POETRY.

The Silent Singer.

As he stood upon the hilltop
In the hush of evening night,
Though the woods were dark behind him,
Yet a flood of crimson light
From the sunset's fading splendor
Brightened all his homeward way,
Winding down the quiet valley
Towards the margin of the bay.
Gleamed the white sails in the distance,
Touched with color here and there;
And the beson's massive tower,
Dark against the sky,
Marked the cross reef and robbed it
Of its fearful power to harm.
When the storm-wind reared in fury
O'er the waters now so calm,
Radiant sky and gleaming water,
Wooded hills and shining strand,
Seemed a rare and varied picture,
Glowing from the Master's hand;
And the watcher's heart uplifted
By the beauty of the sight,
Sang a hymn to his Creator
As dusk deepened into night.
Of this psalm no stately measure
Ever fell on mortal ears;
In his heart the cadence lingered,
Rang through all his coming years,
He, unlettered, poor and humble,
To his inspiration sang;
Set his life into its music,
Lived the psalm he never sung.

CHAPTER XXI.—Continued.

In her great grief and loneliness the Scotchwoman seemed to cling to Miriam and the young girl, with the true instinct of noble womanhood, prepared to spend the night at the cottage. One of the firemen, a broad-shouldered young man, who had quietly cleared the house of all but a few women, was just leaving, when she accosted him. "Can you find me a messenger, sir? I wish to send a note to my father, Mr. Whitney?" "I should be very glad to be the bearer of any message for you," was his reply, and she then recognized Chamberlain, and the real pleasure that she allowed herself to show was very grateful to him. "God bless you!" he said, holding out his hand. "You are doing a noble, womanly deed." The strong hand seemed to impart some of its own's self command, and she felt strengthened. She watched him as he swiftly passed through the long street and disappeared, then she turned the door, returned to her self-imposed task of soothing the stricken one, while the "sauld wives" tenderly prepared the form of Jamie ere he should be forever laid out of sight. As Chamberlain passed through the street on his way to the Whitney place, he saw Gaffney and several others earnestly conversing. "Is the boy dead?" asked the grinder. "Yes. The physician said that he inhaled the smoke and flame, and must have been instantly suffocated," was the reply. "Poor, little fellow!" said Gaffney, the tears springing to his eyes. "Shure it's many times I've seen him carrying water for his grannie, and choppin' wood, when you could see that every step and every stroke was pullin' him to pieces of pain! Poor, little Jamie! shure ye'll never have any more back ache; the water-pail will never again be too heavy for ye,—poor, little lad!"

CHAPTER XXII.

In his tiny room, preparing for the coming Sunday's wrestle with a class of Sleep street boys, sat Chamberlain. It was no light task to train the infant minds of the mill youngsters. Their views on theological subjects were unique. Not at all bashful in expressing them, a teacher of timid habit was apt to be disastrously overcome. The young man was deeply interested in his class, and they returned his affection, even going so far as to indulge in shoo-knocking and hair-pulling, for the honor of sitting next to him. As he digested the lesson, a heavy step on the stair roused him from his work. The door opened, and Sam Putnam entered. "Are you willing to lay your papers aside, and talk a bit?" he inquired, awkwardly. "Oh, no," was the reply. "Sit down." The chair groaned as it received its weight; but Sam, used to wooden protests, did not notice it. "Maybe you have heard of my change of base?" he remarked interrogatively.

A large audience assembled on Monday evening last to hear the music, etc., at the Walther concert. The audience was not disappointed as the viola playing of the Walther brothers and the singing of Madame Walther was truly excellent. Also the parts taken by Mr W. On Saturday night, October 7th, a young man named Daniel Masters, of Avondale, was brutally assaulted in Kentville. Masters was working in Cornwallis and in leaving town that night on his way home after young men, approached on the Joe Bell Hill and with out any provocation one of the number struck Masters on the head knocking him down. The blow seemed to fracture the skull and must have been caused by lead knuckles or a sling-shot. After a few days Masters became insane and in wandering around broke into a mill in Waterville and was brought from there and lodged in jail. He was violently insane while here. His father was notified of his condition and had him taken to Avondale on Monday last. Last Saturday morning Policeman Davis and Jailor Coleman captured one of the men named William Moore and the following Monday Parker Barnaby and Coley Fraser were also arrested. It is believed that Moore is the one who struck the blow. Masters' condition is quite critical.
