I have indicated that the basic bill permits the Governor in Council to make regulations with respect to setting out certain commodities and products that are subject to export control. It permits the Governor in Council to designate certain areas to which export must be under control and it indicates under certain circumstances certain commodities that must be under import control subject to order in council.

Since honourable senators acceded to the amending bill of 1963 there have been presented to Parliament three annual reports of the administration of this act by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The reports for 1963, 1964 and 1965, which have been tabled and are available to all honourable senators, indicate any changes by order in council affecting those particular products which may be under export control, the countries under area control, or import items under control. Broadly speaking, these changes have been relatively few. Nevertheless, many of us may feel some concern about the necessity for this type of governmental control over trade. On that account, some reassurance may be derived from the fact that when the 1953 bill was introduced, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce was able to tell the House of Commons that the use of this kind of authority had been reduced.

In 1948, under the previous act, 113,094 permits were issued by the Government. In 1953, when this new basic statute was introduced, that number had been reduced to 26,335 permits. The report for the calendar year 1965, which has been given to us, shows that the number of export permits has been further reduced to 8,182.

Considering our vast trade, that is an assurance as to the pronounced trend towards reduction in this type of bureaucratic authority and the necessity for it. There has been, of course, a continuing need to exercise control over certain strategic products which we have for export, and honourable senators will recognize that some governmental jurisdiction and supervision is necessary in such cases.

During the last few years very few formal revisions of orders in council were made with respect to the commodities under export control, the designated countries subject to area control, or the commodities under import control.

On the assumption that honourable senators will not expect me to analyse the three annual reports, 1963, 1964 and 1965, which are public knowledge, they might expect properly from me at this time some information about one or two changes made under the authority of this act since the 1965 calendar year report was made available to us. Before I refer to those items which would be current in the calendar year 1966, I may say that a change was made with respect to the area control.

In December 1965 six products—tobacco, chromium, certain manufactured meat products, and some others—relating to trade with Rhodesia were put under import control.

Honourable senators, in fairness to this chamber I should remind you of a point which does not appear in the 1965 report to which you have access. On February 3, 1966 the Minister of External Affairs made a statement in the House of Commons respecting our trade relationships with Rhodesia. He said that, in addition to these six commodities being subjected to import control, there was being introduced, as of that date, a general control of all products. On March 23 of this year, the Minister of Trade and Commerce announced in the House of Commons that further restrictions were being imposed under this act on the import of hides and related leather products.

Honourable senators, in 1963 when an identical extension of the authority of the act for three years came before the Senate, it was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. I believe the Leader of the Government feels that it would be appropriate to follow the same procedure on this occasion.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It is desirable to do so.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: If that is the wish of the house, I propose to make a motion in similar terms on this occasion.

The last comprehensive list of products subject to export control became effective about January 1, 1965. There has been no change since then, apart from the alterations which I have mentioned.

Basically, our control on exports relates to strategic items, a term easy of comprehension by all honourable senators. In addition, there is an area of commodities subject to intergovernmental treaty or agreement where, through NATO or some other intergovernmental conference or negotiation, a method of stability has been arrived at to which Canada has given agreement. Products of that kind then come under export control.

Some products remain on the export control list in order that we may maintain our own requirements on matters of defence. We do not restrict our rights under this statute simply to the control of strategic items or materials for defence. Some items are under export control because of our own domestic need. They may be in short supply and there may be such a commotion in obtaining them that the circumstances justify the Government's right to ensure that proper control of export extends over these products of ours.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I desire to congratultae my honourable friend, Senator Benidickson, on his first speech in the chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Of course I have heard him speak on many occasions in the House of Commons, and it is a further pleasure to hear him speak now in this chamber.

This short bill merely extends the life of the Export and Import Permits Act. That act, as Senator Benidickson has said, succeeded the 1954 Emergency Powers Act, which was familiar to us, especially on account of its extensive use during the Korean War.

He also pointed out there were three things provided for in this bill. It restricts the export of strategic goods; it allows us to set up what might be called the area control list; and it controls the import of agricultural goods into Canada so as to protect our farmers and agriculturists.

As Canadians and as members of the Commonwealth, we are particularly interested in the way this bill differs from those of 1960 and 1963 insofar as our relations with Rhodesia are concerned, a country which has been indirectly a part of the Commonwealth through Great Britain. I am not going to discuss to any extent whether the Rhodesian situation has been properly handled or not. We all have our own opinions on that subject. But I would say that my personal view is that it has been very poorly handled by the Prime Minister of Great Britain and by the Premier of Southern Rhodesia, if I may call him such. I feel they have both been very stubborn. It is most unfortunate that the situation there should be as it is today. As to Canada's part, I do not think we have improved the situation in any way. I read recently that our High Commissioner is being recalled for consultations on the Rhodesian issue. We will wait very anxiously to see what is the purpose of recalling Mr. Chevrier at this time and also to see what the results will be.

The honourable gentleman spoke about Canada's restricting trade and sanctions. I know that as far as Canada's trade with Southern Rhodesia is concerned, it has made absolutely no difference at all. Other sanctions were imposed on Rhodesia which are not having much effect either. He said that we were prohibiting the import of goods from Rhodesia, but we have never imported from Rhodesia anything of consequence. I read in the press the other day that a tobacco auction was being held in Salisbury at which they received over $70 million in revenue from this commodity. It is also understood that the sanctions on the importation of oil into Rhodesia have not been successful.

As I said a moment ago, this is a matter which could be debated at length, and we all have our own opinions on the subject. For instance, I believe that the Prime Minister of Great Britain and many people in other parts of the world, including the United States, think that the four million blacks in Rhodesia should have a vote. There are 300,000 whites in Rhodesia, and they are the people who are more or less governing the country. But there are many people who have watched the development of the new nations in Africa and who are very much concerned as to whether one can give wholesale votes to people who are uneducated and apparently wholly unfit for democratic government. There is hardly a government in Africa today that has not had internal trouble since they became independent.

However, as I said a few moments ago, we may have our High Commissioner, Mr. Chevrier, looking into this problem. The instructions which he will receive and what will be achieved thereby will be of great interest not only to Parliament but to all the people of Canada. If this bill goes before the committee or if there is further debate in the Senate, I hope this matter will be thoroughly discussed, because we have decided to play such an important part, and that whatever action is taken will be taken for the best as far as Rhodesia and the other members of the Commonwealth are concerned. It is a very serious problem not only for the new emerging countries but for other countries as well.

I have nothing further to say on this bill. It is necessary that we extend the time. We are living in times when there are difficulties all over the world. We cannot send goods to the Russo-Sino area without permit, which is perfectly right because we consider those countries might make difficulties for us. We cannot send goods to Viet Nam or that part of the world. It has been decided in the other place that this bill is necessary, as are the regulations under it, and I have no objection at all to its passage.

Before closing I would like to ask the honourable sponsor of the bill if he could give us some idea of the cost of imports to Canada from Rhodesia and the value of our exports to that country.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: I regret to say that I cannot give those figures at this time. I felt this information would be elicited when we have officials from the Department of Trade and Commerce before us in committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Benidickson, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 3, 1966

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of Bill C-157, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1967.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is known as Appropriation Bill No. 3. In view of the fact that it is the first bill of interim supply to be introduced during this session, I feel I should make some general observations which may be useful to have on the record, particularly for the information of some of our new members. I shall try to deal with this matter very quickly.

As honourable senators are aware, at the beginning of each fiscal year or thereabouts the main Estimates are tabled in the house. The Estimates for 1966-67 were tabled here on February 22 and were referred to the Finance Committee. These are the Estimates contained in what is known as the Blue Book, which I now hold in my hand, and they total some $7,950 million-odd. They contain the foreseeable financial requirements of the Government for the coming fiscal year.

In the other place, as honourable senators are aware, the Estimates are examined by the members in great detail. They now have a system there, however, by which the Estimates are referred to various committes in the hope that the work will be done in a more businesslike and speedy way, with a view to giving the various items closer scrutiny.

Without patting ourselves on the back too much, I think the procedure the Commons has adopted in this respect has been copied to some extent from the treatment we normally give bills in this chamber. As I understand it, the members there will be able to discuss items in the Estimates in committee with officials from the departments concerned. When the final Estimates are passed, the bill passes this house too and the final appropriation bill is thereby enacted.

As I have said, when the main Estimates reach us and are tabled, they are referred to the Finance Committee; in this house the approach is vastly different from that adopted in the House of Commons. For many years our finance Committee has been following the practice of making special studies under the successive chairmanships of Senator Crerar, Senator Hawkins, Senator Emerson, and Senator Leonard. Honourable senators will find that the reports of the Finance Committee have dealt with certain aspects of the fiscal problems of the Government of Canada. Speaking only from my own experience I say to new senators that I have found it a source of great help to be thoroughly familiar with the reports that have been made over the years on the various studies conducted by the committee.

Perhaps I should add that in theory there is almost unlimited power vested in this house to deal with the Estimates, with one exception, namely, that we cannot increase the imposte made upon the public. It has been argued that we cannot decrease the amount of any item, and the leaders on both sides of this house have always resisted changes in the Estimates on the ground that such changes would conflict with what is known as ways and means. So, generally speaking, the Senate really makes very little change in the Estimates after they have been passed by the other place.

Hon. Mr. Farris: That is not on constitutional grounds.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No, I believe it is a matter more of house practice than anything else. In that respect may I be permitted to divert the house and tell a story about a personal experience?

As honourable senators probably know, Canada has been designated as the country providing the chairman of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association this year, and I had the honour to be elected to that post at the annual meeting in Wellington, New Zealand, in December.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I can assure honourable senators it was not because of any particular virtue on my part; it was just because of a desire on the part of the Government to have a member of the cabinet do all that was possible to make this coming meeting a success—and after Easter there will be an opportunity to discuss this matter in greater detail. However, having been elected, and being in that part of the world and with no expectation of ever going back—incidentally, I feel lucky I ever got out—I thought I should make some courtesy calls on the presidents of the individual Commonwealth Parliamentary Associations.

The first president I visited was in Canberra. Let me hasten to add, honourable senators, I could not have received a warmer or more interesting welcome than I did in the capital of Australia. On the day of my arrival their Senate, which is elective, had just concluded rejecting a financial measure of the Government that had arisen out of the budget, and they had a constitutional crisis on their hands. Of course I was on the side of the Senate. They solved it, as the Australians in their easy-going way do. There were two objectionable sections in the bill in question, so they proceeded to withdraw the bill and break it into two parts. They put one objectionable section in one bill and the other objectionable section in a second, quickly passed the two bills through the lower house and sent them to the Senate. Then the senators who were obdurate with respect to one section voted against that bill but voted for the other, and vice versa. So in that way they solved their constitutional problem.

So much for the main Estimates. Now I think a word should be said about the supplementary Estimates.

Certainly, large amounts of money are involved in the supplementary Estimates, but they can generally be described as the requirements of the Government to cover unforeseen contingencies—sometimes disasters resulting from acts of God, sometimes, disasters resulting from poor estimating on the part both of the ministers and of the officials. If I may be permitted, I shall use as a concrete illustration an occurrence from the war years when I was with the Honourable Angus L. Macdonald as his assistant at the Navy.

One morning he was asked to change the amount of an estimate for a building the Navy required, and the amount of the increase was very substantial. Being a Scot, this infuriated him and he said to the officials responsible, "Some day when I am asked to make an increase like this I am going to refuse and I am going to insist on a building going up with only three sides to it as a monument to the kind of estimating that is done in this department."

I do not say that happens often and I do not attach any blame, but I do say that supplementary Estimates are required from time to time by the Government of the day. They come before us in due course and, as was done the other day, they are referred to our Finance Committee for consideration.

Interim Supply, with which we are concerned today, is another matter. Of course, Parliament is supreme with regard to expenditures proposed by the Government, and the historic control of the purse; the power of the purse which was wrested originally from the kings has been jealously guarded by Parliament, and particularly the lower house. The consideration of the main Estimates in that place usually takes a long time, but the expenditures of the Government, whether the Estimates have been approved or not, continue from day to day as money is required to pay those day-to-day accounts. Parliament by frequent interim supply allows certain percentages of the total requirements of each and every department to be met as the occasion requires. Usually these allotments or allocations are made in terms of months, and we ask for one, two or three months' supply. That is what this bill does. It is an interim supply bill for two months, for the months of April and May 1966, and it asks for two-twelfths or one-sixth of the total Estimates of all the departments. This is contained in clause 2 of the bill that is before us. The amount of one-sixth of the total of these Estimates is a little over $817 million.

In addition to one-sixth of the amount estimated to be required by each department sought to be approved by this bill, there are certain departments of government at certain times of the year which have unusual money requirements, and these special requirements are detailed in Schedules B to E of this bill. I invite honourable senators to look first at Schedule A which is in respect of the Department of Transport. These amounts are in addition, as I have said, to the two months' supply that is granted generally by clause 2.

Schedule A asks for $408,000, being nine-twelfths of the amount of Vote 103 in the estimates of the Department of Transport for the National Harbours Board. This amount, as the schedule indicates, has to do with the Canadian Universal and International Exhibition in Montreal, and the money is needed for urgent spending required to complete certain work there. This work, I am informed, covers the widening of McKay pier and the filling and grading of a parking lot for Expo '67. The work has to be finished by July 1, 1966; it is obvious, therefore, that the money has to be voted at this time if the contractor is to be accommodated.

In Schedule B the amount proposed to be granted is $3,382,966.67, which is four-twelfths of the total of certain items for the Production and Marketing Branch of the Department of Agriculture and for the Atomic Energy Control Board. The total amount of the item for the Plant and Plant Products Division of the Production and Marketing Branch of the Department of Agriculture is $8,148,900. The bulk of this vote is for the cost-sharing program of assistance to livestock producers for the purchase of feed during the year ended March 31, 1966. Provision is also made for contributions to British Columbia for losses suffered by the tree fruit and grape producers during the year ended last November 30, and for the barberry eradication program in Ontario and Quebec, and for the agricultural lime assistance program. The bulk of this vote, I am informed, covers time already passed. By the end of May it is expected that claims totalling some $4 million, or about half the vote, will have been processed for payment, and the others will follow very shortly.

With respect to the item of $2 million for the Atomic Energy Control Board, being for grants for research and investigations with respect to atomic energy, this vote provides for grants for research projects carried out at universities. It is customary to pay 50 per cent of these grants in the early part of the fiscal year to allow the universities to make the necessary plans.

May I refer honourable senators now to Schedule C which proposes that the sum of $19,582,100, being three-twelfths of the total of the several items in the schedule, be released. In the Department of Finance there are contingencies for the whole of the Government service, and this vote is to make up for underestimates of salary requirements resulting from improvements in recruiting and salary increases on the one hand, and for unforeseen non-paylist requirements on the other. An additional proportion is requested to meet anticipated additional salary requirements which were approved too late for inclusion in the main Estimates, particularly the interim increases approved for the A and B groups in the Civil Service.

In respect of the National Research Council, including the Medical Research Council, an amount of $41 million is proposed for scholarships and grants in aid of research. The awards to be made by the National Research Council for scientific research amount to $28 million-plus, and those to be made by the Medical Research Council amount to $12,350,000. It is usual to pay 50 per cent of the amount required under these items at this time of year.

Schedule C also contains an item in the amount of $22 million for the Canadian Maritime Commission in connection with the construction of commercial and fishing vessels, in accordance with the regulations that have been laid down. This vote covers the program of subsidies by the federal Government of 35 per cent of the cost of constructing commercial carriers for which applications were received prior to February 1965, and subsidies of 50 per cent of the cost of constructing steel trawlers. This is a continuing program; there is, therefore, no time lag between the beginning of the fiscal year and the due date for the various progress payments. I am informed that some $9.2 million, or five-twelfths of the vote, will be payable by May 31.

Under the National Harbours Board, Vote 104, it is proposed that approval be given for the payment of the deficit expected to be incurred in the calendar year 1966 in the operation of the Jacques Cartier bridge in Montreal. By May 31 five months' payments will be due.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: What is the amount of the deficit?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The amount of that deficit is $328,400. By May 31 five months' payments will be due on that, and this interim supply bill provides funds to meet the commitment.

I refer honourable senators to Schedule D whereby an amount of $959,816.67 is requested. This is two-twelfths of the amount required under Vote 20, for the general administration of the House of Commons. This vote provides for the estimates of the Clerk and the Sergeant-at-Arms. The reason why this amount is proposed to be allocated at this time is because the amount of the vote is calculated for a session rather than for a calendar year.

Schedule E deals with certain departments, and requests approval for the spending of $27,945,245.83, which is one-twelfth of the total of several items under several departments.

The first of those is the Department of External Affairs, and this vote covers the cost of the representation Canada maintains abroad. It covers the appointment and fixing of salaries of high commissioners, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, consuls, secretaries and staffs. These are not capital expenditures. When these funds are released they will be allocated to the many posts abroad on a one-twelfth one-month basis, because it is impossible to estimate which posts will require more than one-twelfth per month. This additional proportion is requested to avoid having to examine the accounts of all the posts periodically to meet payments due at some posts in excess of the general proportion.

Under the Department of Justice, Vote 1 totals $2,719,950, and an additional one-twelfth of that amount is requested. This includes the cost of the operation of the office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy, and gratuities to the widows or such dependents as may be approved by the Treasury Board of judges who die while in office, also it gives authority to make recoverable advances for the administration of justice on behalf of the Government of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory.

In the same Schedule E, under Mines and Technical Surveys, an additional one-twelfth of the $8,589,400 for field and air surveys, mapping and aeronautical charting work is requested. This is for air photography, maintaining boundary range lights, and the like. The work is normally carried on in the spring of the year when the demands are particularly heavy.

Likewise, an additional one-twelfth of item 25, Marine Surveys and Research, in the amount of $9,181,200 is requested. This is for administration, operation and maintenance including Canada's fee for membership in the International Hydrographic Bureau.

Item 35, for the Geological Research section—this again is work done for the most part in the summer time. This item is for research in the geological sciences, Canada's share of the cost of the Geological Liaison Office, British Commonwealth Scientific Conference, London, England, Canada's fee for membership in the International Union of Geological Sciences and $150,000 for grants in aid of geological research in Candian universities. The total amount requested is an additional one-twelfth of the $6,927,000 set out in the item.

Item 55, under Geographic Surveys and Research, in the amount of $962,300, is for administration, operation and maintenance, including the expenses of the Canadian Permanent Committee on Geographical names, the National Advisory Committee on Geographical Research and the National Committee for Canada of the International Geographical Union, Canada's fee for membership in the International Geographical Union, and grants as detailed in the Estimates. Here, again, an additional one-twelfth is required.

There is also sought an additional one-twelfth of the $2,638,000 provided for Research in Astronomy and Geophysics.

There is a further request for one-twelfth of the $5,609,000 under item 70 of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, dealing with the International Executive Council of the World Power Conference, authority to make recoverable advances in amounts not exceeding in the aggregate the amount of the shares of the Province of Manitoba and of the Province of Ontario of the cost of regulating the levels of Lake of the Woods and Lac Seul, and the amount of the shares of provincial and outside agencies of the cost of hydrometric surveys, and $50,000 for grants to universities for hydrologic research.

Under "General" is a further item 85, requesting one-twelfth of the $1,695,000 allotted for non-capital expenses for field surveys in connection with the polar continental shelf project.

Item 41, under National Health and Welfare in the amount of $3,550,000 relates to payments made in respect of children of immigrants and settlers. This vote provides for payments during the first year after admission to Canada in respect of children not eligible for family allowances. Payments are made at the rate of $6 per month up to 10 years of age and $8 per month for ages 10 to 16. An additional one-twelfth of this item is also sought.

The latest trends of family assistance payments indicate that the immigration movement to Canada during the first two or three months of the fiscal year will be higher than forecast when this vote was made up last fall.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Will the trend continue to be higher?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There will be no difficulty about that, because the records of the Department of Immigration are matching the records of the Department of National Health and Welfare which administer the votes; and of course the payments are made to the parents of the child who is to receive the benefit of the money paid.

An additional one-twelfth of Department of National Revenue, item 5, $44,986,300 is requested. I need not tell the lawyers and accountants in this house that the first quarter of the fiscal year is a peak period for this department, which has to spend a considerable amount of money to process the various tax returns made to them.

The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, item 1, provides for a grant of $2,196,100, which covers the head office administration costs and the expenses of the Northern Co-ordination and Research Program. An additional one-twelfth of this vote is requested because in the month of May many of the payments are made of the grants in aid of northern research which is carried out in the summer.

Secretary of State, item 40, for the Centennial Commission, in the amount of $9,519,500, provides for various centennial programs of an historical, cultural and ceremonial nature. An additional one-twelfth of this vote is also requested.

Large amounts will be due early in the fiscal year for 64 trailers being constructed as centennial caravans to visit 800 towns and rural centres in 1967.

Continuing with Schedule E—I am sure this is of some oratorical interest as a recital, but I think it should go on the record—under Solicitor General, item 5, $34,769,200: an additional one-twelfth of that amount is required for administration, operation and maintenance, including compensation to discharged inmates permanently disabled while in penitentiaries. This is a non-capital vote. An additional proportion is required for the costs associated with changes in the rates of remuneration of the custodial staff.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Is that expenditure for upkeep in connection with the penitentiaries?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It is described to me as non-capital expenses of the Canadian Penitentiaries Service and for the expenses of administering the Parole Act. So I presume the amount would be for upkeep.

Hon. Mr. Farris: It reads as if the inmates were disabled while in the penitentiaries. That is an awful lot of money.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The amount is not only for that, senator, but for the general administration as well. This item, of course, will be examined in detail like all other items, and can be discussed in detail in the Senate Finance Committee.

The Department of Transport, under item 85, requests an additional one-twelfth of $466,000 to provide for administration of the Canadian Maritime Commission and the degaussing of Canadian Government ships and Canadian-owned merchant ships of from 3,000 to 20,000 gross tons, of Canadian registry or of United Kingdom registry if subject to re-transfer to Canadian registry under special inter-governmental arrangement.

It is only because I was in the Navy that I know that "degaussing" a ship means to make it less magnetic so that it does not attract things magnetic in the water.

Under the Department of Veterans Affairs, item 25, is an item of $182,403,000 for pensions for disability and death, including pensions granted under the authority of the Civilion Government Employees (War) Compensation Order P,C. 45/8848 of November 22, 1944, which shall be subject to the Pension Act; Newfoundland Special Awards, and Gallantry Awards (World War II and Special Force).

An additional proportion is requested to cover expenditures during the early months of the fiscal year. Expenditures tend to diminish as the year progresses so that during the early months of the year they remain in excess of one-twelfth per month.

In addition to the amounts allowed to be granted, as is customary in the first bill for interim supply, authority is sought for borrowing of $1 billion for the purpose of refunding various issues of securities that are made by the Government from time to time during the fiscal year. The authority for the Government to raise new money through the issue of securities must be obtained only from Parliament. At about the beginning of each fiscal year an appropriation bill like this one provides for cancellation of any unused borrowing authority under previous appropriation acts and seeks new authority for the Minister of Finance to raise new money by the issue of new securities. The terms and conditions for such borrowing are laid down by order in council from time to time, depending upon the conditions prevailing in the market.

New money raised through the issue of securities is used for financing the ordinary operations of the Government, including non-budgetary cash requirements such as loans and advances to crown corporations.

The types of securities issued by the Government include treasury bills, marketable and non-marketable bonds, including Canada Savings Bonds.

Appropriation Acts Nos. 1 and 6 of 1965 provided borrowing authority of $1,750 million. By the end of the fiscal year 1965-66, this authority will have been used to the extent of an estimated $820 million only. The Government's practice is to have available at all times sufficient unused borrowing authority to enable it to finance, for example, the unpredictable requirements of the Exchange Fund Account and to provide for other new expenditures which may be introduced. It is customary for the first appropriation bill to request, as in this case, $1 billion net new borrowing authority.

I assure honourable senators that in no instance is the total amount of any item being released by this bill.

The form in which the bill appears is the usual one for bills of this kind.

I give the assurance, although it is scarcely necessary to do so, that the passing of this bill will not prejudice the right of any senator to criticize any item in the Estimates, either here or in the Standing Committee on Finance.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Flynn, debate adjourned.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 24, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot for the second reading of Bill S-22, to repeal the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, the bill before us mentions in its preamble that 158 members of the House of Commons have protested against the redistribution made by the ten commissions, one in each of the provinces of Canada. Therefore, I have 158 strong and powerful arguments for the repeal of what was done by those commissions.

Clause 1 of this bill proposes the repeal of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. Clause 2 proposes that the reports and maps made by the Commissions be declared null and void for all purposes of the law.

Clause 3 would empower a committee of the House of Commons to draw new maps and report to the honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, my original suggestion to you was that the work should be done by the Senate, which is competent and well qualified to do it to the satisfaction of Members of Parliament and of the people of Canada. However, having duscussed the matter with Mr. Réal Caouette, M.P., who agreed to sponsor this legislation in the House of Commons, we came to the conclusion that it would be much more simple and more practical to have the new redistribution made by the House of Commons itself, as it has been done for nearly a century, rather than by the Senate.

If it had been done by the Senate, a Senate committee would have to report to our honourable Speaker, who would then have had to confer with His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons, and the discussions might have been interminable.

As to why I did not protest against the redistribution legislation when it came for the approval of Parliament two years ago, my answer is obvious. At that time all parties wished to have the redistribution done as well as possible. I do not speak in a partisan way, I do not blame anyone and I say that all acted in good faith. I found the legislation absurd, but no one would have considered any objection to it then. It was accepted under the pretence that this would be an independent way of fixing the boundaries of Canadian constituencies. Ten justices of the Superior Court or courts of similar jurisdiction, with the halo of sanctity and infallibility around their heads, were selected to do the work. I could not discuss it with anyone. Nobody would have listened to me; nobody would have listened to anyone suggesting a so-called partisan redistribution made by vulgar politicians like members of the House of Commons. That is not the right expression—I do not choose that language, but I can imagine what would have been said to me at that time. I believe that the members of the House of Commons are able parliamentarians and have the confidence of their constituents. I have differred with them on many occasions, but on this occasion I want to help them against themselves.

If I did not protest when the first bill came it was precisely to give more rope in order that those who were so enthusiastic could hang themselves. They did. Now everybody sees that the work that has been done by each one of these commissions is pitiful.

There are complaints about everything; there are complaints about the names that have been changed. Imagine giving the name of an oyster to one constituency in Newfoundland! Why not use several kinds of oysters to describe a province if they feel like it? I feel it is crazy to give the name of an oyster to a constituency, but the judge who was in charge of the Prince Edward Island redistribution did so. The foolishness of this whole business is pitiful. Not only that, but in Quebec City, the capital city of the Province of Quebec, the name has been struck off and replaced by the names of streets, etc. The people are incensed about it and the papers have written long editorials to say how silly it is.

I want to be honest with you and I would like to make a suggestion to see if my proposal would be successful or not. But I have something else to say before I come to that. I have made a serious study of the whole matter: I have done some legal research and some geographical research on it.

I am familiar with redistribution because, at the request of the late Mr. Ernest Lapointe, I prepared with my secretary of that time, who was a very able person, as I have always trained them, the story of the eight redistributions in the Province of Quebec from 1855 to 1935. It is on record. I have seen some gerrymanders which were corrected ten years later by one government. But in my personal view—I have known 1,500 members of the House of Commons—I believe there is more genius in the membership of that house and they are more familiar with their own constituencies than any one judge could ever be with a whole province.

Think of it! Do you believe there is one man, however clever he may be, who could make such important decisions for a whole province, whether it be one of the Maritimes, or the Province of Quebec, or Ontario, Manitoba, one of the Prairie provinces or British Columbia? Do you think there is any judge who can do that? It is the foolishness of the new wave and of the people who thought that a judge could do that.

Honourable senators, when the Judges bill comes before us I shall have a question to ask about how many judges have been sitting on commissions rather than hearing the cases before the court. It is stupidity when you come to think of it. They like it; they are crazy about it. If you ask a chief justice or an acting chief justice whether he knows a judge who is free to take on a commission, what does he say? He says, "I will see. I will talk to my colleagues. I will consult." These are the sacramental words—"I will consult my colleagues." Then he consults no one and after a certain time he says to the Minister of Justice or the Prime Minister, "I have consulted my colleagues and there is no one available, but I will make a sacrifice and take it." Do not laugh, honourable senators, that is the way it is done. They do it and then they pontificate ponderously.

Of course, there have been very good commissions. You will forgive me if I illustrate, but all lawyers know I am telling strictly the truth. There was the commission headed by Chief Justice Robert Taschereau, and quite amazingly by Mr. Justice Kellock on the spy probe, where they defined for the first time the word patrie which had never been defined elsewhere before, and they made a very good job of it. Then there was the commission on patents and copyright which was headed by Chief Justice Ilsley, and which was remarkably well done. There was a probe on education in the Province of Nova Scotia which was very well done by my friend Justice Pottier, and there is at present a probe being carried out on criminology by a judge of great experience in criminal cases, Mr. Justice Roger Ouimet. He is an expert in these matters. He too is doing very well. But there are not so many.

There are others who know nothing, and I am at a loss to know why they did not understand the sensible arguments referred to them. They paid no attention to them. This is the case of Commissioner Paul Langlois, who was the redistribution commissioner for the Province of Quebec.

Honourable colleagues, there is no longer much sanctity around the heads of some judges, since the papers have reported to us what happened in some cases. I do not say anything against the character of the commissioner for the Province of Quebec, but I say he is dumb and has not the least degree of intelligence.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You are certainly not saying anything against him!

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: No; I tell the truth. It is unfortunate, but it must be said. I said that to him, and he replied, "Well, you complain that we understand nothing." I said, "You said so, sir; you said you understood nothing."

Now, I told you I was dissatisfied with it. What I did in the first place was to publish articles in Le Saint-Laurent of Rivière du Loup; and one day I intended to make the speech which I am delivering now, but there was an important bill to pass, or royal assent or something taking place, and I did not make it. However, with your leave I tabled the articles which had appeared in Le Saint-Laurent weekly which is published in Rivière du Loup, and they are to be found at page 179 and following of Hansard of February 23. I could not repeat all that is there; so with your consent, I put the articles on the table. They have been translated, so that my colleagues who speak French and my colleagues who speak English can take notice of them. They tell you what has happened in the ten counties from Levis to Gaspé. All the boundaries of the constituencies are like the photographs we see of lightning, they zigzag. There is not a straight line between Levis and Gaspé; all the boundaries zigzag. When I asked for some information, none was available, and the commissioner was rude to all those who were there. I was acting as solicitor for the County Council of Rivière-du-Loup.

Well, this tells you the story of three years ago, and I did not know that so many Members of Parliament would complain bitterly about the work that had been done. This was on the bill to approve redistribution as outlined in the report that was made then. The next day I continued my argument by speaking on the Speech from the Throne debate—my speech was divided between two sittings. The first day I spoke on the bill it had to be passed at once; it was important to pass it in a hurry. So, with your help I succeeded in giving you some information which you can now obtain from Hansard at the pages I mentioned. That was on February 23. The following day I explained to you what was the matter—you will also see that in Hansard—and I did it more to enlighten you and to make your job easier.

What did I do? Not long ago there was the shapeless publication, a compilation of the protests that had been made in the House of Commons. I took the trouble to make a calculation of the number of members who belonged to each party. You could not understand the official publication I mentioned to you without having a look at Senate Hansard of March 3, which summarized the whole thing and stated how many Liberal members, how many Conservative members, how many members of the other opposition groups had protested against it. The names are here. I supplied the Leader of the Government, the Leader of the Opposition, and some other members, with all the names and afterwards you agreed to have the whole thing placed on Hansard. Therefore, the Senate is the only place in Parliament where the list has been put in order and where clear-cut, concise and understandable information is available about it. If you go to the House of Commons you will find a shapeless paper, and when you come to the Senate you will find everything in a concise manner in an answer given by the honourable Senator Hugessen as Acting Leader at page 224 of Hansard, and you will also find the names recorded at page 338.

I have played the game with my party. I went to the caucus and informed the party of my intention to sponsor legislation to have the work done by the Senate. Then, after discussion with many leading legal minds of this chamber and of the House of Commons, Mr. Caouette and I came to the conclusion, as I told you, that the thing to do was to have it done by the House of Commons. I notified the caucus the second time. In fact, I did more than that: I went to see the Right Honourable Mr. Diefenbaker, Leader of the official Opposition; I went to see Mr. Douglas and Mr. Thompson, and I explained the situation to them.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Did you see Mr. Pearson?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I saw the whip, and the whip is the party itself. I saw the Liberal whip, Mr. Bernard Pilon, M.P., and I kept him informed of what was going on. I have no secret, because I do not consider it a matter of politics: it is a matter of having order in redistribution.

One of my colleagues who is not in the house at the moment gave me this argument. "It has been delayed long enough. Why should we delay it any longer?" That is not a serious argument, because there are so many committees for useless purposes in the House of Commons that the first thing they should do is to look after the redistribution of their own counties according to the census of 1961. We come with a life preserver, we come to rescue them, we come to help them, and it would not take long. It could be done very easily. One must know how to work. It could be done very easily in a non-partisan manner. It could be done with the assistance of the county councils before they disappear from the map of Canada.

I have the greatest respect for juries, I have argued cases before juries, and I respect my fellow citizens who sit there and who have to make a decision according to the dictates of their conscience. I also have great respect for the county councils which are composed of the mayor of each municipality within a certain territory, which is the county or constituency—you may call it what you will. Those people are familiar with the local interest. They have been harmed from coast to coast by illogical and absurd redistributions, and people are worrying about it.

One of the most atrocious decisions has been made in the case of the County of Gaspé, the union of the Magdalen Islands to the County of Bonaventure. The County of Gaspé has been split. I remember at the time of Joseph Edouard Caron, who was Minister of Agriculture in the Taschereau government, I said that he had gone far away into the middle of the Gulf of St. Lawrence to find a haven from which to be elected. The Magdalen Islands are the counties now where people go when they cannot be elected anywhere else, and the trouble we had in the ten counties of eastern Quebec was due to the fact that the Magdalen Islands were put in the wrong place. However, I will not insist about it. Read the articles in Le Saint-Laurent, and you will be familiar with the situation.

I am not to betray any confidence, but I had a most favourable reaction to the bill from Liberal and Conservative members of the House of Commons.

If I may I will take this one opinion from a Liberal first. He said:

> Now that the protestations against redistribution have begun to be heard in the House of Commons the Liberal party is in a dilemma. We have insisted previously that redistribution should not be a political affair, and, not satisfied with present results, we must again become politicians but too late.

It is not too late. If my honourable colleagues wish the French text, then I shall give it to them. In doing so I shall not be betraying a confidence because you will not know who has written this to me. I will say, however, that it is a very important Liberal member of the House of Commons. He wrote:

> Maintenant que les protestations contre la redistribution commencent à être soulevées en Chambre, le Parti libéral se trouve dans un dilemme. Nous avons insisté au préalable pour que la redistribution ne soit pas une affaire politique et, non satisfaits des résultats actuels, nous redevenons des politiciens, mais trop tard.

It is far from being too late.

Would you like now to know what is the opinion of some Conservative members? I have received many letters but I shall mention only two. The first one I shall mention to you comes from a Conservative from the Prairie provinces. He wrote to me in these words:

> I personally am not affected at all by the redistribution but I know what has happened in my province, and I am so much incensed by the injustice of which the Commission was responsible that I will support my friends and colleagues who have protested against that redistribution.

He was not affected.

I have another letter from which I shall strike the name. I might say that I have a large file of letters of approval and encouragement, but there is also the silent acknowledgment. There are those who say it is bad, but who are afraid to speak. They hide themselves behind the columns. They will not say a word. There are many like that, in my view, who do not say a word.

I will read you one of the best letters I have received. I have chosen it with great care. I have some from people who use profane language sometimes. They come from all parties, but I have too much respect for the ladies to read those letters in the Senate because I would not like to offend them. There are others who use not profane but very strong language. This letter reads:

> I have read the Senate Hansard with very great interest. I am not fully convinced that the Senate might be the proper body to handle redistribution, but I do know that the commissions which were established have done an—wait for the word.

—atrocious job.

That word is enough.

> That work so completed by them has only reminded me of what our old friend John T. Hackett, the late Senator, frequently said in attacking proposals for a so-called independent and impartial redistribution, "Independence and impartiality in this matter will prove to be only the cover for ignorance and incompetence."

Those are very good words. You will see that I am not alone in using flowery language.

Honourable senators, you have been kind in listening to me. I have now a proposal to make to you. The information has been on your desks for over a month in both the French and English languages. You know what it is about. The newspapers said that it was an unbelievable bill, or something like that, when Mr. Caouette sponsored it. I shall explain to you that if it is an unusual bill it is because its purpose is to remedy an unusual situation.

Before telling you what I want to tell you, I have something here that I have kept for such an occasion as this, and which I shall read to you now. I refer to the conclusion, the last two sentences, of an article which appeared in the magazine section of a large newspaper, the Toronto Globe and Mail, on Saturday last. I am wondering if honourable senators have read this article. It is by Norman Webster. I do not know Mr. Webster, but he writes very well. What he did was to take up the defence of the Senate. I read this article yesterday to one of our most distinguished colleagues who did me the honour of calling on me, and he said that I should mention it on the Orders of the Day today. However, there were so many other things that I did not think it was timely to do so, but now it is. Honourable colleagues, you will be pleased and comforted to hear these two sentences:

> The only saving grace thus far has been, praise be, the performance of the Senate. In the Red Chamber they still behave like gentlemen, play the game fairly and actually do a bit of work. The Senate is clearly being outcamped by the house—and that in itself is a powerful statement about parliamentary democracy as practiced these days in Ottawa.

Are you satisfied with that? I was not sure, honourable senators, if I could raise it on a question of privilege because usually questions of privilege are mentioned when one is in trouble, but this time I am elated by that article. I appreciate it, and I want you to share my joy.

Honourable colleagues, I have something else to tell you. I have news for you. I was in the diplomatic gallery of the House of Commons on last Friday afternoon. I was alone in the first row, and one of my colleagues was seated just behind me. I told him to come ahead with me into the first row where we had the best place from which to listen to the debate. I heard the debate on a bill to amend the Constitution with respect to the Senate. Very good speeches were delivered by Mr. Caouette, by Mr. Deachman of Vancouver, and especially by Mr. Neveu, the new member for Shefford, Quebec.

I must tell you that if you take the trouble of reading Mr. Neveu's speech you will see that we still have French in the House of Commons. Therefore, if the article by Mr. Norman Webster was eulogistic of the Senate, and rightly so, it is not absolutely fair to the House of Commons.

Honourable colleagues, I come now to my conclusion. I have something to ask you. I wonder if I will succeed, because somebody told me that there are potholes and boulders in the Senate at times. I protested; I said that that is all wrong, that there are no potholes and no boulders in the Senate. However, he said, "Yes, yes, there are." I contradicted him flatly. But yesterday it was my birthday and I reached the venerable age of 75.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: It is not that I think that I am venerable, I am simply referring to my age.

Now I want to ask you for a gift, a gift that you have already bestowed upon me with great generosity. I ask your kindness. I want a double gift, not only your kindness but your understanding. I come to you not precisely as one comes begging for a gift but as one who has friendship for you and who respects you, and who believes that the Senate could accomplish marvels if it wished to do so.

I have a suggestion to make, but before doing so I must remind you of a precedent. There are highly distinguished lawyers here, and when they appear in court they are asked the question, "Have you a precedent to cite?" Then of course, they consult the law books to find a precedent.

My precedent is in Hansard of the House of Commons during the session of 1936, and it was for the repeal of the bill concerning the establishment of the Economic Council and all the other pieces of social legislation that had been declared ultra vires by the Privy Council. The legislation concerning the establishment of the Economic Council in 1935 had not been subjected to the court, and so I moved the repeal of the bill.

I admit that there was a thunderous scene at the caucus that morning, but in the afternoon the bill passed like butter in the pan. I wonder if my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks), was there and remembers that the bill received first, second and third reading in ten minutes; and the Mr. Woodsworth asked Mr. Mackenzie King, "How is it that you let a private member sponsor public legislation of this kind?" Mr. King answered, very wisely, "I have enough advisors, and I do not need more." The bill passed. It is a precedent, and a good one, with the authority of no less a parliamentarian than Mackenzie King.

Now, will you come to the rescue of the House of Commons? That is my question. You are free to decide yes or no. If you decide "yes," then it seems to me, and I say this earnestly, that you could pass second and third reading of the bill, send it to the House of Commons and tell them over there that the Senate passed this bill in ten minutes. It would give a good example to the House of Commons to follow.

There may be objections to that, as the Senate is the haven of second thought. But now I ask you to put aside the second thought. We have discussed this matter for so long, and I wonder whether you will be willing to do that to show how the Senate can accomplish things and to give a good example to the House of Commons.

Honourable colleagues, you have listened to me with courteous attention, and I thank you. Some of you may have different views from mine, and you are entitled to them. However, I have spoken to you with great sincerity and for the last time, and if I rise again it will be to move the third reading after the bill has received second reading. But I wonder if it is an illusion or not.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien (Provencher) debate adjourned.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament concerning salary revisions, reclassifications and upgradings of positions in the Library of Parliament which was presented on Thursday, March 24.

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the adoption of the report.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few remarks regarding this report.

In a recent article written by one Sally Barnes, in the Ottawa Citizen, we find a great eulogy of the new research branch that is available to senators and to members of the House of Commons in the Parliamentary Library. This is regarded as another major step in improving the services of Canada's historic library on the hill, but the fact that so few members of Parliament and so few senators have availed themselves of these new advantages calls for some comment.

I do not know how many honourable senators have taken seriously the literature received recently from the Librarian, with which there was a questionnaire requesting that if you wish to deliver a speech to either of the Houses of Parliament or to the public, to so state and to ask for any references that you may require.

Recently I had the advantage of observing the workings of that new research department. I went in with several quotations which I had heard quite often, but I did not know their source. Within two or three minutes time I had the answer, and the complete information was delivered to my own office within 15 minutes. It is an amazing service; it provides not only the sources of the quotations, but the authors, the year in which they were made and where, as well as other related quotations and remarks made by politicians or writers.

I have before me an excerpt of an article about which I wish to comment. The subtitle is "Unfortunate". It quotes Mr. Spicer, the Parliamentary Librarian, as saying:

> —it is "most unfortunate" that the Joint Committee on Libraries did not meet in 1965. The new research branch could have greatly benefited from such a meeting and the computer system could have been discussed.

I realize there had been quite a lengthy adjournment due to the election. However, I believe that the Speakers of both houses are co-chairmen of this committee. I do not know if there is any other reason than the election or the lengthy recess why this joint committee did not meet in 1965. However, I do hope that in view of the advantages offered by this new research department this committee will meet more often than it has in the past.

Hon. Malcolm Hollett: Honourable senators, I also wish to pay tribute to the Library of Parliament. On several occasions I have wished to find certain facts and figures on various subjects, and by visiting the library I was able to ascertain the facts and have the necessary information delivered to me speedily.

I wish to pay tribute to Mr. Spicer and all his aides for their courtesy and for the knowledge and experience which they pass on to us.

Report adopted.

THE LATE SENATORS F. GORDON BRADLEY AND ALLAN L. WOODROW

TRIBUTES

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I regret to have to report to the Senate the reception today of two pieces of extremely sad news. The first is of the death of our colleague Frederick Gordon Bradley, P.C., Q.C., whose designation in this house was Bonavista-Twillingate.

Senator Bradley was 78 years of age. As honourable senators know, he has been in ill health for many years. He was a lawyer. He had a long career of public service to his country and, indeed, to Newfoundland long before it became one of the provinces of Canada. He was first elected to the House of Assembly in Newfoundland in June 1924 and was a member of the administration in that province for several years. He was Solicitor General for some time and Leader of the Opposition there from 1932 to 1934.

Senator Bradley's federal career began by his election to the House of Commons after the federation of Newfoundland with Canada. He was appointed Secretary of State for Canada on April 1, 1949, and was the first minister from his province in the Government of Canada. He was summoned to the Senate in June of 1953, the year in which I too became a member of the Senate.

When Senator Bradley was introduced to the Senate in 1953, Senator Petten welcomed him in these words:

> We in Newfoundland will never forget that his was the last voice raised in defence of representative institutions at the time when they were temporarily extinguished in our province, and it was fitting that his should have been the first voice raised in the parliament of Canada as the representative of the people of Newfoundland.

I am sure that I speak on behalf of all senators when I say how deeply grieved we are at his death. I convey to his widow and the members of his family our heartfelt sympathy.

Honourable senators will remember that barely a week ago I commented with regret on behalf of all members of this chamber upon the retirement of Senator Allan Woodrow of Toronto. This morning I was informed that Senator Woodrow, who was in his eightieth year, had today died unexpectedly in a Toronto hospital.

Allan Woodrow was born in Saint John, New Brunswick, that province which has given so many people to the public life of this country. His professional career was mainly in the business of the chartered banks of this country, and he was most closely associated with the Bank of Nova Scotia. He had served as manager in Boston, U.S.A., in Hamilton and in the main office in Toronto for a number of years. He, like Senator Bradley, was summoned to the Senate in May 1953 and, as I have said, he retired just ten days ago.

Allan Woodrow was a quiet man; he was a friendly man; he was a man who made a lasting impression of friendship on people in all parts of this house and in all parts of this Parliament. He was a faithful attendant here; he did not speak often in the chamber, but he made a fine contribution to the work of the committees of this house, and in particular the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, at which he was a faithful attendant at all times.

He was at one time Honorary Treasurer of the National Liberal Federation and later became its President.

It is a sad coincidence that I should be sending a message of sympathy to Mrs. Woodrow on behalf of the Senate on the same day as receiving a letter from her thanking me for a note I had sent her on the occasion of Senator Woodrow's resignation just a week ago. I am sure that in the message I am expressing the sentiments of all honourable senators.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, like the Leader of the Government I learned only shortly before entering the chamber of the sudden death of two of our members.

The Leader of the Government has told you of the many fine qualities of both these senators; he has mentioned in particular the accomplishments of our late colleague, Senator Bradley. We know that because of ill-health Senator Bradley had not been very active in the deliberations of the Senate in recent years. I often thought that probably he did not care too much for the activities in Ottawa, but when he spoke of his native province there was never any doubt as to the great love he bore Newfoundland.

I recall one of the first times I met Senator Bradley in Ottawa he recited the Ode to Newfoundland, and some of those words came to my mind this afternoon on being told of his death. I do not think it would be out of place to quote just one verse, because I think it typifies him:

> As loved our fathers, so we love,
> Where once they stood we stand,
> Their prayer we raise to heav'n above,
> God guard thee, Newfoundland.

He was a great Newfoundlander.

Speaking personally, I knew Senator Bradley when we were both members of the House of Commons, and where he became a minister of the Crown. Of course I also knew him in the Senate, and was familiar with his many excellent qualities, as are all honourable senators. One of his qualities which I do not think was very well known was his wonderful sense of humour. I have heard some excellent stories told of which Senator Bradley was the author.

I join with Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) in extending my sincere sympathy to his widow and the other members of his family.

I saw Senator Woodrow just the other day, and yesterday I was greatly surprised to hear he had retired from the Senate. As Senator Connolly has told you, he was an active New Brunswicker. He left New Brunswick in the early days and joined the bank, becoming a successful banker; he was the manager of some of the largest branch banks in Canada and in Boston. He took a keen interest in education and was active in business and in public affairs in every town and city in which he lived.

I wish to extend to his widow and family my sincere sympathy.

Hon. A. B. Baird: Honourable senators, it becomes my sad duty to pay tribute to the memory of a senator from Newfoundland whom we have lost by death, one who not only occupied a prominent position in this chamber, but also in his native province. His passing will be mourned by us all.

Gordon Frederic Bradley, having a passionate desire for education, decided to study law at Dalhousie University in Nova Scotia. Upon his graduation he returned to Newfoundland, and was admitted to the Bar in 1914. It was in 1924 that he started his political career. He became solicitor general in 1929, and it can be truthfully said that he was one of the finest solicitor generals Newfoundland has ever had.

As all honourable senators know, Senator Bradley was one of the fathers of the Confederation. I venture to say that Newfoundland would never have joined Confederation without "Joey" and Bradley. He was an outstanding man in the country where he lived. He was deeply interested also in business, and for many years was a director of the Bonavista Cold Storage Company.

I join with other honourable senators in extending to Mrs. Bradley and her two sons our sincere sympathy in their great loss.

I wish to be associated also with former speakers in sending my sympathy to Mrs. Woodrow and her two daughters.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, upon coming into the chamber I was quite shocked to hear the honourable Leader of the Government announce the death of my late seatmate, Senator Woodrow. It was only yesterday that I wrote him a belated note in connection with his retirement, expressing the good wishes of myself and my colleagues for his recovery and the enjoyment of his retirement for some considerable time.

Senator Woodrow was a quiet man. He had been my seatmate ever since I came to the Senate. I shall never forget his kindness and courtesy to a new member upon his arrival here, and his constant sympathy and understanding of all the problems that arose. As others have said, he seldom spoke, but he took a kindly interest in everything, particularly the work of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce and all financial matters. We have lost a friend and a kindly colleague, and I join with all those who have spoken in expressing my sincere sympathy to Mrs. Woodrow.

Honourable senators, I am often astonished at how first impressions change. When I first came to the Senate and met the late Senator Bradley I felt he was a very austere man. However, he was a member of the Standing Committee on Divorce for many years, as my friend and colleague, Senator Roebuck, will confirm, and I felt fortunate on those occasions when Senator Bradley was the chairman of a particular subcommittee of which I was a member. He had a rare sense of humour. It used to bubble out at the most unexpected times. His knowledge of the law was very helpful to the work of the Standing Committee on Divorce. I join with my other colleagues in extending to Mrs. Bradley and her two sons our sincere sympathy.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I can add very little factually to what has already been said about the passing of Senator Bradley and Senator Woodrow.

Senator Woodrow came from my own city of Toronto, where I knew him intimately for a long time. I heard of his death only a few moments ago; that news came to me as a great shock, although I knew he had been ill for some time. I shall say only that I join with those who have preceded me in sending to his widow, whom I know well also, our heartfelt sympathy in the great loss she has suffered.

Senator Cameron has just mentioned that the late Senator Bradley was a member of the Standing Committee on Divorce. In bygone days the Divorce Committee heard a considerable number of cases. It was one of those jobs that we had to do—not very inspiring, perhaps, but nevertheless necessary to the work we were carrying on in the Senate. Senator Bradley was a faithful and highly capable member of that committee. As a lawyer he frequently presided over the subcommittees in the hearing of evidence, and most frequently in contested cases, where his wide knowledge of law and his sound knowledge of legal principles, his keenness of mind, and capability as a presiding officer in the hearing of evidence was of great value. He was not well, but he was always generous in giving of himself and doing the work that fell to his lot, willingly, capably and acceptably.

Honourable senators I wish to convey my sympathy to his widow and daughters. This chamber is poorer today for the loss of these two distinguished senators.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, I wish to pay a tribute to our two departed friends. Senator Bradley, an old friend from Newfoundland, was a colourful man with a keen sense of humour and a bright mind. For years he occupied the room next to mine at the Chateau Laurier, and he and his wife were great friends of ours.

Senator Bradley had a distinguished record in the public service. He served in the legislature of Newfoundland, and the service he rendered when Newfoundland became a province of Canada was a fine example of service and achievement.

I wish to express sympathy to his widow and family and to say how much we regret their loss.

Senator Woodrow visited my office almost every day. He was a former New Brunswicker and was married to a lady from Nova Scotia. He was one of nature's gentlemen. He performed valuable service as a banker, both at home and abroad. He had been secretary and also president of the Liberal party in Canada, and he served that party well.

The Honourable C. D. Howe was responsible for Senator Woodrow devoting that service to the party. Senator Woodrow told me that Prime Minister Mackenzie King had sent for him and told him that Mr. Howe had recommended him, to which the Senator replied, "I am a businessman, not a politician." To this Mr. King responded, "That is what I want, a businessman." Senator Woodrow accepted, and he was highly successful in his duty.

Before Senator Woodrow went home the other day he told me that the doctor had forbade him to return. However, he came back and said he was going to resign. I felt sorry about that decision on his part.

The passing of these two gentlemen brings quickly to my mind a verse from the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.

For some we loved, the loveliest and the best
That from his Vintage rolling Time has prest,
Have drunk their Cup a Round or two before,
And one by one crept silently to rest.

I wish to express to Mrs. Woodrow, who is a dear friend of my wife and myself, and to their family, our sincere sympathy in their bereavement, and wish for them that time and faith will support them in the belief that life is still pleasant and happy, in the memory that they had had a good husband and father.

MOTION FOR THIRD READING NEXT SITTING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John J. Connolly: I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading tomorrow.

Honourable senators, we had a very satisfactory meeting this morning, and a full explanation was given by the officials. Therefore, unless someone has a further contribution to make I would ask that the bill receive third reading tomorrow.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I propose to make a few remarks on the bill on third reading. However, I am perfectly content if it is more convenient that I speak tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Speak to the bill now.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I shall not detain the house for long.

The reason I wish to make a few remarks in regard to this bill is contained in certain circumstances that were referred to in the excellent presentation made by Senator Benidickson on second reading yesterday. It appears at page 345 of the Debates of the Senate:

> In December 1965 six products—tobacco, chromium, certain manufactured meat products, and some others—relating to trade with Rhodesia were put under import control.
> In the next paragraph appears the following: On February 3, 1966 the Minister of External Affairs made a statement in the House of Commons respecting our trading relationships with Rhodesia. He said that, in addition to these six commodities being subjected to import control, there was being introduced, as of that date, a general control of all products. On March 23 of this year, the Minister of Trade and Commerce announced in the House of Commons that further restrictions were being imposed under this act on the import of hides and related leather products.

Honourable senators, I am not debating the validity or the merit of this country's policy in applying trading sanctions in regard to Rhodesia. However, as we are all aware, these sanctions are being applied under this act, namely, the Export and Import Permits Act.

I also make this observation. In my opinion, it is quite contrary to law that sanctions of that nature be made under this act. If I am right in that contention, then I submit that the Government of Canada is acting quite illegally, without legal authority or justification, in regard to these sanctions.

As far as I am aware, this is the first time, certainly since the war, and it is perhaps the very first occasion except in wartime, that total trade sanctions have been applied to any country in the world. Certainly, it is the first time that steps of this nature have been taken in regard to a Commonwealth country.

Let me make some observations in regard to the statute.

Hon. Mr. Croll: May I interrupt the honourable senator for a moment. In reponse to that question, did not the witness before the committee say that under section 3(b) and under section 5 there was no authority to do exactly what the honourable senator says we have no right to do?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Yes, that is right.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Are you questioning the validity of the whole act?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: No. I am merely questioning the legal validity of the position taken in the committee this morning. I admit that the action being taken by the Government is presumably being taken under sections 3 and 5 of the act, but I say that this action is illegal and consequently the sanctions being applied against Rhodesia by this country are unlawful.

Everyone knows the real purpose of the act, which is chapter 27 of the Statutes of Canada, 1954. Its main and essential purpose is well known: it is to prevent the export or the re-export of strategic materials to other countries and particularly to countries that are either at war with us or with our friends and neighbours, and especially of course to prevent export of such materials to countries behind the Iron Curtain.

Indeed, in the past the act has been used for that purpose and only for that purpose, subject to one exception which I will refer to.

The act, as is well known, gives power to the Government to exclude or regulate the importation of certain agricultural products that are subject to price support in this country.

I think section 3 of the act is very clear. It is headed: "Establishment of Control Lists". It says that the government of the day is entitled to list certain specific materials:

> (a) to ensure that arms, ammunition, implements or munitions of war, naval, army or air stores or any articles deemed capable of being converted thereinto or made useful in the production thereof or otherwise having a strategic nature or value will not be made available to any destination wherein their use might be detrimental to the security of Canada;
> (b) to implement an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment; or
> (c) to ensure that there is an adequate supply and distribution of such article in Canada for defence or other needs.

Reference was made in the committee this morning, as my honourable friend Senator Croll has suggested, that the power of the Government was contained in section 3(b) referring to "intergovernmental arrangements." The gentleman before the committee referred also to section 5(c) which likewise refers to "intergovernmental arrangement."

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Would the honourable senator permit a question from me?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: It was my understanding that the witness before the committee said that this did come under clause (b), to implement an intergovernmental arrangement, by arrangement with the United Kingdom. Do I understand the honourable senator correctly, that he disagrees with that?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Yes. I do not suggest that I wanted to try to correct the honourable gentleman: I want to suggest that I desire to disagree with his point of view. I made reference a short while ago to section 5(c). If honourable senators refer to the act, they will see that this subsection is similar to section 5(c), namely:

> (c) to implement an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment;

My main point is that section 5(c) and section 3(b) do not empower this Government to apply wholesale, 100 per cent sanctions against any country in the world and that the act is limited essentially to the two things, namely, the export of strategic materials and the limiting of imports of agricultural products which otherwise would affect our agricultural price supports.

In support of what I have said, I wish to refer to the debate which occurred in this house in 1954, in which some of the most eminent members of the Senate participated.

The bill was introduced in this house on March 25, 1954. The motion for second reading was made by the late Senator James A. McKinnon. It was then spoken to by the late Senator Haig and by the honourable Senator Crerar. No suggestion was made in that presentation to the house that the two subsections which I have referred to, namely 3(b) and 5(c), contained the authority now being ascribed to them by the Government of Canada.

I should like to quote from Senator McKinnon's statement, as reported on page 389 of Senate Hansard of 1954:

> In conjunction with our allies—the United States, Great Britain and other members of NATO—we have a real interest in ensuring that no strategic materials find their way behind the Iron Curtain. One of the great problems faced by us, however, is not so much how to control the initial export of these materials from Canada, but how to exercise control in such a way as to ensure that the goods are not diverted in transit to destinations other than those originally indicated. The real purpose of this legislation is to plug any holes through which such diversions might occur.

Then Senator McKinnon proceeded to give examples of methods by which diversions could occur to other countries and the purposes for which that would occur—not only to stop exports from Canada of strategic materials, but to prevent strategic materials coming into Canada and then being diverted by subversive means or otherwise to other countries.

Then I would like to read this paragraph:

> In addition to the control of strategic materials, we must control the export of certain items because of supply reasons. This, of course, includes atomic materials which remain under strict export control.

And perhaps atomic materials would be the only materials the export of which we would want to control because of supply reasons.

Then he said:

> The control of imports is largely the same as that set out in the present legislation, except that the purposes for which import control may be exercised include specific authority "to implement an inter-governmental arrangement or commitment". This change is necessary to define powers required to carry out arrangements with other governments, particularly the United States. It is readily understandable that we control our imports at the request of a foreign government, particularly the United States, rather than leave it to them to impose export controls on shipments to this country.

Honourable senators, I submit that Senator MacKinnon gave the very purpose of this legislation when he outlined the limits of those two subsections. They were simply this: Instead of the United States, say, applying control of an export into Canada, the United States Government might desire to make an arrangement with our Government to apply an import control on the commodity in question and vice versa. The same action might be taken as between the governments of Great Britain and Canada. We might do the same as between any other country and Canada. But it was never intended that the act should give broader powers than the bilateral arrangements to which I have referred.

I want to quote again from Senator Benidickson's speech, when he said at page 345 of yesterday's Hansard:

> Basically, our control on exports relates to strategic items, a term easy of comprehension by all honourable senators. In addition, there is an area of commodities subject to intergovernmental treaty or agreement where, through NATO or some other intergovernmental conference or negotiation, a method of stability has been arrived at to which Canada has given agreement. Products of that kind then come under export control.

I submit there is no authority in the act whatsoever for any operation of that kind, either through NATO or through the United Nations or the Commonwealth organization or any other. The legislation is very clear, as was stated by Senator MacKinnon, that these two subsections to which I have referred relate entirely and exclusively to arrangements between one government and another. I submit, therefore, that it is quite illegal for this country, under this legislation, to apply trading restrictions in the way they have now been applied to Rhodesia. Resulting from that position I submit that Canada has no legal power to apply sanctions against Rhodesia under present legislation, and consequently this question should be presented to Parliament and debated there. We can legally apply these sanctions only after the passage of appropriate legislation. I would point out that Senator Crerar and the late Senator Haig also spoke extensively on this bill, and nowhere in their remarks is there any suggestion that this legislation can be used in the broadside fashion that characterizes its use in this instance.

As I said at the outset, this statement has nothing to do with the rights or wrongs of the controversy between Rhodesia and the United Kingdom. I maintain, however, that in this matter, as in others, the Government of Canada should act within the law and that they require the sanction of Parliament, following parliamentary debate, to implement the decisions that this country should take as a consequence of the present controversy over Rhodesia.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, in the first place I remind the honourable gentleman of the well-known legal adage that he knows so well: "The law is always speaking." I think the sections which he has quoted from the act itself would indicate much more general authority than examples which people explaining a bill in earlier years, or even in this year, might have given to illustrate the kind of situation to be covered.

When this act was passed, no doubt some of the problems were those facing the countries of the NATO alliance, but the act itself has very broad language indeed.

My memory is not precisely clear on the point and I intend to bring it up to date overnight, because I am not going to move third reading today. But it seems to me that when the question of sanctions to be imposed upon Southern Rhodesia was raised initially, it was as a result of consultation with the authorities of the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries. The U.D.I. was considered to be an illegal act, and it was to counteract that illegal act and the effects of it that the arrangement was made between various governments of the Commonwealth, including the United Kingdom and Canada, to take steps to try to avoid armed conflict, and to adopt other methods which would not involve the loss of life.

As I say, at the moment I am not positive in my recollection, but I think I was told that the law officers of the Crown gave it as their opinion that there was authority under the act to impose these sanctions. The Government does not take steps of this kind without giving it very thorough consideration—no government would. I shall refresh my memory on the point and report tomorrow to the Senate upon it.

I would add a further comment. At the meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in New Zealand last November and December the speakers who came from countries of Southeast Asia and Africa spoke about the sanctions that were applied and were to be applied by Great Britain and other Commonwealth countries, and I never heard a more bitter denunciation of the inadequacy of the steps taken to deal with this situation which had been created in Rhodesia, than I heard there.

The British, upon whom most if not all the responsibility fell, were bitterly criticized on several occasions and on points of order in open debate in a manner that shook me.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: They were criticized by whom?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Criticized by representatives of both the African and southeast Asian countries. The Government surely has authority to deal with matters of this kind. My recollection is that the law officers of the Crown were consulted before this action was taken under the authority which the honourable gentleman has quoted.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: They are not always right.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Certainly they are not always right, and certainly, too, lawyers are entitled to disagree on the interpretation of a section. I am glad the honourable gentleman has raised the point though. I felt I should give this explanation of the discussion conducted here in respect of this matter this afternoon, and tomorrow when third reading is called I shall know whether I have expressed myself correctly.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

PRIVATE BILLS

BANK OF BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. David A. Croll, for Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-16, to incorporate Bank of British Columbia, and had directed that the bill be reported with certain amendments.

For text of report see Appendix A, pp. 381–4.

He said: Honourable senators, may I say just one word in explanation. The amendments contained in the report are lifted directly from the Bank of Canada Act, as proposed to Parliament in 1965; and they are identical to those contained in the Bank of Western Canada bill which was passed by the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask my honourable friend a question? These amendments were contained in the bill introduced last year. That bill did not pass, and it was to be re-introduced. Is there any guarantee that these amendments will be carried forward into the new act, because there is now a different Minister of Finance?

Hon. Mr. Croll: When the Bank of Western Canada bill was passed, like amendments were included in that bill and approved by the Government and by the committee as recently as last month.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Croll: With leave of the Senate, I move that this report be taken into consideration now.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE TRUSTEE BOARD OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN CANADA—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Maurice Bourget, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-20, respecting The Trustee Board of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John J. Kinley moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE ESTIMATES

AUTHORITY TO PRINT FINANCE COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—SUPPLEMENTARIES (E)

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, presented the following report of the committee, to which was referred the Supplementary Estimates (E) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1966:

> Your committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its proceedings on the said Supplementary Estimates (E).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. Leonard, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, to which was referred the Supplementary Estimates (E) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March 1966, presented the following report:

> The Standing Committee on Finance to which was referred the Supplementary Estimates (E) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1966—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

For text of report see Appendix B p. 385.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: With leave, I move that the report be considered now.

Honourable senators, perhaps I should explain the request for leave and also for dispensing with the reading of the report. The report is not long, being only four paragraphs, and in my explanation I wish to deal with it almost word for word, as I think that would save a little time.

The report deals with Supplementary Estimates (E). Honourable senators will recall that when the previous report of the Finance Committee was placed before the Senate for consideration last week, Senator Brooks raised the question of the Supplementary Estimates (E) which had been tabled after the Finance Committee's report had been presented. In the result, the Senate directed that Supplementary Estimates (E) be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance in advance of the appropriation bill based thereon reaching the Senate.

That appropriation bill passed the House of Commons yesterday and was introduced in this chamber today as Bill C-159. Honourable senators have copies on their desks, and second reading will be moved later. In view of the fact that the house asked the committee to report on the supplementary Estimates which are the basis of this bill, it seems appropriate that the report of the committee should be presented first.

Supplementary Estimates (E) are the last estimates of expenditures for the year ending tomorrow, March 31, 1966. Therefore, the report of the committee commences in paragraph 1 by reciting:

> Pursuant to the said order of reference your Committee proceeded to examine the expenditures set out in the above-mentioned Supplementary Estimates (E) and called as witness Dr. George F. Davidson, Secretary of the Treasury Board.

Paragraph 2 of the report gives the total of the amounts in Supplementary Estimates (E) and adds to them the total of the previous Estimates to give the full total for the year. Supplementary Estimates (E) total $173,701,576 and, as paragraph 2 of the report states, this brings the total for the year up to the sum of $7,999,605,015. These figures do not include Loans, Investments and Advances amounting to $96,605,791, which brings the total of such Loans, Investments and Advances for the whole fiscal year to $425,040,892.

Paragraph 3 of the report gives the figure of the increase of this year's expenditures over those of the previous year. This amounts to $781,605,015, and represents an increase of 10.8 per cent. This compares with the estimated increase in the gross national product of approximately 8 per cent. These figures which I have just given, and which are contained in this report, bring up to date and replace the comparable statistics that are in the report of the committee which was submitted to the Senate on March 10. An amended table is also attached to this report.

Paragraph 4 of the report reads simply as follows:

> In his evidence before the committee, the Secretary of the Treasury Board explained the various items of expenditures and answered all questions of the members of the committee to their satisfaction.

Paragraph 4 is the most pertinent paragraph in so far as the consideration of this report is concerned, because the others are merely formal.

At this point perhaps I should mention that all members of the Senate are entitled to attend the meetings of the Standing Committee on Finance and, indeed, of all other standing committees of the Senate, although they must refrain from voting if they are not members of the particular committee. As a number of honourable senators now present were not at the committee meeting this morning, perhaps I should tell the house that Dr. Davidson, in explaining Supplementary Estimates (E), divided them into five main categories which comprise about 80 per cent of the total figure of $173 million. I must say he dealt with them very adequately.

His first division was the agricultural division, and there the large item is an amount of $40,700,000, which is included in Vote 17e and which appears in the schedule on page 3 of the bill. Vote 17e includes some other figures, but the main item is the amount of $40,700,000 which is required for the operation of the Agricultural Stabilization Board.

As honourable senators know, that board has two main functions. One is the purchasing of agricultural commodities and holding them when prices have fallen below what might be called a basic price, and then in time reselling them. It also has authority to make deficiency payments. Instead of a purchase and sale arrangement, it makes a deficiency payment to a farmer with respect to products covered by the act, which is the difference between the market price and the basic price. The operations of this board, of course, go on throughout the year, and the figure of what it requires as a result of its operation is put in the final estimates, in this case Supplementary Estimates (E), where the amount is $40,700,000.

The next major item that Dr. Davidson dealt with in detail was that of $12 million for the Municipal Development and Loan Board, which appears on page 5 of the bill. This amount arises as a result of the extension of the provisions of the Municipal Development and Loan Act until September 30, 1966. This act has been in operation for several years, and under it loans are made for certain municipal developments. Provided the terms are complied with and the work completed within a certain length of time, a proportion of the loan is forgiven by the federal Government. The extension of the provisions of the act to September 30, 1966 enables a number of projects to be completed, and 25 per cent of the loans made in respect of them will be forgiven. This requires a vote of $12 million.

The third item is the reimbursement to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation of $20,347,687, and this appears on page 8 of the bill. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation carries on its operations throughout the year, and some of them are for the benefit of other departments or governments for example, in connection with slum clearance and various other activities. At the end of the year it, in effect, bills the Government for the losses or expenses it has incurred in these operations. These appear on page 8 of the bill as Votes 15e to 35e which, as I have said, total $20,347,687.

The next item, which is on page 10 of the bill, deals with the Canadian National Railways' deficit. This is a perennial we have always with us. When the loss of the Canadian National Railways for the year is ascertained the amount required from the Government to make it up is placed in the final supplementary Estimates. In this case it is Vote 27e on page 10—$34,718,000.

The fifth large item is $25 million in Vote 84e, also on page 10, under Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, and it is to increase from $70 million to $95 million the payments that are made by the Government to railway companies to maintain the freight rates at a level lower than the rate the Board of Transport Commissioners approved some years ago. The Government at that time decided that instead of the increased rates being put into effect, it would freeze the rates and pay the railways a subsidy. There have been subsequent wage negotiations and other increased costs, and the subsidy has been increased to include them.

In addition to dealing with those major items, Dr. Davidson dealt with what are called the $1 items. These have been the subject of considerable comment in this chamber, and this morning the committee had a very good opportunity of questioning Dr. Davidson about them, and hearing from him his explanation of them. He pointed out that all these $1 items are not necessarily, shall I say, disguised legislation. He put them into three categories. The first was a category which involved a change purely in the wording of the vote. Had the wording in the main Estimates been spelled out more clearly it would have included the change now being asked in the $1 item in the supplementary Estimates. This seems to be a perfectly proper use of a $1 item.

A second category is where there may be available moneys that are unexpended in a vote and further moneys are required for expenditures that were not included in the previous Estimates. They could be put through in the proper amount, such as $50,000 or $60,000, or whatever the amount might be, but by using the dollar device the unexpended funds that are available in the department are used for these new votes of expenditure.

The third category is one to which I think all of us feel some objection, and that is where instead of a bill or a piece of legislation a vote is used in the Estimates to give legislative sanction to something that is sought to be done, although the most appropriate method to use would be to have a bill. Some of such $1 items in the Estimates are of a special character, and these were explained by Dr. Davidson. Perhaps the only one I need to mention today is a $1 item which concerns the case of an annuity to a senator who had elected to retire. The wording in our retirement legislation uses language which in effect says that where a senator who is in receipt of an annuity dies, his widow is entitled to receive an annuity. I think the proper wording should be that when he dies entitled to an annuity, then the widow would also be entitled to her annuity.

This particular $1 vote does effectively take care of the one case that has occurred, but there should be an amendment to the act to cover future incidents of this kind.

I think I have covered the main matters that came before the committee this morning. Other members were present, and if I have overlooked anything I am sure they can bring it to the attention of honourable senators. Dr. Davidson dealt with other matters but I think it is sufficient for me to say at the present time that I believe the questions put by senators were adequately answered.

Some of the matters I have dealt with and that were in the Estimates could be made the subject of a more detailed report, but in all cases similar items will appear in the 1966-67 Estimates. Perhaps it would be more appropriate if we studied them more thoroughly, and in a subsequent report dealing with the 1966-67 Estimates we could cover with greater precision matters such as the $1 items and others not specifically mentioned in the report today.

Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak at length on this report. I was present in committee this morning, and the meeting was an excellent one. Senator Leonard mentioned that I had asked that these Estimates go before the committee. That is true. Undoubtedly the intention was to have them before the committee in any event, because the 1965-66 Estimates would have been incomplete if we had not considered Supplementary Estimates (E).

Senator Leonard stated that the items in these Estimates are quite similar to the items which will appear in supplementary Estimates which come before us from time to time during this year. I agree that they are practically the same as supplementary Estimates which came before our committee previously. When one makes a thorough study of one set of supplementary Estimates, this similarity becomes evident. That is borne out by the fact that this morning Dr. Davidson divided the Estimates under five headings and dealt with each heading, as Senator Leonard explained, extensively.

I have nothing further to say. I had intended to speak on many of the items that had not been brought to the attention of the committee, but I am satisfied, and I do not think it is necessary to extend my remarks.

May I urge honourable senators to read the proceedings of today's meeting, when they are printed, as well as the comprehensive account which Senator Leonard has given us.

Report adopted.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1966

SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved, with leave of the Senate, second reading of Bill C-159, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1967.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-159 is also known as Appropriation Bill No. 4, 1966. As honourable senators will observe, it contains five sections and a schedule of some considerable length.

The position of the Leader of the Government in respect of this measure, in view of the debate this afternoon, is somewhat anomalous, because on second reading of a bill it is normally the duty of the sponsor not only to explain the bill but at least to make some comprehensive reference of the items in the schedules.

We are in the happy position of reversing that procedure here today, and I do not intend to refer to the schedules at all in this discussion, in view of the report which has just been adopted. However, I would like for the record to endorse what has been said by Senator Leonard and by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) about the extreme importance, particularly to new members of the Senate, of meetings like the one held by the Senate Finance Committee this morning. I know of no way that senators can get a better appreciation of how the finances of government are managed and operated than by attendance at the meetings of that committee. I say that without attempting to disparage what may be done elsewhere.

I say again and again that honourable senators who are not members of our committees should make it their business to find out when committees meet so that they can attend and receive training in the kind of work that the committees do. This would prove to be invaluable to them, and by doing so they would be able to render better service to the Senate.

Honourable senators, the bill contains five sections. The first section is simply the title section. Section 2 provides for the granting of $270,207,367, as detailed in the schedule. Section 3 provides that in respect of the purpose and effect of each item, the amount authorized by each item may be paid or applied only for the purposes and subject to the terms and conditions contained in the item, that the provisions of each item in the schedule shall be deemed to have been enacted by Parliament on the first day of April, 1965, which was the first day of the fiscal year to which the supplementaries apply.

Section 4 is the customary provision with reference to commitments. In brief, it says that a commitment may be entered into only in accordance with the terms of such item, and if the Comptroller of the Treasury certifies that the commitment proposed to be entered into, together with all other commitments, does not exceed the total amount provided for in the item.

Section 5 is an additional section in this bill which is not found in all bills respecting supplementary Estimates. It reads:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of the Financial Administration Act, the amounts appropriated by this Act may be paid at any time on or before the thirtieth day of April, one thousand nine hundred and sixty-six, and such payment shall be deemed to have been made in and be chargeable to the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and sixty-six.

The reason for this is obvious. Today is the 30th day of March. If this provision were not there, all the payments provided for in these supplementary Estimates, which cover the fiscal year ending tomorrow, would have to be made by tomorrow. Leeway of one month is given to make the payments authorized by the act.

Section 6 is a usual section. It provides that the amounts paid or applied under the authority of the act shall be accounted for in the public accounts in accordance with section 64 of the Financial Administration Act.

Honourable senators, this is the kind of bill which scarcely needs re-explanation each time. However, at the beginning of the session, it may be worthwhile giving this explanation, which I hope is satisfactory to all honourable senators.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1966

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa west) for the second reading of Bill C-157, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1967.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, as this is the first time for several years that an interim supply bill has reached the Senate in time to allow a few days for debate on it, I did not hesitate yesterday to move the adjournment of the debate. Usually we are forced to go through the three readings of the bill in quick succession.

We are all indebted to the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate for the explanation he has given of what constitutes an interim supply bill. At the risk of repetition, I would also like to put on the record my views of the mechanism of interim supply.

By asking Parliament for interim supply the Government is asking authority to make some expenditures before Parliament has actually studied and been able formally to approve those expenditures. In other words, it says, "Give me authority to spend now and you will approve later." It is like the airline slogan: Fly now and pay later.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Spend now and approve later.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes. This is the principle under an interim supply bill. On that account, when you extend the practice to the point where it was extended, say, last year, when we voted eleven-twelfths of the expenditures of the budget before completing the study in the other place, the principle of the supremacy of Parliament over the expenditure or the control of the purse is greatly eroded. There is no doubt about that.

In principle, it is possible for Parliament to approve the budget or the Estimates before the fiscal year commences. This fiscal year, as you know, will commence on April 1. Usually the Estimates are tabled in January. If my memory serves me aright, this year the Estimates were tabled around January 26. That means that Parliament has had two months to deal with them. Of course, I agree that is not sufficient, but usually if Parliament had about three or four months to consider the Estimates it could deal with them in time—for instance, if the Estimates were tabled four months before the beginning of the fiscal year and Parliament was in session at the time.

In practice, this is rather impossible, as sessions do not always start at the same time and the program, especially in the other place, is subject to changes due to circumstances. In the other house the review of the Estimates of the budget usually takes up to 60 or 80 days of sitting. An improvement should result from the adoption of the new rules, which limit the debate on the Estimates in the house itself to 30 days. If I am not mistaken, this would include the six supply motions concerning the Estimates of a given year. Therefore, it would probably be possible from now on, when you have a session beginning in January, to complete in the other place the study of the Estimates in time to adopt the final appropriation bill in June, that is, only two and a half or three months after the fiscal year has begun.

I suggest that if Parliament were able to examine the Estimates in that space of time, the study would be much more useful, instead of our being faced, as we were on the occasion of the last appropriation bill, with the situation that eleven-twelfths of the budgeted money had already been spent, thus making it seem a rather futile exercise to discuss it.

As far as the role of the Senate is concerned, I am in general agreement with the Leader of the Government. However, in my own view, the Senate has all the powers of the other place, except that a money bill cannot be initiated here. I suggest that the Senate may very well, if circumstances warrant it, not only vote against an appropriation bill but also may reduce a given item or may vote against a certain item. This is, of course, looking at the situation from a strictly constitutional viewpoint. In practice it has not been exercised very often and I agree it should not be done as a simple caprice, but again the right of this house to vote against or to reduce the Estimates or an item of expenditure in the Estimates should not be doubted in any manner.

I want to add that the Finance Committee has been helping the Senate very much indeed since it resumed its sittings two years ago, inasmuch as it enables the members to examine the Estimates and to obtain some knowledge, fairly appropriate knowledge I would say, of the Estimates before they come to us, whether in the form of interim supply, supplementary Estimates or as the last appropriation bill. I feel we should commend the work of the Finance Committee and continue the practice of referring all the Estimates to it.

Honourable senators, I want to add just a word specifically about the present bill. Usually when Parliament is sitting the Government seeks only one-twelfth of the Estimates by way of interim supply. If a recess is foreseen as, for instance, during the summer, then they sometimes ask for two months' or three months' supply. In the present instance Parliament is seeking two months' supply, and I have not seen in the debates of the other place the reason for this. I can appreciate, of course, the case for the Government in this bill asking for more than one-sixth where there are special reasons as, for example, where expenditures have to be made during a given season. But I am speaking at the moment of the general clause of the bill which seeks one-sixth instead of the usual one-twelfth.

I have nothing else to add, honourable senators, except to say that we are making progress in our procedure for considering appropriation bills. We have less reason for complaints as this system has been improved over the years, I remember some years ago we had bitter, and in my view justified, complaints, but I feel that everybody is very happy with the changes which have occurred.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: May I remind honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Connolly speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I have only a word to add to what has already been said. At the outset may I thank honourable Senator Flynn for the remarks he has made this afternoon.

On the question of the reduction of Estimates or certain items in the Estimates, I have sat in the Senate now for 12 years, at times on the Government side and for a time on the Opposition side, and while it has never been my lot to have to take this stand, I have seen successive leaders stand in this place and say, "If we reduce an item in the Estimates we will upset the ways and means"; and this is the traditional position that governments have always taken. I hope I shall not have to take this stand at any time, but I realize that the time may come when I shall have to stand here and say, "I must oppose on behalf of the Government the reduction of this item." I hope I shall be able to say it and at the same time not concede that the Senate has not the right to do so, because there is constitutional authority for this right. In practice, leaders have stood in this place and have had to take this stand, and perhaps the matter of cabinet solidarity, as much as anything else, has played its part in the position taken.

I am not altogether sure that Senator Flynn is completely right about the customary practice of seeking only one month's supply. In modern practice in Parliament—and perhaps we are getting to the point where we can do this, particularly in the other place where they can negotiate a longer period—this is done by agreement and I think it helps greatly. In my view it does us no damage here having regard to the work being done by the Senate Finance Committee. I thank the honourable senator for the remarks he has made.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT OF FINANCE COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 24, the report of the Standing Committee on Finance with respect to the expenditures set out in the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1966.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I should like your indulgence at the beginning of my remarks, and I also ask for leniency from His Honour in the Chair if I transgress the rules, to make a reference to those who have departed from this chamber by death over the last year. Unfortunately I was not here when tributes were paid to them at the opening of the session.

Senator Wood was not one of the most active members of this house; he was stricken with a serious illness which incapacitated him. He was a genial gentleman and was very highly respected in his native province. I join with others who have already paid tribute to his memory in extending sympathy to his family.

Senator Comeau came from the Atlantic provinces, being a product of the Acadian community. The Acadians suffered a cruel wrong when they were dispersed a little over two hundred years ago. The evidence of their virility and their power to survive lay in the fact that many of them returned to the province in which they had been born and in which they had hoped to spend their future years.

Senator Comeau occupied a room on the fourth floor not far from mine, and I saw him frequently, we visited back and forth as senators do. He was a rugged man: when I entered his office and saw him sitting at his desk he reminded me of the Rock of Gibraltar. He was not an eloquent man and took little part in the debates of this house, but he was very wise. I doubt if there was anyone in this chamber who had a better understanding of the weaknesses and the foibles of human nature. It was a pleasure to talk with him; it was a pleasure to listen to his comments, always grounded in sound common sense. I think we are all the poorer because he has left us.

Now I come to Senator Paul Bouffard. Senator Bouffard was an adornment to this house. He did not have the volatile characteristics of some of his compatriots. He was not guided by his emotions so much as by his reason, and to the practice of law in his native province and to his approach to all the questions that came before the Senate he brought a clear, logical, concise mind, unemotional in its approach, arriving at judgments based on the facts as he saw them. I am bound to say that Senator Bouffard was, among all our other colleagues, one who deserved the highest respect of every member of this house.

I want to say a word now about my old friend Senator Lambert, and here let me confess that it is difficult for me to speak without some emotion. I met Senator Lambert first about 55 years ago. He had graduated from Toronto University and had chosen the profession of journalism as a career. He joined the staff of the old Toronto Globe as a reporter under the guidance of Stewart Lyon who was then its editor. After preliminary training in Toronto, Mr. Lyon sent him to western Canada for two years. In the second year he returned to Toronto and the next year he was made a permanent representative of the Globe in that vast expanse which was known as the prairie country. It was then that I met him. We were associated together in the old Progressive movement of 1921. He was not only a journalist, not only a keen observer, but he was intensely interested in all that was going on around him, and it was not long before he developed a sympathy for what was known as the "agrarian movement" on the prairies, and gave it his unstinted support.

Later he came to Ottawa and engaged in the the political sphere. Still later he was appointed to this house, and I may say that in my judgment he was one of the ornaments of the Senate.

Senator Lambert was interested in life; he was interested in politics; he was interested, above all, in good government.

There were times when he exploded quickly. It reminded me of a sultry summer's day out on the prairies when a thunderhead, as we called it, sailed across the heavens and the sunshine. Then there was a flash of lightning and a loud clap of thunder, and then the whole thing dissolved. Senator Lambert was like that in some of the emotional statements he made, which were only emotional for the moment.

He had a good mind and was well read. I doubt if there was anyone in this house who had a clearer understanding and better knowledge of the history of the Senate. He was a staunch friend at all times. If you were going into battle you never needed to look around to see if Norman Lambert was coming along with you; he was always there. He had those qualities of friendship that engage good people everywhere. We shall all miss him. I personally shall miss him very much indeed.

This morning I paid a visit to St. Vincent Hospital where Mrs. Lambert, ill with a disease from which she may not recover, is living. All I can do, along with others, is extend to her and to the family my deepest sympathy in their loss and the loss to the community in which he lived.

As to the news we have received today of the passing of Senator Bradley and Senator Woodrow, I have little to add. Senator Bradley entered Parliament after the achievement of Confederation with Newfoundland, and was a member of the Government for a time, representing that province. Later he was appointed to the Senate. It was well known to those of us who saw him frequently that his health had become impaired. To his widow and all who were associated with him in Newfoundland, I extend my heartfelt sympathy.

I now come to discuss for a few moments the report which is before us. Honourable senators, I am now in order, although if I had felt up to it, the discussion should have taken place last week on the motion to refer the 1966-67 Estimates to the Finance Committee.

I believe that over the years the Finance Committee has done an excellent job, but as a member of it and as its chairman quite a number of years ago I have always been a little pessimistic as to what we have really achieved. It is true we have the Estimates before us of the various departments, and we have the officials—some of whom are very capable men—who come and explain to us what the items represent and the scope they cover. However, they do not initiate the Estimates; they do not initiate the spending directly. The Government has to take the responsibility for that. I think it would be very difficult indeed to curtail these Estimates, these expenditures, by any effort of the Finance Committee or any action by the Senate.

My thoughts on it have evolved to some extent around the idea that the examination of the Estimates might be made somewhat subsidiary to the consideration and examination of other matters arising out of the Estimates.

Let me refer to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, for instance. This year we shall be asked to vote a little over $110 million for that corporation. One of the things that impresses itself upon my mind is the fact that the C.B.C. is more and more becoming a little empire, complete unto itself. It reports only through a minister of the Government. That has been so ever since it was established, on the theory that there must be no political partisanship or influence operating in the conduct of the affairs of the C.B.C. Quite frankly I do not like a situation where $110 million of the money of the taxpayers of this country is handled in what appears to me to be a rather irresponsible fashion.

One suggestion I have to make is that the Finance Committee could quite properly call the top officials of the C.B.C. before it, and ask them: "How do you justify this expenditure? We want to know." We could do that quite properly and quite legally, and it would be quite within the powers of the Senate and of the Standing Committee on Finance.

Let me give you an illustration. It was announced in the press two or three weeks ago, when this famous lady whose name was before the public was discovered living in Germany, that the C.B.C. paid her $5,000 for a 20-minute television interview. I say to you there is no fundamental reason why that money should have been so spent. Not only did the C.B.C. pay the lady $5,000, but they sent a battery of so-called experts with all the necessary television apparatus to interview her, and that cost money. I think the C.B.C. management should be put on the carpet for these things. It should be asked to explain and justify them. The Finance Committee could do that, and could make a report on the whole thing.

There is much else in the administration of the C.B.C. to which exception can be taken.

It is a curious thing, honourable senators, but nevertheless true, as has been proven by history, that if you give people unlimited authority without control or regulation, then 99 times out of 100 they abuse it. It is in the very essence of human nature to do that. That is why we need these checks and controls. It is my hope that the genial chairman—and a very excellent chairman he is too—of the Finance Committee will give some consideration to this suggestion.

There are two or three other matters that I should like to refer to briefly. I have been appalled at times, surprised at times, and angered at other times, by the quantity of franked mail that comes from Government departments to my desk. I have opened envelopes to find announcements I have already read in the morning paper. The extent of this has grown outrageously. Of course, some of my older colleagues in the house know that I am old-fashioned. Some of the newer senators who are cutting their eye teeth in the Senate may not understand this. But, the degree to which we have expanded the governing machinery of this country is frightening and something beyond my understanding.

If I may make a personal allusion, I will say that I was a member of Sir Robert Borden's Government during the First War for nearly two years, until the war was over and the troops were back home. Throughout the period of the last war I was a member of Mr. Mackenzie King's Government. Indeed, I sat on the War Committee of the Cabinet which met every day. I am not complaining about the burden of work, but I can say to this house that my working day was at least from 12 to 14 hours, and sometimes more, six days a week, and sometimes on Sunday. But, we did not feel at that time it was necessary to surround ourselves with a number of private secretaries, public relations men—heaven forbid that we should ever get more of those—executive assistants, and all that paraphernalia. Let me say to this house that I think the War Committee of the Cabinet, and indeed the whole cabinet during the last war, had to deal with problems that certainly were the equal of any that a government has to deal with today. When I see a minister—and I do not care if he is the Prime Minister himself—who has to surround himself with three, four or five executive assistants or parliamentary secretaries and what-not, I simply say to myself that that gentleman does not know how to organize his own office. I say that deliberately, and I have said it repeatedly.

Mr. Mackenzie King introduced this business of parliamentary secretaries. In a country like Britain where the Parliament at Westminster deals with all of the problems that are dealt with by our provinces here, there might be some excuse for having them. When Mr. King asked me one day, "Well, Crerar, who do you want for your parliamentary secretary?" I said that I did not want one. He said that I should have one. I replied, "What good would it do? I cannot delegate a parliamentary secretary to settle a matter with the deputy minister or any other official of the department. That is my responsibility." I would not tell a parliamentary secretary to take a certain matter up with a deputy minister; I would call in the deputy minister and settle it with him myself. The result was that I never had a parliamentary secretary, and I do not think I lost anything by it.

Another matter that the Standing Committee on Finance might take a look at is this very substantial item in the Estimates which appears under the head "Loans, Investments and Advances." If my memory is right—it may be failing, and I was not here last year for reasons beyond my own control—I have a recollection that there was a loan of $10 million made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I recall that there was some comment on it at the time. I do not know whether that loan is still outstanding, but when it came up it struck me as being an odd thing. What was the sense of making a loan to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which depends for every dollar it spends on a vote from the Government? Where is it going to get the money to repay the loan? There are others of these loans and investments that could be scrutinized. In that field there is a place for inquiry to be made.

The important thing is to establish sound basic principles upon which government is conducted. Of course, government has greatly changed over the years, and people say it must change with the times. That to me is nonsense. Principles do not change. There was a time when our forefathers looked upon the institution of democratic government as a means of keeping people in order so that every man could work in peace and security, in accordance with the dictum of the old Hebrew prophet who, three thousand years ago, looked forward to a time when every man should sit under his own vine and fig tree and no one dare molest him or make him afraid.

Now a new concept of democratic government is being preached vociferously by quite a number of people who have little sense of responsibility. The new concept is that the main function of democratic government is to look after everyone from the cradle to the grave. I do not go for that. I may be outdated, I daresay I am, but I do not agree with that concept.

Another matter that might engage our attention is that of loans and investments. I suggest to the Chairman of the Finance Committee that it would be worth while to call the Auditor General and get his comments on this matter. He is the servant of Parliament, not of the Cabinet.

The next point I wish to mention is the amount of expenditures. My remarks on this subject will not appear as a new feature to my colleagues in this house, who have heard me talk about it ad nauseum at times. However, I observe that our Estimates this year, with the supplementaries that we may expect before March 31, 1967, will probably reach $10 billion. That to me is a sizeable amount of money. May I suggest that we could reduce that volume of spending by 10 per cent, reduce the amount by $1 billion. No doubt some will be horrified at the suggestion, but I say that if we could import into government administration something of the quality to be found in business administration, such an economy could be effected. If we could apply to government administration, for instance, the efficiency that a corporation like the Canadian Pacific Railway applies to its operations, or that of a bank, steel company, or any industrial concern, I am confident we could reduce the amount by 10 per cent.

Undoubtedly someone will say that cannot be done, that you can never equate governmental administration with private business administration, that they are in different categories and you can never expect to conduct a government administration as efficiently as a private administration. Anyone who believes that is true—and I will not admit it—should advocate keeping government out of administration of all these things.

Honourable senators, I am speaking under somewhat of a handicap and perhaps I should not have made these observations. As some of you know, it is my intention to retire from the Senate at the end of May.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Oh, no!

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Perhaps I should not take up the time of the house in the consideration of all these matters that I am suggesting to the Chairman of the Finance Committee would be worth while examining. However, they are matters that come within the purview of the committee; there is no doubt in my mind about that. If these matters could be examined, perhaps some light could be thrown in some dark places, and if we get the right kind of an inquiry and the right kind of a report, the report should be circulated to every newspaper in Canada.

The only way we can improve the mechanism of government and make it more efficient is, in the end, through the pressure of public opinion.

Believe me, honourable senators, if I am any judge—and I have been observing the scene for many years—there is a growing feeling that all is not going as it should in the Parliament of Canada. It is interesting to reflect that all the great revolutions in history had their origin mainly in oppressive taxation, and I am not one of those who are so confident that we have our democratic system so strongly anchored that the forces of passion cannot move people to upset it. That is possible.

Part of the responsibility of leadership in public life, and also of Parliament, is to create and maintain and earn the confidence of the people generally in their democratic institutions. If that is not done, then we are, at large, on a rough and stormy ocean.

I regret to say that in recent years we have failed to instill that confidence in our people. As a result, what do you find about the body politic? You find criticism and a growing lack of confidence, following which every adverse wind that blows is listened to, and every adverse criticism is heeded.

Honourable senators, to sum up I would say that in the past ten years, indeed ever since the end of World War II, we have been governing ourselves largely through our emotions. It is the emotional appeal which has carried weight—the slogans, the headlines. Everything we do tends to emotional disturbance or appeal. All I can say is that if we want to preserve and hand down to future generations the freedom that was won for us by hard-fought battles of those who went before us, we shall never do so by emotional appeal.

The democratic system of government is based essentially on the theory that human beings are reasonable and can be appealed to in a reasonable way. Get the facts—that is what Senator Leonard's committee is all about—and let the people judge. I have faith enough in the Canadian people that they will do that.

I believe that 80 per cent of the Canadian people are the finest people in the world. They do the work of this country; they look after our municipal institutions, our schools, our churches, our hospitals, our agricultural affairs, irrespective of what their religion or politics may be, and they do it well. Then we have 20 per cent of the people who create 90 per cent of the problems with which governments have to deal. To my way of thinking it is unfortunate that we have tended to cater too much to the 20 per cent and not recognized the worth of the 80 per cent as we should have done.

Honourable senators, I hope to make still one more speech before I walk out of the doors for the last time and it will be on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, which the whip and our leader (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) have kindly offered to keep open for debate until after the Easter recess. My remarks will not deal so much with the Speech from the Throne; I might endeavour to tell you what I would try to do if I were Prime Minister of Canada.

I am grateful for your patience. Let me say, as I have said before: I have an abounding faith in Canada, I have an abounding faith in its future. After the war there was no country in the whole wide world more highly regarded than Canada. We had made tremendous contributions to the stabilization of the world. I fear that we have lost some of that regard, and one of the tasks of Parliament should be to try to regain that position.

Honourable senators, may I close by wishing you a very happy holiday.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Croll, debate adjourned.

DIVORCE (EXTENSION OF GROUNDS) BILL

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 24, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck for the second reading of Bill S-19, to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, I would like to join with those senators who have already spoken, in extending sympathy to the families of our two late colleagues, Senator Woodrow and Senator Bradley. With the indulgence of the Senate, I wish to welcome the new senators. I hope they will enjoy their sojourn in this chamber, and I feel sure they will contribute much to our deliberations and live up to the traditions and principles that are forever a part of our democratic system of government.

Honourable senators may be interested to hear that Prince Edward Island has the oldest divorce legislation in Canada, a divorce law having been passed back in 1778. This act apparently was never repealed.

In 1835 an act was passed for establishing a court of divorce on the Island, which was a colony at that time, and for repealing a certain act therein mentioned. This former act was the one passed by the General Assembly in 1933, as above mentioned, in the third year of the reign of King William IV.

The act of 1835 set up a divorce court under the jurisdiction of the Lieutenant Governor, or other administrator of government, and five members of His Majesty's Council. At the same time it was enacted that the jurisdiction of the other courts in matters apart from divorce could not be altered or affected. It also made provision for the Lieutenant Governor, or other administrator, to deputize the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court to act in his place or stead if for any reason he could not act. It gave the grounds for divorce which named other grounds besides adultery; it provided that children should not in any way be prejudiced or affected with any disability thereby, and the wife should not be barred of her dower, or the husband be deprived of tenancy by the courtesy of England unless it should be expressly adjudged and determined by such sentence of divorce.

In 1869 an additional act was passed to provide for the service of divorce process on absent parties.

In 1949 an act was passed to amend an act for establishing a court of divorce in the Province of Prince Edward Island and for repealing a certain act therein mentioned, the act of 1835.

This amendment gave jurisdiction to the Supreme Court of Judicature, concurrently with the Court of Judicature. It provided for transfer of causes upon application to the court of divorce. The court of the Chief Justice presiding in chambers could order that any action or proceeding on record, or pending, in the court of divorce should be transferred to the Supreme Court provided no such order should be granted if the application was opposed by any party to the proceeding or by the King's Proctor.

In 1952 a further amendment to the divorce act was enacted which struck out the above provision and substituted the following:

> (a) an order for transfer of an action or proceeding to the Supreme Court may be made upon the consent of the Queen's Proctor, and either upon the consent of all parties by or against whom any relief is claimed; or
> (b) after notice to such parties and in such manner as the Court or Chief Justice may direct.

Honourable senators, this is the history of our divorce legislation in Prince Edward Island. Speaking to Bill S-19, I may say that during the many divorce cases I have listened to while a member of the Divorce Committee of the Senate, I have been impressed with the fact that our laws regarding divorce are too severe. After all, while adultery is considered the unforgivable sin—perhaps in this day and age it is not quite alone in being unforgivable. I have heard women testify to almost unthinkable insults, indecencies, and indignities suffered at the hands of brutal husbands. Also, we have heard husbands tell of trying to live with wives who made life with them utterly impossible. I feel the time has come when our laws regarding divorce must be broadened.

Of course, the problem of children is always a factor and it is regrettable that when children are involved, a divorce resorted to by parents who cannot live together is particularly sad. I remember reading one time an article about broken homes. It said that a bad father was better than no father and that a bad mother was still a mother to a child. That is debatable, for I think that the influence and effect of irresponsible parents and an unhappy home cannot be good for children morally, physically or mentally. The example set in such a home must be very tragic, and must leave with children memories that can well affect them throughout their lives.

Today the general consensus seems to be that our federal divorce laws are outdated and must be broadened to take in grounds other than adultery. Those other grounds are cited in the bill before us, so I will not name them. I must say though that I do not think that a marriage should be dissolved on grounds of insanity for a period of only five years. I have known of cases where a party recovered after a lapse of more than five years.

I wish to pay tribute to Senator Roebuck with whom I have been associated in the Divorce Committee and whom I have known to be a most able, conscientious, faithful and hard-working Chairman of the Divorce Committee. In bringing in this Bill S-19, he has taken a big step toward improving our divorce laws and thereby enabling many unhappy and ill-used people to find a better way of life. I am happy to support this bill.

Hon. John Hnatyshyn: Honourable senators, I had thought at one time of making a more lengthy speech on this bill but in view of the fact that there is some urgency in having it referred to the joint committee, with your permission I would make but two or three points.

In the first place I congratulate the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) in bringing it before this house. As a result of questions asked by Senator Choquette and Senator Deschatelets as to whether this bill applies to the Province of Quebec and the Province of Newfoundland, some discussion has arisen. I believe the sponsor of the bill was wise in framing it as he did, so that it does not apply to those provinces.

Honourable senators, I would like to see an equal law for all. On the other hand, it is the privilege and the right, especially of the Province of Quebec, to take the stand which they take on divorce, and if it is to apply to that province I would agree with the honourable sponsor that the initiative should come from that province and not from someone else. That is not the way things have been done in this chamber since I have been here, and that is not the way they have been done so far as I know in the history of the Senate. There has never been any attempt by one section of the community to force their opinion on another. Perhaps I am transgressing, but let me say that in my opinion by following that course this chamber has done more than any other body in Canada to maintain unity and good understanding between the various parts of this country. While we may differ on some questions we have also learned to respect the opinions of those who differ from us.

As I have said before, in my view the sponsor has very wisely framed this bill in its present form. If it is to be amended it can be done after discussion in committee. In this bill we are not discussing the principle of divorce because we already have divorce in Canada. I heartily support the principle of this bill in enlarging the grounds for divorce. I do not say that because I believe in divorce. Personally I abhor divorce, and I do not think anyone in this chamber is in favour of it. I accept the proposition that family life is the very bulwark of our civilization and our nation. But let me add that in some 34 years' practice of my profession of law—and while I was not specializing in divorce you cannot help but have some regular clients come to you with family troubles—and after seven years of service on the Divorce Committee, I have not yet seen a case where a divorce was applied for where there was any family life. Usually in the cases we had to deal with the home was broken beyond any repair, and in my opinion to talk of the sanctity of the home in such cases makes no sense.

We are not encouraging divorce. If I thought we were, or if I thought we were making it as lax as it appears to be in some of the states south of us, I would be against enlarging the grounds, but all I think we are doing is providing some corrective measure for homes that are already broken. I have seen cases of desertion—where the wife and family lived in destitute circumstances, having been deserted for years, without a cent being contributed to their welfare. In such circumstances, in my view, it is not a question of the sanctity of the home, for there is no home. A divorce would merely be a corrective measure to help that person seek another chance for a happy life.

The principle of enlarging the grounds for divorce was before this house in 1938 and again in 1955. Perhaps the late Senator McMeans, who sponsored the bill in 1938, and Senator Aseltine, who sponsored the bill in 1955—and the present sponsor who took a very active part in that debate and had the same opinions as he has now—were ahead of the times. I do not know. It seems to me that at the present time, especially in the common law provinces where divorce is tried by the courts, there is a vast majority of people who feel that our law as to the grounds is archaic, that it should be brought up to date to meet the circumstances of life as txisting in this country. I do not intend to go into all the reasons why conditions have changed. I could speak on that for a long time—about the two world wars, about people not living in rural communities any more but living in cities and mostly in apartments—but I simply want to say that for the first time the General Council of the United Church of Canada have taken a stand on this important question. I read all the debates on this subject in 1938 and in 1955, and if I remember correctly it was mentioned by one or two of the senators participating in those debates that no church had ever taken a stand in this regard. Well, I am sure that the General Council of the United Church of Canada took this stand not because they want divorce or because they believe in divorce. I believe they took it after seeing many of these broken homes where the grounds in most cases are much more important than adultery, and they felt that the grounds should be enlarged. It has been said that there is a danger that if you allow desertion for three years or so as a ground for divorce, there will be too much collusion. I submit to you, honourable senators, that if a person is ready to obtain a collusive divorce why wait three years? It would be much easier to commit adultery by collusion and obtain it immediately.

Honourable senators, there has been criticism in the press about the way divorces were handled in the committee of this house, but it seems to me that during the seven years I was a member of that committee every case was given as careful and attentive consideration as it would have been given in any court of any of the common law provinces having jurisdiction to grant divorce. The members of that committee did their work conscientiously and in a thorough manner. Naturally with adultery being the only ground for divorce some cases might have gone through that were collusive, but collusion is very difficult to detect either in the committee of this house or in the courts. We cannot say how many cases went through that were collusive, for if there was any suspicion of collusion a divorce was never granted any more than it would have been granted in the courts.

In conclusion I compliment the sponsor of this bill, the Chairman of the Divorce Committee, for the very wise and intelligent way in which this question has been handled throughout.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Burchill, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

(5) Subject to paragraph (a) of subsection (4), where an offer of shares of the capital stock of the Bank is made under section 36 of the Bank Act, the bank may accept any subscription

(a) if the terms of the offer contain provisions to the effect that in the case of a share offered to a shareholder whose recorded address, at the time fixed for determining the shareholders to whom the offer is made, is a place within Canada and who is not at that time, to the knowledge of the bank, a non-resident, a subscription will not be accepted if the share is to be recorded in the name of a non-resident;

(6) Default in complying with the provisions of this section does not affect the validity of a transfer of a share of the capital stock of the Bank that has been made or recorded in a register of transfers of the Bank or the

(5) If any provision of this section is contravened at a general meeting of the shareholders of the Bank, no proceeding, matter or thing at that meeting is void by reason only of such contravention, but any such proceeding, matter or thing is, at any time within nine months from the day of commencement of the general meeting at which the contravention occurred, voidable at the option of the shareholders by a resolution passed at a special general meeting of the shareholders.'

'9. (1) The directors may make such by-laws as they deem necessary to carry out the intent of sections 6 to 10 and in particular, but without restricting the generality of the foregoing, the directors may make by-laws

(a) requiring any person in whose name a share of the capital stock of the Bank is held to submit a declaration

(i) with respect to the ownership of such share,

(ii) with respect to the place in which the shareholder and any person in whose right or for whose use or benefit the share is held are ordinarily resident,

(iii) whether the shareholder is associated with any other shareholder, and

(iv) with respect to such other matters as the directors may deem relevant for the purposes of sections 6 to 10

(b) requiring any person desiring to have a transfer of a share to him made or recorded in a register of transfers of the Bank or desiring to subscribe for a share of the capital stock of the Bank to submit such a declaration as may be required pursuant to this section in the case of a shareholder; and

(c) providing for the detemination of the circumstances in which any declarations shall be required, their form and the times at which they are to be submitted.

(2) Where pursuant to any by-law made under subsection (1) any declaration is required to be submitted by any shareholder or person in respect of the transfer of or subscription for any share, the Bank may refuse to allow such transfer to be made or recorded in a register of transfers of the Bank or to accept such subscription without the submission of the required declaration.

(3) The Bank and any person who is a director, officer, employee or agent of the Bank, may rely upon any information contained in a declaration required by the Bank pursuant to this section or any information otherwise acquired in respect of any matter that might be the subject of such a declaration; and no action lies against the Bank or any such person for anything done or omitted in good faith in reliance upon any such information.

(4) Where for any of the purposes of section 7, the Bank requires to establish the total number of shares of the capital stock of the Bank held by non-residents, the Bank may calculate the total number of such shares held by non-residents to be the total of

(a) the number of shares held by all shareholders whose recorded addresses are places outside Canada; and

(b) the number of shares held by all shareholders each of whose aggregate individual holdings of such shares has a par value of five thousand dollars or more and whose recorded addresses are places within Canada but who to the knowledge of the Bank are non-residents; and such calculation may be made as of a date not earlier than four months before the day on which the calculation is made.

(5) Where by any calculation made under subsection (4) the total number of shares held by non-residents is under ten per cent of the total issued and outstanding shares of the capital stock of the Bank, the number of shares the transfer of which by residents to non-residents the Bank may allow to be made or recorded in the registers of transfers of the Bank shall be so limited as not to increase the total number of shares held by non-residents to more than ten per cent of the total issued and outstanding shares of the capital stock of the Bank.

(6) Notwithstanding subsections (1) and (2) of section 7 where in the case of a transfer of any shares of the capital stock of the Bank to a transferee it appears that

(a) the aggregate par value of all shares of the capital stock of the Bank held by the transferee as shown by the register of shareholders of the Bank at a date not more than four months earlier is less than five thousand dollars, and

(b) the aggregate par value of the shares included in the transfer and any shares acquired by the transferee after the date mentioned in paragraph (a) and still held by him as shown by the register of transfers of the Bank in which it is sought to have the transfer made or recorded is less than five thousand dollars, the Bank is entitled to assume that the transferee is not and will not be associated with any other shareholder and, unless the address to be recorded in the register of shareholders of the Bank for the transferee is a place outside Canada, that he is a resident.'

'10. (1) Notwithstanding section 7 the Bank, upon its incorporation and with the prior approval of the Treasury Board, may, either before or after the first general meeting of the shareholders of the Bank, accept subscriptions for shares by residents without regard to the provisions of section 7 but no such subscriptions for shares may be accepted by the Bank except in accordance with and subject to such terms and conditions as the Treasury Board may by order prescribe.

(2) Notwithstanding subsection (2) of section 8, the voting rights pertaining to any shares of the capital stock of the Bank acquired through the acceptance of a subscription pursuant to subsection (1) of this section and held in the name of and for the use or benefit of a resident may be exercised by or on behalf of the holder thereof in accordance with and subject to such terms and conditions as the Treasury Board may by order prescribe.'

'11. Sections 6 to 10 inclusive of this Act shall have effect notwithstanding anything in the Bank Act but unless otherwise provided by Parliament shall cease to have effect upon the last day upon which the Bank may carry on the business of banking under the provisions of section 6 of that Act.' "

2. Renumber original clauses 6 and 7 as clauses 12 and 13 respectively.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Salter A. Hayden,
Chairman.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF COMMITTEE—SUPPLEMENTARIES (E)

Wednesday, March 30, 1966

The Standing Committee on Finance to which was referred the Supplementary Estimates (E) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1966, has in obedience to the order of reference of March 24th, 1966, examined the said Supplementary Estimates (E) and now reports as follows:

1. Pursuant to the said order of reference your committee proceeded to examine the expenditures set out in the above-mentioned Supplementary Estimates (E) and called as witness Dr. George F. Davidson, Secretary of the Treasury Board.

2. The expenditures contained in the said Supplementary Estimates (E) amounted to $173,701,576. These are the final estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1966, and they bring the total of expenditures for one year as set out in the main and all supplementary Estimates to the total sum of $7,999,605,015. This figure does not include Loans, Investments and Advances which amounted to $96,605,791 in Supplementary Estimates (E), bringing the total of such Loans, Investments and Advances for the whole fiscal year to $425,040,892.

3. The expenditures of $7,999,605,015 are an increase over the previous year of $781,605,-015 and by percentage they are 10.8% more than the total for the year 1964-65. This compares with the estimated increase in the gross national production of approximately 8%. These figures bring up to date and replace the comparable statistics in the report of your committee submitted to the Senate on March 10th last, and an amended table is attached to this report showing the expenditures since 1955 and the percentage increases from year to year.

4. In his evidence before the committee, the Secretary of the Treasury Board explained the various items of expenditures and answered all questions of the members of the committee to their satisfaction.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

T. D'Arcy Leonard,
Chairman.

PROPERTY QUALIFICATION OF SENATORS

SUPPLEMENTARY RETURN PRESENTED

The Hon. the Speaker presented a supplementary return, submitted by the Clerk of the Senate in accordance with Rule 105, listing the names of members of the Senate who have renewed their declaration of property qualification.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA
31 March, 1966

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Robert Taschereau, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 31st March, at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. G. Cherrier
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate.

ADMIRALTY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-161, to amend the Admiralty Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, yesterday with commendable expedition the other place gave first, second and third readings to two relatively minor and noncontentious bills. Bill C-161 is the first of these. Though these bills are noncontentious, they are important in the sense that it is desirable that they should receive Royal Assent before the Easter recess.

Honourable senators, I would ask for unanimous consent to deal with these bills today.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Nelson Rattenbury moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be read the second time now.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-161, which was passed in the other place yesterday, is, as the honourable leader has said, quite straightforward. I shall try to keep my explanations as brief as possible.

It is a bill to amend subsection (1) of section 7, and subsection (2) of section 13 of the Admiralty Act.

Dealing with the first amendment, section 7 (1) of the Admiralty Act provides that a district judge in Admiralty or, if he is incapacitated, a judge of the Exchequer Court, may with the approval of the Governor in Council, appoint a deputy judge from among persons having the qualifications of a district judge. This may be a barrister of not less than ten years' standing or a judge of another superior or county court, but it has become the practice to appoint as deputy judges only persons who are already judges of other courts.

The appointment of one deputy judge for a district, however, is not adequate to meet the needs of certain Admiralty districts, particularly those of British Columbia and Quebec—and more recently, I understand, that of Toronto.

It is proposed, therefore, in clause 1 of the bill that the Admiralty Act be amended to authorize the appointment for each Admiralty district of one or more deputy judges, but not exceeding three.

Deputy judges receive no salary, but the Admiralty Rules provide for their retaining certain fees. The appointment of these additional judges will, therefore, not require the appropriation of any moneys by Parliament.

Clause 2 repeals subsection (2) of section 13 and substitutes a new subsection. Marshals of the Admiralty Court are officers whose main duties relate to the execution of documents of the court, such as writs of summons, attachment and execution; in many ways their duties in the Admiralty court are similar to those of sheriffs in other courts.

As the explanatory note to clause 2 indicates, subsection (2) of section 13 of the Admiralty Act at present provides that all sheriffs in the provinces of Canada are marshals of the Court within their respective counties or district. It has been recommended by the Canadian Bar Association that the jurisdiction of sheriffs as marshals of the court should extend to the whole Admiralty District in which are located the counties or districts for which they hold the office of sheriff. That is the first purpose of this amendment.

The second purpose is to provide that deputy sheriffs in the provinces are deputy marshals of the court for the Admiralty district in which the counties or districts for which they hold office are located. This amendment was also recommended by the Canadian Bar Association.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, one of the redeeming features of this bill which has been succinctly explained by my honourable friend Senator Rattenbury is that the deputy judges receive no salary, although the Admiralty Rules provide for their retaining certain fees. The appointment of these additional judges will not require, therefore, the appropriation of any moneys by Parliament.

The bill was given the first, second and third readings in the other place within the space of a few minutes. I have examined it, and I find it noncontentious and containing nothing complicated. Therefore, I am wholeheartedly supporting it.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, first I should like to thank Senator Rattenbury for the explanation he has given of this bill. He undertook this task on very short notice, but I would remind the house that Senator Rattenbury is one of the few people in this chamber who have had considerable experience in the merchant service of this country. He explained a bill in the same category a year or so ago when he was a very new senator, and he is beginning to earn the title of "Admiral of the Senate." Perhaps we shall be hearing from him on this subject on other occasions.

I thank Senator Choquette, too, for his co-operation.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I rise not to oppose this measure but rather to advocate its passage.

This bill causes my memory to go back to the time when I, as Attorney General of Ontario, had to recommend for appointment a Master of the Supreme Court of that province. I needed a particularly capable judicial officer, and selected Mr. Justice Barlow, then Mr. Fred Barlow, Q.C., for the position. He took office and, as a result of the good work he did, he was appointed Judge of the Admiralty Court. Some time after, having been a very good judge in Admiralty, he was appointed to the Supreme Court of Ontario. I know he did a great deal as Judge in Admiralty, perhaps more than should have been asked of anyone who was also filling another post. His service as Judge in Admiralty was completely gratuitous, but he did it effectively.

Since those early days the St. Lawrence River has been developed, and Toronto is now an ocean port. I can see very good reasons indeed why there should be more strength on the Admiralty bench than has been the case in the recent past. I congratulate the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Rattenbury) who has explained this bill so clearly, and also the department for placing it before us. This is a bill that we can pass with an easy conscience.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): With leave, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

JUDGES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-160, to amend the Judges Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved, with leave, the second reading of Bill C-160, to amend the Judges Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is to amend four sections of the Judges Act.

These amendments provide for the appointment of eight new judges to four provinces. It provides for two additional judges to the Supreme Court of Ontario, one county court judge to the County of Middlesex, one judge to the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, one judge to the Alberta district court, and three judges to the Province of Quebec, providing eight appointments in all.

Section 92 of the British North America Act confers upon the provincial legislatures exclusive jurisdiction in relation to the administration of justice in each of the provinces, including the constitution, the maintenance and organization of the courts in the provinces.

Under section 100 of the British North America Act, however, provision is made whereby the salaries, allowances and pensions of judges are fixed and provided for by the Parliament of Canada.

In addition, the appointments are made by the Governor in Council. In other words, the federal Government appoints and pays the salaries of the judges, but their duties are set forth by the provinces.

With respect to the appointments provided for in this bill, three of the provinces which requested the appointment of judges have already passed the necessary legislation. In the Province of Quebec a bill is now before the legislature for that purpose.

Honourable senators may be interested to know why these additional judges are to be appointed. In Ontario the two additional judges will preside in the high court division of the Supreme Court of Ontario, known as the trial division. Litigation coming before the Ontario courts is increasing and it has been extremely difficult for trial judges to keep pace with the increase.

With regard to the County of Middlesex, which contains the large City of London, litigation has also greatly increased. There are already two county court judges in Middlesex, but they are unable to keep pace with the increased work in the courts; therefore, provision is made in this bill for the appointment of an additional county court judge.

In New Brunswick the additional judge will be appointed to the Queens Bench division, which is a trial division of that province.

In Alberta the additional district court judge will preside over the District of Northern Alberta, which includes the City of Edmonton, a city which is growing rapidly, with the consequence of increased litigation in the courts.

In the Province of Quebec, provision is being made for the appointment of three judges to the Superior Court. I shall state briefly the reason for this request. The Province of Quebec wished to establish a special court in which bankruptcy cases would be heard. In other provinces this has been done by one judge being selected from time to time to sit in bankruptcy court. I remember that in Ontario, 15 or 20 years ago, one judge sat exclusively on bankruptcy cases. There are to be two additional judges in the Montreal district, one of whom will hear bankruptcy cases; and there will be one additional judge in the District of Trois-Rivières.

Honourable senators, this bill is for the appointment of eight judges. I am sure all honourable senators appreciate that the provinces would not request these appointments unless they felt there was need for them.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, it is a particular pleasure to join my distinguished friend and colleague, the former Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald, Brantford), in supporting this bill.

The bill was passed in the House of Commons without division. In each instance the appointment of the additional judges has been recommended by the attorneys general of the province.

There is no question about the need to make these appointments. The Bench is being heavily overworked in all provinces, particularly in Ontario and Quebec. After all, this is one of our institutions that is still sacrosanct and has not been attacked, as has been the Senate, unnecessarily, and the House of Commons with perhaps some reason. Here the Bench is sacrosanct, and it is important that we should maintain it in that high position by giving its judges proper time to deliberate on questions relating to the administration of justice.

Therefore, I have great pleasure in supporting the honourable Senator W. Ross

Macdonald in his motion for the second reading of this bill.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I will support this bill with necessary reservations. I have pointed out many times that some judges join commissions, having first been appointed and taken the oath of office to act as judges, to listen to cases and to render judgments.

I know that it is not always pleasant for judges to travel like commercial travellers from one part of a province to another, because they do not all have permanent residence in certain cities. Some judges have their office in Montreal or Quebec City but have to travel through the Province of Quebec, and go to such distant places as the Magdalen Islands. I speak only of the Province of Quebec because I am more familiar with the conditions there than elsewhere.

The judges take the oath to render justice. Some of them serve on commissions—some of them do well, others do not.

My honourable friend Senator Walker spoke of the high regard that one must have for judges. I agree with him on that, provided the judges start by respecting themselves and preaching by example to others. We have unfortunate cases. It is difficult to speak of them, but the newspapers are full of it at one time or another.

An inquiry is still going on in the Province of Ontario in which a judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario is at present defending himself with respect to his involvement in a natural gas franchise when he was mayor of a city in Ontario. While the inquiry is on he does not sit in court; in virtue of this bill there is another judge to be appointed there while the former is defending himself for certain doubtful transactions that he made when he was mayor. I do not say more about it, because it is sub judice—mum is the word.

There is another pitifully sad case in the Province of Quebec. A judge has had to resign because he was a disciple of a mythological god named Bacchus, the god of the full barrel. I am sure that my friend the Leader of the Government does not know about this case, but I know it and it has been put under cover.

There is another case that we are all familiar with, of another judge who received his full salary. He is in Montreal but he does nothing because he had legal trouble. We have to put a new judge on the Bench of the Supreme Court of the Province of Ontario while a judge is busy defending himself in court. We have to appoint another judge to the Bench of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec because another judge there is sitting at home. I tell you nothing new. You know all about it. It is very unfortunate.

I am all for respect for judges, but when we hear the speeches that are made at the opening of courts telling us that we must all respect the judges, I repeat that we come to the same conclusion, that they must start by respecting themselves.

Honourable senators, what I have said does not apply to all judges. I know some are remarkable judges. I may add the name of one commissioner to the list I gave yesterday or the day before. It is the name of Mr. Justice Yves Bernier who has done considerable work for the Maritime law concerning pilots. He has been working on that for almost two years and has been doing a good job.

I do not say that all judges who sit on commissions are bad judges. I do not say that at all, but I am sure that some of them are bad; they do not know their business. Nevertheless, they are considered infallible.

For instance, take the case of the ten justices who have been appointed, one in each province, to do the work of redistribution of all constituencies. When there is a general complaint about it, do you think that it increases the respect which people should have for judges? They are subject to criticism, fair criticism, just criticism, because their work is badly done. No one can say nay.

The day before yesterday I argued a case before you, and if you had been the jury, honourable senators, I would have won it. I know that. But here it does not work on account of the boulders and potholes.

What I want is reform, and the Bench needs reform, too—not for all judges, but for some of them. It is the same as discharging over-ripe fruit from a basket of good fruit.

It seems to me that it can be done, but no one can accomplish anything. You cannot say a word. Although everybody knows about it, no one dares to speak about it and no one dares to act.

What will we do? There is a judge of the Ontario Supreme Court who is there defending himself. Is he guilty or not guilty? I do not know. Is he an honest man? Again, I do not know. I give him the benefit of the doubt.

What I complain of is that he has exposed himself, and on account of that we have a bill before us to replace him by another judge, a new man. If we appoint a new judge, does it mean that the judge who is now before the court will never again sit on the Bench? I do not know. I give him the benefit of the doubt.

With regard to the Superior Court it makes no difference. When a judge goes and he is replaced, it makes no difference in the payment of salary, but there is a certain degree of embarrassment on account of it. Besides that, in the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec the salary is paid to one judge who cannot sit for reasons that you know. This will mean that two salaries be paid when only one judge sits. It makes no sense.

I am surprised that this matter was not brought up before the House of Commons, and if I speak of it today it is because of the high regard I have for the Bench, and because I believe that the Bench should give good example if we want people to observe the law. At the present time we have a crisis of authority. Nobody respects anything. The Bench is there to be respected, provided that the judges respect themselves, and this is the case, I would say, in four out of five cases.

Now there is another class of judge, those who observe the Ten Commandments, who are honest citizens, but who are incompetent. They have been appointed on account of the friendship of the then Minister of Justice for some lawyers of the district of Montreal. They are judges who understand nothing, and if you try to explain something to them, they do not understand. They are honest but they understand nothing. There are judges who come from the District of Montreal. Some of them are sitting on the Bench in rural districts, and they are not qualified to do so.

The present Minister of Justice, Monsieur Cardin, comes from the rural district of Sorel and bears a great name. I admire him for the fact that he appointed lately to the Bench one of his confrères of the Richelieu Bar. He gave a chance to a lawyer who came from a rural district, and so much the better for him. All judges to rural districts should not be appointed from the City of Montreal, because in Montreal they have problems which do not exist in rural centres with regard to municipal law and many other matters. It is important to appoint somebody who has had experience in such things and who is familiar with the affairs of the people who live in that district.

There has been great favouritism in the appointment of judges for a long time, and I will give you an illustration which may surprise you. There is presently sitting a judge who was appointed under the previous Minister of Justice and who had previously been a Member of Parliament representing a constituency in the Province of Quebec for three or four years. This you can find in the Canadian Parliamentary Guide. His biography is there. Afterwards he was a member of the Quebec Legislative Assembly, and his biography was again in the Parliamentary Guide, but there was no reference to the fact that he had been sitting for three years as a member of the House of Commons of Canada. Why? Is it because he was ashamed of it, ashamed of having been elected as a federal member for the constituency that he represented? You have only to check the list of the elections in each county and you will see his name, but you will not see set out there the fact that he had been a member of the House of Commons for three years. It says in his biography how many times he had been elected a member of the Quebec Legislature and so forth, but it does not mention that he was a member of the Bloc Populaire, and that he was under the leadership of the great ancestor of the separatistes, the late Maxime Raymond, the leader of the Bloc Populaire.

I do not say that it is dishonest, because it is not dishonest. But it shows the turn of mind of some of those judges, and that is why I bring it to your attention. If you read the Parliamentary Guide of two years ago and look at the biographies of those from the Province of Quebec, you will see the name but you will not see in the biography that this person had been a member of the House of Commons. I do not say that this is scandalous; he will not be debarred for that; he will not be prevented from sitting on the Bench, but he should never have been appointed to it.

Moreover, there has been favouritism to a high degree based upon friendship or on other political considerations in the appointment of judges in the Province of Quebec, especially under Mr. Favreau, the former Minister of Justice. There is no excuse for that. The result is that some judges are very much embarrassed when certain cases come before them because they have not had sufficient training and knowledge to be a judge. You know it is true, honourable senators, and everybody in Montreal knows it is true.

Sometimes I have to defend the appointment to the Bench of former Members of Parliament, and I have no objection to that. I have no objection to the appointment of a Conservative, a Liberal or an N.D.P. member to the Bench, provided the person is qualified and knows his business.

There is another factor which complicates the situation. Do you know that two judges, one of the King's Bench and one of the Superior Court, were sitting on a commission with a former Bâtonnier Général of the Province of Quebec—and by that I mean the President of the Quebec Bar—to reform, revise and review the Quebec Civil Code of Procedure? I brought to the attention of one of the commissioners, who was in fact the Bâtonnier, that there was a large number of articles—which would be the equivalent of sections in a statute—of pure procedure in the Civil Code which should be transposed or transferred to the Civil Code of procedure.

Now the many prominent lawyers who sit on both sides of this chamber know that evidence is a question of procedure under the civil law. We find it in the Civil Code. Well, this person wrote to me—I have the letter upstairs and I had it photographed to show it to you—that the so-called learned man who had already been on that commission for two or three years with two other judges, told him they never thought there were so many articles of procedure in the Civil Code of the Province of Quebec. It is discouraging.

But do you know what they did? There was a pleasant expedition of members of the Quebec Bar and also one of the members of the commission to the Hanseatic cities of Hamburg, Bremen and Luebeck on the Baltic Sea to learn how they deal with civil procedure here, —German ways of procedure to be transplanted to the Province of Quebec. That is the way it was done.

There is something further. This is a controversial as well as a non-controversial bill—it goes both ways. There is the wrong teaching of the law, and the erroneous understanding of the law by judges. Do you know that the judges in the Province of Quebec—and this applies to other provinces too—have never taken into consideration the fact that the right to define the jurisdictions in matters of civil law comes from the Constitution itself. Most of them have never paid any attention to the Constitution, and they have recognized provincial legislation when it was completely outside of the jurisdiction of the province. One day in this chamber when I was speaking about it and was commenting that it was unfortunate that the Quebec Legislature paid no attention to the Constitution in passing amendments to the law, I was told that, as it had actually been done, therefore it was legal and constitutional. Well, it was a sophism, because if the Legislative Assembly that passed that legislation illegally and anti-constitutionally did it like that, it is worth nothing. Such an argument was fallacious and misleading.

Now you understand how embarrassed I am to give my consent to the appointment of new judges. I hope that I have not shocked you too much, but I have told you the truth, and you know it is the truth. I will not insist and I will not register any other protest over the adoption of this legislation, but when we return—and I appreciate the fact that our Leader is most helpful when I desire information—I would like to know the number of judges who have been sitting on commissions in each province of Canada, their names, and how much each commission has cost.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the honourable senator specify a period of time?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Yes, surely. I may say five or ten years.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Do you mind if I "take five"?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Not at all. I remember on one occasion Mr. Norman Rogers, who was then Minister of Labour, gave me a bulky file showing the number of commissions that had been established in a period of 10 or 15 years. We may start now by dealing with the 10 judges who were appointed redistribution commissioners; there is one in each province. There are others; some of them are reasonable and above reproach, but others are most extravagant and their work serves no purpose.

I want also to know who are the judges who have been appointed during the last five years and from what district they came and who their partners were. It is most important because I know several judges have been appointed on the recommendation at least of the Attorney General of the Province of Quebec, with the result that the Quebec politicians were served before the supporters of the Government in the House of Commons and before the friends and the qualified lawyers who had helped the members of the House of Commons to be elected.

On another occasion I shall have something more to say about the Bar itself, but imagine, we have a Bâtonnier Général, Mr. Yves Prévost, the former provincial secretary, who has a mania of making speeches. One of his great suggestions was to establish a school of law next to Laval University. The students, who have a paper called Le Carabin, have complained that the lectures are no good and that the teachers or professors are incompetent and know nothing. Instead of reforming that part of teaching he wants to leave the university as bad as it is and build a new "crazy" school next to it, une école de droit. There will be the good and the bad one, and the good one will not be any better than the bad.

That being said, I bow to Your Honour and I bow to all of you, and I hope there will be some progress. It takes a long time; it may take many years; it may happen only after we are all gone, but future generations will benefit from it in due course. Let us hope so.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, the honourable senator who has just spoken, of course, has a perfect right to discuss the Bench when we have a bill of this kind before us and, no doubt, he is thoroughly informed as to the Province of Quebec. Personally, I know very little about the administration of justice in that province, but next year I shall have been a practising solicitor and counsel in the Province of Ontario for fifty years. The fifty years impresses itself upon me because, in our province, when one has been in continuous practice for that length of time he pays no further Bench fees.

I have been a Bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada now for over thirty years, and I think I can say, from very long and intimate experience, that I have been impressed upon many occasions by the quality, the integrity, the industry and the virtues of the men who sit on the Bench of the Province of Ontario. I think I can go further and say, though not with so much authority as when I speak of Ontario, that the same applies to the Bench of the other provinces. I take time to mention this, because I would not have word go abroad that we in the Senate are critical of the Bench in a general way, and that we do not appreciate the virtues of the high court bench, the county court bench and the magistrates of our provinces.

We have every reason for being thankful. I know that in every group—and I do not care what group may be mentioned—there are some men better than others. There may occasionally be a black sheep but, when we consider a bill such as this, let it be understood that the administration of justice is not in our hands. That is reserved by the British North America Act to the provinces.

There have been grounds for criticism of judges in my province for delay in rendering their decisions. We discussed this on the last occasion when a bill to amend the Judges Act was before us, but I think we were all agreed that this was a matter for the attorneys general of the provinces.

I know that I ran into such trouble when I was Attorney General of Ontario. At that time I called the Chief Justice before me and told him that unless that defect was attended to immediately, I would lay before the legislature a bill taking out of the hands of the trial judge any case in which he had delayed a decision more than one year. The problem was solved almost immediately. A matter of that kind is, for the most part, in the hands of the attorneys general of the provinces.

I would not have said anything at all following the remarks of my honourable friend, Senator Pouliot, had I not felt that it might go abroad that we were critical, and not appreciative of, the judges that are appointed. We have good reason to be thankful for the integrity, diligence and kindness that the public receives from all those who sit on the benches of our provinces, and I speak especially for the Province of Ontario.

Hon. Malcolm Hollett: Honourable senators, I do not intend to say much on this subject. I shall soon be old enough to retire from this august assembly. Every one of us here is a human being, as is every judge that has been appointed in the province in which I live since I became old enough to know what a judge was. I have never seen any better or more honest human beings than we have had on the Bench in my own province, and I am quite sure that we are going to continue having such men on the Bench.

If one, two, or a dozen judges do not live up to the standards of one honourable senator, we must not, for that reason, condemn the whole Bench. In my experience I have found the judges are the essence of humanity, kindness, and honesty.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, I do not want you to conclude that when I was speaking of the particular, I was referring to the general. I did not do that. I have high regard for most of the judges, but there are some exceptions in a body in which there should be no exceptions at all.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I would be remiss indeed if I did not, first of all, thank Senator Ross Macdonald for undertaking the explanation of this measure at very short notice and Senator Walker also for dealing with it on behalf of the honourable senators on the other side. I appreciate the consideration that all honourable senators have given this measure, especially having regard to the fact that it was introduced only today.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the third reading of Bill S-23, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I undertook yesterday to bring some information before the house in respect of a matter that was raised by honourable Senator Thorvaldson. What he was concerned about was the right of the Government to implement sanctions under the authority of the Export and Import Permits Act in respect of Southern Rhodesia.

Regardless of what other ailments may affect me, I am glad to report that my memory is not as bad as I was afraid it might have been. In point of fact, the authority that the Government of Canada had for its acts with respect to trade between Rhodesia and Canada was raised at the time that the intergovernmental arrangement was made between Canada and the United Kingdom. It should be remembered that the sovereign authority in that South African country was the British Government, and the intergovernmental agreement or arrangement was made with the Government of Great Britain in respect of Rhodesia.

I find also that not only was this matter referred to and considered by the law officers of the Crown, but on February 3, 1966 the Secretary of State for External Affairs replied in a similar fashion in the House of Commons. His remarks will be found at page 698 of the Hansard of the other place. In justice to the statements I made yesterday, I feel that I should put this information upon our record.

I do not propose to lay before the Senate a history of the steps that were taken in connection with the matter. I simply desire to refer to the fact that in the view of the Government, based on the advice given by the law officers of the Crown, the step taken was appropriate, legal, and the kind of step as a matter of policy the Government should have taken at that time.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Thorvaldson, who was obliged to leave the chamber, I wish to say practically what he would have said had he remained. For once, he is ready to bow to the opinion of the law officers of the Crown. I cannot say I would be ready to do that, had I studied the problem as thoroughly as he did.

Senator Thorvaldson was present in committee, as were many other solicitors, and he heard the opinion of the law officers. It is his privilege to disagree with that opinion. If lawyers never disagreed there would never be any court cases. However, he studied the problem thoroughly and is still not satisfied that the law officers of the Crown were correct in their opinion.

I cannot say that I would accept all legal opinions given by solicitors of the Crown. My experience with law officers of the Crown has been most fortunate. I have found them to be topnotch experts, who deal with problems thoroughly. However, many of them, especially in certain departments, such as the Department of Justice, have never actively practiced law but are not at all reluctant to give an opinion most favourable to the Government. The result is that unnecessary and costly actions are taken by litigants in the Exchequer Court, and the judges arrive at the opinion usually given by a practicing solicitor with 25, 30 or 35 years of experience.

In this instance, Senator Thorvaldson left a message with me that he does not want to delay the passage of this bill and he is ready to bow to the opinion given by the law officers of the Crown.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Without costs.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Without costs. I am glad you mentioned that, because as a rule I seldom forget costs.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck for the second reading of Bill S-19, to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, my remarks this afternoon will be brief for several reasons. In fact, my only justification for speaking on this subject is that I have been a member of the Divorce Committee for some years and have had an opportunity of hearing evidence in many cases and learning about existing conditions in our social life in Canada today. I would not have gained that knowledge had I not been a member of the committee.

I did not become a member of the Divorce Committee by choice. I was drafted by the chairman, the honourable Senator Roebuck, who told me on one occasion that the load of work for that committee was extremely heavy. The Divorce Committee is not one on which senators generally are anxious to serve. Most of us find the work unpleasant and distasteful, and would like to avoid serving on the committee.

Senator Roebuck, on the occasion of which I speak, came to me in great distress, pointing out that the volume of work was heavy by reason of the increasing number of cases, and emphasizing that he needed help. I could not find it in my heart to say no, because the hearing of divorce petitions is part of our responsibilities as members of the Senate. I therefore consented to be drafted.

Senator Beaubien came to me a little later—and I do not think I am betraying secrets —and asked me to help him persuade a new lady member of the Senate, namely, Senator Fergusson, to serve on the committee. I do not know whether I influenced her to join us, but I know that she accepted only from a high sense of duty as a senator.

Senator Fergusson was the first lady to serve on the committee, and we found company for her in the person of Senator Hodges, from Victoria, who was also newly-appointed to the Senate at that time. Senator Fergusson broke the ice, so to speak, and since that time other lady senators have become members of the committee, have listened to the evidence and brought in reports.

Honourable senators, in the limited time at my disposal, may I say that I hope grave and earnest consideration will be given to the objects of this bill before a decision is made, and that the Parliament of Canada will do nothing in the matter of divorce that will in any way undermine or erode the high place that the family must maintain in the fabric of our Canadian civilization.

That great man and his gracious lady, the present incumbents of Rideau Hall, have set us an example of the influence the family must have in our future Canadian civilization. No influence is as vital to the formative character of a boy or a girl, be it education, culture, or anything else, as is the influence of the home. I hope that whatever action is taken with regard to divorce, it will do nothing to disturb the anchor of the influence of the home in our Canadian society.

May I be permitted to add that many religious bodies during the past few years have given grave and earnest study to the question of divorce. The Anglican Church of Canada appointed a commission in March of 1943 which has since been studying the question constantly, and at the last session of the General Synod in Vancouver a canon was introduced which it is hoped will be confirmed at the next session in 1967.

We must not proceed with undue haste, but must give this subject our best possible consideration.

I am in favour of this bill being referred to the Joint Committee on Divorce, which I hope will study it from every angle. I trust that ample opportunity will be given to all interested persons and organizations to appear before that committee to give information. Finally, I hope that the report which the committee will present later will be one which all honourable senators can justifiably support.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I do not propose to make a speech—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Are you closing the debate?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, I am not closing the debate. Permit me to explain the situation.

I endeavoured to bring about a meeting of the new joint committee tomorrow morning and I notified some of our members that we would probably meet in the general committee. Since then I have been notified by the authorities of the House of Commons that it is impossible for the Commons to assemble a quorum. So, that meeting cannot now be held.

A number of senators wish to speak on this measure, and for that reason I would ask you to permit me to move the adjournment of the debate, with the understanding that when we reassemble I may yield to those who wish to be heard. Those who have indicated to me that they intend to address the Senate on this subject are, Senators Fergusson, Kinley, Benidickson, Cameron, Croll, Grosart and Flynn. There may be some others. The action I suggest is merely a matter of procedure.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Would you permit me to move the adjournment?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Very well.

Honourable senators, I am making this explanation so that you will understand my position in regard to the joint committee. When we return after the recess, the committee will meet shortly afterwards and I hope it will proceed expeditiously.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Croll, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

THE NORTH WEST LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. David A. Croll moved the second reading of Bill S-25, to incorporate The North West Life Assurance Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, North West Life Assurance Company of Canada is being incorporated to acquire the rights and property and to assume the liabilities of North West Life Assurance Company, which was incorporated in British Columbia in 1956 and which has carried on the business of life insurance, personal accident insurance and sickness insurance in British Columbia and Alberta.

The North West Life Assurance Company was incorporated by private act of the Legislative Assembly of British Columbia in 1956 to engage as insurer in the business of life, accident and sickness insurance.

Under the act of incorporation it took over all assets and liabilities of North West Mutual Life Assurance Company, which was incorporated by private act in 1951 and which was successor to the Empire Home Benefit Association, which was incorporated in 1924.

The company has a good growth record and had life insurance in force on December 31, 1965 of more than $55 million and assets of nearly $2.5 million.

It is licensed to sell life, accident and sickness insurance in British Columbia and Alberta but its main business is in life insurance. Accident and sickness insurance forms only a small part of the business. The company operates six branch offices and five general agencies in six cities in British Columbia and Alberta. It has 50 full-time agents acting under contract exclusively for the company.

The bill is in normal fashion. The management is in the hands of experienced persons, who have spent many years in the insurance business.

If the Senate gives second reading now, I intend to move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, at which time those interested will make the necessary explanations.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Hon. Mr. Croll, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John J. Connolly: I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 3, at 8 p.m.

Honourable senators, it is not definitely known at this time when the House of Commons will adjourn for the Easter recess. I understand that that house will sit until Wednesday of next week to continue the debate on the budget. During that period we can expect no new legislation.

Honourable senators, I had thought that we might adjourn until a week earlier than is proposed in this motion. However, when we adjourn under such circumstances, should sufficient business develop to warrant the Senate being summoned, His Honour the Speaker can send notices to all honourable senators to attend here at an earlier date. Therefore, while the adjournment will technically read until May 3 at 8 o'clock in the evening, it may be necessary for the Senate to be summoned earlier. In that eventuality, I will consult with His Honour the Speaker and honourable senators will receive notice in the usual form.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

CANADIAN MOTHER OF THE YEAR

GUEST IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY

Hon. Josie D. Quart: Mr. Speaker, may I have permission to call to the attention of honourable senators the presence in the south gallery of Madame Jeanne-Pauline Beaulieu who has been chosen as the Canadian Mother of the Year by winning the annual contest sponsored by the Florists Transworld Delivery Association.

Madame Beaulieu is lovingly called "Smiling Mummy" by her Grade IX young adult students. As you will see, she is smiling even in the gallery.

The 52-year-old mother of three tall sons lives in the small village of Rivière la Madeleine on the top of the Gaspé Peninsula, in eastern Quebec. Her husband Gerard operates a family store in this community, and Jeanne-Pauline helps out occasionally in the store but most of the time she is busy mothering other people's children. Over the years she has cared for 32 youngsters, and has picture galleries in her home showing some of these children at work and play in the isolated community of Madeleine.

When Madame Beaulieu is not mothering or acting as hostess to travellers, guests or family at her large horseshoe-shaped dining table, she is active as president of the local Desjardins Credit Union and is an official of the Economic Development Council of Eastern Canada. Other organizations for which she works are the Farmers' Wives Association, the local recreation committees and the District Advisory Committee on Tourism.

Madame Beaulieu was nominated for the award by the 30 students in her Grade IX night school class. Besides teaching young adults who have now gone back to school, she has acted as hostess on interprovincial student exchange programs where teenagers from English-speaking Canada learn French during the summer months in her Gaspé home.

She will receive an award-winning scroll engraved in French; a flower-of-the-month arrangement delivered to her door for each of the following twelve months; and she may send a duplicate of a specially designed Mother's Day bouquet to anyone she selects.

On May 6 an additional treat is in store for Madame Beaulieu when she is escorted to Montreal for a meeting with His Worship Mayor Jean Drapeau. She will meet Expo directors, be presented with an Expo gold pin and have lunch at the Helene de Champlain Restaurant at Expo.

The judges for the 1966 Canadian Mother were Mr. Jack Passmore, Canadian Director of the Florists' Transworld Association, the Honourable Judy LaMarsh, Senator Elsie Inman, Mrs. Grace MacInnis, M.P., Mrs. Margaret Rideout, M.P., and Mrs. J. J. Greene, wife of the Minister of Agriculture. Mrs. Philip Gaglardi, the wife of British Columbia's Minister of Highways, was also one of the judges.

Selecting the most unique mother in Canada was a tough job. Four hundred and eighty-six nominations were submitted from every corner of the nation. In making their choice, the judges found in Madame Beaulieu a mother who was felt to embody the essence of motherhood, with a loving concern for all children as well as her own. She is a mother who has broad horizons, not confined to one group, organization or locality. Madame Beaulieu will be paid tribute not only for doing things for people, and especially children, but for putting them in a position to do something for themselves.

[Translation]

Mrs. Beaulieu has taught handicapped children. She has also set up courses for adults which are still given today. Her pupils' ages range from 14 to 50. She teaches French, sociology and sciences.

Mrs. Beaulieu likes photography, fishing, the open air and picnics. She says that if she had a lot of money she would build a big house for orphans. It is the dream of her life.

[Text]

During her visit to Ottawa Mrs. Beaulieu was received by Madame Vanier, Mrs. Pearson and Mrs. Diefenbaker. I think she went to see the Prime Minister, and she met many cabinet ministers, senators and members of the House of Commons, and Mayor Reid. Sitting proudly beside her in the gallery is the Member of Parliament for Gaspé, Mr. J. R. Keays.

Congratulations, Mrs. Beaulieu.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—COMMONS AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-14, to amend the Bills of Exchange Act, and acquainting the Senate that they have passed this bill with the following amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate:

4. Section 165 of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

(3) Where a cheque is delivered to a bank for deposit to the credit of a person and the bank credits him with the amount of the cheque, the bank acquires all the rights and powers of a holder in due course of the cheque.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this amendment be taken into consideration?

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, I move, with leave, that the amendment be concurred in now.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Should we not have some explanation of the amendment?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I think we should have an explanation.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes. Senator Cook will give an explanation now.

Hon. Mr. Cook: Honourable senators, this amendment, which is a very simple one, was requested by the banks in order to overcome difficulties which arise from the now very general custom in the banking system of depositing cheques without the payee first endorsing the cheque.

Until recently, any holder of a cheque who wished to deposit it to his account had to endorse the cheque, and so upon payment thereof the bank became a holder in due course. Accordingly, if the cheque was dishonoured, the bank had the right to recover from the payee as well as from the maker of the cheque. However, in order to facilitate business, the custom of depositing cheques by writing thereon the words "For Deposit" or "Deposit only to the credit of the payee", without actually endorsing the cheque, has become very widespread.

In 1962, in a case before the Alberta Supreme Court, the court decided that this was a restricted endorsement and, in these circumstances, the bank acts only as an agent, and therefore has no recourse whatsoever against the drawer of the cheque.

There is, of course, no reason why a bank should be in a less favourable position in cases where it negotiates a cheque which is marked "For Deposit" or "For deposit only to the credit of the payee", than the bank is when it pays a cheque which has been duly endorsed.

All that the amendment does, therefore, is to put this particular type of business transaction into the same category as it would be in if the holder had in fact endorsed the cheque.

In view of the fact that the amendment is not a contentious one, I do not ask that it be sent to committee, unless of course any senator desires otherwise.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I do not see why there should be any objection to this amendment. Probably most of us have seen it only since returning from the recess. However, I have read the report of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of the other place, and also the evidence of Mr. Elderkin, and it is quite clear to me, as I am sure it is to everyone, that this is a necessary amendment, and therefore there should be no objection to concurring in it.

Amendment concurred in.

I feel however that it would be better to have them on the Order Paper so that honourable senators who wish to speak on them when they come to be dealt with will be in a position to do so.

DUTCH ELM DISEASE

REVIEW OF CONTROL MEASURES AND CURRENT RESEARCH

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, on March 10 last Senator Roebuck referred to the regrettable loss of many of Canada's stately elms through the ravages of the Dutch elm disease, and he asked what steps the Government of Canada is taking to control this dangerous disease.

The Department of Forestry informs me that that department is undertaking a comprehensive program of surveys and research on the Dutch elm disease. It has been demonstrated that control measures involving the removal of diseased and dead trees and spraying of healthy trees with insecticides such as D.D.T. and Methoxychlor can keep losses to acceptable levels.

However, it is unlikely that the disease can ever be completely eradicated, as it is now well established over extensive areas of Canada and the United States. Under these conditions, it is impossible to remove all sources of infection. In cities and towns where the current recommended programs of sanitation and application of insecticides have been rigidly applied, losses have been reduced to tolerable levels. The example given is that of Fredericton, New Brunswick.

The department is assisting in these programs by providing technical guidance in methods and procedures of disease control. Extensive continuing surveys are being carried out to define the limits and seriousness of the disease and to provide other information essental for the development of timely and effective control operations. The department also provides a diagnostic service so that occurrence of the disease in suspect trees may be confirmed before expensive felling operations are undertaken.

Intensive research is in progress to find improved measures for control. This research includes studies on how the disease develops in infected trees, on chemotherapy, and on the development of elms that will remain resistant to the disease.

This is a disease of foreign origin and therefore comes under quarantine regulations administered by the Plant Protection Division of the Department of Agriculture. Officers of the Department of Forestry co-operate fully with the Plant Protection Division in the exchange of information leading to appropriate quarantine regulations.

In addition, the Department of Forestry has provided me with a copy of its Bi-monthly Progress Report for July-August, 1964. The whole issue is devoted to a review of the Dutch elm disease, and at the conclusion of my remarks I shall table this document in order that it will be available to honourable senators who are interested in this matter.

I might add that recently a new technique has been developed at the University of Guelph which is believed to hold some promise. It involves isolating the affected trees by insulating their roots from the roots of other trees which might become affected. It is a further step towards control which is so greatly desired.

I now table:

> Bi-monthly Progress Report of the Forest Entomology and Pathology Branch of the Department of Forestry for July-August, 1964, containing A Review of the Dutch Elm Disease. (English text).

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I have the indulgence of the house to congratulate the Leader of the Government and those who have co-operated with him in making this very satisfactory report.

Although I have no special knowledge of the subject, I do not entirely agree that it is impossible to eradicate the disease, because I am under the impression that as chemical progress is made in this matter some method will be found of medicating the sap of these trees to protect them against the attack of the beetle, worm, infection, or whatever it might be.

I am much more optimistic than these gentlemen who have been trying for so long and perhaps experiencing many disappointments. I wish them success in their further investigations and urge them to continue the good work they are doing.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Is the federal Government bearing the entire cost, or are the provinces assisting in this work?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am not positive, but I believe it is a joint program. I will make inquiries on this point.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: This is similar to the work being done to combat the spruce budworm?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Exactly. You refer to the aerial work being done in New Brunswick?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I will make specific inquiries and inform the honourable leader.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Honourable senators, I move that the document which the Leader of the Government has just tabled be printed as an appendix to our Debates.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That will be satisfactory, if honourable senators so desire.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Later:]

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, earlier this evening the Senate made an order that the pamphlet I used in answering Senator Roebuck's question on Dutch elm disease be printed as an appendix to Hansard. Since that time the Debates Branch have had an opportunity of examining this document and inform me there are technical difficulties involved in reproducing the pamphlet in tonight's Hansard. Apparently the illustrations present some difficulty. Therefore, some other method will be devised in order to make the pamphlet available. I would therefore ask honourable senators to change their previous order, and I shall make an announcement tomorrow as to what can be done in this matter.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

DIVORCE (EXTENSION OF GROUNDS) BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Roebuck, seconded by the Honourable Senator Croll, for second reading of Bill S-19, intituled: "An Act to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief". (Honourable Senator Croll).

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, Senator Croll is not present. I understand that Senator Grosart intends to speak, and if he is ready he might do so now provided it stands in Senator Croll's name for the next sitting.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am in the hands of honourable senators as to whether I proceed now or adjourn the debate until tomorrow.

Some Hon. Senators: Adjourn the debate.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I take it that is the consensus, and would ask that the order stand.

Order stands.

PRIVATE BILL

THE EXCELSIOR LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard moved the second reading of Bill S-26, respecting The Excelsior Life Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill does not fall into the usual category of bills incorporating federal life insurance companies, but I shall endeavour to make my explanation as brief as possible, even though it is of a somewhat different category.

The Excelsior Life Insurance Company is at present a provincially incorporated company. It was incorporated in 1889 under the laws of the Province of Ontario and it was first licensed with the federal Department of Insurance in 1897. It is the twelfth largest insurance company in Canada and has over $1 billion of insurance in force. It is one of only four provincial life insurance companies registered with the federal Department of Insurance under Part IX of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

As a provincial company registered under the federal act it is subject to most of the provisions of the federal act as if it were a federal company; at the same time, it is subject to the provisions of the Ontario Corporations Act, and certain of these respective provisions overlap and cause conflict between the two jurisdictions. This dual jurisdiction has resulted in some hardship and inconvenience in several areas.

Without going into those in detail, I might mention that there are differences between the investment powers under the two acts; there are differences between the forms of the annual statements; and there are differences with respect to the separation of the funds of the company for its various classes of insurance.

The company is licensed for life, personal accident, and sickness insurance; it carries on business in all provinces of Canada, and is an affiliate of the Aetna Life Insurance Company.

Because of certain difficulties, because of its dominion-wide character, and for other reasons, the company now desires to give up its charter as a provincial company and become a federal corporation.

The Ontario Department of Insurance has at all times been most co-operative in its supervision of the affairs of the company, and in the result the company has, in effect, been treated as if it were a federally incorporated company. I should point out that the Ontario Department of Insurance and the Ontario Government are co-operating in connection with this application.

Having decided to become a federally incorporated company, one possible method of accomplishing this was to incorporate a new federal company of the same name, to sell or transfer the assets and liabilities of the provincial company to the new federal company, and then terminate the existence of the provincial company. The petitioners state that this method is not practical or feasible in view of the size of the assets. There are close to 200,000 policyholders, and the transfer of so many policies to the new company is said to be not feasible. There are mortgage loans aggregating $68 million, all of which would have to be transferred to the new corporation, and as well $3 million of marketable securities.

In order to overcome these difficulties this bill provides in clause 1 that the existence of the company is continued under its present name, and is deemed to be a company incorporated by special act of the Parliament of Canada. As all lawyers, and probably others, will recognize, in order to accomplish this purpose it is not only necessary to pass a federal act to that effect but it is also necessary that the province of Ontario legislate to the same effect. Accordingly, a bill was passed by the Ontario Legislature and received Royal Assent on April 6 last, authorizing and implementing the intention of this bill by continuing the existence of the Excelsior Life Insurance Company as a federal company. Subsequent to the Royal Assent, all the necessary corporate action to bring about the continuance of the company's existence as a federal company has been taken.

The method of procedure has received careful legal consideration, in the first instance, by the solicitors for the company itself—a firm of considerable eminence in the legal profession. It was then referred by the Superintendent of Insurance to the Department of Justice, and the bill in its present form was settled by the Department of Justice, the solicitors and the Department of Insurance. It has also received the approval of the Law Clerk of the Senate.

Without going into the other clauses of the bill I would simply say that they are self-explanatory and are for the purpose of carrying out the intention of clause 1.

If the bill receives second reading, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Allister Grosart: May I ask Senator Leonard a question? Is there a precedent in the business of insurance, trust companies, banking and other fields, of a provincially incorporated company making application for federal incorporation?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators, in answer to Senator Grosart's question—which is very apt and pertinent, and is the first question I asked when I was requested to sponsor this bill—I will say that I was told that there is a precedent going back some years. Honourable senators may recall that a few years ago we passed a bill to amalgamate The Canada Permanent Trust Company, which was a federally incorporated company, and The Toronto General Trusts Corporation, which was a provincially incorporated company, and to carry on the amalgamated company as a federally incorporated company.

That bill passed the Parliament of Canada, and similarly an implementing bill was passed by the Legislature of the Province of Ontario, which made it possible for The Toronto General Trusts Corporation to amalgamate and merge with and become part of the new federally incorporated company.

Having said that, I still think that the best way to deal with the honourable senator's question is to have the solicitors for the petitioners, and anybody else who is necessary, appear before the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. I repeat, however, that it is my understanding that this has received all the legal approval necessary, and that there is at least some precedent for it.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, perhaps I may be allowed to say a word on this question. There is a very old precedent for this that I ran into in my own practice some years ago. It was a case, I think, of the Quebec Railway, Light and Power Company which was formed by an act passed by the provincial legislature in the late eighties of the last century, and then two or three years later this Parliament passed an act converting that company into a federal company with the same rights and powers.

There is one question I should like to ask my honourable friend who introduced this bill. As a matter of interest, in respect to clause 9 of the bill, what is special about the date of the 4th day of May, 1910? Clause 9 reads:

> The Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act shall apply to the Company as if the Company had been incorporated by special Act of the Parliament of Canada passed after the 4th day of May, 1910.

What is the significance of that date?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators, I must admit that I am not at all sure of the proper answer to that question. Perhaps Senator McCutcheon may be able to throw some light on it. I have it in my own mind that under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act that date has relevance to the provisions of that act with respect to companies incorporated before or after that date. I think it is only to bring this company in line with what may be the general provisions of the act which took effect as of May 4, 1910.

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: I agree with what Senator Leonard has said. The act is of long standing, but there were amendments at that date following the investigation of the Armstrong Commission in New York. Substantial revisions were made to the act, which were to some extent retroactive to companies previously incorporated and which applied to all new companies. This clause makes those provisions applicable to this company, although substantially they have always been applicable by reason of the federal licence which this company has always had. However, this will make it abundantly clear that those provisions are applicable to it.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: May I presume that the Ontario legislation will be laid before the committee to which this bill will be referred? That legislation is not before us at the present moment.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I agree with what Senator Roebuck has said. I have in my file a copy of the act, and copies will be made available to the members of the committee for the purpose of their consideration.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Thank you.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL TO REPEAL—WITHDRAWN

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 29, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot for the second reading of Bill S-22, to repeal the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, after Senator Pouliot spoke to this measure I asked the Whip (Hon. Mr. Beaubien, Provencher) to ascertain if any other honourable senator wished to speak and, if not, whether he would be good enough to adjourn the debate on my behalf. I should like to speak in this debate at this time, and I shall be grateful to the Senate if I am permitted to do so.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, the act sought to be repealed is chapter 31 of 13 Elizabeth II, which was assented to on November 20, 1964. The original bill was debated in this chamber on November 19, 1964.

At the time second reading was called there was no vote; in fact, the bill did not go to committee. I wish to refer to a few statements that were made at that time.

The sponsor of the bill was Senator Power, the father of this Parliament. He said, as appears at page 1080 of the Senate Hansard:

> —The aim and object of it is that Parliament dispense with the function, which since Confederation it has exercised, of allocating the boundaries of ridings within each province, and hand over to bodies of a less partisan nature the duty of making this redistribution. Generally speaking, I think this object meets with pretty general agreement and even with a substantial measure of acclaim.

The Leader of the Opposition, the honourable Senator Brooks, at page 1083, said, among other things:

> —This, I am sure, is a great accomplishment in respect of a measure of this kind. It was brought about by the determination on the part of all members of the House of Commons to produce as far as possible a redistribution bill that was as fair and non-political as possible.

Senator Flynn, at page 1085, said:

> We are in agreement with the three main principles involved in this bill, the first being to put an end to gerrymandering which has taken place in previous redistributions; the second, to keep for Parliament, and especially for the House of Commons, a certain control over this problem of redistribution; the third, to apply as far as feasible the principle of equal representation for every vote.

Senator Crerar, the senior member of the Canadian Privy Council said, at page 1086:

> Without any question, this measure is a march forward—

In due time, after the bill received the Royal Assent, the commissions provided for were set up. They have since reported to the Speaker of the House of Commons, and as required by section 20 of the bill certain objections from members have been filed. The debate to follow upon those objections has already commenced. I do not think it has concluded as yet. In due time the reference will be made to the commissions to consider the views which are expressed by the members of the House of Commons pursuant to section 21 of the act. After that has taken place, the representation orders will follow in accordance with the provisions of section 22 of the act.

I am informed that there are some 27 objections that have been registered in the House of Commons, each of which must be supported by not less than 10 members.

Obviously some have signed more than one objection. I understand that 158 members have signed objections. For the 27 objections obviously there should be 270. Therefore, a good proportion of members have registered objections, of varying degrees of importance, I assume, to certain decisions that have been taken by the commissions.

I can understand the concern that the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) has expressed about the disappearance of historic constituency names, and I hope this factor will be considered seriously and favourably by the commissions when they review material placed before them as a result of the debate in the other place.

I can only add that while some of the provisions do not satisfy the sponsor of the bill, obviously some of the findings do not satisfy a great many members of the other place, which is primarily concerned with this measure. No doubt that is true of any bill. I do not think politics has ever been described as a process to produce perfection, and I am sure that none of us feels that measures that come before us here are by any means perfect.

I think this is essentially a matter for the House of Commons. It is a test of a new method, and in view of the expression of opinion that has been given in this house I feel that it should be given a fair trial.

When amendments are to be considered by Parliament, I would think that the views that the honourable senator has placed upon the record should form part of the record to be considered by a Government that will propose further changes to improve the legislation.

Personally, I regret that I must take the stand that I do, in view of my regard for the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Pouliot). However, as a member of the Government, if for no other reason, I cannot support the proposal he makes, and I ask honourable senators not to approve the measure.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been moved by the Honourable Senator Pouliot, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook, that this bill be now read the second time. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, for the reasons which have been mentioned by the Leader of the Government in this house, and on account of the fact that the majority of the members of the House of Commons do not seem to be interested in repealing the redistribution legislation—they shall remain with a rope around their necks to be led by a civil servant, where, nobody knows—I ask you for leave to withdraw the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, has the honourable Senator Pouliot leave to withdraw this bill?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Bill withdrawn.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 23, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, the best part of my speech, for those who are Canadiens hockey team fans, is that I may announce to them that the present score of the Stanley Cup game is three to nothing for Canadiens over Detroit. That is the best part of my speech.

Honourable senators, having neither the talent, voice nor wind of some of my colleagues, I will not be able to speak to you as long as they often do.

Although I am late in doing so, I wish to join with all those who spoke before me and extend my respect and best wishes to our new Speaker. Moreover, I want to insist here on his efforts to learn French, efforts all the more commendable because it is hard to learn a new language when one is a little over forty.

The movers of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne deserve our most sincere congratulations as much for their constructive remarks as for the way they expressed them.

I also extend my respect and wishes to both leaders of the house of whom we are proud, but in particular to the government house leader about whom we worried a lot during his temporary absence and who is now fully recovered to the great relief of us all.

I extend the warmest welcome to the new colleagues who have joined us. They are all highly qualified to fulfil the important task which is entrusted to them.

[Text]

Honourable senators, in the Speech from the Throne, I read the following:

> A measure will be placed before you to provide for the re-organization of certain departments of government, in order to adapt the structure of administration to new and changing conditions and so better meet the needs of our people. The purpose of this re-organization is to provide for closer and better co-ordinated action in the following areas of public policy...

And amongst these areas I read, a little further down:

> —the problems of corrections and crime, particularly in regard to the effective co-ordination of police services and intelligence in combatting organized crime.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, there is a problem which is as serious as it is alarming, for it has to do with the protection of society, not only its property, but what it holds dearest, that is the life of its members.

The debate on capital punishment, recently ended, lasted until speakers and arguments were exhausted. However, I want to commend the Government on its determination to continue its fight against crime, in all its aspects, and to reduce to a minimum the loss of innocent lives which we all deplore.

But I want, first of all, to express as strongly as possible my disapproval of the obnoxious forms of propaganda used by some newspapermen, radio and television commentators who, taking undue advantage of the fact that they can reach hundreds of thousands if not millions of readers and listeners, endeavoured systematically—and they are still doing so today, in the name of civilization, of social progress, of religion—to influence public opinion with a view to abolishing capital punishment, rather than placing the problem before the public in an impartial and objective fashion. That attitude, to my mind, smacks of dishonesty, of sheer cussedness, not to mention that some of them receive salaries paid out of taxes coming from citizens who in the majority favour retention of capital punishment. The sky was the limit: leading titles and sub-titles, caricatures, photographic close-ups of the gallows, the gas chamber, the electric chair, selected speakers, films or interviews, etc.—in short, a thorough brainwashing conducive to abolition of capital punishment. One newpaperman even had the unmitigated gall to upbraid a provincial Minister of Justice for having dared to express an opinion that was contrary to his own. There is similar arrogance and complacency in many other fields.

However, most of the members have preferred to turn to the experience of people who are knowledgeable in this field instead of relying on the opinion and arbitrary and personal reactions of some laymen. Thus several of them referred to the report of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons established to study capital punishment, an inquiry which lasted over two years, or from 1953 to 1956.

Dozens of briefs were sent to and studied by this committee, dozens of witnesses appeared before it who, on account of their work or profession, are in a way experts on the subject or at least much more qualified than a newpaperman or a commentator. These witnesses, aside from expressing their opinions, were questioned and requestioned by the members of the committee who unanimously recommended the retention of capital punishment.

I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate most sincerely our colleagues on this committee for their fantastic work. I was pleased to see, among the members of this committee, the names of Senator Fergusson as well as Senators Aseltine, Farris, Hayden, Roebuck, Veniot and Vien, all of whom demonstrated once again the usefulness of the Senate and continue to render valuable service to their country.

Honourable senators, if it is true that in most cases murders are committed following crimes, the Government is well advised to co-ordinate its efforts with all police forces in the country to take the most appropriate measures to cope with such crimes.

The Government's intention is to co-ordinate all research, information and operating methods, as well as to uncover deficiencies to achieve a truly efficient reorganization.

Maclean's Magazine for March last, reports on the utterances of Mr. Brunet, formerly of the R.C.M.P. and, since 1960, director of the Quebec Provincial police.

Mr. Brunet says something like this about the police organization in Quebec in 1960.

> The total strength of the force was fifteen hundred men; at least five hundred more were required. . . Almost to a man, they had been appointed regardless of age, education, physique or health condition. Some had ill-kept files, others had none; some could neither read nor write. . . Several hundred had to be fired for theft, extortion or incompetence . . . Formerly, Mr. Brunet explained, almost anyone could obtain a permit to carry firearms. . . As early as 1961, over a thousand permits were cancelled.

In 1965, Mr. J. Adrien Robert, then director of the Montreal police, replaced Mr. Brunet in Quebec. And, in the same Maclean's magazine, Mr. Robert said:

> There is a need for 800 more policemen in Quebec.

Is the police strength in other provinces also so insufficient and so inadequate? Is firearms control neglected as it was in Quebec in 1960? I do not know. A federal-provincial conference would reveal this. Furthermore, to settle problems which are as vital as they are alarming, there should be no boundaries, and no bigotry in this country.

The present director of the Montreal police, Mr. Gilbert, decided recently to prosecute habitual criminals, with a view to social defence and rehabilitation. He quoted for instance the records of 30 habitual criminals involved in murder cases in Montreal in the last year and a half. In 17 years, in the Province of Quebec, only three accused were convicted as habitual criminals. Would it be desirable that the Canadian provinces do as the Montreal police director did? Do rehabilitated criminals go back to crime because they cannot get an honest paying job? If such is the case, should the governments take steps to cope with the situation? Those are other problems that could be settled at a round table.

Moreover, the Quebec Minister of Justice recently announced the creation of a class of police cadets, thus catching up on the organization of the R.C.M.P. and that of the Ontario provincial police. Heaven knows how many such initiatives considered together would be useful to the community.

Honourable senators, since the question is to save innocent lives, I wonder whether we should not connect with it highway tragedies, even though this problem comes rather under provincial jurisdiction.

Last year in Canada nearly 5,000 persons lost their lives as a result of highway accidents and nearly 150,000 suffered physical injuries resulting, in many cases, in the victim being crippled for the rest of his life, while damages to property amounted to more than $130 million. Is it because the laws are not severe enough or because of ignorance or inadequate enforcement of the law that these accidents take place? Is it because of a lack of supervision?

I quote here an extract of an article published in the Ottawa Journal—considered an excellent newspaper—we have among us a senator who contributed to its popularity. This paper, which is widely read and very serious, published in its edition of April 25 last an article entitled "Extra Police Worth Paying for". It has to do with a report of the London Observer.

[Text]

The Ottawa Journal reprinted an article from the Victoria Colonist, which said:

> Extra Police Worth Paying For
> The method suggested is to place more policemen on the roads, in the belief that driving behaviour improves in proportion, more or less, to their numbers. To support this theory, the Observer cites an actual example: "In 1938, almost 700 extra police were sent to seven police districts for road patrolling. Road deaths dropped by 180 and casualties by 5,500."

This refers to an example in Britain.

For instance, would we be narrow-minded enough to allow road signs in one language only, thus endangering the lives of drivers and others?

Discussions between the provinces could prove very useful in reducing the number of highway tragedies. Road security methods used in foreign countries should be studied for the benefit of the Canadian people. I remember that in England—where I travelled with Honourable Senator Blois with whom I got along very well, even though we disagree on political matters—in some places the road is divided not only by a painted line but also by phosphorescent dots which add to security in the dark.

The Minister of Industry, Mr. Drury, said recently that the federal Government is developing road security rules. Such information, efforts and methods will not be really effective, in my opinion, without the co-operation of all governments.

Honourable senators, I have another suggestion which could be looked into. The Canadian army already has all the means of transportation and communication of great value to any police force; members of the armed forces are clothed, fed, quartered and paid by the state, their trained personnel would require little additional training and could, without much inconvenience and at little cost, become excellent police officers or, at least, subsitute for career policemen in minor or less important duties.

If, to protect society more adequately, the governments had to double or triple their police forces, although they cannot do it due to lack of money or qualified personnel, I submit that we should study the possibility of filling the gap by using our armed forces in peace time.

On many occasions, our armed forces showed themselves highly effective in tragic moments of Canadian life, in case of fires, earthquakes, floods, forest fires, rescue operations, epidemics, etc. Why should they not be effective also to reduce to the minimum crimes and losses of life due to highway accidents as well as murders which accompany crimes?

Honourable senators, I submit that, jointly with the federal Government, the provincial governments should undertake a detailed study of organized crime and of other tragedies implying loss of life. Thus our governments would find the more suitable and more efficient methods of using the police forces of the country and, if necessary, the methods of using the valuable services of our armed forces in peace time.

Honourable senators, when thousands of human lives are at stake, the legislation must be severe and all our leaders should get together, regardless of provincial boundaries, and apply this legislation in the most adequate and efficient way.

DUTCH ELM DISEASE

DISTRIBUTION OF FORESTRY DEPARTMENT REPORT

On the Orders of the day:

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, may I say that yesterday evening Senator Vien suggested that the pamphlet published by the Department of Forestry with reference to a review of the current research on Dutch elm disease be printed in Hansard.

From what I have been able to gather, because of certain drawings and illustrations contained in the pamphlet, it would be virtually impossible to reproduce it in Hansard. On that account, I have arranged that a copy of the pamphlet be placed on the desk of each honourable senator. I know this is not as wide a circulation as it would get in Hansard, but at the moment this is as far as I am able to go.

[Later:]

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, with leave, may I state that yesterday Senator Brooks asked if the federal Government's assistance in combatting the Dutch elm disease was in the form of a shared cost program such as that for the spruce budworm.

I am informed that while the federal and provincial governments share in the effort to eradicate Dutch elm disease, it is not on the basis of a shared cost program. The federal Government's contribution consists in providing technical and scientific information to persons and agencies carrying out control programs.

It should be noted, however, that a measure of financial assistance is available to municipalities under the Municipal Winter Works Incentive Program. The labour cost of removing diseased, dying and dead trees which have been marked by specialists for removal can be shared under this program.

With the consent of honourable senators, I would ask that this supplementary answer be placed in today's Hansard immediately following the earlier reference to this matter.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

RETIREMENT OF SENATORS ACT

INQUIRY AS TO TITLE OF RETIRED SENATORS

Hon. J. Eugène Lefrançois: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government regarding the Retirement of Senators Act.

When that measure was being considered on second reading, I remember that the question was put to the Leader of the Government as to whether a senator after retirement should keep the title "the honourable". If I remember well, the Leader replied that it was not necessary to have a clause in the bill to that effect, that an order in council would be passed by the Government and a retired senator would keep his title "The Honourable". Has any decision been made about that matter?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I do remember giving this undertaking and I have fulfilled the undertaking. There will be a change in the order of precedence in Canada providing for this. It would have been done by now, but it requires approval of Her Majesty and we are awaiting that approval. The provision will be retroactive and will apply to all honourable senators who have taken advantage of the measure which we passed last year. Therefore, the answer to the question is yes.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Does this involve also the title of "senator", retired?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No, that was not a part of the provision. Undoubtedly, custom will continue to prevail. In the Table of Precedence, senators are designated as "the honourable". They are called "senators" because they are members of the Senate. I assume that they would continue to be called senators.

Hon. Mr. Vien: By courtesy or by right?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): By custom.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: By precedent.

AGRICULTURAL AND RURAL DEVELOPMENT ACT

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-152, to amend the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act.

He said: Honourable senators, it is a pleasure for me to have the opportunity of moving second reading of this bill, the first Government motion I have had an opportunity to move in this chamber. I say it is a pleasure because during part of my period in another chamber I served as Minister of Agriculture and as such was responsible for the implementation of programs under ARDA in my own Province of Saskatchewan. Therefore, I am quite familiar with some of the programs that have already been brought into effect and the results that those programs have had on communities of Saskatchewan and other parts of Canada. I am also familiar with some of the weaknesses in the original legislation, in that it did not allow for some programs that most people in Canada realized ought to be implemented if we were to do all that was necessary to solve economic problems of the rural population of Canada.

Before I begin an explanation of Bill C-152, I would refer to some of the activities that preceded this legislation, and remind honourable senators that this legislation was, in my opinion, the result or the outcropping of a committee of this chamber. I refer to the Senate Committee on Land Use. I was not a member of that committee or of this chamber at that time, but I think that all honourable senators would wish me to congratulate the members of that committee on the full and concise report they made, and the effect it had in promoting the ARDA legislation in the House of Commons.

The ARDA legislation was first passed in 1961, and at that time it had the unanimous consent of the members of the House of Commons. Since that time some $80 million has been committed for the implementation of ARDA programs across Canada.

I shall not go into detail so far as any of these programs are concerned, either in my own province or in other provinces because I know all honourable senators are well aware of the start that has been made in adjusting the income and bringing about a better use of the resources of rural areas of Canada.

In addition to the $80 million I have mentioned, a further $50 million of federal Government money has been made available for special programs across Canada, programs undertaken entirely by the federal Government. Let me repeat that while in my view some success has been achieved, this is only a beginning. When we realize that in 1961 it was estimated that there were in Canada half a million rural families with an income of $3,000 a year or less, we can understand how necessary this program was and indeed still is.

Bill C-152 provides two amendments to this legislation. As I mentioned earlier, I found that under the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act it was difficult to have some programs suggested by the provincial governments accepted by the Government of Canada because in actual fact they had little if anything to do with agriculture; and it is my understanding that the Department of Justice has complained to the minister responsible for the ARDA program that some of the programs already implemented in Canada were not quite in accordance with the act.

For this reason the House of Commons has now passed this bill to amend the original act, making it possible for provincial governments to recommend programs that can be accepted by the national Government for the development of rural Canada and for increasing the standard of living of those people who live in rural Canada, through programs that are not directly associated with agriculture.

Again, if honourable senators will bear with me, I would like to refer to my own province. Perhaps some of the most serious poverty in the Province of Saskatchewan is in the northern fringe areas, areas that are populated chiefly by the native people. Because of the geographic and climatic conditions, by no stretch of the imagination could one associate the activity of the native people with agriculture, but if we are going to implement programs to improve the standard of living of rural people, then it is essential that the terms of this act be broadened to allow us to implement programs in that area of my province where, as I said a moment ago, the activities are not associated with agriculture.

It is my understanding that we have almost identical problems in virtually every province of Canada. I am thinking of areas in Newfoundland where they are many miles removed from agriculture, and yet this act ought to be made applicable to the people who live in those areas. So, the main amendment to this act is to allow the Government of Canada, in co-operation with the provinces, to implement programs in rural Canada, whether they are directly or indirectly or not associated at all with agriculture.

The second amendment deals with an advisory committee to ARDA—and I think this is again of first importance. When we were attempting to develop new programs in my own province to deal with poverty in rural Canada, I recall that we were looking for suggestions from people who lived in rural areas, from people with many years of first-hand experience who could tell us what public programs could be implemented to accomplish those things which the Government had in mind for the people living in those particular areas. So, now it is suggested that an advisory committee be made available to the minister under this act, and that the minister have the authority to provide remuneration to the members of the committee.

The advisory committee is to be composed of people who are eminently qualified to give the type of advice the minister and his departmental officials are looking for. I would refer you to the Debates of the House of Commons of March 31, 1966, page 3703, where the organizations are listed from which personnel have been selected to serve on this committee. They will be approximately thirty in number. I believe this committee will help to bring the local problems to the attention of those responsible for the administration of this act.

Therefore, I feel that the two amendments before us at this time are worthy of our support, and I would hope that all honourable senators would see fit to support them. In the event that this bill receives second reading, I propose that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Blois, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY BILL

CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINE NEAR BRUCE LAKE, DISTRICT OF KENORA— SECOND READING

Hon. W. M. Benidickson moved the second reading of Bill C-165, respecting the construction of a line of railway in the Province of Ontario by Canadian National Railway Company from the vicinity of Amesdale on the Redditt subdivision of the Canadian National Railway in a north north-westerly direction for a distance of approximately 68 miles to a point in the vicinity of Bruce Lake, in the District of Kenora.

He said: Honourable senators, I appreciate the opportunity afforded me by the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) to make a few remarks with respect to this bill.

This bill has already passed the House of Commons, and did so without reference to one of its committees. However, it may be the view of this chamber that we should have a committee consider it. In any event, it is a bill in form similar to many others that have been presented to you in recent years with respect to branch lines which our government-owned Canadian National Railways has thought it necessary to build and which management has represented to Government will in the long term be not only beneficial to the country but also to the balance sheet of the railway system.

I said I was privileged to introduce this bill, and it is because it happens to involve territory in the area I used to represent in the other place. It is a line from the main line of the Canadian National Railways running north north-west for about 68 miles from the national route of the Canadian National Railways, which you are all familiar with, and between Winnipeg and the Lakehead.

The investment which Parliament is asked to approve involves a basic item of about $11,100,000, but in accordance with the form of other similar bills you have approved in the past, this bill contains a clause providing for a contingency of 15 per cent. That means that there is 15 per cent liability, perhaps, beyond the $11,100,000 referred to in the bill.

I believe most of you are familiar with the Canadian National transcontinental line. You may ask whether it is not possible to use the other line, the Canadian Pacific, which is also national and is but 20 miles or more to the south of this particular location. However, it seemed economic that the developers of the mine would use the C.N.R. line.

It is intended to transport iron pellets to the national rail line which is about 68 miles south of the mine site. On an open-pit mining basis the mine does not produce a very high grade ore, but if the ore is pelletized, the enterprise, in the opinion of those backing it, becomes financially sound. This has been looked at for a long time. I think most honourable senators will have heard about the Bruce Lake Iron Mine Company; in any event, this mine is now sponsored by the Steel Company of Canada, one of our great and most astute commercial enterprises. They are willing to invest perhaps $60 million in the development of from a million to a million and a half tons of pellets at this site. In tandem with that, the Canadian National Railways asks Parliament to authorize it to provide $11,100,000 plus 15 per cent for contingencies, which will permit it to associate the national railway company with this great new resource development.

The Minister of Transport has said in the other place that he has assurances from the Canadian National Railway that it would derive from its investment what it thought was an adequate return.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: What is the amount?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: I indicated, Senator Isnor, that the capital expense would be perhaps $11,100,000, plus 15 per cent for contingencies.

I do not want to embarrass the railway because it has relations with its customers, but it did assure the Minister of Transport that it felt the capital expenditure would be provided for, and that the earnings would enhance the overall earnings of the road.

The Senate will no doubt wish this bill to go before a committee, where all honourable senators who desire more detailed information will be able to get it. Of course, we are entitled to that information, but the assurance was given that this would be, in addition to many other branch lines, one of the new rewarding branch lines of the national system.

The return envisaged is in the nature of $1 million a year. I am informed that the agreement states that if the Steel Company of Canada does not produce the tonnage expected within the next 10-year term there will be a penalty. The $60 million investment is going ahead now, and this bill contemplates an investment of $11 million-plus on the part of the C.N.R. It does seem to me to be something that we should do in conjunction with the Steel Company of Canada, and it is something that will be of great benefit to northwestern Ontario.

The tonnage coming out will be up to 1,500,000 tons a year, much of which can move in the winter months to the Lakehead when the Great Lakes are not open to navigation. This will provide labour and traffic to the railway workers of northwestern Ontario. In the whole area I understand that perhaps 500 men can be expected to be employed on this new development.

There is some urgency about this measure because if production is to go ahead as the Steel Company of Canada expects at the beginning of 1968, then our assurance to the national railroad must be given now in order that the private financing arrangements can be made.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: May I ask my honourable friend a question? I am familiar in a general way with the area to which he alludes and which is covered by this proposal, but do I understand aright that the Steel Company of Canada is going ahead with this development at an estimated cost of $60 million, or thereabouts, before the railway is built, or is it waiting until after the railway is built? That is my first question.

My second question is: Does the Steel Company of Canada propose to give any guarantee as to the annual tonnage that will be given to the railway in consideration for its building this branch line?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: My friend Senator Crerar has raised two questions. The Steel Company of Canada would like to be in production in the spring of 1968, but naturally they do not want to have the pellets produced without a railroad being in existence, and therefore it is urgent that Parliament take action. The Canadian National Railway Company is the natural conductor for this area, and so it is necessary for Parliament to decide on this matter fairly soon. Does that answer the question? Naturally, the Steel Company of Canada is already doing some things, senator.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask when it is expected that the railway will be completed, if we pass this legislation?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: If we pass this legislation the expectation is that the railway will be completed at about the end of 1967. This would be appropriate with respect to the plans of the Steel Company of Canada, but that company is holding back some of its plans till Parliament acts.

I covered the scope of the honourable senator's second question in part, but perhaps not adequately. In almost all arrangements between the Canadian National Railway and its primary customer on a branch line of this kind, the railway has within recent years providently inserted a penalty clause to the effect that if there is not production to a certain quantity the customer pays an increased freight rate on something else. Naturally, the Canadian National Railway in this enterprise will watch the $60 million development of the Steel Company of Canada, and will go forward as it goes forward, but in the contract there is a clause which provides that if the promised quantity of tonnage for the next ten years is not produced the Steel Company of Canada will pay a per ton penalty.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: If I understand it correctly, that means that the Steel Company of Canada guarantees the Canadian National Railway Company a certain tonnage annually, and if it fails to meet that guarantee then the penalty clause will apply. That is clear.

I might say in a general way that I think this is a very important and useful development. It is rather remarkable that so far as North America is concerned all the important discoveries of iron ore in the last ten or fifteen years have been made in Canada. This company will build a $60 million plant. They will concentrate the ore at the site to probably two-thirds of iron in pellets, and ship the pellets to Port Arthur from where they will go down to Hamilton by boat. If the Steel Company guarantees the railway a certain tonnage then, in my opinion,—and this is the important thing to me—there is almost no risk at all so far as the public treasury is concerned in the passage of this legislation.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, the questions asked by Senator Crerar illustrate quite clearly the necessity of referring this bill to committee. I have no doubt that the agreement, which I understand has been signed by the steel company and the Canadian National Railway, will be before the committee, so we shall have a thorough understanding of the situation.

I congratulate the honourable member on his presentation as sponsor of this bill. As he stated, he is on familiar ground, having represented Kenora-Rainy River for many years in the House of Commons. I am not on familiar territory, and therefore I have no intention of making any extensive remarks. However, I wish to make a few general remarks regarding the building of branch railways.

I noticed in today's Orders of the Day that the C.P.R. is petitioning to build a couple of branch lines. We have been building quite a number of branch lines in Canada during the past few years. The bill now before us is similar to others which have come to us for consideration from time to time.

The sponsor of this bill said that the 15 per cent for contingencies was not mentioned. Although I cannot be positive, I am under the impression that it was mentioned in some other bills. Senator Burchill will recall the building of the C.N.R. branch line at Heath Mines in New Brunswick, and I think the 15 per cent was mentioned there.

I wish to point out, speaking generally about branch lines, that the railways are now doing away with hundreds of miles of railway lines across the country. The chief reason for building railway lines in Canada today seems to be, and in fact is, for the hauling of heavy freight. There are so many other means of transportation for both freight and passengers today that the railway companies are up against very heavy competition, and I do not criticize them for doing away with their branch lines.

In my own province, branch lines have been discontinued because they did not pay and the railways were not able to compete with other means of transportation. However, when it comes to conveying lumber, wheat, and in this case minerals, it is quite clear that we must build branch lines for this purpose, viz., heavy freight.

As to the need of the particular branch line which is proposed by this bill, I listened very carefully to the explanation of the sponsor of the bill, and I can see that there may be need in this particular case as far as that part of Canada is concerned.

To give an example of the need for branch lines, I would mention the Pine Point branch line which was built from Alberta to the Great Slave Lake, which line I believe has been a great success. However, there is a difference between the Pine Point railway and the one under consideration, because as I understand it there is only one possibility of freight haulage, and that is from the iron mine. In the case of the Pine Point railroad there are great fisheries at Great Slave Lake, and there are forests along the line, as well as farmlands. There is much more freight than minerals.

To my way of thinking, there is a better possibility of success in the future in a branch line such as Pine Point than in the branch line sought by this bill, with only one class of freight to carry.

Another point I wish to raise is that, as the sponsor (Hon. Mr. Benidickson) has told us, the ore in that area is not a high grade ore. Senator Crerar has told us that no other country in the world has as much mineral ore, and particularly iron ore, as has Canada.

The steel company which is promoting this particular mine in Northern Ontario has also promoted to a far greater extent the development of the mines in Labrador and Quebec. A line was constructed there to convey iron ore to the port of Sept-Iles on the St. Lawrence River, from which point it is carried to American ports and also to mills at Hamilton and other parts of Canada.

To one not familiar with this particular situation, it does seem a little strange that we should now be building more railways into more mines in other parts of Canada. Possibly it is going to be much cheaper. This could be the reason.

The honourable sponsor said it will give employment to 500 people in that section of Northwestern Ontario. My good friend Senator Hollett is not here this afternoon, but he could point out to us that 1,200 men in Belle Isle, Newfoundland, have lost employment because the iron mine which formerly supplied ore for DOSCO at Sydney, has been closed down. I could cite other cases.

Senator Burchill and I could refer to mines in the northern part of the New Brunswick. When I say we have no assurance that this mine will continue for any great length of time, I remember the railway that was built into the Heath Mines, north of Newcastle, in New Brunswick, some years ago. I do not think they are now in operation. It was represented to the Commons and to the Senate that there was great urgency for the building of this particular line, and it was also represented by mining engineers that there was the greatest possibility of production of base metals in that part of the province, such as could not be found anywhere else in the world. The company, which came from the United States, spent millions of dollars, but they did not develop and are not developing the mines in New Brunswick or using the railway to the full capacity.

For those reasons I say that we should be extremely careful, and that not only should this bill be studied and thoroughly explained to us in committee but also the agreement between the company and the railway should be before the committee for study.

I am speaking in general; I am not aware of the particular situation, but I have not much doubt that satisfactory reasons will be given for the building of this particular line. A lot depends of course upon the necessity of steel production. I know that steel production during the past few years in the United States has been above average. We read in our press that on account of the war with Viet Nam steel production is on the increase. However, there is the possibility of a slackening in steel production in the United States, which might mean a slackening of production in Canada, and that would mean that these mines might not pay. These are matters which we should take into careful consideration, particularly where a railway is built for one purpose only, namely, to serve a mine in Northern Ontario where, if the mine runs out there is nothing else on which the railway could depend for freight to justify its existence.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I wish to correct the misunderstanding which Senator Brooks has about the Heath Mines in New Brunswick. They are operating on that railroad and the concentrating plant is going full steam. The concentrate is being shipped from Newcastle; at least, it was being shipped last summer and they operated all winter. Not only that, they have made possible the development of other mines in that sector and they plan a larger development, as the manager told me not so very long ago. Therefore, the honourable gentleman is under a misapprehension.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Were they not out of operation for a time?

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Yes.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Having regard to the debate, is it proper for me to move that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Will representatives from the steel company and from the railway be asked to attend the meeting of the committee?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): If I may, I will answer that question addressed to the honourable sponsor of the bill. I will make sure that they are asked to attend.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Might I say that there is great urgency about this bill. I am sure that the two leaders will be in communication about this question as to how many witnesses are required. In the other place, because of the urgency, committee discussion was not required, but I know that committee discussion will take place here.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: They had too many other things to discuss.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Benidickson, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

SCIENCE COUNCIL OF CANADA BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: moved the second reading of Bill C-149, to provide for the establishment of a Science Council of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, as its name implies, this is a bill to establish an organization to be called the Science Council of Canada. This is a fairly simple bill and it may be sufficient at the moment if I indicate its principal provisions.

Under section 3, the Science Council of Canada is to consist of 29 members, of whom 25 are to be from what might be called the public sector, chosen from amongst persons having a specialized interest in science or technology; and four members at present employed in departments or agencies of the Government of Canada. In a few moments I shall explain the reason for the second sector.

The meat of the bill is to be found in section 11 which quotes the duties which the new council is expected to perform. The first part of section 11 says:

> It shall be the duty of the council to assess in a comprehensive manner Canada's scientific and technological resources, requirements and potentialities and to make recommendations thereon to the minister; and in particular it shall be the duty of the council to give consideration to, and make reports and recommendations to the minister on—

Then follows a list of the particular items to which the Science Council is to devote its attention. These include such important matters as:

> (a) the adequacy of the scientific and technological research and development being carried on in Canada;
> (b) the priorities that should be assigned in Canada to specific areas of scientific and technological research;
> (c) the effective development and utilization of scientific and technological manpower in Canada.

The only other section to which I wish to refer for the moment is section 12, which gives the minister the right to refer specific questions, as to science and technology, to the Science Council for consideration and advice.

Honourable senators, I wish to emphasize that this bill does not set up a new government department. The Science Council is to be purely advisory. Section 7 provides for the remuneration of the chairman, at a rate to be fixed by the Governor in Council, and it also provides for the travelling expenses of the other members of council, all of whom will serve without remuneration. This is the only expense provision.

Perhaps the closest parallel to this form of organization is the Economic Council of Canada, which was established a few years ago. During the debate on that legislation some honourable senators questioned the advisability or necessity or utility of an advisory council of that kind, but I think honourable senators will agree with me that the Economic Council of Canada has abundantly justified itself by its two excellent reports.

With regard to science and technology, it is scarcely necessary for me to emphasize their importance, in view of the continual progress of science as the years go on, its impact on the life of the nation, and the necessity that the Government be in a position to keep in touch. One striking example is that of automation and its effect on the current labour life of the nation.

With regard to the general question of the advancement of science and its effect on the life of the people generally, we need but remember the days of our boyhood and think of the extraordinary changes in habits of life which the development of science has produced.

This bill is designed to carry out in part some of the recommendations of the Glassco Commission. As honourable senators know, the Glassco Commission prepared a long and complicated report on the various branches and features of government, and among others they considered the question of the relationship between government and science. In Part 4 the report recommended that a central scientific bureau and a national scientific advisory council be established. I quote from the report the following words:

> the existence of suitable machinery for informing and assisting the Prime Minister and Cabinet with respect to major scientific policy decisions is of paramount importance. Such arrangements as exist on paper today are... less than adequate. But the real concern of your Commissioners is that in fact they (the existing arrangements) have been virtually inoperative and the whole post-war expansion of government scientific activity has proceeded on a piecemeal basis without adequate co-ordination.

I will put that into less restrained and formal language. What it means and what the Glassco Commission is saying is that Canada has at the moment no real comprehensive scientific policy and no formal machinery to provide government with the necessary studies on which to found such a policy.

In December 1963, presumably as the result of this report of the Glassco Commission, the Prime Minister asked for a report from Dr. C. J. MacKenzie on this whole matter and on the activities of government relating to science and technology. I know it is not necessary for me to comment to honourable senators on Dr. MacKenzie, whose name is well known to you all; he is one of the most outstanding scientists in Canada today, and for many years was the head of the National Research Council.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: And he is from the Province of New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is all we have against him!

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Dr. MacKenzie submitted his report to the Prime Minister on January 28, 1964, and that report was tabled by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on April 30 of that year. In his report Dr. MacKenzie recommended that two principal steps should be taken, the first being the establishment of a science secretariat. I quote what the Prime Minister said in the House of Commons:

> The first recommendation, which the Government has now decided to adopt, is that a Scientific Secretariat be established to assemble and analyse information about the Government's scientific programs and their inter-relation with other scientific activities throughout Canada.

The Government carried out that recommendation and a science secretariat was set up in the summer of that year, headed by Professor F. A. Forward, who was head of the Department of Metallurgy at the University of British Columbia. It is a small department attached to the Prime Minister's office.

The second recommendation made by Dr. MacKenzie was to set up what he called a "national committee on scientific policy," which is, in fact, what this bill is proposing to do in slightly different words. This bill calls it the Science Council of Canada. If you examine Dr. MacKenzie's report with regard to this proposed national committee, you will see that his recommendations have been very largely, if not almost entirely, carried out in the provisions of the bill before us. Dr. MacKenzie contemplated a relatively small committee composed partly of scientific men and men of knowledge from outside, and partly from scientists and men engaged in various departments of government. Therefore, I think it is fair to say that this bill is the result partly of the recommendations of the Glassco Report and partly of the recommendations made by Dr. MacKenzie in the report which I have just mentioned.

There is one matter which I am sure exercised the minds of honourable senators as it did mine when examining this bill, and that is the question: What about the present National Research Council? The question may be asked, should not the National Research Council perform the functions of the Science Council of Canada as proposed under this bill?

In answer let me say that the responsibilities of the Science Council will be considerably larger than those of the National Research Council, since those responsibilities will involve the whole sphere of scientific activity. As you know, the National Research Council carries on a great deal of research on its own and encourages a great deal of research in various universities throughout Canada. Therefore, it is questionable whether a body which is itself engaged in research is sufficiently disinterested or objective to give the Government disinterested advice as to the way in which research should be conducted or the channels through which it should be directed. It is quite clear, I think, that the two bodies, the National Research Council and this new Science Council, will work very closely together.

As I said a few minutes ago, the bill provides that four members of the council shall be people who are now employed in the Government service, and I think it is quite unquestionable that when the council is set up one of its permanent members will be the head of the National Research Council at the time.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Is there any information as to how much this is going to cost?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: It will cost the salary of the chairman plus the travelling expenses of the members who are required to come to Ottawa at least twice a year. That is all I can tell you about that.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I would assume, if I may interrupt my honourable friend, that the actual expenses will be the expenses of the four members who now make up the scientific secretariat of the Privy Council. They will be the civil servants who will become part of this.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is quite right; they will be the civil servants upon the basis of which the Science Council will be set up, and to that extent there is no increase in the public expense.

I think all honourable senators will agree that this is a step in the right direction. All civilized countries have recognized the great and increasing importance of science and research and the need for the association of such science and research with government. In Great Britain, for instance, they have a minister for science and they also have a minister for technology. In the United States there is an organization known as the Office of Science and Technology, which is located in the executive office of the President, and its director acts as a special scientific adviser to the President. In France they have quite an elaborate system headed by an organization called Comité Interministériel de la Recherche Scientifique et Technique which reports directly to the office of the Prime Minister.

Honourable senators, I do not think I need go any further in explaining this bill, though I shall be glad to answer any questions which may happen to arise during the debate.

Hon. Mr. Paterson: Will this have anything to do with space investigation or research?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I would certainly say so. Anything that comes under the heading of science would be included. It is a step in the right direction under present conditions. Let us hope that the proposed Science Council will become, as it may well become, an extremely useful and influential body—indeed, as useful and influential as the Economic Council of Canada.

Under those circumstances, all I can do is to commend this bill to the careful attention of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Does the honourable senator know which minister will be designated? Is there any indication of that yet?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: There is no indication. It simply states in the bill that the minister is the minister designated for the purposes of carrying out the provisions, but it does not say who the minister will be.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, we have had placed before us today a report which shows that we have done some scientific research into the saving of our trees. I have another little idea along these lines which I would like to launch.

Not very long ago, two or three years ago in fact, I wrote to the President of the National Research Council to this effect: I suppose you are so thoroughly immersed in deep and abstruse scientific problems that you have very little time to study something that is of great public importance. Then I called to his attention the desirability of a cold firecracker, and supported by letter with a clipping from one of the newpapers showing a list of unfortunate children whose eyes had been knocked out by firecrackers, of children who had been severely burned by fires, and a digest of all the fires that had been started in Canada as a result of the 24th of May celebrations.

We are approaching another 24th of May, and we could almost count in advance the number of children who will lose their eyes or have them severely injured, who will be burned or otherwise hurt during these celebrations; and we could almost count, based on past experience, how many thousands and thousands of dollars we will lose as a result of fires started by this unscientific and dangerous instrument, the firecracker. I told the chairman of the council that what we needed was a firecracker that children could use in safety.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Without fire.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, I said that we want a cold firecracker which would make a flash of light and a great deal of noise, and that is all that is required. I warned, don't ask me how that is to be done; that is your job—and a real job. It may sound humorous, but it would be a great public service if your institution would develop something of that kind.

Well, I received a reply in which the President said that he was referring my suggestion to someone else, but I heard nothing more about it.

I am bringing this matter up now not as a joke—although it sounds humorous to talk about a cold firecracker—but to suggest to you, my colleagues, that it would be a great public service if these scientific people would develop a noise-maker of that kind that would leave the children with a flash and the noise but would remove from their celebrations the dangers that now encircle them.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, Senator Hugessen has presented and explained this bill with that rare, lucid magic which has made him over the years one of the ornaments of this house. My difficulty in following him today is that he has read and has quoted from all the authorities that I have read and wish to quote from, and has made all the observations about them that I would like to make but would not make as well.

I have read the report to the Prime Minister by Dr. MacKenzie; I have read the Glassco Commission report; and, as well, with a lot less profit, I must say, I have read the debate that took place in the other place last week.

One of my other difficulties is that I think I support this bill even more strongly than it has been supported by Senator Hugessen. Many years ago Matthew Arnold wrote some lines about standing between two worlds, one dead and the other struggling to be born. The world that most of us knew died when a bomb fell on Hiroshima, and what we are witnessing now is a new world struggling to be born, struggling amid what we may call rightfully a scientific revolution, a revolution which, in the judgment of people competent to judge, may mean a great deal more to mankind than the industrial revolution of a hundred years ago.

I remember about four or five years ago when the Prime Minister of Britain, Mr. Harold Macmillan, was here. He was at Uplands taking his departure from Canada, and he gave a press conference. While he was giving the conference word came that the Russians had put a Sputnik into space. Mr. Macmillan turned to the Prime Minister of Canada and said, "There is a sign for us; there is the shape of the future; there is a compelling signal for us of the western world to direct all our energies henceforth to scientific development."

In his famous speech at Fulton some years ago, Sir Winston Churchill warned that the dark ages may return, the stone age may return, as he put it in his picturesque way, on the gleaming wings of science; and he went on to say that what might now shower immeasurable material blessings on mankind might even bring about its total destruction. And he added, "Beware, I say. Time may be short."

Sir Winston Churchill was approaching this question from the standpoint of possible war, but, honourable senators, the words of his warning to us then are just as relevant if we think of science—not of pure science but of applied science, of technology, in terms of the scientific revolution. What we are seeing in this scientific revolution is a new march of mankind, and if in that march we fall behind, history might well be merciless to us.

As I read the debate that took place recently in the other place I noticed that there was considerable lamentation over our failure to do more in the past about science. In my opinion, a great deal of this lamentation is irrelevant. There is no value, there is no gain for us now in complaining to ourselves or to others that in past years we did not do enough about science. In fact, we did not ignore science altogether. As far back as 1916—50 years ago—at the time of Union Government we set up in this country what we called, I think, the Science Council. Later we spent money on this or that phase of science, but actually the amounts grew and grew until last year the appropriations, for science, for research, for our universities, our industries, our government departments—and we have five government departments that have adopted this role—amounted to $345 million.

The difficulty has been that our efforts have not been unified. There has been no cohesion. There has not been sufficient coordination to it. This is what the report of the Glassco Commission complained of, as is indicated by Dr. Mackenzie in his report to the Prime Minister, a copy of which I have here. At page 8 of his report you will find these words taken from the report of the Glassco Commission:

> It is against such a background of disjointed promotion that the Cabinet is called upon to approve plans for expansion of existing agencies and their programs, or the creation of new ones. Too often, in the existing organizational vacuum, the decision for or against is made in fact by the Treasury Board, largely on the advice of its own staff. These officials, although possessing widely recognized ability, make no claim to scientific competence or foresight.
> The missing element of expert appraisal has been compensated for in part by the presence of strong leadership in the National Research Council...

And this is true.

> ...the informal participation in policy-making of a succession of able presidents, and frequent consultation amongst scientists on a number of committees. While their contributions have had undoubted value, as part of the operating research group with a direct stake in one segment of it, they have not been wholly disinterested in the elaboration of government scientific policy.

To that statement by the Glassco Commission Dr. Mackenzie added these words:

> In my view the above is a reasonably accurate picture of how things have happened during the past 20 years of the explosive growth in science and it all underlies the present need for suitable government machinery to assist those responsible for formulating national scientific policy.

So, honourable senators, I think a realistic and proper approach to this bill is one in which we ask ourselves, first, is there a need for what is proposed by the bill; and, second, is this a bill to fill that need; and third, what about personnel? What about the people who are going to be committed with the execution or the direction of the provisions of this bill?

This, I think, is the heart of the matter. You can put on paper almost anything. You can put on paper ideal plans and groupings and desires, but unless you get the people to carry out the purposes and the intentions of such a bill, then the whole thing becomes more or less meaningless.

There is to be a body of governors, as was indicated by Senator Hugessen, to carry out the aims of this bill. This, I am afraid, leads me to say that we have not in the past been very wise and not very happy in our choice of people to carry out enterprises of this kind. If any honourable senator doubts that, he had better look at the current controversy about the C.B.C. The truth of the matter is that in choosing people to sit on these boards or other emanations of the Crown—and this is true of both parties—we have often made appointments on the basis of recognition for the services, and even financial help, of deserving Liberals or deserving Conservatives. If that should happen in respect to a matter of this kind it would be tragic indeed.

A question has been raised here today about whether this body would interfere with the National Research Council. Of course it will not. This bill, in fact, is not concerned with pure science. Pure science will take care of itself. The findings of an Einstein are always available to us. What we are concerned with here, and what the nation should be concerned with, is technology. We are concerned with technology for industry. If honourable senators look at the first or the second report of the Economic Council of Canada they will find stated specifically that what is needed to help Canadian industry, to help our exports, tc help us to compete, to resolve our balance of payments and employment problems, is more technology for Canadian industry—technology which we may import, and technology which we may develop on our own. That is the purpose of this bill.

Any honourable senator who has read the famous Reith lecture by Professor C. P. Snow—now Lord Snow and I think connected with the British Ministry of Science—will know that this is what he stressed. He was not talking about pure science. He was talking about applied science. He was talking about technology. He said in this lecture that Britain's whole future depended upon what she could do in that regard. I think that is also true of Canada.

We may talk about tariffs—and there are still a few of us who talk about tariffs—we may talk about an Atlantic Trading Community, we may talk about a Common Market, but, honourable senators, if we do not keep up with this march of mankind in the way of technological improvement, then nothing that happens in the Kennedy round and nothing that we do about tariffs will avail us in the least. If we are unable to compete with the technical advances of other nations, then our industries and our whole industrial future, including our exports, our balances of payments, and everything concerned with our development, will go by the board.

I myself should like to think of this body that is being set up now as a companion to the Economic Council of Canada. I should like to think of it as a body that will do for science and scientific development what the Economic Council of Canada is doing for industry. I agree profoundly with Senator Hugessen, that the Economic Council is a great body. I think that the Government should be congratulated upon securing a man of the stature and ability of Dr. John Deutsch to head this council. Some of the most interesting reading that has come my way in a long time is found in the first and second reports of the Economic Council of Canada.

If we can get this body to do what the Economic Council of Canada is doing, and get them both working together, the one complementing the other, then I think we shall have done a great job for Canada. But, as I said before, we must obtain the right people. We must get the John Deutschs of science to act on this committee. If we start appointing this university professor or that university professor, or this or that man from this or that specific region, then we are lost. This is not a regional matter at all. We cannot say that we must have New Brunswick represented, or Quebec represented, or Ontario represented. We want Canada represented, and only Canada. This is something that I hope the Government will do.

There is one other point I should like to make about this bill. In the bill, "minister" for the purposes of the act, is defined as:

> ...such member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada as may be designated by the Governor in Council...

Honourable senators, speaking for myself alone and for no one else on this side of the house, I submit that this is not good enough. If research and scientific technology be as vital to Canada as Senator Hugessen told us, and if they be as vital as I believe they will be, then I say there should be set up in this country a separate Ministry of Science.

I hardly expect that my hope in that regard —and I must say it is a vagrant hope— will be accepted by this Government. Nevertheless, it is true in this matter of science, that one of the recognized difficulties in parliamentary countries has been that the minister concerned with general scientific policy, as distinct from departmental scientific activities—because we have four distinct departments with research branches of their own —should not have to concern himself with these other scientific activities of a special character and be concerned with departmental matters as well.

If this legislation is what I think it is, the most important bill that will come before this house this year—it may well be one of the most important ever to have come to this chamber—then I say you cannot leave it to the happy chance of some minister who may not have the qualifications and may not have the interest required of him. I think this is big enough for a separate ministry.

Now I am going to make a further suggestion which may surprise you. I think this designated minister should not only be the head of a Ministry of Science, but he should be a member of the Senate. In the Senate he would not be troubled or worried by some department or by some scientific branch in a department of which he was head.

In my view, a Minister of Science sitting in the Senate surrounded by men, many of mature judgment, all with an interest in science, certainly all of them with an interest in the future of technology in Canada, with the advise he would get from these people, with a committee such as the Banking and Commerce Committee before which he could appear from time to time, and before which he could bring experts in science—the greatest technicians we have, or scientists from other countries—would be a very important step for Canada and one that might bring lasting benefits.

Honourable senators, I have spoken more briefly than I had intended, because as I said, Senator Hugessen has already said all that is necessary and relevant, which I had intended to say, and he has said it a great deal better.

In conclusion, however, there is something I wish to say; it may seem almost a contradiction of what I have already said, but I can assure you it is not. I have wanted to say these things in the Senate before, but did not have the opportunity. I want to express the hope that in our proper and terribly vital concern with science or technology we will not in Canada be led to forget the humanities, that in our concern for know-how we will not forget the know-why. There is no sense in pasting wings on man unless you give him a winged nature.

Not long ago I was saddened, as I am sure others were as well, when I read that some of our universities or colleges were dropping English as a necessary subject for engineers. Honourable senators, a step like that is a tragedy.

Incidentally, I notice even in these reports that when they speak of skills, of technical training, vocational training, they seem to confuse these things with education.

Honourable senators, God knows we need scientists and technology, as I have been saying for the last half hour; but, no matter what that need, we must never in this country confuse technical training with true education. Education is not something to make a man a lawyer, a doctor, an engineer, or a priest—it is something to make him a man. Education is not concerned with training; it is something to teach men to love truth and beauty for their own sakes. True education is wisdom of the heart. True education is tolerance; it is God's grace of courtesy; it is understanding, it is sympathy, it is sportsmanship, it is love, it is compassion, it is mercy, it is pity. If the people have not these things, then no matter what their technical training, no matter what their skills, they are in truth not educated at all.

I say, God help the nation where everybody would be trained and nobody educated.

Honourable senators, with that rider to what I have been saying to you, I have before me a quotation from Huxley. What he said is something that we must keep in mind in this country at this time. It is this:

> When man no longer loves nor hates, when suffering causes no pity and the tale of great deeds ceases to thrill, when the lily of the field seems no longer more beautifully arrayed than Solomon in all his glory, when the awe has vanished from the snow-capped peak and from the deep ravine—then, indeed, Science will have the world to itself, not because the monster has devoured Art, but because one side of human nature is dead and mankind has lost the half of its precious and eternal heritage.

Huxley repeated those words a few years later when he visited John Hopkins University, and he also said:

> Gentlemen, I am not impressed by all your wealth or your great buildings.

And the most famous economist of our time John Maynard Keynes, in almost the last words he wrote, said that no matter how important economics were, how important political economy, he hoped that he would never see the day when political economy and economics were given priority over morals and goodness and decent living.

Honourable senators, these are things that I thought that I must add to what I have said about technology. We do need what this bill provides. I think it gives a means of getting what it aims at, but let us not forget the other things.

Honourable senators, I do commend this bill to your hearty support.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Sullivan, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 31, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck for the second reading of Bill S-19, to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I understand that I may speak with the acquiescence of Senator Croll who does not object to our continuing the debate in his absence.

I rise somewhat reluctantly to discuss this Bill S-19 because, while it is one on whose principles a layman is obviously entitled to have views, it is also one the details of which are clearly the domain of those learned in the law and in particular the law of marriage and divorce. I say "reluctantly" because on the principles of the bill I find myself in full approval of this step in the direction of extension of the grounds for divorce, a cautious extension and one which seems to me to be socially sound. It is the details that give me cause for concern.

I believe this is a bill which will extend materially the grounds on which marriages may be dissolved in Canada, for any citizen in any province, provided he has the money to defray the expenses of an action in the courts of his province or a petition to the Senate of Canada.

There may be some disagreement among honourable senators as to the actual effect of this bill. I would not be surprised if the sponsor of the bill, Senator Roebuck, disagrees with my view. If so, I would hope that when he sums up he will make a clear statement as to whether or not, in his view, the effect of this bill will be to extend the grounds on which divorces will be granted by the Senate committee.

I raise that point because it was raised by Senator Choquette during the second reading debate on March 3. Senator Choquette made what seemed to me to be an excellent case for the contention that the wording of this bill does include the Senate of Canada. His point was that the Senate is a court within the meaning of the extension of grounds for divorce, by clause 2, subsection 1, to "courts" having divorce jurisdiction.

I was surprised to hear the reply of Senator Roebuck, who introduced the bill, to the point raised by Senator Choquette. He said, as reported in the Senate Hansard of March 4 at page 244:

> I assure the honourable senator it was not the intention of the drafters of the bill to include the Senate, or the "court" which we are presently operating in connection with the Senate.

My question to him would be, why not? Why was it not the intention, or how could the drafters of the bill assume that there would be any other effect?

I do not say that it is legally or constitutionally desirable that the Senate should be placed on the judicial level of provincial courts, but if this extension of the grounds of divorce becomes applicable or permissible to the courts of the eight provinces, surely the Senate committee will grant divorces on those same extended grounds. I say that because it is my understanding, from the statements we have had here on many occasions from Senator Roebuck, that the basis—the constitutional concept behind the granting of divorces by the Senate—is that it is a petition to the Crown based on the fact that the citizens of two provinces have unequal rights with citizens of other provinces in the matter of divorce. As I understand it, the granting of divorce, if I may use the short term, by the Senate committee, is a remedy of a situation created by certain dispositions of the legislature of certain provinces.

I am not criticizing those provinces. I must presume that they are acting, as they understand it, in keeping with the will and the wishes of those they represent. In so doing they have deliberately not provided judicial divorce in their provinces, in spite of the fact that those provinces as far as I know have raised no objection to their citizens coming to this court, if I may call it that, and asking for the dissolution of their marriages.

Senator Roebuck gave us a very comprehensive background of what, to a layman at least, is the jumble and jungle of divorce law in Canada. He pointed out, as I remember, that in four of the provinces the jurisdiction of divorce in the courts is based on pre-Confederation statutes; in three others it is based on acts which they themselves have incorporated; in one, Ontario, it is based on a special act; and in two of the provinces no provision has been made.

I would hope that Senator Roebuck, in summing up, would run down the list, province by province, giving a brief summary of the present law and explaining to us exactly what will be the effect of this bill, if it becomes law, on the present grounds for divorce.

At present we are given to understand that while adultery is, with one or two exceptions, the only ground for divorce, there is at least one province in which some of the new grounds are at present grounds for divorce. I believe that applies to Nova Scotia.

It would be helpful to our consideration of the bill if the honourable senator would state the law, province by province. At the moment I am sure there are other senators like myself who are not clear as to the exact effect of this bill.

I also hope that Senator Roebuck, with his vast experience, will tell us his view of the effect of this bill on the grounds for divorce as recognized by the Senate committee.

I come now, honourable senators, to the specific grounds set forth in this bill. In layman's language they are desertion, cruelty and lunacy.

My objection to the bill as drafted is that these terms are not more clearly defined. I recognize that when Senator Roebuck introduced the bill he explained why they were not more clearly defined. He said, if I may use his expression, he was introducing a "simple" bill. With very great respect, as a layman, I think the bill is too simple.

It is also true, as Senator Roebuck pointed out, that in the normal course of judicial proceedings definitions will be given to the terms desertion, cruelty and lunacy. He went further and said that definitions had already been given in the English courts following the introduction there of a similar act, and he also pointed out that the wording of the present bill as it is before us, and with the changes necessary to accommodate our particular system of government, is in effect the same as the English bill which became law in 1950.

Let us look at the three terms. The first ground applies if the "respondent has deserted the petitioner without cause for a period of at least three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition." Now, as I have said, honourable senators, I am quite sure that the case law on this subject in England, has defined the word "desert", as I am sure it has also defined the words "cruelty" and "of unsound mind," or whatever you wish to call it. It seems to me that a good case can be made out at this particular time for incorporating some of that case law into the statute law we are asked to consider at this time.

Honourable senators, we also have before us at the present time the Interpretation Act, which looks into some of the words in common use in our statutes and says in effect that it is necessary that these words should be explained. Among the words that qualified for definition in this statute are such simple words as "a week", "a bank", "broadcasting", "fiscal year", "local time", "month", "person". It also defines the words "shall" and "may", and the word "year". Now I suggest, and again I am speaking as a layman, that if such words need interpretation, such important words as "desertion, cruelty" and "of unsound mind" also should be defined.

Hon. Mr. Farris: That would make it more complicated.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I fully agree with the remark of honourable Senator Farris, that this would make it more complicated.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Might I ask the honourable senator if he would also require that we define the word "adultery" at the same time?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It is easily recognizable.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable Senator Roebuck asks if we should define "adultery", and I as a layman think we most certainly should. I say that because I well remember a case in the courts of Ontario, in which the evidence was that a couple, not married to each other but married to others, booked a passage on a Saguenay tour; they spent a week together sleeping in the same cabin, registered as man and wife to each other, which they were not, and when the case came before the court the learned judge ruled that there was no evidence of adultery before him. He spelled out in words which I will not use here in this chamber exactly what he meant by adultery, and I can assure honourable senators it was not merely registering in the same cabin and sleeping in the same bed. Such definitions of course can go too far; we have some evidence before us that some overzealous people in the C.B.C. may have gone too far in spelling out what they regarded as juvenile delinquency. I am not suggesting we take pictures, but I am sure there is the ability among the gentlemen learned in the law here to define these terms. Why is this necessary?

Let us take the case of desertion. A wife married to an incorrigible alcoholic decides to remove herself and her children from bed and board for three years. She wants to take herself and her children away from an atmosphere of shame and sordidness. So she leaves for three years. Is that desertion? Honourable members who are learned in the law will say that judges will use their common sense.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I point out that the wording in the act is "without cause".

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am aware of that, and I thank Senator Roebuck for drawing my attention to it. In fact I had it underlined.

Again let us take the specific example of the words "without cause". Is it sufficient cause that this wife is married to an alcoholic? If so there are hundreds and thousands of men and women living within the bonds of matrimony who have cause. I do not think that is a sufficient qualification. I say that because there are two sides to this question. The person who wishes to remove himself or herself from within a marriage circle may wish to know how far he or she can go and on what grounds. What is cause? How can they do it without putting themselves in jeopardy of the law in regard to the marriage contract? No layman should have to go to a lawyer and ask him to look up the English cases, regardless of which side he is on. In my view, if the simple words in the Interpretation Act require definition, and even if it will make the act more complicated, some definition will clarify this measure and make it fairer to the average person who may find himself involved in its operation.

Let us look now at the word "cruelty". We all know what has happened in the United States because of lack of definition. In many if not in most of the states "cruelty" has become merely another word for mutual incompatibility. And the courts there in their wisdom or lack of wisdom have extended the word "cruelty", which is one of the new grounds suggested in this bill, to make the whole marriage contract meaningless. The question was raised in the debate, does this include mental cruelty? I think even if the definition went no further than to define mental and physical cruelty, it would improve this act. Without complicating this act unnecessarily, I think it is possible to make these definitions more workable.

For example, surely "cruelty" should somehow be related to detriment to physical or mental health, either of the offended party to the contract or the children. If this amount of definition were given, then the proof of the grounds would at least be subject to professional and expert evidence. You would at least be able to call medical evidence to show that the mental or physical health of the petitioner or the children in the case were in danger of detriment.

I come now to the third new ground for divorce—lunacy, unsoundness of mind, or whatever it may be called. Here I find perhaps a rather good example of why I believe some definition would be helpful, because I find a conflict between the interpretation of the bill as given us by the sponsor and what I consider to be the wording of the bill.

Let me illustrate. Throughout his explanation Senator Roebuck seemed to make it quite clear that the new ground, unsoundness of mind, was as follows. First of all, at one point he used the words, "five years of insanity while confined in an institution." Those words appear in the Debates at page 235. On the same page, quoting the General Council of the United Church of Canada, he said, "insanity that fails to respond after five years of treatment in an institution." At page 241 appears the same general interpretation: "Five years in a mental institution in an intractable condition of mind." Again on the same page, "detained for five years as an intractable lunatic."

As I read Senator Roebuck's explanation I certainly get the impression that he believes this bill provides for unsoundness of mind within that definition. That is to say, where the person of unsound mind is intractably so—because that is the word used instead of "incurable" which is used in the English act—and is detained for some five years.

I have cited the statements of Senator Roebuck which I believe support that interpretation, but I do not think the bill says this. If I may read it, clause 2(1)(c) states that a court may grant a divorce where the respondent > is intractably of unsound mind and has been continuously under care and treatment for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

Then it defines "care and treatment" as follows:

> (2) For the purposes of this section a person of unsound mind shall be deemed to be under care and treatment only while he is
> (a) detained in pursuance of an order or inquisition completely made or had under authority of a statute in force in the province concerned or as a criminal lunatic; or
> (b) receiving treatment as a voluntary patient pursuant to any statute in force in the province concerned, being treatment which follows without any interval a period of such detention as aforesaid.

Unless my reading of the wording is quite wrong, this means that grounds for divorce can be established where a spouse has been detained for a year, less than a year, six months, two months or sent for psychiatric examination by a magistrate, and then released from detention and voluntarily takes treatment. This is a ground for divorce? I am sure that is not the understanding Senator Roebuck had, and yet it seems to me this kind of definition is loose and opens the door to all kinds of abuses.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say. I am sure Senator Roebuck knows I am not criticizing him or the bill, but I am merely making a plea for careful consideration of these aspects. I think it is a mistake to take a bill that was passed by the British Parliament in 1950 or 1952 and say that because this form was passed there, therefore we should use the same form. I think we can do better.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton) for Hon. Mr. Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

CONFERENCE IN NEW ZEALAND—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the 1965 General conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, held in New Zealand in November and December 1965, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada, and to the forthcoming meeting to be held in Canada in September and October 1966.

He said: Honourable senators, pursuant to the notice I gave several days ago, I would like to take some time in the Senate today to discuss the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, somewhat in general, and in particular the eleventh meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association which took place in New Zealand in November and December of last year.

The Canadian delegation was led by Mr. S. Ron Basford, the Member of Parliament who represents Vancouver-Burrard, British Columbia.

There were two representatives from the Senate—His Honour the Speaker (Hon. Mr. Smith, Kamloops), and the Honourable Frank Welch from Nova Scotia. In due time, Senator Welch will speak on this matter.

I was present at the conference, not as a member of the Canadian delegation but as vice-chairman of the General Council and chairman at that time of the Canadian branch of the C.P.A.

Honourable senators, I was proud of the performance of the Canadian delegation and proud also of the impression they left with their fellow delegates and with the people of New Zealand. Many of our delegates took on this task at very short notice, immediately after the election. They worked hard on the briefing material and they acquitted themselves admirably in the debates. Senator Welch will discuss the special aspects of the meeting, as he was present for the tours of

New Zealand which were arranged. He was good enough to bring Mrs. Welch with him, and she made no small contribution to the many events of the conference and to the morale of the Canadian and other delegations.

I am delighted to have the opportunity to praise the co-operation and assistance given to the delegation by the Canadian High Commissioner in New Zealand, the Honourable K. J. Burbridge, who is known to many honourable senators, and by his wife, Mrs. Burbridge. Our grateful thanks are due to them for the hospitality and many kindnesses shown to us. We also had the co-operation of the very able staff at the Canadian Mission in New Zealand. They briefed the delegation, they assisted in the preparation of material and they went far beyond the call of duty in providing facilities and helping in every way. Their standing in New Zealand, and especially in Wellington, is very high indeed.

We were all impressed by the elaborate hospitality extended to us. The Prime Minister of New Zealand, the members of his government, the members of Parliament, the staff associated with the organization of the conference and the New Zealanders themselves all contributed to make our visit to New Zealand one that we shall always remember.

We were in New Zealand in November and December—it was spring there, almost the beginning of summer. Incidentally, the golf was very good too, when we could get to it.

Hon. Mr. Farris: How about the players?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The players were not too bad. Of course the New Zealanders are very keen golfers, and I wish I could say that the Canadians acquitted themselves as well on the golf course as some of the New Zealanders did.

Honourable senators, I desire to speak primarily about the proceedings which took place in the Parliament Buildings at Wellington. They are summarized in an issue of a publication called The Parliamentarian, dated January 1966, which is available to all members of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in this chamber.

There were some 123 accredited delegates; there were four observers; there were eight specially invited visitors from the United States under the leadership of one of their distinguished senators, a friend of many of us, Senator William Fulbright.

The agenda before the Conference contained five items, arranged by the steering committee in the following order:

(1) The Rhodesian question.

(2) Economic growth in the Commonwealth.

(3) Parliamentary government in the Commonwealth.

(4) The Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and its future.

(5) Foreign affairs.

The next meeting of the association will take place in Ottawa at the beginning of September 1966, and for that reason, among others, I feel it is important to report to Parliament at this time about the proceedings which took place in New Zealand.

Dealing first with the Rhodesian question, some 35 speakers addressed themselves to the current situation there. The vast majority of speakers were from Africa and Southeast Asia, and they were highly critical both of the United Kingdom and of the United Nations for their failure to remove the Smith regime. There were pleas made against this attitude, pleas for moderation, pleas for time to see if the proposed sanctions would not work, and pleas especially for the wisdom of avoiding bloodshed. These pleas come mainly from the older countries of the Commonwealth and most of them went unheeded.

The emotional depth and aspect of this debate was indeed profound. It was urged that since there was no hesitation in using troops in Kenya against the Mau Mau, or in Cyprus against the freedom fighters, or in British Guiana against the nationalists, or in Viet Nam against the rebels, there should be no hesitation in using troops in Rhodesia to oust the Smith regime. The Smith government, it was said, had committed treason against the sovereign power, which was Britain, and it was pointed out that the penalty for treason was death. With few exceptions the countries of Southeast Asia and Africa made it crystal clear that the method they considered essential in this instance was the use of force. It was even alleged that the failure to use force was a decision based upon colour. I am happy, however, to report that this view was controverted by certain moderate elements from Africa.

All members of the Commonwealth should know this, particularly we in Canada since we are to be the hosts for the next meeting. We will hear more of it in September because the problem is a continuing one. It is a problem which must be watched and every available opportunity must be used to resolve it. It is my personal hope, and I am sure that of all honourable senators, that force will not be necessary. I couple with that the further hope that justice to the people of that unfortunate country will result from whatever action is taken.

On the subject of economic growth in the Commonwealth, I should like to say a few words. This topic was argued with some considerable force, but with much less emotion than was the Rhodesian question. It was pointed out that on the whole the countries within the Commonwealth which could be described as underdeveloped or developing had, in fact, less development than developing countries outside of the Commonwealth. The basic requirement of these countries is for aid in human terms and in terms of skills, and as well for money and machinery. Perhaps primarily, and influencing all of these other instruments of help, it was made quite clear that the first requirement was the provision of more facilities for education in the broad sense of the word in the newly developing countries.

Honourable senators, the delegates from Southeast Asia and Africa from whom these pleas emanated are impressive people. They laid stress on every aspect of education in every area of the field. Technical training is not enough. Basic education leading to higher education was considered to be of extreme importance; and if I may paraphrase, if not quote what Senator O'Leary of Carleton said yesterday, they said it was important not only to have the know-how but as well to have the know-why. It was said that there were avenues which could open up working opportunities for people in those countries and which they could not have without outside assistance all across the spectrum of what that term involves today.

The case was put most reasonably. It was said that the supply of aid should be geared to the needs, the resources and the cultures of the people who were to be helped. It was thought that a decade of intensive application of the proper assistance could work wonders.

Of course, the problems are legion. They include, first of all, poverty, which is a breeding ground for communism; sickness and disease; over-population; under-employment and outmoded work methods. They also include internal insecurity, instability of government and in some cases poor systems of land tenure. But, I repeat, the first priority is for the provision of facilities for general education and special training of all kinds, both industrial and agricultural, together with loans and gifts, technical assistance and managerial assistance. Properly used, they hope these things might lead later to investment from abroad.

The problem of feeding the world's people was recognized, and that it will increase with the years was greatly stressed. But above all, stability of government must be assured. Here again stress was placed on the importance of education for government, the education of the young people of those countries to enable them to take their place in the public life of their country.

The Senate will be interested to know, I am sure, that an argument was made for the planning of the development of industrial capacity in the developed nations to avoid competition with the early manufactures of the new emerging and developing nations. For me this was an old proposal, as it is indeed for many senators. It has been urged many times in the Economic Committee of the NATO parliamentarians. Senator Walker will remember particularly the leadership given in this respect by Senator Javits of New York, who was at one time the chairman of that committee.

On the other side of the coin it was suggested that in the developing countries emphasis should be placed upon indigenous new industrial and agricultural products which would open foreign markets of a new kind. In other words, there is no sense, they were saying, in having Kenya make clothespins to sell in Canada, or electric light bulbs to sell in Japan, or shoes to sell in England. In every one of these developing countries the standard of living is low, and the effort to raise it must come from the people who live there, with appropriate aid from outside.

I must say that there was a very generous acknowledgment of the aid that had been received from Britain, from Canada and the other developed Commonwealth countries, from the United States and West Germany. One could not help but feel too that there was on the part of the developing countries a moral duty to continue this work systematically and with prudence.

These are the general impressions that were left with me after that debate.

After my return I had a talk with Senator McCutcheon, and he told me of a book—and I am most indebted to him for drawing it to my attention—written by the great authoritative historian, Arthur Toynbee, entitled Between Niger and Nile. In that book there are two or three points which seem to bear upon what I am trying to say this afternoon, and with the indulgence of this house I should like to read some passages from this book. At page 68 Tonynbee says:

> It means, above all, inspiring people with confidence that they can change their lives for the better by self-help. It means tapping hidden springs of initiative which may have been buried and choked for ages, yet which are always latent in the subsoil of human nature.

And at page 116:

> In the world of the future, every cultivated man or woman will have to be at home in at least two cultures as a minimum; and, among the current ecumenical cultures, the French culture is one of the most attractive.

This is Toynbee talking about the situation in Africa. And we think we have problems in this country in this respect!

> West Africans today are realizing that their university-educated elite will have to be not merely bi-cultural but tri-cultural. Besides being literate in their local African mother-tongue, they will have to be literate in both French and English as well. In West Africa the ex-French and the ex-British territories are intricately interlaced with each other geographically, and their frontiers—drawn sixty or seventy years ago to suit British and French, not African convenience—but right across the native African ethnic and linguistic map. Close co-operation between the ex-British and the ex-French West African territories is therefore going to be indispensable in the new era of independence.

And continuing on page 117:

> Should the young African universities be content to follow the established Western university conventions? Or should they take a new look, with fresh and unprejudiced eyes, at the whole subject of the scope and aim of university education?
> They have, in fact, the chance of finding a new way that will meet African needs; and, if they innovate imaginatively and judiciously, they may do valuable educational pioneering work, not only for Africa, but for the world as a whole.

And, I would add, particularly in Southeast Asia.

Industrialization, of course, is the magic word in all of this discussion, and of this Toynbee says at page 69:

> All over the world today, they are now demanding a share in the benefits for themselves; and this is reasonable now that we have entered on the age of mechanization. Modern technology is increasing Man's productivity to a degree that is making social justice practicable at last; and the long-overdue social revolution is therefore now inevitable everywhere.

But, there is an important aspect of industrialization which, in my submission, should give pause not only to the developing nations, but also to ourselves, the so-called developed nations. Sir Arthur Bryant, writing in the Illustrated London News of April 2 last, quoted a letter that was written to the New Statesman which he thought—and it is also my own humble opinion—has much merit. I should like to read a portion of it. Bryant wrote:

> ...it referred to what is perhaps at once the loveliest, most contented and prosperous, and least spoilt rural area in the British Isles, the Border Country.
> "To the eye of one going through the Borders the little towns he passes through and the land between them can give nothing but pleasure and a sense of cleanness and peace too rarely-found in our island. The pastures are well stocked, the towns old and friendly, the scattered farms compact and solid: the faces of the natives getting in and out of the bus or train are pink and contented and are more often than not greeting each other as neighbours or familiar acquaintances at races or markets—northern country people, kindly but reserved, set in their ways and belonging to their land. The rivers, and hills, the woods and pastures have about them a woven-in harmony.
> And in another generation will this land have changed again? Will there be the scattered blocks of bootbox modern towns, multiplicity of chimneys, giant pylons, power-lines, smoke, industrial scum in the waters, a smell like the English midlands, the droning and hooting of factories and the roaring of bulldozers? Will another generation never know the rare and fruitful peace of this small, fertile part of Scotland?

> But I cannot forbear to suggest that there may come a time when we shall need our land and the food that it produces more than we now need plastic factories and timber-pulping works and the other quick prosperity-makers that 'They' are offering us—nay, forcing upon us."

It seemed to me that this is an aspect of development in underdeveloped and developed countries which might well be very carefully considered by their leaders.

I should like now to say a few words about parliamentary government in the Commonwealth, which was also one of the topics discussed. There was a long discussion about the role of the ombudsman, which I do not propose to discuss here. However, since the delegates were all described as parliamentarians it was most interesting to hear the views they expressed about the parliamentary system itself. Some of them praised what was called the modern one-party system, and the fact that there was no necessity to waste people's time by having an opposition. It was pointed out that the one-party system prevailed in Kenya and in Ghana as the result of a plebiscite.

The Congo was cited as a country where there was unstable government because of the multiplicity of parties. Malawi, too, which was a republic, had a one-party system, but there was provision for representation of the European community.

The African countries appeared to be the only place from which an attempt was made to justify this concept of the one-party system. But it does exist there and it is a real idea with those people, a working idea. However, their spokesman was good enough to say that it might be considered to be a peculiar aspect of the conditions on that continent. It does not prevail everywhere. For example, Zambia has a parliament with opposition parties, and an assembly consisting of chiefs, which I would gather to be an assembly somewhat like a Senate. However, they were not sure that this was the right arrangement even for that country, and that perhaps the one-party system based on the system of the tribal councils was more appropriate for African nations. That was one side of the argument.

From New Zealand, Jamaica, Nigeria, India, the United Kingdom and Canada there were forceful speeches made on the importance of a government responsible to a House of Commons opposed by a freely elected opposition.

The matter of second chambers was discussed only to the extent of pointing out that New Zealand had dispensed with hers and that Australia had made hers elective.

I was impressed with one speaker from Nigeria, who said that if the dignity of man and fundamentals of human rights had any meaning at all, nothing but the two or multi-party system was acceptable, that anything else would be a reversion to colonial days. Another delegate likened the development of the one-party system in African countries to the practices in this respect of Communist countries, especially Russia.

I may have said this in the Senate before, but when I was in Singapore I was invited to attend a meeting of the legislature. It was the second sitting of a new parliament. It was curious to see that the opposition, for reasons of their own, had decided to boycott the sitting, and in the result every government proposal that day went unopposed and uncriticised, and on that day the budget was presented!

I am frankly of the opinion that while it may take some time to develop parliamentary institutions, as we understand them, along traditional lines and modernized to meet current world requirements and national requirements, this is an undertaking which must be seriously considered by the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. I hope it is a task we shall take upon ourselves in September.

Honourable senators, I do not like to quote myself, but in the speech of acceptance which I made at the last convention, held in the southeast portion of the world, I thought it appropriate to say that in that region I felt there was a special elan above and beyond its great material potential. I said that it was a product of the spirit and a culture of the great, the friendly, the gentle peoples of Asia and of Africa. I described them deliberately in that way, despite the turmoil which now disaffects and disturbs so many of them.

In the character and within the social institutions of these peoples there is a mystical quality—human, spiritual, part of it indeed oriental in character, from which strength and indeed aid can inseminate the western establishment of the Commonwealth. In the words of Tennyson, it is something within which "Spirit with Spirit can meet." In my view, it is a very real and available Commonwealth asset; it is part of the great concept of Commonwealth which can be enduring if we will but use it.

There was also much discussion about commodity stabilization. This is a subject which is allied to the general problem of economics and social development, and great emphasis was placed upon it. It was freely recognized that efficiency of agricultural methods in the underdeveloped countries must be improved. This includes the fields of production, distribution, and of price on the world markets, especially for those countries with single or few special products and crops, like sugar or cocoa.

The finger was pointed to famine, which prevails in certain sections of the Commonwealth despite the opportunity to provide plenty of food in the world. This is the dilemma to be resolved.

The matter of population control was also urged. So also was the use of co-operatives, and education of the agricultural producer in the use of co-operatives. I must say that the Canadian delegation was particularly helpful in this area of the debate.

It was striking to me, as I am sure it will be to all honourable senators, to hear that 23 per cent of the land area of the world, 20 per cent of its rainfall and 24 per cent of its population is within the Commonwealth.

On the question of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and its future, I should like to say a word or two particularly about a speech made by Mr. Bernard Braine of the United Kingdom delegation. He had many practical suggestions to offer. They included the urgency of developing a proper agenda for the general meetings. He urged a closer relationship between the work done by the prime ministers conferences and the conferences held by the parliamentarians. He was supported strongly by others in his suggestion that a committee system be devised to shorten the time of the conference and still allow ample opportunity for the work of the plenary session. He also urged that some attention be paid to continuity in national delegations. He urged upon delegates the importance of reporting to their legislatures on the work of the conference.

I may say that the practice in this respect which is followed in this chamber and in the House of Lords was highly commended as an admirable example.

I must also mention the speech of the distinguished the Right Honourable Arthur Henderson, who is the honorary treasurer of the General Council. He thought that the council, now with 46 members, was unwieldy. He also thought that meetings should be held not annually, but every two years. He warned against the dangers arising out of increasing costs associated with conference meetings. I must say that in this respect, he is a man after my own heart.

I shall not attempt to report on the debate on international affairs. The leaders were the Prime Minister of New Zealand, the Right Honourable Keith Holyoake, who spoke particularly about the problem in Southeast Asia for the parts of the Commonwealth in that area.

The other featured speaker was Senator William Fulbright of the United States. He made a very moderate but a most impressive presentation. He outlined the problem of Viet Nam and the responsibility which the United States government and the people of the United States felt for world peace and especially in Southeast Asia. His speech to me was most reassuring.

Honourable senators, when the Commonwealth Law Conference was held in Ottawa in 1960, the leader of the United Kingdom delegation was the then Lord Chancellor, Viscount Kilmuir. He was a most thoughtful man, and able. I remember him asking what I thought the ultimate fate of the Commonwealth was and what unifying element there might be to preserve it with so many new areas achieving independence. He asked, "Was it the Crown, the parliamentary system, the rule of law, trade, power—what?"

Since that time there has been a greater proliferation of independent members and others described as on the fringe of the Commonwealth.

If I had to answer Lord Kilmuir's question today I would say that all of the elements he mentioned form a part of the unifying force in one way or another. I would add now one further element, that is, the problem, the challenge and the opportunity which the issues of the developing parts of the Commonwealth present to the whole group of its 21 or 22 nations. The old days are gone. Certainly, Britain, and help for the mother country, is not the central issue.

Like the older members of the Empire and of the Commonwealth, Britain has become a donor unit with great responsibilities, not only in the field of technical assistance and economic aid but in the field of defence. I had the opportunity to visit the great British naval base at Singapore and to see the heavy responsibility which she is shouldering there and how important it is for that area of the world.

For other and valid reasons, we in Canada, like other members of the Commonwealth, have been donors in this field. We are not engaged in preserving an empire. We are engaged and we must become increasingly engaged, in the issues of promoting peace, raising living standards, helping people across the whole spectrum of developing nations, but more particularly the developing nations within the Commonwealth. In our generation, if we fail in this we shall be condemned. If we succeed, we shall have made an impressive contribution to the betterment of a vast segment of humanity. I know we have pockets of poverty in Canada; we have serious domestic problems, social, economic, jurisdictional. But as a free and prosperous people, as an enlightened people and a generous people, we must face and formulate, as well, with others, solutions to these larger issues which are very real and which require urgent and sympathetic attention.

I had the honour to be elected chairman of the General Council of the C.P.A. at the conclusion of the meeting in New Zealand. This was not any personal tribute to me. This was a compliment which was paid to Canada and because she will be the host country for the next meeting. This post has not been held by a Canadian since Senator Roebuck was similarly honoured in 1952.

Following upon my election, I paid official visits in Canberra, in Singapore and in Kuala Lumpur. Unfortunately, the opportunities for paying visits to other countries in Southeast Asia and Africa were considerably curtailed by circumstances of my health, but more particularly because of the parliamentary year and the fact that a full twelve months do not elapse between the closing of the New Zealand conference and the opening of the next one in Canada.

Next September the annual meeting will be held here and the discussions will take place in Ottawa, perhaps in this very chamber. It will be necessary for me to preside over meetings of the General Council in London, starting on May 15. We shall there be working on all aspects of the forthcoming meeting, particularly the agenda. Much of the local program here has already been prepared by a most effective committee in the Canadian branch, of which the Honourable John Turner is now chairman and with whom several very distinguished senators work on the committee. I hope all honourable senators will not only wish us well in our endeavours but will give this undertaking their active and continuing support.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Welch, debate adjourned until Monday next.

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM INCOME TAX AGREEMENT BILL, 1966

SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill C-154, to implement an agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to taxes on certain classes of income and to implement a supplementary income tax agreement between Canada and Sweden.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is divided into two parts. One part is to approve a new tax agreement entered into between Canada and the United Kingdom for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to taxes on certain classes of income. The second part of the bill provides for the approval of a supplementary income tax agreement between Canada and Sweden. May I deal with the second part first.

The main purpose of the supplementary agreement between Canada and Sweden is to reflect a change in our withholding tax in respect to dividends, where there is a subsidiary company in Canada and a non-resident parent company owning all the shares of that subsidiary. That rate until 1960 was 5 per cent. In the "baby budget" in December 1960 the 5 per cent provision was eliminated, so that the general withholding rate on dividends going from Canada to a non-resident company was 15 per cent. Several years later, for a period at least, we had several rates of withholding tax, the object being to use the rates as a weapon or instrument to bring about a greater permitted participation in operations in Canada of companies owned by non-residents.

During the period since 1961 Canada has been seeking to obtain this supplementary agreement so far as Sweden was concerned, and this supplementary agreement is the result. By virtue of it, there is deleted from the original agreement the provision which makes a 5 per cent withholding tax rate applicable where more than 50 per cent of the shares of the Canadian company are owned by a non-resident company—in this case, by a Swedish company—or vice versa.

The agreement which the bill implements by deletion of the provision in that regard establishes a standard 15 per cent withholding rate of tax in these circumstances as between Canada and Sweden. If this agreement did not exist, the regular withholding tax rate imposed by Sweden, for instance on dividends coming from Sweden to Canada, would be 30 per cent.

The Swedes took advantage of the situation to increase the number of taxes which would be the subject matter of the agreement, and they added what is called a communal tax. A communal tax is an income tax; it is one imposed by the states that make up Sweden and is in its nature an income tax. It is a tax which the central government permits the state to impose. That has been made part of the subject matter of Swedish taxes covered by the tax convention between Canada and Sweden.

Then the use of the instrument of foreign tax credit in order to avoid double tax has been brought into play in several particulars in this agreement. Where an exemption is not provided by one country or the other, if you are subject to tax in both countries, you would still get a foreign tax credit in one country to the extent of the tax you paid in the other. That is the sum and substance of the supplementary agreement.

I should point out, however, that up until now Canada has observed the conditions of its agreement with Sweden and has enforced only the 5 per cent for which you will recall there is a provision in the implementing statute. Furthermore, where there is a conflict as between the law as laid down in the tax convention and the general tax law of Canada, the law as laid down in the tax convention governs. As the result of negotiations, Canada finally corrected that situation to bring the tax convention on that point in line with government policy and government taxation law, and the purpose of this bill is to have parliamentary approval to these changes in the supplementary agreement.

Now, exactly the opposite situation has occurred in relation to the tax convention between Canada and the United Kingdom. Negotiations went on as a result of incidents which I described earlier, which resulted in conflict as between the United Kingdom-Canada Tax Convention and the general law of Canada, to work out and try to harmonize those two positions. Finally, when it appeared impossible to do so, Canada terminated the tax convention as between this country and the United Kingdom. The notice of this termination was given in the manner provided for in the original convention entered into in 1946. That notice was given on or prior to June 30, 1964, and as to withholding taxes it became effective on January 1, 1965. So that as and from January 1, 1965, we have had no convention governing the rate of withholding as between Canada and the United Kingdom and as between the United Kingdom and Canada. In so far as other income taxes are concerned, the notice which Canada gave would terminate the agreement at the end of the fiscal year of companies which had a fiscal year ending sometime in the calendar year 1965. So, in effect, the United Kingdom-Canada agreement of 1946 was terminated under the termination provisions in that agreement.

What we have before us today is a new agreement, and it is called an agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom for the avoidance of double taxation in relation to certain classes of income tax. It has been described, as you may have noticed in the papers and in public statements, etc., as being an interim agreement. When you see the area it covers as compared to the area covered by the earlier tax convention, you will realize that there is implicit in it the fact that it is to be temporary in its nature, but there is nothing in the agreement itself which says so, and the termination provisions in this agreement now before us are exactly the same as we had in the earlier agreement.

Having said that, I should also point out to you that a clause in this new agreement in relation to withholding tax makes the agreement effective retroactively to January 1, 1965, so that there would be no gap between the termination of the old agreement in relation to withholding taxes and the commencement of the new agreement when it becomes law. It does the same thing in relation to the other income taxes that are the subject matter of the agreement so far as Canada is concerned.

I should at this stage point out too that on the question of exchange of information—and we have had some hard words said here on previous occasions when we have been looking at certain provisions for the exchange of information in this bill—the provision here is simply that the two countries will exchange information at their disposal under the income tax laws in the normal course of the administration of those laws for carrying out the provisions of this agreement. That I think is significant in the sense that it rather points to the interim nature of the agreement, because if you go back and look at the language in the original agreement which has been incorporated in other tax conventions, the language is much broader and provides for an exchange of information for the prevention of fraud or for the administration of statutory provisions against legal avoidance in relation to tax that is the subject matter of the agreement. Many heated and harsh words were said in this chamber at times on the scope of this exchange of information, and the fact of one country undertaking to assist in the enforcement of the fiscal laws of the other country, and in the matter of prevention of fraud, which would really be an offence in the other country under the acts of the other country.

I thought I should draw your attention to that point. I think I should also point out that the withholding tax in the United Kingdom at the present time is 41¼ per cent, which works out at about eight shillings and three pence on the pound.

Having said that, I propose to tell you now just what are the heads covered in this new agreement. There are four. The first one deals with what are called the profits of an industrial or commercial operation, where you have such an operation as an enterprise in Canada, and it is also carried on in some fashion in the United Kingdom and deals as well with the reverse situation.

As to the profits in relation to that kind of operation, I want to point out generally that the agreement provides that the taxation shall be governed as follows, and I quote from Article III:

> The industrial or commercial profits of a United Kingdom enterprise shall not be subject to Canadian tax unless the enterprise carries on business in Canada through a permanent establishment situated therein. If the enterprise carries on business as aforesaid, tax may be imposed by Canada on those profits but only on so much of them as is attributable to that permanent establishment.

Later in the section they go on to apply the order in reverse and apply the same rule of law where you have the Canadian enterprise carrying on business in the United Kingdom.

In the old act, the old tax convention, there was provided a method for determining whether the Canadian enterprise had a permanent establishment in the United Kingdom. You will find that continued in the present tax convention, or perhaps I should say in the proposed one, and you will find it spelled out in the rules of interpretation, if I may call them that. You will find them spelled out in more detail as to how you will make that determination as to whether or not there is a permanent establishment.

I do not propose to weary you with this unless some questions are asked, nor do I intend to deal with what the conditions are. They are, as I said, spelled out in the bill. You will find at page 5 of the bill under paragraph (j) a group of paragraphs which provide this information. There you will find the definition of the term "permanent establishment," and in the enumeration they give a list of what are regarded as permanent establishments in the other country for purposes of this agreement. Then they go on to say that the term "permanent establishment" shall not be deemed to include various items, and they give an enumeration.

Then there is another enumeration of those things which, while they may be carried on by the Canadian enterprise in the United Kingdom, do not create the situation of the Canadian enterprise having a permanent establishment in the United Kingdom; and it works in reverse as well.

Then there is a series of paragraphs which indicate the conditions under which a person who is representing a Canadian enterprise and is in the United Kingdom and carrying out certain operations there would be regarded, or the Canadian enterprise would be regarded, as having a permanent establishment and the conditions under which it would not be regarded as having a permanent establishment.

I should interject here and say that I am going to propose before I sit down that we should give consideration to sending this bill to committee. We have not done that in the past in similar cases, but I feel it may be time we sat down with the officials and learned how they go about negotiating these agreements and what, in effect, they think they have gained as a result of this tax convention. That it is another reason why I am not going into such elaborate detail to point out when there is a permanent establishment, when it is deemed certain operations do not constitute a permanent establishment. I shall not go into detail on this unless there are some questions.

The second item has to do with profits from the operation of ships or aircraft. In the old tax convention it was provided that the profits of an enterprise from the operation of ships or aircraft by, say, a Canadian enterprise in the United Kingdom would be subject to tax only in Canada, if the place of effective management of the operation was in Canada. It has continued with a few changes in wording.

So what this tax convention proposes in that regard is to lift out of the old convention the agreement which was made, that profits from the operation of ships or aircraft in international traffic will only be taxable once and in the place where the effective management of the enterprise is situated. That is the second item.

The third item—and I think this is the most important one—is the matter of taxes on pensions and annuities. One starts off with the general principle in the bill before us that all pensions and annuities will be taxable only in the country where the recipient of the pension or annuity is resident. This differs from the old agreement, which provided that pensions paid in respect of British or Canadian governmental or military services could be taxed only in the country of source.

In order to try to give an understanding of this particular item I would very briefly, in a summary way, give you the breakdown which I have made of various classes of pensions and what happened under the old agreement, what happens in the interim when you have no agreement, and what happens as, if and when a new agreement becomes law.

I have four classes of pensions. The first is pensions payable by the United Kingdom government to former employees, to the extent that such pensions are payable to Canadian residents. In that situation, under the old agreement these pensions were taxed by the United Kingdom, that being the source, and not by Canada. In the absence of any agreement those pensions and annuities would be taxable in both countries. Under the new agreement they may be taxed only in Canada, which is the place of residence of the pensioner or annuitant. If, however, this Canadian resident who receives such a pension or annuity in these circumstances was resident in Canada and was in receipt of such a pension or annuity on January 1, 1965, then he may make an election. If the United Kingdom rates are more attractive—which I would doubt at this time—he could make an election to be subject to the United Kingdom rate; otherwise, he would be subject to the Canadian rate.

The second class is what I call non-government pensions. In the first class, which was government pensions, I had included civil service pensions and military pensions. In what I call non-government pensions I would include what they call their National Insurance, which is their form of security payments, and private pension plans which companies in various industries maintain for their employees. If the source of the non-government pension is the United Kingdom and the payment is made to a resident in Canada, under the old convention it could not be taxed by the United Kingdom and was taxed by Canada only. If there was no agreement, it could be taxed by both countries. Under the new agreement it is taxable only in Canada and, therefore, to that extent you have carried forward the provisions in the old agreement.

The third class is the reverse process. This would be Government pensions paid by Canada to residents in the United Kingdom. Under the old agreement those pensions and annuities could be taxed only by Canada. As a matter of fact, they were not taxed by Canada. In the absence of agreement such pensions and annuities could be taxed by both countries. Under the new agreement such pensions and annuities may be taxed only in the United Kingdom, but there is the same right of election which I described earlier in relation to the reverse situation.

The fourth category is non-government pensions payable by Canada to people who may be resident in the United Kingdom. Under the old agreement they could not be taxed by Canada but were taxed by the United Kingdom. If there was no agreement they could be taxed by both countries, but, in fact, Canada did not tax. Under the new agreement they may be taxed only by the United Kingdom.

As to the beneficial effect of this change I think it is the most important single thing the convention does. The benefit, in a memorandum which I have here, indicates that in this regard as to pensions under these provisions the benefit would accrue to some 12,000 Canadian residents who are in receipt of non-government pensions from Britain, and who for the first time are feeling the weight of the British tax, which is severe by our standards, and some 3,000 Canadian residents in receipt of British Government pensions, whose combined British and Canadian tax may now be higher than the British tax paid during the existence of the old agreement. It would also restore the position of some 2,500 recipients of Canadian pensions now living in Britain whose financial position has been seriously affected by the termination of the old agreement.

The next category, and this is my number four, is what is called copyright royalties. That means royalties which are paid in respect of copyright. Under Article VI of the new agreement there is continued the exemption at the source from tax. May I just illustrate to you what that means. Under Article VI on page 8 it says:

> Subject to paragraph (6) of Article III, copyright royalties and other like payments in respect of the production or reproduction of any literary, dramatic, musical or artistic work (but not including rents or royalties in respect of motion picture films and films or video tapes for use in connection with television) derived from sources within one of the territories by a resident of the other territory who is subject to tax in that other territory in respect thereof shall be exempt from tax in that first-mentioned territory.

That simply means that a Canadian receiving copyright royalties from the United Kingdom will be taxed on them only in Canada.

In order to carry this to its logical conclusion I should tell you the items that are in the old agreement and which have not been carried forward in this agreement. One is, of course, the 5 per cent witholding tax which is now contrary to Government policy and contrary to our law, in the situation where you have a Canadian subsidiary company more than 50 per cent of whose shares are owned by the United Kingdom parent company. But, until the agreement was terminated by Canada this provision not only existed in the old agreement but, notwithstanding our change in the law in Canada, Canada observed its obligation under the old tax convention and only withheld the 5 per cent. This was done in spite of the fact that our general law and Government policy provided for a 15 per cent withholding.

Honourable senators will recall also that there was what I call an individual exemption for personal and professional services performed by, for instance, a Canadian in the United Kingdom. There were certain limitations in the old agreement under which, if a person was not in the other country more than 183 days, he was not subject to tax in that country. Article IX in the old agreement—and here for "United Kingdom" you may read "Canada" and thus get it in reverse—reads:

> An individual who is a resident of the United Kingdom shall be exempt from Canadian tax on profits or remuneration in respect of personal (including professional) services performed within Canada in any taxation year if—
> (a) he is present within Canada for a period or periods not exceeding in the aggregate 183 days during that year, and
> (b) the services are performed or on behalf of a person resident in the United Kingdom, and
> (c) the profits or remuneration are subject to United Kingdom tax.

So there is taxation in only one country under these conditions.

This provision has not been carried forward into the present agreement. I do not know whether that indicates any change in view on the part of either the negotiators for Canada or those for the United Kingdom, but I suppose there was a limit to what they could immediately project into a tax agreement in view of the impending Carter Commission Report here and what recommendations it may bring forth, and the extent to which they may be implemented by our Government. I suppose in view of that they felt they should go only so far at this time.

Of course, as you have been reading in the newspapers during the last few years, there have been fairly substantial changes in the income tax structure in England, and in their approach to the various problems and various kinds of income taxes they have.

Honourable senators will recall that there was in the old agreement an exemption in relation to teachers and students who were doing special work, or teaching for a period not exceeding two years in the other country. They had their exemption, and only paid their tax in the one country.

These are items which are not carried forward, and you can assess how important it may be for any person who is affected adversely as a result of their not being carried forward. Such a person would urge that these matters are most important and should have been attended to. But, there were, as I have explained to you, deep-seated reasons for not attempting a full-scale agreement at this time.

In the meantime some precedents have been, and are being, established. The United Kingdom has negotiated a revision of its tax convention with the United States, and it would appear from that that the United Kingdom at the proper time, when Canada may be negotiating, will be amenable to a withholding tax rate on both sides of 15 per cent. Certainly having regard to the present withholding rate of 41¼ per cent, that would be a great achievement.

In the old agreement there was a definition as to who was a resident of Canada and who was a resident of the United Kingdom. You will find spelled out in this agreement, however, a series of rules for determining the residence of a person for the purpose of determining the applicable rate of tax, whether imposed by Canada or the United Kingdom. This becomes important in respect to the present bill because it contains a provision, not found in the old agreement, in relation to what is called dual residence. It is important to people who have been caught in past years by this concept of dual residence, and who have been ruled for the purposes of this tax convention, and for assessment for income tax, to be a resident of both countries. There is some relief for them, because on page 4 of the bill in subparagraph (g) honourable senators will see how a final determination can be made with respect to persons who have a dual residence, and how they can obtain a residence in one country or the other.

Honourable senators, I think that that covers the pertinent provisions of these tax conventions.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I should like to ask my honourable friend whether there has been any organized opposition to this proposed legislation, either here or in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I have heard of none.

Hon. Mr. Walker: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Whenever he outlines a bill he is very forthright, although he may not always be so forthright when he votes. Is this not overall a very fair agreement both ways?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. I think, looking at the horizon and seeing what is there in the form of the report of the Carter Commission, and what is evolving in England in the way of their reshaping their tax structure, this is a fair compromise agreement for an interim period.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, we have heard a very clear and precise resumé of the content of Bill C-154. Consequently, I do not propose to go over any of the details referred to by Senator Hayden. I do wish, however, to make a few remarks in regard to one or two general points which arise in connection with the bill.

The Canadian Tax Journal, which is a publication of the Canadian Tax Foundation, of January-February 1966, contains a very complete review of the Canada-United Kingdom tax agreement. I am sure that Senator Hayden has read it.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I should like to put on the record the brief but comprehensive statement that is found at the beginning of this article:

> The Anglo-Canadian tax agreement signed December 6, 1965 is a stop-gap measure designed to serve until each country sorts out its domestic tax affairs. One major shortcoming is that the agreement leaves open the question of withholding tax on items of investment income such as dividends, interest and patent royalties.

I think this short statement is very much in line with the remarks made by Senator Hayden.

In this same issue of the Canadian Tax Journal, at page 48 under the heading "Conclusion", the author says this:

> The new limited interim agreement with the United Kingdom is an interesting innovation in the area of international tax agreements. However, it should not allow a pause in the efforts of the Canadian authorities to press for an immediate reduction in the rates of withholding imposed by the United Kingdom on dividends and other payments to Canadian residents. The existing rates constitute a serious impediment to prospective Canadian investment in Britain. In the context of international business and investment a tax rate of 41¼% on the gross amount of dividends, and particularly on interest and royalties, is simply unfair. The inequity is compounded when the withholding tax is not applied at the same rate to all non-residents. Thus > while the revised U.S.-U.K. convention restores a measure of reasonableness in the British withholding tax rates payable by Americans, it introduces a serious degree of discrimination against investors from Canada and a number of other countries.

Honourable senators, what we hope and press for is that a permanent agreement with the United Kingdom can be made as soon as possible.

Senator Hayden referred to the fact that the United States and the United Kingdom had succeeded in completing a new agreement. I believe that agreement was completed in January this year. I am taking for granted, therefore, that the Canadian Government must be in process of further negotiation with the United Kingdom Government in order that a final agreement covering these other matters can be entered into as soon as possible.

One wonders, indeed, why the United States and the United Kingdom could come to a satisfactory conclusion when such has not been done in respect of Canada. I understand that two reasons have been advanced. One is said to be the very great revision of British tax laws, which was done in the United Kingdom Finance Act of 1965. Then from Canada's point of view it is suggested that we should not press too quickly in coming to a final agreement with the United Kingdom until the Carter Commission on Taxation submits its report, which should indeed be available soon.

How valid these reasons are, I do not know, but I am presuming that the Carter Commission will report fairly soon, and that it has something to do with the fact that this is an interim and not a final agreement.

As Senator Hayden said, of course, difficulties in regard to the British agreement started to arise in December, 1960, after the introduction of the baby budget of that year. Honourable senators will recall that the then Minister of Finance, the honourable Mr. Fleming, announced as government policy that a minimum withholding tax in regard to dividends paid by Canadian subsidiaries to foreign parent companies would be 15 per cent. This new policy was in direct conflict with one very important provision of the Canada-U.K. act, which provided that no withholding tax whatsoever would be levied on dividends paid by a Canadian subsidiary if such Canadian subsidiary was wholly owned by a British parent company.

For many reasons that was an intolerable situation, and one wonders how we could have negotiated a treaty containing such a provision. However, I am presuming that the explanation is that in 1946, when the original treaty was negotiated, Canadians were not so conscious of the question of foreign ownership of our industries as they are now. Certainly one fact seems to have been overlooked, namely, that when Canada gave complete tax exemption to a wholly-owned subsidiary of a British company, that is completely contrary to the concept that has been developing in Canada recently, namely, the thinking that there should be greater Canadian ownership of Canadian industry. Indeed, this provision amounted to a penalty against a British company unless it owned 100 per cent of the shares of the company. Consequently, a British Company which owned a Canadian subsidiary would be dissuaded from offering shares in that company to Canadians or others, because it would then be penalized to the extent of a five per cent tax difference in the withholding tax that would be levied against it.

The situation was further complicated by Finance Minister Gordon's budget statements in 1963 when he chose a withholding tax as a means of promoting the sale of 25 per cent of the shares of foreign-owned companies to Canadian residents.

Honourable senators, I point these things out only to indicate that there has been a change in Canadian attitudes, and the reason it became necessary in 1964 to abrogate this treaty was because the thinking of Canadians was directed to preserving a greater Canadian ownership in our resources.

As I understand it, at least I am presuming this, that since 1960 Canada has been attempting to re-negotiate this agreement. However, as we all know, such attempts have not been successful until now, and even now we have only an interim agreement, That is all I have to say on that point.

An interesting fact, which I read recently in regard to this agreement, is that there are 25,000 persons resident in Canada who receive pension or annuity payments from the United Kingdom. The number of persons resident in Britain receiving pensions or annuity payments from Canada is only 2,500. I am told that part of the reason for that wide difference in numbers is that particularly since World War II a large number of pensioners moved to Canada from Britain and consequently received pensions from the United Kingdom. However, if this agreement had not been made, you will quite understand from Senator Hayden's explanation that the position of those receiving these payments from abroad would have been quite intolerable. That is just one example of the reason why the 1946 agreement required to be renegotiated, even though in interim form.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say on this bill, except to suggest that since an agreement has now been entered into between the United Kingdom and the United States, I would think that we will not have to wait too long before Canada succeeds in completing a tax convention with the United Kingdom covering satisfactorily the matters which are now omitted in this interim agreement.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I rise once again, as I have from time to time for the past 20 years, to protest against the method of carrying out this proposed change in our tax law.

The system followed is not the historic one, as it should be. In the past, when the king was not only the head of the executive but also the maker of the laws, the Crown could enter into an agreement and carry it out by the necessary changes in the law. However, as time went on and constitutional monarchy took the place of absolute monarchy in the formation of law, it has become the rule of law that the executive may enter into a foreign agreement which is binding upon the executive, but not upon the country, and if the executive requires a change in the law in order to carry out the agreement it must then come to Parliament and ask for that change and take its chance as to what Parliament may do in the circumstances.

It is quite new procedure, I think, for the executive to enter into a complicated agreement of this kind and then to bring it to Parliament and shovel the whole document into the statutory law of the land. Obviously, the result is confusion worse confounded.

Just fancy the citizens of Canada trying to find out what the law is with regard to taxation in Canada and abroad. Think what it means to those who are doing international business along these lines, to have to read these lengthy agreements in an attempt to find out what is the law. How much better it would be if we simply amended the tax act to make such change in the law as is necessary as a result of the agreement, rather than put all this agreement into a new act.

We make changes in statute law of a complicated character in other connections. The Minister of Finance rises in his place and delivers a budget speech and then, following that speech, there are such changes made in the law as are required to enforce it upon the people of Canada. What would honourable senators say if, instead of making those necessary changes in our statutes, the Government were to ask us to make the budget speech the law of the land? It would be just as sensible as this method of changing the tax law of Canada, which the Canadian citizen is expected to understand, know and obey.

I know I am speaking futilely, because I have made this protest frequently over the past 20 years as these various agreements have come before us, but without my protest being successful or eliciting any response, the same old cumbersome procedure is carried on year after year.

Senator Hayden suggested that on this occasion we should refer the bill to committee. I approve that course. I would ask those in charge, those representatives of the executive, why it is they persist in this cumbersome, unconstitutional, unhistoric method of making confusion worse confounded, asking us to make an agreement into the law of the land. I would like to know what their answer may be.

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris: Honourable senators, I asked one or two questions, as I felt that the problem presented here is one in which we have a serious responsibility. Judging for myself, I doubt if we, generally speaking, are competent to deal with this kind of matter. For my part, I asked my honourable friend Senator Hayden if there was any protest from outside interests. As far as he knows, there has been none, although the question has been debated already in the House of Commons.

We have heard a clear dissertation from my honourable friend Senator Thorvaldson. Relying on what has been said, I am going to vote for this bill.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I am going to vote against it.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I am going to vote for it because those who brought it here, and Senator Hayden, who has studied it, consider it is a good bill. He accepts it and recommends it, and I intend to accept his recommendation.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: May I ask honourable Senator Roebuck if he has made a statement that this method is unconstitutional?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Perhaps it is not outside the authority of Parliament under the British North America Act. I would not go that far. But it is not the constitutional procedure which has been in vogue for the past 300 years in Great Britain and here, in carrying an international agreement into the law which the citizen is expected to observe.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: If a senator with the experience of Senator Roebuck has some doubts in his mind as to the constitutionality of this method of procedure, I submit we should take plenty of time before we, as senators, pass this bill.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, if honourable Senator Hayden speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: In the course of my remarks I suggested it would be well if we departed from our earlier practice and referred this bill to committee. Then we could find out what procedures are followed, how negotiations are carried on, why these things have the particular form they have, whether any other forms have been considered, and if they are practicable. These are all questions we could look into in committee. That is why I propose to move that it be referred to committee.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: That is an excellent idea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by honourable Senator Crerar, that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

SCIENCE COUNCIL OF CANADA BILL

SECOND READING

Leave having been given to call Order No. 4:

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 4, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hugessen for the second reading of Bill C-149, to provide for the establishment of a Science Council of Canada.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government and Senator Blois for allowing me to speak at this time.

I wish to chastise the honourable Leader of the Government for not paying enough attention to his personal physician and the position of the Senate. We are vitally interested in his health and welfare and wish he would take more care of himself.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I talk too much—that is all.

Hon. Mr. Sullivan: I congratulate the sponsor of the bill, Senator Hugessen, on the clear and precise manner in which he elaborated on it. He did so in such a way that further exposition is not necessary.

Secondly, Senator O'Leary (Carleton) with his usual olympian oratory, tore us apart with a lot of important points from the philsophical point of view, some of which I had in my preparation for the discussion of this bill.

As both previous speakers have said, this is one of the most important pieces of legislation ever debated in this chamber. The sponsor of the bill referred to clause 11, in which the duties of the council are set down in eight points. I wish to draw special attention to paragraphs (g) and (h), which I consider of the utmost importance.

Unlike the National Research Council, the Defence Research Board and other agencies and departments of Government, this proposed Science Council of Canada will have no staff, no laboratories, and no authority over expenditures other than the amounts allocated for the chairman and for the expenses of members in attending meetings of the council.

As has been stated, the report of the Glassco Commission on Government Services and the report of that brilliant scientist Dr. C. J. MacKenzie, to whom the sponsor of the bill referred, advocated that such a council should be established. As one who has been vitally interested in medical research for over 30 years, I can assure honourable senators of the importance of such a council.

A little over a year ago the federal Government appointed Professor Frank Forward, a distinguished engineer from the University of British Columbia, to be scientific adviser to the Government. I heard him speak once about the creation of the Science Council, which would have several divisions. The one division of which I have some knowledge is that to be headed by Dr. Louis Paul Dugal, formerly Dean of Science at the University of Ottawa. It was my privilege to be associated with him on the Scientific Medical Council of the Royal Canadian Air Force during the last war. Before that he was a Professor of Physiology at Laval University. He is an outstanding scientist and has the support and confidence of all those in the medical schools. Now you can see the purpose of my speaking to this bill.

I do not know exactly what Dr. Dugal's duties will be, nor what his relationship will be to the Medical Research Council. The medical schools have looked in the past, as indeed they still do, to the Medical Research Council as the main support of medical research in this country. We are all hoping that the budget of the Medical Research Council will be increased markedly, as recommended in the Bladen Report and also in the report prepared by Charles Gundy and submitted to the Government quite recently.

I really do not know what the intentions of the federal Government are in relationship to the support of medical research. I can tell you however that all the medical schools are much in need of more support for medical research and I emphasize that they are all extremely pleased at the formation of this scientific council for Canada. Apart from the private granting agencies such as the National Cancer Institute and the Arthritis Society, the federal Government is the principal source of support for medical research and this comes mainly through the Medical Research Council.

It has been my privilege to be associated with the experimental research on monkeys used first for space travel on this continent, and it is through the kindness and generosity of the Atkinson Foundation that we were allowed to carry on this particular field of endeavour.

The distinguished chairman of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Dr. James R. Killian, speaking in Toronto the other day, made this statement:

> Some of the instruments needed for basic research are of such size and cost that no single institution can afford them, and so we see universities forming association to handle them, or countries pooling their resources and efforts. . . The conduct of teaching, as well as the conduct of research, is also calling for new institutional arrangements.

Senator O'Leary made the statement that medical research is now on the gleaming wings of science. Well, he was a little ahead of the times; medicine is still an art but is fast becoming a science.

Presumably, we need informed advice as to the degree to which scientific efforts deserve to be supported, and what sort of balance ought to be preserved among the various scientific disciplines. I suppose this would require representation from the physical sciences, the biological sciences, the health sciences, including the behavioral and social sciences. One of the problems nowadays is the way that these overlap and merge with one another, so that problems often have to be tackled by teams of workers recruited from the various primary divisions of science. Another problem is that these groups may have some difficulty in understanding one another and communicating—all of them find it difficult to explain things to the rest of the world; hence this council, the co-ordinating council of all scientists.

A Science Council, presumably, might have two functions—the one to get the best representatives of each of these areas together to discuss problems and methods of collaboration. However, one of their main tasks would be to assign priorities to various tasks or projects—I emphasize this—and to advise government in this area.

Their ability to do this well would depend as much on their statemenship and philosophical background as upon their stature as scientists. Obviously, the decisions would have to be made by the cabinet and Parliament. The Science Council might not be asked to do more than provide a clear and dispassionate exposition of the issues involved, and an estimate of the resources required to accomplish various aims. This they might be able to do reasonably well, if they were well chosen.

I think what I am trying to say is that a scientific council could be a great disappointment, unless its terms of reference were very carefully worked out, and unless its members were carefully chosen, not only on the basis of their accomplishments as scientists but also with a view to their qualifications regarding balance, judgment, common sense and ability to express themselves clearly.

Dr. MacKenzie in his report to the Prime Minister made this statement on page 1:

> My overriding philosophy is that getting the right people is more important than drafting an ideal organization chart and I stress this aspect more than does the Glassco Commission.

That was also the focus of Senator O'Leary's (Carleton) concluding remarks yesterday on the composition of the council as detailed by Dr. MacKenzie on page 30 of his report.

As we look forward I do feel that some day we will have a Ministry of Science, as has been advocated.

With the sponsor of this most important piece of legislation, I would ask all honourable senators to give their full support to this bill.

The science of technology, thrusting itself upon us literally faster than the speed of sound, requires our wholehearted support, if we are to maintain and preserve it for peaceful purposes. Otherwise we are only creating a past, which has already been destroyed, to be preserved in a museum if there is that much left.

I commend this legislation. Thank you for your attention to my remarks.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance. I feel it is appropriate that it should be referred to this committee since there is a possibility that it will involve Government expenditures, and in doing so it will also serve to relieve the pressure on the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL AND RURAL DEVELOPMENT ACT

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald for the second reading of Bill C-152, to amend the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act.

Hon. Fred M. Blois: Honourable senators, I wish to make only a few brief remarks in connection with Bill C-152. At the outset may I compliment Senator McDonald on the very clear manner in which he explained the new and changed items in this bill.

I am sorry that honourable Senator Pearson is not in the house this afternoon because I know he wanted to speak to this bill. I am sure all honourable senators know the work done by the Senate Committee on Land Use in Canada which was chaired by the honourable Senator Pearson. It was outstanding work and reflects the great credit due to members of this honourable chamber.

I also believe that the work of this committee and the information contained in its report were used to quite an extent by the Honourable Alvin Hamilton when he was having this bill drafted to present to Parliament.

If my memory serves me correctly, when the ARDA bill was discussed in this chamber in 1961, it passed unanimously, and I think that generally speaking people have been well pleased with it. The fact of the matter is that I have heard a number of persons, and not always Conservatives, say they believe that perhaps the most lasting achievement of the Diefenbaker Government is likely to be the passage of the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act, commonly known as ARDA. I have heard it called the brainchild of the Minister of Agriculture of that day, the Honourable Mr. Hamilton. It is a most imaginative and far-reaching piece of legislation, perhaps one of the most far-reaching that has ever been passed by Parliament to deal with the problems of rural life in Canada.

As were many others, I was pleased that when the Minister of Agriculture introduced the present bill in the other place he paid a compliment to the former Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Hamilton, for the work he and his associates did with regard to this matter.

In legislation as important as the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act,

I think it is not surprising that subsequent events have shown that certain changes are needed, even while the original intent of the bill remains intact and there is little or no real alteration in it. I think this is what Bill C-152 does.

In discussing this bill I am going to speak principally about the work ARDA has done in my own Province of Nova Scotia, because I am better informed about that than what has been done in other provinces. The Province of Nova Scotia has made considerable use of this legislation, and I have no doubt that, with the changes made, my province will make even more use of it in the future.

A great deal of work has been done during the past few years on the dyking of marshland and the drainage of land in Nova Scotia. Many hundreds of acres of fertile land have been reclaimed by this means. Anyone who understands the problems we have in Nova Scotia, with the high tides in some of our bays and rivers, will realize the necessity of building these dykes, and that their cost would be beyond the means of the farmers.

Speaking of high tides, it is probably known to most honourable senators that Nova Scotia has the highest tides in the world. In fact, in my constituency of Colchester-Hants we have tides that occasionally reach a height of 65 feet, and it is not uncommon to have tides at certain times every year, running as high as 40 to 45 feet, so I think it is readily understood why the necessity exists for governments to do so much of this work.

Honourable senators probably know too that the old agreements between the federal and the provincial governments expired in March 1965, and new arrangements were worked out between the governments which will carry on for an additional five-year period, from 1965 to 1970.

I believe that Nova Scotia was one of the first provinces to act under the new agreement, and it has recently announced a project in excess of $3 million for a five-year program of farm enlargement and consolidation designed to increase the size of the Nova Scotia farms to a point where they will provide the operators with a reasonable income.

I should mention that the new agreement includes a number of important changes to the original bill. Generally, it places heavier emphasis on the alleviation of poverty in rural areas by means of diverse resource development programs of various kinds—land use adjustment, farm consolidation and community development.

I do not want to occupy too much of the time of the chamber this afternoon, but I would like to mention just two or three items that the Nova Scotia Government, in conjunction with ARDA, are involved in at the present time. For instance, an ARDA-sponsored socio-economic study of the Shubenacadie-Stewiacke watershed area of Nova Scotia is to be undertaken by the Acadia Institute of Acadia University. These two districts are both in my own constituency of Colchester-Hants, and they cover some of the finest agricultural dairy farming land in the province. The cost of the project is going to be very high and is to be shared equally by the federal Government, through ARDA, and the Government of the Province of Nova Scotia. The study will take the form of a resource assessment of the various aspects of agriculture, forestry, mining, service industries including tourism, and human resources. Before any program of economic rehabilitation or development can be implemented, a comprehensive plan of action is essential. I believe that in the past very often plans have been undertaken before a really thorough study has been made, and the Government of Nova Scotia—which has to watch its money, being a small province with a small population—feels a study of this kind is worth while before anything further is done.

There is also another project in connection with this study that could have a far-reaching effect on the industry of the Province of Nova Scotia. They are studying these watersheds and the possibility of damming certain of the rivers, thereby developing quite a considerable quantity of low-cost electric power. This matter has been discussed there for quite a number of years and some studies have been made, but under the present plan a sufficiently thorough study will be made to see whether the project is economically feasible. That is one of the items that will be under way in a very short time.

There is another research program that is going on in the Annapolis Valley of Nova Scotia. I believe this is quite different from anything tried before. The idea of this study is to determine the economic feasibility of an integrated market-garden farm unit, to produce and market vegetables and small fruits, principally strawberries.

In announcing the undertaking, the federal Forestry Minister, Mr. Sauvé, and the provincial Minister of Agriculture of Nova Scotia, Mr. Akerley, said the cost of the five-year project in Digby county, estimated at $111,000, is to be shared equally by the two governments.

Under the Nova Scotia Farm Consolidation Program, and with the assistance of ARDA, an area of 170 acres of abandoned farmland—small farms that have become run down and are no longer used for farming purposes—are going to be purchased for the purpose of consolidation and development into an integrated unit. This is where the experimental program is going to be put into effect.

They are going into it a little further than this, because they are studying a plan of marketing the produce of this experimental farm unit. They have in mind the fact that the reclaimed land is quite fertile and easily worked, and, the climatic conditions in that part of Nova Scotia are somewhat better than they are in other parts. Another advantage is the ready accessibility of markets in the New England States, particularly Boston and New York, as well as Montreal.

It is felt that if this will work on a farm unit of this size, then it may be tried elsewhere. I might add that the idea is to hire a thoroughly qualified agricultural gardener who will have a trained assistant. Exact records of the costs of this work will be kept. At the end of the four- or five-year period it is hoped to have the exact cost of raising the produce and of marketing it, and consideration will then be given to whether other such land and small farms can be utilized on a similar basis. This is a very worth-while plan, and it is being conducted in conjunction with the dyking and other work on the rivers.

Another undertaking that will be commenced soon is a study of the tourist development of the province, particularly in Guysborough county which does not have any amount of land suitable for farming, and is dependent mostly upon lumbering and the inshore fisheries. The idea there as between ARDA and the Nova Scotia Government is that a very thorough study will be made of the possibility of opening up a large portion of that county, which has many lakes, streams and beautiful spots, as a tourist paradise. It seems feasible that this can be accomplished by the building of additional roads.

This, again, is going to take time and money, but as I mentioned earlier it is one of the things that can be done under the new agreement with ARDA which runs from 1965 to 1970. They can now embark on a type of work that was not allowed under the old plan. I have no doubt that if this works satisfactorily in the Province of Nova Scotia, other provinces will be interested in trying out similar projects. In fact some have already commenced.

At this time I should mention that during the past few years that the ARDA plan has been in effect the representatives of the Province of Nova Scotia and the representatives of ARDA have worked closely together in harmony. This has had much to do with the fact that the people are satisfied with the work being done. I have heard very little criticism in respect to money being wasted on these projects. Everybody seems interested in this work, and there is no doubt that it will bring very good results to the province.

It is for these reasons that I support this bill and the amendments with the same enthusiasm that I supported the original ARDA plan.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I enjoyed very much listening to the remarks of my honourable friend from Nova Scotia, and I was especially interested in the story he told about the ARDA plans in his province. I am wondering what has been the effect of ARDA in the past. Have any projects been carried out in Nova Scotia, and if so with what results?

Hon. Mr. Blois: The only work that has produced results, honourable senators, is that done in connection with the dyking and damming on some of the rivers, which has brought in new land. I know that this has been very successful in many parts of the province. I regret being unable to state the amount of money spent on reclaiming land but, as I said earlier, several hundreds of acres of the most fertile land in the province has been reclaimed. I know from my own personal knowledge, from talking to some of the farmers, both large and small, in the areas where this work has been done, that they are all well pleased with it.

I feel confident that the new projects going forward will prove successful. What I want to stress is this wonderful co-operation that exists between the representatives of ARDA and those of the provincial Department of Agriculture. These projects have the backing of the Agricultural Federation of Nova Scotia and of the people as a whole.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I suggest that the questions that have been raised might form the subject-matter of an interesting discussion in committee. If the sponsor of this bill intends moving that it be sent to a committee then some of the officials of the federal Government who have first-hand information could attend and deal with these points that have been raised.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

AERONAUTICS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets moved the second reading of Bill C-153, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

He said:

[Translation]

Honourable senators, since it is the first time I have the pleasure of addressing this honourable assembly, let me tell you very simply how happy I am to be a member of the Senate and how much I appreciated the friendly welcome extended to me by all my colleagues. I am very grateful to you and I think that the most pleasant atmosphere prevailing here is due in great part to the Speaker who is following in the footsteps of his predecessors.

Honourable senators, since the bill I have the honour of submitting on second reading contains several technical terms, I thought it would be easier to explain it to you in the other language.

[Text]

Honourable senators, Bill C-153, to amend the Aeronautics Act, was passed by the other place on April 6 last. Many aspects of this bill are of a rather technical nature, and if this honourable house agrees to its principle on second reading, I would think it is that kind of legislation that should be referred to a committee where experts on the matter can explain it on a broader basis.

Several amendments are being proposed to the Aeronautics Act, so as to permit the making of regulations covering the following main points:

(a) Levying of fees and charges;

(b) provisions to improve the safety of air travel;

(c) changes in the composition of the Air Transport Board; and

(d) a consolidation of the board's powers.

At this stage, and with the indulgence of honourable senators, I shall review briefly the proposed amendments.

As far as the charges and fees for facilities and services are concerned, the proposed amendment will not basically change the present system which the Department of Transport is imposing under the Financial Administration Act. It is now proposed to place the authority for charges from now on in the Aeronautics Act instead of under the financial administration.

At present, the Department of Transport imposes various charges in connection with its airports and related facilities; these vary from the collection of landing fees from aircraft to charges for communications services which may be provided, as well as land and building rentals of various sorts. These are the charges which in the future will be established under the Aeronautics Act on the basis of regulations approved by the Governor in Council.

Honourable senators will understand that the system of charges for air facilities is designed gradually to make our airports self-sustaining. I understand that this goal is achieved presently at the largest airports in the country. So far as less important airports are concerned, progress towards this objective must be gradual and cannot be imposed at a rate which would be prohibitive.

The bill also provides for regulations respecting the maximum hours of work and other working conditions for pilots, co-pilots, navigators and flight engineers employed by any person operating a commercial air service licensed by the Air Transport Board. This is to ensure a maximum standard of efficiency and to prevent crew members remaining on duty for excessive periods of time.

The bill also provides for regulations to be made respecting the entering of the premises of any aircraft manufacturer and the inspecting of those premises. If any civil aircraft manufactured in Canada is to be fit and safe in all respects for flight it is necessary, I am sure you will agree, to obtain complete information on the aircraft, including its parts and components and the facilities and equipment available to its builder.

There are also provisions in the bill for regulations respecting the preservation and protection of civil aircraft involved in accidents; also the protection of accident sites and the removal and testing of any part of an aircraft that has been in an accident. The precise cause of an aircraft accident must be found, if at all possible, in order to avert similar mishaps. The bill authorizes the establishment of boards of inquiry, equipped with sufficient authority, including power to summon witnesses.

There are also provisions made for regulations respecting the use and operation of rockets, moored balloons and kites, which in some cases might be hazardous to air navigation. I am informed that mishaps have occurred recently. We are living in an age where the firing of rockets for military and scientific purposes has caught the imagination and has engendered intense public interest in this field, so much so in fact that we now find the amateur rocketeer constructing and firing his own rocket.

Another provision will vest the Canadian courts with jurisdiction in respect of offences against air regulations committed outside Canada. The Aeronautics Act already provides for regulations respecting conditions under which aircraft registered in Canada may be operated outside Canada, but the amendment in the bill will confer specific jurisdiction on any Canadian court in respect of offences committed outside Canadian territory.

Honourable senators will also note that there is provision in the bill for an increase in the membership of the Air Transport Board to a maximum of five persons, compared with a fixed number of three in the present act. This proposed increase reflects the increasing work load of the board, and the complexity of the problems with which they are dealing.

Honourable senators, I have tried to cover very briefly the main amendments suggested in this bill. As I said before, it would be much easier in committee to assess the importance and urgent need of these amendments to the Aeronautics Act. Airports of this this country are handling continuously more and more air traffic. On the eve of the centennial year and of Expo 1967, we can envisage another tremendous increase of air traffic. Plans are always for bigger and faster aircraft, and I submit that any regulations enhancing more security to the air traffic is a measure which should receive support by this honourable house.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Haig, debate adjourned.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, this is a sort of perennial measure. It has been before us so often that I hate to see it come again, but we cannot help ourselves. Therefore, with leave, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask the honourable leader if the second reading of Bill C-145, to provide for the development of the commercial fisheries of Canada, will be proceeded with tomorrow?

Unfortunately Bill C-171, to amend the Farm Credit Act, cannot be dealt with until Tuesday next.

Of course we also have a number of measures that are specifically set for tomorrow.

PRIVATE BILLS

YORK LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY— SECOND READING

Hon. David Walker moved the second reading of Bill S-28, to incorporate York Life Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, the petitioners, with the exception of Meredith Fleming, Q.C., are all officers or directors of Physicians Services Incorporated which, in Ontario, is known as the P.S.I.

The Physicians Services Incorporated, in turn, is the doctor-sponsored prepaid medical plan incorporated in Ontario in 1947. In 1964 there were 1,997,093 participants in the Physicians Services Incorporated prepaid medical plan, and 6,243 participating physicians.

Of the incorporators, Dr. J. Osler Lockhart is the president of Physicians Services Incorporated; Dr. Owen B. Millar is the vice-president; and Mr. Wallace S. Major, the general manager.

It is anticipated that all, or substantially all, of the capital stock of the life insurance company will be held by Physicians Services Incorporated. It is further anticipated that the present management, which has so successfully guided the P.S.I. in Ontario, will assume the managerial responsibility of this new company.

As a matter of fact, the moving cause behind the petition is the desire of the Physicians Services Incorporated to place itself in an equally competitive position with the commercial indemnity companies selling accident and sickness insurance in conjunction with group life insurance.

The P.S.I. wishes also to meet the competition of the life insurance companies which, conversely, offer a package plan including medical indemnity along with life insurance and sickness and accident benefits.

Honourable senators, it is my intention, if this bill passes second reading, to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Walker bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

SUSPENSION OF RULE

Hon. Mr. Walker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that Rule 119 be suspended with respect to Bill S-28, to incorporate York Life Insurance Company.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: With leave of the Senate, it is moved by honourable Senator Walker, seconded by honourable Senator Méthot, that Rule 119 be suspended with respect to Bill S-28, to incorporate York Life Insurance Company. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Explain.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, may I first read Rule 119, It provides:

> No Committee on any Private Bill originating in the Senate (of which notice is required to be given), is to consider the same until after one week's notice of the sitting of such Committee has been posted up in the lobby—

Senator Walker may wish to explain the purpose of the motion.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Honourable senators, in view of the prospective recess of the Senate at the end of next week, as has been suggested by the honourable Leader of the Government and in view of the fact that the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce has said the committee is willing to consider all bills sent to it before that time, and has also suggested that Tuesday next is suitable to the committee for consideration of this bill, I am taking the liberty of asking the permission of the house, in these circumstances, to suspend Rule 119.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

LEAGUE SAVINGS AND MORTGAGE COMPANY —SECOND READING

Hon. Harold Connolly moved the second reading of Bill S-30, to incorporate League Savings and Mortgage Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill comes to us from the Credit Union movement of Nova Scotia, which has contributed greatly to the economy of all parts of the province almost without exception, originally in the rural sections and latterly in the urban areas.

It is my intention subsequently to move that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, and I should like to inform the house that at the hearing before that committee officials of the Credit Union movement in Nova Scotia will appear and provide any and all information the committee desires. Indeed, the men and women in this movement are such enthusiasts that the probability is that they will give the committee far more information than it would ask for. Normally, they remain a modest and inarticulate people, but they do their best under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Especially under provocation.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): Especially when they have to talk in the Province of Ontario. Honourable senators, the Credit Union movement, as I am sure is well known to all members of this Chamber, was first introduced in Canada in the last month of the last century by a former parliamentary reporter named Alphonse Desjardins. In the year 1900 he established a still-famous caisse populaire, which was conceived under the most auspicious circumstances and flourished in its early years.

About 1907 or 1908 a great Boston philanthropist and merchant, the late Edward A. Filene, introduced the movement in the United States, the first branch being established, as I remember, in New Hampshire. The movement spread with great speed over the ensuing years.

In 1930 the people of Nova Scotia—if you will permit another reference to the little province in which I live and for which I have a lasting affection, despite the snide remarks sometimes cast—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Never.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Never.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): —the people of Nova Scotia, like most of our people, found themselves in dreadfully depressed circumstances, and there came into the public focus at that time a giant of a man, both in stature and mind, the late Reverend Moses Cody, who thought that perhaps in this movement there was a possibility of impelling the people of Nova Scotia to engage in a self-help program which would improve the economy of themselves and their families. He therefore sought the services of an expert from the organization in New England. In 1932 the first credit union was established in the small town of Antigonish.

In my little province we do not have tornadoes of the usual type. But as all senators from Nova Scotia know, the impact of the credit unions was tornado-like in all its aspects, and there was a great revival, so great that the idea became fixed in the minds of the people of that province, all based upon the theory and the fact of self-help.

I confess with a little shame that for too many years we had looked to others in this country to do for us what we ought to have done for ourselves. However, with the advent of this movement there was a complete change in the atmosphere, and in all the years since, our people, fortified by the knowledge that they had their own capacities, knowing that there is real value in self-help and self-interest, have been able to build a new economy in the province.

There are innumerable credit unions scattered all over Nova Scotia. Eventually the need arose for a central organization, and that central organization is the one from which we received this bill.

The primary purpose of credit unions, apart from encouraging thrift, is to make money available to people who might not otherwise have the capacity to borrow through the regular channels. In order to do that they take greater chances, but in doing so they fall back upon the oldest principle known to Parliament, that of character. They do not ask what assets a man has, they do not seek to find what his connections are; they find out what that man has been during the days of his life, whether his word is good, whether he has made an effort to pay his bills. When they discover that he is a trustworthy type of individual they are able to take greater chances than ordinary institutions could, because they have the strongest basis of all, character, in their transactions.

They found soon that there was need for mortgage lenders. I must say that the type of men in the organization at that time were a little timid about getting into the mortgage field. Indeed, they advised their innumerable credit unions against it, largely because the individual credit unions lacked the financial capacity to handle these mortgage requests. However, when the war came and the need for housing was evident there was a change of heart, more especially when all the reserve and surplus funds of the many credit unions were funnelled into the head organization and they had moneys available for mortgage purposes.

Honourable senators, I do not propose to burden you with an extended view of the situation. Suffice it to say that they have made somewhere between 700 and 800 loans. It is to their credit and to the credit of their borrowers that their losses have been virtually negligible.

Now, with only 25 years experience in the mortgage field they propose to set up their own mortgage corporation. They seek a federal charter rather than a provincial charter because of the greater guarantee of supervision by the federal insurance branch than is possible through provincial circles, and because they want this business to be conducted on the highest possible plane. They believe that with the supervision they will get from the federal Government that can be done.

It will be noted by the bill that the company will not commence business until $500,000 of capital stock has been subscribed and $250,000 paid thereon. There are sufficient moneys available to the credit unions to proceed immediately, provided assent is given with all the necessary expenditures to set up, and they propose to issue debentures to be purchased initially by credit union members, and finally by the general public in the province and possibly elsewhere.

The capitalization will be $1 million. As I said earlier, the sponsors will enlarge on this when they appear before the Banking and Commerce Committee, at which time I am sure they will be able to answer more satisfactorily than I can any questions which may be directed to them.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North), bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT AND THE CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND AN ACT TO AMEND— SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill C-169, to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

He said: Honourable senators, it is perhaps incorrect to describe this measure as a hardy perennial, but it has been before this chamber in various forms on a number of occasions, going back quite a few years. However, there is a difference in the introduction of the present bill and it lies in the fact that for the most part in the past this type of bill came to us in the dying days of the session, often when it was impossible to give it the consideration which the Senate as a whole felt was warranted, and which Senator Roebuck in particular insisted upon.

On other occasions, Senator Roebuck, despite his objection to the terms of the measure, was good enough to say that he would allow it to pass under the circumstances and because of the lateness of the session.

However, the circumstances this time are different and I intend to move that this bill be sent to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for careful scrutiny.

On the west coast of Canada, in the Province of British Columbia, individual fishermen have formed themselves into groups or combinations to deal with their counterparts, the packers, on questions relating to the quantity of and the fixing of prices for the catch each year.

In 1959 there were objections to this procedure on the ground that it was offensive to the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code. These objections were not raised only in respect of the activities of the individual fishermen who had joined together in associations for their own protection: they were levelled also at the group which sat opposite the fishermen at the bargaining table, the packers.

As a result of these complaints and because the problem was difficult of resolution at that time, the practice commenced of introducing a measure of this kind to exempt this practice from prosecution under the Criminal Code. Since then, the fishermen, through their associations, have continued to negotiate jointly with the representatives of the packing companies on these questions of price and quantity each year. Practically every fishermen belongs to the association, although he is an independent operator. In acting as they do, they may contravene the strict letter of the law, which is found in section 411 (see pp. 462-3) of the Criminal Code and is as follows:

> (a) to limit unduly the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article,
> (b) to restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any article,
> (c) to prevent, limit or lessen, unduly, the manufacture or production of an article, or to enhance unreasonably the price thereof, or
> (d) to prevent or lessen, unduly, competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation or supply of an article, or in the price of insurance upon persons or property, > is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.
> (2) For the purposes of this section, "article" means an article or commodity that may be a subject of trade or commerce.
> (3) This section does not apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as workmen or employees.

I may comment that fish is indeed a subject of trade or commerce. Furthermore, this section of the Criminal Code obviously rules out any possibility of a contravention by a trade union. Nevertheless, as I have said, these fishermen are considered to be independent, are also independent operators and as such they do not enjoy any exemption from the provisions of section 411.

An investigation was held into this point and it was thought that the practice was, at least technically, a combination of a character which offends against section 411, but no definite finding was made then by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. It was felt that if the association of fishermen were dissolved, dire results could flow and the industry might be destroyed. Then the practice of introducing exempting legislation was begun. The first moratorium was placed upon the statute book in 1959 and was due to expire on December 31, 1960. It was extended to December 31, 1961, and then to December 31, 1962, then to December 31, 1964, and finally to June 30, 1966.

The measure now before us proposes an indefinite moratorium, on conditions which are found in section 1(b). This in effect says that any arrangement between the fishermen and the packers shall not be deemed to be an offence. It also says that this moratorium will extend until the later of the two dates—

> (b) the thirtieth sitting day of the House of Commons next after the day on which the House of Commons, upon consideration of any notice of motion in that House signed by ten members thereof and made in accordance with the rules of that House, resolves that this section cease to be in force, or such sooner day as this section is repealed.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Would not the Senate have something to say about that?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am glad the honourable senator has raised that point, as that is precisely what I am coming to.

As a result of the inquiry, conducted by officers of the Department of Justice, whether under the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission or under the Combines Investigation Act, legislation might find its way into Parliament before December 31, 1967. If it does not, it appears to me, on the clear reading of the wording of this legislation, that the moratorium continues.

When the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission was investigating this situation, various actions were taken in different courts. There were attempts to limit the production of documents felt necessary to the commission for the purposes of this inquiry. Those references to the court resulted in the contention of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission being upheld, and it was decided that the documents were producible.

In 1963, a federal-provincial committee was established to make recommendations with reference to this whole situation. I understand the report indicates that the practice should be allowed to continue, but I also understand that having regard to the way the law now reads it would be necessary for the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to examine that report carefully and to decide whether there should or should not be further legislative action taken.

I come now to Senator Aseltine's point, which I consider to be an important one and one which should be considered particularly, if I may say so, by the lawyers in the Senate Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. The initiative to be taken, as provided for in the bill, is now restricted to 10 members of the House of Commons who can take action by giving a notice. This initiative is not given to Parliament, and I raise the question so that the committee may consider the advisability of investigating whether or not there may be a Senate interest that is affected here. Is there in fact a delegation of the powers of Parliament to the House of Commons? This is a question which I think should be examined very carefully before any final decision is taken.

Honourable senators, I do not raise this point in any contentious way because, in fact, there was a delegation of powers to the Senate some years ago, as you may remember, in the matter of divorce. Here we are dealing with something which is not purely a parliamentary matter, but which affects an important segment of a very important industry in the Province of British Columbia. I feel that all legislators are in duty bound to look at this legislation with a view to ensuring that the right thing is done to preserve that industry so that it may supply as much canned salmon as possible from British Columbia.

Since my recent illness this seems to be one of the few things my doctor permits me to eat for lunch, and I am now enjoying meals far better than I have in many years.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We will catch you a trout.

An Hon. Senator: Is that why you are sponsoring the bill?

Hon. Mr. Hollett: What about Newfoundland?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It may be one of the reasons I am sponsoring the bill. I am sure no honourable senator would want to do anything that would imperil or endanger in any way this very important industry. No matter where in the world you go, there is nothing more enjoyable than British Columbia canned salmon, if you can get it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What about sockeye?

An Hon. Senator: What about Restigouche?

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Did they specify that it must be British Columbia salmon? Did they not say anything about eastern salmon?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It may be that the people in British Columbia have succeeded in popularizing their product more than has been done in the case of eastern salmon. Certainly from the point of view of reputation the British Columbia salmon is very well known.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: While the sponsor of the bill is answering questions, I have one to put to him which he can probably answer now. Why does this amendment apply only to British Columbia—why not to all of Canada?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think the wording restricts this to British Columbia, which is the only place the problem arises under the Combines Investigation Act. So far as I am aware the problem does not arise elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not know. It may be that other arrangements were more appropriate elsewhere. Speaking of British Columbia salmon, let me tell you a little story. I remember being in Vancouver with a friend of mine on one occasion, and having lunch at one of the famous hotels there. My friend ordered the salmon salad for himself and for me, and he specified that canned salmon should be used.

However, I hasten to say that one of the things that I look forward to more than anything else in June is the opportunity to eat boiled salmon from the Restigouche, the Saguenay, from Newfoundland and from Gaspé, especially served with egg sauce. I add that to show that I have no bias against the other side of the country. Now I have spoken for both sides of the fence.

Honourable senators, I hope this explanation and the questions I have purposely raised will result in serious thought being given to the provisions of this bill, and particularly those dealing with its parliamentary aspects. I hope the commmittee will have the officials on hand to give the answers which in my view are very necessary in this case, and that they will examine the measure thoroughly.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I am most anxious to have a definite answer to the question I raised. I am wondering if the sponsor of the bill will provide the answer for me.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The answer will certainly be available in committee.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I have a few remarks to make concerning this bill.

This is the sixth time it has been explained in this house, so it is not necessary to go in detail into the situation it attempts to cure. At the outset let me say that I am wholeheartedly in favour of the principle of the bill. I think these associations should have the right to negotiate the price they receive for their catch, and we should recognize that this is a fact of the industry.

This amendment was first passed in 1959, and the business practices in that industry have been thereby kept alive. They have been kept alive by the previous Government and by the present Government. I think we should recognize the fact that this situation is not going to be changed. However, in my view paragraph (b) of the new section 1, whereby certain powers are delegated to the House of Commons, complicates a very simple matter.

When this matter comes before the committee I think we should consider whether or not there should be an amendment which would delete everything after the word "fishermen" at the 19th line of the first page of the bill. That would make the situation permanent. It would take this practice out of the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code in perpetuity. Unless we do that, we are only fooling ourselves.

This is a situation which has arisen and which is going to remain. Let us simply pass this uncomplicated legislation to say that it is not going to come under the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code, and if by chance some government in the future wishes to bring it under such legislation, it will be quite a simple matter to do so—it will just mean another amendment to the act.

In my view the provision here whereby it can be amended by 10 members of the House of Commons is ridiculous. The sooner we get rid of that provision, the better.

Generally speaking, I support the principle and provisions of the bill.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, my friend Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), has said that he supports the principle of the bill. I rise to say that I am utterly opposed to the principle of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The reading of the Criminal Code by the Leader of the Government struck some very responsive chords in my memory. I represented the government of the Province of Ontario as long ago as the early 1920's as counsel in prosecuting the wholesale grocers combine of Ontario for a violation of this special provision of the Criminal Code; and I have been in touch with combines investigations during the many years that have followed.

Let us thoroughly understand that we here are representatives not only of the industry in British Columbia, but we have a responsibility also to the consumers of all Canada—not just British Columbia, and not just those gentlemen who are engaged in the fishing business and who wish to sell their products to the rest of us at a price they set without the competition which the law provides.

Let me say this to the Leader of the Government that since he is a consumer of salmon we are responsible to him as well as to the rest of Canada to see that he is not charged a price beyond that which competition makes proper and legitimate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): If I am, I will switch to the eastern salmon.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: You could not do better, but from what I hear from Senator Hollett, he wonders why this act does not apply to the east as well as to the west. Of course if it applies to the west it should apply to the east. So let us have a good, solid combine of the eastern salmon producers as well as the western salmon producers; and if it is a good thing for salmon producers, why not for all producers? Why should there be some special citizens in this country who are relieved of the provisions of the Criminal Code and allowed to do things that no one else is allowed to do? What rot it is to say that the salmon industry of the west is dependent upon the kind of combine that is now in existence there and which we are being called upon to protect!

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: And to pay for.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Of course, and to pay for through the nose. I am opposed to the whole principle. I think it smells.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Fishy!

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It smells fishy.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It smells fishy all right.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: If you try Newfoundland salmon you will find it does not smell.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No. The salmon which comes from the east will not be subject to this kind of high-flavoured legislation we are asked to approve.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It is too good to put in cans.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Everyone recognizes it, apparently. Everyone who has had anything to do with drawing this act recognizes the evils that are latent in the measure because they are doing another extraordinary thing in this act by allowing ten members of the Commons to bring it to a close.

As Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton) has already said, that is all wrong. That is not an act of Parliament; it is an act of ten members of Parliament which has the effect of law. I am opposed to that too, just as he is. I am opposed to the whole thing. These lines come to mind:

> Oh, what a tangled web we weave,
> When first we practise to deceive!

No, honourable senators. This is bad!

When this matter first came before us in 1959 we were told it was a temporary move, that there was a strike of some kind in prospect out there and that unless we passed this miserable kind of legislation there would be a strike and the salmon would stop spawning, or something of that kind—the salmon would be offended.

In spite of the protest I remember making on that occasion, we passed the measure and in due season, two years after, it was before us again for consideration on some other spurious proposal of the kind that it was just temporary. This is the fourth time—

Hon. Mr. Brooks: The sixth time.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is it the sixth? It was a temporary proposal in the first place. I can only count four, but that does not matter: four is as good as six, or six is as good as four in a case of this kind. Be that as it may, here it is before us again.

Let me say, I will vote against the measure and do all I can to stop it. I do not like it: it is beneath the dignity of this house; it is contrary to the traditions of Parliament; it is just dead wrong.

Hon. J. W. deB. Farris: Honourable senators, I have listened to my honourable friend, and he is too depressing for this pleasant afternoon. I am thinking of my colleague the leader and his reference to canned salmon, and if I may be a little frivolous to overcome some of the sobriety that has been perpetrated here, I should like to repeat a story told of a missionary sent out from Vancouver to Asia. His supporters in British Columbia used to send him canned salmon, canned beans, canned meat and all sorts of canned commodities, and he would have all his converts in and serve them these canned goods. Finally, his supporters sent him a television set, and when he had all his converts in to watch television they threw up their hands and said, "Heavens, a canned missionary!"

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, my contribution shall be very brief, but there are one or two things about this measure that have aroused my curiosity.

If I understand it aright, beginning in 1959 we commenced to legislate that certain individuals or companies or both would by law be exempt from the operation of the Combines Investigation Act. That is, in effect, we said to them: we will remove any penalties from you, if you should technically—I think that was the word used by the leader—violate the combines legislation.

On principle, I think it unsound to have a law and then later on, through the creation of another law, exempt certain citizens from the operation of the law that was supposed to apply to all.

I would have liked to have had a little more information—and no doubt we can obtain it in committee—as to why this was proposed in the first instance. If my understanding of the measure is right, it operates like this: A number of fishermen—or perhaps an association of fishermen or something similar to a credit union—go out and catch fish and bring them ashore, proposing to dispose of them to a packing company. At any rate, to me this legislation appears to be based on the theory that by some connivance between the packer and the fishermen who have fish to sell, the public interest can be hurt. I cannot understand that, and on that point I would like to have some information.

As a matter of fact, when the fisherman brings his fish in to the harbour and the packer's representative is there to buy it, there is a conflict of interest between those two. The fisherman wants to get the highest price he can for the fish he offers for sale, and the packer naturally, unless there is some peculiar breed in British Columbia which I do not suspect, wants to obtain the fish as cheaply as he can. How does an operation of that kind conflict with the public interest? That is the thing I cannot get through my head.

But, on the general principle of the thing, when laws are passed it is entirely wrong to exempt certain people from their operation by passing another law. What would honourable senators think if, for instance, the Criminal Code were amended to the effect that individuals who keep their thievery below $5 are exempt from the operation of the law? That, it seems to me, would not be greatly at variance with what we are doing here.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Or murder in a certain place.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I trust that when the bill goes before the committee we shall get some enlightenment on this point, because it strikes me as rather peculiar.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I thank the honourable members of this house who have participated in the discussion of this short but certainly contentious bill. I might not have opened a can of salmon, but I have undoubtedly opened a can of worms.

I agree generally with both Senator Roebuck and Senator Crerar, that this bears very careful investigation. I agree with Senator Crerar when he says that it is better not to have exceptions to the general law; that the law should apply to all equally. But, I point out that subsection (3) of section 411 reads:

> This section does not apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as workmen or employees.

This was designed, of course, to exempt the trade union movement.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: And wrongly.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Well, I would not say that, but in any event it was done for the purpose of exempting the trade union movement from the provisions of this section. This is only because—and this point must be kept in mind—these fishermen are independent operators. They are certainly workmen, but they are independent operators.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Not quite.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Not quite? That is an argument that is made on their behalf, in any event. However, it was felt that action should be taken along these lines.

I do not think any of us feels this matter can be disposed of this afternoon. I am particularly pleased there has been so much interest shown in it, because of the history of this legislation in this very house, and I am especially pleased that the bill will go before the committee where I hope that people who are interested in not only the fishing industry in British Columbia but elsewhere will give their attendance and their help.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by honourable Senator Connolly, seconded by honourable Senator Hugessen, that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly, (Ottawa West), bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

[Later:]

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, on a point of order, I may owe the Senate an apology, and I am indebted to the honourable Senator Prowse for drawing this to my attention.

I made much of section 411 of the Criminal Code because it is the section of the Code that is referred to in Bill C-169. In point of fact, section 411 of the Criminal Code was repealed in 1960 by chapter 45 of that year and its substance was replaced by sections 32 and 33(b).

The reason why there is a reference to section 411 in this clause eludes me at the moment. I apologize to the Senate for having inadequately briefed myself on the point, but perhaps it is a matter that can be considered when the bill is before committee.

I do not think there should be any other changes made in Hansard, apart from the correction I am now making. Is that agreeable to the house?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

FISHERIES DEVELOPMENT BILL

Hon. Donald Smith moved the second reading of Bill C-145, to provide for the development of the commercial fisheries of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I consider it a privilege and a personal pleasure to be asked to move second reading of this very important piece of legislation which affects the fishing industry of Canada at every level from one coast to the other and on all lakes in between. I have been closely associated with the fishing industry, and with fishermen and their many problems, for most of my life. Perhaps because of that, and because of my earlier experience in the other place, I have continued to be deeply interested in any legislation which affects fishermen and their families.

Throughout the years during which I have had this association I have seen tremendous changes in the industry which have brought an ever-increasing share of the economic growth of Canada to the fishermen. With energy and hard work intelligently applied I believe it is now becoming possible for the living standard of fishermen and their families to approach that of many of their fellow Canadians engaged in other occupations.

I know that Senator Kinley and Senator Isnor, and others who have had a very close and longer association than I with fishermen and their problems over the years, will agree with me when I say the days of the schooners and of fishing with hand lines from dories tossing about on stormy seas are long gone. Gone too are those weeks and months on the fishing banks, which were sometimes followed by the meagre reward of little more than enough money to pay the family's grocery and supply bill which had been incurred during the fisherman's absence. I think the Lunenburg expression to describe such a trip of a group of fishermen on a schooner was "a broker".

Also gone are the days of the small motor boat powered by a one-cylinder engine and manned by a strong back capable of handlining groundfish and hauling in lobster traps from sunrise to sunset.

Those were the days of the fishing industry as I knew it. The changes in the industry have been slow indeed in coming. For many years the involvement of the federal Government in the fishing industry, as indeed in any other private enterprise, could be considered negligible. In those days it seemed to make economic sense for governments to continually strive for the lowest public expenditure, even during the depression years when people were going hungry because they were without opportunities for employment.

I know there are some who may still mourn the death of this kind of economic thinking and decision, but for my part I welcome the modern economic approach of government which has had such an impact on our rate of growth and development in general, and in particular in the development of our means of utilizing the tremendous resources of the sea.

It has been said, and I believe it is true, that the Department of Fisheries was for many years an orphan of government. It has been my observation that this departmental orphan began to be well-sheltered and nourished when it came under the direction of a formerly successful businessman, the Honourable Robert Mayhew, and his deputy minister, the late Dr. Stewart Bates, an economist who came to Ottawa from Scotland via Nova Scotia. The orphan has since developed into the vigorous and well-led department of government we now know. The blueprints, or guidelines, to use a modern expression,—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is a bad word.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): —of progress were laid down at the time I have referred to, and the industry has continued to expand and flourish ever since.

One of the early contributions of the honourable Mr. Mayhew and Dr. Bates, which gave a tremendous push to the modernization of the fishing fleet in the Maritime provinces, was the introduction and acceptance by the industry of the long-liner type of vessel.

Encouraged by a substantial federal vessel subsidy, in a few years hundreds of these vessels were built in Maritime yards and sailed by the fishermen with greatly increased financial rewards. In later years, as the demand grew for more production and better productivity, this subsidy program extended to larger vessels of the dragger type, as well as long-liners, which now operate from all main fishing ports on the Atlantic coast.

May I say that the long-liner type of fishing, which has proven its worth to us over the years, was first used in Canada on the west coast, and a typical west coast long-liner with adaptations was brought to the east coast by the Department of Fisheries as a demonstration vessel. It met with resistance, but those who were looking for improvements regarded the test as a highly successful one, with the results I have described.

The benefits of employment and higher incomes to those who build as well as to those who sail these fishing craft have flowed from a policy of public investment in what had been for too long a slow-growing resource industry.

Federal encouragement and assistance leading to a modernization of fish processing plants has also been developing for some years. For example, grants for bait-freezing facilities, as well as for public cold-storage facilities, have been made for many years, at least as far back as 1949 when I first came to Ottawa.

Honourable senators, several new federal policies are now playing an important role in the construction and modernization of fish processing facilities. For example, the Atlantic Development Board has stepped into the picture by investing some of its capital funds in site preparation and in the development of clean, adequate water supplies for fish plants. Examples of this form of direct financial assistance are found in the new plants at Riverport, Port Mouton, Pubnico, Canso and others.

The Area Development Incentives Act is also beginning to play its part. Under this act the financial assistance may take the form of tax incentives or grants up to one-third of the cost of a new or expanded processing facility. The investment in harbour facilities by the Department of Public Works is also playing an increasingly important role in fisheries development.

Honourable senators, with the remarks I have just made as a background, I now turn to a brief discussion of the bill before us.

In the first place, Bill C-145, as the short title "The Fisheries Development Act" indicates, consolidates and enlarges the functions of the Department of Fisheries in the many-sided aspects of a modern fisheries development policy.

The minister will be empowered to undertake a variety of projects falling under three classes.

1. A more efficient exploration of presently known fishery resources and the exploration and development of additional resources.

2. The development of new types of vessels, equipment and techniques.

3. The improvement of the processing and marketing of fishery products.

In order to accomplish these objectives, the minister is authorized to enter into agreements: first, to undertake joint projects with any province or any person; secondly, to make grants towards provincial projects or those undertaken by persons; and, thirdly, to undertake economic studies alone or jointly with provincial governments, educational institutions or persons.

The bill specifically provides for payments to be made toward the construction and equipment of fishing vessels. This is not a new program but one that requires to be reviewed and modified in a progressive modernization of the fishing fleet.

Another very important specific provision of the bill is for payments toward the construction, modification and equipment of commercial cold storages and bait-freezing facilities. It has been deemed necessary to include this particular provision, because in many cases it was felt that private enterprise was not in a position to finance on its own the modernization and expansion of these facilities now required under the revised fish inspection regulations. In other words, the Department of Fisheries, in insisting on the installation of very low temperature freezing facilities as an important requirement of quality control, has realized that doing so creates an uneconomic situation for existing plants in making the required capital investment. The conclusion was reached, accordingly, that the industry could be induced to incur additional association costs if financial assistance took the form of grants rather than loans. This, I believe, was a most helpful decision in the light of all the circumstances.

It has not been easy for the already established fish processing plants to meet the other requirements of the new fresh fish inspection regulations, which must be met before a plant can be registered and permitted to export their products. To be obliged to modernize their storage facilities as well, without financial assistance, would have been carrying compulsory requirements altogether too far.

It is hoped that the regulations to be made under Bill C-145 will be generous in the extent of the grants to be made available, and that there will be some tolerance in the technical requirements.

Honourable senators, this brings me to a subject which is of very deep concern to many fish plant operators in western Nova Scotia. It is a concern which I share and is closely allied to what I have just been discussing. The revised fresh fish inspection regulations to which I have referred have been in effect since April 1, 1965. Except for the large, new fish plants which have been built by Industrial Estates Limited, or financed by another agency of the Nova Scotia government, in general the operators of the many other plants have had great difficulty in meeting the requirements of the Department of Fisheries. Some, indeed, have been forced out of business.

A much larger problem is now being anticipated as a result of proposed new regulations, which are scheduled to come into effect on April 1, 1967, for the salted and cured fish industry. These regulations will require salted and cured fish plants, including herring plants, to meet very high standards of construction, equipment and operation. In meeting these standards, once again, only the large, new and easily financed plants will be able to do so without real hardship or risk of being forced out of business.

I have been informed that there are about 70 relatively small operators in this branch of the industry in western Nova Scotia, and that more than three-quarters of them could not hope to carry on under the proposed regulations without substantial direct assistance. Even under more relaxed regulations, some form of assistance will be required.

This may be the era of centralization and bigness as a general economic requirement. However, we are far from the position that this should apply to the fishing industry, as I know it, of Nova Scotia.

I know that the fishermen of western Nova Scotia are not yet prepared to leave their own villages, scattered on the indented coast, where there is a market for their fish at competitive prices, and move into the few larger centres where the big plants are operating.

Unless most of the smaller plants are assisted and kept in business, they would, however, have no other choice, unless some kind of plants were permitted to remain without modernization and perform the function of feeder plants. I discussed this with smaller elements of the industry. It immediately meets with the criticism from them that if the Department of Fisheries would permit feeder plants of a low standard of construction, operation and equipment, why should our fish, which might be tainted according to the inspection requirement, then be permitted to be bought by the larger plants and sent to the market with the stamp of approval of the inspection service. I found that a very difficult question to answer.

It is important to note that the Counties of Shelburne, Yarmouth and Digby in western Nova Scotia, according to the report of the Atlantic Salt Fish Commission, produce 63 per cent of the salt fish in Nova Scotia and that almost half of the drying capacity is in these three counties. The herring plants in western Nova Scotia are of equal importance.

We are dealing in these circumstances with serious human and social problems, as well as those of economics.

When I first learned of the proposed regulations, which would permit only approved and registered salt and cured fish plants to export their product, I had hoped that there would be substantial modifications in their requirements. I have not yet been made aware that this is to be expected.

My information is that consultations have been held with the industry with respect to the proposed regulations. I do not know who the spokesmen for the industry are who have approved them. I believe, however, that of the 46 members of the western Nova Scotia Fish Dealers Association who met with officials of the Inspection Branch, not one is ready to accept the proposed regulations willingly. I have been informed that many of them, on the other hand, doubt that the department seriously intends to enforce the regulations on April 1, 1967, in view of their financial implications.

This all leads to some suggestions which I make now, for I believe that the second reading of the bill is the time to make them. I have two suggestions for the minister and his officials with respect to this problem.

The first is to take another look at the possible consequences for a great many people, fishermen and dealers alike, of insistence on the enforcement of the proposed regulations in their present form.

No one can reasonably quarrel with the desirability of regulating and inspecting all aspects of the fishing industry eventually, in order to ensure a high standard of quality for export to other Canadian provinces and to our foreign markets.

The chief inspection requirement should be that the product shall be wholesome and of merchantable quality.

Surely, this standard for salted and cured fish can be maintained without expenditures beyond the means of the smaller operators.

If the department insists on something more than this, with its accompanying higher cost to the operator, it should be prepared to provide the necessary financial assistance in the form of grants.

It was a disappointment to me that Bill C-145, which I read a few days ago, did not contain such a provision. Indeed, I was surprised that the discussion and debate in the other place contained no reference to this deficiency. The problems I have outlined are there to see for all who have an interest in such matters. It may be that the department intends to meet this problem in another way and an amendment to this bill will not be necessary.

I may say I have been reminded of a number of precedents for direct assistance in order to encourage higher quality of food products. For example, for many years, under the Cheese and Cheese Factory Improvement Act, grants have been made to high quality cheese producers. These have totalled $33 million over the life of the program. Of this amount, $7 million has been for grants for improvement of plants and equipment.

The same principle of making direct payments for product improvement is employed with respect to high quality hog product, which is presently costing about $9 million each year.

I am sure Senator Vaillancourt who, I regret, is not here at the moment, is well aware of the federal expenditures which have been made to encourage improvement in maple production equipment. During the life of this program, these subsidies amounted to half a million dollars annually.

With these precedents in mind, it seems reasonable and fair to expect the Department of Fisheries, if it insists on regulating the operation of cured fish plants with the goal of product improvement, to provide substantial assistance to ease the financial burden placed on these smaller operators.

Honourable senators, I now come to the conclusion of my remarks. If the bill receives second reading, I intend to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Does everything go to the Banking and Commerce Committee, even fish and butterflies?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): The only reason why I suggest the Committee on Banking and Commerce is that this bill deals so much with commerce and finance; it gives the minister power to spend money. If some other committee can be constituted to deal with it, I have no objection to that. It is a little more than the concern of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources, because this bill delves into the subject matter of resources. We are dealing with more than the expenditure of public funds. It seemed to me the natural course to send it to Banking and Commerce, but if honourable members have other wishes I shall be glad to fall in with them.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why not the Finance Committee?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): That might be a good suggestion. I leave it in the hands of the house.

Because the provinces have an important interest, constitutional and otherwise, in the development of the fisheries industry, the subject matter of this legislation was discussed at a federal-provincial conference held in January 1964.

This meeting was followed by a number of conferences at the official level and an agreement was reached with respect to the terms of the bill.

This is a joint field in which apparently there have been no objections to a dominant position being taken by the federal authority. I believe it can be cited as an excellent example of what Senator Aird in another debate referred to as "creative federalism." In this instance, the vigorous part, financial and otherwise, played by the federal authority is of a most creative nature, making possible new employment opportunities and higher incomes for the fishermen and allied workers of all provinces.

I hope that the co-operation of the provincial and federal governments in the joint projects contemplated will be of the highest order. I hope that no government, whatever its political character may be, will seek a narrow political advantage from either benefits or shortcomings and that good will in the years of fisheries development which lie ahead will be maintained. The people of any province of Canada are not well served unless this be so in all joint federal-provincial undertakings.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I first ask a question? I have been studying this bill carefully while I listened to the excellent address by the sponsor. I congratulate him on the quality of his address and on the substance of it also.

In the short time I have been reading this proposed legislation I have been wondering whether this means that the Government of Canada intends to go into the fishing business. They may enter into agreements and make payments. What are these agreements and what are their limitations? Are they to become partners with the smaller or larger operators? Are the loans to be purely mortgage loans or something of that nature? Where does all this lead? Does it lead into some socialistic arrangement with regard to fisheries, or is that just a figment of my imagination?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Honourable senators, I hope that is a figment of my honourable friend's imagination. The grants which I had mentioned before and which have been going on for many years have not resulted in the acceptance of the theory that the Government is engaged in a socialistic enterprise when it makes cash grants to an industry which cannot at a particular stage of its growth stand on its own feet. This has been going on for many years.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The word "grant" is not used in the bill.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Then, let us use the word "payments"—payment of a grant. The word "payment" is used in the bill. There is no new principle in this legislation which has not been used for many years. I pointed out several instances of that when I referred the house to such things as the production of higher quality cheese, maple syrup and hog production.

I might add in passing that most of the money spent on these items has gone to my friend's province, and I do not think he should object if we continue that principle in giving some assistance to the little lake fishermen and to the fishermen of the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. Should we not help them to attain to as high a standard of living as is enjoyed by the wealthier provinces in this country?

I want for a moment to deal with this particular phase which deals with payments and which is one of the smaller aspects of the bill. This is a broadly based bill resulting from much research and exploration, and I might add that I have never yet read a bill that dealt in such plain language with the actual intent of the department.

It gives power to the minister to have a vessel built which, in the opinion of the experts, after careful study, is considered to be the type which should be demonstrated to fishermen in some particular area of the country. It gives some attention to the development of new fishery products which later can be taken up by private industry, and layer upon layer of assistance like this which will ultimately lead to the raising of the standard of living of those engaged in the fishing industry. I am not alarmed by socialistic implications.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Would my friend permit me a question arising out of what has been said by Senator Roebuck? May I say first that I really think the federal Government is getting into the fishery business and that is the reason for my question.

Is my friend, the sponsor of the bill, aware of the situation which exists with regard to the Arctic char, which is fished with great difficulty by our Eskimos, sold in the summertime at $1 a bag, and then resold to them by the federal Government at $1.50 per fish in the winter months? This industry is monopolized by the federal Government, because the distribution of the fish is made by the federal Government to different fisheries.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): I do not know.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: May I interrupt?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I have asked a question and I would like an answer.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): I know nothing about Arctic char. There are many enterprises in the far north where the Government has been in business and this has led to one outstanding criticism for years. I refer to the operations of the transport system leading into the north, which is a crown corporation. I do not think anyone is worried much about selling char.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: May I interrupt to point out to Senator Roebuck one matter relating to his comment about socialistic tendencies and the Government going into the fish business? If he reads the bill carefully he will see that the minister can do nothing without the consent of the Governor in Council, and the provisions are well guarded. The agreements are of no avail until passed by the Parliament of Canada. That is stated in the bill.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, with great respect to our colleague Senator Kinley, for whom I have a real affection and admiration, surely he does not want to argue that because a measure is passed by Parliament—introduced in the Commons and approved in the Senate—that clears it of any stigma of being socialistic. That surely is preposterous. As a matter of fact, I agree very largely with the criticism of Senator Roebuck in regard to this measure. The area in which governments intervene in matters of this kind is being widened all the time.

Fifty years ago, when the farmers' grain pools were organized, they got no government assistance. They did not get a dollar in government grants. In 1914 and 1915 the farmers of Saskatchewan developed a co-operative elevator company. That company got a loan from the Government. It did not get a grant, but it got a loan, and it gave the elevator as security to the Government for the loan, and ultimately paid the loan back with interest.

The same thing happened in the Province of Alberta. I am bound to say that the old company with which I was associated for over twenty years was not so fortunate because we never got a dollar in government assistance either directly or indirectly. In fact, to my surprise, honourable senators, the men with whom I was associated—and I was much younger than they were when I took over the responsibility of president and general manager—the farmers with whom I was associated would have refused any help. They would have said, "No, we are not going ahead with this if we have to ask the Government for a grant of money for support." That is a measure of the change which has taken place in the intervening fifty years.

What could have been done in this measure, and I readily agree may be of very great advantage and quite within the proprieties, is this: The Government could have brought up a proposal and said to those fishermen or groups of fishermen who wished to buy or build a moderately-equipped fishing vessel, "We will grant a loan on a reasonable rate of interest and take the ship as security but we expect you to pay back the loan." Instead of that we have a shovelling out of money, and I want to say to this honourable house that when a government starts to shovel out money to any favoured individual or group of individuals, it is setting upon a road of which it can never see the end.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Have they not already started that?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I would not have risen to my feet if it had not been for the rather strange theories advanced by Senator Kinley, that because a measure meets the approval of Parliament it is free from any incubus of socialism.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Our friends in the New Democratic Party, who are the genuine socialists in Parliament today, propose to achieve all their ends by legislation through Parliament. Of course at the rate the two major parties are proceeding down the road of socialism, it will soon be quite possible for the New Democratic Party to withdraw from the field altogether.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: May I ask a question of the honourable Senator Roebuck, through the sponsor of the bill, without endangering my right to speak on this bill? I would like to ask Senator Roebuck if he remembers a bill which was before us for consideration yesterday—this concerned Ontario, and you know a lot of things can happen in Ontario—whereby the Government, through its agent the Canadian National Railways is to shovel out $12 million to aid STELCO—and that is no small company—to build a railway.

I would also like to ask him if he thinks the Government has not been in business with regard to farming and farm products by way of subsidies and that sort of thing. Is there any way the Government can help the fisherman without shovelling out a little bit of money?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I rise to answer the question. Likewise, I do not want to imperil my right to speak on this bill at a later time, if I wish to do so. At all events, there is this distinction between money we advance for railroading and other moneys. Railroading is a natural monopoly and the fishing industry is not.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: The fishing industry is not what?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It is not a natural monopoly. Railroading is a public utility, and as such it is necessarily monopolistic. You cannot have many railroads competing. We are supposed to have some competition between the two present great railways, but the railway has to go to the Government for special rights—rights of expropriation, of crossing roads, and so on. There cannot be competition between railways.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: It is a steel company that wants this railway.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: No. The Canadian National Railways want it; it is a Crown corporation which wants it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: We gave that money to the Crown corporation. However, in directing my question to my honourable friend, I asked him whether I had read the bill correctly, or not, or whether there are limitations in the act, or whether the act is an announcement that the Government is going into the fishing business. I did not say it was a socialistic proposal, and I still have an open mind with regard to it.

The second question I would like to ask of the sponsor is, assuming that he is right and these are grants, or perhaps loans which are later to be repaid, is this leading up to some grants to the monopoly we have just heard about on the west coast? Are we giving loans to the British Columbia fishing monopoly which we have allowed to operate, or will continue to allow to operate, if this bill passes, outside the law of the land?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No, within the law.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: All right; I stand corrected.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, I guess we are all out of order; we are getting socialistic tonight.

I remember that the Conservative Government brought in this legislation to promote the building of fishing vessels in Nova Scotia, and it proved successful. His bill, I think, is designed to give assistance to the shore fishermen who are the needy people along the shores.

There is no socialism in this measure. I have been in Parliament for nearly 50 years, and I have heard about grants to promote industries ever since I entered the Legislature of Nova Scotia. There is not a dollar granted by this bill. It gives the minister permission to make an agreement with a province and permits him to make payments for this purpose. It also gives him permission to do research work through his department and with others. This is an enabling bill, and he cannot do anything under the bill unless he has the authority of the Governor in Council. Grants cannot be paid until the agreements have come before Parliament in each individual case. There is nothing wrong in that.

It seems to me this is salutary legislation. Now, I would be the last to want socialism, but I have been following this matter and I have watched Senator Crerar's record in this country. I do not think he would come here and seriously complain that this bill is socialism. I do fear some people in Canada, but I do not fear Senator Crerar because he has learned that in public life you must help to keep the wheels of industry turning, and he has done that over the years. I congratulate him on his long service and achievement, but on this bill we do not agree.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, if I may add to the gaiety of the moment, I would like to ask Senator Kinley to tell me when I have supported a socialistic measure such as he mentioned.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: The honourable senator comes from that part of the country which has secured government aid, and succeeded well.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I do not wish to get into this fish fight, but have we not been giving grants to help fishermen to build boats for some years? I think some 40 per cent of the cost of building fishing boats has been granted by this and other governments, and I think Senator Crerar probably voted for such measures too.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Were they grants or loans?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Outright grants.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Honourable senators, I am sorry I was so hasty in adjourning the debate. I thought I had given everyone ample time to ask questions. I was caught flatfooted once before by not getting up in time, and for that reason I rose about 45 seconds before the questions started.

Perhaps I might ask one question. I believe Senator Roebuck made a suggestion to the sponsor with regard to the committee to which this bill might be referred, other than the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. I did not quite hear his suggestion.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I suggested the Finance Committee.

On motion of Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough), debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

GOVERNMENT BILLS—PARTICIPATION BY MINISTERS IN SENATE DEBATES

On the orders of the Day:

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris: Honourable senators, I have the nod from the Leader of the Government that I might speak at this time.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): You are entitled to.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I only seek to do so because I think the subject of my few remarks—condensed to two small pages of notes—is of importance to this house and the Commons in the way that I will explain, and I believe that honourable senators will not object.

I refer to Rule 18A of the Rules of the Senate, which was passed as an amendment in 1947. That rule reads as follows:

> When a Bill or other matter relating to any subject administered by a department of the Government of Canada has originated in and is being considered by the Senate or in Committee of the Whole, a Minister representing the Department, not being a Member of the Senate, may enter the Senate Chamber, and...take part in the debate.

Honourable senators, I have distinct recollections of the time when this was introduced. Senator Wishart Robertson was then the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and the reason for the introduction of the rule was to enable the Senate to co-operate with the Commons in the expedition of legislation. In 1947 there was considerable need for this rule because of the congestion of legislation, but today there is far more need for adopting this method of procedure that was provided for under the leadership of Senator Robertson than there was then.

As a matter of fact I read in the newspapers—and sometimes they are right, you know—that Mr. Pearson has given warning that unless there is more expedition in respect to the passing of legislation, Parliament will have to sit during July and August. That must be contrasted with the fact that during the past month this house was adjourned.

The reason why more legislation has not originated in this house—and when I say "legislation" I mean Government bills—is that the ministers are all in the House of Commons, with the exception of my honourable friend the Leader of the Government in this house, and they object to anybody but a minister making the opening speech on a motion for the second reading of a Government bill. As a result, most Government bills have been first introduced in the Commons. The provisions of Rule 18A meets this situation. Under this rule my honourable colleague Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) could introduce a certain piece of legislation in this house on first reading, and then the appropriate minister could enter the chamber, move the second reading and make the original speech. To a great extent the objection made at that time was met by allowing the minister to move the second reading of the bill in the Senate.

The Honourable Lionel Chevrier was the first to take advantage of this rule back in 1947, and he was followed from time to time by other ministers. Congestion in Parliament lessened over the following years, and there was not the same need for this scheme that had been devised by Senator Wishart Robertson. But, the rule was never repealed. It has always existed. It dropped into desuetude, and so far as I know has never been acted upon in recent years.

Honourable senators, having regard to the warning given by the Prime Minister, and our own knowledge, it would seem that occasion has arisen for the reviving of this practice under Rule 18A. I am addressing myself particularly to the newer senators who are probably not familiar with this rule, and also to the older senators like myself who have almost forgotten about it. I am addressing myself to the cabinet ministers in the other place. I hope that our leader will feel free—and I believe he does from the discussions I have had with him on this matter—to convey a message to the Prime Minister and his ministers that the Senate is ready, willing and anxious to have Rule 18A revived so that there may be concurrent activity in both houses.

I am sure that will be the sentiment of both sides of this house, and that this change at this time—it is not a change; it is merely a revival—will result in a public benefit.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Instead of saying the rule should be revived, should you not say that it should be made use of? After all, it is still in existence.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Yes, it is in existence.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It cannot be revived. It is still there.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I will accept my honourable friend's distinction.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Perhaps "revitalized" would be a better word.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Yes, revitalized. I used another word—I said it had fallen into desuetude. I was reasonably sure of the meaning of that word, but I went to the library to confirm it. A lady there who volunteered her help told me that there was no such word because she could not find it in Webster's dictionary. However, she found it in the Oxford English dictionary. It means a cessation of use.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Farris: What was the phrase you suggested?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: "Made use of."

Hon. Mr. Farris: Very well. In any event, my point is to get the thing going again as it was in the earlier days. I believe I have the support of the members of this house when I say that the result would be for the public benefit. It would stir up the Senate to get a minister here—and it might be the Prime Minister himself. I understand that the Prime Minister knows this is being considered, and I think it would be most interesting.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Coming events cast their shadows before them.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Sometimes. I do not suppose there would be much objection to that in some quarters.

As I have said, it would stir up the Senate. By coming here the minister would be impressed by the restrained but efficient manner in which his bill would be examined. It would establish a concurrent activity between the Commons and the Senate, each dealing with different portions of government legislation at the same time. It would certainly lessen the legislative congestion, because if there were a full discussion by the Senate, with the minister in charge, there would be a great deal less need or demand for a long inquiry in the Commons as under present conditions.

In conclusion, I would like to feel free to say to the Prime Minister, speaking through the Leader of the Government in the Senate—or perhaps I could talk to him directly—that by coming to the Senate himself, these circumstances would be most interesting and helpful. If he comes, we will welcome him.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have just a word to say about the proposal of the honourable gentleman.

In the first place, we already have in this chamber a member of the Privy Council who is entitled to attend the sittings of the Privy Council and is in daily contact with the other members of the Cabinet. He is the Leader of the Government, Senator Connolly.

I appreciate the fact that Senator Connolly is a privy councillor. If I have insisted at times in having all the acting leaders appointed privy councillors, it is because they replace the leader in his absence and therefore they must be in daily contact with the other members of the Cabinet to discuss any piece of legislation with them so that they may enlighten the Senate about its details and purpose.

I would add that the Leader of the Government in the Senate does more work than any other member of the Cabinet, for two reasons. First, he has to explain to us every piece of legislation originating either in the House of Commons or in the Senate. I say that he does more work than any other member of the Cabinet because he has a very small staff. He has a highly competent executive assistant and two perfectly trained and devoted secretaries who work day and night, all week long, and sometimes on Sunday. Other cabinet ministers have large staffs in their offices, which makes a great difference. However, I do not say that as a matter of criticism. I am a realist, and I put the facts before you as I know them. We do not need other cabinet ministers to come here; we already have one.

I would have no objection to seeing some of our other honourable colleagues appointed to the Cabinet, and I would appreciate my honourable friend the Leader of the Government being put in charge of a department, if he had the time and the willingness to do it.

My first point is that we have someone here who is in daily contact with the Cabinet and who attends the secret sittings of the executive council, which is the Cabinet. That is my first point.

My second point is that I do not see why ministers should be bound to come to this chamber, although I saw some of them do so when I was in the House of Commons. That custom is obsolete now.

There is another strong argument against the proposal of the honourable gentleman. It is that the ministers attend the meetings of committees of this chamber. The last minister to come was the Honourable Paul Martin, who came to the Committee on External Relations. The Minister of Finance and other ministers are willing to come before our committees, where each member has an opportunity to ask questions. The questions and answers are taken down in shorthand and they are made part of the report. What more do we want? Our committees are an extension of this chamber and with rare exceptions no minister has ever refused the call of the Chair to attend sittings of a committee. Therefore, what would be the improvement in having a minister sitting here, when he has not the right to vote in this chamber?

Reverting to what I said earlier, when I suggested that the acting leader should be appointed a privy councillor for the reasons that I have given, I believe something should be done by this Government to honour the memory of one of our most distinguished colleagues, the late Senator Bouffard, who in spite of all his other activities, made the sacrifice to agree to be acting leader in the absence of our leader. He should be appointed a privy councillor posthumously, to honour his memory. Also, all those who have been acting as leaders here should be appointed privy councillors. Because one man is dead, we should not ignore what he did in his lifetime. Some people are surprised that we often speak of our departed colleagues—we keep their memory fresh; it is far from being dead. It means that they are really present in our minds and in our hearts. It is to the credit of the Senate that we can remember our departed colleagues, and tell the new members that they missed a great deal by not knowing them.

That being said, I am satisfied with the present practice with regard to Cabinet ministers. They may be invited to this chamber if the Senate wants to invite them, but I do not see how we can invite every cabinet minister for very piece of legislation that is brought before us. They do not refuse to come before any committee, and that is enough for me.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, Senator Farris said he wanted to stir up the thinking of the members of this chamber. He has stirred me up to the point where I totally disagree with him. I have no objection to ministers coming in here; in fact, I welcome them.

However, those who know something of the history of the Senate will remember that one of the great failures of the Senate was that for many years two men dominated the Senate, one on one side and one on the other. They presented the bills: they presented the criticism. That continued for years and years. It is but recently that members are given the opportunity to present a bill and now fully participate in Senate debates.

There is much talent and ability in this house. There is a desire to be occupied. Moreover, when a member is given a bill to present on second reading, whether he be on this side of the house or on the other side, it is educating.

As to regards holding up legislation, we cannot be held responsible for that. We debate every bill as quickly as we can and if there is work to be done we do it expeditiously.

Before we make any move we should consider how better we can employ the talent we have here. The fact that we have been doing this to a greater extent now than ever before, has raised the standing of the Senate in this country.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, unlike some of my predecessors in this short interchange, I am pleased indeed that Senator Farris has raised this point, if for no other reason than that those who have already spoken have put forward points of view which deserve serious consideration.

The recent book The Modern Senate of Canada, by Professor Kunz, points out that, during the leadership of the Honourable Wishart Robertson, a retired member of this chamber, there was a very serious effort to spread the work of introducing Government legislation. Senator Croll has already pointed this out. That was a period of transition. I believe Senator Robertson was trying by the introduction of Rule 18A to make it possible for still further work to be done here, as the Senate at that time did not seem to be as fully occupied as it might be.

During the leadership of honourable Senator Ross Macdonald—whom we are always happy to see in the chamber—that practice was continued to the point where many senators got valuable experience. I recognize this as very fine leadership, as it involved many more people in the work than would have been involved otherwise, apart altogether from the committees.

The practice was continued while our good friend Senator Aseltine was leader, and indeed while Senator Brooks was leader. This is an important aspect of the work of the leader, to try to involve as many people as possible in the sponsoring of Government legislation.

A leader should also encourage the back benchers—God must have loved them, as he made so many of them—to take greater initiative in sparking ideas for special committees. This must be done with care and with a sense of responsibility. Whenever it was done in that way in the past it proved beneficial. My honourable friend, the dean of the Privy Council of Canada (Hon. Mr. Crerar), sitting to my right, knows that and so do many other honourable senators.

Although my namesake may not agree with this, if I can believe what I read in a Halifax paper around the turn of the year, it is important for the Leader of the Government in the Senate to be a member of the ministry, although it may seem somewhat anomalous. I really do not know what I would have done if I had not been a member of the ministry in the past two years. I am sure that Senator Ross Macdonald, Senator Brooks and Senator Aseltine would all agree totally with it.

I often wonder how Senator Aseltine—and this is not political criticism; I am talking within our own family here—was able to do so well when he was asked to lead here and was not a member of the Privy Council. Those must have been difficult years for him. Those who were here then remember with great admiration the work he did and the way in which he did it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I took my cue from the work of Senator Macdonald (Brantford), Senator Brooks, Senator Aseltine, and Senator Wishart Robertson, and when I started attending meetings of the Privy Council, and in particular the Legislation Committee of which I happen to be a member, I asked for as much legislation as possible for introduction in the Senate. There was no resistance to that suggestion on the part of the other members of the committee or of other members of the Cabinet. I think that request was heard, because since then we have had more legislation for introduction in this chamber.

I have always taken the position, and I always shall, that while it is my responsibility as a member of the Government to support this legislation it is highly proper that persons other than the Leader of the Government in the Senate should be asked to take on the responsibility of sponsoring bills.

Just a few weeks ago I mentioned the fact that when I was on the other side of the house under the leadership of Senator Macdonald (Brantford), we actually took on the sponsorship of a bill on behalf of the Government. This occurred under special circumstances, and I may say we were both very happy to do it. I know Senator Macdonald will support me in this. It was the bill in connection with the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act. I mention this to show that the party line does not run down the middle of the chamber to excess.

There is another point I should make at this time. It has been mentioned by one or two honourable senators that we have only one member of the Cabinet in this house. This is not so in the House of Lords; there you have the Lord Chancellor, a member of the Cabinet, and the Lord Privy Seal, who is the Government leader. In the Lords there are other ministers as well, some rather senior, and quite a number of junior ministers in the back benches. I understand there are 13 or 14 members of the Government in the House of Lords.

The day may come, and perhaps it will come sooner than we expect, when there will be more ministers of the Government in this chamber, not necessarily administering departments, but perhaps assisting. When the leader in this house is the only member of the Cabinet, he does not dare walk out of the Chamber while the house is sitting. His duty is to be here and to be responsible and to act with responsibility.

The purpose of Senator Farris' proposal is, in my view, a most praiseworthy one. He seeks to have more Government legislation initiated here, and thereby to speed the movement of legislation through Parliament. However, I would point out that Rule 18A permits a minister from the other place to come here to deal only with a bill which has originated in the Senate. And we have to remember that a bill involving a financial factor cannot originate here. Automatically these bills are excluded.

What I am about to say now I shall not say in my capacity as a member of the Government but purely in my capacity as a member of the Senate. I would hope that we might be able to amend the rules of Parliament itself so that certain bills could be considered here in the first instance, despite the fact that they had financial implications. The financial sections could be reserved for the special consideration of the House of Commons, while all other aspects of the legislation could be dealt with here. The bill could then be referred to the House of Commons, and then returned here.

It is not my intention to draw up a blueprint for this, but it seems to me that such a procedure would accomplish the purpose that Senator Farris has in mind far better than by simply bringing in a minister. Such a step might stimulate debate, but it might create a furor to have a minister from the other place come in here and speak to the bill.

I am going to be so bold as to say that there are members of this chamber who can explain and have explained bills better than they have been explained in the other place, and debates on many subjects that have taken place in this chamber have been far more enlightening then those in the other place. I have no wish to draw invidious comparisons between the two houses, but the bills that come before us here invariably get careful consideration and thoroughly objective study. To accomplish the purpose that Senator Farris has in mind would involve a change in Rule 18A, to allow bills other than those which can be originated here now to start in this house. Perhaps with the increasing volume of work Parliament has to do every year, this is going to become necessary.

I know there are some important bills, even those without financial implications, that are so much a matter of Government policy that the ministers prefer to introduce them in their own house. I think we can all understand that. But there are other bills which do not fall into that category and which might very well originate here; and if we need a minister from the other place to explain the measure, I certainly would not be averse to having one do so. But in my view we have a pretty good team here to deal with measures as they come before us.

I regard the view expressed by Senator Pouliot as a very valid one, that we have the advantage of the viewpoints of the ministers voiced in our committees. They do not hesitate to come before us, sometimes on very controversial bills. In my view they have always co-operated with us in this respect.

Perhaps I have said too much, but I have expressed my ideas about the importance of the Senate doing all it can to advance expeditiously the work of Parliament. I am glad this interchange has taken place, and I assure Senator Farris, Senator Pouliot, and Senator Croll that I will put these representations before the Government at the first opportunity.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to prolong this debate. However, although I had no idea this matter would be raised today, I do want to add a few words.

I have been a member of both the House of Commons and the Senate. We all realize that under the British North America Act the House of Commons has certain functions and the Senate has certain functions, and I think the work of the two houses has proceeded along those lines pretty well for the last hundred years. Possibly some more satisfactory procedure can be made in the future.

I do not agree with my good friend Senator Farris, although I would like to do so because we agree on most things. However, I think if we were to adopt his views we would simply be establishing another House of Commons. It was never intended that we should have two Houses of Commons. It was intended that we should have one Senate and one House of Commons, and together they should form one parliament. As my good friend the leader said, there would be a danger of creating a furor in the Senate if we had the minister here sitting opposite what is called the Opposition, although I understand there is no such thing as an official opposition in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, there is.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Such a situation could create quite a furor, and I think he was quite correct in saying so, and we could be debating back and forth much as they do in the Commons.

I was a member of the House of Commons for 25 years, and since becoming a member of the Senate I have been greatly pleased with the work of the Senate and particularly with the work of its committees, which I think do an excellent job. I do not think it would be amiss if a second cabinet minister were selected from among honourable senators. There are two or three portfolios which are not particularly political, and it might be an excellent idea—especially as I understand that the number of ministers is to be increased again, though I think we have enough already—if in their generosity a second cabinet post was filled from the Senate.

I also agree with Senator Connolly that the Leader of the Government should always be a member of the Cabinet. If he is, he is the connecting link between the Cabinet and the Senate. The Commons have their 25 ministers, and surely the Senate is entitled to a connecting link. The Senate representative in the Cabinet hears the discussions that take place on various bills, from other ministers he appreciates the necessity for each particular bill. Then with that information he can speak with authority before the Senate and is a great asset and help to this chamber.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY BILL

CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINE NEAR BRUCE LAKE, DISTRICT OF KENORA— THIRD READING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved the third reading of Bill C-165, respecting the construction of a line of railway in the Province of Ontario by Canadian National Railway Company from the vicinity of Amesdale on the Redditt subdivision of the Canadian National Railway in a north northwesterly direction for a distance of approximately 68 miles to a point in the vicinity of Bruce Lake, in the District of Kenora.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FISHERIES DEVELOPMENT BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Friday, May 6, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne) for the second reading of Bill C-145, to provide for the development of the commercial fisheries of Canada.

Hon. Clement A. O'Leary: Honourable senators, like the sponsor of this bill, I too may say that my association with the fishing industry and with fishermen and their problems extends over the greater part of my life. And again, like Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne), I also learned much during my experience in the other place, particularly in having my sights broadened about the industry nationally, and I gained a more thorough appreciation of the more complex and varied problems on both coasts and in our inland waters. And, once more I too bow to the longer and closer association and consequent knowledge of several senior members on both sides of this chamber.

I immediately offer warm congratulations to the sponsor for the excellence of his presentation and his very humane and unbiased consideration of the subject matter. He certainly enunciated as well as anyone could the general principles contained in the bill. I fully appreciate that it would be difficult for him or anyone else to go into any great depth as to specifics, because to date we do not have much information beyond the general intent. This, of course, is a good reason why the bill should go to some appropriate committee, but I make no particular recommendation in this respect. It seems to me that the actual committee is not of greatest importance but, rather, that the greatest importance should be attached to the witness or witnesses who may be made available to us. I would certainly hope that we might hear the Minister of Fisheries and particularly Dr. Needler, the Deputy Minister, who, I am sure, could give us the benefit of his obvious expert knowledge of at least some of the particulars envisaged, and as to where and how they may apply.

As the sponsor pointed out, the probable initiative for this bill arose as a result of the federal-provincial conference in January 1964, where the subject was discussed at considerable length. I would have hoped too that it was given more recent impetus from proposals made in the last Speech from the Throne. Here again, although only a general reference was made, subsequent press reports indicated, for example, that while no specific figure had been set as an objective annual minimum net report for fishermen, it was expected that it should be in the area of $4,200 a year, similar to the objective set for the Canadian farmer.

Immediately I interpreted this as what we might call the fishermen's ARDA plan, or F.R.D.A., and it is not illogical to hope that as a result of the implementation of at least some of the proposals in this bill, it could be just that. As one Atlantic province newspaper editorialized not long ago,

> This bill could be all important to an industry which is gaining national recognition perhaps for the first time in our country's history.

This statement, of course, had reference to the fishing industry on a national basis. Here we all recognize—and I know I will be excused if I make several references to my native province—that 50 years ago Nova Scotia's fisheries were famous. I presume this was the reason for our first being labelled "Herring Chokers". In view of the fact that in 1965, Nova Scotia for the first time, reached first place in its dollar volume of landed fish as compared with other provinces—

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I correct the honourable senator? Nova Scotians are known as "bluenosers," and New Brunswickers are known as "herring chokers."

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): I have heard other names for New Brunswickers too.

However, as I say, Nova Scotia did reach first place in 1965 in total dollar value, and we are told that the herring played an important part in our reaching that position. From time to time we are still called "herring chokers," and I acknowledge this title with at least a tolerant degree of pride. I must be quick to point out, however, that the Province of New Brunswick obtained the greatest share of the herring catch, but plans and predictions seem to indicate that Nova Scotia has the greater future potential in this area. This was confirmed by the experts at last week's meeting in Fredericton of the Canadian Atlantic Herring Fishery Conference.

I want to console British Columbia too with the fact that their fish poundage volume exceeded that of Nova Scotia by some 20 million pounds last year, but our dollar volume was higher by approximately $2 million. This is partly explained by our higher yield of lobsters, scallops and haddock. I shall not say anything about salmon at this moment.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Not canned salmon, anyway.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): There are four kinds of salmon, as the honourable Leader of the Government must remember. As a former retailer I would never go into a store and ask for a can of salmon. I would specify a variety. Perhaps there are others, but I am going to suggest that there are four kinds of canned salmon, namely, Keta, Fancy Pink, Cohoe and Red Sockeye. Ask for Red Sockeye if you want the best.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): What about Nova Scotia canned salmon?

An Hon. Senator: It is too good to be put into cans.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Yes, and the same thing applies, I believe, to Gaspe salmon. Newfoundland has canned some salmon.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I hope the honourable senator does not mind these interruptions.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Not at all.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There are other Nova Scotia fish that have been canned in recent years and brought to the attention of the people of central Canada. I am thinking particularly of lobster. Some of it is really magnificent. Perhaps the honourable senator could enlighten us on what other Nova Scotia sea products are canned.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): There are others present more qualified than I am to enlighten the house on this subject. Lobster has been mentioned, and this is the most widely recognized canned food product. I recall from my experience in the retail business that American tourists were always looking for a Nova Scotia pack. For sardines I suppose we have to go to New Brunswick; I am not too sure. I will not boast too much about our chicken haddie—our cat loves it. I cannot enlighten you any further.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): This question might be raised in committee. The officials will be able to give us some information on it.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Without laying it on too heavily but to continue my boasting, if honourable senators will bear with me for one moment more, I will say that Nova Scotia's fishery value in the past year totalled more than that of Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Quebec combined. Lobsters alone contributed $12 million to our total landed fish value which amounted, incidentally, to over $48 million for the last year. It can be seen that this is approximately a $100 million industry in that one province alone, in that the market value is approximately twice the landed value.

May I now refer to the not-so-bright side of the picture. Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne) made certain observations in this sphere, upon which I shall comment later. At this time I want simply to state that the Canadian fishing industry, although it has been making progress, just is not keeping pace with other countries. Peru, Russia, Poland and other new converts have taken the initiative. They are setting the pace. I understand that this is basically a result of their concentration on the herring harvest, and unfortunately the greater part of this harvest is obtained from the waters of our coast.

Over the past years Iceland has increased her yearly herring catch by 50,000 to 60,000 tons. Norway plans to increase her fishing fleet this year by over 100 sea-going vessels of 100 feet or more in length. As we all know, Russia is constantly developing her fleet, as are other countries.

In 1964, Iceland produced three times the weight of fish that the Nova Scotia industry did. I am sure all honourable senators will agree that we just cannot permit this situation to continue. Anything that this bill does to rectify that situation certainly deserves our commendation and support.

I am not unaware of the present assistance being given the industry right across Canada by the federal Government, not only by the federal Department of Fisheries but by many other agencies of government, both federal and provincial. I commend the excellent work of the Fisheries Research Board, and suggest that its functions and financial support must necessarily be enlarged in the future if this measure is to be effective.

I call the attention of this house also to Item 5 of the 1966-67 Estimates of the Department of Fisheries, and the breakdown of the Fisheries Development projects participated in jointly with the Atlantic provinces and Quebec, which was given to the Standing Committee on Fisheries of the other place. These too will undoubtedly be considerably enlarged with the implementation of the bill now before us.

In effect, what I am trying to say here is that we have not been entirely standing still. As a further example of this, in the field of providing new and better vessels, the Nova Scotia Fisheries Loan Board lent only a little over $1 million for new construction in 1964, but in the year ended March 1966 that figure is in the area of $8 million, and a still larger sum is anticipated for the year ending in March 1967. As a result of this, some 30 vessels of over 65 feet in length are to be commissioned in the province this coming year.

Perhaps the honourable sponsor of this bill or some other honourable senator has more information on this particular item than I have, but in the Halifax Chronicle Herald of Tuesday, April 26 there was an item from the Ottawa Bureau which indicated that a meeting was to be held on April 27 in Montreal of senior fishery officials from the Atlantic provinces and Quebec and the federal Government to discuss measures to improve the productivity of the inshore Atlantic fishermen. It then went on to say that the Minister of Fisheries had made a forecast to the effect that it was very possible that at this meeting there would be consideration given to increasing the present 25 per cent to 30 per cent subsidies to 50 per cent for vessel construction.

The minister also indicated that the federal Government was prepared to recommend provincial loan agencies as lenders under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. I have not seen any report on this since. I presume a meeting was held, but perhaps it was a matter between senior officials, and possibly there has been no public release. However, that can be inquired into in committee.

The sponsor of the bill indicated the difficulties experienced by many plant operators in Nova Scotia in attempting to comply with the standards set out under the revised fresh fish inspection regulations which came into effect since April 1, 1965. I, too, am aware of the effect of these regulations on some of my friends who operate or operated some of these plants. If the inspection regulations were too rigid, that is one thing; on the other hand, if these regulations were intended to protect and expand our consumer and export market for quality fish, then I too would hope that cold storage facilities assistance be generous under the regulations of this bill.

As for the "degree of tolerance in the technical requirements," without adequate knowledge on my part, I would hesitate to express an opinion.

Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne) then expressed an even more serious concern and alarm over the regulations to come into effect on April 1, 1967, which in effect will permit only approved and registered salt and cured fish plants to export their product. I will not argue that these standards may be too high. I can appreciate that they will be costly, but here again, guaranteed high quality seems to be the objective.

The sponsor suggests that "the chief inspection requirement should be that the product shall be wholesome and of merchantable quality." I think we would all like to know if that can be brought about by a stricter enforcement of the regulations in their present form. If not, then the precedents that he has given us for direct assistance to encourage higher quality food products should be made applicable here.

This leads me to an even wider and more general concern as to the future prospects of our inshore fishermen. When Dr. Finn, a former Deputy Minister of Fisheries, was looking into the advisability of establishing a salt fish marketing board, he naturally was obliged to cover the entire industry during his examination, and as a result, in addition to advising against such a board he tells us that the inshore industry is failing as opposed to the rapid progress being made in deep-sea fishing. He then draws the logical conclusion that more competent men need to be trained to properly man these vessels.

With this I have no quarrel. It appears to be a "must," and I believe that when the proper incentives with training are provided and the industry is made just a bit more attractive, our younger men will show greater interest and enthusiasm. Presently we have approximately 13,000 fishermen in Nova Scotia—3,000 off-shore and 10,000 inshore. Dr. Finn correctly referred to the low landings per inshore fishermen—$762 per year average in 1963—and referred to it as "a limited resource with an excessive number of people dependent upon it." As a result of his report, it is his opinion, and appears to be the opinion in some quarters, that an effort should be made to attempt to divert about half the inshore fishermen to the off-shore fishing grounds.

Needless to say, with the average income as given above, it would perhaps seem impossible for us to visualize why any young man would wish to pursue the inshore industry. On the other hand, I feel it is quite impractical and would be morally wrong to limit in any way the endeavours of our middle-aged and older men presently engaged in the inshore industry. Certainly here it is a matter of human and social problems—and even economic as well.

I shall not take time to discuss many major problems affecting the industry on both our coasts and inland waters, such as the development of the salmon industry on the west coast, and, I might add, the Atlantic coast as well; the lobster volume decline so far this year; the disappearance of our clams; the Lake Erie perch, and other problems.

I was a bit surprised at the nature of the questioning at the conclusion of Senator Smith's introduction of this bill. It seemed to me that much was being made of the Department of Fisheries as such making provisions for payments or grants of any type to private industry. In the instance of this bill, the only new item appears to be cold storage, which was formerly under the Department of Agriculture. I do not know whether it will continue to be under that department.

I am still not too clear what the intent was behind some of the questions. I simply say that there is no precedent here, and certainly not in many other agencies or departments of government. This does not say that those who feel otherwise have a right to oppose the general principle which has been carried on for years of developing any industry which is of national, genuine economic value and needs encouragement and tangible assistance.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words on this bill, although I am somewhat reluctant to say them after the discussion between the honourable Senator Brooks and the honourable Senator O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough) as to who was a "bluenoser" and who a "herring choker." A resident of P.E.I. is called a "spud islander". Indeed, it might well be asked why I should rise to speak on a fisheries bill.

For some time there has been a great need for national fisheries policy. While perhaps this bill does not introduce many of the needed measures, nevertheless, it consolidates them under the one program. I believe Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne) made that statement, in introducing this bill.

The Department of Fisheries had been the orphan of the Government for some time. I recall the late George Clark, who was deputy minister, telling me on one occasion that with regard to his budget he was something like the character in Alice in Wonderland who had to keep running steadily to keep from getting behind. Yet there can be many improvements made with little expenditure. I recall one that was made in a small village in my riding when I was in the House of Commons.

The fishermen in that area had about eight weeks of lobster fishing. Then they tried to hand-line or jig cod fish. The season was very poor, and the Department of Fisheries in conjunction with the province moved in and set up a school to teach the fishermen how to use gill nets. The total cost of the program was the huge sum of $1,800. Since that time the fishermen have gone on out into different types of netting and seining. Two fishermen who took part in this first program told me that between them last year they landed approximately 300,000 pounds of mackerel that they would not have been able to land without the benefit of this school. I point this out to illustrate that we do not need huge sums of money to change a lot of our habits: it is instruction in new techniques that is needed.

The bill makes reference to research. I hope this will be developed and speeded up in many areas of fishing. I am interested particularly in the oyster farm at Bideford. We have an excellent program under way in oyster research, and it is fascinating to visit this station and speak to the biologists who are carrying out the research work and attempting to develop oyster farming. I remember on one occasion the senior biologist told me that he hopes within five years to develop what he termed purebred strains of oysters, just as we have purebred strains in cattle.

I recall another occasion when I visited the station with a medical specialist, a heart specialist. He asked the biologist questions about his work. Mr. Drinnan turned to him and said "You are a heart specialist—how would you measure the heart beat of an oyster?" This indicates that these people have a very interesting and difficult task and that they are worthy of our support.

Sometimes their work gets tied up in red tape. Certain expenses of the station must be divided between the Fisheries Research Board and the Department of Fisheries. It is unfortunate that these highly qualified men of training and education should have to spend so much time breaking down such expenses.

I should like to see more research work in the lobster industry. Last year, in the Northumberland Strait, the lobster fishing was poor. We need research to attempt to get into the so-called farming of lobsters. On that subject may I point out to the Leader of the Government that the trend in lobsters now is to freeze them, to provide a frozen pack, and that canning is not nearly as important now as it used to be. If he is not familiar with these excellent packs, the next time I visit Prince Edward Island I will try to bring some back so that he may acquaint himself with this excellent product.

The bill makes reference to grants to universities and for research projects. These should receive a great deal of emphasis, for two reasons. First, we are short of graduate students in marine biology in Canada. This provision would give the universities an opportunity to train the biologist. We would then have the value of their knowledge to apply to our fishing techniques. I hope this section of the legislation will not be overlooked.

Senator O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough) mentioned that some inshore fishermen probably should be transferred to deep sea fishing. This may be desirable but it is difficult to take a person who has invested in one way of life and change him completely.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Pardon me, I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: The honourable senator cited some official who made that suggestion. The honourable senator is quite right in that regard. The lobster fisherman invests several thousand dollars in a fishing boat, motor, trap, ropes, etc. It would be difficult for him to leave this investment. It would be better if we could persuade those who design vessels to develop a boat which would carry out the purposes of lobster fishing, which would take the traps out to the grounds, let them slowly turn over and let them use the ropes, so that the traps can be emptied and rebaited and, when lobster season is over, they can be used in seining. That would do much for the lobster fishermen.

The bill deals with cold storage. I have some questions on that point which I hope will be answered in committee. Formerly, this function was carried on under the Department of Agriculture. I wonder if it will still be carried out under that department or whether there will be a new section in the Department of Fisheries.

As regards the grants, I recall that the expenditure was made up of one-third from the province, one-third from the federal government, and one-third from the participating company or co-operative. In return, the firm or co-operative receiving the grant had to postdate guarantee that these facilities would be available for public use for ten years. I hope to receive an answer on that point in committee.

Honourable senators, I was disappointed that the terms are not spelled out in more detail in the bill. I tried to find out something from the officials in the department or from the minister's office concerning the plan in certain fields. I could get no information. The answer I received was that they cannot say anything until the Governor in Council has approved certain orders. This makes me feel we are giving them a blank cheque which they may use or discard. I recall that we gave the same authority in the Territorial Waters Act, regarding the so-called 12-mile limit, and no action has been taken in this regard. Perhaps because of the annual provincial conferences they need not have the same fear of neglect as we had in the case of the Territorial Waters Act.

Hon. James Gladstone: Honourable senators, I am happy to take this opportunity to speak on behalf of the British Columbia Indians. This is a very important feature of their livelihood, and the protection of their interests in the waters of the Pacific is most necessary.

About three weeks ago a delegaton came from British Columbia with a brief. I did not see it because at that time I was at a meeting of two Indian organizations in the interior of British Columbia. I was told at that meeting by some of the delegates that a brief was being presented at that time in Ottawa to the Indian Affairs Branch, not only on behalf of Indians who are making their livelihood in fishing but also on behalf of people in British Columbia who live or work along the Charlotte Island adjacent to Alaska. They find that the encroachment of the Alaskan and Japanese fishermen is making an inroad into their fishing interests.

When this bill comes to committee, I would like to see consideration given to those interests of British Columbia, not only of the Indians who are making their livelihood in commercial fishing but also those who are fishing for their food.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if honourable Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne) speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): At the outset let me say to my honourable friend from Nova Scotia (Senator O'Leary, Antigonish-Guysborough) how pleased I am that he spoke for the official Opposition in the Senate in such terms as to give me to understand that this bill does have the support of all parts of this house. He made some helpful suggestions and raised some interesting questions. I hope these will be fully dealt with at the committee stage.

Senator Roebuck was interested in the powers of the minister and how the money was going to be spent, and whether there would be some form of mortgage loans and so on. Unfortunately, I do not have the information at this time to satisfy him on these points. I was also interested to know that Senator Phillips could not obtain the information at this stage of the legislation. I want to say to Senator Roebuck that those of us who are sure to be in attendance at the committee meeting when we have before us the minister, the deputy minister and other officials, will bear down very intensely and seek to ascertain the information which he requires.

Senator Phillips also made some interesting points in his very fine representation on behalf of his beautiful Province of Prince Edward Island. But while his views were mainly concerned with his own province, he did suggest that the bill gives a blank cheque—and I think that was the expression he used—to the minister and the department to do all kinds of things without parliamentary approval or control.

I am not actually sure of my ground on this point, but when I first looked at the bill I found that section 8 on page 3 is the section that covers the particular questions he had in mind. Subsection (1) of section 8 says:

> All expenditures for the purposes of this Act shall be paid out of money appropriated by Parliament therefor.

Then subsection (2) of section 8 says:

> No agreement entered into pursuant to subsection (2), (3) or (5) of section 3 providing for the payment of any money by the Minister has any force or effect until such time as money has been appropriated by Parliament for the purpose of discharging any commitment under that agreement.

My non-legal and uninformed conclusion from reading section 8 was that the items would have to be submitted through the Estimates to be approved by Parliament before the minister could spend any money. In so far as the Minister of Fisheries might in effect have a blank cheque on Parliament, I do not think that is something we would have to be unduly concerned about.

I hope that other members of the committee will in the meantime think about the subject of fisheries, and perhaps suggest some questions for those of us who are rather closer to the industry than they may be, so that as a result of those questions we may have a complete and full exposure of the intentions of the minister and the department under this act, and thereby satisfy ourselves that the lot of fishermen and their families who have long been connected with what has long been a low-income industry will no longer have to remain in that category. Thank you.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Honourable senators, it was my original intention that this bill be sent to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. Then it was suggested to me that another committee might be more appropriate. I have not, however, had an opportunity to discuss the matter with the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, but on review it now seems that the agenda for that committee has been prepared very far ahead, and therefore I cannot see any alternative except to add the butterflies and the fish to the work already before the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. I therefore move that it be referred to that committee.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved the second reading of Bill C-150, to amend the Research Council Act.

He said: Honourable senators, as the title implies, this is a bill to amend the Research Council Act, and should be taken in conjunction with the bill which I had the honour to explain to this house last week, to set up the Science Council of Canada. As honourable senators will recall, that bill is designed to provide a body which will have the duty of advising the Government generally on matters of scientific policy. At that time I referred to the National Research Council, and it so happens that the Research Council Act itself provides for the carrying out of the function of advising the cabinet on matters of science and technology. Therefore, the setting up of the Science Council of Canada involves a change in the act setting up the National Research Council, and that is the principal object of the bill before us.

As honourable senators are aware, the National Research Council has not carried out the function of advising the Government on general matters of scientific policy. What it has done, and done very successfully, has been to take charge of scientific and industrial research in Canada, to carry on major operations in research, and also to encourage and give grants to universities for the same purposes. Those are functions which the National Research Council will still continue to fulfil. And that is the reason for the proposed amendment to section 7 of the act by clause 6 of the present bill. The new section simply states for the future that:

> The Council has charge of all matters affecting scientific and industrial research in Canada that may be assigned to it by the Committee.

It makes no reference to the power of advising the Government on matters of scientific research to the National Research Council, as contained in the present act. That change is the principal object of this bill.

However, as so often happens, when a department comes to revise for some specific purpose an act which has been in force for a number of years, it always finds a lot of other amendments which it would like to have put in, amendments which have arisen as a result of circumstances or the operation of the act over the years. That has been the case with the Research Council Act.

In addition to this section to which I have specifically referred, the bill contains a number of other sections dealing with amendments and revisions. One of them will, I think, appeal to this house.

I did not know until I read this bill that the National Research Council, which everyone knows about under that name, has in its original act another title. It is called The Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research, which in itself is quite a mouthful, and by which name this organization has never been known. It is now known generally throughout the country as the National Research Council. One or two of the sections of the present bill propose to confine its name to that of the National Research Council, by which, as I say, it is now generally known throughout the country, and to add the words "of Canada". So from now on the organization will be known as the National Research Council of Canada. That involves two or three consequential amendments to various sections of the present act, into which I do not need to go in any detail.

There are various other amendments. I do not propose to go into all of them; they can be adequately discussed and explained in committee. However, there are one or two which may be of some interest.

There is the additional power to be given to the Council by clause 9 to acquire money or securities by gift, bequest or otherwise, and to expend these moneys subject to the terms upon which such money has been given. I find the explanation of that somewhat interesting. Under the present act the Council has authority only to expend money received through the conduct of its operations by bequest, donation or otherwise. The Council already has had to refuse gifts from donors who wished to create trusts for scientific work because there was no authority to administer such trusts. The proposed change makes it clear that the Council has the power to accept gifts or bequests of property and deal with such property, subject to the terms on which it is given.

There is another subject which seemed to me to be rather interesting. That is the authority at the end of clause 9 of the bill, to establish, operate and maintain a national science library. In that connection, I am told that there has been a long-term understanding between the National Library of Canada and the library of the National Research Council, that the Council's library would accumulate scientific literature on a national basis and avoid duplication in the National Library. That is the reason for this particular clause.

There are various other minor changes, as I say, with which I do not think at this juncture I need labour the house, but which can and will, I am sure, be satisfactorily explained in committee.

As honourable senators may perhaps recall in connection with the Science Council bill, I suggested that that be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance because there were certain financial implications in it, and also for the purpose of lightening the burden of our beast of all work, the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

If the Senate should see fit to give second reading to this bill, seeing the connection between the two bills, I think it would be appropriate for me to move that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, Bill C-150, to amend the Research Council Act, is necessary legislation after the passage of the act establishing a Science Council of Canada. It is not a controversial bill, and consequently it received unanimous approval in the other chamber. The explanations given in the other house and the lucid presentation of the bill given in this House by Senator Hugessen, together with the excellent debate in the Senate last week on the Science Council of Canada, have convinced me that whatever I would have to say would merely be belabouring the essential features of the bill. Hence my remarks will be short.

It can be argued that a science council should have been established many years ago and that as a result of this delay Canada has not kept pace with new developments in the rapidly changing modern society in this era of technology, automation and conquest of space. However, we should be happy that provision has now been made for the functioning of this most important body, and that the efforts of our Government will be directed towards furthering a general science policy to exploit efficiently both our natural and human resources for the betterment of the life of our people and our position among the leading nations of the world. Because of the tremendous impact of science upon all aspects of society, the next logical step in the near future would be the formation of a Ministry of Science, as has already been suggested by Senator Grattan O'Leary.

This year marks the fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of the National Research Council. We are indeed proud of the excellent scientific work that has been accomplished by our dedicated scientists. It was these men who were responsible for the report on government science that was presented over two years ago by their president, Dr. C. J. Mackenzie, whose recommendations finally resulted in the establishment of the Science Council of Canada. We hope that the debate on the two bills in both houses of Parliament and their unanimous enactment will be regarded as wholehearted appreciation of and a tribute to the outstanding service these men and women of science have contributed to the welfare of our Canadian nation. With faith and confidence in their dedication and work, we look forward to a more promising future benefiting not only Canadians but all mankind.

It would take a long account to outline the valuable achievements of the National Research Council. From my own connection with the N.R.C., I can give an example of the high quality of its research projects. After I had returned from the Canadian Army in 1945, immediately after the last war, I was hired by Dr. T. K. Pavlychenko, head of the Department of Ecology at the University of Saskatchewan, to be his assistant in his researches on weed control, which were financed by the N.R.C. My task consisted of helping to spray crops of grain in several parts of the province and a variety of weed patches with various concentrations of chemicals, such as Sinox, 2-4D and others, and recording the effects of these herbicides on weeds, grains, garden vegetables, shrubs and trees. From these experiments, effective herbicides, such as 2-4D, were developed, which destroyed weeds and saved the crops. During the six months of my employment, I met top scientists from many countries of the world, including the Soviet Union, who had come to observe the work of Dr. Pavlychenko, whom they regarded as an outstanding scientist in the world. His discoveries have been a great boon to farmers, agriculturists and urban dwellers maintaining lawns, not only in Canada but throughout the world.

Under the direction of the new Science Council of Canada, it is expected that the National Research Council will make much greater strides in carrying out and promoting basic research for the Government, as well as giving increased aid to universities to establish and maintain laboratories and scientific facilities. A much more elaborate program will have to be worked out with private industry in order to improve its competitive position in our own country and the world. By providing more research facilities for scientists, the N.R.C. will help to keep our university graduates in Canada and thus stem the tide of the brain drain.

We have rich, untapped natural resources and we have rich human resources. Conscious of the fine record of the N.R.C. in the past, we are confident that with increased government financial contributions and direction the N.R.C. will harness both the natural and human resources to help solve many of our complex problems that face science and technology.

I hope and expect the Senate will give unanimous approval to the bill before it.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I make one suggestion in connection with this bill? If the bill is sent to a committee, would the chairman inform the National Research Council that we would be very pleased to receive from it a condensed report of its activities, so that its accomplishments may be made part of the record of this house.

I admit that my own knowledge is very deficient and incomplete, but I have heard of some of the work done by this Council. For instance, it has developed a method of sterilizing canned goods. I do not know whether it can be applied to fish, but it can to many other commodities. The old method of preserving fruit, for instance, required that the product be boiled and put in a jar so hot that the container became filled with steam, and in consequence of the heat some of the qualities of the fruit were destroyed. The Council has developed a method of radiation which pierces the can and sterilizes the contents in a cool condition, giving them greater lasting qualities. Perhaps the biggest accomplishment in respect of this particular piece of experimentation is the destruction of the eyes or buds or sprouts on potatoes when they are passed in front of this radiation machine, making the potatoes more fit for storage and lasting a much longer time than has been the case in the past.

I am told that we have sold two or three of these machines, one to the State of Texas, for $1 million.

If I am at all correct in this information, an authoritative statement on what has been accomplished by the Council would be exceedingly interesting to the members of this chamber and to the public at large. I am not endeavouring to give a comprehensive statement of the achievements of the National Research Council, but merely an illustration. I suggest that the chairman of the committee notify the Council that the members of the committee and of the Senate would welcome such a statement.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I undertake to do that on behalf of the chairman of the committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 4, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck for the second reading of Bill S-19, to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn, P.C.: Honourable senators, until now, no French-speaking, Roman Catholic, Quebec resident senator, has taken part in the debate. Considering that this silence, or this non-intervention, could be considered as contempt, indifference or even hostility towards the sponsor of the bill and those who supported him, I believe it was necessary for our group to express its opinion. Let there be no misunderstanding. I take part in the debate at this stage of the proceedings neither to support the bill, nor to object to it. I must say that so far I do not have a definite opinion. I know that later, before inviting the house to express its opinion on the principle, on second reading, it will be moved that the bill be not read now but instead that its subject matter—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): For the second time only.

[Text]

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I would like to be bilingual, and I am trying to improve my capability in that respect by study. In the meantime, however, I have to make use of the simultaneous interpretation system, but I am having no success with it at the moment.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I cannot hear the English translation at all.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Perhaps the interpreter is not on hand.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I shall send for the interpreter.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Perhaps I could do the job from here.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If there is no interpreter, honourable senators, I am prepared to change to the English language.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: I would not want my colleague to defer his speech. I think a number of us are able to understand partially well. However, I think the equipment should be working. I can understand.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Well, I can't.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: The principle still remains, that there is no reason why the interpreter should not be on hand.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Right.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It is equally true that any honourable senator may speak in either language at any time. It is a convenience—a necessity for the interpreter to be here.

However, if there is some difficulty about that, perhaps we could just wait for a moment.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford): I am pleased that the bilingual Hansard reporter is here.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): He is always here.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: As I was saying, I do not want to be misunderstood. I do not at this stage intend to support the bill because I have no definite opinion yet on the matter.

However, I am happy that eventually, before the bill is submitted to this house for second reading, it will be moved that the bill or its subject matter be referred to a special joint committee on divorce. In my opinion, that is where a better judgment can be made, especially by those who, traditionally, because of their religious convictions, are against divorce—if a new outlook is possible, if there has been some progress in the Catholic outlook or even in the Quebec outlook.

For the time being, I want to make some remarks about that bill and as a background to them, I intend to quote from an editorial published in Le Devoir March 9 last and signed by Mr. Claude Ryan, one of our most competent editorial writers in Canada, and certainly in the province of Quebec.

Here is the first extract I want to quote:

> In societies where a strong religious homogeneity prevails, more often than not the religious conception of marriage pervades the laws passed by the legislator about the civil aspects of marriage. Strongly Catholic societies are opposed to divorce in general.

Everyone knows what the situation is in Canada at the judicial level. The federal Parliament, which is solely responsible in the matter of divorce, has rarely used its power. Adultery is the only ground for divorce today. In all the provinces, except Quebec and Newfoundland, the legislatures have authorized some provincial courts to grant divorce on grounds of adultery, except in New Brunswick where, occasionally, extreme cruelty is accepted.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I would say that is in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It is in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I stand corrected, it is rather in Nova Scotia.

As for the two provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland, the legislatures have not empowered the provincial courts to hear divorce cases so that Parliament, and, for the last few years, the Senate almost exclusively, has been responsible to this task. Such is the situation.

But precisely because we in Quebec are largely homogeneous as far as religion is concerned, there has always been opposition to any attempt the federal Government might have made to foist divorce laws upon Quebec. On the other hand, looking at the situation from the point of view of the whole country, outside Quebec, there is no such religious homogeneity but a multi-denominational society. On a Canada-wide basis, the religious homogeneity of Quebec is not reflected in a majority, but in a minority.

Having made this point and given this description, I should now like to quote a second excerpt from the editorial by Mr. Ryan. I quote:

> Feasible and most useful in thoroughly homogeneous groups, a perfect accord of the citizens' religious convictions and civil laws becomes gradually more difficult in a modern, multi-denominational population. Catholics, for instance, are perfectly justified in demanding that marriage laws of the State do not require them as catholics to act in any way contrary to their religious beliefs. Are > they, for all that, entitled to demand that their views on marriage, or, if it is preferred, the only catholic views be imposed on all, including the citizens who hold moral and religious tenets different from their own?

> In such a country as ours, an increasing number of public figures feel that the time has come to reconsider attentively our divorce laws, the sale of birth control devices, abortion etc.

And further on:

> There is obviously no ground to jump inconsiderately to a decision to simply foresake the legislation which has largely contributed to build up in this country a healthy and deeply moral population. Nor is there any question of being steam-rollered into adopting any legislation so as to satisfy the latest hot-headed fanatic with a high opinion of himself.

I do not know to whom he is referring.

> A sound middle course should be sought to express truly the consensus of modern Canadians, to enable everyone to live according to his creed without forcing it on others and also to ensure the minimum moral stability and social balance without which the very survival of our population would be jeopardized.
> Weak laws promote lawlessness. Overly severe laws promote hypocrisy.

I should now like to make three or four comments pertaining to the bill.

Bill S-19 does not deal with the principle of divorce. It suggests additional grounds, such as desertion and intractable insanity besides adultery which, in practice, is the sole ground recognized for divorce. Therefore, here is the reasoning behind the bill: if you recognize adultery as ground for divorce, should you not also recognize desertion for a period of five years, or unsoundness of mind? I think that is the crux of the matter. Put in such a way, it is difficult to say no. One is inclined to recognize the logic of such an assertion.

On the other hand, as pointed out by the sponsor, the bill would not apply to either Quebec or Newfoundland. The intention is no doubt sincere. But, I wonder if it is a good thing to maintain this special status, and even stress it further in the case of Quebec and Newfoundland. I think this matter should be discussed by the joint committee.

The federal Parliament has been given authority in divorce matters because Canada as a whole constitutes a society with many religious beliefs. But why should Quebec and Newfoundland be isolated in this regard? I think that it would be a difficult principle to accept.

I should like to make another comment and say that the bill does not deal with the problem of courts having jurisdiction to grant divorce. The bill recognizes the existing situation and provides that courts so authorized by provincial governments will be able to grant divorces on grounds of desertion and incurable lunacy. There again, the bill—I do not criticize the sponsor, for I know his good intentions—thus maintains this particular situation in Quebec and in Newfoundland. Considering our experience in the Senate for many years and in view of the present situation which is becoming increasingly difficult to accept, I ask whether it is not time that the Senate cease to be a divorce court for the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland? Personally, I find this system absolutely abnormal.

I would like to see the joint committee examine the possibility of this Parliament authorizing a court for all the Canadian provinces, for the whole of Canada, so that all divorce cases receive equal treatment.

As I said, these are some thoughts which came to me regarding this bill and this problem which is becoming increasingly important in Canada. Undoubtedly, public opinion in Quebec is not as interested in this matter as elsewhere, but I think that the few passages which I quoted from the editorial by Claude Ryan show a marked evolution in the last few years.

Nobody is satisfied with the present situation. I am confident that the special joint committee will be able to shed light on the problem and perhaps soon find acceptable and valid solutions.

[Text]

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have listened with interest to the speech just delivered by the honourable gentleman. I take the opportunity to translate his suggestion—that we should have one court for Canada to deal with divorces. I hope that translation is satisfactory to him.

At the present time we have a proposal to enlarge the causes of divorce and to allow Parliament to give divorces in the case of desertion and mental deficiency. I will say nothing about that. I cannot understand the suggestion that a joint committee should study these questions of divorce in order to make a recommendation about this bill. To be realists, we must make the point and see where we are with regard to divorce legislation.

The legislation governing the granting of divorces in Canada is the most absurd thing on earth. The House of Commons has got rid of it and has left to the Senate the burden of passing resolutions with regard to divorce.

How does it happen? A divorce case is submitted to one of the Divorce Commissioners in the West Block. Mark you, they are the only judges who are part of the staff of the Senate. They are Senate civil servants; they have the designation of judges and the salary of judges. They hear witnesses, they make reports to the Divorce Committee, and then the Divorce Committee presents resolutions here.

Since the beginning of the present session, 572 such resolutions have been approved by the Senate. I will take each one of the resolutions which are printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of Friday last. Those cases have been heard by one of the so-called judges who sit in the West Block. I have nothing to say in their favour or against them. I do not know what happens there. Very few members of the Senate know what happens in any one of those cases. We have to vote blindly and approve.

The judge makes a report to the Divorce Committee. Then the evidence is distributed amongst the members of the committee. Some have five, then, twenty files to read, with the report of the chairman that they are all right.

I do not criticize the members of the committee. They act according to the law. They sit in committee and receive the reports from the judges. The judges recommend or do not recommend a divorce. The members read the file, they read the stenographic evidence. All members of the committee do not read the whole evidence of all the cases. It is divided. Some members have so many cases they must be bored to death in reading them. Other members have other files. They read them and report to the chairman. Then after having perused that literature, the chairman comes here and moves that such and such resolutions be adopted at the next sitting or some future date. Then we have something formal which means absolutely nothing. The name of the person concerned is here. I will read one for you. I find it pitiful, but it is the law.

I will go to the middle of the report to be found in the Minutes of Proceedings of the last sitting. It says:

> The Standing Committee on Divorce makes its five hundred and eighth report, as follows:
> 1. The committee refers to the Senate herewith the Report of the Commissioner relating to the petition of Alison Stella... of the town of...in the Province of Quebec, for a Resolution of the Senate dissolving her marriage to....
> 2. The committee concurs in the recommendation of the Commissioner.
> 3. The committee recommends adoption by the Senate of a Resolution dissolving the said marriage.
> All which is respectfully submitted.
> A. W. Roebuck, Q.C.,
> Chairman.

I do not give the family names or the name of the town concerned, but this is found at page 459 of the Minutes of Proceedings. But what do you know about it?

I shall read another one. They are like Chinamen, they are all alike. It reads:

> Tuesday, March 29, 1966.
> The Standing Committee on Divorce makes its five hundred and ninth report, as follows:
> 1. The committee refers to the Senate herewith the Report of the Commissioner relating to the petition of Joseph Andre. . . ,

—I do not mention the family name—> —of the city of . . . , in the Province of Quebec, for a Resolution of the Senate dissolving her marriage to . . . .

> 2. The committee concurs in the recommendation of the Commissioner.
> 3. The committee recommends adoption by the Senate of a Resolution dissolving the said marriage.
> All which is respectfully submitted.
> A. W. Roebuck, Q.C.,
> Chairman.

Do you want me to read more than this? I want to ask you what you know about it. You will approve a resolution and everything will pass just like a picture which is shown too fast on a screen. You will know nothing of the case, but still you will pass it, and the good order of the state is safeguarded and the Senate has done its duty in fulfilling the provisions of the British North America Act, which gives the Parliament of Canada full authority in matters of marriage and divorce. What do you think of that?

Now, I could mention the name there and then ask you or ask the members of the Divorce Committee what is this case about? What happened in this case? Were the commissioners right or not? What about other cases? What about No. 1, 2, 3 or 4 in this book? I could ask all these questions, but no one would be able to answer them. I could illustrate what I say by mentioning names and by asking what happened in the cases involving these names. And, if you have not read the file, you will not be able to answer. All the members of the committee do not know what happens to every file submitted to the committee on which they sit. They take the word of the chairman. I have no objection to taking his word, but I am not to ask questions of him about each case that is listed in this Order Paper. Who would do that?

It is submitted to us and I know everything must be done in good faith; everything must be done in accordance with the law, against which I protest, in accordance with the law that came at the last minute before prorogation, so late in fact that the leader at the time, the Honourable Ross Macdonald, for whom I have the greatest respect, refused to let it pass because he felt it was a last-minute amendment. At the time a former Minister of Justice was hidden behind the curtains of the House of Commons when the bill was sponsored by a cabinet minister who was not a lawyer. Last time it was sponsored by the then Minister of Justice himself, but it was not a credit to him. If we want to get into divorce matters, if we have that ambition, what we have to do is to have the judges fulfil their task and continue to hear the cases and give judgments. They must cease to be civil servants or officials of the Senate; they can be placed under jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada. This would meet the suggestion made by the previous speaker, and then what we should do would not be, in the first place, to enlarge the grounds for divorce but to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court. One day the honourable gentleman who is Chairman of the Divorce Committee expressed himself clearly about this, and he seemed to be fed up with this mockery of legislation.

We are here to legislate and to study each bill that comes before us, to give it three readings, just the same as is done in the House of Commons, and to do whatever committee work is necessary, but I do not see why the Senate should adopt resolutions confirming the report of the Commissioners or the Judges to the Divorce Committee when we do not know a word about these resolutions. It is repugnant to the human intelligence to pass legislation like that. It is not in the language of the law. It gives no importance to the Senate.

One day I saw the Dean of the Faculty of Law of one of our Canadian universities coming here with a group of students to have some explanation of the divorce proceedings here. I could have informed him very well—I was too modest for that—but if he had come to me I would have said to him exactly what I tell you. I wonder how legislators of your standing continue to pass on such legislation without protesting against the law that exists. This is not a reflection on the judges or on the members of the committee; it is not a reflection on the Senate itself, but we must expect some kind of reform. We should act in accordance with what has been recommended by the previous speaker, so that we would have a law that applies to the whole country and which would be applied by qualified judges without interfering with the daily routine of our business in the Senate.

I am very tolerant. I have waited two or three years to tell you this, but the time has come when things should be changed. The change suggested would be superficial, and would change nothing of the actual conditions except to enlarge them. We would simply have more complaints from people whose consorts are mentally deficient, or whose husbands or wives have deserted the home. How could we deal with it? At the present time there are so many cases that it is almost impossible to understand what is going on. What will be the situation when there are two more grounds for divorce?

Judges can deal with the situation. It is very easy to increase the number of judges, if necessary. The judges are there and it is for them to decide; it is not for us to decide. It is a mixture of judicial legislation and judicial power.

Honourable senators, if a judge rendered a decision without knowing what had happened in the case, what would be the result? We know nothing about it, and yet we make a decision.

I understand that the members of the Divorce Committee have made great sacrifices. I know they have been in earnest, and I know that they have done painstaking work to try to come to a satisfactory solution, but what we have now is not a solution at all. It is an archaic disorder of the law, and it is a mockery to see the Senate adopting resolutions with blind eyes. It is pitiful. I hope that we will come to some understanding before the committee has finished its study, and that the whole matter will be given to judges who will have authority in these matters. If their judgments are faulty in any manner there can be an appeal, and I would have no objection to facilitating the procedure with regard to appeals.

There is something else that from the start has not been considered by the members of the Divorce Committee. It was mentioned to us by one of our colleagues some months ago, at the beginning of the session. It is that according to the Constitution, marriage and divorce are matters that belong exclusively to the Parliament of Canada. You know that; I have not to dot the "i's" and cross the "t's". There is something else. It is that in the following section, section 92, there is provision to the effect that the ceremony of marriage comes under provincial jurisdiction. When the Constitution of Canada, the B.N.A. Act, was adopted, the Civil Code of Quebec had been in force for eleven months, and the legislators, Cartier, Macdonald and the others, knew what the provisions of the Code were. Dorion knew that, and he was the leader of the Liberal Party. The others were the leaders of the Conservative Party, but they were all good lawyers and knew about it. They decided that the only matter that came under provincial jurisdiction was the ceremony.

Take the case of a couple appearing before a judge on a complaint. Perhaps the wife whose husband has committed adultery—he has also deserted her, but the complaint is for the adultery—has three, four, five or six young children. How many women have appeared before the Divorce Committee since Confederation, women with young children? Did the committee decide anything about the children? They said they could do nothing about them because it is a matter of civil law. It is true that it is in the Civil Code, but do not forget that that part of the Code, marriage, is under federal jurisdiction. Therefore, the Divorce Committee has no excuse whatever not to provide the children with some assistance in virtue of the law, because the whole part of the Civil Code—and I will not discuss what happens in other provinces —which concerns the family and the care of the children comes under federal jurisdiction. The exception does not apply to it, and therefore the Divorce Committee has had full authority to decide what the delinquent husband should have done with regard to the care of the children. That has never been considered, under the pretense that it was civil law. It is civil law, but it is civil law under federal jurisdiction, and Parliament has been lacking in that respect ever since Confederation.

How many women have had so much trouble with regard to the care of their children just because that part of the law has been ignored by the Divorce Committee since Confederation? I understand that the members were acting in good faith, but they were in error just the same. It is a serious matter, and shows how vast is the question of divorce. We must be very careful and consider the whole question of divorce, not only from the point of view of those whose consort is deficient in mind or has deserted, but from the point of view of separation, separation with a certain degree of security for the party who lodges the complaint. I may surprise you with that, and when one of our colleagues spoke about it one afternoon in the winter, I remember very well some members were surprised. They did not pay much attention to what was said, but it is a very serious matter and if you want to study it you have only to look at the Constitution, and you will see it in black and white. I do not blame anyone. We must take things as they are, and here in the City of Ottawa it is the land of the accomplished fact. But it is not enough. We must be careful of what will happen in the future, and as there will be a joint committee of both houses to study the divorce question, they do not stop at the study of desertion and mental deficiency of the consorts. Do I make myself clear enough?

There are pages and pages of reports and resolutions; they are all the same. We know nothing about them. Very often I have been tolerant. I consider I am still tolerant, but I have deep convictions and I do not think as much of the litigants in divorce as I do of their children who have been deprived of their own rights because the law of this country has been—I will use my term—forgotten.

You will say that the provisions of the B.N.A. Act are obsolete, and they may be obsolete. At the present time we all speak of the new way, but no one can declare seriously that we are not bound by the B.N.A. Act to conform ourselves to the very clear enactments we find there. At the present time there is a great agility exhibited by some lawmakers to jump over the fence and pay no attention to the restrictions of the B.N.A. Act, but until they are amended they are in force, and as long as they are in force there is no excuse for the Divorce Committee not protecting the children in the case of divorce—not only the children of the guilty party, but the children who are issue of the marriage when the consort asks for a divorce.

I try to be just as calm and tolerant as one could be, but I have a great deal of anxiety and worry about it. I know that the members of the Divorce Committee are all good fellows. They are friendly, and they do their best to make people happy. But the family is the cornerstone of the country and when there is a divorce the home and the family is broken, and the country suffers. I ask all honourable senators to think of that.

I do not expect to be a member of the committee, but I can tell you now that I find it shocking that all of us have to pass resolutions on what I can only call hearsay. We have nothing before us but the word of the chairman (Hon. Mr. R Roebuck) which, of course, I take, but to my mind that is not satisfactory at all. It is not satisfactory either to the members of the committee, some of whom are no better informed than any other honourable senator, because they have not read the evidence. That being that, I leave it to your consideration.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Croll, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

LAURIER LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Jacques Flynn moved the second reading of Bill S-27, to incorporate Laurier Life Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall not detain you for very long. This bill seeks to incorporate an insurance company under the name of Laurier Life Insurance Company and, in French, Compagnie d'Assurance-Vie Laurier. The bill is in the classical form, and I will refer the house only to clause 8 which gives the company the right to acquire by agreement the whole or any part of the rights and property, and to assume the obligations and liabilities, of Laurier Life Insurance Company, incorporated October 6, 1965, under and pursuant to The Corporations Act, Chapter 71 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1960.

The Laurier Life Insurance Company, which was incorporated under the laws of Ontario, has an authorized capital of $5 million divided into 50,000 shares with a par value of $100 each, of which 10,000 shares have been allotted and issued as fully paid and non-assessable shares. These shares were issued at a premium of 100 per cent, thereby giving the company a paid-in capital of 1 million, and a contributed surplus of $1 million, being the excess of the issue price over the par value of such shares. Mr. E. E. Brooker, now the President of Laurier Life Insurance Company, and formerly the executive officer in charge of the group department of Global Life Insurance Company, conceived the company and learned, after negotiations with officers of Global Life Insurance Company, that it was possible to acquire the group portfolio of that company, which at that time represented over $80 million worth of insurance in force with an annual premium income of over $1,300,000. The bulk of insurance in force was situated in Ontario with some in the Province of Quebec.

As a result of discussions between the company and the Department of Insurance of Ontario and the federal Department of Insurance, it was agreed that Laurier Life be incorporated and licensed by Ontario, and registered in Ottawa under Part IX of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act to carry on business in Ontario.

After Laurier Life was so licensed and registered it acquired the group portfolio of Global Life out of its contributed surplus, but because of the licensing and registration conditions, although it was allowed to reinsure the insurance in force in the Province of Quebec, it has not been able to sell insurance anywhere other than in the Province of Ontario. This means that although the company services business in Quebec under the terms of the reinsurance treaty with Global Life, and maintains an office in that province, it cannot sell new policies in Quebec. Hence the necessity of incorporation under federal laws. In addition, the company wishes to carry on business in other provinces as well as Ontario and Quebec.

I do not need to mention the petitioners. If the bill receives second reading I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Flynn, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 30, consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Finance with respect to the expenditures set out in the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1966.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I shall be very brief. I wanted to indicate to the Senate the value of committee work. In the course of the investigation made by the Standing Committee on Finance some matters that I thought were very important came to my attention.

The Standing Committee on Finance had been carefully studying what the Senate had given it as its task, and much of the credit for that is due, of course, to the chairman. I was disturbed by some of the evidence that was given before the committee. I was disturbed on the day I heard it, but I did not bring it up at that time because I had a very much harsher speech to make on that day. Since then I have cooled off a little, but nevertheless I feel the matter should not be left without some observations being made in regard to it.

The part of the evidence that bothered me was that dealing with the municipal winter works program, in respect of which the federal Government pays 50 per cent of the labour cost. The purpose of the municipal winter works program is the alleviation of unemployment that exists in various parts of Canada, particularly in the winter months. The program has been working out very unevenly and very unfairly.

The Province of Quebec, as is its right, made extensive use of the program. The Province of Ontario made less use of it. Some of the western provinces made some use of it, but the maritimes did not use it at all, or, if they did, it was to a very small extent.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Honourable senators, may I interrupt for a moment. There was one point that was not made. I wonder if the honourable senator is aware that the Province of Nova Scotia has its own winter works program, which is separate and apart from the joint federal-provincial program, and in which they promote current and not capital expenditures.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Well, I find it hard to understand how a province—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Municipalities were given a choice, and they chose the provincial program.

Hon. Mr. Croll: What choice is there when the dominion Government is paying 50 per cent of the labour cost under its program as against the total cost being borne by the province under the other? I see no choice there at all. It just does not make sense to me. This is the point I am making.

The Province of Quebec added a subsidy of 40 per cent to the contribution that the dominion Government made, and in designated areas it added another subsidy of 10 per cent, which meant that the municipality received 100 per cent of the labour cost of a particular program.

The Province of Ontario added a broad 25 per cent, and in some instances in a designated area added another 10 per cent, which made 85 per cent of the cost.

Manitoba added 25 per cent, and, in cases where persons were taken off relief, added another 25 per cent, making a total of 50 per cent.

Saskatchewan added 25 per cent across the board. Alberta did the same. British Columbia, like Manitoba, added 25 per cent, and where it applied to people who were taken off relief, paid 50 per cent. Prince Edward Island, I understand, contributed 30 per cent. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland paid no subsidy at all.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I believe that is correct, but I think it should be pointed out that where the Province of Quebec paid 40 per cent, it was a rich province that could afford to do so. New Brunswick and Nova Scotia—

Hon. Mr. Croll: Let me make my point. I am here to make a case for the Maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It is a little late to bring the matter up now.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I did not intend to go on. I need not have spoken today. New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland paid no subsidy at all.

The Province of Quebec in 1964-65 received $25 million from the federal Government towards the winter works program. Ontario during the same period received $6 million, and the Atlantic provinces less than $1 million—$995,000, to be more precise.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: That is where it is needed most.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes, of course. My point is that the program works well in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. They can afford to participate, but the Maritime provinces cannot afford the ante to come into this program.

Now, this business of talking about "matching grants" is nonsense. Here are provinces that cannot afford to participate and consequently are not receiving any benefit, yet at the same time unemployment in the Maritime provinces is double that of the rest of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): In percentage.

Hon. Mr. Croll: In percentage. However, the reason for my rising is that a Department of manpower will probably be established within a few days, and it is time that this matter was brought to their attention as forcibly as possible, not only by me, but by others to make sure there is an alternative way of passing on these goodies to that part of the country that can use them.

When I ask people from the Maritimes what the reason is for this they say, "Well, it was being pushed, for instance, in New Brunswick, but was not being pushed in other parts of the Maritimes." But that is not borne out at all. It is not a matter of selling the program. The provinces just cannot afford to participate, and the Government must find some other method of passing out money for purposes of alleviating unemployment; otherwise, we shall continue to do what we have done for years, just perpetuate our poorness in various parts of our country. It seems to me that the time has come that we ought to be correcting our mistakes instead of making new ones all over again.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, when this matter was discussed at a sitting of the committee, the minister explained what happened with regard to winter works, particularly in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Naturally in every province of Canada there are unemployed who need some help during the winter months, and the kind of work that is being done in the designated areas is a great boon to the people who need help. However, there is an essential condition for a grant of money, and that is that an application should be made. If fewer applications were made in Ontario than in Quebec, no one can complain about it. It simply means that the Province of Quebec—the municipalities themselves—submitted a larger number of applications.

As one of our colleagues pointed out, in one of the eastern provinces it is the provincial government which does the most in that regard.

I am not criticizing a provincial government, but I know that the province has paid out a lot of money. However, there were so many cases of poverty in certain areas, especially where the settlers lived, that the number of applications was more numerous for the Province of Quebec than the Province of Ontario. There was no unfairness. If Ontario had made more applications they would have been granted, as well as those of Quebec. The same applies to all other provinces.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Leonard speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators, I rise only to move the adoption of the report and to thank those senators who spoke on the debate. Before the Easter recess, Senator Brooks, Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne), and Senator Pouliot spoke, and today, Senator Croll.

This now completes the proceedings of the committee on the reference to the 1965-66 Estimates. We are now engaged on the 1966-67 Estimates. The first meeting of the committee was held last week, and I expect that the next meeting will be Thursday of this week. May I say that I am grateful for the interest taken, and I hope that something may come of the suggestions of the committee in connection with the winter works program.

Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

Report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

DIVORCE (EXTENSION OF GROUNDS) BILL

SUBJECT MATTER REFERRED TO JOINT COMMITTEE ON DIVORCE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Roebuck, seconded by the Honourable Senator Croll, for second reading of Bill S-19, intituled: "An Act to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief".—(Honourable Senator Croll).

Hon. John J. Connolly moved in amendment:

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Roebuck, seconded by the honourable Senator Croll:

That Bill S-19, intituled "An Act to extend the grounds upon which courts now have jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief" be now read a second time.

In amendment, it is moved by the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), seconded by the honourable Senator Hugessen:

That the bill be not now read a second time, but the subject matter thereof be referred to the Special Joint Committee on Divorce.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, of course I thoroughly approve the amendment to my original motion. It is what I asked for in the course of my address when I brought the matter to the attention of this house. I asked that the Government, the Commons and ourselves, join in a joint committee for a thorough study of this matter.

Speaking to the amendment—and I hope that the lines of the rules will not be too closely drawn—I would like to make some general observations and in particular answer a number of questions that have been raised in the course of this long debate.

In the first place, let me express my thanks to all those who have taken part in this debate for the effort they have made to throw light upon our future path, for the thought they have given and the interest they have shown in this very important subject, and to those who have asked questions concerning the matter, for the concern they have manifested.

It has been a matter of great satisfaction to me that all those who have spoken have, I believe without exception, expressed approval of the effort that we are making to improve what is generally agreed among us is an unsatisfactory situation in a good many, if not all, respects. I do not mean that they approve in any way of the principle of divorce. That is not the principle of this bill. Were this bill to become law, it would affect only those jurisdictions which now have courts in operation enforcing certain rules with regard to divorce, and which have recognized this principle of divorce for a great many years.

The principle of this bill, as I see it, honourable senators, does not touch the question of divorce itself. The principle of the bill is the improvement of the administration of the law with respect to divorce. It is to remove certain abuses in the administration of the law and to make it more reasonable, more considerate and more honest. For the sympathy that has been expressed for the effort that we are making, I am grateful. I am also grateful for the approval that has been expressed in the press almost generally all over Canada. I am also grateful for the approval that has been expressed in many letters which I have received—and the correspondence has been fairly heavy—since this bill was introduced. There seems to be an overwhelming sentiment throughout Canada at the moment for what is the substance—with little exceptions here and there—of the bill which I have had the honour to introduce.

Honourable senators have no doubt noticed that the Anglican Synod met in London a short time ago and passed a resolution which I may say, without going into too much detail, in general approves the substance of this bill. And I have no doubt that all here have recognized what took place in the State of New York very recently. From time immemorial the State of New York has restricted its grounds of divorce to adultery only, and very recently that ancient and, I think, archaic restriction has been abolished and the State of New York has adopted, in many respects a more liberal, shall I call it, rule than would be the case were this bill of mine to be adopted.

I trust that those honourable senators who have spoken and asked questions will pardon me if I fail to respond to all the comments that have been made in the course of this fairly long debate. Of course my time is limited in reply by common sense, but some vital points have been raised which I think call for a somewhat comprehensive rejoinder on my part.

The first one I shall mention is not so insistent, but Senator Aseltine, having assured me that he would support this bill one hundred per cent, added that he thought the bill which he introduced in 1955 was a better bill than mine. Well, I am very ready to admit that that bill was well and skilfully drawn. I am not much interested in comparisons between these two bills, but I am interested in the reasons that Senator Aseltine advanced as to why his bill was better than mine, and I wrote down a list of some twelve matters which he mentioned in the course of his address. They were as follows: rape; sodomy; beastiality; death; judicial separation; avoidance by non-consummation; unsoundness of mind; alimony; venereal disease; pregnancy of the bride; domicile; certain procedural rules and regulations. He said that these were all mentioned and dealt with in his bill but were not to be found in mine.

Honourable senators, let me tell you why these matters are not to be found in my bill. To begin with, rape is adultery on the part of the aggressor—not, of course, on the part of the victim—and is considered as such by the courts and I am sure would be so considered by us. So it is not something we need to legislate on now; it is already covered.

Let us take next sodomy and beastiality. I suppose it is not generally known among us, but the fact is that both these matters are included in the grounds for divorce in the English law of 1870, and in consequence are within the jurisdiction of the Senate at the moment under the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriage Act, and they are within the jurisdiction of all the provincial courts which rely upon the English law of that day. So there is no need for us to touch that at all at the moment. They are very seldom used, but they are there.

The next is the right to declare a missing spouse to be dead. That is within provincial jurisdiction, and it is not at all necessary for us to consider it here. It is now dealt with, I think, in all the provinces. I know that in the Province of Ontario applications are frequently made for a declaration of the decease of a certain person, and those are dealt with by the courts under provincial legislation.

The next matter was that of judicial separation. That may be within federal jurisdiction, but I do not know. It has always been considered to be within provincial jurisdiction, and has been so dealt with by the Province of Quebec for many years. The Province of Ontario has avoided any rules with regard to judicial separation, and has relied on agreements of separation. I am not sure about the other provinces, but I am sure that practice and law and a proper understanding of the British North America Act would place the matter within provincial jurisdiction.

Voidance on the grounds of non-consummation is also within the law of England of 1870, and is a matter that has come before this body many times. It is already dealt with, by both the Senate Committee and also by the provincial courts which rely on the law of England, as most of them do.

Unsoundness of mind was differently expressed in my bill as compared with that of Senator Aseltine of 1955, but it is dealt with.

Venereal disease is horrible, but due to the advances made in medicine it is not now the incurable curse it was some years ago. It may be evidence of adultery on the part of the spouse accused. Should the committee to which the substance of this bill is referred consider that venereal should be included, then I would have no objection to its doing so, although I do not think we would have very many applications on that ground.

The next item was pregnancy on the part of the bride for which the groom was not responsible and which was unknown by the groom at the time of the marriage. I suppose a good deal could be said on both sides of the question as to whether divorce should be granted on such a ground. There are those who think that marriage cures the past and that the parties embark on a new course. If it can be shown that there is a substantial demand for the addition of this ground, then I would not have any serious objection to it. However, I do think that the bill goes far enough without taking in matters of that kind.

Alimony, in my opinion, is a matter ancillary to divorce. The words of the British North America Act are "marriage and divorce", which are placed within dominion jurisdiction. Alimony is ancillary to the granting of divorce. But, on the other hand, alimony has been taken care of by the provincial courts all over Canada ever since Confederation, and they have done a satisfactory job with respect to it. There would be various serious objections from the Province of Quebec and the other provinces if after all these years we intervened and took this matter into our own hands. Furthermore, let me say, we would be undertaking something for which we have no machinery. There are no sheriffs or sheriff's officers, or other such machinery of the courts, attached to the dominion Parliament. It is quite clear, and I feel sure that most honourable senators will agree, that we should leave that matter alone.

Then comes the question of domicile. Senator Aseltine had some very fine paragraphs in his bill with respect to it. It does seem to be most unfair that the general rule be that the domicile of the husband is the domicile of both the husband and wife, and certainly it is unfair that when a man deserts his wife her domicile should follow him like his shadow. This has been appreciated by the dominion Parliament, and in 1930 there was passed the Divorce Jurisdiction Act, which provided that when a woman has been deserted for two years, although the rule is that domicile follows the husband, she may nevertheless claim divorce from him in the courts in the province in which she still resides and in which she was deserted.

The Divorce Committee has always recognized the right of the woman, if she has been deserted for more than two years, to claim divorce in any of the provinces. There is objection taken now to the delay of two years, but if it is thought to be too unjust, and I can see some serious objections to it, the proper procedure is to amend that act. It should not be included in a bill such as that now before us.

Those are all the differences that have been mentioned between the bill of 1955 and this one of 1966. I am perfectly sure that were Senator Aseltine and I to sit down together to draw a bill there would be very little difference between us.

A good deal has been said in the course of this debate, and elsewhere for a long time, about the fabrication of evidence and collusion in cases before the courts. In my opening remarks I said that generally speaking, with some inconsequential exceptions, the one ground for divorce in all of Canada was adultery. I was taken severely to task by a critic whose name I need not mention. I was told I was wrong, that there were two grounds. I questioned this, and was told that in the first place there is adultery, and in the second place there is perjury.

I will not agree for one moment that perjury is a ground for divorce. I will concede, however, that it is a means sometimes used, very wrongly and fraudulently, to obtain a decree of divorce on the grounds that are recognized. But I ask you: Is not the frequency with which collusive and perjured cases come before our courts and before our own Commissioner very much exaggerated? It is so easy to throw out general charges of this kind.

It was said on the floor of this house that 50 per cent of the cases were collusive and were decided on perjured evidence. I intervened at the time to say that that percentage was much too high. Feeling that it was an unnecessary downgrading of our courts, I asked our Commissioner to make an investigation in order to separate the goats from the sheep.

It is perfectly obvious that when we find people living together in what has always been known as a common law relationship—although there is no common law about it; that is the phrase used—there is no suspicion of collusion or perjury when the facts showing how they are living together are laid before the court. When adultery is proven to have taken place on repeated occasions in the home of the respondent or the co-respondent, it is not a matter you would suspect of having been concocted. It is in these one-night stands in hotel and motels that suspicion is aroused. For that reason, I asked for an analysis of how many cases of that kind are or are not reasonably open to suspicion and this is what our Commissioner had to say:

> As requested by you I have made an analysis of the last 200 uncontested divorce petitions which I have recommended for approval, this being a sufficiently large number to provide a representative sample, with a view to determining how many of these would be based on evidence of one-night adultery in a motel or hotel and which could conceivably have been arranged by connivance between the parties.
> I classified the evidence into four categories as follows:
> Cases where there is a commonlaw relationship or evidence of continuing adulterly with the same co-respondent—134.
> Cases where adultery took place on one or more occasions with the same co-respondent either in respondent's own residence or in that of co-respondent—33.
> Cases where the adultery took place in a hotel or motel, the husband being the respondent—28.
> Cases where the adultery took place in a hotel or motel with the wife being the respondent—5.
> There figures proved surprising even to me, since it is apparent that in 67 per cent of all cases there is a commonlaw relationship or continuing adultery. In addition to this, although it would not of course be impossible for collusive adultery to take place at the residence of respondent or co-respondent, this is certainly less likely, and such adultery was proved in 33 cases or 16.5 per cent. Furthermore although there may always be some suspicion where the husband is respondent and the adultery proven is a one-night adultery in a hotel or motel, I think you will agree that it is much less likely to be collusive when the wife is respondent as it is unlikely that she would deliberately provide evidence of adultery against herself to enable her husband to get a divorce, so we can probably rule out these five cases. This leaves only 28 cases or 14 per cent of the total where there would appear to be a reasonable possibility that the evidence might be collusive.

This is not to say of course that I believe that the evidence was collusive in 28 cases out of 200, since had I been convinced of this in any of these cases I would not of course have made a favourable recommendation. In all these cases the evidence indicated the likelihood that the adultery was committed as alleged, and it is certainly not difficult to believe that a man who picks up a woman with intent to have sexual relations with her would take her to a hotel or motel rather than to his own residence or to her residence which might be impractical if not impossible in many cases. It would certainly be wrong to assume therefore that all evidence of adultery in a hotel or motel is fabricated.

To conclude, therefore, I would doubt whether there was any connivance in as many as 10 of the 200 cases, and even in these cases it could not be detected from the evidence. It would appear therefore that a maximum of 5 per cent of all petitions might involve connivance or collusion, which is a far cry from the 50 per cent figure which one sometimes hears mentioned.

One of the reasons for the introduction of this bill, of course, is to make the courts of the land more honest in this regard. However, I do not like to see a grossly exaggerated estimate that seems to downgrade our courts. I think it is worth while to assure my fellow senators that a reasonable view of what takes place is that not more than five per cent of all the cases presented are open to this suspicion.

Senator Choquette, on March 4 last, during the course of this debate raised a most important and somewhat difficult question. He asked whether the Commissioner's proceedings were not that of a court, and therefore whether this bill should not be amended if we wished to exclude the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland from its operation.

Section 2 of the bill reads:

> In any court having jurisdiction to grant divorce a vinculo matrimonii any husband or wife may commence an action praying that the marriage may be dissolved—

And so forth. My friend suggested that that might include the Commissioner's court, and therefore this chamber.

On that occasion, Senator Choquette said:

> I recall that a few years ago there was a case heard before the Senate Standing Committee on Divorce in which two private detectives were alleged to have committed perjury. Subsequently, they appeared before Magistrate Strike in the City Magistrate's Court, and he had no difficulty in finding them guilty of perjury. Then their solicitor appealed to the Court of Appeal of Ontario, and that court decided that these witnesses had not committed perjury in the sense that they had not been before a tribunal or properly constituted court; therefore, the appeal was allowed and the action dismissed.
> Then my friend, the sponsor of the bill now before us, decided to remedy that situation by introducing a bill, which was subsequently passed, to the effect that henceforth the Standing Committee on Divorce would be considered a court and a tribunal for every purpose.
> That bill of some 12 or 13 years ago, providing that thereafter the committee would be considered a court in which someone who gave false evidence could be found guilty of perjury, having been passed, I ask this question: Does the Senate committee—and the more so now that a judge of the Exchequer Court is appointed the Commissioner—hearing divorce actions constitute a court? If it does, then I say the phrase "in any court having jurisdiction" will include the Senate Divorce Committee and all petitions that are heard by the committee or by the Commissioner may invoke any of the new grounds proposed in this bill.
> If that is not so, then I suggest that this bill should be amended to read: In any provincial court having jurisdiction to grant divorce . . .
> In the light of the facts I have outlined, it would be most ambiguous to say "in any court".
> It is my opinion that the Senate Committee on Divorce has been constituted and recognized as a court for some 12 or 13 years, and that this bill would entitle people in the two provinces that are excluded to come to the Senate and ask for a divorce on these extended grounds. My question is, am I correct in so thinking? I hope I have made myself clear.

I replied that he had made himself very clear, but I reserved my right to consider it further. I said I thought he had raised a point.

Well, remember that it was 12 years ago and one's memory fades to some extent on details of this kind, but in the interval that has passed between the senator's question and this, on reviewing this matter and refreshing my memory, I find: first, that the detectives were not charged with perjury; and, second, that in the amendment to the Criminal Code which we made—at my suggestion—we did not make the Senate or the Senate Commissioner a court, or to use my friend's words, "a court and a tribunal for every purpose". Thirdly, we did not do that and, accordingly, the bill as drawn would not affect the Province of Quebec or the Province of Newfoundland.

And now, in view of the misunderstandings and perhaps the fogginess of memory, I think it is necessary that I make clear just what the situation is. What is the true character of our Commissioner and his proceedings and his status?

It is correct that on November 24, 1954, two private detectives were convicted in an Ottawa court, not of prejury, but rather of fabricating evidence. Let me be perfectly specific on this: Two private detectives were convicted as follows:

> With intent to mislead a court of justice did unlawfully attempt to fabricate evidence by means other than perjury or subornation of perjury.

The charge was laid in pursuance of section 117 of the Criminal Code, which reads as follows:

> Every one who, with intent to mislead, fabricates anything with intent that it shall be used as evidence in a judicial proceeding, existing or proposed, by any means other than perjury or incitement to perjury is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for fourteen years.

The accused appealed their conviction and the Ontario Court of Appeal quashed the conviction on the ground that the proceedings before the Senate, or a committee thereof, was not a court of justice within the meaning of the Criminal Code.

We proceeded to cure that matter, and I have the case here which I think is interesting. I refer to Regina vs. Pichette and Santerre, found in Canadian Criminal Cases, volume 3 of 1955 at page 403.

This is what the judge says with regard to our status, and it is important that we understand our real status.

Chief Justice Pickup:

> The appellants are two private detectives who appeal to this Court from their conviction on November 24, 1954, by His Worship Magistrate Strike at Ottawa. The charge was that the appellants, "with intent to mislead a court of justice, did unlawfully attempt to fabricate evidence by means other than perjury or subornation of perjury—
> The facts of the case may be simply stated. The appellants, desiring to obtain evidence for the purpose of enabling a married woman to secure a divorce, planned to trap the husband into a false position from which adultery might be inferred or found if evidence was later given in some proceeding for divorce. This plan was to have a woman go to a room in an hotel, register under an assumed name, and give the room the appearance of the bed having been occupied. She was not required to do anything more. The husband was to be lured by a pretext to the room and, when there, would be found by the two appellants, who would then be in a position to give evidence as to his being found there with the woman. In carrying out this plan, the appellants arranged with woman "A" to obtain the hotel room and perform her part of the plot, which she did. In the meantime, the appellants arranged with woman "B" to call the husband, under an assumed name, which was the name which woman "A" was to use at the hotel, and invite him to come to the room. This was done by woman "B", but the husband was suspicious. Woman "B" claimed to be a friend of the husband's sister, and the husband took the precaution of calling his sister as to the friend whose name he had been given over the telephone. Instead of going to the hotel room as invited the husband went to the police, with the result that the plan at that stage miscarried and it was the police who went to the hotel room, instead of the two appellants who were endeavouring to mislead someone.
> The first ground of appeal is that the Crown failed to prove the intent necessary to constitute the crime charged. It is > argued that it was necessary, under the charge as laid, to prove an intent to mislead a Court of justice, and that the intent proved in this case was not an intent to mislead a Court of justice but, at most, an intent to mislead the Divorce Committee of the Senate, and Parliament which might act upon a recommendation of the Divorce Committee...This ground of appeal, therefore, turns upon whether or not the Senate committee and Parliament are a "court of justice" within the meaning of s. 177. In my opinion, they are not. The expression "Court of Justice", in the sense in which it is used in this statute, in my opinion, should be given the meaning attributed to the word "court" in Murray's New English Dictionary, vol. II, p. 1091, column 1, under item 11, from which I quote the following: "An assembly of judges or other persons legally appointed and acting as a tribunal to hear and determine any cause, civil, ecclesiastical, military, or naval."

Senator Choquette was correct, that I initiated the amendments of the Canadian Criminal Code to correct that situation. Let me say what we did. In consequence of this decision, we amended the Interpretation Section, which affected section 117 of the Code to include the Senate and such parliamentary bodies in the prohibition against the fabrication of evidence.

Section 99 of the Criminal Code as amended, reads as follows:

> "judicial proceeding" means a proceeding (ii) before the Senate or House of Commons of Canada or a committee of the Senate or House of Commons, or before a legislative council, legislative assembly or house of assembly or a committee thereof that is authorized by law to administer an oath,

It is clear, therefore, that the Code as a result of Regina vs Pichette and Santerre did not constitute the Senate or its committees a court, nor the Commissioner or his proceeding's—which by the way, were not in existence or contemplation at that time. Nor does the dictionary do so.

The Oxford dictionary defines "court" as follows:

> An assembly of judges or other persons legally appointed and acting as a tribunal to hear and determine any cause, civil, ecclesiastical, military or naval.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Now that we have changed the system and we have our Commissioner who does not render a decision but only makes a recommendation, could anyone who takes an oath before him be brought up for perjury and convicted?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I will go through that a little more fully, because I think it is important to understand our own status.

When the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act was before our Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce on August 2, 1963, the Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. E. A. Driedger, said that the function of the Senate Commissioner when he is hearing evidence in support of divorce petitions and making recommendations to the Senate is legislative and not judicial in character. I have the report of the committee of that time, and this is what the Deputy Minister said:

> In the first place I tried to take particular care to frame this bill so that it would provide for a legislative dissolution rather than a judicial dissolution. One of the very important reasons for that was that if the proceedings are judicial, then they might well be subject to the prerogative writs such as mandamus. prohibition, certiorari and so on; but if the bill is framed purely as a legislative process then the internal machinery, the internal procedure, is of a legislative character and therefore will be outside the scope of prerogative writs. If we were to put in a clause to the effect that nothing in this bill shall be construed as altering or changing the jurisdiction of some courts, then we are half confessing that it really is a judicial procedure rather than a legislative procedure. By inserting such a clause the courts might say that this man is a judicial officer rather than a legislative officer, because such clause makes it clear that he is and therefore is subject to the prerogative writs.

Senator Power asked:

> Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what definition Mr. Driedger gives of legislative action as against judicial action.

This is Mr. Driedger's answer:

> My answer, Senator Power, would be this. If it is a judicial act you have preordained laws and the tribunal finds > the facts and applies those laws. In the case of a legislative act the tribunal makes the laws, taking into account such facts as it considers desirable. As a legislative act I would include not only acts of Parliament but regulations of the Governor in Council or a minister. Those are what I call legislative acts....

> The power to dissolve marriage is conferred on the Senate by resolution, and section 3 has a limitation, an administrative limitation on the recommendations that the officer can make . . . he does not actually apply a law.

He only makes a recommendation.

The power and authority of the Senate Commissioner under this act is set out in section 3 of the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act. It reads as follows:

> The Senate shall adopt a resolution for the dissolution or annulment of a marriage only upon referring the petition therefor to an officer of the Senate, designated by the Speaker of the Senate, who shall hear evidence, and report thereon, but such officer shall not recommend that a marriage be dissolved or annulled except on a ground on which a marriage could be dissolved or annulled, as the case may be, under the laws of England as they existed on the 15th day of July, 1870, or under the Marriage and Divorce Act, Chapter 176 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952.

I pointed out that our Commissioner has no power except as he finds it in these rules and as set out in the act. He can recommend to the Senate only, but the Senate has no obligation to accept his recommendations. And if the Senate does dissolve a marriage, it does so in a legislative capacity and by legislative means, not by a decree of a court. If the Senate dissolves a marriage it is the Senate's act and it is not that of a Commissioner. In consequence, I would say to my friend who raised this difficult question that there is absolutely no question whatsoever that the bill as it is now drawn does not extend to the Commissioner or add to his powers.

Now let me attack the question that the honourable senator has just raised: Is the Senate a court in that case? Of course it is not. The bill said, in any court having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii. Certainly, our Commissioner has no such power. It is true that we may, by passing a resolution, conform in procedure to an act of our own, but it is a legislative act. Of course Parliament has the power to do anything, and so any act of ours will not add to Parliament's jurisdiction. That fact is immaterial at the moment to the question before us.

Honourable senators, if after what I have said with regard to our status as a legislative body rather than a judicial one, if after what the Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. Driedger, has said, and if after what has been found by the Court of Appeal in Pichette and others, anyone still thinks that we are a court, or that the Senate is a court, or that the Commissioner is a court so that he is included in this phrase, I would be quite willing to add certain words when we get to committee. I think it totally unnecessary, but if it laid the question so that there was no further argument about it, I would be willing to add such words as these:

> Nothing in the Act shall affect or be deemed to affect the operation of the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act or to extend the grounds on which the Officer of the Senate designated thereunder may recommend to the Senate resolutions for the dissolution or annulment of marriage.

I say that is quite unnecessary, but if there is anyone who still thinks there is any confusion in this phrase, "a court having jurisdiction" and so on, I would suggest that the committee add this phraseology to the bill.

Honourable senators, I am sorry it has taken so long, but I felt it necessary to put on record what the facts are with regard to our status, whether we are a court or a legislative body or what we are, because I know there is a great deal of confusion, and when the question was raised I was not ready with my answer.

Senators Grosart, Baird and Hollett would like the Senate to be included in this bill, and if my friend was right in his question I suppose it would be. I would also like to see these provinces included, and I would like to see the Senate Commissioner included in the wider powers to be found in this bill, but not until the Province of Quebec or its authorities, or the Province of Newfoundland, so intimate to us. If they will do that, I will be very glad to see the bill amended accordingly.

Senator Haig says that one consequence of the bill would be an increase in the number of divorces. I have one comment in that regard. There would, of course, be an increase in the first year or so, because there are those who are waiting for such an opportunity to settle their domestic affairs.

But, let me point out that many of those who would now be included in this bill have in the past found means of complying with our restrictive procedures, so that there is not such a large backlog as one might otherwise imagine. There will be an increase, but let us be as realistic in this as we are in other things. It will not be overwhelming.

There is only one thing more I need say. I am sure my fellow senators would like some intimation as to why we are not making better progress. Before we adjourned at the beginning of the Easter recess I did my best to arrange a meeting of the joint committee. Both houses had agreed to it, each one having appointed its members, but I was unable to arrange a meeting because I was told a quorum could not be obtained in the Commons. Immediately we returned I tried to activate the matter, and the chief of our committees branch saw the chief of the committees branch of the other place and asked for immediate action. I was told that he went through the roof, and said that there were so many committees over there that they could not handle them, and they were not going to try to handle any more because they had neither the staff nor the reporters, and that it was impossible to obtain members for another committee.

I sent our Chief Clerk of Committees back to tell them that if a meeting was held for just one half an hour, or even ten minutes, we could appoint the chairmen and a steering committee, and we could then go to work organizing the basic task of the committee, so that it would be ready for the time when the Commons would be in a position to carry on this work. I received word shortly after from the co-ordinator of the Commons committees that even that would not be done. I went then to the highest authority and engaged his co-operation in the matter, but still nothing is done. I am hopeful, however, that as soon as one or other of the committees of the Commons has completed its work, which should be quite soon, we may then be able to proceed with the sittings of this committee. I want all honourable senators to know that any delay in connection with the bringing together of this committee is not due to the fault of the Senate or any member of it.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your patience in listening to me. My remarks have been longer than I intended, but I think they were necessary.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I did not know that this motion was going to be put today. I did not know either that my honourable colleague, Senator Roebuck, was going to give us this learned argument, but I want to congratulate him on the manner in which he has done so.

My sole object in rising is to say that I am entirely in favour of the motion. It would be a mistake if the Senate were to divide on this issue at this stage before this bill and others have been considered carefully by the special joint committee.

I was interested in the criticism, if I may call it that, of the bill which Senator McMeans and I introduced in 1938, a duplicate of which I introduced in 1955. I am not going to argue with the honourable senator on all the points he has raised. His remarks indicate that he is convinced that a number of the twelve points I raised in my speech are covered in his bill.

I am only going to say that when we drafted the bill in 1938 we copied it almost entirely from the English act that had been passed in 1937. When we inserted those grounds—if you may call them that—in the 1938 bill, which actually passed this chamber but which was not given second reading in the other place, we were merely following what had taken place in England. It was our opinion that if those things were already in the law as it stood in 1870, the English Parliament would not be passing the bill that it did pass in 1937. That is the reason why I included those twelve points in the bill I presented to this house in 1955.

I think nothing more should be said about these matters at this time. We should leave them to the special joint committee which will be able to obtain expert legal opinions on them. When a measure is brought in, if the committee so decides, I believe the bill will be satisfactory both to Senator Roebuck and to myself.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by honourable Senator Roebuck, seconded by honourable Senator Croll, that Bill S-19, intituled: "An Act to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief", be read the second time.

In amendment it is moved by honourable Senator Connolly, seconded by honourable Senator Hugessen, that the bill be not now read the second time, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Special Joint Committee on Divorce.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: So far as the debate on the motion is concerned, I wish to adjourn it. The bill still remains. What we are considering now, as I understand it, is the adoption of the amendment to refer the subject-matter of this bill to the special joint committee. I am in agreement with that. What are we going to do with the bill?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It just stands.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It is still before us. I want the bill to stand, and I move that it be adjourned.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: In other words, the soul departs and the body remains?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, that is it.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: As I understand it, the amendment was moved by honourable Senator Connolly, and Senator Roebuck was speaking on the amendment.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is right.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I am now reading the amendment I have before me. Does any honourable senator object to it?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think Senator Roebuck is concerned about whether this bill will appear on our Order Paper again after the committee has reported.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is all I am asking.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): When the committee reports, the bill is revived.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: In that case, I am entirely satisfied.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion in amendment agreed to.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard moved the second reading of Bill C-144, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I propose to make my explanation of this bill in three parts.

The bill is entitled, an act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act. Section 7 of the act, which is repealed by clause 2 of this bill, deals with the report the Minister of Finance makes to Parliament at the end of each year on the operations under the Bretton Woods Agreements Act. As section 7 now stands that report must be laid before Parliament within 30 days of the fiscal year which ends on March 31.

The fiscal years of the two institutions covered by this act, namely, the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, do not coincide with the end of our fiscal year; and therefore the submission of the report by the Minister of Finance within 30 days of March 31 means that a good deal of unnecessary work has to be done in order to bring operations up to date. This amendment therefore proposes that the report be submitted to Parliament before the 31st day of March next following the end of each year or, if Parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first 30 days next thereafter that Parliament is sitting. This will provide, as the explanatory note says, for the submission of such a report on a calendar-year basis rather than on a fiscal-year basis. I am sure that all will agree that that is a practical and much more effective and efficient way of dealing with the report.

Clause 1 has the effect of increasing Canada's quota and subscriptions to the International Monetary Fund and to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. I shall refer to the latter by its common name, the International Bank.

I shall divide that clause into two, taking first of all the International Monetary Fund. This fund was the result of a conference of a number of countries at Bretton Woods in New Hampshire in 1944. Those countries reached an agreement for the establishment of the International Monetary Fund.

In 1945 Canada passed the act which authorized us to join the fund, and we were one of the first and original members.

Until the establishment of the fund there had been no effective international means or international institution to provide for settlement of international balance of payments or for maintaining stability of exchange. The purpose and function of the fund was to promote stability in international exchange, to assist in establishing a multilateral system of payments, and to help correct maladjustments and balance of payments.

Prior to the establishment of the International Monetary Fund, settlement of international balances were made largely on a bilateral basis, sometimes trilateral, and in a few cases multilateral, as in the case of countries which belong to the sterling bloc. In so far as Canada is concerned, our traditional position so far as balance of payments was concerned was that we had a deficit position with the United States. We had a surplus position with respect to our balances with the United Kingdom, and in those days were able to offset our deficit with the United States by our sterling surplus in London.

Owing to World War I and the events which followed—such as going off the gold standard by a number of countries, the depression of the thirties, the devaluation of currencies, the increase in price of gold and, finally, the devastation and destruction and interference with trade that took place during World War II—there was general agreement that it was necessary to set up a new international body to help in the restoration of international trade, and to provide for some means of bringing about stability in international payments. That was the reason for the establishment of the International Monetary Fund.

During the intervening 21 years, unquestionably this fund has proved its worth and is now recognized as being indispensable in the international relations of countries such as Canada. I need only refer honourable senators to the exchange crisis in Canada in June of 1962, at which time we were able to draw on the International Monetary Fund to the extent of $300 million, as one of the means we took then to overcome the crisis. In 1961 the United Kingdom drew on the fund to the extent of $1½ billion. Even the United States has drawn upon the fund.

As a result of the situations I have mentioned, it became apparent that the resources of the International Monetary Fund were not sufficient to take care of the probable strain that might be put upon it. In 1962, therefore, a group of 10 countries, of which Canada was one, informally and on a consultative basis, agreed that they would make available to the fund the total of $6 billion to assist it in meeting the drawings that might become necessary.

The group of ten countries have continued on such a consultative basis, and are commonly known as the Paris Club.

As a result of this action on the part of the ten countries, which was of a temporary character, although it is still in effect, it was apparent to all members of the fund that it was necessary to increase the quotas. Following meetings which were held in 1964 and 1965 it was decided that the quotas of all member countries should be increased by 25 per cent.

Perhaps I should have said previously that a country becomes a member of the fund by a quota being assigned to it which it must pay into the fund, and then its right to draw on the fund bears a relationship to its quota. It was also decided to increase the regular or established quotas of 16 countries, of which Canada was one, by certain amounts.

The reason those countries were selected for new quotas to be established was that they had expanded more rapidly than the others, and their share in the problem of balance of payments was thereby greater. In the result, with Canada's consent, our quota in the International Monetary Fund is being raised from $550 million, first of all, by an additional $42 million, which brings our regular quota up to $592 million which with the 25 per cent increase and which is general to all countries, amounting to $148 million, brings our new quota to $740 million.

I should add, that because of that additional quota, our reserve position is thereby strengthened.

I come now to the second division of clause 1, dealing with our participation in the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. This bank was also established at Bretton Woods by an agreement among the same countries. It also came into effect in 1945, and the same act that authorized Canada to join the International Monetary Fund also authorized us to become a member of the International Bank and to subscribe for shares in it.

However, while the two institutions were related, and while the amount of each country's subscription to the International Bank was related to its quota in the International Monetary Fund, the functions of the two institutions were quite different.

The main function of the International Bank was actually to lend money and, to that extent and in that sense, it was a true bank. It was to lend moneys to countries for increasing their productive resources where private funds were not available on reasonable terms. When one looks at the history of this bank over the intervening 21 years, one can say that it has performed excellently and has made its loans on a sound basis.

Its investments are good; it has assisted greatly in developing the resources of countries throughout the world, particularly the developing countries. The funds are used for such purposes as construction of roads, railways, and public utilities, for industry in some cases, and for education. At the present time the total investments represented by such loans amount to some $5,500 million.

Hon. Mr. Paterson: Have they had many losses?

Hon. Mr Leonard: No. it has been a very successful operation, and the reserve they have established is ample to take care of any potential losses.

In addition to that, the bank has developed excellent technical facilities, which are available to assist countries in their own work of developing their resources.

In the case of the International Bank there is no general increase in the subscriptions of countries, because there is no need for further additional capital. However, under the terms of membership in the bank, the amount that a country has to subscribe is related to the amount of its quota in the International Monetary Fund, and, when Canada's quota in that fund is increased by $42 million a similar increase takes place in the amount which we must subscribe to the International Bank.

So that by clause 1 of this bill we are increasing our subscriptions to the International Bank by $42 million. We are increasing the authority for our quota in the International Monetary Fund by $190 million, and the total increase to both funds is $232 million.

Now, if you look at the act, you will see that the figure there authorized is $1,532 million. This section repeals the former act under which the Government had authority for $1,300 million. Therefore, the new authority of $1,532 million is the amount which we have already subscribed over the years plus an additional $232 million.

Honourable senators, in conclusion, I think there are one or two interesting pieces of information that you might like to hear about.

There are, I understand, some 102 countries which are members of these institutions. After this increase of 25 per cent and the increase in the special contributions, the total of the quotas of all the countries will be approximately $21 billion. That is with respect to the International Monetary Fund.

The International Bank assets are approximately $8 billion. In addition, there is an uncalled portion of the subscriptions of member countries, because in subscribing to shares they are asked to put up only 10 per cent of their subscription. This uncalled subscription amounts to some $19,500 million.

These figures illustrate the importance of these two institutions and the extent to which they have assisted, not only in the development and expansion of trade but in increasing the productivity of the nations of the world, and increasing the general standard of living, and to that extent contributing also, tc peace in the world.

The act, from its beginning in 1944, and the amending acts by which from time to time the quotas have been increased, have had support from both major parties represented in this house; the legislation has been nonpartisan and non-controversial, and I am sure again it will command support from all members of the Senate.

If the bill receives second reading, I propose that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Paterson: Might I ask the honourable senator if Eugene Black is still the head?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: No. The president is now George B. Woods.

Hon. Mr. Paterson: Is he an American?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I believe so.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Might I ask Senator Leonard a question? I am not clear on the relationship between the two institutions. Has not the International Bank got something to do with the investment of the funds of the loan?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: No, Senator Burchill. From that standpoint the two institutions are separate. The one is, of course, a reserve fund represented by gold, the currencies of different countries; the other is a lending body that lends the capital that has been subscribed to it, and it issues bonds which are bought by life insurance companies, trust companies and other investors in Canada, the United States and elsewhere.

These obligations are sometimes in U.S. dollars, sometimes in Canadian dollars and sometimes in Swiss francs. These funds then are loaned to the countries where the railroads and the other industries are being built.

There may be a certain amount of collaboration, shall we say, in the administration of both funds, but the functions are quite separate.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Was the monetary fund just held in reserve to be called upon when needed?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: It is my understanding that that is the situation. It may be in short-term loans of the particular currency involved, but they must hold so many Canadian dollars, so many French francs, and so on. Every member of the International Monetary Fund puts up 25 per cent of its quota in gold, and the balance it puts up in its own currency. It is true, I imagine, that the fund could, or does from time to time, hold more of one particular currency than another, but this does not relate to the investment funds.

I might add that if I have been mistaken in my answers we will soon find out when the bill goes to the committee.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Brooks, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

UNITED BAPTIST WOMAN'S MISSIONARY UNION OF THE MARITIME PROVINCES— SECOND READING

Hon. A. J. Brooks moved the second reading of Bill S-33, respecting United Baptist Woman's Missionary Union of the Maritime Provinces.

He said: Honourable senators, you will recall that this bill was before the Senate last session, at which time it received first and second readings, and it was also dealt with before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, but Parliament was dissolved before it was reported back from committee.

There is very little to explain regarding the bill. It simply enlarges the territory of this organization.

The original act, the United Baptist Woman's Missionary Union of the Maritime Provinces, was passed in 1906. Since that time, as everyone knows, Newfoundland has been taken into Confederation. The activities of this organization extend now, and have extended, to the four Atlantic provinces.

The purpose of the bill is to change the name of the society to United Baptist Woman's Missionary Union of the Atlantic provinces. I may say that this does not interfere in any way with the existing rights of this society.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Brooks, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 5, the adjourned debate on the notice of the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) calling the attention of the Senate to the 1965 General Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, held in New Zealand in November and December, 1965, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada, and to the forthcoming meeting to be held in Canada in September and October, 1966.

Hon. Frank C. Welch: Honourable senators, I would like to take this opportunity to give an account of my mission to New Zealand. First, I wish to thank those responsible for sending me on such a delightful travel tour. I am pleased that Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) is here today so that I can express to him the great sense of gratitude which I feel. Senator and Mrs. Connolly were both very kind to Mrs. Welch and me. I would also like to thank our honourable Speaker, Senator Sydney J. Smith, for his special friendship.

Many of us met in Vancouver, and by the time we reached Fiji most of our Canadian and West Indies groups had become acquainted and were really enjoying each other's company. On arrival in Wellington, New Zealand, we were split up into groups and taken to different hotels. From there, two days later, we started our tour of New Zealand by bus; about seven buses comprised the group, each bus arriving in different towns and cities for meals and lodging.

At this time I would like to name the Canadian delegates who attended this conference. Senator John J. Connolly attended in the capacity of Vice-Chairman of the General Council. The delegates from the Senate were: His Honour the Speaker, Senator Sydney J. Smith, and myself. The delegates from the House of Commons were: Mr. Patrick Asselin, from Quebec; Mr. Ron Basford, from British Columbia; Honourable J. Angus MacLean, from Prince Edward Island; Honourable Marcel Lambert, from Alberta; Mr. Max Saltsman, from Ontario, and the secretary to the Canadian Delegation, Mr. T. R. Montgomery. The provincial delegates were: Honourable Donald Morrow, Speaker of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario; Honourable Guy Lechasseur, Speaker of the Legislative Assembly of Quebec; Mr. H. J. Spence, M.L.A., Nova Scotia; Mr. Clarence S. Menzies, M.P.P., New Brunswick; Honourable W. H. Murray, Speaker of the Legislative Assembly, British Columbia; Honourable J. E. Snedker, Speaker of the Legislative Assembly, Saskatchewan; Honourable Alfred J. Hooke, M.L.A., Minister of Municipal Affairs, Alberta; Honourable George W. Clarke, Speaker of the Legislative Assembly, Newfoundland; Lt. Col. J. D. Stewart, M.L.A., Prince Edward Island, and Honourable George Hutton, Minister of Agriculture and Conservation, Manitoba. The secretary to the provincial delegates was Charland Prud'homme of Winnipeg, Manitoba.

The New Zealand Government had everything superorganized. We were taken to all important points in the country, from north to south and east to west, seeing everything from beautiful pastoral scenes to volcanic mountains. New Zealand, the most southerly settled land on the Pacific, lies 1,400 miles southeast of Australia and half way between the Equator and the South Pole. The two islands are 1,000 miles in length. The North Island is the more populated. The climate is temperate with plenty of rain to provide grass for the 70 million sheep and 7 million cattle. The snow-clad mountains provide abundant water for the beautiful rivers and lakes.

At Rotorua, the hot springs and other thermal wonders are more spectacular than anywhere else in the world. It is fascinating to see the Maori people cook their foods in hot thermal pools. Also at Rotorua it was exciting to see the teenagers swimming in the river coming down from the ice-capped mountains, then diving in the hot pools to get warm before taking another ice bath.

New Zealand is the most concentrated wonderland of scenery of any country I have visited. Here you have a land of sunshine and temperate climate, you see boiling mud pools, spouting geysers, caves illuminated by myriads of glowworms, snow-clad peaks towering 10,000 feet into the sky, and lakes and fishing streams of unbelievable beauty.

You have very good hotels, and travel is easy by air, ship and rail. As you travel through this country you see great flocks of sheep and herds of cattle. The wool and mutton is exported to Britain. This is largely in the hands of the New Zealand Wool Board. In fact, almost all farm produce is sold and controlled by a board.

In the Rotorua district great areas of pine have been planted; I understand about 286,000 acres. The New Zealanders are preserving and taking great care of their forests of which about 14 million acres still remain. Pulp and paper is one of their major industries, and I visited one large plant where they were making pulp, paper and building materials. In fact, everything was manufactured except the noise from the saws. They now have five large plants in different sections of the country.

Electricity is supplied to homeowners at very cheap rates. Both the North and South Islands are covered by a grid network of transmission lines. This, of course, is made possible by the numerous large streams of water coming from the mountains. Eighty-five per cent of the country's electricity is owned and controlled by the New Zealand Electricity Department.

The two and a half million New Zealanders, mostly British settlers, work closely with Polynesian Maori people, who comprise about 7 per cent of the population. The story is told that when the English arrived in New Zealand the Maori people met them on the shore. The Maori chief, carrying a two-handled basket of food, invited the British explorer, Captain James Cook, to take one handle of the basket thus helping to carry and share the food. The British and Maori have been carrying the load together ever since. They know only friendship for each other.

The seasons in New Zealand are the opposite of those in the northern hemisphere, Christmas being the hottest time of the year. When we left there in December the schools were closing, and the children were going to the beaches for vacation.

New Zealanders are very keen on politics, as is evidenced by the fact that over 90 per cent of the voting population votes in the general elections. I might add that New Zealand does not have compulsory voting, as does its neighbouring country, Australia, I was told they were giving it serious consideration, but it is to be noted that in Australia, where there is compulsory voting, 93 per cent of those eligible exercise their right, whereas in New Zealand, with no compulsion, 92 per cent do so. The present Prime Minister of New Zealand is the Right Honourable K. J.

Holyoake, and the Leader of the Opposition is the Honourable A. H. Nordmeyer. The next election is to be held in 1966.

The main flow of trade goes to other Commonwealth countries, chiefly Britain. This is why I made the statement, when speaking at the conference, that if Britain joins the common market they could be forced to share their trade with common market countries thereby reducing their purchases from New Zealand and Canada as well as other countries between which the balance of trade at the present time does not favour Britain. Grassland farming represents about 90 per cent of the country's exports. New Zealand exports a very high quantity of wool, beef, lamb, mutton, butter, cheese, et cetera. One can readily see why New Zealand depends so much on the British trade.

While agriculture is the main industry, the economy is changing somewhat to manufacturing. At present New Zealand has 9,034 factories, mostly small plants, employing 191,515 men and women. It has been said that there are eleven jobs for every ten persons. Unemployment, therefore, is no problem. Education is compulsory to age fifteen, and free to age nineteen.

There is no doubt that the role of the conference is extremely useful; indeed, with the wide expansion of the Commonwealth it is necessary. The opportunity to express points of view on common matters of importance, to know and understand the backgrounds of other Commonwealth countries and their governments, and to forge some common objectives from the wide differences in problems, environments and attitudes that will make the Commonwealth an increasingly useful assembly, must be considered an experience of high priority. The tour of New Zealand gave us an important insight into the life and economy of the country.

Certainly knowledge obtained in this way is better than that obtained by listening to commentaries by others, or reading reports or books on such matters. First-hand examination and experience has no substitute. Thus, over a period of time all parts of the Commonwealth must become equally well known to all members, so that when Commonwealth affairs, or even domestic affairs of some members, are being discussed we have informed members of governments available for their view and opinions. In addition, the tour provided us with a cross-section of representatives who travelled and lived together for this period, enabling us to gain a better understanding of their views, particularly as they compared life in their country, or how their economies related to what they witnessed in New Zealand. All in all, the tour was a most profitable part of the meeting.

The conference itself was officially opened by the Governor General in Wellington on November 30. The agenda was as follows:

1. Economic growth in the Commonwealth

   The effective use of technical and financial resources for economic development.

   Problems of commodity stabilization. Agricultural co-operation. The growth of population in relation to resources.

2. Parliamentary Government in the Commonwealth

   Differing party systems. The redress of grievances: The office of ombudsman.

3. International Affairs

   The United Nations.
   Southeast Asia.
   Africa.

4. The Commonwealth Parliamentary Association

   The future role and development.

5. A Commonwealth Court

The final item on the agenda, however, was deleted and replaced by a discussion on Rhodesia, clearing the first day of conference.

As might be anticipated, the discussions on economic growth and international affairs held the widest attention. My own contribution was a speech on Agricultural Co-operative Marketing in which I was able to draw the Canadian experience to the attention of other delegates. In addition, I suggested that a committee might well be set up to study the need of Commonwealth co-operative marketing and the role it might have in strengthening overall supply, demand, and price arrangements. It seems to me that this is one aim which should receive a good deal of attention in the light of our competitive positions on the international scene.

I might point out that for the first time data papers were prepared for the delegates, and they provided extremely timely and useful sources of information for the discussions.

While I cannot hope to present a detailed view of the many papers and discussions that went on, I believe it is worthwhile to pass on my particular impressions on economic growth in the Commonwealth. As the Commonwealth now stands we have a wide spectrum of economic development varying from the more industrially mature economies to those which are just emerging.

Much of the commentary at the conference, and indeed elsewhere, centered around the role in which the developed economies can play in assisting the underdeveloped. Naturally, this leads to the part which foreign aid and technical assistance can play. I believe that the Commonwealth countries should examine this in detail and, indeed, such a task could well be carried out by the new Commonwealth secretariat.

I am sure that Canada will provide whatever assistance she can, yet it is necessary to recognize that our own resources in the form of financial assistance must be held to some limit, for we are not in a position to provide funds indiscriminately. This, in itself, should make us realize that Canada must ascertain the priorities in the nature, size and direction of her involvement in external aid to Commonwealth countries. As painful as it is, there must be the recognition that some countries do have limited potential and resource endowment for economic growth, and that no amount of external assistance will make a change in such a situation.

Thus, it is my contention that the whole structure of assistance must be examined so that priorities, means and direction be given to Commonwealth assistance, rather than following a random process without long-term objectives.

I might also point to the dissension in the C.P.A. itself, and note briefly the outcome of this discussion. Much of the commentary centred around the strength and structure of the organization, and it was decided that a committee system should be introduced by the annual conference.

In addition, urgent considerations were raised as to how the most effective utilization of conferences, proceedings and the association's regular work could best be attained.

The General Council proceedings must also be noted. Its meetings dealt with the general business and elections, as well as the role of the council. The most important consequence was the unanimous passing of the following resolution on Rhodesia:

> That in view of the fact that the Rhodesia Parliament has condoned the act of rebellion by the illegal Smith régime and actively supported the actions of the said illegal régime, it is hereby resolved that the Rhodesia Branch be expelled from the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association forthwith and it is further resolved that when a legal and constitutional government is restored to Rhodesia, re-admission of the said Branch of the association will be duly considered by this Council.

In closing, I would like to mention that the Prime Minister's invitation to hold the Twelfth Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference in Ottawa in 1966 was warmly received, and accepted. It was also decided that the Thirteenth Conference would be held in Uganda.

May I extend my congratulations to Senator John J. Connolly, who was unanimously elected chairman for 1965-66.

Again, I would like to thank the very fine people of New Zealand for the hospitality they extended us in their wonderful country. The slogan of New Zealand is "The Land of Peace and Prosperity."

AERONAUTICS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 5 the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Deschatelets for the second reading of Bill C-153, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, this afternoon we have listened to a long discussion on divorce procedures and the law in respect thereto, and another on the Bretton Woods Agreements, after which we had a very entertaining and instructive speech by Senator Welch on New Zealand. I wish to speak at this time on an ordinary bill to amend the Aeronautics Act, which was introduced in the other place by the minister without portfolio, whose remarks may be read at page 3675 of Hansard of the House of Commons.

I refer first to the powers of the board to make regulations regarding fees, to make changes in the composition of the Air Transport Board, and certain other powers. Certain objections were raised in the other place as to the unavailability of aircraft, to the charges of available aircraft, and the question of allowing the minister to make orders and regulations under subsection (1) of section 3A. This was later withdrawn.

I am pleased to see that in this bill there are certain rules, regulations, and procedures and controls given by the minister in connection with aircraft accidents, but I think there should also be spelled out somewhere in the regulations some provision as to the right of procedures to be used and the right of counsel in connection with any injured party for the aircraft affected. I think these should be spelled out, because they are not clear at the present time.

There is also provision in the regulations making it an offence now to obstruct or hinder any investigation in connection with an aircraft accident. Also the Governor in Council may make charges in connection with an aircraft, such as a landing fee, and also for any other facilities not coming within subparagraph (i) provided by the minister in respect of any aircraft.

May I suggest that if this bill goes to the Transport and Communications Committee—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It will go to that committee.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Thank you. Then, may I suggest that certain information be provided by the officials as to the revenues obtained by the department in connection with some of these silly little charges being made, such as 10 cents for the use of toilets, and 10 cents for going up on the observation platform.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: These are nuisance charges, and I think we should have some information about them.

I should also like to get some information as to the cost of operating certain of our major airports in Canada, which are under D.O.T., because, as mentioned by Senator Deschatelets, and also in the other place, we are attempting to make airports as self-sustaining as possible.

I should also like to see the Government of Canada formulate some kind of an air transportation policy. The question comes to mind quickly as to another transcontinental run, the Canadian Pacific Air Lines; another question arises as to the use of the route from Toronto to Chicago. We are allowed two flights, and Air Canada has only one. There is some suggestion that this be given to C.P.A. I think that should be a matter of Government policy.

Honourable senators, in conclusion, I commend this legislation to your favourable consideration. I think that most of the proposed amendments would strengthen the hand of the Government and the Minister of the Department of Transport in connection with the safety of air travel, which is increasing all the time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) for Hon. Mr. Deschatelets, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

PRIVATE BILL

THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY OF ENDOCRINOLOGY—SECOND READING

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson moved the second reading of Bill S-29, to incorporate The International Society of Endocrinology.

He said: Honourable senators, before I deal with this bill, I should like to express my appreciation to the honourable Leader of the Government for the very kind remarks he made a few moments ago about the accident that happened to me on the way to the forum. I also wish to express my appreciation for the way in which the honourable leader's remarks were seconded by my colleagues in this house.

Perhaps it is not inappropriate to say that while the merits and values of professional sports are frequently questioned, I think we could agree that both clubs in the final series of the Stanley Cup put on a highly creditable display.

May I say that I personally am proud that the Canadien Hockey Club, le club de hockey Canadien, demonstrated qualities of sportsmanship, courage and skill in keeping with the best Canadian traditions.

Honourable senators, Bill S-29 is for the purpose of incorporating in Canada an international society, the prime activity of which is research and dissemination of knowledge in one particular field of medical science.

It is not the first time such a bill has come before Parliament. In fact, I had, as many of my colleagues will remember, the privilege of presenting a bill in February 1961, with a similar objective—to incorporate the International Brain Research Organization.

It seemed to me that my explanation of Bill S-29 should cover three essentials: first, the bill itself as to form and content; second, the background leading up to the request for incorporation; and, third, the nature of the activity in which the members of the association are engaged.

Looking at the bill, I find very little requiring comment as it is in the usual form setting out the name, objects, membership, organization, by-laws, powers, head office, et cetera, and is, I believe, self-explanatory. The schedule listing the membership, which is limited to organizations or bodies and excludes individuals is, I am sure you will agree, most impressive. No fewer than 40 national societies are named.

When we come to the background of the incorporation it is necessary perhaps to say a little more. You might well ask: Why incorporate? And again: Why in Canada?

To answer the first question—why incorporate?—I must go back in time, but not too far back. It was only in the early 1900s that endocrinology became a subdivision of a wider discipline—biology. Some 20 years later, in the middle 1920s, its recognition as a separate discipline was reflected in the creation of increasing numbers of national endocrine societies.

Shortly after World War II, distinguished scientists and academicians who considered themselves primarily endocrinologists began to consider the organization of some form of international federation of national endocrine societies. A preliminary committee, which was formed to investigate the feasibility of organizing international congresses of endocrinology, was convened in London, England, in February 1957, and in Paris in June 1957 an International Executive Committee was formed with a view to organizing the First Congress. Professor Christian Hamburger of Copenhagen, Denmark, was elected Chairman of the First Congress and Professor F. T. G. Prunty, of St. Thomas Hospital Medical School, London, presently Chairman of the association and one of the petitioners, was elected Secretary.

The First International Congress of Endocrinology was held in Copenhagen in July 1960 under the Chairmanship of Professor Hamburger. During this, the formation of an International Society of Endocrinology was again discussed. An interim Executive Committee was created which, when it met in London in June 1961, agreed to hold the Second International Congress in London in August in 1964. The meeting to consider the proposed International Society of Endocrinology, in fact, took place on August 16, 1964, at the Royal College of Physicians, London. Each nation with an endocrine society had been asked to send delegates, and during this and subsequent meetings held during the Second International Congress they concerned themselves with drawing up a final draft of the statutes and their acceptance, discussion of nominees from member national societies, election of society officers as laid down in the statutes, and formation of an executive subcommittee.

One of the main early objectives of the International Society of Endocrinology will be the co-ordination and fostering of international congresses of endocrinology, which will curtail the recent uncontrolled proliferation of international meetings. In addition, the International Society is beginning to serve as a clearing house for information of use to endocrinologists, including notification of meetings of special interest, training programs, personnel available for posts in the specialty, recent advances in research, et cetera. One of the more distant aims is the development of an International Journal of Endocrinology. Evidence exists that some of these objectives are already being met.

To sum up, one might say that in the short span of some six decades endocrinology has grown from an uneasy birth as the child of biology to a manhood as a discipline of prime importance in the lives of all in the human and animal world.

With the development of local societies all over the world it is logical that a central or international association in formal incorporated form is required to communicate, rationalize and co-ordinate the wealth of invaluable information which is daily growing.

As to the question, why should the Canadian Parliament be asked to create the corporate entity, there is a very simple answer. There are already, as I said, 40 national societies involved; as far apart as Argentina and Finland or, say, Turkey and Japan, and Canada is considered by these countries to be the most acceptable in which to locate the secretariat and to provide the depository for its funds. This, is, I believe, very complimentary to our country and we should welcome this opportunity to be the centre of yet another international organism.

Now, having referred to the bill and the background against which the demand for the incorporation took form, I offer a word or two about endocrinology itself.

Endocrinology is that branch of the biological sciences which is concerned with the ductless glands, which produce hormones, which are essential to life. Its uniqueness is that it draws from many previously established disciplines within biology and thus has served from its very beginnings as a "meeting ground" for anatomists, physiologists, pharmacologists, biochemists, geneticists, etc.

The word is derived from the Greek endon meaning "within" and crino meaning "to sift."

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is the endocrine gland a ductless gland?

Hon. Mr. Molson: There is more than one endocrine gland, senator, but they are the ductless glands.

The endocrine glands synthesize hormones which travel through the blood stream and acts as catalysts in other often remote parts of the body. All of us know of the existence of hormones but probably few outside the world of science realize what an important part they play in our lives. For example, if our favourite grandson loses his place in the choir because his voice cracks it is because a hormone has been at work.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There would be no more "hormony" after that.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Molson: If we look in amazement as the runt of the litter suddenly starts growing at an astonishing rate, we know that a hormone started it. When we see a gangling daughter transformed in a few years into a beautiful mature woman, we can thank hormones. And in the animal kingdom everything from the quality of the meat we eat to the quantity of wool from sheep is affected by the activities of hormones.

The subject is vast. As our medical colleagues can see, my knowledge and understanding of it is microscopic, but I think it safe to say that endocrinology is a discipline which offers tremendous challenges and opportunities to clinicians and researchers. Anything which helps their work helps the whole human race.

Honourable senators, I commend this bill to you, and if it is given second reading I propose to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, after that dissertation and superb medical lecture by the distinguished senator from Montreal—I believe he must have a Ph.D. now in endocrinology—I rise only to support him fully on this bill. This is a great advance.

As a member now of one of the international societies of the world, I know what endocrinology is attempting to do by the formation of this society. But, above all—and honourable senators should be very happy that Senator Molson has brought it to our attention—it is good that the repository for this whole association is going to be in Canada.

I support this bill wholeheartedly.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Molson, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

FARM CREDIT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Harry Hays moved the second reading of Bill C-171, to amend the Farm Credit Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is my first opportunity to say a few words in this house. I must assure you that I have always had great respect for the Senate of Canada and its members, but I have had a great deal more respect since March 7 last!

This afternoon I am going to explain Bill C-171, which is a bill to amend the Farm Credit Act, and I would just like to go into the history of farm credit in Canada very briefly.

The first farm credit legislation started away back in 1929, when the Government of the day saw fit to introduce a bill known as the Farm Loan Board Act which loaned up to $10,000 to help farmers finance mortgages on their farms. During the thirties this was amended to reduce the amount of credit to some $6,000; and it carried on until some time in 1952, when it was increased to $12,000. It was again amended in 1956 to provide $15,000, and then in 1959 it was completely overhauled. The name was changed to the Farm Credit Act, and its uses were broadened and the amount of credit available then was $20,000 for unsupervised loans and $27,500 for supervised loans.

In 1964 it was again amended and the totals doubled—$40,000 for unsupervised loans and $60,000 for supervised loans—and its uses again widened. From time to time it has become necessary to expand the use of the Farm Credit Corporation because Canada is so different from many other countries. We live in a cold, harsh climate. For seven months of the year our country is paralyzed. We have stiff competition from countries that have an opportunity to grow two or more crops while we grow one; many countries can grow seven. Despite all of this, I think it is recognized by thinking Canadians and people the world over, that the farmers of Canada have done a fantastic job for the consuming public in Canada. Our food costs are in the neighbourhood of 21 cents of the working man's dollar, and it is about the third lowest of any country in the world, even under these conditions.

We have 2,272 million acres in Canada and of this amount 172 million and a fraction are used in Canada, which is about 7.6 per cent of our land. We have 103.4 million acres of improved land. According to the last Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures, in 1964 our usable land was estimated to be worth $9,472.8 million. Equipment on Canadian farms amounted to the value of $2,554 million, and livestock and poultry to a value of $2,166 million.

The purpose of the amendment contained in Bill C-171 is to increase the capital of the Farm Credit Corporation from $24 million to $40 million. The effect of this increase is to raise the limit of the amount the corporation may borrow from the Consolidated Revenue Fund from $600 million to $1 billion.

When the Farm Credit Act was first introduced in 1959, it provided capital of $8 million and authority for the Minister of Finance to lend the corporation up to $200 million. This amount has been increased on three occasions since that time, bringing the total capital at present to $24 million and the minister's authority to lend to the corporation up to $600 million.

The first full year of active lending operations by the corporation was the year 1960-61, during which it approved 5,597 loans for a total of about $60,700,000. In the year ending March 31, 1966 the corporation approved 11,238 loans for about $209 million, and it is forecast that loan approvals during the current year will be in the order of $225 million. In the six years of operation it has approved a total of 49,000 loans for about $692 million.

With the rapid expansion of lending by the corporation, principal repayments from borrowers are far from sufficient to provide all the funds required for new loans. Under the present level of lending, the corporation recovers about 27 per cent of its annual capital needs from borrowers. The remaining 73 per cent must be obtained from the Minister of Finance by way of borrowings and subscription to capital. It is estimated that the $400 million which will be provided by this amendment will be sufficient to meet the needs of farmers for a period of about two and a half years.

It may be interesting to know the purposes for which these funds are being used. The largest item, representing about 40 per cent of the loans approved by the corporation, is for the purchase of land to enable farmers to enlarge their existing units to sound economic size. The second item, 27.8 per cent, is for refinancing the balance due on existing mortgages or agreements for sale which farmers have arranged prior to making application to the corporation. About 12.7 per cent is used to assist beginning farmers to purchase complete farm units.

The tremendous upsurge in the number and amount of loans being approved by the corporation has used up the funds available to it much more quickly than was anticipated, and this additional capital is now urgently required to meet the current needs of farmers.

This act is very important for the proper financing of our farmers. It seems to me that in the future, in order to make this self-sustaining we would require—and this is the figure Mr. Owens gave me—something in the neighbourhood of $2 billion. Then it would be self-sustaining, provided land values remain at the same level they are at today.

Canadian farmers are having a great many problems because of geography, and they always will have. Larger, completely mechanized and highly specialized farms will be required to operate under almost complete lack of labour in the future. In order to do this these units are going to have to be larger, and are going to call for much more financing. We have new machinery syndicate legislation which is now beginning to be used, and this money will also provide funds for this purpose.

Honourable senators, I recommend this bill to you for your consideration. I think this legislation is necessary if we are to continue with viable agriculture and give the consuming public the sort of food they want at a cost they can afford.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Could I ask the honourable senator a question? You have told us about lending great sums of money. Has the repayment of these loans been satisfactory to the credit board?

Hon. Mr. Hays: Last year, if my memory serves me correctly, the loss amounted to $6,297, and, the previous year it was something under $12,000.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words with respect to this important legislation, but before doing so I want to congratulate most sincerely the sponsor of the bill on his maiden speech in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In my opinion, he has spoken very well indeed. He speaks so that everyone can hear what he has to say, and his remarks have been what most of us have been expecting from him in connection with this important measure.

I am sorry that the report of the Farm Credit Corporation for the last fiscal year has not yet been tabled. The latest report I have been able to obtain is that for the fiscal year 1964-65. Senator Hays has given us some information in connection with what has happened in the last fiscal year, but I should like him, or possibly some other honourable senator, to inform the Senate of the lending done by this corporation, separated as to provinces, during the last year.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: You will be able to get that in committee, will you not?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If it is not possible to have it at this time I shall have to wait until the bill is before the committee. This is a very important measure. Large sums of money are being lent, and I think the chairman of the corporation, or the vice-chairman, should appear before the committee to answer such questions.

It was stated by the honourable sponsor of the bill that the federal Government has been in the farm loan business for a long time. The Canadian Farm Loan Act was passed in 1927, and it set up the Farm Loan Board, which did not commence lending until 1929.

It has been said that the loans were on first mortgages on the farms belonging to the farmers. I should like to say at this point, however, that I was never satisfied with the Farm Loan Board. Whenever I had to make an application on behalf of a client I was told that they were not allowed to lend money to a farmer on the security of his farm, except to clear up his obligations and put him on his feet by having everything consolidated. An applicant could not go to the Farm Loan Board and ask for a mortgage if he was going to use the money for the purpose of carrying on his farming operations. He had to furnish a statement of all his creditors, and if the loan was not large enough to pay off all his creditors he had to go to each creditor and get him to reduce his claim until such time as the mortgage could be placed.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: What about new equipment? Could a farmer obtain a loan from the corporation for the purchase of new equipment?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have never been able to get a loan for any client for anything except what I have stated. If a farmer could consolidate all his debts and pay them off with a loan from the corporation, and thus be put on his feet so that he could carry on economically, then the loan was granted.

It was on that account that I was very pleased indeed when that act was repealed in 1959, and the Farm Credit Act passed. The Farm Credit Act, which is Chapter 43 of the Statutes of 1959, was part of the Government's program of obtaining a higher standard of living for farmers. That act set up the Farm Credit Corporation, and the assets and liabilities of the Canadian Farm Loan Board were transferred to the new corporation, which was given the power to lend money to persons whose chief occupation was farming and who could use the money thus borrowed to set up economic farm units. Among other things, a farmer could use the money for the acquisition of land, the erection and modernization of farm buildings, clearing land, draining land, irrigating land, fencing land, and making permanent improvements. He could also use it for the purchase of basic herds of cattle, farm equipment, fertilizer, seed, and for many other purposes considered necessary to the establishment of an economic farm unit.

The provisions of this act went further than those of the old act, and they were seized upon immediately by the farmers in western Canada, and later by the farmers of eastern Canada and the Maritimes. It is my understanding that they have been able to obtain money for these purposes, and to enlarge their holdings and carry on more successful farming businesses.

I am not going to go into the original amount of capital of $8 million, or the amendments that were made in succeeding years enlarging that amount to $12 million, $16 million, $24 million, until we come to the bill presently before us which will enlarge the capital to $40 million. There have been four previous amendments to this act—in 1961, 1962-63. I was told by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) that I introduced the bill to amend the act in 1962-63—probably that is the reason he asked me to say these few words today.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It is one of the reasons.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The act was amended in 1964 and again in 1965. This bill, if it is passed, will constitute the fifth amendment. With a capital of $40 million the corporation will be able to borrow 25 times that amount from the Minister of Finance. As has been stated, that should give the Farm Credit Corporation enough money to carry on for two and a half years.

Honourable senators will also remember that in 1964 the Farm Machinery Syndicates Credit Act was passed, under which the Farm Credit Corporation was allowed to lend money to three or more farmers who set up a qualified syndicate for the purpose of purchasing farm machinery for co-operative use, and it was allowed to lend up to 80 per cent of the cost of this machinery.

A reasonably powerful tractor today costs from $11,000 to $13,000, and a self-propelled combination threshing machine costs in the neighbourhood of the same amount, and diskers and seeders and all other farm machinery have increased in price to such an extent that individual farmers in every case are not able to buy their own machinery. If they do buy it, then it is idle much of the time because they have not sufficient acreage to keep it fully employed. The Farm Machinery Syndicates Credit Act, which was proclaimed on December 11, 1964, takes care of such a situation.

In the report of the Farm Credit Corporation that I have in my hand there is no mention of how much the Farm Machinery Syndicates Credit Act has been used. It is my hope that such information will be received either here today, or in committee. I have in mind such questions as: How is this act working out? How many syndicates were formed? Where are they located? It is information of that kind that I should like to have.

Other questions I should like to have answered are: What percentage of the loans made up to the present time are in good standing? What is the operating loss, if any? Are the mortgages that have been given by the farmers badly in arrears? Is there any chance in the future of heavy losses being suffered by the corporation?

In my part of Saskatchewan farm credit is considered to have been highly successful. The business of the corporation is well managed by dedicated employees, who are courteous and well informed. They render valuable service and give advice to farmers upon request. They have offices located at strategic points throughout the whole province. There is a fine office in the town of Rosetown, in which I reside; in fact, it is in the same block where I have my own office, and we are in close touch with their counsellors there. They give valuable advice to us as well as to the farmers. They give pre-loan advice as well as post-loan advice. In my opinion, their post-loan advice, in many cases, is more valuable than the pre-loan advice.

Honourable senators will gather that I am in favour of Bill C-171. I was always dissatisfied with the old Farm Loan Board and was certainly pleased with the Farm Credit Act which was passed in 1949. I should also say that this is one piece of legislation for which we must give the former government credit. I almost forgot to say that.

I have a few general remarks to make before closing. Land prices have increased as the result of the loans being made. Machine prices have increased, probably on account of the fact that farmers can obtain money more easily than in the past. Costs generally have increased, and the farmers are going to need more income if they are to repay these amounts they have borrowed.

I am not in favour of increasing the amounts of loans, because I think that will push the price of land and machinery higher still.

The farmer is in a cost-price squeeze. I read in a recent article in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix that the National Farmers Union has presented a brief to the federal Government asking for $2.50 a bushel as a minimum price for the first two thousand bushels of wheat, and so on.

Although costs have been rising, the price of wheat, on which our district in Saskatchewan depends more than anything else, has decreased in the past year or so. However, I read a report in the press which stated that the price of cattle has gone up considerably in the past few days. The sponsor of the bill did not mention anything about that, but I understand that he held a most successful sale and is quite pleased with the result.

I would not want to see interest rates increased. I understand the rate is 5 per cent on the original $20,000 or less, and 5 per cent on the original $27,500 or less. On the increase above those amounts it is the going rate, and I am informed that it was 6.38 per cent in 1964-65. I do not know whether that was the rate in the fiscal year 1965-66.

Again, I congratulate the sponsor of the bill. I hope he will refer the bill to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce so that we can obtain further information.

I understand that the honourable senator from Saskatchewan, Senator Argue, who was recently appointed to the Senate, intends to say a few words and perhaps he will be able to answer some of the questions I have asked the sponsor of this measure.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I wish to say how honoured I am to have this opportunity to address this chamber. I also wish to thank honourable senators at this time for the many kindnesses they have shown to me personally since I have been appointed to this chamber.

I am delighted to see the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly) with us, restored to health. It is a delight and a privilege for me to have the honour of working with him in this chamber.

I have had some experience in the past in another place. I was not known in those years for being reticent. I hope that I may be able to make a contribution to this chamber and so to make a contribution to the Parliament of Canada.

If I may, I which to express my appreciation on this occasion to the Prime Minister for having appointed me to the Senate. I hope my performance will be such as to warrant that appointment, and that I may conduct myself in the best interests of our parliamentary democratic institutions at all times.

I was delighted to hear the honourable Senator Hays introduce this legislation. However, I think he is a little too modest, and that he might have taken some well-deserved credit for the distinguished part that he played for a number of years as the minister responsible for the operation of the Farm Credit Act, having presided over the operation of that act during its period of greatest expansion.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Having said that, I wish to acknowledge, with the honourable Senator Aseltine, that it was the former administration which introduced this act under its present title, and that was a step forward. But surely that is what makes our country a great country and our democratic institutions great institutions, that no matter what political party assumes office from time to time, each in its own way and in its own right makes a contribution to progress and the well being of our nation.

Certainly the measure before the house at this time is an important step forward in the development of an act that has done, and undoubtedly will continue to do, great service to the agricultural industry of this country.

Apparently our nation today is in a mood to lend large sums of money for productive purposes. The quantity of money loaned from time to time on mortgages and farm property, as well as that loaned for other property, varies, and perhaps goes in cycles. However, most of us can remember that there were years when the very thought of mortgage indebtedness horrified the agricultural producer, and so there was an understandable reluctance for many years to promote farm mortgaging or farm credit. We have passed those days of reluctance and have learned that farm credit in its place plays a very useful part.

Certainly, it is necessary in the agricultural industry to have adequate amounts of credit at reasonable prices, if for no other purpose than to facilitate the transfer of land from one generation to the next. The farmers who have carried on farming operations for many years and have come to retirement age have a right to expect that they can dispose of their property to a son or to a neighbour at a reasonable price, obtain a reasonable return, and make it possible for a new generation of farmers to come along and play their part.

Honourable senators, I believe that we in this chamber are all in support of the family farm as the basic farm unit of our country. We do not want corporation farms; we do not want farmland in the control of a small minority of the people engaged in the agricultural industry.

We are convinced from past experience, from the way our country operates, that the most desirable type of farm is a family farm in which the farmer and his family provide the management and most of the labour, and with the use of modern machinery, this gives the most efficient agricultural industry of any nation in the world.

That is why we have been able to compete, sometimes with difficulty but nonetheless compete, in the agricultural markets in the world.

But as Senator Aseltine has said, with costs of farming going up today at very rapid rates, there is developing a need for higher prices for agricultural products. The price of wheat, for example, has changed very little. It has gone up to some extent, but generally it has changed very little at a time when machinery and other costs of farming have gone up by a very substantial amount.

Farming under the circumstances of today is a highly skilled operation. It is one that requires the best the farmer can put forward by way of management, because he is in a price-cost squeeze. The prices for his products have stayed relatively stable while the prices of the things he has bought have gone up by very substantial amounts.

We have seen in the last few years across this nation very substantial increases in the price of land. I am happy to see land being sold at reasonable prices so that the generation selling their farms may attain an adequate return, but to me at any rate there have been increases in the price of land in recent years that have been quite alarming. I am not certain that farmers are able today to afford high-priced machinery, to pay substantial taxes, and also to service the cost of land at present prices.

I congratulate Senator Hays in his work in extending the scope of the Farm Credit Act. I was pleased indeed that the present Government and previous administrations have been prepared to maintain the 5 per cent interest rate on the first $20,000 of loan.

I think this is an indication that the Government is sympathetic to the needs of the smaller farmer and to the need to help young farmers to start in the business of farming. But the Farm Credit Corporation itself is concerned, I believe, about land prices and the way they are going up. Like Senator Aseltine, I have not the latest report, because it is not yet published, but in the 1964-65 report, the latest available, I read at page 9 these words:

> Land prices, which have continued to increase during the year in many areas, have accentuated the problems of those wishing to start farming in those areas. A major factor influencing these prices appears to be the demand for land to expand the size of farms. The steady upward trend in land prices also may have attracted some investment in land by non-farmers. Under present circumstances, it is sometimes difficult for a lender such as the Corporation, in making appraisals for loans which are repayable over terms up to 30 years, to reconcile current land prices in some areas with the net income potential and loan repayment capacity of many farms in those areas.

We spend as a nation and as a Government large sums of money to promote the efficient production of agricultural products. If we are going to have land selling at very high prices, then it does seem to me that in a way the high price for land has defeated the benefit that comes from these other services. To pay an interest rate on a high price for land, or a high mortgage, is certainly a cost that takes away income from other needs of the farmer.

I think land needed to go up in price, but I also think the increase in the last few years has been alarming. I know on the prairies in certain areas citizens of the United States have bought land. This is their right under our laws, of course, but they have not come and settled as farming citizens, as we would like them to do. They merely move their machinery up from their own country when seeding commences, stay a couple of weeks, put in their crops and go back. They may make two or three trips up during the operating season, but they contribute very little to the community life in these areas.

Not a large percentage of the farms are controlled in this way, but I do think this has been a factor in pushing up the price of land. Non-farmers, have purchased land and, as the corporation has said, this too has tended to increase prices.

I wonder, however, if we are not getting a general body of agricultural credit available in such a way as perhaps to contribute to an undesirable increase in land prices. I do not think the Farm Credit Corporation by itself is really responsible for very much of this condition. However an individual farmer may be able to get a loan from the Farm Credit Corporation, he may be able to get loans from banks under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, and farm machine companies these days are providing their own line of credit.

A farmer can buy a truck or an automobile from a dealer, and he can finance it through the deal.

I know of individual cases where young farmers have obtained money from the Farm Credit Corporation then have gone heavily into debt to the banks, and added to that have gone heavily into debt by way of credit from farm implement companies, and credit from automobile and truck manufacturers. They have loaded themselves with an impossible debt.

Now, the Farm Credit Corporation itself carries on a service of advising people on credit, on their credit needs. This, I think, is good, but I do not think this same kind of service comes from anybody else. I think some consideration should be given by the Farm Credit Corporation and by members of this chamber to the end that advice may be available to farmers as to how they should use credit generally, so that they would not, through lack of knowledge, use all of the credit from all of the various avenues available today probably to the detriment of themselves personally and perhaps to the detriment of the agricultural industry.

In the province I come from there is land, good land, in the Regina plains area that has been sold recently for $150 an acre. The long-term average yield in that area is 20 bushels an acre or less. In my calculation, it is absolutely impossible for a farmer to pay $150 an acre and obtain for that investment an income of 6 or 7 per cent, or whatever might be considered a normal return, pay all his expenses and have anything left for his family. You might ask, why do farmers do this? Well, they are optimists. They believe they would like to have an extra piece of land. They have been looking at a piece of land for 10 or 20 years, and they would like to have it; they are willing to take a gamble. So perhaps some thought should be given to telling farmers who want to do this kind of thing that the economists and the agricultural experts have worked it out and it is not a very sound move.

This is not a problem confined only to Canada. It is a problem that exists in the United States. Having talked to their agricultural people from the very same standpoint. I know they are concerned.

I am pleased that this bill is being referred to a committee. I hope that when the experts from the Farm Credit Corporation come before that committee they can reassure us on some of the points I have raised, and perhaps steps can be taken to see that the general body of credit available in this country is used in the best possible way by farmers, in their own interests, so that there is a minimum amount of speculative use.

Many important amendments have been made to this act over the years, one of them by the honourable Senator Hays, a former Minister of Agriculture, when he brought in an amendment to provide for farm machinery syndicates.

Senator Aseltine was kind enough to ask me one or two questions. I just happen to have the press release from the Farm Credit Corporation in my hand, and it points out that:

> From the start of operations in January, 1965 to March 31, 1966, 137 loans were made to 120 syndicates, comprising 511 members, for a total approval of $988,893.

I think this is an excellent amendment to the act, whereby a number of farmers can get together and buy a piece of machinery which they can use collectively, because it is more economical than each purchasing the same machine. I think this has been a good improvement. I think this idea could be extended somewhat further. It would seem to me that this kind of provision should be made to apply to something more than machinery only. For example, if a number of grain farmers at Rosetown or Assiniboia would like to do something in addition to curling in the wintertime—for example, start a hog operation—then they should be able under an appropriate amendment to obtain funds to establish such an operation. I understand it can be done, but it has to be done as an ordinary farm loan, and this is complicated. The farmer may already have a loan, and this makes it still more difficult. However, this kind of further amendment could be provided that would make this act more useful, and I am hoping that these kinds of amendment may come forward from time to time.

In introducing this measure this afternoon the honourable Senator Hays gave us an excellent explanation of its good results over the years. Senator Aseltine raised some important problems and pointed out that another administration also had made its contribution. I hope that in the days ahead, in the near future, we will see some further amendments and further action that will improve the important functions of this, a very important act.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, before the house continues further with its business, would the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West), make a statement of what business we may expect in the immediate future. We seem to have been getting along very well with our work, and we have accomplished much in the last ten days, but we should like to know what other work is going to be placed before us.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, as the Order Paper indicates, we shall be receiving this afternoon reports from three committees. In addition, we shall have a number of third readings, continue the debate on the Bretton Woods Agreement, and as well continue the debate on the Speech from the Throne, which has been placed as item No. 1 on the agenda for this afternoon. We shall also deal with certain divorce resolutions.

So far as I am able to determine, tomorrow we shall have reports from the Finance Committee on the two bills which were referred to that committee, namely, the Science Council bill and the National Research Council bill. We may continue the debate on the Speech from the Throne tomorrow if anyone wishes to speak to it. There will be a number of bills for third reading, and we will give first reading to whatever new legislation has come to us from the other place by that time. I would hope that tomorrow evening the matters I am about to speak to will be given Royal Assent.

May I add that tomorrow I shall not be here, but Senator Hugessen has kindly agreed to lead in my place. I know that he will not only do well, but better than I do.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I interrupt the honourable leader? Could he anticipate what bills may be coming from the other place today or tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not know that I can at the moment. Perhaps, if I finish what I had thought of saying, there might be an indication in that of what we might expect.

The fact is that the Order Paper for today and for tomorrow outlining the formal proceedings in the chamber is rather thin, and the public judges us very much on what appears on the Order Paper and in Hansard when, in fact, there have been very important committee meetings taking place. The committees sat all this morning, and tomorrow is again a very important committee day for the Finance Committee.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: And starting at 9.30 a.m. too.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): We always start early, and we are always up early too.

I think honourable senators will be interested to know that since we returned on May 3 we have completed the consideration of ten Government bills and have given second reading to another one, namely, the Combines Investigation Act. We have also completed consideration of four private bills and have given second reading to six others. In addition we will have discharged orders in respect of two private members public bills, one on divorce and another on redistribution.

We have also dealt with two motions, one on the joint committee on employer-employee relations in the Public Service, and the other debating the report of the Standing Committee on Finance with respect to last year's Estimates.

The Throne Speech debate has been continued, and we have had a debate, rather short, but, so far as Senator Welch's contribution is concerned, very good, on the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association meeting in New Zealand. Also, we have adopted 130 divorce resolutions, and our committees, in addition to considering legislation, are continuing work on the current year's Estimates and on the inquiry which the External Relations Committee is conducting in respect of Commonwealth relations.

In a general way, that is what we have accomplished since May 3. I think it is a fairly formidable record of achievement, one which I believe all honourable senators can look upon with some degree of satisfaction.

When we reassemble we will have the automotive agreement resolution to debate, notice of which I shall be giving later today.

There are three important bills before the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. The first is the bill to amend the Bankruptcy Act. The committee considered that bill this morning, with the Minister of Justice in attendance, and will resume when the Senate returns. In the meantime, important amendments have been proposed which will receive the consideration of the officials and, indeed, of the Government.

The Combines Investigation Act, with which we dealt a few days ago, is also to be further studied and will be dealt with upon our return. Consideration of this matter would have been completed by now but unfortunately, the director is absent from the country, and because of the nature of the debate that took place here, I felt it only fair to all honourable senators to have consideration of that bill in committee deferred until his return.

Coming specifically to Senator Brooks' question, I am informed there is a possibility that by the time we return there will be ready for consideration a bill setting up a fund for rural conomic development. This bill has been printed and I think circulated in the other place. In any event, before the Senate reassembles it will be available, and I hope that any honourable senator interested in speaking upon that bill will hold himself or herself in readiness.

Then there are bills altering the status of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. If in fact the Senate does not have to be recalled before May 24, we will certainly from that date until the end of the month be looking forward to consideration of an important interim supply bill. As supply has been voted only until May 31, we are likely to receive another interim supply bill before the end of the month.

Apart from this rather cold recitation of our achievements, and this rather obvious patting of ourselves upon our mutual backs, I must refer to the fact that we have heard particularly good speeches from some of the new senators. I single out in particular the two maiden speeches made yesterday. Of course they were not made by inexperienced parliamentarians, but so far as concerns the Senate they were maiden speeches. Every honourable senator will agree that they were a source of gratification. Of course we expect Senator Aseltine to speak as well as he did because he is an old hand, especially in the field of agriculture; but now we have three other experts who are experienced debaters in this field. I am including in that number Senator McDonald, who has participated in debates over a long time.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: He is seasoned.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, he is seasoned. In addition, we have heard some rather bad puns.

I would be remiss in my duty if I did not express my gratitude to all honourable senators for the help and co-operation they have given, and the willingness they have shown to sit long hours in both the house and committees in order to accomplish this work.

If I single out the chairmen of the committees who have organized their sittings to meet the convenience of the Senate and its members, I am sure I shall be expressing our approval of their work. As the committees can sit only when they have a quorum, I wish to thank honourable senators who are members of those committees for their faithful attendance.

I repeat that I hope the new senators will continue to attend as many committee meetings as they can, whether or not they are members of the committee. There is no better training ground for the work of Parliament than the committees of the Senate.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 3 consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

[Translation]

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, when I rise to speak in this house, I am moved, and deeply so, because I wonder whether I am always equal to the task.

As I usually do at the beginning of such a speech, I should like first to offer my best wishes to the Queen of Canada, that great lady who sets an example for all ladies and Canadian wives. I wish her long life and I say: God save the Queen.

The Speaker of the Senate being absent, I wish him a prompt return. I hope he will get satisfactory results and be back in good health. I have also noticed that he learned to speak French much more rapidly than I learned to speak English.

As for our leader, when I learned about his illness at the beginning of the session, knowing him as we all do, and having been favoured by his support and his valuable advice, I was distressed. I am very pleased to express the hope that he will continue to enjoy radiant health as seems to be the case today. He is supposed to leave this evening or tomorrow—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Tomorrow, then, to represent us in England, which means he must feel rather well.

Therefore, I wish him a complete recovery.

I am always happy to hear the Leader of the Opposition express his criticisms which are never destructive but positive and always made with calm and courtesy. A courteous man is a great man.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: As far as the new senators appointed at the beginning of the session are concerned, I hope they will contribute to our work and help us for the greater good of the country. They must have noticed since they came to this house that productive and constructive work is done here and that what I would call small politics does not prevail.

As for the mover of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, he spoke like an old hand.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: An old hand, a man of great experience and I am happy to say that he is a very valuable addition to the senate.

As for the seconder, he is known as an old campaigner, a teacher, a man who has an extraordinary reputation, just like his father who left a fine name in the province of Quebec; the son takes after the father and that is very fortunate.

Before dealing with the two main points of my speech, I would like to repeat what the Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Pearson, said to the young yesterday. All problems cannot be solved right away. One has to think before passing to action. But I dare say that too many people think only after.

In the world today, after some twenty years of alleged peace, people are troubled more than ever before. Nobody is happy. Nobody is satisfied, because it would seem that only those who destroy, those who criticize, are right and that governments are always wrong. I wonder how a government could stand it, especially in our democratic world, if it did not have in its mind, to try to do its best for the good of the people.

I sometimes wonder—as a good farmer was saying some months ago—if democracy has not become a demoncracy. Nobody is satisfied. The way things are being discussed is frightening. Demands are being made all the time; demands are made against someone but very seldom are things being done with someone. Anarchy is rampant in the world and I am concerned for the future.

Then, laws are not being heeded; they are violated; strikes are called regardless of court injunctions or anything else. Unfortunately, at home, teachers are setting an example in that regard.

Let us have discussions in good faith, as discussions are when co-operation is involved. Everyone does not have the same opinion, no one has the monopoly of wisdom. But, dialogue entails an effort at mutual understanding, and when the majority has taken a decision, everybody follows suit not for the good of one man or one organization but for the common good. All my life, I have preached co-operation and it seems to me that it would be the salvation of the world if we realized what is co-operation: to co-operate is to act with someone and not against someone. That is what makes the whole difference between sound philosophy and anarchy.

Some contend that the Speech from the Throne contains nothing new. However, there were many projects in the throne speech last year but elections prevented the enactment of several bills. Since this government is sincere, it insisted on bringing back many bills which will be passed this year.

I should like to say to my honourable friend from Newfoundland, Senator Hollett, not to consider the Quebec Saint-Jean Baptiste Society as a religious group. Sometimes, among ourselves, we call members of that group protestants because some of them spend their time protesting So we say they have become protestants.

I would also tell our colleague from Manitoba, Senator Pearson, not to make a tragedy out of the discussions concerning the purchase of foreign aircraft; the wheat sale has nothing to do with that. The quality of aircraft cannot be dependent on the wheat trade. A few weeks ago, England went through a near-crisis because of a decision to buy American aircraft, and the British government is now negotiating the purchase of French Falcons.

All claims are not bad. Great capitalist organizations make more business than ever, with ever-increasing profits. Workers, in turn, seeing these things, also want to share in the profits. Sometimes, each side is overdoing it. That is why an honest dialogue should take place. When the organization involved is a public one, I say that, at the risk of being bitterly criticized by certain bodies, mandatory arbitration should apply, if an agreement cannot be reached. The nation must be placed above individual claims.

Previous speakers praised their area and their province. They told us of the interesting events taking place in their district. I have learned many things from the side-lines of history and all those things make up the history of the country. I am glad of it. But today, I shall not talk about my province, but deal instead with two points. You will say that I am very daring.

A few months ago, I was reading a report from the head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Edgar Hoover, which said:

> The main problem in America is not Communism but the breakdown of morality among our young people. If we do not manage to stop this degradation, America is lost.

In his article, Mr. Hoover states that, according to an official census, there were over 80,000 illegitimate children and over 100,000 abortions in secondary co-educational American schools in 1961.

Two international conventions were held last summer: one in Stockholm, which dealt mainly with crimes committed by young people; the second in Montreal, on crime in general. I followed both conventions carefully, and I am still reading the Stockholm report which says that a scientific way to rehabilitate young criminals has not yet been found, nor a way to reach the desired objective by proper scientific means.

The Montreal convention dealt not only with the rehabilitation of young criminals, but of all criminals. A joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons was established several weeks ago to study this problem. To my knowledge, none of the reports presented at these conventions studied the reason for this increase in crime. It seems to me that it would have been more sensible to educate before re-educating. If we stop to think, we find that mostly the young are enticed into delinquency because they are shown how to live in the midst of physical and material pleasures without having to work. Look at the TV set which you all have: the films that show how to live on fraud, how to live at the expense of others without working; how to live an extravagant and disorderly life, without any morals, how to rape, how to set up housekeeping three or five together, how to disrupt a family; finally how to do everything without ever doing anything good.

On the radio, as on television and in the newspapers, the limelight is given to sensational, extravagant events, which are of no value. A gangster will make the headlines in all the newspapers while the discoverer of an outstanding vaccine will only get a few lines. It seems people forget that pictures strike the fancy of the young; pictures of those scandals are splashed on the front page. The young are dazzled by those nefarious pictures.

I have personally witnessed a striking example of what the pictures shown on television can do. For many years, I was a school trustee in my town. I have always liked to take care of the young. Quite frequently, during recess, I would go and see the pupils, talk with them, find out if they liked their studies, if they had suggestions to make, and so on. I came one day upon a group of five or six pupils having a rather animated discussion. Coming close to them, I asked them what they were discussing. It was very simple. The day before, a detective film had been shown on television and, at the end of the film, after many mishaps, the thief who knew many tricks of the trade, had finally been caught. One of the pupils said: "If the thief had not made such a blunder, he would not have been caught." After having educated our children in that way, having distorted their mentality, how will we be able to re-educate them to-morrow with scientific methods? In my opinion, it would be much more logical not to corrupt them than to try to rehabilitate them. Blatant publicity emphasizes wrongdoings. A gangster will take the limelight in the press, on radio and on television. A few weeks ago, the C.B.C. spent thousands of dollars to interview a girl of rather dubious morals. But when our Queen went to the West Indies to visit Commonwealth member countries, the C.B.C. did not spend a cent to cover the Queen's visit.

To fight juvenile delinquency, spare time activities are organized in many areas. That is fine. The main objective is to entertain our youth, but I doubt whether the results are those looked for. Youth need to do more than play because deep down they are not bad; what they lack is healthy leadership, an ideal. When one is young, one is full of generosity; let us give our youth what they need, let us have faith in them and let us be convinced that they can do other things than mischief. They can love beauty, goodness.

In my opinion, the best argument against the death penalty is that we are responsible for the education of criminals. We put up with an unhealthy education which is spreading—not only in our own country—but throughout the world and which breeds delinquents. And in spite of that people say that the death penalty must be maintained. We are the first ones to blame.

But what is the use of saying all those things? Will some authority see to it to prevent this unwholesome education from being given on television, on the radio and in the papers? Indeed not, nobody will dare, alleging the famous argument of freedom as a pretext. It seems that freedom of the wrongdoers should be protected but nobody is concerned with the freedom of those who would do good. One of these days what happened two thousand years ago before Christ came on this earth will happen again. At that time the Romans dominated all the known countries which were reduced to slavery and paid tribute to the Roman people. The Romans said: What is the use of working, the people under our domination are bringing us everything we need without our having to do any effort, let us be merry. They lived extravagantly for pleasure and enjoyment but the pleasures of the flesh do not last long, they make man sad. The family did not exist any more, free love was accepted. One day, seeing what was going on, the leaders of the Romans became frightened and said to themselves that if they did not change their way of living, in a few years' time there would not be any young people to take over from the generation of the day and they would disappear. They felt then that the granting of family allowances might be the way to reorganize the family. That shows that family allowances are nothing new; that system was invented two thousand years ago. Roman families which had one child were very few; they received such an allowance. Families with two children were fewer still and their allowance was not doubled but increased fivefold. However, it was too late already and the peoples called the Barbarians, the Visigoths and the Ostrogoths, took over the Roman empire which disappeared forever.

Today underdeveloped peoples, especially Asians, such as the Chinese, are not afraid of making sacrifices and some day soon I cannot say when, they will take over and lord it over us.

About hunger in the world, we have been reading for some time various reports, according to which in a few years food production will not be sufficient to feed all the people on earth. Recently a French agronomist and economist gave a lecture at the Université Laval in Quebec city and at the University de Montréal. He said that in year 2000 people would be starving to death and that the remedy was family planning, with families of one or two children. I have just referred to what happened to the Romans two thousand years ago. The same thing could happen here if birth control were to be adopted. Instead of birth control, if a positive rather than a negative policy were adopted, the results would be quite different. It would be more sensible to increase production rather than to restrain consumption.

In 1900, that is about 66 years ago, 75 per cent of the population in Canada was living out in the country, and 60 to 70 per cent cultivated the soil and made the land productive. Today, the reverse is true. Hardly 30 per cent of the population lives out in the country and of these 30 per cent, 10 to 15 per cent only cultivate the soil and are concerned with making the land productive. Yet, much more wheat, butter and cheese is being produced than formerly; the same thing is true of livestock for butchering; egg production has increased, and so on. What is the reason for this? Our population is better educated and has adopted more efficient and faster production methods. For instance, in the old days on the Western Prairies, plowing was done with a double plow harnessed to two or three horses while today, plowing is being done with tractors eight and ten furrows at a time. More work is being done in one day than could be done in ten or fifteen days some years ago.

In the eastern provinces, soil is being fertilized much more efficiently and this has brought a four- and five-fold increase in crops So, today, Canada sells wheat to all countries of the world and large quantities of meat to the United States, and so on. Why not educate underdeveloped nations? Take Israel, a country organized barely twenty years ago. A friend of mine, recently returned from that country, was telling me that he had never seen such a marvelous thing. Entering Israel from Jordan, he realized that Jordan was a desert where nothing grew. It is an arid land, burnt by the sun. Once in Israel, he found out that what used to be a desert had been transformed into a productive land, covered with splendid forests and lush vegetation. Everybody is working and trying to produce and that country which was worthless for cultivation, now sells fruit to all countries of the world. Another example is Russia. The Ukraine was formerly the breadbasket of Russia and could, at the time of the Czars, not only feed all the Russians but export wheat throughout the world. Nowadays, Russia has to import wheat to feed its people.

In December 1949 Chiang Kai-shek, with 500,000 survivors of his defeated army, and a little more than a million refugees, set foot on the island of Taiwan. Today, with a population of 12,500,000, those nationalist Chinese have the second highest standard of living in the Far East, second only to that of the Japanese. At one time this island could only survive by depending heavily on imports; today it exports, and its commercial exports in 1964 exceeded $52,700,000. Taiwan became what it is thanks to the assistance of the United States; that assistance is ever decreasing and I wonder whether it is still needed. Starvation gave way to abundance. How can one explain such a success? By the fact that the Taiwan government made good use of the financial assistance it received from the United States and also by the fact that Taiwan Chinese people are hard workers. According to an American official, the cause of that success is that, instead of first asking for steelworks and an airport for jets, like many under developed countries, Taiwan asked the United States to implement a program aimed at the very roots of the farm question. This goes to say that where there is a will there is a way, but the will has to be there first.

A few weeks ago, I read a very interesting article in Science et Vie of December 1965, entitled "How to feed six billion people". Six billion people will be the earth's population around the year 2000. Now, with 3 billion at the present time, it is estimated that 10 to 15 per cent of the human race do not get the necessary amount of calories for the work expected from them. Furthermore, 35 to 40 per cent are perhaps underfed. There were times of starvation, for instance between 1920 and 1925 in Russia. In recent years, China, India, Egypt and Cuba had to import millions of bushels of wheat from Canada, the United States and France. Now, we see countries with an abundant production, with a rapidly increasing demography, which cannot manage to feed their people. It is not an opposition between a country with rich lands and one with a poor soil, but rather an opposition between unevenly developed populations and with farming is developed to different levels. It seems to me that the future of humanity lies in the development of agriculture. The countries that need food do not always have infertile land. The Nile delta, the Ganges delta, the Mekong, the Red river and the Yangtze river irrigate lands almost as fertile as those of the Ukraine. Fertilizers, phosphates, potassium and nitrogen would make this soil more fertile.

Is another example necessary? The Danish farmer is said to be the only European farmer with an average salary higher than that of city dwellers. Denmark exports products even to France and to the Common Market countries in spite of customs duties. The Danish farmer is the most highly educated farmer in Europe, followed by the English farmer and the Dutch farmer. The Dutch farmer has one of the highest standards of living in the world, yet Denmark and Holland both have very poor soil, but it has been transformed by scientific agricultural methods. Moreover, agricultural experts tell us that if all the land in the world were cultivated like that of Belgium, it could feed not six but twelve billion men in the year 2000.

Many countries have made spectacular progress in the conquest of space; even China has joined the nuclear armaments race, but neither China nor Russia can adequately feed their population, although close to 50 per cent of their people are farmers. Chemical fertilizers alone, of course, cannot make the land productive. It is true they are a great help; but the land must also be studied to determine which part of it is suited to a particular crop, whether a certain region is better suited to cattle or to the dairy industry, whether nitrogenous fertilizers will make a particular soil more productive, and so on. The main thing is to put back into the earth what crops take out of it. I think every effort should be made in that direction, so as to help these underdeveloped countries to produce their own food and, at the same time, teach them how to cultivate the land.

In principle, each country should feed off the products of its own soil. Will we ever achieve a world body with the object of feeding humanity? It is a pipe dream, an impossible flight of fancy but, nevertheless, I hold to this wish, to this dream.

Were it to come true, such a dream might also have other results. Better educated, enjoying a higher living standard, people would be less inclined to mutual destruction, to mutual hatred, for it often happens that people living in hardship, are envious of others with a higher standard of living and envy is always a bad counsellor. Carrying out this positive policy, we could succeed in feeding every nation on earth and thus spread upon the earth a spirit of co-operation, of bonne entente and of charity. Then, the world of tomorrow would be an improvement on the world of today because there would no longer be mutual suspicion, it would not occur to anyone to seek at the neighbour's what is available at home; each would have the fulfilment of his own livelihood; each would be happy to live in peace.

I am dreaming of this with my eyes open, as something feasible if, in all parts of the world, instead of the negative education that is being dispensed today, a positive education was given, based on love, charity and mutual help.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 10, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard for the second reading of Bill C-144, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, before beginning my remarks on the bill, I feel I should mention something that is of interest to us all.

The honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West), is leaving tomorrow to attend a Commonwealth conference overseas. We all wish him bon voyage, and trust that he will have a profitable and pleasant trip. I do not think it will be out of place if I warn him to take better care of himself than he did the last time he was out of the country.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Honourable senators, although the subject of this bill is interesting I have found it a very difficult one on which to prepare a speech. I had hoped that someone who was better versed in international finance and international trade would have accepted this responsibility.

The bill has been before the other place, and I followed it through the resolution, first reading, second reading and committee stages. There seemed to be very little difference of opinion among the members of the other place as to its merits.

I do wish to congratulate the honourable sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Leonard) on the manner in which he introduced it in this chamber. We are never surprised when he makes an enlightening presentation. The only disappointment I had was in not hearing more about the bill. I liked the honourable sponsor's remarks so much that I could have listened to him at much greater length.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: It was pretty late in the day.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Senator Leonard divided his presentation of this bill into three parts. He dealt first with the second clause which has to do with the report of the Minister of Finance, and said that the purpose of that clause was to provide for the submission of an annual report on a calendar-year basis rather than on the basis of the fiscal year, and he gave very good reasons for this. There seemed to be little difference of opinion as to clause 1, and I have no particular objection to it.

This bill is brief and for that reason does not look impressive, but if one analyzes the contents it assumes great proportions.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Financially.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Financially, and generally as far as international affairs are concerned. It affects the lives of many millions of people and the governments of many countries.

The sponsor of the bill spoke of the Bretton Woods Agreement Act being the result of the devastation of countries in two world wars, the terrible depression of the thirties, and the disruption of trade caused thereby. It was determined by a group of nations in 1944 that something must be done to build up the economy of the nations which had been affected. World financial security needed attention. The factors which the honourable sponsor mentioned formed the background of the necessity of this legislation and the Bretton Woods Agreement.

The sponsor divided his remarks regarding the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development into two categories. He mentioned the fact that the International Monetary Fund had to do particularly with solving the problem of international finance, international trade, balance of payments, maintaining the stability of exchange, and other matters. I do not intend to deal with those.

He also pointed out the purpose of establishing the International Bank, which was drawn up at the United Nations Monetary and Financial Conference, was the same as that of the International Monetary Fund which was established in 1944 at Bretton Woods.

The sponsor pointed out further that the purposes of the International Bank are, first, to assist in the reconstruction and development of member countries by facilitating the investment of capital for productive purposes, thereby promoting higher living standards and the balanced growth of international trade. Secondly, the encouragement of private foreign investment. Thirdly, to make loans to further the above-mentioned purposes when private capital is not available on reasonable terms. This embraces many undertakings, and many nations have been and are being assisted by the International Bank.

The functions of the two organizations are quite different, but they are both essential for the prosperity of the western world.

Since the signing of the Bretton Woods Agreements in 1944 these matters have been discussed in many lands and in many tongues. When I was in attendance at the United Nations a few years ago I heard discussions on the Bretton Woods Agreements. One hears the agreements discussed at international parliamentary associations, at the Commonwealth associations, and at other important meetings in various countries.

Since 1944, Canada has played an important part in the Bretton Woods Agreements. We have played a proud and, I think, a generous part so far as many of the smaller nations and some larger nations are concerned.

It must be remembered that when we assist other nations we also assist ourselves. Canada is a great trading nation. We look forward to increasing our trade with other parts of the world and we realize that this can only be done if other nations are placed in a position to buy and purchase our goods.

In 1958 Canada took advantage of the opportunity to borrow $275 million from the fund. Great Britain borrowed some $2 billion and other countries also borrowed considerable amounts at that time.

In 1959 the original quota under the act had to be increased, which was quite natural, because the situation in the world had greatly changed and more balance was needed in financial matters. The 1944 quotas were not nearly sufficient for what was needed in 1959. In 1959 the quota was not adequate, and is not adequate for what we need today.

The honourable Senator Leonard told us yesterday about the exchange prices which arose in 1962. At that time the situation was so serious that it was decided to organize a group of ten countries as a sort of consultative group to see what might be done in a satisfactory way to assist monetary exchange and meet the difficulties we were experiencing at that time. Canada was a member of the group of ten. I understand the finance minister of each country was made a governor, and the deputies were officials of this group. In 1963 the finance ministers instructed their ten deputies to make an investigation and review of the functions of the International Monetary Fund and the need for liquidity in 1964.

It was agreed that quotas must be increased. Meetings were held and important recommendations made. I understand there was little disagreement among the nations as to what should and must be done. The main problem at the time was not the increase of subscriptions and quotas, because all were agreeable and willing that this should be done. However, out of the deliberations there evolved what has apparently become a serious problem, and they concluded that some improvement was needed in the reserve system. When I said I would have liked to hear a few more remarks from the honourable sponsor, I meant that I would have liked him to deal with some of the difficulties which the reserve system is encountering.

So that honourable members might understand better what we mean by this, I would like to quote from report No. 5 of the proceedings of the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee of the House of Commons. They were discussing Bill C-144, and I must say that the meetings of that committee were taken up practically in full by a discussion of this problem of reserve.

Mr. Hockin, who is vice-president and a very distinguished and well-informed member of the group of ten—I suppose one of the best informed men in this connection to be found anywhere—first mentioned in his evidence the countries which belonged to the group of ten. I would like to read the names of those countries: Belgium, Canada, France, The Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan, The Netherlands, Sweden, The United Kingdom and the United States augmented by Switzerland which is not a member of the Fund. Switzerland, though it is not a member of the fund, has given considerable help in connection with the activities of the fund.

I read from the report:

> These Governors instructed their Deputies to examine and report in the Spring of 1966 on "What basis of agreement can be reached on improvements needed in the international monetary system; including arrangements for the future creation of reserve assets, as and when needed".

Those were the instructions that were given to this committee. It mentions the "future creation of reserve assets," and I am sure we will hear more of this later. Continuing:

> The problem now before the Group of Ten Deputies arises from recognition of two facts: first, the growth in the stock of monetary gold has not been and is not expected to be adequate to meet the needs of the international monetary system for reserves—

One reason might be that which was given by Senator Sarto Fournier this afternoon, when he said that we were not paying enough for gold and that the gold mines are going out of operation.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think Mr. Hockin said that too in the same place.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Yes.

The report continues:

> —secondly, although the official needs for reserves beyond those served by gold have been met in the main by increases in official holdings of reserve currencies, especially U.S. dollars, it now seems unlikely that, for a variety of reasons, appreciable further increases in reserves will occur in this way.
> Accordingly, an attempt is being made to provide, as need arises, a supplementary reserve asset, that is to say, an asset that supplements both the U.S. dollar and gold in official reserves and in transactions among monetary authorities.

So, as I said a moment ago, I think that the question of reserves is very important. It has been suggested that the new reserve, the new quota of gold and currency, would be of the subscribing countries instead of the United States.

The United States has advised that it is no longer able to finance this reserve as it has done in the past, and I understand that the reserve at present is made up of about one-third gold and two-thirds currency, most of which is American currency.

I read further from the report:

> You know that up to now the reserves, currency reserves, official reserves of countries in the world, at least in the western world, have been made up mainly out of gold and dollars. Now, these two traditional sources of reserves may in the future dry up. This is particularly true of the dollar element in the international reserves as and when the American balance of payments really swings back into equilibrium, because then the provision of reserves for the rest of the world through the United States balance of payments will come entirely to an end.

In that case, gold reserves are not enough. At present it makes up about one-third, and we may suddenly be in the position of insufficiency of reserves. It is not necessary to point out that that would be very detrimental to the economy of the whole world.

Our problem, then, is the urgency to find the right kind of reserves for the I.M.F. I know that this is being worked on at the present time. At present in the United States the balance of payments are considerably out of equilibrium, and possibly we cannot depend much longer on these balance of payments.

Honourable senators, I feel it would be presumptuous on my part even to try to comment further, particularly on this matter of reserves. Moreover, it is really not part of the bill except in an indirect way.

The bill contains two clauses. As to clause 1, there is no controversy over the need for the quotas and contributions, nor is there any objection to clause 2, a very minor clause.

I would suggest, however, that it might be interesting to honourable senators to have some idea as to this provision. In that respect I believe you will find page 227 of the Report of the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee very interesting reading.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It is a house committee.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It is a house committee, yes, and it did an excellent job. Some very outstanding men appeared before it.

The first country as to quota—and this is after the 25 per cent increase over 1965—is the United States, whose quota is $5,106 million. In second place is the United Kingdom, with a quota of $2,440 million; and the third is the Federal Republic of Germany, with $1,200 million. It is remarkable that a country such as Germany, which 25 years ago was practically down and out, should now be the third leading country of the world in trade and finance.

France is the fourth country, with $985 million; India is fifth, with $750 million. This is rather a pleasant surprise. Canada is in sixth place, with $740 million. It is to her great credit that in a list of over 100 nations of the world she stands just sixth from the top, and of this I think we should be very proud.

Japan is No. 7. We might make the same comment on Japan as we did on Germany: here was a devastated country, practically down and out just 25 years ago. Yet today she is the seventh nation in the world as far as trade is concerned, and her quota is $725 million.

China is in eight position—I think that means Formosa.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: The ninth is Belgium, a very small but still a very progressive country with a quota of $422 million.

Hon. Mr. Paterson: I think Italy comes in there.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Yes, Italy has $625 million, and comes tenth. It is the last of the ten as far as the record is concerned.

Honourable senators, as I said, I am not going to take any more of your time. I believe there is absolute agreement as to the necessity of this bill, and the quotas and subscriptions it provides. As the honourable sponsor suggested yesterday, it is the intention to have this bill referred to a committee. It is well that it should go to committee, and I would like to see some of these men who gave evidence before the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee of the Commons appear before our committee. Probably Mr. Hockin, Mr. Hudon and Mr. Lawson would be available. There was also a Mr. Emminger, from Germany who appeared before that committee. Mr. King from the United States gave evidence, and he might appear before us. All these men gave evidence before the Commons committee, particularly on reserves.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your attention. As I say, this subject is a little out of my line, but I have found it very interesting indeed.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Leonard speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators, I will first take a moment to thank Senator Brooks for his contribution and presentation which was, as always, interesting and useful.

I quite agree with him that the creation of a new reserve unit or reserve asset is an extremely important question and one that is demanding the attention of the major countries concerned with international exchange. However, this has been a matter of discussion and study for a great many years.

As far back as 1944, when they were forming the fund in the first instance, Keynes had a recommendation for a reserve unit which he termed a "bancor." In the intervening years many other proposals have been made. Currently the unit they have been discussing mostly has been a unit called the "cru"; and, as one can see from the letters, it does refer to a reserve unit. There are various schools of thought.

There is general agreement on the desirability of adding another reserve asset to gold and United States dollars, which are the two main currencies used at the present time as reserve units, and all schools of thought are in agreement with respect to the desirability of a new unit. Canada supports that proposition, but the variation of opinion is as to what backing and what kind of unit we should have. There are some, of course, who still feel that to have the confidence of the nations of the world it would still have to be backed strongly by gold. There are others who believe a more flexible type of unit can be evolved.

These discussions are still going on and are making progress. No doubt, in due course there will be some agreement reached as between the various schools of thought as to what is the best form of new reserve unit. In the meantime the strengthening of the fund by these additions to the quotas temporarily helps to meet the demands that may be made in the next few years before a new reserve unit is established.

Having said that, I should explain that I left out any mention of it in my remarks on second reading partly because my knowledge is limited on the subject, and it is a technical subject on which we should really hear from experts, and partly because it is not strictly relevant to the bill, as the bill deals only with the increase in quotas. Perhaps, in due course, we will have some legislation on a new reserve unit.

As the honourable Senator Brooks said, it is the intention to refer this bill to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. I believe that committee is scheduled to meet at 9.30 tomorrow morning, and we will have there the appropriate officials who will add to any information that has come out in the Senate chamber and answer any further questions.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY (SASKATCHEWAN)—SECOND READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill S-32, respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to grant authority to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build a branch line of railway a distance of approximately 11.0 miles from a point near Fox Valley, Saskatchewan, in a southeasterly direction to a property in section 25, township 16, range 25 west of the third meridian in the province of Saskatchewan.

Fox Valley is located on Canadian Pacific's Burstall subdivision about 70 miles west of Swift Current, Saskatchewan. The branch line will be built in a generally southeasterly direction to a property owned by the Saskatchewan Minerals Corporation in the vicinity of Ingebright Lake where a plant is in the course of erection to produce sodium sulphate.

I am sure all honourable senators are aware that a railway company must come to Parliament for authority to construct a branch line which is more than six miles in length.

Saskatchewan Minerals Corporation own a deposit of sodium sulphate, estimated at 9 million tons, at Ingebright Lake. It is understood that the plant, which is to be constructed during the mid-summer of 1966, will commence operation in the late fall of this year. During the first two years, annual production is expected to amount to a minimum of 55,000 tons, and during the next five years a minimum of 75,000 tons. After that time, production will depend upon demand, and there is every indication that the demand will continue to grow.

I do not know whether all honourable senators are aware of the fact that the sodium sulphate division of Saskatchewan Minerals now operates a sodium sulphate plant at Chaplin, Saskatchewan, and last year showed an operating profit of over $1 million.

The Government of Saskatchewan has decided not only to construct a new crown corporation sulphate plant, but has extended the privilege to two private companies to develop two other sodium sulphate plants in the province. One property is at Alsask and the second, known as the Tombill property is located at Snakehole Lake just north of the town of Tompkins. There will be three new plants going into production some time this summer.

Sodium sulphate is used primarily in kraft paper manufacture, although it is extensively used in the manufacture of glass and glass wool, pharmaceuticals and soaps, synthetic detergents, stock feeds, textiles and ceramics. The bulk of the production from the Ingebright Lake plant will require long-distance transportation to the pulp mills of British Columbia and eastern Canada. Of course, the most economical method of moving a commodity such as sodium sulphate is by rail. This is the reason why the Government of the Province of Saskatchewan has asked the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to construct this line into Ingebright Lake.

The plant will be located about one-quarter of a mile from Ingebright Lake. The proposed branch line will connect with the present Canadian Pacific trackage at Fox Valley, where an agent is located and where there are facilities available for handling traffic originating or terminating at the new plant. The present freight service to Fox Valley consists of a mixed train on Tuesdays and Thursdays of each week. Traffic from the plant will be handled from Fox Valley to Leader, and then east to Swift Current, or west to Bassano for main line movement to either eastern or western Canada.

The entire route of the proposed line is through prairie land which is privately owned. The first nine miles, approximately, after leaving Fox Valley is through land used for grain crops, while the remainder is through grazing land. There are no streams or rivers to be crossed, although there is a line of sloughs. It is not expected that the construction of the line will create any serious difficulty. The route has been selected as the one most feasible from the standpoint of best serving the needs of the industry, as well as economical railway construction and operation.

Honourable senators, this is an important economic project for both Saskatchewan and Canada as a whole, and the construction of this line is in the best interests of the province and the country.

If the house sees fit to give this bill second reading I intend to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY (ALBERTA)—SECOND READING

Hon. J. Harper Prowse moved the second reading of Bill S-34, respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

He said: Honourable senators, as this is the first time I have had an opportunity of speaking in this chamber, may I express my appreciation to you all for the kindnesses that have been shown me in different ways since my appointment. It is too early, perhaps, tc make promises, but I should like to assure the members of the press, who were so distressed at the action of the Government in making this appointment, that if in ten years' time they can say the same things they thought they were saying at the time of my appointment then I shall consider whether I should continue to occupy my seat.

The purpose of this bill is much the same as that introduced by Senator McDonald, except that this branch line is in the Province of Alberta. The bill asks for authority to construct a branch line from a point near Didsbury, which is approximately 50 miles north of Calgary in the Province of Alberta, to a point 16½ miles west where Canadian Superior Oil Limited has established what is known as a scrubbing plant, through which natural gas is cycled before it is put into the pipe line. This scrubbing operation takes out what are called impurities, but which contain very valuable chemicals.

At the present time Canadian Superior Oil Limited is processing some 240 million cubic feet of gas a day, from which they extract propane, I-butane, and N-butane. I think the propane is used entirely for heating, while the I-butane and N-butane are constituents of the liquefied petroleum gas, or L.P.G., which is used to run various gas plants for individuals. The butanes are used to some extent for this, but they are much more valuable as a basic chemical in the petro-chemical industry.

At the present time these two commodities are run by pipe line from the extraction plant to the siding at Didsbury, where they are loaded into tank cars.

The gas comes from the Harmattan-Elkton and Harmattan-East fields, one of which produces a very sour gas, containing a high percentage of hydrogen sulphide. There is under construction a plant, expected to be in operation by July 1st of this year, which will process that gas, and produce from it elemental sulphur in quantities amounting to 817 long tons per day, or 283,000 long tons per year, for a period of 25 years—and 283,000 long tons is approximately 311,000 ordinary tons.

To give honourable senators some idea of the size of this production, I will say that it is greater than the total amount of sulphur used in Canada in 1962. It is only since 1961 that we have started to produce sulphur from the scrubbing of gas, and it is becoming an increasingly important commodity.

This sulphur will be taken by tankcars to the main line, from where it will go to various parts of Canada. Most of it will go to Vancouver where it will be used in the paper industry, which uses about half of the sulphur being used in Canada. The remainder will be used chiefly by the fertilizer industry, which is another big user of sulphur. It can, of course, be used in the manufacture of sulphuric acid and other chemicals. The value of this sulphur is approximately $10 a ton, according to the latest figures that are available to me. I have been checking on this commodity in the library in order to be able to answer any questions.

From what I have said, I think it is clear that sulphur is an important commodity, and this production will put Canada into a position of being a net exporter of sulphur rather than being a net importer, thus putting it in a better position in respect of world markets.

Another reason for the scrubbing process is that the gas cannot be put into the pipe line before the hydrogen sulphide is removed. Hydrogen sulphide will completely eat away the pipe itself in a very short time, and by removing these commodities the gas is made usable. Another advantage is found in the fact that the commodities which are removed from the gas will, in the life of the plant, produce some $75 million, as well as work for the people who operate it. From an economic point of view this is a desirable thing.

The route of the proposed line to Didsbury has been selected by the engineers because it seems the most feasible. Gradients along the route in both directions can be held to 1.5 per cent. On all the other alternative routes the engineers would have to have gradients up to 2 per cent, which I gather makes it very difficult for them. The route goes through country which is important and valuable farming land. It is all privately owned, and the company will have to make its own arrangements with the owners for its right-of-way.

In view of the great value of these commodities to Alberta and Canada, I feel that this line is required in the interests of the country as a whole.

If the house gives this bill second reading I intend to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications before which interested parties may make representations.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I wish to compliment Senator Prowse on his presentation of this bill, and to say that I am in favour of it.

In recent weeks and months I have had visitations from the officers of the municipality of Mountain View in which this proposed line is to be built. They express a great deal of concern about the location of the line, but they are not opposed to the building of the plant. It is probably the first time in my experience that I have seen western farmers concerned about the use of land.

Senator Prowse pointed out that this proposed line would go through some of the finest farming land in Alberta. It is all privately owned, and the railway has obtained options on a number of farms. Other farmers are refusing to give options on their land, but of course their land can be expropriated.

The farmers of that area and the officers of the municipality are suggesting an alternative route, which they say is not much longer and would not go through such good farm land. They are most anxious to have the opportunity to make representations to our Committee on Transport and Communications. I only hope they will be given time to come here and make their representations.

Senator Prowse did not say that this Canadian Superior Oil plant was located 16.5 miles west of Didsbury and is literally on the edge of one of the greatest known sulphur deposits in the world. The long range planning of the company at some later date is to extend the line another 40 miles west to the Panther River area, where these huge sulphur deposits are situated.

Again, the farmers in the municipality have an alternative route to suggest. Whether their desire to conserve and preserve excellent farming land and not to have their farms cut up by a railway line, whether they can avoid the building of seven railway crossings which would affect their school lands, and whether they can avoid a situation in which the railway company will have the right to sell a lot of small parcels of land for smallholdings, I am not sure. I do not know if they can make their case stick. However, I think it is most important that they have the opportunity to present their case.

This is one of those instances where everybody agrees on the objectives. There is no doubt that it is a fine economic development, and one which I am sure will go through. I would like to see it go through with the least inconvenience possible to the people concerned who are farming in that area.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Prowse, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE CONTINUED

Consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

(The following speech was delivered in the Senate yesterday—see p. 530)

[Translation]

Hon. Sarto Fournier: Honourable senators, I would like the first words which I have the honour to utter in this house this afternoon to be addressed to our new Speaker. The government made a very happy choice in appointing to preside over our deliberations a senator who is perfectly able to maintain the prestige of the position he occupies as well as the authority of the high functions he is called upon to assume.

We also have the pleasure of having among us ten new senators. I wish to tell them personally, and I think that others feel the same way, how happy we are to see them here because we are convinced that the Senate will be all the better for their presence. There is no doubt that their relatives, their friends and all their acquaintances must rejoice over their appointment. On the other hand, there will also be some people who, for unknown reasons, will make sarcastic remarks about them and the institution in which they are called upon to carry out their activities. Sometimes, we hear people inveigh against the existence of the Senate, but those who say such things remind us of a lot of young men who, still wet behind the ears, suddenly feel that their father has become a nuisance in the house and that he is not needed. Such things happen. Of course, they will become used to such irresponsible treatment as we had to do.

They are here to legislate as we are. There is nothing more difficult than the passing of a law. Any law circumscribes the freedom of the citizen. It piles up new duties on the shoulders of each citizen. Therefore, it is of capital importance that any law be something that has been worked on, thought out, studied from all sides and in all its implications. Moreover, a law cannot be passed hastily. One of the greatest accomplishments of the British genius is to have understood that it is impossible to legislate overnight. Any law is the consequence of a fact. It creates an obligation and that is why in a country like ours each bill introduced in the Commons undergoes three readings, three studies and then it is sent to a committee. It is also introduced in the other place which in our country is called the Senate; in England, it is called the House of Lords. The Senate was not a British invention. The second chamber has always existed among the peoples who have won fame in ancient times and who have greatly contributed to the civilization to which we are lucky enough to belong.

The Senate is useful in that it is a place of sober second thought; it is a place where possibly a required amendment, a needed correction may be made. Therefore, so far as the new senators are concerned, such will be their new duties. They are invested with high functions. They are invested with other great responsibilities and we all wish them success and happiness in their career.

We were all greatly worried for a while at the beginning of the session, when the Leader of the Government had to spend some time in hospital on account of a serious illness. We missed him. We felt sorry about his illness. We are happy to see him back among us and that he is recovering his strength day by day. He is perhaps now in better shape than he was last year to fulfil the duties incumbent upon his office in this house, for the benefit of the Senate as well as of the nation at large.

I want to join the chorus of praise addressed to the mover and to the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, Senator McDonald, who is new among us, and Senator Gouin, a veteran of this house; both made speeches worthy of our congratulations and our thanks.

Honourable senators, listening to the Speech from the Throne delivered by His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, at the opening of this session, I was impressed by the paragraph dealing with our international economic relations:

> International objectives must be pursued by economic and social as well as political means.

And he added:

> My government will recommend to Parliament further measures to improve and develop international economic conditions and to sthengthen the Canadian economy.

Emphasis was thus placed on the economic situation, a major problem, frequently ignored and disregarded in the past by intellectuals who claimed that people interested in the economy, in trade, in business, to be too matter-of-fact, and devoid of ideals. But nowadays, with advancing civilization, we can see that progress in all its forms is making giant strides, thanks first and foremost to economic development. Moreover, if we have been able, to a certain extent, to solve our difficulties in the social field, it is because we live in a country with a sound economy which is the basis of everything.

This is why I decided to use the paragraph I quoted from the Speech from the Throne as the subject matter of the speech I will have the privilege to deliver this afternoon; I will try to make it as short as possible. I will deal with our country's natural resources, especially the production and sale of gold, and the production and sale of uranium in Canada.

In 1934, I think, we were careless or naive enough to sign an agreement in Washington under which the price of gold was set and frozen at $35 an ounce. Moreover, the agreement, which is still in force after 32 years, makes no provision for denouncing or amending it. Here we are, hamstrung by an agreement that set the price of gold at $35 in 1934. While the war lasted, while controls remained, there was no discussion. But as soon as the war ended, as soon as trade and commerce returned to normal a cry of alarm was sounded. People concerned with the production of gold rushed to Ottawa to tell the government: Help us, we are sinking. Those people who were obliged to sell gold at $35 an ounce, were unable to produce gold due to fantastically rising costs. The government understood and passed the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to save the gold mines from disaster. That took place in 1948; little change has taken place since.

This legislation in force since 1948 to help the gold mines has cost us in subsidies $200 million. In 1948, there were 117 gold mines in operation in the country; today, in 1966, 48 remain, and out of the 48, 44 live from hand-outs. Moreover, when we signed the agreement in 1934, we were signing the death warrant of the gold-mining industry in Canada and Canadians blindly and naively were taking perpetual vows of poverty and obedience.

It seems to me, honourable senators, that the time has come to amend such obsolete legislation, to change such distressing legislation that is paralyzing the economy of the country, to change this legislation under American control and under which we are selling to the Americans, for $35 an ounce, gold that we produce at a cost often as high as $40 and $45.

Which private industry, which private enterprise, which country would sell its goods below cost? That is nonsense, an economic heresy. Some adjustment is necessary. The present trend can no longer continue, because we are not deriving any profit from our gold, which is a very great asset to our country. If we should sell more of our gold at $35 an ounce, we would grow poorer. In addition, confusion and anarchy are rampant. Our gold mines are drifting towards bankruptcy. We are again haunted by possible ghost towns and villages.

Honourable senators, I suggest that this state of things must change; it is nonsensical that the Americans should control the price of our gold. There is the International Monetary Fund, of course, but it is also under the control of Washington. It is unseemly that the Americans should control the price of gold and buy from us, at $35 an ounce, a metal which may have cost us twice as much to produce. Readjustments must be made. Alternative means exist. One might object that an increase in the price of gold would cause inflation. I doubt that; such a thing has never been proved; it has been repeated over and over again but it has never been proved; it is a false theory in my opinion.

Prior to the stabilization of the price of gold, there was no inflation; it came after stabilization. There may be no cause and effect relation here, but it is nevertheless an alarming coincidence.

The price of gold does not create inflation. Inflation occurs when there is such an increase in prices of the necessities of life that the consumer does not have the means to pay the selling price and to buy what he needs. The causes of inflation are mysterious; some of them are hazy. But I do not believe that the raising of the price of gold to an adequate level which would bring in a fair and reasonable profit would cause inflation. It might do so if the price of gold were raised too high, to its 1934 rate, but not if the increase in production cost is added and if the 1934 profit is maintained—and a profit of $100 in 1934 was equivalent to at least $300 today because money has less value. If, proportionately speaking, we were to raise the price of gold overnight from what it was in 1934 to what it should be in 1966, the change might be too violent.

There are other formulas, other solutions. Perhaps we could proceed slowly, raising the price over a five-year period until it reaches a reasonable level. But this process may also have its disadvantages, because gold producers, knowing that next year they will be able to sell at a higher price than this year, would keep their gold and the inevitable shortage would surely produce too great an increase, which would create disturbances.

Another formula which would be the simplest, the most natural, one which should never have been abandoned, the formula applying to all other products, the only one that makes sense, would be that of supply and demand. The law of supply and demand applies everywhere else, in all other fields of endeavour, to all other products and commodities.

I still wonder why we ventured in, or committed ourselves to, an undertaking or an obligation from which we cannot get out today, unless strong measures are taken. I think that we should advise Washington this year that we intend, next year, to denounce the agreement signed in 1934, because it is working against us. I do not think we should put ourselves in a straitjacket, honourable senators.

When the Americans change their trade policies, as is their right, they do not ask for our opinion; when they decide to lay down guidelines to their best neighbour, to their best customer, knowing in advance that such guidelines may be prejudicial to us, knowing in advance that such guidelines may cause disruptions in our country, that does not matter to them. I believe we have a natural right to advise the Americans, this year, that it is our intention to denounce the 1934 agreement, as it is one of the causes of poverty in Canada.

The External Relations Committee of the Senate sat the other day. It is presided over by the honourable senator from Winnipeg South, Senator Thorvaldson, who does things with great dignity; it is marvellous to see him in action. We heard then an economist who explained to us what impact Great Britain's joining the Common Market would have on the Canadian economy. It is not a very encouraging prospect for us. I do not think that Great Britain will consult us and ask for our views before reaching a final decision whether or not she should join the Common Market.

Senator Vaillancourt, who spoke before me, said that the others minded their own business; the Americans minded their own business, so did the British, and they are well advised to do so. I think that next year, when Canada celebrates its centennial from a constitutional standpoint, would afford us an excellent opportunity to show our sovereignty, our freedom, our power and our desire to administer the business of the Canadian nation for another hundred years, not according to the whims of our neighbours, or to please people who live elsewhere. I think it would be the right time to do something to take away from the Americans control of our economy. It seems to me that the time has come, we have paid tribute long enough. That legislation has cost us $200 million.

Therefore, I intend to get in touch with Senator Thorvaldson, chairman of the External Relations Committee. We will call experts from the gold mines, the Bank of Canada, the chartered banks, experts and economists who will explain to us what is the situation exactly. If there is no way out, which would be unfortunate, it would be the first time, to my mind, that a country has become so deeply involved, has shown itself so naïve and so lacking in wisdom that for over thirty years it has been hamstrung by an agreement which we signed probably in the best of faith. I have no intention of blaming anyone. It is a matter of straightening the existing situation. It is a matter of informing the Canadian people about the problem without causing any panic; all that is required is to arouse public opinion so that the government will finally decide to do something.

There is another problem, that of uranium. I do not want to take up too much of your time, honourable senators. However, to my mind, there again we are confronted with another disastrous situation.

Uranium is no longer, in 1966, the problem it was in 1948, or what it was from 1942 to 1945 when it was used exclusively to manufacture nuclear weapons. The word uranium then meant the atom bomb. As soon as the word uranium was spoken, one saw the mushroom-like cloud that set ablaze two cities in Japan at the end of the war.

Today, the uranium problem is entirely different. Thanks to the excellent work and experiments of scientists throughout the world, uranium is no longer an instrument of death, but rather a source of life, of peace and of well-being. Scientific break-throughs in physics, in chemistry, in biology, in medicine, in agriculture, in industries of all kinds, have made of ours truly the century of the atom. Uranium can now serve humanity and all peoples have an equal need of it.

Canada's uranium potential is as large as her gold resources. In 1957, or during 1957-58, uranium production in Canada was worth $331 million, and Canadian uranium ore reserves were estimated at 340 million tons. There were 25 mines in operation in 1958, while in 1964, there were three. We are left with two in 1966. It is true that this is due to causes beyond our control; market conditions have fluctuated during transition between war and peace.

Today, uranium is no longer thought of as fissile matter to be used in the manufacture of atomic weapons in order to wage war; thanks to world scientists, uranium is now mainly considered as a source of energy. We need it as such to help progress in the world. The world has progressed without cease since its creation, but not always at the same speed. Today, the rate of progress is much swifter. What is progress? Essentially, it is the improvement of a given situation. Consequently progress is a movement, and movement is energy in action. And the uranium deposits in Canada constitute an almost inexhaustible potential source of energy.

Honourable senators, when one considers that a pound of uranium 235, natural uranium, can give off as much heat as three million pounds of coal, it is unbelievable. This represents a considerable source of potential energy.

Senator Vaillancourt mentioned Israel as a case in point; the success achieved by that country in agriculture and economic development. It emerged from the desert as if by a miracle. Today the country needs water, the land is thirsty.

The other day I read in the press that Israel was acquiring costly machinery to distil sea-water, in order to irrigate lands which acquire an unparalleled fertility as soon as they are watered.

In Europe, at least seven or eight other friendly countries are acquiring equipment because of their need for water power, development and progress.

I was reading the other day some statistics concerning the consumption of electrical energy throughout the world. These statistics provided figures in horse-power per capita. The average energy consumption per capita in the entire world amounts to 900 horsepower; in Europe, it is 2,200 h.p., here in North America it is 4,800 h.p. So the Europeans feel they are lagging behind. They have less power than we have, but they want to progress at the same rate as we do. Therefore, they are prepared to buy our uranium.

However, the problem is this. France was the first country to approach us. While we were discussing the terms under which we were willing to sell uranium to France, we were told, perhaps rightly—I have never seen any official proof of this statement—that we intended to sell uranium to France but, as it is a strategic material, we would require that inspectors visit all laboratories in all the industries in France in order to find out to what use our uranium was put. Gentlemen, you, of British and American descent, who understand the British or the Americans, know that Great Britain or the United States would never agree to have foreigners poking their noses into their business, keeping watch over them as the spies do, gathering here and there information and then going almost everywhere in the world to disclose what they had learned; that is a new kind of espionage. That would humiliate a country. The deal fell through. It is still pending, because France, like Great Britain, United States and, I hope, Canada, will never agree to such impossible terms as those contained in this agreement.

If one looks at the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and reads carefully the preamble, namely section 2, one finds out that this is first of all a military organization but it is also an economic, cultural and political mutual assistance body. In addition, in the North Atlantic treaty under section 8, you will see that it is strictly forbidden to any member of the Atlantic Community to sign agreements which are incompatible with the terms and the spirit of the treaty.

Furthermore, in 1957 a resolution sponsored by the United Nations was agreed to by most of the nations present, including Canada, France, England, the United States and others; its object was to create an International Nuclear Energy Commission, with a view to activating the production of nuclear energy throughout the world and organizing the distribution end of it.

So far as I know, this resolution does not provide for any control or inspection by the selling country. Besides, to make such control effective, it would be necessary to have a whole army of inspectors dispatched to the buying countries. Who would be those people? Where would they come from? What would be their qualifications? What would be their moral worth? Nobody knows. Besides, Canada surely lacks qualified people to perform this work. Consequently—and I believe this suggestion was made to the government in the past—instead of the inspection being done by the selling country, under a bilateral agreement defining the terms of the sale and the use the buying country pledges to make of the uranium, the buying country would carry out its own control and would undertake to report to the selling country, as well as to the International Nuclear Energy Commission, on the use made of the uranium for peaceful purposes. At a time when about ten European countries are getting the necessary facilities to convert the potential energy of uranium to their own ends and are about to come and buy some uranium in Canada, I am fully convinced that none of them will humbly accept this inspection requirement.

Today, we are negotiating with France. Tomorrow, it will be with twenty more countries or none; in the latter case, we will have to keep our uranium thus depriving ourselves of a considerable source of revenue. What we should do, for instance, is tell France: Tell us how you will dispose of our uranium and pledge yourself to use it only for peaceful purposes.

Honourable senators, I am quite sure we could take the word of honour of France and of most of our other partners within NATO. We have no right to demand this humiliating and offensive control which is almost an insult to our friends. Why should we not take France's word of honour? France has always treated Canada as a friend. We have no reason to question its moral integrity or its honest intentions. France and England have been friendly since the turn of the century, when King Edward VII and the French President met and shook hands, in order to celebrate twenty years of political union and unity, this alliance known as l'Entente cordiale, proved unfailing and was sealed on French battlegrounds by British, French, Canadian and American blood on two different occasions. When the Americans fought their War of Independence at the end of the eighteenth century, who went to their aid in order to foster the advent of freedom on American soil, to assure Americans they would be a free people and help them to gain their freedom, if not Lafayette and French soldiers and sailors who offered their unconditional help? When the French came to help the Americans, the latter did not impose any inspection or control on them to check their methods. They had no reason to doubt.

Remember that we might be losing the sale of uranium. I do not know what goes on in Moscow or Paris, but General de Gualle is going to Moscow in June and you, who know from practical experience how nations treat each other, are not without knowing how clever, shrewd and sometimes tactful the Moscow government can be in its dealings. The Russian government may say to General de Gaulle when he gets to Moscow: It seems that your friends are refusing to sell you uranium; we are ready in Moscow to sell you some and not under humiliating conditions. For us, in Moscow, there is no problem. If you want uranium, tell us now much you need. All you will have to do is say that you will not use it to make weapons. Tell us how much you need and we will sell it to you at the price arrived at by your Canadian friends and we will deliver it as soon as you tell us to.

If such a thing happened, if Paris and Moscow came to an agreement on uranium, it would entail for us a loss of several hundred million. I feel that the Leader of the Government here should point out to the cabinet the threat to Canada. I think that the Government should review its stand on that matter, should understand that we should accept France's word of honour which is worth many other country's signature.

Today, we see that France is breaking with NATO countries. France is bowing out and I would not be surprised to learn one of these days that the lack of confidence shown by her friends in America, and elsewhere in Europe, had something to do with that unfortunate decision as far as NATO is concerned.

I would like here to congratulate Canada's Minister for External Affairs, Honourable Paul Martin, for the humane and comprehensive stand he took on the alarming situation resulting from France's decision to withdraw from the NATO forces. I feel there is still a possibility of putting things right. I cannot admit the French point of view in this matter because if its stand is the right one, it would also be the right one for all the other countries belonging to the organization.

If French policies were imitated by others, there would surely no longer be any NATO; the situation in Europe would revert to what it was before 1949 and the peace of the world would be jeopardized. Keep in mind that peace has never been a weakness. Peace is a force and throughout history, weak nations disappeared, crushed by the strong. To my mind, this opting out by France constitutes a dangerous precedent for the peace of the world. But while I reject the French viewpoint, I understand it perfectly. France must have felt deeply the lack of confidence shown by her friends; her word of honour is not sufficient when it comes to purchasing uranium from Canada. If we start mistrusting one another, if we lose confidence in a country like France which has never reneged on her word or her signature—and every country in the world can bear witness to the fact—if we begin to treat our best friends as we must treat our prospective enemies, such contemptible attitude of distrust can lead us to the worst disaster. The great family of Atlantic nations must remain united, otherwise it will be weakened and in jeopardy. I repeat that we are the ones who must change our attitude because France will never consent to be humiliated by accepting a deal under conditions that constitute an insult to her dignity and her honour. I have no hesitation whatever in addressing my warmest congratulations to the French government for its reaction to the terms we have laid down to enable France to buy our uranium.

I mentioned a while ago the External Relations committee of the Senate under the chairmanship of Senator Thorvaldson; I feel the question of uranium should be submitted to this committee at the earliest possible moment so that it may look into uranium production and sales as well as into the terms under which it may be sold. These are sources of wealth—gold and uranium And we have plenty of them. Canada is walking on gold and on uranium, as the Egyptians are treading on their history.

The celebration of the Centennial of Confederation is approaching. I believe we should review all our positions so as to contribute something new. Yet, it seems that when economics are concerned, we are not sufficiently business-like, we lack courage and we tremble before the Americans and we shudder at the thought of what may occur in London.

As Senator Vaillancourt said a moment ago, and I repeat his words in concluding: let us mind our own business. Let us mind it for ourselves, for our own people, for Canada, and the rest will be given unto us.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Richard has been substituted for that of Mr. Nixon on the list of members appointed to serve on the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament.

RURAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT FUND BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-151, to provide for the establishment of a fund for the economic and social development of special rural development areas.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, we have received from the other place three bills which will be called in due course by His Honour the Speaker. It is my intention to ask for leave that second reading be given each of these bills this evening. I do this only so that the explanation of the bills may be placed upon Hansard, and I do not expect that the debate will continue tonight unless some honourable senator desires to participate.

I feel it would be expeditious to have these bills explained this evening. In asking this I also take into account the fact that the Senate was so expeditious in its work prior to the adjournment that the Order Paper was virtually cleaned up. Therefore, it is with a certain amount of pride that I now ask for leave that second reading of this bill be proceeded with this evening.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, in rising at this time it is not my intention to object particularly to second reading of this bill being proceeded with this evening. However, we are getting into the habit of moving second reading of bills immediately after first reading, and this in my view is not desirable.

As honourable senators will understand, this bill now before us is very important, being an act for the establishment of a fund for the economic and social development of special rural development areas. It is one of the most important pieces of legislation passed by the House of Commons during this session, and some 30 to 40 speeches were made during the discussion in that house.

The honourable leader suggests that it is a good thing to have the explanation of these bills immediately after first reading. I see certain advantages in that, but I also see certain disadvantages, the main one being that time is not given to those who wish to speak on the bill to make preparation for doing so. I think the intention of the rule is to give honourable senators an extra day after the bill has had first reading in order that those who wish to speak on second reading may have an opportunity to make the necessary preparation.

As I have said, I am not rising to object particularly, but there are three bills coming to us this evening for first reading, all three of which—according to the statement of the honourable Leader, and the Scroll which I have before me—we will be asked to give second reading to this evening. The other two bills are not as important as this one, and I will certainly not raise any objection to their receiving second reading tonight.

Honourable senators, I have no great objection to this bill receiving second reading now, but I think this practice is being overdone. It has always been my understanding that if there is any genuine urgency for second reading to follow immediately, and there is some justification for taking that course, then there can be no great objection. We can hardly claim in the Senate that there is any particular pressure or urgency, but if the honourable Leader feels there is some justification for this procedure I am not going to make any further objection. However, we must not stray too far from the rules of the house.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, not in any way to controvert what the Leader of the Opposition has said, I make this motion only because I hope it fits the convenience of the Senate and the expedition of our business. We all know that we have set aside time tomorrow for a special occasion on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. So, in any event, it is unlikely that these bills will be proceeded with in debate tomorrow. Perhaps one will be, but I do not know.

I thoroughly agree with what the Leader of the Opposition has said, but rather than defer the second reading of these bills until Thursday, which might very well be a source of inconvenience to honourable senators, I make the proposal that I do.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have no objection to second reading now so that an explanation may be given of the bill, but I say that with the understanding that the debate will be adjourned at least until tomorrow, so that we shall have an opportunity of discussing the bill.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There is no doubt whatever of that.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I understand that the debate will be adjourned probably until Thursday.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is quite possible.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: I am sure all honourable senators will understand the importance of this bill if they refer to Bill C-152, the second reading of which I had the pleasure of moving on May 4 last. At that time I outlined some of the programs that have been put into effect under the ARDA legislation, and some of the improvements that will be made in the future following the amendments contained in Bill C-152. Bill C-151 is a new act, but it can, I think, be considered a stablemate of Bill C-152. I would ask the house to bear with me for a moment or two while I refer to some further facts that pertain to the ARDA program generally.

Under the agreements that have been signed by all provinces except one, and the Government of Canada, there will be approximately $125 million of federal money and approximately the same amount of provincial money spent on ARDA programs over the next five years, or until March 1970. The ARDA program allows the federal Government to participate only up to a maximum of 50 per cent of the cost of the projects. The bill before us tonight allows the federal Government to provide $50 million to be spent on projects across Canada in co-operation with the provinces, and authorizes the Government to pay 50 per cent or, in some cases, up to 100 per cent, of the cost of a project in certain designated areas.

The reason for this is that ARDA can cope with poverty in the great majority of areas of Canada, but in some areas it is not possible under the ARDA legislation to do what is necessary in bringing about an increased standard of living for the people who live in those areas, or to completely develop the resources of those particular areas.

I know that $50 million is not a large sum when it is related to the poverty that exists in pockets throughout the country, and I suggest that such pockets exist in almost every province. I am amazed sometimes when I hear members of the public, and even members of Parliament, talk as though poverty exists only in some of the "have not" provinces. I had the opportunity of speaking in the debate on the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and at that time I commented on some of the problems in respect of poverty that exist in my own province. I should like now to refer to a table that appears in the House of Commons Debates of May 10 last, at page 4936. The first column is headed "Percentage of all farm families that have 'low incomes' ", and against the name of my Province of Saskatchewan is the figure of 21 per cent. That means 21 per cent of all farm families in Saskatchewan have low incomes. For the wealthy Province of Ontario the figure is 16 per cent, and for the equally wealthy Province of British Columbia it is 15 per cent. In one province that figure is 36 per cent.

The second column is headed "Percentage of rural non-farm families with annual income below $3,000". According to this table, 48 per cent of the non-farm families in the rural areas of Saskatchewan have an income of $3,000 or less a year. Even in the Province of Ontario 31 per cent of these families have an income of $3,000 a year or less. I need only add that every province of Canada has a high percentage of low-income non-farm families living in the rural areas.

I refer to a second table on page 4937 of Commons Debates, showing the percentage of male rural non-farm wage-earners under $2,000 a year. The table, which is according to provinces, gives Saskatchewan as 33 per cent, Ontario 24 per cent, British Columbia 19 per cent. In the lower categories, Newfoundland is 53 per cent.

The second column of the table under the heading "Percentage of rural population of school age or over, but not attending school, whose highest grade attended is Grade 8 or less": Saskatchewan 61 per cent; Ontario 59 per cent; British Columbia 46 per cent; Newfoundland 72 per cent.

An examination of the statistics provided in the tables shows how difficult it is for these people to obtain employment and a decent standard of living for themselves and families. In some areas of Canada the percentage is higher than in others.

In virtually every province there is a pocket of rural poverty, and the purpose of this bill is to develop the resources of that particular area in order to increase the standard of living of its people.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: May I ask the honourable senator if he is speaking of Bill C-152 or Bill C-151?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I am speaking of Bill C-151. Bill C-152 deals with the amending of the ARDA legislation. Bill C-151 is the bill that is before us this evening.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: May I ask a question? Would the honourable senator, with the consent of the Senate, put those tables on the Senate Hansard so that the information may be complete?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I would be glad to, if all honourable senators are agreeable.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Agreed.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I have quoted from the tables on pages 4936 and 4937 of the Commons Debates for May 10, 1966, in which all the provinces are enumerated.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I think it would be preferable to have the original document from which the tables were made.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I am sure that all honourable senators will recall that in November 1964 officials of the federal Government, together with officials from the provincial governments across Canada, met in the City of Montreal and discussed the proposed legislation that is now before us and the amendments to Bill C-152 which we dealt with a short time ago.

At that meeting there was general agreement by the representatives of each province and of the federal Government that this was the necessary step to cope with poverty in rural Canada.

I think great credit is due to the minister of the day who invited the provincial governments to participate, and I am sure that this is a much better program because of the participation of the provinces with the Government of Canada prior to the drafting of the legislation now before us.

This proposed legislation is not meant to provide social aid; it is not meant to be a welfare program; it is not meant to give work to the unemployed. The legislation is meant to develop resources in those areas of Canada where there is poverty but where there are sufficient resources which if properly developed will provide a decent standard of living for those people who reside in these particular areas. This is another important weapon in the arsenal of Canada to defeat poverty.

Honourable senators, in the society in which we live, one of the most affluent in the world, we should be able to look inward and solve problems that exist in Canada as well as those problems of poverty which exist in other parts of the world. Canada has an exceptionally fine record for her contribution to societies less fortunate than her own. Nevertheless, we as Canadians have overlooked for too long that poverty which exists in our own country and in our own community. We can find poverty virtually in every rural area and in every urban area of Canada if we want to look for it.

A short time ago I had the opportunity of watching a television program sponsored by the C.B.C., which pointed out some poverty in this capital city. I repeat that this bill will be a weapon in our arsenal which will go a long way to fulfil a program to combat poverty in rural Canada. I hope that this house will have the opportunity in the not too distant future to discuss further legislation to fight poverty regardless of where it exists, in our country or abroad. The Government of the day, and previous governments, have implemented legislation of considerable benefit to rural Canada—such as the P.F.R.A., the P.F.A.A., and ARDA. We have now this new special fund of $50 million.

Some people are concerned that $50 million is not enough to do the job set out in this bill. I could not agree more, but no one has said that there is to be only $50 million for this program. This is just the beginning. Before the battle can be won, it will take many times the $50 million. I am confident that this nation can afford it; and I might even say that the nation cannot afford to fail to implement the program outlined in this legislation. This program will come into being through the co-operation of local people. It will be administered after joint consultation between the provinces and the Government of Canada.

Honourable Senators, I have great pleasure in moving second reading of this bill.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Irvine, debate adjourned.

NEWFOUNDLAND ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE BILL, 1966

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-185, to give effect to Term 29 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. B. Baird, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill, C-185, is intended to give effect to Term 29 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada. In accordance with that term, it is proposed to pay to that province the sum of $8 million per year by way of additional assistance out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Honourable senators, it was difficult to see with sufficient accuracy the financial consequences of Newfoundland becoming a province of Canada, so it was provided under Term 29 that a royal commission be appointed, within eight years, to review the financial position and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required by Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at the level and standards reached subsequent to the date of union, without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to the capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprised in the Maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Honourable senators, this bill is concerned exclusively with the completion of the Terms of Union, 1948, adopted in 1949. All that this bill is seeking is that we complete now the terms of this union with Newfoundland.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Would the honourable senator tell us in what particular this implementation of the Terms of Union should be done?

Hon. Mr. Baird: I did not quite get the question.

Hon. Mr. Vien: In other words, in what particulars could this implementation be made? If we have the instrument of union that provides the terms and conditions, then in what particular is this legislation needed?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The answer is, I think, to give permanence to the payments that are to be made under the provisions of Term 29 of the Terms of Union.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It terminates in 1967, and this is an extension of time.

Hon. Malcolm Hollett: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak at any length on this particular bill. As honourable Senator Baird has pointed out, it was introduced in the other place to carry out Term 29 of the Terms of Union.

When Newfoundland came into Confederation in 1949, it was difficult to know exactly how much more money it would take to keep up the public services in Newfoundland to a level which would be right and proper for a province of Canada, without imposing on the Newfoundland people taxes which would be higher than those imposed in the Maritime provinces. For that reason it was agreed that under Term 29 a royal commission would be set up within eight years to try to determine what amount should be paid to Newfoundland to maintain the various public services to the point to which they had been brought during those eight years.

A royal commission was appointed, consisting of the Honourable John Babbitt McNair, Chief Justice of New Brunswick, the Honourable Sir Albert Joseph Walsh, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, who has since passed away, and Mr. John James Deutsch. They made their decision with regard to this matter. To make this point clear, I should like to quote from the report of that commission. They said:

> Accordingly we recommend additional financial assistance as follows:
> (a) for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1957, $8,000,000 less the transitional grant of $1,400,000 or $6,600,000;
> (b) for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1958, $8,000,000 less the transitional grant of $1,050,000 or $6,950,000;
> (c) for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1959, $8,000,000 less the transitional grant of $700,000 or $7,300,000;
> (d) for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1960, $8,000,000 less the transitional grant of $350,000 or $7,650,000;
> (e) thereafter $8,000,000 per annum.

Now, most honourable members will remember that some attempt was made to clarify this and to do something about it in the other place some years ago. It stirred up quite a dust, and there was an election and there was much discussion of this Term 29. In fact, even today there is much discussion of it, and it is mentioned that some people are attempting to get Term 29 out of the Terms of Union. But, honourable senators, there was nothing in that Term except to say that a royal commission would be set up to determine how much money would be required to enable Newfoundland to continue the standard of public services required. And this is the result of the decision of that royal commission.

This bill is entitled Newfoundland Additional Financial Assistance Act, 1966, and is to give effect to Term 29. I shall read the original section which this bill proposes to repeal. It is as follows:

> In addition to all other payments, grants, subsidies and allowances payable to the Province of Newfoundland, the Minister of Finance may, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, pay an annual grant of eight million dollars to that Province in the fiscal year commencing on the 1st day of April, 1967 and in each subsequent fiscal year.

Looking at the bill we have before us, the relevant section starts out in the same words "In addition to all other payments, grants," etc. I shall read a little more from that section:

> In addition to all other payments, grants, subsidies and allowances payable to the Province of Newfoundland, the Minister of Finance, on behalf of the Government of Canada, shall—

"Shall", not "may".

> —out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, pay to the Province of Newfoundland in the fiscal year commencing on the 1st day of April, 1967 and in each and every fiscal year thereafter—

I do not see much difference in that. However the section goes on:

> —unless and until otherwise provided by any agreement in that behalf hereafter entered into between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland, an annual amount, by way of additional financial assistance as contemplated by Term 29 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada, of eight million dollars.

I have taken the trouble to read again the Terms of Union, and I am rather surprised that they have not been given more than $8 million. During the last hundred years the other provinces of Canada have had all sorts of social and other benefits conferred upon them by the federal Government. Roads and bridges have been built and many other benefits granted. The people in Newfoundland did not have these benefits, and indeed there were very many public services which you, shall I say, as Canadians, prior to 1949, had enjoyed. These services had been built up and you had enjoyed them over the years, while we were coming in with none of these services.

The idea of Term 29 was to endeavour to give us a grant of $8 million to help us to build up the public services to a level enjoyed by the people of Canada. Eight million dollars was a small amount of money to do that. At that particular time our main industries in Newfoundland were, and are today, fishing, mining and logging or paper-making. We had very little agriculture; we had to import practically everything we ate, and consequently we were not very well off in those days. In fact, if you look a little further back in history you will see we in Newfoundland were very badly off. We were just a crown colony, and in 1933 things were so bad that the British Government took over Newfoundland for the simple reason that our national debt was so great that somebody had to take us over. At that time our national debt was a little over $100 million and today it is still only about that amount.

Subsequently we went through the Second World War. During that period there was a certain amount of prosperity, and the Commission of Government built up a certain sum of money—we had forty-odd million dollars in the bank at St. John's, Newfoundland. It is not very often that a government builds up a surplus of $40 million, particularly a government of a country the size of Newfoundland. The Commission of Government was so stingy that they almost starved the Newfoundlanders to build up that sum. When we came into Confederation we had $40.3 million in the bank, and Canada took over our national debt and left us with a debt of only $3½ million. It was very generous of them to take over our national debt.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask that order be called in the chamber. We are having difficulty hearing the speaker.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I repeat, Canada took over our national debt and we were left with $3½ million, and we had $40.3 million in the bank. That was not so bad. But when this royal commission looked at social conditions and public services in Newfoundland they decided we should have $8 million for a period of years—I think it was 12 or 14 years. We got the $8 million, which was gradually reduced.

Then the time came when it was suggested that we were to have the final payment under this Term. Somebody was badly advised on that.

Nevertheless the present Government is endeavouring to fortify Term 29 and to strengthen the royal commission's decision to such an extent that it cannot be taken away. I want to congratulate the present Government for trying to make this arrangement as practicable as possible.

I am, however, a little perturbed over some statements made in the other place by certain individuals relative to our boundaries, and I cannot finish my remarks without bringing the subject up again. I am a Newfoundlander; I was born there and my people for many generations were born there. Certain statements were made in the other place and I want to say a word about what has been said.

Hon. Mr. Vien: I would suggest that you should not say "a word" but that you should explain very plainly and with certainty the question of the boundaries.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: He has done that once before.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: The point I am getting at is that one individual said that with the decision of the Privy Council in London in 1927, Newfoundland succeeded in stealing part of the territory of Quebec, namely Labrador.

If we stole it, we did not steal it from Quebec, because the terms—

Hon. Mr. Vien: You did not.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I am very happy to hear my honourable friend say that.

What the Privy Council had to decide in 1927 was the matter of the boundary between the Dominion of Canada and the colony of Newfoundland in the Labrador peninsula. They had to decide where the boundary was between the Dominion of Canada and our little colony. If we stole it we did so from Canada, and if in those days we were able to steal it from Canada, I am very proud to be a Newfoundlander, and you must all be ashamed of yourselves if you are not Newfoundlanders. The gentlemen in the other place stated we were thieves and the Privy Councillors helped us to steal. I wish they had not said that.

Hon. Mr Vien: Will the honourable senator agree that the decision of the Privy Council was more political than judicial?

Hon. Mr. Hollett: For the honourable senator's consideration I would point out that there are in the library 14 thick volumes containing the evidence taken by the Privy Council and the decision they made. I would recommend this as very good reading for anyone born in Quebec. It makes wonderful summer reading. I have taken the trouble to look at a lot of the evidence.

Hon. Mr. Vien: I think it would be a very good recipe for insomnia.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Yes; I am afraid you would be asleep before you had read very much. But I am glad the honourable senator agrees with me that is was no such thing as stealing at all.

Hon. Mr. Vien: It was a judicial decision, but in our opinion it was made by the Privy Council more on political than on judicial grounds.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no!

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I do not agree with that statement, but I agree that an awful lot of decisions are made on political grounds, particularly with regard to the province from which my honourable friend comes.

Some Hon. Senators: Order, order!

Hon. Mr. Vien: I would like to add that I take no exception to that.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: All I want to point out is that we did not steal anything in those days; we had nothing to say on the matter. The boundary was decided by eminent men on the Privy Council, and where the boundary is today I am not quite sure, but it is somewhere in the wilds of Labrador. As I say, if we stole it, we stole it from Canada, and if Canada wants it back she has it back because she has Newfoundland with that part of Labrador.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It is iron clad anyway.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Iron bound. The trouble is that everything that is iron bound is not particularly nice sometimes.

I have further notes upon which to speak, but I do not think there is any need for me to go into this further at this time.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Will the honourable senator allow me a question? When he speaks of $8 million, which is basically the fulfilment of an obligation in the terms of the act between Canada and Newfoundland at the time Newfoundland came into Canada, does it represent some compensation for losses or some expenses incurred by Newfoundland prior to its coming into Canada, or is it compensation for privileges which Canadians enjoyed under Confederation prior to Newfoundland's coming into Canada?

I would not like honourable senators to construe my words as being in opposition to this bill. I am in favour of it, but I would like to understand what the honourable senator from Newfoundland has to say in that respect. I am all in favour of granting Newfoundland this $8 million, but I would like to understand what it represents.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: All the honourable senator has to do to understand that is to read Term 29 of the Terms of Union.

Hon. Mr. Vien: That is what our Leader has told us.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: In addition to Term 29 there are many other terms under which Newfoundland was granted certain things, including financial assistance. I believe my honourable friend Senator Baird has explained this, but I will read Term 29, which will answer the honourable senator's question. It had nothing to do with something we were losing; it was to make up for something we never had.

In view of the difficulty of predicting with sufficient accuracy the financial consequences to Newfoundland of becoming a province of Canada, the Government of Canada will appoint a Royal Commission within eight years—

Which they did.

—from the date of Union to review the financial position of the Province of Newfoundland and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required by the Government of the Province of Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services—

From the date of Confederation and up to eight years thereafter, we were endeavouring to build up our public services which had never been built up. This term states:

—that may be required by the Government of the Province of Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of Union—

In other words, at the levels and standards reached during the eight years after the date of Union.

—without resorting to taxation more burdensome having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the Maritime Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island.

Term 29 is the one under which the royal commission was set up to decide how much it would take to maintain these public services built up over that eight-year period immediately following the date of Union. They said $8 million annually.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Will the honourable senator allow another question? If that is already provided for, why is new legislation necessary?

Hon. Mr. Hollett: That is something which my honourable friend may be able to answer much better than I, because we have already passed legislation which provided:

In addition to all other payments, grants, subsidies and allowances payable to the Province of Newfoundland, the Minister of Finance may, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, pay an annual grant of eight million dollars to that Province in the fiscal year commencing on the 1st day of April, 1967 and in each subsequent fiscal year.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Until when?

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Forever thereafter.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Forever?

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I suppose so. That is what the Premier of Newfoundland thinks. It will go on for eternity—until he passes away.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is the same thing.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: This bill says that the Government of Canada shall pay the $8 million, and is going to continue to do so until such time as the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland agree to forget it. That is what it says there.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: As the honourable senator reads Term 29, does it say that the recommendation of the royal commission shall be accepted by Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Hollett: No. You took us into Confederation on these terms, including Term 29. So I presume that the Canadian Government, by taking us into Confederation, intended to pay us or to consider paying us whatever that royal commission recommended, but, I agree with you, they were not bound to.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Please correct me if I am wrong, but up to this time it was a statutory grant of $8 million. It is now being made the subject of an Act of Parliament, and it can be changed only by Parliament. That is the difference.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, not at all.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: We had statutory grants included in the Terms of Union.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Subsequent to the McNair Commission report it became a statutory grant, and now it is becoming part of the law of Canada.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I am very much surprised that these questions were not put to my honourable friend, the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Baird). However, as I remember from the discussion of some years ago, under Term 29 the Government was called upon to appoint a royal commission to investigate and report.

That royal commission, as we all recall, was headed by Chief Justice McNair, who was an expert in the field, and he was helped by Mr. John Deutsch. The commission recommended, but said it would not necessarily be in perpetuity, that the grant of $8 million be made annually. Some people have interpreted that as being legislation to the effect that it will be paid in perpetuity, but that is absolutely erroneous.

The payment has been made, but when we reach 1967 a royal commission may be appointed and the grant may be increased, according to the needs of Newfoundland at that time. I fail to see how this legislation is going to make the annual grant of $8 million perpetual.

I should have liked to ask my honourable friend the sponsor of the bill a question, but the honourable senator from Newfoundland (Hon. Mr. Hollett), thinking he had to speak immediately, rose. He might have adjourned the debate. I should have liked to ask this question: What does this legislation mean? Are we now repealing section 3 of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, 1964? The explanatory note to clause 3 says:

> The section and heading thereto being repealed read as follows:

—It is not "reads as follows" but "read as follows."

> Newfoundland Grant.
> 3. In addition to all other payments, grants, subsidies and allowances payable to the Province of Newfoundland, the Minister of Finance may, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, pay an annual grant of eight million dollars to that Province in the fiscal year commencing on the 1st day of April, 1967 and in each subsequent fiscal year.

That is being repealed. What are we left with? That is what I would like to find out from the honourable sponsor of the bill. Are we left with legislation that will provide for the payment of $8 million every year in perpetuity? This is the question I am asking the honourable sponsor of the bill, and he says, "Yes."

Hon. Mr. Croll: You are left with parliamentary control. That is all you are left with. It is now in the hands of Parliament to change, and a change is not likely to come about.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Senator Choquette has asked a question, and now, I understand, Senator Croll has asked another. Where do I stand? I did not get the question. I understood the sponsor of the bill to say that this does not mean in perpetuity. I say it is in perpetuity. I say that now we have it for all time—there is no question about it at all—or until the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland agree to forget the $8 million.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I intended to ask a supplementary question, but did not have an opportunity of doing so. I was going to ask the honourable gentleman if it is contended that the Parliament of Canada cannot repeal this measure it is in the process of passing. I understood him to say that Parliament in the future could not repeal this act.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is for the law officers of the Crown.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I am asking if that is so.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Let me get around to answering the question in my own way. Term 29 is one of the Terms of Union under which Newfoundland came into Confederation, and which this Parliament cannot repeal and Newfoundland cannot repeal.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: This bill is not part of that.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: This bill is part of it in that it lays down what Term 29 means.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Honourable senators, may I ask a question? Is this bill not going to committee? If it is, should not these questions be asked and answered there? I have never heard so much confusion in my life. I thought I understood what the bill meant until these questions were raised.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am sure the honourable sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Baird) will be moving that it be sent to committee. All the same, this has not been an uninteresting kind of debate. I think my honourable friend is doing quite well.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He is making a good job of it.

Hon. Mr. Farris: While travelling from Vancouver today on the plane I read in the newspapers that Newfoundland is borrowing very large sums of money. I am not sure of this, but my recollection is that Newfoundland has arranged a loan privately, and I should like to know something about that in relation to this whole question.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Is the honourable senator alluding to a figure of over $20 million?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No, $15 million.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: That is easy. For the honourable senator's information I will say that in the fiscal year 1965-66 our estimated revenue, both current and capital, was $161 million. Our estimated expenditure was $171 million, and we had a loan of $20 million. Our net debt outstanding today, in spite of the fact that in 1949 we owed only $3.5 million, is $117 million. That is what it was last year. Goodness knows what it is now. I am speaking of Newfoundland, of course. Our funded and unfunded debt is $142,500,000.

Hon. Mr. Croll: What was the income in 1949? You gave us the debt.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I gave you the figures for 1965-66. You are asking in respect of 1949?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes, at the time you came into Confederation.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I do not remember that figure at the moment, but I can find it here if the honourable senator wants to know it. I have all that information here.

As a matter of fact, there was a financial genius who came down from Canada at the time when we were talking about coming into Confederation—and some of us were talking about not coming in—who said that if we did come into Confederation our revenue would be about $23 million; that if we had $23 million we could carry on. But last year, as I have told you, our revenue was $161 million. We spend a lot of money in Newfoundland.

Unfortunately—or, shall I say, fortunately —we are a part of Canada. Thank God for that. I am hoping things will get better in Newfoundland. I am a Newfoundlander, but I am a Canadian as well. Sometimes it is hard to make ends meet.

Hon. Mr. Vien: You are becoming more and more liberal.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Yes; Newfoundland is. I do not see how Newfoundland could become more liberal than it is now. As a matter of fact, we came in under a Liberal Government, and we have not been able to wipe off the disease since.

I should like to say that last year Canada gave us by way of grants and transitional payments, and the $8 million, a total amount of $56.4 million. In addition to that Canada spent $22.5 million on the Trans-Canada Highway. Altogether we received $78.9 million, and our total revenue was only $161 million, both current and capital. From this you will understand that another $8 million does not amount to very much so far as the federal Government is concerned.

I point out once again that Newfoundland always has been a poor country. If there were no fish, people went hungry. If there was bad weather, people did not earn very much. Roads were almost non-existent except for a few dirt roads. There was no Trans-Canada Highway. All of this had to be built up, and this grant of $8 million was something to help our social and public services. I am quite sure we needed it. I am quite sure that if the Liberal government continues in office we are going to need it much longer. Perhaps I should say that, no matter what government is in office. I am not casting aspersions against the Liberal government for it is liberal in many ways. However, we are going to need that $8 million. What I am most anxious to say is that I do not want any other province to say that Newfoundland stole part of any other province. If we did steal from Canada once, we gave it back.

Hon. Mr. Baird: We did not steal it at all.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Even if we did, we gave it back to Canada when we came into Confederation. I am only too glad that we came into Confederation. One look at the figures is sufficient to indicate how fortunate we were to have taken that step.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Our population is only 500,000. It is a huge province, when one takes in Labrador. We are part of Canada, and Canada today is deriving great benefits from our mines and fisheries. For instance, we export every fish we catch and all the paper we manufacture. We export all our minerals. Does that not help to maintain Canada's balance of payments?

In that connection, I think that eventually it will be found that Newfoundland will be an asset rather than a liability. As a Canadian, I do not begrudge giving a few million dollars to Newfoundlanders.

Finally, let us think of Canada as a whole, and not provincialwise. If we think in terms of provinces we are finished. Indeed, I think it would be far better for the people of Canada if there were no provinces and Canada were one huge unit. God knows, Canada is a huge country with a diversity of resources. If instead of thinking of Canada by sections, we would think of Canada as one vast country and in terms of prosperity for all Canadians, I think our nation would soon become one of the greatest nations on the face of the earth.

Honourable senators, I am happy that this bill was brought in, but I am not fussy about its wording. It simply means that the federal Government shall pay Newfoundland $8 million until such time as the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland agree to do otherwise.

In 1949, $8 million purchased far more than it will purchase today, and I am quite sure that 20 years from now Canada will not bother about a small sum like $8 million.

I am glad that our Terms of Union are now complete and that Newfoundland is a part of Canada, for good or ill, whichever way it goes. I am happy to agree with everything that is in this bill.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, in order to understand this question one must read Term 29 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada, as set out in the schedule to the British North America Act 1949, as follows:

> In view of the difficulty of predicting with sufficient accuracy the financial consequences to Newfoundland of becoming a province of Canada, the Government of Canada will appoint a Royal Commission within eight years from the date of Union to review the financial position of the Province of Newfoundland and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required by the Government of the Province of Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of Union, without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the Maritime Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island.

This was conditional upon the Government of Newfoundland getting in touch with Ottawa in order to have a subsidy amounting to $8 million, if necessary, to provide the Province of Newfoundland with the same standard of living, the same advantages, enjoyed by the other three Maritime provinces. It was conditional at first in virtue of the Terms of Union. Now it is definite. It means that there will be no request necessary from the Government of Newfoundland. There is no question involving the standard of living in the other Maritime provinces; the Government of Canada will pay $8 million annually from April 1967 to the Province of Newfoundland—forever. It is just as clear as that. There will be no application necessary from the Government of Newfoundland, and no comparison between the standard of living or taxation in Newfoundland and any other Maritime province. That is all; it is not complicated.

With regard to Labrador, it is a very important part of Canada. There has been discussion and litigation between two provinces about its possession, but those are difficulties between the provinces. The portion of Canada that is Labrador belongs to Canada. It is within the boundaries of this country and it is an asset to us.

Now, with regard to the statement that was made by my learned colleague and confrere, Senator Vien, that a certain decision was more judicial than political—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is the other way.

Hon. Mr. Croll: More political than judicial.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Yes, more political than judicial—one must remember the brass band which accompanies the expedition from the Province of Quebec to the Privy Council. However, unfortunately the case was not so well prepared as that. What was wrong was that the maps which were presented to the Privy Council did not indicate clearly whether Labrador was part of Quebec or Newfoundland. There was an element of doubt, and the judges decided that it depended on the flow of the rivers, and the boundary was set between the flow of the rivers flowing to the east on the one side, and flowing to the west on the other. That was the decision made by the Privy Council, and I am not in a position to say whether it was more judicial than political or more political than judicial. The point is that Canada had an interest in the matter. With regard to the provinces, it is unfortunate, but they had not the exhibits which could have supported their case.

There was an agitation against the Privy Council, that it was not being fair to Quebec and was showing favouritism to Newfoundland. Up to the present time Newfoundland has been declared the owner of Labrador by the court that was considered the highest tribunal in this case. I understand that some people felt defeated on account of that, just as some lawyers feel defeated each time they lose a case. But the matter is finished, and Labrador is part of Newfoundland and Newfoundland is a province of Canada. If they have hardships, they can be helped just as can any other province. It is fair to give them a hand. They should not be abandoned because they happen to be in the extreme east of this country.

Honourable senators, subsidies formed part of the Union agreement. Then it was decided that in the future, after several years, if Newfoundland needed some help, a commission would be appointed, upon a request from the Government of Newfoundland, to study the matter and to make a decision as to whether the Government of Canada should pay a certain amount, not exceeding $8 million, to the Province of Newfoundland.

The purpose of it was to put Newfoundland on the same basis as the other Maritime provinces with regard to taxation, etc. I leave it at that.

It seems to me that if that money is needed by the Province of Newfoundland we must do something in that regard; but until now there has been no evidence that the Government of Newfoundland has made any request to the Government of Canada for an outright annual subsidy of $8 million.

May I ask the sponsor of the bill whether Premier Smallwood, on behalf of the Government or the Treasurer of Newfoundland, has made representations to that effect to the Government of Canada?

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Honourable senators, may I interrupt for a moment, to put my honourable friend Senator Pouliot straight on one particular matter. I understood him to say the idea was to give us $8 million in order to keep our standard of public services in Newfoundland on a level with those of the other Maritime provinces. That was not the idea.

The idea was that, for the first seven or eight years of Confederation, we would endeavour to build up our public services as much as we could, and then a royal commission would be set up to find out how much money would be required to keep these public services at that particular level without undue taxation, more so than the other Maritime provinces.

It was wholly to try to keep our standard of public services at the level which we had achieved in seven or eight years. We had to keep them at that level and they gave us $8 million to keep them there, so that we would not have to impose taxation greater than in the Maritime provinces. It was not to keep them up to the level of the others, because we never got up to that level.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank my honourable friend for what he has said, but I have quoted the text of Term 29 in my remarks and I do not go beyond it. It is there, so that every senator can understand it.

Honourable senators, in conclusion, it seems to me that instead of receiving subsidies like that, each province should be self-sufficient and should impose enough taxation to provide for its own needs, so that we would not collect taxes and give them away in the form of subsidies to any province. That is my final remark about it.

Hon. Thomas Vien: Honourable senators, my question may have led honourable senators to misconstrue my remarks. What I had in mind was to inquire why legislation was necessary. Both the honourable Leader of the Government and the honourable gentleman from Newfoundland (Hon. Mr. Hollett) have pointed out that provision is already made in the act incorporating Newfoundland into Canada.

Also, as the honourable gentleman from Newfoundland has just pointed out, it was provided that if at any time the need arose to maintain the level of taxation equal to that of the other Maritime provinces, a royal commission should be appointed to find out to what extent additional contributions from the federal treasury were necessary. I agree entirely with that view.

We would like to dispel in my honourable friend's mind any apprehension that we are thinking of his province as thieves, stealing this amount or other amounts from the treasury. We are most happy to have Newfoundland with us in Canada. I agree with him that we should contribute to the best of our ability to build a great country, Canada as a whole.

However, in view of the fact that the territory of Canada extends from St. John's, Newfoundland to Victoria, British Columbia, it is obvious that we have sections inhabited by very different peoples. They are all Canadians, but they have their own traditions and their particular ways of life. If we leave to each district the greatest possible autonomy in matters that they are best able to deal with locally, we shall find that they will contribute to the nation as a whole more happily than if Canada tries to impose decisions which may not always be understood in various sections of our country. Let us leave to the various provinces—to Newfoundland, as well as to the Maritime provinces, to Quebec, to Ontario, to the Prairie provinces and to western Canada—the fullest possible autonomy, in matters that can be dealt with locally better than centrally.

Honourable senators, we were very happy to induce Newfoundland to come into Canada. We are very happy that Newfoundland is contributing with us in the upbuilding of a great country. This feeling is appropriate and it is expedient to express it at this time when we are on the eve of celebrating the centenary of Confederation in 1967.

There are two difficulties arising in respect of this bill. I agree with the honourable Leader of the Opposition that this bill should be referred to a committee. These questions can more properly be discussed in committee than here. Nevertheless, it was quite proper for honourable senators to put questions to the mover and the seconder of the bill, on matters involved in this legislation.

The honourable gentleman from Newfoundland mentioned that it would be a perpetual agreement unless both Canada and Newfoundland came to an agreement to put an end to it. I cannot very well reconcile myself with this idea. If Newfoundland, in order to maintain a level of taxation similar to that prevailing in the Maritime provinces, needs $8 million or more, there is no objection on our part at all. But we have to be shown—we are from Missouri—we have to be shown that that is necessary. It may be necessary now, as recommended by the royal commission, but will it be necessary in ten years, when the Churchill Falls are developed and when Newfoundland receives additional revenue out of that and other resources?

The question of its being a perpetual arrangement is something that bears investigation, and that investigation I would leave, as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition, to the committee. It may well be that amendments to the bill will be suggested to take care of this situation.

So far as the other aspects of the problem are concerned, I may say to the honourable gentleman that Canada as a whole, and the Province of Quebec in particular, have suffered in the past. For instance, when the boundaries with the United States were determined by the Ashburton treaty, a large part of Canada which we thought should be part of the Province of Quebec was taken away and given to the State of Maine and other places, to the extent that today if you wish to proceed by the short line of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Montreal to Saint John, New Brunswick, and Halifax, you have to traverse a part of the territory of the United States. To our mind at that time it may have been a political decision, but it was not a judicial one and we do not feel that it was fair and just.

Let us consider the Alaska boundaries for a moment. In that case we had arbitration, and we still feel that the British arbitrators on that committee did not act properly; they made a political decision not on all fours with the fundamental principles.

Coming to the question of Newfoundland's boundaries, the same situation arose. Now that Newfoundland is in Canada, I agree with my friend Senator Pouliot that the objections raised at that time no longer exist. I do not go so far as to say that they stole part of Labrador from Canada or from the Province of Quebec; I say that they were more alert in presenting their views; that the Privy Council had had the experience of Newfoundland, a British dominion at that time, which came to distress; that the Constitution of Newfoundland as a dominion had to be suspended. The British Government took a hold of the situation until the agreement to bring Newfoundland into Canada was consummated.

My honourable friend says that the $8 million is necessary to compensate Newfoundland for what the rest of Canada had enjoyed, and which that province had not enjoyed. I would remind him of the history of Newfoundland. Prior to suspension of the Constitution, some very distinguished gentlemen in Newfoundland had to account for certain deeds not found legal. Many of the troubles of Newfoundland, prior to that period, were due to the people who administered the country as they deemed fit. Therefore it is not so much a question of advantages which the rest of Canada had enjoyed and of which Newfoundland had been deprived. I think the honourable gentleman corrected that view in the latter part of his speech.

My view of the whole situation boils down to this: When Newfoundland entered Canada it was provided that the level of taxation there should be maintained to the level prevailing in the other Maritime provinces. Then, if necessary, a commission should be appointed.

That commission was appointed and it suggested that to maintain that level of taxation in Newfoundland it would be necessary to give a further subsidy of $8 million to Newfoundland. I am in favour of that, and I do not want anybody to construe my words otherwise.

We are happy to have Newfoundland with us; we are happy to respect in every particular the obligations assumed by the deed entered into between Newfoundland and Canada. But I would like to point out that, in committee, we would carry out an investigation to determine the limit or the termination of that subsidy. It should not be a perpetual arrangement.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable gentleman, as an eminent constitutional lawyer, if he considers that the Parliament of Canada of today, by passing an act of this kind, can bind the parliaments of the future?

Hon. Mr. Vien: I agree entirely; we could not make a perpetual commitment and Parliament can always put an end to it.

In addition to this particular provision of the constitutional law, there is another point. The spirit of the agreement between Canada and Newfoundland was to maintain a level of taxation equal to the level of taxation in the other Maritime provinces. But if in 10 or 15 years from now, the prosperity that we foresee for Newfoundland and which we wish Newfoundland to enjoy is in existence, it will no longer be in the spirit of the agreement that we should pay that contribution, and I think it will be in order to suspend that provision.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Cook, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 12, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, my first words this afternoon must be of thanks to Senator Connolly, the leader on this side, for holding over the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne in order to give me an opportunity to deliver my swan song to the Senate.

Today I speak under the pressure of some emotion. It is a long time since I first visited the halls of Parliament. Almost 50 years have passed since October 12, 1917, when I was sworn of the Privy Council. I joined the Union Government of Sir Robert Borden, who, in my judgment, was one of our great prime ministers. I served for almost two years under that administration. It is evidence of the mutations that time brings that all who marched with me in that government have passed the border to the Great Beyond.

In 1941 I served through World War II under Mr. Mackenzie King. Of those who worked together during that administration, more than half have passed on. I stand here today as a sort of relic of the past, and I am conscious of the difficulty that faces me at this moment.

Thoughout my association with Parliament, during my 20 years of rather strenuous activity in the House of Commons, and my 21 years in the Senate—where the atmosphere is, I am bound to say, more congenial to me—I have made many friends and many enduring friendships. Now I face the possibility—not only the possibility but the certainty—of a lack of close association with all these friends.

It is evidence of the changes that time brings, that of the Parliament elected in 1917, so far as my knowledge goes, only three members remain—and those three are in the Senate. There is my good friend Senator Vien, who was elected in 1917; there is my good friend to my right, Senator Power, elected at the same time; and myself. Sooner or later we also will be leaving this house. I will leave it within a few days.

I have always admired Senator Power. Of course, there were times when he was wrong, but any differences of opinion never interfered in the slightest degree with our friendship. I can say here with a true heart that Senator Vien and Senator Power are two of my most respected friends.

Honourable senators, it is my purpose today to speak with some frankness, and I hope it will not be taken amiss by anyone in this house or elsewhere.

I have had a rather long experience in public life and there are some things today that certainly are disturbing. The thing that probably gives me most concern is the growing lack of appreciation of Parliament and the failure of Parliament to maintain its standards. In the press, in private conversations, sometimes in public addresses, this fact is frequently referred to.

It is a great misfortune for a democratic country when its people commence to lose faith in their governing institutions. There is no more necessary foundation for the maintenance of a democracy than a respect not only for these institutions but for the people who govern in these institutions. There may be differences—there will be differences, of course—in the manner in which public men discharge their duties; but there should always be a respect for the public men who for the time being are occupying the very responsible position of members of Parliament, either in the Commons or in this house; but that respect must be earned.

Honourable senators, I am not going to attempt today to give you any reasons I may have for this state of affairs that we have somehow fallen into. I hope to live long enough to see the prestige of Parliament fully restored. But I do think this, and I say it with all frankness and with all candor, that we shall never get right in our parliamentary institution here until we have had a change in leadership in both the two major parties. I know there will be those who disagree with me in this view, but we have had two elections within the last few years, both of them indecisive in their results. If there were to be another election today, I think we would most likely find the same result again. That is very unhealthy for Parliament.

I say to you that on these two leaders, both of whom have been Prime Minister and both of whom have served their country, I offer no comment on failures; I offer no criticism; I deal only with the fact that notwithstanding these two elections neither was able to secure the degree of confidence from the Canadian electorate to place him in a position of authority to govern this country. I think if a change were made and new men came in to occupy these posts, we might be able once more to re-establish the prestige that Parliament should enjoy throughout this broad land.

I come now to deal with some of the problems of today for which in my view it is most important and most necessary to find a solution. A few weeks ago I rather rashly stated that I would endeavour in this my last address to the house to tell you some of the things I would try to do if I were Prime Minister. Of course I have never been Prime Minister, and I can say quite frankly that never did I have any ambition to be Prime Minister. But I would not have lived and passed through my experience in Parliament to any effect, and I would not be worth anything if I could not at least contribute some suggestions as to what I think might improve our whole parliamentary picture.

The first matter I wish to deal with is this troublesome question of Ottawa vis-à-vis the provinces. Somewhere along the line we have gotten off the track with the result that our affairs provincially and federally are mixed up to a very dangerous degree.

The Fathers of Confederation who drafted our Constitution were very wise men, and they provided in that Constitution that all matters of general concern, such as banking, trade and commerce, customs, post office, and transportation interprovincially and internationally, would be under federal jurisdiction, and they left the remaining matters of local concern to the provinces. That was the broad definite principle upon which the British North America Act was based.

Nowadays we have departed greatly from that. We have amended the Constitution in recent years so that Ottawa now is dealing with many of the matters that originally were reserved for the provinces. In my view it has not worked out well.

If I were asked to offer a solution, I think I would say to the provinces: We shall give you back all the standard taxes, corporation income tax, personal income tax, succession duties, and you let the federal Government have one or two exclusive fields, such as sales tax and gasoline tax; you look after all welfare and matters of local concern and we will look after all the matters of general concern to the country as a whole.

It is clearly absurd that the federal Government should through the provinces or any other agency, contribute money to build a skating rink in Saskatoon or to pave a street in the town of Carman, Manitoba, or in Antigonish, Nova Scotia. Such was never intended, and as long as we have that state of affairs we will have differences in opinion and squabbling over money as to who shall do this and who shall do that and who shall do the other. That is not the way to build unity and harmony in this country.

We are like a family. Take, for instance, a man who has six or seven sons. If he plans his life so that these boys shall all work together, whether in farming or in business or in anything else, they will not be able to carry on in harmony for more than a few years. After that time they will commence to differ as to what and how it should be done. That is precisely what has taken place in Canada today.

This situation arises not through any ill will, jealousy or anything of that kind, but from the shortcomings of human nature. There is nothing more important for a Prime Minister or a government than to understand and to know people. All those who have been greatly successful in government or in business found their success due in large measure to their ability to know and judge people.

I would try to solve this problem of federal-provincial relations in this way. We need some amendments to our Constitution, but we do not need many. With regard to fiscal matters, the argument may be made that if Ottawa were to give up some of its authority it could not organize and plan our fiscal and tax matters in such a fashion as to prevent depressions and to stimulate booms.

I am bound to say I have no great faith in that kind of planning. We are working today, and have been for years, under the theories of John Maynard Keynes. One of his essential postulates was that during good times a government should budget for surpluses and increase taxes, and in bad times it should budget for deficits and reduce taxes. How has that worked out? For the last ten years by and large we have had a prosperous Canada. On one or two occasions we have dipped back a little bit, but on the whole it has been a period of abounding prosperity. Nevertheless, there has not been one year in the last ten in which we have balanced our budget. One of the fruits of such a policy is found in the degree of inflation we have in our economy today.

I say quite soberly to this house that at the moment there is no more insidious danger facing us than inflation. When you consider that in the sixteen years since 1949 we have worked 42 per cent inflation into our economy, then, it seems to me to be a matter of very grave concern. I do not hold with business people, economists or others who argue that it is quite possible and even beneficial to have, say, 2 per cent or 1½ per cent inflation a year. That is a dangerous doctrine.

The inflation in our economy has been a major source of our troubles with labour. It has denied and brought hardship to many of the people of this country who are living on fixed incomes or on savings. The person who bought a thousand dollar bond in 1950, paying 4 per cent interest, will find when that bond matures, say in another five years, it will have depreciated to the extent that 45 per cent or more of its purchasing power will have been eroded. They find that of the interest they get yearly on their bond, nearly half has gone down the drain. That is no way to encourage savings; that is no way to build up self-reliance in our people and to create the savings necessary if we are to protect ourselves from our American friends.

I have great respect for the sincerity of Mr. Walter Gordon, but I do think that no one could be more astray than he is in his theories about our relationships with the United States in monetary matters or in his program of moving further leftwards in social reforms. How far have we moved in the last 20 years to the left? We have moved to the extent that federally we are spending nearly $3 billion a year on the welfare state philosophy. How much further can we go and maintain solvency?

That is a question today that is giving great concern in England, even with a Labour Government. I say it is just folly, supreme folly, to think we can go on expanding our services, spending here, spending there, never balancing our budgets, and at the same time imagine that we can avoid trouble in the future. It just cannot be done. I mention this with some hesitation because I hope I never have and never shall indulge in personalities, but I do think these policies are fundamentally wrong, and I am quite sure that the Canadian people, once they have an understanding of this, will, with good common sense reject them completely.

The next matter I should like to mention is that of labour. Here we enter not only a very delicate field, but a difficult one. I am not anti-labour, I never have been anti-labour, but I do think we have reached the stage in our development where some consideration must be given to this matter. Our labour unions today are among the most powerful organizations in the country. This is true also in the United States. There are unions in the United States that pay their presidents $50,000 a year and allow them a long expense account. I have no criticism to offer on that.

It is perfectly legitimate for a labour organization to pay its officers anything it thinks right and proper. It is perfectly legitimate for a labour union to pay an ex-president who has retired $50,000 a year as a pension. But what all this means to me is that labour today is big business, and big business in the most powerful way.

We have today a situation, for instance, in Montreal. I am not assessing blame on either side, but I do say that the public interest of this country should come first in all these things, and there are some precedents for this.

Back 70 years ago the railway companies of Canada were a law unto themselves, completely. They could fix their own freight rates. They could discriminate in freight rates as between one city and another. They could give rebates on freight rates. They could refuse to put in a siding for some business or industry that wanted to establish itself in a city, if the existing industry in the city concerned had sufficient influence with the railway to dissuade it from doing so. That was an intolerable state of affairs.

I am old enough to remember farmers' cattle being killed by railway trains through no fault of the farmer. And what recourse had he? He had none. He might sue in the local court and obtain a judgment, but he could not go finally through to the Privy Council where the case might ultimately be carried. This was a state of disorganization; it was a condition of affairs that was contrary to the general public interest.

So, in the early years of the Laurier administration a railway commission was set up, staffed with competent men, and an effective law was passed. After that institution came into being the railway companies had to give notice of any increase in freight rates, and the public could go and argue their case. If they refused to put in a siding for someone who wanted to establish a business in some city, that person could have recourse to the railway commission and the commission could order the railway to put in the siding. That did not detract any from the ability of the railway to operate efficiently. As a matter of fact, I am sure that today the railways would not want to go back to the old state of affairs.

Let me give you another instance, that of marketing of grain in western Canada. When grain commenced to be produced in substantial quantities on the prairies, of course business developed to handle it. There were elevator companies which the railways encouraged. They were not licensed, they were not bonded, and very often the farmers were the losers through dishonesty on the part of the grain people with whom they were dealing. Then the Canada Grain Act was passed, requiring that every person engaged in trading in grain be licensed and bonded. Anyone who was irresponsible could not get a bond; that was the protection there. Overnight that changed the whole picture in grain marketing operations.

The same is true of the Combines Investigation Act. If two or three concerns put their heads together to manipulate a price when they are the only suppliers, they violate the Combines Investigation Act and they can be hailed before a court and can be fined or even jailed.

What was the great underlying principle in all this legislation I have just sketched for you? It was the principle that the public interest always comes first. Today that principle should be applied in the matter of settling these strikes. I do not like compulsion any more than anyone else. I would not deny unions the right to bargain—and I am speaking now of a field in which the federal Government has jurisdiction, not of the provincial field because, as you all know, there is a division in responsibility with regard to labour matters between the provinces and the federal Government. Speaking of the federal responsibility, I would say to labour: We are going to establish a court. We will put the most impartial and fair-minded men we can find on that court, and we will tell that court that in the end they have to take into account not only the rights of labour, not only the rights of the employer, but also the rights of the public.

Furthermore, I would say to these labour unions under federal jurisdiction: You can bargain; you can try to reach arrangements with your employer; but you cannot strike. You will go to a court and the court will settle the matter. I would work that in reverse as well. I would say to the business people of this country: You cannot have lockouts. You cannot lock your employees out without an order from the court, where all the interests engaged could be heard and the proper decision reached.

Next I want to say a few words about the cost of government. I do not think this will surprise any of my colleagues in this house, but it is a matter of concern. When I think that annually we spend over $10 billion—as I said a little earlier, if we include the supplementaries which will undoubtedly come along—it is a matter of very considerable importance. That represents over $500 per head, man, woman and child of the Canadian population, based on an estimated population of 20 million. And on top of that we have all the expenditures of the provinces and the municipalities. We are the most over-governed country in the world. I doubt if there is a country—unless you could find a South American republic or perhaps a new country in Africa—where more money is spent per capita on government than in this country. I think this is a matter of concern.

I am old-fashioned enough to hold the view that no government should take a penny out of the taxpayers' pockets that it does not need. I say that there is no greater obligation resting upon a government than that of conducting its business prudently so that it spares the taxpayers these burdens as far as possible. We have drifted into a state of thinking in these modern days that we must have everything at once, and governments feel they must give the people everything at once. The result has been a mounting debt, a mounting expenditure, a mounting inflation, and a mounting discontent among the people. This is something that should be the concern of us all.

I would reorganize administration in government departments. To be quite frank, I do not think the changes that are under consideration now will be of any value in effecting economies, or will be very much of an improvement upon the present situation.

In my judgment—and here again I am speaking frankly—the Civil Service Commission has too much power. Let me give an example. During the war years a problem arose in the Department of Mines and Resources. A valued servant of the Immigration Branch had retired and we had to find someone to take his place. There was a man in the Parks Branch whom Dr. Camsell thought would fill the bill admirably, and when I received the facts I agreed with him. We proposed to transfer this man from the Parks Branch to the Immigration Branch, all within the Department of Mines and Resources.

What happened? We had to get the approval of the Civil Service Commission, who told us that if we were transferring this person at the same salary it would be quite all right, but if we proposed to pay him any increased salary which, of course, we intended to do—something like $25 or $30 extra a month—we could not do it because the regulations required the advertising of the position so that every one in the Civil Service, from one man to the other, could have a chance to apply.

We were faced with this situation, and the result was that we left the man where he was, although in our judgment he would have been an excellent servant of the Immigration Branch. That sort of thing is perfectly absurd. When one is trying to institute good administrative practices such a matter vitiates the whole thing.

The deputy minister corresponds to the general manager of a business concern. I would like to see a reform instituted whereby deputy ministers are selected from within the department, not from outside. I would like to see the Civil Service organized in such a way that every office boy who comes in at the foot of the ladder knows he has the opportunity, if he works effectively, to be some day deputy minister of the department. I would apply to the Civil Service the same principles that are applied in a successful business operation. I know it is not possible to obtain the same degree of efficiency in Government administration as there is in business administration, but I do think we could approximate much more closely to it.

Let me give a few illustrations. Since Parliament opened on January 18, 1,540 questions have been placed on the House of Commons Order Paper. I look over these questions occasionally. Anyone who knows anything about Government administration can only conclude that an immense amount of work is involved in answering those questions. They are asked on the theory that any member—and there is something to justify it—can ask any question and demand an answer from the Government. Many members do that without having any good reason.

When I was the Minister of Mines and Resources, which portfolio included Indian Affairs, I recall an occasion in the house upon which a gentleman from Alberta—he is no longer a member—asked a very involved question concerning Indian administration. When I saw the question I knew at once that a great deal of labour would be required in obtaining the answer. I discussed it with Dr. Camsell, who was a very good deputy minister, and he agreed with me. It was one of those questions that has five or six divisions. I asked this member if there was any particular information he wanted, and pointed out that much work would be required in obtaining an answer to the whole question. As a matter of fact, it involved searching records back to the time of Confederation. He told me he wanted it all. He said, "I am entitled to it as a Member of Parliament, and your department should supply it."

I had to agree. I could not tell him he was crazy, or anything of that kind. However, I asked Dr. Camsell to have a record kept of the time spent in getting the answers to this question and what it cost in dollars and cents. Believe it or not, honourable senators, when the order for return in respect of that question was tabled after several months it was discovered that the answer cost over $2,000 to prepare. That is perfectly absurd.

The great difficulty today, if I may say it—and I am speaking, as I indicated at the beginning, rather frankly—is that many members of the House of Commons do not sufficiently discipline themselves. Any member of Parliament is entitled to information but, in my opinion, there is some limit on the questions that should be asked. I mention this merely as one of the reforms I think could be brought about in the House of Commons.

If we give the matter a moment's consideration we will realize that these questions keep a small army of civil servants in all the departments busy preparing the answers. I have studied these questions, and it is my opinion that a great deal of the information required could be obtained by an intelligent study of the Estimates, and they could be asked when each minister has his Estimates before the House of Commons for approval.

There are a few other matters I wish to mention, but I am afraid I am taking up too much time—

Hon. Senators: Go ahead.

Hon. Mr. Power: I am not asleep yet.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: We should do something to encourage savings. There is no more striking evidence of the virtue of a people than the way in which they handle their personal affairs. Every sensible person endeavours to save some money each year. But what encouragement to save do we give people today? There are Canada Savings Bonds. We have put out hundreds of millions of dollars of savings bonds, and there has not been a single one sold since the time they were instituted that has not had its value eroded by inflation. If we are going to encourage savings, then we must stop inflation, even if it creates a good deal of discontent in the country—and it probably would. For the vital stability of the nation this is of first importance.

We could encourage savings in other forms. There are those people, and they are rather voluble at times, who say that Canadians should invest more in their own enterprises. There has been a good deal of oil development in Alberta and Saskatchewan ever since 1948, and that development was brought about by American capital because Canadian capital either was not available or would not take the risk. Today more and more Canadian capital is being invested, but the Canadian finds, if he buys, say, 100 shares of a company like Noranda or a new company that has good prospects, that the first crack taken at the earnings is by the Government which imposes a tax of 50 per cent on the corporation's profits. Then he gets his dividend, and he finds that 80 per cent of the amount he gets on his dividend has to be included in his income tax. That is no way to encourage savings.

I think there could be reforms and improvements as an incentive to Canadians to invest in their own Canadian companies.

Now I want to say a word or two about the Canadian Broadcasting Company. The C.B.C. is under a good deal of criticism these days. However, I think there is something anomalous about a concern like the C.B.C. spending over $100 million a year of the taxpayers' money—and there is no government supervision of that expenditure, none at all.

When the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was first set up about 30 years ago, the whole concern of the political parties—there were only two of any consequence in the House of Commons—was to keep it out of politics. Therefore, they leaned over backward; they were fearful of themselves; they were afraid that if the Government were in any sense responsible that the evil of politics would enter into administration. I think there is a good deal of nonsense about that.

I would have one of our ministers made responsible for C.B.C. affairs, and I would like it laid down in the law that he was not to interfere except to give approval of spending, particularly capital spending of the corporation. That is essential. When I look around and see some of the huge buildings that corporation has erected, it does not surprise me that it needs vast sums of money.

I would insist that supervision be laid down in the act, and that it should express as definitely as possible the conduct of the

C.B.C. in its operations. I say this because today many of its programs are excellent, and some are as good as anywhere in the world. On the other hand, there is a good deal of trivial tripe broadcast over that network. I watched television last night. Why do they have to deal with every sordid event in our community?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): They were pretty good in part last night, especially the part that you played.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Why do they have to exploit, for instance, a murder case? Why delve into the gutter and spread this stuff before the eyes of the public?

If I had anything to do with it, it would not be an order, but I would bring to the attention of every program director and everyone associated with programing on the C.B.C. the words of the Apostle Paul when he wrote his epistle to the Philippians.

I have always been an admirer of the Apostle Paul. He was rather a grouchy individual, yet he was one of the great men of history and had a keen insight into human nature. This led him to the Philippians, who were probably rather a poor lot. These are the words of the Apostle Paul addressed to them:

> Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.

I imagine those words might be salutary if placed before the program experts of the C.B.C.

Honourable senators, make no mistake about it, all these broadcasts have an inevitable impact upon our consciousness and upon the consciousness of our children; they have a powerful influence on whether we are going to reach for the stars or sink into the depths. I say that it does not go beyond the responsibility of Government to try and see that the right direction is taken.

I will say more. If we have not reached the stage of maturity to prevent someone from trying to exploit this medium for political purposes, then we are still political children. However, I do not believe that. Instead of groping through the dregs, let us reach for the stars and use this great agency as something to elevate the minds of our people, to provide material that is more honest, purer and better, and to consider the things that are lovely and of good report.

Honourable senators, I am near the conclusion of my remarks, and I am quite certain that some of you in your hearts will say amen to that. However, I have one further thing to say, and it arises from my abounding faith in Canada and the Canadian people.

Next year we shall celebrate one hundred years of Confederation. I would invite you to look back with me for a few moments to the state of affairs that existed a hundred years ago. We know from our histories that government in the old Province of Canada, that is when Quebec and Ontario were united, had become almost impossible, and there were reasons for that. So someone thought of the idea of Confederation. I believe the idea was first propounded by George Brown, but undoubtedly Macdonald played the great part, and Confederation came into being. In that respect, I think that Macdonald may justly be called the Father of Confederation.

Confederation laid down the Consitution for our guidance, and for almost a century we have got along very well under that Constitution. If there have been differences between federal and provincial authorities, they were settled in the courts, and without exception the judgment of the court was accepted. We should try to get back to that principle. However, that is not the particular purpose I have in mind when I refer to Confederation.

In 1867, when the Fathers of Confederation gathered at Quebec to consider and pass the resolutions that later became the basis of our Constitution, it took the delegates days to travel from Toronto to Quebec, and the delegates from the Maritime provinces had to come by boat in the summer or by dogteam in the winter. The vast expanse of the western prairies was an enigma at that time. Out of all this, on the basis of the constitution that the Fathers of Confederation framed, we have built a country. And what a country!

There is no country in the world today that compares with Canada and its resources. If you look at the progress we have made in a hundred years, there is no country in history that can surpass it, not even the United States. We have built our governing institutions—and, let me say here, the best governing institutions are those that are closest to the people. We have built universities, a score or more all across Canada. From a time when a few million dollars was considered a big budget a hundred years ago, we have reached the situation where today this Parliament is considering the spending of ten billion dollars. That fact alone illustrates the progress we have made in material things.

Honourable senators, we have made progress in the arts—not as much as we should have made. We are commencing to develop writers, and good writers they are; we have developed fine artists, and many of them have been very fine artists. We have our educational institutions, our church organizations. And we have done all this in a hundred years.

Now at the end of a hundred years, we seem to be in a state of confusion and uncertainty. We must have the leadership that will lift us out of that situation. It is futile to think that you can make progress without able leadership. There was never a truer thing said than that said by the old Hebrew poet:

> Where there is no vision, the people perish.

So we must find the leaders. And we will find them, because I say to honourable senators that there are no finer people anywhere in the world than 80 per cent of the Canadian people. They deserve the very best that our legislators can give them, the very best.

If we do that, if we are true to ourselves, if we are true to the principle of creating the qualities of character in our people—self reliance, honesty, energy—then, honourable senators, we can look forward with confidence that the second century of Confederation may even surpass the first.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, my own personal attachment to him, and indeed the enormous national prestige which he enjoys, makes a speech about the Honourable T. A. Crerar at this time a most difficult task indeed.

Parliament will not soon forget the illustious career that he has had. Historians will be compelled to write about it. Those of us who have been here in his time will always remember the privilege we enjoyed of being his colleagues. Senators who are here today will not soon forget his valedictory.

Honourable senators, a valedictory is a term usually reserved for the orator of the graduating class. It is interlaced with a sense of gratitude—gratitude to the institution from which the parting is about to occur. It is filled with hope and with optimism for the opportunities which lie ahead for his colleagues and for their future.

We have indeed today heard a valedictory, but one of a very special order. In its background is Senator Crerar's half century of membership in this great, free democratic institution which we call Parliament. He had an early life of sound preparation for the public service which has been so fully given. Senator Crerar grew up with the pioneers of the west country. He knew their moods and their ways because he was of them, and he has reflected their views here faithfully.

In 1917, in his early manhood, Senator Crerar came here to be a member of a wartime government, as he has told us, and he has walked with the great ever since. In a very real sense he represents a link with the earliest builders of our federation. When he was sworn of the Privy Council, Laurier was then, as Senator Crerar is now, its most senior member.

Borden was then Canada's first minister, and our colleague's leader in Parliament. At that time there were as well, of the Privy Council, men like Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, and Sir Hugh John Macdonald, sons of men who helped bring the Quebec Agreements to fruition in 1867. In successive cabinets his parliamentary colleagues included names like Foster, Sifton, Mulock, Aylesworth, Lemieux, Dandurand, King, Meighen, Bennett, Ilsley, Ralston, Macdonald, Power, St. Laurent. He was an associate of men like Dafoe. He founded and developed the Progressive Party. He was a member of every government formed by Mackenzie King since 1930 and he was the only minister to hold a portfolio during each of the two great wars in which Canada was engaged.

Since 1945 Senator Crerar has ably served this chamber and its committees as an innovator as well as a critic. In his career here he has exhibited all those qualities of a senior statesman for which the Senate was designed. Because of his career, the Senate, Parliament, and Canada itself have become better places. Because of his wisdom and his kindness, many people here have become better member, better senators, better parliamentarians, better Canadians. He has never failed to be fair, even when in his Scotch background it was dictated that he should be critical and firm. He has been fearless in his criticisms as well as in his commendations. This is the reputation which his private life and his public career have enshrined. This reputation he will never lose and as he leaves us he carries it with him.

In this his valedictory, too, there is a sense of gratitude. But in my view, and I am sure in yours, this sense of gratitude should activate the institution, Parliament, which he now leaves, though he has expressed his gratitude for the opportunities it afforded him to serve his country the better.

Earlier I said that a valedictory is interlaced with hope and optimism for the future of the valedictorian and his associates. The speeches which Senator Crerar has made in Parliament over the years, and the speech which we have heard today, have this quality too. It is more persuasive optimism because it is born of an unrivalled experience in the affairs of his country. He retains undiminished his faith in Canada and its people who have fashioned its fabric. Again and again we have heard him affirm this belief. It might even be epitomized in a saying of the great Gladstone—and the comparison between the two men is apposite, for both have exhibited in their public careers "a trust in the people tempered by prudence." Again, I repeat, words of mine are inadequate to this occasion, but the words of Daniel Webster used of Charles Carroll of Carrollton, the last survivor of the signers of the American Declaration of Independence, and spoken after Carroll had reached his 90th year, I summon to my aid and attribute them to our colleague:

> Of the illustrious signers of the Declaration of Independence there now remains only Charles Carroll. He seems an aged oak, standing alone on the plain, which time has spared a little longer after all its contemporaries have been levelled with the dust. We delight to gather around its trunk, while it yet stands, and to dwell beneath its shadow. ... if he dwell on the past, how touching its recollections; if he survey the present, how happy, how joyous, how full of the fruition of that hope, which his ardent patriotism indulged; if he glance at the future, how does the prospect of his country's advancement almost bewilder... Let him know that, while we honor the dead, we do not forget the living.

He retires, his faculties unimpaired and his physique little short of marvellous. As he leaves Parliament we especially of the Senate salute him in admiration, in respect, and in deep affection.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, we have listened to a great speech this afternoon. We have listened just now to a great and a well deserved eulogy. It is not my intention to speak at length. I agreed with most of what my very dear friend Senator Crerar said in his valedictory. I cannot say I agreed with all of it.

I have spoken before on the Speech from the Throne and it is not my intention to do so again today, but the Leader of the Government suggested it would not be out of place for me to say a few words on this particular occasion. For that reason I am rising more on a question of privilege, a very great privilege, to say a few words with regard to a very dear friend.

Time does not suffice for me to do justice to this occasion, and it would be unfair for me to keep you here by repeating all those things that we know, or at least many of us know, regarding Senator Crerar. My main reason for rising is simply to say that I join with the honourable leader, and I am sure you all join with me in saying that we regret very much Senator Crerar's departure from this chamber.

Parliament has been his stage for fifty years, and during that time he has played many parts. It may well be that no man in the history of Canada has played more parts in the public life of his country than has Senator Crerar.

As a young man he came to Parliament, the leader of a new party, a large party, in Western Canada. In Parliament he was the holder of the balance of power in this country. Since that time he has been the head of more departments, I suppose, than any man who ever sat in the Parliament of Canada. He has been most generous in his service, as the honourable leader of this house has told us, and he has been more helpful not only to members of Parliament but to the great public of Canada, which he has loved so much.

As far as we are concerned we would be selfish enough to wish that he would stay with us many more years. He has given service not only in great quantity but also in great quality.

I remember well when I was a member of the House of Commons in 1935 and the King Government was formed, I, like most other members at that time, sized up or tried to size up the cabinet. It was not long before most of us knew that Senator Crerar, or Minister Crerar as he was at that time, was an outstanding member of that ministry. In it were men such as Dunning, Gardiner, Powers, Ilsley, Ralston, Lapointe—I could name them all. But among those men Senator Crerar was outstanding. He was outstanding not only for his ability. I have heard it said among my colleagues that of the ministers of that cabinet who were most likeable and most human, the two outstanding were Senator Crerar and Humphrey Mitchell from Hamilton. These were the two who were best liked. I repeat that statement today.

I have read the speeches in Hansard of both houses. I have read many of your speeches, Senator Crerar. I have enjoyed them all. In 1945 when you came to the Senate you made a speech in this chamber on the motion to approve the United Nations Charter. One paragraph of that speech impressed me very much because it characterized most of your philosophy. You said in part:

> ...the progress of the world has always been based on spiritual and moral factors. If we permit moral and spiritual factors to become weakened, dead or obliterated, we make it more difficult if not impossible to bring about the kind of world that is necessary if we are to have a permanent peace.

That was Senator Crerar's philosophy, and I think he has always lived up to it. It is ideals such as that that have placed Senator Crerar among the most beloved and most liked men in this country.

May I say that we hope he will be replaced—I was about to say by as good a man as he is, but we do not expect that. However, if he is replaced by someone who is half as good we will have an outstanding senator in our midst and one who will be a geat credit to this institution.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) spoke about Senator Crerar's great mental capacity. The wonder that a man of his age can stand up and for 40 minutes speak without the aid of a single note, as he has done today and as he has done on many occasions in recent years in this chamber. Senator Connolly spoke also of Senator Crerar's amazing physical strength. I am sure that while this is his valedictory so far as the Senate is concerned, with his mental capacity and his great physical strength, he will have many years in which to serve his country outside this house.

In conclusion I wish him many years of good health and happiness; and I extend that wish most sincerely to his very dear wife, Mrs. Crerar.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Thomas Vien: Honourable senators, I would like to add three words to the eloquent speeches that have just been heard.

My first word is an expression of gratitude to the honourable Leader of the Government and the honourable Leader of the Opposition for the fine tributes they have paid to our distinguished colleague, honourable Senator Crerar, for his long and outstanding career in both Houses of Parliament. I concur in all their very appropriate remarks; they have better expressed than I could have done my own feelings in that regard.

My second word is one expressed as a member of the most exclusive club in Canada. Many contend that the Senate is the most exclusive club in Canada. Yet there is one still more exclusive: one that has only three surviving members of a membership that cannot be perpetuated: the club of the three surviving members elected to the House of Commons in 1917. Indeed, we are only three surviving members, within or without Parliament, of those elected in 1917, and these three are: The honourable Senator Crerar, P.C., the honourable Senator Power, Q.C., P.C., whom I am so happy to see with us today, and your humble servant.

Agreeing with everything that has been said in honour of Senator Crerar and with gratitude to the honourable Leaders of the Government and of the Opposition for having so eloquently spoken, I wish to appeal, as I think honourable senators will do, to Senator Crerar to delay his retirement until after the celebration of the first centenary of Confederation. In keeping with all the speeches that he has made in the past and that have been so highly praised today, the speech just delivered by honourable Senator Crerar shows that he is still physically and mentally alert and capable of continuing to serve in the capacity that he now so brilliantly holds. I would therefore like to suggest, and this is my third word, that Senator Crerar be prevailed upon to wait until after the first centenary of Confederation shall have been celebrated before retiring from the Senate.

I congratulate Senator Crerar for his long, noble and useful career. Canada as a whole is deeply indebted to him for all the services he has rendered. I wish to reiterate my gratitude to the leaders on both sides of the house for the tribute they have so eloquently expressed, and which I do not wish to repeat.

I hope my appeal to Senator Crerar to delay his resignation will be granted. I have in mind that he also should celebrate his golden jubilee as a member of Parliament.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. C. G. Power: Honourable senators, it is indeed a very difficult task for anyone to express adequately the feelings which I am sure animate all members of this institution on learning that Senator Crerar is about to separate himself from us. With respect to the Senate itself, apart from the personalities involved, it has struck me that with the loss of Senator Crerar we are losing one of the bulwarks of defence against those who say that the Senate is composed of senile and aging political refugees.

Senator Crerar, by his contributions to the debates here, by his speeches, by his presence in committees, has shown that we have within the Senate statesmen who are capable of carrying on the affairs of this country as adequately as those of any other section of the country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Power: Through his fluency and his eloquence he has shown also that he can express views, thoughts and considerations brought about by long experience in business, government and administration.

Like my friend Senator Vien, I entered Parliament in the same year as Senator Crerar. He was my senior by a long way, in that he had already been sworn in as a member of Cabinet before he even became a member of the House of Commons. It took me 20 years to achieve that distinction. But when I heard him today, as I have on numerous occasions, my mind went back to some time in 1918, to the first session of the Parliament after the 1917 election. Senator Crerar was then Minister of Agriculture in the Union Cabinet of Sir Robert Borden.

I can remember him well as he stood up to make his maiden speech. He was awkward, gawky and suffering from maiden speech nerves. But what impressed most of us on the other side—and those of you who are old enough to remember will recall we were still under the impact of probably the bitterest and the dirtiest election which had been held since Confederation, and we were not inclined to be friendly towards those on the other side of the house—was that notwithstanding the evident amateurishness of my honourable friend, he gave every evidence of the utmost sincerity and conviction. That is what has remained with me over all the years that have followed during which I was his contemporary in the Commons, in the cabinet, and here.

Honourable senators, if I may be pardoned for going back a little bit in order to mention incidents in his career, I should like to say that Senator Crerar up to 1917 had been a convinced Liberal. He was a great friend and an admirer of, and he had a great affection for, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The time came when, for purely patriotic motives and for a cause in which he firmly believed, he separated himself from his leader. That was integrity, honesty and conviction. Two years later, notwithstanding the fact, as he said here today, that he had acquired a great respect and admiration for his leader, Sir Robert Borden, he found that his convictions on the matter of tariffs compelled him to leave his cabinet. Tariffs are not as important today perhaps as they were in those years gone by, but those who were of the same view as Senator Crerar believed that any duties imposed on goods going from one country to another were morally wrong; not economically wrong, but morally wrong.

The war being over, the time came for Union Government supporters to revert to their original or former allegiances, but Senator Crerar found he could not support the tariff views of the party with which he was associated, and he left the Government of Sir Robert Borden. Again conviction, again honesty, again integrity.

Later on he was instrumental in forming the Progressive Party, which will be remembered by those who think a little bit about their parliamentary history. Senator Crerar came to Ottawa with a number of followers in the Progressive Party in excess of those who supported Mr. Meighen in the Conservative party. He could at that time, constitutionally and by every rule, have become the Leader of the Opposition, and the alternative to the Government of the day. But he was not a man to seek power for power's sake. He wished only to bring to Ottawa, and before the people of this country, the grievances and the complaints of those with whom he was associated. That, again, showed disinterestedness and integrity.

Still later on, as leader of the Progressive Party, he found that within its ranks there was an important group who felt that members of Parliament should be delegates and not representatives in what I call the true and constitutional sense of a member of Parliament's being a representative. Because he could not agree with those who held the view that members of Parliament must vote on measures in the house according to the dictates of the particular classes or sections of the population that supported them, he decided to leave the party. He could not remain leader of a party that left aside the customary and constitutional understanding of what a member of Parliament is, namely, a representative of the whole of the country rather than of any faction or section.

Still later on, after he had returned to the Liberal party, he found that his views about patriotic effort did not correspond with those of his leader and the head of the cabinet, Mr. Mackenzie King. He and his friends brought so much influence to bear that the entire policy of the Government with respect to certain controversial matters was changed. Here again, on account of his disinterested conviction, because he had nothing to gain—and one result, so far as I was concerned, was that I went out into the wilderness for many years—he brought about changes in policy.

This is the man who is about to leave us. If his career in politics had been that of any other man I would have said it was adventurous and exciting, but our friend has had the habit of making these strong decisions without any appearance of doing something out of line. He did what he did as a matter of course and because he believed in it. With him, belief and conviction are sufficient to make him take the course he does.

During all of that time, notwithstanding the controversial things he has done, the most remarkable thing about him is that rarely did we hear of any antagonism against him. Rarely have there been personalities expressed against him, and neither have any of us heard him express personalities against people with whom he did not agree. We have here a man whose career has been somewhat extraordinary in our own lifetime, and yet he does not give the impression of being an exploiter or an adventurer. He remains what he was when he first came into Parliament—an honest, conscientious, decent man.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I cannot add anything to the remarkable speeches that have been made by the two leaders of the house, and by the members of that exclusive club we have heard about—the club of 1917. Yet, as one of the older members of this house I think I should say something.

Honourable senators, I have known Senator Crerar for more than half a century. I was attracted to him very strongly many years ago when as leader of the western radical movement he expressed so forcibly and so clearly the philosophy of free or freer trade.

Many years have followed. I went through the election of 1917. I have always considered that election the worst blot upon the democracy of Canada. I was a Laurier candidate in 1917, and was supported by Laurier, but I did not win in that election because of the kind of election it was.

I sat in the house with Senator Crerar during the war sessions, and I have been his colleague here for the last 20 or more years. So, I could not allow an occasion of this kind to go by without saying at least something.

I have regret at Senator Crerar's leaving the Senate, but, honourable senators, I can see one bright spot. While Senator Crerar is undoubtedly leaving this chamber in the very near future we can all be assured that he is not leaving public life. I say that because I have known him so well for so long.

He has advocated those things in principle, not in detail, but in the fundamentals in which I believe. Through all the years he has championed principles for which I also stood. He has denounced and criticized many of the things which I also denounce and criticize. Therefore, I shall regret to see him leave. However, honourable senators, be assured that Senator Crerar is not leaving public life. We have not heard the last of him. I can scarcely imagine Canada without Crerar, and I cannot imagine Crerar without Canada. We shall hear more from him as time passes.

Let us not forget that there has been a power behind Senator Crerar over all these years. I refer to Mrs. Crerar, who has been a staunch supporter of him and his ideas and principles. I honour him now by saying that she means more to him than anything else in the world except his cherished principles.

I express the hope that, as time goes by and occasion arises, Senator Crerar will visit us here in Ottawa many times, because he will find here many friends on both sides of the house, both in and out of Parliament, who will welcome him. But in no place will he receive a more sincere and friendly welcome than right here in the Senate of Canada.

I wish Senator Crerar well and wish him that joy that comes from the recollection of a life well and vigorously spent. I wish him that happiness that is the lot of those who have spent their lives in public service; I wish him continued health and the vigour and the enthusiasm to continue his service to Canada.

Hon. William H. Taylor: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. To relieve the minds of some senators, may I say that I move the adjournment on behalf of Senator Bourque.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, may I have an opportunity just for a moment or two to express my warmest thanks for the kindness of all my fellow senators here this afternoon. Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) and Senator Brooks, in the respective positions they hold, have been more than kind, as have also the famous two who have survived since the 1917 legend, along with myself.

Nothing moved me more than the remarks of my old friend Senator Power. In the past, whenever I have risen to speak, I was usually able to put him to sleep. However, that was not the case today.

I am more than grateful to my old friend Senator Roebuck. It is more than 50 years ago since we first met. And Senator Vien has been most kind.

Honourable senators, my heart is filled with gratitude for the kindness I have always received from my colleagues in this house. I can assure all that I shall not be forgetful of that kindness, and I shall cherish until my final days my rich experience as a member of the Senate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Taylor for Hon. Mr. Bourque, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, may I suggest that in the circumstances, the remaining items on the Order Paper be dispensed with this afternoon. Perhaps we can work a little harder tomorrow instead.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Items No. 2 and 3 will therefore stand.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-17, to amend the Bankruptcy Act, and had directed that the bill be reported with certain amendments.

For text of report see Appendix "A", p. 596-8.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave of the Senate, I move that this report be taken into consideration now.

Honourable senators, I wish first to give an explanation of why I am asking that this report be taken into consideration now. The committee has spent a considerable amount of time on its examination of this bill. The first hearing was on March 23; since then there have been five others, one extending over a morning and an afternoon. The Minister of Justice and the Deputy Minister, and the Superintendent of Bankruptcy appeared before the committee.

The committee also heard representations from such organizations as the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants and the Canadian Bar Association. Indeed, during the clause-by-clause study of the bill Mr. J. L. Biddell, of Clarkson, Gordon and Company of Toronto, one of the outstanding men in the field of bankruptcy, and Mr. Michael Greenblatt, a well-known Montreal lawyer in this field, representing the Canadian Bar Association, remained during our consideration and were most helpful in our discussion of the technical aspects of certain clauses of the bill.

At this time much pressure is developing for the passage of this bill, and its very important amendments, into law. The committee has made a careful study of it and has, I suggest, simplified the way for the consideration of these amendments in the other place.

In addition, the transcripts of the committee hearings are available, and it will be easy for members of the other place to follow our discussions and the reasons for the changes proposed.

Those are the reasons for my request for the consent of the Senate to consideration of this report today. May I explain briefly the amendments.

One of the very important amendments has to do with the provision in the bill giving the Superintendent of Bankruptcy authority on an ex parte order obtained from the courts to go into any building or premises and seize books, records, etc., that might afford evidence of an offence under the Bankruptcy Act, and to take such documents away.

The committee felt this was too arbitrary a power to be given, particularly in the light of what has happened in some other cases where such arbitrary powers of seizure exist in the statutes. For instance, a firm of chartered accountants was once visited by the departmental officers. Their aides arrived at the premises in a certain city with trucks and cartons. They seized every book, paper and file, filled up the cartons and took them away. The day-to-day business, the current operation of that particular company, was brought completely to a standstill. Afterwards there was the delay in getting at the documents and reclaiming them, and even of obtaining copies.

We felt it was time that we spelled out what we regarded as reasonable limits to this practically unlimited right to seize documents in premises and to take them away. Therefore, we adopted the principle that, certainly so far as current documents were concerned, those documents should not leave the premises until the owner of the documents or the person from whom they were seized had copies or was furnished with copies, so that he still had the tools of his trade.

In this connection it must be remembered that we are dealing with seizure of documents in the hands of third persons, that we are not talking about the seizure of documents and records of the bankrupt, because the trustee has all that authority, and he is entitled to enjoy such right.

Finally, we provided amendments which we felt would cover that situation, and invited the Minister of Justice and deputy minister, and the Superintendent of Bankruptcy, to attend a meeting of the committee. They made certain representations, pointing out the difficulties that our proposed amendments put in the way of the proper enforcement and investigation of bankruptcy frauds.

We had entirely different views, and I think reasonable and sensible views on the question. The minister asked for time to consider. He subsequently asked for a conference with the chairman of the committee. I spent several hours yesterday with the minister and the deputy minister, as well as with the Superintendent of Bankruptcy. We had not arrived at any finality by the end of the discussion, but in my own mind I had thought of several slight changes to meet their wishes. However, the deputy minister and Superintendent of Bankruptcy asked to appear before the committee this morning, and the amendments appearing on pages 4 and 5 of the report are amendments proposed by the deputy minister and accepted by the committee in relation to the seizure of documents, other than on the aspect of solicitor and client privilege, which I shall talk about later.

As the amendments stand before you now, on the right of the superintendent, when he can get an ex parte order from a court he can go into any premises and, not seize but examine records and documents on the premises, and he can make copies and take the copies away. The books and records as such remain in the possession of the person all the time, so that his business operations are not interfered with in any way.

For the purposes of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy, copies are satisfactory. As a matter of fact, that is the way, with certain other changes, that they operate under the Combines Investigation Act. They go in; they are very discriminating in the matter of the records that they decide they need; then they may, and do to a large extent, make copies right on the premises. In the case of the documents they decide to take away for further examination, they provide copies to the person from whose hands they have been taken.

These amendments dealing with seizure of documents occupied a considerable part of our time. We finally arrived at a solution. We must assume it is satisfactory to the minister, because it was drafted and proposed by the deputy minister at our committee meeting today. We discussed it and it was accepted.

Honourable senators, on the aspect of what is called solicitor and client privilege, we felt that it was an old and well-known doctrine that a client is entitled to claim privilege in relation to opinions which he may obtain from his lawyer, and that the client is the only one with whose consent the lawyer can waive that privilege. There are provisions in the Income Tax Act recognizing and providing procedures where a claim is made or asserted on solicitor and client privilege. What we have done here is, by cross reference, provide that those provisions in relation to solicitor and client privilege presently existing in the Income Tax Act, where they have been for some time, shall apply to the Bankruptcy Act.

I cannot say that the deputy minister was too happy with the incorporation of this provision. He preferred or suggested that possibly we should not insist on this until such time as there was a complete revision of the act. Our view was that if we raised this principle—and it is a sound principle—and then abandoned our position, our position would not be very strong later on to re-assert it. So it is incorporated in the amendments before you.

There are some minor amendments, but I should tell you of some of the major ones. For instance, in the area of proposals, you will remember that in these amendments an insolvent person may make a proposal to his creditors. He goes to a trustee and makes a proposal. With the advice and assistance of those experts who were with us during the hearing, we have simplified the procedures and tied those provisions in with the main provision on this point in the Bankruptcy Act.

Let me illustrate. An insolvent person makes a proposal to his creditors, the creditors hold a meeting and they do not accept the proposal. Then, under the amendment, the person making the proposal is presumed to have made an authorized assignment on the day on which the proposal was made. Then there was the problem of tying that kind of authorized assignment into the general scheme of the Bankrupcy Act. We have done that in the amendments we have provided.

We have provided for some expedition by saying that, at that very meeting of creditors in which they refused to approve the proposal, the creditors may convene themselves into their first meeting of creditors and by an ordinary resolution of creditors appoint a trustee or confirm the appointment of the trustee who has been acting in the proposal.

The significance of an "ordinary resolution" is this. Under the Bankruptcy Act itself, such a proceeding in the regular and ordinary way is done and required to be done by "special resolution." The difference between a special resolution and an ordinary one is that under a special resolution you must have a majority of the creditors and you must have three-quarters of the value of the proven claims; under an ordinary resolution you have a plan laid out in section 81 of the Bankruptcy Act, under which there is one vote per hundred dollars or so many hundred dollars of proven claims.

Therefore, it would be easier and more expeditious, at the stage that you are concerned with, where a proposal has been turned down and there is already a trustee there, that you get the machinery and the business of the liquidation under the Bankruptcy Act moving as quickly as possible. So while you have the creditors in session you may as well make use of the situation instead of sending them away to come back another time.

The procedure we set out to deal with the situation where the creditors do not approve of a proposal will also apply to a situation where the creditors approve but the court does not. We have also applied those same procedures to deal with the case where after a proposal has been going along and the debtor fails to perform, the court may, after examining the circumstances, annul the proposal. Then we have provided a series of procedures by which the legal machinery of the Bankruptcy Act starts to operate.

We have other instances that may be of some importance. Heretofore under the Bankruptcy Act the assets of the bankrupt consist of all he may have at the time the bankruptcy takes place, what he may be entitled to receive during the period of bankruptcy, and what might devolve upon him during that period. The amendments before you also provide that in relation to salary or earnings of a bankrupt during the period of bankruptcy, the trustee may apply to the court for an order directing the payment of some portions of that money to the trustee. We felt that the trustee ought only to exercise that power with the consent of the inspectors and/or the creditors. So we have provided for that. It is possible for such an order under the amendment to extend beyond the date on which the bankrupt received his discharge. We felt there should be full approval by the creditors and the inspectors to such a course of action.

In what are called reviewable transactions—those are transactions because of the blood relationships set out in the first part of the bill—a creditor who is involved in such a transaction has to stand by until the dividends in respect of the claims of other creditors are paid before he is entitled to come in. He can do so only after the others have been paid. An exception was provided in that where a creditor had made a loan of cash within two years prior to the date of bankruptcy, the transaction was not subject to this provision. We felt the court was the proper place to determine in every instance whether a creditor in a reviewable transaction was entitled to the exemption from this prohibition. We have therefore provided that in all these cases it is up to the court to decide whether the transaction is proper.

There was a provision in the amendments, you will recall, that a corporation may not apply for its discharge. We had a full discussion on that in committee, and there seemed to be numbers of cases where this would work a definite hardship and might even interfere with the rehabilitation of companies. What we have therefore provided is that where a company has satisfied the claims of its creditors in full, it may apply for its discharge from bankruptcy.

There was another provision concerning the information that would be made available to the general public by the procedures in the amendments. Through these procedures the only information that would get through to the general public and to the trade would be, for instance, in relation to the opinion of the trustee as to who was responsible for the greatest proportion of the debts or the debtor's liabilities.

In addition we felt that information of a public character in the way provided in the amendments should also extend to include the opinion of the trustee as to the probable cause or causes of the bankruptcy. In addition, we did extend and broaden some of the so-called bankruptcy offences, but you need only to read these to understand them.

There was a little problem in connection with what I call the transition; that is, how you read into the provisions of the general bankruptcy law the amendments which are made, and particularly in relation to reviewable transactions. Bankruptcies are proceeding all the time. This bill becomes law at a certain date. How do you apply the provisions of this bill when they become law in relation to the transactions in the administration of the bankrupt estate that had moved along to a certain stage of disposition? Our concern was particularly in relation to reviewable transactions. When this becomes the law, no matter what stage the administration may be at, does the trustee have to go back and measure everything in the terms of the requirements laid down for reviewable transactions that are created under this amendment?

As a result of discussion and with the approval of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy, and with his assistance in the drafting of the amendment, you will find we have rewritten the concluding section of the bill, section 22, so as to make clear how the transition works as between the differences in the new bill and what is provided under the general law in the old bill, and this was even to the satisfaction of our so-called experts, Mr. Biddell and Mr. Greenblatt, who were there.

Those are, in outline but in very bald outline, the things which were done in revision. I can tell you that a great many hours were spent, and we received the benefit of good advice. I need hardly tell you that we had an excellent and well-informed committee who had a full appreciation of the law that would bear on this, and the net result was, I think, a very good job.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, we are all indebted to the members of this committee for the careful consideration over a long period of time they have given to this very technical matter—and it is a problem that has been crying out for solution.

I think this is one of the areas in which the Senate works at its best. They have taken a complicated bill and have heard the experts who were available from the Government and from the professions, and I am sure they have done an expert job themselves. I repeat, we are all indebted to them for what they have done.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, before we proceed further may I pay a special tribute to the very able chairman of this committee who has done so much.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS

UNITED BAPTIST WOMAN'S MISSIONARY UNION OF THE MARITIME PROVINCES—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Maurice Bourget, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-33, respecting United Baptist Woman's Missionary Union of the Maritime Provinces, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN BOARD OF MISSIONS OF THE CHURCH OF GOD—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. Bourget, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-18, to incorporate Canadian Board of Missions of the Church of God, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendments:

1. Page 1: Strike out line 22 and substitute the following: "name of Canadian Board of Missions of the Church of God (General Offices: Anderson, Indiana),"

2. Strike out the title and substitute the following: "An Act to incorporate Canadian Board of Missions of the Church of God (General Offices: Anderson, Indiana)".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Bourget: I move, with leave of the Senate, that this report be taken into consideration now.

Honourable senators, the purpose of the amendment was specifically to delineate that the bill apply only to the establishment of the Canadian Board of Missions of the Church of God. It was felt the addition in brackets of the words "(General Offices: Anderson, Indiana)" would indicate clearly to anyone dealing with the Board of Missions that the denomination referred to has its origin in the midwest United States and that, therefore, no special significance attaches to the words "Church of God".

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Cameron moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-150, to amend the Research Council Act, and had directed that the bill be reported with certain amendments.

For text of report see Appendix "B", p. 599.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Leonard moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, May 31, at 8 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

NEWFOUNDLAND ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE BILL, 1966

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 24, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Baird for the second reading of Bill C-185, to give effect to Term 29 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, up to this moment this has been a most interesting debate. I am sure we are all indebted to the honourable sponsor (Hon. Mr. Baird) for his concise and clear explanation of the reasons for the bill. We all learned a great deal from, and thoroughly enjoyed, Senator Hollett's contribution. His speech was one that I would expect from a fellow Newfoundlander, and is all the more impressive coming from a man who has given a lifetime of service to his country. Like the sponsor, he served with distinction during the First World War, then as a magistrate and a member of the Provincial Parliament, and now as a member of this house.

Senator Pouliot spoke in his usual kindly and understanding manner. His remarks were most helpful.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you very much.

Hon. Mr. Cook: Senator Vien asked one or two questions and made some observations that went to the root of the matter. I note that he does not appear to have the same admiration and respect for the Privy Council that I have, but no doubt if the boot were on the other foot I would feel as he does.

However, I do not share Senator Hollett's concern about some remarks made in the other place by some enthusiastic members from Quebec. On the contrary, I recall the fact that Newfoundland was treated very well indeed by the Canadian Government, which was presided over by a greatly loved and outstanding Canadian, who also comes from Quebec. I refer, of course, to the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent. In short, honourable senators, there is no doubt that, should the need arise, Newfoundland and Quebec will form a partnership to the mutual benefit of each other.

I do not wish to be critical of my colleagues in the Senate, but it does seem to me that the Senate as a whole is not sufficiently informed on the vital subject of Newfoundland's history, so this afternoon I shall spend a little time, before saying something about the bill itself, in an endeavour to correct this situation.

Newfoundland was first discovered in 1497 by John Cabot who landed at Cape Bonavista. There has been some suggestion from Nova Scotians that he landed on Cape Breton Island, but this every loyal Newfoundlander rejects absolutely. Cabot was given ten pounds by King Henry VII. Some people have been so unkind as to say he should have been given ten years. Such a remark springs from jealousy of us Newfoundlanders.

In 1583 Sir Humphrey Gilbert took possession of the island for the British Crown, and we thus became Britain's oldest colony. At that time, the only inhabitants of Newfoundland were the Beothuk Indians, and the records do not show that Sir Humphrey consulted them on this matter.

Nothing much happened that would be of interest to a mainlander from 1583 until 1914, the commencement of the First World War. I might mention in passing that by 1914 the Newfoundlanders had completely exterminated the Beothuks. When the First World War began, Newfoundland played her full share.

Both Senator Baird and Senator Hollett, as I have said, served in that war with distinction. Hardly a family in Newfoundland escaped. Being only five or six years old at the time I was not ready to serve, but like most other families mine suffered as well. I had an older brother who was among the first 500 to enlist in 1914, and who went overseas and died of his wounds in 1918. Indeed, almost a whole generation of Newfoundlanders was wiped out. In addition, we spent what money we had. The First World War cost Newfoundland $30 million, which was a vast sum to us at that time.

The next event of importance was the great depression which caused Newfoundland to surrender self-government. For this, Newfoundlanders blamed their political leaders, but the background was economic. Newfoundland was a tiny, undeveloped country. Its main industry was the production of salt codfish, and in the depression the total value of the catch sank as low as $6 million.

Newfoundland had never really experienced prosperous times. When the collapse came the people were frightened and almost totally ignorant of the underlying causes. Accordingly, our public affairs were examined by a royal commission, and the evidence given by Newfoundlanders was to the effect that it was all the fault of the politicians. In looking back at those times in the light of knowledge acquired since, it seems to me that to blame Newfoundland's collapse on the politicians is absolute nonsense. The standard of the public man in Newfoundland was no higher and no lower than that in any other place, and I feel that Newfoundlanders have no reason to be ashamed of that period in their history.

Whatever the reason was, our Constitution was suspended at our own request, and we were governed by seven people appointed by the Dominions Office in London.

Then came World War II, and once again Newfoundland did what she could. The effort was not as great as that in World War I, but of course an appointed government could not in wartime formulate the same policies as an elected government. Still, there is no reason for Newfoundlanders to feel anything but pride at what their country did. Our young men and women served with those of other countries of the Commonwealth. Indeed, when England wanted to give parts of Newfoundland to the United States for use as military bases for 99 years, no one questioned the right or the wisdom of England to do this.

At long last we come to the year 1949, the year of union with Canada—the most outstanding, most eventful and most beneficent year in Newfoundland's history to that time.

When Newfoundland became a part of Canada it was generations behind the rest of the country in its standard of public services. For example, we had almost no municipal government of any kind. The only municipal government we had was in the capital city of St. John's, and that government did not operate the police department, the fire department, any schools, hospitals or welfare departments. All of these facilities were provided by the central government, and there was not one single municipal government outside St. John's.

There was so little information of any kind upon which those who negotiated the Terms of Union could rely that they were at a loss to know what would be necessary. No one could foretell the future. Therefore, Term 29 was inserted in the Terms of Union. In due course, in pursuance of Term 29 a royal commission was appointed, presided over by the Honourable John B. McNair, the distinguished Chief Justice of New Brunswick. As all honourable senators know, we can always count on people from New Brunswick to do the right thing.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Cook: Newfoundland's representative was Sir Albert Walsh, then Chief Justice of Newfoundland, and who was, I am proud to say, for a short period a law partner of mine. The third member of the Commission was Mr. John Deutsch, an outstanding economist and now the Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada. It is from the report of the McNair Commission that the $8 million per year comes.

The Canadian Government carried out the recommendations of the royal commission, and has continued to do so. This bill does not change what is now being done. However, there is one important difference.

Section 3 of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act 1964 reads:

> . . . the Minister of Finance may, . . .

Section 2 of this bill reads:

> . . . the Minister of Finance, on behalf of the Government of Canada, shall . . .

As I understand the situation, under the present act, the administration itself could decide whether the $8 million would or would not be paid. Under this act, the $8 million must be paid by the Government so long as the act itself is part of the statute law of Canada. Canada is a sovereign power. The Parliament of Canada is the supreme authority of a sovereign power.

Having said that, I do not propose to enter into any argument on the question of the legal right of Canada to repeal or amend this act once it is passed. The act speaks for itself. But, I repeat, this act carries out and implements a treaty entered into between Canada of the first part and Newfoundland of the second part, and it remains in full force and effect unless and until the Parliament of Canada after full debate decides otherwise.

The Parliament of Canada is the high court of justice of the nation, and in the light of the past treatment of Newfoundland by Canada, I for one am more than satisfied that Canada always has and always will more than honour to the full her commitments to Newfoundland and that therefore the power of subsequent Parliaments to amend, revoke or repeal this act is purely academic. This act will remain in full force and effect so long as the need for it exists.

Newfoundlanders do not particularly like being a "have-not" province, and we are doing all we can to cure this situation. She is developing, and developing very quickly, and when the times comes, as I think it will, when we catch up and perhaps even pass the other "have-not" provinces, no doubt we will sit down and make an agreement to suspend or to end these annual payments.

It is true that Newfoundland is borrowing large sums of money, but when it is realized that in a very short time our population has almost doubled, the need becomes apparent. When you read that her population is 500,000, you must understand that the word "population" means men and women and boys and girls. The men and women may become sick or grow old so that hospitals and welfare agencies are needed. Our boys and girls need schools and universities.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to utter anything of a partisan nature. This would be unwise, unfair and improper, when so much good will for Newfoundland is shown by all parties. However, I would like to say "Thank you" to the Prime Minister for the interest he has shown in this matter, and to Newfoundland's representative in the Cabinet who has made this bill his special concern. I know that our energetic premier, the Honourable Mr. Smallwood, who in the past has had some fears about the payment, will indeed be happy.

Finally, I say to the Parliament of Canada through the Senate, and to all the people of Canada through Parliament, "Thank you" for the practical welcome you have always given to the people of Newfoundland and for all your kindness, generosity and good will through the years we have been part of Canada.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I say this is a splendid bill. It would be even more so if it provided for, say, $10 million or $12 million. However, rather than delay its passage I am prepared to vote for the $8 million.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, there has already been a good debate on this bill, and I believe that there has been even more unanimity in regard to it than would the speech of my honourable friend Senator Cook indicate. He, of course, supported the bill, and I want to assure him and also my honourable friend Senator Hollett that I do not propose to oppose the bill in any way. I just want to make one or two brief comments in regard to it.

I listened with particular interest to one sentence that Senator Cook uttered in his fine address. He said, "This act will remain in full force and effect as long as the need for it exists."

I wish to submit to this honourable house that my friend is being most ungenerous to Newfoundland, if that is the proper interpretation of this bill. I do not find anything in the bill or in the resolution which was introduced in the other place which would limit the effect of the bill in the manner indicated by my learned friend.

My first comment is that no explanation has been given for a certain part of the wording of section 2 of the bill, from which I shall read three lines:

> —unless and until otherwise provided by any agreement in that behalf hereafter entered into between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland—

It is by reason of these words that I speak to this bill.

I would like an explanation from someone as to what those words mean. Do they mean that next year or five years from now the Canadian Government is going to say to the Government of Newfoundland that the amount of $8 million should be reduced to $4 million? Does it mean that at some future time the Canadian Government will say to Newfoundland that the $8 million should be reduced to nil?

On the other hand, does it mean that there is to be a perpetual payment of $8 million to the Province of Newfoundland? I do not know. Perhaps what is meant in this context will be explained in committee, if the bill goes to committee.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, it will be referred to committee.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: The main reason I comment on these words is that I decided to find out what was said in the resolution stage of this bill in the other place. I shall not quote from a debate in the other place, but I think I am at liberty to quote the resolution. It reads as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to give effect to Term 29 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada and to pay to the province, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, in the fiscal year commencing on the 1st day of April 1967 and in each and every fiscal year thereafter, an annual amount, by way of additional financial assistance as contemplated by Term 29 of eight million dollars.

I ask honourable senators to consider the words, "to pay... in each and every fiscal year thereafter, an annual amount, by way of additional financial assistance as contemplated by Term 29 of $8 million."

Surely that means only one thing, that this is an annual amount in perpetuity. I think my honourable friend Senator Hollett will agree with this. I am not objecting to it at all. I am not opposing the bill, but I ask why did not the bill speak the same language as the resolution. That is my main point.

The honourable Senator Cook related part of the history of Newfoundland. I concur in his statement that there has always been agreement among all Canadians that a good thing was achieved when Newfoundland confederated with the rest of Canada in 1949. I think everyone in Canada, high or low, wanted Newfoundland to get a generous deal from Canada, and I hope that has been the effect of the union. However, the effect or result of this bill does not depend on the fact that we wanted to be generous, and that we wanted Newfoundland to become part of Canada. This bill is the result of a contract, and I think that this point has not been emphasized sufficiently in this house.

I believe that actually the contract Canada made with Newfoundland was to pay this $8 million in perpetuity. Of course, the matter was not quite as simple as that. As Senator Hollett said Tuesday, it was realized in 1949 that it was impossible to determine at that time just what, if anything, should be paid by way of an additional grant to Newfoundland in order to bring its standards up to those of the other Atlantic provinces, without additional taxation or greater taxation impact than these provinces were subjected to.

Consequently, it was agreed in Term 29 that a royal commission would be appointed within eight years. That was done, and as Senator Cook has said, that royal commission consisted of the Honourable J. B. McNair as chairman, the Honourable Albert Joseph Walsh, then Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, and Mr. John J. Deutsch. The Commission was given specific terms of reference, and these terms were recited by Senator Hollett and appear in Hansard of May 24.

There was but one weakness in the whole picture, as I see it. It was that the terms of reference authorized the commission to examine into and report upon this problem we have been talking about. The whole issue was whether the Government of Canada was bound in contract to accept the report of that commission, exactly as given.

In my view there is much to support the position that that was a contractual obligation by the Government of Canada, that the Government of Canada undertook to do exactly what that commission recommended.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): This bill reinforces that.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I am just coming to that point. Certainly, you could use the word "reinforce". I am simply restating my position. I am not objecting to the bill, but I am bringing out certain things which I think have not been brought out in this debate and which should be brought out.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): If the honourable gentleman does not mind the observation, I think that Senator Hollett dealt rather well with this point yesterday. I assure honourable senators that this bill will go to committee—I believe the sponsor of the bill will move that this be done—and there these questions can be more thoroughly discussed.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I hope my honourable friend does not object to my making a few remarks on this bill. This legislation is important from the point of view of Newfoundland, but it is also important we emphasize that this is a matter of contract. I agree that the recommendations of the McNair report should be carried out. Senator Hollett recited the terms of the recommendations, and the concluding recommendation (e) states that from April 1, 1960 and thereafter, additional financial assistance be paid in the amount of $8 million per annum.

The only point of difference that there may be between these governments is whether the Government of Canada was bound to accept this recommendation as made. In my judgment the Government is bound to pay $8 million in perpetuity.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Would it not be the first time in the political history of this country that the Government would be bound by the report of a royal commission? Does not the Government at times shelve such reports, and does it not object to some recommendations? I am not questioning the reasoning, but would this not be the first time that this would be done?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I am giving my opinion with regard to the McNair report. I ask the honourable leader of this house, or others, or the people who drafted this bill, why it is this bill has not carried out the terms of the resolution presented in the House of Commons on May 18. That is in identical terms to the McNair report, but the bill is not.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think a quick answer is simply that in a resolution which is presented in the other place it is impossible to put in all the terms that are in the bill that is to follow. All that is indicated in the resolution is the general terms of the measure that is to follow, particularly the financial provisions. The details follow. If the honourable senator will look at other resolutions he will see that quite short resolutions often deal with some long bills. Perhaps that is the answer on this point.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I hope the honourable Leader of the Government does not think that I do not understand that a resolution cannot disclose everything that might be contained in a bill.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The senator asked a question and I thought he wanted an answer.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I understand, of course, that a resolution cannot contain all the parts of a bill, but there is no reason why it could not contain the extra three lines which are contained in this bill.

The question that I ask is, why this bill should not be amended to provide for the contractual obligation which I have stated in exactly the way that I, and I believe many others, understand is contemplated by the McNair report as a result of the specific problem set before it by Term 29?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have a question to ask any member from Newfoundland.

Whereas in virtue of the Terms of Union, financial assistance amounting to $8 million may be required by the Government of Newfoundland, there is no evidence to the effect that there was any request from the department in Newfoundland. I find this a very delicate matter, because, as we know, Mr. Smallwood is very touchy and if he has not asked for this subsidy the Province of Newfoundland may reject it.

Therefore, I would like to be told what steps were made by the department in Newfoundland to have this kind of legislation and this subsidy amounting to $8 million. If this has been done behind the back of the Government of Newfoundland, the Parliament of Canada will be laughed at because of this legislation.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Honourable senators, may I ask a question, to clarify my mind.

I understand Senator Cook to say that the Province of Newfoundland has received $8 million a year, is receiving $8 million a year and will receive $8 million a year, or words to that effect. The question I want to ask is, what happened in the intervening years between 1949, when the terms of the agreement were signed between Newfoundland and Canada, and the date of the McNair report? Did Newfoundland receive the money, or is this based retroactively? Did they receive money in those years?

Hon. Mr. Cook: There was a transitional grant which was coming down by order from the Government of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Baird: Honourable senators, I wish to thank all those who have taken part in the debate. I would like to single out Senator Thorvaldson. I have no doubt that when the bill goes to committee, as I propose to move, all the information necessary will be provided by the witnesses who will appear before the committee.

He said: Honourable senators, as this is the first time I have risen to speak in this Chamber since the beginning of the present session—and I could add that it is my first opportunity to speak since I have been appointed a senator—I take this opportunity to offer you, Mr. Speaker, my best wishes and sincere congratulations on your appointment as Speaker of the Senate. Would you be so kind as to convey these felicitations and good wishes to your charming and distinguished wife. I am sure that you will fulfil your duties impartially and that you will bring to your high office the fine and numerous qualities that have always been characteristic of you, sir.

I also take this opportunity to tell my colleagues who sat in this Chamber when it was my privilege to preside over their discussions—and here I am speaking particularly to the honourable Leader of the Senate, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), and to my good friend the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Brooks—that I felt deeply the courtesy and the friendship they showed me throughout my tenure as Speaker of the Senate.

I would be remiss were I to neglect to thank the officials of the Senate for their unfailing support during my speakership and also all the Senate staff for their good and loyal services.

To my new colleagues, I extend a most hearty welcome to this Chamber. I am sure they will share with us the benefits of their widespread experience and their numerous talents.

[Text:]

The purpose of Bill S-31 is to grant authority to Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company to complete its line of railway within the period ending on the 14th day of May 1977. The company's present authority so as to complete its line expires on the 14th day of May, 1967.

The company was incorporated in the year 1947 for the purpose of constructing and operating a railway from the St. Lawrence River at a point between the rivers Marguerite and Moisie in the Province of Quebec and thence northerly through Labrador, ultimately to a suitable port on Ungava Bay. The portion of the line which has been constructed to date runs a distance of 355 miles—149 miles in Quebec and 206 miles in Labrador—from Sept Iles, Quebec, through Labrador, to Schefferville, Quebec, and has been constructed at a cost of over $162 million.

The company is a subsidiary of the Iron Ore Company of Canada and, as honourable senators are undoubtedly aware, the railway was constructed to make possible the development of the iron ore deposits located in this vast area of our country's north. There are two main areas where iron ore is now mined. These are in the Schefferville region and the Wabush Lake-Carol Lake region. The latter mining operations are located about 225 miles northwest of Sept Iles, and 40 miles to the west of the company's railway. These operations are served by a branch railway which is owned by others.

It may be of interest to note that, when construction of the present railway line began in 1951, the population of Sept Iles was less than 2,000 persons with a mere handful living in the area to the north. Today, this area has a population in excess of 35,000 persons. Capital investment by the Iron Ore Company of Canada and associated companies in mining, concentrating, pelletizing, railway, shipping and townsite facilities in Quebec and Labrador exceeds one-half billion dollars to date, and further expansion is now under way. The Iron Ore Company of Canada, its subsidiary Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company, and its associated company the Carol Pellet Company, have a work force of approximately 4,000 and in 1965 paid $37 million in wages and salaries. Since operations began in 1954, $350 million has been paid in wages and salaries and, in the same period, municipal, provincial and federal taxes amounted to $105 million.

It is clear that the recent development of this northern area is making and will continue to make an important contribution to the economy of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Is this all American money?

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Well, I do not know exactly.

Hon. Mr. Paterson: This is American money.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Honourable senators may ask when the company plans to extend its railway farther north than Schefferville. The answer to this question depends upon demand and economics. As in the past, the Canadian iron ore industry will continue to rely on export markets for the bulk of its iron ore sales, despite the increasing consumption of domestic ore by the Canadian steel industry.

Throughout the world there are vast known deposits of iron ore. Some, such as those in South America and Africa, are already in production. Others, such as those in Australia, are under intensive development. There is now keen competition for the sale of iron ore in world markets, and this is likely to increase. Many of the new deposits are higher in grade and more accessible to tide water than those in the Quebec-Labrador region. On the other hand, the Labrador-Quebec region has certain advantages.

The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, in its Mineral Information Bulletin 80, entitled "Canadian Iron Ore Industry 1964", says that:

> Factors influencing the growth in Canadian iron ore exports include the expanding demand for iron ore in consuming countries; the inability of some traditional sources to meet the increase in demand; an increasing demand for beneficiated high-grade ore; the relative proximity of large Canadian reserves of beneficiating-grade material to the large steelmaking centres of the United States and, to a lesser extent, Western Europe; Canada's favourable political climate, which is conducive to capital investment, and its incentive mine-taxation policies.

The Iron Ore Company of Canada is now opening up a new deposit called the Redmond Mine, which is located about nine miles south of Schefferville. It will be connected to the main line of the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway by a four-mile spur. There are also other known deposits of iron ore north of Schefferville. For example, the Iron Ore Company of Canada has deposits about 50 miles north of Schefferville in Quebec. I am advised that these deposits are in the company's program of future development. Exactly when development will occur will depend on market conditions, but Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company feels that, as and when the decision to proceed with such development will be made, it must be in a position to provide the required railway services without hindrance or delay. This, then, is why the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company has come to Parliament to ask that the time within which it be allowed to complete its line of railway as authorized by its charter be extended.

I am sure that the purpose of the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company in presenting this bill will commend itself to the members of this chamber as a necessary step in continuing its important role in the development of our natural resources.

I would propose that, if this bill is given second reading, it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. At that time, representatives of the railway and of its principal shipper will be present and will be able to answer any questions which may occur to the members of the committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Bourget, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 10:

Hon. J. Harper Prowse moved the second reading of Bill C-146, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill may perhaps best be described as a housekeeping bill as far as the Government of the Northwest Territories is concerned. It is not, nor is it intended to be, a Magna Carta for the Northwest Territories, but it does represent a pragmatic step forward toward the realization of representative, if not completely responsible government for the Territories, in line with the recommendations which have been made and the pressures which have emanated from the present Council of the Territories.

The principal provisions of this particular bill are to extend the number of elected members from four to seven by the creation of three new electoral districts, which will extend the franchise to all adult members of the Northwest Territories and will permit all of them to take part in electing representatives to their Council. Increasing the number of elected representatives from four to seven, and the Council itself from nine to twelve, will for the first time throw into the hands of the elected representatives the balance of power in that body. Previously, as you will undoubtedly recall, the balance of power has lain in the hands of the appointed representatives.

In addition to the increase in the number of representatives, the bill proposes to increase the sessional indemnity for members of the Council, that of the elected members to the sum of $5,000 a year and that of the appointed members to $3,500. At the present time the members are paid on a per diem basis, the elected members at the rate of $100 per day plus $25 expenses to a maximum of $2,000, and the appointed representatives merely on an expense account of $25 per day.

In order to ensure in these northern territories, where travel is so difficult and the cost of getting around so great, that there may be available for government service men of ability and high calibre, men who will be able to deal with the many problems involved, it was felt this remuneration should be provided.

Honourable senators, perhaps I can give you some idea of what we are talking about. Earlier this afternoon we were discussing Newfoundland which, with its appendages, represents four per cent of the land area of Canada. It may shock us to realize that the part of the country we are now dealing with, and to which this bill refers, covers an area of 1,300,000 square miles. From the tip of Ellesmere Island to the islands at the tip of James Bay is a distance of 2,200 miles. From the community of Inuvik at the mouth of the Mackenzie River in the west to the settlements on the east coast of Baffin Island is a distance of 2,100 miles. In that tremendous area, which represents one-third of the whole land area of this nation, the population is slightly over 22,000, giving a density of less than one-fiftieth of a person per square mile. Those figures, more than anything else, will impress upon us the tremendous problems these people face.

In dealing with the problem of providing some kind of government for an area such as this we have to consider the further fact that more than two-thirds of the population are native Eskimos and Indians, and in the area to which it is now intended to extend the franchise, which represents more than half of the total area concerned, lives one-third of the population, or about 8,000 persons, 90 per cent of whom are Eskimos.

The Indians all live in the western part or down in the islands of James Bay. A very large number of these 7,000-odd Eskimos speak only the Eskimo language. Yet, if we are to keep in step with the trends in other parts of the world, and if we are to have our hands clean when we go into the court of public opinion to tell people how they should deal with the natives in their own countries, it seems only obvious and fundamental that we should at that time be able to say that we have extended the democratic franchise to our own natives. It is for those reasons that this bill is now before us.

The original government of the Northwest Territories was provided by the Temporary Government Act of 1869, when the areas of Rupert's Land and Hudson Bay were first being negotiated for and taken over. The only representatives of government in the area at the time were the members of the police force, and there was provision for the setting up of a commission. In 1875 a commission was set up under the first Northwest Territories Act. At that time it consisted of the commissioner and five appointed persons, three of whom were to be police magistrates or stipendiary magistrates, as they were then called, and as, in fact, they were.

That act also provided that as any territory reached a density of population of one person per square mile, or, in other words, when any area of a thousand square miles or less achieved a population of 1,000, then it would be entitled to elect a member to the Council of the Northwest Territories. It is significant to note that just before 1905 there were 20 members of the assembly of the Northwest Territories who carried on a reasonably responsible form of government.

At that time the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were carved out of the Northwest Territories, and the government for the rest of the area reverted to exactly the same as had existed prior to 1870. In other words, there was a commissioner who was assisted by four appointed members, except that nobody ever got around to appointing any of the members. The commissioner of the Northwest Mounted Police was the sole representative of, and was personally responsible for, law, order and good government in those areas up until the year 1921.

At that time a new commissioner had been appointed, and he decided that it lay within his power to put into effect an edict to keep people out of the territories—at least, he decided he could say who should come in. This was challenged in the courts, which ruled that he did not have this power; and, as a result the government proceeded to fill the appointments provided for, and increased the number to six. So, there was a commissioner and six persons governing the territories from that time until 1951.

Up until 1946—and, indeed, to all intents and purposes throughout this whole period—the members of the commission governing the Northwest Territories were exclusively the heads of the government departments concerned, such as the R.C.M.P., the Department of National Defence which was responsible for communications, the Department of Transport which provided certain aerial and weather reporting services, and the department that was responsible for Indians and natives. In other words, the whole area was run entirely by what might be called a co-ordinating committee of senior civil servants.

In 1946 the Government for the first time appointed a person from outside this select group of senior civil servants, and in 1951 provision was made in the Northwest Territories Act for the election of three members to represent the groups of people living in the communities down the Mackenzie.

Following 1930 there began to be considerable development in mineral exploration, which resulted in the development of Yellowknife and the discovery of pitch blend and the mines that were developed, such as Eldorado on Great Bear Lake. A great deal of increasing activity started in that area. Today the activity in this area is chiefly mining.

Perhaps I can give honourable senators another figure which I thought was a gem. Of the 1,300,000 square miles in this territory, only 13 are being used for agricultural purposes, and they are down at the south end of the Mackenzie. Except for the Mackenzie valley there is no arable land in the whole area, but there is a great deal of mineral wealth, and exploration has been increasing all the time.

Honourable senators are well aware that the oil companies are showing an increasing interest in the possiblity of gas and petroleum recovery. There have been rather remarkable discoveries, such as that of iron ore up on the northern shore of Baffin Land, which deposits dwarf anything of a similar nature in the country. Fortunately, we have other supplies sufficient for our present needs which are cheaper to get at. But the problem of bringing ore out of that country will have to be faced in the future.

There were four communities around the Mackenzie Delta and the Yellowknife area, for which the legislation of 1954 provided four elected members. In 1960 or 1961 they started to appoint, not heads of government but individuals from outside who might bring some special interest or knowledge or have some connection from the outside world to the north.

In 1964 the number was increased by four elected members, three of whom were appointed from outside. At the present time the appointed members consist, first, of the only member of the Government or Civil Service, namely, the deputy commissioner who sits in the legislature as a member of the council. Then there are four appointed members, and the fifth member is the commissioner. Now, instead of there being just four elected members, there will be seven.

The bill contains a number of clauses, and I do not think this is the proper time to discuss them. If there are any questions, I shall be happy to try to answer them. However, the effect of the bill is really in the increased representation, and it brings into effect an ordnance of the territories which was passed at their last session providing for the extension of the franchise to these people.

I know that a great many people feel that this is a very hesitant step and a long way short of the responsible government that some think the territories ought to have.

It may be recalled that as a result of pressure which began around 1958 for complete responsible government, at least in the western part of the Northwest Territories, the Canadian Government of the day was persuaded to introduce legislation for the purpose of dividing these areas of the Territories into two parts. This would have enabled the western part, which at the moment is perhaps the more able part, to present a case for standing on its own feet, or at least to move more quickly in that direction. This proposal ran into a great deal of opposition from people who were concerned with the area, with the result that it was not proceeded with.

In the following year, 1965, the Government set up the Carrothers Commission, under the chairmanship of Dean Carrothers, of the School of Law of Western University. Although still a young man, he has had a distinguished career in the field of law on the west coast, where he graduated from the University of British Columbia originally, and later at Dalhousie University. He also holds degrees from Harvard University. He would appear to be a man eminently qualified to bring in an objective point of view to a most important study.

To assist him in this work are two commissioners, namely, John H. Parker, the Mayor of Yellowknife and a mining engineer who has had a good deal of experience in that country, and Professor Jean Beetz of the University of Montreal, one of the outstanding authorities on constitutional law. It is expected that they will bring in a report this coming fall.

The terms of reference of the commission are generally to examine the whole problem of how to give responsible government to the Northwest Territories, how to set about it, and anything else that occurs to them in the process. They have been getting as wide an expression of opinion from the residents of the areas themselves as possible.

At the present time, lest anyone be concerned about the ability of these people to use a vote, let us remember that they are all permitted to vote in the federal elections.

Another item of importance is that up to the present time, although they have the Council, the administration has been under the hands of departments that were located here in Ottawa. As someone has said, you not only have as the administration a dog team running down the river, which was bad enough, but the driver was two thousand miles away in Ottawa, and if there was some dissatisfaction it should cause no one any great surprise.

The present commissioner has indicated his intention to retire this year, and it has already been announced that the new commissioner will presumably be appointed after the Carrothers Commission has submitted its report. In any event, he will be expected to take up immediate residence and execute his duties from the Territories.

One of the things necessary to be done, of course, will be to name a capital for the Territories, provided it is recommended that there should be one territory.

All this could have been done before the report came in, but in view of the tremendously strong feeling among people that they have been deprived of their franchise, and their desire to have it, and the expression of the Council of the Northwest Territories for the passing of the legislation, it was felt that this was a step which could be safely taken at this time without anticipating in any way work that is being done by the commission.

There are a number of smaller matters in the bill; for instance, the care and custody of people who formerly were called insane and now are regarded as mentally disturbed. However, the chief function of the bill is to provide immediately the correction of what many people have felt was a serious deficiency which has extended itself into the history of our country with regard to dealing with these people who are expressing so much need, and who because of the expansion of Canada are coming daily into greater contact with the white man, and whom we want to initiate into responsible forms of government as quickly as possible.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question?

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I should like to know if possible what the revenue of the Northwest Territories from all sources is at the present time, and how much money in addition to that does it cost the Government of Canada to handle the affairs of the Northwest Territories.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: It is certainly not possible for me, honourable senators, to give an accurate answer to the honourable gentleman's question, but I have a list of the municipal revenues from a number of towns.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am not referring to municipal revenues.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: I can give the figures for the years 1962, 1963 and 1964, on operating account. The total operating revenues for 1963-64 were $7,030,469. In the previous year they were $5,828,740.

On capital account from loans from the federal Government and recoveries of capital expenditures, they received in 1963-64 another $1,023,541. Total operating expenditures amounted to $6,026,017. Total capital expenditures were $749,111.

This did not include certain costs such as salaries, housing and maintenance of the Northern Administration Branch.

In the year 1963-64, the total cost for the Northern Administration Branch was $9,836,706, of which $1,234,800 was recovered from the Northwest Territories Government, leaving a total of $8,601,906 to be recovered from here.

In a general way, if it will help at all, it is my understanding that at the present time the revenues that are collected by the Northwest Territories Government, and which it retains, consist chiefly in the profits from liquor. The rest of the income—for instance, local taxes—is collected from local people. Actually, from local sources they obtain about 14 per cent of the money they require for the total of all the Government services provided. The Department of Welfare comes in and deals directly there. The Indian Affairs Branch and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources come in and deal directly with the Indians and the Eskimos. The Department of Transport provides the airlines and air terminals. I believe that department also provides the northern transportation services, and the river services.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Those services are all paid for by the dominion Government.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: And they amount to about $8 million a year.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: This is according to the figures I have here, if I interpret them correctly.

I suggest honourable senators should satisfy themselves on this point. I do not want to put any department of the Government on the spot. I presume that there will be an opportunity later to get answers from people who are much better able to give them than I am.

One of the interesting factors is that, at the time Alberta and Saskatchewan were carved out of the Northwest Territories, they were getting from local sources exactly 14 per cent of what it cost them to provide the services. I do not know whether that figure is as significant as it might be, but I give it for general information.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 24, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald for the second reading of Bill C-151, to provide for the establishment of a fund for the economic and social development of special rural development areas.

Hon. Olive L. Irvine: Honourable senators, as a westerner, I rise to express my support for the principle and purpose of Bill C-151. As we know, this act is to provide for the establishment of a fund for the economic and social development of special rural areas.

I see it as another brick in the foundation laid by the former government and in particular by the honourable member for Qu'Appelle, Mr. Hamilton, in 1961 when he introduced the ARDA legislation, whose many principles are to be found in this bill.

In the other place it was a source of great satisfaction to see the unanimity of agreement on the principle behind the bill. It reflects, as was felt on all sides, an appreciation of rural life and its value to Canadian society.

Of course, not all rural areas in Canada are in need of special development assistance. There are extensive rural areas in which agriculture is prosperous, where rural incomes and living standards are good and where natural resources are well managed. In these areas the people have been able to adjust to the times and take full advantage of the great technological changes of the last three decades. There are areas, however, where economic conditions have been poor.

We are all aware that rural development must start with the people concerned. According to this bill we are told that there shall be chosen an advisory board, consisting of not more than ten senior officials of departments or agencies of the Goverment of Canada, to be appointed by the Governor in Council, to hold office during pleasure. Personally, I am of the opinion that if an amendment could be made in the choosing of the candidates for the board's representatives from municipalities in which projects are located, more good would result. Matters of local interest and local needs would be brought to the attention of the board to a much greater extent than if they were made up by those not familiar with local conditions or with the needs of the people in general.

Three special areas have been chosen to begin this development: (1) the Interlake area of Manitoba; (2) northern New Brunswick; and (3) eastern Quebec. The bill provides for an expenditure of $50 million to begin with, but the money supply can be expanded very rapidly as the principle of the legislation expands.

In the Interlake area of Manitoba the citizens have been subject to low income, have major adjustment and development problems and have recognized development potential. Much provincial planning has already been done and has now reached the stage where rural development plans, including proposals for specific projects, are being prepared, and it is obvious that special provisions will be required to finance the development plans. This bill will provide for the economic and social development of these areas and is being proposed in order to provide special financial assistance beyond that normally available under the cost-sharing provisions of the ARDA program, to implement these plans. The fund of $50 million is over and above the funds already available under the ARDA program. This special fund will be used for the specific purpose of developing certain designated areas.

In the Interlake district, census statistics are cited which show a marked decline in farm population in the area, and only a 3.1 per cent increase in population between the years 1951 and 1961, compared with an 18.7 per cent increase in the province as a whole. Many of the inhabitants of the area are of Metis or Indian origin.

The loss in farm population during the same period was 8,254, compared with a gain in town population of 9,956.

Another survey shows where farmers went who sold their farms between 1941 and 1961. Thirty-six per cent retired; 20 per cent went to better farms, mostly in the Interlake; 17 per cent took jobs as labourers; 12 per cent went into trade and service occupations and 15 per cent went into other occupations.

The same survey showed that 46 per cent of those living on farms stayed in the Interlake region; 33 per cent moved to the City of Winnipeg; 7 per cent moved elsewhere in the province and 14 per cent left the province completely.

We are led to believe that a new agency will be set up under this new legislation which will buy out small uneconomic farm units, join them together into one large unit, and then sell them back to the farmers. This is an experiment that might prove extremely costly. Many of our rural people would object to being uprooted and forced into an urban environment for which they are ill-suited and unadaptable. There are types of people who would rather live on the land than anywhere else despite their economic problems. This is their right; this is their liberty.

As well as proposing an overhaul in education, it may be necessary to map out priorities for economic development, and highway and road development in order to encourage tourism and commerce. Already the Province of Manitoba is trying to develop new resources, and the federal Government plans to attract secondary manufacturing and processing plants if possible. Greater specialization in livestock and feed production should be another means of growth.

Fishing resources in the area cannot support any increase in numbers. In fact it has been suggested that the number of fisherman be reduced by two-thirds. The average income from fishing is less than $1,000 per man. At the present time marketing is said to be inefficient. Recommendations have already been made to make the fisherman's voice heard, to provide better credit facilities, for improved marketing and more fisheries research. When new job opportunities open in northern Manitoba, this will no doubt offer fishermen alternative employment.

Government assistance programs, properly designed and carried out can be of tremendous benefit in rural areas undergoing basic changes and in need of economic development.

Honourable senators, may I express the hope that, when implemented, this piece of legislation will help to eliminate many of the pockets of poverty which so often occur within prosperous areas.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, debate adjourned.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT AND THE CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND AN ACT TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce on Bill C-169, to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Hayden, I move that we now consider and, if you see fit, adopt this report.

As honourable senators are aware, the amendment was made in committee and is set out in the Minutes of the Proceedings of May 25, at page 533. Honourable senators will remember that this bill proposes to extend the exemption provided from the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code for the fishing industry on the west coast to the later of two dates, the 31st December, 1967 or a period thirty days after a notice signed by ten members of the other place, resulting in the introduction of a motion in that house for the termination of the extension, and such motion being passed by Parliament.

When the minister was present in the committee the position of the Senate, as pointed out on second reading, was recognized, and this amendment simply provides that this notice may be given by ten members of either house.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Then, the debate in this house had some effect.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The question the honourable senator asked was the key question and was answered, I am sure, to his satisfaction.

This is the explanation of the amendment, and those who were in committee will clearly recollect that it was decided upon simply to indicate that Parliament does not consist of only one house.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, we see no objection whatever to the suggestion of the Leader of the Government.

This bill is not as inclusive—if that is the right word—as one might wish. In reading the Combines Investigation Act one might think it was all-embracing but, as the leader has said, it simply deals with fishing on the west coast and was before the house last year and debated six times. It has pretty well gone through the mill and is very well understood. We agree with the suggestion of the honourable leader.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): As the bill has to go back to the House of Commons for concurrence, I move, with leave, it be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to, and bill as amended read third time and passed.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, May 31, 1966

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 5, 1966

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-189, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1967.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. John J. Connolly: With leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting. Honourable senators, I ask that the motion for second reading be the first of the Orders of the Day for tomorrow.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, may I say a word on this matter? Many members of this house for a time complained about the fact that bills similar to this one came to the Senate and passed like lightning, leaving us no opportunity to discuss their contents.

Tonight I must express my appreciation to the Leader of the Government for what happened on a previous occasion when we had a bill similar to this one debated in the Senate for two days. That had not happened for a long time before. Now we have a bill before us, and we shall have time to read it, because it will come before us for second reading tomorrow.

I wish to express my appreciation to the leader for the steps he has taken in order that we have an opportunity to fulfil our parliamentary duties as we should in this chamber.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. John J. Connolly tabled:

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

CONFERENCE AT OTTAWA—INQUIRY AS TO ARRANGEMENTS

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, before proceeding further with the business of the house, I wish to ask the following question of the Leader of the Government, of which I have given due notice.

> Is the Leader of the Government prepared to announce to this house what were the results of his meeting with officials of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference Association, which was held in London last week; and what are the plans for the Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference to be held here from September 26 to October 4 of this year?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Haig for giving me notice of this question, and also for waiting a week until I could make a reply.

The reason for the delay in replying is that last evening the committee in charge of arrangements had a special occasion in the West Block, at which the principal speaker of the evening was the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth Secretariat, Mr. Arnold Smith.

There were in attendance the high commissioners accredited to Canada from various Commonwealth countries, the ambassadors of two countries rather intimately connected with the work of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, certain parliamentarians, and a very fine representation from the press. The purpose of this function was to acquaint the press, primarily, and the high commissioners, of the proposals for the conference to be held next fall.

I am sure honourable senators would not mind if I single out one member of the local Canadian branch committee for the outstanding job he did last evening I refer to honourable Senator Grosart, who was in charge of this function. I think the meeting was the first of its kind ever held in connection with a Commonwealth Parliamentary conference. I am sure all honourable senators who were present last evening were as pleased and proud as I was with the splendid work Senator Grosart did in connection with it.

Now I come to answer the questions asked. The twelfth general conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association will be held in Canada this fall, from September 8 to October 4. These dates are inclusive: they provide for a period for assembling the delegates in Montreal, for sending them on tour, and for the conference proper.

I should perhaps mention that while in certain Commonwealth countries it is possible to see much of the host country during the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association meeting, here, with an entire half-continent to cover, it will be almost impossible to visit many places. Nevertheless, it is intended to have the delegates go from coast to coast and every province will be visited, but, regrettably, not by every delegate.

The delegates will assemble in Montreal between September 8 and 10, and the tour period will run from September 11 to 25. Between September 11 and 14 there will be a tour in the Atlantic provinces, where it is proposed to divide the delegates into four groups. Twenty delegates will go to Newfoundland, 20 to Prince Edward Island, 85 to New Brunswick, and a fourth group of approximately 125 will visit Nova Scotia.

Following the tour of the Atlantic provinces, the delegates will travel to western Canada. All delegates will visit Alberta and British Columbia, after which they will again be divided, this time into two groups of approximately 125 each. One group will visit Saskatchewan and the other Manitoba. The dates of the visits in these provinces are as follows: Alberta, September 14 to 16; British Columbia, September 16 to 19; Saskatchewan and Manitoba, September 19 and 20.

The delegates will then be reunited for their visit to Quebec City and the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. They will be in Quebec from September 20 to 22, and in Ontario from September 22 to 25. They will then proceed to Ottawa for the conference proper.

At this stage I shall not mention any specific places where calls will be made because, though the program is very well advanced, I think honourable senators in due time will be able to get more detailed particulars than I can now give, even if I were to read the program in full, as I am sure you would not wish me to do.

The meetings of the General Council, which is a very large body comprising 45 to 50 people, will be held in Ottawa on September 26 and 27. These are very important meetings. Thereafter the full conference will assemble in plenary session which will last from September 28 until October 4.

Normally the number of Canadian delegates to a Commonwealth Parliamentary Association conference is seven, but it is customary for the host country to double the size of its delegation. This Canada proposes to do at this time. In addition we will be inviting each of the provincial branches to send two delegates rather than one, which is the usual number to which they are entitled.

My honourable friend has also asked me something about the agenda which it is proposed to adopt for the meetings to be held in Ottawa following the tours of Canada. This agenda was tentatively settled at the meeting of the General Council in London last week, and can be conveniently broken down into four general headings.

The first will embrace the subject "The Commonwealth in the World." It will involve a debate on international affairs, but will also be concerned with purely Commonwealth matters current at the time. For example, the Rhodesian problem and the India-Pakistan dispute were current at the time of the meeting in New Zealand last fall. I should add that this debate on international affairs is the one in which the American representatives and other national groups who come as observers are invited to take part.

The second topic on the agenda will be the general question of Commonwealth self-help. This will embrace the general subject matter of aid and trade. From my own experience and I am sure that of many honourable senators, this can be expected to be a wide-ranging debate. For example, it will involve relationships between the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, on the one side, and the work done at the meetings of the Prime Ministers of the various Commonwealth countries, on the other, and will include the relationships between the Prime Ministers' Conferences and the Commonwealth Secretariat. I believe the purpose of this type of debate is to intensify the interest of backbench parliamentarians of the various parliaments in the broad issues which face the governments within the Commonwealth.

I may add that there has always been a complaint made that insufficient time is allowed for discussions at meetings of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. Accordingly, a new device is going to be introduced this time, in that a committee system will be used. At the public meetings of the committees the delegations will be asked to nominate delegates to one or other of the committees, but any delegate can attend and speak in any committee. This system will allow two separate matters to be discussed simultaneously.

Two topics are proposed for discussion in committee. The first is parliamentary government in the modern world. I believe all of us, even in the developed countries, have a great deal to learn not only about parliamentary institutions but also about the development of parliamentary institutions and the adaptation of these institutions to modern conditions. I hope there will be papers prepared on the functioning of upper chambers and lower chambers under ideal conditions in Parliament, and that these papers will channel debate towards objectives which will be helpful to both the developed and the developing countries. This can be a very useful exercise for parliamentarians from all over the Commonwealth. It can do nothing but good, and I would put it very high in the order of importance of the items on the agenda.

The other topic that will adapt itself very well to committee treatment, and to the preparation of papers with respect to it, is a discussion of intra-Commonwealth aid, with special emphasis in the field of training and education in the developing countries. It is my hope that there will be papers prepared by experts from the donor countries providing these services abroad and at home, and also papers prepared by experts with intimate local knowledge of conditions in the donee countries for which and where this work is being conducted.

At the conclusion of the work of the committees it is proposed that reports be made to the plenary session of the conference, where there can be a general debate if it is thought necessary.

Honourable senators, I have tried to answer as fully as I can at this time a question asked by Senator Haig. The important point about the answer is the information I have given as to where the delegates will be at certain times during the period of the conference.

I think it will interest honourable senators to know that the Honourable John Turner, who is the President of the Canadian Branch and a member of the administration, and I both felt that our visit to London was very well worthwhile. I cannot speak too highly of the preparations made for it, and for the provident use of our time that was arranged, particularly by the Secretary General of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, Mr. Robin Vanderfelt, who is at present in Canada and who happens to be in our gallery tonight.

Not only did the general officers help us greatly, but we were extremely well received and looked after by the United Kingdom branch and its officers, through whom we met a great many British parliamentarians at various functions.

I cannot conclude without saying that we had a particularly interesting time at a luncheon given by the Leader of the Government in the House of Lords, the Right Honourable the Earl of Longford. He had with him his chief whip, the Right Honourable Lord Shepherd, and the Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Lords, Lord Champion. Sir David Stephens, the Clerk of the Parliaments, was also present.

Honourable senators will be interested to know that the questions came from them rather than from us, although we did have a great many to ask them on the way their upper chamber operates. The trend in Britain today is away from hereditary peerages and towards life peerages which, in effect, is what we have had in Canada since Confederation, although without the title.

We discussed procedures, powers and methods of placing problems before parliament, and such matters as the report of the Bryce Commission in 1917, which is the classic document on second chambers, and mentioned as appropriate for second chambers.

The United Kingdom branch is seeing to it that there will be a good representation from both the British House of Commons and the House of Lords. It is my opinion that with the kind of co-operation we have been receiving from all the Commonwealth countries we shall have an outstanding meeting this year.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I thank the honourable Leader of the Government for his explanation of the procedures of the conference. There are two further questions I should like to ask. First, what is to be the position of the non-delegates who are represented at the conference; and, second, at what place in Ottawa is it intended to hold the conference and the committee meetings?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): In reply to the first question, I have no doubt that the delegates will be selected by the party leaders in both this house and the other. Members of Parliament who are not selected as members of the delegation from either house will be free, of course, to attend the meetings. I hope there will be a large attendance. The debates will be interesting, and it will be well worth while for every honourable senator to take as much part in the work of the conference as he can.

The locale presents a problem, and I cannot give the honourable senator a precise answer to his second question at this time. If Parliament is not then sitting, perhaps the most appropriate place in which to hold the conference would be the House of Commons chamber, because of its size and its available translation facilities, amplification system, visitors' galleries, the press gallery, and many other facilities.

It may be that I shall have to make an appeal to the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks), and indeed to the Senate, to have this chamber made available if the other place is in session. It might be appropriate to put forward such a suggestion at the appropriate time. Failing that, there are of course some very large and good rooms which can be used for the plenary sessions, but I do think it would be more appropriate if they were held in one of the houses of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: How many delegates will be attending?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Anywhere from 125 to 200 delegates will be involved.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, if I may make another suggestion to the honourable Leader of the Government it would be that, in addition to the delegates who may be appointed by the different parties, all members of the Senate be advised of the proceedings and be extended invitations in respect to the events of this conference. I say this because I think that both the Senate and the House of Commons owe a debt to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, and anything we can do to assist the conference will be appreciated by the association.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): My honourable friend has given me an opportunity of which I shall take advantage. It is highly desirable for every member of the Senate and the House of Commons to be a member of the Canadian branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. The membership fee is only $5 a year. I am sure I can give this undertaking on behalf of the Canadian branch that all members will be fully advised of every detail in connection with the conference.

I thank my honourable friend for the opportunity to make that plug.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I should point out that I was not asking the honourable Leader of the Government with respect to the membership fee. I was merely asking that all honourable senators be advised as to matters affecting the conference to be held next fall.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Did I understand my honourable friend to say that the provinces could be represented?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, each province has a local branch. When the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association's meeting is held outside Canada, each of the provincial branches is entitled to send one delegate, as they did when the conference was held in New Zealand. As this conference is to be held in Canada they will be invited to send two delegates. The Speaker of the Legislature is usually the most active person in the local provincial branch.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, as two members of this chamber are chairmen of committees and members of the Planning Committee for the Commonwealth Conference, I am sure the honourable Leader of the Government will not object if I mention the fact that my colleague in this respect is the honourable Senator Leonard.

I thank the honourable leader for his kind references to my own activities. The fact of the matter is that I could fail in the discharge of my duties without in any way jeopardizing the success of the conference; Senator Leonard, on the other hand, cannot, and I am sure will not, fail in his duties because he is the chairman of the Finance Committee.

CANADA LABOUR (SAFETY) CODE BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. David A. Croll moved the second reading of Bill S-35, respecting the prevention of employment injury in federal works, undertakings and businesses.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill breaks new ground. Under it there will be established a new bureau in the Department of Labour called the Canada Labour (Safety) Code, which is a companion to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code which we passed in this house last year. It will cover the same industries that are now covered by the Canada Labour (Standards) Code and some other acts administered by the Department of Labour, as well as crown corporations.

The object of the bill is to promote the safety and well being of persons during their employment in federal works, undertakings and businesses.

The previous Government in 1962 introduced a bill with similar objectives and principles. It was not enacted by the time Parliament was dissolved. Subsequently, a bill with similar objects was placed on the Order Paper by the present Government in 1964, but it was not proceeded with due to lack of time.

This bill is a new approach to a very old and complex problem. The legislation will require all industries under federal jurisdiction to observe minimum occupational safety standards, and it will vest in the Department of Labour responsibility for the development of safety standards for the regulation and inspection of works as may be necessary for the safety and the health of employees.

At the present time there is no federal legislation of general application directed towards the preventing of employment accidents and the elimination of accidents in work places coming under federal jurisdiction.

I call your attention to the fact that there is a Government Employees Compensation Act which gives the minister authority to promote and encourage accident prevention activities and safety programs among persons employed in the Public Service. Under that act the Department of Labour has been carrying out a continuous program through consultation, education and publicity work.

Some industries under federal control—such as railways, shipping, and air transport, which involve operational safety, safety of the public, and in some instances, of employees—are covered under general statutes, but in the absence of federal controls some provincial regulations have been applied by federal establishments, with indifferent success and much uncertainty. As provincial activity in the industrial safety field has been intensified we have benefited, but it has also served to accentuate the lack of federal concern and action. This is now being recognized and corrected in this bill.

The matter has been under study by the department for a considerable number of years. An intensive survey was undertaken in 1960 and it confirmed the need of federal legislation applicable in that field.

A submission proposing safety legislation was submitted to the Cabinet and approved in 1960. The Glassco Commission recommended that aggressive action be taken to promote occupational safety in the public service, and on two occasions the matter was referred to in the Speech from the Throne but not proceeded with.

In order to stop the drain of manpower we need positive action by the federal authority to co-ordinate and continue safety measures. We can no longer afford the loss of humans and their productivity, for accidents are expensive.

Safety codes, well applied, limit accidents. Accidents in factories take their toll in many ways. There is the pain and suffering of the victim; there is the family's worry and financial loss; there is also the effect on other employees, as well as the loss of morale and productivity.

It is a truism that can be repeated time and again, that safety prevents sorrow and men are not expendable.

There are some federal acts with safety provisions. This measure will take nothing from them, since it states that it is subject to any other act of Parliament. This will be complementary legislation to any federal statutes. Where provincial acts contain the appropriate safety standards, these can be adopted under regulations. It follows that there will be collaboration, continuous consultation and exchange of ideas and experience.

This legislation is comprehensive, in that it will provide for all elements a complete industrial safety program.

It is also enabling legislation, in that, although it does not set out the requirements, other than in a general way, as to how both employers and employees are to carry out responsibilities in a safe manner, it does authorize the making of extensive regulations containing specific safety measures. These regulations will provide for such things as an appeal by the employer against a stop order issued by a safety officer where he believes there is imminent danger.

It is anticipated under this bill that there will be promotional educational and research activities, in co-operation with either federal or provincial authority and where possible, they can arrange for such things as one inspection regarding boilers, pressure vessels and elevators. Where there is a satisfactory provincial service, arrangements are contemplated to avoid duplication and so increase efficiency and lower costs.

Statistics are not readily available because each one of the provinces seems to define injuries in a different way.

The reports of the Workmen's Compensation Boards give the number of employment injuries in Canada over the past four years as follows: In 1961, 539,092; 1962, 573,306; 1963, 627,711; 1964, 715,053. I am informed that the increase reflects the growth of the labour force.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Could the honourable senator break that information down and tell us how many fatal injuries there were?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes, I have something on that. Perhaps you may wonder why I used the Workmen's Compensation Board.

The Government Employees Compensation Act was first passed in 1918. Under it, compensation is paid to federal employees injured while in employment. The act provides compensation in much the same way as in private industry. The adjudication and payment is made by the provincial workmen's compensation authorities. These provincial boards are reimbursed for the amounts paid to federal employees, and a proportional share of their administrative expenses is also paid.

I now come to the question asked by the honourable Leader of the Opposition. I have not many particulars on it but perhaps at another stage I can supply them.

The number of employees under federal jurisdiction is something less than 10 per cent of the labour force. Thus, you will see that about 60,000 industrial accidents per year can be attributed to the federal domain. That means that 225 to 250 employees are injured each working day through accidents on the job.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is this code going to tell them how to prevent these accidents?

Hon. Mr. Croll: This code will help prevent some of these accidents, I am sure.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Come on!

Hon. Mr. Croll: The codes in other provinces have prevented accidents—there can be no question about that.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Let me ask you this question. This sounds like boy scout legislation to me, just showing how to prevent accidents. You have the Canadian Labour Safety Code. Are you going to write a series of instructions to people and say, "Do not walk on steel beams when a building is being constructed?" Are you going to tell them to walk on the ground? Are you going to tell them not to drop anything on fellow employees' heads? What is this? It is just boy scout legislation and nothing else.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Similar legislation has been in effect in ten provinces of Canada for a period of, I should say, 25 years or more.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Are they just a series of instructions?

Hon. Mr. Croll: No; there is more than instructions in this bill. There is authority and there are penalties.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You have been talking about compensation and comparing it to workmen's compensation, and you have not dealt with the prevention of accidents at all so far.

Hon. Mr. Croll: My friend either was not listening or misunderstood what I was saying.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I have listened to you.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I brought in the Workmen's Compensation Board only for the purpose of proving the number of accidents that are taking place in this country. That is the only statistic that is available on that particular point, and I dug that out to indicate to you the seriousness of the problem. How many accidents it will prevent, I cannot tell you at the moment, but I am certain—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: What is the purpose of this legislation?

Hon. Mr. Croll: To prevent accidents, that is what it is.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: So far we have omitted to give them instructions as to how to prevent accidents. It is ridiculous!

Hon. Mr. Croll: We have not done that at all. Some of the provinces have good safety laws; however, others are not as good. We feel that we in the federal domain have a responsibility in that field and we should do something more than what my friend suggests about writing fine essays, that we should do something actively in order to promote safety.

I indicated that 225 to 250 employees are injured each working day through accidents on the job. There are about 110 to 120 fatal accidents each year. That is the best statistic I can get on it at the present time.

Honourable senators, some accidents are not preventable. They are due usually to severe weather conditions, icy conditions, and a great number of other factors. But a sizable number could have been and must in future be avoided.

Workers must have the right to employment in safe conditions, and employers by their efforts and interest in co-operating have shown that they also want this legislation.

Over a period of years, the work done by the employees and employers safety council has been responsible in this country for preventing many hundreds of accidents and saving many, many lives. If, over a ten-year period, we can save 10 per cent of employees from disablement and anguish and hardship, it justifies all the money and all the effort we put into safety.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: We have heard the trite phrase that "safety is everybody's business." This bill will build it into the fabric of every company and we will have the active direction and the support of management. Safety is a matter that concerns a great number of people in this country today.

The lack of safety on our highways, resulting in human slaughter on holidays and weekends, has aroused our people. They want steps taken in order to avoid needless and useless and reckless waste of innocent lives.

Honourable senators, this bill will go a long way towards making employment in the federal service safer in the future.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Will they be only in the form of recommendations or will there be punishments and sanctions if certain things are not done that should be done?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I recommend that the honourable gentleman read the bill.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I have just heard the explanation.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Honourable senators, I quite agree with my seatmate that the sections of the bill were not particularly well explained. It was, however, a very sound general statement by our good friend the sponsor of the bill.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Before the question is put, may I ask the honourable sponsor of the bill how this is going to conflict with the various safety associations which are very active in the various provinces under the provincial workmen's compensation acts?

I know that in the Province of New Brunswick we have had the safety association there under the control of the employees for many years. I can recall several occasions when the active leaders of that association in

New Brunswick were personnel of the Canadian National Railways and employees of the federal Government. They took a very active part. I wonder how this is going to fit in with the various provincial safety associations.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I have read the last report of the New Brunswick Safety Association, which is one of the better ones, I should say. I assume from the information available to me that it is intended to collaborate with them and by appropriate regulations to give the same measure of safety support in the federal field. It is not intended in any way that these regulations should work at cross-purposes.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I think the bill provides for mutual co-operation.

May I ask if it is intended that this bill should be sent to committee?

Hon. Mr. Croll: In my view, questions arising out of this bill could best be answered in committee by the appropriate officials who will be able to explain it section by section.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I ask the question because you have not mentioned whether or not it would be sent to a committee. To what committee do you think it would be appropriate to send it?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Transport and Communications.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Brooks, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN BOARD OF MISSIONS OF THE CHURCH OF GOD (GENERAL OFFICES: ANDERSON, INDIANA)—THIRD READING

Hon. Donald Cameron moved the third reading of Bill S-18, to incorporate Canadian Board of Missions of the Church of God (General Offices: Anderson, Indiana).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 26, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Prowse for the second reading of Bill C-146, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, before dealing with Bill C-146 to amend the Northwest Territories Act, I wish to inform honourable senators that I have just received a copy of the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of May 17, from which I note that at the Spring Convocation of the University of Saskatchewan, held on May 16, honourable Senator Charles Gavan Power, P.C., was on that occasion presented with the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws.

I mention this particularly because my home town is just a few miles away from the headquarters of the University of Saskatchewan, of which four of my children are graduates, and I feel it is a high honour for a senator or anyone else to be presented with an honorary degree from that university.

The newspaper article says that Senator Power was presented to the Chancellor for his degree by Dr. Norman Ward, Professor of Political Science, who read a citation and referred to Senator Power's Irish descent, his political proclivities, his legal training, his athletic career, particularly his hockey career in the National Hockey Association, his fine distinguished war record, his parliamentary career, both as a member and as a minister, and as a senator. It also mentions his other accomplishments. The Chancellor then conferred on Senator Power the degree Doctor of Laws Honoris Causa.

I am sure we all congratulate Senator Power on the honour which has been so deservedly conferred upon him.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Now I wish to say something about Bill C-146 to amend the Northwest Territories Act, which was passed in the House of Commons on May 13, 1966 and introduced in this chamber on Thursday last by one of our new senators the honourable Senator Prowse from the Province of Alberta. I congratulate him most sincerely for his comprehensive explanation. It was a fine effort on his part and a job well done.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: For a long time I have been intensely interested in the Canadian north, consisting of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, and have been deeply concerned for the welfare of the inhabitants of those territories and for improvement in the form of government operating there. Senator Prowse gave us some information with regard to the extent of the Northwest Territories, and I wish to add a few remarks on this aspect of his speech.

The Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories lie north of the 60th parallel of latitude and extend eastward from Alaska a distance of over 2,600 miles across the top of the North American continent. The Yukon Territory, covering 207,000 square miles, is located north of British Columbia and east of Alaska and extends as far as the Mackenzie District of the Northwest Territories. It is not as great in area as the Northwest Territories, and covers only 5.6 per cent of the total area of Canada.

The Northwest Territories, however, as was explained by Senator Prowse, cover 1.3 million square miles, more than one-third of the whole of Canada. When he was describing the extent of the Northwest Territories he proceeded from north and worked south; I propose to work from the other direction. The Northwest Territories embrace all that area north of the 60th parallel between the Yukon on the west and Hudson Bay on the east, together with the islands in Hudson Bay and in the Arctic Archipelago. They extend northwards 1,600 miles to within 500 miles of the North Pole.

This bill has to do with the Northwest Territories only; a further bill will be presented later, Bill C-147, which will deal with the Yukon. Despite the fact that this bill has nothing to do with the Yukon, I would like to say something about the population of these territories. As of January 1, 1960 it has been estimated that the population of the Yukon is approximately 15,000. According to the 1961 census 85 per cent were white and the remainder either Indian or Eskimo. Of this remainder approximately 0.3 per cent are Eskimo; 80 per cent of the Eskimo population is in the eastern Arctic.

Now, referring to the Northwest Territories, the estimate of population on January 1, 1966 was 26,000. By the 1961 census, 42 per cent were white, 23 per cent Indian and 35 per cent Eskimo.

As honourable senators know, the Northwest Territories Act—Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, chapter 331—has been amended many times. It was first amended during the 1953-54 session, again in 1955, still further during the 1957-58 session, again in 1959—which amending bill I sponsored—and also in 1960. This bill, C-146, further amends it. Each amendment has been for the purpose of giving to the Territories more control over their own affairs.

Honourable senators will also remember that in 1963 two bills were introduced to divide the Northwest Territories into the Mackenzie Territory and the Nunassiaq Territory. These were Bills C-83 and C-84 respectively. However, there was considerable opposition, the bills did not pass and were finally dropped. Many of the inhabitants of the Northwest Territories opposed division of any kind, and even went so far as to suggest that the Yukon should be invited to join the Northwest Territories to form a single province in northern Canada.

From time to time, honourable senators, there have been other suggestions. When I spoke in 1953 on second reading of a bill respecting the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, I suggested a way out of the difficulty. I propose to read from what I said on that occasion. It will only take a moment or two, but I think it important because of the fact the Carrothers Commission is considering this whole proposition. At page 162 of Senate Debates of that year I concluded my remarks as follows:

> I have one suggestion to make in respect to this whole matter. I have already explained that these territories are north of the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba. I am informed that the cost of administering the territory is considerable and that there is very little revenue from it, so I am going to suggest to honourable senators that the way to solve this whole problem of looking after the Northwest Territories would be to give them to the provinces that I have mentioned. Give the part north of British Columbia, which extends north to the Arctic Ocean, to the Province of British Columbia. All the travel out of that country is through British Columbia anyway. Give that part north of the Province of Alberta to the Province of Alberta. That would take in the Mackenzie River valley. All that territory is adjacent to Edmonton, and all the traffic out of that territory is through the northern part of Alberta. Then, give the part north of Saskatchewan to the Province of Saskatchewan, and the part north of Manitoba to the Province of Manitoba. These provinces have local legislatures and governments and the setup is such that they could handle all this business very easily and relieve the federal Government of any difficulties or expense in connection with it.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Who suggested that?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): He did.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Is this your speech?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, it is Senator Aseltine's.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That was in 1953.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Is the honourable senator still of that view?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Well, I will come to that later. Sometimes when I have said that I would come to a point later, I have been accused of failing to come to it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Would the natural resources of that territory go to the province along with the expenses?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I would think so. They would have to handle the business and pay all the bills. They would naturally have to have sources from which to secure the funds, and natural resources would be one of them.

I may say that many people in the Territories opposed this suggestion of mine. In fact, I remember the press of the Territories carrying a great deal of opposition to the suggestion. I have never followed it up since, but I believe there is a great deal of sense in what I had to say, and it may be that something like that will eventually take place.

Honourable senators, a similar suggestion was made before I made mine, by the late Senator John T. Haig of Winnipeg. I also notice that in 1964 Premier Bennett invited the Yukon to join British Columbia, and he offered to pave the Alaska Highway if they would do so. Also, the Province of Alberta, in a brief to the Carrothers Commission which is presently carrying on an investigation into northern affairs, proposed:

> —that the Yukon Territory and the Mackenzie River basin of the Northwest Territories should be incorporated into the western provinces and that the rest of the Territories might be administered by either Saskatchewan or Manitoba.

In that connection, I came across an article in one of the western newspapers dated March 2, 1966. I do not often read newspaper articles into the record, but this is so much in point that I believe I should do so now. The article refers to the brief presented to the Carrothers Commission by the Province of Alberta, and states, in part:

> The brief, which already has sparked hot debate in the territories, is the only one the commission has received from a province. Other provinces declined invitations to submit briefs.
> The Alberta brief says there is not enough people nor wealth in the territories to support provincial governments. Because government offices for the territories are in Ottawa "the efficiency and effectiveness of administration, however well intentioned, is perforce blunted by sheer distance and sheer lack of contact with, and knowledge of local conditions."
>
> The solution is a locally-based administration and under present northern economic conditions, "the only possible practicable method of attaining local government is to unite with contiguous provinces."
> Alberta suggests joining of the Yukon and British Columbia and the Mackenzie River basin with Alberta.
> "The remainder of the Northwest Territories could be administered by either Saskatchewan or Manitoba; or the remainder might be split along the current Mackenzie-Keewatin districts boundary."
>
> Union of the territories with the provinces need not be permanent.
> "The privilege of opting for permanent union or for division and separation should be provided at such time as the population and economic development of the present territories reaches the point at which a viable provincial government can be sustained."

As I have said, these suggestions have not yet met with the approval of residents of the territories who want to be incorporated into provinces. I cannot imagine a province the size of the Yukon with a population of only 15,000, or a province the size of the Northwest Territories with a population of only 26,000.

In my opinion, it will be a long time before the population and the revenue is large enough to warrant the formation of provinces in these northern areas. In the meantime I am in favour of giving the people more control in government, and I will support the bill providing for the election of seven members to the council instead of the present four. Some people go so far as to say that all the council members should be elected. That may eventually take place, but the Government does not seem to be prepared to go that far at this time. I point out, however, that the amendments to the Northwest Territories Act contained in this bill are interim measures. Further changes, no doubt, will be made after the Carrothers Commission reports.

When Senator Prowse was explaining this bill I asked him about the revenue of the Northwest Territories, and he told me that the total expenditure was approximately $9 million per annum, of which $8.5 million was provided by the federal Government. The Northwest Territories, therefore, depend heavily upon Ottawa for their funds, and the federal Government must continue to have a voice in the spending of this money and in the administration of the territories.

It is my understanding also, honourable senators, that the Carrothers Commission is about to make its report, and that many members of the Senate are wondering why it is found necessary to amend the Northwest Territories Act now. Why does the Government not wait until it knows what the commission is recommending? Perhaps the Government has some advance information as to the recommendations the report will contain.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am looking forward to the publication of the report of the Carrothers Commission because it will reflect the opinions and ideas of the inhabitants of the Northwest Territories. In the meantime I have no objection to the provisions of this bill becoming law. I want the people of the Northwest Territories to have as much control over their own affairs as it is possible to give them, but, on the other hand, I am still of the opinion that consideration should be given to the territories being taken over by the provinces which join them to the south.

I have nothing further to say with respect to the principle of the bill and its clauses at this time. At first it was my thought that it would not be necessary to send this bill to a committee. The provisions of the bill are steps forward, in my opinion. However, other honourable senators may have questions they wish to ask, and in that case the bill should go to one of the several committees of this house.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

COMMERCIAL SOLIDS PIPE LINE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill S-36, to incorporate Commercial Solids Pipe Line Company.

He said: Honourable senators, the petitioners for the incorporation of Commercial Solids Pipe Line Company are four senior employees of Shell (Canada) Limited, and they are Canadian citizens or British subjects.

Although the objects set out in the bill follow the general form that has been adopted in recent years in bills for the incorporation of companies to operate pipe lines, and include the power to transport solids, liquids and gases, it is the intent of this proposed company to build a pipe line or pipe lines for the transportation of solids in capsule, slurry or other form. Shell (Canada) Limited will be the principal shareholder of the new company.

There are various solids which lend themselves to transportation by pipe line such as, for example, sulphur, coal, potash and iron ore. One project that Shell (Canada) Limited is examining particularly is the transportation by pipe line of sulphur from Alberta to the west coast. Sulphur production in Alberta—and the demand for it in various markets such as Australia, India and Japan—has increased to the point where the petitioners believe it would be in the national interest to build a pipe line which would provide a cheaper and more efficient method of transporting this commodity from the producing area to the closest suitable port.

It is anticipated that by 1969 there will be eight gas processing plants in southern Alberta producing approximately 1,750,000 long tons of sulphur per year, and that exports of Canadian sulphur by that time will amount to 1,500,000 long tons per year. The production of sulphur in southern Alberta after 1969 should increase at the rate of about 100,000 long tons annually. Any of the southern Alberta plants which wished to transport its sulphur through such a pipe line would be able to do so by mutual agreement with this particular company. Some of the plants in southern Alberta are wholly owned by Shell, others are partially owned by Shell, and there are some in which Shell has no interest at all. Shell owns approximately 40 per cent of the total production from all of these plants.

The pipe line envisaged is a 12-inch line, and will cost approximately $50 million.

Having regard to present freight rates, the pipe line would reduce the cost of transportation of sulphur to the west coast by about one-third, and, if built, would likely be the first of such in the world. So far as the petitioners know, no other such pipe line is being planned. It would certainly place Canada in a better competitive position in world markets, the other major exporters of sulphur being the United States and Mexico.

Considerable research has already been undertaken in respect of the feasibility of such a pipe line, and the company expects to spend a further sum of $650,000 on a pilot pipe line and a pilot separation plant. Shell is seeking a charter at this time before committing itself to this expenditure.

The company has not yet ascertained what liquids will be used to convey the solids through the pipe line that it may build. It is because crude oil and natural gas liquids are possibilities, and because no pipe line should be precluded from the shipment of hydro carbons if the National Energy Board should approve, that incorporation by special act of Parliament is now sought.

Honourable senators, it is not my wish that I be questioned on the technical feasibility of this pipe line, but if this house gives this bill second reading I intend to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. The company has assured me that their legal counsel together with technical experts are prepared to appear before the committee to answer any questions honourable senators may have. They will be able to answer them in a much better fashion than I.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL ACT

AN ACT TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Finance on Bill C-150, to amend the Research Council Act, which was presented May 26.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, the report of the Standing Committee on Finance on Bill C-150 was printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of May 26, and it appears also in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate at pages 556 and 557.

At first glance the amendments look rather extensive, but in point of fact the change made by them is a simple one. Hitherto, the National Research Council reported to or through the chairman of a committee of the Privy Council known as the Committee of the Privy Council on Scientific and Industrial Research. There was no special minister designated for the purposes of the National Research Council. Now, with the creation of the Science Council, the National Research Council will no longer function as the Science Advisory Council for the Government, and it is therefore desirable to provide for the designation of a Cabinet minister to or through whom the National Research Council will report. This is the purpose of the amendments made in committee.

The main amendment is contained in the provision striking out clause 3 of the bill and substituting a new clause 3, which in turn adds a paragraph (e) to the National Research Council Act. Paragraph (e) reads as follows:

> "Minister" means such member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada as may be designated by the Governor in Council to act as the Minister for the purposes of this Act;

When these amendments were suggested in committee on behalf of the Government, at which time Dr. B. G. Ballard, President of the National Research Council, was before us as a witness, he asked that the matter be deferred so that he could have further opportunity to consider it. Then he appeared before our committee again last Thursday, having had a week or more to consider the matter, and he acquiesced in this change.

This bill originated in the House of Commons, and if this report is now adopted the bill as amended will have to go back to the House of Commons for concurrence in the amendments. However, as the amendments have been proposed by the Government and agreed to by the National Research Council, and as they are really consequent upon the adoption of the legislation creating the Science Council, it would seem to be quite in order for the Senate to adopt the report, amend the bill accordingly and send it back to the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: May I ask the honourable Senator Leonard whether or not it is a fact that the announcement of the appointment of the new Chairman of the Science Council, Dr. Solandt, was made after the deliberations of our committee?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Yes, that announcement was made since our committee meeting.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: And in compliance with our discussions in committee?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Consistent with those discussions.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Consistent, yes.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I move, with leave, that the bill as amended be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read the third time and passed.

CONSERVATION OF WATER RESOURCES

DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. F. W. Gershaw rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the need for conserving Canada's water resources.

He said: Honourable senators, one of the primary obligations of the people of this generation is to conserve water resources for future Canadians. All life on earth depends upon water, for without water pestilence and famine would soon depopulate the earth.

Archaeologists tell us there are cities, whole civilizations, lying beneath the sands of the desert because water was not conserved. On the other hand, certain ancient people realized the value of water. The Babylonians, the Egyptians, the Persians, built structures to store up water in time of flood so that it could be used in times of drought. The Greeks during their great days also did work along this line.

Then we come to the monumental works of the Romans. They diverted streams, built reservoirs and tunnelled canals through mountains by hand 2,000 or 3,000 years before the birth of Christ. They built aqueducts over low, depressed places so that water could be taken to the seven hills and then poured into the fountains and baths of the rich people.

Of course water is of very great value, particularly for irrigation. For many years it has been saved up in areas where food has been scarce, and then distributed so that some food could be produced by means of irrigation. Even in areas in this country where the rainfall has been deficient it has been lifesaving. Even where there is a fair but erratic rainfall, the system of distributing water by sprinklers is a useful way of getting better crops and is indeed one form of crop insurance.

Water is also used for transportation; in pioneer days the waterways were avenues for travel and highways for commerce. But this function has diminished greatly except in the far north and of course around the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence. The word "Ottawa" is taken from an Indian word meaning "men of the forest," and long ago men of the forest with faces painted and their bodies clothed in skins of animals brought furs down the Ottawa River. Since then logs have been floated down the river, and even today it is the cheapest way of transporting logs from the forest to the mills.

Water is also needed for hydroelectric power, industry and domestic purposes. For this purpose we require about 140 gallons per person per day. There is annually twelve to fifteen inches of rain, so that if water is conserved sufficient of it can be obtained without desalting the ocean. Of course, water is also in the air in the form of vapour and is precipitated as hail, snow and rain. It is also on the surface of land. Canada is noted for the fresh-water lakes and fast-flowing mighty rivers that cover about 7.6 per cent of the surface of this country. Water is also found below the surface. The upper margin or upper level is called the water table, and if it is near the surface vegetation grows well; if it is down deep, we miss the water because the wells run dry.

Then again, beneath the surface in certain places there are large streams of cold, rapidly flowing water called aquifers, and at other places water gushes up in artesian wells or mineralized hot springs.

Canada has quite a number of watersheds. There is the one in the north dominated by the mighty Mackenzie River; there is the Hudson Bay watershed with its tremendous power potential; and the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence. West of the Rockies the rapidly flowing rivers produce power and provide spawning grounds to which swarms of salmon swim with great difficulty.

The place to which I particularly wish to draw honourable senators' attention this afternoon is the prairie region. There are 15 or 20 or even more streams flowing down the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains. The trouble is that at times these streams are in flood and a tremendous amount of water comes hurtling down, and at other times it is a mere trickle. In one stream that has been very carefully watched the mean flow is about 7,500 cubic feet per second, but in springtime it can grow to 160,000 cubic feet per second. In 1958 the total annual flow of that particular stream was about 6 million acre-feet, but in 1962 it had dwindled to 4½ million acre-feet. So, there is a great difference in the annual flow of these streams and indeed in the daily or monthly flow.

To avoid these periods of flood and drought, means must be devised to regulate that flow. One method is to save the forest covering of the mountains from fire. If disease, germs or fire destroy the forests, then the water rushes down in a torrent, but if the trees are preserved there is a bed of leaves and vegetation which holds the moisture and allows it to flow more gradually.

Another way of storing water is to build reservoirs in the foothills, and this has been done to a considerable extent. The Ghost River, the Milk River, the Bow and the Waterton have been dealt with in this fashion. And Mr. Harry Strom, Minister of Agriculture in Alberta, has said that the Pincher Creek and Oldman River will have storage facilities in the future. By these methods water can be kept in the headwater areas and distributed when needed to the dry, parched areas that are certainly dependent upon irrigation.

Engineers are working on schemes to get water from the northern regions to the southern regions, from the North Saskatchewan, on which there are very few demands for water, to the South Saskatchewan on which there is a very high demand. The South Saskatchewan River flows through a dry area which has not a consistent rainfall.

Where the water is diverted to any foreign country there must and should be a return flow of benefits in some way. The federal Government, with the co-operation of the provinces, has a water policy which could be described under three headings. The first is that they are continually taking inventories and this is necessary to know what is going on from year to year. Secondly, they recognize that there is a difference in the water endowment of certain districts—some have water and some have not, and this has to be adjusted. Finally, they are interested in providing for the future which, of course, is important because as the population increases more water will be needed for domestic purposes and hydroelectric power. These needs will be increasing for a long time to come. Water is also used for various other purposes.

Now we come to the problem of water pollution. Medical records can tell of some sad tragedies in connection with water pollution. Homes have been visited by sickness and death because of the virulent bacteria which come in some of the polluted streams. How can we prevent pollution? All sewage must be treated, and industrial waste must not be dumped into flowing streams, and of course there should be a greater supply of water to purify the streams.

Protein is recognized as a necessary and very valuable food. One source of protein is the fish of the ocean and the lakes, and quantities seem to be diminishing. When Jacques Cartier sailed through the Straits of Belle Isle in 1535 he lowered a basket and it filled with fish, and the fish were so plentiful that the ship could hardly pass through the water. Even the Grand Banks does not have such quantities of fish today.

It is said that in some of the lakes—Lake Erie, for example—there are algae, debris, industrial waste, detergents and decomposing material forming a scum over the surface of the water so that fish do not get sufficient oxygen and consequently do not flourish.

During recent years much has been done to save our water supply. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, designed to help those areas that were producing nothing because of drought and wind erosion, was passed in 1935. Millions of trees have been planted. Some community pastures have been established, and efforts have been made to find appropriate uses for these submarginal lands. Many dugouts, stock water reservoirs and small irrigation schemes have been made. The Government will pay for the engineering and for half the cost of constructing these works, and some 90,000 small dams and reservoirs have been constructed.

Then, in co-operation with the provinces, larger irrigation schemes have been established. For instance, there is the St. Mary's irrigation scheme, wherein waters of three mountain streams are stored in the Spring Coulee reservoir. About 500,000 acres can be irrigated from that source. The biggest undertaking of all is the South Saskatchewan River project, where there is a great dam 210 feet high and more than three miles long, forming a lake for 140 miles behind it and providing power and irrigation for another half-million acres, and fresh water for some of the neighbouring cities.

Other developments have been the Northwest Escarpment and Interlake Project, the Assiniboia River Reclamation Project, the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, and the Canada Water Conservation Act.

One of the most recent developments of all has been ARDA, the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act. Through the implementation of its provisions people living in submarginal areas are consulted. They know how they can increase their income and make better use of the water and soil, and they form associations and draw up resolutions concerning their needs. Some 368 federal-provincial schemes have already been approved, and extensive work has been done on some of them. In Alberta about a million acres are under water, and some one million acre-feet of water must be replaced in some way, so a great supply of water will be needed in the future.

These water supply works are to some extent self-liquidating because there is some return on capital investment. Those living in sparsely populated districts where neighbours are widely separated are lonely and have a hard life. Irrigation affords a better social life because people can live closer together, the standard of living is improved and, in particular, the amount of available food is increased. When we consider the fact that from one-half to two-thirds of the people of the world are suffering from lack of nutrition, we realize how valuable this food is. The conservation of water brings some measure of security, because hungry peoples will fight.

Honourable senators, it is difficult to judge just how much needs to be done. Are we doing enough, or should more be done? If we are neglecting this we shall not be held blameless. On the other hand, if this matter gets the attention it deserves, the people of this generation will make a great contribution to the welfare and happiness of future Canadians.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, debate adjourned.

AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT— MOTION FOR APPROVAL— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John B. Aird moved pursuant to notice:

> That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament do approve the Agreement concerning Automotive Products between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America signed on January 16, 1965, and tabled in the Senate on March 3, 1965; and that this House do approve the same.

He said: Honourable senators, I am greatly honoured that the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) has asked me to deal with this most important agreement respecting automotive products which was recently concluded between Canada and the United States. This is particularly the case because it was my pleasure and honour recently to attend the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Conference held in Washington. The Canadian delegation was most ably headed by His Honour the Speaker, and Senators O'Leary (Carleton), Phillips, Fournier (De Lanaudière), Rattenbury and myself represented the Senate at the deliberations. The first two items on the agenda of the committee meetings which I attended were the Kennedy Round and the balance of payments problem. From this it will be seen that the general subject of international trade and international payments was very much under discussion.

All honourable senators, no doubt, will have read the lengthy, informative and constructive debate concerning this agreement that was held in the other place. In addition to this debate I have had an opportunity of reading and studying many of the opinions promulgated about this agreement over the past several years. The agreement has been very much in the news and will no doubt continue in the news and in the minds of the Canadian people because it is most important and significant, and is having and will continue to have a tremendous impact not only on the automotive industry but on the whole economy of the country.

Honourable senators, I have decided, having regard to the mass of material that has confronted me, to endeavour to concentrate my remarks into a simple pattern along the following lines: Firstly, what was the problem that required the Government to decide that an agreement of this nature was necessary? Secondly, what does the agreement do? Thirdly, what have been the results of this agreement? Fourthly, I shall discuss generally the present situation and the future prospects under the agreement.

I am fully aware of the great risk involved in trying to oversimplify the very large scope of this matter, but it seems to me that if I deal with it under these four headings, honourable senators will have an appreciation and perhaps a perspective of the operation of the agreement.

What was the problem that required the Government to decide that an agreement of this nature was necessary? A good starting point for discussing this question is a reference to the Royal Commission on the Automotive Industry, established in 1960 under the Conservative Government, to "inquire into and report upon the present and prospective competitive position of the Canadian automotive industry in Canadian and export markets as compared with automotive industries in other countries." The commissioner was Dean Vincent Bladen whose most important conclusion, in my opinion, was that expressed in these words:

> The Canadian automotive industry is subject to the disadvantages of low volume production as long as it is geared almost exclusively to the Canadian market. To break through the limits imposed by low volume production in Canada, it is necessary that manufacturers be in a position to benefit from the lower cost possible of higher volume production. This could be achieved if Canadian parts manufacturers were in a position to produce parts for a wider market and if Canadian automobile manufacturers had duty free access to the lower cost, higher volume parts producers in other countries.

This then was the problem. There was an inadequate structure with a resulting loss of productive efficiency in the Canadian industry. This inadequate structure and lack of productive adaptation was becoming a serious source of weakness in the Canadian economy and as expenditures on automobiles was one area of rapidly growing demand, this weakness was, of course, being reflected in a widening volume of net external payments for automobiles and parts. However, it is my opinion that the essential problem lay not in the payments' balance itself but in the inadequate structure in productive efficiency of the Canadian industry.

What does the agreement do? I believe that the prime essential objective of the agreement was to bring about needed improvement of the country's industrial structure. This could only be achieved through the development of lower cost and more efficient production, making the fullest possible utilization of the economies of specialization and scale. Probably the biggest merit of the agreement—and I wish to emphasize this—is that it recognizes the problem of efficiency and that it seeks, through the willing co-operation of the companies involved, the development of a continuing movement towards more efficient and lower cost output. A more specialized concentration upon fewer models and upon fewer kinds of parts and components, with a growing share of output being directed towards the United States and other export markets, promises to bring about major improvements in the productive capability of the whole industry.

Now, honourable senators, I wish to turn to the agreement itself. Under its provisions Canadian-made motor vehicles and original equipment parts enter the United States free of duty. On the Canadian side, vehicles and original equipment parts may be imported duty free by a Canadian vehicle manufacturer who meets a number of specific requirements. These requirements are set out in a tariff item which forms a part of the Canada-United States agreement and in the letters of commitment to the Canadian Government signed by each of the vehicle producers. Each vehicle producer in Canada must meet the following conditions:

1. It must maintain the same ratio of vehicle production in Canada to vehicle sales in Canada that existed in model year 1964.

2. It must maintain Canadian value added in vehicle assembly in Canada at least equal to that achieved in model year 1964.

3. It must increase Canadian value added by production or purchases in Canada equal to 60 per cent of increased sales over those achieved in the model year 1964 base period.

In addition to these requirements, vehicle producers must increase total production or purchases in Canada by $260 million annually by the 1968 model year. This amount is over and above the increased Canadian production of vehicles or purchases of parts achieved through growth in the market. It is also over and above the Canadian value added which was achieved in the 1964 model year base period, and which must be maintained each year.

Duty free entry of auto parts into Canada is also available to parts makers if they are for use in Canadian vehicle production.

What does this mean in simple terms? It is clear that this is a new type of arrangement with features especially designed to deal with a special situation. It seeks to change the pattern of automotive production in Canada to enable Canadian vehicle and parts makers to expand their output to achieve cost savings by greater specialization. In fact, this means that instead of being largely confined to a market for 600,000 to 700,000 vehicles per year, Canadian producers are being encouraged to gear their activity to participate in a North American market of more than ten times that number of vehicles annually.

The ability of the Canadian vehicle and parts makers to take full advantage of this expanded opportunity will depend upon their ability to keep manufacturing costs as low as possible. In this regard I would like to point out that the agreement is of unlimited duration but that it provides for a comprehensive review of the whole program to be undertaken in 1968. At that time consideration will be given to such further steps as may be necessary or desirable for the full achievement of the agreed objectives. It is my opinion that the test will be whether Canadian automotive industries have had an adequate opportunity to participate fully and equitably in the expanding North American market.

What have been the results under the agreement?

I believe that it is fair to say that the agreement has had substantial beneficial effects. In support of the foregoing statement there is a mass of statistical data that can be brought forward but I have no desire to over-sell the benefits that are accruing under its operation. In the first place, I believe that it is probably too early to make a fair assessment of all its ramifications and, in the second place, I have often felt that statistics can be used to suit a specific situation. However, I do wish to draw the following facts to your attention.

Production during the first year of the automotive program has totalled over 855,000 motor vehicles, a 27.5 per cent increase over the same period in 1964 and a 36 per cent increase over the same period in 1963. The value of shipments of motor vehicles parts and accessories for model year 1965, the latest complete production year, shows a 51 per cent increase over model year 1963, which was the last model year prior to the introduction of this Government's automotive measures in the fall of 1963.

During the first twelve months of the program the average number of workers in the automotive industry has increased by almost 10,500 persons, or 16 per cent over 1964. More than 4,700 of these additional jobs are in the auto parts industry.

Exports of Canadian automotive products have increased greatly under the program. During 1965 exports to all countries amounted to $362 million, an increase of 275 per cent over the same period in 1963, and 94 per cent greater than in 1964. Imports, on the other hand, increased by only 33 per cent in the first 11 months of 1965, compared with the same period in 1964.

Exports to the United States during 1965 increased to $231 million compared with $99 million during 1964, and only $40 million in 1963. This represents annual increases of 133 per cent in 1965 over 1964, and 147 per cent in 1964 over 1963. Over the two-year period there was a 475 per cent increase.

Another most important aspect resulting from the operation of the agreement is that the Government has undertaken to provide assistance to those workers and parts manufacturers who are affected by the necessary adjustment process. To administer this program the Adjustment Assistance Board was established.

If parts makers are to take advantage of the automotive program, they must be increasingly competitive and flexible in their operations. Many parts makers will have to engage in substantial re-equipment and expansion programs. In additon, increased working capital will be required in order to operate at expanded levels.

To provide the opportunity to participate in the program, the board is authorized to make loans available to producers of automotive products who have a reasonable prospect of profitable operation but who otherwise would be prevented from benefiting from the program through lack of financing. The loans will carry an interest rate of 6 per cent and are repayable over not more than 20 years for land and buildings and 10 years for other purposes.

Firms manufacturing the automotive products covered by the automotive program are eligible for the loans, except those companies which manufacture automobiles or are affiliated with automobile manufacturers.

To assist workers in the automotive products industries in meeting their adjustment problems, the Government introduced a Transitional Assistance Benefit Program. This program will provide assistance benefits ranging from 62 per cent to 75 per cent of the worker's weekly pay, depending on the number of his dependants, provided this benefit does not exceed 65 per cent of the average weekly wages and salaries in the industry.

Those are my first three points. I should like to proceed now to my fourth heading, which is: A general discussion of the present situation and future prospects under the agreement.

The first point that I would like to make is that I believe that this agreement is the kind of priority that the Government of Canada should be engaged in implementing. It is a classic example of co-operation and partnership between government and industry proceeding towards an agreed objective. It is the type of initiative that I have discussed here in previous addresses, and I believe that it is the right type of government involvement in the private sector. It is a type of the kind of creative federalism that I believe is so necessary in Canada today. Yet, it is my opinion that it would be inaccurate to say that the agreement is an unqualified success in every aspect or that the road ahead will be an easy one.

It is clear that Canada has a continual and worrisome balance of payments problem, and it is also clear that although this agreement has demonstrated that in this area the ratio of exports is increasing at a rate faster than the ratio of imports, we are in fact as a country increasing our over-all deficit on current account. However, I do think that it is generally acknowledged that the balance of payments position would be significantly worse if we had not had the agreement, and it is very evident that Canada continues to be dependent on a massive inflow of capital, most of which must come from the United States.

In this regard, I would like to quote from the Prime Minister's recent address in Montreal on this subject wherein he said "a policy of national exclusiveness of 'little self-contained Canada' would not only be foolish for us; it could be fatal." I do not believe that Canada can isolate itself economically in a world where international interdependence is a necessity of existence. I would, however, like to make the additional point that the inflow of capital is dependent upon two fundamental factors, and those factors are confidence and respect in Canada as a country.

What determines confidence and respect today? Confidence on the part of those who are investing or are about to invest capital in Canada is based on the foundamental premise of fair dealing in every sense of the the word. Respect is based on the fundamental premise that if a commitment is made or a word given, the commitment or the word will be kept in its entirety. Both confidence and respect will be sustained if Canada conducts itself in a mature and enlightened fashion. I think it is clear that Canada has a great opportunity to maintain its enviable position in the eyes of the world if, in general, it keeps these two requisites in the forefront of all its negotiations.

As I previously have stated, I have read with interest a great number of the comments and criticisms that have been made about the agreement. It seems to me that most of the criticism has been valid and has been of a constructive nature. In this particular case we do not suffer from a lack of knowledge or opinion. To the contrary, much of the criticism has had great validity. The dialogue has been exhaustive. I believe that we should turn this interest and dialogue to the benefit of Canada so that when this agreement is reviewed, Canada will be in a position that will demand both confidence and respect.

It is my belief that the prime concern of the Canadian Government should be a concern for its overall strategy, the establishing of priorities and the achievement of a standard of excellence in its performance. It seems clear that in the broad strategy for Canadian development, certainly over the next few years, trade policy should have a prominent place of priority—first, for the traditional purpose of securing better terms of access for Canadian goods in external markets and, second, as a means of encouraging a needed strengthening and adaptation of Canadian industry to a rapidly expanding and changing world economy.

In this regard, I believe it is widely recognized that efforts should be made to encourage greater concentration on lines in which Canada has particular advantages, and that to secure the benefits of specialization and large scale output, it is important that there be widening of outlets beyond national boundaries.

I would refer honourable senators to the Second Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada at page 172. I have slightly paraphrased the quotation, as follows:

> We have stressed the full part which Canada must play not only in concerted international initiatives for maintaining a strong expanding world economy but also in international efforts to improve the world's monetary and trading system. This role recognizes the growing degree of international economic interdependence. More specifically, an active and meaningful role by Canada in negotiations to broaden and deepen nondiscriminatory multilateral trade coincides with our long-term interests and position as a major world trader. Such negotiations should also be viewed in the context of offering opportunities for strengthening Canada's international competitive position, thereby helping to minimize possible constraints on future growth arising from balance of payments problems.
> In particular, we recommend in accordance with the foregoing basic commercial policy that:
> (1) Maximum use be made of the opportunities available in the present Kennedy Round of multilateral trade negotiations to remove obstacles to Canadian trade.
> (2) Since, in addition to multilateral arrangements, Canada has a number of bilateral and special trading arrangements, the achievement of expanding trade and economically sound industrial specialization be the dominant economic criterion of any such arrangements.
> (3) In anticipation of possible adjustments in the structure of production resulting from future reductions in trade barriers, immediate steps be taken to establish a general program under which adequate and effective assistance would be available to particular industries and groups of workers which may be adversely affected by any such reductions. The basic purpose of such a programme would be to bring about an effective and speedy transfer of productive resources from less efficient to more efficient lines of production. The resulting improvements in the productivity of the economy would amply justify the costs involved.

Honourable senators, for a good many reasons, including the fact that several Canadian basic products must find markets overseas rather than in the United States and our continuing and understandable concern about undue dependence on our large neighbouring country, Canada's basic interests have long been recognized as lying in the widest possible opening up of world trade.

In spite of this basic position, however, there may well be good reason in particular instances for working out bilateral or special trading arrangements so long as they do not interfere seriously with our important multilateral interests. This must be particularly the case as we view the difficulties that appear to be strangling the Kennedy Round negotiations. It seems clear that the original purposes envisaged by the late President of the United States will not be achieved as first conceived.

I reach this unhappy conclusion because so much remains to be done and agreement has not been reached in so many areas that it seems almost impossible that the Kennedy Round will be completed on time. As a result of this doubt as to the success of the Kennedy Round, I believe that Canada must concern itself with bilateral arrangements such as the one under discussion. The inherent difficulty of this statement lies in the fact that there appear to be very few obvious cases where an arrangement like the automotive agreement could sensibly be worked out.

It is true that in the case of the automobile industry there were many special considerations favouring a bilateral approach. In particular, of course, there was the fact that the industry in Canada has for many years been dominated by a small number of large U.S. companies. Any successful major readjustment of the industry's operations required the willing co-operation of these companies, and the fact that only a few companies were involved greatly facilitated the working out of practical patterns of change.

With respect to the balance of payments aspects of the agreement, it must be noted that the value of Canadian imports of autos and parts is inevitably dependent on the level of Canadian demand for cars, together with the volume of exports of completed vehicles. Because Canadian demand for cars has been increasing rapidly over the past few years, it is hardly surprising that imports of autos and parts have been rising strongly also. Under the agreement, however, such imports are being offset to an increasing degree by exports, particularly to the United States but also to some extent to other countries.

While the balance of payments deficit widened considerably in 1965, it seems clear that it would have increased a good deal more in the absence of the agreement. For the years ahead it is anticipated that the deficit will tend to level off, if not decline. I might say that for a major exporting country which has a large "payments surplus" in quite a number of products—including pulp and paper, lumber, nickel, iron ore, aluminum, wheat, etc.—the kind of payments emphasis adopted by a surprising number of people towards the automobile industry strikes me as being somewhat discouraging.

Among the awkward problems still to be faced as a result of the agreement are those of prices and wages in the automobile industry itself. It is claimed that the price margin for cars has narrowed a little in the past year and I know that spokesmen for the Government anticipate further moves in this direction. It seems to me, however, that the speed of such a narrowing of prices depends fundamentally on the relative degree of improvement of productive efficiency that is achieved. The agreement has undoubtedly strengthened the pressure of the automobile unions for wage parity with the United States. Any marked move in this direction, however, would tend to offset the fundamental purpose of the agreement in achieving more efficient production and also reduce the capacity of the industry to narrow the margin of prices.

Beyond this problem, too, there is the ever-present danger that the upward wage pressure will spread to other industries which are not achieving anything like the same gains in productivity. Such an undesirable development would clearly tend to reduce the competitiveness of the Canadian economy.

There are several other aspects of the program that have given rise to comment. Firstly, there is the problem of the type of expansion that is taking place under the agreement. To date the automotive companies appear to be concentrating on meeting their objectives through the expansion of labour intensive production rather than capital intensive production. This means that there has been a greater increase in employment of semi-skilled labour than in highly skilled labour. However, I believe that it is too early to conclude that this trend will hold for the future, as all of the companies' plans to meet their commitments have not been announced. I would hope that the industry's future expansion under the program would include locating in Canada manufacturing processes which utilize more highly skilled labour.

Secondly, there is the problem of tax policies which appear to be in conflict with the intent of the automotive program. In particular, I refer to the general 11 per cent sales tax, which of course includes production machinery used in the automotive industry. This is essentially one of the ancillary problems which arise when a program of this magnitude is undertaken, and is a problem of which the Government is very aware. In this regard I would call the attention of honourable senators to the recent Budget which proposes the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on certain tooling for use in production machinery, and the progressive elimination of the sales tax over the next two years on the remaining categories of production machinery and equipment.

In conclusion, I would suggest that Canada's experience under the agreement has been beneficial. It has resulted in more production and employment and has brought about greater specialization which should have a salutary effect on our economy. Notwithstanding the many benefits, some problems still remain. While efforts are being made to meet these problems, it is clear that if Canada is to enjoy maximum benefits much hard bargaining will be needed in 1968 when the agreement comes up for reconsideration. Canada, after gaining a more equitable share of North American production, must ensure that it keeps it. The Government will have to press hard for more safeguards for Canadian production and for specific arrangements to keep cross-border specialization a reality.

Honourable senators, I commend this agreement to the favourable approval of the Senate.

I would add that it is my understanding that this resolution is to be referred to the appropriate standing committee for consideration.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, may I first congratulate, on behalf of the house, honourable Senator Aird on his very exhaustive and able summary of a very difficult situation. We are glad to have in this house people like Senator Aird because he has all the earmarks of a Tory. May I remark that there is another senator here who has also played a prominent part in the Liberal organization. I refer to Senator Lang, whom I wish to congratulate on having yesterday been made a Governor of Canada's greatest university, the University of Toronto.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Although Senator Aird has had to do the best he can under the circumstances, he has interlarded his speech with a great deal of theory, and, what he cannot fill in for the present in fact, he is anticipating for the future. But he has failed to point out that the debate today is really an exercise in futility.

Let us look at some of the matters he left out. In the first place the measure giving effect to this agreement, so far as Canada is concerned in any event, was brought into effect by order in council in January 1965, not 1966. And so, honourable senators, for practically sixteen months this agreement has been in operation, and only after sixteen months is Parliament asked for the first time to validate it. In effect, Parliament is being asked, and I am sure my honourable and reasonable friend will agree, to rubber-stamp the executive action of the cabinet, to endorse an agreement now operating for over a year.

What are we debating? Why have a debate at all? What is the use of it? In so acting after this sixteen months' delay, the Government, I suggest, is really flouting the sovereignty of Parliament. This is not unusual and it is not the first time. It is in keeping with many other actions that have gone on before. I ask you, honourable senators, why debate a fait accompli? If we are going to talk about the history of it, let us wait until 1968.

Now my honourable friend has failed to point out that the balance of payments situation, which under this Canada-United States automotive agreement was supposed to improve, has in fact worked the other way. The net automobile trade deficit with the United States rose from $578 million in 1964 to $674 million in 1965, and these figures are not disputed. In other words, there has been an increase of almost $100 million in the deficit.

My friend has also failed to point out—and I cannot blame him, for as a lawyer he is putting his best foot forward, and I think Senator Lang would do the same—that the increased employment on the assembly line, which has been very substantial, has been offset to a very substantial degree by unemployment in parts manufacturing in many areas of the country, and has caused, as he knows and as we all hear about from day to day, particularly in smaller localities, extreme hardship and even disaster in the parts segment of this great automotive industry.

Finally, as I have said, this is an exercise in futility, but it would not do to allow my honourable friend to go on with all those fine theories and look to 1968 for the working out of them.

I am bound to point out another failure. My friend has neglected to mention that the $50 million gift this tariff concession presents to the United States manufacturers—not to the Canadian manufacturers, but to the United States manufacturers—has not been passed on to the consumer except to a minimal degree. He and everyone knows well that this is one of the glaring failures of the agreement up to the present time. The honourable senator hopes that eventually it will be passed on, but in the meantime the American car manufacturers are getting even richer at the expense of this $50 million tariff cut.

I could go on, but what is the use? It is a fait accompli; it has been working for 16 months. We are not being approached today for our opinion on it, because our opinion means nothing, not even the opinion of my able friend. The agreement is working for good or for evil and, as he says, we shall review it again in 1968.

Hon. Harry A. Willis: Honourable senators, first of all I want to congratulate my knowledgeable friend, the honourable Senator Aird. It is a shame he is not in the other place, for I say with all sincerity that I think he would make an excellent Minister of Finance.

Before proceeding with the few remarks I have to make on this resolution, may I refer to a personal matter. On Monday last I attended a convocation in the Province of Ontario where a new chancellor of a university was installed, and among the reception line welcoming him were chancellors of neighbouring universities. Lo and behold, I saw the honourable Senator Ross Macdonald dressed from head to foot in fine red silk, with a red tam on his head. I honestly did not recognize him at first. Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like he. He is to be envied having such a gown and hat. I congratulate him on being Chancellor of Waterloo Lutheran University, and I was pleased to see him as the outstanding fashion in that parade.

I also wish to congratulate my colleague Senator Walker on his contribution to this debate.

I wish to press strongly to have this resolution referred to a committee. It was not considered by a committee in the other house, but I believe this resolution to be sufficiently important to Canada's fiscal policy that it should go to committee.

My first objection to this bill is that it was conceived in secrecy. Two or three ministers, including the Prime Minister, flew down to Texas where they visited what is known as the L.B.J. Ranch, and there the agreement was hammered out. Then it was brought to Canada and was born at a cabinet meeting, the birth announcement being made on January 16, 1965. I hope that if this resolution goes to committee we will see its demise notice in the Canada Gazette before too long.

Perhaps the principle is not overly objectionable, but why on earth would a resolution like this, affecting the fiscal policy of Canada, be passed and become law in Canada without reference to Parliament and the representatives of the Canadian people? It is noteworthy that in the United States it was considered by both Congress and the Senate. It was examined thoroughly and hotly debated before it was passed in the United States.

I have in my hand a book which will be applauded by my friends opposite. It is the latest biography of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The honourable senator who has just spoken, Senator Walker, and some of the newcomers, of course, had not been born by 1910 and so will not recall the circumstances to which I am about to refer. Others of you will recall that the then Minister of Finance, with a cabinet colleague or two and departmental officials, went to Washington and spent almost a month there negotiating what became known as the Reciprocity Treaty. On their return to Parliament, it was debated so hotly that the then Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, had to adjourn Parliament in order to attend the Imperial Conference. Sir Clifford Sifton—who I do not need to say was a Liberal—on February 28, 1911, stated in the House of Commons:

> —four or five gentlemen who,...are in control of the affairs of the dominant political party, can suddenly, of their own motion, without discussion, without debate, without the knowledge of the country, commit the country to a radical change of fiscal policy.

The Prime Minister of the day had no thought of signing the agreement without the approval of Parliament and, of course, he did not obtain that approval. In September of that year a general election was held, and honourable senators will recall that the Government of the day was defeated on that very issue.

I also want to recall the words of another leader of the great Liberal party and a great Prime Minister, Right Honourable Mackenzie King, who on June 21, 1926, moved in the House of Commons:

> This house...considers further that before His Majesty's Canadian ministers advise ratification of a treaty or convention affecting Canada, or signify acceptance of any treaty convention or agreement involving military or economic sanctions, the approval of the Parliament of Canada should be secured.

On April 12, 1928 the Right Honourable Mackenzie King stated in the House of Commons:

> I submit that the day has passed when any government or executive should feel that they should take it upon themselves without the approval of Parliament, to commit a country to obligations involving any considerable financial outlays or active undertakings.

He went on to say that in all cases it should obtain the approval of Parliament.

Here we have legislation passed by order in council which, I think, was unconstitutional because it affected the fiscal policies of this country. Anyhow, it was passed by order in council and became law. As my honourable friend Senator Walker said, this occurred on January 16, 1965, and Parliament was not asked to ratify, discuss or debate it until the month of May, 1966.

Honourable senators, this is a matter which should be debated thoroughly by a committee of this house in order that all details can be gone into, and so that all those who have been hurt by it can come before the committee and express their views. Were I searching for a phrase to describe this piece of legislation I would quote the words of Longfellow, who said:

> I shot an arrow in the air,
> It fell to earth, I knew not where.

That is just about what they did with regard to this agreement. They passed it by order in council without knowing its ramifications, and, as the honourable Senator Aird said, the Government has had to set up a special board to deal with those affected and hurt by this agreement. I say to you, honourable senators, that these are the small people who for years since the last war have been trying to carry on small businesses.

I refer the house to an article by Roger Newman—not Peter Newman—in the Globe and Mail of May 3, 1966, the heading of which is: "Difficulties shape up for Auto Parts Suppliers." The author mentions three or four small firms in Beaverton, Ingersoll, and other places, which cannot keep going because of what has happened.

My honourable friend Senator Aird said that for years Canada was dominated by the American motor industry. I say that Canada is more dominated by the American motor industry since this agreement than it ever was before. I will tell you why. The dies that our smaller manufacturers in places such as Ingersoll and Beaverton made are now being imported by Ford and Chrysler—I think they are the principal offenders—from their parent companies in the United States. This has caused our small manufacturers in Canada, and particularly those in Ontario, to import these dies from the United States. The cost, therefore, is more, and on top of that they are saddled with the 11 per cent sales tax.

I would ask the Government why, when it entered into this agreement, it did not repeal the 11 per cent sales tax as it affects this particular industry. In order for our Canadian suppliers to compete with the Americans they have to be able to sell their dies at competitive prices, and this they cannot do when they have to pay the 11 per cent sales tax. In many cases they have to import specialized parts from manufacturers in the United States, and when bringing those parts into Canada they are faced with a tariff of 22½ per cent. When those parts are assembled and made ready for installation on motor cars, the Canadian company has to pay the 11 per cent sales tax. They are caught both ways. When they import the parts from the United States they pay the tariff of 22½ per cent, and when they sell them they pay the sales tax of 11 per cent. How on earth can they keep in business under such conditions?

Much has been said on the hustings and in the debates in the other place to the effect that this agreement has assisted the plants at Windsor and Oakville, where two of the big car manufacturers are located. I admit this, but the agreement has not helped the little man in Canada. It has been said that the agreement has provided for more employment in the automotive parts industry in Canada. But what is really happening is that these small plants can no longer carry on and are going into bankruptcy, and their skilled labourers are being sent to Windsor and Oakville where they are put on the assembly line just to assemble parts coming in from the United States. Soon there will be no skilled workers left in Canada.

It is all very well to talk about Canadian content in respect to this agreement, but the Canadian content in our automobiles right now is represented by the worker who is putting these parts on the car. That is all he is doing. He is not working with machines which require a great deal of skill to operate, and he is not manufacturing these parts. If this goes on we shall lose all our skilled labour in the industry and wind up with unskilled workers doing something that Senator Croll and Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) could do just as well.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): You are down to the bottom of the barrel now.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Speak for yourself.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I was.

Hon. Mr. Willis: Honourable senators, this is a chamber in which a second look is taken at legislation. The great enunciator of that principle is the honourable Senator Roebuck, for whom I have much respect. As this is fiscal legislation which was not referred to Parliament until 15 or 16 months after it was put into force, it should be given a good second look. This is the same principle enunciated by the great leaders of the Liberal party in the past with regard to some fiscal policies that were proposed in those days.

As I have said, it is my modest hope that by these few remarks I have persuaded my honourable friend Senator Aird, the mover of this motion, and in particular the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West), who is a very reasonable man, to take the initiative and move that this piece of legislation be sent to a committee.

I have not much more to say, but I do want to reiterate that all is not gold that glitters. The Government, simultaneously with the negotiation of this agreement, should have wiped out the 11 per cent sales tax and thus given our small producers some measure of protection.

I have in my hand another article from the Globe and Mail. It is dated May 11 of this year and is headed: "Hit by Car Pact—Parts Firms Say". I shall not read this, but it was written, as far as I know, by an unbiased person.

If this measure does not go before a committee, then the people of Canada will have had nothing whatever to say about it. It has become a fait accompli, as my honourable friend, Senator Walker, has said. Would it not have been reasonable to have done what was done in the United States? Although this agreement passed both houses at Washington, its passage took some time. It was investigated there very thoroughly. Parliament and the people of Canada deserve the same advantage.

It is still my view that this is similar to the legislation Mr. Mackenzie King was referring to in speeches he made in 1926 and 1928, and it is certainly what Sir Clifford Sifton was referring to in 1911. I plead with the utmost sincerity that the Government consider sending this to a committee where it can be thoroughly examined, and so that the people of Canada will know it has been thoroughly examined.

I do not know whether any honourable senator present has read the brief presented to the Government by the Automotive Parts Manufacturers' Association, but I would mention that it is very good reading. In it the association gets down on its knees and asks the Government to at least amend the agreement so that the bankruptcies of these small firms may be prevented, and so that Canadian manufacturers of these parts are not put at a disadvantage because of the two taxes to which I have referred. To these pleas I hope the Government will not turn a deaf ear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Grosart, debate adjourned.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS

REQUEST FOR NOTICE OF AGENDA

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to draw a small matter to the attention of the house. I hold in my hand a notice of a meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications which is to be held tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock. The notice gives me no information as to what will be discussed on that occasion.

I think honourable senators will agree—because like myself, they are burdened with many things to do and do not find it possible to attend all committee meetings —that it would be a real service if these notices contained information as to what is to be considered at the meetings. I like to take part in discussions of those matters that are of special interest to me, and I would consider it a worth while service if the Committees Branch, when sending out these notices, would list the subjects to be discussed.

For instance, this particular notice could say that certain bills referred to the committee will be discussed on this occasion. Without that information, we are left entirely in the dark.

That situation undoubtedly applies to the Transport and Communications Committee, of which my distinguished fellow senator and deskmate (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) is chairman. It certainly applies to the Banking and Commerce Committee, and perhaps to other committees that meet less frequently. I call this matter to the attention of the chairmen of the committees and to the officials who produce these notices.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I think the idea suggested by the honourable Senator Roebuck is a very wise one indeed. I believe it was the practice at one time, when notices of committee meetings were sent out, to include some kind of a notation with regard to the bill which was to come before the committee. If I may be permitted, I will take the matter up with the officials and see if that former practice cannot be restored. I am sure that can easily be done.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Thank you.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: If my honourable friend will allow me, I will give him the information now which I agree should have appeared on the notice of bills to be considered in the Transport and Communications Committee tomorrow morning.

The principal bills which were sent to the committee by this house during the past week or two were two C.P.R. branch line bills, one in the Province of Saskatchewan and one in Alberta. The other was the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company bill, which was explained on second reading last week by the honourable Senator Bourget, and which asks for an extension of time for construction of the remainder of the line.

I am sorry that the notice did not include the information sought by my honourable friend and others who received the notice.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Thank you.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 5, 1966

SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of Bill C-189, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1967.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a bill for interim supply for one month. In accordance with the practice in the past, both in connection with interim supply bills and bills providing for supplementary Estimates, I have circulated a table showing what has been done about supply to date.

Perhaps I should preface my remarks with a few words of explanation. I do so rather apologetically, but sometimes it is helpful for new senators to be reminded that as soon as the main Estimates are tabled in this house they are referred to the Finance Committee. In that committee, not only committee members but any member of the Senate who chooses may attend and ask for any information he or she requires in respect of any item in the Estimates.

We have also begun a new practice which I think is going to prove very fruitful and helpful indeed when we come to consider supplementary Estimates. When they are tabled in this house they too will immediately be referred to the Finance Committee.

I believe the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) spoke about how satisfactory the experience was on the occasion upon which we received the last supplementary Estimates for the previous year. We considered them in committee actually before we had the bill before us in this house, and we received most helpful explanations from the officials.

I think this practice will, if I may so describe it, take the sting out of a good deal of the criticism that members of the opposition, and indeed members on the Government side, over the years have been directing at leaders and at the Government for introducing appropriation bills, first of all, at a very late date, and secondly, at a time when they had to be rushed through without adequate consideration.

We are trying to remedy that difficulty collectively here, and there is great co-operation on both sides. If the practice is continued, I think we shall greatly benefit from it.

I know that the same problem occurs with interim supply, because interim supply is simply a vote on account of the general Estimates, or, if there are supplementaries, on account of a certain proportion of the supplementaries to enable the Government to conduct its day-to-day business.

Today we are dealing with supplementary Estimates for one month, namely, the month of June. We have already voted two months' supply. Now we are asked to vote a further third month's supply.

I will come to the bill, if I may, after I have discussed the financial aspects which are contained in section 2, details of which are given in the various schedules.

From the memorandum which has been circulated, it will be seen that the main Estimates provide for a total expenditure of $8,283,224,878. Of these there are statutory expenditures which are provided for year in and year out under acts passed by Parliament providing for certain payments. These are part of the permanent legislation of the country, and cover such items as interest on loans, payments for children, many items under the health legislation, and other statutory enactments of that kind.

The total to be voted in the year will be $4,907,982,911.

In addition, there are payments to be made out of the Old Age Security Fund of $1,035,000,000. Therefore, the total expenditures as provided for thus far without any supplementary Estimates amount to $9,318,224,878.

As I have already stated, we have passed two months' supply under Appropriation Act No. 3. This carried supply to May 31 in the amount of $870,275,281. Appropriation Act No. 5 which is now before us asks approval for payment of a total amount of $450,944,478.01.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Will that carry us to the end of June?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That will carry us to the end of June.

May I now direct the attention of honourable senators to the schedules. These are designed to allocate additional percentages of certain items in the Estimates for certain departments because of special requirements, many of which are seasonal. These are extra amounts in addition to the one month's supply that is generally provided in section 2, subsection (a).

Schedule A asks for an additional eight-twelfths or $11,666,666.67 under Vote L40 in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. This item provides for loans to the Atlantic provinces for the production of power for industrial purposes. This assistance, which is provided by the federal Government, is to be repaid over a period of 30 or 40 years, dependent upon the arrangements made for thermal power projects, electrical transmission projects, terminal station projects and the like.

The sum of $13,400,000, which had to be carried over from the past fiscal year, is now the amount that requires payment; and the additional amount requested in Schedule A will provide sufficient funds to carry out that commitment.

Schedule B refers to certain additional amounts required in the Department of External Affairs for the External Aid Office. It asks for an additional three-twelfths of item 35, in the amount of $21,025,000. This additional proportion is required particularly for wheat shipments which are to be made to India and Pakistan for delivery and shipment during the months of June, July and August. This assistance is provided under the International Food Aid Program.

Honourable senators, I come now to Schedule C. It asks for an additional two-twelfths, or an amount of $4,285,833.34. Under the Department of Finance, item 15 for Government administration, this additional amount is required for salary payments approved too late for inclusion in the departmental votes in the main Estimates, particularly for the increases given for groups A and B in the Public Service. Group A is the professional group; group B is the clerical and stenographic group.

Also in Schedule C, under item 80 of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, an additional proportion is required at this time of the year to cover certain programs connected with channel improvements in the Upper Thames River, the Metro-Toronto Region system of dams, reservoirs and channels; the Greater Winnipeg Floodway; and the North and West Vancouver flood control program. A good deal of this kind of work is seasonal and heavier demands are made in the earlier part of the fiscal year.

Likewise, under Schedule D, which I might describe as a seasonal item, an additional one-twelfth of $5,013,735.42 is asked for. This is required particularly on account of the expenses incurred by the Government in connection with the International Fisheries Commissions. That work goes on in a more intensive way in the summer months and extra money is required to meet the demands as they fall due. For the purpose of the record, I might say that if any senator is interested in the detail of this particular item, it will be found in the main Estimates on page 149.

Item 20 in the Department of Fisheries deals with fisheries research stations in nine locations across the country. Again, there is a seasonal aspect to the work that is undertaken in these fisheries research stations.

In the Department of Forestry, under Vote item 15, the field research program demands are heavier at this time of the year and for that reason a little extra money is required.

Under the heading "legislation", an additional one-twelfth is required for the Senate expenses. As honourable senators know, while a month's supply may be appropriate in many departments, the Senate expenses are not incurred regularly over the 12 months of the year because the Senate is not sitting in certain months and the expenses are higher in months when it is sitting.

Similarly, additional money is required in connection with the preparations which are now being undertaken, and expenses which are being incurred now, for the Twelfth General Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, about which we spoke last evening.

The Department of National Health and Welfare is going to require an additional amount for progress payments on the Charles Camsell Hospital in Edmonton.

Under the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the cost of maintaining and operating parks, historic sites, the wild life service, and the National Battlefields Commission, is higher in the spring and early summer.

Honourable senators, perhaps I should not take you through as much detail in the schedules as I do, but I do so on interim supply bills to give you an idea of the nature of the items for which approval is being sought.

I come now to the bill itself. I have in effect dealt with the schedules, and with section 2, which provides for the total amount and the additional amount for each of the schedules.

Section 3 of the bill, which is in the usual form, provides that the amount authorized can only be paid for the purposes and subject to the terms and conditions specified in the item.

Section 4 provides that where an authority to enter into a commitment is given, that authority must be respected meticulously.

Section 5 provides, as is customary, that the amount paid or applied under the authority of the act shall be accounted for in the public accounts, in accordance with the Financial Administration Act.

I need perhaps not give the assurance, because it is always understood, that any item at any time on any future appropriation bill is open to inquiry by any honourable senator. I give the further assurance that no item in the general Estimates is closed out by the amounts required under this bill.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, we have had a very clear explanation from the Leader of the Government with reference to interim supply. This is the usual type of bill which we have had three or four times a year and have had for many years.

I agree with the remarks Senator Pouliot made yesterday about having these bills before us for longer periods of time than has been the case in the past. It gives honourable senators a better opportunity of studying and discussing them.

We have had from the honourable Leader the usual assurances and the usual explanations; and I expect there are members here who feel the usual frustrations regarding a supply debate.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) has explained the amounts. The main Estimates, including payments from the Old Age Security Fund, as he pointed out, amount to $9,318,224,878. To this must be added, up to June 1, Appropriation Act No. 3, and this bill, which will be Appropriation Act No. 5. If I remember correctly, Appropriation Act No. 4 related to the Estimates of the previous year.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The final supplementaries of last year.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Yes.

I would like to point out, honourable senators, that it is not $9,380 million-odd that the Estimates amount to as of June 1, but $10,450 million-odd. Before the end of the year we probably will have some more supplementary estimates which indeed might bring it up to $12 billion, or somewhere in that vicinity, which is an enormous sum of money. I am sure we all agree with our very good friend Senator Crerar, when he says it is certainly time that we gave this matter of Estimates much more practical consideration.

The honourable leader has told us that we have been more or less satisfied with the review that we are getting of the Estimates at the present time. We have a good Finance Committee, and if the committee is given the opportunity and is asked for information, I am satisfied that they will get the information for us and that we will be given a good understanding of the general estimates.

I am not going to go into the act in detail as the honourable leader has done. Section 2, as he has pointed out, calls for one-twelfth of the total Estimates, in the amount of $408,953,242.58. He also mentioned different schedules.

Schedule A, as he pointed out, calls for $11,666,666.67, which is eight-twelfths, and this refers to a loan made under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act. This is not a handout; this is something which those who are in charge of the Atlantic Provinces Power Development are borrowing from the Government and which is to be repaid. I also point out that this act was passed in 1958 and it has been of tremendous assistance to the Atlantic provinces. However, I would like to ask in this connection how much money has already been borrowed by the Atlantic Provinces Development Corporation and what is the rate of interest payable? I understand that originally it was 4¾ per cent, but what it is at the present time I do not know.

There is another point on which I would like some information. When we say that under Schedule A it is eight-twelfths of the amount of the item—the general item is one-twelfth, as we know, and that covers all items in the Estimates—do we add that one-twelfth to the eight-twelfths, and is it a total of nine-twelfths that is being sought at the present time? This is a point we do not very often realize.

Then we come to Schedule B having to do with External affairs. May I revert for a moment to the point I was just making? I do not think the honourable leader explained why it was that the Atlantic Power Development Corporation required eight-twelfths. That is nine-twelfths or three-quarters of the total amount. Why are they borrowing all that money at the present time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps the honourable gentleman will allow me to say that the amount sought under Schedule A is $11,666,666.67. The amount required to pay claims will be some $30,400,000. That is for work already done. This further amount is required to be loaned under the program. This will in effect mean that so far as this item is concerned we voted two-twelfths on the last supplementary estimate, plus one-twelfth, and now plus eight-twelfths. If it is approved we shall have allocated eleven-twelfths of the amount under this item in the main Estimates.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: And I understand that is because some bills that have not yet been paid are now falling due.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, they are falling due.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: We can understand the other items which refer to the sums mentioned in L40.

Schedule B, I understand, involves assistance to developing countries in technical education, and I assume this money is required because of work done during the summer months by students who are working on special technical education in undeveloped countries. Would that be the main reason?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps I was not clear on that. The main reason for the requirement of some $21 million here is to facilitate the shipments of wheat to India and Pakistan for delivery during the months of June, July and August. That is the specific requirement anticipated during this period.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Well, it is rather misleading. It says "Economic, technical, educational and other assistance as detailed in the Estimates—"

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is the general item, and included in that is this specific requirement.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Another item which rather interested me was the one under the heading "Fisheries." I refer to the latter part of item 20 which says "... the amount of the share of the International Great Lakes Fishery Commission of the cost of work on lamprey control and lamprey research." I would like to know from the Leader of the Government what success they have had in this field. I understand it has been considerable. We also know, however, the pollution of the Great Lakes has resulted in a greater problem to fisheries than the lamprey eels ever were. We will have to vote more money for that, I would think. It would be money well spent.

A further item has to do with Northern Affairs and National Resources and, being a Maritimer, I was very interested to learn that there will be a new park for our sister province of Nova Scotia. The only comment I have to make on that is to express my pleasure that a new park is being established, and also my hope that the park will not be called by the same name as the area in which it is to be established. It is a name which I cannot pronounce and I would ask the department for Heaven's sake not to give the park the name that is printed here, which is Kejimkujik lake.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): I may tell my honourable friend that if he tries to change that name now, a name which that district has had for perhaps a thousand years and which is known to the people of that area, he will have quite an argument on his hands.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Could you tell us how it is pronounced?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): It is pronounced as it is written, "Kej-im-kuj-ik", and locally it is abbreviated to "Keji" for the benefit of those people who cannot pronounce "kujik".

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Perhaps you have to belong to the Micmac tribe to be able to pronounce it.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps the honourable Leader of the Opposition might suggest that they should have gone to the Gaelic for that.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: They could have done that in Cape Breton, but not in that part of the province. I am sure my friend Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton) would not approve of that. I have nothing further to say except to remark that these estimates, together with the general Estimates, show a tremendous increase in the cost of government in this country. It also shows how increasingly difficult it is to govern. I was greatly pleased with the remarks of my good friend Senator Crerar the other day; he pointed out first that governments must be very discriminatory in their payments and in their selection of priorities. He mentioned that we must try to place first things first. I think that is an excellent idea. I know every minister in the Government thinks that his department and the items under his jurisdiction are the most important, and I am afraid many of them get away with that idea.

Senator Crerar spoke about the $3 billion projected for social services. He also spoke of $100 million for the C.B.C. and other heavy expenses. These are undertakings that are possibly necessary, but we must not try to do everything at once.

I was pleased to hear the honourable Senator Aird mention the fact that we were catching up with the United States as far as our deficit in trade was concerned. But then our good friend Senator Walker, who has a great faculty for setting things straight, pointed out that we were not catching up with the United States as far as trade deficits were concerned, but that our deficits had increased from 1964 to 1965 in that one industry alone by some $500 million, or some very large amount.

It occurs to me that Canada must try to trade more with countries such as Great Britain. We have a surplus there of $500 million and a deficit with the United States of over $1 billion, and I personally cannot see why Great Britain, for instance, and other trading countries should have to pick up the tab every year in trying to pay off this great deficit we have with the United States.

Not long ago a delegation came here from the West Indies asking us to develop more trade with them. We should do so. It is one of the Commonwealth countries and, for instance, instead of Canadian tourists going to Florida or California every year, they would be far better advised to go down to the West Indies. There are also possibilities for greater trade there. These are ways in which we can lessen the great gap that exists between our trade and financial position with the United States.

Honourable senators, as I have said, these interim supply bills come up periodically and it is necessary for us to pass them. We now have a better opportunity than I believe we have had for some time to review and consider the Estimates in the Finance Committee. There is nothing further I wish to say at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I wish to ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning Schedule A, the amount paid under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act. To what body in the Atlantic provinces is that paid? Is it paid in connection with the hook-up between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I suppose it would depend on the project being developed at a given time, and in what province it was. I will inquire whether there is any specific allocation for that amount, and if possible I will have that information tomorrow. In any event, I will transmit it to the honourable senator.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I understood the honourable leader to say a few moments ago that it was to pay outstanding bills.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I know that is the case, but I am not sure in what provinces the developments in question are located, which is what Senator Burchill asked.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I would like to ask the Leader of the Government a question on fisheries. Can he inform the house as to what progress is being made towards the implementation of the 12-mile limit? I ask this question because I have had complaints from various fishermen, particularly on the southwest coast of Newfoundland, relative to the loss of nets and other fishing gear because draggers come in, not only at night but during the daytime, and drag the grounds and destroy their nets and other fishing gear. When this comes up again for discussion could the leader tell us what progress has been made towards implementation of the 12-mile limit?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I will try to obtain the information for the honourable senator.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the notice of motion for adjournment:

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and also as an act of faith, I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, June 7 at 8 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask the honourable leader if he could give us an outline of the business we may anticipate dealing with next week? Perhaps this act of faith would help.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I have been considering this myself, honourable senators, and I am pleased to give what information I have at this time.

The debate on Senator Gershaw's inquiry calling the attention of the Senate to the need for conserving Canada's water resources will not be resumed today. This is an important debate in which there is much interest. It will be continued next week.

The Canada-United States Automotive Products Agreement is before us, and that debate will continue next week. I would say at this time, because of the remarks made yesterday, particularly those of Senator Willis, it is the firm intention to send this bill to a committee at the appropriate time.

The Senate has before it the Canada Labour (Safety) Code and the Rural Economic Development Fund Bill, both of which are important measures of widespread interest in the house.

The debate on the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne has not yet been concluded. I understand there is one more speech to be made on it. Unfortunately, it is near the end of the Order Paper, and I may ask leave to have it placed at or near the top on a day next week.

We can expect that the bill providing for Government reorganization will receive third reading in the other place and come to us next week. It is my hope that our debate on it will commence then.

Honourable senators, a large amount of work is being done in committees. The Interpretation Act is before the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, a subcommittee of which is working on the measure. It is very technical and it will be some time yet before the committee can make its report. When it does report, I am sure the committee's work will prove to be very useful. The Standing Committee on Finance will be sitting next week. Senator Thorvaldson is not in his place at this moment, but I understand it is his intention that the Standing Committee on External Relations will have at least one sitting next week.

In addition to the standing committees there are two joint committees which may sit, one on Divorce which was organized today, and one on Penitentiaries.

I am not quite sure of this point and I should have informed myself before coming into the chamber, but I understand that the joint committee on collective bargaining in the Public Service, to which two allied bills are still to be referred, may soon be commencing its work.

Generally speaking, the program for next week looks to be fairly comprehensive.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: The joint committee on collective bargaining, I take it, will be sitting for some time, and we shall not be debating the bill next week.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): We shall not be debating it until it comes out of the joint committee.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: What two bills did the honourable Leader of the Government have in mind would be referred to that committee?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The bill on collective bargaining in the public service is allied to two other bills, one dealing with Employment in the Public Service and the other to amend the Financial Administration Act. The suggestion has been made that these bills, which are interrelated in many respects, be considered by the same committee.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL SERVICES

FEES PAID BY GOVERNMENT TO MEMBERS OF QUEBEC BAR—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Notice of Inquiry of Hon. Mr. Pouliot:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the payment of fees by the Government of Canada to the lawyers of the Bar of the Province of Quebec for the last five years.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, it has been my intention to discuss this matter during the last two sittings of the Senate, but because there are provincial as well as federal implications in the matter, and the Quebec provincial elections are taking place next Sunday, I will let the matter stand adjourned until the next sitting. In doing so I am also showing my spirit of co-operation with my colleagues whose agenda is so heavy, which is a fact that I can say is to the honour of the Senate of Canada.

Unfortunately, the body that represents the Bar in each province of Canada, and even the Canadian Bar Association, are no longer independent bodies. The only body that could be independent is the Senate of Canada. I will prove that in due course on Tuesday next, if I may have the consent of the house to allow the order to stand.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

NEWFOUNDLAND ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE BILL, 1966

THIRD READING

Hon. A. B. Baird moved the third reading of Bill C-185, to give effect to Term 29 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have something to say on this bill, because I had the privilege—although of course it was my right to attend the committee to which this bill was referred—of hearing the explanation given by the Honourable Mr. Pickersgill, the Minister of Transport, who represents a Newfoundland constituency in Parliament and is the representative for Newfoundland in the Government.

As the law stands today, before this bill passes third reading and receives the Royal Assent at the end of the afternoon, I must say that we can admire the sagacity and wisdom of the then Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, who had a hand in the drafting of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland as suggested by the commission which made its report. There was a confusion between the McNair Commission, which made recommendations with regard to the Union of Newfoundland with Canada, and the proposed commission which was to study the requirements of the Government of Newfoundland.

On the one hand there was the McNair Commission which fulfilled its purpose and, on the other hand, a commission that was suggested by the Terms of Union to decide about the requirements of the Government of Newfoundland.

In Hansard it was stated that I mentioned the department of Newfoundland, but I did not say that—I said the Government of Newfoundland.

With respect to the $8 million that was to be paid the following year, another commission was to be appointed upon the requirement—I insist upon the word "requirement" —of the Government of Newfoundland. It was not upon the requirement of any individual, however honourable he might be, from that province, but of the government speaking on behalf of the Province of Newfoundland. It was a requirement of the Government of Newfoundland for the establishment of a commission that was to study the whole matter in order to decide whether it was possible to give the same level of living standards in Newfoundland as in the other Maritime provinces. That study has never been made. That commission has never been appointed. The Terms of Union have not been repealed, and could only be repealed by agreement of Newfoundland with Canada, and perhaps with the authorization of the British Parliament in Westminster.

It is a question which I have not studied deeply enough. However, this is a bad piece of legislation. I am not opposed to any bill that is necessary for the Province of Newfoundland. As I said to the minister when he was before the committee, Newfoundland now is a member of the great Canadian family.

In this bill, however badly it is drafted, there is a silver lining to the cloud. It is that the Province of Newfoundland is not called a state. There is no province in the whole country which has the right to call itself officially a state. Who has ever heard about "the State of Newfoundland," "the State of Nova Scotia," "the State of New Brunswick," or the "State of Ontario," as we hear every day about "the State of Quebec?" Why is it that they use a false name to describe the province where I was born and of which I am so proud? This is a good note for Newfoundland.

On the other hand, there is no excuse for this legislation—it is a bad piece of legislation.

There has been too much confusion in the answers given before the committee. I wanted to know the stand of Honourable Mr. Smallwood, the Premier of Newfoundland, about this matter, because I did not want him to come by the back door and say he was not satisfied with what had been done by the Parliament of Canada. One has to be very careful to defend the rights of the Parliament of Canada. Who is sure that the Honourable Mr. Smallwood is satisfied, because there is no written record to that effect? There is hearsay about it, but there is no clear evidence. There is no demand from him; no letter has been tabled. It is very unfortunate. My stand was to defend the Parliament of Canada and the Government of Canada against any future complaint which could be made by the Premier of Newfoundland.

Honourable senators, I will not oppose this bill, but I have lodged a solemn protest against the kind of legislation that comes before us. There is urgent need to reform the Department of Justice from the attic to the cellar. To do so requires determination, courage and fortitude. It has to be done in all wisdom. It is urgent.

Legislation comes before us containing phrases three pages long, without any breathing spell, and no one understands anything, so much so that I told the Minister of Justice before the Banking and Commerce Committee that the bill which was before the committee at that time—I think it was the Bankruptcy Act—was just as clear as mud.

It is a serious matter, and I take the liberty to draw your attention to it. I hope that sooner or later my protest will meet with success.

Honourable senators, I must pay a special tribute to the Leader of the Government for the trouble he takes to get the information one asks for. I know that it must be unpleasant for him sometimes to insist on getting certain information. If I ask for it, it is not at all because I wish to be unpleasant, but because I consider it my duty to be well informed about what is going on, especially in matters of legislation.

That being said, I will not object to the bill any more. I will leave it at that. I take the Honourable Mr. Pickersgill's word that Honourable Mr. Smallwood is happy. So much the better!

Honourable senators, I have one word to say in conclusion. I wish to congratulate my honourable friends from Newfoundland, Senator Baird, Senator Cook and Senator Hollett, for the excellent effort that they have made to have this legislation accepted. They have done very well. Their speeches were just as good as they could be. Even so, they have not the authority that the Honourable Mr. Smallwood has to speak on behalf of the Province of Newfoundland.

Honourable senators, we have a great compensation. I had my fears about the entry of Newfoundland into Confederation, I had my concern about the union. But I have realized that the membership from Newfoundland, both in the House of Commons and in the Senate, is such an asset for Canada that any amount could be given to Newfoundland and it would be much less than the value of the members we have here in this chamber and in the other chamber.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, we on this side have not opposed this bill and do not intend to do so. However, having heard the remarks of my good friend Senator Pouliot, I wish to say a few words which have been prompted by those remarks.

It is really a reflection on the Province of Newfoundland to say that they will never reach the financial standard of the Maritime provinces. Because of its tremendous natural resources, Newfoundland may some day become one of the richest provinces in Canada. If Newfoundland does become a rich province—and I have every hope and every reason to believe that it will—it may have to come to the federal Government and say, "We do not want this perpetual gift; we are not paupers; we want to put an end to it." Newfoundland may find itself in that position.

I do not know if Newfoundland will ever come to the federal Government and make such a request. I do not think any federal Government will ever wish to put an end to this type of legislation. This is a gift which was not asked for. We have no proof that it was requested, yet it is a perpetual gift of $8 million. I agree with my friend Senator Pouliot that it is bad legislation.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 5, 1966

THIRD READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the third reading of Bill C-189, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March 1967.

He said: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, may I refer to the questions asked yesterday by three honourable senators—Senator Brooks, Senator Hollett and Senator Burchill. Upon inquiry, I find that the material for which they asked is rather larger in scope than I thought it was when the questions were asked.

The items in the Estimates upon which these questions were based are, of course, still open. I will provide the material at the earliest possible opportunity and will table it. If at that time any of the honourable senators require it to be printed in Hansard, they need only indicate this to me and I will see that this is done.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: May I ask the Leader of the Government at this stage what is the status of the reference of this bill to the Finance Committee?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps the honourable senator was not here at the beginning of the discussion yesterday when I explained that the practice with reference to the Estimates in general, first of all, is to refer them to the Finance Committee for study, and all the items are open. We have also adopted the practice now, and I think it is a very good one, of referring the supplementary estimates immediately upon receiving them to the Finance Committee for consideration. This saves much time on the debate in the chamber because information is made available in a much more satisfactory manner than it could be by long speeches here.

So far as interim supply is concerned, I do not think it is the feeling in the Senate that these bills should be referred to committee. After all, interim supply is simply payment on account. The items are always open, and the Finance Committee can deal with any of the items called into question when interim supply is before the chamber, should the explanations given by the leader seem inadequate.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I was here at the opening. Would the honourable leader not agree it would be wise to follow our usual practice when bills are referred to committee and wait for the report of the committee before third reading?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): We always do.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Was it done in this case?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): This bill was not referred to committee. In my experience here we have never referred supply bills to committee, and I doubt if we ever would choose to do so.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: The total supply of which this is a part is referred to committee. This refers only to payment, in that we vote eight-twelfths or three-twelfths instead of one-twelfth per month.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I hope I do not interfere with any question that is to be put by any one of my colleagues, but I have some remarks to make on this matter.

Either yesterday or the day before I paid a tribute to the Leader of the Government. I expressed my appreciation of the unusual fact that in this instance this is the third day on which we could discuss supply. I gave him full credit for that. It is a victory, not of the Conservative tradition represented by my friend Senator Grattan O'Leary, nor of the Liberal tradition which I would be proud to represent, but it is a victory of the parliamentary tradition represented by the leader of this house, by Senator Grattan O'Leary and by my humble self.

Now we have the opportunity to discuss matters included in the Estimates of which we are called upon to vote a large portion today. There are so many things to be paid for out of the moneys we are about to vote by the bill which is to receive Royal Assent by the end of the afternoon, that I could speak for many hours to tell my grievances. Your Honour and honourable colleagues, this is the time when we can lodge complaints before the throne. We can say what we do not agree with. I am ready to give the benefit of the doubt to the Government, but on the other hand at my age and after the number of years that I have spent under this roof, it seems to me that I have the right to speak out and say what I do not agree with.

In the first place, so many people speak of liberty, freedom and human rights and yet they do not know what it is. Their mouth is full of it but in their mind they have no knowledge of it.

Not long ago, before one of the committees of this house, I had the opportunity to question a high official of the Department of Justice on the Interpretation bill. This, in my view, is one of the craziest pieces of legislation ever brought before Parliament—not just at this time, but when it was introduced, a number of years ago. It is now part of the statutes and should be the first chapter in the Revised Statutes of Canada. It should not be lost in the meander of the statute books. Its place is there, after the revision of the statutes has been completed.

Who will do that work? Who will carry out the revision of the statute books? It will be done by the bureaucracy of the Department of Justice. Will they be able to do that work well? No, sir! Will the confusion and contention in the law of the land cause these people to do the kind of work that could be compared to the patient and skillful work done in the monasteries during the middle Ages? Did you ever look at the size of the statutes? They pile up four feet high and fill thousands of pages. Who among them, the Deputy Minister of Justice and his assistants, will be able to spend enough time to put everything in order in the statute books? It is impossible.

To come back to the point I was making earlier, I asked one of the assistant deputy ministers of justice what is the definition of "freedom", of "liberty" and of "human rights". I do not see it in the Interpretation Act; I do not see it in the human rights bill. "Oh, sir," he said, "it is too difficult; it exists nowhere." I asked, "when we do not find a definition in the statutes, where shall we go for it? Shall we go to the dictionary?" He said "Yes, sir."

If we have to go to the dictionary, then what is the use of the Interpretation Act? I say this to you, honourable senators, because there is so much confusion in the minds and in the words of those who speak about liberty and freedom and human rights. You know very well that there are obligations that are correlative to every right. But these are forgotten; they are ignored. Nobody speaks of the obligations and responsibilities of those who enjoy freedom. To what extent does an individual have freedom?

To what extent does one individual have freedom? Does his freedom stop when the freedom of the other fellow starts? That means if you enjoy relative freedom you cannot encroach upon the freedom of your neighbour. If that were told and taught as it should be, we would have much less trouble in this country. But when you read the press, when you listen to speeches, you hear only of human rights. It is most ridiculous.

One after the other the provinces are adopting bills of human rights that are meaningless, a trompe-l'oeil, a deceit. One day I received a pamphlet with a blue cover coming from the dean of a faculty of one of our universities and speaking about human rights, but not mentioning a word about responsibilities. I wrote to him and asked him, "Sir, what do you do with regard to responsibilities? Why don't you mention the responsibilities that go with all liberties?" I never received an answer, and he is supposed to be a learned man. If you go to Webster's dictionary you will find the definitions of "liberty." I do not have them at hand now, but I have read them. They mention the obligations that we have when we enjoy liberty, and at the same time they say that liberty shall not be excessive because then it becomes a licence.

In the years gone by I have dealt with a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of the Jehovah's Witnesses, when the late chief justice showed his total ignorance of Canada and rendered a judgment which made no sense and opened the door to all excesses. There should be a reform of the Bench, but I will have other opportunities to speak about that.

Honourable colleagues, if you are interested, I will send to some of you a copy of a speech that was made six years ago about liberty and responsibility and a copy of the committee report which contains the remarks to which I have just referred.

There are other things that I could speak of. You are very good to me, and I appreciate it. There is an element of friendship in this chamber that exists nowhere else, and I miss no opportunity to proclaim the fact that the Senate is a body which could be compared to no other in this country. You are wonderful listeners, and I hope that some day you will add action to the kindness that you show in listening to what is being said to you. I cannot complain, because on some occasions you have supported me two-to-one when I was defending a point of view which I was sure was right and well founded in law. Most of you have been personally good to me in different ways, and I cannot reciprocate what you have done for me, but I want the Senate to serve; I want the Senate to be useful; I want the Senate to be independent.

Now I cannot do otherwise than say a few words that I was going to reserve for Tuesday next. I shall try to make it just as snappy as possible.

A few days ago we paid tribute to a wise man in the Senate, Senator Crerar, and he deserved it. Now the Senate will be the poorer on account of the resignation that took place yesterday. However, one thing you know and will never forget is that if Senator Crerar has been praised, and worthily so, it was because of his independence, his independence of thought, his wisdom and his courage. He was not alone in being of that character. Other senators who have gone were like him.

It was so typical of Senator Crerar that as soon as he recovered sufficiently to return to the Senate he mentioned in his first speech the admiration he had for the late Senator Norman Lambert. And why? It was because Senator Lambert too was an independent man. And we think of Senator Bouffard—an eminent lawyer, jurist, professor, and businessman of my province—he was praised for his courage and independence. If those men are remembered today it is because of their courage and independence which made them Canadian citizens of the first rank. They were all party men.

There are some men—most of my colleagues, I would say—who have the same qualities, the same civic qualities which commend them to the admiration of the Canadian people; but sometimes they seem to look indifferently upon what is going on, and sometimes they say something about a certain matter and lodge a protest or give a warning. I have a warning to give now, and it is on a matter you may not consider too important. It concerns the purchase of an Old Master at a cost of $6 million. It makes no sense.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The Secretary of State should remember the fate of Dr. Jarvis, the former curator of the National Gallery, who approved purchases at much less cost than that.

At the present time what is most remarkable in culture is agriculture. I have said so before in the Senate, and not too much was done for agriculture. But with regard to culture, take it with a grain of salt and be careful of it.

Now there is a new incumbent as curator of the National Gallery. She has been praised. I am not in a position to say whether she is qualified or not, but if she starts by recommending the purchase of an old or young master at the rate of $6 million or $3 million or $1 million, we will have to be careful. She may know the address of Dr. Jarvis in due course.

Honourable senators, I thank you. My heart is full of gratitude to you. I believe that if we work in unison in the Senate of Canada, leaving aside party affiliations, we can accomplish marvels.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

MENNONITE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (CANADA) —SECOND READING

Hon. J. Campbell Haig, for Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson, moved the second reading of Bill S-37, to incorporate Mennonite Central Committee (Canada).

He said: Honourable senators, I regret that Senator Thorvaldson is not present this afternoon. He received a personal call, as a result of which he had to leave for Winnipeg this morning.

This bill was presented to the Senate and read the first time on May 31. Clause 1 names the incorporators, and clause 3 indicates that the head office of the corporation will be in

By clause 5 and the following clauses the corporation is given the ordinary powers of a corporation, in that it can borrow and invest funds under supervision.

Clause 17 gives the corporation jurisdiction throughout Canada, and clause 19 indicates it is a non-profit organization.

Honourable senators, if this bill receives second reading I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, before whom a person acquainted with the corporation will appear to answer any questions the committee has.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 31, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Croll for the second reading of Bill S-35, respecting the prevention of employment injury in federal works, undertakings and business.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I adjourned this debate on Tuesday last. I now understand that Senator Roebuck wishes to add to the explanation of the bill, and I agree to his speaking in my place.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I point out, honourable senators, that Senator Roebuck is not speaking for me.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Be careful in what you say. I may say something with which you will agree.

I thank my honourable friend for giving me the floor and thus enabling me to make some remarks that I think ought to be made in respect of this bill.

Honourable senators, I am in a quandary in some respects with regard to this bill. In the first place, I wish to compliment the Government upon the production of so comprehensive a safety measure.

If honourable senators will look at clause 8 they will observe that the minister is empowered to establish consultative and advisory committees composed of representatives of employers and employees, first, to advise the minister, and second, to assist in establishing reasonable standards of safety. I think I can say definitely that no industrial institution or factory in this country that fails to appoint a committee of employers and employees to study safety and the prevention of accidents is up to date. I know from personal experience that safety committees of this kind, armed with some local authority, have accomplished wonders in seeking out possible hazards and eliminating dangers, thus bringing about security for employees in the operation of machines and the general working of the plant or institution. Safety measures brought about by committees of this kind have always, I think, dealt with sanitary hazards which may affect the health of the people who are victims of the situation.

This bill provides that the minister may undertake research, and institute programs to reduce or prevent employment injury.

Honourable senators, this bill has teeth. A reading of page 10 will indicate that penalties are provided for. An employer who violates the regulations or orders issued under the authority of this bill is liable to a fine not exceeding $5,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or to both. This is not a boy scout bill, as it was referred to on a previous occasion. There is nothing implied against boy scouts or boy scout bills, of course, but if that remark was made with the intention of conveying the idea that this was a pretend bill or a weak bill, or anything of that sort, then I would point out that that is certainly not true.

Clause 14 provides for the appointment of safety officers who will be given very wide powers to enforce compliance with the safety regulations.

Clause 17 provides, it will be noted, that where a safety officer considers anything of a dangerous nature, then he has to notify the employer and take such measures as may be necessary for guarding the source of danger. He may close down the works and keep them closed—

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: He could close the banks—there might be a hold-up.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: —until those responsible comply with the regulations.

Who among us cannot recall some distressing fatality that would not have occurred had someone foreseen the danger and taken action to remove it?

Of course, there are appeals from arbitrary orders of that kind, appeals for the safety of the individual affected. I submit that all that is highly commendable. It is something that has been asked for over many years by people working in factories and elsewhere, and I congratulate the Government for its forethought and energy in producing a bill of this kind.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: What type of factories does he refer to which are under federal jurisdiction?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: You are asking me rather a big question as to what institutions—

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: No, I am asking about factories, manufacturing establishments, where machinery is used.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I did not say that there were any factories under government jurisdiction, although I think there are a great many. During the war, for example, all the factories producing supplies for the army were under dominion jurisdiction, and I fancy there were a good many more.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): And all the crown corporations.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, all the crown corporations; they have factories. However, I was not referring to factories under federal jurisdiction when I made that broad comment. I said that I knew from personal experience the benefits produced by committees of employers and employees in various factories in bringing about safety of operations. Undoubtedly this bill will tend in that direction. I have no criticism of the bill on that account.

If senators turn to section 7, they will find that the Governor in Council may make regulations for the safety and health of persons employed in any federal work. That is good.

I call special attention to section 7(d) of the bill. Under that paragraph the minister may make regulations:

> (d) respecting the provision and maintenance of potable water supplies and of sanitary and other facilities for the well-being of employees.

My purpose in mentioning this is that the labour unions and the railroads, to my personal knowledge, have been crying out these improvements for many years. I have taken part in negotiations between railway management and employees with a view to securing something of that nature.

The labour unions have been protesting the lack of sanitation at terminals and divisional points, especially at bunkhouses provided for the use of employees, usually at stopover locations. I have seen reports indicating that the sanitary conditions to be found in too many of these bunkhouses and such places are in a positively disgraceful condition. I fancy some of my colleagues know something about that and about the protest of the workers over the years. I also know, and I say this in defence of the companies and their management, that some effort has been made from time to time to correct that state of affairs, but I am also informed that much remains to be desired.

The problem is not so serious in the bunkhouses in the centres where sewage and water supplies are available, but at many of the turn-around points in the remote areas where these facilities are not available the bunkhouses will be found to be in a deplorable condition. Peremptory orders are required immediately to clean them up. It is something that is long overdue.

May I give an illustration which honourable senators may check if they wish to do so. I am creditably informed that on diesel locomotives of the C.P.R. men are required to drink out of a tin water pail, and the top of the pail is the common drinking cup. You will find that on the C.P.R. across Canada.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Could not the local board do something about that matter?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Or the Minister of Transport?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Thank you. I will come to that. That is my thesis at the moment.

I have said that the unions have been protesting bad sanitary conditions for many years. In 1948 the Canadian Railway Labour Executives' Association, representing the employees of both railways, and throughout Canada, waited upon the Honourable Paul Martin, at that time Minister of National Health and Welfare, for the purpose of complaining against sanitary conditions such as I am indicating.

On April 30, 1949 Mr. Martin wrote to an old friend of mine, the late J. B. Ward, then Assistant Grand Chief Engineer of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, that his department had authority—perhaps I can say has authority now—with regard to health and sanitation on railroads under dominion jurisdiction.

I have Mr. Martin's letter before me, written on April 30, 1949, which says in part:

> We have since been advised that this Department has authority with regard to health and sanitation in buildings on the property of international or interprovincial railway companies.

There was no doubt they had authority, but just how did they exercise it? The department, after the writing of that letter, proceeded to draft what they called "minimum standards," and they produced a document entitled "Sanitary Requirements for Bunkrooms." That was sweet music to the ears of the men who were using those facilities. The actual practice, however, was far below the wording of the document, which merely contained suggestions and had no regulatory authority.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is the way they were drawn.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I understood the honourable senator to say that the Minister of National Health and Welfare had authority to draft regulations. Under this measure he would have more authority than he had before.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is what I am complaining about at the moment and wish to bring to the attention of this house, so that we may deal with this bill and its virtues in a sensible way. I have the document before me.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: If I follow your argument, I assume you are suggesting that Mr. MacEachen or Mr. Nicholson will do a better job than Mr. Martin.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: If you will just wait for a few minutes until I have some chance to state my case, you might then ask that question. I do not think it applies at the moment.

The present bill comes from the Department of Labour under Mr. Nicholson, and I shall have something to say about both the bill and Mr. Nicholson in a few minutes.

To return to what I was saying about the Department of National Health and Welfare, the document before me is entitled, "Recommended Requirements for common Carriers Construction Camps and Eating Establishments under Federal Jurisdiction." It had no teeth in it.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: That was Mr. Martin's fault.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And the recommendations have not been fully observed.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: What is the date of that document, may I ask?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: This was produced in January 1966.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: They had not very much time.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is the consolidation that I have before me. The department's action was in 1954 under the Department of National Health and Welfare Act. The heading is: Potable water regulations for Common Carriers, 18 August, 1954. They are recommended standards only, as applied to locomotives, cabooses and bunkhouses. I can tell you from my knowledge that it was only a recommendation and it had no really serious effect.

As I was saying, in 1955-56, when diesel engines replaced the old and picturesque steamers, some of the new diesels had sanitary facilities but they were designed in such a way that they will not work in cold weather. So, right now the sanitary arrangements on these diesels are closed down in the winter. That is one reason why, as I tell you, they have the drinking water in a tin pail with a common cup, the top of the can.

When the railway unions could get no effective action from the Department of Health, and no authoritative enforcement, the unions went to the Board of Railway Commissioners. They asked for regulations under section 290L of the Railway Act. You will find that in chapter 234 of the Revised Statutes of Canada 1952.

This section gives what I would think are fairly broad powers to the Board of Railway Commissioners. Section 290L provides that regulations may be made:

> (1) generally providing for the . . .protection, safety, accommodation and comfort of the public, and of the employees of the company, in the running and operating of trains . . .

One would think that that was pretty broad. Application was made to the Board of Railway Commissioners. The men were disappointed. The board held that the safety and comfort of the employees did not include sanitation. It is extraordinary, but it is a fact.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Did they go further than that?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I can give you the reference. I do not blame you if you hardly believe it. You will find the decision in Canadian Railway Cases, volume 2, page 336 to 337. I have a summary here of the decision, as follows:

The resolution must be disposed of by the simple statement that, the men not being "on duty" during these intervals, the act confers no jurdisdiction whatever upon the Board to deal with the situation.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Surely that does not deal with facilities on a diesel engine?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The decision does.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: The man surely is on duty when he is on a diesel engine.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: He is not on duty when he is in a bunkhouse.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Oh, a bunkhouse.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The board has refused to issue regulations with regard to sanitation of any kind, which they hold is not safety—

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: That is not what the head note said. The honourable senator said the head note referred to the obligations of the railway towards an employee when he was on duty.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: They referred, when this summary was made, to bunkhouses.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: But you were talking about bunkhouses and I am talking about diesel engines.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I was and I am still talking about bunkhouses, if you will let me finish my remarks.

In the Railway Act, which has no fewer than 468 sections, I find nothing other than what I have just read, section 290(1) under which the men have applied, but without success.

Beginning in 1957, and every year since, irrespective of what government was in office, the railway unions in their annual brief to the cabinet committee have asked the Government for action.

In 1963 the unions were told that the Government was preparing a national safety code. That was very satisfactory to the men.

In 1966 the promised code appears in Bill S-35, which is before us at this moment and which was sponsored by Senator Croll a few days ago. It gives the minister very wide powers to enforce sanitation, just such powers as the men have been asking for in the last 20 years.

Again the men are disappointed. If honourable senators will turn to clause 3(3) of the bill they will find it reads:

> Notwithstanding subsections (1) and (2) and except as the Governor in Council may by order otherwise provide, nothing in this Act applies to or in respect of employment upon or in connection with the operation of ships, trains or aircraft.

One would hardly expect to find a section like that in this bill. Thousands of men on the railways are to gain no benefit from this bill. They are thrown back on section 290(1), which has been ruled by the Board of Railway Commissioners not to apply and under which, although it has been in effect for a long time, are such things that I mentioned as water in the pails, and bunkhouses that are a disgrace.

The bill gives wide powers of enforcement, it is true, but not in favour of this very large number of men.

What does all that mean? Does this bill imply, that the "men who go down to the sea in ships"—because such men are excluded also—and those who operate trains and those who fly aircraft, do not need sanitation, or that like pigs they can endure filth with immunity?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: It means the bill is a façade which was all I was endeavouring to indicate previously.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I cannot hear the honourable senators' whisper. Anyway, if this bill goes through as it now stands it would seem that our policy is that sanitary safety is not for railway men.

Why draw this distinction? You will notice that the section says that it does not apply unless the Governor in Council intervenes. There is a power of regulation by the Governor in Council to expand or override that section which reads out the labour men. Why make that distinction between ordinary civil servants, of whom there are many thousands —Senator Croll gave us the number—and these men who run trains? Why should not this bill extend to all of them? Why leave it to the men to convince the Government, which does not now agree with them on the need for sanitary protection? Why leave it to them to establish their right to sanitary protection later on? Why draw that distinction between classes? Is there any distinction in cleanliness between classes? I do not think so.

I think I have made the matter fairly clear, and I have explained my objections. I am strongly in favour of the bill, but everybody is not. I have a telegram from J. O. Goodman of the Automotive Transport Association of Ontario, representing the transport operators, strenuously urging rejection by the Senate of Bill S-35. On the other hand I have received strong representations from the labour unions and their representatives asking to be included under this bill and protesting that the regulations in the past have not been effective and just were not good enough. I have, for instance, a letter written quite recently to the minister responsible, the Honourable John R. Nicholson, from which I quote the following paragraph:

> The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers has also endeavoured to deal with the situation in direct negotiations and while we have been successful with the Canadian National Railways in obtaining the promise of the installation of mechanical water coolers and electric toilets on diesel locomotives, we have not met with any success in dealing with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Our position is that all cab-operated diesel locomotives used in main line service should be equipped with some form of sanitary toilet, wash basin and a closed type drinking water supply.

I would think it was obvious. And the minister replies and he certainly does not disagree. He says:

> The measure with respect to safety in employment about which I spoke to the labour groups, will necessarily be of general application. It will establish basic principles as well as indicate the general method of enforcement.

The men expected this safety code to apply to them as well as to anyone else, but it does not do so.

The minister continues:

> The standards and other subject matters that may be dealt with by regulation under the proposed Code will be developed over a period of time to deal with particular physical working conditions of persons employed within the federal field of jurisdiction.

The only answer to the argument I am making is that the rights and safety of these men are in some way protected under other legislation. Honourable senators, I have made a fairly careful study of this matter and have had some knowledge of the circumstances of the men. I have represented railroad unions for many years and I actually took part in the negotiations that led up to the agreements. In those negotiations we discussed at great length the very matters I am speaking on now, and I know as far as one can know anything that the sanitary arrangements on the railroads are not such as we could be proud of. This bill ought to apply to the railroads. In my view it is most essential that we have the inspectors provided under this bill given power to inspect trains, bunkhouses, and all other facilities used by these men. I am not asking for anything more than is given to others. All civil servants benefit by these regulations, so why should not these men? This bill provides what we have been asking for for years. It is a sore disappointment that it does not extend to the thousands of our railroad citizens.

Do not misunderstand me; I am highly in favour of this safety measure. It is a splendid bill. I congratulate the Government for bringing in at last a comprehensive safety code, but I am thoroughly disappointed in its limitations and its distinction as between classes in that it includes civil servants and excludes railroad employees.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Why does this comprehensive legislation not include other than federal employees?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Because we have no jurisdiction to do so.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Well, then, let us get it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: We would have to rewrite the British North America Act. Our right is limited to matters under federal jurisdiction and I could turn up decision after decision, some of them given by the Privy Council, where the distinction was drawn. For instance, the Hours of Labour Act which went to the Privy Council was held to be under provincial jurisdiction in those industries under provincial control, and to be under dominion jurisdiction in those industries or institutions under dominion control. If we were to attempt to legislate in such matters, it would be ineffective. The court would simply rule the legislation as unconstitutional and therefore ineffective.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Does the honourable senator suggest that provincial hygiene regulations do not apply to trains and ships? They may be difficult to enforce, but do they apply?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: They do in part. Where the lack of sanitation in a community endangers the community generally, it will come within provincial legislation. Where it is entirely a matter of the diesels, for instance, and deals with men employed by the railroads, it is under dominion jurisdiction. That is the way I understand it.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Flynn, debate adjourned.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 31, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Prowse for the second reading of Bill C-146, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Hon. John Hnatyshyn: Honourable senators, I understand that in view of the election that will be held in the Northwest Territories in the month of September next, there is some urgency to pass this bill so that Royal Assent can be given to it today. Therefore I do not intend to speak at length, but there are certain matters which I wish to draw to the attention of honourable senators.

First, I wish to congratulate the sponsor of the bill, Senator Prowse, for the excellent manner in which he introduced it. I know that Senator Prowse, along with all of us who live in the Prairie provinces with the northern territories at our boundaries, are probably a little more conscious of the importance of the north than are people who live farther away.

I also wish to say at this stage that I personally have very great confidence in the present Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I think that he realizes the importance of the north; he realizes the enormous wealth in natural resources that exist there, and he personally is doing his very best.

I do not know that I want to extend the same compliment to the present Minister of Transport. I recall that when the Pine Point Railway was built by the previous Government, Mr. Pickersgill was its chief critic. He ridiculed the whole idea of the vision of the north. He saw nothing but waste of money in building new railroads. As a matter of fact, I think he looked in his crystal ball and saw the railroad rusting away from lack of use.

As you will recall, when the Pine Point Railway was built, the federal Government of that day contracted with the railway to use the rails to the extent of carrying only 225,000 tons of concentrates per year. That was not the objective. That was not all that the Government expected, but that is what was contracted for. This figure was reached as a result of negotiations with the representatives of Cominco, the company that was going to be the chief user in the initial stages. As a matter of fact, in 1966 it is estimated that there will be 630,000 tons taken out of this area, which is almost three times what was anticipated for the first year.

Just briefly, to give you an idea of the mineral production: in 1964 the mineral output was $17 million; in 1965 it was $72 million, and in 1966 I believe it is estimated it will be over $100 million.

I believe the north is going to be the most exciting part of Canada in a very few years. As a matter of fact, I know that the present Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is in favour of building another railway—because the Pine Point Railway runs along the western boundary of Alberta—on the eastern boundary of Alberta and the western boundary of Saskatchewan.

I know that in my own province, when uranium was in great demand we had Uranium City just a few miles from the boundary of the Northwest Territories. I had the pleasure of being in that community a few times some years ago when it was a town of some 3,000 people, busily mining uranium. As honourable senators know, uranium ran into bad days, but I think its use will come back into demand and we will see expansion not only in the northern parts of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, but also in the Northwest Territories. The main difficulty now is the lack of communications, and railways will have to be built.

The population of the Northwest Territories today is larger than that of Manitoba when it became a province in 1870. It used to be part of the Northwest Territories, but when it was made a province it had a population of 10,000. Winnipeg was a city of 225 people in 1870. It took another 35 years, until 1905, for two other provinces, the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, to be formed from parts of the Northwest Territories.

I do not agree with my very good friend Senator Aseltine that we should split up the Northwest Territories and add parts of them to each of the provinces they border. I believe they have a special economic interest that no other part of Canada will have. In the very near future both the Yukon and the Northwest Territories are probably going to become the eleventh and twelfth provinces of Canada.

I am not going to go extensively into what exists in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, because that topic has been excellently dealt with by the sponsor of the bill. I wish only to add that with the increasing population in the Northwest Territories and, certainly, with the expanding economy, people have become more conscious of managing their own affairs. They would like to have self-government, and I believe that is coming. I am not saying I advocate that it should be given to them overnight—I do not think the people of the Northwest Territories are demanding that—but I would like this bill to go a little further than it does. All it says is that instead of four elected members the council will have seven elected members and five appointed. At the same time, clause 19A of the bill says:

> It shall not be lawful for the Council to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue of the Territories, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the Council by message of the Commissioner in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

It simply means this Council of seven elected and five appointed members will have no authority whatsoever to pass money bills unless they are recommended by the Commissioner. This is something they had under the old bill, because it was the Commissioner in Council who could pass money bills.

To my mind, the question arises: Is this provision included because in the present bill the elected members outnumber the appointed ones? I do not think this bill goes much further than the colonial type of government that we have had in the Northwest Territories up to now.

I am not saying it should be done immediately, but I think the federal Government should express a definite principle, a definite policy, that the ultimate object is that as soon as possible the Northwest Territories and the Yukon are going to have a democratic system of self-government such as we understand in this country. I believe the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources personally would like to make such a statement, and I only hope that he gets support for this from the rest of the cabinet. I would like to see self-government given to the Northwest Territories next year, which happens to be our centennial year.

As I have said, in my opinion, this bill is just a housekeeping bill or probably just window dressing, for, after all, as was pointed out by the sponsor, the Carrothers Commission is sitting and is looking into the problems of the Northwest Territories. From all appearances, it is a commission composed of excellent members who are doing a fine job, but their report will not be ready until some time this fall. To increase the number of elected members from five to seven, in my opinion, in view of section 19A, does not go much further in giving self-government to the Northwest Territories.

Both the sponsor of the bill and Senator Aseltine made excellent presentations concerning conditions in the Northwest Territories. I am not going into that question, except to say that I would like to impress upon honourable senators the importance of these territories. I have mentioned the Pine Point Railway that has been built. As soon as it was built the beautiful and prosperous town of Fort Smith came into being on the southern boundary of the Northwest Territories. This very prosperous town is referred to sometimes as the capital of the Northwest Territories.

More railways into the Territories are needed because of the untold mineral wealth there. I should like to point out that the Soviets in regions similar to the Northwest Territories have cities with populations of many thousands of people.

The day is coming when we shall have to pay more attention to the north, when we shall have to open up that country because of its great wealth. The Territories can be of benefit not only to themselves but to Canada. I am sure that in the not distant future we shall have an eleventh and a twelfth province in this dominion.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I intend to enter this debate because, like Senator Hnatyshyn, I have visited the Territories, and have some strong views on this relic of colonialism in our system of government. I would have liked to develop this at more length than the late hour permits.

In view of the forthcoming elections, I understand there is some urgency about the passage of this bill, and the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) would like to have it assented to this evening. Therefore, I shall keep my remarks as brief as possible, but I hope that this will not be taken as an indication that I regard this matter as anything but of the highest importance.

I gathered from the remarks of Senator Aseltine that he believed the interests of the Northwest Territories and the adjacent provinces, and indeed of Canada as a whole, might best be served by the Territories becoming part of the adjacent provinces. It is not my intention to controvert that view. Senator Aseltine might well be right. The people of the provinces, if they agree with him, and the experts elsewhere in Canada who appear to share that view, may also be right. But, it seems to me that if there is one lesson we should have learned from past and present history, it is that the form of government of any people emerging from a state of non-independence should not be determined by what others think is best for them. Their own wishes must be respected.

It is obvious that there are many matters which must be considered before any decision is made about the future of the Territories. There are economic considerations, geographical considerations, demographic considerations, and many others, but it seems to me that the one consideration which must have precedence is that of the wishes of the subject people in the Territories.

I use the word "subject" deliberately because, as Senator Hnatyshyn has so well pointed out this bill, with all its good intentions, makes it clear that those people live under a very limited form of democracy. They certainly do not have at the present time a system of representative responsible government. Indeed, section 19, which Senator Hnatyshyn read, could well be taken out of this statute and placed in our history books as an indication of the type of colonial status that Canada suffered from 100 to 150 years ago. The wording is almost exactly the same as that found in the statutes under which Canada was not an independent or sovereign nation.

I am not inclined in any way to criticize the fact that this is the situation at the moment. I would not criticize that any more than I would criticize the fact that Canada itself has not always been a self-governing nation, or that Australia, New Zealand, India, Ghana and even the newest nation, Guyana, were not always self-governing. Self-government comes about gradually.

Generally speaking, for those countries seeking self-government the process is too gradual and too slow, but for those outside, self-government to the newer nations of the world has come about too quickly. Yet I do not see how we can support the basic principle of the right of any people, not now self-governing and independent, to be consulted and to have their wishes honoured in the matter of the form of government under which they are to work out their destiny—whether in Vietnam, Malaysia or in the new nation that will emerge in September, Swaziland—and deny it in Canada.

Some of the difficulties, I know from discussions that have been going on, have been emphasized and in some cases exaggerated. Senator Hnatyshyn has pointed out that Manitoba had less population in 1870 than the Northwest Territories have today. I will go further and say that it had less population than either of these territories has today, because the population of the Yukon is at least 15,000 and that of the Northwest Territories is 25,000.

Of course, if the Territories are to obtain independence within our Constitution there will be geographical problems, but other countries that have become independent nations had much more difficult problems.

I would sum up my position by saying that I believe it would clear the air, and indicate a measure of goodwill on the part of the federal Government, if at this time a declaration were made that the form of government under which these Canadians in the Northwest Territories are to work out their destiny will not be altered in any substantial way except in accordance with their wishes. I am sure many of us applauded, as we looked across the world at the breakup of the old British Empire, the very wise decisions of those who had the responsibility, generally speaking, of making such a declaration of intent in respect of some part of the Empire which today is an independent nation within the Commonwealth.

The second part of the wisdom of those responsible was the setting of a program and a time plan. This might well be done in this case, because it would bring great satisfaction to the citizens of those territories if the Government were to say: You will not in any circumstance be placed under a form of government that is not in accord with your wishes, and we will now spell out for you in exact terms how and when we see your independence within the Constitution being brought to fruition.

Honourable senators, I am fully aware that we are not here dealing with a nation emerging from dependence to national independence. We are dealing with Canadians who are not now enjoying the provincial rights that the rest of us have, rights that for us are guaranteed by the Constitution. I am referring here to the powers that are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures.

I am aware that there is not exact parallelism between constitutional matters and those of self-determination, but the principle of the right to self-determination in a form of government is the same whether we are dealing with Canadian subjects not now independent in Canada or British subjects not now independent in South Africa. I say there is more justification for not forcing these Canadian subjects into a form of government which is contrary to their wishes than for forcing, shall we say, Swaziland, which is completely encircled geographically by South Africa, into an association with the Union of South Africa.

I therefore urge the honourable Leader of the Government to carry to those councils, in which I am sure he has influence, the suggestion that there be a declaration and a program in respect of the eventual rights of Canadians in the Northwest Territories.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

LEGAL SERVICES

FEES PAID BY GOVERNMENT TO MEMBERS OF QUEBEC BAR—INQUIRY

Hon. Jean François Pouliot rose, pursuant to notice:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the payment of fees by the Government of Canada to the lawyers of the Bar of the Province of Quebec for the last five years.

He said: Honourable senators, I have just a few words of explanation to give about this inquiry so that you will not be misled, and afterwards I shall ask for leave that the inquiry stand in order that I may give you further and more precise information.

This is a big question. In the first place, as a member of the Bar for many years, I realize that it takes quite a lot of money for a young lawyer to start his practice, especially if he is alone in a large centre. He may join a big firm and receive a regular salary and have no personal responsibility concerning the rent, the wages of the stenographers, the purchase of paper and stamps, etc.

It is impossible for a lawyer to have a decent office in the legal section of a city for less than $2,500 or $3,000 a year. It is impossible to hire an average stenographer, especially if she is bilingual, for less than $300 a month. Then there are all the other incidentals.

Therefore, before earning one cent for himself, a lawyer should make at least $6,000 or $7,000 to cover his expenses.

I do not complain about the fees received by my confrères of the Bar in my district, in my province, or in other parts of Canada. At this time, if I ask for some information about the lawyers of the Province of Quebec in particular, I do so in order to have an answer quickly. I have been told that the same question should be put for the other provinces, but it would take too long to get that information.

The lawyers are not supposed to live on good air in any part of Canada. They have to make money. When I represented the students-at-law of Laval at a students' dinner given at old Freeman's Restaurant on St. Lawrence Street in Montreal, I saw for the first time some bottles of Scotch on the table.

One of the leaders of the Bar at the time—he was rather young then, and he is gone now—told us students: "Your purpose in life should be to make money; if you don't make money as a lawyer, you are no good." That was the advice the young man gave us on that occasion.

There are some prosperous lawyers who have great ideals, who enjoy reading, who have a vast general culture, and who could be compared to the most famous lawyers of the Inner Temple and the other courts of Great Britain or any other country in the world. I like my profession and I admire most of my confrères.

The purpose of this question is not to prevent the Government from paying reasonable fees to lawyers for services rendered to the Government. This is normal. Their memos of costs and memos of fees are submitted for examination to the officials of the Department of Justice, who decide if the amount asked for by the lawyer handling the case or giving the service is exorbitant or not.

Therefore, the first point is that a lawyer who renders professional services to the Government or a crown company is not independent of the Department of Justice because he has to go to them for the taxation of his memos of costs.

I want those who are not within the profession to understand how it works. How could a lawyer, big or small, old or young, who has been acting for any branch of the government, and who has to go to the department for the taxation of his memos of fees and costs, be independent when he knows very well that the officer to whom he goes may say, "You have overcharged the Government on this item and on that item. I must cut this; I must cut that." There is no independence. Those lawyers who work for the Government in any capacity are dependent upon the Department of Justice for the recovery of their costs and the payment of their fees.

I am just coming gradually—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Take your time.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: My honourable friend knows that what I am telling is the plain truth.

Now, there is more to it. There are great names at the Bar of several countries and here in Canada. In France everyone knows how courageous was Berryer to defend Lamennais, and—

An Hon. Senator: What about Johnson?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I wonder if my honourable friend speaks of the President. I would not argue with my friend.

And in Canada there was Fernand Choquette, now a judge of the Queen's Bench, who as a lawyer defended his confrère Rene Chaloult in a very difficult case. There was Gilles Langlais who defended Jean-François Pouliot when he was arrested for libel and was facing a jury because he had told the truth. There are many others who acted according to the true traditions of the Bar, as we were told when we were students in the faculty of law. They have done it.

But how can you expect any lawyer who has a case for the Government to be able to defend right and justice if he thinks there has been something wrong in the interpretation of the law as it should be? I had the great satisfaction of receiving from one of my confrères here in Ottawa, whom I have not met but whom I will invite to come to have a conversation, a most interesting brief on the Interpretation Act. It is the opinion of an independent lawyer about a piece of legislation that was submitted to the Parliament of Canada, not for the first time but which had been on the statute books for a long time, but in the wrong place, as I mentioned not long ago. There is no other place for the Interpretation Act than as the first chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, whenever they are published. It is lacking in every respect. When I asked the Clerk of Committee if the subcommittee which was to deal with this matter had met often, I was told that it had not met for at least a month. The subcommittee is supposed to discuss the provisions of that bill, which is not complete, half-baked and nonsensical, as I pointed out to one of the assistant deputy ministers of justice.

Here is a lawyer of Ottawa, an English-speaking lawyer, probably of Scottish descent, who sent to me that most interesting work. But it should have been sent, not by him but by the General Council of the Bar of the Province of Quebec, or drafted by the Benchers of the Upper Canada Law Society, or at least by a committee of the Canadian Bar Association.

Why was it not done? It is very different to have the free expression of one man, one lawyer, however distinguished he may be, and the joint opinion of a body which should be always there to defend the rights of the people and to promote a right understanding of the law. I refer to a body such as the Canadian Bar Association, or the General Council of the Bar of the Province of Quebec, or the Benchers of the Upper Canada Law Society or any similar organization in any one of the other provinces. Now you see the difference. Here is a lawyer who does what should be done collectively by a body, and which is not done collectively because some members of the Bar are not independent.

I do not mind about any lawyer or notary public who makes any amount of money at the expense of the Government, provided his services have been rendered, but what I do regret is the fact that some of those lawyers who have the right to make as much money as they reasonably can are prevented, by reason of the fact that they are employed by the Government, from expressing a free opinion when they reach important positions in the collective organizations of the Bar of each province or of the Canadian Bar Association. I hope I have made myself clear.

Therefore, it is most interesting to know how much money has been paid by the Government during the last five years to the lawyers of the Province of Quebec in order that we may know those who are tied and those who are free. It is not only as simple as that. If a lawyer in a law firm earns a quarter of a million dollars over five years—as happened in the Province of Quebec not so long ago—that man is not independent; and, as he must bring some of that money into his firm, all his confrères in that firm are not independent because they benefit from the large amount of money which is received by one member of the firm. Those people cannot speak on behalf of the Bar; they should not speak on behalf of the Bar, although they do. Therefore, I want to have that information.

I am greatly disappointed that the Bar is no longer independent, that no Bar is now independent on account of that. What has happened in the Province of Quebec happens equally in the Province of Ontario. It is not a question of Liberals or Conservatives; each man has his party; each man has the right to make money. However, I am sorry that such important organizations as the Bar associations are no longer independent.

Now, there is one family, the older generation of which has got into the higher ranks of the Canadian Bar Association, and the younger branch of which is controlling the General Council of the Bar of the Province of Quebec. That family is powerful because no one cared about these matters, and the members of that family took the reins and are now the leaders of the Bar in the Canadian organization and in the provincial organization of the Province of Quebec.

Before I ask for leave to let this inquiry stand until I have more precise figures to give you, I will give you a first conclusion. It is that the organizations of the Bar in each province and the Canadian Bar Association are no longer independent. Look around you. The county councils can do a lot, and they have accomplished much—especially some years ago, as I will have occasion to remind you. But for me, the only body that can be totally independent in Canada now is none other than this chamber, the Senate of Canada.

Honourable colleagues, what the others are not, you can be. I cannot show any more respect to you than to tell you now that the safeguard of our liberties is in your hands, provided you show the independence that is lacking, that has been lost by other bodies that were once but are no longer independent. Therefore, there could be no greater appreciation of the Senate than to tell you that we are free men, and as long as we can exercise freedom, which is the greatest privilege we all have, the country will be protected against all encroachments on freedom, liberty and human rights.

If you are kind enough to grant me your leave, honourable colleagues, I will give you more precise details on some future occasion.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Has the honourable Senator Pouliot leave that this matter stand?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I would like to ask a question of the honourable senator. When we eventually get the answer to the inquiry, will we know what fees have been paid up to this date? I ask that because it would take in the fees of Mr. O'Brien and others engaged in the Munsinger inquiry. I would like to have that information.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable colleagues, I asked for that information. It was to be as complete as possible. At the present time I have no complaints regarding the expeditiousness of the honourable Leader of the Government, but I will say that at the present time I am not discussing the amount of the fees of anyone. My objection is that anyone who receives fees from any government—from the Government of Canada or from provincial governments—should be sitting on the councils of the Bar of any province. That is my point, in order that the councils should be as free as possible to express their honest opinion about any piece of legislation that is not apparently founded in law.

I hope this satisfies my honourable friend.

Order stands.

RETIREMENT OF SENATORS VENIOT, TAYLOR and JODOIN

TRIBUTES

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I am sure all honourable senators would expect me to rise and say a few words about some of our colleagues who have retired from the Senate under the appropriate legislation.

First, I address myself to the career of the Honourable Clarence Joseph Veniot of New Brunswick. Senator Veniot is not only a Doctor of Medicine, but is also—and this is a rather unusual combination—a Doctor of Philosophy. He is a surgeon and a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons. At one time he was President of the New Brunswick Medical Association and a member of the Executive of the Canadian Medical Association. For many years before entering public life at the age of fifty, he practised the great profession of medicine in his native province. His example must have been rather outstanding, because one of his four children is a doctor.

Senator Veniot was mayor of Bathurst from 1933 to 1935, and in 1936 he succeeded a distinguished father in a by-election necessitated by his father's death, and he remained in the House of Commons from 1936 until 1945, at which time he was appointed to the Senate. He served for 21 years in this house, for a total of 30 years in public life.

Senator Veniot is a quiet man. Latterly his health has not been as good as it was when he was a member of the House of Commons, but he befriended everyone with whom he came in touch here.

It is worthy of mention that there has been a Veniot in public life almost continuously since 1894. Senator Veniot's father was first elected to the New Brunswick Legislature in that year, and served until 1900. In 1917 he was the Minister of Public Works in New Brunswick and was Premier of New Brunswick from 1923 until 1925. He was elected to the House of Commons in 1926 and became Postmaster General and served in the house until 1936. The total number of years served by father and son in Parliament has been lengthy.

Senator Veniot was a distinguished member of the House of Commons and of the Senate; he is a distinguished son of New Brunswick. His retirement from the Senate is an occasion of sadness for us all.

I refer now to the retirement of Senator William H. Taylor of Norfolk, who was known in Parliament for so many years as Billy Taylor. He was in public life before he came to Parliament, being the reeve of Windham Township from 1921 to 1925. He was elected to the House of Commons in 1926, and was successful in a total of four general elections to that house.

I remember him particularly well during the war years in the sessions from 1940 to 1945, when he was the Government Whip in the other place. He was popular on both sides of the house. At a time when the problems of the Whip were difficult, Bill Taylor discharged his responsibilities and duties to the satisfaction of the House of Commons.

He was appointed to the Senate in 1945, and remained here until his retirement in 1966. This means that he served Parliament for 40 years—a fact of which he is very proud indeed.

He was a farmer, and he knew farmers and the problems of farmers. He was a parliamentarian and politician who was faithful to the principles and traditions of his party, but this did not prevent him from having friends in all quarters of whichever house he happened to be a member. He had a quiet capacity for keeping friends. I suppose no honourable senator will miss him more than his seatmate, the whip on this side, the honourable senator from Provencher (Hon. Mr. Beaubien), because in this house Bill Taylor was also the assistant whip, which duties he discharged with dignity and success.

Senator Taylor will have the leisure now in which to spend more time with Mrs. Taylor, whom we were all so happy to see here last week, and with their daughter and grandchildren.

Honourable senators, Senator Mariana Jodoin also retired from this house last week. Madame Jodoin was the daughter of a barrister and the wife of a barrister, and in her early years was very active politically. She was president of the Deaf and Dumb Institute of Montreal for some 25 years, and for her work in connection with that worthy institute she was awarded membership in the Most Honourable Order of the British Empire. She was active also in women's societies, the universities, press societies, and business and professional women's organizations.

She was appointed to the Senate in 1953—as a matter of fact, she was introduced at the same time as I. She was a conscientious senator, and I am sure we all agree that in her resignation we have lost the companionship of a very great lady.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, before her appointment to the Senate, Senator Jodoin had led an active life in Canadian, university and professional organizations as well as in journalism and in politics. She was the first French-speaking lady to be appointed to the Senate. As a result of her retirement, the Senate is the poorer, since in the best meaning of the words, she was beloved by all her colleagues.

[Text]

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, we are embarking upon a new procedure in debate, that of paying tribute to our colleagues who have retired under the recent legislation affecting the Senate. The retirement of these senators is necessary, as we all know, in order that they may qualify for the pension and other allowances.

The honourable Leader of the Government has spoken extensively of the public activities of the three senators who retired last week, and it is not my intention to repeat what he has said, except to reiterate that they were three very distinguished members of this house. A few days ago we paid tribute to Senator Crerar for his outstanding contribution to the public life of Canada. Of course there are very few members of this house, past or present, whose record of service to the country can compare with that of Senator Crerar. However, each one of the retiring senators, Senator Jodoin, Senator Taylor and Senator Veniot, has a splendid record of achievement in this house, and in the public life of their own provinces and of Canada.

I did not have the honour and pleasure of knowing Madame Jodoin well, but it was not difficult to distinguish in her a kind, friendly, intelligent and most likeable lady. As the honourable Leader of the Government has told us, she participated widely in public life, particularly that of her native province of Quebec. There are others, no doubt, who knew her better than I and who will be able to give a better account of her many activities and accomplishments.

Senator Veniot came from my own province of New Brunswick, where the Veniot name has been respected for many years. Senator Veniot's father was the first Acadian premier of the Province of New Brunswick, and a member of the legislature for a long time. This is something of which we are very proud. His son, Senator Clarence Veniot, is also well known in the province for his success in public life. People liked him and voted for him whenever he came up for election. He was and still is also very popular as a doctor, as a result of which when he ran for election to Parliament he always received a very large support. The Veniot family has an enviable record in both peace and war.

We shall also miss Senator Taylor. I do not think I ever saw him when he was not smiling or friendly. I am sure everyone's mental picture of Senator Taylor will always be that of a smiling man. He spent 40 years in Parliament, a fact that demonstrates he was highly respected by the people of his constituency. I was with him in the other house when we were both younger men, and it was there, perhaps, that I knew him best. A whip, especially in the House of Commons, who can always smile must have a great sense of humour and a lot of patience.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Such a man was Bill Taylor.

I join with the honourable Leader of the Government in wishing these retired senators many more years of happiness and activity in their homes and with their families.

Possibly it would not be out of place, honourable senators, for me to say a word respecting the Retirement of Senators Act, under which many more senators will be retiring in the future.

There will be many occasions of the retirement of senators from this chamber in future. I feel that there is a weakness in this act, and that unfairness to senators has already been shown by this measure. I think we are and should be more concerned than any other group, and that we should find the time first to appoint a committee to study the act again, and make whatever amendments are necessary to improve it.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I add a few words to what the leaders on both sides of the house have said.

I wish to refer especially to Senator Taylor. Before doing so, however, I join with the Leader of the Opposition in his reference to the act which enables honourable senators to retire.

The act is far from being perfect. It was passed at the end of a session when we were all anxious to get away, and I do not feel that we gave it the consideration which so important a measure deserved. Therefore, I hope that at some future time we shall have an opportunity to reconsider it. Whether or not this house has the power to amend this legislation, I cannot say, for I have not looked into the matter to any extent. However, I feel, as the Leader of the Opposition does, that the act should be reviewed, and if it can be improved we should do so.

Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words about Senator Taylor, since he and I have many things in common. We have been neighbours for many years. He represented the County of Norfolk, and I represented the City of Brantford, in the County of Brant.

Many honourable senators are not familiar with that part of Ontario. It is the garden centre of Canada, and I do not think any place could be more beautiful or prosperous.

Bill Taylor's life was a rural one. I stated that he was a neighbour of mine. Indeed, he was a good neighbour. I took advantage of his qualities as a good farmer, since I, for the most part, represented an urban riding. I knew very little about farming, but my friendship with him gave enhanced prestige in the rural parts of Brantford, with the result that I did fairly well at the polls in the rural sections of the Brantford riding.

Bill Taylor and I were in Parliament together for quite a long time. He and I contested every election; in other words, I ran in every election in which he ran. Does that mean that we were in Parliament during all those years? No, we were not. Bill won every election in which he ran. I lost the first two attempts I made. However, I can say that when I was returned to Parliament in 1935 he by that time knew his way around and he was of great assistance to me. It did not take me long to become familiar with the ways of parliamentarians and I was able to look after the interests of my constituents, with the result that I was successful in a number of succeeding elections. For that I owe Bill Taylor considerable credit.

As the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly—Ottawa West) stated, Bill Taylor was a Whip of the House of Commons during the war years. The Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) in his remarks also referred to those days. I sat in Parliament with Bill Taylor at that time, and they were indeed difficult days. At times feelings ran high and debate was acrimonious. All did not go well with our own party, and I think I can say the same for the other parties. However, Bill Taylor always seemed to hold us together. He was Whip of the Liberal party when the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King was Prime Minister of Canada; and Mr. King had the reputation of not being an easy taskmaster. Bill Taylor served well under him, and Mr. King acknowledged his service at the end of his term as Whip by presenting him with a silver platter which he values highly.

Honourable senators, Bill Taylor was a hard worker. He fought many elections. I would remind honourable senators that he won the election of 1930, a difficult one for a Liberal to win. Indeed, it was almost as difficult to win as the election of 1958. Nevertheless, Bill Taylor succeeded in the 1930 election. He had been elected in 1926, and his majorities increased in succeeding years.

One of the reasons Bill Taylor was so successful in his constituency was that he looked after his constituents. I doubt if a single weekend went by when Parliament was in session that Bill Taylor did not get on the train at Ottawa, go all the way back to Brantford, spend Saturday and Sunday there, and return to Ottawa on Monday. He did that year after year. He never forgot his constituents and they never forgot him.

Bill Taylor and his wife have now taken up residence in Brantford. In speaking of his success at the polls, I should say that a great deal of it was due to the faithfulness of his wife throughout all those years when he served in Ottawa and Mrs. Taylor received his constituents. They have worked very well together. We welcome them in Brantford, and I join with the leaders in wishing them happiness in the years that lie before them.

Honourable senators, it was my privilege to introduce Madame Jodoin to this house, and therefore may I be permitted to say a few words with respect to her.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I am sorry to learn that Senator Jodoin has decided to retire. When she was appointed to the Senate, I had the honour to accompany her to the throne and to introduce her to the Speaker. Since then, she has unceasingly made a valuable contribution to the work of the Senate.

She will be greatly missed by all of us, but we hope that her marble portrait will soon be placed at the entrance of the Senate, in order to recall that Mrs. Jodoin was the first French-Canadian woman to be appointed to this house.

I join with my colleagues to wish her many years of good health and happiness.

Hon. L.-M. Gouin: Honourable senators, I cannot let this opportunity go by without saying a few words about my good neighbour, my excellent neighbour, Senator Jodoin.

This very distinguished lady was the first French-Canadian woman ever to become a senator. She was also one of the first French-Canadian woman to take an active part in public life—I mean, in politics—and also in social work. She took an active part in the Liberal women's activities, in particular, as she did in charitable organizations such as that of the deaf-mute. It was fitting that she should be awarded the Order of the British Empire.

She was very popular in all circles. I hope that her health will continue to enable her to devote herself to all those organizations which were so dear to her and with which her name will forever remain connected.

It is not without feeling that I learned the other day that she was leaving us and I told her: "We are very sorry, dear Senator". She replied that she was sorry too, but that it had to be done.

But I trust that I will still often have the opportunity to meet her and work with her for causes which are dear to us.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, we regret the retirement of our colleagues. Senator Taylor came in contact with most of us through his position as Deputy Whip and an attachment and affection for Bill Taylor was built up among us.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: He was a "true Bill."

Hon. Mr. Burchill: We regret losing these colleagues. Although I cannot add much to what has been said so well by the two leaders respecting Senator Veniot, as a representative of the Province of New Brunswick I wish to emphasize that Senator Veniot had an outstanding career as a surgeon in that province before he entered politics. His reputation as an outstanding surgeon was known all over the province. In his home town of Bathurst and in other places where he operated, many stories are told about his great ministry of healing before he became active in politics and succeeded his illustrious father.

Senator Veniot entered the Senate in our group—as did Senator Taylor—and I leaned on him to a large extent when we came here first.

Of later years Dr. Clarence Veniot's health prevented him from taking a more active part. However, I want to say that Dr. Veniot is a very great gentleman and a distinguished surgeon. We will miss him very much in this Senate. I regret sincerely his retirement.

[Translation]

Hon. J. M. Dessureault: Honourable senators, I wish to join the Leader of the Government, the Leader of the Opposition and my colleagues who spoke before me and paid such eloquent and well-deserved tribute to our colleagues who have left us after sitting in the Senate for so many years.

The departure of honourable Senators Crerar, Taylor, Veniot and Jodoin creates in the Senate vacancies which will be difficult to fill.

However, as a Quebec colleague of Mrs. Jodoin, I should like to pay her a particular tribute and express my regrets to see her leave so soon her senatorial duties which she performed with so much dignity.

I knew Mrs. Jodoin long before her appointment to the Senate in 1953, when I was witness to her swearing in, which afforded me great pleasure. I always professed great esteem and friendship for her.

She is a great lady who has long been engaged in political, social and charitable work, where she played a leading role.

In 1926 she founded in Montreal the Wilfrid Laurier Club, of which she is still honorary president; she is also vice-president and life member of the National Federation of Liberal Women of Canada.

Mrs. Jodoin was the first French-Canadian woman to be appointed to the Senate; she never missed an opportunity to be useful to her fellow-countrywomen who always held her in high esteem.

To conclude, I know that we will all remember our four distinguished colleagues well and will greatly miss them.

I wish them health, long life and a well-deserved rest during their retirement.

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, I am a Quebecker who wants to pay tribute to his colleagues who left the Senate last week. This reminds me of an old saying:

To leave is to die a little,
To die to those we love.

And, I add: To leave is to live, to live through the memories left in our hearts and souls by those colleagues for whom we had a deep affection. Older in years than I, the four of them were my juniors in the Senate since I have been her for over 22 years. However, I would also like to add a word about Senator Jodoin.

As pointed out by our leader, her father was a lawyer of great reputation in Montreal. He wrote many legal works, namely, his works of reference on the Civil Code. Married to a lawyer, she had herself, if I may say so, a legal mind. Senator Jodoin never made much noise but good is often done quietly and often noise does not bring any good. With her tact, her very soft and pleasing voice, Senator Jodoin could touch all hearts. She was and still is very active, not only in political circles but especially in charitable and welfare organizations also, I might add, since she is still chairman of the Zélatrices de l'Institut des Sourds-Muets. She is fond of saying: I hope I will stay there until God calls me back to him.

A few months ago we paid tribute to someone. He then had the opportunity to say a few words—let us add that he was not old but old enough to retire—and he told us: I must leave because I am only a setting sun.

I have remembered since then those beautiful sunsets one sees in the fall, when the temperature is pleasant and mild and when it is good to feel alive. At such times I go as far as the parish church from where I have a splendid view of the St. Lawrence river and Quebec City. When the sun sets on the horizon, it looks like a ball of fire that lights up the whole river. Moreover, a beautiful sunset forecasts a beautiful tomorrow. When one looks at such a sunset, one says to oneself: Tomorow will be a nice day.

In comparing our colleagues who have left us, I see again the picture of the setting sun and I say to myself: The youth you have trained will be good and radiant. Then, as a beautiful dawn rises, we can say that other mornings, through your own radiance, will rise in triumph.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators I wish to say a few words about Dr. Veniot, whom I knew when he was a student at Laval and I was younger than he. I remember that he came down with his arms full of prizes. He was very successful in his examinations. He was one of the brightest students of the faculty of medicine of Laval. Besides that, and it has not yet been stated, he was a remarkable chef. He had the gift of cooking unsurpassed meals. He rendered many services as a surgeon in his native province. I liked him and I liked his father, who was very helpful as Postmaster General when he was there.

Dr. Veniot belongs to that great fraternity to which his deskmate, Dr. Gershaw, also belongs and as do Senator Sullivan and Senator McGrand. We are fortunate in having in this chamber such eminent representatives of the learned faculty of medicine and surgery.

Senator W. H. Taylor—or Bill Taylor, as we knew him—was a personal friend of mine. He was with me at the time of the conscription issue, which was a very difficult and controversial matter. He was fair and dealt honestly with all members of Parliament. He was very well liked by all.

Madame Jodoin is a very great lady, and there was no exaggeration in the praise spoken of her today. I appreciate very much the great honour Madame Jodoin paid me, an honour done to me by only two of my colleagues, and that was to hang my picture in their rooms. The other one was Senator Leonard Tremblay. That is an evidence of real friendship. We shall miss Madame Jodoin as much as we now miss Senator Tremblay.

CANADA LABOUR (SAFETY) CODE BILL

CORRECTION OF STATEMENT

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I am compelled to make a correction in my remarks at page 642 of Hansard of June 2.

Speaking on the Canada Labour (Safety) Code Bill, I referred to a decision made by the Board of Transport Commissioners with regard to bunkhouses, and I read volume 11 in my citation as volume 2. It is an easy mistake to make. I wish now to correct this, and to say that the judgment may be found in Canadian Railway Cases, volume 11, at page 336.

In that same address I read a telegram from Mr. J. O. Goodman of the Automotive Transport Association of Ontario, in which he expressed opposition to this bill. Since then I have received a telegram from Mr. John Magee, General Manager, Canadian Trucking Associations Inc., in which he says:

> We wish to advise that the telegram represents Mr. Goodman's personal view and was not sent on the instruction of any policy-making body of the trucking industry, either provincial or national—

I had undoubtedly given the impression, as did he in his telegram, that he represented the trucking industry. Apparently that is not entirely the case according to the second telegram.

Since then I have received a further telegram from Mr. Goodman in which he says:

> My June second wire represents the views of the board of directors of the Automotive Transport Association of Ontario—

I hope both these gentlemen will attend when this bill is before the committee to express their views and to tell us just whom they do represent.

CANADA LABOUR (SAFETY) CODE BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 2, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Croll for the second reading of Bill S-35, respecting the prevention of employment injury in federal works, undertakings and businesses.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I feel that the importance of this bill should not be judged by its rather high-sounding title, whether it be its full title which reads:

> An act respecting the prevention of employment injury in federal works, undertaking and businesses or its short title: Canada Labour (Safety) Code; nor should it be judged by the fact that it has 31 clauses and covers 13 pages, nor even by the very unusual fact that it had a sponsor and a co-sponsor.

Of course, I commend both Senator Croll and Senator Roebuck for the explanations they provided regarding this bill. They performed their duty brilliantly. I must say, however, that I am far from sharing their enthusiasm about this bill, which seems to me to have a very limited scope and be rather a half-baked piece of legislation.

Among other things, the sponsor of the bill stated, as reported on page 604 of the official report:

> This bill breaks new ground.

Further on, on page 605, he said:

> This legislation is comprehensive, in that it will provide for all elements a complete industrial safety program.

And still further on, on the same page, he added:

> It does authorize the making of extensive regulations containing specific safety measures.

Honourable Senator Roebuck, whom I termed earlier as the co-sponsor of this bill, said on page 640:

> In the first place, I wish to compliment the government upon the production of so comprehensive a safety measure.

And, further, he referred to certain safety problems, particularly sanitary hazards that might be of interest to railway employees.

He mentioned a moment ago the decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners and, as an aside, I should like to make the following comment: I went to the trouble of looking up the decision of the Railway Commission which Senator Roebuck mentioned. It is a well-founded decision. But I believe the reporter reported it erroneously because it did not involve bunkhouses, or sleeping quarters in the ordinary sense we would encounter, for instance, in forestry operations, or close to the stations. Nevertheless, the railway employees involved were asking that the company supply them with a boarding house separate from ordinary hotels where they could have lived, and the Railway Commission simply said: How can you expect us to have the power to order the railway companies to build dormitories at places where you will have to stop overnight when you are not on duty and hence cannot be considered as employees of the railway?

If inadequate sanitary conditions had been involved in the case, the problem could have been easily solved through provincial hygiene regulations which apply to all hotels, public places, boarding houses, etc.

To my mind, it was just an embryo of legislation. First, what is being proposed? In Section 4, a very elementary principle is proposed:

> Every person operating or carrying on a federal work, undertaking or business shall do so in a manner that will not endanger the safety or health of any person employed thereupon or in connection therewith.

I have no objection. It is elementary. It is a simple provision of civil law. It is a statement of elementary principle that an employer take the required precautions so as not to endanger the lives of his employees. In any case, it would surely not be what I would call a comprehensive safety measure.

In fact, the legislation simply seeks the authority to make regulations. It enables the Minister of Labour to enact regulations in all areas concerning safety and, incidentically, regarding sanitation, in the areas within federal jurisdiction.

Section 7 sets out, without restricting the general principle that I have just laid down, a series of areas where he may legislate through regulations. This is all very well, but it is not by the mere power to make regulations that the problem is going to be solved. The regulations themselves will show whether this act can really work in its intended field of application.

Although this is only legislation that allows the making of regulations, the fact is, in my opinion, that the field of application covered is a highly restricted one.

Section 3 describes this field of application. It is a very long one, which is similar to that we had last year in the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. It says:

> Any work, undertaking or business operated or carried on for or in connection with navigation and shipping, whether inland or maritime, rail transportation, air transportation, and, then, we come to broadcasting stations. Frankly, here I do not see the purpose they have in mind for a broadcasting station. Is it possible to make security regulations forcing banks to hire policemen as a protection against thugs who would try to stage a hold-up? I do not understand very well what they have in mind.

Subsection (h) says:

> any work or undertaking that . . . is before or after its execution declared by the Parliament of Canada—

This is the usual wording. The field of shipping, rail transportation and air transportation is a broad one, but, as pointed out by Senator Roebuck, subsection (3) says:

> nothing in this Act applies to or in respect of employment upon or in connection with the operation of ships, trains or aircraft.

Thus, a very large scope of application having been described, this third subclause says that the act does not apply to transport. I do not criticize the principle of this third sub-clause because it is well-founded. Indeed the field of transport is already covered by other legislation. As Senator Roebuck pointed out, the Railway Act contains the right to regulate safety. Senator Roebuck mentioned section 290, quoting paragraph (l); all the paragraphs of that section show that the government has only to avail itself of this provision to make complete regulations in the field of security as far as railways are concerned.

The same situation exists in the field of maritme transportation. The Canada Shipping Act includes a series of provisions covering every possible aspect of security and health. Therefore, this bill is useless in that regard.

With regard to air transport, the government has the same powers.

However, as some might say, that leaves the government employees. Well, with regard to government employees, I would say, first of all, that the Government does not need any legislation to apply security and health standards. Besides, it already has the right to legislate with regard to accidents which might occur to federal civil servants through a legislation which Senator Croll mentioned when he moved the second reading of this bill.

Therefore, with regard to government employees, there is no need for any legislation; the government can adopt any regulations it sees fit. The same thing applies to public works contracts given out by the government. It can stipulate therein the terms which contractors will have to meet with regard to security and health.

There remains in fact only a small area. It is possible that we are succeeding in closing a little gap left by the federal and provincial legislation. Honourable senators, as we know very well, the field of security and health is first of all the responsibility of provincial legislatures. There is in that field a host of provincial regulations which sometimes apply to areas coming under the federal government.

I talked a little earlier of bunkhouses, for instance, the boarding houses which a railway company could build. In my opinion, provincial health regulations apply in that field which does not come exclusively under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

I am not criticizing the principle of the legislation but I say that we are dealing with a bill which seems to cover a very large area and which, in fact, has a very narrow field of application, and we are not even too sure about certain limits.

In short, I would see this bill as an embryo of legislation, as an attempt to codify, perhaps to standardize or co-ordinate all the security regulations that may eventually apply throughout all fields of this federal jurisdiction. Through it, the Department of Labour may perhaps be able one day to repatriate within its jurisdiction all the regulations related to maritime, air or railway transport, other related fields, as well as other spheres strictly of federal competence.

But, as it stands now and with present regulations in the various fields I have mentioned and which are still being applied, this code will cover almost nothing and, again, will only permit the minister and the government to experiment. We shall see, in a few years, whether we have achieved more efficiency and consistency in the field of security. But to find anything very important and really complete in this piece of legislation is, I think, to deceive oneself. In my opinion, it is nothing but a mountain bringing forth a mouse.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Croll speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, may I, first of all, thank Senator Roebuck and Senator Flynn for their valuable contributions to this debate. Senator Roebuck saw much merit in the provisions of the bill as indeed, as he indicated, does the man on the job. It is not a façade. It is meant to do a job that previously has not been done.

Senator Flynn was of the view that the bill is a collection of various odds and ends made for the purpose of centralizing authority, and there is some truth in that. He referred to it as an embryo. If he used that word in the sense that it has not shape or form, then I cannot agree with him at all. On the other hand, if he used it in the sense that it is a beginning, then I will agree with him and point out that it can be brought before us time and again for improvement, enlargement and extension.

Senators Roebuck and Flynn both made constructive representations with respect to clause 3(3) which reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding subsections (1) and (2) and except as the Governor in council may by order otherwise provide, nothing in this Act applies to or in respect of employment upon or in connection with the operation of ships, trains or aircraft.

This provision was placed in the bill to avoid duplication and overlapping of jurisdictions with respect to operational safety. The Senate will appreciate that each of these three areas is highly specialized, and it is a vitally important field in which there should be no confusion or uncertainty with respect to safe operation.

There are particular statutes governing these operations in the interest of safe and efficient movement of persons and things, namely, the Railway Act, the Canada Shipping Act, and the Aeronautics Act. Because of the size and complexity of these industries and the importance of protecting the travelling public as well as employees, it is essential that responsibility be discharged under one authority, namely, the Minister of Transport. The subclause to which I have referred is not an absolute exclusion of these industries from the application of the safety code, and if the Governor in Council sees fit then it can be so ordered.

The other matter raised was in connection with sanitary conditions in bunkhouses. Clause 7(1)(d) of the bill has reference to drinking water and sanitary conveniences and certain types of equipment and facilities connected with railroading. It is my view, as I am sure it is that of Senator Roebuck, that there is adequate authority vested in the Minister of Transport to deal with these matters. However, I am informed that in the event that a situation complained of is not improved or remedied, then it is possible for the Governor in Council to deal with it under this act. I am given to understand also that the Department of Transport is giving serious consideration to the best means by which this may be done.

I thank the honourable senators for their constructive criticisms, if I may use that word. These points will be fully covered when the bill is before the committee to which it will be referred after second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask the honourable sponsor of this bill if it is proper to refer it to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, having regard to the fact that there is a provision excluding its application to all forms of transport.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, the comment is usually the other way, namely, that everything seems to go to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, I agree.

23031—55½

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): This is a good opportunity for us to have the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications deal with this bill. There are transportation aspects to it, although, of course, there are others. Sometimes it is difficult to know to which committee a bill should be sent, and sometimes the presence of the chairman of the particular committee can be a determining factor.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is a good argument.

Motion agreed to.

RURAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT FUND BILL

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 26, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald for the second reading of Bill C-151, to provide for the establishment of a fund for the economic and social development of special rural development areas.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I shall try to be as brief as possible in my remarks on this bill. I find that it applies to the farmers of Canada for their rehabilitation, and the manner suggested is to give them a certain amount of money to help them improve their farming conditions.

Honourable senators, there are many ways to keep farmers on the farms. One way is to give them security of ownership to permit them to live in peace on their farms. When I was young my parents told me that farmers were kings on their farms. Probably you have heard the same thing said. That was true some years ago for a certain number of farmers. Naturally, as with other trades and professions, some farmers are more fortunate than others.

A distinction should be made between farmers and settlers. Apparently settlers are the first occupants of a lot or piece of land. Those we call farmers are in possession of farms already under cultivation. I have not used technical terms, so you will understand what I mean.

At home, in the county which I had the honour to represent for a number of years in the Commons, there were two classes of farmers. Some were settlers and others were farmers. The farmers were far ahead of the settlers. Sometimes the settlers had considerable difficulty because in the first place, they did not have lots on which there were enough trees to permit their subsistence or support. The trees on any tract of land are a profitable harvest to the owner, inasmuch as they have not been cut down by lumbermen before the lot was granted to a settler.

In my province the division of lands was not made with sufficient care in the first place, and in some areas there were farmlands which were granted to lumber companies, while the farmers had to settle on lands that were not suitable for farming. Frequently the timber was cut on the lots before the settler could occupy the land.

For a time there was a great move for colonization, and some people were under the impression that they could take persons out of a city like Montreal, transplant them to the country and make farmers out of them with no experience at all.

That was about 25 years ago. The settlers were given lots on the sides of rocky hills. In one parish in my former constituency the lots were on seven hills. In order to go to church for instance, they had to climb one hill and go down the other, and so on. I called it "Seven Hill Parish." I saw young girls there, beautiful looking, whose figures were like the stem of a flower, because they were undernourished. Those settlers lived on soup made out of our national emblem, the maple leaf. Several families shared a cow for field work, for the transportation of material, and for the supply of milk for the children.

I made an inquiry and sent questions to all the farmers of certain parishes, asking them how many animals they had. I already knew the answer. However, I received it in writing. One of those families had two animals, a cat and a dog. Do not laugh, it is true. Another had six animals—six chickens. I went on like that. The people were very poor and undernourished.

Finally, I succeeded in having an inquiry made by the Department of Labour, on the instruction of the Honourable Norman Rogers. I felt it was important to know the occupations of the unemployed and I had asked the Minister of Labour under the Bennett government for the occupations of the unemployed. They could not answer me. So I had to correspond with the mayors of several municipalities of the larger cities in Canada in order to get this information with regard to previous trades of those who were unemployed, whether they were carpenters, barbers, etc.

The two municipalities where I had the most trouble were the City of Toronto and the City of Windsor. There were union men in the council, and I had a lot of difficulty.

If honourable senators want further information about it, the entire correspondence is bound in the archives. Sir Arthur George Doughty, the Archivist at the time, thought it was worthy of being bound, and it is undoubtedly available there. I have not seen it, I do not know if it has been burned or is still there, but it was there for a time. A report was made, and when the Honourable Norman Rogers, Minister of Labour, took office at the beginning of the session of 1936, after the elections of 1935, he said that that report on unemployment which was made at the time and distributed to all the members of the House of Commons was the basis of the policy of the Government.

Then I asked them for my reward, to have an investigation made of the settlements in my county. There are those three big books. That probe was made by Mr. Frank Lafortune who was previously a controller of the City of Ottawa, and Mr. Willie Begin, who was the right-hand man of Senator Power when he was a member of the Cabinet. He was his right-hand man in Quebec City.

Those gentlemen visited all the settlements and made a report on those people. Their report showed that it was important to come to the assistance of those settlers in order to permit them to live.

Everything possible to help those people has been done. I have those reports here. Those two gentlemen went out to visit each family to report on them, and these are the big reports that I have now.

It was not the business of the Government of Canada to do that, but it had to be done by the Government of Canada because the provincial government was not acting.

At the present time conditions are very bad in some settlements. For instance, in the Parish of St. Elzéar, near St. Louis, in the heart of the County of Temiscouata, the number of families has decreased from 64 to 16. The children have gone to the city and they have invited their parents to join them. Now the parents live with their children who take care of them in the city. They have left the country and the old people have the pension which helps them to live in town.

The first trouble that we had with regard to the uprooting of the sons of the land was the war, not only because of the enlistments but because of the manufacture of munitions.

When a farmer, who has been living a frugal life in the country, goes to town and enjoys the advantages of the city, with electricity, easy transportation and so on, he does not want to return to the land.

My neighbour is a farmer and I have the most profound admiration for him, for his wife, for his family. I have known his father, mother, sisters, brothers—they are my friends and I know them well. I see them every day. Their work is difficult. They rise early in the morning; they have not a moment to spare. The mother has to get up early to milk the cows and to do all the work that has to be done for the family. It is a very hard life.

My most pleasant vacations have been spent with farmers. I know them and their hospitality; they are generous, they are kind; their life is hard and difficult. It is not the easy life that people have in town. The great problem is to keep the farmers in the country, to keep them on the farm. Their life must be made more attractive.

I wonder if you will permit me to put on the record an article—I do not wish to read it all to you tonight—that was written when I was very young. When I was in my early twenties, before I passed my Bar examinations I had a friend in the country who was the best farmer around Rivière du Loup. I used to talk to him. One day there was a preacher or missionary who blamed the farmers for buying stoves with mirrors on them—the old stoves that had mirrors on both sides or in the middle. This missionary said it was extravagant for a woman to have a mirror in front of her when she was cooking, so she could look at herself when she was working at the stove. This article appeared in a publication called La Patrie on December 13, 1913—53 years ago. The title of it is: "No Luxury, but Comfort".

If you have no objection, with your leave, I will put it on the record for your information.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is permission granted to the honourable senator to have this article inserted in Hansard?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: By all means.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: It will be translated into English for the benefit of my English-speaking colleagues.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is agreed.

NO LUXURY, BUT COMFORT
IF YOU WANT TO KEEP YOUR CHILDREN AT HOME . . .
"LA PATRIE"—DECEMBER 13, 1913

Let us distinguish between luxury and comfort. . . . Comfort is far removed from luxury. Luxury is the superfluous, the excessive, it is living beyond one's means. Comfort is what can properly be afforded to give life some charm. It is no worse for a farmer who has the means, to buy a piano or even a pianola, than for a millionaire to purchase an automobile. One cannot be blamed for incurring expenditures proportionate to one's means, all the more so since, if the family residence is bare of all embellishments, the children will seek in town the distractions they cannot find at home.

Farmers in some areas of the country are to be admired for knowing how to enjoy the benefits life has to offer.

The woollen sock is generally favoured all over. It is very well to practise thrift. But the happiness of an intelligent and sensitive man should not merely consist of piling up dollar bills, of depositing money in the banks and of putting the care of improved cattle before that of the children in the home.

Is there in the world anything more beautiful than to see a father arousing the interest of his children in his most unimportant chores, of a farmer who inspires those who will follow in his footsteps with the love of the land where they were born and where destiny calls them to live happy days and a life blessed by heaven.

But the task of the father does not stop there. He must further give his children a taste of family life and to this end, give them, together with the love they can expect from their parents, all the necessary comfort.

In short, for each to strive, within his means, to please his children is not only a right, I should almost say it is a duty, a patriotic duty which, more than any other crusade, will stem the scourge of emigration of our people to the big cities or to the United States.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, you understand it is important to keep the farmers on the land. If help is given to them on the farm, it will enable them to stay there. There is a tremendous amount of work to be done, but the best thing to do is help them.

The best thing that has been done up to now was done by the former Minister of Agriculture, who is now a colleague of ours. He decided to give a lot of technical information in an understandable way to all farmers. A publication entitled Le Mois gave very good information. There was his letter to the farmers in both languages. It was bilingual and was a very good way to inform them, and they needed to be informed.

At the time of conscription my surprise was to have the reports on all the farmers, about the number of cattle that they had in some parishes, the number of hogs they hibernated and the wealth they had on the land. Of course, the wealthier ones could not be compared to the settlers whom I have mentioned.

When conscription was the issue in the war years, one of the main reasons that Your Honour (Hon. Mr. Bourget) and myself and others objected soundly to it, was precisely to keep the farmers on the land, to prevent them from being lost to the farm.

If today you compare the statistics of the number of people who are on the farm in all provinces of Canada to that of 25 years or 30 years ago, you will realize the effect of the war on the rural population.

I had some rewards—the reward of having helped the people to stay on their land and not be induced or forced to go to town and leave the country. But in all my years as a Member of Parliament, I know only of one family that has come back from the city to the country—only one. It was a young man who had left the parish in Rivière du Loup to work as a mechanic in Montreal. He made some money, came back home with his wife, who had been brought up in the city, and he bought his father's farm to operate it.

I wonder if it would not be possible to have a larger number of farmers come back from the city to the country with the experience that they have gained when they were farming. There is no improvisation in farming. It is not only a profession, it is also a science. But it is not a science that is often taught in schools, although some agronomists are very helpful. It is a science taught by father to son, and even nowadays in the country there is some work, despite the machinery that exists, that can only be done by the arms of young, strong men. They can be directed by their parents, but the parents with all their experience need the strength of the young ones to operate a farm sucessfully.

Much more could be said about it, but I consider the time that we spend in helping the farmers stay on the land is not lost. Those who have stayed there have proved their courage and are among the best Canadians. I say that of all the farmers in Canada. When they work on the land they have time to think.

I hope this bill will be considered in the best spirit. I am entirely in favour of it. I am in favour of any kind of help that we can give the farmers. It would take too long to explain what has been done for them in the past collectively and individually, but what has been done was to support a good cause and for people who deserved it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, debate adjourned.

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 25, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

[Translation]

Hon. Romuald Bourque: Honourable senators, may I at the outset pay my compliments and best wishes to the new Speaker. I have no doubt about his capacity to do, with dignity and efficiency, the work imposed upon him by the high office he occupies.

I take great pleasure in congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne for the very constructive, interesting and documented speeches they made on that occasion.

At the same time, I wish to congratulate our brilliant leader, Senator Connolly, for his return to the Senate. Sickness forced our leader to get away for several weeks. We hope that his health will now permit him to continue to fill, with all the efficiency for which we know him, the high position he occupies and for which he is so eminently qualified.

At the same time, I want to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition, honourable Senator Brooks, for his kindness and his tact in the discharge of his duties.

To the new senators, I wish the heartiest welcome. I am sure that those distinguished citizens will make a great contribution to the business of this house.

Honourable senators, on Monday, May 23, 1966, there appeared in a Montreal daily an editorial concerning Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II. I think it is a beautiful editorial, and I would like to read it into the record:

> Today, the official birthday of Queen Elizabeth II, is an opportunity to pay tribute to one of the rarest and finest examples of a dedicated life in the world today.
>
> This is the official observance of the Queen's 40th birthday. She has been the Queen now for 14 years. The light that beats about the Throne is such as would disclose any fault or failing. But the critics of the Queen have had to pick upon such trifling matters as to condemn only themselves.
>
> The reconciliation of all private wishes with public duties is never easy. The necessity to do always what duty demands rather than to find the ease and satisfaction of a more private and freer life—and to know that this necessity will end only in death itself—imposes a difficult role. It is hard to forget the famous photograph of the Queen descending from her plane at the airport, while in front of the camera, Sir Winston Churchill and Mr. Clement Atlee stood shoulder to shoulder to receive her back from the tour interrupted by her father's sudden death. At that moment the long, hard reign of Elizabeth II seemed to begin.
> To have been given such a role, and to carry it out year after year—faithfully, graciously, humbly—is to set an example that none could fail to acknowledge in human terms. The monarchy, of course, is greater than any one person: it comes out of antiquity and belongs to the ages. But when the duties of the monarchy are accepted with unfailing dedication, there is also a human triumph.

The best observance of the Queen's Birthday is for everyone to be as dedicated to his, or her, own calling, as Elizabeth II has been to hers.

Honourable senators, on May 1, 1966, in an important and widely read Montreal weekly, there appeared the following article which I quote:

The mania of some people to impose their views upon others under cover of an "association"

More and more people are exasperated by the dictatorial attitude of small pressure groups which, through publicity in the press and more particularly on television, are not satisfied with expressing their own opinions but seem bent upon forcing them on the rest of the people. These small "cells" are getting more numerous and more vociferous. For instance, we have in mind two of those French-speaking groups that have been in the news this week.

Last Sunday, about a hundred members of the League met and blandly decided that the French Canadians should, at all costs, boycott the Centennial celebrations. That is an opinion, but the language used by the group gives the impression that they were speaking for thousands of active followers. The next day, one of these two French-speaking groups, whose opinions are not shared by $\frac{1}{10}$ of 1 per cent of the population, in spite of their claim to the contrary, declared peremptorily that the last part of the Parent report was worthless and that it should simply be thrown in the wastebasket etc. These, as previously stated, are only two instances that made the headlines in the last few days but these small groups of individuals are not by far the only ones operating along these lines and seeking to impose by force their own views on the rest of the population.

I have refrained from mentioning the names of these two groups referred to in the article quoted, because I do not think it is very important—such groups are already too numerous.

[Text]

Honourable senators, there comes a time in every man's lifetime when without thought of personal or political gain, without any desire for recognition or reward, he must stand up and be counted on the side of a cause in which he believes.

Today, in this honourable and historic chamber, I want to speak up for Canada. I want my voice for these few moments to be heard above all the clamor, above all the grievances and all the promises, and to be accepted simply as the profession of my sincere love for what I believe is the greatest country in the world.

I am not speaking today as a French-Canadian or as an English-Canadian or as any other kind of hyphenated Canadian. I am speaking as one who was born in Ontario, has lived for half a century in Quebec and has visited and addressed audiences in almost every other province of this vast country and abroad.

In Parliament, I represented a constituency made up of many religious and ethnic groups, and I firmly believed that I represented not just one of those groups, but all.

Here, in the Senate of Canada which, along with the rest of the country, will be celebrating next year its hundredth anniversary, I believe it fitting that one should offer leadership to this nation in recreating a sense of nationhood and restoring the faith which led in 1867 to foundation of this Confederation.

Next year will be Canada's centennial year. It is inevitable that in the process of celebrating our hundredth birthday we should look back over our past. At the risk of offending all the historians who try so diligently to preserve, and sometimes elaborate, our national story, and at the risk of antagonizing the many well-meaning people who are already deep in their plans for pageants and spectacles commemorating the great battles and achievements of former years, I would suggest that we forget our history for a while and concentrate upon our present and our unlimited future. Looking forward is a better preoccupation for a young nation than reflecting upon old disputes and fruitless quarrels.

History is full of errors as well as triumphs. We in Canada cannot afford to dwell upon the errors, as we so often currently are inclined to do. Like every people on earth, we have problems, but ours are small compared to those of many other lands. We exaggerate them and far too often seize upon them as noble excuses to support our own personal prejudices or to justify untenable positions. It is time we tore up the pages of history which deal with violence and real or imagined injustices, or at least wrenched their memory from our minds, and concentrated upon the way we live today and the world we are going to live in tomorrow.

It does not really matter who was responsible for this or that political or military crime —if indeed it ever did. England celebrates the victory at Waterloo; France celebrates the conquest of Britain in 1066; Germany celebrates the triumph of 1870. What matters is what we are doing to and for each other right now.

But who cares who won a battle two hundred or more years ago? It puts no food in our grocery baskets today and does not make one contemporary world citizen any better than another. Must we, without any such glamorous disasters or triumphs to remember, conjure up new ones based on petty trifles and deceits?

Who cares about promises that were made by a king or a queen across the ocean centuries before we were born, or what the Governor of New France said to the Governor of New England when Canada was simply a barren waste of ice and snow? It will not help develop a single mine, or ship a bushel of wheat, or compose a bar of music.

I wish I could say it will not create a single newspaper headline!

Young men must have things to believe in and fight for—but surely it is not for the long dead past. Surely, we in Canada have something much better to offer than that, and we who have spent our lives here and who come from all corners of the nation have the right and the duty to suggest to those who follow us that they lay down their history books and allow themselves to dream of a Canada that will truly come first in the hearts and minds of all their countrymen, not just in one tiny corner.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Bourque: We are having our fill of dissension, most of it unsoundly based and carried on without rhyme or reason. Responsible citizens despair; universities, sociologists and newspapers set out to discover who is to blame. Finding the answer to that question, if such an answer exists, offers no solution. It matters not who was to blame—what should concern us is what we all together do about Canada today.

Canadians are an individualistic people. There lies one root to our problem. Each of us attempts to justify his position, according to his own history, his own experiences, his own religious beliefs and his own social prejudices. This is not a French fault, nor an English one; it is not the exclusive weakness of the German or the Pole or the Italian or the Japanese. It is a characteristic of all of us, whatever our background, who share this great wide-open land where an individual can still be an individual and is neither regimented nor afraid.

It is a great privilege to be an individual. But it is a dangerous one, too. Carried to extremes it can destroy a nation—and all the individuals who occupy it. Unrestricted, it can lead to the kind of dissension which today, on the eve of her hundredth anniversary, threatens the peaceful future of this wonderful nation.

The people of Canada are a wonderful breed. They have come here over the centuries from almost every country on earth, and they have brought with them skills and traditions, hopes and ambitions which if drawn together could create something entirely new in this world, a true Canadian, not melted down into a common mould but devised and contrived out of diversity. What a noble experiment we have made—and how close we are coming to success. All that we need is a little more patience, a little more understanding and a great deal more willingness to live and let live and to share our national inheritance instead of fighting over it.

If we lived in a poor land, without resources, with no hope of future development, bitterness and tension among us would be understandable. Then neighbour would fight neighbour for the tiny piece of cheese—we would be engaged as so many others have been in a struggle for survival.

But this is not the case. We are twenty million people in a land with staggering natural resources, most of them still uncovered. We are one of the biggest trading nations in the world; trade follows our flag across the seven seas to every island and every continent. We have the second- or third-highest living standard in the world. A greater percentage of our people are gainfully employed, at good wages and salaries, than is the case in almost any other country.

We are young, but we have already bred artists, writers, actors and musicians who have won international reputations. The produce of our prairies feeds millions of starving people on the other side of the world. Our nickel and asbestos, copper and newsprint support industrial enterprises not only in Canada but abroad.

We have made important contributions to science and medicine, and one of our greatest and most welcome exports has been Canadian brains. However, much we may wrangle and wrestle at home, abroad we are looked upon as a very fortunate people who have come a long way in our first hundred years.

The men and women who have contributed to this portrait of a modern Canada have never come from one single ethnic group nor has any ethnic group dominated our foreign image. Scots, Irish, English, French, Jews, Polish, Italians, Czechs, Chinese, Ukrainians and representatives of many other groups all play on our hockey teams, paint our pictures, act on our stage, write our books and magazines and compose and sing our songs. Creatively, we are still individualists, but our total product makes no distinction between racial or ethnic backgrounds, our religion or our mother tongues.

Art is international: no matter of what origin, creative artists can communicate with each other. In a sense, Canadians are international too; and, just as artists have done, they can learn to communicate and to be creative together to help produce the end product which is health, happiness and good fortune for all.

The energy directed by Canadians today into inter-city, inter-provincial, inter-racial or ethnic group bickering could have created a dozen major industries, built hundreds of miles of roads or sent a rocket half way to the moon. The time, energy and conversation expended in trying to find the goat who is responsible for all our difficulties might have given the world a rich new philosophy capable of leading us all on the way to perpetual peace. How much better reading we could have had in our newspapers, and how much better viewing on our television. And what an example we would have afforded those countries in other parts of the world whose people are not too sure that it will ever be possible for men and women of different ethnic backgrounds and different religions and tongues to live peacefully together in one country.

We believe they can—the whole reason for Canada's existence is based on that belief. We believe that people can share problems and triumphs, failures and successes, riches and poverty, without being squeezed into a test tube and ejected like so many robots, looking alike, talking alike, thinking alike. That is the whole Canadian story: multitudes of people from many different countries crossing an ocean to settle in one vast land where, without giving up their own individuality—without becoming conformists in any sense of the term—they can live their own lives and joyously allow others the right to do likewise.

Who settled the prairies and created out of a wilderness an overflowing breadbasket? Women in heavy shawls and men in sheepskin coats who travelled across a continent on hard wooden seats in cold and drafty colonists' cars; men and women who spoke not a word of either French or English, but who quickly developed a love for the land and bred children who won positions in every walk of life. Why should they suffer or see their future imperilled because a shot rang out in the forests of Quebec or Ontario two centuries ago?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Bourque: Who planted the orchards in the Atlantic provinces, built the ships and mined the iron, caught the fish and gave to Canada one of its loveliest playgrounds? Men and women from the villages of Scotland and Brittany, some of whom speak the Gaelic and respond to the bagpipes while others talk a provincial French and follow the customs of Acadia. Are they to suffer or see their futures endangered because someone in Winnipeg dreams of a homeland in Iceland?

Quarrels are easy to start and almost impossible to end. Long after becoming senseless, they go through the generations, like the feuds in the southern states which have kept many Elizabethan colonial tribes from sharing in the prosperity of America. So devoted have these mountain folk been to their hatreds, they have let their share of the great society slip by and are content, or at least compelled, to sit barefoot in the shade plotting additional ways of humbling their enemies.

Ethnic or religious feuds on a bigger scale in a country like Canada can only produce more calamitous results. Instead of a few, smouldering individuals sharpening their knives and cleaning their rifle barrels, we are threatened with whole cities or provinces rising up to fight over again the battles of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, to find revenge or satisfaction against imaginary enemies for indignities suffered by their ancestors centuries before they were born.

This is not the way we will build a great Canada, nor the way by which any of us will achieve real personal satisfaction. There is a positive course we can follow—a straight and honest path that can only bring us to the kind of world in which we all want to live.

Let us first of all come out of the past and into the present. "Je me souviens" is no longer a suitable slogan for the mid-twentieth century, unless I remember only those things which are good and forget those which are bad. Let our historians and teachers accept their responsibilities as citizens of Canada and as citizens of the world and realize that to teach a child to look upon the past with vengeance or retribution in his heart is a dangerous and wicked thing to do. To use the past to teach understanding and respect for other peoples of all races and creeds is a useful and decent contribution to society.

Next, let us realize that even though we live in a competitive society, in Canada there is plenty for all of us if we work together to get it. Price cuts, phoney discounts, misleading advertising and unfair competition never pay in business. They pay even less in the business of nation building. Everybody loses when class fights against class, ethnic group boycotts ethnic group, or when unfair tactics are introduced to maintain racial, economic or religious superiority. Controversy attracts the headlines; it seldom contributes to personal satisfaction or national prosperity.

Finally, whether we are young or old—whether our life in this fascinating and vigorous country is just beginning or whether we have completed our race and concluded our task—let all of us take a few hours or days as we reach the eve of our country's hundredth birthday to do these things: To study ourselves as individuals and a people, to find out what we really are and what we amount to in the scheme of things; to list our virtues and our faults, and to be as frank with the latter as we will be with the former; to study other Canadians who may have a different ethnic, social or religious background than ours and find out what they really are, how they react and how they think, and what they amount to in our scheme of things; to list their virtues and their faults, and to be as frank with the former as we will be with the latter; to ponder on what we have discovered about ourselves and our neighbours and, if possible, to go out and meet a few of those whose tongues or accents may have once repelled us; and then, on the basis of what we have learned, to think of the ways in which all of us could benefit if we worked closer together instead of drawing apart.

That is not a political platform or a program, nor do I intend it as such. For what ails Canada today is not a political problem—it is a problem of human relations, a problem of creating within each one of us the desire to be good Canadians, worthy of this great country which all of us share.

I have not submitted here today a detailed study plan, but knowing as I do that many senators in this chamber share my apprehension about the future of a divided Canada, I sincerely believe that within this chamber lies a great opportunity to be of lasting service to our country. We are senior citizens in Canada, and this can either entitle us to sit back and rest from our labours or present us with the challenge to use our knowledge, experience and relative freedom from political toil to find a cure for a national disease which threatens the death of all that we have worked to create.

I am sure that within this body are many men and women of goodwill, men and women of varying ethnic backgrounds and of varying political faiths, who would, if pressed, willingly give of their time and energy to find a formula which would win universal approbation.

I am not going to suggest that a royal commission be established to hear witnesses, receive petitions and write reports. Royal commissions have their usefulness, but the real problem which besets us is not one which is amenable to formal investigation. It deals with ancient prejudices, unreasonable quarrels and inner disturbances. It is not something which can be reconciled quickly. It requires patience and much long and studied effort.

If a large Canadian merchandising company were suddenly to discover that in certain sections of the country its sales were dropping and its market disappearing, it would do two things. It would spend a lot of money on an opinion poll to discover why its customers were disaffected and then, after removing the cause, would launch a huge public relations program to attract back its former customers.

That, in brief, is what Canada must do at the present time. Canada has lost or is losing customers; it needs to know why; having discovered why, it needs to remove the cause and then it will need to tell all its people and the whole world what Canada is and what Canada means.

If honourable senators, representative of all parts of Canada and all classes and creeds, would consent to serve on such a study commission, I am sure they would be astounded at the support they would receive from serious and concerned citizens in every province and city. We sometimes hear criticism of the Senate and descriptions of its activities and its members that are far from flattering. Should we undertake seriously such an important project, and should we give to it the attention it demands, we would find throughout the entire country a great outpouring of goodwill.

The task is there before us. It will not be an easy one, but successfully performed it will constitute a major triumph for Canada. Its very promise would give to Canada's centennial a new feeling of accomplishment. Celebrating together as one people of varied interests, traditions, languages and beliefs, Canadians would begin their second century as a shining example of man's humanity to man.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Argue, debate adjourned.

RURAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT FUND BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald for the second reading of Bill C-151, to provide for the establishment of a fund for the economic and social development of special rural development areas.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, I wish to make only a few comments in respect to Bill C-151. At the outset I would say that I support this bill wholeheartedly, but I should like to refer particularly to clause 5(a), which is found on page 2 and which reads:

> For the purposes of this Act, (a) a comprehensive rural development program is a program, consisting of several development projects, that is designed to promote the social and economic development of a special rural development area and to increase income and employment opportunites and raise living standards in the area—

Honourable senators, I discussed this matter with some farmers in Ontario a short time after this bill was published. They were what might be called woodlot farmers—or they were attempting to be woodlot farmers—and they were trying desperately to get into the tree-farming business on their own. Their opinion was that the Government, instead of spending money buying up farms at this time, should be helping the farmers presently in these areas of poverty in a number of ways, such as helping them to enlarge their holdings so that they may raise more livestock, and also by giving them training in the proper handling and feeding of their livestock.

It was also their feeling that where it is essential that an area be turned into forest, and where the Government has acquired the lands in that area, the remaining farmers should be employed, under proper supervision, to assist in the reforestation in the particular area in which they live.

They felt also that forestry should be classed as agriculture, so that the implements used in woodlot farming, if imported, could come in tariff free. Apparently, at the present time, woodlot farmers have to pay a tariff on their implements.

My contention has always been that ARDA was not meant to dispossess farmers, but to give them assistance in solving their problems. If we start in with wholesale dispossession of the farm population in these areas of poverty, we are going to have to face the problem of trying to find employment for those people in urban areas and in reorienting them into a new way of life.

A difficult problem arose in Saskatchewan during the thirties when farmers in the drought-striken areas were offered free transportation if they wished to move. The movement started, and before a year had passed the Government had literally started a fire it could not put out; hundreds of farmers decided to move north where they could get fuel in the parkland country for their homes, and grass for their livestock. Great hardship was suffered by many of these farmers who moved out and who eventually, when the rains came, moved back to the prairie and started again from scratch to reorganize their farms. However, in the present case, if these farmers are moved off their land, and the land is taken over by the provincial Government, there will be no place to which they can move back. A man who has lived all his life in a rural area will find it difficult to adjust himself to living in an urban centre, particularly if he is past middle age.

Again, I well remember that in the thirties there was a tremendous number of unemployed in the cities. In Winnipeg some businessmen tried to make arrangements for the unemployed to purchase or rent small acreages outside the city, so that they could raise some garden stuff and keep a few head of livestock which, together with the welfare payments they were receiving, would enable them to eke out a living. If we ever run into similar conditions today, we will have enough problems in the cities without adding to them by moving people whose love of land has kept them on it, even though poor, in these local areas.

Land should not be taken out of cultivation if there is any possibility at all of its growing food.

Honourable senators, food and water are the main resources of this country. We should be endeavouring to help these people raise more food, even though in these days that may seem to be a waste because of our present surplus of cereal grains. There is a growing shortage of food in the world, and we shall need every acre of land in this country, and, indeed, in the whole of North America, to help feed the hungry of the overpopulated countries.

I should like to put on Hansard part of an editorial that I read in the Christian Science Monitor of May 9 last. It commences with a quotation from the Bible:

> "And Joseph gathered corn as the sand of the sea . . . And all countries came into Egypt to Joseph for to buy corn; because that the famine was so sore in all lands."
>
> There are many points of difference between the Egypt of the second millennium B.C. and the United States of 1966. But they have at least one point of crucial similarity. Each foresaw the day when it would be called upon to help feed the world's hungering masses.
>
> Like Joseph, Secretary of Agriculture Orville L. Freeman has recognized that for many years hungry lands will be clamouring more and more instantly at the storehouses of lands fortunate enough to be able to help them through their desperate shortages. To meet this first wave of requests, Washington recently authorized a 15 per cent increase in land planted to wheat.

A little farther on the editorial continues:

> In the future, if there is a move of land in or out of tilth, it is more and more likely that America will see the amount of land under the plough broadening rather than being cut back.
> Thus America will almost certainly have to begin to remold its thinking on agriculture, and lay plans for more tillage, still higher yields and even greater farmer efficiency. And what is true of America, will almost certainly be true of neighbouring Canada. Together these richly endowed lands are, happily, in a position to step in and help such lands as need immediate assistance while encouraging these latter to solve their own farm problems.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I am quite agreeable to the allocation of this $50 million, as the Government intends, to certain areas such as the Interlake area, Northern New Brunswick and Eastern Quebec; but to my way of thinking the whole program is too slow and should be speeded up in every possible manner by the present Government. I say this because while there are areas which can be classed as poverty or slum areas in the country, I must warn the Government there are a number of other areas that are on the verge of becoming slum areas, and unless we vigorously push the ARDA program we are going to have a problem on our hands that will make $50 million—to use the words of the honourable senator from Regina (Hon. Mr. Argue)—look like peanuts.

The cost of living is increasing too rapidly. Machinery costs are getting out of proportion in terms of the selling price of farm products. A number of other districts, which at the present time are on the borderline of poverty, are going to be thrown on our hands to be worked out within the same manner as we are trying to deal with the present problem in slum areas.

I must say that the Government has made quite a study of the Interlake area in Manitoba. The departments of the province which are interested in this ARDA program made an intensive survey in 1964 of the needs of that area. They got the farmers into groups to find out exactly what their needs were.

The federal Government's problem at this time is the training of personnel for field work, or assisting the provinces in training of personnel for field work, so that they can apply the remedy immediately after there has been a substantial amount of research done regarding the needs of the populace.

A steady hand is needed today to guide our country, such as in planting trees only where they give better land use for woodlots and/or recreational purposes, or arranging to build large community pastures, all with the purpose in mind of providing increased employment to farmers in those areas.

I note that the minister in speaking to this bill cited a number of what he considered the essentials of the ARDA program. In reading the brief presented by the Canadian Farm Federation to the Senate Land Use Committee in 1959, I note that the brief uses almost the exact words the minister used in the Commons debate. I am quite sure that the Canadian Farm Federation will be glad to know that the minister is following out their recommendations in the ARDA program.

Hon. Rheal Belisle: Honourable senators, consideration of Bill C-151 gives me the opportunity to say a few words regarding this legislation to provide for the establishment of a fund for the economic and social development of special rural development areas.

Here is a bill with which I cannot quarrel, and I daresay no one else in this chamber will. One cannot read the contents of the bill without coming to the conclusion that the ingenuity and foresight of the Minister of Agriculture in the Diefenbaker Government gave not only inspiration and leadership to the ARDA legislation, but laid a solid foundation for this Government to build on. May I congratulate the present Government for recognizing the wisdom of the former Government.

Honourable senators, I support the bill for several reasons. First: Within its scope it will assure a continually adequate supply of efficiently produced food and fibre to meet our national requirements and our responsibilities to less fortunate people.

Secondly: It aims to foster conditions which will help to improve living standards for farmers and rural people and make them comparable with those of workers in other occupations. May I point out that the concept of the bill is somewhat more expanded than the original ARDA concept. The bill, as I understand it, will provide for the establishment of special rural development areas, an increase in small industries and operations of this type.

Thirdly: As I read the bill, it will assist in the maintenance of the economic farm unit and the continuance of healthy and productive rural communities which historically have provided a healthy, human injection into the urban life.

Fourthly: I support the measure because it will assure the conservation and wise management of our basic soil, forest and water resources, within its limited field of action.

Honourable senators, I am sure we all freely admit that this is experimental legislation which will require determined application by the Government, the co-operation of the provincial governments, and the participation of large numbers of Canadians through the various organizations that will be involved.

While this bill provides for an expenditure of only $50 million, this figure can quickly be increased when the work under this legislation proves successful, proves its popularity and is endorsed by the people it is intended to serve.

I think it was very wise not to launch into a crash program but rather to proceed cautiously and, on the basis of the experience we are able to gain from year to year in the various regions of Canada, to solve some of the basic problems. For instance, the problems in Quebec might be quite different from those in Ontario, or the prairie provinces, or even those related to the region I have the honour to represent, and while it is now known as the nickel capital of the world it once had a large agricultural potential.

It is a well-known fact that country life, because of its slow progress, has a tendency to make our young people shy away from the farm and migrate in increasing numbers to the towns and cities. Of course, the working day is longer and living conditions more difficult for the farmers than for those who live in the city, and young people are discouraged because their parents cannot help them much to settle and continue on farms.

Therefore, the credit given to the farming community, one of the best places for credit one can find, should not be reduced but increased so as to allow young people to settle on farms, for if we allow family farms to disappear we will undoubtedly find ourselves in a difficult situation one day.

Farming, like any other profession, can be learned. It is learned more easily and more rationally in the company of one's parents, brothers and sisters. The trend today is towards larger farms, and farming is considered as some sort of ever-expanding business. However, I am convinced there will always be a place for the family farm.

I should like to point out the great urgency of giving every consideration to the problems of rural life. The farmer is now squeezed between a high cost of living and the cost price, while the sale price of his produce has remained almost unchanged in the last few years. The cost of living is rising continually and the farmer is forced to obtain one loan after another to meet his obligations.

This is not a healthy state of affairs and, sooner or later, unless the necessary remedies are found, the farmer will eventually follow the very abnormal trend of going on strike—to use a much abused word—and before this becomes a plague with that occupation too, action should be taken.

Unless the federal Government assumes its responsibilities and creates conditions which will allow the farmers to continue feeding the nation and other needy areas of the world, we will have to ask ourselves whether we have really done what is necessary. Our duty is to effect legislation which is general in scope and which will give the farmer his due, that is, a fair share of the national revenue.

I think it is wise to limit the amount of money to be spent at this time. I believe the idea that the money supply can be expanded as rapidly as the situation warrants is a good principle of the legislation, and time will prove the validity of this principle. The bill has the support of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, farmers' unions, fruit growers' organizations, farmers' and womens' institutes and other community groups, particularly those rural community groups which are interested in co-operating with the Government and with the groups directly concerned in making a success of this legislation.

I would like to quote an article from the Sudbury Star of May 19. It reads:

> Northern Ontario Economy Overlooked at Ottawa, Too—
> Politically it is a misfortune that Northern Ontario is regarded as not much more than a geographical designation (and an imprecise one at that) for the northern part of this province.

Northerners know this to be true in most of their dealings with the provincial and federal governments—nothing special about our problems; the solutions just cost more.

Recently at the federal level, it becomes clear that nobody down there at Ottawa knows about the "North".

Study the debates in the House of Commons! The economic problems of Newfoundland are frequently under discussion. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are often in the spotlight under the all-embracing title of "the Maritimes". Quebec, of course, is seldom out of the news—it holds the stage front and centre. "The West" and the wheat farmers get special attention. More recently there has been special concern expressed over the economic development of "the Northwest" and its problems.

The observer of the national scene is soon made aware of what could be called the "segmentation" of Canada. He reads of some form of "special assistance" for Newfoundland, the Maritimes, Quebec, the West and the Northwest. But Northern Ontario, with its special problems, is just considered to be "a part of Ontario," and, as seen at the national level of government, with no special needs, we're entitled to no special help at all.

But there are special problems that affect Northern Ontario. They were brought to the attention of the Ottawa government recently by a delegation of 15 Northern Ontario mayors, backed by area business and industry. They argued with some vigor on rail freight rates and the curtailment of rail passenger service affecting Sudbury, for instance.

A study of House of Commons debates over a long period shows that Northern Ontario MPs familiar with northern problems have not spoken up. The Newfoundlanders, Maritimers, Quebecers and Westerners seem to be more effective in catching the ear of government.

There are matters of concern to Northern Ontario that come under national jurisdiction which do not differ greatly from those that plague areas with more active federal representation. One is the question of freight rates. The delegation of mayors sought equalization of freight rates for the North "so that it won't cost the same to ship a sack of potatoes from the Maritimes as it does from Mattawa or the Blezard Valley to the supermarkets of Toronto.

The mayors would like to see certain industrial areas in the North designated as being qualified for federal tax incentives to attract new manufacturing plants, and the mounting of a federal campaign to promote Northern Ontario as the place of new industry.

The Ottawa government could do a lot for Northern Ontario in assisting its economic development, and without treading on provincial toes. Fast-stepping Hon. Stanley Randall has placed enough on the record in the legislature to show that his department, responsible for economic development in Ontario, is setting a pace the federal government might try to keep up with.

While Ottawa foot-draggers should get busy, above all Northern Ontario needs more "active native spokesmen". If Toronto and Ottawa fail to help, perhaps it's because they do not hear enough about the nature of the problem. More delegations are needed, particularly to Ottawa. And more strident informed voices among Northern MPs must be raised in the Commons concentrating on the economic aspects of the North—for there is already too much political utterance.

Of course honourable senators will note that there is no reference to the Senate in this matter, which provides evidence that there are no foot-draggers in this chamber.

It is gratifying to read that the Bank of Montreal, as one of its centennial projects, is giving leadership in awarding 50 Centennial Farm Leadership Awards of $2,000 each, half in western Canada and half in eastern Canada. The awards will be made "to encourage and expand leadership qualities in people in rural areas to enable them to meet the problems arising from growing technological and scientific advances in agriculture and vastly changed economic conditions." The program is open to all men and women in full-time farming, and the awards are to be made on the basis of value and feasibility of the projects of a candidate's own choosing.

It would be a wonderful thing if other companies and corporations who derive large benefits from the sale of farm produce and farm machinery imitated the lead set by the Bank of Montreal, so that the industry by itself would eventually become self-sufficient and not dependent on the Government.

I sincerely believe that the present Government should be more conscious of this gulf of misunderstanding, as it applies to Government efforts to improve the economic position of our farmers. When they read that the department responsible for the National Art Gallery of Canada is ready to spend $6 million to buy a small picture, even if it is a rare piece of art, I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that it is much more important to spend such a huge amount on the welfare of our farmers who are in dire need of assistance. I was very pleased to hear honourable Senator Pouliot express, in a much more liberal way, the same opinion. There are people who consider as folly the spending of millions on articles which do not directly benefit our citizens.

I am a little overwhelmed at the dimensions of some of our rural problems and I am quite certain that we will never solve them completely unless there is understanding and support for necessary agricultural programs from our urban as well as rural taxpayers. There must be a much wider recognition of the economic problems; and I personally prefer to think of them as challenges. Rural and urban Canada are really indivisible. If we are to enjoy the fullest fruits of our labours and resources in the Canada of tomorrow, we must take a total approach to our economic problems today, a policy approach which recognizes that our rural and urban economies are inseparably integrated.

May I conclude by suggesting that the ultimate purpose of all government agricultural policy, of course, should be to put the family farm on a self-supporting basis. Or, to state it in another way, the long-term goal of government spending to support agriculture should be to eliminate or reduce to a minimum as quickly as possible the need for government support of agriculture.

Obviously, it should not be in the long-term interests of our national economy to subsidize inefficiency in any sector. We profess to be a civilized country where people come first, where the rights of the individual are paramount, and where everyone has the right to an equal opportunity for the good life, in whatever terms that might reasonably be defined. Therefore, we must do our best to manage, with a minimum of dislocation and hardship to the people involved, this transformation that is taking place in Canadian agriculture today.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator McDonald speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Before the question is put there are a few remarks I wish to make in closing the debate.

First, I wish to refer to a suggestion made by honourable Senator Irvine when she spoke on this debate. She suggested that an amendment was necessary to provide that the advisory board should consist of local people rather than senior civil servants. With all respect, I think the honourable lady is a little confused as to the responsibility and duties of the advisory board under this legislation, Bill C-151. The purpose of this board—and the reason it is to be made up of senior civil servants—is to review programs implemented from time to time, and also to consider and review suggested programs submitted to the federal department by provincial departments of agriculture.

Bill C-152, if I might be allowed to refer to it for a moment, makes provision for a local committee which shall advise the province as to what programs are necessary in their community. In the particular legislation now before us the committee referred to will not be promoting programs; they will be passing judgment on the programs brought into effect or on new programs suggested by the provinces. For that reason I cannot see any need for an amendment to accomplish exactly what the honourable senator had in mind.

I was interested in the remarks of honourable Senator Pearson because, as you all know, he comes from my own province. There has been some difficulty in some rural areas of the province so far as poverty is concerned, but I could not quite agree with him when he talked about dispossessing farmers. In my view neither this legislation nor Bill C-152 will have the effect of dispossessing farmers where resources of the area are sufficient, if properly utilized, to provide a decent standard of living for the people who live in the area. This act applies to areas in our provinces where the resources, even if developed to their maximum, will not provide a decent standard of living, and also to areas where the resources when developed will provide a decent standard of living, and it is suggested that in the first case some people must be moved out of the area.

I share his concern when he tells us about moving some of our middle-aged and older people out of the farming community. However, legislation is now available which will make it possible for those people, who because of age are not capable of being retrained, to remain in the community and have their living standard increased through the payment of an allowance. Actually it is the hope of the provincial government of Saskatchewan to move the younger people out of communities where they have no hope of receiving a good level of education or achieving a decent standard of living and to move them into communities where they can be retrained so that they may be absorbed into the urban and industrial life of the province.

One of the greatest needs in Canada today is for more workers. There is hardly a province, in western Canada at any rate, that could not absorb many thousands of additional workers, and this legislation can provide one source of supply to help fill this demand and at the same time help solve the problem of depressed areas across Canada.

Senator Pearson further suggested that the program was too slow. I would point out, however, that the federal Government has nothing to do with the speed with which the program is implemented. It is administered by the provinces.

To my honourable friend Senator Belisle I would say that if in Northern Ontario somebody is dragging his feet, it is not the responsibility of the federal Government. It is the provincial Government that is responsible for implementing programs as such under Bill C-152 or Bill C-151. The programs are suggested by local people in co-operation with provincial officials, and they are then proposed to the national Government and if accepted are brought into being on a shared basis. The speed with which this program and programs under ARDA legislation generally are implemented is the responsibility of the provincial governments.

I hope that in all areas of Canada the local people will present their ideas to the provincial governments who in turn will submit programs to Ottawa where they can be studied with a view to implementation.

As I said when introducing this legislation, I do not consider $50 million is sufficient, but if between now and 1970 we spend $50 million wisely we will have laid the groundwork and will have the right to come back to Parliament to ask for further sums to finish the job.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I move that the bill be referred to the appropriate standing Committee.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the next bill to come before us is expected to go to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, and it is likely that the same minister will be appearing in respect of both bills, it might be appropriate to refer this bill to that committee. I think this would be expeditious.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: That is satisfactory to me. I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Commttee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: With the understanding that the minister is to appear before the committee?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I would hope so. I shall certainly send word to him.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL, 1966

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill C-178, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-178 is considerably more than a housekeeping bill and considerably less than a revolutionary measure. It was extensively debated in the other place at the resolution stage on May 9 and four other days. It was considered in detail in committee of the whole house on May 25, 30 and 31, and there was some further talk, although very brief, on third reading.

As a matter of convenience to honourable senators, it might be helpful if I begin by giving an outline of the table of contents of the bill.

Sections 2 to 5 deal with the Department of the Solicitor General; sections 6 to 10, the Department of the Registrar General; sections 11 to 14, the Department of Manpower; sections 15 to 21, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development; sections 22 to 26, the Department of Forestry and Rural Development.

Sections 32 and 33 deal with the amendments to the Financial Administration Act respecting the President of the Treasury Board and some other consequential changes.

Section 34 provides for an amendment to the Department of State Act.

Section 35 makes an amendment to the Salaries Act in respect of new ministers who are to be created as a result of this legislation, should it pass, and certain consequential changes.

Section 36 provides for certain transitional provisions.

Sections 37 to 44 deal with the allocation of responsibilities for the administration of certain acts to certain ministers as a result of the changes that are made in the names of various departments and the reallocation of duties.

In a general way, honourable senators, that is a table of contents of this measure. Frankly, when I read it first I was rather bewildered, but I believe that by an analysis of this kind it becomes clear that there are certain clearly defined areas, and if honourable senators will follow the bill as I discuss it I think it will be readily understood.

I should say too that many of the actual transfers of duties which are provided for in this legislation for special reasons have already been carried out under the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act, and the legislation before us is required, among other reasons, because the names of departments are changed and new ministers, in effect, are being created.

I should add by way of preliminary observation that this is perhaps the most wide-sweeping reorganization and reallocation of functions that has ever been proposed for the public service of Canada in peacetime. I do not mean by that that there have not been extensive reorganizations in other times, but I think the fact this one is as extensive as it is is perhaps a sign of the times, as has already been referred to today by Senators Bourque and Belisle. It is also a sign of the rapidity with which conditions in all parts of the country and in all areas of the economy are changing.

The purpose of the bill is to attempt to organize departments to deal more efficiently, more effectively and certainly more realistically with modern social and economic patterns of life in Canada, under new and emerging conditions. The action that is taken here—and I am not speaking of the specific action, but very generally at the moment—has been recommended both directly and indirectly at various times by different agencies. For example, the royal commission known as the Glassco Commission made some very wide-sweeping recommendations for change. The royal commission known as the Commission on Canada's Economic Prospects also contained the seeds of some of the ideas that are incorporated in this measure. There have been studies made by the Economic Council of Canada—which body, I believe, enjoys great prestige in this country and certainly in this chamber—which are reflected in part in the terms of this legislation.

There are, of course, some quite exceptional administrators in the Public Service of Canada—a fact we are all proud of—and many of the suggested changes in this bill were put forward by these individuals because they are aware, and in the ordinary course of their duties they are bound to become aware, of the extensive change which is taking place in many parts of the country. But perhaps the real reason for the need for reorganization is the emergence of new economic and social conditions throughout Canada.

Honourable senators, the Government must and does take the responsibility for this legislation, but I would be less than frank if I did not say—and everyone will agree—that two or more governments confronted with these same conditions and situations would be most unlikely to make the proposals identical to those contained in this bill. I believe it is a matter of the judgment and the kind of thinking that goes into the solution of a problem of the type I have been discussing, that really determines the final result. I would think that there are elements in this bill which will and, indeed, have commanded general political approval in all parts of Parliament. I am just as firmly convinced that there are proposals which will be strongly criticized, and some have already been strongly criticized. I can only say that to me, at this time and in these circumstances, the bill seems to be a reasonable proposal. I hope that its provisions commend themselves to the judgment of honourable senators.

I would add one or two further preliminary comments. There has been some criticism that to embody so much legislation in one act adds to the complication of the problem and leads to confusion. I would point out to the lawyers in the house—and, to many other senators who are familiar with the legislative process—that in some respects what is being done here resembles the practice under the Statute Law Amendment Act that has been adopted in the legislatures, wherein many statutes are amended in one statute. There is some similarity between the two.

In the other place, I say quite frankly, there was a procedural advantage. If a resolution had to be introduced with respect to each individual department, be it touched ever so lightly, a special resolution would have been required and the pile-up of parliamentary talk as a result would have reduced the effective working time of the house. That consideration is not one that concerns us in this chamber. But to see the scope of the measure in one bill provides some assistance to honourable senators who desire to see all of the changes being made in perspective; and I hope everyone will agree this is an advantage.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is, to give the whole picture.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think this gives a more complete picture than we would have if we were debating separate bills.

Obviously, the bill should go to a committee, and I would hope that the appropriate ministers of the various departments mentioned, and the officials, would attend the committee meeting so that they may give details that cannot be covered in a discussion in this house. It would be helpful to me if, before the bill goes to committee, an indication were made as to what ministers would be required to appear before the committee. It is no secret that ministers are very busy, but if some notice is given I am sure I can make arrangements satisfactory to the Senate and to the members of the committee.

Honourable senators, these are preliminary and rambling remarks about the bill generally. May I deal now with the particular segments of it in sufficient detail at least to give some idea of their general tenor, but not in such detail as to weary you.

The Department of the Solicitor General is provided for in clauses 2 to 5 of the bill. This office was formerly a cabinet appointment within the Department of Justice. As honourable senators know, the main responsibility of the Solicitor General is to advise the Government upon the use of the royal prerogative of mercy in capital cases. He does assist the Minister of Justice in certain other respects, but this seems to be his main function. It has been traditional from the beginning.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It was considered one of the most insignificant portfolios, if I remember well.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps that is so, although some very important people have occupied the position. It is a department, in my opinion, that could have been utilized to much greater advantage—perhaps to the same advantage that the British use it. The Solicitor General in the United Kingdom is quite a different type of officer; he is a very important cabinet member.

This bill proposes in clauses 2 and 3 that there be a new department with a minister, a deputy minister and the necessary staff. The additional duties of the Solicitor General are set out in clause 4. He is to be charged with the administration of matters touching reformatories, prisons and penitentiaries. He is to deal with parole and remissions, and he is to be the minister to whom the Royal Canadian Mounted Police will report. The agencies dealing with these matters are self-contained units within the Department of Justice, or ones that report directly to the minister.

These new duties, as honourable senators readily see, cover enforcement and correctional activities presently in the Department of Justice. They are functions which require special and continuous attention, particularly having regard to the increase in crime in Canada, provincially and interprovincially and, indeed, internationally.

This new disposition of functions will provide a greater opportunity for correctional programs and penal reform and rehabilitation, which are subjects that have been debated extensively by very responsible people over the years. I think an opportunity for giving them higher priority in the administration of justice in Canada will emerge from the proposals contained in clause 4. It is my personal opinion that heretofore the tasks devolving upon the Minister of Justice were more than any individual minister should be asked to embrace, and there is much to be commended in the provisions of clause 4.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Does clause 4 state all the duties of the Solicitor General, or will he have other duties under other statutes?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No; that is all.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is this all-inclusive?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am talking now about his general functions, if I may call them that.

I should draw the attention of the house to the fact that these clauses dealing with the Department of the Solicitor General should be read in conjunction with clause 37, wherein it is provided that the words "Solicitor General" should be read for the words "Minister of Justice" in certain pieces of legislation, and for the names of other ministers in other statutes. I refer honourable senators to Schedule A at page 20, of the bill, from which it will be seen that the Solicitor General will have administrative responsibility for the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act. The Solicitor General will be responsible for the administration of those statutes.

I have been talking not in terms of statutes, but of general functions. However, I am glad the question was asked because it enables me to say here and now that while the new functions are described in those clauses of the bill dealing with the Department of the Solicitor General, the statutes for which this minister will be responsible are set out in Schedule A. This applies in nearly every case.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is my honourable friend in a position to say whether the solicitor general will be the only person entitled to have access to the files of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I cannot answer that question at the moment. I would think that certainly the Minister of Justice would have access to such files when he has to give an opinion. Perhaps I had better say that in the result of the setting up of this department the Minister of Justice becomes, in effect, the legal adviser of the Crown. He becomes the law officer of the Crown or the law firm to which the Crown turns. As such, I would think that he would have access to whatever is required in order for him to discharge any function he is called upon to discharge as Attorney General of Canada, and that would include access to the information my honourable friend mentioned.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Would not access to the files be under the control of whoever manages the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I would think so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And access will be given to those whom that gentleman thinks should have it.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Precisely, but certainly the Minister of Justice would be an obvious example of a minister who would require access.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: If not, he should not be Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): If not, then the Solicitor General should become the Minister of Justice. There must be a Minister of Justice.

May I turn now to clauses 6 to 10, dealing with the Department of the Registrar General. Clauses 6 and 7 provide for a new department with a new minister and deputy minister and the necessary staff.

The duties of the Registrar General may be described as those concerned with the economic aspects of national life within federal jurisdiction. This minister will be responsible for the administration of matters touching combines, monopolies and the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, which duties he will take over from the Minister of Justice. He will be responsible also for the administration of the Bankruptcy Act which is now under the Department of Justice. He will also be responsible for the administration of corporate affairs, the Canada Corporations Act, now in the Department of the Secretary of State. He will take over responsibility for patents, copyrights and trade marks from the Secretary of State. I suppose it is fair and reasonable to say that this department will have special concern for consumer interest in economic life.

No doubt a good deal of this work will be influenced very considerably on recommendations by the Economic Council of Canada. I suppose, too, that it is appropriate to say, as the Financial Times said on December 27 last, that it will be a department concerned in federal jurisdiction with the problems of business in the country within the four corners of the section setting out the duties.

This minister will in fact be responsible for many pieces of legislation. The sections dealing with the Registrar General must be read with section 38. Schedule A sets out the various acts for which the minister is immediately responsible. They are as follows: Canada Corporations Act, Combines Investigation Act, Trade Marks Act, Copyright Act, Patent Act, Timber Marking Act, Industrial Design and Union Label Act, Bankruptcy Act, Boards of Trade Act, Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, Pension Fund Societies Act, Part I of the Winding-up Act and The Trading with the Enemy (Transitional Powers) Act.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And seemingly possession of the Great Seal?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No; the Great Seal would still remain with the Secretary of State, unless I am mistaken, Senator Roebuck. In general, I think that is all I need say at this stage on the Department of the Registrar General.

I come next to the Department of Manpower and Immigration, which is dealt with in sections 11 to 14. Here again, there is a proposal for a new minister, a new department, a deputy minister and staff. The duties of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration are set out in section 13. They include the development and utilization of manpower resources in Canada, responsibility for employment services, as well as for immigration.

Honourable senators, I think it is right to say that the genesis of the proposal in this section of the bill is to be found in a committee of this house, namely, the Senate Committee on Manpower and Employment, which sat a few years ago, and for the first time highlighted the importance of the new manpower requirements in the Canadian economy. This was reflected later in the first report of the Economic Council of Canada. Perhaps that was natural, because the staff work for the Senate committee was done by the President of the Economic Council, Dr. Deutsch. The report was also commented upon by the Glassco Commission.

Generally speaking, the purpose of all these studies was to consider the potential output of the labour force of Canada in the light of the technological changes that were taking place.

In setting up this department there have been transfers of functions. From the existing Department of Citizenship and Immigration, responsibility for immigration is now vested in the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

In the Department of Labour, the minister will take over the National Employment Service, Technical and Vocational Training Programs, Manpower Consultative Services, the Research Branch dealing with manpower problems, occupational mobility, geographical mobility of workers, winter employment, and subjects of that kind and allied thereto.

These sections should be read in conjunction with section 39, which is really a consequential section with Part III of Schedule A which gives the minister responsibility for the Immigration Act, Immigration Aid Societies Act, Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act, Section 21 and Part II of the Unemployment Insurance Act, Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Act, and Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act.

Perhaps the establishment of the Department of Manpower and Immigration is one of the most important aspects of this legislation. I think, too, the establishing of a separate department of government is recognition of the urgency that is required if Canada is to hold her place competitively in the markets of the world and if her economy is to move ahead in step with other modern economies.

May I now deal briefly with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The pertinent sections are 15 to 21. Again the minister is provided for, as well as a department, a deputy minister and staff. The duties are set out in section 17. To summarize them, they include responsibility for Indian Affairs, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory and their resources and affairs, Eskimo affairs, national parks, national battlefields, historic sites and monuments, and migratory birds and other wildlife.

The minister will also be responsible for co-ordinating the activities in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory of the several departments, branches and agencies of the Government of Canada.

The minister will be responsible for undertaking and promoting programs for the further economic development of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, and for fostering, through scientific investigation and technology and research, greater knowledge of Canada's north and of the means of developing that area.

The minister will also have the control, management and administration of all lands situated in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory belonging to Her Majesty in the right of Canada, except those lands under the control of any minister other than the Minister of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

The minister will be responsible for the administration of all acts, orders and regulations not by law assigned to any other minister.

I should say that the present department, whose name is almost identical with this one, is quite different. The new department, first of all, loses control over water resources development which formerly belonged to the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, except water resources development on Indian lands and certain areas in the far north.

This department also loses jurisdiction, as against the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, over certain power and water developments as set out in Order in Council P.C. 2284. Its nondepartmental responsibilities, however, will include responsibility for the government of the Yukon Territory, the Northwest Territories, Northern Canada Power Commission, Northern Transportation Company Limited, which operates mainly on the Mackenzie River, and the National Battlefields Commission and Historic Sites and Monuments Board.

The sections dealing with the department should be read with section 40 and also with Schedule A Part IV, which gives a long list of acts for which the minister is directly responsible. I do not think I need to read these acts, because substantially I have already given their general tenor in my description of his duties. Perhaps this is a matter which can be looked at in committee if further information is desired.

Generally speaking, this minister will have jurisdiction over the federal interests in the sense that I have described them, north of the sixtieth parallel of latitude. There are a few islands in Hudson Bay which do not fall within this jurisdiction. I think they go with the Northwest Territories. This is a detail which can be dealt with in committee.

May I deal now, honourable senators, with the Department of Forestry and Rural Development, sections 22 to 26 of the bill.

Section 22 provides for renaming the Department of Forestry. The minister is renamed and provision is made for a deputy minister and staff. The duties of the minister include matters within the federal jurisdiction touching generally the forest resources of Canada and rural development in Canada. He has special authority in these fields for research studies, investigations, the establishment of experimental areas, for making agreements with provinces which will further the duties or the responsibilities that he carries and for the ARDA program. As honourable senators know, the Maritime Marshlands Rehabilitation Act is now merged with ARDA, so this minister will also be responsible for that program.

He will be responsible too for the Feed Grain Assistance Program, for the freight assistance in connection with feed grain, and for the storage that is required during the winter months. This minister will also be responsible for the Eastern Rocky Mountain Conservation Act. Honourable senators will remember that in 1947 a 25-year agreement was made with the Province of Alberta which dealt with conservation, particularly of the water resources on the eastern slopes of the Rockies, and which constitutes the important water shed of the Saskatchewan River basin. This will fall within his jurisdiction.

I come now to the proposed Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the predecessor of which was so ably presided over in other years by two senators, the honourable senator from Kenora (Hon. Mr. Benidickson) and the honourable senator from Quebec City (Hon. Mr. Flynn). I am sure they will have much to say or think about my explanation of the provisions of this section of the bill.

Section 27 deals with the establishment of the department and the appointment of a new minister. Section 28 provides for the appointment of a deputy minister and a staff.

The powers which this new minister and new department will be asked to discharge are set out in section 29. They extend to energy, mines and minerals, water and other resources, explosives and technical surveys within the meaning of the Resources and Technical Surveys Act.

At this point I should put upon the record some of the nondepartmental responsibilities for which this minister and this department will be responsible. They include the National Energy Board, the Dominion Coal Board, Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, Eldorado Aviation Limited, Atomic Energy Control Board, Atomic Energy Canada Limited.

These agencies operate under the authority of certain acts, which are set out in Schedule A, Part V. I need only refer senators to the Schedule.

Sections 27 to 31 should be read in conjunction with section 41, which section simply provides for the substitution of the name of the new minister for the old, in cases where this is required.

This minister and this new department will be responsible for integrating regional and national policies and programs for energy, water, mineral and other resources and for all of the technical programs related thereto.

The royal commission popularly known as the Glassco Commission proposed, among other things, that responsibility for water resources should go to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, as it has been known. This bill accomplishes that. This department will be generally responsible for the great energy requirements of the country and for solving the problems related thereto. So it will work not only with the officials in its own department but with the universities, with the National Research Council and, I am sure, it will take a great deal of advice from the recently established Science Council.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Honourable senators, may I ask a question? Looking at section 21, I note that the control over crown lands not vested in the Minister of Indian Affairs falls under the administration of the Minister of Public Works. Then, under section 29, I note that the jurisdiction over mines is vested in the department under the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. What would be the case of mining lands vested in the crown in right of Canada? Do they fall under Public Works or under Energy, Mines and Resources?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Generally speaking, mineral rights which are in crown lands, described as Indian lands, are administered by the crown on behalf of the bands of Indians who live on those lands. I do not know if that answers the question the honourable senator is asking. I know that in this respect I am right, that minerals under crown lands are administered by the crown on behalf of the Indian bands on the reservations there.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Generally speaking, of course, crown lands are provincial in nature, but I think there are a few anomalous situations where there are crown lands vested in the Crown in right of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, in the far north.

Hon. Mr. Lang: No, within the jurisdiction of, and the geographical boundaries of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There may be.

Hon. Mr. Lang: I wonder under what department they will fall.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): If they are federal lands, presumably they would be under federal jurisdiction, unless the natural resources had been separated by some act or agreement with the province. It would be rather difficult for me to answer that question categorically. I would ask the honourable senator to put it in committee. If he has some specific area in mind, he could bring that to the attention of the committee also.

Perhaps I have said enough on that section and indeed perhaps I have said enough on the bill. I certainly have said enough on the Department of Energy to indicate to Dr. Sullivan that my own energy is running down a little bit. I really have little to add.

Honourable senators, I come to the Department of the Secretary of State, under section 34. This is really an amendment to the Secretary of State Act and changes the powers of the Secretary of State. That minister will be responsible now for citizenship and for elections; for state ceremonial and the custody of state documents and records; for the encouragement of literary, visual and performing arts, learning and cultural activities, libraries, archives, historical resources, museums, galleries, theatres, films and broadcasting, and also for the control and management of the National Museum of Canada. This department looks after the administration of the Trade Marks Act, the Copyrights Act, the Patent Act, the Industrial Designs Act, the Companies Act, all of which go, as I have indicated earlier, to the Department of the Registrar General.

May I refer, honourable senators, to Schedule A, Part VI, which vests authority in this minister for the Canadian Citizenship Act and the Public Archives Act. As I have indicated the functions are much wider in scope than the administration of those two pieces of legislation. I should add that section 34 should be read with section 42 for the reason I have already given.

I am sure you are all glad to know that this is the last department with which I shall deal.

The Financial Administration Act, section 32, makes provision for a new minister as President of the Treasury Board, in the place of the Minister of Finance. The President, the Minister of Finance and four other ministers will constitute the Treasury Board. This was a recommendation of the Glassco Commission, and I think it is a sensible reform to undertake. The duties of the President of the Treasury Board are set out at page 10, section 4. While these do not look very formidable, in my view this is one of the most important offices of government since this is where the real control of the purse strings lies.

> 4. (1) The President of the Treasury Board holds office during pleasure and shall preside over meetings of the Board and shall in the intervals between meetings of the Board exercise or perform such of the powers, duties or functions of the Board as the Board may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, determine.

The staff of the Treasury Board is not a large one. It is generally administered in the Privy Council offices, but there will be further legislation before Parliament which will indicate that in addition to the ordinary functions of presiding over the Treasury Board meetings, the President of the Treasury Board will also deal with collective bargaining problems on behalf of the employer with the agencies in the public service, as indeed he did in the postal strike last summer.

Now, honourable senators, I have wearied you, I know—

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): —but I have tried to simplify as much as I could a rather complicated looking piece of legislation. It is not, however, as complicated as it looks. I shall be glad to answer any questions I can, but I truly think this is a bill for committee. I am not urging that it should go there without debate, but I do give the undertaking that if given second reading it will be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Translators used to come under the Department of the Secretary of State, and I see no mention of them now. Do I take it, since they are not mentioned, that they remain there?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I should have the answer to that readily.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is in section 42.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I have some information here. Among the departmental functions remaining under the Secretary of State will be the Translations Bureau and the National Museum of Canada. The Secretary of State will also be responsible for parliamentary returns and will control and direct the National Library, the Public Archives, the National Film Board, the National Gallery, the Department of Public Printing and Stationery Publications Branch.

The Secretary of State is also spokesman in Parliament and has certain responsibilities for the Board of Broadcast Governors, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and the Centennial Commission. The National Arts Centre is now under the direct control and supervision of the Secretary of State. That minister is also spokesman in Parliament for the Canada Council, the Civil Service Commission, the Representation Commission, and the Chief Electoral Officer. I think that gives the full scope of the duties of that department.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The Secretary of State is the one who shall buy the pictures.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Or rent them.

Hon. Mr. Molson: May I ask a question? I am not clear whether or not the President of the Treasury Board is a member of the Privy Council. The way the section reads, it is rather ambiguous. I am referring now to subparagraph (2) of paragraph 3 on page 10.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think the answer lies in subsection 3(1) of clause 32, on page 10:

> 3. (1) There shall be a committee of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada called the Treasury Board over which the President of the Treasury Board appointed by Commission under the Great Seal of Canada shall preside.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: It is not very clear.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Is the President to receive two salaries? It is set out that the President will receive a salary of $15,000, as will all other ministers.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): This is a drafting problem. I will ask my honourable friend to deal with it in committee, but I would be quite sure that not only the Treasury Board but also other ministers would be careful to ensure that they did not receive a salary as a minister, as a member of the Privy Council and as a member of the Treasury Board. Since we are talking about salaries, there is given a list of salaries to be paid to ministers, and honourable senators will note that there is no provision for a salary for a minister without portfolio. I do not know whether I am going to go unpaid or not.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is provided in another section of the act.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I wanted the jolt there.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I am rather mystified by this section about the Treasury Board. It is quite clear by this act that only members of the Privy Council may be members of the Treasury Board. Am I correct in thinking that in the past other than ministers have sat on the Treasury Board? If I remember correctly, for a long time the Deputy Minister of National Revenue, Mr. Sim, was a member of the Treasury Board.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think he may have been an official, but not a member. The only members of the Treasury Board are members of the cabinet and Privy Council. This I know from past experience.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I think others can act as advisers, if I remember correctly.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): When there are special problems in relation to their own departments.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Am I correct in thinking that the subject of immigration comes under the Department of Manpower, but citizenship comes under the Department of the Secretary of State? If this be so, it is a pretty fine line to draw, is it not?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I should not think so. I regard the problems of immigration of an order completely different from those of citizenship. The flow of people, the numbers of people, the types of people who immigrate, I think, have a special meaning and occupy a special place in the administration of the policy of the Government. When it comes to citizenship, this is more a matter of a person who is living here and whose rights can be decided quite apart from the other problems of the inflow of people from abroad.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: They have been separate branches in the past.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, if there are no other questions to be asked of the sponsor of this bill, I move the adjournment of the debate. I would also request that this item be placed first on the Orders of the Day for tomorrow, because I anticipate there are several honourable senators on both sides of the house who will want to speak on this matter. Perhaps we could deal with the rest of the Orders today and start with this item tomorrow. That is my request.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is quite agreeable to me. I am sure it meets with general approval.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Choquette, debate adjourned.

FAIR WAGES AND HOURS OF LABOUR ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Donald Smith moved the second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I notice on the agenda which was issued that second reading of this bill was to stand.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That was the original intention, honourable senators, but when Senator Choquette came to see me a little earlier he thought that instead of debating the Government Reorganization Bill and having further speeches on it now, we might have the explanation of Bill C-2 at this time. I have no objection to it being adjourned immediately thereafter. I am informed by the sponsor of the bill that the explanation will be short.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: There is no objection to that. The only objection I would have is that other honourable senators, not now present but intending to speak, may have taken this arrangement as definite.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There is no intention of asking for second reading today.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, unless I surprise myself and am completely carried away, I undertake to occupy only a few minutes of your time.

This is rather a simple bill which does a simple thing of some importance to those upon whom it will have an effect. I would like to see this bill progress as rapidly as possible because of my own personal realization of the effect that will flow from the provisions which are being added to the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act and, in particular, in my own constituency where we are expecting some further tenders to be called on that difficult-to-pronounce national park down in Nova Scotia, the Kejimkujik National Park.

Perhaps I might be permitted to say that it was my privilege last year to move second reading of the legislation dealing with the establishment of the Canada Labour Code, and it is an equal privilege for me to make some remarks on second reading of this companion bill to that legislation, with which Parliament dealt at the last session.

The Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act, which this bill amends, has been in effect since 1935, and it has established over the years minimum standards of wages and hours of work to be followed by contractors carrying out federal construction contracts. These standards have been related to local rates and conditions in effect in the various regions of Canada which could be accepted as being, as the old act says, "fair and reasonable." These standards will be spelled out in the amended act too, but, in accordance with the undertaking which was given last year by the Minister of Labour on behalf of the Government, during the consideration in Parliament of the Canada Labour Code, these proposed amendments will bring the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act into conformity with the minimum standards of the Labour Code.

I might say, for what it may be worth, that this bill was discussed in the House of Commons at various stages in great detail and was then referred to one of their new standing committees, where a number of days were occupied in conducting a thorough examination of the bill. The point I am coming to is that the bill was unanimously reported out of the committee without amendment.

I wish to enumerate very briefly the principal changes which are to be brought about by this bill.

In the first place, to the present definition of "fair wages" will be added these words:

> —and shall in no case be less than the minimum hourly rate of pay prescribed by or pursuant to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code.

Therefore, in future it will be a condition of Government construction contracts that the present labour standards rate of $1.25 per hour will be the minimum rate; but, of course, in many localities the actual rate will be higher than this minimum.

Secondly, the present act provides that the working hours on Government contracts shall not exceed eight hours per day or 44 hours per week, except in special cases with the approval of the minister or in cases of emergency. The new section will provide, in accordance with the Canada Labour Code, that persons in such employment shall be paid at an overtime rate of time-and-a-half for hours worked more than the standard eight hours a day or 40 hours a week. The significant change is to reduce the number of ordinary working hours undertaken at regular rates from 44 to 40 hours a week. It is provided, however, that the working hours shall not exceed the eight hours per day standard, or a total of 48 hours per week, including overtime, except where authorized by permit. The change involved extends the 44-hour limit to 48 hours, and it relieves the situation where permits would have to be granted in more cases than would otherwise be necessary.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Are eight hours of that total to be paid at overtime rates?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): If someone worked more than eight hours in any one day, those hours beyond the eight hours in any one day would be paid for in this classification of employment at time-and-a-half. If during a week a man worked more than 40 hours, those hours beyond the 40 hours would be paid for at time-and-a-half his regular rate of employment

Hon. Mr. Denis: Does it mean that Saturday does not count? It is five days a week, and eight hours a day; that is 40 hours a week. What happens to men who work on Saturdays?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): I am very sorry, but I do not understand the honourable senator's point.

Hon. Mr. Denis: The honourable senator mentioned eight hours a day and 40 hours a week. Does this mean that if somebody works on a Saturday he will be paid an overtime rate, such as time and a half?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): There is nothing in the Canada Labour (Standards) Code about working on Saturdays. The two main provisions are that the regular working day shall be one of eight hours duration, and the regular work week shall be one of 40 hours. Any man who, in either of those periods, works more than the regular hours is entitled to overtime pay. This is the same principle that is adopted in private industry.

Honourable senators, it is important to mention that in this bill provision is made for the first time for a penalty. In future for each failure to comply with any of these conditions—and these amendments provide they shall form part of the contract entered into between Her Majesty the Queen and the contractor—the contractor must pay to Her Majesty the sum of $50. This is a quick way of penalizing a contractor for not carrying out the provisions of the bill, and without making it necessary for inspectors to be continually on the job examining books and allocating the amounts of pay. It can be ascertained readily whether a contractor has broken the law in this respect, and if he has he will be subject to a penalty of $50. In other words, a few sharp teeth are being placed in the act.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Will the employer also have to pay the wages he ought to have paid?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Yes, that provision is being continued. It is in the original act. It is important to make that point.

I should point out also that the regulations section of the act is enlarged, by giving authority to make regulations for the enforcement of nondiscriminatory fair employment practices which are required to be observed in carrying out construction contracts for the Government.

None of these new provisions—perhaps this is obvious—should be applied to those contracts already entered into, or to those for which tenders have been called before the act comes into force by proclamation of the Governor in Council.

It may be of interest to honourable senators to know that federal Government contracts—that is, contracts to which this act applies—involve about three per cent of the construction in Canada. The remaining 97 per cent comes within provincial jurisdiction.

It will be obvious that in many parts of Canada these new minimum standards of wages and hours of work applying to federal construction contracts will have little effect because of the high wage rate structure that prevails in those parts, but in other areas of the country the effects of this bill will be considerable. Its greatest effect, as has been the case in respect of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, will be felt in my own province of Nova Scotia. The Canada Labour (Standards) Code has had a considerable influence upwards on the provincial standards. I am quite conscious of the fact that because of the relatively lower standards of wages and hours of work that exist in most rural areas of the country, these amendments will have direct significance and will be well received by those who are likely to be employed on federal construction contracts, such as those in connection with national harbours and the multi-million dollar national park undertaking in my own province.

Honourable senators, I think that is a sufficient explanation of the intent of this bill, and I seek your favourable consideration of it. If, as the debate develops, honourable senators feel it should be referred to a committee for consideration, then I will be very glad to move that it be referred to an appropriate committee.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Would the honourable senator be good enough to enlarge on clause 5? I have in mind mail contracts for periods of two, three of four years entered into last year. Would they be affected by the passage of this bill?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): No. I am in a position to answer that directly. Mail contracts cannot be classed as construction contracts. The act which this bill amends has application only to construction contracts awarded by the Government of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable sponsor of this bill a question? He said that for the first time teeth were being put into the act. From a reading of the new section 3(1)(c) it seems to me that they are substantial teeth, because that paragraph reads "... in respect of any employee—" If a fairly large contractor with a thousand employees on the job does not pay proper wages, then he may be in a very vulnerable position. Is this the honourable sponsor's interpretation of that provision?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): I am at a loss to answer that question. Perhaps during the course of the debate one of my legal friends will assist me. My honest answer is that I do not know. I would assume that the Department of Labour, as in most other matters, operates in a very reasonable fashion, and that it is not its custom to put undue burdens upon people with whom it does business. I would expect that they would administer the act in such a way as not to make it difficult for anybody.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY OF ENDOCRINOLOGY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Maurice Bourget, chairman of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-29, to incorporate The International Society of Endocrinology, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

MENNONITE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (CANADA) —REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Bourget, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-37, to incorporate Mennonite Central Committee (Canada), and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move, with leave, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, June 13, 1966, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Senator Brooks and I, with other senators, have been trying to determine what might best be done about the volume of work we have on hand and the prospect of receiving more. We are agreed generally that the best course to adopt is to reassemble on Monday night next, as this would give the committees an opportunity to discuss some of the legislation now before the chamber.

Motion agreed to.

HON. NORMAN A. MACKENZIE

FELICITATIONS ON ELECTION AS NATIONAL PRESIDENT OF ASSOCIATION OF CANADIAN CLUBS

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, the Senate has been honoured again. Yesterday, the honourable Senator Norman MacKenzie, former President of the University of British Columbia, was signally honoured by being elected National President of the Association of Canadian Clubs.

This very great honour is but a continuation of the many honours he has been garnering in the course of a very useful life which is far from over. As a former student of his at the University of Toronto, I am sure I speak for all senators in extending to him heartiest congratulations.

Hon. John J. Connolly: We are all most grateful to Senator Walker for what he has said of his former professor. Perhaps I might add that the professor too should be proud of his student.

I understand an announcement has been made in the other place today that the same honourable gentleman has been asked to undertake some arduous duties in connection with conciliation work in a very important segment of the economy. The sense of fairness which has always actuated this honourable gentleman in his career will undoubtedly be displayed again on this occasion. He is performing a great public service in taking on this burden of extra work, and I know I speak for all honourable senators in wishing him well in his new duties.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL, 1966

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) for the second reading of Bill C-178, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I think that the highest compliment I can pay to the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) who sponsored this bill yesterday is to say that he made an able presentation of a badly-drafted and ill-conceived bill. We could refer to his efforts as what the French people call a tour de force or quite a feat.

Despite a close reading of the debates of another place, and despite the explanation which was given so ably yesterday, I must say that in my opinion a number of mistakes have been made by the Government in connection with this measure.

It may be true, as the Prime Minister insisted, that the inclusion of these extensively diverse matters in one composite bill would enable the Government to accomplish its massive reconstruction of ministries and ministerial functions in one fell swoop. It might have been considered that the Opposition would be overpowered by the magnitude of the undertaking, the complexity of the matters dealt with, and the expertise required to reply effectively to the proposals made. In my opinion, however, this bill is neither more nor less than a lazy man's load. It would have been far better legislatively and much less confusing to deal with each department, old as well as new, seriatim and individually. In that way it would have been possible to assess individually the merits of each ministerial change.

It is difficult enough to understand what has already been done as a matter of administration, let alone what is being confirmed or changed by this omnibus bill. In my view there should have been separate bills for each department of government affected, not only from the point of view of the convenience of Opposition members, but also that it might be made abundantly clear for the future precisely what changes have been made. The net product before us is organized confusion, now and possibly for the future. The Government could, I am sure, have gone about this matter in a much more comprehensible and practical way.

Having said that, I will allow myself one further generalization. I cannot believe in the present context that what is needed is a further proliferation of departments and ministers. What is needed is a consolidation of the existing ministry, with genuine leadership at the top. None of us can have remained unmoved by the recent pleas of Senator Crerar in this respect. If the hidden suggestion in this bill is that more of "the three wise men" should be brought into the Cabinet, why not let them in by removing some who are obviously less wise?

I regret I cannot vote for the second reading of this omnibus bill, which is more in the nature of a tractor then an omnibus. There is no single principle in it: there is, by admission, a multiplicity of principles which taken together do not guarantee better government in this country. But even if, as I suspect might happen, this bill receives second reading, a heavy burden will still rest on those who in committee must demonstrate that these drastic changes will, in fact, represent an improvement over what has gone before. Reform is of no use for the sake of change alone. It must be clear that what is being changed is understood and that what is suggested will constitute a real improvement in the administration of the affairs of Canada. I, for one, am not convinced.

The reason why the establishment of new departments is being done by way of a composite bill, we are told, is merely to save time. But what of the question of future amendments to such a piece of legislation—and we know it is customary, almost from year to year, to amend acts. Will it be as easy for both houses to amend this type of act as it would be to amend four or five separate acts? I have grave doubts on this question.

We are assured by the sponsor of this legislation that if accepted by Parliament it will not add to the number of members of the cabinet. This is all to the good, because many people, including parliamentarians, feel that the cabinet is already too large. I understand it has been intimated by the Prime Minister that there might be an approximation to the British system under which there are currently 23 ministers inside the cabinet and 31 ministers outside. These junior ministers attend such meetings of the cabinet as are concerned with the affairs of their department. They also serve on cabinet committees as required, and I believe they share the collective responsibilities of the cabinet as a whole. In other words, cabinet solidarity applies to them. This seems to make good sense to me, but I must point out that the present bill does not concern itself with this matter, and that such a change could well have been accomplished without legislation, let alone an omnibus bill of this kind.

I do not propose at this stage to examine every aspect of the departmental changes contemplated. It may be true that the so-called trifurcation of the Department of Justice may result in a "beefing up" of the administration of justice in this country by removing certain functions which have over the years become attached, by accident or design, to the Department of Justice. I sincerely hope that this will prove to be the case, because I am sure that all honourable senators will agree that the administration of justice in this country could stand some "beefing up."

Having said that, I add this, that no department, whether bifurcated or trifurcated, will be any better or stronger than the minister who heads it and his deputy. I will leave it at that.

What I have just said, I suggest, applies with equal force to such things as Immigration and Manpower. We cannot say a priori that such-and-such a consolidation will or will not work. That can be judged only as a matter of insight in the light of experience, but we are nonetheless expected to be armchair quarterbacks, not only before the game has been won but before the warm-up.

While I am on the subject may I remark that unquestionably the proposed Minister of Manpower has had long experience in labour matters, particularly in the matter of strikes, but the new minister, as I understand the bill, will inherit only part of the functions of the former Department of Labour and only a partial function with regard to immigration.

In particular, I believe that the Minister of Manpower will not have direct contact with the conciliation services of the Department of Labour. We heard read yesterday the functions of this minister as they appear in clause 13 of the bill, namely:

> The duties, powers and functions of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration extend to and include all matters over which the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, not by law assigned to any other department, branch or agency of the Government of Canada, relating to
> (a) The development and utilization of manpower resources in Canada;
>
> (b) employment services; and
> (c) immigration.

Honourable senators, here is a man with these qualities and extensive experience in labour matters and with labour unions, given a ministry of this type. Surely, although he will be replaced some day by another minister who I hope will be equally competent, the services of this minister could have been better utilized. He could have dealt with unions. He could have negotiated. He could have helped regulate or settle strikes, but, no, he is given immigration. I doubt whether he knows very much about immigration.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): And manpower.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Very well; my honourable friend has mentioned manpower. He has two portfolios. Is Citizenship and Manpower now going to work hand in hand in this way? Are we going to tell the Minister of Manpower to find out how many qualified plumbers and how many able carpenters Canada needs, and then turn to the Department of Immigration and tell it to get 200,000 men in these trades? Is that the way we are going to deal with immigration? I cannot see it for a moment.

I add merely that the former Minister of Labour, the Honourable Michael Starr, enjoyed a record in the field of labour conciliation unsurpassed in the history of Canada. I can only hope—and the present circumstances are not too encouraging—that the new minister, having in mind his limited mandate, will be able to compile as good a record. My point is, as in all the affairs of men, personalities are the dominating factor regardless of any words in the statute book.

It is not difficult to dream up solutions of a theoretical kind. Any one person, for instance, could, as an intellectual exercise, suggest an entirely new Constitution for Canada. The difficulty is that no two people would produce a similar solution. We will know, I suppose, within a few years whether these readjustments will have a beneficial effect or not. Despite the reassuring words of the sponsor of this bill (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) I must confess—although I doubt whether my attitude will affect the passage of this bill—that my doubts and hesitations about the efficiency of this measure outweigh any feeling of confidence I might have for its success.

Thus far, honourable senators, I may seem to have spoken in a light vein, but legislation of this kind cannot be treated casually in this chamber, which has been called a chamber of sober, second thought. It is not a laughing matter. We have here a single bill which sets up eight Government departments and substantially amends at least five statutes, namely, the Department of Public Works Act, the Department of Forestry Act, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys Act, the Financial Administration Act, and the Salaries Act.

In addition, Schedule A transfers to new ministers or departments the administration of 54 separate statutes. Schedule B more modestly lists about 30 acts which are amended, or repealed in whole or in part.

I have been a member of this chamber, honourable senators, for eight and a half years, and I think I can say that we have not been accustomed to receiving omnibus bills. When one did come before us its sponsor told us it was a package deal, and almost apologized for the complexity of it. A dangerous precedent is being established here. I do not know who is responsible for this type of legislation, but I think there are new legal minds in the Department of Justice and other departments who decide that they will take a short cut, and every now and then give us an omnibus bill that we are supposed to accept holus bolus.

Within a few days we shall receive another one, containing 73 pages. It has already been given first reading in the other place. I refer to Bill C-193. I shall not comment on its various clauses, but I do want to mention what it is about. It is a bill to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act, the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways Employees' Provident Fund Act and the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition Act. What a nice bouquet we shall be receiving soon!

If we do not protest, some day we shall see Parliament being run by people in the Department of Justice who want to take these shortcuts. Honourable senators, no matter on what side of the house we may be, we should protest this kind of legislation because it is bad. In all fairness to the public and those who have to peruse the statutes, it is my opinion that because of the confusion caused by this bill the Government should give an assurance that the matter will be regularized in respect of every department affected, whether new or existing. At the very least, a brochure should be prepared immediately so that the exact status of each department may be known to all. Perhaps there should be a brochure published for each department, which will include information as to the statutes to be administered by that department and the boards which report to it. If that is not done there will be confusion.

I dare any honourable senator present to tell me, for instance, under what department pipe lines come. I have been trying to obtain that information over the last few days, but without success. The best information I was able to get is that it is not known whether pipe lines come under one department or several departments. One official suggested to me that gas may be under one department, and metal pipe under another. What kind of confusion is this? I do not think there is a senator here today who can tell me which department will, under this new legislation, administer pipe lines. That is only one example.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I suggest to the honourable senator that if he looks at Schedule A, Part V, to the reference to the National Energy Board Act, he will have his answer.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Will that be the only department dealing with pipe lines? I am not satisfied, because I have communicated with many people who are interested in this subject, and I was not able to obtain definite information.

This bill proposes extremely bad legislation—bad for the country, bad for Parliament which should know better, and it sets a bad precedent for the future, as I have just explained.

I understand that the Government has to a large extent repented, or regretted, the form taken by this bill—and so it should. Nevertheless, in my view, the Senate should not give the breath of life to this malformation. Better it were never born. I invite honourable senators opposite who are experienced in legislative matters—Senator Roebuck, Senator Croll, Senator Hugessen, the honourable Leader of the Government—although he is not in a position to express an opinion—and Senator Power. I ask all of them to tell me if they believe sincerely that this is sound and good legislation. And I ask senators to indicate their abhorrence of this type of legislation by voting against it on second reading. Its principle, if any, is organized confusion.

Finally, the bill is misnamed. If the bill is in fact referred to committee, I think that clause 1 should be amended so that the short title will read, "This act may be cited as the Government Disorganization Act, 1966."

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The honourable gentleman directed a special question to me as to whether I think this is good legislation. My answer is yes.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I thought you would say that. Everything your government puts through is good legislation.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No; I do not say that.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: The honourable gentleman also directed a question to me. Frankly, I cannot understand the object of my friend's remarks to me. It is just a question of one piece of legislation instead of six. What is the difference?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: The difference is the confusion and the amendments of so many statutes; that is the confusion.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Surely from year to year we have legislation which amends a number of different statutes. That is not new.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Not too often.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Sometimes it affects 20 million people.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford): Carried!

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, I am not going to touch on the propriety of this type of legislation; that has already been done ably by Senator Choquette. I merely say that I agree with the views that he expressed.

At the same time, I think that the analogy that the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) drew when he was introducing this bill, between a bill of this type and the Statute Law Amendment Act, which we have from time to time, is not a particularly apt analogy.

Despite the fact that we have before us eight or more bills in one—and the Leader of the Government said that he hoped that appropriate ministers of the various departments mentioned and their officials will attend the committee—nevertheless, we shall want the ministers who will be responsible for various parts of this legislation to appear before the committee to give us more information than we have now or will obtain in this chamber.

If that means some considerable delay in the passing of this bill, and I suspect it may, then we do not need to be concerned, because, after all, there is no urgency about the bill.

It is generally understood, and I think I am correct in saying this, that most of the reallocation of responsibilities has already taken place. There may be one or two minor responsibilities which to date have not been transferred under the legislation that is available for that purpose.

Therefore, I say that we shall want to hear from the Solicitor General; we shall want to hear from the President of the Privy Council, who is reputed to be the new Registrar General as well; we shall want to hear from the Minister of Citizenship and Immmigration, who is about to become the Minister of Manpower and Immigration; we shall want to hear from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who is being shorn of considerable of his powers, with some minor additions; and we shall want to hear from the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: And the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: My colleague suggests the Minister of Justice. We shall want his views as to what is happening to his department. We shall want to hear from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who has inherited very heavy responsibilities from three or four other ministers.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: He has not expressed dissatisfaction, has he?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: No, but we would like to hear from him.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: He appears to be satisfied.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: He might not be satisfied after discussion in committee; one never can tell.

We shall want to hear from the Minister of National Revenue, reputed also to become President of the Treasury Board. I am not suggesting that we call the Secretary of State, for I think we can probably conclude our deliberations in committee without that.

In his opening remarks the Prime Minister is reported by the press to have said that this bill was primarily about the need for a reorganization of government. That the Government needs to be reorganized, there is no question. There are several ways of doing it. The voters failed to do it in November 1965. However, we may be somewhat more optimistic as to what they will do on the next occasion when they have an opportunity to pass on the Government.

There is also a way of doing it methodically, systematically, exposing fully the reasons for both expanding departments and contracting departments, and that is by following through carefully the recommendations of the Glassco Commission and either accepting or rejecting them and indicating why.

It has been suggested by the leader of the Government that this bill sprang to some extent out of the recommendations of the Glassco Commission. It seems to me that the bill has been tailored not to produce efficiency but to make way for the people available and politically necessary. We shall now have 26 ministries, not to mention the ministers without portfolio. We have a number of new ministers, and they will be set up with all the trappings of a deputy minister and staff, which in turn will start to expand.

The truth of Parkinson's law will be fully evident in a few years if this bill goes through in its present form. Those of you who would like to refresh your memories of Mr. Parkinson's first book will find that he said that when any Cabinet reaches more than 20, or possibly 21, its effectiveness ceases and it becomes steadily less effective as its numbers increase. He suggests that the proper figure is somewhere between three and 21, but he declines to give a specific figure. He says that some people suggest the ideal figure is eight. He points out that eight was the number of members of the committee of state of Charles I, and he suggests that what happened to Charles is probably the reason there has never been a Cabinet of eight, so far as he knows.

One could review the recommendations of the Glassco Commission at great length. One could comment on what may come out of some of the present proposals. Possibly there is something to be said for a Registrar General, and some of us may hope that the result of combining these various pieces of legislation under one department may be the sensible revision of the Combines Investigation Act, which has been promised from time to time. However, one loses hope when one finds that all that is happening is that the Combines Investigation Act, to mention only one of these matters being transferred, is going to be administered, according to current information, by the former Minister of Justice, who, when he had those responsibilities, failed to produce the improvements which we looked for in that statute and in other statutes.

It is interesting to note where this bill does not follow the Glassco Commission. There are some examples, of which I will mention two. One is the Department of Defence Production. I suggest honourable senators read the recommendations made with regard to that department to see whether this bill carries them out. In regard to the Department of Public Works, I make the same suggestion. At this time I will not labour to put the specific recommendations on the record and indicate where they have been deviated from.

As I recall, there was no specific recommendation respecting the Department of Transport, but there was a serious suggestion that that at least was a department in which the minister was overburdened and some action should be taken. However, I do not see that referred to in this bill. Honourable senators, in regard to the Treasury Board, I will quote the Glassco Commission report. The commission made some very definite recommendations about the Treasury Board, as given in volume 1 of the report at page 54:

> —the Treasury Board needs to be strengthened by the appointment of a presiding minister with no departmental responsibilities, who would give day-to-day guidance to its staff, provide the initiative needed within the Board itself, and ensure that general considerations of good management find adequate expression within Cabinet on all matters to which they are relevant.

Those of us who have been sitting on the Finance Committee and have listened on a number of occasions to the Secretary of the Treasury Board, one of our ablest public servants, appreciate more than ever the extent and the magnitude of the problems involved in ensuring good management in government.

Although it may not be correct, my understanding is that the Minister of National Revenue is to become president of the Treasury Board. The Minister of National Revenue may be somewhat less busy than the Minister of Finance, who has been the president by law to date; but my assessment of the responsibilities of the Minister of National Revenue is that he will be left with very little time to do the specific things the Glassco Commission recommended and which the public will think this bill is carrying out.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): You mean in respect of the Treasury Board?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Yes. If the Treasury Board is to be separated from the Department of Finance, there should be a minister, the Glassco Commission says, with no departmental responsibilities, as the President of the Treasury Board.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is a very reasonable statement.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Otherwise, my suggestion is that it would be better to leave the Treasury Board with the Minister of Finance and appoint a strong parliamentary secretary to the Miniser of Finance who might assume those responsibilities.

I see Senator Leonard shaking his head. I merely throw that out as a suggestion, and I have some more.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that, in any reorganization, when there is an expansion in departments one frequently can contract or eliminate some other departments. I suggest that the Department of Public Works could function perfectly well and probably more efficiently as a crown corporation. I suggest that the Post Office Department could certainly function more efficiently as a crown corporation. One or two policy matters would have to be settled by a minister. The Secretary of State would have to approve the final design of the stamps, and there are other cultural matters of that nature which we might not want to entrust to the President of the Post Office as a crown corporation. However, those matters could be dealt with very easily.

A case can even be made out for not having a Minister of National Revenue. There was a considerable period when we did not have one. I am anxious to get efficiency in Government, to reduce this Cabinet to at least below the upper limit where, Mr. Parkinson says, danger follows. It is for that reason that I give these suggestions to the Leader of the Government.

Honourable senators, I have a final sugestion. When I heard that this bill was coming down, I was hoping there would be a clause in it referring to the statute setting up the Department of Industry, and saying, "it is hereby repealed."

If there has ever been an instance of overlapping of duties, functions and responsibilities, between three departments, this has been by the creation of the Department of Industry. May I quote Parkinson's first law: "Work expands so as to fill the time available for its completion." One has only to look at the Estimates for the Department of Industry in the past few years to note the steady growth in personnel and look at the salary levels to realize that once one sets up a new department, Parkinson's law will inevitably be applied. The department is there, it must find work to do and, having found work to do, it must add staff—and so it goes on until we have the result which we see today.

I have never been able to understand the exact difference between "industry" and "trade and commerce." I question whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce, either the former minister or the present minister, understands the difference. If we are to reform Government organization, I suggest that is one more place where we might do so.

Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Choquette, there is no principle in the bill which I can discern or which, if I do discern, I can approve. As I said earlier, it appears to be tailored to suit the individuals available and who are politically necessary to fill posts that are set down here.

I will oppose giving the bill second reading.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Speaker: May I remind honourable senators that if Senator Connolly speaks at this time it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, while I do not agree with some of the remarks made by the two senators who have spoken, I thank them for their participation in this debate and for the criticisms they have made, some but not all of which appear to me to be constructive. Yesterday, in opening the debate, I said that in any case of reorganization of departments of government, no two governments, no matter of whom composed, would do the thing in exactly the same way.

In regard to what Senator McCutcheon says about making crown corporations out of the Department of Public Works, the Post Office Department and—he did not quite say this—perhaps even out of the Department of National Revenue—

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Right.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): —this is something that certainly merits some consideration. It is not done by this bill, but the fact that the suggestion is on the record at least indicates an opinion in Parliament which is worthy of consideration.

Senator McCutcheon's suggestion that, following the Glassco Commission report, the President of the Treasury Board should be a minister of the Crown without departmental responsibility, is still possible under this legislation, because as I read the section it is up to the Governor in Council to decide what minister shall be President of the Treasury Board as long as it is not the Minister of Finance. To be perfectly frank, seeing the kind of burden that the President of the Treasury Board has to carry, I certainly would not disagree with the honourable gentleman's proposal.

The question of the size of the cabinet is in my view a moot point. Perhaps the Government that reduces the cabinet to eight might suffer the fate of Charles I. I think it would be virtually impossible to do that. I am rather intrigued by Senator Choquette's point about the fact that the Canadian cabinet has some 26 members, while the British cabinet—the system which he endorses—has some fifty-four. I wish there were more cabinet representation in this house. I think it would be a good thing for Parliament, for this house, and for the legislative process. But to say that the number should be 23, 21 or 15, or to say that we should have an inner cabinet and an outer cabinet, as is the case in England, is a matter of judgment, and much depends upon the requirements as the government of the day sees them for the purpose of administration of the public business.

I am rather surprised at the kind of treatment Senator Choquette gives to the Department of Manpower and Immigration. I think he was in the Senate, and he may have been a member of the committee of the Senate which dealt with Manpower and Employment. I certainly think that the first real study of the problem in a comprehensive fashion was carried out by that very committee. For that reason I do not accept and I do not think very many senators can accept the description of the function of a Minister of Manpower given by the honourable gentleman.

He talks too in a complaining way about omnibus bills. I agree that to deal with the different measures in the same bill could possibly be a cause of great confusion. He cited a bill which will shortly come here, and which we should not be debating now, which deals with the public service superannuation, pensions of the R.C.M.P., and various other pension matters. Simply because these matters are handled by specific measures, he says it is not good enough to put them all together, that there is no principle running through them. In this case there is a very definite principle running through the bill to which he refers—though I am not altogether familiar with the bill—namely, the question of pensions, in various segments of the public service, perhaps including the armed forces, for the purpose of integrating these pensions with the Canada Pension Plan.

The honourable senator says he finds no principle in this bill. Honourable senators, I find a very important principle in this bill, namely, the principle of reorganizing government departments in a way that commends itself to the Government of the day, with the assistance and advice that it has had from time to time from various royal commissions which I named yesterday, and from the rather experienced administrators in the public service. I think that this bill should commend itself to Parliament, and the fact that it comes in one measure will not, in my humble opinion, create the great difficulty foreseen by the honourable senator.

I said yesterday that I thought it would be a very simple matter to provide an office consolidation after the measures are adopted by Parliament and the provisions of the bill have been put into effect in the various departments. Furthermore, I think we can very shortly expect a revision of the statutes. The last revision was carried out in 1952 and a new revision will certainly incorporate the amendments to the various statutes in their appropriate places.

I agree with Senator McCutcheon that the analogy between this bill and the Statute Law Amendment Act passed by this Parliament is not perhaps too apt an analogy. But I thought it would be some help to say it in my opening for the purpose of indicating that many statutes are being changed in one way or another.

Senator McCutcheon asked particularly about the attendance of witnesses in committee.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: May I interrupt for just a moment?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Certainly.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I did not mention the Minister of Labour. I have views about the division of responsibility as between him and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and I would certainly like to have the minister before the committee.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Well, I gladly assure honourable senators that I shall do everything I can to facilitate the work of the committee. I expect to speak to its chairman today and I hope the committee will get to work quite early next week. I think it will be the responsibility of the committee, of which Senator McCutcheon is a valued member, to see that as many people are brought there as are necessary to satisfy the members of the committee.

I agree with Senator McCutcheon that the recommendations of the Glassco Commission with reference to the Department of Defence Production, the Department of Public Works, the Department of Transport and perhaps other departments have not yet been fully implemented, but many of them have already been dealt with, and this bill reflects a further step in the process of reorganization. In my view this bill goes a long way towards accomplishing the results which that royal commission sought to achieve.

Honourable senators, I think there is no need for me to say anything more at this stage. I thank all honourable senators for the contributions they have made. I hope the committee will be satisfactory and informative and that it may even persuade the honourable senators opposite that we have a shining example of good legislation in the bill before us.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), seconded by honourable Senator Beaubien (Provencher), that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West), bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

FAIR WAGES AND HOURS OF LABOUR ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne) for the second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act.

Hon. John Hnatyshyn: Honourable senators, this bill has been very ably presented by the sponsor. As a matter of fact, he made such a good job of it in his pleasant manner that he gave the impression it was just a routine amendment that probably did not require much discussion. With that view I differ a great deal. I think this bill should receive most careful scrutiny in one of our committees.

Honourable senators will recall the difficulties that were encountered in the passage of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code in 1964. Several industries found it unrealistic. For instance, the railway running trades were governed by the mileage run by train crews and not by the hours of work. Also steamships cannot remain stationary on a Sunday. The problem of the grain elevators out west came up where it was practical to average out hours of work instead of having eight hours each day. I also remember the problem involving summer resorts run by the two railways and by other companies. In view of representations made at the time by both labour and management, the Minister of Labour, as we all recall, held up the passage of that bill from October 1964 until February 1965. At that time he presented a number of Government amendments to provide for the flexibility which both labour and management felt were essential if the legislation was to be practicable. Many of those amendments were originally suggested in committee.

In regard to this Bill C-2, I understand the joint labour and management delegation presented a brief to the then Minister of Labour in May 1965, asking for further consideration. I understand that they did not even receive a reply in May 1965.

After the Speech from the Throne this session, Bill C-2 appeared in January of this year and was given first reading. Again, the labour and management association interviewed the present Minister of Labour, Mr. Nicholson, and I understand they had two meetings with him. Then, when the bill finally came before a committee of the House of Commons, there was a joint delegation of labour and management and I understand that the hearings in committee in the House of Commons lasted for three days. I feel that we too should have this bill go to committee, where all its items can be considered after hearing various representations both from the Government side and from labour and management.

I understand that the labour and management group are united and feel that fair standards and fair wages are those that are negotiated by labour and management. This practice has been followed by Quebec for some 30 years. They also feel that in regard to such things as roadbuilding, more flexibility is needed regarding hours of work because the season is short.

The main objection I have is that the Government is too hasty in ignoring the just representations of labour and management in this case. On the one hand, the Government pleads for labour and management co-operation; and, on the other hand, in regard to this bill, it seems completely to ignore labour and management.

Also, I believe a strong argument can be made that fringe benefits be included in wage determinations. Both labour and management wish to have negotiated employer-paid benefit plan contributions incorporated into "fair wages." This has been done in the United States legislation under the Davis-Bacon Act which was amended in 1963.

I do not think we should hurry this legislation if it is to stand the test of time. We should certainly give it a close study in committee. Parliament is granting bargaining rights to civil servants. I do not object to that, but I have yet to be convinced that it is right to refuse the request of labour and management under this bill, because in this regard there is absolutely no difference of opinion between labour and management. I would like this house to give serious consideration to fringe benefits, which this bill ignores. Many of these, such as medicare and the Canada Pension Plan are not covered by present legislation. There are fringe benefits consisting of sick pay, supplementary unemployment benefits and group life insurance for which there is no legislation now.

In my opinion, there has been too great a tendency recently to pass legislation which the Government thinks is needed, when the people concerned do not want it and are usually against it. You hear all over the country that the Government is getting too high and mighty in regard to some legislation that has been passed. Probably the result of the Quebec election last Sunday brings this to our attention. It may be that too much of the legislation the Government thought was necessary for the people was passed when the people did not think it was needed.

In conclusion, I again appeal to the sponsor and to honourable senators not to rush passage of this measure. Let us send it to the appropriate committee where we can hear representations from both sides so that we will know exactly the difficulties that confront both labour and management.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words in regard to this bill. Perhaps I should begin by saying that I believe it is necessary—although I regret it—that we have to pass such legislation as this. I say this because actually the main purpose of this bill is to raise the minimum rate of pay to $1.25 an hour. It does seem sad in this day and age that we need legislation to bring the minimum wage under federal Government contracts up to that rate.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton): But the fact remains, as has been pointed out by the sponsor, that there is an area where that minimum is higher than the provincial minimum wage law. For example, in Nova Scotia there are three areas for minimum wage purposes, and in the area to which the honourable senator from Queens-Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Smith) referred yesterday, the minimum wage under provincial legislation would be 90 cents an hour. Now, the passing of this act would mean that those employees would get at least $1.25. I would expect that in that area where there are no other industries the minimum would be paid. The minimum wage laws of Nova Scotia provide a higher rate than those of any of the other Atlantic provinces. I do know that in our neighbouring Province of Newfoundland the minimum wage at the present time is 70 cents an hour for men. I do not know what it is in Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: It is 90 cents in New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton): It is necessary, therefore, that we have this legislation in order to bring that minimum up to $1.25 per hour. It seems to have been assumed that this would not apply to too many projects because the federal Government itself does not engage in a large amount of construction, but it must be remembered what is provided in section 5(1) of the act. It reads:

> Whenever the grant or payment of any public moneys of Canada is authorized or made by way of contribution, subsidy, loan, advance or guarantee, for or in aid of the construction, remodelling, repair or demolition of any work, otherwise than for the Government of Canada, the party intended to receive such grant or payment (whether the government of any province or any municipal or other body or any person or agency whatever) shall, unless the grant or payment is by statutory authority or by agreement with the Government of Canada excepted from the operation of this section, be required to enter into an agreement with the Government of Canada in which there shall be set forth the terms and conditions upon which such grant or payment is to be made.

Then it goes on to state that the agreement will contain this clause about fair wages and hours of labour.

In this day and age when the federal Government makes contributions to so many projects—for example, the Trans-Canada Highway, the Roads to Resources program to which it contributes half the cost, the Technical and Vocational Training Schools, the Vessel Construction subsidy, and the Coal Storage subsidy—it could well be that this act would become applicable to much more than just construction by the federal Government itself. I would expect that through these agreements there will be many projects to which this act will apply.

Honourable senators, perhaps the sponsor and I have been considering this bill from the one point of view of minimum wage. As I read the brief that was presented jointly to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Labour and Employment by the Association of International Representatives of the Building and Construction Trades and the Canadian Construction Association, it seems they were considering it from the other point of view. They were not interested in the minimum rate because under their collective bargaining agreements their members' wages are much higher than $1.25 an hour. It was quite proper that they should make a joint submission to the committee of the House of Commons because it was to their mutual advantage. What they are interested in is the manner in which this fair wage is set.

The act defines "fair wages," and the only amendment that this bill makes to that definition is the addition of the words > —and shall in no case be less than the minimum hourly rate of pay prescribed by or pursuant to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code.

The submission to which I have briefly referred is that when a fair wage is set you cannot just take what is known as the prevailing rate in a locality or region. Incidentally, if the unions have managed to negotiate with employers for what are called fringe benefits, it should be remembered that for a period they were requesting more fringe benefits than actual money. In any event, the unions claim that if the wage rate, for example, was $2.50 an hour, and through negotiation they obtained benefits wholly payable by the employer worth another 25 cents, then the fair wage rate should be set at $2.75 and not $2.50. In other words, it should take into consideration everything which went to make up what might be called the real wages.

I think they made a pretty logical case, because otherwise the computation is wholly unfair. It penalizes both the employers and the unions in respect to what they have been able to accomplish. It would be a retrograde step, in my opinion, not to take this into consideration.

The committee of the House of Commons did not recommend any change, and it might well be that instead of changing this bill the whole act should be studied and brought up to date. There have been no amendments to it since 1935. If, as I expect, this bill is sent to committee, then the unions and the construction industry ought to be heard. If they are, then I am sure they will present their argument in great detail.

As I read the proceedings of the committee of the House of Commons it seemed to me they put forward the suggestion that there be more flexibility in regard to hours of labour. It would be fair to say that they did not press it too heavily, but apparently in three of the trades there is difficulty under the present system. This stems from the fact that oftentimes construction work, particularly highway construction, goes on in remote areas, and the number of hours worked in a week depends much upon weather conditions. It is my understanding that men employed on such projects prefer to work longer hours when the work is available and the weather is good. I am thinking particularly of the operators of heavy machinery who have only certain months in which to make their yearly income, and they are prepared to work somewhat longer hours.

A representative of the Department of Labour who wound up the hearings of the House of Commons Committee on Labour and Employment answered this point, but from a reading of his speech I do not think it can be said he took violent objection to it. He has some fairly reasonable objections, but he was not saying it should not be considered. He mentioned why certain things were not done, and the difficulty in considering the setting of prevailing rates otherwise than on a cash basis. It would be difficult, but I do not think it would be impossible. He had certain other objections, but I think none very substantial.

When we look at the bill again we see that it sets out a penalty clause. Section 6 of the act itself provides that the Governor in Council may make regulations for, among other things:

> (j) the penalties to be imposed for breaches of the provisions of this Act or regulations made hereunder;

This will be changed by including a penalty clause which, to my mind, is a most unusual clause.

The regulations under the act provide that in case of default in wages to employees by any person, the matter is to be referred to the minister for investigation, and if he determines that there has been a default in wages he requests the contractor to deliver a cheque for the amount. The employee can get that, because the act provides that instead of the Receiver General paying the money to the contractor he may pay it to the minister. It is further provided that the money will be paid over to employees who have not been fully paid.

As I understand it, those regulations will stand under the bill now before us. Indeed, there is no reason why they should not stand, because they are not made under the penalty clause.

Section 2(c) of the penalty clause in the bill says:

> in the event of any default in carrying out any of the conditions set out in paragraphs (a) and (b) in respect of any employee, the contractor shall pay to Her Majesty as liquidated damages a sum of fifty dollars for every such default, and the minister under whom the work contemplated by the contract is being executed may direct that the amount assessed as liquidated damages under this paragraph be deducted from any moneys payable to the contractor under the contract and be credited to the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

It would appear to me to be most unusual for a penalty clause, for that is what it actually is, to use the term, in civil law, "liquidated damages". I presume, since nothing is said about it, that to collect those damages or to prove that there are damages, someone would have to be sued. I do not think that the minister could just say, "Well, you have not fulfilled your part of the contract so I am assessing you liquidated damages of $50 for every such default." I think this is one item that should be explained in committee, for I do not see any reference to it in the hearing before the committee of the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, I feel that this bill serves a useful purpose, and that the request of the joint submission made by the Association of International Representatives of the Building and Construction Trades, and the Canadian Construction Association, deserves to be given serious consideration. If it is possible to come up with a new definition of "fair wages"—taking into consideration the progress made in negotiations between unions and employers over the past 30 years—I think every effort should be made to do so in the light of modern conditions.

Personally, I do not like the idea of prevailing rates. I do not feel there is any reason why employees in one section of the country working under contract for the federal Government should be paid less than those doing the same work in another part of the country. In other words, I think the wages paid under federal Government contracts in Nova Scotia should be just as high as in Ontario, Quebec, or British Columbia. However, being a realist, I do not think that is going to happen in the near future, and therefore I would say that the next best thing is to give fair consideration to the measure.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Would the differences in cost of living not justify a difference in wages, according to locality?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton): No. I would say that in many cases the cost of living does not justify the difference. For instance, the cost of living is higher in some parts of Nova Scotia than in large cities. The only reason a man would expect to receive lower wages is that he has not the economic strength to attempt to get higher wages. The standard of living is lower, and under this prevailing rate idea it is likely to remain lower. If we could get the federal Government to set a good example and lead the way in raising wages, we would be very happy.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I join with those who would like to see this bill examined carefully in committee, if for no other reason than to delete from it one of the strangest statements I have seen in a bill introduced in this chamber since I have been here. I refer to subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (b) of clause 2, which sets forth certain exceptional circumstances in the operation of federal contracts under which the discretionary power of the minister may be exercised to greatly extend the hours of work provided for under the bill.

Subparagraph (ii), which is new, reads as follows:

> by the Minister in cases of exceptional circumstances including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the circumstance that the work concerned has to be completed or carried on in a short working season or in a remote area—

Both of which I think we would all agree are exceptional circumstances. However, the third is this:

> —or that the public interest requires an expeditious completion of the work.

I suggest that the committee might consider deleting those words, because surely it is not an exceptional circumstance when a public work is completed expeditiously in the public interest.

I note that this is part of the amendment introduced, and it may merely be carelessness on the part of the draftsman. However, as one honourable senator has said, the act has not been revised for 30 years, and the minister has said that this is a declaration to all Canada and the rest of the world of our intent in these matters. I would think that we should not enshrine in our statutes a declaration that it is a very exceptional circumstance when we require expeditious completion of work under a federal contract in the public interest.

In saying this, honourable senators, may I comment that the bill gives very wide powers of discretion to the Governor in Council and to the minister. I think this answers some of the objections to the bill raised in the other place and in the committee to which it was referred and examined thoroughly. The purpose of these wide powers is obviously to provide for the situations that have been brought to the attention of this house by honourable senators today, that is, exceptional circumstances such as when work is being performed in the far North where a 60-hour week is not only understandable, but in most cases desired by the organized workers themselves.

However, I wonder about the wording. The bill, as it is before us, provides that there shall be an eight-hour day and a 40-hour week, except as the Governor in Council may otherwise prescribe. Then it goes on to say that in that situation the working hours of persons who are employed shall not exceed eight hours a day or 48 hours a week. That is understandable. The Governor in Council may issue a work permit—which is what has been done under the present regulations—to extend the 40-hour week to a 48-hour week.

Then there is another exception. This 48-hour week apparently may be extended in such cases as the Governor in Council may prescribe—and I do not understand why he needs the second authority at all—or by the minister in those exceptional cases that I mentioned.

It is obvious that the purpose of these discriminatory powers, particularly discriminatory power given to the minister, is to allow exceptions to the general principle of an 8-hour day and 40-hour week.

In view of the extensions which have been granted over the years in the regulations, I would hope that the committee would ask the appropriate officers of the department exactly what is intended.

Some of these matters have already been raised by honourable senators. Is it the intention of the department to allow averaging? Averaging is the principle where you multiply 40 hours by 50, which gives 2,000 hours, and as long as you do not work anybody over 2,000 hours in the year, you come within the act as extended by these particular regulations.

Does departmental policy include lower payments for people who are described as being in training or who are apprenticed—an exception that is being made now under the act?

Will this discretionary power be used to make deductions for meals and lodging, which are permissible now under the regulations?

In discussions on this bill, these matters have been raised. I do not think that comprehensive answers have been given by the officials. They have very wide powers. It would be a useful function of the committee to elicit from these officials just what they intend to do. How far will the regulations depart from the principle of this act?

It has been pointed out again today that the bill, as it is before us, was strongly objected to by a joint committee of the Canadian Construction Association and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. At first, I was impressed by the fact that these objections had been made, and made as strongly as they were and over such a long period of time. I was concerned as to why the Government was not accepting those objections. It would be untrue to say that very careful consideration was not given to them.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The objections were all by the employers, were they not?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: No, sir. The objections were brought before the committee in the other place by the joint committee to which I referred. The spokesmen of that joint committee, if I may set the record straight, were Mr. Ladyman, who is General Vice-President of the Canadian Labour Congress and also International Vice-President of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; and the spokesman for the Canadian Construction Association, which is the employers' association, was Mr. Peter Stevens, the Director of Labour Relations in that organization.

In their presentation they made a great deal of the fact that it was a joint presentation. As honourable Senator Hantyshyn remarked, it was quite an unusual thing and a fine example of labour-management co-operation. They came together, they agreed on the presentation they would make and, as far as their particular interests were concerned, they made their objections in much the same language.

However, honourable senators, I was shocked at one statement made by the representative of the workers. I am sure I do not have the reputation of being opposed to the union movement or the interests of the workers generally. However, I was shocked because I do not believe that this statement, which was made in committee, represents the true attitude of labour towards Government legislation seeking to protect the rights of labour. If I may, with leave, I would like to put the statement on the record. It is not long. It appears in the report of the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Labour and Employment in the other place, May 24, 1966, at page 102. I do not propose to read the entire statement by Mr. Ladyman who, as I have said, is General Vice-President of the Canadian Labour Congress and International Vice-President of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. He said this:

> Now it could be said that the minimum wage establishes some protection for the organized people.
> Now, I do not think this is correct. The establishing of fair wage acts or minimum wage acts actually has always worked to the detriment of the unions engaged in organizing, and very often over the years it has worked to the detriment of the people who requested these things in the beginning because why should I join a union if you, as a government, guarantees me what the union is going to get me. In Manitoba this has very definitely had a detrimental effect on the state of organization in that province. They have a fair wage act, and the day I sign an agreement for an electrician every electrician in the province will get that rate. Well, I do not bargain for all the electricians in that province; I bargain for the I.B.W. electricians and that is the rate that should be paid. As a consequence there are many people there who, as I say, say, "Why join a union; the government legislation guarantees me all this." Well, we are not ready to relinquish our field in collective bargaining as yet to the government. I do not think he wants us to. Yet, in effect, this is what we are intending to do here.

That last sentence is a reference to this bill.

Honourable senators, I trust that the first two matters I raised at least will have the consideration that I think they warrant in committee.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), for whom I have the very highest possible respect, if I understood him correctly to say that the industries of Nova Scotia were in a position to pay the same rate of wages as the industries in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton): No, no; you wholly misunderstood me. I said I regret they are not in a position to do so, but I feel that the federal Government is in a position to make the same payments everywhere.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I do not propose to discuss the detail of this bill. In a general way, minimum wage legislation has been in effect for a very long time. I am entirely in accord with Senator Hnatyshyn when he says that the bill should go to a committee where the detail may be studied. Here we are discussing the general principle of minimum wages and the general principle of this bill. In that regard, I would like to put myself on record as saying that I am wholeheartedly in favour of the principle.

Honourable senators, we in Canada are highly organized, thoroughly competent producers. Our power of production is marvelously great. The idea of the lower classes—and I am speaking of the wage rates—working for starvation wages is abhorrent to practically everybody in this country. I have held that view for a long time and I wish only to express it.

It may be of some interest to some honourable senators that I argued before the Privy Council the constitutionality of this very legislation. That was about 1936. I conceded, on the part of the Province of Ontario, that the jurisdiction over wages and hours of labour, in those industries under dominion control, comes under the jurisdiction of the dominion Government. That was an issue at that time, but it is no longer. Of course that is more than thirty years ago. Since then I have had some familiarity with the operation of the act and I am free to say it has been a genuinely good act. It has raised the standard of living in a general way everywhere.

It has been pointed out just now that at least some of the provincial minimum wage rates are lower than those provided in this bill. Is that very extraordinary? Is it not our duty and our privilege to set an example in this regard and to lead the way in providing a decent standard of wages and living conditions?

This bill will, of course, go to a committee where we can examine it in detail—with a microscope, if necessary. We can ask such questions as we feel should be asked and obtain whatever information is available. At this stage I simply want to place on the record the fact that I am thoroughly in accord with the general principle of a minimum wage which will guarantee to everybody, whether they have the economic power or not, a decent standard of living.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I think we are all in agreement on that.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne) speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): I do not intend to speak at great length. However, I wish to thank those honourable senators who have participated in this debate. I want to compliment them on having done their homework on this legislation. I can see that many have taken the trouble to wade through the great mass of material made available to us as a result of the discussions in the other place. It is obvious that the members who have spoken, and some have made very important contributions, have indeed done their homework very well.

Having done some little homework myself on rather short notice, I did prepare myself yesterday to cover in a general way the answers, if I may put it that way, to the proposals which were made over a year ago to the Minister of Labour of that time, and in more recent months to the new Minister of Labour, and also the briefs which were sent to honourable senators and members of Parliament in general. I realize, having regard to the time of day, that it was rather a lengthy note that I would have been compelled to put on the record with regard to the objections made by the construction industry and one of the labour unions involved in construction. I am glad now I did not attempt to cover them in detail. I realize the interest of honourable senators is particularly keen so far as this legislation is concerned, and I think the appropriate place to have a full discussion is in committee.

I hope that Senator Hnatyshyn, who followed me in the debate, will permit me to maintain my position that this is a simple bill. It is far simpler in its effect and in consideration of its impact on numbers of people than the Canada Labour Code legislation in which the federal Government has a much larger jurisdiction involving the transportation industry, railroads and steamships, the broadcasting industry and hotels operated by railways. They qualify as being under federal jurisdiction. I say that because I want to emphasize again that the benefits, if there are benefits, which flow from this particular legislation can only apply in a small part of this country and to people employed in 3 per cent of the construction industry in this country.

Perhaps I should not put this on a numerical basis but rather on a slightly more philosophical basis. But it was on that basis that I left the impression that I regarded this as a simple bill.

I do not wish to add extensively to what I have already said, but there is one answer which springs to my mind in connection with Senator Grosart's question as to the provisions in this bill which refer to the public interest being served when a construction project is required to be carried out most expeditiously, and therefore could qualify for a special permit.

I wish to mention a concrete example with which I am quite familiar. Such a situation does arise from time to time in the lobster fishing industry. The lobster fishermen are busy at certain seasons of the year. When that season is over these fishermen go herring fishing. In the meantime a contractor may have a public works contract in the harbour and he may have to clear out a wharf, or repair a slip or carry out dredging between the time the fishermen haul their nets after the herring fishing and prepare again to go lobster fishing. It has to be done at a time when the fishermen are not occupying the harbour. I am sure if Senator Grosart were as familiar with this situation as I am he would welcome any way the minister could find to assist a contractor to carry out such work as expeditiously as possible. I mention that at this stage because I doubt if any official would have that kind of concrete example to provide to my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I should make it clear that my only suggestion was that all federal contracts should be carried out expeditiously. By that I do not mean suddenly or on an emergency basis, because provision is made for that. I wonder if my honourable friend is aware, for example, that almost every Expo contract, and they number over a hundred, has been given exemption on this ground.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): I did not know they were all given exemption. I was, however, aware of the need for exemptions in certain cases. These exemptions are necessary so that everything may be made ready in time for the opening of Expo '67 in April next year.

It has been made perfectly clear to me and, I am sure, to all honourable senators, that this bill should go to a committee. It seems we have not employed our specially designated committees quite as often as we might have done in the past. Even if it should not be possible to get the committee into operation the very next time a committee room becomes available, because of prior legislation going before some other committee, I would certainly be glad to have the Standing Committee on Labour and Immigration headed by my friend on the other side, Senator Hnatyshyn, provide the Senate with a thorough examination of this bill. I know he is the kind of man who will see that the minister and all other witnesses get a fair hearing.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne), bill referred to the Standing Committee on Labour and Immigration.

PRIVATE BILL

THE EVANGELICAL COVENANT CHURCH OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. John Hnatyshyn moved the second reading of Bill S-38, to incorporate The Evangelical Covenant Church of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a bill to incorporate another religious body. The Evangelical Covenant Church of Canada is closely connected with the Evangelical Covenant Church of America. Probably the American church would be called the parent church, although the Canadian group is absolutely independent.

It is not a very large group. This church now has 23 organized congregations in the prairie provinces: nine in Alberta, four in Manitoba, and ten in Saskatchewan. There is one congregation of this church in my home city of Saskatoon, and I know personally that the people who belong to it are held in very high regard by the other citizens of our city, and they are respected by all other religious bodies in Saskatoon. The bill seems to be in order, and if it receives second reading I will ask that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, where honourable senators will have an opportunity to ask questions on any section.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

YUKON ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Norman A. MacKenzie moved the second reading of Bill C-147, to amend the Yukon Act.

He said: Honourable senators, since this is the first opportunity I have had of speaking in this chamber I felt it would be in order to say that I count it a great and rather unexpected honour to be with you and to be made a member of this distinguished body.

I count it a privilege, too, not only because of the honour attached to it but because it does provide me with a few more years of service to my country, Canada, for which I have a very high regard.

I am very grateful to the honourable Senator Walker and to the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) for the kind things they said about me a short time ago. I may say that one of the special pleasures I am enjoying here is the friendliness and helpfulness of all members of the Senate I have met and have been associated with. I welcome the opportunity of renewing association and friendship with many old friends, particularly with those who were my students many years ago and who have gone on to distinguished careers and are now members of the Senate and, incidentally, several who are members of the other place as well.

I have been asked to speak on this bill, C-147, an act to amend the Yukon Act. I do not profess to be an authority upon the Yukon. As we all realize and remember, it was and is a romantic part of Canada. We have memories of the Klondike, the "gold rush," and of the period in our history between 1898 and 1902, when it became, in a sense, the centre for adventure for people from all over the world. Its population grew very rapidly and a great deal of wealth was taken out of it. As you know, after the "gold rush" there was a rapid decline in its population, in the extraction of wealth and income.

I believe the next occasion on which I heard anything about it or became familiar with that part of the world was when, as a Nova Scotian youth, I was trying to grow wheat on the prairies in Saskatchewan and I seriously considered going up to the Peace River to homestead and to see something of the Yukon. For better or for worse, I returned to the university, and from there I went off to World War I. But I have continued my interest in the Yukon. I have flown over it en route to Alaska. Mrs. Mackenzie has visited it and has seen quite a bit of it by car, by boat on the Yukon River, and by train down to Skagway. I have many friends who have been there. Incidentally, I would like to join with those in the other place in paying tribute to the Commissioner, not only because he, to my knowledge, has done excellent work—and it is a matter of great regret that he has recently resigned—but because he is a cousin of mine, and naturally I am pleased when members of my family, however remote, do good work.

During the thirties there was discussion in British Columbia about union between British Columbia and the Yukon. But the thirties were years of problems for everybody, and I think it is fair to say that those concerned at that time did not particularly relish the prospect of adding to their problems by increasing the areas of their responsibility. So, nothing came of that.

While there are suggestions, such as those we heard in connection with the bill to amend the Northwest Territories Act, that this area might very properly, and perhaps more efficiently from the point of view of administration, become part of the Province of British Columbia in the case of the Yukon Territory, and of Alberta and Saskatchewan in the case of Northwest Territories, I know that the people of that territory, the Yukon, are much more interested in obtaining what they would describe as representative and responsible government, and of becoming in due course a province in their own right, than they are in becoming attached to an existing province. However, I do not propose to enter into any discussion about the merits of these propositions.

This bill speaks for itself. It is very simple in scope. In respect of the desires of the people of the Yukon to bring about changes in their present status, I think it is accurate to indicate that the department responsible and the Commission have agreed upon an economic study of the Yukon Territory, and that pending the receipt of the report of the royal commission headed by another former student of mine, Dean Carrothers of the University of Western Ontario, a somewhat similar constitutional inquiry may well follow for the Yukon Territory. But, in the meantime, as I said, this bill that we are asked to study, review and, if we approve, in due course pass, is simple and modest in scope. Its main purpose is, first, to bring the financial arrangements for the members of the Yukon Council in line with present-day costs and practices followed by other legislative bodies; and, secondly, to provide the additional legislative authority needed to keep pace with the accelerated rate of the economic growth of the Yukon.

There are seven elected members of the council, I believe, who have what one might describe an advisory function rather than an executive or administrative function. It is proposed to increase their indemnity or remuneration, and bring it in line with that which has been proposed and agreed upon for similar individuals in the Northwest Territories. That is the first amendment.

In addition to the general increase in indemnity, there is a proposal for a special increase to the three members of the council who serve on an advisory committee on finance. That is a rather small indemnity or honorarium of some $300 a year. There are increases to, or changes in, the allowances for expenses as contrasted with the previous arrangements under the existing act.

Then there are certain changes which are designed to achieve a more efficient operation of the Government of the Yukon Territory because of increasing responsibility for matters of a local nature. They cover such areas as the authority to designate and make regulations for the operation of a new jail that is being built at Whitehorse. I understand that up to the present the Yukon Territory has relied on the facilities of other provinces in respect of prisoners and jails. Because of the increasing population and the necessity of having closer at hand a facility like this, a new jail is being built. This bill provides the authority to deal with it.

There is also authority to own and dispose of lands pursuant to tax sale proceedings. This was not possible under the existing legislation.

The bill also provides authority for the commissioner to lend money to individuals, and I believe to corporations as well, for the proper development of the territory, or for other purposes. At the moment the lending of money is restricted to school districts and possibly municipalities.

There is a rather extended amendment that has to do with the examination and audit of the territorial accounts by the Auditor General. As this will make for greater efficiency and security it is an amendment which is appropriate, and one which we should approve.

Finally, there is a change in terminology in respect of treatment for those who are ill mentally. In the existing legislation they are described as insane, and in this bill they are described as mentally disordered persons. I gather there is less opprobrium attached to being mentally ill than to being insane, and that is a fair conclusion. Attached to that amendment there is also provision for some psychiatric treatment and help.

Honourable senators, in a general way these are the amendments that are proposed by this bill to the existing act. As will have been gathered from what I have said, or from an examination of the bill itself, it is simple in scope and is designed not to make fundamental changes in the economic affairs, financial affairs or the constitutional or political affairs of the Yukon Territory. Such changes may be desirable, but if so they will be brought about at a later time in more appropriate ways after thorough study. This bill, as I said before, is to provide for existing situations which need the kind of treatment provided by this bill. I feel that that is all that needs to be said in explanation of this bill at this time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 13, at 8 p.m.

NEWFOUNDLAND

CLOSING OF WABANA MINES—DEVELOPMENT OF CHURCHILL FALLS—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Malcolm Hollett inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. What, if any progress has been made with regard to alleviating the serious situation in which several thousands of Canadians will find themselves on the close-down of operations at Wabana Mines, Bell Island, Newfoundland?

2. With regard to the development of the Churchill Falls power in Labrador, has the federal Government been made aware of the problems facing such development and, if so, what are these problems?

Hon. John J. Connolly: The answer to the honourable senator's inquiry is as follows:

1. The Government set up a committee of public servants under the chairmanship of Dr. Ernest Weeks, Executive Director of the Atlantic Development Board to work with an agency of the provincial Government to make plans for co-operative measures to meet the situation. The committee has been working actively with the provincial Government and is expected to make a formal report shortly.

2. The only problem respecting the development of Churchill Falls power in Labrador which has been brought officially to the attention of the Government of Canada relates to the discrimination arising because of the taxation of private developments as compared with the exemption from federal taxation of provincial agencies. The Government is proposing legislation at the present session of Parliament to remove this discrimination in respect of the generation and sale to the public of electrical energy or steam or gas.

UNIVERSITY FINANCES

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I ask that this inquiry stand until Tuesday, June 21, 1966.

Order stands.

DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 1, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of the honourable Senator Gershaw, calling the attention of the Senate to the need for conserving Canada's water resources.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, before proceeding may I mention the very enjoyable cocktail party put on by Mr. Speaker in honour of the visit of the Czechoslovakian parliamentary delegates. We had a very enjoyable time—I think some of our members may be still there.

I am very pleased Senator Gershaw proposed this inquiry into water conservation. Water is a very common resource and in fact is cheaper than dirt. It has been said that you can buy water in our cities delivered by tap to your bath or sink for about a nickel a ton, while just ordinary dirt fill costs from $1 up, and topsoil about $10 per ton. Yet, as the honourable senator has said, the whole of life depends upon adequate supplies of water. It is needed for domestic consumption, industrial output, agriculture, recreation, fish and wildlife, navigation and hydro power.

All our water comes from precipitation. There is a regular cycle; the sun draws the water from plant, lake and ocean into the atmosphere where it forms clouds, and then when the temperature is right it returns to the land once again and is stored in a number of ways. First, some is stored in the great lakes of our country; second, some by the topsoil; third, some of it works its way down to the rock strata to be retained in our ground water supply, and, fourth, some is retained in our forests.

A great deal of it, however, is run off into the rivers and eventually back into the sea. If we have a very heavy rain, the moisture will carry soil with it and may in some cases choke the river with mud or sand and at the same time destroy the land from which it flows. This happened when Hurricane Hazel, which many of you will remember, hit Ontario. Floods cause a great deal of damage to land, buildings, rivers and streams.

Canada has about half the total amount of fresh water in the world. It looks as though we have most of it when viewed from the air across northern Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, as I have done many times. Despite this, the only "raw water" safe for human consumption is that in our high mountains or inaccessible areas. Most of the other water in our country is polluted to some extent, and as it nears the great industrial cities it becomes more and more polluted, until it reaches the stage that is reported in the case of Lake Erie at this time, which lake is said to be almost beyond repair; at any rate, it will take many years of remedial treatment before it will be considered a good body of water for all purposes.

Man seems to have a perverse habit of destroying nature in trying to acquire an immediate living or wealth for himself. With our immense visible supply of water in our Great Lakes and large rivers it seems we have no problem, and until 1935 there had been no particular thought given to conserving our water supply.

I might say that in Ontario there are some 15,000 ponds, both private and public, which have been developed for conserving water. In Quebec there are some 2,000 ponds; and out on the prairies since 1935, through what we know as the P.F.R.A.—the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act—there have been some 85 major water conservation projects, and a total of 94,482 projects, including dugouts, irrigation and river dam projects, for a total cost of some $31,150,000.

The prime feature of water conservation is to intercept the run-off. The interception of the run-off can be effected in a number of ways. It can be done, first, by increasing the forest cover and by the better use of our forests. The forest is the most natural area for storing water. It prevents rapid run-offs; the snow in the open melts and runs off before the snow begins to melt in the forest.

The second method is the proper cultivation of the soil, to allow water to penetrate to a greater depth and to help prevent erosion. In many cases cultivation of the soil has been overdone so that it becomes almost a silt, in which case it is difficult for rain to penetrate; then we experience soil erosion and the water running off into the streams or lakes.

The third way is to build dams and dikes at the headwaters of rivers to create reservoirs, and the fourth is to control the outflow of the lakes.

As I have said, there is considerable conservation of water in Ontario and the western provinces, under the various river authorities and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, respectively; and the only satisfactory solution to the problems of conserving and storing water is concerted control. This may be accomplished by an agreement between the federal, provincial and municipal or county authorities, all working together for the benefit of the whole. There is not much advantage in one county or industry spending a great deal of money to store water, if the water is destroyed by pollution or wasted farther downstream. Consequently, we must have some authority responsible for the storage of water and the prevention of pollution of that stored water.

At the present time we see numbers of lakeshores and river banks dotted with rotting bathhouses and bathing enclosures which were at one time beautiful beaches, surrounded by signs reading: "No swimming—Polluted water." Polluted water is dangerous to human life. It causes economic loss, and damage to recreational resources. The main causes of pollution are municipal sewage, industrial waste and land drainage. Adequate water is vital to the urban dweller, and to industry and agriculture, but polluted water is of no use to anyone.

In Ontario, for example, water is needed for the irrigation of land. There are some 70,000 acres in crop and under irrigation in Ontario now, and it is estimated that by 1975 this area will have increased to half a million acres which will need approximately two billion gallons of water per day. This will make for considerable competiton for water between urban and rural dwellers, and between industry and agriculture.

Such cities as Montreal and Toronto today need approximately 120 gallons of water per day for every man, woman and child. Along Lake Erie and Lake Ontario the United States uses 760 million gallons, and Ontario uses approximately 400 million gallons of water per day. From this you will understand that the demand for water at the present time is considerable, and it will become greater as our industrial areas expand and intensive farming calls for more irrigation.

In reading the ARDA catalogue of projects from 1962 to 1965 I note many listed there for the conservation of water. These are major projects, the financial arrangements for which are made between the federal and provincial governments. Prince Edward Island has five projects, Nova Scotia ten, New Brunswick four, Ontario seven, Alberta six, and British Columbia has twenty.

It amazes me to read that British Columbia, which has great rivers and plenty of water from the melting snow on the mountains, is working towards conserving its water to a greater degree than is any other province. The Maritime provinces, of course, have an abundance of rain and, consequently, have not the same need for the conservation of water as does the rest of Canada. Quebec, because of its type of soil and rainfall, has 102 projects under way which, however, are mostly of a drainage nature.

I was particularly interested in the fact, as recited by this report on the ARDA program, that the Province of Saskatchewan, which is considered a dry province and short of water, should have 31 drainage projects. The problem there, apparently, is one of containing the rivers and ensuring that they do not flood lands that can be used for agricultural purposes, and of storing the water for later use.

Alberta, which has the run-off from the mountain ranges along the west escarpment, has six water conservation projects underway. Manitoba has seven projects, and they are mostly for the control of the spring run-off and drainage. At the present time it is putting a large ditch or canal around the City of Winnipeg to assist in the carrying away of the spring run-off. The floods in Manitoba were caused by the ditching of the heavy flat lands in North Dakota and Manitoba which has forced the water to run off what was originally swamp country and good hay land, but which is now considered fine agricultural land suitable for all types of grain and vegetables. It is always difficult to decide whether more land or the retention of water is the most necessary for the country.

Honourable senators, although apparently there is a great surplus of water in our country at the present time, we shall need most of it.

In our western provinces, where water is somewhat short due to the shortage of total rainfall per annum, we have a good potential of water, when it is needed, through the diversion of certain rivers such as the Peace River, the Red Deer River, and the Saskatchewan River. With proper control, I foresee ample water for many years to come in that area.

On the other hand, in Ontario and Quebec there is already a great industrial empire built up, and in a very few years water, especially clean water, will become less of a surplus commodity.

Western Canada is just on the threshold of becoming an industrialized area and will need all the water in that area in the not-too-distant future.

Our friends to the south of the border, especially along the Pacific area, are now scrambling among themselves for a share of the Columbia waters which were just recently diverted to the United States by the Province of British Columbia and the federal Government. Apparently they now have some scheme in hand by which they hope to divert waters from Northern British Columbia and Alberta down through the Saskatchewan-Qu'Appelle River system into the Assiniboine, and on down to the midwest states.

For my part, I think this would be a great mistake from the point of view of Western Canada. Up until now western Canada has been a great exporter of our raw material, and there is no reason why we in the west should not develop, in a very short time, into a great industrial empire. We have tremendous hydro-electric power potential. We have great oil and natural gas resources. We have one of the largest deposits of potash in the world. We have great copper and zinc and iron deposits. We have vast stretches of timber in the northern part of the provinces. There is no reason why Western Canada should not be a great manufacturing area such as the western coast of the United States and Eastern Canada. For that reason we would invite these American enterprises, if they need our water so badly, to move their industries to this country, to make use of our resources here to our and their advantage, rather than continuing to export our raw materials, which includes water.

Honourable senators, I think that the conservation of our water and all our resources is something that we should be very mindful of at this time and in the future.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, debate adjourned.

AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT— MOTION FOR APPROVAL— ORDER STANDS

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the honourable Senator Aird:

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, with leave of the house, may I be permitted to yield my place in the order of the debate to the honourable Senator Hugessen.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order stands.

YUKON ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 9, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. MacKenzie for the second reading of Bill C-147, to amend the Yukon Act.

Hon. John Hnatyshyn: Honourable senators, it is a real pleasure in this debate to follow such a distinguished member of the Senate as the sponsor of this bill, Senator MacKenzie. It was a delight to me, as I am sure it was to all senators in this house, to hear him speak on this bill—indeed, to speak for the first time in this house. I wish to congratulate him on the able manner in which he presented the bill.

A little over a week ago I had the honour to speak on the Northwest Territories bill. So far as development of the Northwest Territories and its resources are concerned, everything I said applies equally to the bill now before us, with this difference, that at one time the Yukon received notoriety when gold was discovered. After that the Yukon was forgotten for a while. However, since the discovery of gold many other resources have been discovered there, such as lead, zinc, iron and other minerals.

Another difference between the Yukon and the Northwest Territories is that the Yukon has a much longer history. I believe that it is some 68 years since the Yukon has had an active legislature. Today its government includes many men of experience.

The elected legislature of Yukon Territory may be similar to the legislatures of the provinces, but it has absolutely no executive power. For instance, its Legislative Assembly has no power to pass any money bills; it has no power to legislate in regard to any of its natural resources, nor to legislate in regard to the administration of justice.

As already stated by the honourable sponsor of the bill, the Yukon Territory will soon become our eleventh province. Today it is not asking that it be given complete jurisdiction so far as executive powers are concerned, but that gradually it be given executive powers in order to manage some of its own affairs. I know, from speaking to many people from the Yukon Territory, who visit our city, that they are most anxious for this program to come in progressive stages. They are not asking for it to happen tomorrow. However, there is a feeling that since they are 3,000 miles away, and after some 70 years of experience in government, they should gradually be given some of their executive powers.

Honourable senators, I am not going to oppose this bill, which raises the salaries of the legislators in the same manner as was done by the bill which was before us recently in regard to the Northwest Territories. There is nothing wrong with that. However, I want to repeat what I said when I spoke on the earlier measure, that although I am not in favour of giving complete autonomy overnight, I would like the federal Government to make it perfectly plain to the people of the Yukon that it is working toward the day when the Yukon Territory will be granted self-government, when it will have executive powers similar to all the provinces of this dominion. I agree with the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. MacKenzie) that that day is coming, and may come in the near future.

I wish to impress upon honourable senators again that in the Yukon Territory today there are many men who have had long years of experience in the legislature and in the government. I say that they are quite capable of performing some of the executive duties now performed by a Commissioner. I am not criticizing the Commissioner, because I think that up to now a fairly good job has been done in the Yukon so far as the executive side of the government is concerned.

It has given the people from the south an opportunity to learn something from the north. Perhaps it has not been altogether bad that we have Ottawa 3,000 miles away do some of the work. But I say the time has come when we will gradually have to trust the people of that territory to do some of the executive work which they want passed on to them.

I mentioned when I spoke in connection with the Northwest Territories bill that the Province of Manitoba, for instance, was admitted into Confederation as a province when it had a population much less than there is today in the Yukon and in the Northwest Territories.

These northern countries are the hope of Canada for the future. Personally, I do not know if honourable senators appreciate the North as much as I do, having lived in an area bordering on these territories. I think they have the most romantic future in the history of our country. They have untold wealth. The population has been gradually increasing. Resources have been developing. A lot of wealth comes from these northern parts of our country.

Honourable senators, in another 25 years the Northwest Territories and the Yukon will be two of our leading provinces. I am firmly convinced that the Yukon will be the eleventh province and the Northwest Territories will be the twelfth province of this dominion.

As I said, I am not opposed to the principle of this bill. I want to repeat what I said in regard to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, that I think he has the welfare of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon at heart. He is making a splendid job of it. I know that his stand and his feelings are perhaps a little bit ahead of what the Government is willing to do. But I am glad he is there, and as long as he is minister I am convinced that the fate of those two territories in the north will be very bright and that soon we will have two new provinces in Canada.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I ask a few questions? I know very little about the Government of the Yukon, and I am asking for information.

How much money does the Government of the Yukon, such as it is, draw now from the federal treasury? This is my first question.

My second question refers to powers. The honourable senator has told us the powers that the local government does not enjoy. What are the powers that it does enjoy? And if we gave entire autonomy to the local Government of the Yukon, are the people there prepared to pay their own taxes as other provinces do?

I am not asking these questions to be nasty, but because I would like that information.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, perhaps on behalf of the Government I should intervene here. It is probably more than should be imposed upon Senator Hnatyshyn, whose speech we have enjoyed so much, to take on the burden of the answers.

I must say frankly that as I did not sponsor the bill, the information is not available to me here this evening. I can do one of two things. I can get the answers in so far as they are available. The financial figures would be readily available. Or, if honourable senators so desire, this bill can be sent to committee. It was originally thought that it need not go to committee, but perhaps the questions that Senator Roebuck has asked should impel us to reconsider, so that we can have the officials attend and answer the questions directly rather than give written answers.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Personally, on this side I would appreciate much more if Senator Roebuck in future put questions of that type to the senator sponsoring the bill, especially when it comes from the Government.

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: Honourable senators, I think I can give roughly the answers as far as the Northwest Territories are concerned, subject to any correction that the Government may make later.

I think that out of the $74 million that is spent in the Northwest Territories, only $14 million comes from the Northwest Territories and $60 million comes from the federal Government. But it is as a matter of principle that I spoke about giving the provincial status to these territories. Based on what the other provinces gets as a subsidy per capita, I do not think the Northwest Territories or the Yukon are far behind. They may not be able to finance themselves completely.

I am not saying provincial status should be given overnight. I think I made it perfectly clear that neither the Yukon nor the Northwest Territories are asking for autonomy overnight: they are asking that it be granted to them gradually. This is the proper way to grant autonomy. After all, today we have countries like the Congo and Rhodesia and others becoming independent entities. Surely the time has come in Canada when we should give to these two territories the rights that we gave to the other provinces years and years ago.

The people of the Yukon are just as capable as those of Southern Rhodesia or the Congo to carry on self-government. The people there have been very fair, they have never expressed abusive criticism of the federal Government. Everything they have said has been said in appreciation of what has been done. All that they are asking is: "Give us gradually some executive powers so that in a few years we will do what other provinces of Canada are doing today."

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

PRIVATE BILL

LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA—CANADA SECTION—SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill S-39, to incorporate Lutheran Church in America—Canada Section.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill, as the title implies, is to incorporate a Christian body in Canada to be known as the Lutheran Church in America—Canada Section.

Honourable senators are quite aware that there are many thousands of people in Canada professing the Lutheran faith. They are in the Maritimes, in the district of Lunenburg with which Senator Kinley is very familiar; they are in the district of Waterloo, Ontario, and all through that area of Ontario up to Georgian Bay. Senators who come from Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta are familiar with Lutherans in those provinces. I hope honourable senators will agree with me that Lutherans are to be found generally throughout Canada and have contributed much to Canada. They are industrious people with high ideals and over the years they have become indeed great Canadians.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): They have also made great contributions to this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford): Yes, they have. I am sure the honourable Leader is referring in particular to the late Senator Euler, a devout Lutheran who was at one time Chancellor of Waterloo Lutheran University. In fact, he was chancellor when he died. If he were here tonight I am sure he would be introducing this bill and it would not be my honour to do so.

Hon. Mr. Croll: May I ask who is the Chancellor now?

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: Everybody knows that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford): I am sure that if honourable Senator Willis were here tonight he would tell you who is the Chancellor.

The incorporators come from various parts of Canada, one being from Nova Scotia, another from Winnipeg and yet another from Edmonton. The sponsor of the bill is from Ontario. The head office of the Church will be in Winnipeg.

At the present time, there are a number of sections of the Lutheran Church in Canada, three of them being main sections. The purpose of this bill is to incorporate these sections into one body in Canada to be known as the Lutheran Church in America—Canada Section.

The bill is drawn up in the terms usual for a bill of this nature. If it receives second reading, it is intended to send it to a committee where honourable senators will have the opportunity of asking any questions which they deem advisable, for example, with respect to the number of Lutherans in Canada. I am sure many of you will be surprised at the number of Lutherans and the extent of the Church throughout Canada.

Honourable senators, for the reasons I have given, I ask that the bill be given second reading now.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Could the honourable senator tell us how many branches of the Lutheran Church there are in the United States at the present time, or is there just one body there?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford): My information is that there is more than one body in the United States. I am sorry I do not have more detailed information, but I was brought up a Presbyterian, and I am now a member of the United Church and Chancellor of a Lutheran university.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford) bill referred to Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the Senate, I wish to mention that this is going to be a particularly busy week in the Senate, although it may not appear so from Hansard.

As honourable senators are aware, many bills have been sent to committee and therefore the committees will be sitting long hours each day. Notice has already been circulated about the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce meeting for tomorrow morning at 9.30. In making this announcement it is not my intention merely to apprise honourable senators of the situation, but rather to indicate that the work of the Senate is not confined to this chamber although sometimes it is judged entirely by the amount of time we spend here.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

DOCUMENT TABLED

RURAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT FUND BILL

AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the following report of the committee on Bill C-151, to provide for the establishment of a fund for the economic and social development of special rural development areas:

Your committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-151, to provide for the establishment of a fund for the economic and social development of special rural development areas, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendment:

Clause 10, line 13: Immediately after "year", insert the following: "and in any event not later than six months after such termination and, if Parliament is not then sitting, within 15 days of its commencement,".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden, with leave of the Senate, moved that the report be taken into consideration now.

He said: Honourable senators, the amendment applies to the provision in the bill for the minister reporting to Parliament. The language was very indefinite in that it provided that the minister shall report to Parliament as soon as possible after the termination of the fiscal year. We thought that was too indefinite, and we amended the provision that the minister shall report to Parliament as soon as possible after the termination of the fiscal year, by adding the words "and in any event not later than six months after such termination and, if Parliament is not then sitting, within fifteen days of its commencement,".

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL, 1966

AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the inquiry of the honourable Senator Gershaw, calling the attention of the Senate to the need for conserving Canada's water resources.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have said often that it is a great honour to be a member of this chamber. It is my pleasure today to pay a special tribute to two of our colleagues for the learned and timely speeches they made with regard to the conservation of Canada's water resources. Senator Gershaw is a pioneer in that domain and many others, and he covered the whole subject in a speech which takes up only three pages of Hansard of June 1 last. Senator Pearson, who followed him, in a remarkable speech dealt with the matter from a different angle. Both dissertations would honour any academy of the world, and it is our great privilege to have such outstanding colleagues among us.

The matter of the conservation of water is vital. Some experiments have been made and some rumours have been spread to the effect that on account of the diversion of our waters to the United States, Lake Erie may dry up. No one has forgotten the difficulties with Chicago when its intake of water affected the level of the Great Lakes.

I have another most important document. It is a report of what a former President of the National Research Council, a former Chairman of the International Joint Commission and another savant, has said about the conservation of water. As it would take a few minutes to read, I ask leave to place it on Hansard to complete what has been said by Senators Gershaw and Pearson.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that this newspaper report appears in Hansard?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you. You will read it in Hansard tomorrow.

[The report follows.]

NAWAPA DIVERSION SCHEME DEBATED BEFORE ROYAL SOCIETY

"YOU HAVE ENOUGH WATER IF YOU USE IT WELL," McNAUGHTON TELLS U.S. SENATOR

—By Susan Anderson
Globe and Mail Reporter

Sherbrooke—A U.S. senator's proposals for U.S. sharing of Canadian water were politely rebutted by General A. G. L. McNaughton yesterday.

Both Gen. McNaughton, chairman of the Canadian section of the International Joint Commission from 1950 to 1962, and the U.S. senator, Frank E. Moss (D, Utah), addressed the Royal Society of Canada at the University of Sherbrooke.

Gen. McNaughton told Senator Moss: "You've enough water in your domain if you use it well. You don't have to come to us."

In his address, Senator Moss reviewed the North American Water and Power Alliance, a plan that involves the collection of up to 18 per cent of the excess runoff from the high-precipitation, medium-elevation areas of Alaska and Western and Northern Canada. He stressed that this is surplus water, which would be diverted south and east through a system of canals and reservoirs.

"Such controlled distribution of the waters from the north, pooled with waters from the interconnected producing areas of both countries, would benefit one territory and seven provinces of Canada, 35 states of the U.S. and three states of Mexico," Senator Moss said.

Gen. McNaughton called NAWAPA "nothing more than an attempt by the Ralph M. Parsons Co. of Los Angeles, a private engineering firm, to drum up business for themselves." Senator Moss was instrumental in bringing the NAWAPA plan before the U.S. Senate committee on water resources. A subcommittee headed by the Utah senator concluded that the NAWAPA concept could deliver nearly twice as much water as could be provided by the large number of U.S. projects already under study.

"The NAWAPA scheme", Gen. McNaughton said, "seems to be based on the premise that there are large quantities of surplus water in Canada. The NAWAPA propagandists love to talk of great quantities of water spilling unused into the Arctic Ocean. But the major sources for the scheme are the rivers of the Canadian Cordillera which provide a great series of prime power sites, rivers which are the basis of the forest products industry, rivers which provide some of the finest salmon runs in the world."

Gen. McNaughton said that "the NAWAPA proposal contemplates that the complete jurisdiction and control will rest with the corporation which, although it might be nominally international, would in reality be dominated by Americans."

He added: "If we make a bargain to divert water to the U.S. we cannot ever discontinue or we will face force to compel compliance. There is nothing in our experience to date which indicates any change in the vigor with which our American friends pursue objectives which they deem in their national interest, however, much this may hurt a neighbour who has unwittingly made a careless bargain in other circumstances."

The solution that Gen. McNaughton proposed to Senator Moss was pollution control. What is scarce in the United States is not water but clean water, he said, and this could be provided at less cost by proper administration and pollution control than by importation from Canada.

"If Canada offered the United States our water at bargain prices, the attack on pollution might then be postponed until the problem was no longer soluble and at the very least the cost would be astronomical."

Senator Moss replied that even complete success in cleaning up polluted waters would still leave some areas with a water shortage. He noted that government and research agencies are working on desalinization projects and weather research in an attempt to induce precipitation.

In the exchange with Gen. McNaughton over the existence or non-existence of a Canadian water surplus, Senator Moss concluded: "If Canada decides it has not a surplus, it has not and that's the end of it."

Both Senator Moss and Gen. McNaughton refused to reply to a suggestion by Gordon Shrum, co-chairman of the B.C. Hydro and Power Authority, that Canada trade the flooding of the Rocky Mountain Trench, which would divert water into the United States, for Canadian ownership of the Alaska Panhandle.

MAYORS' GROUP WILL ESTABLISH POLLUTION BODY

Special to the Globe and Mail

Vancouver—A resolution to establish a standing committee to help combat pollution was approved yesterday by delegates to the conference of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities.

The resolution was proposed by Alderman Michael Grayson of Toronto, who was not a voting delegate, and formally moved by Mayor Philip Givens, also of Toronto. It was approved unanimously.

Alderman Grayson said a large number of reports on pollution were available and a committee was needed to go through the material available and get on with the job of combatting pollution of all kinds.

The standing committee is to co-ordinate research material, study new plans and devices and advise senior governments and federation members on pollution matters. It also is to act with any international joint committee dealing with air and water pollution, including that caused by urbanization, industry and motor vehicles.

I shall not take up much more of your time, but there is one point to which I wish to draw your attention. It is about the diversion of the waters from the Arctic Ocean southwards. According to scientists, well-qualified men and women, that would change the temperature of Canada. It could be done, but with disastrous effects to our climate. You will read what General McNaughton with his qualified experience has said.

My conclusion is obvious. The Senate has accomplished excellent work in many domains. The matter of the conservation of water is now before this chamber. It is before the Canadian people, and we must have an outlook that will protect the most important resource of the country—water for future generations. It is the Senate that is able to make that study and to present a report that will be most useful to Canada, in the same way that it presented its report on manpower and on so many other matters.

Therefore, my suggestion is that the Government take the trouble to read what was said by Senator Gershaw on June 1, by Senator Pearson yesterday, and also by General McNaughton as reported in the Senate Hansard of today. Every member of the Government will then have the satisfaction of doing the right thing in asking the Senate to make a close study of this matter.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Gershaw, for Hon. Mr. Cameron, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

UNITED INVESTMENT LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Daniel A. Lang, for Hon. Mr Leonard, moved the second reading of Bill S-40, to incorporate United Investment Life Assurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-40 is an act to incorporate a life insurance company and comes before us in the standard form for such bills. The provisions of the bill are formal and set out the skeletal facts necessary for consideration on second reading.

Honourable senators will see from the bill that the company is sought to be incorporated under the name of United Investment Life Assurance Company, and, in French, La Compagnie d'Assurance Vie United Investment.

The provisional directors are named in the bill, and it is provided that the capital stock of the company shall be $2 million, divided into shares of $10 each.

The bill also provides that the amount to be subscribed and fully paid before the general meeting for the election of directors is called shall be $500,000.

The next section provides that the company shall not commence business until at least that amount of money is subscribed, together with a contribution to surplus of $500,000. The head office of the company is to be in the City of Toronto, Province of Ontario.

Finally, the bill provides that the company may carry on the business of life insurance, personal accident insurance, and sickness insurance.

I am advised that the initial capital required before this company commences operations will be provided by a Canadian company known as United Funds Management Limited, which company will own 100 per cent of the shares of the proposed corporation, at least initially.

United Funds Management Limited is the proposed total shareholder of our corporation. It is an investment management company which manages the portfolio of another corporation known as United Accumulated Fund Ltd., a company with assets of approximately $250 million.

I should add that United Funds Management Limited is in turn a subsidiary of an American investment management company by the name of Waddell and Reed Inc. That company has management of a portfolio worth in excess of $2,250 million.

With regard to the Canadian parent company of the proposed corporation, I might say that 18 per cent of United Funds Management Limited shares are held by Canadian shareholders and the balance is held in the United States.

It is proposed that this corporation, in carrying out the business set out in the bill, will offer for sale, initially, term insurance and ordinary life insurance, stressing forms of such insurance which complement the investment requirements of the shareholders of the mutual fund, United Accumulative Fund Ltd., which fund is managed by the parent corporation.

It is also proposed that the sales force of the new corporation will operate out of the existing branch offices of United Investment Services Limited.

I think there is little else that I can add at this stage of the bill. If the bill receives second reading, I would propose that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, where honourable senators would have the opportunity of examining the promoters of the bill and hearing from the Superintendent of Insurance.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Hon. Mr. Lang, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

TRAINING ALLOWANCE BILL, 1966

SECOND READING

Hon. Earl W. Urquhart moved the second reading of Bill C-186, respecting allowances to persons being trained under technical and vocational training programs.

He said: Mr. Speaker and honourable senators, I must first of all thank the Leader of the Government for giving me the opportunity of moving the second reading of this bill. This also gives me my first chance to say something in this chamber since my appointment to this distinguished legislative body.

I wanted to say that I do not feel completely strange here, because I sat for 14 years in the House of Assembly of Nova Scotia. I have noticed, however, that different procedures are followed here, in some respects.

In the short time I have been a member of the Senate I have made many friends, and I certainly appreciate the kindness and the consideration that were shown to me, both inside and outside this chamber, by you Mr. Speaker, by the Leader of the Government, by the Leader of the Opposition and by honourable senators.

Having said the niceties which are part of the tradition of this house, I shall endeavour to explain as best I can the provisions of Bill C-186.

Honourable senators, this bill, which relates to the payment of increased allowances for persons being trained under provincial technical and vocational training programs, is one which gives increased importance to the paramount problems of retraining and further training of our labour force across Canada.

It is a truism widely acknowledged in this country and in other countries of the free world, that the skills of members of our labour force must be constantly improved. Our modern industrial society is moving so rapidly ahead that we are experiencing an industrial evolution from year to year. Industrial production techniques undergo changes so frequently that our productivity becomes greatly increased.

Very often many people are affected by the improved production techniques because they were initially trained for an industry or for techniques which have become obsolete almost overnight. Thus they find themselves often at an early age without employment and without any bright prospects for future employment.

The Economic Council of Canada and other organizations in this country have constantly urged major efforts to improve the skills and upgrade the standards of our workmen. Skills and knowledge can become out of date rapidly, as new situations and new needs arise almost daily on the industrial and economic scenes. An extensive program of training for the unemployed and the under-employed appears to be a correct answer to the unemployment problems of a changing industrial society.

The importance of training must be recognized and appreciated if we are to keep pace with a buoyant economy and technical changes.

One of the reasons why existing training programs have not been used to a greater extent is the inadequacy or the low level of present training allowances. This has been an obvious weakness in the present system.

The bill, C-186, will go a long way to correct this weakness and assist the provincial governments in enlarging and extending their technical and vocational training programs. Bill C-186 makes provision for much higher training allowances for trainees in technical and vocational schools taking courses covered by federal-provincial agreements.

As honourable senators will see, this bill is short and it is also simple. I should think that its provisions will be beyond the tongue of dispute and will be commended by all concerned.

This bill has only two purposes, namely, first, to increase the allowances to employees who will take training or retraining courses in provincial technical and vocational training schools by agreement with the provinces; and, secondly, to amend certain provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The provisions of this bill were discussed by federal authorities with provincial ministers at the Federal-Provincial Conference last January and there was general agreement among provincial ministers as to the desirability of increasing the level of allowances for employees in training.

It was tentatively agreed that July 1 of this year would be the commencement date for the implementation of this new arrangement between the provinces and the federal Government. We must bear in mind that each province has to enter into an agreement with the federal Government respecting the new scale of training allowances.

With that background, let us examine the two provisions of this proposed legislation. Let us consider first the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act which are amended by this legislation.

The main purpose of this new arrangement is to sever the connection between training and unemployment. In the past, and as of now, unemployed workers who entered training courses continued to receive during their period of training unemployment insurance benefits. These benefits were deducted from the training allowances granted by the provinces so that the allowances are in effect at present merely a supplement to insurance benefits.

The main bad feature of this arrangement was that trainees had to use up their unemployment insurance benefits while training, with the result that their benefits could be depleted following training and before they could obtain work. Indeed, some persons could feel penalized for taking training and find themselves worse off immediately after taking a course.

This legislation breaks the dependence of training on unemployment insurance. It provides that any unemployed worker who enters a training course covered by a federal-provincial agreement will be entitled to a training allowance and will retain intact his unemployment insurance benefit and contribution rights during training. Let us clearly understand that the unemployed worker will not receive unemployment insurance benefits while in training. Instead, he will receive a training allowance. When he leaves the training course he will have exactly the same amount of unemployment insurance protection as when he entered, even if the training course is several months or over a year in duration.

To summarize this point, up to now the incomes of people in training have come in part from unemployment insurance if they were entitled to such benefit, and the balance from training allowances. The unemployment insurance benefits are financed from the federal unemployment insurance fund. The training allowances are paid by provincial governments, but the federal Government reimburses 90 per cent of the expenditure which leaves only 10 per cent to be financed by the provinces in the final analysis. This is the picture as of now.

What change in that setup will be brought about by this legislation? When the connection between training and unemployment insurance is severed, a new financial arrangement must be implemented. The provisions of this bill will, in effect, substitute for unemployment insurance a basic training allowance of $35 a week, which will be paid in full by the federal Government at no cost to the provinces. The $35 per week is based on a 35-hour training week at $1 per hour. This is a basic or minimum allowance and we should not lose sight of that fact. It replaces unemployment insurance for trainees. It will be available to people in training courses if they have previously been self-employed in primary industries, such as farming, fishing or lumbering.

In addition to paying the basic allowance of $35 per week, the federal Government will reimburse the provinces for 90 per cent of training allowances in excess of the basic allowance of $35 per week up to a total allowance of $90 a week.

I want to make this point clear on the additional allowances to be paid above the basic allowance of $35. The amount of these additional allowances is a matter for each province to decide in accordance with its own needs, its own wage levels and its own priorities. Accordingly, the rules and regulations governing the supplementary allowances will be determined in the agreements negotiated with each province under the provisions of clause 3 of this bill.

The federal Government proposes to fix a maximum supplementary allowance of $55 a week which, with the basic allowance of $35, would mean a total allowance of $90 a week.

The maximum total allowance of $90 a week would be paid to trainees with a number of dependants living in the relatively high-wage areas of Canada. Accordingly, lower scales would be in effect where wage levels are lower, and we expect that the provinces would want variations written into the agreements relating to whether the trainee lives at home or has to be away from home to take the training course.

The federal Government is willing to enter into agreement with the provinces providing for variations according to family circumstances and living costs, provided the basic allowance is never less than $35 per week, which is paid 100 per cent by the federal Government, and that the supplementary allowance, of which 90 per cent is paid by the federal Government, does not exceed a maximum of a further $55 a week, for a maximum total allowance of $90 a week.

This legislation will go a long way in meeting the needs of modern technology and the requirements of a modern economy. It will provide an incentive to workers to achieve higher incomes, and better working careers will be the result for the trainees. This is but another step forward in making the most of the great human resources of Canada.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before saying a few words with regard to this bill, may I be permitted to extend to the sponsor, Senator Urquhart, a very warm and special welcome to this chamber.

He and I have been friends for many years. We were in the Legislature of Nova Scotia together for a time. He was successful in remaining a member of the Legislature for 14 years, which is no mean achievement in Nova Scotia when one considers that I made it for only four years.

I am also pleased to have him here because now I have some assistance in representing the Island of Cape Breton, which I know you will all agree is a very heavy responsibility. Indeed, there is a vacancy in the Senate at the moment for a representative from Nova Scotia, and I am sure Senator Urquhart will agree with me that that vacancy should be filled by someone from the Island of Cape Breton.

An Hon. Senator: How many do you want?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton): The more the better.

While Senator Urquhart is still a young man, he has already had a distinguished career in the Province of Nova Scotia. He did not mention that he was first elected to the Legislature while a student at Dalhousie Law School. He rose rapidly in the Legislature; indeed, he rose to the highest rank in the councils of his party, and while a member he earned for himself the respect and indeed the admiration of the people of Nova Scotia. I can assure you that he is a man of ability and of excellent judgment, one who has already served his province well. He will also serve it well in this chamber and, I hope, for many years to come. I congratulate him upon the excellent presentation he has made this afternoon.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton): Speaking to this bill, I believe it is a good addition to our existing legislation regarding technical and vocational training. Indeed, I feel it is a logical development of existing legislation, because such legislation must develop as the years go by and this bill is a part of that continuing development. It is also a sign that we are making progress; it is a forward step; but we must also remember that we have a long way to go before our system can be called complete.

As has been mentioned, this bill separates Unemployment Insurance payments from the allowances paid to unemployed persons taking training courses. By so doing it is recognizing that these are separate and distinct matters. It is recognition, or at least a partial recognition, that workers may well have to take training, retraining or further training courses as a normal condition of their working lives, and that receiving such courses will not be regarded as being participated in by the unemployed but by the employed. In other words, I think that training being taken under these technical and vocational programs, in so far as adult workers are concerned—persons who have been employed—will have to be regarded and treated as ordinary, regular employment. Such persons would not be classified as being unemployed, but it would mean that they would be classified, treated and paid just as if they were in any other type of employment, and there would be a relationship of employer and employee between the authority giving the training course and the worker taking such a course.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask, will his contributions continue to the Unemployment Insurance Fund during this period?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton): As far as I know, no; but I shall deal with that matter in a moment.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: What about his pension contributions?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton): Up until now a worker taking a training course was, in effect, using his Unemployment Insurance benefits. Apart from that, the only allowance he received was the amount over and above such benefits and, as has been stated, of this amount the federal Government reimbursed the provinces for 90 per cent. This bill is breaking the connection between Unemployment Insurance and the training programs in so far as the financial allowance to be paid is concerned. As I understand it, any Unemployment Insurance benefits a worker is entitled to when beginning a course are held in abeyance, as it were, so they are available to him on completion of the course.

In passing, may I add that sections 45, 47 and 48 of the Unemployment Insurance Act and clauses 5 and 6 of this bill are not easy to follow or understand. However, I take it from clause 5 of the bill that an unemployed worker taking a training course does not, while taking such training, pay Unemployment Insurance premiums, nor does the training authority make any such contributions. If this is so, then this bill does not fully recognize that these training courses are to be considered as employment.

In my opinion, the time is rapidly approaching, if it is not already here, to consider these training courses for unemployed workers—or for employed workers who require retraining or further training—as regular, normal employment, and, as such, contributions would be deducted for Unemployment Insurance premiums, for the Canada Pension Plan and for any other purpose that usually accompanies the relationship of employer and employee. Of course, in order to do this a somewhat higher scale of allowance would have to be paid.

The present bill makes some changes in such payments, but further changes should not be difficult. It may be too late to do anything about it this year, as I understand the agreements with the provinces are expected to come into effect on July 1 next. However, I hope that further study and consideration will be given to this suggestion before the agreements are renegotiated or changed.

Under the terms of the Technical and Vocational Training Act the federal Government has made agreements with the provinces to pay 90 per cent of the allowances being paid to unemployed workers taking these training courses; and, as has been stated, under this bill the federal Government will be able to make agreements with the provinces to pay 100 per cent of a basic training allowance of $35 a week and 90 per cent of any allowance paid over that sum.

When the Minister of Labour was explaining this bill he stated, in effect, that the $35 a week would be roughly $1 an hour which the trainee would receive. He further stated that this rate would probably come to $1.25 an hour or more, with the amount contributed by the provinces, and so would be at least up to the minimum wage paid by the federal Government. As a matter of principle, I would like to see the federal authority contribute a basic training allowance of $43.75 a week on the basis of a 35-hour week. In other words, the federal authority would then be making a basic contribution equal to the federal minimum wage law. This would be another recognition of the employment feature of this type of training. The extra cost involved would not be great, as, of the extra $8.75 involved, the federal authority would in any event be paying $7.87, if the province brought the allowance up to that amount.

In the course of his remarks when explaining this bill in the House of Commons, the minister mentioned that in the agreements made or to be made with the provinces these training courses will be available not only to unemployed persons but also to persons who have previously been self-employed in primary industry, as Senator Urquhart pointed out. I think this is a wise provision and it should be helpful. I hope it will not be too long before these training courses will be available to all unemployed persons. I understand from the remarks of the minister that they are to be restricted, so far as the provisions of this bill are concerned, to workers who are the heads of families and must maintain a certain standard of living. I hope it will not be long before these training programs are broadened and enlarged. I think they are necessary and will become more necessary as time goes on.

As may be concluded from my remarks, I am in favour of this legislation. I do not think it is necessary to refer it to committee. The sponsor made an excellent and detailed explanation and, so far as I am concerned, we need no further information on it.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I think this bill should go to a committee. The honourable Senator Macdonald spoke of this undertaking as providing employment, but nothing I have read in the debates so far indicates that from now on the recipients of these allowances will be part of the statistics on employment in this country. Their status lacks some of the ingredients of employment. We ought to have an explanation of this. In the first place, they will not be subject to Unemployment Insurance payments and, in the second place, what they receive will not be subject to deductions.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Will there be no deductions for income tax?

Hon. Mr. Croll: They will not be subject to deductions for income tax. They are not subject to any deductions.

All honourable senators seem to be in favour of the bill, but we ought to have a clear understanding of what it is about. Therefore, in my opinion, it should be sent to a committee so that we may obtain explanations.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, there is further information I should like to have. It is obvious that there must be amendments to other acts. If these people are not to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan, then I think an amendment to the appropriate legislation will be necessary. If they are not to contribute to the Unemployment Insurance Fund, then that statute will have to be amended, as will other statutes that are affected. There are many questions that come to my mind with respect to the carrying out of the purpose of this bill, for which I am all in favour, which questions I shall not direct to the honourable sponsor (Hon. Mr. Urquhart) because I do not think he would be prepared to answer them.

I should like to know why the federal Government is paying 100 per cent of the amount of $35. Surely, the provinces are interested to some extent in this matter. Why should they not bear at least a portion of the expense? I am not quarreling with the federal Government's paying 100 per cent, but it does seem to me to be fair at least to ask why it should pay it all and the provinces pay nothing. In the second division the federal Government is paying up to 90 per cent and the provinces only 10 per cent.

The bill before us is not sufficiently clear as to why these payments will be made to the provinces which will then make them to the individuals. If this bill contained explanatory notes perhaps it could be understood, but a first reading of it does not convey to the reader a complete knowledge of what is under way.

Unquestionably, the bill should go to a committee for further discussion with those who drew it and who know how it will operate and can answer the questions I have raised.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, if it is the desire of any honourable senator to have this bill sent to committee, I am sure the sponsor and also Senator Macdonald would agree that that is the proper course. I would urge the sponsor to take that course at the conclusion of the debate on second reading.

I would point out that some of the suggestions made by Senator Macdonald from Cape Breton involve procedures in the other place which require a resolution. The same applies to some of the suggestions made by Senator Roebuck. These matters are beyond our power in this house to change because they entail a further charge upon the Treasury. However, I think everyone will agree, as both of the honourable gentlemen who have spoken so well have put it, that this is an attempt to walk before we run. The principle of the bill, in that it provides the beginning of a remedy, commends itself to the entire house.

I am sure that we can look upon this afternoon as being somewhat of a Cape Breton afternoon, and this is understandable. I remember having the distinct honour and privilege of being invited to address the members of the Legislature of Nova Scotia a few years ago at their annual dinner party. The present Premier, Mr. Stanfield, in introducing me said that I had been "appointed" to the Senate on such and such a date. There were rumours in the air at the time that the honourable Senator Macdonald from Cape Breton was about to be—may I use the word? —"appointed" to the Senate. It was a rather convivial evening, and Senator Macdonald rose in his place and said: "May I correct the Premier by saying that the proper word is 'summoned'?" It was generally agreed that perhaps he had more of an interest in the precise language that should be used on such an occasion than any other member of the Legislature. He will remember that occasion, I am sure.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton): I do.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Last fall when Senator Welch, Mrs. Welch and I were in New Zealand we had, quite by accident, a talk with the Minister of Health, the Honourable Donald Mackay who represents a district in New Zealand called Waipu. I got talking to him about an exodus of Cape Bretoners over 100 years ago under the leadership of a Presbyterian minister, the Reverend Norman Macleod. These people had come from Scotland with him, and had settled in Cape Breton. They found conditions were not quite what they expected, and they decided to re-emigrate. They built their own ships and, taking their animals and household equipment, went to New Zealand where they settled in a district called Waipu. The Honourable Donald Mackay, the Minister of Health in the Government of New Zealand, was a descendant of one of those people who left Cape Breton. Since that time I have received many pieces of literature dealing with this emigration from Cape Breton to New Zealand, and I have sent it to people in Nova Scotia. I am given to understand it will probably wind up in the Gaelic centre at St. Anns, the place where they hold the Mod.

Honourable senators, for the purpose of putting myself in order, and having told that story, I should say we are very glad that the progenitors of our two colleagues from Cape Breton remained in Canada, and that today these two gentlemen are members of the Senate of Canada and not the members for Waipu in the New Zealand house. If legislation of this kind had been available to their ancestors, no doubt some of those people who are doing so well in New Zealand would still be in Cape Breton.

What I do want to add is that we are very pleased with the performance of these two honourable gentlemen, and I especially commend Senator Urquhart on his maiden speech. It was a delight to listen to him. He has proved that in his presence here we have a fine addition to the Senate.

Motion agreed to, and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Urquhart, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES

INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question which, if possible, may be answered tomorrow.

When will the corrected maps and descriptions of the constituencies that were, according to the newspapers, prepared recently, be made available to the members of the Senate?

I might add that I have telephoned the Distribution Office many times and have been informed that it has not yet received them.

RURAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT FUND BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the third reading of Bill C-151, to provide for the establishment of a fund for the economic and social development of special rural development areas, as amended.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not want to delay or oppose this bill, but I want to put on record that I am not entirely satisfied with the reasons obtained in the Committee on Banking and Commerce why the program for which this fund is created is not integrated with the ARDA program.

The consequence of this different status for the fund is that there is no apportionment between the provinces of the sum of $50 million which is set aside for this program. Consequently, the amount can be spent anywhere, even in a single area in Canada.

Moreover, the bill does not provide any fiscal compensation for a province which would like to opt out of this program. We have had a vague assurance that this program was approved in principle by the provinces. I am not satisfied with the assurance that we received in this connection, and I suspect that we may face opposition to this distinct setup for this fund, which we would not have had to face if it had been integrated in the ARDA program. I feel that I need to draw these facts to the attention of the house.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I wish to convey my thanks to the Chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee for having supplied me with the information that I asked for regarding urban and rural populations. The first year given is 1914, that is, the first year of World War I; the second is 1920, the second year after World War I; the next is 1939, the first year of World War II; and 1945, the last year of World War II.

The information given confirms what was said here in the Senate to the effect that in 1914 the urban population was 3,690,000 and the rural population, 4,190,000, while in 1945 the urban population was 6,690,000 and the rural population 5,380,000.

These figures prove that the rural population decreased after the war. During the war many people left the country to live in towns. That is one of the reasons why some members of the House of Commons fought against conscription of the sons of farmers who were uprooted from the farms and did not return there afterwards. It is a long time afterwards to get confirmation of what we were saying at that time, when we were given the cold shoulder by the so-called enthusiasts for the war.

May I point out now that the farmers are the most useful of all citizens, because they continue to feed us. I regret that the only witness who appeared before the committee, and who was a nice fellow—I do not object to that—came from the western part of Canada and knew nothing of the problems of the east. We should have had another witness who is more familiar with our own problems in the east.

That is all I have to say for the moment. There will be other occasions to speak about it.

Motion agreed to and bill as amended read third time and passed.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL 1966

THIRD READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the third reading of Bill C-178, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, before this bill is read a third time may I be permitted to make a few remarks.

This bill could be called an omnibus bill because it refers to the new arrangement that will exist in many departments. Some branches are transferred from one department to another. It leaves one at a loss to know with whom we should deal when we have any matters to discuss.

I have asked the minister in charge who was responsible for the drafting of this bill and he answered that they were the draftsmen of the Department of Justice. I continued to insist, and finally I found that that bill had been drafted by the Treasury Board in co-operation with the draftsmen of the Department of Justice.

Before these changes come into force I must say that the first reform should be in the Department of Justice itself. I regret to have to say that, but I have been here long enough to express my free opinion about matters of such importance.

I remember the great Ministers of Justice. The first one that I knew well personally, and who used to add always words of French in the letters he sent to me, was Sir Allen Bristol Aylesworth who was Minister of Justice in the Laurier Government and was one of the secretaries of the Government at the time of Confederation. He was the one who appeared before the Privy Council for the Ontario Government—whose Premier and Attorney General was then Sir Oliver Mowat—and he won the battle of equal rights for Ontario. He was a learned jurist; he also knew the Bible by heart—which is remarkable for a lawyer. I think the only one who could be compared to him in that respect is our friend Senator Roebuck who is very familiar with Holy Writ. Perhaps there are others, I do not know.

Another Minister of Justice who was very impressive was the Honourable Hugh Guthrie. He was tall and had an impressive demeanour. When a question was asked of him, he used to answer in his capacity of Minister of Justice: "This is the law", and it ended there.

Another one whom I knew very well also, and whose name I mentioned recently, was the Honourable Ernest Lapointe who was a giant mentally and physically and who had a high sense of duty.

Honourable senators, if you will permit me, I will mention to you what I said before the committee the other day, quoting Mr. Ray Brown of the Canadian Press, who has set down his recollections in a book entitled From Where I Sat. One of those recollections was that once he called at the office of Mr. Lapointe in the East Block and he saw three women there. He wondered who they were, and he was told that they were the wives of three men sentenced to be hanged the following day. One woman got into the office of the minister and came out at once; the second one did the same; and the third one entered into the office of Mr. Lapointe but did not return at once. Then the bell rang and everybody went to the minister's office and found the woman lying on the floor because the minister had told her he could not change his decision regarding the hanging of her husband. The three men were hanged the following day.

I knew Mr. Lapointe well enough; I used to meet him every day during the summer, and I saw him often here in Ottawa. When he had a case of capital punishment to decide he could not sleep for two or three weeks, but he said, "This is my duty; I have to do it although it is hard to do." That was the way the minister acted until a change occurred under the previous administration.

I told the then Minister of Justice that it was a grave error to change the definition of murder. Until that time we had murder and manslaughter. He changed the definition into capital murder and non-capital murder, which confused the minds of the juries to a certain extent.

The trouble came in the Department of Justice when an order in council was passed last summer to decide that there would be no executions until the vote was taken in the House of Commons as to whether capital punishment should continue or not. The vote was taken and the majority of the house voted to maintain capital punishment, but nevertheless criminals are not hanged when they have been sentenced to be hanged.

There is no sense of proportion, and I regret this very much. I cannot understand why the Department of Justice was so hard on a few young men of various departments for peccadilloes when others like Santa Claus Marcotte can write novels and paint landscapes in jail. Then you have the case of the sinister Dion who survived the assassination of several young boys. That is due to the fact that the recommendation in the files signed by the judge not to let him out of jail was disregarded completely by the remission commission which looks after the commutation of sentences. The president of that commission said that he had shed tears of blood. But shedding tears of blood did not give life back to the young men assassinated by that murderer. He was not punished; he is still there on the advice of those responsible for advising the department on the commutation of sentences. And it goes on like that.

I find that the Government has been unfair to the Solicitor General in putting into his lap the whole matter of capital punishment. He was a new minister. The Minister of Justice must keep his own responsibility instead of putting it into the hands of another colleague. I regret the attitude of the Government in this matter of utmost importance. I say that without rancour, without fear and without favour: I say it because I believe society must be protected.

Last year or the year before a child in the City of Quebec was wounded to death by a lioness. The constables came and shot the animal to get rid of it. For me, when a man is dangerous to society, society should get rid of him, because one never knows whether his children or grandchildren will become the victims of those who have been dealt with too leniently.

I wonder what will be done about the situation. At the present time some of those bad characters are scot free. According to the press someone said the other day—it was not said to me but I read it—"I will be in jail for 10 years; my sentence will be commuted and then I will have my pension and I will live happily until the end of my days." They call that humanity. They call that being humane. They are afraid to get rid of one who has been found guilty of murder by his peers, and they do that for the sake of humanity. For me, humanity consists of the protection of the whole population of the country against dangerous characters.

There is another item which also interests me. It is one of those things that have been changed by the act. Before last year the Chief Electoral Officer had to report to Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, and he was a servant of Parliament. At the present time he is the master of the House of Commons. It is quite strange. It is the same thing as it is with capital punishment. No one dared to assume the responsibility of entrusting to a parliamentary committee the defining of the boundaries of the various constituencies of Canada. This is very unfortunate. The members themselves have placed a rope around their necks. Who holds the rope? There are two who hold the rope—the first is the Chief Electoral Officer and the other is the gentleman who will define the boundaries of the constituencies.

Do you not believe, honourable colleagues, this is an abjuration of Parliament, that Parliament has been vesting in public servants the authority that it had to accomplish certain matters that concerned itself? This is why in withdrawing my bill I have to reveal the legislation concerning the redistribution of constituencies by civil servants, and I must pay a special tribute to Mr. Real Caouette, Mr. Fane of Vegreville, Mr. Bell the member for Carleton, Mr. Gérard Duquet for Quebec East, Mr. Neveau of Shefford and others, who made excellent speeches. Some of them have spoken very well about this matter, and others have spoken very well about the Senate too, but it is unfortunate that the majority of the members of the House of Commons have swallowed that legislation and have permitted outsiders to run their own business. This is why I withdraw my bill, but I could not do so without paying a special tribute to those who have fought hard, although unsuccessfully, for the respect of the rights of Parliament.

There is another matter I want to mention. I have some copies of a motion which was unanimously adopted by the Senate six years ago, to the effect that there are correlative responsibilities attached to liberty and freedom. I wonder if you remember that. Some honourable senators now present were not here at that time, but that motion, which was unanimously adopted by the Senate six years ago, means you cannot speak of liberty and freedom of human rights without speaking of the responsibilities attached to them. My liberty ends when yours starts, and vice versa, so that there is order in society.

I remember when I was at college we had to write a line at the top of our copybooks. It was: Ordo ducepe ad Deum—"Order leads to God". Then we continued to write our exercises.

I believe in order, and I regret at the present time that we are passing through a crisis of authority where nobody seems to assume the responsibility for his own actions. I believe we must respect the Bench, but the Bench should start by respecting itself. It was pitiful to see in the press that the probe that is going on is more for the insecurity of a couch than for the security of the state. Our lady colleagues will excuse me, but the conclusion is whether a lady's man dreamed over a Beautyrest or snored under it. It does not seem to be serious, and the people of Canada do not appreciate it at all. I have talked to people from the west and from the east, and they say, "What are they doing over there discussing matters like that, which are of no importance to the state?" I know very well that if there had been some kind of treason it would be different, but what has been reported by the press are rather matters that are dealt with at the Old Bailey in London, the police courts in the city.

There is something else I want to tell you. I have no grudge, as I have said already, against anyone who makes money. My confreres at the Bar can charge as much as can be declared acceptable or reasonable, and they may be happy; but I insist again, and I want to be understood clearly, that the lawyers who receive legal fees from any government are not entitled to speak for the Bar and they should resign from the Bar or resign from the cases they are engaged in for any government because they cease to be free. We need freedom in this country; we need freedom of opinion, freedom in accordance with the law of the land, freedom to protect the minorities and freedom to act normally and as you are expected to act.

I wonder what you think of it, but I will send you the whole brief that was crowned by your unanimous approval of the statement that there are responsibilities which are correlative to liberties. My conclusion is that fortunately, or unfortunately, the Senate is the only body in Canada which could be independent, if you want it to be; and you could render an immense service to the country by doing that. Moreover, the people are watching you; they are looking to you over the House of Commons, all of you without any exception and without any political party consideration. They say, "What will the Senate do in such an occurrence?" The answer is in your hands.

Honourable senators, I have no lesson to teach you; I am not preaching a sermon; but I repeat what I have heard in many places from many people, who have respect for you. They say that they expect you to make a decision that you can justify in the minds of all those who will see the reports of the Senate.

I said to the minister in charge in committee that I did not believe in the opportunity or efficiency of the changes. That is one opinion. I may be wrong about it, but I have expressed my sincere opinion. Now it is for you to decide what you have to do. I will speak on it again because I do not wish to be boresome at this time, but these are liberties, these are things that deserve every consideration. I respect you, and I expect you to keep the respect the people have for you and not to lose it as the House of Commons has lost it to a great degree, although the members are nice fellows and respectable people. The demeanour of the House of Commons in certain matters has been obnoxious to the prestige of Parliament as a whole, and I want the Senate to survive.

I hope I have been clear enough. I could have spoken at much greater length, but it is enough and you understand me. I hope I have not spoken in vain.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 8, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Gouin, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, this is the first opportunity I have had of speaking in the chamber with His Honour the Speaker in the Chair. Even at this late date I hope that I may extend my congratulations to him on his being appointed to his high office, and to say that he has always conducted himself in a fair, judicial and responsible manner. It is certainly a pleasure for me to work with Mr. Speaker even more intimately now than in the days when I was in the Commons.

Honourable senators, this afternoon I should like in the main to discuss what I believe to be an important grievance felt by the producers of western Canada. We all agree that our nation today is going through a period of very great prosperity. We recognize, no matter what is our political faith, that our country is prosperous, our economy is buoyant, and the two houses of Parliament of Canada, together under the leadership of the Government are making progress in very many important fields such as medicare, social security generally, the Canada Assistance Plan and the Canada Pension Plan. As a Parliament, under the leadership of the Government, we are also making important progress in the field of education.

Although I am a new member of this chamber, in the short time I have been here I have heard very distinguished members say that in their opinion both major political parties require at this time a change in leadership. I intend to make no remarks about the leadership of the other major political party of which I am not a member, but I do believe, and believe sincerely, that the Liberal party is most fortunate, and Canada is most fortunate, to have as its leader the Right Honourable L. B. Pearson, who is doing a good job for this nation and who I hope will continue to do the same job for many years to come.

It is very easy to write articles in the newspapers about the leadership of the country. It is very easy to write articles in the newspapers about the incompetency of members of Parliament or anybody else. But the great leaders of democratic nations have always gone through a period or periods in which they are unpopular, and in which there is a strong hue and cry for a change of leadership.

I was fairly young during most of the time when the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King was the Prime Minister of this country, but from reading the newspapers I did not think he had a friend. Yet, he won many elections, gave great leadership, and has gone down in history as one of the great Prime Ministers of this country.

Winston Churchill after the war was unpopular. He was the great leader who had brought Britain through the war and who had led the democracies in the fight against totalitarianism, and yet he became unpopular. The hue and cry was to change his leadership, but his leadership was not changed. He vindicated himself in peacetime in the same commendable way that he vindicated himself in wartime. He, of course, has gone down in history as the greatest Englishman of all time.

So, I am not impressed by the articles and statements I read criticizing leadership of the Liberal party.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Good boy.

Hon. Mr. Argue: The proof of the pudding is in the eating, and I think the people of this country are doing very well under the leadership of the Prime Minister. But there is, I think, a very serious problem in our democracy, and it lies in the fact that the Government does not have a majority in the House of Commons. One can say it is because of this or that reason—because the people were fed up, or because not enough seats were delivered by the Province of Quebec, the Province of Ontario or the Maritime Provinces. I think the real reason is pretty clear. It is because the Government did not get support in the three Prairie Provinces. It had three members in the House of Commons from the Prairie Provinces before the election, and in the election it lost two.

Apart entirely from political considerations, this is not good for Canada. It is not good for democracy. It is not good that a great part of the nation is not adequately represented in the Government, no matter whether it be a Liberal or a Conservative government. It is good for the nation that all provinces have a reasonable representation on both sides of the house.

The present Leader of the Conservative party became the Prime Minister of this country in 1957. Not many people remember that he became Prime Minister of the country with almost no support from his own province of Saskatchewan. He had three seats from Saskatchewan and I think only three from Alberta. But within a year he had vast support in that area, and that support he and his party has continued to receive.

There are many reasons why this has happened, but the central one is that the people on the Prairies felt, rightly or wrongly, that the Conservative Government had their interests at heart and was thinking about them and doing some things on their behalf.

It is my opinion that some of the things that register as most important from time to time are not necessarily the big or the costly items. One of the things that that Government did, and which was given widespread support, was to provide a system of cash advances on farm-stored grain. This is used by a relatively small minority of farmers, but the farmers who need it have it there and they do use it. It has cost the treasury of this country a very small sum of money relative to the cost of many other items. This action was greatly appreciated.

The Government on three different occasions decided to make acreage payments. The farmers from western Canada had come down to Ottawa en masse asking for deficiency payments, for something fundamental and permanent, for something that would compensate them for the increasing costs of production. They did not get what they wanted. They got only a small proportion of what they asked for, but they were very grateful for the relatively small consideration they received, and they have given their support to that party ever since.

The Government needs the support of the Prairies for the good of the country, and I think it can get that support. It does not need all the seats on the prairies, and it would be a mistake if it were given them. It can get support on the Prairies if it will consider doing some of the things that are being requested of it from time to time. The members of the Senate can help correct this imbalance in Parliament by giving understanding consideration to the problems that exist on the Prairies.

The Liberal party had an agricultural program of many parts. Many of its features have been implemented. There has been a great expansion of credit under the Farm Credit Corporation Act, and there is the provision of crop insurance. These things are important and are appreciated. There have been even greater sales of wheat in the last three years than there were under the previous administration, and this fact is also appreciated. But I think the western farmer believes that these things have been done as a kind of routine, without any real basic understanding of, or basic sympathy with, the central problem.

When the Government was elected in 1963 it received very little support from the Prairies. There was a feeling among some at least that the Liberal party could get along without widespread and substantial support on the prairies. Some people reasoned: What did they do for us this time? We have no great responsibility to do anything for them. There was a feeling that the Prairies had repudiated the agricultural program with which the Liberal party had gone to the country, and that therefore there was no need to implement that program for the people of the Prairies.

There has been some prejudice in Parliament during all the years since 1945, when I first came here, with regard to the people on the Prairies. It can be heard almost every day. It is said that the people there drive big cars and take long winter holidays in California and Florida, and that, therefore, it must be pretty easy to operate a farm out there when there is so little to be done.

Well, through no fault of mine and through no request of mine, in the last three years I have had the opportunity of seeing how easy it is for the farmers on the prairies to produce wheat, and just what work there is for them to do. I can tell you that there is a great deal of work to grain growing. First, the farmer must get the seed cleaned, and if he is smart he does that early. When it comes time to plant the crop he has to rise early in the morning. I had a couple of men working for me, and they were very good. Without any request on my part, they volunteered when the weather was good—and you cannot farm when the weather is not good—to work until midnight, night after night, and we were in the field at 7 o'clock in the morning. During all this time I started at 4 o'clock in the morning because I liked to start early and quit at dark. As soon as I could see by the early daylight I was on the tractor.

The farmers are out in the fields on the prairies now and are working very hard. In the wintertime a few of them get a holiday. A small percentage, maybe one per cent or a half of one per cent, can go to the southern United States. Is that any great crime? If ten per cent could go that would mean a holiday only once in ten years. What is wrong with prairie farmers getting a holiday? These farmers do more than produce grain; they also produce a lot of livestock.

I am sure that members in this chamber realize that people on the prairies, as do people in any part of Canada, make a great productive contribution to the economy of this nation.

When wheat markets were difficult to obtain, there was perhaps not the measure of appreciation of the economic value of wheat production that there is now. However, if our exports had gone according to plan we would have exported in this present crop year over $1,200 million worth of wheat. Certainly that is a major item in Canada's balance of payments.

These grain producers also produce large numbers of cattle and hogs. I have in my hand the latest quarterly bulletin of agricultural statistics, published by D.B.S., which shows that just over a million farm people in Quebec and Ontario keep a little more than five million head of cattle—that is, five head of cattle per person. On the Prairies some three quarters of a million farm people keep 6.7 million head of cattle, or about nine head of cattle per person. Here in the east there are, admittedly, more milk cows, and there are special reasons for that. However, the prairie people are definitely large cattle producers.

Using the same yardstick, there are three hogs produced on the Prairies and three hogs in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec for each person living on farms.

It will be seen, therefore, that the farmers on the prairies are doing everything they can to produce and to make their own economic contribution to the welfare of the country.

In the election before the last one, the Liberal party went to the country with an agricultural program, and so far as the people on the Prairies are concerned, I think it had two main points. I have in my hand a pamphlet headed, "Wheat, Oats and Barley", and I shall quote from the pertinent sections.

> A new Liberal government will immediately provide a floor price of $2.00 per bushel for wheat, basis No. 1 Northern at Fort William, with appropriate differentials for other grades. This will apply over the life of the present International Wheat Agreement.
> Further, legislation will be provided for a two-price system for wheat on the basis of the unit quota. Farmers will be paid a price for wheat used in domestic human consumption which reflects the fact that they buy production requirements in a tariff-protected market and sell in world markets.

Here was the program, a floor price guaranteed at $2 per bushel for wheat, basis No. 1 Northern, and an unstated additional price per bushel on 300 bushels of wheat, that is, the unit quota.

Admittedly, the farmers did not flock to the support of the Liberal Party, but I do not think it was because they opposed this section of the program. I think it was because they were reasonably satisfied with the government in office, and they were not prepared at that time to switch their support to another political party.

Here was a program to give some guarantee of income, to increase incomes to a small degree, and to make the payments in such a way as to give a relatively greater support for the smaller farmer.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture came to Ottawa this spring and presented a brief to the Government. I quote only a couple of sentences from page 9 of that brief:

> We believe strongly that by some means the government must as a matter of public policy recognize its responsibility for protection of the income of the (wheat) producer, and adopt concrete measures to give effect to this responsibility. There is a need not only for a clear statement of intent at a very early date, but also for action to be taken in the near future.

They go on to urge a studying of the problem, and then they outline seven possible measures that the Government might take, any one or two of which might be adequate to deal with this question. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture pointed out that they had interviewed the Government on a number of occasions to emphasize this very thing.

I ask honourable senators whether they feel the people on the prairies are justified in asking for an income guarantee or a floor price on wheat or something by way of a subsidy to provide a larger measure of assistance to smaller farmers. I think they have a very good case indeed.

The Wheat Board has been handling the marketing of Canadian wheat for a great number of years, and it is easy to find out the payments that have been made and the price received by farmers over the years.

The price of wheat generally speaking has not changed in the last 20 years. The price farmers received per bushel of wheat produced in 1945 was almost identical with the price they received for a similar bushel of wheat produced just one year ago. How many other industries have not had an increase in their prices in the last 20 years? Although the price of wheat has remained the same, the index of farmers' costs of production, on the basis that 1939 equals 100, in 1945 was 152, and in August 1965, the last month for which statistics are available, it was 326.8. So the index of the cost of production has doubled over this period of 20 years while the price of wheat has remained almost the same.

We as a Liberal party said to the farmers of Western Canada that they should be given a support of $2 per bushel for wheat. I have in my hand the report of the Canadian Wheat Board for the crop year 1949-50, and I wish to read a couple of sentences from page 2:

> The domestic price of wheat in Canada was established by the Government at $2.00 per bushel for No. 1 Northern Wheat basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver, plus a carrying charge.

And the carrying charge was an additional return to the Canadian Wheat Board. So the price that was established in 1949 is the price that I am suggesting as an established minimum guarantee at this time.

I have stated that farmers have been receiving approximately the same price over the last 20 years. However, they do not know that they are going to get even that price, and this is part of the trouble. They have a feeling of complete insecurity, that at any time they might become victims of United States' policy, which may be to bring prices down; and they have a feeling that if the price is not good now, it could be worse almost overnight. A year ago in January, within a period of five days, the Canadian Wheat Board became the target of world competition, and it had to drop its selling price for wheat on the various grades from 12 to 20 cents a bushel. Surely this is a very difficult position for any industry to be in, to have to face this kind of a substantial, precipitous cut over which they have no control.

I feel the farmers of western Canada are doing a good job for the country and earning dollars for Canada. In spite of rumours—and that is all these statements are—they have not been raiding the Canadian treasury; they have been standing on their own feet. They have been standing in competition with the United States treasury. They have been standing against the competition from the treasuries of every major exporting country in the world.

In 1964-65—and this is from the last Canadian Wheat Board Report, 1964-65—the United States exported 728 million bushels of wheat. Of that quantity, only 162 million bushels were sold for cash. Therefore, the American farmer received 22 cents out of his dollar from the cash sales of wheat, and he received 78 cents out of the dollar from his government that had provided wheat on the export market—yes, and some on the domestic market—at subsidized prices. That is, 78 cents of the dollar the American wheat producer receives comes from the federal treasury of the United States.

In this country, on the same basis, how much of the Canadian farmer's dollar came from the federal treasury? We exported in that same year almost exactly 400 million bushels of wheat. The total gifts of Canadian wheat—the gifts, the provision of wheat outside of a cash market—amounted to just under 12 million bushels. So 97 cents out of every dollar paid to the Canadian farmer is cash, earned by him, and only 3 cents comes from the treasury of this country by way of provision of wheat for Colombo Plan countries and similar measures.

On the basis of the fact that the price of wheat has not increased for 20 years, on the basis of the commitments that have been made by the party that is in power in this country today, on the basis of the requests of farm organizations, I think that the Government, under its present leadership, should take action even now to implement this program.

What would $2-wheat cost? The year before last the farmers received $1.97, without a guarantee. So it would have cost 3 cents a bushel. In the past year the farmer received $1.87 a bushel, plus a fraction. So it would have cost just over 12 cents a bushel.

I told honourable senators of the great drop in the price of wheat a year ago January. The price of wheat has slowly been coming up since. After a long period of time it has now recovered the majority of that drop.

A guarantee of $2 wheat today might cost the treasury of this country very little. If the price of wheat continues to go up even another few cents a bushel it will cost the treasury of this country nothing. But it would still be of real value to the producer to know that his wheat in the bin, that the wheat growing out in the field, when it is harvested, can be sold and will be sold at a return to him of not less than this certain price.

I think this is something that can be defended in this country and with other countries who are subsidizing their producers by a much more handsome amount. This action could be defended as a sensible and reasonable thing. From any standpoint, I wish it had been done a couple of years ago.

The farmers' unions have come to Ottawa in the last few weeks and they did not request $2-wheat—they want $2.50 a bushel. Of course this would mean a very large sum of money.

As for $2-wheat, I must confess I had something to do with getting it in the liberal program, but I tell you I had absolutely nothing to do with the program calling for a two-price system. I think that some day, before long, a two-price system will be provided for, because it is sensible. It just means that a somewhat higher average price will be paid on a small quantity of wheat to each wheat producer. This is a transfer of money within the economy. It gives a little encouragement to the smaller wheat producer.

Having gone from one farmers' meeting to another, I can tell you that I found that all of them, whether small farmers or big farmers, have at heart the interests of their neighbour who may be a smaller farmer, and they support this kind of a small transfer payment.

An additional dollar a bushel on the unit quota—that was not my figure, I had nothing to do with this when it was talked about—could cost the treasury of this country close to $60 million in a year. Well, is that really too big an item to consider, for an industry that has been producing well over a billion dollars of hard currency for Canada through its exports on the markets of the world? Would this be too big an item to consider, when Parliament, very rightly, provided $100 million by way of grants and other assistance last year for the development of the Atlantic provinces? Is this out of the way from a Parliament that has supported the provision of some $143 million for the building of a bridge and a causeway to Prince Edward Island?

I am sure the prairie grain producers would support the recent dairy policy which I think is a good policy. In one fell swoop, by an announcement of the Government, the price on manufacturing milk across this country—which will be reflected in the returns of milk producers for the cheese market and for butter fat—is raised to $4 a hundredweight, at a projected cost to the national treasury of $90 million per year. If that is good for the dairy producers of this country—and I am sure it is—I see no reason why the great wheat-producing industry should not have some sympathetic consideration for its modest request, and for especially sympathetic consideration, because for a period of 20 years there has been no increase in the price of wheat.

I think the people on the prairies would like to have representation on the government side of the house, whether it be a Liberal Government or a Conservative Government. I think they are ready to give support, that they are basically and naturally inclined to give support to the Government in office. They recognize that the Government has done many things of great advantage to them and to the country—crop insurance, loans under the Farm Credit Corporation, and other things for the general advantage of this country—but they want consideration for this key item about which I have been speaking. They want consideration of some other things, too, such as unemployment insurance for farm labourers, adequate railway services, continuation of fiscal agreements with equalization grants, and other matters.

The key thing is whether or not the Government will do something to assure the stability of income on the prairies, to bring about a very modest increase in incomes at this time and to provide some small transfer of income in order to give the small farmer a bit of a break.

A prairie conference is being held at Saskatoon, sponsored by the Liberal Party on the prairies. There will be people coming to this conference from all parts of the prairies. I expect that it will be a productive conference. I would say that if the conference becomes anti-anything or anti-anybody it will be a failure.

This conference, to be of value, must be positive and must come out with positive action. I believe that if this is done, the general policy conference of the Liberal Party in Ottawa in October will bear real fruit.

The people on the prairies are just good Canadian citizens, as are people in all parts of the country. I do not think they object in any way to assistance being given in other parts of the nation. Because of recent strikes, they have not had it easy in the last few weeks and they may not have it easy in the next few weeks. The country is being plagued by many strikes. It is admitted that wheat exports will be down at least 35 million bushels. That means a loss of close to $70 million income this year. They may recover it next year if they get the breaks, but there is a risk of loss, and certainly for this year a $70 million loss of income is serious.

Farmers see that to settle the strike the workers were granted a 34 per cent increase in wages. They see that the dairy producers, by this new policy, by one announcement, get a 26 per cent subsidy. They read in the press that the farmers of Quebec, who were hard-pressed and were finding it difficult to get feed grains at the time of the strike will be compensated by the Government in amounts ranging from $2 to $7 per ton because of the increased cost of the longer freight haul from the lake parts. In other words, the cost of this strike is not to be borne in this instance by the feeders and farmers of the Province of Quebec.

I am glad that the Government undertook that action, but I say that when the prairie farmers already know they have lost $70 million income this year, and when they know their prices have not changed for such a long period of time, I think their request also deserves sympathetic consideration. I think their request can be met by a modest contribution from the rest of the people of this country. Prairie farmers would like the opportunity to go on producing larger and larger quantities of foodstuffs to feed needy people in countries all over the world, and they want to play their part in obtaining large export markets, thus helping Canada maintain a stable balance in her international payments.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Will you permit me a question? Do you know that in Quebec we pay higher prices for feed than do European people? Can you explain that?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I am not sure that I can explain it, but I believe it is correct. I believe it has to do with the higher domestic freight rates in Canada as compared with the lower export rates. I cannot speak for anyone else, but from memory I gather this is what the Government intends to deal with in its feed grains program. I hope they will deal with it, and I as an individual in this place would certainly give that kind of policy my support.

Motion agreed to, and the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Ordered that the address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are members of the Privy Council.

AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT—MOTION FOR APPROVAL—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 1, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aird:

> That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament do approve the Agreement concerning Automotive Products between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America signed on January 16, 1965, and tabled in the Senate on March 3, 1965; and that this House do approve the same.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I am very grateful to my friend Senator Grosart for giving me the privilege of speaking at this time. I understand that we are going to have the advantage of hearing Senator Grosart on this subject either immediately following me or at a later stage in this debate. There was an excellent debate on this subject of the agreement on June 1. It was explained at considerable length and very clearly by Senator Aird, and there followed two very able speeches by Senator Walker and Senator Willis from the other side of the chamber.

I am afraid I am not competent to discuss the merits or demerits to the Canadian economy of this particular agreement and so I am going to limit myself this afternoon to discussing certain criticisms of the manner in which this matter was brought before this house, as expressed by Senator Walker and Senator Willis in their speeches.

What we are discussing and what we are asked to approve is an international agreement between Canada and the United States respecting automotive products. The agreement was dated 16th January 1965 and is now in effect. Now Senator Walker in his excellent speech made the following remarks:

> In effect, Parliament is being asked, and I am sure my honourable and reasonable friend will agree, to rubber-stamp the executive action of the cabinet, to endorse an agreement now operating for over a year.
> What are we debating? Why have a debate at all? What is the use of it? In so acting after this sixteen months' delay, the Government, I suggest, is really flouting the sovereignty of Parliament.

And on the same subject Senator Willis said:

> ...but why on earth would a resolution like this, affecting the fiscal policy of Canada, be passed and become law in Canada without reference to Parliament and the representatives of the Canadian people. It is noteworthy that in the United States it was considered by both Congress and the Senate. It was examined thoroughly and hotly debated before it was passed in the United States.

That brings up the whole question of the manner in which this Parliament deals with international treaties and agreements. I emphasize that what we are doing here is what we normally do in matters of this kind. We have before us an agreement between our Government and the Government of some other country, an agreement signed, entered into and now in effect. All we are asked to do and all we can do in the circumstances is to express our approval or our disapproval.

Now why is that the case here? The answer to that question is that we follow the British system under which treaties and foreign agreements are the prerogative of the Crown, and they require no parliamentary sanction of any kind. I have here what is perhaps the best authority on the British Constitution, and widely recognized as such—Professor A. Berriedale Keith on Constitutional Law. I am reading from the seventh edition, 1939, at page 342. This is what he says about the treaty powers of the Sovereign:

> The constitutional law of many European and American States require the consent of the Parliament to the validity of most treaties, but this is not English law. A treaty can be concluded and ratified without reference to the legislature, and is internationally binding, thus obviating the difficult question of the effect of a treaty concluded without sufficient constitutional authority by the officers entrusted with the conduct of foreign affairs. But this international validity must be distinguished from the effect of a treaty made by the Crown on the law of England. International law is part of English law only so far as it is adopted by usage, judicial decision, or legislation.

What he is saying is that the Crown can make any agreement it likes with a foreign country without any reference to Parliament, but if that agreement requires any change in the local law of England, that change must be approved and adopted by Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is what I have been saying for the last 20 years.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is the English system, and in Canada it works in this way.

In Canada today the Sovereign does not play any direct role in respect of the treaty-making power which is exercised by the Governor General in Council acting normally on the advice of the Secretary of State for External Affairs who is the responsible minister under the Department of External Affairs Act. The negotiation and conclusion of a treaty is therefore in law in Canada an act of the executive power which unquestionably possesses the authority to enter into legally binding agreements with foreign states and international organizations. Moreover, there is no statutory rule imposing an obligation on the Government to refer to Parliament agreements prior to their conclusion. Indeed, the signature and ratification of such international agreements are completely within the prerogative of the Crown and no parliamentary approval is in fact required to make such agreements binding upon Canada in international Law.

That is the legal situation as regards the power of the executive to make treaties.

There is, of course, the practice which has grown up under which all important treaties and international agreements are in fact referred to Parliament for their approval after they have been signed and after they have come into force. That is what we are being asked to do today. That practice came into effect in, I think, the year 1925 as a result of a resolution proposed by Mr. Mackenzie King and passed by the House of Commons in that year, to which Senator Willis referred in his speech. As I say, since that time it has been the habit of the Government of the day to submit for parliamentary approval all international treaties and agreements that are of an important character.

That came into force in the year 1925, but the question of how Parliament should treat treaties was discussed in our Parliament long before that.

The other day I happened to be reading the autobiography of Sir Robert Borden dealing with the time when he was Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons before the first war. Honourable senators will perhaps recall that in the year 1908 the Government of Canada made an extremely important waterways agreement with the United States which is still in effect and under which the International Waterways Commission was set up and still operates. The only way in which the Parliament of the day came to know about that was when that treaty was tabled in the House of Commons. This is a quotation from what Sir Robert Borden said when this treaty was tabled in the House of Commons on January 26, 1909:

> A treaty which we make with the United States is not valid or binding upon them until it is ratified by their Senate. It might be worth considering whether or not our treaties dealing with important subjects should not have a clause to the effect that they should not become binding on His Majesty until they have been ratified by the Parliament of Canada. I hope my right hon. friend—> —will take that into consideration. It seems to me that it might very well be taken into consideration, and it might possibly lead to a different mode of conducting these treaties from that which has prevailed in the past.

He is referring to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Leader of the Government.

It is interesting to observe that, in fact, in some of these treaties this suggestion by Sir Robert Borden—that they should not become effective until they have been ratified by the Parliament of Canada—has been followed. Honourable senators will recall that practically every year we have one or more international income tax treaties with one or more governments. We had one this session in Bill C-154, an act to implement an agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom for the avoidance of double taxation. That agreement was made. It was submitted to us, but it would involve a slight change in the income tax law of this country, and the bill placed before us contained the clause that:

> In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this Part, or the Agreement, and the operation of any other law, the provisions of this Part and the Agreement prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

In other words, this act would override the income tax law. I think my honourable friend who sits next to me (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) objected very strongly to that section.

That is all very well, but when you come to look at the agreement itself, in Article X it says that:

> This Agreement shall come into force on the date on which the last of all such things shall have been done in the United Kingdom and Canada as are necessary to give the Agreement the force of law in the United Kingdom and Canada respectively...

In other words, this agreement did not come into force until we had passed this bill, and to that extent, and to the extent there are other tax treaties which follow the same principle as this—and I think there is quite a number of them—the idea of Sir Robert Borden has been carried out.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The treaty we are discussing does not contain that clause, does it?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: It has a similar one which I will come to in a moment.

As I said, that is the English constitutional doctrine. The executive has the right to make treaties with foreign powers without any reference to Parliament, if it so wishes; but if it wishes to change the local law in respect of any such agreement it has to go to Parliament for that purpose.

It is rather interesting to compare the system in the United States with that English system. The system in the United States is completely different. I have the United States Constitution before me. In section 2 of Article

II, dealing with the powers of the President, it says:

> He—

That is the President.

> —shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur . . .

Then as to the effect of a treaty made in that way, you look at Article VI, which says:

> —and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

So in the United States the situation is completely different. Once you get the consent of two-thirds of the senators to a treaty then that treaty, in so far as it affects the local law of the United States, is binding and overrides any local law to the contrary.

The question always arises in connection with agreements with the United States as to what is the meaning of the word "treaty" in the section I have just read to the house. In diplomacy, as all senators know, nations speak to one another in all kinds of different ways: they have treaties; they have exchanges of notes; they have protocols; they have agreements and conventions. And in the United States the question always arises as to which of these documents are treaties under the Constitution requiring the approval of two-thirds of the members of the Senate.

In the case of this automotive trade agreement between Canada and the United States of January 16, 1966, which we are discussing at the moment, this document has been treated not as a treaty but as an executive agreement. Therefore, it did not require the approval of two-thirds of the senators, but it did require action by both branches of the United States Congress—the Senate and the House of Representatives—for reasons that I will explain in a moment.

I want to turn now to the agreement itself, which is fairly short. It begins with a preamble which contains certain general observations on the importance of stimulating trade and reducing trade barriers, and so on. Article I reads:

> The Governments of Canada and the United States, pursuant to the above principles, shall seek early achievement of the following objectives:
> (a) The creation of a broader market for automotive products within which the full benefits of specialization and large-scale production can be achieved;
> (b) The liberalization of the United States and Canadian automotive trade in respect of tariff barriers and other factors tending to impede it, with a view to enabling the industries of both countries to participate on a fair and equitable basis in the expanding total market of the two countries. . .

That is the vital clause as far as Canada is concerned. The United States is agreed that Canada should have its fair share of the enormous and increasing trade in automobiles and automotive products on the North American continent. That is a very valuable concession for the United States to make.

I come now to Article II, which is most important. This is what the two governments undertake to do:

> (a) the Government of Canada, not later than the entry into force of the legislation contemplated in paragraph (b) of this Article, shall accord duty-free treatment to imports of the products of the United States described in Annex A.

Annex A contains a long list of automobiles and automobile parts which Canada undertakes to admit free into Canada from the United States.

> (b) the Government of the United States, during the session of the United States Congress commencing on January 4, 1965, shall seek enactment of legislation authorizing duty-free treatment of imports of the products of Canada described in Annex B.

Annex B is also a long enumeration of automobiles and automobile parts to be built in Canada and imported free into the United States. Paragraph (b) continues:

> In seeking such legislation, the Government of the United States shall also seek authority permitting the implementation of such duty-free treatment retroactively to the earliest date administratively possible following the date upon which the Government of Canada has accorded duty-free treatment.

To discuss those things one after the other I shall mention what we undertook to do. We undertook to eliminate the duties on a large number of automobiles and automotive products coming from the United States. The authority to do that is contained in Section 10 of the Customs Tariff, which provides:

> The Governor in Council may by Order in Council make such reductions of duties on goods imported into Canada from any other country or countries as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for concessions granted by any such country or countries.

The Government has the right to do that without reference to Parliament.

That action of our Government in reducing those duties was severely criticized. Senator Walker called it a flouting of the sovereignty of Parliament, and Senator Willis said it was unconstitutional because it was done without the authority of the House of Commons. I say that that action was neither the one nor the other. It was an action taken by order in council under the authority specifically conferred by this Parliament on the Government by section 10 of the Customs Tariff for this very purpose.

The Congress of the United States then took action. Apparently, the executive of the United States has no such discretionary power as that conferred upon our Government by the Customs Tariff to which I have referred, and as this agreement involves the reduction of United States customs tariffs on a great many articles it needed the consent not only of the Senate but of the House of Representatives as well. As Senator Willis said, there was much discussion in the United States Congress, and action was finally taken by it on October 21, 1965, at which time Congress passed an act called the Automotive Products Trade Act, 1965, and on the same day the President proclaimed the removal of the duties.

The Congress of the United States concluded its action on October 21 of last year and I want to emphasize that fact in view of the criticism made by Senator Walker as reported in Hansard of June 1, second column, page 622:

> In so acting after this sixteen months' delay, the Government, I suggest, is really flouting the sovereignty of Parliament.

It is true that the agreement was signed on January 16, 1965, but what in the world would be the use of submitting this agreement to Parliament before the Congress of the United States had taken the action necessary to make the agreement effective? In view of the fact that the Congress of the United States finished its proceedings on the matter as late as October 21 last, and in view of the demands on parliamentary time since that date which we all know about, I say that the Government in submitting this agreement to Parliament for its approval in the following May did act within a reasonable time. I have no sympathy with the idea that the Government was flouting Parliament by waiting until the Congress of the United States concluded its action.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: When did the agreement go into operation?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: As of January 16, I think.

My honourable friend asked whether there was anything in this agreement which makes it inoperative until Parliament has passed upon it. There is not, but I draw his attention to Article VI, which reads:

> This Agreement shall enter into force provisionally on the date of signature—

That is, January 16, 1965.

> —and definitively on the date upon which notes are exchanged between the two Governments giving notice that appropriate action in their respective legislatures has been completed.

The agreement is provisionally in force now. There has not yet been an exchange of notes between the two governments advising that their respective legislatures have taken the necessary action, and I understand that the Government of Canada does not propose to give such notice until this agreement has been approved by this house, as it was approved by the House of Commons on May 4 last.

I do not know what comfort any of us can take from the fact that the agreement is only provisionally in effect, and that it will not become definitively in effect until some future date, but that is, to some extent, an indication of the rightness of Sir Robert Borden's suggestion of this sort of action in connection with treaties.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What would happen if we do not approve it? What happens to the agreement?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Well, that depends—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It has been in force all these months and deals have been made back and forth. What would be the result if we do not approve it?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is a theoretical question. The first result, I suppose, would be that the Government would feel it had lost the confidence of the house, and it might ask for the treaty to be renegotiated or cancelled.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It would not have any effect at all.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No, because of section 10 of the Customs Tariff.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: The points I have tried to make clear in answer to the objections of Senators Walker and Willis are, first of all, that the Government constitutionally was perfectly entitled to sign this agreement without the consent of Parliament; secondly, that following the practice of the last 30 years, the Government has submitted this agreement for approval by Parliament within a reasonable delay after the United States Congress had taken the necessary action; thirdly, the agreement is not definitively in force until approved by Parliament; and, fourthly, that the Governor in Council was specifically authorized to reduce the Canadian duties called for by the agreement without approval of Parliament under the provisions of the Customs Tariff.

There is one other section of the agreement to which I direct the attention of the house, namely, Article IV (c), which says:

> No later than January 1, 1968, the two Governments shall jointly undertake a comprehensive review of the progress made towards achieving the objectives set forth in Article I. During this review the Government shall consider such further steps as may be necessary or desirable for the full achievement of these objectives.

In other words, we have until January 1, 1968 to look at this agreement in every respect, see how it affects us and our industries and to find out in what way we think perhaps it should be amended or altered.

Senator Willis made the suggestion, which I think was an excellent one, that the subject matter of this resolution should be submitted to a committee of this house, to which the Minister of Industry would explain just exactly what has been done under the agreements so far and what he expects the future will bring, and to which I suppose other persons interested in the agreement may make their observations, if they wish to do so. I understand that the leader has agreed to that being done.

I think that is a very valuable thing to do, particularly in view of Article IV, which says the two governments have got to review their thinking by January 1, 1968.

It may be that the committee to which this matter is submitted, may have a great deal of interesting information to obtain with a view to helping us to know the Government's attitude and what it is doing by January, 1968.

In that connection, I want to refer for a moment to one suggestion made by Senator Walker, that this was an exercise in futility. It may very well be that an approval of some of these agreements or treaties which are not susceptible of change in any way, and which exist for ever, may be an exercise in futility; but with this agreement, having in mind this particular requirement, I do not think you can say this is an exercise in futility.

There is just one other thing I should say. I do not want to appear political, but the observation I am about to make is induced by something said by Senator Willis. I mentioned a few minutes ago the actions of Sir Robert Borden in 1909. Senator Willis mentioned the reciprocity election of 1911. Well, I was very young at that time. I did not have the vote. However, I do remember most distinctly the cry that went up from my honourable friends on the other side, a cry that went from one end of the country to the other: "No truck nor trade with the Yankees."

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Does that apply to a motor car as well as a truck?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: After 55 years of experience since 1911, I think our honourable friends on the other side would agree with me that although that may have been an effective election cry at the time, our relations with the United States today are such as to render it a complete cry of nonsense. We have had these 55 years of experience both in war and peace in our relations with the United States—for instance, the Ogdensburg Agreement, between Roosevelt and King. Even later, take the Columbia River Treaty, which honourable senators may remember I endeavoured to explain to this house in a speech of inordinate length about two years ago. That is an indication of the sort of treatment we can expect in our relations with the United States. As I tried to explain at the time, the Columbia River Treaty will confer enormous benefits in power and flood control both on the United States and on Canada, particularly in the Province of British Columbia. That was only two years ago.

Now we have this automotive treaty, which says, in so many words, that Canada is to have its fair share of the trade on this North American continent. That is a fairly generous statement on behalf of the Americans.

No truck nor trade with the Yankees, forsooth! I would say, thank God we have truck and trade with the generous and understanding people of the United States.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: May I ask the honourable senator if there is any constitutional argument whatsoever in Canada that it is expedient that this should be passed by the Houses of Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No constitutional argument of any kind. It has simply been the practice. Mr. King said he did not think that under the circumstances Canada should enter into important obligations by way of treaties or agreements without Parliament having to consider them, and that is what we have done.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I believe it was Senator Willis who claimed that we had lost some $10 million by this agreement so far. I have not heard my friend tell us whether that was so or not, or whether the figures were correct or not.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I started off by saying that I was not in a position to state what the economic advantages or disadvantages would be. I did not hear Senator Willis mention $10 million. I think I heard Senator Walker say we had given the American manufacturers $50 million by reducing duties. However, those are subjects on which I am not in a position to speak.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, first I wish to congratulate my friend (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) on his erudite and wonderfully well arranged and sound dissertation on the constitutional features of this agreement. What he has been doing and has said wins my complete admiration.

He has stated much more fully as an authority something I have been declaring in this house in protest over the past twenty years. He has submitted, as I have said many times, that the Crown—now the executive—has a perfect right to enter into an agreement with a foreign state and that that agreement may contain clauses requiring a change of the law of the land, but that in doing so it must take its chances on Parliament passing the necessary legislation.

I have said that over and over again, but then I have said that the executive is all wrong in asking Parliament to make an agreement the law of the land. I would like to call attention to the fact that there does not appear in this resolution before us, and upon which we will vote, any such statement that the agreement is the law of the land. What is being done at this time is, in my judgment, the proper way to handle agreements of this nature.

All we are asked to do today is to approve the agreement. What the Government has done is to rely upon an act of Parliament which is already in existence and which gives that Government the power to change the law of the land in accordance with the agreement. If it had not been for the clause in the Customs Tariff Act giving the executive the power to change the tariffs in accordance with the agreement, then the Government would have had to come to us and ask us to pass an act changing the tariff law.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Just as the United States Congress does.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Exactly. That is the proper way to carry out an agreement of this kind.

My protest from time to time has been against the custom of the governments of both parties over a long time, of bringing to us long and complicated agreements, full of verbiage, and ask us to declare that to be the law of the land. So today, if you want to know the law with respect to agreements between ourselves and other countries on the application of income tax you have to read all that bulk of agreements to find the law. It is not scientific; it is not in accordance with good parliamentary practice; it has not got the sanction of precedent of other governments such as those of the United Kingdom or the United States. This, on the contrary, is sound procedure.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: But it is not expedient.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The honourable senator is talking about the agreement, as to whether it is expedient. I am not talking about that at all. I say that this method is sound parliamentary procedure, and that the procedure in those other cases that have been before us is not sound.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

PRIVATE BILL

COMMERCIAL SOLIDS PIPE LINE COMPANY—AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report of the committee on Bill S-36, to incorporate Commercial Solids Pipe Line Company:

Your committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-36, to incorporate Commercial Solids Pipe Line Company, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendment:

Page 3: Strike out clause 7 and substitue the following:

7. The provisions of subsections (7), (8), (9), (10), (10a), (11), (12), and (13) of section 12, and subsection (2) of section 14, and sections 15 and 19, and subsection (1) of section 20, and subsection (2) of section 22, and sections 35, 36, 37, 39, 40, 62, 63, 64, 65, 83(3), 84, 87, 91 and 94, and paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (1) of section 103, section 105, and subsection (6) of section 108, and sections 110, 130, 134, 135, 136 and 137 of Part I of the Canada Corporations Act apply to the Company: Provided that wherever in the said sections and subsections the words "letters patent" or "supplementary letters patent" appear, the words "Special Act" shall be substituted therefor.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen, with leave of the Senate, moved that this report be taken into consideration now.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a measure which we considered in committee this morning, an act to incorporate Commercial Solids Pipe Line Company. I think it is the first measure that we have dealt with of a pipe line company which proposes to transport solid materials through a pipe line. In effect, it is proposed to transport sulphur from the Alberta oil fields through to Vancouver for shipment to the Far East.

The only amendment we made to the bill was in section 7, which is a purely technical one. Section 7 provides—as is done in many pipe line bills—that the company shall have the advantage of certain sections of the Canada Corporations Act, and it was found that these sections had been to some extent misnumbered. The only change effected is the renumbering of the sections of the Canada Corporations Act mentioned in section 7 of the bill. It is a matter of little consequence and has no import of any kind to the principle of the bill.

With that explanation, I move concurrence in the report.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

He said: Honourable senators, I have had reports about this morning's committee meeting. I understand it is the first time during the present session that the committee has sat. PAN-AMERICAN GAMES

INTERNATIONAL EVENT IN WINNIPEG, 1967

Hon. J. Campbell Haig rose pursuant to notice:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the holding of the Pan-American Games in Winnipeg from July 22 to August 7, 1967.

He said: Honourable senators, as indicated on the Routine Proceedings I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to the largest sporting event to take place in the Western Hemisphere in 1967. I refer to what is known as the Pan-American Games, which will be held at Winnipeg from July 22 to August 7 next year.

These games are staged every four years, one year prior to the Summer Olympics, and are considered among the sporting fraternity to be the prelude to the Summer Olympics.

During the past few years we have heard, and read and seen much about the Centennial celebrations which will be taking place in towns and cities and provinces across the country. We have also heard much about Expo '67, and senators and members of the House of Commons who have visited the site have told us about the progress that is taking place there.

The Pan-American Games in Winnipeg will be the fifth occasion on which the games have been held. The first occasion was in 1953 in Buenos Aires, Argentina, when there were 2,500 entrants; the second took place in 1955 in Mexico City with 2,500 entrants; the third took place in 1959 in Chicago with 2,200 contestants; and the fourth was in 1963 in Brazil with 1,700 contestants. The director of the games, Mr. Jim Daly, told me last week that we already have 3,200 entrants listed for the games in Winnipeg and it is expected the number will go upwards to approximately 3,500.

As I have said, these games are held every four years, in the year prior to the Summer Olympics. Next year we will have the largest number of participants ever in these events and also the largest number of sporting events ever to take place. There will be some 23 sporting events, ranging from athletics to yachting.

Some of my confreres have mentioned that they did not know exactly where Winnipeg was. Winnipeg is the provincial capital of the keystone province of our dominion. There are some 500,000 people in the metro area; and we have in the city and its environs a large number of sporting facilities which we are going to use. We have a stadium which will seat 24,000 people, an auditorium with a capacity of 8,000, and we will have track and field events at the University of Manitoba where there is seating capacity for 5,000. We will build a velodrome which, in case the uninitiated do not understand or cannot hear me, is a cycling track which encloses a football field. We are also going to build an Olympic-size swimming pool.

An Olympic-size swimming pool has to be a certain length and width and at least six feet deep at the shallow end. This new pool we are going to build will be 50 metres long plus another 20 yards; and at the end of the 50 metres there will be a bulkhead where the water will be six feet deep so that the swimmers will have this depth in which to turn. We are hoping to put in seats at either side of the pool at a cost of $750,000 and we are going to put up walls which will cost $500,000. We are now debating where we can find the money to put a roof on the pool. In Winnipeg we have a certain amount of winter weather when the pool cannot be used without a roof. So the provincial Government under Premier Duff Roblin, who is contesting an election on Thursday next, has offered to put up dollar for dollar with the federal Government to put the roof on the pool.

The second big sporting facility that is going to be provided is a track and field stadium at the University of Manitoba. This is going to be a regular 400-metre track with seating on both sides, running north and south, and all the usual facilities, such as locker rooms. A synthetic composition called "Tartan," which has been developed by the 3M Company of Minneapolis, is going to be used on the track for the first time in an athletic competition. This will provide an all-weather track which can be used in the winter and wet weather, and for the track man it has the advantage that the inside lane does not get pockmarked after a few races.

The rowing and canoe races are going to be heldon a thre-mile stretch of our $67 million floodway constructed to save the City of Winnipeg from periodic floods. This will contain 700 million gallons of water to a uniform depth of 10 feet, and the rowing and canoe races will not experience wind resistance and current. So, between the track composition and this floodway it is going to be one of the best facilities for these two events in the history of the games.

I have already mentioned there are some 3,500 unpaid workers preparing for these games, and the total staff at the moment consists of three office clerks, a public relations official, an executive director and a director.

You may ask what is the advantage to Canada of hosting these games. This event is going to bring to the sporting fraternity in various ways a desire for competition. The games will mainly attract world champions. They will lead to increased participation in sporting events. Another factor, of which I was not aware, is that there will be a larger number of trained and competent officials. When I discussed this with the executive director, Jim Daly, I asked him if at any of the earlier games he had ever had any rows or rhubarbs develop which caused international tension. He replied, "No."

In connection with the track events, the Omega watch company is prepared to present for the use of the games a timing device that takes photographs and shows the first four runners in their exact positions when the first competitor crosses the tape. So there will never be a judgment call and there should be no row about that.

In fencing, which involves a judgment call, the foils or swords are going to be electrically tied in some way so that when a competitor has made a touch, it will be recorded on a timing device so that the first person who hits will be recorded. So there will be no question of a dispute in that connection.

Honourable senators, I suggest this is going to be a welcome addition to our birthday year. After you and your friends have enjoyed your own centennial celebrations and have visited Expo or are on your way to Expo, I invite you to drop in to Winnipeg, the capital city of the Province of Manitoba, sometime between July 22 and August 7 and witness the largest sporting event held in the Western Hemisphere next year.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all most grateful to the honourable Senator Haig for bringing to the attention of the Senate—and, I hope, more widely to the attention of the Canadian public—the fact that the Pan-American Games are going to be held not only in Canada but in the City of Winnipeg in our centennial year.

These games have been the subject of negotiation for some considerable time, and there has been splendid co-operation shown by all parties concerned. On the financial side, the federal Government will bear five-elevenths of the estimated cost of these games, the province will bear four-elevenths, and the City of Winnipeg two-elevenths. If the aggregate of the estimated net expenses of the sponsor of the games, the society which is to run them, exceed the sum of $2,710,000, a formula has been worked out which will increase the amount to be expended by the federal and provincial governments equally, but the maximum contribution of the federal Government will not exceed $1½ million.

It is anticipated that the federal Government, in addition to its financial contribution, will provide extensive facilities and services through the Department of National Defence, to the extent that that department's facilities and personnel based in the Winnipeg area will be able to participate. This participation is now being negotiated with the Department of National Defence.

Speaking as a very young man myself and on behalf of a lot of other young men to whom I am addressing my remarks, I must say that I am more than delighted, as I am sure we all are, that this significant sporting event will be held in Canada at this time. Sometimes we forget we are part of a great segment of the world known as The Americas, and that we are Americans as much as those who live in the United States. I must say that the people of South America rather resent the idea that they are not called Americans. They would like to be called Americans because they feel they are.

I think, too, the holding of games of this kind—which will enable young athletes of both sexes from all countries of The Americas to come together for the purpose of athletic competition—is a most salutary kind of promotion that any country or part thereof can undertake. Last fall, as President of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, I had the privilege of making an official visit to the capital of Malaysia, Kuala Lumpur, and there I had the pleasure of attending the South-East Asia Games.

South-East Asia is not a part of the world where everything is peaceful and quiet, and at that time the confrontation between Malaysia and Indonesia, and indeed to an extent between Singapore and Malaysia, was not as easy as one would have liked. Yet there were large groups of athletes there from all countries in the South-East Asian group, except Indonesia. Had the games been held now I think Indonesia would have been represented. It seemed to me to be a great demonstration of the possibility of bringing these countries together for a peaceful and profitable purpose by holding athletic events of the character of the Olympics and the Pan-American Games, such as will be held in Winnipeg in 1967.

I believe it is a splendid undertaking. I am sure the very active committee—which I think has some national representation on it as well—will do fine work to the great advantage of Canada. On behalf of the Senate, I hope that Senator Haig will convey to the president of the society, to the committee and to all who are actively engaged in it, our best wishes for its outstanding success.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

TRAINING ALLOWANCE BILL, 1966

THIRD READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the third reading of Bill C-186, respecting allowances to persons being trained under technical and vocational training programs.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT—MOTION FOR APPROVAL—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aird:

> That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament do approve the Agreement concerning Automotive Products between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America signed on January 16, 1965, and tabled in the Senate on March 3, 1965; and that this House do approve the same.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senatros, I listened with great interest and a good deal of admiration yesterday to Senator Hugessen's excellent dissertation on the resolution before us. He asserted with a considerable degree of vigour and learning that the Government had the legal power to sign the Canada-United States Agreement concerning automotive products, and to implement it by order in council without in either case any reference to Parliament before or after signature.

I understood that he based the first power on the ancient prerogative of the Crown under English law. I note, only in passing, that the prerogative of the Crown has not yet been invoked, because this is not an agreement between heads of states. It is an agreement signed by the head of one state and the Prime Minister of another. Just what its nature may be in international law is not for me to say, but I would suggest that there is considerable doubt among the authorities about the kinds of compacts between nations that are subject, under our law, to the prerogative of the Crown. This question is thoroughly discussed in Oppenheim's International Law, one of the outstanding authorities on the subject, particularly in more recent editions. There is also an interesting discussion of it in a book written by Mr. J.-G. Castel, the title of which is International Law: Chiefly as Applied and Interpreted in Canada, and published last year. I commend it to all honourable senators who are interested in the subject. It is an excellent book, and it discusses thoroughly the question that I am raising now.

The second power that the Government asserted in making and implementing this agreement is based, as Senator Hugessen said, on section 10 of the Customs Tariff. He read that section to us and, as I am going to comment on it, perhaps I should read it again. Section 10 reads:

> The Governor in Council may by Order in Council make such reductions of duties on goods imported into Canada from any other country or countries as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for concessions granted by any such country or countries.

The language there is quite specific, but I would note—again, merely in passing—that the power asserted here may very well be doubtful.

I point out that if the power exists under this section, then it must be by way of compensation for concessions granted. The verb is in the past tense. I would point out also that at the time the order in council was issued no such concession had been granted by the United States. It was not, in fact, granted for nine months. I will leave the unravelling of that to my learned friends, but I hope it will not be asserted seriously that because the President said he would ask Congress to grant these concessions, they had been granted. Section 10 of the Customs Tariff does not say "in anticipation of such concessions"; it says "for concessions granted".

This fact points up, as many other aspects of the Government's handling of this situation do, the very grave danger of any government rushing into the implementation of an international agreement without consulting Parliament, because there is no doubt in my mind, honourable senators, that there was unseemly and unconstitutional haste on the part of the Government in this matter. We are entitled to probe into the circumstances, and ask ourselves if we can find any reason for this haste. We can find such a reason, in my opinion, in the fact that within less than six months after the order in council was made effective we had an election—an election in which the Government party made a great deal of this agreement. Indeed, I will go so far as to say that it was very helpful to them in the determination of the result.

I am sorry that Senator Davey has had to leave. I thank him for writing me a very nice note indicating that he would not be listening to me this afternoon. I mention this, because I am saying that the timing of the order in council for the purpose that I have suggested could hardly have been improved upon. There was just enough time for the apparent benefits of the agreement to achieve the apparent majority the Government was seeking. I use the word "apparent" in both cases, because in the first the appearance proved illusionary, and in the second, as I hope to indicate to the Senate today, the benefits to Canada from this agreement may prove in the future to be every bit as illusionary.

In its haste, the Government appears to have brushed aside all serious consideration of constitutional usage in its use of this authority under the Customs Tariff, and what many would consider its clear, moral obligation to consult Parliament before implementing a measure that reverses a fundamental national policy of this country of long standing. The fact of the matter is that the Government could not wait for Congress or Parliament.

I must say, honourable senators, that I for one believe that the written constitutional guarantee to the American people that this kind of thing cannot happen in their country is something which could well be adopted in Canada, as I thought Senator Hugessen suggested, so that the Canadian public and Parliament might have a similar written guarantee that this will not happen again.

Apart from that, I shall not be too much concerned this afternoon with what Senator Hugessen said in attempting to reply to the views of other honourable senators. I shall be more concerned with what he did not say. He did not tell us to what extent the treaty-making power of the executive is or should have been limited by constitutional usage. He did not tell us the extent to which the incidental power of adjusting the tariff rates—because that is all it is, if you examine the Customs Tariff—has been actually used to tear down an important part of the tariff structure which has been created by Parliament over many years. I would suggest to him, and more particularly to the members of the executive who carried out this arbitrary action, that it is not enough to say of any exercise of power that it is legal. The important question, surely, is whether it is right.

We all know, for example, that the Parliament of Great Britain has the legal power arbitrarily to amend or repeal the British North America Act and the Statute of Westminster. The Governor General has the legal power to dissolve Parliament tonight without consulting anyone.

The Queen as Commander in Chief has the legal authority—I say this on the authority of Professor Dawson—to send our armed forces to Vietnam tomorrow. The Governor General has the legal authority to refuse his assent to any act of Parliament, or even to reserve it for consideration by the Queen in Council in Great Britain. But we all know that these powers are not exercised, and it would be utter folly for the British Parliament, the Queen or the Governor General to argue that because they have these legal powers, they have the right to exercise them if, when and as they please without the consent of the Canadian Parliament.

What then are the limitations of such powers? In saying that, I include each and every power claimed by any government of Canada or by any other democratic government under a system of parliamentary democracy. There are many limitations, of course, the first being established constitutional usage, and second, the consent of the people in Parliament assembled.

It could be that in the legal sense the Government had the power to sign this agreement and implement it by order in council, but in spite of what Senator Hugessen has said I find myself in agreement with Senator Walker and Senator Willis that the Government did not have the constitutional right to exercise the power the way it did, and that it was an affront to Parliament. They may have had the power on paper, but they did not have the right in reason. I think that is what Senator Walker and Senator Willis meant. They were criticized by Senator Hugessen for calling the Government action unconstitutional, that is to say, in breach of constitutional usage and in contempt of Parliament.

As I read the authorities, the plain fact of the matter is that all prerogative power—and it is prerogative power that has been claimed in one aspect of this matter—dies a little bit every day, and on some days it dies a lot. It dies most when it is abused, and I would say that this particular use of the prerogative power is of the kind that deals it its most mortal blows.

I would say that if the discretionary power that we here so often grant to the Governor in Council in our statutes is to be used to bring about major changes contrary to the general intent and purpose of statutes, then it is time we began to limit that discretionary power which we seem to give so freely to the Governor in Council.

I have said that this whole proceeding was done in unseemly haste. What are the facts? It is perhaps too much to say that this action by the Government was implemented by press release. But the facts are, honourable senators, that on the night of Friday, January 15, 1965 it was officially announced for the first time to the Canadian people by a press release bearing the insignia and on the letterhead of the Department of Industry that:

> A new and far-reaching program for the Canadian automotive industry is being introduced to take effect on Monday . . .

Some reference is then made to the agreement which makes effective "a new and far-reaching program."

Well, one would assume, of course, that this was an agreement that had been signed at the time of that press release. As a matter of fact, it was not signed. It was signed the next day, as I read from the signature page of the document—"Done in duplicate at Johnson City, Texas, this 16th day of January 1965." It is signed on behalf of the Government of Canada by L. B. Pearson and Paul Martin—we all know the high offices they hold—and on behalf of the United States by Lyndon Johnson and Dean Rusk—and I do not need to say who they are.

I would say, when thinking of this unseemly haste, that apart from the affront to our constitutional usage, the government negotiators should have remembered the adage long current south of the line: "The President proposes—Congress disposes."

It is a hard lesson that we Canadians have had to learn over long years of history. One wonders if we are going to have to learn it all over again in the working out of this agreement. As I shall indicate, I believe there is some evidence that we may have to do so.

Honourable senators, Congress might have declined to implement the agreement—they have done it before and they could very easily have done it in this instance. Indeed, Congress did not fully implement the recommendation of the President as to how the United States should carry out its part of this agreement. That recommendation to Congress represented, I am sure, the attitude of the executive in the United States as to what had to be done, yet there was a fundamental reservation on the part of the Congress of the United States, and one that is extremely dangerous to Canada.

If Congress had declined, we would have been in the position of allowing the free import of American autos, commercial vehicles and buses, their original parts and accessories, for nine months, and finding our automotive industry in a state of disruption from which it might not have fully recovered for many years.

I think it is for reasons such as these, and examples such as this one that the wisdom of the nations over long years has concluded that important contracts between nations are neither operative nor binding until it has been established that they are within the authority of those who negotiate them and that their implementation is in accordance with the constitutional usage of the countries concerned.

Perhaps I should say at this time that I do not deny that there is some apparent evidence of benefits to Canada which I am certain we all hope are not of a temporary nature. Senator Aird, the sponsor of the measure, gave us some facts, and I do not for one moment dispute them. He told us there had been substantial apparent increases—I would say actual increases—in production, export and employment. He also told us, unfortunately, that there had also been increases in imports of automotive products and parts from the United States. There had been between 1964 and 1965 a 27 per cent increase in production, a 51 per cent increase in parts and accessories, a 61 per cent increase in employment, and a 133⅓ per cent increase in exports to the United States. He did not, however, give us the comparable percentage increase in imports from the United States, but he did say that "the balance of payments deficit widened considerably in 1965."

There are at the moment real benefits to Canadians from this agreement and its implementation, but, honourable senators, all the evidence that I can find in statements made by senior United States officials, and particularly in the information given on the amendment in the United States Congress, raises the distinct possibility that the interests of Canada and Canadians in that quick trip to Texas may well have been bartered down a well-known fast-flowing river that does not flow in the direction of Canada.

I have said that the subject matter of the agreement implemented by order in council brings about a major change in our long-established Canadian and parliamentary national policy.

I am not going to argue at this time the merits of protection versus free trade in our over-all economy or in any particular Canadian context. However, there can be no doubt that we are dealing with a major change in our national policy. Perhaps I need only to quote what the United States Secretary of Commerce said in this connection:

> ...through this agreement Canada has operated to move in the direction of a single North American automotive industry and away from the maintenance of a separate industry protected by tariffs...

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is a fine thing.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Wait until we see the results.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: We have already seen the results.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Senator Roebuck says that is a fine thing, and I am sure that is exactly the remark we would expect to hear from him. He has long been an advocate, I believe, of unrestricted free trade for all persons between all nations everywhere throughout the world.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is mildly put.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: What I have said is that free trade has not been the national policy of Canada over the years. The industrial plant and productivity that we have in Canada, whatever may be the merits of free trade, can hardly be said to be the product of free trade.

In that connection, I would like also to quote another statement from the report of the committee. This is the committee which has carefully examined this whole agreement —as it has not been carefully examined in Canada—and it is reported in the Senate report on the bill. It says:

> This represents the joint decision of our two great nations to allow the development of a single unified North American automobile industry uninhibited by tariffs.

I think Senator Roebuck will agree with that, but perhaps he will not agree with the rest of the quotation. It says:

> No longer will they—

That is, U.S. vehicle and parts manufacturers.

> —need to build duplicate facilities in Canada.

We were also told, particularly during the election campaign, that one of the great effects of this agreement would be to decrease our very large balance of payments deficit with the United States on our automotive account.

Government spokesmen have shied away from that a great deal lately. It is quite obvious now that there is no substance whatsoever to the claim that this is going to help our balance of payments problems.

Honourable senators, it is not merely that unforeseen factors have intervened to bring in new situations that were not considered at the time the Canadian people were told about those possible benefits. On the contrary, there never was the slightest possibility or intention by our American friends of allowing this agreement to narrow the gap between Canada's automotive exports and imports from the United States.

In support of that, may I quote the Assistant United States Secretary of the Treasury, again before the congressional committee. He said:

> From a balance of payments viewpoint then, the automotive agreement simply means this. Under it, we—

The United States.

> —stand to maintain our sizeable surplus with Canada in automotive trade.

And this is most significant. The Assistant United States Secretary of the Treasury said:

> Without the agreement, we stood to lose a large part of our surplus.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: That is the beneficial effect in the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I was about to say that that is the effect, according to a very outstanding authority, of the agreement we are asked to approve.

The Assistant Secretary documented that statement with facts and figures, and the committee reported its findings on the matter and said this:

> This (agreement) will lead to increasing sales for United States parts manufacturers.

They were dealing only with parts at that time, but they have the same conclusion for vehicles. He continued:

> —sales which would have been impossible without the agreement.

Again, this is the agreement we are asked to approve.

Now, in fairness, the minister has said there would have been a much greater imbalance had this agreement not been made. But again this is not the judgment of the experts in the United States. I do not know what is the amount of the imbalance, the increased imbalance, in the first year of the operation of this agreement.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: About $100 million.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The minister said, if I read his remarks aright, that the increase was $19 million. I am not questioning the minister's sources of information. I may be wrong in attributing that statement to him. But I feel obliged, in any event, in discussing the matter here, to bring to the attention of honourable senators the statement made on the same subject by another authority, Mr. Robert L. McNeil, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Commerce, of the United States, as reported in the Globe and Mail of April 18 of this year. The report is datelined Washington, by Bruce MacDonald. With leave, I quote:

> Canada's automotive trade deficit with the United States increased by nearly $100 million—

As usual, Senator McCutcheon is right in his figures. It continues:

> —to a total of $674 million last year, Robert L. McNeil, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Commerce estimated yesterday.
> Mr. McNeil, in a speech prepared for the general conference of the Pacific Northwest Trade Association in Vancouver, said preliminary Administration figures indicated that Canadian automotive exports to the United States had more than doubled in 1965, rising from $76,000,000 the year before to $164,000,000, under the influence of the conditional auto free-trade agreement between the two countries.
>
> But although Canadian sales south of the border rose relatively far more sharply than U.S. sales in Canada, the absolute increase in U.S. exports far outstripped Canada's, the total increasing by $184,000,000 to $838,000,000 in 1965.
>
> The net result was that Canada's net automotive trade deficit with the United States rose from $578,000,000 in 1964 to $674,000,000 in 1965, an increase of $96,000,000 despite any Canadian benefits derived from the auto-trade pact.
> While authorities in Ottawa originally argued that the new continental marketing scheme was intended to cut back Canada's chronically heavy automotive deficit with the United States, a result that was disputed by Administration officials, they have since switched to the argument that the agreement has helped to prevent the deficit from increasing even more sharply than otherwise would be the case.

I now come to the amendment brought forward in Congress to the bill proposed by the administration. I think it is fair to presume that the bill presented by the administration to Congress represented the American Government's understanding of the legislation necessary to implement the agreement.

I suggest that this amendment is of such far-reaching importance that it amounts, in effect, to an amendment of the agreement itself. As far as I know, the fact and the effect of this amendment on this agreement has not to this day been communicated to the Canadian Parliament.

The amendment is rather technical. It deals with the basic requirements under which vehicles and parts may be imported free into Canada. The minister, in his own statement on the resolution in the other house put it this way:

> These requirements are set out in a tariff item which forms part of the Canada-U.S. agreement and in the letters of commitment to the Canadian Government signed by each of the vehicle producers.

The commitments refer to: the ratio of vehicle production in Canada to vehicle sales; the maintenance of Canadian value added at least equal to that of model year 1964; the increase of Canadian value added equal to 60 per cent of increased sales.

The vehicle producers must also by this commitment increase total production or purchases in Canada by $260 million annually. This is to be over and above the increase of production and purchases due to the growth of the market.

I hardly need say that I agree with the minister and others that these requirements are the very heart of the benefits that Canada should obtain from this agreement, because they represent the protection of Canadian content in increased sales assured by these letters of commitment from Canadian vehicle producers.

So, granting the importance of those letters of commitment as an almost integral part of the entire agreement, I read without further comment from the amendment proceedings in the United States Congress, as described in the Senate report No. 782 and reported in the United States Code Congressional (and Administrative) News, 1965, volume 2, page 3670.

Honourable senators, I am sorry to say that this quote will be rather long, but I ask leave to place it on the record because I think it is of the utmost importance.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: At page 3676, I read, under the heading, Letters of Undertaking:

> One of the novel features of the solution embodied in the arrangement is the ancillary undertaking by the Canadian automobile companies.

This is the amount of Canadian value added to a product by reason of Canadian industry or services.

> By their undertakings the Canadian subsidiaries of U.S. auto companies have expressed to the Canadian Government their intention of expanding their Canadian operations in such a way that the "Canadian value added" (that is, the amount of value added to a product by reason of Canadian industry or services) would be heightened by the end of model year 1968. The total of the additional Canadian value added in the undertakings stated by all the Canadian companies is to be approximately $241 million plus 60 per cent of increased Canadian sales, measured in terms of production costs.

I think we would all agree that is an excellent provision and something which, if it lasts, would be of great benefit to Canada. Now we will see if it is going to last.

> These undertakings ... were made by the Canadian subsidiaries in order to reassure the Canadian Government that in agreeing to reciprocal elimination of duties the Canadian part of the automotive industry would not be submerged. The Canadians also wished to be sure that the U.S. parent companies would treat the Canadian plants equally and would not overlook the advantages of production and procurement in Canada. Moreover, Canada wished to be sure that Canadian production and employment would participate in the anticipated rapid growth of the Canadian automobile market.

Then it goes on:

> The undertakings of the Canadian companies are subject to necessary qualifications about market conditions and other factors beyond the control of individual companies.

In the view of the committee, although these letters limit the free trade character of the new arrangements, they do not derogate in any significant degree from the objectives of the agreement.

Now, I would ask honourable senators to note this very carefully.

Moreover, the committee has been informed that undertakings for increased production stated in the letters end in 1968, that the administration does not approve their renewal or extension.

What did the committee do about it? On page 3683, subheading 6, I read this from the same authority, that is to say the report of the Senate Committee:

Section 205 of the bill was added by the Committee on Finance. It provides for an investigation by the President to determine whether any manufacturer which is owned or controlled by a U.S. corporation has undertaken by reason of governmental action to increase the Canadian value added of motor vehicles or original equipment parts after August 31, 1968. This is generally the expiration date for the letters of undertaking by the Canadian subsidiaries of U.S. corporations providing for increase in Canadian value added of 60 per cent of increased Canadian sales (measured in terms of production costs) after 1964 plus $241 million. (This $241 million increase is to be achieved by the end of model year 1968.)

Now we come to the amendment.

Under this committee amendment, if the President determines that such a manufacturer has undertaken by reason of governmental action to increase the Canadian value added after August 31, 1968, he shall suspend the duty-free importation of autos and parts from Canada unless (1) the Congress authorizes continued duty-free treatment by approving legislation in effect endorsing the new undertaking, or (2) the President finds that the undertaking to increase Canadian value added no longer is operative.

This agreement does nothing to add to the Canadian content of vehicles and parts manufactured in Canada after 1968, and the U.S. Congress magnanimously says to the President, "If it does not help Canada, you don't have to do anything about it."

Surely the effect of these quotations is clear. It is that the parent companies of Canadian subsidiaries give these undertakings for increased Canadian production, as stated in the letter, and they will be in effect only until 1968, and that the administration does not approve their renewal or extension—

...if the President determines that such a manufacturer has undertaken by reason of governmental action to increase the Canadian value added after August 31, 1968, he shall suspend...

Again I say, honourable senators, this is the agreement we are asked to approve.

I raise these questions for three main reasons. First, it has been suggested that this type of agreement may be the precedent for others in other segments of our industry. Well, I think we would all hope that if that is to happen there would be some opportunity to find out the real effect this agreement is going to have on the Canadian economy.

Secondly, the Government's handling of this does raise the important question as to whether this is just one more example of the unchecked growth of the executive power, the examination and checking of which, if necessary, has been said by many authorities to be an important function to which this chamber should address itself.

In the third place, I have also suggested that this may be regarded by this Government, if they are allowed to get away with it, as the precedent for using the incidental powers given the Governor in Council for the purpose of bringing some flexibility into a statute and to use that power to make sweeping changes far and away beyond the intent of the fact, or anything that could possibly have been anticipated by Parliament when it gave that power.

Now I have raised the question of constitutional usage, as did Senator Hugessen and Senator Roebuck. I am sorry my speech is as long as it is, but I think these matters are of some importance. Senator Willis quoted Mr. Mackenzie King as an indication of what in his view was the proper constitutional usage in the matter of international compacts made by Canada. He quoted Mr. Mackenzie King on June 21, 1926 on a resolution moved by Mr. King and passed by the house.

> This house...considers further that before His Majesty's Canadian ministers advise ratification of a treaty or convention affecting Canada, or signify acceptance—

A very important phrase, "or signify acceptance."

> —of any treaty convention or agreement involving military or economic sanctions, the approval of the Parliament of Canada should be secured.

Later, Mr. Mackenzie King removed that qualification. On April 12, 1928, as again quoted by Senator Willis, he said:

> I submit that the day has passed when any government or executive should feel that they should take it upon themselves without the approval of Parliament, to commit a country to obligations involving any considerable financial outlays or active undertakings.

He went further than that. He went on to say, and this is applicable to the contention that the Government had the power constitutionally in this matter:

> In all cases where obligations of such a character are being assumed internationally, parliament itself should be assured of having the full right of approving what is done before binding commitments are made. I would not confine parliamentary approval only to those matters which involve military sanctions and the like. I feel that parliamentary approval should apply where there are involved matters of large expenditure or political considerations of a far-reaching character.

It is interesting to note, honourable senators, that the phrase "far-reaching" was the first phrase used in the press release which began the strange implementation of this agreement.

Mr. Mackenzie King lumped treaties, conventions and agreements all together and made no distinction. That, I need hardly say, is very much in line with the authorities, but it is opposed to the view of the Minister of Industry who said that if this had been a treaty "it would not become operative until satisfaction had been sought and approved." This statement can be found in the House of Commons Hansard of 1965, page 4815.

There have been other recent comments on this matter. Let me refer to what the present Prime Minister, when he was in Opposition, had to say—and I find it very interesting in view of the refusal of the Government to send this matter to committee in the other place. It is true that the amendment to that bill was ruled out of order by the Speaker, but the minister, as I shall indicate, went to great pains to give his views as to why it should not go to committee. When Mr. Pearson was in Opposition he told the then Prime Minister, for his good, for his example, the way he should conduct his affairs, as reported in Hansard of April 9, 1962:

> —the committee on External Affairs considered every important treaty while we were in office.

I presume he was referring to those long years when the Liberal Government was in power. Mr. Pearson was not using "treaty" in any narrow sense, I am sure. With his great diplomatic experience he would, I think, use "treaty" in the sense that has been accepted by the authorities.

So that there will be no doubt about that, I shall quote one or two authorities. Oppenheim's International Law, which is in its seventh edition and is probably the standard authority today on international law, at page 898 has this to say:

> International compacts which take the form of written contracts are sometimes termed not only agreements or treaties but also conventions, declarations, protocols and the like. But there is no essential difference between them, and their binding force upon the contracting parties is the same whatever be their name.

Again, he says:

> It has been asserted that "apart from those compacts which bear the title of treaty or convention, ratification is only required where it is provided for"; but this assertion is too sweeping. Since all international compacts are contracts, and therefore treaties in the widest sense of the term, the title which a particular compact bears cannot decide the question whether it does, or does not, require ratification.

I could give you a similar quotation from a book by Mr. Castel, which I mentioned earlier. I will merely observe that he agrees with Oppenheim and rather interestingly points out that if documents of this nature are to be called agreements, they should deal with purely technical and administrative matters and be signed by representatives of government departments.

Mr. Pickersgill had some comment to make on this question of constitutionality. In speaking to a point of order, he said:

> We all know that under the strict interpretation of the Constitution these agreements are ratified by the Crown and they do not in fact require—though it is a constitutional practice—to ask for approval of the house.

That is the position taken by Senator Hugessen, and I personally would not object to it. Then Mr. Pickersgill went on to say:

> If what has become a constitutional practice is followed, the agreement would not be ratified by any future Government without the consent of the house, if it came forward again. If the ordinary constitutional practice which we now have is followed, any agreement of this sort is brought by the Government to both houses before there is ratification.

In that I agree entirely with Mr. Pickersgill, although it leaves open the question of what is "ratification."

I am sorry to say, honourable senators, that as I look over the Government's record in this matter, I see a clearly detectable tendency in their handling of this matter towards that strange kind of arrogance that Shakespeare called "the insolence of office." For example, the minister who sponsored the bill brushed off all protests about the long delay of 17 months between implementation of the treaty and the time it was placed before Parliament, by calling these protests, "some coy suggestions about eventually giving approval." This, in spite of the fact that he had declined over and over again to give information on the agreement sought by members of Parliament. Over a long period of time members asked and asked, and they were always faced with the reply, "This is not the time to bring it up. Don't bother with this on a supply motion. Wait until we bring in the resolution; that is the time to discuss it; that is the time when the Government will tell you about it; that is the time you will get some information." Members waited a long time, almost one-and-a-half years from the time of the hasty implementation of the agreement.

It is tempting to say that all this is reminiscent of ten years ago. I remember a display of that same kind of unseemly haste, that same kind of political temper, and I wonder if the Government's handling of this matter portends the revival of that political temper. If so, I sincerely hope it is attended by the same fate. I am sure that all honourable senators around me, if not all on this side, would agree with me in that. Senator Hugessen told us this is merely a procedural motion, and that was the attitude taken by the minister. He said, "It is only here for discussion." We are told this is just a matter of form. We cannot reject it; we cannot change it; and Senator Walker said that it is probably all just an exercise in futility because the agreement was made 17 months ago and has been in operation and has affected our whole economy.

If we have to turn back the clock after August 31, 1958, I need hardly even attempt to draw in words the picture of the chaos that will result in our Canadian economy.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: You mean August 31, 1968.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Yes, August 31, 1968. Our American friends tell us that that is the date when these commitments given in the letters will have no effect whatsoever. On the authority of their own executive the date is August 31, 1968, and we are finding out about it now, when we are half-way through that first three-year period. We have had a year-and-a-half, and in another year-and-a-half we will be faced with the possibility of this tremendous problem confronting us.

The sponsor of the bill has been good enough to say that it will go to the appropriate committee. I would be inclined to suggest to the honourable Leader of the Government that perhaps it should go to the Standing Committee on External Relations, as obviously it is an agreement between Canada and another country, and I hope that he will give very careful consideration to that suggestion. The chairman of that committee is Senator Thorvaldson who sits in this section of the house, but I think there would be no doubt as to the impartiality with which he would deal with the matter.

I was pleased to hear the tribute the Leader of the Government paid to another senator on this side, Senator Hnatyshyn, for his chairing of the Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour this morning. I was at the meeting, and I should like to add my tribute to the honourable senator for the excellent way in which he conducted the hearing.

No matter to what committee this bill is referred, I suggest that we invite the minister and the officials concerned to explain the things that have not been explained; to explain the authority under which they regard this action as constitutional; to explain what they think section 10 of the Customs Tariff means; to explain their future policy in regard to the use of the incidental power given the Governor in Council when they are faced with the desire to make these far-reaching changes in our economy. The officials should appear before the committee to state exactly what kind of subjects come within what kind of compact, and what kind of agreements require ratification, before or after, by Parliament.

I have suggested that we adopt a procedure comparable to that of the United States. If this action of the Government is constitutional, then it would appear to be deficient in many ways. We are told that this agreement is an administrative act—something between departmental officials. If this is so, then, of course, they are again asserting the power of the Governor in Council. The officials should be asked to tell us how much authority they believe these orders in council give them to make that kind of change.

There are other questions the committee might discuss. I am sure the Canadian public is not yet satisfied that the agreement has achieved or is achieving the results claimed of it. This is certainly so in the area of balance of payments. The committee should ascertain whether this agreement is bringing down or ever will bring down the prices of Canadian automobiles compared to those of the same automobiles in the United States, and even more importantly, it should ascertain whether it will place Canadian production in a position of being able to sell to the Canadian consumer a Canadian-made car at the same price that the American consumer can buy that car. I am told that the difference between what a Canadian pays for a Canadian-made automobile and what an American pays for that same Canadian-made automobile is approximately $615. Yet we are told that this is a free trade agreement.

Honourable senators, this is not a free trade agreement. This is an agreement which allows certain manufacturers to import and certain manufacturers to export. It gives the Canadian consumer no rights whatever. It does not give the Canadian consumer the right to buy a Canadian-made car in Canada at the same price that his neighbour across the line can buy that same car. This is a good deal for a group of automobile companies, and if that is free trade then I do not believe in it.

Another question has been raised with respect to the tariff on certain production machinery that is required by some Canadian firms who are tooling up in an endeavour to fit themselves into the conditions brought about by this agreement. The assertion has been made that there is a tariff of 22.5 per cent, and that most of that is subject to draw-back. I have not investigated the matter to the point where I can be at all definitive, but I suggest that the committee should question that matter.

Honourable senators, there has been a very serious complaint made to the effect that some Canadian auto firms have told smaller Canadian firms that they will not accept any tenders from them. The names of firms have been mentioned, so I am not indulging in gossip. The reason given by the automobile manufacturers for their refusal to accept tenders is that they have across the border in the United States their own subsidiaries making those parts. I suggest that the committee should at least obtain information as to whether that situation prevails, and discover the reason for it. If that is the case, then it should ascertain whether this agreement is the cause of it.

There has been serious objection taken also to this agreement because of the fact that it is bringing about a shift in our automotive labour force. Some of those who study these matters carefully believe that one of the end results of this agreement, if it continues in force, will be a great increase in the number of unskilled workers in our automobile industry at the expense of the number of skilled workers. The committee should ask the minister and officials and others if this is so.

Another of the conditions attached to this agreement is that it applies only to original parts for automobiles. It is well known that there are many small Canadian companies which manufacture replacement parts and accessories. They, of course, would like to share in any benefits that may be available to them from this agreement, and in view of the fact that this agreement is subject to revision in a short year and a half the committee might like to hear from those manufacturers.

Honourable senators, I raise these matters because I can find no evidence that they have been adequately examined and adequately replied to. This is largely due to the refusal of the minister to allow this matter to go before a committee of the other place. The importance of our committees here is that such questions as this may be submitted to them. In this particular instance the work of the committee will be doubly important because of the refusal of the Government to match the kind of investigation that was given in the—if I may use the word—Parliament of the United States.

What were the reasons given for the refusal to send this agreement to a committee of the other place? I do not think I said there was arrogance in that refusal, but that there was a detectable tendency to arrogance. The minister gave three reasons which were, first, the committees were having difficulties in obtaining quorums; second, if this resolution went to a committee it would indicate a "lightheartedness and disregard" for other matters of more urgent business; and, third—and here I shall quote the minister directly because honourable senators might not credit the accuracy of a paraphrase—the minister said:

> To refer this matter to a Committee on the grounds that somebody might be interested does not seem to me to be a very practical or businesslike way of conducting the business of Parliament.

I hope what I have said, honourable senators, has persuaded you that some clarification needs to be made of many matters in connection with this agreement. In closing I would make one observation, and even presume to give a piece of advice to the Government. It is my opinion that the Government made a mistake. It was a mistake of haste; a mistake, perhaps, of political expediency. It was a mistake which raises serious questions about the rights of Parliament. It was a mistake which may seriously affect our economy for a long time to come. I think we would all think more than we do—and some of us more than others—of our Government if they admitted the mistake and assured us that to the best of their ability this kind of thing will not happen again.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, June 27, at 8 p.m. The Friday following that date will be July 1, a holiday. Between those dates I think we can expect interim supply and a number of other measures to come from the lower house. We should, therefore, have a fairly busy week, and of course committees will also convene during that week.

An adjournment of this kind is of course always subject to the possibility that the Senate might have to be recalled earlier. If that should be the case, it will then be my duty to inform His Honour the Speaker and to have the honourable senators notified.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC SERVICE

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

BANKRUPTCY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—COMMONS AMENDMENTS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-17, to amend the Bankruptcy Act, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill with certain amendments to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate:

1. Page 5, Line 31. Strike out subsection (8)...

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Dispense.

For text of amendments see Appendix p. 777.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that these amendments be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for consideration and report.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I think I should say a word before we pass this motion for reference to committee.

There are but five amendments, and the only significant or substantial one is that which deletes a provision which we inserted in the bill in committee dealing with solicitor and client privilege. As the members of the committee will recall, this was done after very long and earnest consideration, and after quite a number of conferences with the Minister and the Deputy Minister of Justice and with the Superintendent of Bankruptcy. All those hearings are reported in our printed report of the proceedings of the committee, and honourable senators can read and see what was said.

In the representations which the minister made in the other place supporting his motion to delete this particular subsection, he repeated, in some cases almost word for word, the objections which were made by the minister and his deputy before our committee in the Senate. There is no new ground put forward. This raises a very important question in the opinion of the committee, and I think the members of the Senate should know the real meat of the amendments proposed.

The amendments, other than the solicitor and client privilege, are of no particular significance. The solicitor and client privilege is a provision which we inserted in the bill. It presently exists in the Income Tax Act and has been there for quite a number of years. It has worked out, one would judge, very satisfactorily so far as income tax authorities are concerned. They have not sought to have it struck out, nor have we heard any statements made in Parliament or elsewhere in public complaining that this particular provision in the Income Tax Act impedes or inhibits the operations of the departmental officers—and it would have particular application, of course, to their investigations and gathering of documents in relation to possible offences under the Income Tax Act.

Inherent in the amendments which we dealt with in the Bankruptcy Act was exactly the same purpose, giving authority to the Superintendent of Bankruptcy, on obtaining an ex parte order from the court, to go into premises—and we had cut down the scope to examine records, etc., relating to possible offences under the Bankruptcy Act or related acts—and to make copies of documents. We insisted that this particular amendment in relation to examination of documents and making copies should go in, and it was concurred in by the Minister of Justice and by his deputy. It varied the form but not the substance of what the committee had proposed. We felt that it should not be possible when dealing with a third party, and not with the bankrupt, to be able to go in and take all records from his premises—in the case of a solicitor, thus removing the tools of his trade for an indefinite period. Therefore we felt the purpose would be served by examining the documents and making copies, and we suggested that documents should not be removed until copies had been provided.

Now, the actual words used in the draft dealing with the making and supplying of copies were suggested by the deputy minister, and therefore we considered we were on safe ground in the event of any objections thereto being taken in the other place. The deputy minister did object, however, to the solicitor and client privileges being included. One of the reasons for this was the length of time that would be involved. We said that under the provisions of the Income Tax Act certain time limits were provided and that we would provide one-third of that time limit for making a submission before a judge who would hear the motion, and we were prepared to say that the judge's decision should be final and that there should be no appeal. We said to the deputy minister that if this did not shorten the time enough, he could tell us by how much we should shorten it. The deputy minister told us that the time factor was not the most important one, and that they were opposed to the provision.

Their representations were repeated in the Commons. It was said that if you cannot get at these documents in a solicitor's office—and that is the only area to which this provision relates—and examine them immediately, but you first have to settle the question of whether it is a privileged document between solicitor and client, in the meantime news might get around to other people tied in with the matter who could, if they wished, destroy the documents.

One answer we gave to this situation, which seemed reasonable, was that we think—and we have no corner on life, business or even on crime—the grapevine might start to work the moment the superintendent went into the lawyer's office, and if any steps were to be taken to destroy documents, they could be taken right away. Notwithstanding the fact that our views were in print, it was stated that we had overlooked how serious the situation was, and it was suggested that we were impeding the proper functioning of the Superintendent in his investigation. This inference of failure to appreciate the situation is serious and the committee, since it was practically unanimous in its recommendations, feels strongly that they should examine more particularly this amendment to the bill, and report its conclusions to this chamber.

For that reason we are glad the amendments are going to committee.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I join with the honourable chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce in what he has said.

To delete subclause 8 of clause 3 of this bill is to encroach on the common law right of privilege pertaining to solicitor and client. This right has come down to us through generations, and it is one of the fundamental bastions of our common law. To chip away at this by way of statutes, taking away that privileged relationship between solicitor and client, is most unusual, and under the circumstances it is unnecessary because if it is thought that there is a conspiracy to defraud and that the solicitor is part of this conspiracy, then the Superintendent has his remedy in the Criminal Code and may immediately take out a search warrant and go into the solicitor's office. But to leave it willy-nilly, the way the other place has now amended the act, so that the bankruptcy officials can go into a lawyer's office and destroy that relationship pertaining to a solicitor and client, when they have a remedy elsewhere in the event of any possible crime or conspiracy, I suggest the other place has badly dealt with this measure which has been gone into painstakingly by our Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. It has been carefully considered by us, and through our experience with the Income Tax Act, where the privilege as between solicitor and client is maintained, we know of no instance where justice has been aborted or frustrated.

Therefore, I join with the leader of the House and the chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee and support the motion that this matter should be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, with great respect and as one who cannot claim to have the privilege of belonging to the legal fraternity, I was one of the members of the Banking and Commerce Committee who agreed with the representations made by the Minister of Justice and his officials that the amendment which the members of the committee inserted would destroy to some degree the force of the teeth the department was endeavouring to put into the Bankruptcy Act.

As one of those who had been concerned with a fraudulent bankruptcy and on behalf of people I know who have been ruined by such bankruptcies, I felt the department was entitled to every possible support in putting teeth into the act whereby they might protect those who have been defrauded.

As I say, I was one of the members of the committee who supported the Minister of Justice, and I do not think there were many others. I think most of the members were lawyers, but as a layman I objected to and voted against the committee's amendment. I am still a member of the Banking and Commerce Committee, and when this amendment comes before it again, I want the honourable chairman and his supporter, Senator Walker, to know that I am still going to vote against it.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I am not a supporter of his—I am a supporter of his amendment tonight.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Would the honourable senator permit a question? Does the honourable senator know whether the privilege which he talks about as a lawyer's privilege is a lawyer's privilege or a client's privilege which the lawyer cannot give up without his client's consent?

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, this is not quite as black and white as you may have been led to believe so far. I was very ardent in my support of the chairman and Senator Walker, as I thought it was an appropriate solution.

I have read the reports of the proceedings in the other place and, as I understand the question, the reason it was struck out was that the curtailing of fraudulent bankruptcies is a matter of great urgency and one in which there should be no limitations placed on the department, at least for a while. The minister gave a quite clear undertaking, as I read it, that in the further amendments that are being proposed to the Bankruptcy Act, and which will be forthcoming at the first of the year, the subject matter of this amendment will be given a great deal of consideration. When he appeared before the committee he told us that for the time being they wanted a free hand to operate among these people who have been doing such things as my friend Senator Burchill and others have mentioned. It seems not unreasonable that the matter be put off for a period of five or six months.

Although I supported ardently the committee's decision, I can see reason for going along with the House of Commons for a further period of five or six months or until such time as they have an opportunity for taking another look at it, and seeing what the result has been in handling these fraudulent situations which have even now become more aggravated.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I do not want to get into this dispute among lawyers, but it does seem to me to be a clash between bureaucratic convenience and the rights of the individual. I submit to you that the place of the Senate should be as far as possible on the side of the rights of the individual. Certainly I shall go back to the committee and oppose these amendments with all the earnestness I can command.

Hon. Mr. Walker: May I ask Senator Croll a question? Has he changed his mind on the principle of this bill, or is he making this statement tonight to enable the Government to get this legislation through and to convenience his friends in the other place?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I have not changed my mind on the principle of the bill. I believed in it the other day, and I believe it is a proper principle that should be there. But in the circumstances they want an act that is operative immediately; and, rather than get into a hassle with the Commons at the present time I think it would be wise to go along with them, provided they deal with it again in another bill which they promise by the end of the year.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): That is always the excuse given for an encroachment upon the rights of the individual.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-200, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill proposes certain changes in the Customs Tariff. As you know, such a measure has become almost an annual event.

There are three main schedules in the Customs Tariff. The first is Schedule A which is concerned with the classification of goods and rates. Schedule B deals with drawback, and Schedule C deals with the lists of prohibited goods. The first three clauses of this bill provide for certain changes in each of these schedules, but the majority of the changes are with respect to Schedule A.

Schedule A on pages 2 and 3 of the bill contains 17 items. Unfortunately, the bill does not incorporate the wording of the items as it now appears in the Customs Tariff. In other years there was opportunity of having these items printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings. At the appropriate time I think there will be a motion to do that this year, so that they will appear in tomorrow's issue of the Minutes of the Proceedings. For those of you who want this information at this time I would refer you to the Budget debate in the House of Commons Debates for March 29 last, starting at page 3391 and continuing for three pages. You will find in this Budget Resolution the items to be dealt with and which were not changed in any particular in their course through the other place. There you are given the tariff items changes as they are proposed by this bill, and immediately after on each page you are given the tariff items as they stand now.

I can tell honourable senators that in connection with Schedule A there are 17 items, seven of which involve only an extension of time within which the particular rates of duty that appear in the schedule will remain in force. In respect of five of the seven the benefit of the particular rate of duty that appears in the schedule is extended for a period of one year, and in relation to the other two it is extended for a period of two years. Most of these items, if not all of them, have been subject to this procedure over a period of time, going back as far as 1960 or 1961.

I would call your attention to those items, which you can see quite readily in the bill. The items in respect of which there is provision for an extension of one year or two years, without any change in the rate of duty, are to be found at the top of page 2; they are Items 945-1, 20925-1, 21045-1, 23705-1, 24100-1, 26325-1, and the top two items on the next page, namely, 44043-1 and 44047-1.

There is an historical reason for the occurrence of some of them, which I think has been stated by me in previous years. I am sure you will not want me to indulge in repetition. I should like to deal with the six items in respect of which there is some addition or deletion.

There are two items which might be called new items, which I shall deal with first. One of them is to be found on page 3, Item 57210-1, oriental rugs or carpets with pile hooked or knotted by hand. That item has a percentage rate and also a duty per square foot. The purpose of this, as has been stated frankly by the minister, is to encourage the further development of this industry in Canada.

The other new item is 44725-1. This has to do, as is evident from the description, with well points, well screens, well strainers and—this is the new item—pitless well heads, "all the foregoing of a class or kind not made in Canada, parts thereof." These are various pieces of equipment that are used in the sinking of a well, and the equipping of the well so that it may produce and deliver water. This item is new because it has been lifted out of another more general item in Schedule A and accorded special treatment, and in addition pitless well heads are set out.

As to some of the other items I should tell you, for instance, about Item 7905-1, carnation cuttings in their first year of introduction. That item used to read "rooted carnations," on the basis that cut carnations just could not stand the trip coming into Canada and they used to be detoured, I understand, from other parts of the States and were rooted and brought in in that form. It is a free entry item. However, now the word "rooted" has been removed, and they can come in rooted or unrooted. I am sure some senators will be happy to know that they will not have to acquire the rooted carnation and then do the trimming themselves in order to make an acceptable presentation somewhere.

Item 23505-1, as it reads now, is "Liquorice blocks, granules, paste or powder, not sweetened." This item has been in the tariff for some time but the additional words are "blocks," "granules," "or powder," Heretofore, the item simply covered liquorice paste, which is used in the confectionery business. This item is a raw material of the confectionery business, in tobacco products and in some pharmaceuticals. Apparently, the only place it can be produced successfully is in subtropical countries, and it has been requested by the Confectionery Association that the additional words be included.

Next is item 24100-1, "Litharge and mixtures or combinations of litharge with other materials . . . " Apparently the word "litharge" means lead oxide. This item, which is a free item, was originally limited to free entries when imported by manufacturers of batteries. Now that restriction has been removed so that any person who is in any phase of the battery business or engaged in the making of any part of that operation is in the same position as a battery manufacturer himself to import this item.

In connection with item 41105-1, there has been one addition and one word dropped. The words "captive balloons having a volume of 150,000 cubic feet or more," is additional to this particular tariff item. The word "complete" has been dropped because heretofore, when they were dealing with parts the item read "complete parts," and you could not bring in unfinished parts on which further work was to be done.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Can the honourable senator tell us what "captive balloons" are used for?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: They are used for logging. My note says: This item which covers logging equipment is being broadened to include captive balloons having a volume of 150,000 cubic feet or more. Experimental work is being carried out on the west coast with these balloons for the transportation of logs over rough terrain.

The balloons are expensive and this proposed reduction in duty should assist in this work. This amendment is supported by the British Columbia Loggers Association.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): They have nothing to do with trial balloons?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No, they have nothing to do with trial balloons, which have not been subjected to duty at any time. There might be less of them if they were.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am not too sure about that.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Do you think if we included duty they might bring in more of them?

Another item I wish to direct attention to is item 84850-1, the last one in Schedule A, which reads:

> Machines and apparatus and parts thereof (including motive power) of a class or kind not made in Canada and drilling mud, for use in the exploration, discovery, development and operation of potash and rock salt mines or for use in the production of crushed and screened rock salt.

There was another clause in this item which is struck out in this amendment. It reads, "or for use in the production of muriate of potash." Muriate of potash is a fertilizer. It was struck out at the request of the potash producers in Saskatchewan. By striking it out of this section it was found possible to fit it into another tariff item which deals particularly with this kind of fertilizer so that the persons who import such machines for use in the production of muriate of potash are enabled to come under that particular item. That item is specifically mentioned in the schedule of exemptions in the Excise Tax Act. This is an item which it is anticipated will be of great benefit to producers of muriate of potash as a fertilizer, and being thus made free of sales tax will be of great benefit.

Honourable senators, I think I have covered most of the items. However, there is a new item I did not mention, item 70505-1 which deals with settlers' effects. The item as it appears in this schedule has been considerably reduced, because heretofore there were certain conditions which had to be met. One was that the settler in seeking to bring in his effects had to certify that they were at least six months old. Also, if he were bringing in a car of a value over $2,500, it was dutiable. In addition, there was an enumeration of a great list of things which would be regarded as settlers' effects. What has been done in this item is that the age limitation of six months old has been eliminated because it created all kinds of confusion. The value of a car which is sought to be brought in as part of the settler's effects, with the duty on the part of the value over $2,500, has been removed. Instead of this interminable list, it is now provided that the list shall be set out in such regulations as the minister may prescribe, which I am sure administratively will make it much better than the conditions that were enumerated in the item to this moment.

This pretty well exhausts what has been done in Schedule A.

Schedule B, on page 4 of the bill, is the drawback section. This adds to an existing tariff item a drawback of 99 per cent in relation to machines which are imported and which are used or to be used "in the plants of manufacturers of automobiles and motor vehicles or of automobile or motor vehicle parts for the manufacture of automobiles and motor vehicles or of automobile or motor vehicle parts."

That is in the law as it stands at present. What is added is the entitlement to a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty paid if this machine or these machines are used for the manufacture of dies, jigs, fixtures or moulds which are used in the production of automobiles or motor vehicle parts. So that if a Canadian manufacturer of automobiles or automobile parts finds it necessary as from March 30 of this year to import into Canada a machine or machines as described in this item for the manufacture of dies, jigs, fixtures or moulds, which are used in the production of automobile or motor vehicle parts in the trade, he is entitled to a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty payable.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Is that regardless of whether or not there is a Canadian company already producing these articles?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Producing which articles?

Hon. Mr. Walker: The fixtures and jigs and dies.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No. The general item is in reference to these machines "of a class or kind not made in Canada". That general description appears in the item itself. Then the second column states when such an item is subject to drawback; but in order to find the description of the machines themselves, you find it as "all of the foregoing, of a type or kind not made in Canada."

Schedule C is the prohibiting schedule. In that schedule, of course, as you will see and as you will recall from previous times, "used or second hand mattresses or materials therefrom" are in the prohibited list of goods. But since we have dealt with settlers' effects under item 70505-1 in Schedule A, and prescribed the basis on which settlers' effect may be brought in—and in his effects might very well be mattresses and used mattresses—there is added to the list of items appearing in Schedule C, item 99219-1 as an exception from the prohibition against the importation of used or second-hand mattresses or materials therefrom, "mattresses imported under item 70405-1"—which is the item we have just dealt with on page 3 in Schedule A.

Honourable senators, this is the sole and the full purpose of these amendments. The minister had announced earlier that, under the present Kennedy Round of Tariff Negotiations and Arrangements, having regard to the time of termination on the present United States law in that regard, there will have to be a very substantial tidying up, in connection with all the arrangements which may have been reached at GATT, before the middle of 1967, because that is when the United States Trade Expansion Act expires.

Therefore, the Government felt that at this time, as a matter of policy, they should deal only with items which appeared to be extremely urgent and which might not bear on any negotiations that they wanted to carry on in relation to GATT items.

The way Canada deals in relation to bargaining on GATT items is that we offer to the other parties in this GATT conference certain items that we are prepared to trade for certain items on which they have agreed to reduce their rate of duty or to make free. They are not necessarily correlated. As a matter of fact, they may be entirely different items. Our method of dealing has not been in relation to a particular item. There are illustrations of what we deal with in Schedule A, where this type of bargaining has been done. Laundry bleach in Canada used to be subject to a duty at all levels. Then there was a Supreme Court of Canada decision which said that, having regard to certain relationships, this should be a free item. That disturbed the industry here in Canada considerably, so Canada bargained with the United States and traded two other items in order to be in a position to reinstate the rates of duty which formerly existed on this laundry bleach item.

This is the way Canada deals, and therefore it is understandable that they would want to keep themselves well prepared by volume in trading items for this final round before the present United States trade expansion statute expires.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Quid pro quo.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, it is quid pro quo but it is not necessarily giving a quo for the same item. It may be for other items that are thrown in.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Is there a possibility that an extension be granted for the discussions at Geneva which are taking place in connection with the Kennedy Round?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I wish I knew. This is a matter that is peculiarly in the hands of the United States Congress and Senate, because there is a termination date on the present United States Trade Expansion Act. Every person must proceed, therefore, on the basis that it is going to run out at that time.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Could they extend it, as we extend the Bank Act?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That would be very interesting, as it would simply mean passing a statute saying that the present act is in force for so much longer. That would be a very simple way, but we cannot suggest that to the United States Government.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Choquette, debate adjourned.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-197, to amend the Canada Student Loans Act.

Bill read the first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. John J. Connolly: With leave, I move that the bill be read a second time now.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: If there is any urgency with respect to these bills, we should know. I take it there is reason for the honourable Leader asking that this bill be read a second time now.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, there is only this reason. We have five new bills coming to us tonight. As we do not know how long Parliament will be sitting this week, it seems reasonable to suggest that at least two of these five should be explained tonight. I propose to stand the other three until tomorrow, when they are called.

In the interest of trying to move the work of the Senate along as much as possible, I would suggest that this is an appropriate bill on which to have an explanation tonight. Other honourable senators may wish to speak on it sometime in the course of the week.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I take it that there may be some necessity to get this bill through in a short time so that students may be able to take advantage of it. Is that the reason why this motion is put now?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I would think so. Bills that come to us between now and the summer recess should all be considered as urgent for passage before the summer recess.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I wonder if it is the intention of the Government to have second reading passed today and have the bill sent to committee? There is a most serious question. It involves a constitutional issue.

According to the Constitution, the Government has no authority with regard to education. Are we to swallow this bill because the summer recess is upon us? This bill needs very serious and complete discussion, so that it may be considered from every angle. Is it suggested that the second reading should pass tonight?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I can assure the honourable senator that there is no intention of asking that this debate be concluded this evening. As I indicated earlier, it is desirable to have the explanation on the record this evening.

On the constitutional question which the honourable senator raises, that is a matter for debate and if he wishes to raise it in the course of debate that is his privilege. There is no intention of seeking conclusion of the debate on the second reading this evening for the purpose of getting this bill to committee.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank the honourable Leader for the explanation. I would like to have the debate adjourned until tomorrow in order to express my views on this matter.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: We have no objection on this side to the explanation being given tonight. As a matter of fact we would welcome it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Does the honourable Senator Pouliot wish to move the adjournment of the debate, after the explanation has been given?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That will be done on this side, as usual.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I am happy to have the opportunity of discussing this important bill. It proposes to amend a very important act which in the course of its short history of about two years has made a tremendous impact on the life of university students in Canada and is helping to bring the number of Canadian students getting higher education more into line with that in other countries. At this stage, honourable senators, let me give you a little background information.

There has been a general recognition in the last few years that in order to survive, nations have to spend more and more of their time and resources in developing a higher level of education. In this respect, while Canada has made some spectacular strides in recent years we are still lagging considerably behind other countries. In the United States, for example, 25 per cent of those completing high school are going on to university and are receiving 30 per cent more hours of education, or years of training, or months of training, depending upon how you wish to express it, than are their Canadian counterparts.

In recent years many Canadian educators have been pointing with pride, if I may call it that, to the fact that the Americans have many fine educational institutions but also many poor ones. It has come as something of a shock to these same Canadian educators on reading the second report of the Canadian Economic Council to learn that the American students are getting more training, and that this increase in training reflects the percentage by which the standard of living in the United States is higher than ours.

In Japan 20 per cent of students finishing high school are going on to universities. Japan is one of our competitors in the industrial field.

I have no comparable figures for Russia at the present time, but the last figures I have show that 11 per cent of their high school students go on to universities and technical training schools.

In China there were also no comparable figures, but I was there recently and I was interested to learn that there are 50 universities with a total of 500,000 students in the City of Peking alone. In other words, there are more students attending establishments for higher learning in that one city than there are in the whole of Canada. They also claimed to have trained one million technicians since 1949.

I mention these figures to show how necessary it is that Canadians should see the necessity for doing more in the field of education. In Canada just under 7 per cent of students completing high school go on to university.

Fortunately for us, and as a result of the Canadian Vocational Training Assistance Act passed in 1961, over 1,000 technical schools have been built or adapted since the act was passed. The response to the Canadian Vocational Training Assistance Act has been spectacular; in fact, nothing quite like it has happened in this country. This massive program in the technical field will be having a very important impact on the Canadian labour force in a very short time.

It is in the light of this new climate of appreciation of the vital necessity of having a higher percentage of our people with greater training and skills in our labour force that governments, both provincial and federal, have set up in the last few years a variety of scholarships, bursary and loan plans.

Some six years ago the Province of Alberta established the Queen Elizabeth Loan and Bursary Fund of $1 million; the Province of Ontario also has established a very substantial bursary and scholarship fund. On July 28, 1964 the Parliament of Canada passed the Canada Student Loans Act which authorized the Government to make loans through the instrumentality of chartered banks and certain other lending institutions such as credit unions to make loans to students "in need"—I put those words in quotations marks—who could produce a certificate of eligibility. That is to say, a student could obtain a loan up to a maximum of $1,000 per year or a total of $5,000 during his academic career provided he discharged his responsibilities in a satisfactory manner.

This has been a co-operative venture between the provinces and the federal Government, and it has been a very happy one. The provinces have taken over the responsibility of providing the certificates of eligibility, and it is they who decide who are entitled to loans and it is they who approve the authorized educational institutions within their boundaries.

An amount of $40 million was set aside the first year commencing September 1, 1964 and the results have been very spectacular, as I have indicated. In that first year of the program from September 1, 1964 to June 30, 1965 some 42,000 students in Canada took advantage of the facilities offered. In the second year commencing July 1, 1965, and which will conclude in a few days, over 50,000 students have taken advantage of these loan funds. In other words, in the two years which will come to an end on June 30 next some 92,000 Canadian students will have been assisted in entering upon university training or training in a higher educational establishment for a further period of time.

Some honourable senators may be interested in knowing what has happened with respect to these certificates of eligibility, and I intend to put on the record two tables which indicate exactly what has happened. The first is the report on Certificates of Eligibility issued during the loan year ended June 30, 1965 showing the provincial allocations and the amounts actually used by provinces.

I am not going to go into the formula by which the allocation was arranged except to say that the amount was arrived at by taking the number of students who achieved the age of 18 years and were under the age of 25 years and relating that to the total number of the same age in the population of Canada.

Under this scheme, in the first year $27,036,000 was allocated, and this was supplemented by a further amount of $3,230,000. In other words, in the first year of the program the co-operating provinces were allocated $30,266,000, of which $26,748,000 was actually used.

Then coming to the year commencing July 1, 1965—the current year which will end in a few days—I am not going into the details of that, but I will put this table on the record, with your consent. A total of $28,380,000 was authorized, and this covered loans to 50,419 students. Because of effective demand the amount had to be increased to $35,460,000. That was a spectacular response to this student loan program.

To continue with a little further background to the act, the Canada Student Loans Act authorizes the Government to guarantee repayment and to pay interest, while the borrowers are full-time students, on loans made by banks and designated credit unions on the basis of Certificates of Eligibility issued by the provinces participating in the plan. Here I should say that the Province of Quebec does not participate in the plan, but an amount arrived at on the same formula basis is paid over to that province.

The act provides a ceiling for the amount of loans the provinces may authorize in any given loan year. It contains a total loan provision for each year. It was $40 million for the first loan year, and this act increases that amount considerably. The total loan is divided among the provinces into provincial allocations on the basis of population in the 18-24 year age group. The act authorizes assistance to eligible students who are in need of a loan. The administrative criteria and procedures for determining the need of a student is left to the participating provinces. For the first loan year—that is, 1964-65—time did not permit the development and use of commonly agreed criteria on which the loans would be made to students and some provinces did not apply specific criteria at all. When the demand for loans threatened to exceed provincial allocations in these provinces special parliamentary authority had to be sought through an item in the Estimates to provide supplementary allocations for that loan year. For the second loan year, however, administrative criteria, including general principles to govern the assessment of a student's financial need, were agreed to by the provinces and the federal Government, and now are in effect.

Notwithstanding the institution of these new criteria, it became apparent as early as last September that the demand for loans from students who qualified under the new criteria would exceed the allocations by a wide margin in several provinces. Parliament was not in session, and the Minister of Finance sent a telegram to the provinces undertaking that legislation would be introduced as soon as possible to amend the act in respect of provincial allocations. The telegram indicated that the amending legislation would incorporate in the allocations for the present year any overruns which otherwise would have been charged against the following year's allocation. With this assurance, it was suggested to the provinces that there was no reason why provinces should not continue to issue certificates.

The provinces have continued to issue certificates to eligible students. The aggregate of allocations to participating provinces for the current year is approximately $28 million. However, loans totalling $34,200,000 had been authorized by the provinces as of January 31, 1966. The extent of the overrun of provincial allocations has varied from as low as 8 per cent to as high as 62 per cent, demonstrating that, notwithstanding the application of common criteria, there exists a wide variation from province to province in the demand for student loans, depending on such factors as the level of family incomes and the extent to which other sources of student aid are available.

The conclusions arising out of that experience were that the act should be amended before June 30, 1966—in other words, before the end of the current loan year—and it is with the proposed amendments to sections 6 and 11 of the Canada Student Loans Act that we are dealing tonight.

The purpose of the first amendment, to section 6, is to require the minister to pay interest to a bank on a guaranteed student loan on behalf of the student in respect of any period for which the borrower's interest-free status was reinstated after having earlier expired. In other words, under the old act a student might have attended for one term and then dropped out, and under that act he was not eligible to carry on with an interest-free loan. The purpose of this amendment is to provide that the student may be reinstated after a period of absence and have the interest covered by the Government.

The second amendment deals with section 11, which at present reads:

> The appropriate authority for a province shall not issue or cause to be issued any certificate of eligibility in a loan year if as a result thereof the aggregate of the amounts set out in certificates of eligibility issued or caused to be issued by such authority in that loan year would exceed the provincial allocation for that province for that loan year.

The purpose of this amendment is to increase provincial allocations for the loan year commencing July 1, 1965 and subsequent loan years by authorizing the minister, on application by a province, to determine a supplementary allocation for that province in an amount not exceeding 20 per cent of the basic loan provision for the year, and by increasing to $58 million the basic loan provision for the loan year commencing in 1965. In other words, this section provides for flexibility which had appeared to be desirable as a result of past experience.

I should emphasize that the administration of this program is carried out by the provinces: they are the ones who work out the details with respect to eligibility of students; they are the ones who authorize the institutions at which the money shall be spent; and to that extent they are the ones who are in charge of this particular program.

I have already indicated that all provinces except Quebec are co-operating in this program; and as far as Quebec is concerned, they are running the program entirely themselves but are receiving the money from the federal Government. I am not familiar with the details of the mechanics of their program.

There is reciprocity between provinces as to where the money may be spent. For example, a student in British Columbia who may want to attend a course in Toronto or at McGill is eligible to do so. Up to the present time the reciprocity has not been 100 per cent in the case of some of the provinces, but in the main it is working very well and it is expected that there will be a greater measure of reciprocity as time goes on.

Honourable senators, I think these two amendments are simple and straightforward. They provide for recognition of the facts of the situation. They make the act more effective in serving the purpose for which it was intended; and there is an harmonious relationship between the provinces and the federal Government. When this bill receives second reading, I shall propose that it be referred to the appropriate standing committee.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

and the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition Act", has in obedience to the order of reference of May 6, 1966, inquired into the said bill and now reports the same with the following amendment:

1. Amend the French version of the said bill by striking out the words "service public" and substituting therefore the words "fonction publique" in the title and wherever those two words appear in the said French version of the said bill.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: With leave of the Senate, I move that this report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) REFERRED TO FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly moved, with leave of the Senate:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March 1967; and

That the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I am not rising to object to the motion, but Supplementary Estimates (A) that are now before us are the first of this year's supplementaries—is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, that is correct.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I point out that these supplementaries provide for the expenditure of a very large amount of money, almost $300 million. I can remember when $300 million was almost the total of the main Estimates for the year.

I have pointed out before that it is unfortunate in a way that we have no other forum in which to discuss these estimates except the Standing Committee on Finance. That committee is, of course, an excellent one, but I often wonder whether honourable senators take as much advantage of it as they should. I know that we have had considerable complaints about not getting the information we would like to have. I also know that the Finance Committee, under the leadership of Senator Leonard, is always anxious to assist members in obtaining information. My suggestion is that this committee might be used more often than it is.

May I point out to honourable senators that these same Estimates were sent to the Public Accounts Committee in the Commons and I understand they are before that committee now. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I believe so.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: The committee goes through the Estimates very thoroughly, and I know it makes a report to the House of Commons on the supplementary Estimates. It is in fact the only opportunity that house has of dealing with these particular Estimates, which is entirely different from the interim supply Estimates and the supplementary Estimates.

Some items which I glanced through I found to be most interesting, such as the item of $3,914,000 on page 4, assistance to various provinces to obtain feed during certain months last year when the hay crop was short in New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario. It would be interesting to know just how much of that amount went to each province.

Vote 36a, on page 9—to forgive payment by India to Canada of the total principal and interest accruing thereon under agreements related to purchase of Canadian wheat and flour, is for $9,428,572. Why should this item not be under our Colombo Plan? I know that under the Colombo Plan we have been supplying wheat and foods of other kinds to India and other countries.

Honourable senators, I am picking out a few of these items hurriedly and at random.

Vote 17a on page 18 is for $20,000 for the "Hospital Insurance Supplementary Fund." It seems to me that is a small amount for a fund of this kind, and there must be some special explanation for it.

On page 26 is an amount of $1 put in the main Estimates "to provide for construction of a causeway and associated structures across Northumberland Strait and to include the project detailed in these Estimates". I know that $1 is not going to build a causeway between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, but it occurs to me that where engineers have made estimates of the cost they should be stated, and not shown as $1 item, because a project of that kind is going to cost millions of dollars. The supplementary Estimates are $295 million in round figures, and here is an item which would add considerably to that amount. I cannot see why an amount which has been determined by engineers is not stated in the Estimates. Certain items such as this would be of interest to all members of this chamber who may attend the committee.

The Senate Finance Committee is a good committee, and I think we should make the best use of it that we can. Like the Leader of the Government, I am a member of every committee. I must apologize for not being able to attend every meeting, but that would be practically impossible.

If honourable senators look through the Estimates and find items that interest them, I suggest that they might attend the meetings of the Finance Committee with great benefit to themselves.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: They do not have to be members.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: No. When I used the word "members" I was referring to members of this chamber. You do not have to be a member of a committee to attend it. You can attend and ask questions. The only privilege you are denied is that of voting in the committee. You have every other privilege.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition has rendered a great service to the Senate tonight in speaking as he has, and I am not using idle words when I say so. I know of no work that is more beneficial to senators than to attend meetings of the Finance Committee when it is dealing with the Estimates.

In the past few years we have given special attention to the work of the Finance Committee and have urged honourable senators to attend its meetings at every possible opportunity, because for years the Senate has complained of the fact that it gets appropriation bills with no adequate time for consideration of the items contained therein.

I feel that we should appreciate the new practice we have adopted. Very few of us realize the way in which this practice has grown upon us, that when the main Estimates are tabled in this house they are referred immediately to the Finance Committee. Tonight Supplementary Estimates (A) were tabled and immediately a motion was made to refer them to the Finance Committee.

It is open to any individual senator, whether a member of the Finance Committee or not, to attend and to ask questions on any item either of the main or supplementary Estimates, and no matter how many sets of supplementaries are tabled. However, it would be a convenience to the chairman in arranging the meetings, when honourable senators are interested in certain items—the Leader of the Opposition gave an indication of a few such items this evening—if some notification were sent either to the Committees Branch or to the chairman of the committee so that suitable arrangements can be made for the appropriate officials to be there to give the explanations.

May I divert for a moment to mention a practice, which I believe to be a good one, in the House of Lords. When a matter is set down for debate by way of its practice of a motion for papers, the whips get a list of the members who wish to participate in the debate. The list usually consists of six or seven names. That keeps them busy from three o'clock in the afternoon often until nine or ten o'clock at night without a break. We could change our method of debate here to conform to their system and thereby debate a subject all at one sitting on appropriate occasions.

May I now return to the question of the work of the Finance Committee in respect of Estimates. I think we can be proud of the way this kind of work is done. However, I feel that individual senators can help greatly in the work of the committee and in the kind of reports it makes if they would attend at every opportunity. Notices always appear on the notice board. As a rule, they are to be found in our Minutes of the Proceedings, so that when appropriation bills come before us no one can be heard to complain of not having an opportunity to discuss an item. The opportunity is presented by the fact that these Estimates are before the Finance Committee.

I hope that honourable senators will take advantage of the opportunity presented to them even more than in the past.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I point out that quite recently I protested against giving notice of meetings without any indication of what is coming before the committees. I have in my hand at the present moment a notice of a meeting of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Divorce at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

On it I see notice that Mr. E. R. Hopkins, Law Clerk of the Senate, and Mr. Justice Walsh, Divorce Commissioner, will be the witnesses. They will lay the foundation of the legal situation that is to come before the committee. I am sure each of them will give a most interesting statement of the facts and the law with which we will have to deal in the coming months, mostly after the recess.

I would ask that everyone who can attend should come to that meeting at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning. It is the first meeting and there will be a large number of meetings before we conclude the studies undertaken by this committee.

Hon. T. D'arcy Leonard: Honourable senators, first, I would like to thank the honourable Leader of the Opposition for the suggestions he has made in connection with Supplementary Estimates (A).

I would like to point out that the Finance Committee has been meeting once a week ever since the main Estimates were referred to the committee. Now that the supplementary Estimates are being referred this evening, I propose that the Finance Committee sit on Thursday morning, which has been its regular day for sitting, and deal with Supplementary Estimates (A) in the main.

The points raised by Senator Brooks are excellent points and I will see that they are brought to the attention of the proper witnesses we may have before us on Thursday.

If honourable senators look over supplementary Estimates (A), they will see items in which they are interested, and if they would let me know of any particular vote I will see that the information is available also on Thursday for them.

For example, I would call attention to the fact that on page 27 of the supplementary Estimates, there is the item for the university grants to which Senator Cameron referred in dealing with the bill which was before us tonight. The amount there is $38,400,000. Any information required in connection with those university grants, coming under this legislation, can be asked also at the committee meeting and we will endeavour to provide complete answers then or obtain them afterwards.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable gentleman for an explanation. What authority is given to the Government for the expenditure of money when an item of $1 is mentioned? Is there any limitation, or what is the effect of a $1 appropriation?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Let me deal particularly with the item to which the honourable Leader of the Opposition referred. It is at the top of page 26 and deals with Vote 40A. That is a vote which is in the main Estimates. There is a substantial amount dealing with construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, roads, bridges and other engineering works. This item in the supplementary Estimates extends the purposes of that vote, to provide for the construction of a causeway and associated structures across Northumberland Strait.

The amount actually required for the construction is in the main Estimates vote, either by reason of some other item not being used or because the amount is sufficient to take care of this item. In order to extend the purposes of the vote in the main Estimates, to give this much greater detail and allow this item to come in, in addition to the other items, an item is put in the supplementary Estimates with a vote of $1. It grants the authority: the money is already there.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Is there not an explanation given by the different departments for all these items that we have in the supplementary Estimates? I know that in the House of Commons one gets a book with an explanation of every item in the Estimates. Does the honourable senator not receive such an explanation?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: So far I have not, but I am aware that this is the general practice and this will be before us at our committee meeting.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

TABLE OF RATES OF DUTIES PRINTED AS APPENDIX TO MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John J. Connolly, with leave, moved:

That a table setting out the rates of duties provided for in Bill C-200, intituled: "An Act to amend the Customs Tariff," and the corresponding rates in effect prior to the 1966 Budget, be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

He said: Honourable senators, we have been adopting this practice for a number of years. Senator Walker mentioned it when Senator Hayden began his speech. We found this has been a useful document to have before us.

Actually, had we been able to give the usual two days' notice, this motion would have put the material before us in our own records this evening before Senator Hayden spoke. I appreciate the co-operation I have received in getting the explanation onto the record at this time.

Motion agreed to.

HON. KEITH DAVEY

APPOINTMENT AS COMMISSIONER OF CANADIAN FOOTBALL LEAGUE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, may I draw the attention of the chamber to a matter which may be of some interest.

It is always a source of pride to us when a tribute is paid to the special abilities of one of our colleagues. I feel that that would be the response of all honourable senators to the wisdom of the Canadian Football League in entrusting its highest office to our colleague Senator Davey.

I am not in a position to say how much "sober second thought," or perhaps I should say "sober second guessing," he will require in this capacity. I feel sure he will bring the fruits of his experience here to his new duties. One of those will be the special understanding and sympathy for the backbenchers of the league over which he will preside. He will have a special understanding of their great opportunities to watch stars of the league in action and an understanding of some of the frustrations that they sometimes feel on the sidelines.

We will remember, along this row, and we will remind him, come Grey Cup ticket time, that he is and will remain for a while at any rate, we hope, a distinguished member of the left field backbenchers club of the Senate. I would remind other honourable senators that, if there is to be a first call on him at that time, we should have his ear first.

I have known Senator Davey for many years and there have been times when I felt he was following too closely on my heels. That was certainly true in our former capacities—as my learned friends would say, "at arm's length" at times—and I was not surprised when he followed me here.

However, he is now in his new role, which requires youthful qualities of heart and mind and hand—in which, for many reasons, I cannot follow him. I can only wave him by me, wish him good luck and many more laurels to add to the distinguished ones that he already has.

I feel that Senator Davey has all the energy, ability and resources necessary to bring to this exciting new role great credit to himself, to Canadian football and to this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I am sure we are all most gratified to hear the remarks of honourable Senator Grosart about one of our colleagues who has been singled out for a special distinction.

I am constrained to say that the cartoon representation of members of this chamber is belied at least on two counts—one being the appointment of Senator Davey to this position, and the other the fact that we have, among our members here, the head of the organization which controls the hockey team that won the world hockey championship and the Stanley Cup. We have certainly within our group here people who are young-minded and sports-minded. Remembering what Senator Walker said the other day about his former professor, I feel it is a tribute to the kind of judgment a senator is expected to exercise in the performance of a public function, that one of our number should be selected to be the commissioner of such an important part of sporting activity in this country.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, may I second what Senator Grosart has said about Senator Davey. I was very pleased with the appointment and I wish him every success. Having known his predecessor, Mr. Sydney Halter, quite well, I am sure my honourable colleague will have served a very good apprenticeship between now and December 31 when he takes over his duties.

I want to take this opportunity also to express my delight in reading recently that the Prime Minister had selected a member of this chamber for a very difficult and arduous task. I refer to the appointment of my distinguished colleague and friend, Senator MacKenzie, as arbitrator in the Seaway dispute. This was a very serious situation and one charged with grave consequences, particularly to the commerce of this country.

Being delighted, as I have said, that Senator MacKenzie was called upon to use his good offices in this situation, I was even more delighted when he succeeded at the eleventh hour and almost the fifty-ninth minute in bringing about a satisfactory conclusion. This underlines the fact, in my view, that the Government could make more use of the members of this chamber in similar capacities. I wish to congratulate Senator MacKenzie as I am sure many of you have already done. It was a very fine piece of work.

Hon. Keith Davey: I am most grateful to the honourable senators who have spoken here this evening. I am also grateful to those who have spoken to me privately and to those who have been kind enough to write to me on the occasion of my recent appointment. I am especially pleased, honourable senators, that these generous remarks have come from friends on all sides of the house. I believe that while football is a great game it is, in fact, much more than a game. I believe that Canadian football has made a unique contribution to our nationhood, and it will be part of my task as commissioner of Canadian football to help expand and develop the game. In so doing I shall be mindful that such expansion of football will be making a further contribution to our nationhood. I might add that I think our country has too few such national institutions. It is a matter of particular satisfaction to me that the Grey Cup Game in centennial year, which will be my first year as commissioner, will be played in the nation's capital.

There are two other matters which I should mention. When I was appointed I made it perfectly clear to the football people, and I believe through the press to the Canadian sporting public generally, that I intend fully to live up to my commitment as a senator. I am confident that I can be a useful senator and at the same time an effective commissioner. I shall, of course, have less time for some of my former more partisan political activities. I flatter myself that this might delight some of my Conservative friends, but I am depressed to think that it may also delight some of my Liberal friends.

I think it might be an appropriate time to cut back on my political activities because, as senators will realize, my appointment last week took place in the City of Winnipeg, and to my certain and personal knowledge this is the first victory chalked up by a Liberal in Winnipeg for a number of years.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien, with leave of the Senate, moved:

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 5, 1966

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ASKED IN DEBATE ON SECOND READING JUNE 1, 1966, PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. John J. Connolly: I move, with leave of the Senate:

That the answers to the questions asked on June 1st, 1966, by the honourable Senator Brooks, P.C., the honourable Senator Hollett and the honourable Senator Burchill respectively, and tabled in the Senate on 15th June, 1966, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

For text of answers see Appendix, p. 801.

Honourable senators, I had thought that it was sufficient to table the answers to certain questions asked on June 1 last. However, after discussing the matter with the honourable Leader of the Opposition, I quite agree that if questions are important enough to be asked the answers are important enough to be put into Hansard. For that reason, I make this motion at this time.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I wish to thank the honourable leader.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL SERVICES

FEES PAID BY GOVERNMENT TO MEMBERS OF QUEBEC BAR—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Notice of Inquiry of Hon. Mr. Pouliot:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the payment of fees by the Government of Canada to the lawyers of the Bar of the Province of Quebec for the last five years.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have a few words of explanation to give regarding this inquiry. Naturally, sometimes there is a misunderstanding. Some of my colleagues were under the impression that I was complaining of the fees being paid to our confrères of the Bar, both by federal and provincial governments.

That was not the point. The point at issue was that a lawyer who gets $400 a day, more or less, is not free, is not independent of the government which pays him that sum. Such fees have been paid not only by the federal Government but by provincial governments also.

You have all read in the press that some Quebec lawyers received $75,000 per year, and others have received a quarter of a million dollars in fees for three or four years, and some others have been paid so much per hour for work done at home. It is impossible to control it. One may say that he has worked three hours at home at $100 an hour or more or less. It is impossible to know from here, as it is a provincial matter that should be looked into by the provincial house. Here we have also some solicitors and counsel who are very well looked after. I do not complain of that, although it may look exorbitant. That has never been mentioned by the lawyers who know, and the other people will never know it unless an eye-opener tells them what is going on.

The point is that the Bar has been known to be an independent body, free of all governments and all undue influence and free from what I might call self-censorship. If the Bar were free, the executives of the Bar or the Boards of the various Bar associations—and this applies to the Canadian Bar Association, to the Upper Canada Law Society and the Conseil général du Barreau de la province de Québec—should be absolutely free in order to claim the redress of wrongs, especially in law.

There is at the present time much confusion in the making of laws. Yesterday evening there was a debate in this chamber on Bill S-17. When that bill was before the committee for consideration and the Minister of Justice appeared I told him flatly that it was just as clear as mud. How could anyone, even an expert in law, understand a sentence which is three pages long? You have only to look at the book to see that; it leads to a lot of confusion.

Another thing that the Bar could have done, was to have complained of the fact that the revision of the Statutes of Canada is actually being done by the bureaucrats of the Department of Justice who are specialists in writing laws that nobody understands.

This is the first conclusion that I draw, that those who receive emoluments, fees or moneys of any kind from any government, should not be entitled to be members of the executive of a Bar association, because they are not independent. My second point is that the only independent body that exists is the Senate of Canada, if it wants to be independent. I am making that point in order to increase the prestige of the Senate among the Canadian people.

If the Senate has no objection, please let this inquiry stand, and tomorrow I shall ask a precise question which I will put on the Order Paper so as to obtain more information on the matter.

Inquiry stands.

AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT—SUBJECT MATTER REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 16, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aird:

> That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament do approve the Agreement concerning Automotive Products between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America, signed on January 16, 1965 and tabled in the Senate on March 3, 1965; and that this House do approve the same.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, first I would like to express my appreciation of the presentation which Senator Aird made when he introduced the motion approving this trade agreement. His explanation was clear and concise and, as far as I was concerned, was easy to follow.

So far as my friends Senator Walker and Senator Willis are concerned, I followed carefully what they had to say, and I appreciated the research which went into the presentation. As to Senator Grosart's remarks, I am sorry that I did not hear him, but I can assure him that I have read what he said not once but quite a number of times, and it is quite obvious from reading his speech that he had devoted considerable time to research.

I know that some, if not all, members of the Senate will not expect me to say that I subscribe to everything that these honourable senators have said. I do have some observations to make as to some of the things they said. For instance, Senator Grosart, in talking about the effects of the trade treaty, at one time went as far as to say that there was apparent evidence of benefits accruing from the operation of this trade agreement.

Later he became a little bolder, and even went so far as to say that there were actual benefits.

Senator Walker thought that while there were benefits in certain directions they were offset by losses, companies going out of business, and loss of employment in other directions. Senator Willis spoke in the same vein.

I should like now to answer one other remark by Senator Walker before I deal with this proposition. Senator Walker talked about a windfall of $50 million that was presented to the American manufacturers of motor cars that were imported into Canada duty free during the time when the reciprocal arrangement was not in force as far as the United States was concerned but when Canada was observing its terms. It is not clear to me, and I still do not know, whether it was the American manufacturer or the Canadian importer of the article who obtained the benefit of that duty-free entry into Canada.

Hon. Mr. Walker: It was certainly not the consumer.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I can understand my honourable friend's high regard—and it is one which I share with him—for the consumer. There are some offsetting features that relate directly—although my honourable friend might not think completely—to what he has said on this point, but I shall go on and supplement that with my authority I mentioned a minute or two ago.

When the treaty became operative so far as Canada was concerned the 1965 models had been on the market for some time, and the 1966 production had in large measure been committed in respect of orders for parts, et cetera. But when the 1966 models were introduced there were price reductions announced. For instance, General Motors announced price reductions averaging $72 per car, Ford announced price reductions averaging $62 per vehicle, and at the same time Chrysler announced reductions ranging from $38 to $126 per car.

I concede that it is difficult to try to relate those price reductions to the volume of car sales in Canada in that year and to calculate what might be the amount that was recaptured by the consumer as a result of the price reductions. The best calculation is that made on the basis of actual sales in 1966, plus the projected sales for the balance of the year. Basing the calculation on the most popular model of car, and removing all the options, a figure appears in the area of $40 million. In other words, prices were lowered to the extent of $40 million when compared with the prices that prevailed in the previous year. There is some part of the $50 million. While my friend might say, "Late", I would say, "Better late than never."

In addition, there was a substantial increase in employment and in additional revenues to the Government that resulted from the increased production and sales. When it is realized that the retail value of North American manufactured passenger cars and commercial vehicles totalled $2.574 billion in 1965 as against $2.192 billion in 1964—an increase of 17 per cent—it can be assumed, I think, that there was some measure of increase in revenue to the treasury as a result of these increases in sales and production.

My honourable friend might say that that is only a partial answer. As he knows, it is said among the legal profession that when your opponent enters court with one book under his arm, beware, for he is carrying that one book for one of two reasons. Either he is trying to fool you, or he has everything he needs for the presentation of his case and for answering what you might say in that one book, or even in one case in that one book. That is really dangerous. So I wondered how I could do something similar with such an experienced counsel as Senator Walker. I am now going to try.

On March 25, 1966, at Oakville, Ontario, at the official dedication of the new Oakville truck plant constructed by the Ford Motor Company and involving an expenditure of at least $25 million, some remarks were made on that occasion by a guest of honour whom my friend knows very well and I would think admires.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Diefenbaker?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: And whom I certainly think he supports—the Ontario Minister of Economics and Development, the Honourable Stanley J. Randall. May I read to you a few of his remarks? He said:

> I understand that Ford of Canada alone, in 1965, spent more than $260 million on goods and services, supplied by more than 2,800 Canadian businesses from coast to coast—a 16 per cent increase over 1964.

He went on to say:

> Ontario's greatest manufacturing gains during the past year—

That is, 1965

> —were in the automotive vehicles and parts industry.
>
> Of all the Ontario companies expanding their plants last year, 75 were involved in, or with, the automotive industry. They added over 8,000 employees, over three million square feet of new space, and spent over $100 million on capital investment.
>
> Of all the new manufacturing establishments that located in Ontario last year, 35 companies were affected, or resulted from, the new automotive pact. These companies added 5,000 employees, built over two million square feet of space, and invested over $50 million.
>
> In total, the automotive agreement between Canada and the United States, in 1965 alone, accounted for 13 million new jobs—

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Thirteen million?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Thirteen thousand.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: You said 13 million.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I am sorry. I knew my friend would pick that up right away, and I thank him. It accounted for 13,000 new jobs. It is a little early, I agree, for 13 million jobs, but give us time.

Hon. Mr. Willis: A century?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: To continue:

> —and $150 million of increased investment in Ontario.

Then speaking of 1966, he continued:

> Since January this year Canadian automotive manufacturers have more than doubled their exports of cars and trucks, mainly to the United States.
> Though results of the Canada-U.S. automotive trade pact were excellent in 1965, and off to an outstanding start in 1966, in the next two years, Ontario's auto and auto parts industries will enter an even bigger expansion period.

This is the view expressed by Mr. Randall as to what the next two years will produce, and I think some senators may be interested to hear it coming from such a responsible source.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I think the honourable senator had better get another law book.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: So far as I am concerned, until my friend has something to contribute that is material I am satisfied to operate with the one law book. Actually, I have a few more books, so my friend is not going to get off so easy.

Mr. Randall went on to say:

> In this period the auto pact is expected to: create at least another 20,000 to 30,000 new jobs in Ontario; stimulate several hundred million dollars of investment in new plants and equipment; add at least five million square feet of factory space; bring at least 20 new plants to Ontario, and lead to expansions in 20 to 30 others; increase steel demand by 400,000 to 500,000 tons a year; create growth opportunities for rubber, glass, plastics, synthetic fibre, paint and chemical industries; increase demand for nickel, aluminium, zinc and copper.

In addition to that—since that seems to be the one book and Senator McCutcheon is a little concerned about just having one authority—there is the Financial Post, which my friend reads, perhaps avidly. In the issue of February 19, 1966, a whole page is devoted to an article headed "Life Under the Auto Pact," in which may be seen in some detail the tremendous developments which have taken place and are on the drawing board or in actual expansive operation as against being in production since this particular agreement became operative.

While I know honourable senators would enjoy my reading it to them in full, they may be satisfied with a few of the headings, and then I shall make the page available for those who may want to read it in full.

By 1970 the total vehicle sales in Canada will reach $3,444 million. Then in connection with developments, the Ford Motor Company has been taking these steps, as appears by this article:

> . . .Company is spending $70 million in Windsor to convert its engine, foundry and chassis plants for large-scale production of engines, standard transmissions and axles for compacts. Another $65 million is being spent to build an assembly plant at Talbotville that may tie in with these Windsor changes.
> And in Oakville the company has already moved to integrate truck assembly.

That is the $25 million to which I have already referred.

The article goes on to deal with the expansions by Chrysler and by some of the parts industries. For instance, among those is a reference to the Budd Automotive Company of Canada—

> ... which is building a $20 million car chassis frame plant at Kitchener for a production start in early 1967. Likewise Dana Corporations Hayes Steel Products Limited is spending $3 million also to manufacture car chassis frames.

I realize that after talking in terms of many millions, $3 million is stepping down a little.

May I refer to the issue of the Financial Post of April 2, 1966. Again, there is a whole page devoted to an article under the heading which reads, "Most auto-parts makers are rubbing hands in glee at huge market prospects." Another heading on the same page reads, "Shock-absorber company will quadruple business in 1967, zinc diecasters expect to boost exports to U.S. and opportunities beckon for most."

Now you have an enumeration which possibly refers to the 15 or 20 companies in different parts of Canada and indicating the state of business resulting from the impact of the trade agreement. In some few instances I must say that the companies are named and the facts are stated in connection with some operations that have lost business and money as a result of this trade agreement; there is reference also to some who have lost business but have been resourceful enough to attract other business.

I mention these just to indicate that there is a side to this development, a practical and realistic side, of the benefits which are accruing, rather than remaining solely in the area of academic discussion as to whether the Government should have proceeded in this fashion in the approval of the agreement and whether there is authority under section 10 of the Customs Tariff to do what was done. These are factors we may well look at. When you come to appraise the value, if there is value in this trade agreement, you have to look at the practical operation during the period of time it has been in operation.

For instance, Senator Grosart seems to be concerned, and he referred copiously to a report of the Finance Committee of the Senate of the United States, and in particular to statements in the report indicating that this agreement when it came into operation would be of increasing benefit to the United States.

May I present this very practical situation. Do you think it would be possible for Canada to negotiate a trade agreement in the automotive industry with the United States where such trade agreement would have practically no beneficial effect to the United States? The concept of international trade nowadays is that there must be a policy of give and take, and in this case they were able to show that there would be beneficial effects on both sides in the working out of the agreement. Therefore, when my friend gives these references, I suggest that he does so for an obvious purpose, because after reading each reference from the proceedings of the Senate Finance Committee of the United States, he says, for instance, quoting, "This agreement will lead to increasing sales for the United States parts manufacturers." Now, when he reads further "That without the agreement we"—meaning the United States—"stood to lose a large part of our surplus", and then when he concludes with the words "and this is the agreement we are asked to approve," the obvious conclusion one draws from that context is that this was not a good kind of agreement for Canada to enter into with the United States because it will produce beneficial results to the United States.

However, if any person has any idea that the negotiation of a treaty of this kind with a country like the United States could be accomplished on a basis that was not beneficial to the United States, then I say that such a person is indulging in wishful thinking—indeed, if I might develop an expression, I think he is wandering with Alice in Wonderland because it is not a realistic view.

Honourable senators, while I am on this particular point, I wish to deal with one other reference which my friend made. He referred to the amendment which he said the United States Senate made to the law passed by the United States approving this trade agreement. He took some quotations from the report, indicating this amendment to section 205 of the United States bill. The part of it that he stressed particularly was the part which provided that in August of 1968, if it were found that undertakings by subsidiaries of American parents were being projected and applied to operations after that date, the President was directed to suspend the operation of the agreement. My friend will recall having referred to that, as it appears in Hansard.

If my friend had referred to the statute instead of to the Senate Finance Committee report—sometimes Senate Finance Committee reports do not become adopted in their entirety—and to the language in section 205, he might not have been able to make a point out of this report as he does when he says that this power really renders ineffective the provisions of the treaty and yet we are asked to approve of this agreement.

What the law says on that point is found in section 205, and may I take a moment to read it to you. Section 205 is in three parts. Section (a) says:

> No later than August 31, 1968, the President shall submit to the Senate and the House of Representatives a special report on the comprehensive review called for by Article IV(c) of the Agreement. In such report he shall advise the Congress of the progress made toward the achievement of the objectives of Article I of the Agreement.

This is one point where what the Senate Finance Committee report says and what is in the law are different.

> (b) Whenever the President finds that any manufacturer has entered into any undertaking, by reason of governmental action, to increase the Canadian value added of automobiles, buses, specified commercial vehicles, or original equipment parts produced by such manufacturer in Canada after August 31, 1968—

As my friend read it, the next words were, "He shall suspend"; but the law as it stands says:

> —he shall report such finding to the Senate and the House of Representatives. The President shall also report whether such undertaking is additional to undertakings agreed to in letters of undertaking submitted by such manufacturer before the date of the enactment of this Act.

Now we come to subparagraph (c):

> The reports provided for in subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall include recommendations for such further steps, including legislative action, if any, as may be necessary—

I direct your attention to the words, "as may be necessary".

> —for the achievement of the purposes of the Agreement and this Act.

In other words, there is no arbitrary provision by law given to the President of the United States to suspend operations if he finds this situation, which is set out, existing after August 31, 1968. He is to report, and just to report, in terms and make recommendations in order that the purposes of the agreement and the act may be carried out.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Would my honourable friend tell us what the purposes of the agreement and the act are, as set out in the American legislation?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: My friend will find the purposes of the agreement set out in the agreement. I am sure my friend has already read them.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: And the purposes of the act are to implement the agreement and provide for the tariff modifications that are required to that end.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I thought there might be a preamble. I do not know.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No. There is the section which deals with purposes—if my friend will refer to it—which says:

> The purposes of this Act are (1) to provide for the implementation of the Agreement Concerning Automotive Products Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Canada signed on January 16, 1965 (hereinafter referred to as the "Agreement"), in order to strengthen the economic relations and expand trade in automotive products between the United States and Canada; and (2) to authorize the implementation of such other international agreements providing for the mutual reduction or elimination of duties applicable to automotive products as the Government of the United States may hereafter enter into.

The second part does not concern us, because that is authority given in the United States act, so that the United States can carry on negotiations similar to these and make similar arrangements with other countries.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Would my honourable friend permit a question at this point? If he has it at hand, would he care to quote the statement by the committee that he has referred to, that it has been informed that the executive would not approve the extension of the letter of agreement.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I have the full Senate Committee report, as I would think my friend has, because when I was reading it, from the same source that he had read it before me, I saw pencil marks indicating rather copious extractions had been made. There is the statement made in the report of the Finance Committee of the Senate. I know nothing about the source of the statement that such and such information had been reported, and therefore I cannot comment on it, but I would say that the basic principle is that this is a mutually beneficial agreement, that it was intended to be that sort of thing and there could not have been an agreement if it were not mutually beneficial.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Surely the honourable senator has no intention of misinterpreting my remarks. He has laid considerable stress on the references I made of the benefit to the United States. I am sure he would agree that at no time did I deprecate that in any way; and I am sure that he is aware that it is not my view, never has been and I do not think ever will be, that a mutual agreement should not be an agreement of benefit to both sides.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I thank my friend for the interjection—I thought he was going to ask a question but he may have been rising on a point of privilege. I can only answer by referring to the speech which he made. When he reads certain excerpts which deal with representations or statements in the Senate Finance Committee of the United States, and then he adds in conclusion, "and this is the kind of agreement that we are asked to approve," my suggestion is that there is a reasonable inference to be made that he was critical of Canada entering into that kind of an agreement which provided those benefits for the United States.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Nonsense.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: My friend's remark of nonsense, I take it, is in the context. I thank him for the gratuitous remark. I have been much more polite in listening to him and I will continue to be so, in the hope that he may learn to be a little more polite.

Honourable senators, next I want to come to the question of constitutionality. I thought Senator Hugessen had completely demolished that, and I did not intend to spend much time on it. However, it was suggested by Senator Grosart that section 10 of the Customs Tariff Act did not permit the use which was made of it in this case. He made that suggestion because it spoke of compensation. This is the language of section 10:

> The Governor in Council may by order in council make such concessions of duties on goods imported into Canada from any other country or countries as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for concessions on Canadian products granted by such country or countries.

His proposition was that the use of the word "compensation" suggested that you must have both things done at the same time. That was my understanding of what he meant by the application of this section.

If my friend is going to give us a legal interpretation of section 10, I suggest that he should learn a little more about the principles of interpretation. By compensation in this case, it means the agreement provided for certain concessions which Canada was making to the United States. It provided for certain concessions that the United States was making to Canada, and these were mutual. There you have the mutuality of concession or, in the language of the marginal note, reciprocal concessions.

Please note that even though Canada's duty-free entry of American cars and parts to Canadian motorcar manufacturers commenced in January 1965, and the United States Government did not approve of this agreement and the legislation there did not become effective until October 1965, there is a provision in the United States law under which the duties imposed by the United States on Canadian cars and parts going into the United States in that period of time may be refunded. Thus there is an element of retroactivity in the law, and any person who can qualify and who applied within 90 days of the passage of this act in October 1965 would be entitled to get a refund. I say there is a mutuality and section 10 has full application. Then it was suggested that this was an unchecked, arrogant attitude on the part of the executive to proceed by order in council under this section instead of coming to Parliament. Let me deal for a moment with the origin of this section.

This section was introduced into the law of Canada in 1931 by a great Prime Minister of Canada, an outstanding lawyer and one who had great respect for the law and the rights of people. I refer to the late Mr. Bennett. At this time there is a difference of one word between what was introduced and what is now in the law. In 1935 the same Mr. Bennett changed the word "reductions", which was used in the 1931 section, to "concessions", and so from 1935 on section 10 refers to "concessions" instead of reciprocal "reductions."

How has that change been used? In 1938 Canada and the United States entered into a trade agreement approved by order in council under provisions of the then section 11 of the Customs Tariff. A year later a bill was brought into Parliament approving the agreement. In 1954 Canada, under this order in council, amended trade agreements with Portugal and Spain. In subsequent years, including the years in which a Conservative Government was in office, this order in council was used on all occasions to implement the arrangements that were reached at the GATT conferences, and at no time in that period was there any suggestion that this was an unlawful or unwarranted use of this power which has been in the Customs Tariff for that length of time. As I say, there is full authority in that section of the Customs Tariff to permit by order in council the kind of trade agreement that was entered into with the United States.

Now I would like to deal with one or two other points. First, my friend Senator Grosart had recommended for reading a textbook by Castel on international law. You will find included in that textbook a statement of Canada's present constitutional requirements and practices in the conclusion of treaties, which quotes a memorandum of July 21, 1952 submitted by Canada on laws and practices concerning the conclusions of treaties and sent to the United Nations legislative series. That memorandum supports completely the explanations which Senator Hugessen gave.

Coming to the matter of imbalance, some questions were raised in the course of the debate—I think it was in the course of Senator Grosart's speech—about imbalance in payments, and it was said that this trade agreement was not going to correct the situation, that the imbalance of payments in the last year was $100 million more than it had been the previous year, or something of that kind.

I am not one who believes, nor would I argue, that this trade agreement is a panacea for all the economic ills we may suffer, some of them being in relation to the United States and the imbalance of payments with it, but I do assert it is too early to say that this treaty will not relieve or reduce to some extent the imbalance as it relates directly to the auto trade as between Canada and the United States. There have been so many other advantages that Canada has received as a result of this trade agreement that we can live with the imbalance if this trade agreement will lead to arresting that imbalance or reducing it even slightly.

I understand projections have been made on the basis of this trade between Canada and the United States in the sixties, that projection has been made to 1968 or to 1970, and the figures show that the imbalance might have achieved the order of $1.5 billion unless something was done. The first thing this will achieve will be to produce a larger export market for Canadian manufacturers both of cars and of parts, and this in turn will provide an increase in purchasing in Canada as a result of the expenditures necessary to serve that larger market; also it will permit Canada to develop better manufacturing processes, more automation, and so get its production down to a lower cost basis. It also could widen its trade in this area with other countries, because Canada is free under this trade agreement to extend to other countries the same benefits extended by this trade agreement to the United States.

I recognize that the trade agreement will not produce a miraculous result immediately or in the foreseeable future of wiping out the imbalance in payments, but it will provide great additional benefits to the Canadian economy, to the workers and suppliers of materials and people engaged in all phases of the manufacturing operation. This applies particularly when you translate all this into profits and revenues and taxes which the Government will collect, and the increases in purchasing power for the people engaged in the industry. You will realize that the extent of the benefit to Canada by virtue of this trade agreement is very substantial even though on the other side of the ledger we still have to wrestle with a substantial part of this imbalance of payments as between Canada and the United States in relation to the auto industry alone. There are other areas where we can make the effort, and we will do so to an increasing degree, to reverse the situation as between exports and imports. This would certainly apply in other areas as between Canada and other countries in the world.

While I may be speaking in terms or descriptions that sound very laudatory about the benefit of this agreement, I admit that it is not without what you might describe as being a defect—the defect being that it does not correct immediately and completely or substantially the imbalance of payments with the United States. Nevertheless, it is still a sound, solid, good agreement, the kind of agreement that will redound to the benefit and the economic advantage of Canada. The fact that it also increases benefits to the United States is an added factor, and when we next deal with the United States on some other problem maybe we will, to use tennis language, have an "add-in," because in the negotiations on this transaction we were not trying to direct trade on a one-way street.

Hon. David Walker: May I interrupt my honourable friend to ask him a question before he leaves this point. He concedes that this trade agreement had worked out at $100 million increase in the imbalance. Is it not a fact that my friend's projection, as he has given it now and as to its being a remedy, is simply a pious hope? He has given us no reasons for this. If he has reasons can he give them to us?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not very often have people use the word "pious" in connection with things I say.

Hon. Mr. Walker: It does not describe you.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Some people, even today, have used words entirely different from "pious." No, I am not putting it as a hope, certainly not as a "pious" hope, nor as a prayer. I know my friend is fair, and let me tell him this.

When this trade agreement started to operate in January 1965 we were committed to the course of automobile trade so far as the 1965 models were concerned. They had come out in August, September and October of the previous year. It would be pretty hard to develop very much in the way of compensating factors during that period. And remember too that before the next year's models come out, the preparation, planning and ordering all start a year ahead, and in relation to the 1966 models, which came out in August, September and October 1965, much of that ordering had been done in January and February 1965.

Then, to take the other factor, until October 1965 the reciprocal duty provisions did not operate as far as the United States was concerned. The American cars and parts came into Canada duty free because Canada put into force its side of the agreement right away. I think it was the correct tactical move, one that was highly persuasive and in large part it contributed to the result. However, you had all these factors militating against the full use of the agreement.

The figures you want to look at are for 1966, to the extent we have them, and 1967 and 1968. If it is a "pious" hope, or even a hope, to look ahead and project, I suppose the language that is used in every business enterprise and by every government scientist and mathematician in projecting, on the basis of known factors, what are likely to be the results in the next year or the following year, or in giving a four or five-year ahead picture of trade developments, could be described as such. But I must tell my friend that I have been identified with companies that, if they miss out by as much as $100,000 in some of their projections in a given year, get very upset and go back to find out where they went wrong and why they did not hit closer to the projections.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I would not insult my friend by accusing him of having pious hopes at all, but I wonder if he would help us by placing on record this projection obviously prepared by Government, so we would have an opportunity of assessing what the future of the agreement is, because factually to date the result is, as Senator Walker and Senator Grosart have said, the imbalance of payments.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I can refer my friend to the statement that the Minister of Industry made in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: We are not allowed to read such statements here.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The moment I said the Minister of Industry made a statement in the House of Commons, I anticipated my friend would refuse to read it.

Hon. Mr. Walker: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Not Senator Walker, because I think Senator Walker believes, as an experienced counsel, that he wants to know what is against him as well as what is going for him.

Hon. Mr. Walker: When I am against you, I do.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: So if my honourable friend has a friend who will read the statement which the Minister of Industry made, and then by that indirect route it is relayed to him, I think he will get in part an answer to his question and an explanation of the answer which I was giving.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps he would get it directly in committee.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, that is right.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is this agreement not going to committee?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, I would expect so. My friend Senator Willis was very—I was going to say "critical", but that is not truly descriptive of him because he is so nice about it, it does not hurt when he says it—about why we did not take the sales tax off jigs and dies and machinery brought in from the United States, and why we did not do something about duty, because these were making it difficult, if not impossible, to manufacture jigs and dies for use in the automotive trade in Canada.

My friend was in the chamber last evening, and he knows that the Customs Tariff does permit machinery to be imported into Canada with a 99 per cent drawback as of March 30 where these machines are used to produce jigs and dies for use in the automotive trade. So my friend has achieved the very fortunate position of having something done for him that he wants even before he asks.

On the 11 per cent sales tax, if we deal with the Excise Tax bill today in relation to jigs and dies, etcetera, which are used in the manufacture of many things, including automobiles and automobile parts, he will see that the sales tax has been removed as of March 30 because that item is now included in the schedule of exemptions.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): We had better get him into the Government.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: So my friend certainly reads the future, and/or we read what he is going to complain about and what he would like to have changed. We are attuned to such an extent that maybe he should pay more attention to what we tell him, and he will not have to worry about these things—we have done them, and so he can stop worrying.

That is all I have to say at this time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, not for the purpose of making it necessary for the honourable Senator McCutcheon to get any of this information second hand from the minister or otherwise, but because I gave an undertaking earlier in the course of this debate, I now move that the subject matter of this resolution be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for consideration and report.

Motion agreed to and subject matter of resolution referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY BILL

CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINE NEAR STALL LAKE, MANITOBA AND OF BRANCH LINE NEAR WATROUS, SASKATCHEWAN —SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, it would be convenient to the honourable Senator Hnatyshyn, who wishes to speak to item No. 6 on the Order Paper, if it were called now. He has been asked to undertake some official functions. Senator McDonald will first explain the bill. If this order could be called now, with unanimous consent, it would be generally appreciated.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-210, respecting the construction by Canadian National Railway Company of a line of railway in the Province of Manitoba from the vicinity of Stall Lake on the Chisel Lake Subdivision of Canadian National Railways in a northeasterly direction for a distance of approximately 12 miles to a point in the vicinity of Osborne Lake in The Pas Mining District of that Province, and of a line of railway in the Province of Saskatchewan from the vicinity of Watrous on the Watrous Subdivision of the said Railways in a northeasterly direction for a distance of approximately 18 miles to a point in the vicinity of Guernsey in the Regina Mining District of that Province.

He said: Honourable senators, by this bill authority is being sought to enable the Canadian National Railways to construct two new branch lines, one to be located in northern Manitoba and one in the central part of southern Saskatchewan. The estimated cost of these branch lines is $1,600,000 and $1,800,000 respectively. In accordance with the usual practice, the bill authorizes the railways to spend such amount for such purposes, and provides for an additional allowance, if required, of 15 per cent to cover contingencies. The usual provision respecting necessary borrowings is also included in the bill.

The first mentioned branch line—that is to say, the one to be built in Manitoba—is required for the exploitation of substantial copper-zinc deposits on the Osborne Lake property of Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company Limited near the town of Snow Lake. It will be an extension of the branch line which already serves the property of that company at Chisel Lake and at Stall Lake which are in the same vicinity. The approximate length of this new line will be 12 miles, and it is estimated that its average cost of construction will be $133,333 per mile.

Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company Limited has proved satisfactory reserves of ore containing base and precious metals at the Osborne Lake site, and is preparing the property for production at the minimum annual rate of about 270,000 tons of crude ore, which it proposes to ship by rail to its existing metallurgical plant at Flin Flon. This will provide a revenue of $737,000 per year to the Canadian National Railway.

It is estimated that this project will provide employment for about 100 men, and the Canadian National Railway reports that it has satisfied itself that the movement of this traffic, upon the terms that have been negotiated with the industry, will be a profitable operation from its point of view.

The construction of the second branch line planned for the central part of southern Saskatchewan has been requested by Alwinsal Potash of Canada Limited. Alwinsal is a company sponsored by French and German interests, and it is located near the town of Guernsey in south-central Saskatchewan.

This proposed railroad will run in a northeasterly direction for a distance of about 18 miles, from a point on the Watrous subdivision of the Canadian National Railway. The estimated cost of construction is $100,000 per mile. It is hoped to have this line of railway completed by 1968, as Alwinsal is expected to be in production some time during that year. Alwinsal is now sinking a shaft, some 18 feet in diameter, to a depth of 3,290 feet at this site.

Honourable senators may not be too familiar with the problems that face potash mining companies in Saskatchewan, and perhaps I should at this time mention some of the difficulties and costs involved in sinking a shaft for the mining of potash. Throughout the whole area in which potash is found in western Canada there are what is known as the Blairmore Sands located at 1,500 feet from the surface of the earth and extending to a depth of 1,800 feet. In this layer of 300 feet water pressures as great as 4,500 pounds per square inch are encountered, and it is very difficult to seal off the water and prevent seepage into the mine shaft.

Most mine shafts built to date have used cement as a lining from the surface of the ground to the top of the Blairmore Sands, and again from the bottom of the Blairmore Sands to the bottom of the shaft, but in the layer of about 300 feet through the Blairmore Sands a system known as tubbing is used.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): What is that word?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Tubbing. It is a German process. Through the layer of the Blairmore Sands there is a cast-steel ring that is built in sections and bolted together. A grouting of cement is then forced in between this cast-steel section and the shaft itself. Of course many problems are encountered before the tubbing is put in place. Before the sinking of the shaft through the Blairmore Sand can be commenced, sink holes have to be made through it and then refrigeration installed to freeze off the entire Blairmore area so that the mine shaft may be driven through it.

Alwinsal is using a different system for the lining of their shaft. At this point I might mention that I had the privilege of turning the switch that started the drills working at this location before the freezing was commenced underground. Rather than using the method I have just described, Alwinsal is using a double steel ring from the surface of the ground to the bottom of the mine shaft, a length of some 3,290 feet. At the top of the shaft the steel section will be 20 millimeters and at the bottom 50 millimeters in thickness. The space between the two steel casings is about a foot, which will be filled by a grouting of cement.

I repeat, this is the first time this type of mine shaft has been built in Canada. I understand it has been used successfully in parts of Europe, especially in Germany, and this company is bringing the entire steel lining from Germany and installing it in its mine in Saskatchewan.

The company has committed itself to the Canadian National Railway for the movement of at least half its annual production, which means that approximately one million tons of potash per year will be moved by that railway. The mine will be served by both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, but the revenue from the movement of one-half of the annual production of this mine, which will amount to about $4.5 million per year will go to the Canadian National Railways. This will give honourable senators an indication of the tonnage that will be moved from this potash mine by Canadian National Railways, and, as I mentioned a moment ago, this is only half of the production, the other half being moved by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

The chief markets for the potash that will be produced by Alwinsal are in the United States and the Pacific countries, which necessitate the movement of this mineral from Saskatchewan to west coast ports from where it will be shipped to its ultimate destination. The plant will employ between 700 and 1,000 men during the period of construction and once it is in production it will employ about 500 men.

If the pattern of potash development in Saskatchewan is followed, then I anticipate it will be only a short time before Alwinsal will sink another shaft. International Minerals and Chemical Corporation, which was the first potash mining company in production in Saskatchewan, has now a second shaft in production and is contemplating the sinking of a third. A second company located in the Saskatoon area has been a two-shaft operation from its beginning. A third company in the Saskatoon area which started as a one shaft operation is now in the process of sinking a second shaft. I would expect that Alwinsal will be seeking permission soon to sink a second shaft and this will mean even more freight for both Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company from this mine site.

If honourable senators see fit to give this bill second reading, I intend to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. John Hnatyshyn: Honourable senators, I disagree with the honourable senator who presented this bill so ably in one respect only. I do not think the bill should be referred to the committee at all. It is possible that Parliament will adjourn this week, and this bill is very important. Nobody on this side of the house is against it. I would prefer to have this bill read the third time today.

If this line of railway in Saskatchewan from the potash mine is not built before 1968, then it will not be available to the company when the mine starts producing. I am informed that for the railway to be completed by early 1968 it is necessary to start construction in July of this year.

Potash, as the honourable sponsor of this bill has stated, is a very big industry in Saskatchewan. I would point out to honourable senators that the experts estimate that in the next six or seven years there will be more tonnage of potash hauled by the railways than there is of grain today. On the average, Canada produces 500 million bushels of wheat per year, of which over 300 million bushels are produced in Saskatchewan. At one time wheat was the big thing in Saskatchewan, because it accounted for almost 85 per cent of the total economy. Today we have a high production of potash, natural gas and oil. Although we have not received the same publicity as has Alberta and the Leduc field, Saskatchewan does produce about half as much oil as Alberta. The result is that we have a diversity in our income.

Agriculture is now less than 50 per cent of our income in Saskatchewan in spite of the fact that we grow over 300 million bushels of wheat.

The building of the railway line from Watrous for a distance of 18 miles to the potash mine is necessary, even though there happens to be a C.P.R. line as well. It will not be a duplication, because we shall need both railways to haul potash. We have enough difficulty as it is in moving our wheat, because the market is developing. Within six or seven years the railways will have to operate to their fullest capacity, and both lines will be needed. That is why Canadian National Railways is building this spur of some 18 miles. The C.P.R. built similarly at Esterhazy where potash is being mined.

The sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. McDonald) outlined some of the difficulties that have been experienced in sinking the shaft. Actually, I would like to point out that the first mine in production was not the one at Esterhazy, but one 16 miles east of Saskatoon. However, as soon as they commenced production leakage occurred and they had to suspend production for over two years and rebuild the whole thing. They are now in operation. But they learned a lesson. They brought in experts from Germany, which at one time had large fields of potash, and the mine at Esterhazy as well as the mine we are now discussing have benefited by that knowledge.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to speak for long for fear there will be delay in the passage of this bill.

So far as the 12 miles of railway in Manitoba is concerned, it is going to be a paying proposition. The more we open up some of that country for mining purposes the better it will be not only for the provinces where the mines are located, but for Canada as a whole.

I give my wholehearted support to this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I just want to say a word in connection with any suggestion that this bill be read the third time without reference to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, of which I have the honour to be chairman.

This would be the first time within my recollection that any bill providing for the construction of a branch line was not referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and I would be a little sorry if it were not referred in the present instance.

However, let me say further that in quite a number of cases this committee has realized perfectly well that it was necessary to get a bill passed as quickly as possible in order to permit the railway to commence its construction operations, and we have always attempted to comply with any reasonable requirements in that respect. I had rather anticipated that was the case in connection with this bill, and my honourable friend Senator Hnatyshyn verified that in his remarks.

I was proposing to hold a meeting of the Committee on Transport and Communications tomorrow evening, if this bill receives second reading this afternoon, and we would have the benefit of the information. I think the Senate and the committee are entitled to reasonable information on all matters of important public expenditures such as this.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Would the committee meet at the end of tomorrow's sitting?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: It would meet either at the end of tomorrow's sitting or tomorrow evening. I can assure my honourable friend there will be no delay. On the other hand, we would have a record that the Senate had, as in the past, reviewed the matter carefully.

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: My only fear was that this bill might not pass in the event that we recess. However, since Senator Hugessen has already arranged for a meeting of the Committee on Transport and Communications tomorrow there is no danger of that happening. I agree with him fully that the members of this chamber are entitled to receive all the information that is available. If his committee is meeting tomorrow, I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. McDonald moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

PUBLIC UTILITIES INCOME TAX TRANSFER ACT

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-211, to authorize the Minister of Finance to transfer to the provinces a proportion of the income tax payable by certain utility companies.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, it might be desirable for us to sit this evening, depending upon the progress that is made this afternoon. With that in mind I suggest that this bill be read the second time later this day and, again only for the purpose of having the explanation upon the record, that we sit this evening if that is agreeable.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: No objection.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-201, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden for the second reading of Bill C-200, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: As honourable senators are aware, this particular bill, if passed, will implement one of three budget proposals.

Despite what the sponsor of this bill has said, I do not think that it is of a class or kind calculated to excite the daring, to test the strong and to give new promise to the timid.

It is interesting to observe that one of the highlights of a parliamentary year is the presentation of the budget by the Minister of Finance. This document is surrounded by a great deal of secrecy, intrigue and speculation. I expect that is partly because almost everyone has an opinion as to how he would run the country economically—and governments do not want their critics to be too sharp by giving them too much time to study.

In any case, it seems that when bills like this are introduced, all interest is lost. These bills seem to be of no interest to anyone, yet this bill and the others like it is nothing less than the legislation required to implement what the Government, through the Finance Minister, wants. The budget proposals would not be implemented if it were not for these bills, yet they seem to generate no interest at all. I suppose it is one of the anomalies of our form of government.

In his budget speech on the night of March 29, the Finance Minister said:

> I think the House will appreciate the desirability of using whatever tariff reductions we contemplate to help us obtain better access to foreign markets for our own exports.

This is a laudable objective. However, this particular bill does not go very far to accomplish this or, to put it better, to change much. Earlier in his speech, the Finance Minister said:

> Tonight I shall be proposing very few changes in the Customs Tariff.

That is a fact. Then, during second reading of the bill, he said:

> ...they (the budget resolutions relating to the Customs Tariff) are not of far-reaching importance.

I would like to ask the honourable sponsor of the bill—I note he is not in the chamber at the moment—why they are not more extensive. I am wondering whether or not they have anything to do with the Kennedy Round of Tariff negotiations? Is the Government not doing much with regard to lowering tariffs until it finds out where these international negotiations are heading? Or is it that the Government does not have a policy in this regard? Surely there should be more changes in the Customs Tariff. It has been, I believe, a year since we dealt with this bill.

It has been estimated that the Government receives 9 per cent of its revenue from tariffs. I do not suppose the Government is afraid to drop the tariff on more items because it realizes that there will be a corresponding drop in revenue. The way the Government is throwing money about these days, it would not surprise me.

As a member in the other place remarked during the debate on the resolution stage of this bill, "What does this actually mean in terms of the economy?"

This bill is a relatively short one and the items are quite inconsequential. I will therefore limit my remarks to what I have said, and hope that the sponsor of the bill will provide us with the answers to some of the questions that I have posed to him.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, in the absence of the sponsor of the bill—who has been called out of the chamber for a short while in connection with the work of the Senate—may I deal with the point raised by honourable Senator Choquette.

I think it was made clear by the Minister of Finance in the other place, or others who discussed the bill, that one of the reasons why the proposals for tariff changes are relatively modest in number this year arises very directly out of the fact that the GATT negotiations, the so-called Kennedy Round, are still in the process of being finalized. This is a very slow process and there has to be a considerable bargaining about the items. It would be completely undesirable if the Government were gratuitously to offer extensive reductions in tariff items when such an offer, if skillfully used in the GATT negotiations, might purchase compensatory reductions in tariffs of other countries, either on a bilateral or on a multilateral basis.

It may not be inappropriate to say that tariff changes have been held more or less in abeyance at this time. No matter what party is in office, given the circumstances of the Kennedy Round, this attitude seems to be on the side of wisdom.

I was interested to hear the honourable senator advocate more reductions. To me it seems that the more reductions and the fewer the obstacles to trade, by way of tariffs quotas or special discriminatory procedures, the better. These things should be eliminated as early and on as wide a plane as possible.

It seems to me—and here I paraphrase what Senator McCutcheon said—that such changes must also keep the interests of the country very much in mind. I am thinking especially of some very wise words he added as a cautionary measure to the report of the Canada-United States committee which has been at work on this problem of easing trade relations between the two countries.

My own attitude and that of most people on this side and perhaps generally in the chamber is that the freer the trade the better off everyone is. Perhaps one cannot be a free trader in the positive sense, but I think one should try to be a freer trader in the comparative sense, or perhaps the freest possible kind of trader in the superlative sense.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) for the second reading of Bill C-197, to amend the Canada Student Loans Act.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, there was an extensive debate in this house on the Canada Student Loans Bill in July 1964 prior to its enactment. The pros and cons of this measure were then discussed in considerable detail. Bill C-197 is an amendment to the original act to provide for supplementary provincial allocations by increasing the basic loan and making a change in connection with the administration of the act. I would like to congratulate Senator Cameron on his lucid explanation of the new provisions introduced by the Minister of Finance.

The members on this side of the house voted in favour of the Canada Student Loans Act and will give support to this bill before us, but not without forward-looking criticism. It is an expedient measure as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough to meet the growing needs of students in securing a modern education.

There is no doubt that these loans have proved to be of assistance to the over 92,000 students who were able to secure them, and have made it possible for them to continue university and higher education. This measure will make it possible for many more to obtain higher education in order to fit them into the modern technological and increasingly automated society. Let us remember that their education will benefit not only the individual concerned but also the whole country. Therefore, governments should provide our youth with the best opportunities to secure the highest education that this country can offer. Lack of financial means should not deny the capable young man and woman of pursuing his or her education.

Student loans on an interest-free basis during the years of study only partially provide our needy young people with the opportunity to continue higher education. There are several arguments against student loans in general. One is that many students coming from poorer homes and who are in the greatest need of this assistance are often reluctant to incur debts to the extent of thousands of dollars. A second is that after the debt has been contracted the graduated student finds himself bearing a heavy economic burden at the time that he commences his career. A third is that students who are saddled with large loans are often unwilling to continue post-graduate studies. These arguments were presented by a number of students with whom I have personally discussed these problems.

In their campaign for free university tuition, the Canadian Union of Students have come out with a fourth argument against student loans—that women are reluctant to take student loans because indebtedness is a deterrent to marriage—a "negative dowry."

The editorial comment of the Globe and Mail of February 22, 1966 is interesting and amusing. I quote:

> No one will argue that two debtors can live as cheaply as one, but it is impossible to believe that a young man would be guided more by purse strings in his choice of a wife. And if he was, what girl would want him anyway?

This observation may have been more applicable during the last generation, but my observations of the present generation show that many prospective husbands and wives are more of the calculating sort than I was when I married.

Of great concern to Canada is the brain-drain to the United States of highly-trained engineers, scientists, university teachers, physicians and surgeons who have been educated in Canada at a high cost to our country. Let us remember that it takes about $50,000 of public money to produce a Ph.D., which is a complete loss if such a person leaves Canada permanently.

I believe that the adoption of the Northwest Territories scheme in the Canadian student loan plan would be most beneficial to Canada in preserving our brain-power and highly trained experts. The loan of $1,500 per year for a student in the Northwest Territories wishing to attend university becomes an outright grant if the student after graduating returns to the territories and lives there for at least four years. A similar plan has existed for many years in the armed forces.

I was hoping that the Government, after two years' experience, would introduce a clause in the legislation making the total loan of approximately $5,000 an outright grant, equivalent to a scholarship, if the student after graduation remained in Canada for a period of five years. This certainly would help to reduce the brain-drain. A graduate would appreciate such a grant coming at a critical time in his life, and would always be conscious that Canada is really desirous of his service and contribution to the welfare of the Canadian nation. The country's financial investment in a graduate's education can only bring manifold benefits to all concerned.

The former Conservative Government had substantially contributed to the needs of higher education. Per capita grants to the universities were doubled; low interest loans were provided for the construction of student residences; tuition fees were made income tax deductible for students; and other forms of financial assistance were given to education.

The present Liberal Government should improve upon the student loans legislation, bearing in mind that in the last two elections the Liberal party promised 10,000 scholarships per year. The implementation of this promise would do much more for deserving students than loans. To keep pace in this rapidly advancing technological and scientific world, Canada will have to invest a greater proportion of the federal budget in education, the greatest asset to the individual and the country.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I said yesterday that I wanted to adjourn the debate. I have had the satisfaction of listening to two most interesting speeches delivered by two of our colleagues who are known as eminent educators. In a way, I agree with them that the students should get the best possible education, and that education should be available to the largest number of Canadian boys and girls. But for me that is not the main point.

As you know, honourable colleagues, I attend the committees as punctually as I can and I happen at times to be there at the psychological moment. Two years ago, on July 28, 1964 I was at the Banking and Commerce Committee, where Mr. Benson, who is the Minister of National Revenue, and Mr. Pennell, who was then Parliamentary Secretary and is now Solicitor General, were answering questions on Bill C-110, an Act to facilitate the making of loans to students, and if you have no objection I shall read to you the questionnaire to the two gentlemen.

> SENATOR POULIOT: Did you say that no provincial government asked for this legislation?
> HON. MR. BENSON: The provincial governments did not formally ask for this particular legislation. Many were very interested in it; and in working out the details of this particular bill they did co-operate fully, and were very happy about the ideas contained in this legislation.
>
> SENATOR POULIOT: After the bill was out?
> HON. MR. BENSON: No, before the bill was out we met with the provinces and considered the principles involved in this bill.

SENATOR POULIOT: My question is: did the provinces ask for it?

HON. MR. BENSON: No, they didn't. In my opinion, they did not ask for the bill but they attended a conference concerning the bill. They were very interested in the idea. The conference was one concerning the ideas incorporated in the bill, and during the conference most of them were very pleased that the federal Government was taking—

SENATOR POULIOT: The first idea was that the bill was not from the provincial governments?

HON. MR. BENSON: No—from the federal, and it was one of the undertakings of this particular Government at the last election.

SENATOR POULIOT: And it was not from the universities either?

HON. MR. BENSON: No.

And, mark you, honourable colleagues, it was not asked by the provinces, nor by the universities. I would not know who had that great idea.

SENATOR POULIOT: Now, Mr. Benson, I have another question. I have seen in the press that the provincial governments have refused to render an account of the federal subsidies in matters of education. Are you familiar with that?

HON. MR. BENSON: No, I am not.

SENATOR POULIOT: Because I have seen in the press that the provinces have met together and have refused to render an account of the way the federal grants for education were spent.

HON. MR. BENSON: I am not familiar with this, senator.

While I am speaking I would like to correct something I mentioned earlier. I may have used the word "note". In this particular instance they are not notes that are given to the bank but, rather, there is an agreement between the student and the bank.

SENATOR POULIOT: I think it occurred before you were sworn in as a cabinet minister.

SENATOR CROLL: I wonder why the infant's legality was not based on necessity—

SENATOR POULIOT: Mr. Pennell, reverting to what you have said about the exclusive legislative powers, in your view are there any exclusive jurisdictions according to the B.N.A. Act?

MR. PENNELL: Are there any...?

SENATOR POULIOT: Are there any exclusive jurisdictions in virtue of the B.N.A. Act?

MR. PENNELL: With great respect, senator, I am not prepared to come here and argue all the fields of the B.N.A. Act.

SENATOR POULIOT: No, but if you read the B.N.A. Act and if you read the part that concerns education, is it not mentioned there the powers of exclusive jurisdiction?

MR. PENNELL: All I can say is that those in the department were greatly concerned they would not intrude into the field of education. They looked at this bill with care and precision, and in their humble and honest opinion it did not intrude into the field of education as such—this bill, C-110.

SENATOR POULIOT: My question is, what is the use of celebrating the centennial of Confederation if you pay no attention to the B.N.A. Act?

THE CHAIRMAN: That is a very large question, and we cannot consider it within the scope of this bill.

SENATOR POULIOT: I am through.

THE CHAIRMAN: Section 2, shall it carry?

HON. SENATORS: Carried.

THE CHAIRMAN: Shall section 3 carry?

HON. SENATORS: Carried.

THE CHAIRMAN: Shall section 4 carry?

HON. SENATORS: Carried.

THE CHAIRMAN: Shall section 5 carry?

HON. SENATORS: Carried.

THE CHAIRMAN: Shall section 6 carry?

HON. SENATORS: Carried.

THE CHAIRMAN: Shall section 7 carry?

HON. SENATORS: Carried.

THE CHAIRMAN: Shall section 8 carry?

And there was a discussion about it.

No one has any objection to students getting all the facilities of education, but do you not think, honourable colleagues, that it must come from the proper source, and as the B.N.A. Act is definite, as there are limitations in this act concerning the powers of all governments, is it not our duty to stand by the Constitution and act according to it? If the Constitution says that the federal Government has no power concerning education, how is it that those loans are paid by the Government of Canada, and that the priority of rights of the provinces and the legislating exclusiveness of the provinces are disregarded in this matter?

I do not see the use of doing that when we are about to celebrate the centennial of Confederation. If you read the B.N.A. Act you will come to the conclusion that the Fathers of Confederation had in mind that the Parliament of Canada, on the one hand, and the provincial legislatures, on the other hand, had exclusive jurisdiction in different fields, and education is one of the fields in which the federal Government has no authority.

There was some discussion in the other house with regard to the constitutional issue. A member spoke of the various possibilities of having it in the Constitution, and one of the parliamentary secretaries answered by saying that the Government had its own philosophy with regard to the amendment of the Constitution. Well, "philosophy" is a great word. It means, "the love of wisdom," but I wonder what the philosophy of that Government is with regard to education. For me it can be summarized in three words: "Slack the slack"—larguez les amarres.

The Government of Canada has no authority to know what is done with the money that is given to the provinces to be spent for educational matters. It is remarkable that the provinces do not mention the Constitution when they come for grants or subsidies. The Constitution seems not to exist for them at that moment; but when the time comes to render accounts, to inform the Government of the way the money is spent with regard to education, they bring the Constitution as their shield to protect themselves and to give themselves the opportunity to refuse to answer. They are outraged if the Government of Canada insists on getting some information with regard to their spending on education.

For me, there is only one way to come to a satisfactory agreement with regard to constitutional matters. In the first place, it is to try as much as possible not to get drunk with words. Until recently—I do not know if it is still the case—there was a false name, an illegal name, given to the Province of Quebec. It was called the "State of Quebec". If we look at the Constitution the name is simply the "Province of Quebec," but some orators thought they were making a good point by speaking of the State of Quebec. As I said not long ago, what if we called the other provinces the "State of Nova Scotia," the "State of Prince Edward Island," the "State of New Brunswick," or Ontario the "State of Ontario," and so on? It would lead to confusion—but in Quebec they were happy and glorious to inebriate themselves with meaningless words. They got nowhere.

When a former premier visited the western provinces last year he was asked if in fact the Province of Quebec was different from the others. When he was asked, "What do you want done?" he was offended. He gave a lecture to the interrogator, and said that he had no manners. You all know that—I am just reminding you of what was said. Imagine, honourable senators, if you spoke somewhere and a member of the audience asked you, "What is it exactly that you want done?", is that not a good question to ask? The particular gentleman I am referring to was very angry at that, and he turned on the interrogator.

I do not believe that the Provincee of Quebec is different from any of the other provinces. In my humble view all that is wanted by the people of Quebec is the respect of their fellow citizens of Canada, and the enjoyment of what was claimed by Sir Oliver Mowat for the Province of Ontario a long time ago, namely, equal rights. They want equal rights and they want to be respected. They want to enjoy equal rights with their fellow citizens. That is fair. That is all they want.

In a constitutional study of Canada the first thing that has to be done is to read the British North America Act with its amendments, and then to try to understand it as it is. It is necessary to know what is wanted by the provinces, so that it may be discussed by the provinces and the federal Government together in conference.

There was a committee formed in the Province of Quebec in, I think, 1963 to study constitutional matters, but it did not sit for a very long time, and no report was made. If am permitted to say so, I spoke during the federal election in 1963 at Rivière Bleue, in Témiscouata, and I suggested that the Province of Quebec should form a committee composed of an equal number of members of the Government and the Opposition to study constitutional matters and to present the point of view of Quebec to the other provinces and the federal Government so that there would be a basis for discussion. That was never done. Such a committee seldom sat. What I find most open to criticism is the fact that a parliamentary secretary has said that the Government is against the formation of a joint committee of federal and provincial members to discuss constitutional issues.

This, again, is playing with words. It is not serious. It is essential to come down to plain facts in order to understand something about constitutional issues which are not complicated at all. You have only to consider the matter with an open mind in order to find the right solution.

[Translation]

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, I would like to add a word because each has his own opinion on constitutional rights. With regard to education, that interpretation, under the British North America Act, is not quite the same in my mind as in the mind of my colleague Senator Pouliot.

I understand that education is what one learns in school and at university. However, it is not because we loan money to someone to help him to get an education that he loses the right to choose what he wants to learn.

Thus, when we discussed family allowances here a few years ago, we insisted that children who go to school until age 16 should be entitled to the allowance. Some argued that the federal Government was infringing upon the rights of the provinces in the field of education. In my opinion, there was no infringement because the children were not forced to learn this or that. We simply wanted to give to all the means to get an education, nothing more. They were told: Learn what you want but get an education.

Take, for instance, organizations such as the Rockefeller Foundation, the Ford Foundation and a few similar organizations which give hundreds of thousands of dollars to universities under very special conditions, namely, that to be entitled to that money one has to study such and such a subject.

But here it is not the same thing at all. A loan is granted to those who cannot afford to get an education and they are told: Go to the university, learn what you want but get an education.

I fail to see how we are violating the rights of the provinces in the field of education by acting that way.

You all know that at a trial there are lawyers on each side and each one interprets things his own way. Well, I interpret them that way and I think that I am helping my country, and my fellow citizens, who cannot afford to get an education, but who are able to borrow and pay back that money which will enable them to become scholars or scientists who tomorrow will save our country.

I say that, if passed, such a legislation will not force anyone to study this or that subject but will enable a young man or a young woman to mature and succeed in life. I suggest that it is a good piece of legislation which does not violate in any way the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: If the honourable senator will allow me—he says that he did not agree with me at all; personally, I think exactly as he does.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I should inform the house, since there has been some consideration given to our sitting this evening, that after discussing the situation with the honourable Leader of the Opposition I have come to the conclusion that it will be unnecessary for us to do so.

I suggest that we deal now with item No. 4 on the Order Paper, which presumably will be sent to a committee. Item No. 5 can stand. We will deal with item No. 7, which is consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce that were presented yesterday, and stand items Nos. 8, 9 and 10. So, the only other substantial measure we will deal with this afternoon is item No. 4.

I would ask honourable senators to keep in mind the possibility of the house sitting tomorrow evening. There will be several matters left over from this afternoon and two new ones. It may be that we shall receive other bills at the beginning of tomorrow afternoon's sitting, in respect of which I might ask for second reading later in the day.

EXCISE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Eric Cook moved the second reading of Bill C-198, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the amendments to the Excise Tax Act, which will be made if Bill C-198 is passed, appear to be unusually numerous and complicated. However, except for one small item all its provisions are either of a relieving nature or are made for the purpose of simplifying the act and the administration thereof.

Section 1 of the bill is a relieving section and seeks to remove a hardship arising from the existing legislation. Under the present section, when manufacturers sell two or more products in one package, and if one of the products is subject to excise tax, they are forced to pay excise tax on all the products in the package. Under this amendment tax will be collected only on the item which is subject to tax, and not on the whole package. For example, if a razor and brush and soap are sold together, and the razor is the only item subject to tax, heretofore tax was collected on the value of the three items; henceforth it will be collected on the razor alone.

Section 2 will correct an inequity which now exists. At the present time if you purchase from a dealer a tire which has been retreaded you, of course, pay sales tax, but if you bring him your own tire and he retreads it for you, tax is not now payable on the value of the work done and the materials supplied. Henceforth tax will be payable on the value of the work done and materials supplied by the dealer. This is the only increase of tax provided for in the bill.

Section 3 contains an amendment designed to assist members of the fur trade who have made representations to the minister concerning difficulties in the collection of tax on their products. This section is inserted therefore in the act at the request of the taxpayers who are concerned with the payment of the tax.

Briefly this section will impose sales tax at two levels. First, tax will be paid by the fur garment manufacturer on the fair value of the raw fur, plus the value of the work done and the materials supplied by the dresser and dyer, of whom there are eight in all Canada. Then when the fur is sold to the ultimate consumer the manufacturer may by virtue of the new section 47B, which will be enacted by section 6 of this bill, recover or receive a credit for the sales tax which he paid on the fair value of the raw fur and on the value of the work done and materials supplied by the dresser and dyer.

The new section also contains a number of incidental provisions which are necessary in order to make it fully operative.

I should point out that the section does not increase the amount of the tax to be paid—it merely alters the method of collection.

Section 4 is, I believe, by far the most important section in the bill. Section 4 together with section 9 and section 10(3) provide for a two-stage removal of sales tax on a comprehensive list of productive machinery and equipment over the next two years.

The tax remains in full force until April 1, 1967 at which date the rate is reduced to 6 per cent, and on April 1, 1968 the tax will be removed altogether.

The list of articles on which the tax will be first reduced and then removed will be found in the new Schedule V, enacted by section 9, and will be found on pages 14 and 15 of the bill. It is estimated that in the year 1967-68 the loss of revenue will be some $63 million and in 1968-69 some $165 million.

In addition to the relief proposed to be given by section 4, the full 11 per cent tax is remitted as at March 30 of this year on the articles which are listed in section 1 of Part XIII of the new Schedule III. Part XIII will be found at page 13 of the bill. The articles listed in section 1 of Part XIII are articles which are often rapidly expended in the manufacture or production of goods. These articles are normally in direct physical contact with the goods being produced and through wear and tear, or because of design changes, frequently need to be replaced. In many manufacturing and processing companies, amounts spent on these items are regarded as operating costs rather than capital expenditures. The loss of revenue because of these exemptions is estimated to be some $20 million yearly.

Section 5 merely brings up to date the reference to a Customs Tariff item.

Section 6. I have already referred to the new section 47B which authorizes the refunding of the first stage sales tax paid by fur merchants at the dressing and dyeing stage.

Section 47C, also found in section 6, is a new section and is introduced into the act to simplify the making of deductions or refunds in the cases provided for in the act. Examples are schools, hospitals, libraries, and the like. This section will authorize the minister to work out in consultation with the taxpayer entitled to the deduction or refund a formula whereby the amount of the deduction or refund will be an agreed percentage of the total sum expended in the construction of the building or the provision of the facilities.

Section 7 merely simplifies the tax imposed on lighters and electron tubes and provides a straight tax of ten cents per item in each case.

Section 8 of the bill repeals Schedule III of the act and substitutes a new Schedule III in place of the old one. Schedule III contains a list of all articles which are exempt from sales tax.

The substitution of a new Schedule III will serve two purposes. First, it will implement the new exemptions from sales tax. Second, it regroups all sales tax exemptions in alphabetical order in numbered parts and sections to allow for easier reference.

The new exemptions, not including those I have already dealt with, will in a full year mean an estimated loss of revenue amounting to a little more than $1¼ million.

The new exemptions cover a very large number of items, the most important from a revenue viewpoint being found in Part VI on page 9 of the bill. These are fuel oil for use in the generation of electricity and natural gas regardless of end use.

The other smaller items range from stained glass windows and steel stalls to false teeth.

The schedule contains all the articles now exempt, so that as I have already pointed out the bill does not impose any new taxation.

The final item worthy of mention is found in Schedule III, Part V item 20. It reads:

> Oleomargarine and margarine for consumption in the Province of Newfoundland.

This item, which fulfils a commitment made in the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada, is not new. This exemption has been in force since 1949, but heretofore was granted by virtue of the Financial Administration Act. That procedure had, however, not been approved by the Auditor General, and following his recommendations the exemption is now being granted in the Excise Tax Act.

Honourable senators, if this bill receives second reading, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is not my intention at this time to comment at great length on this bill, which has been fully explained section by section by the sponsor (Hon. Mr. Cook). As he stated, the bill for the most part is of a relieving nature, and in many cases is a tidying-up operation. However, I think certain sections should be commented upon. For example, the sponsor mentioned that section 2 is to correct an inequity, and that hitherto there had been occasions when the tax was not collected on tires which were retreaded.

It is interesting to note that clause 2 brings in a new principle in this bill. As the minister himself mentioned in the other house, when he was speaking on the bill, until this amendment to the act, a federal sales tax did not apply to services. Now we have a precedent being created where a federal sales tax is being applied to a service—not only to materials but to the service given when a person brings a tire in to be retreaded. Once a precedent is established, as is being done now, whereby a service is taxed, we can expect this system to increase and many other services will be taxed in the future.

I agree that clause 4 is the most important clause of this bill. It removes the sales tax on production machinery in stages over a two-year period. The tax is to be reduced to 6 per cent on July 1, 1967 and is to be wiped out in 1968. If it is desirable to reduce or eliminate the sales tax on productive machinery over the next two years, why not do away with it now?

Honourable senators, when this tax was imposed, it raised much opposition. As you will recall, it was a tax on production machinery and also on building material. Now the Government is admitting it was wrong when it applied this tax to production machinery and it is going to right the wrong by instalments, a sort of repentance over the next two years. But they say nothing about taking the tax off building materials, which to my mind is quite as important. I would urge the Government to do away with the tax on production machinery, not in two years time but, if they feel they cannot do it now, then do it all next year. They should also do away with the tax on building materials.

In regard to clause 3 dealing with furs, to arrive at the sales price, the bill says:

> ...the sale price of the goods shall be deemed to be either the aggregate of the current market value of the furs in their raw state...

Then, to arrive at that current market value, the next subsection says that, for that purpose:

> ...the minister shall determine the current market value of furs in their raw state in such manner as may be prescribed by regulation of the Governor in Council.

It was not many years ago that serious objection was raised in this chamber to the granting of such powers to the minister. I think it is a better practice if we do not leave things of that sort to the discretion of the minister. It is better if we spell out in the bill how such things should be determined. I draw that to your attention in the hope that in the amendments which come next year that section might also be amended.

The honourable sponsor of the bill explained, certainly to my satisfaction and I believe to the satisfaction of this house, the meaning and implication of the other clauses of the bill.

Honourable senators, we should not pass this bill without mention that a new principle is being established when we are taxing services. Furthermore, we should not pass the bill without objection being raised to the maintenance of these taxes on production machinery for a year, in fact for two years, and we should object also that no mention is made of repealing the tax on building materials.

The sponsor of the bill suggested that it might be sent to a committee. From my own point of view, and I can speak for this side, I doubt if there is anything which needs further explanation in committee and if the house feels it should be passed without reference to a committee there will be no objection on this side.

May I repeat, it is time we took a hard look at the language of our statutes to see if we could not make it easier for everyone to understand, even for those trained in the law. The language in this bill is very complicated. We should try to have these statutes reviewed to simplify the language so that it may be more readily understood by everyone.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I wish to add my voice to that of Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), in appealing to the Government to do away with the tax on building materials. There has been no more unpopular measure, so far as our corner of Canada is concerned, than the tax on building materials. It has affected everyone, including every young couple who want to build a home. I have heard most unfavourable comment in every possible direction regarding the tax on building materials and also regarding the tax on machinery for production purposes.

Therefore, I tell my honourable friend that I could not agree with him more when he says that that tax on building materials should be removed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Cook: Honourable senators, in view of the remark of honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton) that there is no need to send the bill to a committee, unless some other senator wishes it to go to a committee, I would move that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Cook, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 5, 1966

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ASKED IN DEBATE ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING, JUNE 1, 1966

GREAT LAKES FISHERY COMMISSION—LAMPREY CONTROL AND RESEARCH

Answer to question by Hon. Mr. Brooks:

The Great Lakes Fishery Commission was established by the Convention on Great Lakes Fisheries signed by Canada and the United States in 1954. The Commission is to formulate and co-ordinate research designed to determine measures needed to provide maximum sustained productivity of fish stocks of common concern, to recommend appropriate measures based on the results of this research, and to develop and implement a program to eradicate or minimize sea lamprey.

Attempts to halt the spread of the sea lamprey in the Upper Great Lakes began in the late 1940's, but by 1955 it had eliminated lake trout from Lake Michigan and most of Lake Huron. Lake trout catches in Lake Superior were declining rapidly and collapse of the fishery there appeared imminent. As the program was expanded, federal agencies played an increasingly important part and when the Commission was formed, the Fisheries Research Board of Canada and the U.S. Bureau of Commercial Fisheries, which were already at work on the problem, became its agents.

Early attempts at control were limited to the blocking of spawning streams with mechanical or electrical barriers. Chemical treatment of streams with a selective toxicant to destroy larva lampreys began in Lake Superior in 1958, and 105 of the 113 lamprey streams were treated once and 47 twice by the end of 1964. In 1965, 7 streams were treated for the first time and 27 streams were re-treated to destroy larvae which had become re-established since the previous treatment.

The catch at 24 barriers, operated to assess changes in lamprey abundance, dropped sharply from 71,111 in 1961 to 9,992 in 1962, the latter representing about 20 per cent of the average catch for the preceding five years. Although all known lamprey streams with the exception of one small tributary in northern Lake Superior have now been treated, the catch at the barriers has remained at about the same level—12,173 in 1963, 12,775 in 1964, and 12,407 in 1965. An examination of possible sources of this continuing infestation has focused attention on a concentration of lamprey which develops each fall below the locks in the St. Mary's River connecting Lake Superior and Lake Huron. Approximately 1,600 lamprey collected below the locks and at other locations in northwestern Lake Huron were tagged in 1965 to follow their movements and assess their contribution to the lamprey populations in Lake Superior and Lake Michigan.

The reduction in lamprey in Lake Superior has improved survival of lake trout and older fish have become more abundant. In the fall of 1964, substantial numbers of mature lake trout were observed on spawning grounds in western Lake Superior and subsequently in 1965 naturally produced trout were taken by trawls for the first time since 1953.

Commercial fishing for lake trout on Lake Superior has been restricted, on the recommendation of the Commission, to a sampling operation in which about 90,000 trout are taken annually for biological information. Some populations on offshore grounds are approaching a state where they can soon support fishing operations on a moderate scale. Inshore populations, however, require continued protection until natural reproduction is re-established.

In Lake Michigan, 93 of 99 lamprey streams have been treated once, and 18 twice since 1960. The catch of spawning lamprey at three assessment barriers has declined to about 30 per cent of the average catch for the period 1958 to 1962. A recent marked improvement in the catch of whitefish may be related to the reduction in lamprey.

During 1965, surveys were continued in Lake Huron, Lake Erie, and Lake Ontario to locate lamprey streams and collect information for planning chemical operations. Research was also continued on chemicals or combinations of chemicals with potential as lampricides and on certain phases of lamprey life history, such as the length of larval life, which could lead to improvements in operations. Where lamprey larvae have been studied intensively a minimum larval life of five years has been established and re-treatment at 5-year rather than 4-year intervals may be possible for most streams.

The 1966 lamprey control program will include a continuation of 1965 work in Lake Superior and an extension into Lake Huron. Electrical barriers will be operated on eight Lake Superior streams and eleven Lake Huron streams as check points to determine the actual number of returning adult lamprey spawners. A total of at least fourteen Lake Superior streams and eleven Lake Huron streams will be treated to kill lamprey larvae in these known spawning streams. Exploratory surveys will be continued in a number of predetermined streams in a search for additional lamprey spawning and rearing areas.

Surface trawling will be continued in the area near the Sault Ste. Marie Locks in an effort to gather additional information on the movement of adult lampreys from Lake Huron to Lake Superior.

FISHERIES—IMPLEMENTATION OF 12-MILE LIMIT

Answer to question by Hon. Mr. Hollett:

The Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act became law on July 16, 1964, and was proclaimed in force on July 23, 1964. It established a 12-mile fishing zone around the coast of Canada. The Act also empowered the Government to draw straight baselines from which the territorial sea and fishing zone could be measured. Until such time as any straight baselines are drawn, the 3-mile territorial sea and the additional 9-mile fishing zone is measured, in most instances, following the sinuosities of the coast.

In an irregular coastline such as that of Canada, baselines may be drawn in a number of ways. Large bodies of water are involved which, if enclosed by baselines, would affect the interests of other countries. Therefore, the Government has been negotiating with a number of countries which have been fishing for many years off the Canadian coast regarding the establishment of the proposed baselines.

These negotiations which have proved to be difficult and drawn out are continuing. The Canadian Government is now awaiting a response from the United States Government to proposals put forward by the Canadian Government designed to establish exclusive fishing zone rights for Canadian fishermen.

In the meantime, until the negotiations have been completed, the 12-mile limit for fishing is an established fact and is being enforced against all countries excepting those which have traditional fishing rights off our coasts and with whom we are carrying on negotiations.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES POWER DEVELOPMENT ACT

Answer to Question by Hon. Mr. Burchill:

The Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act, 1957-58 Statutes, chapter 25, provides for federal assistance to the Atlantic Provinces in making electrical power available for industrial purposes and at low cost. The Act permits the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to enter into agreements with any of the Atlantic Provinces for the construction, extension or completion of thermal power projects and for electrical transmission lines and terminal stations, with the required funds being loaned by the Canadian Government. The loans, provided through the Northern Canada Power Commission, are made from funds voted by Parliament for this purpose. Vote L40 of the Main Estimates, 1966-67, will appropriate $17,500,000.

General agreements under the act were entered into with the province of New Brunswick on February 14, 1958, the province of Nova Scotia on February 20, 1958, and the province of Newfoundland on January 3, 1962. Additional agreements in respect to specific projects have since been negotiated. Construction is undertaken by the Northern Canada Power Commission in co-operation with the province concerned and a completed project for which loans have been made under the act is turned over to the provinces. The province is required to repay the full amount loaned, including interest, over a period of 30 years for thermal plants and over a period of 40 years for transmission lines and terminal stations.

Attached hereto is a summary of projects which have been approved for assistance under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act from its inception to June 13, 1966.

Table by Projects follows

REPORT OF COMMITTEE—COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill S-17, to amend the Bankruptcy Act, and recommended that the Senate do concur in the said amendments, without any amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that this report be adopted now.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the record should not reflect that this report indicates any unanimity in respect of the acceptance of the amendments made to this bill to amend the Bankruptcy Act in the other place.

The committee was, of course, unanimous as to all the amendments of no importance, namely, those numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 as they appear on page 657 of the Minutes of the Proceedings, but such was not the case with respect to the deletion made of section 3A(8) as proposed by clause 3 which would have made applicable to the enlarged powers of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy the provisions of Section 126A of the Income Tax Act.

Honourable senators, I think the record should contain an indication of what is provided by section 126A of the Income Tax Act. Everybody knows that it deals with solicitor-client privilege, but I want to put on the record the definition of such solicitor-client privilege. Section 126A, which was enacted by 4-5 Elizabeth II, chapter 39, defines it as follows:

> "Solicitor-client privilege" means the right, if any, that a person has in a superior court in the province where the matter arises to refuse to disclose an oral or documentary communication on the ground that the communication is one passing between him and his lawyer in professional confidence.

I shall read also subsection 2 of Section 126A:

> Where a lawyer is prosecuted for failure to comply with a requirement under section 126 to give information or to produce a document, he shall be acquitted if he establishes to the satisfaction of the court
> (a) that he, on reasonable grounds, believed that a client of his has a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the information or document; and

(b) that the lawyer communicated to the Minister, or some person duly authorized to act for the Minister, his refusal to comply with the requirement together with a claim that a named client of the lawyer has a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the information or document.

I do not think I need read the rest of the section; it is quite lengthy. However, I want to establish that this solicitor and client privilege is one in favour of an individual and not one in favour of a lawyer and, secondly, that a lawyer cannot hide behind this solicitor and client privilege to do anything which is in any way wrong or fraudulent.

By inserting in clause 3 the application of this principle contained in the Income Tax Act, I think we improved the Bankruptcy bill, and I do not think it would put any roadblock in the way of the efficient application and enforcement of the amendments that are brought to the Bankruptcy Act by this bill.

In the other place, of course, they were afraid there would be misinterpretation by the public. I doubt that this is a valid argument, and I think it was made clear in committee this morning that there was no valid argument for deleting this provision. The bill would have been much more efficient if the provision had remained in it. I am very sorry that the laudable efforts of our Chairman to include the provision in the bill failed. I only hope that the application of the principle will be respected in practice.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been moved by the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), seconded by the honourable Senator Vaillancourt, that this report be adopted. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: On division.

Motion agreed to and report adopted, on division.

DIVORCE

WHITESIDE REPORT ADOPTED

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's report No. 752, and moved, with leave, that the said report be taken into consideration now.

He said: Honourable senators, you will have noticed that this is a single report, and of course some explanation is due the house. There is the birth of a baby in prospect, and I am going to protect that baby if it is possible. I shall give only such details as seem to be necessary.

The respondent and correspondent are both connected with the Canadian Navy in Halifax. There is no doubt about the proof of adultery, and the committee has passed the recommendation of the Commissioner for the granting of a divorce.

Information has since reached us that nature has taken its course and a baby is in prospect. I have in my hand a telegram addressed to Senator Welch, which he very kindly handed to me and which states that a child is to be born.

It has always been the practice of the committee, to the extent of our ability, to protect an oncoming child. For instance, in the hearing of a petition we refuse to put on record the birth certificate of an illegitimate child. The fact that a child was born is all the evidence that we require, and we do not put on our record something which in years to come may be embarrassing to the child. When a child is in prospect, although we may have very little sympathy for the parents, the child is not to be held responsible for the conduct of its parents. Therefore, when the marriage of the parents is within sight, we facilitate matters to the extent of our ability.

Honourable senators, in view of the situation which we all understand, I am asking for the adoption of this report, with leave, now.

Report adopted.

NOTICE OF INQUIRIES

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: I have two inquiries to make, and I presume that they will be answered when the Senate meets again in the fall. They are as follows:

POPULATION OF CONSTITUENCIES

LEGAL FEES

No. 2. Who were the solicitors, lawyers, counsel and notaries public who received fees or payments for travelling expenses from the Government of Canada or its agencies during the three years ending June 30, 1966, and how much was paid to each one?

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE

LEAVE TO MEET DURING SITTINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to meet during sittings of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: That sounds very ominous, Mr. Leader.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications is scheduled to meet this evening. As it is expected that the Senate will be sitting this evening, this motion is necessary to allow the committee to meet while the Senate is sitting.

Again I make an appeal to honourable senators who are on the committee to attend the meeting and to those who are not on the committee to make every effort to give their attendance here in the chamber.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

LA SOCIÉTÉ DES ARTISANS—SECOND READING

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets moved the second reading of Bill S-41, respecting La Société des Artisans.

He said:

[Translation]

Honourable senators, through this bill, the Société des Artisans wants to make five amendments to its charter. I hope to be able to give you in a few words the main points of those amendments and I will do it very briefly for two reasons. In the first place, they are minor, noncontroversial amendments which have been examined by the Superintendent of Insurance. In the second place, if the honourable senators approve its principle on second reading, this bill will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce for a clause by clause study.

There are five proposed amendments.

1. Section 5 amends the French text of the charter to use the same words which are found in the general insurance act of Canada—namely "fraternal society for mutual protection"; therefore, this is a purely technical amendment.

2. Section 12 is to legalize a practice which has become established within the Society, that is, to allow the convention to delegate to the general council the power to set up insurance plans and ratio of premiums. As a matter of fact, it is always the general council which does that. Hence, there is nothing new here.

3. Section 13 requires the members of the executive council to reside in the City of Montreal or its suburbs. The Society believes that it would be proper and advantageous if the general council could choose a candidate to the executive council without taking into account his place of residence.

4. Section 15 has become useless since the fund has disappeared and the Society wants that section deleted from the charter.

The fifth amendment requires a little more explaining because it deals with a new section. Through section 5A, the Society wants to have the right to accept re-insurance from other insurance companies; re-insurance can be defined as the sharing of an insurance risk.

It must be recalled here that the Société des Artisans is a co-operative life insurance company founded on December 28, 1876: there are very few insurance companies in Canada which can claim the honour of celebrating their centennial in 10 years. That explains why some of the Society's powers are obsolete and must be brought up to date in order to allow it to compete fairly with other insurance companies.

The Society does not have today the power to re-insure, with the result that if at any time the Society feels that the risk is too heavy for it, it calls on another insurance company to share it; but if that second company wants to do the same thing and asks the Society to assume an insurance risk, the Société des Artisans must refuse because it does not have the power to do so. Therefore, the Society feels that in all fairness it must enjoy the same privileges granted to all the other insurance companies which are not co-operatives in order to be able to transact business on an equal footing. That is the scope of section 5A.

Honourable senators, I have summarized briefly but satisfactorily, I hope, the scope of those five amendments. If senators have some questions to ask, I will be glad to answer them. I will then move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Deschatelets, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

He said: I might explain that the last report is the one to which I addressed myself previously.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these resolutions be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I move that these resolutions be considered at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved the second reading of Bill C-201, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a very short, simple bill the purpose of which is to change one section in the present Exchequer Court Act.

As honourable senators know, the Exchequer Court is a federal court which deals largely with claims coming under federal jurisdiction. Its headquarters are in Ottawa and its judges and registrar reside here, but it has control over matters which are delegated to it throughout the entire country. The present act permits judges of the court to sit anywhere in Canada where there is an Exchequer Court case to be tried, and, as honourable senators who are members of the legal profession know, judges of that court do in fact sit in various centres throughout the country as the occasion may arise.

In connection with the operation of the Exchequer Court away from Ottawa, it has been decided to appoint as deputy registrars of the court officials of the provincial courts in Toronto and Vancouver. It is felt, and I think rightly so, that there is no purpose in appointing full time special assistant registrars in these places because there would not be sufficient work for them to do, and such work as does arise in these places can easily be carried out by some of the present court officials. Arrangements have been made for that purpose. These assistant registrars will be required to issue writs, receive payment from lawyers of the court fees and provide other services in connection with the issue of various legal documents.

The only difficulty in this connection arises under the provisions of section 80 of the present act, which reads as follows:

> 80. All fees payable to the Registrar under this Act shall be paid by means of stamps issued for that purpose by the Minister of National Revenue, who shall regulate the sale thereof; and the proceeds of the sale of such stamps shall be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

These provincial officials have objected to the idea of being burdened with the task of having to sell these stamps for the Exchequer Court and having to account to Ottawa for the sale. They have also suggested that inasmuch as they are provincial officials dealing with federal matters, any fees paid for stamps should not be paid to the Consolidated Revenue Fund but should form part of the provincial court revenue which would be applied to the costs of their providing these services for the Exchequer Court.

The Minister of Justice has agreed that these are reasonable representations, and the sole purpose of this bill is to substitute for the present section 80 a new section 80 as follows:

> 80. (1) All fees payable to the Registrar under this Act shall be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada and the Registrar shall regulate the collection of such fees.

Then, subsection 2 provides:

> (2) Subsection (1) does not apply to fees collected by an official of a provincial court, acting as a Deputy Registrar of the Exchequer Court in accordance with any arrangement in that behalf made by the Minister of Justice, and any fees so collected shall be retained and dealt with in the same manner as amounts paid as provincial court fees.

As honourable senators will see, it is a very simple, technical business. If the house sees fit to give second reading to this bill, and if any honourable member wishes to send it to one of our standing committees, I would have no objection. However, I do feel that since this is a simple matter of comparatively small ministerial import it is hardly necessary to send it to a committee.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, let me say at the outset that I do not see any need to send this bill to committee. It is actually a change of somewhat minor importance, and is completely understood by reading the bill.

I do not think there can be any objection to the fact that these provincial officers are to be made deputy registrars of the Exchequer Court. I note the appointment of a full-time deputy registrar in the City of Montreal, and part-time deputy registrars in Toronto and Vancouver. Since deputy registrars are being appointed, it might be well to appoint one to each province. True, it is in these larger centres that the greatest volume of the Exchequer Court's work arises, but occasionally cases are heard before the Exchequer Court in the smaller provinces, and it might be a matter of convenience were a deputy registrar appointed to each province.

When I noted that the use of legal stamps is to be discontinued, it struck me that this is perhaps just another example of our becoming more modern and the fact that automation has taken over, even in the use of the law stamps, as a stamping machine is to be used rather than have an official affix stamps.

We are becoming modern in one respect, and yet we are retaining the old-fashioned fee system. I believe the time is approaching when in all these cases the fee system will have to be done away with.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Not lawyers' fees!

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton): No, I would hesitate to recommend that lawyers' fees be eliminated. In most cases the fees taxed for lawyers are far below what they should be.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton): Perhaps at some time when these acts are being considered, the question of officials being on a fee basis should be given consideration. It might be well if they were placed on a salary basis. As I understand it, the idea of the fees being paid to the provincial officials is simply to reimburse the provinces for the extra work the officials do and perhaps for office space and other such items.

Certainly there can be no objection to the bill as it stands, and I suggest that there is no need to send it to a committee at this time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Charles McElman moved the second reading of Bill C-213, to amend the Atlantic Development Board Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have this opportunity to move second reading of Bill C-213, not only because it has great benefits in store for the Atlantic provinces, but also because it gives me my first opportunity to address myself to the Senate. With your leave I would like to make a few general remarks before proceeding to the bill.

First of all, I extend my compliments to you, Mr. Speaker, for the expert and considerate way in which you preside over the deliberations in this august chamber. It will be my endeavour to cause you no difficulty in the course of future deliberations.

I should also like to express my admiration for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the honourable Senator John Connolly. It has been my great privilege to know him well over a period of years, and he has earned my deep respect for his evident and great ability and his absolute consideration for and dedication to Canada and Canadians generally. He has had my sincere friendship over those years because of the warmth of his personality, good humour and kindness that he displays at all times.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McElman: My high regard for him has grown even more as I have watched him perform his onerous duties here with calm determination and efficiency.

May I also express my regards to the Leader of the Opposition, the honourable Senator Brooks, a highly respected citizen of my home province. Although our efforts and aspirations have often pointed in different directions in things political, I share with all New Brunswickers a warm regard for his outstanding record of public service over a period of many years. His dedication to the improvement of our province and the welfare of its people is indisputable, and I salute him accordingly.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Honourable senators, my appointment to the Senate came exactly three weeks short of 20 years following my first active association with public affairs in New Brunswick. During those years it has been my privilege to become intimately familiar with the trials and tribulations of the everyday administration of public affairs and the heartaches and endless hours that go into decision and policy-making; the moments of great but usually quiet satisfaction that come with accomplishments; the despair and then the noisy outbursts that come when things go wrong.

It is with this background that I wish to express my deep admiration for the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, and for the leadership he is giving to Canada during one of the most difficult and trying periods in our history as a nation. It is easy to lead when the state of the nation is placid, but, I suggest, during these past few years Canada has been—and probably will be for several years to come—anything but placid. Our nation and our people have been looking over the very foundations upon which our federation was built. There appears to be little question that the foundations were soundly constructed but, like any structure of well-nigh 100 years, a bit of repair may become necessary. With continued patience and understanding, those repairs can be made and the structure itself will be stronger and even more admirable.

At the same time, our society is changing and the public mind is bombarded by the instantaneous news media to the point where it becomes almost impossible to cope mentally with what is loosely known as "the news". I am sure many would share my view that the programs entitled, "The News of the Day" might more appropriately be referred to as "the sensations of the day". In any event, we are living in strange times, when the patience of all of us is often sorely tried. I am personally grateful that, in these particular times, we have a very human individual of unbounded patience at the helm of the nation. And to those who bemoan various situations and try to lay the blame for many difficulties at the door of our Prime Minister, I would say: Thank God his presence and patience have been available to the nation. I shudder to think of what could have been the outcome of certain situations these past few years had Mr. Pearson not used his talents to teach the Canadian people that compromise is honourable and preferable to the taking of an unyielding stance in many circumstances.

I offer my grateful thanks to all honourable senators who have welcomed me to this chamber and have made me feel at home in these new surroundings. I find the work both interesting and enjoyable and, I might say, a marked change from the hurly-burly of partisan activity I became used to over so many years. I hope that if I should revert to my former state on occasion I will not unduly offend honourable senators.

Bill C-213, to amend the Atlantic Development Board Act, is quite straightforward. I am sure all honourable senators who share a concern that the Atlantic Development Board achieve the purpose for which it was established will have read the debate on this bill in the other place and the evidence given by Dr. E. P. Weeks and other staff members before the Standing Committee of the Senate on Finance. On both of those occasions detailed explanations were given, as well as explicit information concerning current and past activities of the Board.

Very briefly, the amendments propose, first, that the ceiling of the aggregate total of amounts that may be credited to the Atlantic Development Fund be raised from $100 million to $150 million; secondly, that the Board be enabled to enter into contractual agreements with other than provincial governments or their agencies without the approval of the Governor in Council, although the approval of the Governor in Council will still be required for all contracts and agreements entered into with provincial governments or their agencies, and other contracts require only Treasury Board approval; and thirdly, that the Board be enabled to establish user charges in relation to any program or project that it might undertake, and that revenues accruing from such charges may be credited to the Atlantic Development Fund and expended by the Board without affecting the new ceiling of $150 million which is established by this act.

Let me elaborate briefly on the background of the Atlantic Development Board and some of its accomplishments. The Board was established in 1963 for the purpose of stimulating or fostering the growth and development of the economy of the Atlantic region of Canada, comprising the provinces of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. By a later amendment, the Atlantic Development Fund was set up to cover the Board's share of costs of programs and projects undertaken to achieve this purpose. The ceiling of that fund was set at $100 million. It should be stated that at the time of the establishment of the fund a commitment was made by the Government that the fund would be increased as and when it became necessary. This amendment, in part, is the meeting of that commitment. A similar commitment has been made for the time when this addtional amount may be fully committed.

In conversation, and in some press reports, I note a degree of misunderstanding of the present need for increasing the fund, and also what some people regard as a lack of evidence of concrete results from the programs and projects in which the Board has involved itself. First of all, the fund has not been totally spent. In fact, the actual total expenditure from the fund to date is only slightly in excess of $25 million. However, the Board does not simply agree to make handouts to the provinces or their agencies, or to particular industries. After reaching agreement on a specified project the Board contributes its share in stages, depending upon the progress of the actual work on the project, and only after the other party or parties to the agreement have injected capital of their own.

Although only $25 million of the fund has actually been spent, virtually the whole of the $100 million has now been committed on specific projects, such as electric power development, trunk highways, the provision of adequate supplies of fresh water for industrial or processing purposes, anti-pollution programs, industrial parks, basic research facilities and so on. Some of these projects are approved but not yet started. Others have been under way for some time but will not be completed for another one, two or more years—and here I am referring to the huge hydro power projects now under construction at Mactaquac in New Brunswick and Bay d'Espoir in Newfoundland. So, the $100 million is virtually committed for current and future expenditure on already approved projects.

Understandably, the Atlantic Development Board is in no position to make further commitments on essential programs and projects until Parliament makes provision for additional funds to meet such costs. In fact, it is prevented from making further commitments beyond the amount of money already provided for, and that is one of the reasons for the bill now before us.

I should like to pay tribute to the dedicated work of the members of the Board, under the able chairmanship of Mr. Ian M. MacKeigan, Q.C., of Halifax, and its highly competent staff under the guidance of its executive director, Dr. Ernest P. Weeks. It is to their credit and to the credit of all concerned, that the activities of the Board have been kept free of partisan considerations. This desirable situation, I would hope, will continue.

Projects are approved only on the basis of their economic validity. Every care is taken to avoid duplication of effort in matters that would properly be undertaken by departments or agencies of either the provincial or federal governments. Equal care is taken to ensure that projects that could and should be undertaken by industry itself are not made the subject of handouts or subsidies by the Board.

Approval is given only where exceptional costs and circumstances would either prevent or unreasonably delay the undertaking of a desirable project in a given location, and is given by the Board only after the most exhaustive examination of all the factors involved and when there is an assurance that the program or project will, indeed, promote the more rapid growth and development of the economy of the Atlantic region.

I will not enumerate all of the projects in which the Board is involved in the several provinces. I should like, however, to refer to one of the most important fields in which it has concerned itself, namely, that of electrical energy.

As honourable senators are aware, for decades the lagging economy of the Atlantic provinces has been exemplified in the statistical fact that our people have consistently suffered a level of unemployment about double that of the nation as a whole, and an average income which is approximately one-third less than the national average. The expansion of industry and commerce necessary to overcome these deplorable circumstances has been retarded by numerous factors, but one of the principal roadblocks has been a lack of abundant supplies of electrical energy at reasonable rates.

Since World War II New Brunswick has taken steps to reduce its outrageously high power costs through the installation of much larger thermal generating units, and the development of several hydro-electric sites. My friend Senator Edgar Fournier was largely responsible for one of these hydro developments. The returns from these investments are proven in the astounding load growth on the system, which is well in excess of the national average. This means industrial expansion and jobs.

With the rapid development of our forest and base metals industries during recent years, it has become necessary to plan for future major expansion of our electric generating facilities, both hydro and thermal. The provincial power commission proceeded with the installation of much larger and more economic thermal units at several locations to fit in with load demands. In recent weeks another generating station with the largest capacity to date has been announced for Dalhousie on the northeast shore.

In order to maintain the essential balance in our system between thermal and hydro generating facilities, the power commission reached the conclusion that the hydro potential on the Saint John River should be further developed through construction of a huge power dam at Mactaquac, 16 miles above the capital city. This is the most costly and ambitious project of its kind ever contemplated up to this time in the Maritime provinces. The immensity of it raised doubts concerning the financial capacity of the province to see it through to a successful conclusion. It is indicative of the new spirit, courage and determination prevailing in New Brunswick and the Atlantic area generally that the decision was taken to proceed with the project despite the burden it would place upon our financial capacity. Yet, the scheduling of the project, in so far as the immediate development of the full potential of the site is concerned, remained in some doubt.

This is where the Atlantic Development Board came into the picture. They examined carefully the economics of the project itself and the projected favourable impact it would have on the industrial development of the province, including its beneficial effect in the power grid that we now share with Nova Scotia and to a limited degree with the State of Maine—which we expect soon to tie-in with Quebec and Prince Edward Island.

They studied all of these factors and recommended to the Government of Canada that a grant of $20 million be made toward the $110 million cost of this project. Their recommendation was approved and the grant authorized. Full and immediate development of the potential of the site became a certainty and industry was assured of the availability of adequate blocks of energy at reasonable cost.

Honourable senators, this factor alone was largely responsible for industry decisions to speed up the development and processing of our vast base metals deposits and the injection of scores of millions of dollars in the expansion of our pulp and paper industry. This means several thousand additional good-paying year-round jobs for New Brunswickers. It is a tribute to the foresight and courage of the Robichaud administration and to the practical and effective activities of the Atlantic Development Board.

So often in past years prospective industries have passed us by due to unavailability of large quantities of power at reasonable cost. We hope that we will experience no more of this in the foreseeable future.

Similarly, in Newfoundland, the hydro project at Bay d'Espoir is under construction at double the initially planned capacity, due to financial participation by the Atlantic Development Board.

At Trenton in Nova Scotia a major coal-fired thermal generating station is about to proceed with Atlantic Development Board assistance. This assistance has been instrumental in having the size of the plant increased from 100,000 kilowatts to 150,000 kilowatts—a more economic size of unit.

The decision had been reached that the Atlantic Development Board would install a submarine electric power transmission cable from the mainland to Prince Edward Island to tie that province into the Maritime power grid. Now that the causeway has been started, the cable will be carried by it and Prince Edward Island will have access to adequate sources of energy at much lower costs than at present.

The Atlantic Development Board is also deeply involved in the studies that are under way in respect of the tidal power potential at the head of the Bay of Fundy, which, if feasible, could inject vast quantities of electrical energy at reasonable cost into a much larger power grid that would include a tie-in with the New England States.

Perhaps I have taken more of the time of the Senate than I should have on this occasion, but I felt it important to take this one field of many in which the Atlantic Development Board is involved to indicate to honourable senators the extremely valuable contribution that is being made by the board in the improvement of the economy of the Atlantic region.

The real and lasting effects are not presently altogether in evidence, but the years immediately ahead will show the dividends in increased employment and income for our people when the projects now under way and in the planning stages come to effective completion.

In truth, every citizen, and the respective governments of the four Atlantic provinces, look forward to the day when there will be no need for the Atlantic Development Board or an Atlantic Development Fund. That will mean that we will have achieved our joint purpose of bringing the Atlantic area economy up to the level of the nation and that we of the Atlantic provinces, in good economic health, will be making our full and satisfying contribution as equal partners in this great Canada of ours.

That day will not be tomorrow, but with continued and intelligent attacks upon our economic ills, that day is drawing much closer and is within our reach.

Honourable senators, you will have gathered from my comments, I am sure, that my ardent support is with the Atlantic Development Board and its staff. I warmly commend to you the passage of this bill.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, first I must congratulate the honourable Senator McElman for his excellent explanation of the bill, this being his first address in this chamber. The ease with which he delivered his remarks was really no surprise to me, for I knew that he had for some time been executive assistant to Premier Robichaud of New Brunswick. I was reading just the other day that Premier Robichaud has now become termed "the fastest tongue in the east", and I am sure that the honourable senator had much to do with coaching and training him along the way to that title.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: The premier did not need very much.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: The introduction of this bill covered a number of brief notes I had made. Reference was made also to the appearance of the officials of the Atlantic Development Board before the Finance Committee of the Senate. This was one of our better committee meetings. We all had an opportunity to ask questions freely, to which we received answers.

I was greatly impressed with the answers given by Dr. Weeks. I have known him for some time, and he is never at a loss for words. He is able to take a poor situation and make it sound really excellent. That is a quality that many politicians wish they could develop.

I noticed that recently the Board advertised for a public relations or public information officer. I was rather surprised, because I have had the opportunity to hear Dr. Weeks and other members of the Board give a public accounting at meetings of organizations such as the Board of Trade, and these people do an excellent job in explaining the function of the Atlantic Development Board, its objectives, and the progress it is making in achieving these objectives. If any honourable senators have the opportunity to hear such explanations by them at any time, I heartily recommend them to do so.

There is no doubt that there is need of further development in the Atlantic provinces. The honourable Senator McElman mentioned the fact that salaries in the Atlantic provinces are roughly one-third less than the national average. I would like to elaborate by pointing out that there are 60,000 full-time employees in the Atlantic provinces earning less than $2,000 per annum. Many of them are married and must support a family on less than $2,000 per annum. We must have assistance to bring our income level up to the rest of Canada. After all, we in the Atlantic provinces feel that we had a great deal to do with developing this country, and we would like to share in its full benefits as fully as any other region of Canada.

The Atlantic Development Board has spent a great deal of time and concentration on power development, and this is certainly necessary. However, it is of course most discouraging when one hears of the small number of jobs created by the Board. I was impressed with the manner in which the secretary of the Board explained this before the committee. However, a foundation has been laid for the years ahead on which the Board can build and give further assistance to power development.

I would like to see the Board move in the direction of not only establishing industry in the Maritimes, but in helping us obtain the information we can supply to new industries approaching the Maritimes and making inquiries.

In the town of Summerside, in which I live, the Atlantic Development Board assisted in establishing an industrial park. I have found that when various industries make inquiries concerning this, the information they require is not readily available and very often there is no one in the area to get the information for these firms and they tend to forget about establishing in the area.

I always look at an economist with some doubt as to his viewpoints. The best description I have heard of an economist is that he is someone who has an idea for spending someone's else's money. I am not too anxious to see too many more economic surveys carried out by the Board, because when you get into surveys there is always a time lag.

You set a certain date for the survey to be completed, but the economist runs into difficulties and the report is always late and you keep backing up the schedule all the time. I feel that Parkinson could produce a new law based on economic surveys and royal commissions, that is, that they seem to expand to fill in time as well as to increase the number of employees.

The basic change in the bill is to add another $50 million to the fund. I do not wish to create the impression that I am ungrateful for the addition of $50 million to be spent in the Atlantic provinces, but I would merely point out that, on returning to the Senate on Monday, I read in the Moncton paper about a meeting of tourist associations in that city over the weekend to discuss the development of the Fundy Trail. This involves a tourist road through New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. This group, which is probably the most active, decided that the most hopeful source of action would be the Atlantic Development Board, but they also estimated that the Fundy Trail would cost $25 million, or one-half of this increase. Therefore, we are really not giving the Board any surplus money to use.

The previous speaker made reference to the power cable to Prince Edward Island. Here is the only place I find myself in disagreement with the Atlantic Development Board. The P.E.I. Causeway, in its surveys and original planning, always conveyed to me, and certainly to all Islanders, that one of its great advantages would be the ready means of transferring the cheaper electric power from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to Prince Edward Island. We became accustomed to the idea, and in fact accepted that a power cable would be incorporated and would become an original part of the causeway. Now we find that, through some change, it is the responsibility of the Atlantic Development board.

As you know, the Board has been very careful to establish a ratio and spend a certain amount of its funds on each of the four Atlantic provinces. About $5 million is held in reserve for placing the power cable on the P.E.I. Causeway. We feel we have got the short end of the stick, as the expression goes, in this distribution. I hope that with the new funds the Atlantic Development Board will move to restore a greater percentage of their expenditure in Prince Edward Island.

Honourable senators, I am happy to support the bill, and I see no particular need to refer it to a committee—not because of the fact that we are approaching a deadline which interests us also but, rather, that it is only two weeks since the Board was before the Finance Committee. For that reason, I see no purpose in sending the bill to committee.

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Honourable senators, I would like to compliment my good friend for the fine explanation he has given of this bill. He has shown ability and knowledge, and he has demonstrated that he has the interest of the people of his province at heart.

I will not be too critical of the Board. They are doing a fairly good job, and I would like to compliment them on the assistance they are giving to the development of electric power in the Maritime provinces.

As we all know, the Board is not supposed to be unduly partisan. However, as the Board is acting under the recommendation of the provincial government, it is sometimes directed to political attention and not always in the interest of the taxpayers.

First of all, I would like to see the Board initiate some of its own projects and in New Brunswick there would be many. I am one who is on record as not being agreeable to the board's spending money for public works. The reason for this is that in New Brunswick 90 per cent of the Trans-Canada Highway is paid for by the federal Government, and what is left of our rural roads and back country roads could be dealt with out of provincial funds.

Instead of spending that money on public works, which could come out of other concerns, I would recommend to the Board that we come to the assistance of our ship-building industry. We have a dry dock in Saint John which was doing very well since the subsidies of 35 per cent came in. I remember that last year that was cut down to 25 per cent. I would recommend that the Board put in the 10 per cent and make up the difference. That would be a tremendous help to our shipbuilding industry which is staggering under difficulties.

I compliment the Board on what they have done. I am glad to see Dr. Weeks is here to listen to my remarks. I hope he will give attention to my request for assistance for the ship-building industry by paying the difference between the 25 and the 35 per cent. It would do away with politics. No one is going to tell me that there is no politics involved in these bits of road work that are being done around the province, under assistance from the A.D.B.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. McElman moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-205, to provide for the establishment of a Dairy Commission for Canada.
