Twenty-sixth Parliament be referred to the said committee and be made part of the records thereof; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that house accordingly.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Is this a continuation of a committee which has been operating now for some years?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, that is quite right. This is the third time that it has been constituted. It was never allowed to complete its work, because of various political events.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Are there counsel working on this—outside solicitors?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, the committee has outside counsel.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes, we had outside solicitors from the beginning. We had authority to hire counsel.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I know. I merely asked the question.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The senator will remember that we discussed it on a previous occasion. The opinion then was that perhaps they paid him too little.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I think it was the honourable senator who made that suggestion.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It was your own colleague, Senator McCutcheon.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Two hundred and fifty dollars a day.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

SEABOARD FINANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill S-21, to incorporate Seabord Finance Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this private bill is to incorporate a small loans company within the meaning of the Small Loans Act. The Small Loans Act defines a small loans company as being "a company incorporated by special Act of Parliament and authorized to lend money on promissory notes or other personal security and on chattel mortgages."

The proposed small loans company would be known as Seaboard Finance Company of Canada. It would, when incorporated, acquire by purchase all of the commercial paper now owned by the existing company, Seaboard Finance Company of Canada, Limited. The existing company, Seaboard Finance Company of Canada, Limited, was incorporated as an Ontario letters patent company on August 17, 1955. The existing Ontario company is a licensed moneylender within the meaning of the Small Loans Act. Originally the company operated solely within the Province of Ontario. However, the company expanded rapidly and is now qualified and is carrying on business in most provinces of Canada. That being the case it is felt that it would be more suitable for the enterprise to be carried on under a federal rather than a provincial charter.

If honourable senators see fit to give second reading to this bill, I shall of course move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

There is a further matter which I should like to bring to the attention of honourable senators at this time. If the company is granted a federal charter it would immediately do two things: It would sell all of its commercial paper to the federal company, and apply to the Ontario authorities for supplementary letters patent changing its corporate name to one completely dissimilar to that of the federal company. The change would mean that the new company would be the finance company, and the company registered under the letters patent of Ontario would be the holding company of the new company under federal charter.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Finance with respect to the expenditures set out in the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1966.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, the report of the Finance Committee was printed in the proceedings of Thurday, March 10, and all honourable senators have had an opportunity of reading it. It is not a long report and it is mainly factual; therefore, my remarks in moving its adoption will not be extensive.

The work of the committee during the past year was interrupted during the period from June 30, 1965, until January 18 of this year when there was no session of Parliament. However, as in previous years, during the time the committee sat it provided a forum where senators could seek and obtain information on any items in the Estimates about which they were particularly concerned, and in addition the committee continued to study what I might call the principles and methods applicable to Government Estimates of expenditures as distinct from the questions of individual items, and in particular to continue to study the implementation of the recommendations in the Glassco Report dealing with Government Estimates.

Before dealing with this general aspect, I would like to mention the evidence presented to the committee on two subjects dealing with departmental estimates. The first dealt with the policy of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources in connection with national parks. This is a matter of increasing importance as the use of our parks grows, and as that use requires on the one hand a reconciliation between the preservation of the natural aspect of these parks, and on the other hand the requirements for roads and accommodation and for some commercial facilities for the ever-increasing numbers of users of the parks.

The honourable senator for Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron), was particularly helpful in eliciting information from the departmental officials on this subject, which I feel is a matter that should command the continuing interest of the Standing Committee on Finance.

The other department to which I wish to refer is the Department of Manpower under whose jurisdiction will come the municipal winter works program. The evidence before the committee showed that this program is working very unevenly throughout the country. For example, extensive use of the program is made by municipalities in the Province of Quebec, moderate use is made by municipalities in Ontario and some other provinces, and very little use of the program is made in the Atlantic provinces. The explanation is that the Province of Quebec adds a subsidy of 40 per cent of the municipality's payroll costs over and above the federal grant, so that in most municipalities 90 per cent of the municipality's payroll cost is paid, and in some cases 100 per cent is paid in the designated areas.

The Province of Ontario in some instances adds 25 per cent to the federal grant of 50 per cent or 60 per cent, and this in turn brings the total to 75 per cent or 85 per cent.

In New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland there is no additional provincial subsidy. The net result is that for the winter of 1964-65 the sum of $24,076,000 was paid by the federal Government for municipal winter works programs in the Province of Quebec. In Ontario for the winter works of the Ontario municipalities the sum of $6,-134,000 was spent, and in all four Atlantic provinces the aggregate total was less than $1 million, being $995,000.

I doubt if these facts are generally known, and I do not mention them as an indictment of the program or as a criticism of any particular province, but it does seem to me that these figures call for a reappraisal of the program. I can see no reason for changing it in provinces like Quebec where the program seems to work effectively.

Assuming that we are going to continue to have a municipal winter works program, even during the remainder of the year, where we have conditions of full employment, then it seems to me that there must be reasons why this program is not particularly adapted to the Atlantic provinces, and that alternative methods should be canvassed so that aid in respect of municipal winter works in the Atlantic provinces and other provinces where it may not be working should be on a scale commensurate with the assistance given in respect of employment in the other provinces. I would hope, now that we are to have a new Department of Manpower, that in its planning for 1966-67 some new ideas will be developed in respect of winter employment in those provinces where the present program is not very effective.

To deal with the expenditures in the estimates in a more general way, I would hope that the Senate will continue to maintain its interest in the study of government finances. In this respect I would like to refer to something which the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) said at one of the meetings of the committee. He did not think the committee should be expected to study the Estimates in detail, department by department. I agree with this. This is the method that has been used in the House of Commons, and even under the revised rules by which the Estimates will be referred to 20 or more committees, their study of the Estimates will still be a detailed study, department by department. It is not my opinion that the Senate Standing Committee on Finance should duplicate that kind of study. I believe our consideration should be of a more general character, even though at times some particular department, or some Crown corporation, or some spending program, may come under a more specific and detailed scrutiny.

The report of the Glassco Commission has opened up a whole new approach to the method of government budgeting, to the control of expenditures, and to the delegation of financial responsibilities. This is the kind of problem that members of the Senate, experienced in both business and public affairs, are especially qualified to consider.

The whole broad subject of the place of government spending in the economic growth of the country is another subject for consideration, and on which there are some interesting studies and developments coming from the United Kingdom and also from the Economic Council of Canada. For example, a White Paper was issued by the Government of the United Kingdom in February of this year entitled "Public Expenditure, Spending and Control," which describes the methods by which the Government there intends to proceed towards enabling the public service to make the best possible contribution it may to the national economy. One of the methods that has been decided upon by the Government of the United Kingdom is to limit the total growth of the public sector expenditures to 4¼ per cent per year at constant prices in the period up to 1969-70. That is, the average annual growth of all Government expenditures at all levels will be held to an average of 4¼ per cent per year. In its first report, the Economic Council of Canada assumed an average annual growth of 5 per cent for Canada.

This is the kind of overall consideration of government expenditures that the Senate is well qualified to consider and to make recommendations on. Senator Crerar has always interested himself in this problem of public expenditure, and in his time as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance a great deal of useful information was amassed as to the total of all government expenditure, federal, provincial and municipal.

One of Canada's problems is created by its federal system of government. It is not possible to have a national policy such as is proposed in the United Kingdom for the total overall government sector. This makes it more important that we be kept informed about expenditures at all levels of government, so that the public and the legislators may know what these totals are, and what their effect may be on the economy as a whole.

The federal Government, in order to control inflationary effects, for example, may decide to defer capital expenditures for a period of time, but the effects of this decision can be offset by the action of provincial or municipal governments.

Honourable senators, in the report that has been submitted by the Standing Committee on Finance I should mention that the references to the total expenditures, and to any percentage of increase, do not include Supplementary Estimates (E) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1966, that have been tabled since the report was presented. In considering the figures of total expenditures in the report, we must take into consideration these additional supplementary Estimates. An appropriation bill based on these Estimates has not yet reached us, and, in fact, I do not think it has yet passed the House of Commons, so the extent to which they have to be taken into consideration is not at this moment known.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I should like to express my thanks to the deputy chairman of the committee, Senator Molson, and to the members of the steering committee, Senators Flynn, Haig, and Smith (Queens-Shelburne), and to the other members of the committee for their interest and assistance.

I have already given notice of motion that the Estimates for 1966-67 be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, and I can assure the Senate that if it adopts that motion the committee will be happy to discharge the responsibility to the best of its ability.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, the remarks of the honourable Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance (Hon. Mr. Leonard) have been most interesting. As we would expect, the report of his committee is a good one. He and his committee have done excellent work in going over the Estimates. He has pointed out that it is impossible for the Finance Committee of this house to deal with the Estimates in the detail with which they are studied in the other place, but in the latter part of his remarks he referred to Supplementary Estimates (E) for the fiscal year 1965-66, which do not apply to the present fiscal year. The other supplementary Estimates were referred to the committee, were they not?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Supplementary Estimates (E) have not been so referred. Frankly, I do not see how we can pass the full Estimates for 1965-66 until we receive a report on Supplementary Estimates (E). Because of that fact, honourable senators, I should like to move the adjournment of this debate, and in doing so ask the honourable chairman if he expects to have these Estimates before his committee in the near future.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I have not given any particular consideration to that, Senator Brooks. I assumed that we would not actually be receiving Supplementary Estimates (E), but rather an appropriation act. It is possible that when that bill comes before us we will be given an opportunity of delaying it while we consider Supplementary Estimates (E). As far as the committee is concerned, I am satisfied that it would be very happy to have the opportunity of considering Supplementary Estimates (E).

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Those Supplementary Estimates were tabled only today, and of course no member of the Senate has had an opportunity of considering them. However, by giving them just a cursory glance I notice that they contain some very important items, and I should like to ask the honourable chairman if it is possible for his committee, with the consent or direction of the Senate, to consider Supplementary Estimates (E), and then deal with all the Estimates for 1965-66 at one time in the report.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I think I can say on behalf of the committee that it would be pleased to consider them, but I am not sure as to what method should be used to place them before the committee in the light of the report that has been made.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Are you moving the adjournment of the debate, Senator Brooks?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Yes, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Brooks, debate adjourned.

DIVORCE (EXTENSION OF GROUNDS) BILL

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 9, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck for the second reading of Bill S-19, to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, in the unavoidable absence of Senator Grosart, may I have the permission of the house to proceed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Haig: First, I wish to extend congratulations to the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly) on his return to active duty at his accustomed place in the Senate.

I was here for only a short part of the proceedings on March 3 when Senator Roebuck introduced this bill. However, I have read and re-read and studied the remarks he made, as well as those of Senator Choquette on divorce, as appear on page 235 of the Debates of the Senate.

Honourable senators, I wish to commend to you the passage of this bill and its reference to a joint committee of the two houses for purposes of discussion. It is rather odd that I should be discussing this bill when the Senate has already agreed to the setting up of a joint committee. Nevertheless, I wish to make a few comments on the bill based on my past experience as a member of the Divorce Committee of the Senate and as a practising lawyer.

I wish to state at the outset that I am a practising member of the United Church. The General Council of that church in the past couple of years passed a resolution recommending that the federal Government appoint a royal commission to consider extending the grounds for divorce, adding to the present ground of adultery. That is mentioned by Senator Roebuck at page 235 of the Debates of the Senate for March 4 last. It will be found that the request for the extension of the grounds for divorce mentioned in the General Council's resolution are quite similar to those outlined in the present bill.

I submit that this bill, if it is passed by both houses and becomes law, will prevent the granting of many collusive divorces such as are now being granted, either by the Senate Divorce Committee or its commissioners, or the courts having jurisdiction to grant divorce.

Whether we like it or not, any practising lawyer knows that there are legitimate grounds for divorce on the basis of adultery where a husband and wife have separated and one is living in a common-law relationship with someone else of the opposite sex, and there are children. There is no question but that in many cases there are arranged divorces. We also know that if either a husband or wife suggested to a self-respecting lawyer that he might assist in arranging grounds for such a divorce, he would immediately reject the proposal.

If this bill should become law, I think it will be inevitable that there will be an increase in the number of divorces granted. However, I say that all it will do is correct and regularize many illegal unions resulting from a married person, who by reason of incompatibility or cruelty, or for any other reason, separates from his or her spouse and is living in a common-law relationship with another person.

I am very much in agreement with the suggestion of the granting of divorce on the ground of insanity of either spouse.

Many years ago a prominent citizen of Winnipeg came to me and said, "I want to get a divorce." I advised him that there was only one ground, and he said, "My wife has been in a mental institution for the past 12 years. I have brought up my children, educated them and they are going to university. Now I want to re-marry." To that I responded, "You cannot prove adultery, and she cannot petition for a divorce." He then said, "Then I shall go to the States and get a divorce." I told him that was all right, but that if he did so he should bear in mind that the divorce would not be recognized in Canada. He replied that he would take that chance.

This man immediately went to the United States and obtained an American divorce. Afterwards he left Winnipeg and went to live in another large city in our dominion. That man had suffered for the past 12 years, knowing that his wife would never be released from the mental institution. If this bill becomes law such a person would not have to suffer the stigma of an illegal divorce.

It must also be remembered that if we extend the grounds of divorce beyond the present ground, the courts will still have the right to accept or reject a petition for divorce. Therefore, all we are doing is allowing the courts to accept or reject a petition on these grounds. The rules of evidence, the presentation of a petition, the defence if any, are still there, and all we shall be doing is adding three further grounds so as to prevent collusive or illegal divorces.

The present law, by reason of this one cause or ground, is being brought into disrepute, and once the law falls into disrepute the moral grounds for consideration in the best interests of the country are lost.

I agree with Senator Choquette when he suggests that the Senate Divorce Committee and the Commissioners should be considered a court, because I do not think it is right for the Parliament of Canada to grant certain extended grounds to domiciled residents in only eight of our ten provinces. If we pass an act here it should apply to everybody throughout the dominion.

Honourable senators, for these reasons I recommend that we pass this bill and refer it to the special joint committee now being set up.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Baird, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Olive L. Irvine: Honourable senators, I should like to begin my remarks today by congratulating His Honour the Speaker, not only on his appointment to the honoured position he holds, but also on the able manner in which he is discharging his duties. We are extremely fortunate in having his popular wife in the position she holds. She is a friend of all.

In the same vein, I should like to join my colleagues in extending congratulations to the mover (Hon. Mr. McDonald) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Gouin) of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and to offer a hearty welcome to our new colleagues who have taken their seats in the Senate.

We are delighted to welcome back the Leader of the Government, the Honourable John J. Connolly. Senator Connolly, we missed you greatly, but I can assure you that the honourable gentlemen who stepped into the breach during your absence made an excellent contribution.

For some time now the Province of Manitoba, and our sister Province of Saskatchewan, has been giving special attention to the establishment of new industries which would spark industrial development. Research was necessary to further this aim, and as a result of this research three large new fields have been discovered: First, the building of a federal power development on the Nelson River; secondly, the establishment of a major integrated forest industry in Northern Manitoba and, thirdly, the discovery of potash in Saskatchewan.

For honourable senators who are not familiar with the portion of my home province of Manitoba in which the development of the projects I am about to discuss are located, I have had placed on each desk a map showing the location of each project. Manitoba, as you all know, is bordered by oil-rich Alberta and potash-rich Saskatchewan on the west, and just plain rich Ontario on the east.

As stated before, extensive research and investigations have been carried out by Manitoba's Department of Industry and Commerce, particularly, under the very able leadership of the Honourable Gurney Evans, and our Premier, the Honourable Duff Roblin, and the Department of Mines and Natural Resources.

On Tuesday, February 15, 1966, a joint statement was read in both the House of Commons and the Manitoba Legislature. This statement unveiled a project which might be called the greatest economic break-through since Manitoba became part of Canada. These expansive words suited an expensive scheme; a federal-provincial power development of the Nelson River, where the hydro potential is exceeded only by Quebec's Manicouagan and Labrador's Churchill Falls.

Very little has been heard of the Nelson River, but it is really the beckoning giant of the north. It has never cut much of a swath in atlases, but still it drains a watershed reaching from the Rockies nearly to Lake Superior, and south to the State of Minnesota in the United States.

In the natural reservoir of Lake Winnipeg, the thirteenth largest lake in the world, the Nelson takes on the flow of the Saskatchewan, Red and Winnipeg Rivers and then meanders 410 miles north to Hudson Bay, sometimes passing placid banks bordered by dwarf spruce, and at other times tumbling between steep cliffs. On its journey north the river drops a total of 712 feet and can produce an average flow equal to the combined flows of the Peace River and Labrador's Hamilton River.

Co-operation between the Manitoba Government and federal authorities has enabled this great resource to be surveyed, and the possibilities of development appraised in such a manner as to lead to the present agreement.

The power resources of the lower Nelson River have been surveyed at a cost of $4 million as a fifty-fifty joint federal-provincial undertaking over the past three years under the direction of a joint Nelson River programming board.

The vision of the north which was criticized so often while the previous government was in office, is now beginning to show sense to Canadians as a whole. This represents the culmination of the progressive policies of northern development instituted by the Progressive Conservative Government a few years ago.

The federal Government will construct, finance and own the high voltage transmission lines required to move the Nelson River power to Winnipeg, and, when markets are developed, to the international and interprovincial boundaries. The cost of the 579 miles of high voltage transmission lines presently planned from Kettle Valley to Winnipeg, and the ancillary equipment, has been estimated at about $120 million. The line will be leased to the Manitoba Hydro at rates per year and per kilowatt hour of energy transmitted which will suffice over a period of approximately 50 years to repay with interest the investment made in the line.

The federal Government's participation will ensure that this power site of such great importance does not remain undeveloped, for, as honourable senators know, the market for power in our province is still too limited for the province alone to bear the full burden of financing its development.

The potential benefits to Canada will include good possibilities for the export of power to the mid-western states, and the possible sale of low-cost power to Saskatchewan and Ontario through interconnections between the utilities of the three provinces. The ultimate development will be in the magnitude of 5 million kilowatts.

The initial phase will include the construction of a power site at Kettle Rapids and the installation of 855,000 kilowatts of generating capacity; the diversion of part of the flow of the Churchill River near Thompson, Manitoba; works at the outlet of Lake Winnipeg to control the level of that lake and the outflow from it, and long, high voltage transmission lines from the Kettle Rapid sites southwest to the neighbourhood of Winnipeg. The total cost of this minimum initial development of the power in the lower Nelson will exceed $300 million.

Power produced by the projected Kettle Rapids generating station will be about equal to the present annual demand for electricity in the Province of Manitoba. The immediate gain for Manitoba will, of course, be cheap power for industrial growth in the populous southern part of the province and for development of mineral and timber resources in its northern reaches.

Work on Kettle Rapids, starting this spring, will create 3,000 on-site construction jobs and another 3,000 in back-up manufacturing and services.

With the announcement of the Nelson River project, Premier Roblin informed us that other important developments would occur. We did not have long to wait, for on March 8 our Premier stated that a major break-through in the development of Manitoba's north had been announced with the release of details of an agreement between his Government and the giant Swiss corporation, Monoca A. G. St. Moritz of Zurich, Switzerland, to develop a $100-million plus complex to establish a major integrated forest industry centered in The Pas.

With your indulgence may I give a brief outline of this private finance and trust corporation. In the last six years Monoca A. G. has been associated with the development of four major pulp and paper ventures in Spain, Italy and South America. The corporation often occupies a dual function: that of a trustee in its own right and that of a trustee for other investors whose particular interests and experiences in the pulp and paper industry have oriented them toward the financing of pulp and paper ventures in Europe and North America. After all surveys and investigations had been made, this great company decided to initiate promptly a multi-stage integrated forest products development program in northern Manitoba. To this end, a new Manitoba company, Churchill Forest Industries (Manitoba) Limited, has been formed with an authorized capital of $5,000,000.

In making the announcement, the Minister of Industry and Commerce said that the province would not be providing any direct capital or guaranteeing any loans in connection with the projected industrial complex. The full facts of the development financing may be announced during debate in the legislature, but up to the present time indications are that Monoca A.G. has approached the Manitoba Development Fund for a loan. This is a fund financed by the government but operated as a separate agency, and is empowered to grant loans to industries locating in Manitoba.

Stage one would be the establishment of woodlands debarking and loading facilities for 50,000 cords of debarked wood, to be in operation by March 31, 1968, and to be located at Arnot on the Neslon River.

Stage two would be the establishment and construction of a modern saw mill at The Pas for the production of 30 million board feet of lumber per year, to be in operation not later than December 30, 1968.

Stage three would be the establishment and construction of a newsprint and magazine paper mill at The Pas with a minimum capacity of 300 to 400 tons per day, to be operative by March 31, 1971.

Stage four would be, subject to the then existing economics of such a proposal, the establishment of a chemical furnishing plant with a minimum capacity of 50 tons per day.

Stage five would be, subject also to the then existing economics, the establishment of a high capacity sulphate pulp mill or, alternatively, a doubling of the capacity of the newsprint mill, depending on availability of timber resources and markets. Honourable senators will understand that stages four and five can be taken only as projections based on present predictions and future market conditions. It would be reasonable to estimate that stage five could be implemented not later than 1973.

The total investments would finally exceed $100 million, and jobs for several thousand people will be created over the next 10 years at the plant site and in the forest operations. It is further expected that the implementation of these projects will considerably enhance the economic and industrial development of northern Manitoba and lead to substantial exports for the province.

Honourable senators, as you may have noticed, the major benefactor of the development will be The Pas, a community of 4,700 persons on the Saskatchewan River, 314 miles northwest of the City of Winnipeg. This is the town in northern Manitoba known the world over for its famous Annual Trappers' Festival.

It has not been necessary for the town to make any special tax concessions to the new company; it has committed itself only to supply water, sewer and power facilities and bus transportation for employees from the town site to the new industry. It has also agreed to incorporate the area into the Town of The Pas and to build the necessary school facilities which will be needed as a result of the increase in population that will follow the establishment of the industry.

With the promise that the Government has made to establish appropriate schooling and training facilities for pulp and paper technicians at the Northern Manitoba Vocational Centre at The Pas, the new company has agreed to employ as many local people as possible. In the meantime, top management and expert personnel will be made available from Europe and the United States, as long as needed for the successful conduct of operations.

I am delighted that our Indian population, a total of nearly 15,000 in this area, will have an opportnuity now of securing employment right at home in the environment in which they have been accustomed to live. They have always lived in hopes that some day there would be jobs for all. The opportunity has been made possible now and it will be up to them to fulfil their part of the deal. While awaiting the opening of the new technical training school in The Pas later in the year, a new venture has already begun, the establishment of the Frontier Collegiate Institute situated at Cranberry Portage. This school, created out of a former R.C.A.F. radar base, has an enrolment this year of 150 resident students and 50 day students from the nearby towns. The resident students come from widely separated and sparsely populated centres throughout the north. The division has been described as one of the largest in the world; it encompasses a school population of some 3,000 pupils located in 16 isolated school districts and 27 underveloped settlements. It serves an area of about 166,000 square miles. The division is administered from Dauphin, and at present has a staff of 12.

The purpose of the school is to help provide a reservoir of trained manpower of northern citizens to meet the economic problems and opportunities of northern Manitoba. On opening day, the Minister of Education summed the situation up clearly when he said, "No one can face the challenge of our north with more courage and resolution, with more understanding and affection, than do those of our people who were born here." Once the technical school at The Pas is completed, I am led to believe that courses vital to the life of the community will be stressed particularly.

The Government has promised to provide access to now inaccessible timber areas and to accelerate its northern development program. It will construct public all-weather roads from Wabowden and Thicket Portage to Lake Sipiwesk. It will also construct winter truck roads from Thicket Portage to the Thompson highway, and join Wabowden at Cross Lake. The Government has also agreed with the company to match, on a dollar-for-dollar basis, the construction of access roads, up to a total contribution by the province of one million dollars over a 12-year period. These roads will be open to the public.

In general terms it may be stated that the province will benefit from this project in the form of increased revenues from stumpage, added employment opportunities in an area with a large Indian and Metis population, and the utilization of presently unused timber. A major development such as this will spread throughout the whole economy of the region. Many new jobs will be created to sell and service the hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of chain saws, skidders, tractors, trucks and other equipment needed by the logging contractors who will supply the company. Extensive new facilities will be required and many dozens of new jobs will be created in this field alone. Petroleum sales will soar and added retail and bulk distribution must be planned.

This new development is the result of much hard work on the part of many agencies. In particular a great deal of credit is due to the National Harbours Board, the Canadian National Railways, the Manitoba Hydro, the provincial Department of Mines and Natural Resources, the Department of Health, the Department of Municipal Affairs, the the Department of Education, and the officials of the Department of Industry and Commerce. Without their special help and assistance in devising special methods to overcome the obstacles facing this development, this project would not have been possible.

Now let us turn our attention for a few minutes to our good neighbour to the west of us, the Province of Saskatchewan, now known to many as "The Growth Province".

In 1872 the Canadian Government offered free land to all who would claim it in this Prairie province, and from 1882 on railways channelled the flow of settlers. In 1905 Saskatchewan became a province of Canada. Settlers continued to pour in and though there were setbacks there was general progress. In the dark year of 1929 economic depression seized the world and the Prairies entered upon the worst drought in history. Farm prices tumbled to rock bottom. Thousands were unemployed.

The "Thirties" taught Saskatchewan people that it was not safe to rely on farming alone. Since World War II the province has been attracting and developing new industries. Once again new residents are arriving. Farming is still the biggest industry in Saskatchewan, but oil and natural gas, the raw materials of the twentieth century, are being developed and a new diversified Saskatchewan is evolving.

In recent years many mining companies have come into Saskatchewan to develop the province's resources. Of the minerals discovered, potash is likely to have the most lasting impact, and this is the industry with which I will deal today. Back in 1943 explorers for oil discovered potash, but World War II and many difficulties have had to be overcome by companies daring enough to venture into this field of development. However, the result of this multi-million dollar gamble has paid off beyond their fondest expectations, and today under Saskatchewan's soil lie what are considered to be the most extensive deposits of potash in the world. The province can boast the largest and most modern plant in the world, and there are seven more almost as big either in operation or under construction. Impact of the potash industry will be felt in every part of the province and, in fact, in all of Canada. Even the end use of potash provides a dramatic epilogue: about 95 per cent of all potash produced goes to help increase the world's supply of food, the scarcity of which creates a problem which almost daily becomes more urgent.

Before going further may we define the word "potash." It is a term applied to compounds of the element potassium. About 10 per cent of the potash produced each year plays an important role in industry and the chemical trade. It is used in the manufacture of a wide variety of items including matches and various explosives, vat dyes, television tubes, pharmaceuticals, synthetic rubber, detergents, glass and bleaches, photographic film and blueprint paper, and in substitutes for salt. It also plays a part in the case-hardening of steel, uranium processing and in the preparation of metals such as gold, silver and copper.

However, the bulk of potash goes into the manufacture of fertilizers. Its importance lies in the fact that it regulates plant intake of other fertilizer ingredients. Potassium is found naturally in the soil, but after years of continual cultivation, crops use up so much that it must be replaced to maintain yields. This applies particularly to areas which are irrigated. Potash, the only known economical source of potassium, is combined with phosphorous and nitrogen to form a fertilizer which is becoming more and more vital to modern productive agriculture.

At the present time three companies are in production, and another five have initiated mine and mill development. In addition, 12 other companies are carrying out exploration and developing work on permit areas. Total actual and committed investment in the potash industry is well in excess of $500 million.

Current capacity of the three projects in operation is 3,200,000 tons potash product annually. By 1970, however, when the last of eight projects now initiated is scheduled for completion, provincial capacity will have risen to over 10 million tons per year.

Let us consider the Esterhazy operation as an indicator of what is to come in the world of potash. Operating currently at two million tons per year, it employs about 800 people. It generates a payroll of around $5 million a year. It makes possible the purchase here in Canada of some $5 million per year in supplies and other materials. It brings $25 million in railway services, and it produces a product currently valued at around $40 million per year, which contributes importantly to Canada's balance of trade. It is estimated that at least five other people are indirectly employed for each worker in an industrial installation of this kind.

Local and property taxes amount to about $1 million a year, and provincial sales taxes for the first mill and shaft approached a million dollars. Royalty payments run around $1½ million a year, of which $600,000 goes to the Government of Saskatchewan.

Then of course the employees of Esterhazy pay property taxes of roughly $250,000 per year and personal income taxes estimated at approximately $600,000. All this relates to potash, to the product of a single mine situated at what at one time was the small town of Esterhazy, Saskatchewan.

Potash—the new partner for wheat—is, in the words of many Saskatchewan business people, a wind-whipped fire supplied by an endless fuel line. The industry is creating a climate for investment never before experienced.

Therefore, Saskatchewan, may we hail you as one of the coming provinces of "opportunity".

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Irvine a question? I thank her for this map with which she supplied us, because it enabled us to follow her excellent speech more easily, and gave us a bird's-eye view of the whole area.

It is some time since I was active in the production of electricity, and I have failed to keep up with improvements in the art. I am sure all members of this chamber are much interested in this development because the present Government is contributing very largely to its success.

Some 30 years ago when I was an Ontario Hydro commissioner, the commission built a transmission line to bring electricity a distance of about 160 miles from Chats Falls to Toronto. Now, I understood that in the development which the honourable senator has been telling us about, they are bringing electric power some 575 miles to Winnipeg. Thirty years ago we had a line loss over 160 miles of about 15 per cent, and an expenditure on maintenance of about $1 million a year.

The honourable senator has made a very intensive study of this electrical proposal, and I am wondering if she can tell us what development has taken place over these last few years that has made it possible to develop those falls 575 miles north of Winnipeg, and transmit the electric power over that distance. It is proposed to carry the power a further distance still into the United States. What development has taken place, with which I am not familiar—and I apologize for this—that makes such a transmission possible?

Hon. Mrs. Irvine: In answer to the honourable senator I would say that this will be fully discussed in the Legislature of Manitoba, at which time all the details will be made available.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Denis, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honorable senators, I have the honour to present four reports from the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament concerning salary revisions, reclassifications and upgradings of positions in the Library of Parliament.

The Clerk Assistant (Reading): The Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): This is a lengthy report, and one which we should have an opportunity to examine. It will appear in the Minutes of the Proceedings of today. I move, therefore, that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) tabled:

Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, intituled: "Private and Public Investment in Canada—Outlook 1966—and Regional Estimates". (English and French texts).

Report of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, together with a Statement of its Accounts certified by the Auditors, for the year ended December 31, 1965, pursuant to section 33 of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, chapter 46, and sections 85(3) and 87(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, R.S.C., 1952, (English and French texts).

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, for the information of some senators who may be obliged to leave the chamber early, I now move, with leave, that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 29 at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

The change to sitting at 3 o'clock instead of the usual hour of 8 o'clock in the evening is in keeping with the custom that has prevailed for a great many years on budget night. This is to accommodate honourable senators who wish to attend the sitting in the other place to hear the budget speech. I have already discussed this question with Senator Brooks —you will notice in my remarks yesterday, I no longer call him Leader of the Opposition—and we felt that the continuation of that practice is valid.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask the leader if any decision has yet been reached as to a probable Easter adjournment?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West: I cannot be precise about this, because I understand that no firm agreement has been reached as to the adjournment in the other place. However, depending upon how we progress with our work next week, it may not even be necessary to sit the following week. However, as honourable senators know, the budget debate will not conclude before the Easter adjournment in the other place. There will be the customary eight days assigned to the debate. In addition, there will be debates on the various resolutions arising out of the legislation to be introduced as a result of the budget.

In accordance with the normal practice that we follow in this house, I think the Senate adjournment will be a little longer than that of the other place, but I am not able to predict exactly how long the recess will be.

I hope that satisfies the honourable Senator.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

BANK OF BRITISH COLUMBIA—AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the following report of the committee on Bill S-16, to incorporate the Bank of British Columbia:

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien (Provencher): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that this report be concurred in now.

Report adopted.

THE ESTIMATES

FINANCE COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT—SUPPLEMENTARIES (E)

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard moved, with leave of the Senate:

> That the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in Supplemantary Estimates (E) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March 1966;
> That the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records, and to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Will there be a report from the committee on its deliberations in connection with these estimates?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators will recall that yesterday afternoon in the debate on the report submitted by the Finance Committee dealing with the Estimates for 1965-66, the honourable Leader of the Opposition raised a question as to Supplementary Estimates (E) and thought that they should be referred to the Finance Committee. I must take some blame for the report of the committee having been made before these supplementary Estimates were considered. I was under the impression, as I think were also the members of the committee when we made the report, that there would be no further supplementary Estimates. However, the Supplementary Estimates (E) were tabled after the report was passed by the committee, and I was in a little difficulty yesterday to know just how we should deal with them.

I have come to the conclusion that we should now adopt the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition, and to that end I make this motion today. If the motion is passed, the Supplementary Estimates (E) will then come before the Finance Committee, and I propose to have a meeting on Wednesday morning next at 10 o'clock to consider these supplementary Estimates. I have arranged for Dr. Davidson, Secretary of the Treasury Board, to be there as I think he is the appropriate witness to deal with questions on them.

If there are any particular items which honourable senators are interested in, they should let me or the secretary of the committee know and we will make sure that Dr. Davidson is in a position to deal with them. If he is unable to deal with them, then he could get the proper departmental official to do so.

Assuming that happens, and depending upon what the committee does in the consideration of these supplementary Estimates, I think there will be a further report to the Senate on these supplementaries.

In the meantime, there is on the Order Paper today a motion of mine referring the 1966-67 Estimates to the committee. I intend to proceed with that motion, subject to any debate that any senators would wish to indulge in on it. However, that simply refers the new Estimates to us. It would be my thought that we would not consider the new Estimates until we had finished with the supplementaries and our reports on the 1965-66 expenditures were in. That might mean that consideration of the 1966-67 Estimates would stand over until after the Easter recess.

Also, as the first item on the Order Paper today there is the consideration of the report which is already before us and on which Senator Brooks has the adjournment. I think that that debate should not conclude until we have the report on the Supplementary Estimates (E), although I understand there are some other senators who would like to speak on it. Subject to the wishes of Senator Brooks and the other senators, perhaps they could participate in the debate but not conclude it until after we have the report of the meeting on Wednesday morning next.

Before concluding I need only remind the house that all senators are entitled to attend the meetings of the Finance Committee and of other committees of the Senate, and to ask questions and to take part in the discussions. As all senators are interested in this subject matter, they are certainly welcome at the Finance Committee, and by the fact that they may not have to vote, they do not lose a valuable franchise.

I move that these Estimates be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I think that the honourable chairman has made the matter quite clear. However, my point is this: can he assure us that after these Supplementary Estimates (E) have been considered by the Finance Committee, there will be a report on them made to the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: That is my intention, and I am sure that would be done.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: There are some items in it that I know some honourable senators wanted to discuss very briefly.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I think I can give that assurance.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT—EXPENDITURES 1966-67

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard moved, pursuant to notice:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1967, in advance of the bills based on the said Estimates reaching the Senate; and

That the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records.

He said: Honourable senators, I do not think it is necessary for me to add much to what I have already said with respect to this motion. The motion is in the same terms as on previous occasions when the expenditures under the Estimates have been referred to the Standing Committee on Finance. If this motion carries, the Finance Committee will start its consideration of the new Estimates for the ensuing year as soon as it has finished with the Estimates for 1965-66.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Finance with respect to the expenditures set out in the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1966.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I spoke briefly on this item yesterday afternoon. I did not complete my remarks at that time as I wanted to be assured by the chairman of the committee that there would be an opportunity to speak on Supplementary Estimates (E) which actually belong to 1965-66 and not to 1966-67. Therefore, I took the position that the report for 1966 was not complete until this item had been considered. The chairman of that committee has very graciously agreed that his committee will examine these Estimates and that there will be a further report. This I consider to be satisfactory. That was my main reason for my asking for the adjournment.

I have no objection to the report as presented by the honourable chairman of the committee; it is an excellent report. As I said yesterday afternoon, the work done by that committee in the few opportunities they had to meet during the past year is very satisfactory indeed.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: As far as the Estimates for 1966 are concerned, they have been before us or on the table of the house for a long time. I think it is the longest on record. However, now they are about to die of old age, which perhaps is a good thing. We may as well forget them as soon as possible.

Besides being the longest before the house, I think they are also the largest. They amount to $8 billion, not including the $1 billion which we have had to raise for the pensions for the aged.

I also mentioned yesterday that there were in addition six supplementary Estimates passed on the 1965-66 Estimates; and now we have No. 7, Supplementary Estimates (E). All the supplementary Estimates were quite large and added materially to the main Estimates. Supplementaries (E), which we will discuss later, were a sort of posthumous son of the main Estimates, coming in about the time that the main Estimates had died. It is a fairly husky child—in the area of $174 million.

There are some items which we wish to consider later. I agree with the chairman when he quoted me yesterday as saying that we cannot deal with individual items in this committee. My view still is that it would be impossible to do so.

The chairman also mentioned the fact that they dealt with general problems affecting finance. In this committee they dealt with the Glassco Report, the municipal winter works program, parks etc. These are subjects which have always seemed to me should be considered by our Finance Committee.

Senator Leonard stated yesterday that the place of Government spending in the economic growth of the country is one of the main features to be considered by a committee of this kind. With that I am entirely in agreement. But it is a matter of selection. The main committee has a steering committee, and there are many important matters from which the steering committee could make a selection. I feel that the work of this committee this year, as indeed in the past, has been most satisfactory.

I wish to repeat that we should be well pleased with the work of our Finance Committee. We have some very outstanding committees in the Senate. I was about to say that the Finance Committee is the first, but on consideration, I would place it second to our Banking and Commerce Committee. At any rate it is an outstanding committee and accomplishes outstanding work.

Honourable senators, I did not intend to speak at any length. I am in perfect agreement with this report, which I consider to be a good one. My only hope is that this year the committee will have more time to sit and more time to carry on the work which they have so well begun.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to speak quite briefly to this motion which deals with the report of the Finance Committee.

I know it has been said on a number of occasions that we have always been very fortunate in the personnel of all our committee chairmen and in the membership of the committees. They have always been of a very high standard. When changes have to be made it is difficult to select a person who in the first instance will be accepted as one who can completely fill the shoes of those very prominent persons who have gone before him. In the person of our present chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator Leonard, the Senate and indeed the country are favoured because of the high degree of ability and service he has given to Parliament. He has brought to his task a high degree of personal knowledge and a great deal of interest which dates back many years before he came to this chamber. We are indeed fortunate that these services are being made available to us through the channel of the Finance Committee of the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I will divert for a moment to do what Senator Brooks did the other day, and express my warmest welcome to the new senators. I think you will all pardon me if I show a little higher degree of temperature in the warmth of my welcome to the former Nova Scotian, Senator MacKenzie. Senator MacKenzie, a native of Nova Scotia, now represents the Province of British Columbia in this chamber. Senator Urquhart, a native-born son of Nova Scotia, represents that province in this chamber. I welcome them all, but the temperature of my welcome is a little higher with respect of the two Nova Scotians.

Honourable senators, I rise to make a few remarks in connection with paragraph 5 of the report of the Standing Committee on Finance which deals with the municipal winter works program. To remind the house of what the committee had to say about this subject, perhaps I shall be permitted to quote the paragraph:

> Evidence with respect to the municipal winter works deserves special mention. This program is having its greatest effect in the Province of Quebec, due to the fact that the government of that province supplements the federal grant by an additional 40 per cent of payroll cost, so that a municipality in that province receives from 90 per cent to 100 per cent of the total payroll cost of an approved winter works project. On the other hand, provinces in the Atlantic area, which are known to have relatively high winter unemployment, receive comparatively little benefit from the federal winter works municipal program, presumably because it is not sufficiently assisted by the provinces and municipalities in the area. Your committee therefore calls attention to this anomaly and suggests that the federal program might well be reconsidered, not with a view to changing its effectiveness in Quebec or other provinces where it is achieving its purpose, but rather to adapt it to assist unemployment in those provinces where it is not now making any substantial contribution to the relief of winter unemployment.

As a preface to my following remarks it might be helpful if I review the terms of the municipal winter works program touching the most important aspects that were outlined in the evidence presented to the committee.

The federal Government pays 50 per cent of the payroll costs of municipal winter works projects undertaken during the period from November 1 to April 30 in each year. In designated areas of high unemployment the federal share is 60 per cent. The projects which qualify include most capital undertakings of the municipalities, such as town halls, fire stations, and recreation centres, with respect to which the federal incentive is limited to a ceiling of $100,000 in each instance. Streets, sidewalks and works of that nature also qualify.

There are some important exceptions for which there are good reasons, which I do not think I need go into now. These exceptions include mainly schools and school grounds, hospitals and hospital grounds, and municipally-owned but commercially-used buildings; that is, municipally-owned buildings that are built for commercial use by private enterprise.

Another condition of the program is that the bulk of those employed must be unemployed at the time they are hired.

The benefits of the federal incentive of from 50 per cent to 60 per cent of payroll costs also apply to projects in unorganized settlements when sponsored by a community organization and carried out under acceptable supervision. This little known provision—in fact, it was totally unknown to me—is a very important one, and much more use can be made of it. I am thinking of villages, or groups of villages, which might be persuaded by the incentive to undertake the construction of community centres of modest design and, more important, sewage collection systems and community water supply systems. In respect of the latter I would think that in the interests of promoting public health the province concerned should assume a significant share of the cost.

I know of a project of this nature that has been given serious consideration, but the difficulties of financing it have not yet been overcome. This particular proposed project involved a rural area in Nova Scotia where for many years homes have been obtaining their drinking water from the same river into which their sewage is dumped. It might be practical for this type of community to undertake a project under the winter works incentive plan. It could be sure of at least two months free of severe winter weather during the period from November 1 to April 30 and could, under the terms of the agreements, carry the project over to the next season if that were necessary. The committee was given assurance of the possibility of that course.

In addition to the example I have mentioned, there have been other such proposals under consideration to deal with the pollution of our rivers, and these are much needed public works.

In his remarks yesterday, the Chairman of the committee pointed out the disparity between the Atlantice provinces and the rest of Canada in the use being made of the municipal winter works program. As he indicated, the obvious explanation of this situation is a lack of financial participation by the Atlantic provinces in the program. All honourable senators will agree that good evidence was placed on the record yesterday by Senator Leonard to make this conclusion acceptable. In those provinces which make the greatest use of the program the contributions range from 25 per cent to 40 per cent of payroll costs. But, I want to point to additional evidence which supports this conclusion very strongly.

Prince Edward Island, about which we hear so much in glowing terms from our colleague Senator Inman at least once a year, is the only Atlantic province which shares in the labour cost. It makes a contribution of 30 per cent. As this is a designated area, the federal contribution is 60 per cent, leaving a balance of 10 per cent to be paid by the municipality. The result of this favourable situation is that the total labour payroll of the winter works program in Prince Edward Island amounted to $3.75 per capita of the population of the province. By comparison, in my own province of Nova Scotia the total payroll of the winter works program divided by the population provides a figure of 25 cents per capita. The impact on unemployment, in other words, of the program in Prince Edward Island is 15 times larger than it is in Nova Scotia.

The committee was informed also that there is an additional factor which influences the extent of participation in the program. As Mr. W. R. Dymond, one of the chief witnesses put it, this factor involves the influence of "a very vigorous activity on the part of the provincial government itself in promoting the program among its own municipalities." The example that Mr. Dymond gave to the committee was that of New Brunswick where the government, although it makes no contribution, is very active in promoting the program. The result of that promotion is indicated by the fact that during the year 1964-65 the program in that province was three and a half times what it was in Nova Scotia.

The facts that I have given, together with the material placed on the record yesterday by Senator Leonard, is the background of the recommendation of the committee which I quoted in the beginning of my remarks. The recommendation is simply for a reconsideration of the program with a view to increasing its effectiveness, especially in the Atlantic provinces.

My first suggestion in relation to this recommendation is that in the problem areas I have mentioned some of the provinces must be persuaded to do their share in actively promoting the program, such as is presently being done in New Brunswick. The figures would indicate that a high degree of promotion is also being done in other provinces. The responsibility for doing something about promoting winter employment opportunities certainly does not rest entirely on the federal authority. Simply to place a booklet in the hands of the municipal clerks is not good enough.

The second suggestion I would make is that a study be made of the comparative financial capacity of the provinces to share payroll costs.

The added incentive of a further sharing of labour costs, over and above the present formula, at both the federal and provincial level may be required in those provinces where winter unemployment is highest and financial resources of the municipalities and the provinces are the lowest. Each level of government must do its share in reducing winter unemployment, while at the same time lightening the load of the hard-pressed municipalities.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, the outstanding witness that we had before this committee was Mr. Henderson, the Auditor General, who agreed that accounting is most certainly common sense. What he said was very informative, and his suggestions for reform will sooner or later be accepted by the officials concerned, inasmuch as they are supported by the Finance Committee.

At this point I wish to congratulate the Chairman of the committee and to tell my colleagues who are members of the committee that I consider it a privilege to sit with them.

There was a misunderstanding at one time on account of the projects that were accepted. Somebody noticed the fact that more projects for a larger amount had been accepted for various municipal winter works in the Province of Quebec than in some other provinces. That was due to two reasons. The first was that there are many designated areas in the Province of Quebec; the second was that those municipalities took advantage of the winter works program to submit a larger number of projects. If other provinces such as Ontario and the Maritimes had proportionately less, it was due to the fact that they submitted a smaller number of projects for approval.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask the honourable member a question? First of all, I commend the Province of Quebec for its efforts in this regard. However, is it not a fact that its situation was better than, say, the Atlantic provinces because it was able to put up the money for the municipalities, whereas the Atlantic provinces, although having the greater need, were unable to do so?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) and I agree on those matters. In this case the Government of the Province of Quebec has helped the designated areas by paying part of the amount that they should have paid according to the agreement. The example given by the Quebec government to the other provinces in this instance was a good one, and I hope that in the future it will have a good result and be followed by them.

Another most interesting witness before the committee was the Honourable Jean Marchand, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who took a special interest in the winter works program and gave illuminating evidence before the committee.

It seems to me that the winter works program was extremely helpful for a large number of our fellow citizens; and the purpose of the committee, if I correctly understand the Chairman, is to prevent any abuse of that program, and to see to it that it provides the greatest possible benefit to the Canadian people.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien (Provencher), debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck for the second reading of Bill S-19, to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief.

Hon. A. B. Baird: Honourable senators, in saying a few words about Bill S-19 I am going to have to wear two different hats, so to speak.

Since the honourable Senator Roebuck has made it plain that he does not, at this stage, visualize the provisions of this bill applying to the divorces from Newfoundland or Quebec, unless we decide to amend his bill, there is theoretically little reason why I, as a senator from Newfoundland, should be selfishly concerned on behalf of my people, one way or the other. Apparently for us, things are to remain as they are. But I am above all a member of the Senate of Canada, so I shall speak very briefly, first in that capacity, and then as a senator from Newfoundland; because, far from being unconcerned, I believe this bill can be made to serve the people of Newfoundland if we will give it a chance to do so. I shall come back to that point in a few moments.

There is no question in my mind but that we should give unanimous support to this bill. I am not going to waste much time going over the reasons, most of which have already been advanced by honourable senators speaking to this bill. As I see it, there are three simple points to be made.

First, the bill is right. It is a bill which has no conceivable harm within it. It does not go too far, by making divorce so easy that marriage becomes a garment that can be slipped on for size and then discarded at the first sign of a bulge. No; it very carefully extends relief only to those who are helplessly caught up in an intolerable situation completely beyond their own control—those who are faced with circumstances which will likely be adjudged totally beyond remedy or repair by the presiding courts in each case.

It is interesting to note, too, that each of the proposed new grounds involves a circumstance or condition of the marriage which will have been of long standing. At present, in the case of adultery, the offence can happen one day and the spouse, in the heat of the moment of discovery, can immediately begin action which she or he may later regret, yet be too proud to withdraw. I think we all know or have heard about such cases. We even see proof from time to time in divorced couples who re-marry.

This is far less likely to happen when you apply for a divorce after your spouse has deserted you for three years, or has been of unsound mind for five years, or has been so repeatedly cruel that the action has reached the courts. I suggest the bill is not only right, from the standpoint of what it sets out to do, but it will be just, as an act, for what it will accomplish.

The second reason why I support this bill is that the public is unquestionably ready for it. I am in no position, of course, to speak for opinion within the Province of Quebec, but I will come back to that in a moment. I am perfectly satisfied that the people of Newfoundland would welcome such grounds if they were available to them, and I am completely convinced, because the General Council of the United Church of Canada has adopted a resolution approving similar grounds, that the majority of Canadians in other provinces are with us, too.

The third reason why I support this bill is one which, I am sure, will find response in the conscience of most, if not all, members of this house.

I refer to the fact that we find ourselves in the unhappy position of parading before the Divorce Committee a number of citizens who have found lying and collusion to be the better of two miserably bitter alternatives. We know it exists, even though we cannot always sort out who is lying and who is an honest petitioner. But I think we would all sleep a little better if we knew that those who were living with intolerable cruelty, those who have been deserted, or those who appear to be shackled forever to a person of unsound mind, could come before this house and the courts of the other provinces, without having to consider that the inequities of our law might drive them to a degrading and unlawful subterfuge.

Let me now put on my Newfoundland hat.

The honourable Senator Roebuck has said that he will move that this bill be referred to a committee, and he has said that if it is moved that these grounds be extended to Quebec and Newfoundland he will be delighted to vote for it. Let me say at once that I shall support any such amendment, and I believe the sooner it is introduced the better. We tend to make ourselves the laughing stock of the whole country if we broaden the grounds for eight provinces but pussyfoot for fear of offending Quebec or Newfoundland.

Take my word for it, honourable senators, you will not be offending the good people of Newfoundland if you extend to those petitioners who must come before this house the same degree of relief that you extend to residents of the so-called common law provinces.

As the honourable Senator Roebuck has pointed out, what we are actually trying to do is avoid passing laws which might be deemed oppressive to the Province of Quebec.

As I said earlier, it is not my place to speak for the Province of Quebec. We have already had indications from some honourable senators from that province that they would appear to support such an amendment.

I am going to put one thought before you in this regard. If we believe in the extension of these grounds as a majority—and I think we do—is it not less hypocritical to propose from the outset that they apply to cases which come before the Senate, and see what the reaction is from Quebec?

In my view, it is better to phrase this bill as we honestly believe it should be phrased for all Canadians and let the Province of Quebec opt out if it will. As it stands now, we are, in effect, opting out for them before we know how they really stand. To me this is an abrogation of our responsibility, both as senators and Canadians. If the laws we believe to be right for all are altered or subtracted from before they are even presented, in the belief that a province might object, we are letting the people of that province down because we are not giving them a chance to decide for themselves.

There is a very important principle at stake here, and the principle can be briefly stated.

No federal legislation should be drafted in such a way that it denies to some Canadians rights or privileges which the federal body feels, as a majority, belong to the majority of Canadians. The onus for denying these rights or privileges should be placed squarely on the shoulders of those who would deny them. I like the sound of that: perhaps it will become known as "Baird's Law", and I can write a book about it and become famous as Professor Parkinson became with his law!

Honourable senators, I seriously believe the principle is a valid one. Of course, we can always amend as we proceed, as we indeed may in this case, and it may therefore be argued that the safeguard is always there. It has been said that we do not wish to appear to be "forcing" anything on any province. Can we really be accused of "forcing" if we include Quebec and Newfoundland at the outset and ask them to amend themselves "out" instead of "in"?

I am not trying to quibble. I am laying down a fine distiction which I feel should guide us in matters of this kind in the future. This, after all, is the Senate of Canada, and I maintain that we have a duty to all the people to put the interests of all Canadians first, whether we are framing legislation ourselves or passing on legislation framed in some other place.

Since it is my view that the interests of all Canadians, including those of Quebec and of my own province, are served by the extension of these grounds, I would ask that the honourable Senator Roebuck consider, as Senator Hollett has suggested, inclusion in this bill, in the definition of the word "court", the Divorce Committee of the Senate of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the honourable Senator Baird a question. I have put the same question to Senator Roebuck, but I do not think he was in a position to answer for the Province of Newfoundland.

Having heard this speech, I wish to ask Senator Baird if he knows of any valid reason why his province, since it joined Confederation in 1949, did not request the federal Government to delegate its powers to the provincial courts. If he knows of any valid reason, I would like to hear it.

Hon. Mr. Baird: The suggestion is that there are so few divorce cases in Newfoundland that we hardly thought it worthwhile.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I have a supplementary question.

If that province had requested that the federal Parliament delegate its powers to provincial courts, the provisions of this bill would apply to them. The second way it can apply to the province is that, if both Quebec and Newfoundland are excluded, nothing would prevent the Province of Newfoundland from asking that its provincial courts have jurisdiction to hear divorce actions, and use these four grounds. I think that is all Newfoundland could ask.

Hon. Mr. Baird: I think that is what I have proposed in my speech.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I do not think my friend has proposed that. He has proposed something tantamount to this Parliament imposing its views on those two provinces.

Hon. Mr. Baird: No. It is to be at their own request, if they wish it.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Irvine, debate adjourned.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL TO REPEAL—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot moved the second reading of Bill S-22, to repeal the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I will be very brief, because there are three more items to come, and I hope that after a few remarks, you will not object if I adjourn this debate.

To save time now, this Bill S-22, is the same bill as C-143, which is being sponsored in the House of Commons by Mr. Real Caouette, M.P.

After I mentioned to the party that the redistribution bill of the session before last was unsatisfactory and should be repealed, I suggested that the Senate should do the work. Naturally, the Senate would be competent to do that work, as it is an impartial body. You, my honourable colleagues, come from all sections of the country and are familiar with the geography of each constituency, and you would make a report that would be satisfactory to all.

But after having discussed the matter with Mr. Caouette and with other members of the House of Commons and of the Senate, we came to the conclusion that it was a much easier thing to recommend that the act should be repealed, that the maps published and tabled by the commissioners should be declared null and void, that the same thing should be said of their reports, and that new maps should be drafted by a committee of the House of Commons, which should report to the Speaker of that House. That is the bill.

But in the preamble something very important is mentioned: it is that out of 265 members of the other house, 158 members of all political parties and groups coming from all parts of Canada have objected to redistribution made by the commission. It seems quite unusual that such a large number of members of the House of Commons have shown their dissatisfaction with this work, which has been very costly, as Senator Choquette pointed out, and which would create animosity throughout the land.

I am not going to repeat to you, honourable colleagues, what I said here on February 23 or 24, as you are familiar with the question, and I want to bring your attention to another matter before adjourning the debate.

I would like, with your leave, to place some names on the record. Yesterday I referred to a publication which bears the arms of Canada but which does not bear the name of the Queen's Printer. It does not seem to have been printed by the Printing Bureau, but nevertheless I accept it as being official. It contains the names of the members of the other House who have protested against the redistribution. Some of the names have been duplicated in the copies of the protests published in the Votes and Proceedings. So, I asked my secretary to write each name on a separate piece of paper and arrange them in alphabetical order so as to remove those names which had been duplicated. I have here the alphabetical list containing 158 names, and comprising 60 Liberals, including two former cabinet ministers; 72 Progressive Conservatives, including eight former cabinet ministers; Mr. T. C. Douglas, Leader of the New Democratic Party and ten of his supporters; Mr. Robert N. Thompson, M.P., and two of his supporters; Mr. Real Caouette and eight others who belong to his group; and then there is one Independent Liberal and one Independent Conservative.

I wonder, honourable senators, if I may have your leave to have that list printed as part of this speech. I would like the names to be printed in alphabetical order and in two columns rather than in paragraphs.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN COMMONS GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as previously announced, the Minister of Finance will deliver his Budget Speech in the other place this evening at 8 o'clock. May I be permitted to remind honourable senators that none but senators will be admitted to the Senate gallery of the House of Commons on that occasion. This step is being taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many senators as possible. In this manner, senators will not be excluded from the gallery because of many of the spaces being occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

May I add that such instructions were first issued in 1931 by the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable P. E. Blondin, and this practice has been followed ever since by successive Speakers.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Saltsman be substituted for that of Mr. Schreyer on the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

HON. M. GRATTAN O'LEARY

RETIREMENT AS PRESIDENT, OTTAWA JOURNAL

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, with the indulgence of the Senate, I would call attention to the retirement of our distinguished colleague Senator M. Grattan O'Leary from the presidency of the Ottawa Journal. The honourable senator from Carleton began his career with the Journal fifty-five years ago. The year 1911 has bitter memories for people on this side of the house, but the fact that our colleague began his career as newspaperman in that year has contributed also, in my opinion, to make it a noteworthy year.

In the intervening half century as a "journalist"—a term which G. K. Chesterton used to describe himself and the profession of letters, which he and Senator O'Leary have both adorned—Senator O'Leary has known the great and the near great both here and abroad. He has witnessed especially "the cut and thrust of parliamentary discussion." He has seen men reach the heights of statesmanship and he has been inspired thereby. He has watched the less attractive performances of Parliament without losing ever his love for Parliament and his optimism for the triumph of the parliamentary process. If Senator O'Leary writes an autobiography—I hope he will—I am sure it will be "bright with names that men remember, loud with names that men forget."

The editorial pages of the Journal, particularly during election campaigns, have seldom been my favorite political authority. Nevertheless, the reputation of the Journal, developed under men such as P. D. Ross, E. Norman Smith and our colleague Senator O'Leary, has made it one of Canada's impressive enterprises in the field of enlightened journalism. I would add to that the name of Martin Burrell, the former Librarian of Parliament, and others who were part of the literary climate it generated. That tradition remains. In the eyes of experienced Parliamentarians, Senator O'Leary was and remains a realist. Few of us will forget the defence he made last session of the practice of appointing to this house persons of varied political experience. For me there was an aftermath to that speech, for afterwards the father of our Parliament, the gentleman from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power), accosted me in the antechamber of the Senate—and I feel "accosted" is the appropriate word—and said in a loud and somewhat belligerent voice, "Connolly, after hearing that speech, O'Leary has become my leader." So far as I know he has never recanted, Mr. Speaker.

Symbolically, our friend from Carleton is in Parliament forever—and this is even better than an appointment to the Senate—for his features, along with those of our beloved colleague Senator Charlie Bishop, are carved in the stone of the Hall of Fame. But Senator O'Leary is no man of stone; his warm Irish heart and his capacity for friendship are too great for that.

I read last week that when he was appointed to be Editor Emeritus of the Journal he asked, "What on earth is an editor emeritus?" Perhaps he has since found out, but he need not search very far to understand that here we recognize him as "orator excellentissimus".

For years I have shared with him a high regard for the historical and political writings of Justin McCarthy, a longtime member of the Mother of Parliaments, and not only because McCarthy too was of Irish descent. McCarthy once wrote these words of John Morley:

> John Morley proved from his very first effort that he was of the House as well as in it. I have heard him make great platform speeches, and I think he comes nearer to the highest order of eloquence when addressing an ordinary political meeting than even when addressing the House. But it is quite certain that at the present time, the House... has no member who can more completely command its attention.

I apply that language with, I am sure, the commendation of all honourable senators to our colleague from Carleton.

Last week when I quoted Maurice Baring in my references to Senator Lambert, Senator O'Leary sent me a little note in which he referred to a line of Baring's which was the title of a book he wrote on that romantic and mysterious person, Mary Queen of Scots. The line reads, "In my end is my beginning."

I say to him that the end of his presidency of the Journal is, we would hope, the beginning of greater opportunities in his public life, and I personally would add, particularly in the field of letters.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, when Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) rose to speak he intimated that it was not necessary for this matter to develop into a debate. However, I wish to say a few words about our good friend Senator Gratton O'Leary, and I am pleased that the subject has been introduced by the Leader of the Government.

May I say at once that this is a matter which I feel most inadequate to deal with and, that being so, of necessity my remarks will be brief. Moreover, as you know, it is difficult for a mere Englishman to follow an Irishman at any time in any undertaking, and particularly in making a speech.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Especially about the Irish.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: And, as the Leader of the Government says, especially when he is speaking about another Irishman. It is just impossible to do justice to the subject. Moreover, I have not adequate command of the language.

I recall reading the other day an editorial based on the fact that Senator O'Leary had retired, and it spoke about his command of the English language. It also stated that only an Irishman can speak good English. Yet I am again handicapped.

I agree with what my good Irish friend Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) said of our mutual Irish friend Senator O'Leary. To my mind, to say more would be to try to paint the lily—and by that I do not mean to call Senator O'Leary a lily. However, I wish to repeat some of Senator O'Leary's own words recently quoted in an editorial in the Montreal Gazette. In addressing himself to what he considered to be some of the qualities of good leadership, he said:

> We need leaders, trained in the humanities, trained in those moral and spiritual things that have been our stay in the past and which, inescapably, must be our stay in the future. Civilization is something more than superior plumbing.

The Montreal Gazette, speaking of Senator O'Leary, commented:

> Such a leader he has been over the many years.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I am sorry that Senator O'Leary has retired from the editorship of the Ottawa Journal which, as my good friend Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) has said, is an excellent paper. I can think of many editors I would sooner have seen retire from the editorial chair. I have always admired him as an editor and for his many other qualities. He was a good editor. He published a paper which, to my mind, was the best and was always on the side of truth and right.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Except during elections.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May his successor follow in his footsteps. I do not know whether he made the paper great, or whether the paper made him great. In either case, an excellent job was done.

On his many other activities, both physical and mental, I have not sufficient time to comment. He now honours the Senate with his presence here, and I am sure I speak for all of us when I say: May he do so for many years to come.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, you will not take it amiss if I add my few words of tribute to the excellent presentations made by Senator Connolly and Senator Brooks. A good many years have come and gone since I first met Senator O'Leary. I have always admired his editorials in the Journal, and very often disagreed with them.

He had the faculty of clear and lucid expression, but I may say to this house that his capacities in the field of journalism paled into insignificance when one got him on the golf course and he missed a four-foot putt.

I join with all of you in a tribute to Senator O'Leary. He was a great journalist. He is a very useful member of this house, and my hope is that he may long continue to adorn it.

Hon. Jean François Pouliot: Honourable senators, believe it or not, as a regular reader of the Ottawa Journal for 45 years, I must say a word of thanks for the most instructive and pleasant reading that newspaper offered me. In particular, I have always found the Journal editorial page lively. It was always interesting and informative. When I crossed swords with the Journal, as I very often did, I found that the sword of Senator O'Leary was always a rapier and never a dagger. Frequently we disagreed, but when I was really in trouble quite often it was the Journal that came to my rescue, and I am thankful to Senator O'Leary for that.

I congratulate him also on his having followed the tradition of Mr. P. D. Ross and Mr. Norman Smith, senior, and to have contributed so wisely and in such an efficient manner to the formation of his successors, all brilliant journalists like Mr. I. Norman Smith, Mr. James McCook and Mr. Richard Jackson, whom I know particularly well. One realizes that if they had not been under the guidance of Senator O'Leary they would not have made such a success of their careers.

Senator O'Leary is one of the best informed Canadians on the history of this country, of England, and particularly of dear old Ireland. What he says is always so timely, so well and so clearly said, that we keep it in mind.

I shall not repeat what has been said about our most distinguished colleague, but I express the thanks of the Pouliot family who have been so well entertained by reading the Ottawa Journal for many years. I wish Senator O'Leary to be happy. I hope he will keep an office in the building of the Ottawa Journal, where he will remain in a position to give us some of his thoughts and comments occasionally. He will now have more leisure for reading, and although he will be free from this responsibility, I know that his mind will always be active and that all the personnel of the Journal will benefit from it, as will its readers too.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I have been sitting here during the last few minutes pinching myself to make sure that I had not died.

Of course, I wish to thank Senator Connolly, an old, old friend, and my own leader (Hon. Mr. Brooks), my very long-time friend, Senator Crerar, and Senator Pouliot, for the kindly, flattering inaccuracies of the eulogies they pronounced upon me.

I must say that Senator Connolly struck a very sensitive nerve when he said I had a love for Parliament. I was brought up to love and to reverence Parliament. In the little Irish Gaspé community in which I lived we learned to love Parliament, not by reading the debates and the discussions of the House of Commons of Canada; we learned to love Parliament and the great figures of Parliament by reading the debates that went on at Westminster over the question of Irish home rule. In fact, I knew far more about Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Bright, Mr. Parnell and Mr. John Redmond when I was a boy than I knew about Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Robert Borden and even Sir John A. Macdonald.

But at last, after perhaps too long a wait, I came to Ottawa to join the Ottawa Journal. I arrived here at one o'clock, and instead of going to the Journal office to see that my position was there, I wended my way up to the old Parliament Buildings and sat in the gallery to see and hear Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden. I sat there so long that I endangered my job at the Journal, because I did not get there until 5 o'clock and they thought I was not coming.

Actually, if I had my way I would try to find some manner or means by which our public schools, high schools and universities would tell our young people more about the glories of Parliament, and about the meaning of Parliament. Personally, I am saddened whenever an occasion arises to besmirch or belittle Parliament in the eyes of our people. I do not join with those, and I cannot abide those, who go about in our country belittling and downgrading Parliament.

I remember years and years ago hearing that very gifted Englishwoman, Miss Rebecca West, speaking on the Mother of Parliaments. She told of the parties and the men who had come there down the centuries, of how they had fallen into decay and passed into extinction, and of how other parties and other men with new ideas, new hopes and a new social consciousness had come after them, and she said that with all there was to be said against them there was this to be said for them, that most of them, in all parties, had cared a great deal for the common good.

Honourable senators, that is true of our own country. We have had good men in this Parliament and bad, and some of the pages of history they have made for us we would gladly wipe out. But when the last word of censure has been spoken, when everything has been said against them, it still remains true to say that most of them throughout our history did care a great deal for the common good.

Those who hold differently betray ignorance, and I think they invite peril. They invite the fate that has come to so many areas of the earth where because of cynicism, indifference and a betrayal of democracy, we see now that saddest of all things in the human story, the epitaph of a vanished freedom.

Honourable senators, I do thank you for this testimony of courtesy, affection and kindness. From all sides of this house I have received nothing but courtesy and kindness since coming here. I thank you, and I hope I shall always be worthy of being with you in this chamber.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

TOURIST LITERATURE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. John J. MacDonald: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, may I say that I understand that every honourable senator has received a copy of the tourist literature on Prince Edward Island. The booklet is much appreciated, and for it a bouquet should go to the honourable Senator Inman.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Leave having been given to proceed first with Item No. 7 on the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. M. Benidickson moved the second reading of Bill S-23, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this amending bill will not be unfamiliar to a great number of senators, inasmuch as it has appeared in similar form at three-year intervals on several occasions.

Perhaps the explanatory note in Bill S-23 explains the purpose of the bill better than I can. It reads:

> The purpose of this bill is to extend the duration of the Export and Import Permits Act for a further period of three years.

The necessity to have any control over exports and imports may be repugnant to some of us, but honourable senators will be aware that during the war, under the War Measures Act, there was control on this measure of trade. In 1947 a statute was introduced to supersede the authority under the War Measures Act, and that statute was superseded in the session of 1953-54 by a new act, the act which we are now proposing to amend again, by giving a three-year extension of authority in respect to certain matters of export to a certain number of designated countries throughout the world and authority to regulate imports under certain circumstances as outlined in the basic bill of 1953-54.

This is exactly the same type of amending bill as was presented to Parliament and explained in this chamber on June 5, 1963. The honourable Senator Hugessen explained the necessity for continuing for another three-year period the authority that this basic statute authorizes.
