PRIVILEGE

MR. PEPIN—ELUCIDATION OF ANSWER TO QUESTION CONCERNING RYERSON PRESS—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in answering a question yesterday from the hon. member for St. John's East—he was trying to help me and I am grateful to him for that—with respect to the Ryerson affair, I had meant to say only that no specific request for financial assistance had been received by me from the company. I had meant to table the correspondence which I was holding in my hand at that time, but at the last moment I saw on Dr. Brisbin's letter that it was marked "Confidential". This was when I went into a meandering account of the contents of that correspondence.

I am afraid that when I said, to quote my words as reported in Hansard at page 1092, that "there was no specific mention in their letter of the actual possibility that it was going to be taken over", I may have misled the House. Therefore, to avoid any confusion, now that Dr. Brisbin himself has given copies of his file, may I give copies of my file to members of the House and table the said correspondence?

Mr. Speaker: The minister is seeking the assent of the House to table certain correspondence to which he has referred. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ATOMIC ENERGY

STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON THE COMING INTO OPERATION OF GENTILLY NUCLEAR POWER STATION

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to report to the House an event of more than ordinary significance. This is the bringing into operation last night of the reactor at the Gentilly Nuclear Power Station, on the St. Lawrence River downstream from Trois-Rivières.

Gentilly not only is the first nuclear power station in Quebec, it is the first of its kind—a prototype. Like the other nuclear plants in operation or under construction in Canada, it uses natural uranium as fuel and heavy water as the moderator, but where the coolant in the others is pressurized heavy water, the coolant in Gentilly is boiling light, or ordinary, water.

Having in mind the many difficulties and complications that were bound to transpire, some predictable and others unforeseen, it would have been understandable had those responsible declined to make any forecast of how long it would take them to do the job. What the AECL/Hydro-Quebec team in fact did was set for itself, and publicly announce, a tight four-year schedule.

Despite technological innovations, despite a strike that halted work for five months, despite delays in deliveries of key items, despite numerous other problems, they made it. It was four years ago this past October that the first sod was turned at the site; it was on November 2 four years ago that excavation started.

At the outset, one of the primary, declared aims of the signatories was to have engineers and technologists of the province of Quebec take a leading part in the design, construction and operation of the station. This policy was observed, not just to the letter but in the spirit as well. Personnel from Hydro-Quebec and Quebec industrial firms participated in all stages of the design. Hydro-Quebec staff were trained to operate the plant. Every document and drawing pertaining to the station was produced in the two official languages. The conventional part of the station—that is, that portion outside the nuclear system—was designed by a team of Quebec consultants. Hydro-Quebec acted as prime contractor at the site, with responsibility for station construction.

The result of all this has been the establishment in Quebec of a solid body of knowledge, experience and skill upon which to draw and build when the time comes to commit nuclear power stations of commercial size in the province.

I should like to close these remarks, Mr. Speaker, by extending congratulations to all those who had a part in the Gentilly project. I congratulate them for their magnificent achievement and for bearing testimony to the fact that the barriers and frontiers so much talked about these days do not stop men of good will from co-operating in a constructive way. Nuclear science is alive and well in the province of Quebec.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join very briefly with the minister in commending those who are jointly responsible for this venture and innovation in connection with the development of power through this means. I am particularly glad that at this time the minister is able to announce that this development is taking place in the province of Quebec. After listening to his comments about the problems which have been experienced may I say it is most commendable that they were able to surmount them. I hope that other developments will follow which will provide some means of utilizing the power to be generated at this plant.

Finally, I trust that the difficulties we have been experiencing in this country in the last few weeks will not blind the government to the necessity of providing other sources of jobs for the people of the province of Quebec particularly and in the country as a whole. The difficulties we will be facing this winter certainly justify the government turning its attention to the development of a program along the lines of some of the proposals made during the course of the debate yesterday.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I too should like to extend my congratulations and best wishes to Hydro-Quebec and Atomic Energy of Canada. I visited the Gentilly plant just a few weeks ago and was quite impressed with the possibilities of this new style, if you will, of producing atomic energy. The fact that we have been able to produce something different from what is being produced in any other country in the world points up more than ever the necessity for much more research if we would remain ahead in this field.

To be quite frank, if I were a customer for a heavy water or atomic energy plant I would be inclined to wait until this type of plant has been tried out because it has an advantage, as indicated by the minister, in terms of lower capital cost. It also saves a considerable amount in regard to heavy water and heat exchangers, and should also mean lower operating costs for heavy water atomic energy plants.

As indicated by others, this type of plant, particularly if sold in quantity to nations abroad, will provide jobs at a highly technical level for Canadians. I should like to suggest to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that they get busy and go out and sell some of these plants.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I do feel the engineers and staff of Hydro-Quebec, and those of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited should be congratulated on their recent achievement in Gentilly.

Engineers and workers of Quebec have already demonstrated their skill in a very similar field, the construction of dams and electric plants in Manicouagan. The experience they have acquired in building an atomic plant in Gentilly justifies great expectations for the future of that industry in Quebec.

That is a striking example of cooperation between two levels of government and it is to be hoped that natural uranium will serve more and more for peace-time purposes and less and less for war-time industries.

Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said, this is a new venture with regard to the generation of electric energy. We have every reason to believe it will be successful and will be repeated more and more often, since it will permit the development of this type of plant at a lower cost.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING DISCHARGE OF NOXIOUS MATTER INTO INTERPROVINCIAL OR INTERNATIONAL WATERS

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-189, to amend the Criminal Code (Pollution).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, this proposed amendment to the Criminal Code is very simple. It would make it an offence to pollute an interprovincial or international stream or river and thus make pollution which does not affect fish preventable by the same type of penalties as are found under the Fisheries Act where fish are affected.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ANTI-DUMPING ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING TRIBUNAL, INQUIRIES, REPORTS, ETC.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (for the Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill S-6 (from the Senate), to amend the Anti-dumping Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON METHODS OF STIMULATING EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who is not present. I can only point out that neither the Prime Minister nor any minister responsible in the areas of principal concern today—the economy, unemployment, the War Measures Act and related questions—is present today. I want to make it very clear that I understand the absence of the Solicitor General, but in his absence perhaps the Minister of Justice might have been present. I assume there is some explanation for the absence of the Prime Minister as well as these other ministers, and I hope it will be given. However, so far as I am concerned I cannot proceed with any questions today.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. With respect to the reference by the Leader of the Opposition to the attendance of the Minister of Finance, I should like to say that I am here also in my capacity as Acting Minister of Finance and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance is present as well and we are available to answer questions.

Mr. Stanfield: I am delighted, Mr. Speaker. Can the Acting Minister of Finance tell the House whether it is proposed immediately or very soon to have a meeting with provincial representatives to consider ways in which the federal government and the provinces can co-operate in stimulating employment this winter?

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a meeting of finance ministers is scheduled for December 7 and 8 and I would expect that matter might be on the agenda.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to understand there have not been to date and are not now under way any systematic consultations with the provinces to canvass possible methods of stimulating employment this winter? Am I to assume that from what the Parliamentary Secretary said?

Mr. Speaker: I think that the question as asked is certainly argumentative in form. When the Leader of the Opposition asks whether he can assume a conclusion from the answer given by the Parliamentary Secretary, I would think the question is not in order in those terms. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition might rephrase the question.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, are there any systematic consultations under way at present with the provinces to canvass possible methods of stimulating employment this winter through co-operation?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Acting Prime Minister): I must say I was a little surprised at the prelude to the question asked today by the Leader of the Opposition in the matter of unemployment. I want to assure him that the government is fully conscious of the levels of unemployment and fully aware of the necessity of effecting plans and policies that will encourage employment. These are being studied today and have been studied for weeks. It is anticipated that announcements will be made shortly which will have the effect of stimulating employment—

Mr. Ricard: We have been told that for years.

An hon. Member: You don't mean "stimulating", you mean "simulating".

Mr. Laing: —in the field which is the total responsibility of the government and encouraging it in the private sector.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I appreciate the statement by the Minister of Public Works but I wonder if it would be too much for either the Minister of Public Works or the Parliamentary Secretary to answer the question I asked, namely, whether there are under way now any systematic consultations with the provinces with regard to possible methods of stimulating employment?

Mr. Mahoney: I will take that question as notice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There may be a very good reason—I would like to hear it and I think the House would—for the absence of so many ministers and of the Prime Minister today. We do not know who the acting prime minister is and we do not know why these ministers are not here today. Surely we could have that settled. It seems such a waste of time to ask questions in this institution at this time with nobody to answer them. I see Your Honour is getting a little uneasy, but may I point out with the greatest respect that I think it is very important to settle this matter if Parliament is to live at all. There may be a good reason for their absence. If that reason is given to the opposition I am sure we will listen to it and give it the kind of hearing that it deserves, but surely we are entitled to hear it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Perhaps I could indicate on the point of order that there may well have been a very good reason for the absence for two days this week of the Leader of the Opposition. This is only his second day here this week.

An hon. Member: He does not have to answer to the House.

An hon. Member: He is not the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think there should be a debate on the point. I would think the point of order raised by the hon. member for Calgary North is a valid one—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: —but at the same time I do not think it should give rise to a debate.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to the point of order. I do not think that the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Calgary North is an irrelevant one and I think that the kind of answer which the Minister of National Defence gave is irrelevant. I suggest that we should know the reason why the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board, who were due to be here today, are not here. There may well be good reasons for it but we should know them. I had questions for the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. I do not intend to ask a question just to hear a Parliamentary Secretary tell me he will take notice of it. I certainly would not have an answer to the question. I think we should have an explanation from the Acting Prime Minister, who I imagine is the Minister of Public Works, as to why these leaders of the government are not here today when they are due to be here.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, speaking to the matter raised, I want to assure the House that we will endeavour to conduct the House today just as on any ordinary day.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Orlikow: That's the trouble.

Mr. Laing: The laughter engendered on the other side is all part of an act that is being put on today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Laing: I want to renew the statement made to the opposite side of the House that today I have the honour of being Acting Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Laing: There are a number of ministers away today, all for very good reasons, and all of them, with the exception of one, on government business. However, there are ministers here in every case acting for them, or their Parliamentary Secretaries, who are prepared to answer any question which the Leader of the Opposition or any other member on the other side of the House is prepared to ask today. We are waiting for questions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Laing: And we are not going to be satisfied by a statement from the other side to the effect that because the people are not here today that they wanted to ask the questions of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I take exception to the statement of the Acting Prime Minister that somebody is putting on an act on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order. The Leader of the Opposition has the floor.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I think the members of the opposition are quite entitled to express surprise and disappointment, and to seek an explanation when this number of ministers, including the Prime Minister, are not here. While the Acting Prime Minister says they are ready to answer questions, it is very obvious from the two questions I asked that they are not in fact ready or capable of answering questions.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wellington.

Mr. Hales: My supplementary is to a minister who is not here so I do not think I will ask it. I will pass.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary to the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Minister of Public Works. What specific plans do the government and his department have to help the 69,000 people who were unemployed last month in his province of British Columbia, an increase of 50 per cent over the same month last year?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that what he is requesting now is a statement of a general nature. I would not think that the question in those terms is acceptable—

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Mackenzie in a moment since he appears to have a supplementary question, but I would think it would not be in order if members representing different provinces stood in their places, one after another, and asked for a statement on the situations in their respective provinces. I have some doubts whether this would be proper procedure, and so in this light I would think the question as asked is not in order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rises on the point of order that has been under discussion. The Chair has returned to the question period, but if the hon. member has another point of order I will recognize him now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Arising out of the discussion and of the whole situation, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, that the House now proceed to orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It has been moved by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) that the House now proceed to orders of the day. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Knowles, Winnipeg North Centre) which was negatived on the following division:

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: The House will now revert to the question period.

Mr. Cafik: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I feel an attempt has been made to deny me my rights as a member of the House of Commons by the assumption on the part of the opposition that they alone have the right to ask questions in this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: Who is stopping you?

An hon. Member: Go ahead. Ask one.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the right to be heard, even though the opposition may not feel the same way. In my opinion the motion we have just defeated is typical of the arrogance which the opposition consistently shows—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member claimed to be rising on a question of privilege. He should state his question of privilege. He has no right to reflect on a vote.

Mr. Cafik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question of privilege is this: I had intended to ask questions in this House, as did many of my hon. friends on this side—

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Cafik: —and I feel an attempt has been made to deny me my rights as a Member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure that the hon. member's question of privilege requires a ruling. At any rate, he will have heard that we have returned to the question period, and he is free to ask a question now.

TRANSPORT

USE OF RAIL BEDS FOR PRIVATE COMMUTER SERVICES

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. On June 3 I wrote a letter to the minister requesting certain action by the department with respect to commuter transport in metropolitan areas of Canada, particularly in Toronto—

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Cafik: What action has been taken, or what action does the department intend to take, to make available rail beds for private commuter transport services—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has the floor for the purpose of asking a question. If he were to be denied that right it seems to me he might then have a valid question of privilege. In any event, the question has now been asked, and perhaps the minister wishes to reply.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Because of the furor which has been going on I am not sure whether I should answer the hon. member or some of the comments from the other side. They got mixed up and I did not hear the question.

Mr. Speaker: I would think that if the minister did not hear the question the hon. member should repeat it briefly—or what is left of the question period will be taken up by the hon. member's repeated question.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, my question specifically was: What action has been taken, or is intended to be taken, by the Department of Transport in connection with making available rail beds for commuter transport purposes, either by passing legislation or proposing amending legislation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. My understanding is that the hon. member's question asks whether legislation will be introduced, and in those terms the question is acceptable.

An hon. Member: A supplementary question—

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): May I answer the first question first. All this discloses is that the suggestion which occasionally comes from the other side that these questions are planted is clearly not true; otherwise, I would have a better answer for the hon. member. I can only say that we have had discussions with both the province of Ontario and Canadian National. The question really revolves around whether or not a private line of the kind to which the hon. member refers can in fact be assigned the running rights of a common carrier. I will try to get a more explicit answer for the hon. member later.

TORONTO METRO TRANSPORTATION CENTRE

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport whether he can inform the House what is delaying the development of the Toronto metro transportation centre.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, could we go back to the time before the motion when the other side was asking questions!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: Obviously, the competence and incisiveness of the members on this side is far superior. The metro centre really involves a great many private enterprise organizations and the government's role in the centre is essentially peripheral, if I understand it correctly. We are now having negotiations with Canadian National and Canadian Pacific. I believe a group from Canadian National is in Toronto this weekend and is carrying on negotiations with various parties.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN POSITION ON ADMISSION OF PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs or his Parliamentary Secretary. Considering that today the government of Canada was to make a statement at the United Nations with respect to the China question, I wonder whether the Acting Minister or the Parliamentary Secretary can inform the House what position the government will take on the China question?

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to indicate to the House that Ambassador Beaulne has been speaking in the general debate today, and has expressed the view that Canada will vote in favour of the seating of the representatives of the People's Republic of China in the United Nations. In expressing this view he said it is clear that if, in our judgment, continued support of this important resolution could in the future frustrate the will of the General Assembly, the Canadian government will then change its position on the resolution.

INDUSTRY

PHILIPS ELECTRONICS—EFFECT OF LOSS OF CAR RADIO CONTRACT

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the government aware that Philips Electronics Industries Limited have lost a multi-million dollar contract for car radios with the Chrysler Corporation, which could result in the closing of the company's car radio division?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that it is not in order simply to ask whether the minister is aware or is not aware of a particular situation. That, in itself, is not a complete question and it cannot be put in those terms.

Mr. Badanai: Then may I rephrase the question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister any plans to keep this industry going and prevent its closing?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are aware that Chrysler has given this contract to Motorola of the United States. However, my department, in its usual capacity of defender of the common good, has been in touch with the companies involved and Chrysler has agreed to give a part of the contract to Philips in order to help that company adapt to the new situation. My officers also had conversations with Motorola of the United States, and they have assured us they will do all that is possible to place contracts with the Canadian branch of Motorola in Midland, Ontario. It is even possible that some industrial development might be generated from these events.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MONTREAL—LAYOFF OF NORTHERN ELECTRIC EMPLOYEES

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Could he tell the House if it is true that 6,500 employees of Northern Electric in Montreal will be losing their jobs?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there was, in fact, an article—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that he cannot ask a question in that form. He is asking the minister to deny or to confirm a report, and, in that form, the question is not in order.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

First of all, I would like to express the joy felt by the government members upon realizing that the opposition has decided to boycott the question period, as this gives us—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member does not have the floor to express his joy, but to ask a question.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Could he tell the House if the government intends to take measures concerning the announcement that 6,500 employees of Northern Electric will be out of work by Christmas?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I read this report in The Gazette this morning and, as usual, I immediately looked into the matter. This is the situation at the present time: The Northern Electric Company and its employees signed a contract whereby the company must, in the case of a temporary work stoppage, give its employees a 30-day notice, and this is what happened yesterday. The reason for this is the fact that a strike is in progress in one of the company's plant at Bramalea, Ontario. This strike has been going on for some time now. It may be that on account of that, some spare parts may not be available at the Montreal plant, thus bringing about temporary layoffs. Everyone hopes for an early settlement of the strike at Bramalea which would prevent the layoffs.

TRANSPORT

OTTAWA—BUS SERVICE TO RAILWAY STATION

Mr. Georges-C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I want to direct to the Minister of Transport.

Would he tell this House whether it would be possible to operate a bus service between downtown Ottawa and the railway station? In my opinion, this is a serious matter—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is not allowed to deliver a speech at this point but he may ask a question.

Mr. Lachance: This is my question, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to know whether the Minister of Transport is planning to take the necessary action towards the operation of a bus service between downtown Ottawa and Ottawa Union Station?

Mr. Speaker: This question ought to be placed on the order paper.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON ESTABLISHMENT OF FEDERAL DISTRICT

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing. When the chairman of the National Capital Commission states publicly that, in his opinion, a federal district is inevitable, is he speaking for the government and expressing government policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows very well that a question cannot be asked in those terms. A question can be asked about statements made outside the House by cabinet ministers, but not by public servants.

Mr. Francis: Then, may I ask the minister whether it is the policy of the government to establish a federal district in the national capital region.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, it is not government policy to establish a federal district in the national capital region, and the chairman was expressing his own opinion.

NATURAL RESOURCES

CONTRIBUTION TO COST OF RECREATION LAND ACQUIRED BY METRO TORONTO AND REGION CONSERVATION AUTHORITY

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the government reconsidered its recent decision to refuse to contribute to the cost of recreation land acquired under a shared cost program by the Metro Toronto and region conservation authority?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I share with the Minister of Transport the thought that it will be a very happy day for the frontbenchers on this side when we revert to the normal procedure.

This is a matter that is under advisement. Of course, we are bound by the legislation and cannot specifically share in the cost of recreation land, but we are studying methods of assuring that no recreation land has to be disposed of by the Metropolitan Toronto conservation authority, so that the attractiveness of the entire scheme may be maintained.

Mr. Kaplan: Will the minister advise the House when the government may be in a position to make an announcement on this subject?

Some hon. Members: Soon, soon.

Mr. Greene: In the near future.

AIRPORTS

MANAGEMENT OF FACILITIES OPERATED BY CITIES

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Is it the policy of the Department of Transport to take over management of city operated airports where the city does not have the proper resources to provide adequate facilities for the travelling public?

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I thank hon. members for their assistance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I, too, will say "order". I suggest to the hon. member he is inviting a statement of policy and in those terms his question is not in order.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—CONTINUATION OF CABINET COMMITTEE

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has he received any indication from the new Atlantic provinces' governments that they intend to follow in the steps of the previous governments by maintaining the Atlantic provinces cabinet committee on transportation for continued co-operation with the federal government—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Corbin: —in an honest and serious effort to solve that regions perennial transportation problems?

[Mr. Kaplan.]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, before answering the question may I welcome hon. members of the opposition to the Liberal caucus.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: The answer is that I have already had communications with the new premier of the province of Nova Scotia. Of course, the new premier of New Brunswick was sworn in only yesterday and there have not been opportunities for that kind of consultation. I have every reason to believe that both governments will agree to maintaining the committee to which the hon. member refers.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER—CONSTRUCTION OF NEW BRIDGE

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): It is an easy one to answer. Can the minister advise the House when construction will begin on the new bridge to the Vancouver International airport?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubts, even if the question is easy, whether the minister should be allowed to reply, as I am really not aware of the urgency of the matter. If there is urgency, I should think the question might be considered at the time of adjournment.

An hon. Member: At ten o'clock.

FINANCE

POLICIES TO ASSIST PULP AND PAPER INDUSTRY TO COMPETE MORE EFFECTIVELY AND REDUCE POLLUTION

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Finance. Can he indicate to the House whether new policies will shortly be announced designed to assist the pulp and paper industry to compete more effectively in the international market, while at the same time helping it to abate its pollution problem here in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is acceptable only to the extent that the hon. member is inviting the minister to indicate whether a statement will be made.

Hon. Herb Gray (Acting Minister of Finance): I am not in a position to give such an indication at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL SECURITY

WAR MEASURES ACT—ARRESTS, RELEASES, CONTINUING DETENTIONS AND CHARGES

Mr. Rud L. Whiting (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he can give the House up to date figures on those people arrested and charged under the War Measures Act, as well as those released, in the province of Quebec?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we had better move the hon. member back to the right side of the House.

An hon. Member: You are not supposed to be here today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You haven't read the roster.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am neither here nor not here. I am waiting for the debate to begin on a very important bill and I am looking forward to that.

As of 8:30 this morning the figures were: Arrested, 447; released, 383; detained, 64, and rearrested, 1. Of the 64 detained, 41 were previously charged with 63 offences, 19 under the Criminal Code and 14 under the War Measures Act regulations. Of the 23 remaining, six are under coroner's warrant, three are charged under Section 62 of the Criminal Code and Section 4(a) of the War Measures Act regulations, one charged under Section 4(d) of the War Measures Act regulations and one under Section 4(a) and 4(d) of the War Measures Act regulations. There are 12 cases under study.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

RETIRED EMPLOYEES' PENSIONS—ACTION TO IMPLEMENT COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION FOR INCREASE

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that this week the government tabled a bill dealing with CNR financing, I should like to ask the government whether it has approached the Canadian National Railways regarding the report of the transport committee on CNR pensions, and whether the CNR will take any steps to revise its pension program before we discuss the bill that was tabled this week?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I have answered this question on previous occasions, Mr. Speaker. The decision of the transport committee, and the concurrence in that decision by the House were conveyed formally to the officials of the CNR. Of course, the matter is now being considered by them.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSING

INVESTMENT OF PENSION FUNDS IN RESIDENTIAL MORTGAGES

Mr. Keith Hymmen (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for housing. Can he advise the House whether meetings have been held or will be arranged with investment people and pension fund administrations with regard to the financing of housing programs?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks during the throne speech debate I indicated that such a meeting was being planned. I can indicate to the House now that the date has been set for December 8. We have issued invitations to those charged with administering investment portfolios of major pension funds from across the country to meet with me and some of my colleagues in Ottawa on that date for the purpose of enticing them into further investment of their funds in residential mortgages.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hymmen: I have a supplementary question. I should like to ask the minister whether further meetings are being planned with the approved lenders, the banks and trust companies, to stimulate the flow of mortgage money.

Mr. Andras: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did meet with financial institutions, the banks, trust and insurance companies, a month or so ago, and we have scheduled another meeting which will probably take place early in January.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF GAS WELL BLOWOUT ON PANARCTIC DRILLING PROGRAM AND ECOLOGY—SAFETY MEASURES

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the minister say whether he has any information in respect of the situation surrounding the gas well blowout on King Christian Island? Has the blowout been capped and, if not, what steps are being taken to cap it?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the blowout on King Christian Island should not have any harmful effect on future drilling by Panarctic Oil. We have some consultants in the field now trying to find ways and means of stopping the blowout. I must advise that we are very happy because this is a very large discovery of gas. This is further proof that the policy of the government in the north is a good one.

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has any information that Panarctic Oils

Limited, in which this government has a substantial share, did not follow the prescribed drilling practices in its activities on King Christian Island where this gas fire is now taking place?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I can only say to the House that the drilling program was a good one, but there was an error made by the drilling crew on the spot. They had been instructed to stop drilling at 1,800 feet. They did not stop and that is why we had this blowout. The two people who made that error and did not follow the instructions have been fired.

Mr. Anderson: I have a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must bring to the attention of hon. members the fact that there are only a few minutes left before the end of the question period. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

NATIONAL PARKS

PROPOSAL THAT QUETICO PROVINCIAL PARK BE TAKEN OVER

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development answered the last question so well I wish to put another question to him. Would the minister be prepared to enter into negotiations with the province of Ontario with a view to taking over Quetico Provincial Park for the purpose of making it a wilderness national park?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy, if we can come to terms with the Ontario government, to establish more national parks in Ontario. I think the suggestion of the hon. member is a very good one.

TRANSPORT

MAGDALEN ISLANDS—IMPROVEMENT OF FERRY SERVICE

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a very important question to the Minister of Transport.

Could he tell the House what progress is being made in the negotiations between the department and the Quebec government concerning the possibility of making available to the Canadian Transport Commission the M.V. Manic in order to update and improve the ferry service between the Magdalen Islands, in my constituency, and Souris, on Prince Edward Island?

May I add, Mr. Speaker, that we, people of the Magdalens, have long been anxiously expecting some improvement in that field.

Mr. Speaker: I have the impression that the hon. member was trying to make representations instead of putting a question and he must take it for granted that his representations have been noted by the responsible minister.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

PUBLICATION OF CARR REPORT

Mr. Jim McNulty (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport whether the Carr report concerning St. Lawrence Seaway operations has been received by the government and, if so, will it be tabled in the House?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Carr report refers to the St. Lawrence Seaway which has its origin close to Iles-de-Madeleine, where we are looking into the problem referred to by the last hon. gentleman. I am expecting that the study of the Carr report will be complete within a very short time and, at that time, we will make a decision concerning what portions of it and in what form it should be brought forward for public consultation and discussion.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

QUEBEC—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION IN PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Since the premier of Quebec is due to announce, next week, new programs aimed at alleviating unemployment in his province, I should like to know if the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has been consulted concerning its participation to such programs?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we have not yet been advised regarding the projects of the Quebec government, but should the latter ask for our co-operation, it will be granted with pleasure.

SAINT-JEAN—DESIGNATION AS SPECIAL AREA

Mr. Walter Smith (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Can the minister advise the House if plans are being made to include the county of Saint-Jean as a designated area—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recall I suggested yesterday that a question of this nature was not in order at this time.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—ACTION RESPECTING NEW FACILITY

Mr. Ian Wahn (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport. Could he tell the House when we may expect an announcement on action in respect of the new Toronto airport?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): A meeting is scheduled with the premier of Ontario for either Thursday or Friday of next week.

An hon. Member: Before or after he resigns?

Mr. Jamieson: A meeting is scheduled for a week from now with whoever is premier of Ontario. The meeting will be held on Thursday or Friday. At that time it is hoped we can agree on an approach to the whole question and soon thereafter, or soon after the necessary studies are completed, it is our intention to make the studies known to the public and have a full discussion at the regional and municipal level before the decision is made.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The time allotted for the question period has now expired. I apologize to the many hon. members who have not had an opportunity to ask questions today. I will look in their direction next Monday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could announce a change in the government business for today. After discussion, it has been decided not to commence with Government Order No. 36 but instead Government Order No. 24, the committee stage of the Temporary Emergency Powers bill.

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Government House Leader this question which is prompted by a genuine concern for my colleague the Minister of Transport. Will today's question period pre-empt the Liberal caucus on Wednesday?

Mr. Reid: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in view of the question period today, which has been far better than it has been in the last three months, would the Speaker consider providing the members on the other side with—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT, 1970

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY POWERS FOR PRESERVATION OF PUBLIC ORDER

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 10, consideration in committee of Bill C-181, to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada—Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton)—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The House is again in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-181, to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada. When the committee rose on Tuesday, November 10, 1970, clause 4 of the bill was under consideration.

Shall clause 4 carry?

On Clause 4—Offence and Punishment.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: I only wish to make a comment, Mr. Chairman.

According to yesterday's reports, representatives of various Montreal newspapers apparently met to discuss how the regulations, and particularly clause 4, should be interpreted. According to the review published in the papers and particularly in La Presse, it seems that all the information media give a different interpretation to clause 4, and particularly to subclause (c).

We know that under clause 14 of the bill under study, section 4 of the regulations is supposed to be incorporated in Bill C-181. I am glad on the one hand, but on the other hand, I am sorry to find that what I said about the vagueness and the many possible interpretations of clause 4 (c) actually turned out to be true, so much so that on the front page of yesterday's issue of La Presse, the news editor announced that he would have to reverse his opinion and interpret the act differently, since every news editor, following a general meeting, did not agree on the interpretation. Let me remind you that in the regulations, under 4 (c), you find the words "pour le compte de" while in the press release, the words are "en faveur", and finally in the act, the word is "pour".

I would now like to quote a recent judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada on the importance of the agreement between the two wordings. It is the case of Tupper vs The Queen, and in his judgment of June 26, 1967, reported in Vol. II of C.R.N.S. on page 35, Judge Hall stated:

• (12:30 p.m.)

[English]

It can be argued and readily accepted that this may not happen frequently, but it can and may happen if Parliament readily intended what the section says when, without any qualification as to time or circumstance, it put the burden of proof on the person in whose possession any such item may be found.

The interpretation which the wording of the section compels should, I think, be drawn to Parliament's attention.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Idem

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister a question?

The Deputy Chairman: I regret, but the Chair has recognized the hon. member for Abitibi.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I wish to move an amendment to clause 5 because, in my opinion, it is not stringent enough to cope with the present situation.

Clause 5 reads as follows:

—is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

I move that clause 5 become clause 5 (a) and that it be followed by clause 5(b) which would read thus:

A person who, knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that another or other persons are guilty of an offence under clause 4(a), gives that other person any assistance with intent thereby to prevent, hinder or interfere with the apprehension, trial or punishment of that person for that offence is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Abitibi moved that clause 5 should become clause 5A with the addition of clause 5B reading as follows:

5B. A person who, knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that another person or other persons are guilty of an offence under section 4A of this Act, gives that other person any assistance with intent thereby to prevent, hinder or interfere with the apprehension, trial or punishment of that person for that offence is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 14 years.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the purpose of the amendment is to make it an offence for a person who knowingly gives another person—I hope I am translating the amendment correctly—any assistance with intent thereby to prevent, hinder or interfere with the apprehension, trial or punishment of that person for an offence under what is now clause 5 but which would have become clause 4(b) under the amendment earlier proposed by the hon. member and which was defeated in committee.

[Mr. De Bané.]

I want to submit to the hon. member and to the committee that there is no need for this amendment because a person described in the amendment would be an accessory after the fact, pursuant to the provisions of section 23 of the Criminal Code. I want to read that section.

Mr. Baldwin: You are on clause 5?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, the amendment to clause 5 proposed by the hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Baldwin: I thought you said clause 4.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The earlier amendment, had it been passed, would have been clause 4(b), and this one is related to it.

What the hon. member is trying to do is to provide, in effect, an accessory after the fact provision which, I submit, is covered by section 23 of the Criminal Code which reads as follows:

23(1) An accessory after the fact to an offence is one who, knowing that a person has been a party to the offence, receives, comforts or assists him for the purpose of enabling him to escape.

Take that in conjunction with section 406(b) of the Criminal Code which provides that:

everyone who attempts to commit or is an accessory after the fact to the commission of an indictable offence for which, upon conviction, an accused is liable to imprisonment for fourteen years or less, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for a term that is one-half of the longest term to which a person who is guilty of that offence is liable;

Hon. members should take into consideration as well section 119 of the Code which provides that:

Every one who wilfully attempts in any manner to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

Taking these provisions together, I submit that the bill is not improved by the amendment proposed by the hon. member, and for that reason I submit to the committee the amendment should be rejected.

Mr. Baldwin: I would like to make a couple of comments and ask the minister a question to which he might like to reply. He raised a point which has been in my mind since I read clause 5, and that is whether or not section 119 of the Code which he quoted regarding obstruction of justice does not, in the light of the jurisprudence, cover all of the things at which clause 5 is directed. The only change is in the penalty which would be fixed at imprisonment to a term not exceeding five years, rather than to a term not exceeding two years which I think is the penalty under the Criminal Code. Looking at the wording under clause 5 quite carefully it would seem to me, from my experience and my recollection of some of the cases which have gone to the courts of appeal, that practically everything that is prohibited under clause 5 would in fact constitute the basis for a charge being laid and ultimately a conviction being secured if the evidence so provided for obstructing justice. That is the question I wanted to ask the minister.

The other question relates also to the amendment and concerns the word "assistance". The wording reads:

—gives that other person any assistance with intent thereby to prevent, hinder or interfere with the apprehension, trial or punishment—

Has the minister contemplated the extent to which this goes? I suppose it would not cover a witness who is appearing for the accused, nor, hopefully, would it cover his counsel, although one never knows. But what about somebody who provided funds to permit an accused person to sustain a defence? Such a person would, in fact, come squarely within the description of a person who gave to another person charged with an offence assistance to prevent, hinder or interfere with the punishment of that person, but not with his apprehension. I am not trying to be picayune about it, but obviously there is an attempt in this clause to refine and particularize things which in the past have been considered as offences against the obstruction clause. These are two points which have been running through my mind, and I hope that the minister, either at this time or before we have completed our discussion on clause 5, might like to answer them.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I think the words in the bill are fairly clear. The gravamen of the offence is that any assistance that is given, in order to fall within the particular clause, must be given:

—with intent...to prevent, hinder or interfere with the apprehension, trial or punishment of that person—

That in no way would cover any assistance given by way of counsel at the trial. It is put in these precise terms in order that it be made part of the main body of the bill and stand with the bill.

Mr. Baldwin: Wouldn't it cover the prevention of the punishment? I suppose it would be wide enough to cover that.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Well, yes, but prevention of the punishment would, I assume, be an attempt to liberate the accused from whatever custody he was under, and not an attempt to aid the accused in a legitimate defence to the charge.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the minister answer the other question about whether or not these offences established by clause 5 would in fact, under other circumstances, be offences which could be punishable as infractions under section 119 of the Criminal Code because anything which is contemplated here would, under the decided cases, constitute an obstruction of justice? Isn't this provision in the bill only because the government feels there should be an increase in the penalty from two years to five years?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is one of the principal reasons.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Deputy Chairman: The question is on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Abitibi. All those in favour of the adoption of the amendment will please rise.

All those opposed to the amendment will please rise.

And the Second Clerk Assistant having announced the result of the vote as: Yeas, 1; nays, 53:

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Abitibi on a point of order.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, you said, it seems to me, that the amendment did not receive one yea, but two members have risen. I do not know whether the Clerk has counted them.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: I guess this must have been a slip of the tongue on the part of the Clerk. I saw two members who voted for the amendment, and so we will change the record if it is not in order.

Amendment (Mr. Laprise) negatived: Yeas, 2; nays, 53.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, I should like first to mention an error in translation. The word "trial" has been translated by "jugement" whereas in clause 7 this word has been translated by "procès". Therefore I believe that here too we should translate "trial" by "procès".

In addition, I should like to read the version which I should have suggested:

Est coupable d'un acte criminel et passible d'un emprisonnement de cinq ans au plus, quinconque, sachant ou ayant des motifs raisonnables de croire qu'une autre personne est coupable d'une infraction prévue par la présente loi, lui fournit une aide quelconque dans l'intention d'en empêcher, entraver ou gêner ainsi l'arrestation, le procès ou le châtiment pour cette infraction.

As to the form, Mr. Chairman, I see two differences between this clause and section 23 of the Criminal Code. The first is that section 23 of the Criminal Code says "knowing" while here we have "knowing or having reasonable cause to believe".

The severity which is added to clause 5 does not seem necessary to me while the other difference seems to me essential. I think that with this clause 5 we take away both privileges provided in section 23 of the Criminal Code on behalf of the married spouses and I shall read in English both of these exceptions mentioned in the Criminal Code.

[English]

An accessory after the fact to an offence is one who, knowing that a person has been a party to the offence, receives, comforts or assists him for the purpose of enabling him to escape.

There are two exceptions in the Criminal Code, and these are outlined in section 23(2) and (3) as follows:

No married person whose spouse has been a party to an offence is an accessory after the fact to that offence by receiving, comforting or assisting the spouse for the purpose of enabling the spouse to escape.

And:

No married woman whose husband has been a party to an offence is an accessory after the fact to that offence by receiving, comforting or assisting in his presence and by his authority any other person who has been a party to that offence for the purpose of enabling her husband or that other person to escape.

[Translation]

I consider inadmissible the rejection of those two exceptions, since they are based, I should say almost in their proper sense—on natural law. This amounts clearly to setting aside principles issuing from the British law. We no longer even make the distinction established by the Criminal Code in cases of murder or rape allowing the wife to receive her husband because he is part of her own flesh.

Then, the wife who will receive her husband at her home, help him escape and hide him shall be guilty. This is absolutely contrary to the basis of our criminal law according to which a wife is not obliged to give evidence against her husband. A wife is one with her husband as a husband is one with his wife.

Against our own will, with legislations of this kind designed to rid us of terrorist people attempting to destroy freedom in our country, we might ruin our society. Let us try at least not to break our families, for it is painful to think that we are reaching such a notion.

I wish also to point out—and I think I have already proved it—that this law interferes with the principle of strict responsibility, or that at least it is possible that it be interpreted in that sense.

This clause in its wording, particularly in French, could prohibit preventing a lawyer from defending his client or, for example, from taking exceptional procedures like a brief of prohibition to prevent the sentence to be passed.

But in any event, Mr. Chairman, I move one amendment only, which reads as follows: That the following words be added at the beginning of clause 5 on line 1 before the words "A person who,":

"Subject to subsections (2) and (3) of section 23 of the Criminal Code,".

The Deputy Chairman: Order please. It is proposed by the hon. member for Matane to add the following words to clause 5:

"Subject to subsections (2) and (3) of section 23 of the Criminal Code,"— —and to insert them at the beginning of the clause, on line 1, before the words:

"A person who,"—

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I rose earlier, but you recognized the hon. member for Abitibi, to ask the minister a question precisely on the point which is dealt with by the amendment which is now before the committee. I have had a number of letters and phone calls drawing attention to the fact that clause 5 does not have the exceptions which section 23 of the Criminal Code has, so that the wife of an arrested man would be unable to feed her husband or to stay with him in her house, nor would the husband of a woman be able to do so.

Before moving an amendment, I should like to ask the minister why this exception was left out of clause 5. Does he have any objection to the hon. member's amendment? It sounds an almost obviously sensible one in the circumstances. There is no reason why criminals in this situation or their wives should be treated differently from criminals covered by the Code generally.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the clause certainly does not mean that the wife of an unapprehended person otherwise caught within the provisions of the bill and who continues to live with her husband, is guilty of any offence. As I said, the gravamen of the offence is that any assistance must be given "with intent thereby to prevent, hinder or interfere with the apprehension, trial or punishment..."

With regard to the point raised in section 23(2) of the Criminal Code, perhaps we can stand that over the lunch period and I will think about it.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister misunderstood—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The difficulty is that the hon. member for Matane gave us no notice of the amendments he intends to bring forward.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

Last week, a private talk was to be arranged for me with the minister but, because of his duties in the House, the minister was not able to meet me. He was represented by high-ranking officials who have taken note of everything I said. I cannot admit what has just been said, Mr. Chairman, anymore than the accusation directed at me a few days ago for having submitted three different versions of the expression "unlawful association". I was glad to see that Hansard was in complete contradiction with the accusation made by the minister.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On the point raised by the hon. member for York South, Mr. Chairman, the intention was quite deliberately to exclude section 23(2) of the Criminal Code, because of the nature of the conspiracy we are dealing with and in order to disuade anyone from assisting in the escape of persons in this particular conspiracy of the FLQ. The clause is put in the terms that any person who gives any assistance with intent thereby to prevent, hinder or interfere with the apprehension, trial or punishment, is guilty. There is nothing within that clause which covers the case of an accused who continues to live with his wife or the wife who continues to live with the accused. The words are quite clear, "to prevent, hinder or interfere with the apprehension, trial or punishment..."

It is because of the serious nature of this particular conspiracy that we excluded the remainder of section 23(1) and 23(2) of the Criminal Code from the bill.

Mr. Lewis: Of course, I agree that this is a particular situation and obviously the law underlines the fact that it is a particularly evil kind of conspiracy. But, Mr. Chairman, the acts performed by the conspirators are acts which are covered in the Criminal Code.

I hope I am not misunderstood when I say this, but any kidnapping is a kidnapping no matter who the person involved may be. I am sure the minister agrees with that. Whether it is a minister of labour, a Member of Parliament, a foreign officer from another country, a man, woman or child, kidnapping is a heinous crime.

I appreciate that conspiracy is a different sort of thing. Clause 4 does not deal with the worst of the crimes such as kidnapping or murder, but deals only with such things as being a member of the organization and being a member of the conspiracy, crimes which are covered by the Criminal Code, but a person who kidnaps or murders somebody in any context is a murderer and a kidnapper.

I do not want to make a federal case out of this, but I am concerned that the wife of a person who falls under this law could be put in the almost inhuman position of being forced to hand her husband over to the police or to refuse to take him into the house. Of course, if he is trying to escape arrest, I understand that. That is the way I read the clause unless I am mistaken.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Clause 5 of the bill reads:

> A person who, knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that another person is guilty of an offence under this act, gives that other person any assistance with intent thereby to prevent, hinder or interfere with the apprehension, trial or punishment of that person for that offence...

So it is only an offence under clause 4 of this bill that is covered, not an offence that may be charged under the Criminal Code. Offences such as kidnapping, murder, sedition, carrying an unlawful weapon, are offences which would be covered by section 23(2) of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Lewis: This is precisely the point I was making, Mr. Chairman, but I must have failed to make myself clear.

What the minister is saying is that the wife of the man who kidnapped Mr. Laporte, and the man who murdered Mr. Laporte, would be able to escape the provisions of section 23(1) of the Criminal Code and give him whatever succor a wife gives in that situation. But the man who did not kidnap Mr. Laporte, did not murder him, but who is charged with an offence of being a member of an organization without being charged with any of the really criminal and evil acts, cannot be given such succor by his wife.

I suggest to the minister that this is not consistent and that he and others should take a careful look at this kind of provision.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The purpose of this bill is to render inefficient and to immobilize the FLQ, and clause 4 relates to that. It is because of this exceptional problem that this exceptional measure, and the bill itself, are needed. It is for the same reason that the exclusion of section 23(2) of the Criminal Code is needed.

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: It being one o'clock, the committee will rise until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose at one o'clock an amendment to clause 5 of Bill C-181, moved by the hon. member for Matane, was under consideration.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the Minister of Justice might indicate what consideration has been given to this amendment.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I have considered the matter over the lunch hour. I am just looking for my copy of the bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister can have mine.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member may need his copy. Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre makes very useful contributions on legal points when his legal colleagues, the hon. members for York South and for Greenwood, are not here. At times the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has participated in legal debates with great skill.

Mr. Lewis: He is a better lawyer than those of us who are lawyers.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, as I said prior to luncheon, the purpose of the exclusion, or of the implied exclusion with respect to section 23(2) of the Criminal Code, is quite specific. The exclusion applies only to offences under the bill, and primarily to offences under clause 4 of the bill. Because of the nature of the FLQ, the nature of the association and the nature of the conspiracy, because this is an exceptional bill for a limited period of time and because the purpose of the bill is to root out the FLQ, it is the considered judgment of those whose advice I have sought, and it is advice which I support, that the exclusion ought to be maintained here.

I want to make it clear that the provision does not go to the mere fact of a husband and wife living together. That is not involved at all. It must be an act to prevent or inhibit the apprehension or trial or punishment of someone accused under this bill. That would mean that it would have to be something more than mere living together as husband and wife. That situation is not caught or involved unless there is an active participation in preventing the apprehension. I have considered the point raised by the hon. member for Matane and the hon. member for York South, and in ordinary times my instincts would run the same way. However, I am now suggesting to the committee that it should turn down the amendment.

[Translation]

While I have the floor, Mr. Chairman, as I stated previously, I had the French text of the bill revised and confirmed on several occasions.

The hon. member for Matane stated once again that in his opinion the translation was not accurate adding that he had compared the meaning of the word "trial" with that of the word "jugement". I have inquired of the chief translator and of two other lawyers of the Quebec Bar, both French-speaking and civilists. They stated that the word "jugement" is not taken here in the restricted sense of "décision judiciaire", but rather in the general sense of the action of judging, which is moreover the first meaning of "jugement" appearing in dictionaries.

The legal dictionary of Jéraute gives to the word "jugement" the same meaning as that of the English word "trial".

The hon. member for Matane certainly knows of several usual French expressions where the word "jugement" has the same meaning as the English word "trial". One may say, for instance, "passer en jugement", "le jugement d'un accusé", "poursuivre quelqu'un en jugement".

I have at hand the two versions given in the dictionary. The French-speaking legal advisers of our department are not only members of the Quebec Bar, but also specialists of the French language.

Mr. De Bané: May I ask a question of the Minister of Justice? Does he not consider it desirable that, in a same act, the same word not be translated in different ways? For example, in clause 5—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must tell the hon. member that, even if the Chair allowed the minister to clarify the word "jugement", it might be better, at this point, to make a decision with regard to the first amendment of the hon. member for Matane, this would then enable the House to vote on the second amendment of the hon. member, asking that the word "jugement" be replaced by the word "procès". At that time, the debate could perhaps be more detailed.

So, if the hon. member for Matane wants to make a few comments, I would ask him to refer as little as possible to an amendment which will be dealt with later.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, according to the hon. minister's reply I might be prepared to withdraw my amendment on the word "jugement". I wanted to ask him a question in order to expedite our proceedings and, according to his reply, I might withdraw the amendment and save the House's time.

The Deputy Chairman: I will point out to the hon. member that his amendment is not now before the House. I feel we should deal with the amendment on section 23 of the Criminal Code, after which the hon. member will be quite free to put his question to the hon. minister.

• (2:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Lewis: I want to say a word in reply to what the minister has said. I am fully aware that we are dealing with an unusual situation. I know the minister, and I appreciate his sincerity when he says that normally his instincts would go in the same direction as ours. What concerns us here is the morality involved in making a wife turn her husband over to the police, which is, in effect, what this means. The exception to section 23 is based upon simple human morality, simple human relationships. It is nothing extraordinary. I cannot accept the minister's explanation.

I do not see that the purpose which this bill sets out to achieve would be harmed to such an extent as to justify excluding the exceptions which are in the Criminal Code in favour of a spouse. I do not see how the purposes of the bill would be so badly hurt that we should pass an act which says, in effect, to a wife or a husband: If your spouse is being chased by the police and comes into the home you are to forget your relationship as spouse and hand him over to the police, or lock the door in his face, or refuse to give him food. This is the kind of everyday thing which is involved in what we are now discussing. If the minister could persuade me that to omit this provision embodying the humane attitude of section 23 of the Criminal Code was absolutely essential in order to achieve the purposes of the bill it would be a different story, but I cannot for the life of me see how this is the case, and so I have to support the amendment of the hon. member for Matane.

Mr. McCleave: Like other hon. members, I have given anxious consideration to the amendment before us. There are really two considerations which have to be balanced in the scale. First, every means must be available of tracking down those involved in the FLQ conspiracy. Then, there arises an extremely valid social consideration with respect to husband and wife. Marriage is perhaps the strongest single element which contributes to society; great as the needs of the state may be, we should none the less have due regard for marriage. It is a balance of interests which is involved here, but in this instance I vote for marriage as opposed to the requirements of the state. I must, accordingly, support the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Matane.

Mr. Cafik: I should like to ask the minister to clarify one or two points following the comments which have been made on clause 5 and the amendment. As I read the clause, I can find no obligation whatsoever upon a husband or a wife to take any direct action to turn a suspected partner over to the police. All I see in the clause is that a person can do nothing to directly help somebody evade the law, who is suspected of being guilty of an offence. If a wife who suspected her husband was a member of the FLQ continued to live with him, and to provide him with food and so on in the course of normal marital relations, I cannot see that she would be guilty of any offence under the clause. If I am wrong, I may have to reconsider my decision. I should like to hear the minister clarify this point before I make up my mind.

Mr. Lewis: Suppose she knows the police are looking for him?

Mr. Cafik: I see no obligation imposed on her by this clause to turn her husband over to the police.

Mr. Lewis: She has to kick him out of the house.

Mr. Cafik: The hon. member for York South says she has to kick her husband out of the house. That, in my personal opinion, is not the case.

Mr. Gibson: It is a misleading statement.

Mr. Cafik: I do not see why we should pursue an argument of that kind. There can be legitimate criticism of this clause without creating hypothetical situations which, in my view, do not apply. The Minister of Justice is surely in a position to express a better and more intelligent opinion, and I should like to know exactly what his views are in this respect so that I may be able to make an intelligent decision as a responsible Member of Parliament.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The interpretation placed upon the clause by my hon. friend from Ontario is the interpretation which I have been given, and I think he is perfectly correct. There is nothing here which means that a wife of an unapprehended member of the FLQ who goes on living with her husband is guilty of an offence. The gravamen of the provision is that any assistance which is given must be with intent to prevent, hinder or interfere with his apprehension.

Mr. Lewis: I do not want to go around in circles—

Mr. Cafik: Then, don't.

Mr. Lewis: If the closed minds across the way would open a little, it might do some good.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Look who's talking!

Mr. Lewis: I do not disagree with the emphasis placed on the clause by the minister, but if a wife, for example, knows that her husband is being sought by the police yet continues to have him in the house and, maybe, lock the door at night or even during the day, with intent, if you like—I do not know just how you get into the wife's mind—to protect her husband, if she does these things knowing the police are looking for him, and the police finally get into the house and take the man prisoner, then in my submission she is subject to a charge under clause five.

Mr. Gibson: Wrong.

Mr. Lewis: I knew the father of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth.

Mr. Gibson: The son is a politician. He has nothing to do with it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair would appreciate it if the hon. member for York South could continue his remarks.

Mr. Lewis: Perhaps one of his hon. friends could take the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth outside and pat him on the head. I was going to say something stronger, but I decided not to, so don't pull my tongue. It is obvious to me that the meaning of the clause is the one I have attributed to it. What it also means in terms of human relationships is that the wife in such a case would certainly believe that she was guilty of an infraction of this law if she let her husband into the house, and allowed him to stay in the house instead of locking him out where the police could get him. I appreciate that we cannot give a definite interpretation of a statute here in this chamber, particularly when it has to do with criminal offences. The final interpretation will be given by the courts. We may argue back and forth, but we can never be sure of the conclusion the court will reach. One knows of judgments that have gone in the direction opposite to the interpretation put on sections by lawyers or laymen.

The fact is that the presence of this section in the law, particularly when section 23 of the Criminal Code specifically excepts the spouse and no such exception is made here, obviously means that the spouse will be in a tough, an inhuman spot, in relation to his or her partner. It would be inhuman to do this unless one can be persuaded beyond any doubt that without such provision the law cannot do its job, and there is no evidence of that.

There are other relationships in a family. I am not suggesting that sons or daughters be excepted when the criminal law does not except them, even though they too would be in a tough spot. However, the relationship of man and wife has been recognized in the laws of every civilized nation for ages, as well as in the criminal law, and in my submission failure to recognize it in this clause has not been supported by argument.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I wonder why the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) does not approve straight off the amendment moved by the member for Matane (Mr. De Bané), because, according to my interpretation—and I think that many will be of my opinion—the penalty is much stiffer for the spouse of a FLQ member than for the one who did a kidnapping, or a murder after a kidnapping. In the latter case, the Minister told us, if I am not mistaken, that section 23 of the Criminal Code could intervene in favour of the spouse, while the spouse who only belongs to the FLQ, for example, could be prosecuted.

If this is not the case, Mr. Chairman, I wonder why this provision should not be included in clause 5 in order to clarify the act.

[English]

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the comments made by the hon. member for York South, and I feel obligated to make known to the House that I believe what he calls questions of fact are not fact, at least in my view. I do not think clause 5 in any way requires a wife to refuse to give food, lodging and shelter or the other things I referred to earlier, to her husband. For that reason, I cannot support this amendment.

I think it is insulting to many of us to suggest that those who would vote otherwise do not recognize the intimate, close and important association between a husband and wife. Certainly, I recognize it and I am sure all hon. members do. It is a matter of judgment as to how we feel this provision applies to that relationship. There is nothing in the bill to obligate her to do any specific act that would in any way interfere with her marital responsibilities. Therefore, I oppose the amendment.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the Minister of Justice reiterate two or three times his view that this clause does not mean that the simple act of a husband or wife allowing his or her spouse to remain in the same dwelling will constitute an offence under this provision. A similar view was expressed by the hon. member for Ontario.

I should like to ask the minister what he considers the clause to mean in a situation where, for example, the husband, who may have been a member of the FLQ, has been informed that the police are carrying out a search and can be expected to arrive at his dwelling; the husband decides to leave and informs his wife where he intends to go. The authorities then arrive and she neglects or refuses to inform them of his whereabouts. Would that create an offence under clause 5, according to the minister's understanding of it?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the operative words are "prevent, hinder or interfere".

Mr. Barnett: It is precisely because those are the words that I put that question to the minister. Would she not be preventing, hindering or interfering with the apprehension of her husband if she neglected or refused to tell the police where he had gone after leaving the house? Do not those words mean exactly that?

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I do not think so, Mr. Chairman, though, as the hon. member for York South said, the courts would have to decide that. However, I do not think so and that is the advice that I have been given.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is right when he states that this section allows a woman to allow her husband in her home. However it must be kept in mind that the privileges granted under paragraphs (2) and (3) of section 23 . . .

[English]

These privileges are not granted in the case of crime, whether it be murder, treason or rape. They are concentrated, I would say, in the natural law. Suppose a woman helps prevent the apprehension of her husband, for example, by lending him her wig or driving him away from the house while concealed under the back seat of the family car. Under the Criminal Code married people are given certain privileges, and in this case it would be difficult to imagine how she could resist pressure brought on her for reasons other than love or pity. I suggest such a privilege would extend to all married people who helped each other, even though he or she is acting wrongly. It is a privilege based on human nature and dates back centuries.

While the minister may be right when he says that mere cohabitation of both married people in the same house does not mean the wife is trying to prevent the husband's apprehension, nevertheless if she does prevent his apprehension then, according to the Criminal Code, she is innocent, whatever the crime be. Love or pity of one spouse for another should not be tantamount to being an accomplice after the fact.

This is what I wanted to say to my friend from Ontario. Although he may be correct in his interpretation, I am really talking about preventing apprehension by a wife lending her husband her wig or driving him away in the trunk of the car. The Criminal Code grants a privilege to either husband or wife in such matters, whatever the crime, a privilege that dates back centuries. I do not think this is the time, when we are making good law to deal with the FLQ, to enact such a provision as this.

Mr. Cafik: Let me point out to the hon. member for Matane that I sympathize with his views. I understand why he feels that in respect of this temporary public order bill, he should concern himself with those protections normally applied to a husband and wife under the Criminal Code. I feel that this particular provision we are looking at in Bill C-181 is of a temporary nature to protect the public against crimes of subversion and violence, and this affects the common good of all people. I believe the common interest of all Canadians supersedes a particular interest such as the hon. member for Matane has in mind. If this were a permanent piece of legislation, designed in the same way as the Criminal Code, I would be inclined to support his position. In view of the temporary nature and the importance of the problem the bill is designed to resolve, I feel it is imperative that anyone aiding and abetting someone who is guilty of these criminal actions should be subject to these regulations. After all, they are designed to protect the interest and security of everyone in the nation.

For this reason, and despite my good feelings for the hon. member for Matane who I hope will respect my judgment, I find it impossible to support this amendment.

Mr. McCleave: Let's vote and cut out the guff.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, are the members of the FLQ supermen, so that we must set aside all the ordinary considerations for human beings which the hon. member for Matane mentioned we had held for centuries? Can they do things that no ordinary criminals have ever been able to do over the years?

An hon. Member: They did.

Mr. Gleave: They did? They did kidnap people, but this has been done before. They have murdered people, and this has been done before. Are they supermen who can make themselves invisible or do something that makes it necessary for us to set aside all human considerations? It is suggested that the measure is temporary, but if you abridge a law is it important whether you do so for six months or six years? The ordinary human considerations will be abridged for the same length of time. I think the hon. member for Matane has a point.

Mr. Peters: I should like to ask the minister a question. An argument has been made by the hon. member for Matane and answered by the hon. member for Ontario. The Criminal Code affords this protection to a spouse, but the bill we have before us does not afford the same protection. Both hon. members feel there is some justification for this situation. Why is it not possible for the minister to move an amendment which would adopt this protection directly from the Criminal Code rather than having this exception?

Mr. McCleave: He doesn't want to do it, that's why.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This bill, having the specific purpose of immobilizing the FLQ, grants certain departures from the regular provisions of the Criminal Code for a limited period of time. Among those are extended powers of arrest without warrant, detention before a charge, suspension of bail except at the instance of the attorney general of the province, search without warrant and other powers allied to this apprehending and investigatory process. These powers are unusual and extraordinary, and they are so because we are dealing with what we believe to be an extraordinary situation. I do not want to go over the debate on second reading again, but that is the reason the particular exclusion referred to in the amendment of the hon. member for Matane is made.

Mr. Peters: Am I wrong in assuming that a person who is charged under the Criminal Code for a serious offence will still have this protection, and that the protection will not apply to those charged under this act with things which are really of a relatively simple nature? Serious crimes, such as murder and kidnapping, will still come under the Criminal Code so the people charged with those offences will still have the protection but the protection will not be provided for people who are guilty of simple things, such as membership in an organization. I do not see how affording this protection to a married person would interfere at all with the purpose of the bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Deputy Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment will please rise. All those opposed will please rise.

Amendment (Mr. De Bané) negatived: Yeas, 17; nays, 39.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

The Chair has a second amendment by the hon. member for Matane.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, I would be ready to withdraw my amendment after asking a question of the hon. minister. Is it proper to suggest that in a bill it would be advisable to use the same words in both languages, or that the words should be translated in identical terms? For instance, the minister has given us a very good explanation which indicates that "trial" in English might mean "jugement" in French. In clause 7 we see the word "trial" used five times, whereas in the French version we see the word "procès" used five times. Is it not advisable that in the same bill the same word should be translated exactly the same, from a technical drafting point of view?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Not necessarily, Mr. Chairman. The same word in English may be used in different ways and in each way it would be translated by a different French word. Reciprocally, there are words in French which may be used in different ways and each way would require a different English word to meet that use. So, in clause 5 it may be that the word "trial" has a more substantive and global meaning than it does in clause 7 which deals with the procedure of a trial during the course of that trial. The procedure of a trial during the course of a trial is perhaps more accurately translated by the word "procès" but a reference to the trial from beginning to end is probably better translated by the word "jugement".

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. De Bané: I withdraw my amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: There is no need to withdraw the amendment because it has not been put.

Shall clause 5 carry?

Clause 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—Idem.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, I should like to move an amendment to clause 6. The amendment would strike out all the words in clause 6 beginning at the word "or" in line 16 on page 4 down to and including the word "policies" in line 20. The new wording, therefore, would read:

6. An owner, lessee, agent or superintendent of any building, room, premises or other place who knowingly permits therein any meeting of the unlawful association or of any branch, committee or members thereof, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine of not more than five thousand dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years or to both.

If we look at the unamended wording, the argument might be the following: The first part of the clause provides that anyone who knowingly permits any meeting of the unlawful association or of any branch and so on, in the given premises will be subject to the punishment outlined at the end of the clause. This is fine because there is already established legal precedent on this matter in the Criminal Code. Anyone who knowingly permits a group of bank robbers to assemble on his premises before they set out to rob a bank is appropriately chargeable under the Criminal Code. In this amendment, I would strike out the following words:

—or any assemblage of persons who advocate or promote the unlawful acts of, or the use of the unlawful means advocated by, the unlawful association for accomplishing its aims, principles or policies—

I shall briefly state the reason for the omission of those words. The brevity should not be taken as an indication that it is an unimportant point because I think it is extremely important. Why should a person who knowingly permits an assemblage of persons, who ultimately advocate or support an unlawful association, be subject to this kind of punishment if in fact he did not know what that assemblage intended to do. He does know he is going to have an assemblage and has permitted that to take place, a meeting of some sort. However, this is quite different from the situation which would exist when one might argue that it is appropriate to punish a person for knowingly permitting a conspiratorial or criminal association to meet. It is one thing to take that position and quite another to say that a man should be guilty of an offence simply because he permits a group of people to come together who eventually engage in criminal activity. That would seem to be indefensible. That is the first point.

The second point, which is not unrelated to the first point, is that quite apart from the interpretation of the law as it reads now in the clause which I am proposing be amended, which would have the effect of extending the category of groups which would be excluded from the right to assemble, this would permit, and in fact in my judgment encourage, the police to harass a variety of dissident groups, say in the province of Quebec, at this time. I think this is an extremely important point in terms of the maintenance of civil liberties, particularly the right of freedom of speech and freedom of assembly. If this wording should remain, the police could not necessarily obtain a conviction but could harass meetings of the Parti Quebecois, for example, and could harass meetings of students who wanted to get together simply to discuss the idea of separatism, either in the violent form associated with the FLQ or in the non-violent form associated with the Parti Quebecois.

In other words, the wording in this clause as it now stands could have the same effect in terms of the political climate of Quebec as the old padlock law had in that province. Following the argument of the Minister of Justice to the effect that the real purpose of this bill is to get at the FLQ, it would seem to me that nothing would be lost by simply retaining the first six and half lines of the clause and striking out the part I propose be struck out. But there is a real and important danger of severely inhibiting the free expression of ideas if that central part of the clause remains. I would suggest this change is important, not only to the civil rights of the individuals who might be affected but also in the broader sense for the political life of Quebec and, indeed, of Canada. If this clause should be given the broad interpretation, which I contend the police could give it, and if the police were to embark even in the next few months during the life of this legislation on a program of harassing legitimate separatist organizations such as democratic separatist organizations in the province of Quebec, then I for one would have very great apprehension concerning the future of Canada, and particularly the relationship between the province of Quebec and the government of Canada.

I could see such a situation sparking a very strong movement—I am saying this is a distinct and real possibility and therefore one that we must consider—of thousands of civilized French Canadians, who up until this point have not decided on the separatist option, into the separatist camp. If that should happen, then we are in real trouble.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member were right, then his amendment should be to strike out the first part of the paragraph as well. What he suggests is that an owner, lessee, agent or superintendent should not be found guilty merely for knowingly permitting a meeting. What he is saying is that the owner or lessee might not know it was an assemblage of persons who advocate or promote the unlawful acts of, or the use of the unlawful means advocated by the unlawful association. He is suggesting that the word "knowingly" does not apply to the words "to advocate or promote the unlawful acts", etc.

If that were so, the word "knowingly" in the first part would apply to "meeting" and would not apply to "unlawful association". The view has been given that the words "knowingly permit" in the first part of the clause as it now reads apply to any meeting of the unlawful association. There would have to be knowledge of the meeting and knowledge that it was a meeting of the unlawful association.

In the same way, in the second part which the hon. member seeks to strike out the knowledge would have to apply not only to the existence of the assemblage of persons but to the fact that they advocated or promoted the unlawful acts of, or the use of the unlawful means advocated by the unlawful association.

I am suggesting that both those sections in the clause are necessary for the same reason, namely that there is an offence specifically in clause 4(d) to cover those who advocate or promote the unlawful acts of, or the use of the unlawful means advocated by the unlawful association for accomplishing its aims, principles or policies, and for the reason that the definition in clause 3 not only includes Le Front de Liberation du Quebec but also any group of persons or associations that advocate the use of force or the commission of crime as a means of or as an aid in accomplishing the same purpose. The reason is that the bill has as its purpose not only the apprehension of the membership of the FLQ but any successor organization or any organization advocating the same purposes and means, because it is obvious that the FLQ might not have a membership list or a corporate charter with objects and purposes.

If the hon. member's amendment were to succeed and it became impossible for the prosecution to prove that there was membership of the FLQ on the premises occupied or rented by the owner or lessee, then of course the purpose of the bill could be bypassed. So it is not only a meeting of the members of the FLQ but an assemblage of any number of people having the same purpose and advocating the same means as the FLQ that is unlawful under this bill. The word "means" is important. It is found in clauses 3 and 4(d) and throughout the bill because it is clear that the purpose of the bill is not to apprehend those who do not advocate the use of force or crime as a means of effecting governmental change. The words "for accomplishing its aims or principles and policies", and "the unlawful acts and unlawful means" have to be referred again to clause 3 which reads "or any group of persons or association that advocates the use of force or the commission of crime as a means of or as an aid in accomplishing the same or substantially the same governmental change within Canada as that advocated by the said Le Front de Liberation du Quebec".

The purposes and aims are quite clearly recited again in the preamble in the words "who advocate the use of force or the commission of crime as a means of or as an aid in accomplishing governmental change". Attempting to accomplish governmental change by peaceful methods or by the ballot box is not covered by the bill. So the concern that the hon. member has about free discussion is shared by me, but we are not trying to prohibit free discussion that seeks peaceful governmental change, if that is the purpose. We are trying to cover discussion which prompts seditious governmental change, that is, by use of crime, violence or force. I think that is clear throughout the bill. So the purpose of the words that the hon. member seeks to strike out is to complement the definition in clause 3 and the specific offence in clause 4(d). If one were to leave out those words, the bill would be weaker as a result.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, apart from anything else, if one were to accept the argument of the Minister of Justice at its face value, the words which my colleague has proposed to delete from clause 6 are redundant. If one looks at the interpretation clause 2(d) one sees that it reads:

> (d) "the unlawful association" means the group of persons or association declared by this Act to be an unlawful association.

Clause 3 is the clause that declares what is an unlawful association and, as the minister quite properly indicated, it includes other than the particular group or organization currently known as the FLQ.

The clause, as amended, clearly retains within it the use of the phrase "any meeting of the unlawful association or any branch, committee or members thereof". In my submission, because of the prior definition in the bill of what the unlawful association is, all of the circumstances which the minister is arguing should be covered by the bill are clearly covered in the clause as amended by my colleague.

However, what some of us are concerned about is that when you add this redundancy to this clause and you start talking about "any assemblage of persons who advocate or promote" etc., you are moving beyond the definition in the bill of what is an unlawful association which, in my view, is certainly broad enough now for the minister's purposes. You are laying open to an offence any person who permits an assemblage of persons who may meet for discussion purposes, who may be roused by some individuals in that group who are in effect advocating certain actions, and who may decide to take a vote on whether or not certain means of effecting change in our society are or are not necessary. If that happens, presuming it is established that the agent or owner was present at that meeting and did not immediately call the police to eject that assembly of persons from his presence, you are laying open that person to a charge of an offence under the act.

These are the things we are concerned about, that this Provision not extend into what I would describe as the grey areas where people exercise the kind of freedom of speech to which we have been accustomed in this country. I can remember some very eloquent speeches made at meetings back in the 1930's under the auspices of the Communist party. It is true that the Communist party at that time had not been declared to be an unlawful association, but certainly some of the speeches that were made moved the audience in a direction that went beyond what the minister calls "the use of the ballot box". Those things happen.

We suggest that this clause as drafted is unnecessarily broad and that the question of what constitutes an unlawful association is quite clearly laid down in the bill from the point of view that the minister has outlined. The clause is open to an interpretation whereby anyone who happened to own premises or a hall and rented them could be charged. It is conceivable that university authorities could be charged because a meeting took place in a classroom where a group of young people were discussing the whole gamut of how to bring about social change. This may seem far-fetched, but sometimes things get out of hand. I am sure that if the minister considers the matter carefully he will realize that without this phrase the clause is broad enough to cover the circumstances he wants to deal with through the bill.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the hon. member's amendment. The first part of clause 6 prohibits meetings of the FLQ, and the second part prohibits meetings of people guilty of the offence described in clause 4(d). The first part of clause 6 refers in fact to clause 4(a), and the second part to clause 4(d). Therefore, the rationale of the amendment is not good. No illegal association has ever published a restricted list of its illegal acts. Clause 2(d) defines "unlawful association" as an association declared by the act to be unlawful, and clause 4(d) refers to "unlawful acts".

Mr. Broadbent: If I may reply to the last speaker first, I point out that clause 4(d) talks about the person who commits the act. It reads:

> A person who advocates or promotes the unlawful acts of, or the use of the unlawful means...is guilty of an indictable offence—

If you look at clause 6, what we have in it, as I tried to suggest in the first part of my argument, is the very real possibility of charging a man who knowingly not only leases premises to an organization that he is aware is illegal—I am in agreement with that—but who also knowingly leases his premises to an assemblage of people who, in turn, in the course of their meeting may do something that contravenes the law. The man has no control over that. A comparison with clause 4(d) breaks down on that ground. The Minister of Justice referred to the first part of the clause which reads:

> —who knowingly permits therein any meeting of the unlawful association or of any branch, committee or members thereof—

That same "knowingly" carries down to the part of the clause that I want to exclude so that he would only be punished if he knew the assemblage was going to advocate criminal activity. At present the clause does not say that. The unamended clause might be used for harassment of people who may be discussing ideas, whether of the FLQ or some other separatist variety. With the portion deleted which is mentioned in the amendment, the police could still deal very effectively with known branches of the FLQ. We should avoid anything in the law that might lead to harassment of free discussion. If the clause is not amended, that is exactly what we will be doing—providing potential for harassment of free discussion.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the Minister of Justice is not likely to accept any changes in the bill except those that he himself may propose. However, we intend to try to persuade him and the committee to make the changes we think are important. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni said many things that I would have said, so I will not repeat them. I can probably agree with the minister, also being a lawyer of some sort, that the word "knowingly"—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Which one is the "lawyer of some sort"?

Mr. Lewis: The present speaker. I agree with the minister that "knowingly" may be interpreted to apply to an assemblage of persons having certain characteristics, but that is not the whole point. I understood there were three major objectives that the government wanted in legislation in order to fight the FLQ. My colleagues and I have expressed a regretful willingness, I assure you just as regretful as the minister's, to accept those three objectives in the circumstances of the case. The first is the declaring of the FLQ and analogous organizations as unlawful. One doubts the value of declaring organizations unlawful and knows the danger in that. As I have said on two or three occasions, what is there now is an unlawful conspiracy, a group of men who plan kidnappings and are involved together in kidnappings, in murders, in bombings, in robberies and in theft. In short, they are criminal conspirators.

The second thing I understood the government to need for a limited period was the unlimited right to search without warrant in order to be able to apprehend the people concerned and to find weapons, ammunition, dynamite, etc. The third was the right to apprehend people without warrant and to detain them for a limited number of days. I am very glad that the bill reduces the number of days. As I understand it, those are the crucial powers that ever since October 16 the police have required to do the job. In addition, this bill contains many other powers that in our submission go beyond the purpose of the bill.

Clause 6 as a whole is the equivalent of the padlock law introduced by Duplessis in the province of Quebec and against which the right hon. Prime Minister and other members of the Liberal party fought valiantly. But all that could be done under the padlock law was to lock up a house. There was no fine or imprisonment involved, just the authority to lock up a house where a meeting of a communist group advocating force and violence took place.

Under clause 6 of this bill the owner, lessee, agent or superintendent of the building is liable to a fine of $5,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, or both. We are ready to go along with the minister as far as he means letting the place knowingly to an unlawful association, but the vague language used in the clause is bound of interfere with legitimate activities.

I am sure the minister is aware that many cases dealt with by the Supreme Court of the United States involving issues of civil liberties, free speech and amendments to the American constitution have drawn a very important distinction between advocating the use of force in the abstract, as a theory, and inciting the use of force, that is, getting people to go out and use force.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Except that to advocate can amount to inciting.

Mr. Lewis: I will admit that, Mr. Chairman, obviously, but then it may not amount to incitement. What it means is to prohibit an assembly of persons discussing theories about the use of force. In this case it may be discussing theories about the use of force in connection with certain governmental change. I happen to disagree with governmental change; I oppose separatism; I believe that the means used by the FLQ are inhuman, criminal means for which they ought to be apprehended and broken up as an organization. All that is true. But I have been present at university groups and groups composed of organizations of poor people and have heard them discuss their frustrations at the prospect of getting anything done through normal channels. As a citizen believing in peaceful methods, it is my duty to attempt to persuade them that any other method can only lead to trouble. To prohibit discussion, though, is a different thing.

I have here a report from the Montreal bureau of the Globe and Mail of October 30, 1970, which states:

> Quebec's university rectors complained yesterday that "the vague and ambiguous nature of the wartime emergency regulations have stifled academic freedom.

If my memory is correct, clause 6 of this bill is almost word for word the same as section 6 of the regulations; the only difference is that the regulation under the War Measures Act talked about "promoting," etc. The effect of the wording is exactly the same. The War Measures Act talked about "promoting" and this bill talks about "advocating or promoting", which is worse. The rectors of the university are also reported as follows:

> The conference said section 6 of the regulations passed by the federal cabinet on October 9—

I suppose that should be October 16.

> —places all universities in a very difficult position.
> Under this section, a principal could be liable to five years imprisonment or a $5,000 fine for having knowingly allowed the use of a university hall for "any group of people who supported—

In this case it would be for any assembly of persons who advocate or promote, etc. It is the same thing but a little broader than the regulations under the War Measures Act. The report goes on:

> —this regulation opens the way for "guilt by association" and interferes with academic freedom. In a letter to Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau and Premier Robert Bourassa, the conference stated:
> "You will recognize that, in the normal course of university life, groups of students or professors may endorse social, economic or political positions which by coincidence may resemble certain ideological views of the FLQ.
> We do not believe that it is in the public interest to expose these citizens, or the universities where they meet, to legal sanctions."
> The university heads said section 6 is so ambiguous that it forced the University of Quebec to close its Montreal campus to 7,000 students for a week because Rector Leo Dorais feared he would be prosecuted in the wake of a sit-in at his office by a handful of radical students supporting the FLQ. (The sit-in collapsed after the murder of Pierre Laporte on October 17.)

The university rectors are already aware of and disturbed by this provision. They are fearful of interference with our academic freedoms, and this fear is justified. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, it is difficult for legislators to interpret the precise wording of a section. The interpretation will eventually be made by the courts in relation to a certain set of facts. We have no precise facts and therefore cannot interpret this law. It seems to me, therefore, that we have a duty to avoid going beyond those means which are necessary and essential to achieve the purpose of breaking up the FLQ. There is no reason under the sun why this bill should abridge freedom of discussion and expression of views.

I had hoped that the minister would see this point. If he does not like the particular amendment that has been moved, perhaps he could come forward with a better one to remove the fears indicated by the rectors of universities in Quebec. We would have been quite happy for him to introduce another amendment, but he seems determined to keep the language exactly as it is. Perhaps he will show the same determination on every amendment proposed by members of the House on either side.

We shall continue to move them in order to show what the law should be if it were properly organized for the purposes it is intended to serve. We shall see whether the minister can be moved to accept some of them. I hope the minister will change his mind and be prepared to accept at least the ideas which we have presented and will come forward with amendments of his own. Of course, if he does not, there is nothing we can do about it.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the Minister of Justice a question as a result of the remarks of the hon. member for York South. He indicated that clause 6 would prohibit academic discussion as to whether force could at any time be legitimately used or any type of similar objective. I am of the opinion, having read clause 6, that there is no such prohibition. According to my interpretation, the only prohibition is the advocacy or promotion of force for the achievement of political objectives. Certainly, this does not prohibit academic discussion with respect to the use of force. I cannot see anything in the clause that would constitute such a prohibition. I ask the minister if he would in a moment comment on that matter.

The second point is this. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby seemed to feel that this clause might be dangerous to members of the Parti Quebecois in the sense that any meeting might well become involved in discussing the use of force or advocating it. I do not think there is very much in common between the purposes of the Parti Quebecois and the means and purposes advocated by the FLQ. Frankly, I think it is an insult to the democratic organization of the Parti Quebecois to suggest that they would be holding meetings along lines that are prohibited by clause 6.

I cannot see why we should be fearful of this clause. I do not think it constitutes an abrogation of academic freedom in any way. I cannot agree with anyone in this chamber who wants to protect those who knowingly permit an assemblage of persons to advocate or promote unlawful acts against the state. I feel that when society is endangered, as at present, we must take adequate steps to protect it. I believe that clause 6 is one of those necessary steps. Before I sit down I would ask the minister to answer the question I asked as to whether there is a loss of academic freedom involved in this clause.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, I will not go over all those arguments that have been raised, arguments with which I do not think the hon. member for Ontario dealt. I wish to make an important correction. I do not wish to imply in any way that the actions of the Parti Quebecois have anything to do with the FLQ. Their only aim in common seems to be their commitment to an independent Quebec. My point was that precisely because of this common ground there may be real danger of the democratic Parti Quebecois being harassed as a result of this clause, simply because some of its ideas in certain respects correspond with some of those of the FLQ. Their ideas correspond in certain respects, just as the ideas of all parties in this House correspond in certain respects.

A discussion of the question of separatism might be just enough to bring about abuses by the wrong kind of policemen. That, really, is what we must be concerned about. The law, when it is framed, must take cognizance of the fact that the wrong kind of policemen may act. I am not suggesting that all policemen are bad policemen, but we must consider what would happen if they were overzealous. For instance, they might apply the same arresting powers, initially, to an assemblage of the Parti Quebecois as they could legitimately apply to the FLQ or an association of the FLQ. That, precisely, is the major point of the amendment.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a word or two to what has been said by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. The point that may be of concern to us, since the question of the FLQ and the Parti Quebecois has arisen, is that clause 6 deals with the question of owner, lessee, agent or superintendent of premises. Some of us have very vivid recollections of situations in which we tried to rent the only hall in a community. In that situation, because owners of certain premises at one period in the history of this country equated the CCF with the Communist Party, it became impossible for some of us to rent premises in communities for the purpose of holding public meetings to discuss public issues.

This is the kind of unnecessary restriction upon the freedom of democratic discussion in this country that some of us are concerned about, partly because we have had personal experience of how this can happen. We do not want to see this bill become a vehicle whereby freedom of discussion of the kind in which the Parti Quebecois is engaged in the province of Quebec is restricted and suppressed. This is the very practical concern of some of us, especially because of the manner in which this clause is worded. It has to do with those people who have in their hands the right to rent or refuse to rent premises for public assemblies.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. He is going to answer the hon. member for Ontario and I have a question on this clause. I think we all agree that any owner, lessee, agent or superintendent who would rent to an illegal association knowingly would be guilty of an offence. Also, any owner, etc., who would rent to an assemblage of persons some of whom wish to advocate the violent overthrow of the government or who have similar ideals, would be guilty of an offence.

However, the question that arises in my mind and to which I ask the minister to direct his mind is this. Let us suppose an owner or lessee does not know that the assemblage of persons to whom he is renting is going to advocate force, and so on. Does that impose upon him the duty to attend and supervise these meetings and, if he finds out subsequently, as opposed to prior knowledge, that some of the members advocated the overthrow of the government by force, of telling them to get out? Does he have to stop the meeting and call the police?

If that is to be the effect of the clause, it certainly imposes a tremendous restriction upon people renting premises. And not only that. It would mean they would have to supervise every meeting in order to see that none of these things happened. It would certainly, as the hon. member for York South said, impose tremendous restrictions upon universities and all political parties, most of which advocate the democratic process in order to bring about change. I have directed my question to the minister and I should like him to consider it.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I am supported in my view that the word "knowingly" applies not only to the word "premises" but also to "unlawful association" in the first part of the clause, and to the words "assemblage" and "promote the unlawful acts of", etc., in the second part. I am supported by the hon. member for York South in that view.

Mr. Gilbert: That is prior knowledge, then?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is my answer to the question.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, with respect, the Minister of Justice answered the first part of my question about prior knowledge but he has not answered the second part about subsequent knowledge. Once a man has rented premises, does the clause put upon him the duty of supervising the meeting to determine whether certain members of the assemblage are going to advocate the overthrow of the government by violence? If he happens to overhear such conversation, must he inform the police, or must he tell these people to get out? Otherwise he is liable to be charged under this clause.

Mr. Lewis: That is a good point.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I cannot be placed in the position of trying to give a legal opinion on a whole range of facts. I think these will be for the courts to determine. I think it is clear from the way the words are written that "intentionally" means at the time permission was given.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Broadbent: The minister suggested the hon. member for York South agreed with him that "knowingly" applied to the second part of the clause. I mention this because my hon. friend was not listening at the time. As I recall it, he said that in his legal view the minister's interpretation might be the correct one. This is an important point. If the minister is not clear about it, it should be clarified.

Mr. Baldwin: I was interested in the minister's reply to the hon. member for Broadview. Is it the hon. gentleman's view, as presented by his legal advisers, that the word "knowingly" must add to the usual importance of the principle of mens rea, proving beyond reasonable doubt, and does it apply to every ingredient of the offence? In other words, is it to be construed not only in conjunction with permitting but with the knowledge of a person charged as to the nature and character of the assembly and what the motives and intentions of the assembly were?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is the advice I am given, Mr. Chairman, and that is my view.

Amendment (Mr. Broadbent) negatived: Yeas, 9; nays, 47.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 6 carry?

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I should like to move an amendment to clause 6, because in my opinion it is not stringent enough towards criminals.

Those who engage in terrorist activities, whether they be members of the FLQ or other criminals, should be liable to more severe penalties. If the government managed to fight inflation with as much success as it manages to be soft with criminals, the people would have cause for satisfaction.

But as regards clause 6, Mr. Chairman, I think that the act is not stringent enough in the cases we are concerned about. Therefore, I move:

That clause 6 be amended by replacing, in line 22, the words "five thousand dollars" by "twenty-five thousand dollars" and in line 24 the word "five" by the word "fourteen".

[English]

The Chairman: I will ask the Clerk Assistant to read the amendment.

And the Clerk Assistant (legal) having read the following amendment:

Mr. Laprise moved that clause 6 be amended by replacing in line 22, the words "five thousand dollars" by "twenty-five thousand dollars" and in line 24, the word "five" by the word "fourteen".

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, a few days ago, when the hon. member moved various amendments in order to change the amount of the fines and the terms of imprisonment, I pointed out to him that fines and terms of imprisonment in this bill must agree with those provided in the Criminal Code in respect of kidnapping, murder or mutilation. That is why I suggested to the committee to reject the other amendment of the hon. member. Once again I must urge the committee to reject the principle of this amendment.

[English]

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Laprise) negatived: Yeas, 2; nays, 58.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 6 carry?

Mr. McCleave: I simply want to draw the attention of the committee and, through Hansard, the attention of the country to the fact that we have spent approximately 40 minutes on this one clause, and yet the only useful exchange, the one which dealt with the essence of the whole matter, was the one between the Minister of Justice and my hon. friend from Peace River.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member should not reflect upon the time taken in debate or upon the vote of the committee.

Mr. McCleave: I shall not reflect upon the time taken up by debate, but upon the type of arguments which have been used, arguments which have been advanced over and over again—

The Chairman: Order. Clause 6 is still before the committee. If the hon. member wishes to relate his remarks to the clause, he may do so; otherwise he is not in order.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: I hope, Mr. Chairman, that my comments have some bearing on clause 6. There are three things I want to discuss in connection with this clause.

In the first instance, there are translation errors; secondly, there is a possibility of ambiguity, and, thirdly, the matter of strict or objective responsibility.

With respect to the translation errors, I do not know whether the phrase "agent of any room" means anything in English, but I know perfectly well that in French the Phrase "Régisseur d'une pièce" has none, or at the least, is a very unusual expression. Also, the words "building superintendent" in North American translate into "concierge" and not into "surintendant". Webster's Third International Dictionary gives this definition of a "superintendent": the person who "is responsible for the cleaning and maintenance of a building".

About the possibility of ambiguity, the wording of this clause is bad, because while allowing a meeting of "members of the unlawful association", this includes necessarily a meeting of the association, of a branch or a committee of said association, while, in my opinion, the wording should be "meeting of members", without adding the words "of the association or any branch, committee".

Then, the second group of persons covered by clause 6 is described from line 24 to line 30 inclusively. I wanted, without proposing an amendment, to suggest a version which seems to me simpler and especially, much more efficient. I must also say that it is much harsher, but this is justified by the temporary character of this act.

Furthermore, the clause, as written, seems to forbid two different things.

First of all, the first part of the clause forbids, without taking into consideration its objectives, any meeting of the members of the unlawful association, while the second part forbids any meeting of any group of persons who advocate or promote the unlawful acts of an unlawful association for accomplishing its aims, principles or policies.

The clause would have been acceptable had the expression "unlawful acts" been used. But by using "the unlawful acts" we see how impossible it is to prove that they are unlawful. Finally, I quote the Kipling case, of the Ontario court of appeal, in connection with Section 221 (2) which deals with leaving the site of an accident, in which the following terms were to be interpreted:

> Every one who, having the control of a vehicle that is involved in an accident with a person, vehicle or cattle in charge of a person, with intent to escape—

The court reached the conclusion that the expression "in charge of a person" applied not to the vehicle but to the cattle.

I think the version I suggest, without moving it as a formal amendment, is clearer and solves a lot of problems.

Finally, considering the concept of strict, absolute or objective responsibility, the following words should be added after "knowingly permits": "without lawful justification or excuse the onus of which lies upon him".

I shall give the example of the owner of premises who would knowingly allow a physician or a political scientist to gather members of an unlawful association for an interview for scientific purposes.

We must finally realize that the clause stands out mostly because it provides for a maximum sentence that, off-hand at least, is greater than the one prescribed under clause 4(g) for someone who really makes use of violence.

Finally, let us note that, by the combined effect of clause 4 of this bill and section 21 and following of the Criminal Code, this clause seems unnecessary.

I should like just to suggest, without moving it formally, the following version of clause 6:

> Is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine of not more than $5,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years or to both, any person who is the owner or the lessee of any building, room, premises or other place, or who acts in a responsible or supervisory capacity with regard to them, and who knowingly permits without lawful justification or excuse, the onus of which lies upon him, any meeting of the persons who have violated or who violate the provisions of subclauses (a) to (g) in clause 4 of this act.

I hope that when the promised legislation is drafted in a few months' time these suggestions will be taken into consideration.

• (3:40 p.m.)

[English]

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Clause 6 agreed to.

On clause 7—Detention.

[Translation]

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, prominent law officers from the department and outside have called the attention of the minister upon certain anomalies contained in the French version of clause 7 which would make it a little difficult to understand this clause in view of the double negative. Furthermore, with regard to the English version, mention has been made of some difficulty, for instance, in understanding the meaning of the first paragraph which reads as follows:

[English]

> A person charged with an offence under section 4 shall be detained in custody without bail pending his trial unless
> (a) the Attorney General of the province in which the person is in custody has not—

[Translation]

On account of those two negatives, the minister is prepared to move an amendment, if the House agrees. I have here both the French and English versions of the amendment. Copies of the amendment have already been distributed in the House so that hon. members can get acquainted with it.

With the agreement of the committee, I am ready to move this amendment concerning Bill C-181.

I move that lines 25 to 37 on page 4 and lines 1 to 6 on page 5 be deleted and replaced by the following:

> 7. (1) Without prejudice to subsection (2), a person charged with an offence under section 4 shall be detained in custody without bail pending his trial.

(2) A person shall not be detained in custody under subsection (1)

(a) after the seventh day following his arrest or, if he was arrested before the coming into force of this act, after the seventh day following that date, unless, before expiry of the seven days, the Attorney General of the province in which the person is in custody has filed with the clerk of the superior court of criminal jurisdiction in the province a certificate under this section stating that just cause exists for the detention of that person pending his trial, or

(b) after a certificate issued under this section in respect of that person has been revoked, or the Attorney General of the province in which that person is in custody has otherwise consented to the release of that person on bail.

(3) Where a person who has been charged with an—

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister to clarify one aspect not only of this amendment but of the original clause. I should like to ask a question with respect to the certificate that is to be given by the Attorney General. The certificate would state that just cause existed for the detention of a person, and this would be the reason for detaining that person for up to seven days.

Can the minister indicate whether it is intended that the certificate will state what is the just cause, or will it simply state, "In the opinion of I, Jerome Choquette"—or whoever it may be—"there is just cause for the continued detention of," so-and-so? If this is the case, I would be rather apprehensive about it because I must say, with all due respect, that some of the statements attributed to the Attorney General of Quebec indicate it would be dangerous to leave in the hands of an attorney general, particularly the one I have instanced, the right simply to sign a certificate stating there is just cause.

Is it intended that more than this bald statement would be included in the certificate? Is there to be any reason given beyond the Attorney General saying there is just cause? If there is—and what we say here is not binding upon any court—I assume it is the view of the government and the view, I hope, of hon. members of the committee that the Attorneys General be so advised.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Peace River compares clause 7(2) with the regulations under the War Measures Act, he will see why the words "just cause" have been inserted. The regulation provides:

A person arrested for an offence under section 4 shall be detained in custody without bail pending trial unless the Attorney General of the province in which the person is being detained consents to the release of that person on bail.

In other words, it was at the discretion of the Attorney General to withhold or to grant bail. It was taken away from the court. The same thing obtains here. The discretion is left in the hands of the Attorney General. The reason the words "just cause" were added is to make clear that since we have the Bill of Rights, and since the words "bail shall be granted on just cause" appear, we have to use the same words to make that particular exclusion from the Canadian Bill of Rights, leaving the suspension of bail in the hands of the Attorney General. In other words, since bail must be granted under the Canadian Bill of Rights when just cause is apparent, the words "just cause" are repeated here to illustrate that the Attorney General has to say there is just cause for refusal.

The specific answer, then, to the hon. member's question is that the Attorney General will not have to state what the cause is; he will just state that in his opinion just cause exists. The words are inserted to make it clear that this is one of the exceptions to the application of the Bill of Rights.

Mr. Baldwin: Does the minister feel there should be a reason stated as to just cause? I understand the point the minister has made in respect of bringing in this provision as it affects the Bill of Rights, but is it the view of the minister that the "just cause" should be particularized? I am not suggesting it be given in great detail but perhaps some indication should be given. That is the point the minister might consider.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Here again, the Attorney General of the province is the chief law enforcement officer and his responsibility in the exercise of his discretion is to the legislature and the people. He will have to substantiate this, but I would prefer to leave it in his discretion.

Mr. Baldwin: His "just cause" and yours might be different.

Mr. Stanfield: You could say that about anything.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Lewis: I just want to understand that we are merely voting on the alternative wording which the Parliamentary Secretary has moved and that this does not settle the discussion on clause 7.

The Chairman: The question is on the amendment now before the committee. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Béchard) agreed to.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment in respect of the original wording of clause 7. However, since the Parliamentary Secretary moved an amendment which has changed the wording of clause 7, my amendment will have to be in accordance with the amendment just passed. The Chairman has a copy of my amendment. Just so we are clear in our own minds, I move

That clause 7(1) be amended by striking out all the words in the said clause after the words "pending his trial" in the third line thereof so that the said subclause will read:

"A person charged with an offence under section 4 shall be detained in custody without bail pending his trial unless an order for his release on bail is made by a court having jurisdiction under the Criminal Code".

In reconsidering my amendment, Mr. Chairman, I realize we would also have to strike out all the words in subclause 2. So that the Minister of Justice and his Parliamentary Secretary, as well as hon. members, are clear, we are striking out the words in subclause 1 after the words "pending his trial" and also all the words in subclause 2. I think that gives the meaning of the amendment.

The Chairman: Just so the Chair is clear, is the hon. member for Broadview amending the amendment that is now before the House by striking out all the words in subclause 2 of clause 7?

Mr. Gilbert: Yes, Mr. Chairman, together with the words I have mentioned in subclause 1.

The Chairman: I wonder if the hon. member would send his amendment to the Chair in writing. The Chair has an amendment in writing to subclause 1 and I understand that the hon. member also seeks to amend clause 7 by striking out subclause 2.

Mr. Gilbert: You are right, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member would give the Chair a note to the effect that subclause 2 is to be deleted. We would then be complying with the rules.

Mr. Gilbert: I will send it to the Chair in a moment. Prior to the passing of the regulations under the War Measures Act and the introduction of Bill C-181 it could be said without hesitation that the Minister of Justice was one of the most progressive reformers we have had in the House of Commons. When I think of the great work he did in respect of the official languages bill and the omnibus bill amending the Criminal Code, I realize he demonstrated an attitude of conciliation and flexibility.

The Chairman: Order, please. Before the committee rises, perhaps the Chair should put the amendment moved by the hon. member for Broadview. Does the committee agree that the amendment that has been placed before the committee be further amended by adding that subclause 2 of clause 7 of Bill C-181 be deleted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: The amendment now before the committee is in the following form:

That clause 7(1) be amended by striking out all the words in the said clause after the words "pending his trial" in the third line thereof so that the subclause will read:

"a person charged with an offence under section 4 shall be detained in custody without bail pending his trial unless an order for his release on bail is made by a court having jurisdiction under the Criminal Code"; and

That subclause 2 be deleted.

It being four o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Gilbert.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, might I be allowed to ask at this time what the business of the House will be on Monday? Having in mind that we have made rapid progress and appear to have dealt with one clause of this bill, I should like to know whether the government can give any indication of its intentions in regard to the business for Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of next week.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Monday of which week, Mr. Speaker? The intention is that on Monday and Tuesday of next week, if necessary, we will continue with this particular bill. It would also be the intention, subject to discussion, to have the shirt surtax motion considered at an appropriate time and, as the next item following that, the bill in respect of statutory instruments.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the acting House leader arising out of his reference to the statutory instruments bill? This motion in part provides that there be a committee of the House to deal with the matter. Is it the intention of the government to bring in at the same time a motion in respect of the establishing of that committee, since obviously it would save time if we debated the two matters together rather than separately.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have not been in touch with that question during the last several weeks. I would have to inquire of my colleague, the President of the Privy Council, in this regard. I would hope to be able to make that matter clear before we proceed with the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

REFERRAL OF BILLS IN NAME OF MR. STEWART (COCHRANE) TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On Friday, October 30, 1970, when the order for the consideration of Bill C-7, to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act, was called, a point of order was raised by the Chair to the effect that the bill contained a money provision. Following consultation with the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) and other hon. members, it was thought desirable that some consideration might be given by a Standing Committee to the principle set forth in Bill C-7 and 37 other bills standing in the hon. member's name.

In order to meet that request it has been suggested that by unanimous consent of the House the financial provisions be struck from the several bills and that their subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. If the House is willing to accept that proposal, I shall put the question. Is it agreed that I put the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is agreed that the hon. member for Cochrane shall have leave of the House to delete the financial provisions from the 38 bills standing on the Order Paper in his name and, by consent, to propose that the subject matter of those bills as amended stands referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there will be unanimous agreement. However, I must say that while I appreciate the value of sending these particular bills to a committee, just as many excellent bills and motions have been introduced by hon. members on this side of the House. There must be an understanding that the full potential of the talent and knowledge which lies on this side of the House must be utilized, and that bills prepared by this party and by my friends to the left will also be considered. I hope in this regard there will be that degree of consultation which, when it takes place, makes this House move so smoothly and efficiently.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to agree to the suggestion made from the Chair, namely, that these 38 bills have the necessary correction made to them and that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee that has been indicated. I join the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) in the sentiments he has expressed. It seems to me that if we are prepared to send 38 bills which are improperly drawn to a committee, we ought to be prepared to send to a committee some of our bills which have been properly drawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to the proposal which the Chair has put?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In fulfilment of that order of the House, the bills affected will be removed from the Order Paper. The bills to be amended and the subject matter thereof to be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections are as follows: C-7, C-10, C-11, C-17, C-18, C-29, C-31, C-35, C-37, C-43, C-48, C-57, C-58, C-60, C-74, C-78, C-79, C-80, C-81, C-84, C-89, C-91, C-92, C-98, C-114, C-116, C-119, C-122, C-123, C-126, C-142, C-145, C-147, C-152, C-153, C-154, C-160 and C-164.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

QUALIFICATIONS OF ELECTORS AND CANDIDATES

On the order:

Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of Bill C-12, An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act (qualifications of electors and candidates) —Mr. Stewart (Cochrane).

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to suggest that this bill be removed from the Order Paper. It was placed there in error, having been debated during the last session and the Canada Elections Act having been changed accordingly. Therefore, the motion no longer has any meaning.

I should like to express my appreciation to the Chair for arriving at a solution regarding the bills standing in my name. I also express my appreciation to the House for agreeing to send them to the committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Cochrane has requested that the bill referred to be dropped from the Order Paper. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

PUBLIC DISCLOSURE OF ADMINISTRATIVE DOCUMENTS AND INFORMATION

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey) moved that Bill C-15, to better assure the public's rights to freedom of access to public documents and information about government administration (administrative disclosure), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the third time this bill has come up during recent years. I am hopeful that the third time will be lucky not only so far as the bill is concerned but also so far as the public is concerned. In brief, as outlined in the explanatory note, this bill is in aid of the public's right to know in what manner a government is administering the public duties entrusted and delegated to it by the people: save for exceptions that are in the public interest, the bill enacts Bentham's basic parliamentary rule that public affairs must be conducted publicly. The bill would seek to do that—I quote from clause 1—by requiring the following:

> Every administrative or ministerial commission, power and authority shall make its records and information concerning its doings available to any person at his request in reasonable manner and time.

There would be certain exceptions to that principle: those records affecting national security, those affecting or concerning matters that are exempted from disclosure by statute, those concerning trade secrets, commercial and financial matters of a privileged or confidential nature obtained from private persons and, finally, those that concern any private matter of private interest to the degree that the right to personal privacy excludes the public interest.

The measure puts into words, which I hope will some day become law, the basic parliamentary democratic principle that public affairs must be conducted publicly. It seems to me rather incongruous that according to recent public information figures, close to $150 million a year is being expended on circulating the type of information which the government wants placed in the hands of the public.

Many motions are put on the Order Paper of the House by private members representing many thousands of Canadians, calling in vain for the production of the type of information which the government from time to time denies and which the public wants. I would point out in passing that we have established a new agency called Information Canada, and in my opinion this new agency is about to add to the cost or circulating what is basically pro-federal government information by setting up a considerable number of information centres across Canada.

I wonder if instead of placing this additional cost on the taxpayers of establishing new information centres for the public, thought should not be given to integrating Information Canada centres with those already long established, that is, the public libraries in Canada. Considerable expenditure could be reduced, and efficiency improved, by adding a desk or two and a telephone to existing public libraries in order to meet additional services provided to the public by Information Canada.

A great deal has been published over recent years on the general subject of the public right to know and to obtain information in the possession of the government and its agencies. I would quote one article on that subject from the Toronto Globe and Mail. It is an editorial written in support of the bill that I am putting forward. I think it was written about two years ago when the bill was up for discussion the second time. I think the situation has not changed since the editorial was written. It reads in part as follows:

> One bad side effect of the prodigious growth of government in this century is that it has become exceedingly difficult to keep track of. Not only are governments themselves much more deeply and widely involved in the life of the people, but their tasks have become so numerous that they have had to delegate much of their authority to boards and commissions. Accompanying this governmental growth has been a disinclination on the part of governments and their creatures to keep the public informed about what they are doing.
> A private bill—

That is the bill we are now going to discuss

> —has been presented to the House of Commons which could do much to open these many closed doors and keep the public informed about what is, after all, its own business.

The editorial goes on to quote what I have already read from the bill in regard to its aims and restrictions. I have no wish to take up the time of the House unnecessarily by further speaking on this measure. I believe that the general principle of the bill, which is simply that the public should have better and quicker access to public information at the federal level, has a considerable measure of support among all parties in the House. I hope that as we earlier agreed to send other bills to a committee, we will consider sending the subject matter of this proposal to an appropriate committee for detailed consideration. If so, I think the most appropriate would be the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

[Mr. Mather.]

If the subject matter of the bill becomes law, the enforcing agency should be the Exchequer Court, which is now the new Federal Court of Canada. I think that urging that action be taken on this proposal is pretty well in line with the sentiments expressed by government leaders, by opposition members and by the press in different sections of the community.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I will say just a few words in support of the motion to send this bill to a committee. I hope that before five o'clock has arrived the leaders of the government side, having in mind the very generous disposition we have already made of the bills of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart), will think of this as being the first opportunity—I think I can say this, not being a member of the party of the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather)—and an excellent example with which to start that form of reciprocity which we need here.

First I want to comment on what the hon. member for Surrey said about Information Canada, because it seems to me that if we are to get this form of freedom to information, the right of the public to know, we have to establish it firmly and decisively before Information Canada reaches its full growth. It is now pretty young in terms of years but it is assuming rather gargantuan and very alarming proportions.

I was told during the course of a discussion within the last two days that all the problems which Members of Parliament are having in securing replies to written questions on the Order Paper will soon pass because it will be possible to secure within 24 hours answers from Information Canada to any questions. I was told that this information came from a very reliable authority, directly from Information Canada. This is the kind of Frankenstein which we may well be building here.

This means that if the kind of freedom that we need for the public of Canada, in respect of information which the government has, is not secured in the form of this bill or other proposals before Information Canada reaches its full growth, it will be too late because we will be in a situation where there will be an orchestration of information, and ministerial and departmental discretion as to what information is made availabe. We will then be in a lot of trouble. There will then be a form of despotism which now exists with regard to other matters of information. The right to know is the basis of any democratic process. Without that knowledge being available to the public and the members of this House, where are we?

I have some very strong authorities for my view. I am very sorry to see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has left. However, his Parliamentary Secretary is here. I quote the words of the Minister of Justice, which I do not often do. The Parliamentary Secretary may pass this information on to the minister. On September 2, 1969, the Minister of Justice made a speech on twin freedoms—the right to privacy and the right to know, both of which freedoms are getting quite a battering in the discussion of Bill C-181. Here is what the minister said in part:

Government secrecy...may well be a denial of the public right to know. If individual privacy is a foundation of democracy, the citizen's right to know is fundamental to any participatory democracy. The public cannot be expected to dialogue meaningfully—still less decide—if it is refused the very information which would make such a dialogue and decision-making possible.

I have a feeling that the Minister of Justice might find it a little more difficult to go out and make that sort of speech today and be believed. We had another eminent authority, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), before he succumbed to public life and when he was still all for participatory democracy, freedom of information, freedom of gatherings, and held strong views about civil liberties which he cherished so much. He made a statement on this subject a number of years ago. I do not know the exact number of years, but it appeared in that famous Montreal periodical Cité Libre. He took a very strong stand on the need for true and complete information. At that time he was dealing only with Quebec politics. He had not been saturated with Canadian national politics. He had not made that mental adjustment which he seems to have made so forcefully, that 180 degrees about-face in his thinking.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I suggest to hon. members that it is much better to approach a subject of this kind with an open mind rather than an open mouth. I ask hon. members on the other side to fall silent and listen with open worship and admiration to these comments of their great leader. This is what he said:

Democratic progress requires the ready availability of true and complete information.

Mr. McBride: That is why we set up Information Canada.

Mr. Baldwin: I hate to interrupt the right hon. Prime Minister when he is speaking in this House, and I even hate to interrupt his thoughts when reading them on paper. But if the right hon. gentleman's idea of freedom of information is envisaged as Information Canada, he has a long way to travel.

Mr. Gibson: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Baldwin: May I please finish what your great and noble leader said? Perhaps when I have quoted him the hon. member may have lost the need to ask his question. Again I quote:

Democratic progress requires the ready availability of true and complete information. In this way, the people can objectively evaluate their government's policies.

I am sorry I have to laugh, Mr. Speaker. Here is the final paragraph in that quotation:

To act otherwise is to give way to despotic secrecy.

Now, if the hon. gentleman has a question I am quite prepared to listen to it.

Mr. Gibson: Do you not think that setting up Information Canada and going slowly with it—not rushing in with a great big, fast, hastily organized pattern—so that all departments can integrate into the plan is a better way of doing it, rather than rushing into a hastily ill-conceived plan?

Mr. Baldwin: I would agree. I would never want to accuse the government of rushing into anything.

Mr. Gibson: What about the War Measures Act?

Mr. Baldwin: The approach of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) does not indicate that they are rushing with any degree of dispatch to deal with problems of unemployment. I suppose that is an assumption, but I say to the hon. member who asked me the question that certainly it is susceptible to that interpretation. But knowing the government, how it operates, its disposition to autocracy and secrecy, its refusal to give this House and the people of Canada the facts to which they are entitled, does not lead me to have confidence that its intentions with regard to Information Canada are strictly honourable. I have this feeling about it and I hope I am wrong. I would love to be able to stand up here a year from now and say how wrong I was, but that is one thing I know I will not have to say.

Mr. Gibson: Open your mind.

Mr. Baldwin: We have enjoyed these interruptions, Mr. Speaker. I have enjoyed them, but they were not very knowledgeable. The best alternative to knowledge is to keep quiet, listen and learn. The problem is present. To a great many people in Canada, Parliament and the processes of democracy are becoming increasingly irrevelant. The movement to violence is really the ultimate in that particular aspect of human relationship.

I am very serious when I say that the people of Canada and those of many other democratic countries are beginning to despair that they will ever secure from a combination of the democratic process and their system of government the type of needful reforms which are essential so they can say that progress is being made, that it may not be coming as fast as they would like but they are prepared to do their thing within the four corners of the democratic process. However, Mr. Speaker, that is not happening. I do not accept the view that progress is not being made with these things democratically. However, there is great justification for the feeling of many people in the United States, Canada, and the United Kingdom that we are not doing the things we should do and that people are not being told the facts they should be told. They have a desperate urge to find out what the facts are and then to see what might be done about them. In that sense the views expressed by the hon. member for Surrey have my complete support.

I am not going to take much more time, Mr. Speaker. This is a large subject: I would like at some time to introduce a bill or private member's notice of motion dealing with it. Looking at hon. members opposite, I am sure they agree that there is a need to explore this subject. I am sure they would not disagree with me if I said to them that surely there must be many occasions when in their view the type of information, the extent of the information and the manner in which it has been made available has been unsatisfactory. Surely they have talked about this to members of the press whose duty it is to find out what the facts are and to report them efficiently and effectively.

I would say that in private conversation with hon. members opposite none of them would disagree with my assessment of the situation with respect to trying to secure information from the government and government departments. It is part of the process that government departments become large monoliths. Administrators are not evil or corrupt men, but there is a tendency to hide mistakes, to cover up errors that are made. There is a tendency to try to put the best face forward in any matter which has been the subject of government intervention. They are simply being human beings when they act in that way. But it is our job, on behalf of the people of Canada, to press the government for more information.

We are not getting all the information we require. I think there should be such a declaration by the House in the form of acceptance of this bill. The subject matter of the bill should be sent to a committee. Surely hon. members opposite agree that it would be a very useful exercise to have a committee formed to study this whole aspect of public information. Some years ago the United States passed what was called the freedom of information bill. That bill has had some effect, but I have talked to friends of mine in the United States Senate and Congress and they say substantial changes will have to be made to it. I have talked to members of the press over there who agree with this. There is some movement in the United Kingdom to improve matters in this respect. They have made slight progress there. But this country, this government has done nothing.

Mr. Gibson: What about Information Canada?

Mr. Baldwin: Nonsense. There is one other aspect about the matter, Mr. Speaker, and that is that if we decide to send the hon. member's bill to committee, we ought to have a bill with teeth in it. In the United States there is a provision that anyone who seeks information and is not granted it has the right of access to a court. However, I am told this is highly unsatisfactory and it is something that we would have to look into here.

After listening to the comments of backbenchers on the other side, I am not too hopeful, but surely they have a vested interest in acquiring this information and seeing that pressure is put upon the government to make it available. Their comments would seem to indicate that they are quite happy with the present situation. If that is their view, we can expect that the government is not inclined to go along with the changes we want.

I would therefore suggest, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members ponder, reflect and review their thinking. Failure to take action at this time to compel the government to make available facts and information which are required, within reasonable limits, will bring about a further deterioration of the limited democracy we now enjoy.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, there is not much time left so I shall not spend too long on this bill. I was somewhat surprised at the comments of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) about backbenchers failing to get information. When Liberal backbenchers want information they go to the source. Sometimes it can be secured merely by picking up the telephone. The information can then be passed back to the constituent in the riding. This method does not get much publicity but it does not cost as much to get it that way as it does by putting it on the Order Paper.

It was demonstrated in the question period today that Liberal backbenchers take second place to no one—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: —in the calibre and quality of questions asked to get the kind of information that people in Canada want.

Mr. Baldwin: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Cullen: I would prefer the hon. member to listen. I had expected to be speaking today on the Sir John A. Macdonald Day bill.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in no way had I intended to challenge the calibre and nature of the questioning. It is the calibre and nature of the answers that has always worried me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: I do not think that Liberal backbenchers can be blamed for that. Back in the lobby after the question period I did not hear any complaints from them about the quality of the answers they received. I am afraid the fact is that opposition members do not listen to the answers. The hon. member who introduced Bill C-15 stated that this is the third time he has brought it forward. It seems to me that having lost out on two former occasions he should not quit, although he seems to follow eighteenth or nineteenth century motto, "If at first you don't succeed, try, try again." I would suggest, instead, that if at first you don't succeed, try another method.

I suspect that the two bills already rejected by this House contained the same wording as the bill before us today. I read the bill from a somewhat jaundiced point of view. I wish the hon. member had consulted an attorney about the manner in which it should be drawn. If he had done this it would probably have been suggested that he scrap the bill and incorporate the explanatory note which makes more sense and, I think, says what the hon. member wished to say. This being a bilingual country, I would say:

[Translation]

This bill is in aid of the public's right to know in what manner a government is administering the public duties entrusted and delegated to it by the people: save for exceptions that are in the public interest, the bill enacts Bentham's basic parliamentary Rule that public affairs must be conducted publicly.

[English]

I think that clearly says what the hon. member intended. As I read the bill, it seems to say that this is an act to better assure the public's right to freedom of access to public documents and information about government administration. If I may paraphrase, clause 1 of the bill says that the government shall make its records and information concerning its doings available to any person, at his request, in a reasonable manner and time. If the hon. member had stopped there, the bill might have been all right. As one who practised criminal law, I know that when we look at the Criminal Code we always try to find defences in the section itself before we get to the facts: we always go to the legislation first. So when I look at clause 2, the exceptions mentioned by the hon. member take away any teeth in clause 1. Not only do we have one exception, but he has in effect four exceptions to that which he is suggesting in clause 1. One could almost take judicial notice of the first exception:

(a) affecting national security;

The second exception is:

(b) concerning matters that are exempted by statute from disclosure;

This could surely be achieved by statutory legislation. The next exception is:

(c) concerning trade secrets, and commercial or financial matters of a privileged or confidential nature, obtained from private persons;

Clause 2 (d) is even more all-powerful in defeating clause 1, because it says:

(d) concerning any matter of private interest to the degree that the right to personal privacy excludes the public interest.

Mr. Speaker, armed with that piece of legislation, if an officer of the Crown could not bring himself within clause 2(a) (b) or (c) in response to a request for information, he could surely argue that under clause 2 (d) he has hardly to reveal any information to an individual.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Cullen: I hope it is a question about the Sir John A. Macdonald bill. I am better prepared for that.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, has the hon. member noted that the bill under discussion in regard to which he has enumerated these four exceptions, makes no reference to any exception in the area sometimes referred to in this House as the prerogative of the Crown to withhold information at their discretion? It seems to me that the hon. member is losing sight of the distinction between private persons and the public person represented by the Crown.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I had almost eight years of training at university and law school and 12 years of practice in the law, and I think I recognize the distinction. The hon. member has pointed out the weakness that occurs in clause 2(d). Ministers of the Crown have the intelligence to decide what is and what is not in the public interest. The hon. member has a point, but I think clause 2(d) defeats the purpose of the bill. Without it the bill might have been a better piece of legislation. It might have been able to bring forth from the cabinet the kind of information that the hon. member is seeking to have disclosed.

For that reason I would have to vote against the bill, Mr. Speaker, primarily because it is not consistent. I do not think it is particularly well drawn and, as I said, the explanatory note covers the ground much better. Certainly clause 1 covers the ground much better, without the addition of clause 2. This one is typical of some of the bills that are presented by the opposition. It seems to be saying that we ought to be doing something which in fact is being done. The information that members want is available. It is available through the oral question period, through written questions on the Order Paper and through notices of motions for the production of papers. I think I am right in saying that there are at least 154 requests for information on the Order Paper.

Members have access to ministers. These men are not hidden in ivory towers. Ministers are accessible and I have never found it difficult to obtain answers. Sometimes hon. members are confused because the answer is no and does not agree with their point of view. Perhaps that is why this legislation has been brought forward, because it tends to indicate to the public that something suspicious is taking place, which of course is not the case. The explanatory note and clause 1 have merit. However, I shall be forced to vote against the measure, primarily because clause 2 takes away from the bill whatever merit it may have contained.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member resumes his seat, may I ask him a question? I believe I am right in thinking that he favours the principle of the bill but he has difficulty with its details. If that is the case, does he not favour sending the subject matter of the bill to a committee, say the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, where he and others could improve it?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the principle of the bill, but I do not think the bill is even necessary. It seems to me that we have access to information now. Surely clause 2 (a), (b), (c) and (d) add nothing to the circumstances that now exist. If you want information, it is available, with the exception of the matters set out by the hon. member in clause 2 of the bill.

Disclosure of Government Information

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen), I came here primarily prepared to discuss the merits or demerits of Sir John A. Macdonald Day. I think it demonstrates the tremendous flexibility hon. members on this side of the House possess, that changes in the matters to be discussed as listed on the Order Paper do not interfere with the speeches we make.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: Our interest in Sir John A. Macdonald demonstrates the rather non-partisan approach that we have taken to politics on this side of the House.

I was interested in the comments of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather). It seems to me that where I would essentially disagree with the hon. member for Peace River is that his concern is almost exclusively a concern for more information or greater access to information for Members of Parliament. It seems to me that we are a very small group, and that if there is a problem in this area, and I think there is, it is not a problem of any magnitude or seriousness. The problem really is a matter of access to information at the general public's level. In so far as I can understand the purport of this bill—I share the view of the hon. member for Sarnia—I think the explanatory note is probably the clearest part because it seems to attempt to deal with this particular problem.

Even if we accept this as being something that we can usefully do in this House, that is, make information more generally available to the public, it does not go far enough. The greatest improvement regarding the general problem of public participation in public affairs can best be brought about by providing enough information to enable intelligent participation on the part of the public. If that is to take place, far more radical changes than this bill offers will have to take place, and far more radical developments will have to be undertaken involving public financing of experimental organizations for citizen groups. When that happens and we get the response, when there are citizens groups so formed, with the federal government involved in financing some of these projects, we shall see the true measure of concern shared by this House with regard to meaningful participation by citizens of our country in the political process.

Mr. Reid: Pure hogwash.

Mr. Faulkner: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) says it is hogwash.

Mr. Baldwin: He took the words out of my mouth.

Mr. Faulkner: Probably that is the finest contribution the hon. member has made for a long time in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Cullen.]

Mr. Faulkner: I contend that if before now citizens groups have not developed in Kenora-Rainy River, after hearing the hon. member's remark they will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: More hogwash.

Mr. Faulkner: At least the hon. member is consistent. The traditional pattern in this country and in almost all other countries has been that the electoral system has sort of thrown up a group of individuals through the electoral process who, somehow, feel themselves charged with governing this country but really, without reference except in a most cursory and superficial way, to the public at large. These individuals operate with the technocrats who have made their way through the public service through the various examination processes and, together, as a sort of elite operation things are run. That is going to change.

Mr. Reid: We do not do it very well.

Mr. Faulkner: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River who is making a speech by way of asides now has added that we do not do it very well. I disagree. In terms of making this concept operate, we have been successful. The problem with the system is that it does not involve the public in a meaningful way in the decision-making process. I will deal with that matter. This bill is inadequate in that way as well as being inadequate in ways in which hon. members have discussed. Its inadequacies lie in the fact that it does not deal with this fundamental problem. It does not go far enough.

There is, first of all, the right to know. I think Information Canada, despite the rather cynical reception it has been given by the opposition, is an important step in the right direction and no doubt will make a contribution and constitute an improvement.

Mr. Baldwin: It is not a step in the right direction; it is a plunge.

Mr. Faulkner: I submit it is an important step in the right direction. I am prepared to watch it carefully, because I think everyone on this side of the House will agree that it is the type of operation which can be open to abuse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: Yet I think the concept is right. I do not know how many hon. members have been to see the new offices on Slater Street. Information facilities are available there, and what is being attempted is a constructive and positive step in providing the public with information so that the public can intelligently respond to the political problems confronting it. A characteristic of politics in this country in the past has been the reluctance to involve the public in an open, frank and full way in the problems and with the information which we have.

Mr. Baldwin: The hon. member must not forget to use the word "fruitful".

Mr. Faulkner: It has been suggested to me that governments in the past—I am not being critical of this government because it, as well as the government headed by former Prime Minister Pearson, have gone a long way toward improving this situation—have not gone far enough in this area. Certainly, we have brought about improvements to involve the public and I think this is an important development in the democratic process. Yet in some ways the democratic process, which we have been talking about and which we have extolled in our schools and universities has been somewhat fraudulent. It has been a representative system which has had certain democratic features to it. But, really, fundamental democratic features have not been present—democratic features which involve the public at large.

I am talking of the public working in a meaningful way to supplement the activities of Members of Parliament. Therefore, I say that the right to know is basic, but the bill does not go far enough. Whether we like it or not —and I like it—we are moving into a situation wherein the right of access to decision-making is a right which the public at large will expect to have. We want to develop the machinery, if you like, to accomplish this end.

To its credit, this government through a variety of programs administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Secretary of State and the Department of Manpower and Immigration, has been involved in this field by helping to finance the formation of citizens groups. These groups have challenged the representatives of the people at provincial, municipal and federal levels. These confrontations have at times been tough; they have called into question the priorities, the competence and the sincerity of those who were publicly elected. Nevertheless, this protest is a form of therapy which in my view is tremendously healthy for our country.

As I see it, the government will become increasingly involved in financing citizens groups of this type—whether tenants groups, or welfare groups does not matter; I have in mind groups of citizens formed to advance their particular interests. The institutions we presently have are totally inadequate to accommodate this kind of movement. Senator Croll has called attention to these developments in the course of recent comments and we now have to address ourselves to the question: What should be the relationship between the representative system to which we are accustomed and these extraparliamentary groups? If we stand always as protagonists, as those to whom these people must constantly address themselves as adversaries, the representative system will suffer. But if we can find a way of accommodating citizens groups—I do not mean "conning" them, but accommodating them—certain benefits are bound to follow.

The right of participation is a right in itself in a true democracy, but beyond this citizen participation has its own merits; it provides a check against technocratic decisions arrived at by elected representatives in conjunction with civil servants of university backgrounds who can in no way deeply understand or respond to the problems the citizens of this country generally face. In addition, the whole process of participation does in itself provide a sense of worth which citizens otherwise would not feel because they sense themselves to be alienated from the democratic process; only on rare occasions do they put anything into it at all. We should project the principle of involvement to a point at which all citizens, however humble, have a real involvement in decision-making. this would make the system more truly democratic than it is at present and help develop a sense of community in the country as a whole, which at present is lacking.

Mr. Bell: May I ask the Parliamentary Secretary a question, as one who is interested in this subject and who has just come from a luncheon in which one speaker representing the department tried to explain Information Canada? Can the Parliamentary Secretary tell us whether he honestly believes that in this new type of response to government publications, for example, by newspapers across Canada, the government will give the same publicity to views which are unfavourable as it will to views which are favourable?

Mr. Faulkner: I am surprised the hon. member should have any doubts on that score at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: He has not.

Mr. Faulkner: I personally have none whatever.

Mr. Bell: I will check a year from now.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, since we have only a minute or two left I shall quickly put one or two thoughts on record and then defer in case hon. members wish to bring this bill to a vote. The hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) is a consistent gentleman; he keeps coming back with the same bill. I had intended to comment on the first part of the measure, but my hon. friend from Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) has already covered that ground so well that I will now refrain from doing so.

The hon. member for Surrey told us he had been singularly unsuccessful on the two previous occasions on which he had presented this legislation. He has now brought it back on Friday the 13th, an inauspicious date which cannot be a particularly favourable omen. He is a brave man and should be congratulated for fearlessly tempting fate in this way. I think I must put on record one quotation by a famous Canadian who is now a professor at Harvard. He is a graduate from the same institution as that from which I hold a degree. Even the hon. member sitting across the way has one.

An hon. Member: Well, who is he?

Mr. McBride: The man is Mr. Galbraith. He said: "Consistency is what freezes us to our error." Perhaps this could be interpreted in such a way as to apply to the hon. member for Surrey, and perhaps he ought to try another move as recommended to him by my hon. friend from Sarnia-Lambton.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour provided for Private Members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday afternoon at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

*LEASE OF LAND IN CAUGHNAWAGA INDIAN RESERVE

Question No. 47—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

1. Since January 1, 1970, has any land of the Caughnawaga Indian Reserve been leased and, if so, with respect to each such lease, what is (a) the name and address of the lessee (b) the acreage of land (c) the use to which the land will be put (d) the term of the lease (e) the rental or lease fees payable?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes. Question No. 90—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

Does the Food and Drug Directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare allow amphetamines to be labelled as "appetite depressants, mood brighteners, and pep-pills, etc." and, if so, is the Directorate giving consideration to curbing the above labelling similar to action recently taken by the Food and Drug Administration in the United States?

The Food and Drug Directorate is represented on a Committee of the Canadian Medical Association which has recently been established to conduct a national review of the current use of stimulants and sedatives in medicine. DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE—NUMBER OF MAN-HOURS SAVED BY UTILIZATION OF COMPUTERS

Question No. 167—Mr. Robinson:

How many man-hours have been saved as a result of the utilization of computers by the Department of Finance during each year since computers have been used?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The provision of computer facilities in the Department of Finance has greatly increased the volume of analysis carried out on the national finances and the national economy. The work of compilation, storage, retrieval and analysis now being done by the computer would, if done by hand, require the services of a very large number of clerical staff, together with desk calculators, filing facilities, stenographic support and supervisory personnel. The computer permits the use of new and more advanced techniques of analysis, and provides a constant flow of up-to-date information of a kind which could not be provided by traditional means. No estimate of the man-hour equivalent provided by computer services is possible owing to the wide variety of new methods of data processing made possible by the use of the computer.

CONTROL BY BANK OF CANADA OF INTEREST RATES

Question No. 220—Mr. Robinson:

1. What can or will the Bank of Canada do to limit the interest charged by the Chartered Banks and that paid to depositors by the Chartered Banks?

2. How can the Bank of Canada control the interest rates charged by (near banks) trust companies and finance companies?

3. What changes in legislation would be necessary to make the Bank of Canada more effective in curbing inflation?

4. What control is exerted by the Bank of Canada over advertising by the Chartered Banks?

5. What would be the estimated results if the Bank of Canada limited the interest rate chargeable by the Chartered Banks and lending institutions?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): In so far as the Bank of Canada is concerned: 1, 2 and 3. The Bank of Canada exerts an important influence on the general level of interest rates and other credit conditions by using the powers which Parliament has given it in the Bank of Canada Act, mainly those powers which allow it to control the cash reserve base of the chartered banks as a group, and in this way to control the rate of expansion of the banking system. Additional powers would require further amendment of the Bank of Canada Act. Competition between banks and other financial institutions and in financial markets generally for the available funds causes this influence to spread through the whole system. The Bank of Canada has no statutory power to fix or to limit directly the interest rates charged or paid by the chartered banks or other institutions.

4. None.

5. This is a hypothetical question and not answerable.

NATIONAL PARKS—GOLF COURSES

1. Which national parks have golf courses?

2. Which national parks are large enough to contain golf courses but do not have such and for what reason or reasons?

3. What are the green fees charged, what total revenue was realized, and what were the amounts charged to maintenance and upkeep in 1970?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Prince Edward Island, Cape Breton Highlands, Fundy, Riding Mountain, Prince Albert, Elk Island, Waterton Lakes, Banff, and Jasper National Park.

2. Terra Nova, Kejimkujik, Point Pelee, Yoho, Kootenay, Mount Revelstoke, Glacier and Wood Buffalo.

In accordance with national parks policy golfing is acceptable to a reasonable degree in recreational oriented parks. However, it is not considered an essential, desirable or compatible activity in those parks which are basically scenic or nature parks—wilderness parks—parks established to preserve unique species of fauna and flora, and areas of special historic, geological or geographical interest. In developing the above parks, the provision of golf courses was assessed in relation to the overall concept of national parks. In each case careful consideration was given to the fundamental purpose of the individual park, its category or type, terrain conditions, location, accessibility and the visitor need for such a facility.

3. The green fees charged are:

	9 hole course	18 hole course
1 round	$ 2.00	—
Daily	3.50	$ 4.
Weekly	17.50	20.
Season
Senior men and ladies	$ 80.	$ 90.
Married Couples	105.	115.
Junior boys and girls	20.	25.

The total revenue realized in the fiscal year 1969-1970 amounted to $294,048.

The amounts charged to maintenance and upkeep for the fiscal year 1969-1970 totalled to $188,145.

The golf courses in Banff and Jasper National Parks are operated by the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways and the national park fees, revenue, and operation and maintenance costs are not applicable.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON METHODS OF STIMULATING EMPLOYMENT—NATURE OF MEASURES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to address to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made in the House on Friday by the Acting Prime Minister that "announcements will be made shortly which will have the effect of stimulating employment", is it the intention of the government to meet in the very near future with representatives of the provinces to discuss with them ways in which they can most effectively assist the government in putting these measures into operation so that unemployment may be combated in the most effective manner?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, meetings at various levels are going on all the time. I know that officials of the federal government are meeting with provincial officials very shortly to prepare the December meeting of finance ministers. No doubt they will be talking about this problem. There have been meetings over the past many weeks between officials of various governments. Therefore there is nothing more to report on that.

Mr. Hees: Since this is a very important matter I naturally asked the Prime Minister whether special consultations would be taking place, and it seems that they will not. Can the Prime Minister advise the House when the government expects to outline to the country the nature of the measures mentioned by the Acting Prime Minister specifically on Friday, and how effective the government expects these specific measures will be in reducing unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will realize that the second part of the question is not in order. The Prime Minister may wish to reply to the first part of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the first part was perhaps in order but it was incorrect. The hon. member said there were no such meetings. I do not know what he wishes the House to infer from that, but I have just replied that there have been meetings and will be more.

Mr. Hees: Dealing with other matters but not this.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. The Chair will return to the hon. member in a moment.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement by the Minister of Public Works inside the House that new measures are being prepared to reduce unemployment and his statement outside the House that a number of new public works projects would be included in these new measures, could I ask the Prime Minister whether the minister in question was stating government policy and, if so, when does the Prime Minister intend to have an announcement made to the House regarding the extent and nature of these new measures?

Mr. Trudeau: On the first part of the question, the minister was stating government policy but in reality it was a continuation of government policy. A few days before, I had occasion to enumerate to the House the series of measures which have been taken since the Minister of Finance's last budget in March, and last Friday the Acting Prime Minister was informing the House that the government was in the process of wanting to add to this series. When they will be announced is at the government's discretion. We will announce the measures when they are ready and when they have been discussed fully with the provinces concerned.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the urgency of the matter and the fact that public works projects must be undertaken very soon if they are to have any beneficial effect in reducing winter unemployment, can the Prime Minister indicate when there will be a statement about new public works projects either by the federal government or in conjunction with the provincial governments and municipalities, and will this statement include at the same time a mini-budget outlining some of the government's fiscal proposals with respect to dealing with the problem of unemployment?

Mr. Trudeau: On the first part of the question, I repeat that the timing is up to the government to decide, but it will be as soon as possible.

On the second part of the question, may I remind the House that apart from the last budget there was the Minister of Finance's lengthy statement very recently in the debate on the Speech from the Throne in which he put before the House the government's economic and financial position. As to whether there will be another budget needed and at what time, as the House knows this is at the government's discretion and it is something that we will announce in due course. I might say, by the way, that I am very glad that the opposition parties have been conscious of the need to do more and, indeed, have been pressing the government to do more, and we hope that when the time comes to pay for all this we will have their support.

Mr. Speaker: This matter was raised originally by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings and he had a supplementary question which he did not ask. I would like to go back to him now.

Mr. Hees: As it has now become obvious that the government has no new policy to announce, is it not obvious that the Acting Prime Minister was misleading the House on Friday and that the Prime Minister was using double talk and giving us gobbledygook as he usually does when dealing with these matters?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I returned to the hon. member. I thought he had a supplementary question.

INCREASE IN PURCHASING POWER TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary to the Prime Minister.

Dealing with unemployment, the Prime Minister himself stated, as proven by a 1954 number of Cité Libre—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that the question period only lasts 40 minutes and I do not think that he has to go back to 1954 to ask his question. Therefore, I invite him to ask his question immediately.

Mr. Caouette: Let us remain in 1970 then. The Prime Minister stated: "Happily, there is a remedy that can be applied instantly, at the first sign of weakness in the national economy: it is to stimulate purchases by putting more money into the hands of the consumers."

Is the Prime Minister prepared at this moment to hand over more funds to consumers as a means to fight unemployment efficiently?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had kept himself posted on monetary matters, he would have learned that Bank of Canada credit has been considerably increased in recent months, which means that much more money has been made available to consumers.

FINANCE MINISTERS' CONFERENCE—SUBMISSION BY PROVINCES OF PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask one further supplementary question of the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance is meeting with the provincial Ministers of Finance on December 7 and 8, I believe, has the federal government invited the provinces to submit at that time any programs they and their municipalities might have in the form of public works projects which might help to alleviate the unemployment situation to some extent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I cannot answer that question, Mr. Speaker. I am not aware of the agenda in detail. In the past the provinces have felt free to make such representations and I am sure they will in the future, but I cannot say whether this is specifically on the agenda.

IMPLEMENTATION OF BAY OF FUNDY TIDAL POWER PROJECT AS MEANS OF PROVIDING EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): In view of the heavy unemployment that always comes to us in the Atlantic area in the winter months, and in view of the lower interest rates that have been put into effect by the Bank of Canada, would the Prime Minister reconsider the proposal made by the task force that investigated the harnessing of the Bay of Fundy tides to see if that project, which would provide both short-range and long-range employment for people in the Atlantic area, could be implemented?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know of no such review going at the present time within the government but I will communicate the representations of the hon. member to the responsible minister.

CONSTRUCTION GRANTS OR LOW INTEREST LOANS TO AGRICULTURAL EXHIBITIONS AS MEANS OF PROVIDING EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question I would like to direct to the Minister of Agriculture in connection with the governments program for combating unemployment. Would the minister consider making selected ex gratia payments to exhibition associations or similar organizations for the purpose of constructing much needed agricultural exhibition complexes, or the introduction of legislation to provide low interest financing for the construction of such facilities?

Mr. Speaker: I will allow the minister to reply to the question but I would think the hon. member's question, much in the same way as the question asked by the previous member, is in the form of a suggestion rather than a question. I would not think a question in those terms is quite in order, but perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply to this one.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that this kind of financing has been under consideration by the government from time to time for, I believe, about the last six years. However, the priorities in relation to the total amount of financing available have not been such that we have brought forward such a bill.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, may I address a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Would he discuss with the Treasury Board the releasing of funds to the Minister of Public Works and his department in order that they may proceed with the many necessary projects that they are anxious to build?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is of the same nature as the two questions asked previously. I would think it is in the form of a suggestion, and the hon. member has to assume that his suggestion will be considered by the government.

POLICE EFFECTIVENESS IN SEARCH FOR KIDNAPPERS AND MURDERERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Before I ask it, I know I am speaking for all members of the House in expressing to him and Mrs. McIlraith the deepest sympathy of all of us in the trying days through which he and the family are passing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there has been some argument over the question as to which police officers or which police force were doing what work in Montreal. The police officers who discovered the home of the Secretary of State showed particular cunning and ability, but they did not display the same when they picked up Lortie. According to press reports, in the home where he was picked up there were three of the other wanted FLQ criminals. Is the minister in a position to advise, so that appropriate decorations may be given to these policemen, who they were and what forces they represented when displaying such nearsightedness?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the right hon. gentleman for the reference preceding his question. I appreciate his remarks very much.

As to the question itself, the arrests, the subsequent search and the discovery of the alleged hiding place were carried out by the Montreal city police and the Quebec provincial police. Since that is the case I do not think it would be appropriate for me to make any comment as this is the responsibility of the Minister of Justice of Quebec.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker. Was any suggestion made by the other police forces or the directors in charge of the administration of the War Measures Act regulations that the RCMP should assist in these searches and arrests?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, there is an anti-terrorist squad comprised of representatives of the three forces working on these matters in Montreal. I do not think I can answer the question more specifically.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, would the minister consider having an independent investigation set up by the federal government so that we may ascertain the facts as to what did take place, because the arrests and detentions are being made under the War Measures Act implemented by the federal government?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I should point out that the responsibility for the administration of the criminal law in this respect lies with the provincial authorities. I do not feel that it would be appropriate for the federal authority to set up an investigatory body to examine the action of police forces under the responsibility of the provinces.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Solicitor General to make representations to those in authority responsible for the administration of the regulations to see whether it would help to look in the "clues" closet?

SUGGESTED COMMISSION TO EVALUATE EFFECTIVENESS OF POLICE WORK

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to both the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General since it involves joint responsibility. In view of the increasing alarm over police effectiveness in the Cross and Laporte kidnappings and the Laporte murder, is any consideration being given to establishing some kind of commission in conjunction with the Montreal authorities and the provincial authorities of Quebec which would evaluate police effectiveness and the necessary steps to be taken so there will be appropriate security in this situation and with regard to any such problems in the future?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know of no such review going on at the present time Prince Edward-Hastings recently I stated that this type of review and examination was under way at the federal level and that we are doing it in consultation with the other police forces involved.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, has the Prime Minister, in consultation with the other two levels of government, had the opportunity to explore the possibility of an independent commission sanctioned by all three levels of government in order that a full reading of the case can be made for the appropriate officials involved and for the public?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I misunderstood the first question. I was not indicating that this kind of investigation, to use the member's words, was required. I did indicate that an examination was required with a view to dealing with repetitions in the future, but there is no implication that we are investigating the past in the sense that it might have been the result of some gross negligence or other circumstance. There is no investigation in that sense, but we are preparing for the future. That is all I wish to indicate, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In light of what has happened and been disclosed, could the assessments and recommendations of the police which led to the invoking of the War Measures Act also come under review as to their competence?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the government is as interested as anyone in stacking up the results with the previous assessments but this has nothing to do with the principle of the invocation of the War Measures Act. I have given the House the reasons we had for invoking the Act and it would be unfair to say that we only acted because the police told us such and such. We acted because we were informed by all responsible authorities in Quebec of the situation and on our own assessment of the situation.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NUMBER JAILED IN CANADA COMPARED WITH UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware of the reports over the weekend to the effect that despite our much smaller population Canada is now jailing twice as many people as the United Kingdom? Will the minister give some consideration to constructive action on this situation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): It was good of the hon. member to give me notice a moment or two ago that he intended to put this question to me. I should like to study the nature of the figures upon which the comparison is made and take whatever appropriate action or make whatever appropriate statement is necessary.

UNITED NATIONS

REFUSAL OF ISRAEL TO RECOGNIZE JERUSALEM AS SEPARATE ENTITY

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In view of the refusal by the Israeli government to accept the UN's recommendation to the effect that Jerusalem should be considered as an entity separate from the Israeli problem, does the Canadian government intend to ask his UN representative to protest once more against the confiscations and expropriations which the Arabs have to suffer?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Our purpose, and I am sure it is one which is shared by all hon. members, is to bring about a settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute, and for that reason we are supporting the implementation of resolution 242 which includes other elements, but does include, of course, the question of Jerusalem.

CRIMINAL CODE

PREVENTIVE DETENTION—INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice. Is his department planning to introduce any amendments to the Criminal Code, particularly to sections 659 to 667 dealing with preventive detention? What bothers me most is section 660 having to do with habitual criminals, and I should like to know whether there is any plan to change this section?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): The law as it affects habitual criminals and preventive detention was thoroughly dealt with in the committee under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Roger Ouimet. The Department of Justice, the Department of the Solicitor General and the government are actively considering to what extent the recommendations should be implemented.

Mr. Cafik: Is there any plan to send this section—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

WAR MEASURES ACT—PAYMENT BY QUEBEC FOR SERVICES OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): In view of the fact that the Prime Minister's reply earlier indicated that to some extent the decision to invoke the War Measures Act was based on information provided by the police and in view of certain events which have happened, with some reports indicating that some of the police have not been too efficient in apprehending some of the alleged suspects, will the Prime Minister reconsider his position now in regard to paying for the services provided by the Armed Forces as this might bring about greater efficiency on the part of certain—

CANADIAN BROADCASTING COPORATION

TIME OF FRENCH INSTRUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Since neither Postmaster General is present today I should like to direct this question to the Secretary of State and ask my good friend the Solicitor General to audit it. It concerns a petition received from Knox Presbyterian Church in Ottawa praying that a popular CBC language instruction program not be shown in prime kirk time. Can the minister advise the House what he has been able to do to avoid unnecessary competition between Presbyterianism and bilingualism?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question has been audited and found lacking.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTIONS BY QUEBEC MINISTER RESPECTING IDENTITY CARDS, EMERGENCY MEASURES, CENSORSHIP

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Arising out of a report that the Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec is preparing a white paper including not only a proposal to establish a system of identity cards, about which I asked the minister some days ago, but also suggestions for amending the Criminal Code with respect to emergency measures, questions of censorship and the like, I should like to ask the minister whether he has been in discussion with the Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec regarding the work which is now being done in the latter's department?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I have not received any specific recommendations from the government of Quebec on the subject though I read the newspaper reports over the weekend. If and when such representations are received they will, of course, in accordance with the usual practice, be considered by the government and discussed, if necessary, with the other provincial Attorneys General. On the basis of a discussion I had with the provincial Minister of Justice it is my understanding that he was not outlining any program of action or manifesto but was recommending a re-examination of the role and efficiency of the police forces in Quebec.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that some of the suggestions he made, which no doubt he repeated to the minister in conversation, directly affect federal jurisdiction, and in the case of censorship affect federal jurisdiction in the field of freedom of speech and so on, can the minister assure the House that he will pursue this matter further with the Quebec authorities to avoid a conflict later between the two levels of government?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am sure any conflict can be avoided, Mr. Speaker.

QUEBEC—PROPOSED AUTHORIZATION OF WIRETAPPING

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I wish to ask the Minister of Justice whether in view of his repeated expressions of opposition to wiretapping he will discuss with the Minister of Justice of Quebec the proposal there to implement wiretapping legislation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I believe my views on this subject are fairly well known. I hope to be able to bring a bill before the House either prior to or after the Christmas recess.

PAKISTAN—ASSISTANCE TO CYCLONE AND FLOOD VICTIMS

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): I have a question for the Secretary of States for External Affairs. Is the minister in a position to tell the House what action the Canadian government intends to take by way of assistance to the people of Pakistan in view of the terrible tragedy which has taken place there resulting in the deaths of possibly as many people as there are in the city of Ottawa?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Prime Minister sent today on behalf of the Canadian people a message of the deepest sympathy over the loss of life and destruction which has been caused in eastern Pakistan by the recent cyclone and tidal wave. He told the president that Canada was contributing $50,000 immediately to the International Red Cross appeal fund for cyclone relief and has instructed his officials to determine what additional relief assistance we can best provide.

TRADE

ALLEGED LABELLING OF AGRICULTURAL IMPORTS AS CANADIAN PRODUCTS

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell us whether agricultural products imported into Canada are being labelled for sale as products of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt whether this question is in order. It seems to me to be a very general question and unless the hon. member can be more specific it should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Downey: Allegations are being made that certain agricultural products imported into this country are being labelled as products of Canada. Bearing in mind the $35½ million agricultural trade deficit, would the minister look into this situation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): It would be helpful if the hon. member could be a little more specific.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

AGRICULTURE

PRICE OF DRESSED HOGS—ACTION UNDER AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION ACT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the possibility that despite the very serious slump in hog prices in recent weeks farmers will receive no deficiency payments from the Agricultural Price Stabilization Board due to the nature of the support formula under which the board operates, will the minister consider calling a meeting of the board and its advisory committee in order to consider ways and means by which hog producers could receive supplementary payments until such time as market prices recover?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there is no problem in referring whatever data are now available to the Agricultural Stabilization Board. They can, of course, have a meeting at the request of the industry or, indeed, I can ask them to have a meeting to consider this. I am sure they would be willing to do so with a request from either direction.

WAR MEASURES ACT AND TEMPORARY PUBLIC ORDER BILL—REMARKS BY FORMER PRIME MINISTER PEARSON

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): My question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the remarks yesterday on national television by former Prime Minister Lester Pearson with respect to not having sufficient details to judge the correctness or otherwise of the government's action with regard to the War Measures Act and now the temporary public order bill, will the Prime Minister indicate what steps are being taken to clarify what I think is a good deal of uncertainty, as expressed by the former Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the exact nature of the remarks attributed to the former Prime Minister. If they are as the hon. member says, apparently the former Prime Minister is in the same situation as the hon. member. However, this does not apply to other hon. members because they all voted in support of the temporary measures bill.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member knows, it is difficult to answer questions on statements made outside the House by persons other than members of the cabinet. Perhaps the hon. member might phrase his question differently.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In light of the Prime Minister's response to my question, when we come to the vote on third reading of the temporary public order bill, is he willing to allow a free vote for all members of the House so that everyone connected—

Mr. C. Terrence Murphy (Sault Ste. Marie): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Considering that inflation is still a serious problem in the country—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Murphy: I am glad hon. members opposite agree. In view of the fact the government is considering the introduction of measures to alleviate unemployment which may have the effect of nourishing the demand-pull type of inflation, is the government also considering the introduction of other measures which will have the effect of containing the cost-push breed of the inflationary animal?

Mr. Speaker: I think this question is similar to one which was asked earlier in other terms.

RAILROAD LABOUR CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Hon. Will the minister, at the first opportunity, make a statement in the House with respect to the labour negotiation situation regarding Canadian railroads, bearing in mind that the already depressed Canadian economy cannot stand the national disaster of a railroad strike?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): The hon. member will be pleased to learn that Mr. R. A. Gallagher of Winnipeg has been appointed chairman of each conciliation board in matters relating to Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway. Hearings of the board have commenced in Montreal. I know that we are all optimistic about the possible result. At the same time I would assure the hon. member that his suggestion will be passed along to the minister who is about his duties today in Montreal.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED REPEGGING OF CANADIAN DOLLAR TO ASSIST EXPORTERS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the employment opportunities provided in Atlantic Canada by the pulp and paper industry and the 8.4 per cent decline in newsprint shipments to the United States during the past three months, is the government contemplating any action to assist this industry to improve its competitive position in the United States market?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member realizes that he is now asking for a statement of a very general nature. This information should be given to the House by way of a statement on motions. Perhaps the question might be asked in those terms.

Mr. Crouse: Perhaps I could ask my question in a different manner. Since the present value of the Canadian dollar now means that Canadian exporters selling in United States funds receive 5½ per cent less for their goods than in the first half of 1970, can the Prime Minister indicate when Canadian exporters can anticipate some action being taken to stabilize the Canadian dollar?

Will the government House Leader give consideration to having both these measures dealt with in Committee of the Whole? I ask this question in view of the fact that both bills received extensive discussion and detailed consideration in committee meetings, and it may be that the present unhappy experience of the Minister of Justice in connection with the bill with which we are now dealing will not be repeated if government backbenchers are properly briefed.

FARM MACHINERY PRICE INCREASES PROPOSED BY WHITE MOTOR COMPANY

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): My question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that farm machinery prices of the White Motor Company, formerly known as Cockshutt, are, as indicated by that company, liable to be increased by 7 per cent on all sales made in 1971, will the minister indicate whether he will refer this to the Prices and Incomes Commission, particularly in view of the fact that it includes profits for that company?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that company would be expected to comply with the pricing criteria agreed upon last February. Should they raise prices in the manner suggested by the hon. member, the Prices and Incomes Commission will examine it.

Mr. Skoberg: Will the minister tell this House and the people of Canada whether he is prepared to take the initiative of inquiring into the profits of these farm machinery companies?

Mr. Basford: I do not understand the question, Mr. Speaker. The Prices and Incomes Commission made it very clear that companies which increase their prices above the pricing criteria agreed upon will be investigated. There is no need for an initiative on my part or on the part of anyone else.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): It is my understanding that other studies have been made concerning the situation. I will be happy to bring this to the attention of the minister.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): While the Parliamentary Secretary is having these interesting discussions, will he attempt to find out what success the minister is having with Premier Bennett regarding the matter of having more water released through the dam which would help the situation on both sides?

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I directed a question to the Minister of Agriculture asking for information relating to the government's policy respecting consolidation of prairie farm units. The minister replied that it was too large an area for him to reply to during the question period. Can the minister now advise the House whether he will be making a statement on motions outlining the government's policy on prairie farm unit consolidation, as referred to in the grains proposal, prior to the convening of the agricultural congress?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have no plans to make a statement on motions in that context.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question. I wonder whether the minister could explain to the House and to the farmers of this country how in the name of heaven—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is an argumentative supplementary.

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY POWERS FOR PRESERVATION OF PUBLIC ORDER

The House resumed from Friday, November 13, consideration in committee of Bill C-181, to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada—Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton)—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-181, an act to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada. When the committee rose on Friday, November 13, 1970, clause 7, as amended, of the bill was under consideration, with an amendment proposed thereto by the hon. member for Broadview, which reads as follows:

That clause 7(1) be amended by striking out all the words in the said clause after the words "pending his trial" in the third line thereof so that the subclause would read:

"a person charged with an offence under section 4 shall be detained in custody without bail pending his trial unless an order for his release on bail is made by a court having jurisdiction under the Criminal Code"; and

That subclause 2 be deleted.

Shall the amendment carry?

On clause 7—Detention.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, when I moved the amendment on Friday, I commenced by saying that prior to the implementing of the War Measures Act, and the regulations thereunder, and also prior to passing Bill C-181—

The Chairman: Order. I wonder whether the committee would agree with my suggestion that we have a degree of quietness so we can hear the hon. member for Broadview speak to his amendment.

Mr. Gilbert: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was saying that prior to the implementation of the War Measures Act and the regulations thereunder, and also prior to the passage of Bill C-181, the Minister of Justice was considered one of the more progressive reformers in this House. The reason I say that is that his handling of the languages bill and the amendments to the Criminal Code indicated not only that he was progressive but that he was a man who was conciliatory in the matter of amendments, one whose position was flexible and certainly possessed of understanding.

Thus far, the minister has refused to budge on any amendments proposed to Bill C-181, not only by members of his party but also by members of the opposition. I am sure the Minister of Justice does not want to mar his reputation as a progressive reformer, and doubtless he is concerned at the reaction of certain people to the War Measures Act and to this bill. I am sure the minister is aware of articles in the newspaper written by James Ayres and other writers, as well as some university professors. I hope that in considering not only clause 7 but some of the remaining clauses of the bill the minister will change his attitude to the amendments that will be brought forward.

In introducing my amendment to this clause, I could do no better than remind the committee of the words used by the minister in June of this year when he introduced a bill to reform bail procedures, particularly since the clause we are discussing relates to bail. Rather than giving an attorney general discretionary power, we feel that the judge before whom an accused appears should be given the power to make the decision as to bail. When he introduced the amendments regarding bail in June, the minister said that at present many people are unnecessarily subjected to arrest, though other means such as a summons might be perfectly adequate to secure the ends of justice. He also said that too many people who have been arrested are held in custody pending trial, and are thereby exposed to the various indignities of pre-trial detention.

I could not agree more with the minister. In addition, the 447 people arrested under the War Measures Act, of whom 283 were released, 64 detained and 41 charged, indicates the high proportion of those who were perhaps unnecessarily arrested, 283 of them, as I say, having been released. Perhaps this underlines the necessity for seriously considering the bill clause of this bill.

As the minister said in his statement, the criterion for granting bail should be based on the likelihood that an accused will turn up for his trial, as well as on the secondary consideration whether a serious offence would be committed while he is out on bail. The minister will probably implement these criteria in his bail bill. He well knows the provisions of this clause which give the attorney general discretionary power in the matter of bail.

I would remind the minister of his press release in which it is stated that the objectives of the arrest and reform bail bill are fourfold. The first objective is to avoid unnecessary pre-trial arrest and detention, for the initial decision to arrest is the decision which activates the criminal law process. It sets the administrative machinery in motion and is the citizen's first confrontation with the criminal law process. This initial confrontation may well have a determining influence on that citizen's reaction to the law generally and the criminal law sanction in particular. I cannot agree more, but I am just wondering what happened to the attitude and interest that has prevailed so far in respect of the 283 who have been arrested and released and the 61 who are still being detained.

The second criterion is to insure that in cases where arrest, with or without warrant, has taken place the person accused, whatever his means, is not unnecessarily held in custody until his trial. Again, when you read that it indicates the necessity of having someone present both on behalf of the accused and the Attorney General in respect of the determination of bail, rather than giving the Attorney General the right to determine for a period of time whether or not a person should be released.

The third criterion is to insure an early trial for those who have been detained in custody pending trial. Again, I am sure the Minister of Justice must cringe at times when he thinks of the way these people have not only been arrested but been retained in custody and, in many cases, refused permission by the authorities to contact relatives, friends and counsel. I appeal to his instincts of justice in respect of this particular amendment.

The fourth criterion the minister suggests is to provide statutory guidelines for decision making in this part of the criminal law process and thereby mitigate against the possibilities for discriminatory injustice in the decision to arrest, hold for custody, admit to bail, etc. He probably has summed it up beautifully with that phrase "the possibilities for discretionary injustice". I think we have had an example of discretionary injustice with regard to arrest and holding. Now, the minister wants to continue this discretionary injustice with regard to the matter of bail.

The minister said that the bail reform bill will continue to humanize the administration of criminal law in Canada. The right to bail should not be the prerogative of the rich and detention the plight of the poor. He further observed that an accused person should not be subjected to detention without good reason. When we talk about humanizing the law and not subjecting a person to custody without good reason, we are reminded of Section 2 (12) of the Bill of Rights which the minister is now incorporating as part of Bill C-181. Yet, at the same time he deprives a person of the right to reasonable bail without just cause, even though this provision is contained in the Canadian Bill of Rights.

I find it very difficult to criticize the Minister of Justice, who has had the reputation of being so progressive and humane in the past in respect of this particular matter, but I think events and facts have clearly shown that there has been a great deal of injustice in respect of the arrest and holding of persons. The Minister of Justice could show this tendency to humanize the law by accepting the amendment regarding determination of bail.

If the criterion for bail relates to the appearance of the accused at trial and also the possibility that a serious crime might be committed, surely that determination could be made by a trial judge on the representations of Crown Counsel, speaking on behalf of the Attorney General, and defence counsel speaking on behalf of the accused. This is one way the minister could show some compassion for people who are detained in jail, by not having the Attorney General impose discretionary injustice but rather by having the trial judge impose discretionary justice.

It is for these reasons we move the amendment. I have always thought the Minister of Justice earned his title in the full sense and I would hope he will not quickly earn the title of minister of injustice. If he continues with his attitude concerning amendments to this bill, it may be that he will be suitably tagged with the name of minister of injustice.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has recited my words on the introduction of the bail reform bill which we hope to re-introduce in this House shortly. I stand by those words. I think no one seeks a more contemporary and compassionate, human and flexible criminal law process in this country than I. I have been encouraged by the support I have received over the last two and a half years from the hon. member on the standing committee, as well as from hon. members on both sides of the House.

We are dealing with an extraordinary situation. Insofar as the particular threat to which this bill addresses itself, namely the FLQ, we are not dealing with the ordinary tenor of the criminal law. I tried to explain at the second reading stage of this bill why it was that existing provisions of the criminal law were inadequate to deal with this politically organized criminal conspiracy. I also tried to describe to the House why it was that we sought for a specific purpose, and for a limited period of time only, certain extended powers to be exercised by law enforcement officers in this country under the direction of provincial attorneys general, namely increased powers to arrest and to detain for a limited time, of search and of suspension of bail.

I continue to think that in dealing, in ordinary circumstances, with crime in this country, bail should be considered to be an inalienable right if sought for just cause, and that the primary purpose of bail is to insure that an accused shows up for his trial. The secondary purpose is to insure that releasing an accused on bail will not prejudice the public interest in the sense that an accused might tend to re-commit a crime, cause violence to others, intimidate witnesses and so on. Because of the nature of this FLQ conspiracy I am of the view that the second feature, namely the public interest, would not be served by this bill with the adoption of this amendment.

The very nature of the seditious objectives of the FLQ is to attempt, or promote, the overthrow by violent means, by force or by crime, of the government of Quebec or Quebec in its relationship to Canada. There is more than a little evidence to indicate that members of organizations like the FLQ if apprehended, arrested, and then allowed to go free on bail, following the ordinary principles of law would be tempted to escape the country or to seek and perhaps be granted refuge in other countries. The ordinary extradition laws do not reach out to these cases. What is perhaps more important, I think it would be unrealistic to ignore the fact that given an organized conspiracy as we have here, the likelihood of frustration of the measures taken by the law enforcement authorities would be high if released members of unlawful organizations such as the FLQ were able, when released, to make contact with other conspirators.

I think we are entitled to assume in this case that the risk of intimidation of witnesses would be extraordinarily high. I do not say I am not sensitive to the remarks the hon. member addressed to me or to the way he put them. Were we dealing with the ordinary scope of the criminal law, then I would be most receptive to them. But I have stated on a number of occasions that this is not an ordinary criminal measure but is an extraordinary criminal measure to deal with an extraordinary threat. I say to the hon. member that in terms of this bill his amendment would be meaningless because, as a practical matter, this is what would happen if subclause 1 of clause 7 were repealed altogether and nothing substituted therefor. In short, the government recognizes the extraordinary rule embodied by subclause 1 of clause 7, but it is a rule designed to meet an extraordinary situation. The primary purpose of the provision is to ensure that members of the FLQ and their supporters, who are to be proceeded against under law, will not be in a position to frustrate these proceedings by being allowed to escape justice or interfere with the trial by intimidating witnesses or otherwise.

Because the information relating to conspiracy is in the hands of the law officers who are responsible to the Attorney General, and because of the fact that the Attorney General will be responsible to the legislature of the province and will therefore be responsible to the people, I prefer that these extraordinary measures, namely the suspension of bail by discretion, be in the hands of the Attorney General. He will be accountable for the administration of these extraordinary measures during the six months' period which this bill has to run and I would rather not impose upon the judiciary the responsibility of being a party to the suspension of bail. For these reasons, I urge the committee to refuse this amendment.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, would the minister permit one question. It is a very simple question. In respect of association, such as that involving the FLQ, I think that if someone were charged and obtained bail, provided it were permitted, the laws of extradition between here and the United States might not apply.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is the advice I have been given. I should point out that when we talk about the suspension of bail we are dealing only with a person charged with an offence under clause 4, namely membership or participation in the FLQ. The suspension does not attach the other offences.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member for Broadview, I have always been sympathetic to the excellent statements the Minister of Justice has made concerning the extension of the system of bail to permit people who have been charged with an offence, who are known in the community and are not likely to disappear, to be permitted out on bail until their trial. Therefore, despite the difficulties the Minister of Justice enumerated, I am rather perplexed about what is going on at the present time. I do not question the right, and indeed the duty, of the government to keep in jail until they come to trial people who have been charged with offences such as kidnapping, dynamiting and so on, and possibly even membership in the FLQ.

However, there were people arrested almost a month ago who have been charged with sedition who may or may not be guilty. I assume that when their cases come up for trial the courts will decide whether or not these people are guilty. Some of them may be found guilty, but some of them may well be found to be innocent. Although I hold no brief for them, some of these people are quite well known and are not likely to disappear. Some of them hold important positions in the province of Quebec. Yet, some of these people who were arrested in October may not come to trial until January or February and the trial may continue for a month or so. These people could be locked up in jail for a period of four to six months. I think this is an extremely serious matter. Unfortunately, as indicated by a survey carried out by CTV and released yesterday, a majority of the people of this province believe these people are guilty and should be very heavily punished. However, it well may be that many of these people who will have spent some four to six months in jail will be found to be innocent.

It seems to me the situation we have before us now is very different from the situation the minister had in mind until very recently. I must say to the minister that I am not at all convinced by the argument he has put forward this afternoon concerning the need to keep these people in jail until their trial. While he did have the co-operation of members on this side in the past, I want to tell him that if he continues doing what he is doing now that co-operation will not be forthcoming in the future.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, if I may, I should like to deal very briefly with the minister's reply. I want to say first, as I did in connection with another amendment last Friday, that even if it is admitted that certain additional powers are needed by the police, such as the right to search without warrant and to detain for a certain number of days without charge, surely members of the committee and the minister himself must be bound by the determination that these extraordinary powers not be extended one iota beyond what is absolutely essential. The minister, it seems to me, simply has not convinced anybody yet that this particular power in the hands of the Attorney General can conceivably be essential to achieving the purposes for which this bill is before the committee.

The question is not whether a charged person is kept in jail or not. I cannot decide that, nor can the minister. The question is who will determine whether that person is to be kept in jail pending trial or whether he is to be let out on bail. A basic principle is involved here, namely, whether or not it is right to leave that determination in the hands of a political officer, who is advised by the police who will always find it more convenient to keep somebody in jail rather than to let him out on bail. I ask the minister: has he so little confidence in the judiciary in Quebec or elsewhere that he has to deprive the judiciary of their normal right to make that decision? All the arguments which the minister gave for making the decision as to whether people charged under clause 4 should or should not be given bail he can make or counsel for the attorney general of Quebec can and would make to the court. Counsel would indicate to the court that the person is likely to escape from the country and that extradition would not apply. Counsel would likely indicate to the court the danger that if the man or woman is let loose he or she will have direct contact with the conspirators and continue committing an offence. Counsel would likely indicate to the court the danger of the intimidation of witnesses, and use all the other arguments which the minister gave. If those arguments are valid, if counsel can present to the court some reason for his assertion, I have no doubt that the court would refuse bail, as courts have done in extreme cases of that sort even when the ordinary law is applied.

The issue that is involved is that the minister gives the attorney general of Quebec the power simply to file a certificate in which he states that in his opinion just cause exists for this man to continue to be detained, or whatever the language may be. The court has no discretion, and counsel for the accused has no possible ground for argument. The attorney general has spoken, and that is it.

May I remind members of the committee that the minister made clear, I think on Friday, that the attorney general would not be required to state the reasons for his assertion that there was just cause. I am right in that, am I not? I am sure I am. The minister said that all the attorney general would be required to do would be to state in the certificate that in his opinion just cause exists. Then, the man would be denied bail on the word of the attorney general without inquiry by an independent judge and without the counsel for the accused being able to argue against it because there would be no argument. The attorney general has spoken, that is the word of the Lord.

The principle that is involved is one that our law has recognized for centuries, namely, that you cannot leave the question of whether a person charged is to remain in jail or be let out on bail in the hands of a law enforcement officer who will always find it more convenient to have the accused in jail and who will always have an argument for refusing bail. The minister should not reject that principle and throw it out the window without much more reason than he has given us.

I repeat, I am not arguing whether a certain person or a number of people should be in jail or should be freed on bail. I am saying that the decision should be made by the judge and not by the police, because the attorney general does not make that decision on his own but makes it on the recommendation of a police officer. He has even greater difficulty in refusing to take the advice of his police officer than the judge would have in taking or refusing to take the advice of counsel for the attorney general in court. Therefore, in practical terms, it would not even be a decision of the attorney general. That is what our law has always tried to avoid.

I cannot understand the logic of the minister. May I put it in the same terms as I did in respect of another amendment last Friday. The kidnappers and murderers of Mr. Laporte will have the matter of whether or not they receive bail argued in court and decided by the judge, but someone arrested for committing an act prohibited under clause 4—which to my mind is much less reprehensible than the act of kidnapping and murder—will have no say as to whether or not he should obtain bail. The attorney general himself will make that decision. I cannot understand the logic of that. I cannot understand why the murderers of Mr. Laporte should have greater rights in the courts of Quebec than a person charged with being a member or attending meetings of an assembly or group or an association alleged to be Le Front de Libération du Québec.

To my mind, it is completely unacceptable that this group of men and women who are not by definition charged with any other offence—because if they were charged with another offence, whether sedition, treason, kidnapping, murder or possession of offensive weapons they would come under the criminal law and all the rights with respect to bail would be theirs in court—but only with the offence of being members of the FLQ, will have less rights than a man who committed murder as part of the criminal conspiracy of the FLQ. That seems to me to be totally illogical. I do not see how the minister can insist on this provision being necessary to achieve the purposes for which the bill has been introduced.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I want to reply briefly to the additional remarks addressed to the committee by the hon. member for York South. I think I should impress upon the committee that what we are dealing with here is not the automatic suspension of bail but suspension of bail only on a certificate signed by the attorney general. That certificate cannot be delegated, it is not something that can be done by the police. It has to be done by the attorney general on his own authority.

Mr. Orlikow: Where does he get the information?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I do not think the hon. member for York South wants to leave the impression that the attorney general is not accountable. He is more accountable than anyone in the judiciary. He is accountable to the legislature and to the people of the province.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Oh, yes, it has been part of the tradition of the British parliamentary system that the attorney general, whether he be the attorney general in parliament or in a legislature, must be an elected officer of the government and must be responsible as Member of Parliament or as a member of a legislature to the people through his elected position.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): That is political accountability, not judicial accountability.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Political accountability is one given to him under this bill for the operation of an extraordinary provision of law, a provision of the law that is likely to be controversial in its administration, and I recognize that. That controversy is something for which the attorney general should bear responsibility. I would not want to involve the judiciary in that type of controversy. When I have the honour, I hope, to introduce a bill on electronic eavesdropping or wiretapping, I think the responsibility for issuing any warrant to wiretap should not lie with a judge but should lie with the attorney general of a province or with the Attorney General or Solicitor General responsible to this Parliament. The reason for this is the same, that when you are dealing with something that involves the discretionary side of the administration of justice, the person using this discretion ought to be held accountable to the people. One should not involve the judiciary in that type of accountability.

As I have stated, there is no automatic suspension of bail here. The suspension will have to be made on a certificate by the Attorney General, not the police but by the Attorney General, and the police after all are accountable to him. The Attorney General is responsible for the police or for their administration, or mal-administration, whatever it may be. So, there is no breach in that link of accountability beginning with the police, through to law enforcement, to the prosecution, up to the Attorney General, from the Attorney General to the legislature, and on to the people.

I think, Mr. Chairman, I have made the points I wanted to make. We are dealing with a dangerous conspiracy that has proved how lethal it can be, and because of that I think that to allow the ordinary provisions of bail to apply would defeat the purpose of this specific, short-term piece of legislation. The FLQ is just not an ordinary group of citizens but a group of people dedicated to the overthrow of government by violence and in a seditious manner. To allow that type of person out on bail if apprehended—and apprehension is obviously difficult as current events demonstrate—with the possibility of intimidating witnesses, or reconstructing the conspiracy, or threatening life, is something we have to contend with within the terms of this bill. I do that, taking full cognizance of the purport of the remarks that have been addressed to me.

I would not be introducing this type of measure in the general scheme of things were we living in different times, and as soon as I can I will be continuing in Parliament with the type of measure which is more palatable to me in terms of bail reform, the law relating to arrest, and the rest of the legal reform program that we have been introducing over the last two years. But, Mr. Chairman, this is a specific measure to meet specific circumstances and I must take cognizance of it in that respect.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I find the logic of the minister quite extraordinary. If one were to follow his argument to a logical conclusion, his theory of the political accountability of the Attorney General, one is led to the idea he is suggesting that we should abolish the courts altogether. After all, if the Attorney General is responsible to the legislature, and through it indirectly to the people, why not allow him to decide "off with his head" in respect of an accused?

Mr. Woolliams: What manner of nonsense is this?

Mr. Barnett: Surely, the Minister of Justice is not trying to suggest seriously that decisions that affect the life and death, or freedom and captivity of individual citizens should be handled through the process of what he calls political accountability? I have tried to follow the minister's argument in support of this bill through its various stages, but I find myself feeling more and more as though I were in an Alice in Wonderland atmosphere.

In his most recent remarks, the minister again referred to a very serious conspiracy. There are certain facts that have been reported in this House. The kidnappings have been reported. The murder of a minister of the Crown of the province of Quebec has been reported. But, Mr. Chairman, so far as the records of this House go, we have not had anything more than pure hearsay about this conspiracy with which clause 4 of the bill is designed to deal. I am just wondering how much research someone 50 years from now would have to do to find any real evidence in the records of this House concerning this conspiracy to which the minister keeps referring, and referring, and referring.

Like other hon. members I have hearsay knowledge. The minister, having a closer association than I with the area in which the conspiracy developed—

The Chairman: Order. I wonder if the hon. member would like to come quickly to the relevant part of his remarks on clause 7 with which we are now dealing, the matter of bail and the method of granting bail?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, it is my humble submission, to use an expression I have heard, that I was right on that point because the minister is asking us to agree with him that the normal right to bail should be suspended on the ground that there exists a serious conspiracy to overthrow government by violence. What I am suggesting is that there should be something more than hearsay on the records of this House, something more than argumentative dissertations from the minister and other members of the government, to assist members of the committee in making a decision on this point.

I have been wondering on a number of occasions why the minister has never tabled in this House any form of documentary evidence in respect of the conspiracy. I have heard reports of a broadcast in Quebec concerning some document which I think has been referred to as a manifesto. Why does the minister not table a copy of that document, if it exists, so that we may have a first hand and official chance to examine it?

Is there other documentary evidence of statements made by members of the FLQ that the minister could place before the House, that could form part of the official records? The minister is repeatedly asking us to turn over extraordinary powers to the Attorney General of a province in order to administer a special law. Why is it that the government has not placed any documentary evidence concerning this whole matter in the records of this House? Can the minister explain that?

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Gilbert) negatived: Yeas, 11; nays, 46.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Shall clause 7 as amended carry?

• (3:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak on clause 7, and I must ask you to refer back to clause 7.

Some hon. Members: It was carried.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I am sure you just did not see me. You were looking to the right.

Some hon. Members: He was not up.

The Chairman: The Chair has to confess that it did not see the hon. member. We will now hear the hon. member for Broadview on clause 7.

[Mr. Barnett.]

Mr. Gilbert: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. This just indicates your impartiality and spirit of fairness; I appreciate your consideration.

I now move that subclause (3) of clause 7 be amended by striking out the word "ninety" from the tenth and fourteenth lines and substituting therefor the word "thirty". The subclause would then read:

(3) Where a person who has been charged with an offence under this Act is being detained in custody pending his trial, and under the trial has not commenced within thirty days from the time when he was first detained, the person having custody of the person charged shall forthwith upon the expiry of those thirty days, apply to a judge of the Superior Court of criminal jurisdiction in the province in which the person charged is being detained to fix a date for the trial, and the judge may fix a date for the beginning of the trial or give such directions as he thinks necessary for the commencement of the trial.

It is a very simple amendment, to strike out the word "ninety" and replace it with the word "thirty". We feel that ninety days is a very long time.

The Chairman: There does not appear to be a copy of the amendment here.

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, could I make a suggestion? The amendment is very simple and while someone is preparing it could we not make submissions? There has been some delay and I do not see that it would do any harm. Surely, hon. members would agree to that.

The Chairman: The Chair now has the amendment in writing, so perhaps I could put it. It has been moved by the hon. member for Broadview:

That clause 7, subclause (3) be amended by striking out the word ninety from the tenth and fourteenth lines of the said subclause on page 5 and substituting therefor the word thirty.

Shall the amendment carry? The hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. Gilbert: I am sure the Minister of Justice will approve this amendment and see the fairness of it. I am sure he would be the last person to have anyone detained in custody for 90 days before being brought to trial.

Under the wording of the clause not only is someone detained for 90 days, but when that person is brought before the judge the judge may, not shall, fix a date for the trial. Experience has shown that this is a very harsh way of treating any person charged with and not only is it contrary to the minister's spirit of fairness and justice but it strikes very hard against the opinions of people right across the country. As the hon. member for Timiskaming has just said, it strikes against the fundamental principles in the Bill of Rights.

I can almost anticipate what the minister is going to say. He will say that when a person is charged under the Criminal Code he could be detained much longer because when he appears for trial the Crown could ask for successive remands which may exceed 90 days. This does happen under the Criminal Code. Sometimes an accused cannot be brought to trial for four or five months for various reasons. The minister says that this is an extraordinary bill to cover a particular situation. It seems that he would be the last person to have someone detained for 90 days, and then brought before a judge to whom he gives the discretionary power with regard to fixing the date for trial.

It may be that the minister feels that 30 days is a little bit too short for the preparation of the case. If the minister feels that 45 days would be more appropriate for preparation before a person is brought to trial, I would be quite prepared to accept his amendment. The way the clause now stands certainly imposes a hardship on the accused. I think the government should appreciate that difficulty and be prepared to agree to the amendment.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, there are no existing provisions of the Criminal Code which would aid any accused who has been refused bail in accelerating his trial. The hon. member for Broadview alluded to that. The present provisions of the Criminal Code provide no means for an application for accelerating the trial of any accused held without bail. For that reason, in the bail reform bill to which we have alluded earlier, I incorporated a provision that if bail were refused then the accused would be entitled to apply at the end of 90 days to set a date for trial.

The bail reform bill would achieve this improvement in the law. I discussed with my officials whether 90 days was an appropriate period and, taking into consideration the difficulties that might arise for both the prosecution and the defence, I was assured that 90 days was fair and to reduce it might prejudice the administration of justice.

Subclause 2 of clause 7 is designed to assist the accused because, in our opinion, if he is held without bail he is entitled to an accelerated trial. The reason subclause 2 is there is that under subclause 1 of clause 7 he could be held at the order of the Attorney General without bail. I should point out as well that if clause 7 subclause 1 had disappeared as a result of the earlier amendment by the hon. member for Broadview, then the rationale of subclause 2 with which we are now dealing also would have disappeared.

I would point out to the hon. member for Broadview that if both his proposed amendments, namely the amendment to subclause 1 of clause 7 which was just defeated by the committee and the amendment to subclause 2 of clause 7 now before the committee, were passed it would place members of the FLQ in a better position than that which currently obtains with respect to other citizens subject to criminal proceedings.

With respect I submit the committee should reject the amendment.

Mr. Woolliams: I will say at the outset that I support the amendment. With the greatest respect, I cannot accept the minister's argument in connection with the Criminal Code. It is true that sometimes people are kept 90 days awaiting trial, or 100 days, but the fact remains that as the code is currently set up an accused person can get his case before the courts without any undue delay. He can go before a magistrate, skip the preliminary hearing on an indictable offence and then ask for a speedy trial before a county court judge or, in certain provinces such as Alberta, before a supreme court judge, waiving the right to a jury even at the high court level. I have known cases where, after the charge has been laid, there has been refusal or reluctance on the part of the Crown to get on with the job. Defence counsel then picks up the telephone or goes into the office of the chief justice and says: Look, I want to make a move. The judges are always anxious to get on with the job, and I am sure I speak for all provinces. So, the machinery under the code is such that in a few days an accused person can get to trial if he so wishes.

In some instances, of course, when people who are in jail have no counsel, there are abuses, but the law is there to expedite justice. I believe 90 days is far too long. In fact, I have some doubt about 30 days, but I am prepared to accept the amendment; I shall not delay the committee. We on this side have said very little about these amendments but as far as we are concerned we do not accept the argument of the minister that this provision really puts a man in a better position than one who is charged under the Criminal Code. In my opinion, in plain ordinary language, that is hogwash. There are procedures under the code by which a speedy trial can be obtained. Even if a case is to go to a jury, an accused can get it heard before 90 days have gone by if defence counsel is on his toes. In my opinion, 90 days is too long. Even then, as the hon. member for Broadview pointed out, the accused has to make application to a judge who may set a time for trial. So the case may not get to trial for 120 days.

I am surprised at the attitude the minister is taking. This is what is delaying the passage of this bill. Surely, we thought, the Minister of Justice would accept reasonable amendments. But it seems he has closed his mind. Somebody in the bureaucracy has handed him a bill and he intends to stick with it at all cost. If he had accepted some of the reasonable amendments which all parties in opposition have put forward, the bill would be through by now. All of us are concerned about the length of the period which accused persons spend in detention. This is the time to ask questions because immediately the bill becomes law I can hear the minister saying: Oh, this is a provincial matter within the jurisdiction of the provincial attorney general. I asked him today whether the police of Quebec were incompetent or infiltrated. I want to know. If anyone can hide in a cupboard like old Mother Hubbard, it is time we got some answers from this government. The minister and his hon. friends brought in the War Measures Act and now they are bringing in legislation to replace it. As soon as there is any problem, we are told this is a matter for the province of Quebec.

Mr. Peters: I was very interested in the remarks the minister made in relation to the Criminal Code and the delays that have taken place. As lay people, most of us are not aware of those delays unless we are charged with an offence, but when we do learn about these cases we do not like them. The minister is wrong in saying that it does not matter whether similar delays take place under the legislation he is putting forward.

In my opinion all of us should be trying to limit the delays which can take place under the Criminal Code. As the old saying has it, justice delayed is the same as justice denied. In this particular instance, the minister has especially good reason to make sure there is no unreasonable delay, because we are dealing here with a political bill. If people are charged with treason, for example, under the Criminal Code, they will be dealt with according to the provisions of that code. But we are passing a political bill. We are creating a political party where no party existed before and, at the same time, we are outlawing that party.

It seems to me that justice will not be served unless we act speedily. I have always been confused by charges which are laid and which are never withdrawn but which are never proceeded with, either. I am thinking of a case which concerned me. I was charged under the terms of some remote section of the code having to do with an injunction. This took place 15 years ago and I have heard nothing about it since. However, I imagine I am not supposed to go back to that particular property. The case is still pending, it seems, and I suggest this is not very fair. I urge the minister to reconsider his attitude. I am aware it is said that the accused person is often better served by delay. Sometimes Counsel will try to wait until the judge dies. Sometimes the delay arises because of difficulty in getting witnesses; sometimes it is the fault of the Crown. In many cases it arises through the inefficiency of the courts. In any case, I believe the minister is wrong in implying that a long delay is warranted.

This is a political bill and the charge will be a political charge. This being so, it seems to me these matters should be settled in the courts as soon as possible. I certainly hope that the courts will be ready to deal with these political crimes expeditiously. I believe it is improper to relate the circumstances here to circumstances under the Criminal Code. Some of the delays which take place in proceedings under the code may be justifiable, but here, when we are dealing with a political crime, action should be taken as speedily as possible. I hope the minister will reconsider his position.

Mr. Fairweather: I am disappointed at the attitude which the minister has taken towards this amendment. As to the response of the opposition, I believe he would get the same answer with respect to almost any bill which he brought before the House dealing with timetables for trials.

There is absolutely no reason, in my view, why, after 30 days, the Crown should not be prepared to proceed. We should bear in mind the very wise observation made by the hon. member for Timiskaming. This bill creates a new crime. I am not greatly interested in what the code may or may not say about any particular crime because it has been put in statute form over many years and there are precedents and so on. That is why I deplore the fact that people are anxious to get on with this. Some are so irresponsible as to say the bill should be passed in one or two days.

This new crime is retroactive in its scope. I think the minister will want to ensure that the techniques for trial are the most sensitive and sophisticated that can be evolved by the law officers of the Crown. I will be resisting any attempt or excuse by law officers to include a convenient 90-day period. I suggest the minister should be much more flexible in his attitude towards this clause.

I will be supporting this amendment and many others. All this amendment does is limit the period of detention before trial. If the procedures cannot be completed within 30 days then, as my friend from Calgary North says, there should be an investigation into what is the matter with the administration of justice in the province of Quebec. If anyone has read the speech made by the Quebec Minister of Justice in the national assembly a couple of days ago, he will be even more suspicious about this type of legislation coming before this Parliament.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I wish to say a few words relating to what the hon. member for Fundy-Royal and the hon. member for Calgary North said. This is not a minimum period, it is a maximum period. The words read:

—and the trial was not commenced within ninety days from the time when he was first detained, the person having the custody of the person charged shall, forthwith upon the expiry of those ninety days,—

Of course, it would be open to counsel within the 90 days to proceed with an application to set a date for trial. We hope that will happen. This is the outside period within which a date for trial must be set.

Mr. Woolliams: On a question of privilege.

The Chairman: The hon. member on a point of privilege.

Mr. Woolliams: On a question of privilege; the minister has always been very fair in trying to quote people properly. In this case I said 90 days and then an application is made for trial. A trial date might be set 30 days after the 90 days or, in other words, 120 days after the arrest. If an application is made within the 90 days, the judge may set a time for the hearing. Am I not right in that regard?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Certainly the hon. member is right, but it is open to counsel any time before the expiry of the 90 days to make an application for trial. This application can be made the day following the arrest. That is why the section is phrased, "and the trial has not commenced within 90 days from the time when he was first detained". The 90 days is the maximum period. We all hope, as is the case in criminal matters, that the trial commences as quickly as possible. If there has been no application to set a date for trial within the 90 days, it then becomes mandatory. In the Criminal Code it is not mandatory, and this provision is to overcome that lack. The bail reform bill also includes the provision of 90 days.

Mr. McCleave: I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Before doing so, may I preface it with an observation. If a person is in jail and his case has not been set for trial within 90 days, public suspicion would inevitably develop that no case existed against the person or that the authorities were trying their darndest to round up some evidence to use against him. That would be a natural inference from such a circumstance.

It has been stated many times that the provincial attorneys general are administering this particular measure, although for practical purposes this means one man, the Attorney General of the province of Quebec. We are dealing with the administration of justice, bringing an accused into court. We have to consider the workload of the courts in the province of Quebec. Have the officials of the Department of Justice been in consultation with the Quebec Department of Justice to determine this 90-day period?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, when I met the provincial attorneys general in Halifax in July, we discussed the bail reform bill. At that time all the provisions of that bill were thoroughly canvassed, as they were by the commissioners on uniformity of law in Prince Edward Island in the first week of September. The maximum period was discussed. It was the opinion of the attorneys general and their advisers that this maximum period was in keeping with the case load of criminal matters in Canada. For that reason I accepted 90 days as the maximum period for the purposes of the bail reform bill. I drew on that experience for the purposes of this legislation. The 90 days applies in those cases under the bail reform bill where bail has been refused.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, this is my first intervention in the debate on this particular bill. I make no apology for intervening at this time, particularly in view of the remarks made by the Minister of Justice. This is exceptional legislation, therefore we must take exceptional care that everything shall be done properly.

This is one of the clauses in this bill that has disturbed me. One can readily conceive of a person being held without bail for a period of almost 90 days and then having a trial judge set a date for trial three months hence. What if that person is then found to be innocent? The net result would be that the apprehended person would be held without bail for five or six months. What are the consequences? He has lost his job and his reputation has gone out the window. There must be no suggestion of guilt by association. Unfortunately, in this particular case 450 people have been found guilty by association. Let's not have any illusions.

[Translation]

They were all lumped together and accused of the same offence. Each individual's reputation has been affected without distinction, innocent and guilty alike.

[English]

We Canadians, with our love for civil rights, must not do anything under any circumstances to interfere with those rights. My practice is not criminal law. Hon. members know that I am in favour of law and order, but I am absolutely revolted by some of the provisions in this particular bill, not with regard to apprehending but after apprehension. That is my point. It is almost as though we were devising a modern day lettre cachée. I suppose that 90 days, in this day and age, could be compared to five years in the bastille.

I fully support the amendment. Once a person has been charged, appeared before a magistrate, pleaded, and bail has been refused he has a right to counsel. There is no denying that counsel should then apply to set a date for trial. Remembering that this is a special remedy we are seeking I think the courts and the representatives of the Crown would be very loth to abuse their position by asking for a deferment knowing that the individual concerned could be found innocent and indeed is innocent until proved otherwise. I do not find this period of 90 days in any way acceptable.

May I come back to the argument made by my colleague from Calgary North and others. It is absolutely incomprehensible to me that in passing this legislation or accepting the regulations made pursuant to the War Measures Act the Parliament of Canada should take a Pilate-like attitude and say that all abuses are the responsibility of this or that attorney general. This is not good enough. The responsibility is ours. It is this government that invoked the War Measures Act; it is this government that is passing this legislation in substitution therefor; and it is this government, the government of Canada, that will pass legislation of a more permanent nature.

For this reason we have to be more than careful to protect the rights of people. It is on this basis that I plead with the minister to accept what I think is a very reasonable amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Chairman, I share the opinion of the members of the opposition who find a little shocking that a person should have to wait quite a long time before going on trial and that this prolonged delay may indirectly prejudice his future and his status as a citizen and a worker. However some persons detained under other sections of the Criminal Code are also waiting to go on trial and if we should change the rolls to give priority to trials under the bill before us we would do a prejudice to those presently detained for an offence under the Criminal Code. We would grant a privileged status to those arrested under the Public Order Act 1970. I do not think that doing wrong to others will rectify the injustice done to those who were arrested under Bill C-181.

Furthermore I do not think that these people should be treated in a special way. They are common law criminals like anybody else arrested under the Criminal Code and I believe that they should be considered according to the same rules of justice.

The fact that the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is telling us that the provincial attorneys general were consulted and that the Quebec Minister of Justice approves the clause we are now considering is reassuring.

I think we should avoid the very protective attitude adopted by certain hon. members when it comes to the prerogatives of a government that has the same rights as the central government from a constitutional point of view. I feel that this attitude is wrong.

The government of the province of Quebec as any other provincial government in Canada enjoys its own autonomy and we must not judge it as if we were on a higher plane. The provincial governments are entitled to the same respect and prerogatives as we claim for ourselves.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I want to say that any arrests under this legislation will be carried out under very special circumstances.

Common criminals or others arrested under any other legislation must be arrested under a warrant. Furthermore all other requirements of the Criminal Code must be observed whereas under the new legislation they knock at people's doors at night and arrest them without warrant. I therefore feel people thus arrested should be brought to trial before others.

I find it difficult to deal with this rather ticklish matter because the Quebec provincial government will be responsible for the application of the new legislation. However it is emergency legislation we are dealing with not merely legislation applying to the FLQ but of a much more permanent nature.

One should not deceive oneself. We are discussing a permanent law, although it applies for the time being to the province of Quebec. It also mentions people arrested under this law, therefore, one has to study it very carefully. The hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Goyer) should consider clause 14 which has a retroactive effect to October 16; therefore, any person arrested under the War Measures Act will be considered as having been arrested under the measure that is presently before us.

Why? We must think about it. I leave it to the attorney general of my province. It is possible to get the opinion of the attorney general of Alberta or of any other province, because members of other groups or associations could very well spread FLQ ideas in Alberta and be apprehended there.

If I went to Edmonton to shout "Long live this group" or to advocate that the federal government or the government of Alberta should be overthrown, I would be arrested under this act.

[English]

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

[Mr. Goyer.]

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Gilbert) negatived: Yeas, 20; nays, 42.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 7 as amended carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Clause as amended agreed to.

• (4:20 p.m.)

On Clause 8—Evidence.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I rise to move an amendment which is perhaps the most important this committee will have to consider. I want to say that my colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood, intended to move this amendment. Unfortunately, one of his sisters is very ill outside the country and for that reason my friend had to leave, so he asked me to move it. Therefore, I move:

That clause 8 be amended by striking out of the third line thereof (page 5, line 24) the words "either before or" and substituting "16th day of October, 1970" for the words "coming into force of this Act",

So, the clause will read:

In any prosecution for an offence under this Act, evidence that any person after the 16th day of October, 1970—

If any person has done certain things such evidence shall in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be proof he is a member of the unlawful association. I think you may have that already Mr. Chairman. I hope the amendment is clear. Perhaps it might be worded differently, "on or after October 16, 1970" instead of "after October 16th, 1970". It probably should be worded in that way in view of the date, and if the committee will permit me I should like to make that amendment to the amendment I moved.

The Chairman: Would the hon. member repeat the proposed amendment?

Mr. Lewis: You have my copy, Mr. Chairman, but the amendment would be that in place of lines 24 and 25 on page 5 you would have the words "on or after October 16, 1970".

The Chairman: If I understand the hon. member he is adding the words "on or"?

Mr. Lewis: That is right.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. member has permission to insert those words? I will not read the whole amendment, only the pertinent lines as follows:

In any prosecution for an offence under this act, evidence that any person, on or after October 16, 1970—

Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: So the amendment now will read:

That Clause 8 be amended by striking out of the third line thereof (page 5, line 24) the words "either before or" and substituting "on or after the 16th day of October, 1970",—

The clause will then read:

In any prosecution for an offence under this Act, evidence that any person on or after the 16th day of October 1970 (a) participated in or was present at a number of meetings of the unlawful association or of any branch, committee or members thereof,

(b) spoke publicly in advocacy for the unlawful association, or

(c) communicated statements on behalf of or as a representative or professed representative of the unlawful association, is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, proof that he is a member of the unlawful association.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, this clause touches upon one of the most obnoxious suggestions in the bill that is before us, the provision for retroactivity, a principle that has been rejected by our law for centuries, particularly in respect of criminal law.

You will note that Clause 4 of the bill makes it an indictable offence for any person to be or profess to be a member of an unlawful association, and makes a person so charged liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years. What Clause 8 does in our view is make evidence that a person had at some time in the last number of years attended some meetings of the unlawful association, or spoken publicly in advocacy of the unlawful association, or communicated statements on behalf of the unlawful association, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, proof that he is now a member of the unlawful association.

My first point is a simple one, that the FLQ or any association analogous to it was not unlawful before October 16, 1970. Membership in the organization before October 16, 1970 was not unlawful. Speaking for the organization before that date, and communicating statements on behalf of the organization before that date was not unlawful, except to the extent that the actions of the members of the FLQ were against the law or criminal acts. Then, of course, they are caught by the ordinary Criminal Code.

In so far as people involved in bombings, or kidnappings or manslaughter as a result of bombings, or robbing banks and other things for which members of the FLQ have in the past been charged, they have been so charged under the ordinary Criminal Code. What this Clause 8 deals with is purely evidence of membership in the FLQ, and I underline "purely evidence of membership", not evidence of any other offence or crime. It deals only with evidence of membership in an organization which did not become unlawful until October 16 of this year. This provision, in our estimation, makes the effect of the law retroactive.

It is true that the clause contains the words "is in the absence of evidence to the contrary, proof that he is a member of the unlawful association". Therefore the offence is being a member of the unlawful association today, but the evidence on which you may be charged with the offence and the evidence on which you may be convicted of the offence is evidence that pre-dates the time when the association in fact became unlawful as a result of the regulations under the War Measures Act, namely October 16 of this year.

It should be noted, first, that this clause does not contain any time limit. It would be a little less reprehensible, although still reprehensible in my view, if it referred to the last three months or back to October 5 when the kidnapping of Mr. Cross occurred, or even if it went back a little further. However, there is no time limit at all. It is obvious that attending some meetings a year earlier, in October 1969, or five years earlier, in October 1964 or 1965, would be evidence under this clause of proof that a person is now a member of the unlawful association.

The attitude of the minister has been such that I cannot say I have much hope he will accept this amendment, but I really suggest to members of the committee that there are few provisions in what is essentially a penal statute which are more unpalatable to any democratic gathering than a provision of retroactivity.

As was pointed out in this committee on earlier occasions, article 11, subarticle 2, of the Universal Charter of Human Rights, which we signed and to which Canada adheres, contains a provision that no one shall be held guilty of any penal offence on account of any act or provision which did not constitute a penal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed. The point is that anybody who attended meetings or communicated statements on behalf of the FLQ or any analogous organization before October 16, 1970 was doing an act which did not constitute a penal offence under our law at the time when it was committed. The effect of this clause in the bill, in respect of convicting a person for membership in the FLQ or analogous unlawful association, is clearly to make the effect of the law retroactive. It has been suggested in this chamber before that because the membership relates to a time after the passage of the legislation or after the regulation which is now in force, there is no retroactive provision in the legislation. However, I emphasize and repeat that the membership is proved by previous acts or previous advocacy, and the real evidence is not of membership today but of membership before such membership was unlawful, and the evidence of past activity creates a presumption of present membership in the unlawful association.

This itself, of course, is not very often seen in our criminal law. The creation of a presumption of guilt and placing the onus on an accused to prove his innocence, is not contained in very many provisions of our criminal law, although it is contained in some. It is the kind of provision which all our traditions of criminal law condemn and which should not be present except in very exceptional circumstances. You know, Mr. Chairman, I am not seeking a change in that respect. I am not moving that the reverse onus be removed because that, in the circumstances of this case, may not be possible. But I do say that this places the accused in an impossible position. He attended some meetings three or four years ago. He made some speeches a year or two ago. He is charged and brought into court. The facts of his attendances and of his speeches are established. These are brought before the court through the witnesses for the Crown. What does the accused then do? He gets to his feet and says he attended those meetings three or four years ago, if he wants to admit this and if it is true, but states that he has not done so since. He states he is not a member of any unlawful association.

What does the court then do? All of us who have had any experience in court would be very worried about this kind of evidence in contradiction of the facts which clause 8 would permit, because the court likely would look on this evidence as self-serving and would not be very impressed by the accused making an assertion to the effect that he is no longer a member of the FLQ or never had been a member of the FLQ. Unless the accused could produce some additional evidence to the court to support his assertion, then the likelihood of his evidence being accepted as contrary evidence is very small indeed. So, the onus placed on the accused in this case is very heavy indeed, even if the act were one which he performed after it became unlawful. But it is an impossible burden if he can be charged with being a member of an unlawful association and convicted of being a member of an unlawful association on the basis of acts which he performed at a time when the association simply was not unlawful and when the acts therefore were entirely lawful so far as the law at the time was concerned.

I have been trying to think why this provision is needed if justice is to be served, and I cannot think of any reason other than the same reason that has seemed to justify in the minister's mind the rejection of every other amendment which so far has been put before this chamber. I want to repeat, Mr. Chairman—and this is the foundation upon which our approach to the bill is based—that right from the outset on October 16 my leader, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, and I said in the speeches we made on that Friday that we recognized there was a criminal emergency in Quebec, and that at that time perhaps it was necessary—we had to say "perhaps" because we did not have the information to justify even this qualified approach—to extend the powers of the police to search, arrest and detain for limited periods. If those powers would help find the members and ringleaders of the FLQ, help to incarcerate and punish them and break up the criminal conspiracy which the FLQ has been and is, then distasteful though it is, if the government came down with legislation we would consider supporting the extension of those police powers.

This I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, is the absolute limit to which this bill ought to go. Indeed, I want to say that as the days pass one becomes less and less convinced that the bill is at all necessary. One becomes less and less convinced that the serious interference with the rights and liberties of the people is justified by the present situation in the province of Quebec. It is becoming increasingly clear that all the dark hints that were given by ministers of the Crown came out of somebody's imagination rather than out of fact. The conspiracy by these people appears not to have been a conspiracy at all. It would appear that Mr. Laporte was kidnapped by a little group of people who were on their way to Texas, heard of the kidnapping of Mr. Cross and came back to do what they had discussed doing earlier. There did not seem to be any plan. There is no evidence of which I know that is absolutely convincing that even the narrow powers to which I have referred are needed at this time.

However, I am taking on trust, if you like, the general attitude of the authorities in Quebec and here that some expansion of police power is needed to destroy the FLQ. But we ought not in this bill to go one step beyond those powers of search, arrest and detention for a very limited period. When we go beyond that we move in a direction which is unjustified by events in Quebec and which is unjustified by any principle of civil liberties or indeed by any principle of decent and just law, civil liberties on the side.

This particular provision in this bill has been criticized by almost every commentator I have heard, and in almost every editorial and article I have read from across this country. It was criticized I believe only last week by the clergy of a Quebec diocese as reported in the French language press. The clergy plead with the government, and particularly with the Minister of Justice to take out the odious provision of retroactivity in this bill.

I want to emphasize again that what we are dealing with here is purely membership in an unlawful association and committing acts which were lawful before a certain date. The conditions for conviction for membership in an unlawful association is entirely contrary to the spirit of our law and not to be permitted by this committee. I suggest that it will not interfere with the police or with the authorities in their search to destroy the FLQ. We should not create a precedent of retroactivity and I plead with the minister—not with great hope in view of his past attitude—and I plead with members of this committee, I must add not with much hope either in view of the past attitude of government members of the committee to support this amendment and remove the retroactivity from this bill.

We feel that this is a crucial and important point and we ask the committee to deal with the amendment as it should be dealt with.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I have listened with great interest to the hon. member for York South. We are dealing with an important principle of law. But I want to say first of all that all that clause 8 does is to raise an evidentiary presumption or a presumption of evidence and nothing else. Clause 8 does not create an offence. The offence is created under clause 4.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Clause 8 raises a presumption of guilt.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There is nothing in clause 4 which creates an offence retroactively and there is nothing in clause 8 which creates a law which has a retroactive effect. In clause 8 we are dealing merely with a presumption of evidence.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): And of guilt.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is a presumption of fact.

I want to submit to the committee first of all that there is no retroactive provision in this bill. Clause 8 raises a presumption in relation to one offence only namely an offence under section 4(a) of the bill that of being a member of the unlawful association. So let us put this in the proper perspective. Section 8 does not create a law which has a retroactive effect and the evidentiary presumption relates only to one offence namely the offence under clause 4(a) of the bill dealing with a person who is or professes to be a member of the unlawful association.

I am speaking legally now and I am attempting to interpret the legal effect of this bill. A person cannot be properly charged or convicted of being a member of the unlawful association namely the FLQ prior to October 16, 1970. There is nothing in clause 8 or in clause 4 that says that. When we are talking about retroactive legislation or retrospective criminal legislation this is what it means in the true legal sense. If you had a retroactive piece of legislation a person could be convicted in November of 1970 on a charge specifically referring to conduct in October 1970 which was not unlawful at that time. Now no one can properly be charged or convicted either under the regulations passed pursuant to the proclamation of the War Measures Act or under this bill unless the charge specifically relates to conduct after October 16, 1970.

I have said that the effect of clause 8 is to raise a rebuttable presumption, and lawyers present in the committee will know what I mean. In other words, if the Crown, by adducing evidence of those things enumerated in clause 8, places an accused in the position of being liable to be convicted unless evidence is adduced on his behalf either by himself or through witnesses or through the cross examination of witnesses who testify on behalf of the Crown, which on a balance of probability indicates that on the date specified in the charge he was not a member of the unlawful association, then the benefit of the doubt goes to the accused.

I will go into this in more detail, but the presumption of fact, or what criminal lawyers call a provisional presumption, only sets an initial presumption against the accused which he can rebut or discharge if, on the balance of probability, the doubt is in his favour. The overriding burden of proof, namely the burden of proof on the Crown in every criminal case to prove guilt beyond any reasonable doubt, always exists.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I would like to go on with this complicated argument. It may be that if I do not finish it by five o'clock perhaps the committee will give me an extra five minutes or so because it is important that I make my arguments in sequence.

There is nothing new in the concept of placing an onus on the accused in criminal proceedings to adduce evidence on his own behalf once the prosecution has led some evidence pointing toward guilt. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for York South said he was not as concerned about this provision as he was about what he called the retroactive provision, which I deny is a retroactive provision.

By way of illustration I want to refer to section 8 of the Narcotic Control Act which provides that on a charge of being in possession of an illicit drug for the purpose of trafficking, the Crown need only prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused was in possession of the drug whereupon an onus is placed upon the accused to adduce evidence that he was not in possession for the purpose of trafficking. Similar provisions appear in the Food and Drugs Act, in the Customs Act when we are dealing with the unlawful possession of smuggled goods, and the Excise Act in the provisions relating to the unlawful possession of spirits.

With respect to these provisions it must be borne in mind that such a provision is necessary if the offence of being in possession for the purpose of trafficking is to be effectively enforced. There is nothing per se objectionable about such a provision. It simply means that when the Crown has proved illegal possession, this gives rise to a presumption which places a burden on the accused to adduce evidence concerning the motive for his being in possession. The Ontario court of appeal has held unanimously in the case of The Queen against Sharp (1961) 35 C.R. 375, that the onus shifting provision in the opium and narcotics drug act, a provision similar to the shifting of onus or shifting of the burden of proof or presumption of fact that we have here, did not violate the Bill of Rights by depriving a person of the right to a fair hearing or by depriving a person charged with an offence of the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty.

This case in the Ontario Court of Appeal points out that the shifted onus can be discharged upon a balance of probability, and it also draws attention to the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that similar statutory presumptions are not a denial of due process provided there is a rational connection in common experience between the fact proved and the ultimate fact presumed.

There are many instances in the Criminal Code where an onus, similar to the one in clause 8 of this bill, is placed on an accused to adduce evidence. To mention only a few I want to make reference to section 162 of the Code, which involves trespassing at night:

> Every one who, without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him, loiters near or prowls at night upon the property of another person near a dwelling house situated on that property is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Then, there is section 221(2) and (3), which relates to failing to stop at the scene of an accident:

> Every one who, having the care, charge or control of a vehicle that is involved in an accident with a person, vehicle or cattle in charge of a person, with intent to escape civil or criminal liability fails to stop his vehicle, give his name and address, and where any person has been injured, offer assistance, is guilty of
> (a) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years, or
> (b) an offence punishable on summary conviction.
> In proceeding under subsection (2), evidence that an accused failed to stop his vehicle, offer assistance where any person has been injured and give his name and address is prima facie evidence of an intent to escape civil and criminal liability.

There is the same shifting onus there.

With respect to the offence of kidnapping, section 233(1) of the Criminal Code reads:

> Every one who kidnaps a person with intent
> (a) to cause him to be confined or imprisoned against his will
> (b) to cause him to be unlawfully sent or transported out of Canada against his will, or
> (c) to hold him for ransom or to service against his will,
> is guilty of an indictable offence—
> (2) Every one who, without lawful authority, confines, imprisons or forcibly seizes another person is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.
> (3) In proceedings under this section the fact that the person in relation to whom the offence is alleged to have been committed did not resist is not a defence unless the accused proves that the failure to resist was not caused by threats, duress, force or exhibition of force.

In other words, the burden is on the accused to prove that the failure to resist was not caused by threats, duress, force or exhibition of force.

Referring also, Mr. Chairman, to section 253(1) of the Criminal Code:

> The proprietor of a newspaper shall be deemed to publish defamatory matter that is inserted and published therein, unless he proves that the defamatory matter was inserted in the newspaper without his knowledge and without negligence on his part.

Section 295(1) of the Criminal Code reads:

> Every one who without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him, has in his possession any instrument for house-breaking, vault-breaking or safe-breaking is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable for fourteen years.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before the minister leaves those, would he answer a question?

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): May I finish the argument first? All those articles in the Criminal Code, and there are several others I could have adduced, indicate that there is nothing unusual for the onus of proof, in terms of a presumption of fact, to be inserted against the accused in a criminal matter, and that in several instances, indeed many instances in the Criminal Code, this presumption of fact, set forth in a statutory form, has to be rebutted by the accused if he is to escape guilt. He satisfies that onus of proof, or rebutts that presumption if, on the balance of probability, he creates doubt in the minds of a judge and jury. The Crown has to satisfy the burden of proof in every criminal offence. It has to establish that an accused is guilty beyond reasonable doubt. Clause 8 of the bill reads:

> In any prosecution for an offence under this Act, evidence that any person, either before or after the coming into force of this Act,
> (a) participated in or was present at a number of meetings—

Hon. members will notice that this is changed from the wording in the regulations. Now, active participation is necessary, and there has to be presence at a number of meetings instead of at a single meeting, as obtained under the regulations—and that was a weakness.

> (b) —spoke publicly in advocacy for the unlawful association, or
> (c) communicated statements on behalf of or as a representative or professed representative of the unlawful association, is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, proof that he is a member of the unlawful association.

That is to say that he is today a member of the unlawful association or is, after October 16, a member of the unlawful association. This means that the accused, when confronted with evidence under (a), (b) or (c) is entitled to adduce evidence casting doubt on that evidence, thus casting doubt into the minds of judge and jury. If he is able to present any reasonable explanation for participation at a number of meetings, or for publicly speaking or advocating for the unlawful association, or for communicating statements on behalf of the unlawful association, that surely would be enough to create that balance of probability, to create that aura of doubt, which would mean the Crown would be unable to satisfy its primary burden of proof beyond any reasonable doubt, as in any criminal case.

I want to cite as authority for the proposition which I have just presented, the Ontario Court of Appeal in the case that I have just mentioned, and the Supreme Court of the United States, referred to in that case. I also want to refer to an Introduction to Criminal Law" by Cross and Jones, the sixth edition, at page 65 as follows:

> When the jury may find that the presumed fact exists on proof of some other fact, the presumption is one of fact.

That is what we have here.

> Presumptions of fact are sometimes called "provisional" presumptions and they play a very important part in the administration of the criminal law because they are frequently the only means by which the state of the accused's mind can be proved. The judge will tell the jury that they are entitled to infer guilty knowledge or criminal intent from the fact that the prohibited act was done by the accused, and, if the accused offers no explanation, the inference will usually be drawn. This is a matter of common sense, because people generally are aware of the circumstances in which they act, and they generally do foresee that what does result from their conduct will result from it. If, on the other hand, a credible explanation is offered, the jury must consider the evidence as a whole, and if they entertain any reasonable doubt, the general rule that the prosecution has the burden of proof obliges the jury to give the accused the benefit of that doubt.

That benefit of the doubt, and that strict burden on the Crown to prove guilt beyond any reasonable doubt which has been followed in the courts of this country since before confederation, were perhaps best stated in an appeal from the Court of Criminal Appeal in England to the House of Lords in the following important sentences taken from the speech of Lord Sankey. I am referring to the case of Woolmington against The Director of Public Prosecutions, which can be found in the 1935 Appeal Cases, page 462. Here is what Lord Sankey said:

—if it is proved that the conscious act of the prisoner killed a man and nothing else appears in the case, there is evidence upon which the jury may, not must, find him guilty of murder.

It is difficult to conceive so bare and meagre a case, but that does not mean that the onus is not still on the prosecution... Throughout the web of the English Criminal Law one golden thread is always to be seen, that it is the duty of the prosecution to prove the prisoner's guilt... If, at the end of and on the whole of the case, there is a reasonable doubt, created by the evidence given by either the prosecution or the prisoner, as to whether the prisoner killed the deceased with a malicious intention, the prosecution has not made out the case and the prisoner is entitled to an acquittal.

No matter what the charge or where the trial, the principle that the prosecution must prove the guilt of the prisoner is part of the common law of England and no attempt to whittle it down can be entertained.

And that is the law of Canada at the same time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I also want to refer to the well recognized doctrine of proof of similar acts in order to establish a course of conduct. The hon. member for New Westminster, when he was speaking on second reading, demonstrated conclusively that this has always been a principle of the law—

Mr. Lewis: Have you much more to go?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Not much more. I can finish in perhaps three or four more minutes. He demonstrated that it is a quite accepted and traditional principle of British criminal law, applied by the Canadian courts, that similar acts related to the conduct of the accused prior to the offence can be relied on as proof for the offence, I repeat even if the conduct was prior to the offence.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Under that doctrine, evidence can be adduced against an accused to assist in establishing his guilt, even though the evidence—

The Deputy Chairman: I regret having to interrupt the hon. minister but the Chair has done its best not to see the clock. I wonder how long the minister might wish to continue because, according to the rules, the Committee has not the authority to extend the hours of sitting. If the minister is hoping to make his point and complete his remarks within a minute, perhaps the Chair could permit him to continue, but no longer than that, I think.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I should like to thank the Chairman and the committee for their indulgence.

Under that doctrine of similar acts, evidence can be adduced against an accused to assist in establishing his guilt even though the evidence relates to conduct on the part of the accused prior to the date of the offence charged in respect of which the accused has not been convicted, or indeed even charged.

It must be borne in mind in the absence of a provision like clause 8 that, having regard to the clandestine nature of the FLQ, it would be impossible, apart from admissions on the part of the accused, to establish the commission of an offence created by clause 4(a). In other words, it is obvious that when you are dealing with a clandestine conspiracy, to attempt to rely on admission or actions or conduct subsequent to October 16 would render this legislation impractical.

The hon. member for York South said the FLQ was not unlawful prior to this bill and prior to the regulations. I contest that most vehemently. I point out to him that prior to October 16 the FLQ had a record of violence—

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I am sure the minister would not want to misrepresent what I said. I carefully said that it was not an unlawful association in the sense which this bill makes it one. I went on to say that it was, of course, an association against the law as a criminal conspiracy, committing crimes. We are not disagreeing on that.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I accept the hon. member's restatement of what he said. He is perfectly accurate, and I do not contest it.

What I am submitting is that the FLQ, under sections 60 and 62 of the Criminal Code, satisfied the definition of a seditious conspiracy, which is:

—every one shall be presumed to have a seditious intention who

(a) teaches or advocates, or

(b) publishes or circulates any writing that advocates, the use, without the authority of law, of force as a means of accomplishing a governmental change within Canada.

Then, "everyone who speaks seditious words," and so on "is guilty of an indictable offence" and so forth.

It is quite clear that the conduct which we are trying to reach here is conduct which we have rendered more precise by making it an offence to be a member of the FLQ so as to limit the extent of power of arrest, so as to limit the extent of detentions, so as to limit search and so as to limit the other suspensions of ordinary criminal law and relate it particularly to clause 4. That is why we make the FLQ an unlawful association, in order to restrict the ambit of the law for a short term. Those people in the FLQ were undoubtedly, prior to this legislation or prior to the regulations, part of a seditious conspiracy.

To summarize in 30 seconds, Mr. Chairman, the law is not retroactive in its effect and creates no retroactive legal offence. Clause 4 creates the only legal offence, and that provision does not have a retroactive effect in that it is an offence to be a member of the FLQ only on or after October 16.

Clause 8 introduces the rebuttable presumption of fact. This is common to criminal law for generations. Without that rebuttable presumption of fact, the basis of clause 4 could not be met and the legislation in effect would prove to be impractical.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair feels that it should not start allowing members to ask questions at this time and is bound by the rules. The only reason the minister was given extra time was that the question was a complicated one. So that the House may proceed to the consideration of private members' business, I now leave the Chair.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles); pensions—old age security; the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson); broadcasting—performance of North Battleford satellite television station.

It being five o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' NOTICES OF MOTIONS

NATIONAL SECURITIES COMMISSION

SUGGESTED CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCE LEADING TO OPERATION OF COMMISSION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government of Canada should initiate at an early date a plenary conference with the governments of the provinces for the purposes of examining in detail all requirements leading to the effective operation of a national securities commission under the joint jurisdiction of both levels of government.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

He said: Mr. Speaker, I hope that in the period of less than an hour which is left, we can examine this question and that the principle can be adopted by the House. I hope also that the government will then act on it.

Your Honour has read the motion in detail but there are certain points to which I should like to refer specifically. The first is that there should be a conference with the governments of the provinces, and the second point is that the respective governments should examine in detail all the requirements and conditions leading to the effective operation of a national securities commission which would naturally operate under the joint jurisdiction of the provinces and the federal government.

One might ask what sort of hybrid is being proposed here, but I submit it is not a monster at all. This is an agency which would regulate the sale, transfer and issuance of securities in Canada. Hon. members may ask why that is necessary, and is it not being done at present by various provincial securities commissions. It is, but to a very limited degree. I believe there should be a national securities commission. I underline my use of the word "national" as distinct from "federal". I recognize that the provinces have very clear rights and powers in this regard. This would be considered as a national body set up by both levels of government.

It would be overemphasizing the obvious if I were to record all the difficulties experienced in Canada over the years in connection with sales of stocks—the lack of control over company operations, the abuses which have arisen from insider trading, and so on. We hear of lawsuits to recover funds from directors who had special knowledge and used it to their own advantage to the detriment of fellow investors in a particular company or corporation; we also read reams of material coming from the United States complaining bitterly about the operation of certain types of promoters in the Canadian exchange field. Thousands of Americans are bilked out of millions of dollars annually as a result of the operations of fraudulent promoters.

My chief reason in putting forward the idea of a national securities commission is, then, the need for a uniform standard of protection for the investing public. We know that in connection with certain types of company it is more favourable to make use of certain stock exchanges where the regulation and supervision is not nearly as sophisticated or effective as it is, for example, in Toronto. In the second place, I think we could eliminate some of the ill effects resulting from split jurisdiction. In explanation of this, I would remind hon. members that it has been possible for certain operators—either because they work in provinces where there is a very small securities commission, a very limited amount of business, or because a company is a federal company, permitted to do certain things which provincial law does not require it to do—who are thereby able to avail themselves of a degree of artificial protection. I would try to eliminate this by setting up a national securities commission.

In the third place, I believe a national securities commission could work toward a greater degree of public disclosure of corporate affairs. I am not saying that disclosure on the part of private companies could be secured; since these companies would not have any stocks to go on the market they would not be obliged to make disclosures. Attempts by the federal government to move into this field have, in my opinion, been artificial and futile. As an example, I mention the requirement under Bill C-4 last year which amended the Canada Corporations Act in relation to requirements concerning the filing of returns in connection with insider trading, takeover bids and that sort of thing. The trouble is that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) and the Registrar of Companies do not have the authority by law to compile or publish statistics. The information is merely placed on file and an individual seeking information about particular companies or the activities of their directors has to search the file.

This procedure would be eliminated under my proposal because the commission would have authority to collate and publish the information. Reporting, or requiring a report once a month, does nothing to protect the public, though it may help people who make a practice of examining individual corporate files maintained by the registrar of companies. The same applies in all the provinces. I say that if we are to maintain the same level of progress in relation to federally incorporated companies as is being achieved in Ontario under the Ontario corporations act, together with the activities of the Ontario securities commission, we ought seriously to consider the establishment of a national securities commission as I have suggested.

Over the past two or three years, I have often asked the minister to tell us what progress was being made in this direction. I know that contacts have been maintained between the federal authority and some of the provinces which have shown an interest in this question. The answers have been inconclusive and vague. The minister has been anything but frank in telling us what progress has been made. In effect, no progress has been achieved over the past 18 months, at least not until very recently.

I raised this question during the second reading of Bill C-4 in November, 1969, as reported on page 711 of Hansard, and again in the Finance Committee in the discussion on the provisions of that bill; I alluded to it again in the report stage of that bill, particularly in January of 1970, and on third reading of Bill C-4.

What type of organization do I envisage? I cannot give all the characteristics of it because I am not an expert in securities operation. This is why I should like a conference called among all the governments involved to discuss in detail the requirements necessary to the effective operation of a national securities commission. I indicated that I want a national body created jointly by the federal government and the provincial governments. I understand, and this is one of the problems involved, that the federal government may have insisted that any such national body be located in Ottawa. If this is the case, I think it is the poorest place in which such a commission could be located. For practical reasons it should be located next one of our principal stock exchanges, and there are only six cities in Canada where such exchanges are in operation, namely, Montreal, Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg and Toronto. I suggest that a national securities commission would be located most effectively in the city of Toronto because that is where the greatest volume of financial operations take place; it is the leading stock exchange in the country by a wide margin.

I hope hon. members will give us the benefit of their views with regard to this question. I have discussed it privately with a number of hon. members from time to time and I have received nothing but the greatest encouragement. There may be differences about the details of the proposal but I hope that from our discussion this afternoon will come a much clearer idea of what we want, and that the government can then take up the idea with some degree of guidance. We could then effectively arrive at a conference, not within the next six months but some time in 1971, with a view to having a national securities commission at the earliest possible date. I urge hon. members to accept my motion.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): I wish to compliment the hon. member on the motion before us for debate today, not only on the substance of the motion, but his perseverance in bringing forward this matter at every available opportunity. It is the kind of subject that the hon. member has probably found difficult to discuss on an election platform. It is not the kind of motion that will get him very many votes because of its complexity. It is almost impossible to bring forward on an election platform the kind of ideas he is suggesting here. Therefore, it is necessary that for the general good of the Canadian public, particularly the Canadian investing public and those investors from the United States, that some additional form of protection be afforded.

I indicated that the hon. member had persevered. As recently as February 25, 1970, as recorded at page 4065 of Hansard, the hon. member directed a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). It reads:

> What stage has been reached in the discussions or negotiations with provincial authorities with a view to the establishment of a national securities commission or some similar body?

I like the hon. member's choice of nomenclature. He uses the word "nationally", thereby recognizing the definite involvement that the provinces must have in any securities commission regulatory body that is established. The minister's written answer to that question reads:

> The establishment of a national securities commission or similar body was last formally discussed with the provincial authorities at a meeting of the Federal-Provincial Committee of Officials on Financial Institutions and Securities Regulation which was held on October 25, 1968.

The minister adopted the nomenclature of the hon. member, namely, that it is to become a national body. I do not think there is any doubt about whether the federal government approves this kind of regulatory body.

The hon. member has indicated the kind of protection it would afford the Canadian public, protection the investing public do not have at the present time.

This proposal would have the distinct advantage of increasing the kind of investment we need in this country. We could then clearly and boldly say there is a measure of protection that is universal throughout the country. In that way, we could give an assurance that, unfortunately, is not possible at the present time. It would have the possible effect of enabling Canadians to marshall funds for equities through separated jurisdictions, which has a tendency to impede the flow of capital which we desperately need in this country. As I indicated, it is bound to help investment because of the additional protection it will afford the investor.

As recorded at page 4065 of Hansard of February 25, 1970, the hon. member had a series of five questions. The minister's reply to the second query was as follows:

> The last discussions with the provincial authorities on this subject took place at the meeting referred to above. The meeting identified some of the basic issues that had to be resolved before agreement could be reached. These issues were the subject of careful study since the meeting and it is proposed to discuss the matter further with the provincial authorities very shortly.

When this question was answered on February 25, the hon. member was quite right in asking the meaning of the word "shortly". In all probability, officials of the minister's department are, in fact, discussing the very thing he is suggesting should be done through this motion we are debating this afternoon. There is no doubt that it is desirable to introduce legislation regulating international and interprovincial issues of, and trading in, securities.

I might reiterate in different wording than that used by the hon. member. The main considerations which should lead to this decision are that federal legislation would close certain gaps which result from constitutional limits which exist in the securities legislation of this country as presently enacted by the provinces. When problems arise with regard to international trade in securities there is no agency that can speak for Canada. In these matters, Canada can find itself in a weak bargaining position vis-à-vis a foreign regulatory body because neither the federal government nor the provincial securities commission is in a position to give specific assurance concerning the adequacy of Canada's regulations taken as a whole. For a number of well recognized reasons, the trend of the various capital markets in Canada is to become one market.

The same forces at work in giving an increasingly international character to large financial business so that the common market in Canada has become closely linked with the other capital markets of the world. Such developments have imposed a responsibility on Parliament for regulating our common capital market in such a way to enable it to achieve maximum efficiency and to make its maximum contribution to the economic growth of Canada.

Investor confidence is clearly enhanced by effective security regulation. The United States economy is influenced to a large extent by investors' confidence. Until now, the burden of creating this confidence has fallen upon the provinces. There can be no doubt that the investment climate of the country as a whole has benefited greatly from the skilled and conscientious work performed by the securities commissions and staffs of various provinces.

For reasons already stated, nothing short of federal participation will create in Canada and abroad the desirable degree of confidence in Canadian securities. Of course, the hon. member has merely introduced a motion because, he says, he is not an expert in the kind of legislation that is required. I, certainly, am even less of an expert.

We have an obligation in this debate to give some idea of the kind and form a legislation that is required. The legislation should be broadly along the line of legislation already in effect in Ontario and the western provinces. However, careful attention will have to be paid to the views of the provincial authorities, members of the financial community and all other interested persons to ensure that the legislation will meet the requirements of the Canadian economy. The federal government must carefully consider the way in which the federal legislation should be administered and the nature, organization and powers of an agency to administer it.

The Ontario proposal for a joint Federal-Provincial Commission, to be known as Cansec, will be a very useful study. I think this is due to the involvement of Mr. H. E. Langford, the President of the Ontario Securities Commission. The imaginative approach of this proposal to harness the experience of all municipalities in Canada will minimize the number of files required and simplify the whole process of securities regulation. There are two major attractions to this particular proposal. The proposal contains some elements fundamental to the whole scheme which the federal government, and apparently some provincial governments, might find difficult to accept. The individual ministers would have the responsibility of administering the statutes passed by their own legislatures.

The federal government is firmly of the view that a federal minister must, within the constitutional powers assigned to the Parliament of Canada, be answerable to Parliament for the interprovincial and international regulation of securities. Similarly, the multiple functions of the commissioners, sometimes acting as members of the federal securities commission and sometimes acting as members of a provincial commission, would obscure and diffuse the responsibility of individual commissioners.

I do not cite these difficulties to give the kiss of death to the motion. The hon. member himself has already admitted that the motion is not, in effect, legislation but simply embraces a topic that should go to the appropriate committee and appropriate minister for discussion and decision. However, clearly from his answers to the hon. member which I cited earlier, the minister is concerned about the matter and sees merit in the hon. member's recommendation.

I do not know whether it adds much to the steps the government is taking at the present time, but if there is one thing to be remembered in all this question it is, first and foremost, that we as members have an obligation to encourage investment in Canada. One of the best ways we can do this is to set up the kind of governing or regulatory commission to give to investors the protection they have the right to expect.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I first of all congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for introducing this motion to the House. I hope hon. members permit it to go to committee rather than talk it out. It is an important matter that needs to be dealt with, and I think a committee study would be an appropriate way of dealing with it.

I make this suggestion not because I agree with the proposals of the hon. member for Edmonton West; at the moment I have too many questions about the effectiveness of his approach. My questions do not arise from the calling of a conference of federal-provincial representatives to discuss the question of securities; indeed, I believe this is a step that would have to be taken. My questions arise, rather, from the feeling I have as to whether a securities commission would be a more appropriate way of handling what has been a long standing problem of confidence in securities in Canada, as opposed to dealing with the matter under a corporations act. Perhaps a conference should be convened for the purpose of discussing the application of a corporations act to all parts of Canada, rather than the creation of a securities commission.

I am wondering whether the argument for a commission as opposed to a corporations act is an indication of some distrust of direct government supervision, and a greater inclination toward wanting to see the stock markets play a greater role, as would be the case with a securities commission. My own feeling is that in a matter of this importance I would far rather the responsibility remained at the government level or perhaps enlarged, since the people of this country do have a chance to express their point of view at that level. A commission would be one further step removed from direct representation of the people.

Having said that, I find a number of the arguments of the hon. member for Edmonton West difficult to understand. As I recall it, when we debated the Corporations Act both in the House and in committee the hon. member took a strong stand against disclosure, particularly against the publication of statistics of corporations. One of the arguments that he used this evening was that a securities commission would require the compilation and publication of the very matters he argued against being disclosed when we debated the Corporations Act. I hope that on some suitable occasion the hon. member will enlighten me as to why he takes this view today. Perhaps he would let me know why he did not want to see any disclosure provided for in the Corporations Act yet is quite prepared to have disclosure and publication if his proposal today is accepted.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I was talking of public companies.

Mr. Saltsman: It does not matter to me whether they be public or private companies. An important principle is involved here, which is that knowledge be supplied to the investors of this country. Confidence must be established in the integrity of issues that come onto the market in this country. There is no better way of achieving this than to have total and absolute disclosure by all companies in Canada.

I do not know whether the hon. member would raise the question that securities commissions, on the whole, tend to look at new issues rather than those of existing companies—though they do both, of course—and therefore there is a greater, perhaps overriding need for only new companies who are seeking support to be investigated rather than the long-established companies. I hope that is not his argument because there is considerable evidence that some long-established companies have had problems in this regard.

In the United States there are at the moment some of the most prestigious companies associated with the stock market either on the verge of or already in bankruptcy, and there is considerable investor disillusionment with some of the major institutions. I find it difficult to make a distinction between scrutiny and publication on the basis of whether a company has recently entered the money market or has been long established. I therefore do not see justification for creating a commission rather than making provision in a corporations act.

I also had difficulty with the hon. member's suggestion that provincial governments be involved in a matter of this kind. I think it would pose considerable problems for us. Constitutionally, I think the argument is quite sound that in matters of securities the provinces must be consulted. They have to be involved, and perhaps we will not be able to do anything unless this is so. At the practical level, experience has shown that the federal government has, on the whole, been more willing to work for things like disclosure, intelligent reporting and publication than have the provinces. The provinces find themselves taking different views. Some provinces are quite satisfied with things as they are; others are not so satisfied.

There is always a tendency for provinces that need development in the worst possible way to start a "beggar be thy neighbour" program—a program of outbiding everybody else, whether in the area of granting special concessions or not, or being lax about what they insist their investors should disclose, and things of that kind. In this kind of encounter, what happens is that those who want to take a stronger and firmer position are often reduced to a compromise which takes into account the lowest common denominator in order to reach agreement. This is always a factor when one is trying to seek agreement. However, it should be recognized as one of the practical defects of reaching agreement on something as important as disclosure and investor confidence.

I am of the view—I think there are others in the House of a similar view—that it may be more realistic and perhaps more practical for the federal government to take the lead. I know each time this is suggested others say that the provinces may not go along with the government, and this is true. What is more, they do not have to go along with the government. But when the federal government has taken the lead and has put forward legislation, at least respecting federally incorporated companies, ultimately the provinces have gone along with it and have adapted themselves to the circumstances.

I think we can point to later legislation in this regard; for instance, minimum wages. We can also point to the Corporations Act, although in that case one province led the way rather than the federal government. I say these things in order to point out the importance of the federal government on its own asserting a point of view and asking the provinces to go along with it. It has the right to do this. The federal government does not have the power to compel the provinces to follow suit. I think the ability and the willingness to set an example would be emulated by others.

As willing as I am and as desirable as I think it might be to have this motion go to committee for examination, I think the effect of the motion would be to make the enforcement of safety regulations more difficult for the reasons I have enumerated. There is a necessity to get provincial co-operation because of a movement away from firm legislation, and a commission approach would not be as determined as it should be. I would be much more in favour of a motion calling for a federal-provincial conference on the Corporations Act and having in it suggestions incorporating full disclosure and full publication within the ambit of the Corporations Act, rather than having a commission type of organization.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for the motion he has placed before the House this afternoon. I sympathize with him in trying to draft a motion such as this one, because it involves a matter primarily within the responsibility of the provinces yet it is one of national concern and involves a national need. If the action he proposes could be taken, it would be to the national good. The possibility of achieving this action does not lie in a private member's public bill but with a national conference through which, by publicity, pressure could be brought to bear on provincial governments which have the responsibility but are reluctant to give it up to the federal government. In this connection I understand there was a federal-provincial conference held in 1968, as the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) has mentioned, at which there was considerable agreement between the federal government and the province of Ontario although little agreement among the other provinces concerned.

The hon. member's motion suggests that there be established a national securities commission controlled by the two levels of government, federal and provincial. In order to iron out the details as to how it might work, the hon. member suggests there should be held a national plenary conference. Few people would argue about the necessity for a national securities commission. Certainly there is need for a uniform standard of protection for investors throughout the country.

The provinces down through history have been reluctant to give up any of their fields of responsibility including property, civil rights and, in this case, provincial securities. Back in the late 1930's the provinces did agree to a constitutional amendment which made it possible to set up the Unemployment Insurance Commission. They gave up some of their rights there. They have at various times of national emergency given up their rights in the field of taxation, or at least agreed to turn them over to the federal government. However, they are very reluctant to do this. I think the strategy of the hon. member for Edmonton West in calling for a national plenary conference would establish a good forum in which to bring national publicity to the question and bring public opinion to bear, thereby putting pressure on provincial governments to give up some of their powers in this field so that something to the national good might be achieved in every part of the country.

How might we establish a national securities commission? It seems obvious that this is desirable. It could be composed of commissioners appointed by Governor in Council who would be responsible through the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to Parliament. Contrary to what the hon. member for Edmonton West has suggested, I would envisage the headquarters of this commission to be in Ottawa. He has suggested it should perhaps be in Toronto, which has the largest stock exchange. If this were done it would delay any agreement by other, small commissions throughout the country and provincial governments. They do not want to see control going to one of the other provincial capitals. I suggest the headquarters should be in Ottawa with strong regional offices, if necessary, to which the commissioners could travel from time to time as their duties required. The commission would be responsible under the federal securities act, and its powers would include the power to make regulations, carry out investigations and hear appeals.

The commission would be responsible for all international and provincial issues of and trading in any securities. Qualification of issues would be through the regional offices. A simple qualification procedure could be introduced for smaller issues. I think this would be an improvement, because some of the provincial commissions and governments were reluctant in 1968 to agree to the establishment of a national securities commission; they thought it might dampen down their ability, especially a province like British Columbia, to raise large issues of securities. The commission could also be responsible for other functions within the competence of Parliament, for example, the registering of investment dealers and brokers engaged in international or interprovincial issues of or trading in securities.

Having regard to the important matter of co-operation between federal and provincial authorities, there appear to be at least three possibilities. A province might wish to retain the administration of its own legislation. However, once federal legislation was passed it would necessarily prevail in regard to interprovincial and international offerings and tradings. I believe the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton suggested it was the view of the Ontario government that it should retain its own administration. On the other hand, the province might wish to delegate the entire field of securities administration to the federal securities commission, in which case the commission would, after certain conditions had been worked out, administer that province's securities legislation in addition to dealing with the federal securities act.

It might be possible to take a middle course by which the staff of the provincial commission and the federal securities commission would be merged. The federal securities commission and the provincial commission would remain distinct and separate bodies and the staffs of the two official bodies would have a dual function, one to administer the federal securities act in the province and the other to administer the provincial act. In exercising either of these two functions they would be responsible to the appropriate commission.

Two of the main advantages of the CANSEC proposal would then be realized. The knowledge and experience of existing staffs would be used in a co-operative fashion for a common securities administration along the lines of either of the two courses which I have outlined, and would call for consultation with provincial governments by the federal government on the choice of the federal commission's chief administrative officer, such other officers as were appropriate, and on other matters of common concern. Where the pooling of staff was agreed upon, the chief administrative officer under a provincial commission might also be appointed the head of the federal commission's regional office if this were mutually agreed.

Over the course of time the federal securities commission would become a central source of information on all securities matters, which would be available to all provincial securities commissions. Studies of developments in the securities industry could be undertaken either jointly or by the federal securities commission and the results of these studies would also be made available to the provincial securities commissions. The federal government should develop these ideas in fuller detail in consultation with the provinces. The paramount objective of the federal government should be to achieve, by the simplest and most economical means available under our Constitution, a system of securities' regulation best suited to Canada's needs. In pursuing this objective the federal government should be anxious to explore with the provinces the most constructive forms of co-operation.

In summary, it would seem to me that this is a good idea. It would be of great convenience to trust companies and others in raising securities issues, because it would not be necessary to travel to several securities commissions throughout the country to have their issues approved. It would lead to better liaison between provincial securities commissions. There have been several celebrated cases in recent years where trust companies have gone broke. Hundreds and sometimes thousands of little people have lost savings which they have entrusted to these companies. In this connection a uniform standard of protection should be available across the country.

The federal government certainly has a responsibility to push in this direction. I think the provincial securities commissions should maintain the authority to issue small issues within its province. This might make them more agreeable to the establishment of a federal or national securities commission. It seems to me the idea of a conference is a good one, because it would bring public pressure to bear on the provincial governments to co-operate in respect of the establishment of a national securities commission which in the end would generate more confidence in the investment climate in Canada.

Mr. Philip G. Givens (York West): Mr. Speaker, during the course of this discussion we have heard about the importance of raising capital for the development of this great country which is endowed with tremendous resources. I think we are ad idem in complimenting the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for bringing this suggestion before us because it is a very vital matter and we feel there should be one agency instead of some 10 agencies across the country for the purpose of raising efficiently, cheaply and honestly the kind of capital we require.

In the final analysis, when something goes wrong this government takes the responsibility because, indeed, the image of our country is at stake. When something goes wrong like the Commonwealth fiasco, I.O.S. or the British mortgage disaster, our government is blamed: people rear up and ask why the federal government does not do something about it. I ask: Why, indeed, do we not? We do not because in every case we come into conflict with the Constitution; therefore, property and civil rights are involved and the provinces rear up their heads and say they will not allow any diminution of their jurisdiction in this field. I think the time has come when we must say to the 10 emperors of the provincial empires that this country is one nation and not 10 nations. What we require is a central clearing-house with central authority in this field of activity, otherwise we will never be able to raise the kind of financial resources that we require.

I should like to make one particular point which has been made by others during the course of this debate. I appeal to the people in the business community and in the securities field, who address meetings of service organizations and boards of trade and who are always calling in a very rhetorical way upon the federal government to do what has to be done to establish a national securities commission for the purposes indicated this afternoon, to in turn go to the authorities in their provinces and tell them they should co-operate with the federal government for this purpose. They should speak to the provincial authorities and tell them they should contact the federal authorities on this matter.

I think the time has come when we should cut out some of the wind and hypocrisy in respect of this matter, because it is the seats of authority in the various provinces which have been standing against us. They have been saying they cannot diminish their jurisdiction because if this particular problem were handled by the federal authority in Ottawa it would be against their best interests. I think this is false. I think they should cut out this kind of army game which they have been practising over the years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the hour for private members' business having expired, the House will now revert to the business that was interrupted at five o'clock. The House will now forthwith go into Committee of the Whole.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT, 1970

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY POWERS FOR PRESERVATION OF PUBLIC ORDER

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-181, to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada—Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton)—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair. The committee will meet at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose at five o'clock clause 8 of Bill C-181, and an amendment thereto by the hon. member for York South, were under consideration.

On clause 8—Evidence.

Mr. Woolliams: It may please the committee to hear that I will not make a speech. However, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice a couple of questions. I certainly agreed with what he said this afternoon except for his use of the phrase "any reasonable doubt". I think what he meant was "beyond reasonable doubt". These are two different things. I see he agrees with me on that.

Second, I would like to put to him the following question in practical terms. Ideals and theory are one thing, but the practice of law in a courtroom is another. If a person was charged with being a member of the FLQ, an illegal association, it was obvious he had attended about ten meetings prior to October 16, and evidence was brought forward under clauses 4 and 8 of the bill—the minister spoke about rebutting the presumption—unless the accused went on the stand and there was a defence as a result of cross-examination, would that person, because of his connection with the association prior to October 16, be convicted as a matter of fact or as a matter of practice?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, when we get into these hypothetical situations I have to be very careful that I do not try to put myself in the position of the court. I have learned that in some cases there is a difference between the advice I receive and what courts finally say by way of determination. The hon. member appreciates that. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal will know that on occasion I have been able to predict the final result of a case.

Mr. Fairweather: That was on your own.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): However, it seemed to be pretty accurate. At any rate, the situation is that if evidence were to be adduced to the effect that the accused was present at a number of meetings, short of any evidence to rebut it introduced by witnesses called by the accused or in the event that he chose to take the stand on his own behalf, or by way of cross-examination of the Crown's witnesses who tended to establish that evidence, of course the presumption of fact might carry. I emphasize that it might carry. It is a presumption of fact. So there would have to be either evidence contradicting the evidence of the Crown, or successful cross-examination so as to cast doubt on the evidence of the Crown in order to throw the offence charged into doubt under a balance of probabilities—not beyond reasonable doubt, in terms of this presumption, but only in terms of a balance of probabilities. So that the Crown would then be unable to discharge its primary burden of proof, which obtains in every criminal case despite any presumptions there may be in the legislation arising out of the statutes. Then the Crown would be unable to establish beyond any reasonable doubt the guilt of the accused.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I would like to put to the minister another question. Again the Minister of Justice slipped into the mistake I mentioned. He said "beyond any reasonable doubt". He meant beyond reasonable doubt.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, I meant beyond reasonable doubt.

Mr. Woolliams: There is a big difference. I would like to have a case that was beyond any reasonable doubt. I would like to put this question to the minister. Let us consider myself in a hypothetical situation. I will put myself right into the minister's hands. Let us say that when I was a young man I attended many meetings addressed by Tim Buck because I wanted to hear him; I felt that it was quite in order for me to attend these meeting, and I wanted to see what went on in a Communist meeting. I may have attended three, four or five meetings altogether. Assume for a few moments that we are dealing with an illegal association.

Let me ask the Minister of Justice the following question. According to clause 8—I realize it is a clause on evidence but it is a very dangerous clause and substantive law, really—unless I personally went on the stand and said I only went to the meetings because I was interested in being there to see what Tim Buck had to say and perhaps to confront him and his ideas, without any other evidence on my part—and that puts the accused on the stand, which is completely contrary to what is practised under our criminal law as we understand British justice—would the minister, as a lawyer and as Minister of Justice, not agree that without any evidence to the contrary I would more than likely be convicted?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, I would not agree with that. If the accused chooses to take the stand and says, as the hon. member has said, that it was a frolic of his youth and curiosity which led him to see how this movement worked, but that having satisfied that curiosity he did not participate in an effective way in the meetings and did not share the objectives of that illegal association, that type of evidence would be admissible to cast the amount of doubt that is necessary effectively to rebut the presumption.

Mr. Woolliams: I have one last question for the minister. Does this section not really put the onus on the accused, which is the opposite to what is generally done in practice, so that a person, in order to defend himself, would be forced to take the stand? In any case I have ever defended it has been up to the Crown to prove the guilt under the Criminal Code. Let us face it: all the great counsel, whether they are here or anywhere else, have this assistance which is built into our jurisprudence, and would never put the accused on the stand. Normally that is the practice that we learn in law school. If one does not learn it there, one learns it in practice. This provision would force the accused to take the stand and be subject to cross-examination, almost making him a witness of the Crown.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, I do not agree with that, Mr. Chairman. The evidence that would be introduced to rebut this presumption or to cast sufficient doubt upon it may be, of course, evidence introduced out of the mouth of the accused if he chose to take the stand, by way of cross-examination of Crown witnesses or by way of witnesses introduced by the accused.

As I have said, this shifting onus, which is a statutory onus on the accused to rebut a particular presumption, is found in other sections of the Criminal Code. It is open to the accused to decide, if he is able, whether he wants to rebut that onus. But that shifting onus is an onus on the balance of probability relating to the facts set forth in the evidence. It does not shift in any way the primary onus of the burden of proof on the Crown to prove the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt. That onus remains from the first to the end of the case.

This aspect merely relates to the proof of facts within the scope of the case. But there always remains on the Crown, as I cited in my reference to Mr. Cross's book on the introduction of evidence, the onus to establish beyond reasonable doubt the guilt of the accused, and that in no way is affected by the presumptions of facts set forth in this clause.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Chairman, I have two questions for the minister. First of all, I am concerned with the last three lines of the clause where we see the words, "in the absence of evidence to the contrary." I am afraid that may refer back to the word "evidence" in the second line of the clause, which is "evidence that any person may have (a) participated in or was present, (b) spoke publicly," etc., and "(c) communicated," etc. Let us assume that a man—as put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North—a number of years ago attended a number of meetings. Provided the evidence which is referred to in (a), (b) and (c)—or (a), (b) or (c)—is adduced at his trial, the latter part of the clause would require the accused to adduce evidence to the contrary.

With regard to the evidence which he must adduce, would it be evidence to prove that he was not at a meeting, did not participate, or did not communicate? Would that be the type of evidence expected? Or would it be sufficient if he were able to satisfy the court that since then he has dissociated himself altogether from this group although he may have been guilty, as it were, of carrying out the activities which are proscribed here and which would have raised the presumption against him? I would like clarification on the "evidence" referred to in he last three lines. Is it evidence of his present dissociation from the organization, or must it be evidence to disprove the fact that he had attended meetings and participated earlier?

The second part of my question is: Is there any significance to the fact that neither the word "and" nor the word "or" appear at the end of clause 8(a)? With regard to a person who was simply present at a number of meetings of the illegal organization in the past, but did not participate actively, speak publicly in advocacy of the unlawful association or communicate statements, etc.—in other words, there was his mere presence at meetings—would that become grounds for a prima facie case, as it were, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, or should the word "and" not be added to the end of paragraph (a)?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, in answer to the first question it is my view that the evidence that could be adduced to the contrary would either be evidence tending to discredit the evidence introduced by the Crown to establish a presumption under either (a),

(b) or (c), or evidence which was introduced independently of the Crown to establish a new set of facts which would tend to rebut it; in other words, either evidence to attack the evidence which the Crown established or evidence to show that subsequent conduct had given the lie to the earlier evidence. Either type of evidence would be admissible to rebut the presumption.

In answer to the second question, on the basis of the drafting advice I have been given, the fact that there is an "or" between paragraph (b) and paragraph (c) implies the existence of an "or" between paragraphs (a) and (b) and they should be read disjunctively.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether there is any value in arguing with the position the minister has taken, in view of his attitude toward the amendments, but I want to take just two or three minutes to say that I am not in the slightest convinced by the minister's argument that this is not retroactive legislation.

I am not going to take much time in dealing with the question of reverse onus represented by the last lines of clause 8. As I said this afternoon, we were not seeking to amend that. But much of what the minister said referred to the fact that the onus is placed on the accused to prove something that would discredit the earlier evidence against him. I am concerned merely with the question of retroactivity, and I say with the greatest respect to the minister that in his argument he was indulging in semantic legalisms.

Clause 8 is not the clause that provides the offence. It is true that the offence is provided in clause 4, and instead of having clause 8 here the minister could easily have added clause 8 as part of clause 4. That, surely, is irrelevant. What is relevant is that clause 8 sets out the facts under which a person is proven to be a member of the unlawful association, and being a member of the unlawful association is an offence against this law. Therefore, when you have proved that the person is a member of the unlawful association by reference to acts which occurred before the association was unlawful, you are making the substantive offence retroactive, and no number of words and no way of arguing will change that situation.

If I can be held to be a member of the FLQ today by virtue of the fact that I attended some meetings five years ago, then the law substantively is retroactive or retrospective. Certainly the retroactivity is in relation to the evidence on which I may be convicted, but this division between fact and law in this kind of situation seems to me to be entirely barren. When the minister referred to the fact that in an ordinary criminal case you can go back to acts, or action or behaviour of the accused prior to the date on which he is alleged to have committed the offence, you are dealing with something that has always been an offence. It has always been a crime to conspire to commit murder or to commit kidnapping. If I am alleged to have committed that crime on a certain date, and there is evidence prior to that date of my behaviour related to the crime with which I am charged, then of course it is admissible—not as evidence of the charge as set out in the particulars but as evidence of my behaviour supporting that charge.

But this is a new offence. Membership in this organization was not unlawful before October 16. Attending a meeting of this organization was not proof of an unlawful act before October 16, nor was communicating on behalf of this unlawful organization an act which proved membership in an unlawful organization. It is this referral back to what I may have done a long time ago that is offensive.

Time and again in a number of clauses of this bill the minister has referred to the fact—and obviously it is a fact—that it is difficult to prove membership in the organization and that the FLQ is a clandestine organization. Presumably it has no membership card and no membership list, so the Crown would find it difficult to prove that anyone was a member. To extent this logic if it is difficult to prove membership of an organization it is almost equally difficult to disprove it, and in certain circumstances perhaps more difficult.

If there is no membership list and no membership card, it is not necessary to resign membership from the organization. If I am a member because I attend clandestine meetings of a cell or a group, how do I prove that I am no longer a member? I do not send in an official resignation and I do nothing to take me out of the organization of which I was a member. I have committed an offence merely because I attended a meeting some years ago of an organization that has now become unlawful. I have met many young Canadians in Quebec, mainly of French expression, who attended these meetings some time ago.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Trudeau types.

Mr. Lewis: People who were, if you like, fooled by the social and economic objectives which the FLQ has always pretended were theirs and which existed before the bombings started. In my political life I have known people who have attended meetings of Communists, Trotskyists and Maoists without at all accepting the basic theory of force or violence practised or preached by those organizations. They attended the meetings either as part of their education or because they were attracted by Communist, Trotskyist or Maoist pretensions—because they were fighting the battle of the unemployed, the poor, the dispossessed.

The same is true of any organization. The FLQ is here outlawed, not merely because it is a criminal conspiracy or a seditious conspiracy but also because of its political aims of separating Quebec from Canada by certain means. There are a good many young people who may have attended meetings of groups of the FLQ because they were interested or even because they accepted the political aims, without any knowledge or understanding of the criminal and terroristic acts which some members of the FLQ intended to commit.

A young person may have attended a few such meetings six months ago, or four or five years ago, and be charged under this law. The prosecution could then adduce evidence that he had attended those meetings. He may have spoken at them or advocated the purely social goals which the FLQ pretends to have. He may even have communicated FLQ manifestos to other people—manifestos which did not refer to terror, kidnapping or murder but merely dealt with the social and economic objectives of separating Quebec from Canada, of helping the unemployed, the poor and the dispossessed in the province of Quebec, or of fighting the authorities in Ottawa. I use the word "fighting" deliberately because that is the word that might appear in such a manifesto.

A person in these circumstances who had attended the meetings or communicated the manifestos may find himself in court with witnesses for the Crown giving evidence of these facts. The prima facie, presumption as a result of these facts dating back six months or five years is that the person is a member of the FLQ and has the burden of disproving the allegation. I do not know how he can accomplish this. The point we wish to make is not merely the difficulty of the accused to disprove the awful and unjust situation in which he finds himself, but the wrongness of the principle of putting him in that position by making the law effectively retroactive even though the crime itself is not retroactive.

He is put in this position if the crime depends on acts which were entirely lawful at the time, and when the organization to which they were related was not unlawful except as a criminal or seditious conspiracy and, therefore, unlawful in the sense of the Criminal Code but not in the sense in which this bill makes it unlawful. This is the principle with which I am concerned. I have given the matter a great deal of thought since the bill was first introduced, as have all my colleagues. No amount of playing with words, differences between the evidentiary presumption or some other kind of presumption hides the fact that a person is presumed to be guilty because he is presumed to be a member of the organization. He then has to find some way of proving his innocence, and not the usual way where there is a shift of onus in the Criminal Code, because of acts committed when they were entirely lawful.

It is the retrospective aspect of this bill that we find entirely unacceptable, contrary to the basic principle of our criminal law, indeed of most of our law, and contrary to any concept of civil liberties and civil rights.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, to my mind, clause 8, as it now stands, creates a simple presumption which, unless it was contradicted, would be enough to overrule a presumption of innocence. This, in itself, is not exceptional, because, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) pointed out this afternoon, the Criminal Code already contains quite a number of similar presumptions. Those presumptions hinge on past facts.

Nor is this remarkable in itself. The evidence of facts that preceded the crime is often accepted by the courts. With regard to clause 8, the danger lies in the retroactivity it may establish because of the vagueness of the expression "member of the unlawful association".

In effect, the act forbids membership in the association; clause 8 states how one can be proved a member but the act does not explain what it is to be a member. Obviously, according to the dictionary, "being a member" is the state of one who is part of an association; but as the "unlawful association" in question has no charter, no records, no membership cards, it is therefore very difficult to state specifically who can be a member of the said association. Therefore, it is normal to confuse the means of evidence outlined in clause 8 of the legislation, with the offence itself.

Thus, instead of merely being used as presumption, the facts enumerated in clause 8 will become the very basis of the offence. These presumptions concern past events which could have occurred even before membership in the FLQ was declared unlawful by law, as of October 16, at four o'clock in the morning. In that sense, the offence could be considered as having a retroactive effect.

I think the main issue is that the legislation seems to dismiss the possibility of a defence, in fact not in law, once the presumption is established. The phrase "un certain nombre de réunions" is much more indefinite than a certain number of meetings". In fact, the number "un" is a certain number, according to the Robert dictionary.

In my opinion, an exceptional legislation should be couched in the clearest possible terms. This is an example where the French and English terms do not have the same meaning. It is obvious that "a certain number" means "more than one" and that the French word "un" means "a certain number."

Now what happens to the persons who spoke on behalf of the unlawful association before October 16, at 4 a.m. and which were jailed under the regulations or the Criminal Code, after having been found guilty of criminal offences? The possibility that those individuals could be deprived of any legal means of defence makes us fear that the effect of that legislation could be retroactive.

If the proposed effect is really sought through the action of presumptions listed in the Criminal Code, we should add a clause describing what is meant by membership, which is not defined in the bill. I therefore move the following:

> Is a member of the unlawful association any person whose participation in this association meets the requirements of the act for taking part in a seditious conspiration.

With this amendment, of course, the crime of being a member of an unlawfull association would be defined.

Also I do believe that failure to ascribe definitions to criminal acts is tantamount to enacting the wrong kind of law, a law which is foreign to the principle of legality.

Mr. Chairman, there is another point which troubles me: once this legislation is passed, the commission of such acts as are listed under clause 8 would involve a presumption of membership in the association. Now it should be remembered that under clause 14, the fact that a person has on or after October 16 committed any of the said acts, that is speaking publicly in favour of the association or communicating statements, amounts to an offence.

Then, in my opinion, telling a person that the fact that he has publicly spoken in favour of the association implies a dual offence, contravenes two widely admitted principles of criminal law:

Nemo bis vexari debet pro una et eadem causa, and Nemo debet bis punari pro uno delicto

I do not see how, especially after adoption of this act, the person who commits one of the offences can be accused at the same time of committing the other.

With regard to the retroactive effect of the act, it is not definite. Personally, I know several students who were previously members of the FLQ which had branches in several colleges around the years 1963-64, and who left this association when they found out that it was far from being patriotic. These persons, under this act, will be liable to arrest. The attorney general will be able to file a certificate with the clerk to this effect, under clause 7, and they will await their trial. Obviously, it can be said that acts of treason and of sedition are forbidden under the Criminal Code. However, this association became illegal only on October 16 at four o'clock in the morning. And people were arrested as soon as the regulations were enacted.

I understand why those persons cannot have violated the regulations: they were arrested in their sleep. Of course, today, we must have other remedies. As a solution, some suggest that we go back. While agreeing with the Minister of Justice that it is not exceptional in itself to establish presumptions for past actions, I feel that, taking into account the various factors I just mentioned, it is a bad technique. It is unthinkable that several provisions of the legislation should indicate how to determine membership in any association, that membership constitutes an offence and that it does not say what it is all about.

I think the minister is right once again in saying that we may go back. The theory of similar facts and other similar presumptions exists in the bill, but the way the clause is drafted, besides the error I pointed out to the effect that "un certain nombre" in French has not the same meaning as "a number of meetings", it seems to me that the act should be clearer.

I think this clause might be improved by being amended. I am aware of the impossibility refered to by the minister but I think it might have been possible—by including, for instance, the definition which I just suggested—to solve a good deal of the problems. I believe that any person who committed an unlawful act before October 16 is "indictable" under the Criminal Code. If we do not want to prosecute this person for the new offences which are obviously created here, I do not see why this legislation has, in some regards, a retroactive effect.

• (8:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, at one point I thought I would support the government when we came to consider clause 8. When I spoke about our amendment I dealt with this particular clause. As it reads now, I agree with the minister that a question of evidence is involved. But it is a question of evidence which makes substantive law because it places the accused in a position where he is obliged to take the stand and defend himself. The minister can shake his head, but this is what will happen.

The Minister of Justice well knows that an accused has to be proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt and the onus is on the Crown to so prove. But here the onus is placed squarely on the accused. In effect, this clause has made the law retroactive. The minister should refer to the case of Clarke v. The King and the other cases on this point; the citation is 25 Canadian Criminal Cases. The fact remains that in practice the implementation of clause 8 will force the accused to take the stand, which is contrary to normal procedure. Laymen who listen to television shows think the accused always takes the stand. We do not act like Perry Mason. We do not walk up to the bench to whisper to the judge. We do not act as they do in that television show. We do not put the accused on the stand to solve every case. It has been my experience and the experience of other defence lawyers that very rarely is the accused put on the stand, regardless of his guilt or innocence. The reason is that he is then subject to cross-examination. He may leave some doubt as to his innocence in the minds of the jury and therefore be convicted.

The onus is strictly on the Crown. That is the principle of British jurisprudence. This principle has been adopted throughout the Commonwealth, including Canada, and throughout the United States. The Minister of Justice referred to the Narcotic Control Act. As far as I am concerned, that is contrary to the Bill of Rights. Perhaps the courts will have something to say about that. There is the Income Tax Act. All these statutes are being set up by the Crown. They have similar clauses. They are different from the Criminal Code. The onus is shifted to the accused and the defence.

I agree with the Minister of Justice that this is a matter of evidence, but in practice it becomes substantive law. Once a person has attended four or five meetings of this association or has been associated with it in accordance with clause 8, and it is established he did this prior to October 16, he is guilty of the crime unless he takes the stand. What does this mean? When a person is arrested, under the normal rules of jurisprudence he does not have to make a statement. In fact, the police in the jurisdictions of the ten provinces have been instructed to warn an accused that anything he may say may be used against him at his trial. If there is any duress, promise, threat or similar statement made to the accused by a police officer, the statement is not admissible at the trial. There is often a fight about this when a person is charged under the Criminal Code.

An admission by an accused must be voluntary. If not, it is ruled inadmissible at the trial because it was made under duress. Some people make statements because they want to be martyrs. One famous case is the Henderson murder trial. In 1957 a man in a Chicago jail confessed to committing a murder in Calgary which had been unsolved for ten years. When the man was brought to Calgary he said, "I only made that admission to get out of the jail in Chicago." Two years later the proper accused was found. He was tried and convicted. But the Chicago man who was brought to Calgary had made an admission. That is why we have the rule of evidence that statements made by an accused to a police officer or someone in authority must be made voluntarily, and this is the reason a warning is necessary.

Under clause 8, once it has been established by evidence that a person had some contact or association or attended certain meetings, he is guilty until he proves his innocence. Crimes are retroactive to October 16, the date the War Measures Act regulations were proclaimed. The Minister of Justice referred to the law of similar acts. If that is the law of evidence in Canada, the Crown can call evidence to show that a person has committed a certain kind of conduct for a period of time. If he is still engaged in that conduct, he can be convicted. The defence is in the position where it must rebut that evidence. To force an accused to take the stand is contrary to every form of jurisprudence. We are wasting a lot of time on this bill.

An hon. Member: That's right.

Mr. Woolliams: I say to the hon. member that he should add all the minutes and hours that we in the Conservative ranks have talked on this bill. A few days ago we asked that all questions be put.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: We are not responsible for the playing that is going on in the government backbenches. Perhaps the Prime Minister is responsible. I do not know what tricks he may have up his sleeve. I want to get down to brass tacks and deal with the point I am trying to make. The mess in the province of Quebec will not be cleaned up by this bill or the War Measures Act. It will not be resolved until justice is administered in its proper form. We have the evidence of the police entering a certain apartment, picking up Lortie and missing the two culprits, those who are allegedly guilty of murder or kidnapping.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There were three.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, three. The Minister of Justice or the Prime Minister should make a statement clarifying the situation today. Until today the RCMP have been beyond reproach. They have skills and scientific detection equipment equal to those of any police force in the world. The inference should not be left that this group of people is either incompetent or infiltrated.

The problem is not that we require stronger law. What we require are trained, competent police officers to administer the law. If the Minister of Justice had not received instructions from the Prime Minister he would say that what we need today is to clean up the mess as far as the police force of the province of Quebec is concerned. I think that is the problem. No one can tell me that the police can walk into an apartment, go out for lunch, leave their weapons and ammunition and then say that we need an act to strengthen the law. Good, clean boys are needed to clean up the mess.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Because the government is trying to hide under this umbrella, I am not prepared to give them a new law. We do not need new law. We need officers to carry out the law under the Criminal Code. That is what is needed to clean up the mess in Quebec. The Minister of Justice has been told, not only by the opposition but by newspapermen, that if we had the facts behind the reason for invoking the War Measures Act we would know why the government implemented these strong measures. I repeat, they do not need strong measures. What needs to be done is to administer the law which exists in Canada today. Most of those who have been arrested could have been charged under the Criminal Code.

I wish to refer to page 8 of the report of the Royal Commission on Security, paragraphs 21, 22 and 23. This group investigated security in our nation.

The Chairman: Order. The Chair has some doubt as to whether the hon. member is speaking relevant to clause 8. I invite him to refer his remarks to that clause.

Mr. Woolliams: I can understand why you would have some doubts, because I question whether you understand what clause 8 is about.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Chairman: Order. I think that on reflection the hon. member will not want that remark left on the record. In fairness, I asked the hon. member to return to clause 8. I did so with respect. The Chair is not infallible. I think the hon. member has wandered sufficiently far from clause 8 that it is the responsibility of the Chair to bring him back to it.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, if I had said anything to hurt the Chair I would be the first to apologize, but with respect I think I am right. I suggest that the securities report is relevant to clause 8, and I will tell you why. The government is asking for extraordinary measures on behalf of the Crown. If only two years ago, when the government had this knowledge, they had exercised the law and adopted the recommendations of the royal commission, they would not have had to pass this legislation today. The mess in Quebec would have been cleaned up long before the War Measures Act was invoked.

With the greatest respect to the Chair—and I have been respectful as far as the Chair is concerned—I still contend the report is relevant to clause 8. Although lawyers might understand the clause in theory, in practice it is a very dangerous clause. Therefore I would ask the Chair to hear me out so far as the report of the Royal Commission on Security in Canada is concerned. Paragraph 21 of the report makes direct reference to when the security of Canada is at stake. Two years ago the government knew about the FLQ. Having that knowledge, why did the government not move in? They did not move in and as a result created some action, even some reaction, and brought in these extreme measures.

When we question the government on Orders of the Day, they always reply that it is a matter for the Attorney General of the province of Quebec; that it is a provincial matter. The government is implementing extraordinary measures either through the War Measures Act or through this special act. If the government had fulfilled their obligations, as the Royal Commission on Security recommended, they would not be in the mess they are now. The situation is such that this is a question that goes to the security of our nation. Since it goes to the security of our nation we are entitled each day to get answers from the Minister of Justice, from the Solicitor General and from the Prime Minister. Yet each day they refuse; they say it is a provincial matter. They say, "We only pass the act. They are implementing it".

To come back to clause 8—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I am very glad hon. members are clapping. Clause 8 gives the government, the police and the Crown extraordinary Powers in regard to the admission of evidence. It places the onus on every accused in Canada to prove his innocence. We would not even have to consider this sort of measure tonight had the government acted in accordance with the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Security.

Mr. Drury: This is your second reading speech, is it not?

Mr. MacEwan: You could learn something from it. You are a cabinet minister from Quebec and should know about this.

Mr. Woolliams: It took two years for the government to make up their mind. It is easy to get hysterical and for the government to say they have done something. But what have they done? I ask them through you, sir, will they please stand in their places and explain tonight how the police can go into an apartment, arrest one person and miss three others, as well as leave their guns and ammunition in the apartment?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, that was denied today by the Quebec police. The only basis for this information, as I understand it, is a communiqué issued by the FLQ.

Mr. Woolliams: Will the Minister of Justice stand in his place and say that these facts are not correct; that he has investigated the matter and he finds these facts are wrong? The Globe and Mail and other newspapers in Canada must have printed facts which were not true. I would accept the statement of the Minister of Justice if he would stand now and say that these three men were not in the apartment when the police walked in.

The Chairman: Order, please. Again may I indicate to the hon. member that we had a very broad and useful debate on second reading and on clause 2 of the bill. With all respect to the hon. member, it seems to me we are ranging much further than we should at this particular stage of the proceedings. I would ask the hon. member for Calgary North to return to clause 8 of the bill.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned I think I am right, and I still submit, with the greatest respect to you, that I am relevant. We would not have to ask Parliament tonight to pass and approve these extraordinary measures if the government had acted. We would not have to ask Parliament to approve these extraordinary measures tonight if we knew that the law would be administered as it is administered in the rest of Canada. The Minister of Justice says this statement has been denied today, yet he himself has not denied it.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Woolliams: I ask the Minister of Justice to stand in his place—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Woolliams:—and say that these facts are not correct; that these accused, allegedly guilty of kidnapping and murder, were not in the apartment—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Woolliams: —at the same time the police were there, and that the police went out for lunch. I ask the minister to stand now and say that that is not correct.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Woolliams: If the minister will stand and say that, we may go along with these extraordinary measures. But if we are going to give the police power to administer a law of this kind, with that kind of administration—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Woolliams: —what is going to be the result with regard to giving the police extraordinary powers of this sort? It is not going to clean up the mess. What we are trying to do tonight is clean up the mess in the province of Quebec. As long as the law is administered as it is, how can we clean it up? This is why I want to hear from the Minister of Justice. The minister may say this story has been denied. Perhaps a newspaper wrote one thing this morning and somebody denied it this afternoon. The minister could get on the telephone to the Attorney General of Quebec and find out whether or not these facts are correct.

Secondly, during the question period I asked whether the government had investigated to find out if these facts are correct. Then Parliament would be able to move and decide what kind of powers the police need. But without that information, with the greatest respect, Mr. Chairman, Parliament is being asked to make a decision without evidence in the same way as we made a decision without evidence in regard to invoking the War Measures Act.

Coming back to clause 8—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak for a few minutes and to return to the amendment to clause 8 moved by my colleague, the hon. member for York South. In particular I should like to get back to some of the things the minister said when he spoke to the amendment before five o'clock this afternoon. I always listen with a great deal of interest when the minister speaks to us on these fine points of law. However, when I listen to him and to other learned gentlemen in this House I always get two impressions. On the one hand I get the impression that lawyers like to use words that are not in our normal vocabulary, thus creating the impression that there is a mystery about the law that ordinary people cannot really comprehend. The other impression I get, however, when I listen attentively, is that when you boil it all down the law is fundamentally a matter of logic.

• (9:00 p.m.)

An hon. Member: And common sense.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, I would even add common sense and an adherence to certain principles that have been accepted and established. Accordingly, I paid particular attention to the minister when he tried to argue that clause 8, as he has put it in the bill, is defensible because, as he has said, there are many other statutes which have a similar provision in them.

I listened to the provisions that he cited and, with respect, I must say I do not feel that a single one of them was on all fours with the wording in clause 8 which is now before us. I say that because in every case the something that one did that could be used as presumptive evidence occurred at a time when that act was an offence. For example, if I may think of one or two, the minister said that possession of certain drugs is presumptive evidence that one is trafficking. The difference between that kind of legislation and this is that at the time one had the drugs it was a crime to engage in trafficking, but in this clause a law is being written which refers to a period of time before it was a crime, as in this case, to be a member of the FLQ.

I submit with all respect that if the minister will take another look at those examples he gave us during that interesting speech this afternoon he will have to admit that there is not one that is on all fours with the provision of clause 8, and there is not one that defends the legitimacy of this clause on the general principle that precedents establish a case. It is because new ground is being broken in this clause that I feel the amendment of my colleague the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) should be supported.

The minister in his remarks this afternoon made a great deal out of the fact that persons can be found guilty on the basis of presumptive evidence, or at least presumptive evidence can be used against them even if it relates to something that had been done prior to the time of the offence for which they are charged. The minister tries to carry that over to this by saying, therefore, that if one attended meetings of the FLQ three or four years ago, prior to the time of the offence, which could only occur since October 16, that can be used against him. The point I make is that in all of these other laws under which a person's action prior to the time of the offence can be presumptive evidence against him, it was at least a crime at the time the offence was committed or the act was performed.

In this case we are being asked to say that what a person did when it was not illegal, when it was perfectly within the law, can be used as presumptive evidence against him in the period of time when the new law is in effect. I submit that the things my colleagues have said about the dangers of retroactive law of this kind are correct and that we are embarking on a dangerous course.

Perhaps I may go a bit further in respect of what I heard the minister say this afternoon. I believe it is correct to say that he said if a person is accused under this clause and can establish doubt about the evidence that he was in attendance at FLQ meetings prior to October 16 then, of course, that falls to the ground and he is in the clear. Supposing such a person cannot cast doubt on that evidence; supposing the facts establish that the accused was at meetings, in the plural, of the FLQ prior to October 16: then I submit that unless he can produce evidence that he is not now a member of the FLQ, and it is just as hard to prove you are not as it is to prove that you are, then the plain wording of clause 8 means that in the absence of evidence to prove that he was not at such meetings when it was not illegal to be there, that in itself is proof that he is now a member of the FLQ.

In the plainest way I can put it, it seems to me that is passing a law that has a retroactive effect. It is not being made a crime to have attended FLQ meetings in 1965, 1968 or 1969. That is not being made a crime by this measure.

However, if it can be proven under clause 8 that one did attend meetings in those years, and if one cannot prove that he is not now a member of the FLQ, then under this clause such a person can be found guilty of the main offence in clause 4, which is membership in the FLQ, and is liable to the punishment set out in this bill. So, Mr. Chairman, for these reasons, and because it seems to me in the plainest of logic we are being asked to support a proposition that is retroactive in effect, I urge that the minister given more weight than he has yet given to the arguments advanced by my colleague the hon. member for York South.

I end the way I started, by pleading with the minister to face the fact that the examples he gave us in other statutes are not on all fours with this one. They are not good precedents and they are not reasons which justify the kind of departure that is involved in this dangerous clause. I urge the committee to support the amendment of the hon. member for York South so that it is only attendance at FLQ meetings since it became a crime to be at such meetings, that can be used as evidence against an accused person.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I was impressed by the clarity of the minister's statement this afternoon in outlining to the House the place and the role of what he termed presumptive evidence in proceedings before the courts. It was because of the clarity with which the minister outlined the existing practice and precedent in this connection that I became more than ever convinced of the fact that my colleague's amendment to clause 8 is necessary and desirable.

There is one example the minister gave this afternoon which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did not touch upon, and this is the one which to me clarifies the position we are in. The minister made reference to the crime of seditious conspiracy. He stated, quite properly, that his objective was to stamp out seditious conspiracy. I think there is no quarrel in the committee that this is apparently the purported objective of the bill before us. I think, also, that most members of the committee will recognize that seditious conspiracy is one of the most difficult offences to deal with and, if I follow the minister correctly, I can see the place and the role of presumptive evidence in respect of prior activity and association with the FLQ. I can understand the role of presumptive evidence when the activity or association occurred over recent months or even years in relation to a charge or an allegation that a person had been involved in seditious conspiracy.

It seems to me the very argument the minister advanced in that connection makes it more apparent than ever that to now apply that principle through the proposed new offence is certainly not in keeping with the principles of our law and justice as outlined by the hon. member for York South. So far as I am concerned, the very idea of declaring such an organization to be illegal or unlawful is distasteful. This is something which I think we should weigh carefully at any time, both in respect of its practical result and whether or not it is necessary and desirable in a democratic society.

I am prepared to admit that in dealing with the problem of seditious conspiracy there may be circumstances, as this bill suggests, when such a specific group or organization and its membership should be determined to be unlawful. However, if we deal with it in the sense of going back into a person's past and are not prepared to allow people to act in accordance with what Parliament decided with the coming into force of this law, we are going beyond what I feel is necessary or desirable. It seems to me that the minister has something in this legal bag of tricks which he has not yet logically put before the committee. He and all his colleagues on that side of the House should stand and support this amendment.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, there is a good deal in this legislation which I find offensive. Perhaps there is little that is more offensive than the clause we are discussing. The decision to include a clause which would allow the police to arrest and charge people who have been members of a particular group or organization for some years and who perhaps a few weeks ago terminated that membership, all argument to the contrary, is something that is so unbelievable and unjust that I find it difficult to comprehend that any government would have the audacity to bring such a suggestion in legislative form before this House. I find it repugnant that members of this House should be expected to approve a clause of this bill which would establish guilt on a retroactive basis.

This clause states that membership of any nature in an organization that was not considered unlawful until a few weeks ago can constitute the necessary evidence with which to charge a person with a criminal offence. This is too strong and unpalatable to be justified on the ground of security in this country. Not only are we in effect stating that certain acts in the past which individuals may have committed, or certain statements which individuals may have made, are a crime, but in this legislation we are creating a new crime which is either membership in, support for or encouragement given to a particular movement.

This would be bad enough in itself in light of the traditions of this country, but the fact is that we have not yet been given evidence in these many days or weeks of debate concerning the nature of the FLQ and what in particular would constitute reasonable evidence in respect of a criminal offence in this respect. Certainly the minister did not offer to this House in the earlier discussion on clause 3, which was stood, nor in the subsequent debate on various other clauses any relevant information concerning the exact nature of what would constitute a crime in respect of the FLQ. I think he has not done it primarily because he is not able to do it.

In the first instance, the minister has not been able to define the exact nature of the FLQ for purposes of arrest, charge and conviction. Are we, then, to be asked to put ourselves in the completely unbelievable position of suggesting that attendance at meetings or earlier support for some aspects of this organization will constitute evidence that would convict one of a criminal offence? This really is an Alice in Wonderland situation. I am amazed at the audacity and the fictional kind of existence in which the minister and the government must live, when they would expect either members of this House or the people of the country to believe that the establishment of a clause establishing retroactivity is in the best interests of the country or in the best interests of dealing with the present difficulties in the province of Quebec.

Further, it is beyond me how we can in all justice expect to have the people of this country accept as fair legislation which calls for the establishment of criminal offences which when committed in the past were not criminal. By the simple passage of this clause in the bill we would in effect be telling the people that something they did in the past, which to the very best of their knowledge did not constitute a criminal offence, has now in fact become a crime.

It is possible that next year the government might decide that some other organization is in effect of a like nature to the FLQ, and that it would constitute a criminal offence to support that organization, not only now when the legislation becomes valid but perhaps 10, 15 or 20 years ago when it seemed to be no criminal offence to belong to or support a specific organization. It is incredible that we should be engaging in a discussion of such a proposal this evening. Although we certainly are dealing with an organization which is repugnant to almost 100 per cent of the population today, this does not set aside the possibility that some other day another government, or perhaps this government, will propose similar steps in respect of other organizations, other activities, other bodies and other beliefs or ideologies.

In this proposal we are asked to accept a presumption of guilt which strikes me as being contrary to everything I understand of our system of justice. A person will be called upon to prove that in his earlier association, which he may have terminated half dozen years ago, he has no longer maintained some kind of active interest or support. How in the name of heaven is an innocent individual before the courts expected to prove the nebulous assertion that he is no longer an active member or supporter of that particular organization?

There is one thing that is basic to the legislative framework assembled in this place. Not only must we provide laws that are just and fair to the citizenry of this country; they must, above all else, appear to be just. It has not taken very long for a great number of people in this country who have looked at this bill to realize that of all aspects of it this clause is obviously and in the first instance the most unjust. If we are seen to be assenting here in this place to this kind of unjust precedent, we do no service to the remainder of the body of laws and statutes of this country. I urge the minister to reconsider the wording of this clause so as to strike out what I think is offensive both to the House and to the good common law of this country.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I will not bother you or the minister for too long, but as I listened to hon. gentlemen and members of the House tonight I realized that around 30 per cent of them are from the legal profession, which makes one timid to stand up and cast a layman's opinion on some of the proposals which we have before us.

I would suggest at the beginning that the Minister of Justice, prior to the supper recess, tried at least to indicate that clause 8 was perfectly all right and that somewhere in it everyone was well protected. At the same time, I am sure that lay people across this country, about whom we should be concerned so that we can talk to them on the street and at work and not necessarily in a court of law, should have their laws put into language that they understand. I suggest that if there is any reasonable doubt whatever about the clause under discussion, the minister should take another look at it. Surely the minister must realize that if he had to spend the length of time that he did in this House speaking to many of his learned friends, many of us and many people in the country will never understand what the clause says.

Let us, for example, look at the first paragraph of the clause which contains the words "either before or after". That in itself should give everyone cause for concern. I am pleased to see that even some of the members of the minister's party have questioned the terminology before us. I am sure that the hon. member for Calgary North when speaking a while ago about past cases in the courts could recount others, as could other lawyers in the House, and tell us what might happen in the future. But we also know that many people will collaborate with those who they believe are doing something for them. I suggest that people in Quebec who at one time thought the FLQ was doing something for them and who were with the FLQ and supported that organization, now denounce terrorist actions, as all of us in the House have, when they have found out that the FLQ thinks that force is the only way to achieve its ends.

If one looks at clause 8 and at the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York South, one can see no reason why the Minister of Justice would not at least wish to stand up and say there is reasonable doubt regarding the wording and that he will do something about it. He could at least say he will take another look. Instead, he spoke for about an hour explaining something that was beyond the understanding of most people in this country; and after trying to explain it he suggested that we should have such things as "shifting onus", "primary onus", "presumption of fact" and all that type of terminology that means very little to the average individual.

The basic question that we have to ask ourselves tonight is whether or not these provisions will be retroactive with regard to those who may at one time have believed that a certain group of people represented their interests. I suggest to the minister that if he is not prepared to give serious consideration to this amendment, it will amount to telling the people of the country that it is he who piloted the bill through the House, he who is the leader as far as this bill is concerned and not the leader of the Liberals. Maybe he would like to be the leader, but he is not quite there yet. I understand from the news tonight that there may be a leadership contest before too long.

Mr. Orlikow: Look at the results of the by-elections.

Mr. Skoberg: I understand that if he puts the legislation through and the House passes it, he can wash his hands of it completely and say, as they have been saying for the last two weeks, "We have put it into effect. Now it is up to the attorneys general of the respective provinces". It is wonderfully easy for learned people in this House to say they have passed the buck to someone else. At the same time, people can rot in jail for 90 days swearing that they were not and are not members of the illegal association.

I think that some members of the Liberal party believe in the positions of the World Federalists. There is one short paragraph in the recent editorial on that publication which I would like to quote. The words I will read are not to be found in the law books, but I am sure that the editorial gives a good analogy to the situation we are now facing. One part of the editorial reads as follows:

> In fact, as laws pile up, peace and order recede further into the background. Anti-riot laws, anti-conspiracy laws, anti-drug laws do little to shore up respect for the lawmakers and do nothing to enhance their authority. As their laws multiply, their authority derives more from guns than from legislation.

Surely the Minister of Justice must realize that to correct the situation with which we are faced today we need more than this legislation. I am sure he realizes that if he refuses to accept any of the amendments suggested to clause 8, what he is really saying is that we might as well wipe out any pretence of suggesting anything that will have any benefit so far as this legislation is concerned.

It has been said to me—in fact, this applies also to many union contracts that have been signed throughout the country—that it would be much better if professors of English were to write some of the legislation and some of the union contracts, so that they would make sense to the average individual. If I could possibly get the attention of the Minister of Justice for a moment I would like to plead with him, if he believes there is any reasonable doubt regarding the wording of the clause, to stand up right now and say that he will take another look at it. Otherwise, this entire debate will be a complete farce and the onus will be placed on the Liberal government.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Chairman, because we are sitting in Committee of the Whole and therefore there is no way in which our opposition to this provision can be registered without our voicing it, I will take a minute or two to say that I will vote for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York South. I realize that the minister has had a long day and that there are other discussions that he wishes to continue with his colleagues, but perhaps someone else will listen to what I have to say.

Perhaps the outlawing of dangerous toys is the most serious issue facing the country. I do not happen to believe it is, although I commend the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for that bold initiative. The curious aspect of this provision of which I want to remind the minister is that this legislature, and legislatures similarly organized, are the only places that could have the audacity to promote such retroactive provisions and have them ruled constitutional. To put it much more quickly and simply, this provision would be clearly unconstitutional were it passed in the United States of America. Therefore, we should question it. I think it is worth while to take a little time on this bill, particularly on a provision such as this clause.

An hon. Member: A couple of weeks?

Mr. Fairweather: The second curious fact is that we have been along this road before in this Parliament. Anyone who has read about the mistakes that were made by predecessors in office at the time of the Winnipeg general strike know that very serious errors were made at that time because of the hysteria that surrounded the strike. It took a good many years to remove that legislation from the statute books. I think it is to the credit of Ernest Lapointe, the then Minister of Justice, and the Mackenzie King government that section 98 of the Criminal Code was finally abolished. But, Mr. Chairman, having passed along this road before, here we go again.

Seriously, I ask the minister, what was the rationalization behind this clause? Where did it come from? Is it the same as in other statutes, or is it some new initiative, some new piece of draftsmanship without precedent? I shall oppose this provision and vote for the amendment. I am curious about the origin of this retroactive provision and can only say it is abhorrent.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, of all the amendments that have been proposed, this is probably the most fundamental. It has attracted the support of a number of serious members on both sides of the House. It would be an act of both courtesy and earnestness for the minister to reply to some of the criticisms before we vote on the amendment.

Mr. Woolliams: What's the use, if he is going to say the same thing again?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member for Calgary North has just said what I was going to say. It would not be much use if I were to say the same thing again to the committee. I have listened carefully to all the arguments. I think I could repeat every argument made by hon. members, whether they be lawyers or non-lawyers. If the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby reads my speech, I think he will find there has not been an argument that I have left unanswered.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Fundy-Royal made a perfectly legitimate presentation. He asked the minister for the ancestry of this rather weird clause that we are studying.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I cannot give a full pedigree of the clause. It was drafted to meet the present circumstances. It bears no relationship to, nor does it derive any ancestry from section 98.

Mr. Fairweather: I did not say it did.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Its parentage cannot be traced back through any particular lineage. It is something specifically drafted to meet a specific, current problem.

Mr. Orlikow: If the hon. member for Fundy-Royal and the Minister of Justice want to know the origin of this bill they should read an article which appeared in the Montreal Star on Saturday, written by W. A. Wilson, an Ottawa correspondent who is not unfriendly to the government. He makes the case very plainly that the bill has its origin in section 98. I had my say about section 98 before and I will not repeat it. I think the bill has two origins, one in section 98 and the second in the feeling of the minister that he owes something to the Attorney General of Quebec, and he is going to pay that debt in this bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Lewis) negatived: Yeas, 29; nays, 51.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I have a further amendment to clause 8. I move that clause 8 be amended by adding the following subclause:

2. In any prosecutions for the offence of being a member of the unlawful association, the accused shall not be convicted unless it is established that he knew of the use of force or the commission of crime by members of the unlawful association.

My moving of this amendment was prompted by a telegram sent to the Prime Minister by 23 members of the faculty of Osgoode Hall and York University, Toronto, setting forth their objections to the War Measures Act. In their third suggestion they said no one should be charged or detained by reason of his membership in any organization unless there is evidence acceptable to a court of law that he knew or ought to have known of the violent methods of such an organization.

If we are to accept the minister's interpretation of clause 8, it is that this is an evidentiary presumption in relation to the one offence of membership in the FLQ. This afternoon he outlined how the presumption operates. If the accused can set forth a case with the balance of probabilities in his favour, then the onus shifts to the Crown to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused is a member of the FLQ. But the thing that concerns me, Mr. Chairman, and I am sure it concerns members of the faculty of Osgoode Hall law school of York University, is that there are two types of membership, active and passive.

Clause 8 of the bill states:

In any prosecution for an offence under this act, evidence that any person, either before or after the coming into force of this act,

(a) participated in or was present at a number of meetings of the unlawful association or of any branch, committee or members thereof—

In paragraph (a) you have participation in or being present, in paragraph (b) you have speaking publicly in advocacy for the unlawful association, and in paragraph (c) you have communicating a statement on behalf of or as a professed representative of the unlawful association. The first line of paragraph (a) states, "participated in or was present at a number of meetings", but you get an active participation in the other paragraphs. Under paragraph (a) you could have a charge against a person who "participated in or was present at". When you look at the words "was present at" it means you are sort of dwelling on mere membership.

One of the things that has worried many members in this House, and I notice it worried the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie this evening, is the type of evidence that could be brought forth. If a person is charged under clause 4 with being a member and the evidence comes forth that he was present at a number of meetings—the minister has said this may be an improvement over the regulations—the question arises as to the type of evidence he can present to rebut this allegation. It would be difficult for him to say, "I was not present at the meetings". The minister has admitted that there may be two types of evidence: he may be able to argue that he was not present, or that at the time of the charge or previous to it he had renounced membership in the association. I am sure this is the reason why the professors of Osgoode Hall at York University were so concerned about mere membership.

I can appreciate a person being charged if he has participated, if he has advocated or if he has communicated; but if his membership is mere presence at the unlawful association it does impose a tremendous burden upon the accused.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Gilbert: Certainly.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Has the hon. member the date of that communication from York University?

Mr. Gilbert: Yes, I have, Mr. Chairman. The telegram is dated October 21, 1970, and is addressed to the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Prime Minister. I shall be glad to send it over as soon as I have finished. These are the submissions that were prepared and sent to the Prime Minister, signed by 23 members of the Osgoode Hall faculty of law, York University, Toronto. I might add that the provisions in this bill are practically the same as the provisions dealt with by the professors in sending the telegram to the Prime Minister.

I think I have made my point, Mr. Chairman, that the real problem that faced the professors and faces many members is this question of mere membership or passive membership—the attending of meetings when the FLQ was a lawful association. This imposes upon the accused the burden of proof. As the minister has said on other occasions, judges may say that presence at those meetings is sufficient to establish guilt, rather than following the second line that the minister has submitted, that an accused could bring forward evidence that at this time or a short time after attending the meetings he had renounced membership in the FLQ.

If the FLQ is an unlawful association—and we say it is unlawful because it advocates violence for the overthrow of the government—surely mere membership should not be sufficient grounds to lay a charge against a person who attended meetings before it became an unlawful association. I appreciate that if the person has participated at the meetings or has communicated or advocated, it is a different matter. But mere membership should not be sufficient to charge or detain unless there is sufficient evidence that the accused ought to have known of the violent methods of the FLQ.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal briefly with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Broadview. The reason I asked for the date of the communication to the Prime Minister from the professors of the Osgoode Hall faculty of law at York University was that since the date of that communication, October 21, the regulations have been, not replaced but substituted by the bill. That is to say, the communication from the professors was dealing with section 8 of the regulations, which differs in a material way from clause 8 of the bill.

Mr. Broadbent: Would the minister permit a question related specifically to what he is now saying? If the minister looks at page 2 of the brief from the members of the law faculty of Osgoode Hall he will notice that the section is subtitled, "With respect to possible new legislation." It is with direct relation to this legislation that the proposal is made, not to the War Measures Act.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, but with the greatest respect, at that time the professors had no idea what was going to be in this bill. The bill differs in quite a material way from the regulations with respect to the point made by the hon. member from Broadview. The regulations state:

> In any prosecution for an offence under these regulations, evidence that any person
> (a) attended any meeting of the unlawful association

The bill states:

> In any prosecution for an offence under this act, evidence that any person, either before or after the coming into force of this act,
> (a) participated in or was present at a number of meetings of the unlawful association or of any branch, committee or members thereof—

There are two material differences in that paragraph. The first is that the idea of participation is added and the second is that it must be a number of meetings. I am advised that this means two or more meetings. I am suggesting that what the professors were directing themselves to has now been materially changed, and now each one of these three paragraphs deals with active participation or a positive act.

[Mr. Gilbert.]

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Or attendance.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Participation contains the concept of an act.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Or?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Or was present at a number of meetings. Not just one.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Two?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): "Spoke publicly in advocacy." There is an active concept in that idea. Then, "(c) communicated statements on behalf of or as a representative or a professed representative." Again we find an active principle—the sharing of ideas. There is nothing passive in those three paragraphs. The criticism to which the hon. member and the professors of York University directed their attention may have had some application to paragraph (a) of the regulations at that time, but in my submission it does not apply now.

The hon. member is suggesting we should impose an additional burden of proof; that an accused person has to know what the organization is all about. The FLQ is so notorious that its objectives and means are well known not only in Quebec but throughout Canada. How any person can possibly be a member of the FLQ without knowledge of its willingness to resort to the use of force and the commission of crime is hard to imagine. The nature of the organization is known to persons generally across Canada. If, in a situation which I find it difficult to imagine, someone came before the courts and said, "I was a member of the FLQ but I did not know what it was all about", the judge would be bound, if he were satisfied that this was true, to instruct the jury accordingly and the jury would be bound to find accordingly. I doubt very much if such a person would then be convicted or, if he were, whether he would get much of a sentence. But to put into the bill such a provision as is suggested, when the bill is now drafted quite differently from the regulations would, I contend, be placing an unwarranted burden of proof on the Crown.

Mr. Olson: Might I suggest to the committee that under the provisions of Standing Order 6(5)(a) we interrupt the proceedings to ask Mr. Speaker if we can extend the sitting of the House tonight until the Committee of the Whole has disposed of clause 8 of Bill C-181, or eleven o'clock, whichever is earlier?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. In view of the request made by the minister, it is my duty pursuant to section (5)(a) of Standing Order 6 to interrupt the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole in order to permit the House to make a decision on the motion to be proposed by him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel) resumed the chair.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by my colleague the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis):

That this sitting be extended until clause 8 of Bill C-181 has been disposed of by the Committee of the Whole, or 11 o'clock, whichever is earlier.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Before putting the motion I feel I should read to hon. members the relevant Standing Order:

When Mr. Speaker puts the motion on such question he shall ask those who object to rise in their places. If ten or more hon. members then rise, the motion shall be deemed to have been withdrawn. Otherwise, the motion shall have been adopted.

All members opposing the motion will please rise.

And none having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I declare the motion carried. The House will resume in Committee of the Whole.

And the House having resumed in committee:

Mr. Broadbent: With respect, as one says around here, the Minister of Justice has completely missed the point. The proposal outlined in the brief submitted by the professors of York University did, indeed, deal with the substance of clause 8. They did deal with what they thought should have been included in clause 8 and, at the same time, with what they thought should be excluded. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Broadview is taken word for word from their proposal. In effect, it says that no person should be convicted for mere membership unless it can be shown that he knew, or should have known, something about the intention of the FLQ or some related body to use violence. It is not a question of some other crime, but of violence.

This appears to be exactly the point with which the faculty of law of Osgoode Hall were concerned. We have to decide whether or not the proposal which my hon. friend from Broadview had put forward is good on its own merits. I should like to give my reasons for thinking it is a good one. It is common practice in the legal systems of most democratic countries not to convict on the grounds of mere membership of an association. I refer in particular to the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which declared ultra vires a law which made it a criminal offence to be a member of the Communist party. The ground of this decision was, as I recall, that mere membership in the association, a part from the commitment of specific acts of crime, should not be considered a criminal offence.

My hon. friend for Broadview has put forward an argument of essentially the same nature. For the reasons he has given, it seems entirely appropriate that a person should not incur the serious penalties proposed in this bill for mere membership. The requirement is that he should have foreknowledge of the violence associated with this organization, and I should like the minister to deal specifically with this argument.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. For the benefit of hon. members the Chair will read Standing Order 40(7) which states:

When it is provided in any standing or special order of this House that any specified business shall be continued beyond the ordinary time of daily adjournment or that any such business shall be forthwith disposed of or concluded in any sitting, the adjournment proceedings in that sitting shall be suspended.

This means there will be no adjournment debate tonight. I point this out for the benefit of members and ministers involved. Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gleave: I wish to ask the minister a question with regard to the FLQ. Are there any membership lists or known procedures whereby persons are known to be members of the FLQ? Is there any means of calling meetings? What is the definition of membership? Is there a membership fee? How is this arrived at?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I have already said in this House, and I say again to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, that my reply was to the substance of the argument of the hon. member for Broadview after I made particular reference to the date of the statement by his colleagues from York University. Although I may not have dealt with it satisfactorily from his point of view, I did deal with it. I would probably be more courteous to the committee if I did not bore them with repetition, even though my original statement may have been inadequate. I try to meet every argument as it is put forward.

In answer to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, there is a difficulty in establishing membership in the FLQ because it is not a legal organization. It does not have all the trappings such as a corporate charter, purposes, objects or perhaps even a membership list, although I am not in a position categorically to reply to that. Because of this, the definition in clause 4 must be as all-embracing as it is, in other words, to assume or to relate membership from or to a series of acts. One who professes to be a member is assumed to be one, or if he communicates statements on behalf of the association. He is assumed to have that type of relationship if he advocates and promotes the unlawful acts or means of the association. Clause 4 is drafted in this way because there is not a standard procedure of ascertaining the membership of a clandestine, hidden conspiracy.

Mr. Gleave: This clause purports to make a person guilty if he has in the past attended a meeting of the FLQ. How is such a meeting defined? If a person attended a meeting of the FLQ one, two or three years ago, how is the meeting he attended defined for purposes or determining guilt?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That would be a matter of fact. It would have to be proved beyond reasonable doubt to the satisfaction of a court. If a number of people who were proved to be associated with the purposes, objects and methods of the FLQ met for the purpose of advancing the objects of the FLQ, I assume that can be considered to be a meeting within the standard dictionary definition. If it were established that a person attended a meeting or a number of meetings, as the clause reads, creating a presumption of fact in favour of his being a member of that type of association, and he were not able to rebut that assumption by contradictory evidence of subsequently having had nothing to do with it, or having reached a parting of the ways because he found he disagreed with the objects and was not willing to participate in the violence—if he were able to do that he would in the final analysis be found not guilty. Definition of the word "meeting" is what is understood in normal parlance by the word "meeting". In the absence of any definition in the bill, such term would be defined in the standard dictionary.

Mr. Gleave: Supposing, Mr. Chairman, there was a meeting at which was discussed the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada, even by violent means. Such meeting may have been a meeting of the FLQ, it may have been a meeting of some Maoist order or a meeting of two or three dissident organizations. By what means or definition is it established that the meeting that a person attended was a meeting of the FLQ?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You would have to establish facts to that effect. You would have to establish it was an organization that was, I suppose, parading under the auspices of the FLQ and meeting to seek the violent overthrow of the government of Quebec, or the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada. This would have to be established to the satisfaction of the court. I cannot give the hon. member a complete list of the factors that might enter into the definition or into proving a case.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I am genuinely concerned about this question because I have spent about 20 years attending meetings of farm organizations in western Canada and have seen a lot of odd-ball meetings in my time. What I am concerned about is this. We are being asked to pass legislation that defines the position of a person who is going to be charged with having done a certain thing. By what definition or by what rule book do you establish that the person charged with attending the meeting had attended a meeting of the FLQ? If there is no membership list or means of defining these people, the person who is charged is, I suggest, left in a pretty precarious position.

How does one establish, first of all, that a person attended a meeting of this particular group? Secondly, if the group cannot be defined, how does the person know what he was attending? If the minister can offer any yardstick to the committee in this regard, I should like to hear what it is.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I think it is pretty clear that if a man or woman is attending a meeting that is called for the purpose of discussing the use of violence or crime to overthrow the government of Quebec—

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Does it say that?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No. But if one reads the definition in clause 3 and in the second paragraph of the preamble, that becomes clear.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the committee for more than a minute, but may I say to the minister that I think he has very neatly evaded the point that the hon. member for Broadview was making. The minister says that he cannot possibly conceive of a person who is a member of the FLQ not knowing the purposes and objectives of that organization. We are not dealing here with a person who is a member. The purpose of clause 8 is to prove that he is a member.

The minister dealt with participation, he dealt with advocacy and he dealt with communication. What the hon. member for Broadview was pointing out, so neatly sidestepped by the minister, was that any person who was present at a number of meetings of an unlawful association or a branch or committee thereof, or in attendance at meetings of a small group which did not put up big signs saying "this is the FLQ. Come in and get a machine-gun because we are people of violence," is a member of an unlawful association unless he can provide evidence to the contrary.

The hon. member for Broadview is pointing out, not that membership does not presume guilt but that mere attendance could be the result of a misadventure on the part of a person who attended a couple of meetings some years ago during student days and later became aware of the purposes and objectives of the organization and terminated his association with it. If the minister leaves this matter with the mere presence of someone at a meeting being proof of membership, and places that kind of power in the hands of attorneys general and police forces, he will have many cases of flagrant maladministration of justice in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I will try to repeat again perhaps more succinctly, if I am able, what I said initially in reply to the hon. member for Broadview. It is no longer true to say that clause 8 can be interpreted without some ingredient of conscious action by way of participation or association at a number of meetings, or a course of conduct, or active communication, advocacy, promotion or something like that. That positive act assumes some conscious knowledge of what is going on.

I said that it was inconceivable to me that anyone who was a member of the FLQ, or attended meetings of the FLQ in such a fashion that he would be caught on a presumption, would be someone other than one who attended meetings where they were discussing violence and sedition or, armed seditious violence. On the basis of common experience it is inconceivable to me, based on the notoriety of the FLQ, that anyone who was at such meetings would not know of their objectives and purposes.

I said to the hon. member for Broadview that in the hypothetical case where that might happen and where, on the basis of the accused's credibility before a jury or a judge he was able to satisfy the court or jury that that was so, I doubt very much if a jury or judge would convict, or if there were a conviction whether the sentence would amount to much. By adding the words the hon. member seeks to add, he in effect imposes an additional burden of proof on the Crown which I feel would be impossible to satisfy.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I have just one word at this time. The minister said several times earlier, in reply to hon. member's questions, particularly the questions of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, that the meeting would be an FLQ meeting at which there would be discussion of the aims of the FLQ and the unlawful means that group intended to use. If that is the case, why is my hon. friend's amendment so difficult? Obviously the Crown will have to prove—I am using the minister's own words—not only that there was a meeting, but that there was a meeting of a certain kind at which they advocated violence toward certain political ends. So the Crown would have to prove presence at that meeting, as well as the nature of the meeting. If it proved the nature of the meeting and I was there, obviously I ought to have known that the purpose of the FLQ was violence and crime. Surely this is logical.

The minister simply cannot argue, as he did before, that this amendment places an impossible burden upon the Crown. It has to prove the nature of the meeting and, therefore, that the meeting dealt with the unlawful act or the advocacy of it. If it proves that and the person was there, then obviously that person knew or ought to have known about it. The value of the amendment is in relation to some young person who was roped into attending a meeting; the meeting did not discuss violence; the meeting or a number of meetings discussed separating Quebec from Canada, fighting the battle of the unemployed, helping the poor in east Montreal, or whatever. This student or other young Canadian sits in at that meeting and is attracted to the slogans. He returns and attends another meeting or meetings where exactly the same kind of thing is discussed. But present at this meeting—I will mention names everybody knows—are Vallières and Gagnon. The Crown will then say that Vallières and Gagnon were charged with such-and-such and that it was after this the young man attended those meetings.

It is that kind of situation with which my friend's amendment would deal. This young Canadian who was roped into attending such a meeting innocently, and who listened to the social objectives in which the FLQ claims to have an interest, not knowing of the criminal intentions which may have been in the minds of the people or some of the people who may have been there, should not be subject to conviction and should not be the victim under this law. I do not see where the burden on the Crown is so difficult under the elements of the amendment of the hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, on the basis of the hypothetical situation adduced by the hon. member, the accused undoubtedly would escape on the basis of the general wording. What I say to him—I can say it to him because of his legal experience and the sharpness of his mind—is that the burden of proof sought to be added by the hon. member for Broadview would either be impossible to discharge in one circumstance or redundant in the other. That capsulizes the reply I have been trying to make.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, the minister is hanging his whole case on the fact that if a person attends an FLQ meeting, or a number of FLQ meetings, this means that person is familiar with the objectives and the means which the FLQ intends to use to attain those objectives. This does not necessarily follow at all. People have been attending Liberal meetings for years and still do not know the real purposes of the Liberal party.

Mr. Lewis: It is not an unlawful association.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, each one of us tends to speak from his own experience.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): That is right. I have been trying for a long time to find out what your program is.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Chairman, to introduce such an amendment one has to be completely unaware of what terrorist movements are, the goals they seek and how they want to achieve them. In fact, the very essence of the FLQ, the MLQ or any other terrorist movement is their secrecy. Why? Because they seek to overthrow the government by violence.

Therefore, as the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) pointed out this afternoon, we are not dealing with a political party. There are no membership cards and no contributions. These movements do not hold conventions, but secret meetings where terrorism is discussed.

That is pretty well known in the province of Quebec. The record of the FLQ is not recent, for since 1963, its members would have committed about 100 bombings, armed robberies or arms thefts, and they would have caused train derailments.

For those who do not know what the FLQ is, simply by attending one meeting of that association they can figure out how far those guys are willing to go. They state publicly and openly that murders have to be committed.

Everyone knows that in the province of Quebec. Several public meetings, which were not necessarily FLQ meetings, took place. Known supporters of the FLQ were sometimes in attendance at these meetings, indirectly as guests, or because they thrust themselves on a group, meeting for apparently peaceful purposes, to state that political leaders have to be assassinated. If FLQ members now dare say in public that political assassination must be used, there is every reason to suppose in view of the bombings, the robberies, the train derailments, and so on that in more secret meetings these people do not talk about overthrowing the government by democratic, legitimate and peaceful means.

Therefore I think that one would have to be a little naive and ill-informed about life in Quebec to imagine that someone could not know that the FLQ, the MLQ or any other similar movement is not a revolutionary movement attempting to overthrow the government by violence.

• (10:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: I could not disagree more with the remarks that have just been made. Let me give a personal example of the point the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands was trying to make. About two weeks ago I was speaking in Toronto and ran into a student who had recently attended five meetings of a Maoist group. He did not find out until the fifth meeting that it was either a Maoist group or that it believed in violence. This is not a foolish young man. He happens to be a first or second year student who is concerned about poor people in the city of Toronto. He was taken in, if you like to put it that way, by someone he thought was a well meaning student, quite innocent of violent politics, who got him to come out to some study groups. The study groups met a number of times. No mention was made of violence or of Communism, but finally at the fifth meeting he discovered it was a Maoist group and immediately got out.

I think that is the point at issue, and it cannot be dismissed so readily. We are talking in this bill not only about the FLQ but about some successor, some related body, and it is indeed possible that well-meaning young people in the province of Quebec or elsewhere could attend a number of meetings without knowing about the real purposes of that organization.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Deputy Chairman: The question is on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Broadview.

Amendment (Mr. Gilbert) negatived: Yeas, 16; nays, 54.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 8 carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, because we are opposed to it, I rise simply to ask for a standing vote on clause 8.

Clause 8 agreed to: Yeas, 49; nays, 24.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare clause 8 carried. Pursuant to special order made earlier this sitting, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Pursuant to the Special Order adopted earlier, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.31 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, November 17, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

THE LATE BERNARD PILON

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House has just lost one of its most eminent members, Mr. Bernard Pilon, member for Chambly since 1962 and Whip of the government party.

The House of Commons is losing not only a member of great ability and exceptional devotion but also a man who had, through his warm humanity and his generous and sympathetic personality, won the respect and the friendship of all. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that I speak for all hon. members, when I say that he will be sorely missed and that his sudden passing leaves a great void here.

To Mrs. Pilon, his family and his friends, I offer, in the name of all members of the House, our very sincere condolences.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): We have just learned, Mr. Speaker, of the untimely death of Mr. Pilon, member for Chambly and Whip of the Liberal party.

Mr. Pilon who was elected in 1962 has always been considered since, by all hon. members with whom he was acquainted, as a kindly man, who liked life and who could control his feelings and reactions. All of us, whatever our party affiliations, have always appreciated his sense of humour; we are all losing a friend.

[English]

Of Mr. Pilon, Sir, it can be truthfully said that he had the respect and admiration of all members of this House. He was a warm and affectionate man, and we will all hold fine memories of his work here.

[Translation]

To all his colleagues, to the members of his family as well as to his friends, I extend on behalf of my party, my sincere sympathy.

[English]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members in all parts of the House were saddened to learn only a few hours ago of the untimely death of Mr. Bernard Pilon, the member for Chambly. He entered the House in 1962, and it is a measure of the strength of his personality that he very soon became the whip of his party. In this very exacting post, one which, if occupied by a more abrasive personality, could cause a good deal of friction, Bernie, as he was commonly called, won the respect and the admiration of all with whom he came in contact. Those of us on this side of the House came to know him as a friendly, likeable and pleasant personality. We feel saddened today by his passing and we hope that you, Sir, on behalf of the members of this House will convey to Madame Pilon our deepest sympathy at the great loss which she and the members of her family have suffered in the passing of her husband.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, as all my colleagues in the House, I was shocked when I heard the news of the sudden death of Bernard Pilon at the age of 52.

Bernard Pilon was a friend of mine. I came to know him as soon as he was elected to the House in 1962. Since then he and I have been members of parliamentary delegations in Iran and India where I had the occasion to appreciate his superb qualities.

All will remember that Bernard was generous and amiable and that he was more of a humanitarian than a politician.

Mr. Speaker, Parliament has lost a dedicated servant. The electors of his Chambly riding have not only lost a public servant but a friend. As to the government, it is being deprived of one of the most remarkable members it has been our privilege to know.

And so on behalf of my colleagues and on my behalf, I wish to extend to Mrs. Pilon and the family our most sincere sympathy.

• (2:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): As the counterpart on this side of the House may I say very briefly how saddened we are at the loss of our late colleague, the chief government whip, Bernard Pilon. It was an honour and privilege to be associated with him in the performance of his duties in the House which he discharged in a fair, unexcited and businesslike manner. I was also privileged to attend three international conferences along with Mr. Pilon as representatives of the Canadian Parliament, and one could not help but be impressed by his Canadianism as well as his great understanding of international affairs. Members in all corners of the House are saddened by this loss, and we extend to his widow and son our sincere condolences.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to presume in any way but I would like to direct a suggestion by way of a question to the Prime Minister. The universal sorrow of members of this House has never been poured out in more abundant measure than today. While naturally Mr. Pilon would expect us to carry on, has any consideration been given to an adjournment for a period this afternoon in tribute to one who served all so well?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, some consideration was given to that. I am advised it has been a longstanding practice of the House that if the news of the death of a member of the House is received while the House is sitting the House then adjourns for the balance of that day. In this case the news was received before the House began today's sitting.

IMMIGRATION

TABLING OF REPORT ON APPLICANTS IN CANADA

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table under Standing Order 41(2) copies in both official languages of a Report on Applicants in Canada by Joseph Sedgwick, Q.C.

Mr. Paproski: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was hoping the minister would have made a statement after tabl ng such an important document as Mr. Sedgwick's report. After all, when a man works diligently for two years and comes up with a few reasonable recommendations, surely it is not enough just to throw the report on the table under Standing Order 41.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on the point of order, simply for information. In this case Mr. Sedgwick was appointed in July to this task.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A), 1970-71

A message from the Honourable Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Supplementary Estimates (A) for the financial year ending March 31, 1971, was presented by Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 59 I would like to move, seconded by Mr. Olson:

That, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 58(15), the Supplementary Estimates (A) for the year ending March 31, 1971, tabled in the House this day, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Motion agreed to.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

UNITED STATES PROTECTIONIST TRENDS—CANADIAN POSITION—CONSULTATIONS WITH EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET AUTHORITIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Finance who has expressed concern about possible protectionist tendencies in the United States and the implications of this for Canada. Is it the position of the government of Canada that the protectionist trends in the United States are contrary to GATT or any other international convention, or is it the position of the government of Canada that what is contemplated there does not contravene any international agreement but would simply be against the interests of the development of world trade and in particular of Canada's world trade?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we will have to see how these policies develop in order to judge whether they will be contrary to the GATT or not. It is our belief that the United States will not develop policies contrary to the GATT, and of course we are expressing hope that they will not depart from the generally held belief in the benefits of multilateral trade. I had occasion to express this hope of the government of Canada to President Nixon when I first met him a year and a half ago.

Mr. Stanfield: In addition to Canadian ministers expressing concern and exhorting the United States not to proceed in this way, is the government of Canada contemplating any initiative of a concrete sort such as sponsoring or encouraging a conference of the principal trading nations of the world to consider the menace of rising protectionism and possible methods that might be adopted to avoid such rising protectionism?

Mr. Trudeau: In the area of specific measures, Mr. Speaker, next week Canada will be hosting a meeting at the ministerial level of the Canada-U.S. ministerial committee on economic and trade problems, and we will use this meeting to reiterate our firm belief in the benefits of multilateral trade. There are no other international meetings of a specific nature being considered at this time.

Mr. Stanfield: I appreciate that opportunities will be taken to present Canadian views to the United States but I am asking whether opportunities will be sought to broaden the discussions? In particular, I should like to know whether the government of Canada is consulting the European Common Market authorities at Brussels as it is well known that they share Canada's concern about possible protectionist developments in the United States? Have there been consultations with the Common Market authorities at Brussels with a view to developing common and more broadly based consultations with the United States?

Mr. Trudeau: When the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce visited Brussels a few weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, he not only expressed concern about the consequences of protectionism which might develop in the United States but also the concern felt by Canadians that protectionism might develop in the Common Market itself. In our discussions of the possible consequences of the entry of the United Kingdom into the Common Market we reiterated these concerns. So the speech by the Minister of Finance yesterday is part of the reiteration of these very serious concerns we have with the development of world trade by the formation of blocs, whether within Europe or within the United States. It is of great importance to Canada that multilateral trade continue to be viewed by the world trading nations as the best way to proceed. We have also had discussions along these lines in Australia and New Zealand and there have been return visits here by some of their officials. We are trying to impress these views upon the world trading nations.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In the event that the United States does not respond to the minister's call for trade liberalization, can the Prime Minister indicate whether his government is preparing a program that would enable industrial development to take place without continental integration?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I respectfully suggest to the hon. member that the question as asked is hypothetical. Perhaps the hon. member would like to rephrase his question.

Mr. Saltsman: I would like to rephrase it, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister preparing an alternative program in the event that the talks on trade liberalization are not successful?

Mr. Speaker: I would think that the hon. member's question as rephrased is still hypothetical.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, may I have a new supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: This is the hon. member's last chance.

Mr. Saltsman: The Minister of Finance also referred to the need of a selective strategy as vital to our future development. Can the right hon. Prime Minister indicate if the government has such a selective strategy and, if so, when can he make it known to Parliament?

Mr. Trudeau: In due course, Mr. Speaker.

APPLICATION OF UNITED STATES LEGISLATION TO CANADA

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Has the government of Canada received assurances from the government of the United States with regard to the president's trade legislation known as HR. 18970 which is at present moving through Congress, which I know the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has discussed with his counterpart in the United States and which contains very restrictive measure against imports into the United States, especially of manufactured goods? Have we received assurances that this legislation will not be applied against Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not in that specific sense, Mr. Speaker. It would probably be impossible, or certainly undesirable, for the United States to give this specific assurance to Canada. As the hon. member knows, the United States is a member of GATT and it cannot undertake to discriminate either against or in favour of Canada and we do not expect this. Certainly we are not making any representations along that line. We are making representations at the official and industrial levels to ensure that this legislation is not adopted in a manner harmful to the principles of trade which I just enunciated in answer to the previous question. But we are not asking for discrimination in favour of Canada, if that is the hon. member's question.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government received any assurances that this bill, which will be a very restrictive piece of legislation as far as this country is concerned, will not pass in its present form?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure how the member would expect the government to have the assurance that the United States Congress will not pass this bill in a particular form. Of course, we cannot have that assurance from anyone except from Congress itself, and that will be known only when they debate and vote on the bill.

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): In light of Canadian concern over trade restrictions in the United States and other countries and in keeping with the principle of removing the beam from one's own eye before trying to remove the mote from someone else's, would the Prime Minister indicate whether he intends to ask the Minister of Finance to remove government order 36 from the order paper as in this motion the government is attempting to protect the Canadian shirt industry in much the same way as other countries are attempting to introduce protection?

CANADA-UNITED STATES MINISTERIAL MEETING— ITEMS ON AGENDA

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister about the Canada-United States ministerial meeting on economic and trade matters which is to be held in Ottawa next week. Will he tell us what items will be on the agenda and what ministers will be representing the Canadian government at those talks?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I do not know. I will ask the Minister of Finance or, hopefully, his Parliamentary Secretary to provide that information when the question is next asked.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources according to the roster ought to be here today but are not present, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he knows if the export of energy resources is to be included in the talks? If so, will the Prime Minister undertake to see that the responsible minister makes a statement to the House either before the talks or after indicating what Canadian policy actually is with respect to the utilization of energy resources?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is addressing the Chamber of Commerce in British Columbia and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is in Alberta meeting with Premier Strom and representatives of the oil industry. When they come back I will ask them to consider the hon. member's suggestion.

NATIONAL PARKS

ESTABLISHMENT OF FACILITIES BETWEEN BLACK LAKE AND THETFORD

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of national parks.

Is the government about to sign an agreement with the provincial authorities on establishing a national park between Black Lake and Thetford Mines, as the minister promised during the recent byelection campaign?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, that is certainly not due to such a suggestion on my part, as there is no possibility of establishing a national park there. It is only that the people of Thetford realized they were getting nowhere with Social Credit.

AUDITOR GENERAL

EFFECT OF NEW LEGISLATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board if the proposals contained in Bill C-190 reflect the view of the government, as indicated during the preceding session, that a different type of person with greatly curtailed powers is required for the office of Auditor General?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt whether the question as asked is in order. The hon. member, if I understood his question correctly, is asking whether a bill that has been proposed to the House reflects the views of the government. I doubt whether a question of this kind is in order. I would think that the question might be in order when the bill is before the House for consideration. At present we are initiating discussion on an order which is on the order paper, and I would not think that the question is procedurally correct.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I put the question in a general way which may find favour with Your Honour. Does the minister not agree that it is just as dangerous to curtail the powers of the Auditor General as it is to send a lion tamer into a cage of hungry lions with his hands tied behind his back?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think that the supplementary also implies difficulty. The hon. member might wish to reserve this argument until the bill is before the House for consideration.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PAYMENT OF EXTRAORDINARY EXPENSES IN ASSISTING CIVIL POWER—TABLING OF WHITE PAPER

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister assure the House that any extraordinary expenses which may be charged to the Department of National Defence arising from the rendering of assistance to a civil power will not come from the frozen budget of the department but will be provided by some other means?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I think I can fairly confidently give him that assurance because otherwise there would not be funds available. In effect we would have to seek any additional funds that may be necessary to pay these costs beyond the budget which has already been set.

Mr. MacLean: I have a related question which I hope Your Honour will accept as being supplementary. Will the tabling of the white paper on defence be delayed beyond the date of early 1971 suggested by the minister in order to give reconsideration to the implications for the defence forces of the present situation and possible recurrences of similar situations in the future?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I do not expect it will have to be delayed for that reason. An analysis is now under way as to the implications for force levels of the operation which at the present time is gradually being withdrawn, but I would not think that would delay the tabling of the white paper.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board who today tabled the supplementary estimates. Can the minister indicate what item in the supplementary estimates includes this additional expenditure?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): In relation to the discussion which has just taken place, there is no item in supplementary estimates (A) to cover this.

GRAIN

PRESENCE OF RUSTY BEETLE IN WHEAT SHIPMENTS—PAYMENT OF COST OF DAMAGE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Having regard to the strong message that was given to the government yesterday by Manitoba and western Canada and in particular with reference to the beetle damage to wheat, is the government reconsidering the minister's suggestion that at least part of the cost of the damage caused by the beetles should be paid by the farmers? Does he intend to put payment of the cost in the proper place by making the government of Canada responsible for its own negligence?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government is not negligent in any way, shape or form with respect to the infestation of rusty beetles in wheat. If the right hon. member will phrase his question in a more precise way so that it is capable of receiving an answer, I will be happy to answer it. What I said the other day is still valid. We are attempting to ascertain the location of all or most of this infested wheat. With respect to any portion that is in the bins on the farmer's farm, I said that the farmer is responsible for the management of that grain. The right hon. member has never separated his question so that it is capable of an answer in that respect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will recognize the right hon. member in a moment, but I do not think we should enter into a debate during the question period.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will make my question simple enough so that even the intelligence of the Minister of Agriculture will make possible an answer. Is the minister going to hook the western farmer for the cost of any portion of clearing up the beetle situation?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, we are not going to hook the western farmer for anything.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture arising from the same message delivered yesterday by western Canada. Is the minister now prepared to withdraw Bill C-176, the marketing bill?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker. The indication I have from all governments in western Canada is that this is a desirable bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My impression was that the by-election was finished but it seems that it is continuing today.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that Commissioner Shuttleworth indicated this morning at a meeting of the Standing Committee on Agriculture that once the grain has been purchased it is then the responsibility of the purchaser of the grain, is the government now prepared to assume its responsibility and pay for the damage that has been done because of negligence in the inspection?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, there has been no negligence in inspection on the part of the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How then did the infected wheat get to Poland and Russia?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I realize hon. members want to ask supplementary questions, but we must get on.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION ALLEGING FLQ CONTROL

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister arising out of a newspaper report concerning a speech made by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion at St. Jerome on Sunday in which the minister is alleged to have said that the FLQ have also controlled the CBC. Is the Prime Minister aware of such a statement having been made by that minister and, if so, does he approve of it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The answer to the first question is no, Mr. Speaker. Therefore the second question is not relevant. I will have to see the speech and discuss it with the minister.

Mr. Lewis: Will the Prime Minister assure the House that he will make an inquiry not only into the speech made by the minister but also his statement, if he made that statement? If the minister did make that statement, will the Prime Minister explain to the House why no inquiry has been made into FLQ control of the CBC, if the minister is correct?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The first question is a suggestion to the Prime Minister, and I suggest to the hon. member that the second question is hypothetical.

Mr. Lewis: May I rephrase the question and ask whether the Prime Minister will undertake to inquire as to what the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion said on the subject of FLQ control of the CBC and inform the House of the results of his inquiry?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will inform myself of the statement made by the minister and then decide if any action is necessary as a result of what he said.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

WAR MEASURES ACT—TAPING OF STATEMENT BY MICHEL CHARTRAND WHILE IN JAIL

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Can he tell us how Michel Chartrand, now detained under the War Measures Act, was able to make a tape-recording of a statement and get it out of prison?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot do justice to the hon. member because I did not quite understand his question. I am willing to read it in Hansard and see if I can answer it.

INVITATION TO VICE-PRESIDENT TO EXPLAIN OPERATIONS TO LIBERAL CAUCUS COMMITTEE

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he authorized an invitation sent to Mr. Picard, Vice-President of the CBC, to appear before the Liberal caucus committee on communications to explain the inner workings of the CBC to that group only?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not approve such an invitation because I had no knowledge of it. However, I know that our caucus committees, and I hope the caucus committees of the opposition parties, take advantage of every opportunity to get information from experts by asking them to help them in the understanding of problems.

Mr. Skoreyko: If such a move is approved, will the Prime Minister consider having Mr. Picard appear before the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts so that all members can become familiar with the inner workings of the CBC?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Picard does not have to ask permission from me when he is invited to address any particular group of Canadians. He decides whether he will accept the invitation or not. In this case, I repeat, I am not aware of the invitation or of the response. As to whether he will address the broadcasting committee it is, of course, for the broadcasting committee itself to decide whether or not it wishes to invite him. If it does, I am sure Mr. Picard will be glad to attend.

[Later:]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and is supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Edmonton East. Is it government policy that executives of Crown corporations be free to accept or to decline invitations to attend non-public meetings of political parties?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not believe there is any stated policy in this regard, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that the question of whether they can accept such invitations and participate in a non-partisan way is a matter to be left to the discretion of those people. I should think they would welcome the opportunity if they were invited by members of one party. I am sure they would welcome the occasion to accept an invitation if it was extended by members of any other party.

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION ON FLQ ACTIVITIES—INTERPRETATION OF WAR MEASURES ACT REGULATIONS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is directed to the Prime Minister and it relates to some of the questions which were asked earlier. In light of the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion that those people who have in the past expressed support for even some of the aims of the FLQ were in fact supporting the FLQ and its actions, has the government decided to suggest to the government of Quebec how it should interpret the War Measures Act and, if so, does the government feel that such persons as the president and other members of FRAP should be charged under the War Measures Act regulations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The question appears rhetorical to me. I am sure the minister was not suggesting that the government should press charges against one person or another. If the minister has an information to lay, I am sure he will know how to do it.

COMMISSION ON MEMBERS' AMENITIES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can he tell the House when he expects to receive the report of the commission under the chairmanship of Mr. Beaupré which has been examining the amenities available to Members of Parliament? If the report has been received, can the Prime Minister tell us when it will be tabled in the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have not yet received the report. I understand the work is well advanced; I believe it is the usual question of preparing a translation in final form. I expect it fairly soon but I have no knowledge of the exact date.

ESTABLISHMENT OF FUR FARM RESEARCH CENTRE

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he is now in a position to answer the question I put to him on October 29 when I inquired whether any progress has been made in establishing a fur farm research centre in the vicinity of Ottawa and, if so, what is the target date for the completion of this project?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I will be happy to answer the question briefly. Plans are firm to develop a fur farm research centre as a component of the National Research Institute but the target date for completion of the required facilities is not firm. Meanwhile support is continuing through extramural research contract grants to universities.

POLLUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF CONTROL STANDARDS FOR PULP MILLS

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Has the government yet established pollution control standards for pulp mills as he announced he would do some time in October?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): We have prepared draft regulations and they have been discussed with several of the provinces; they have yet to be discussed with other provinces and they have still to be checked with the industry itself. I hope they are out before the end of the year.

COME-BY-CHANCE OIL REFINERY—PROTECTION OF MARINE LIFE

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): I have a supplementary question which concerns the proposed establishment of an oil refinery at Come-By-Chance, Newfoundland. Will the minister give the House an assurance that all necessary steps will be taken by his department to protect marine life in the area from the danger of pollution?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): We are keeping a close eye on this development.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF GAS WELL BLOW-OUT ON PANARCTIC DRILLING PROGRAM AND ECOLOGY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): May I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development arising from an answer, recorded on page 1144 of Hansard, in response to a question about the drilling of a well on King Christian Island? Can the minister tell us whether this well, which went out of control, has now been brought under control, and whether any ecological damage has been caused?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the blowout of the well in question is not under control and according to the latest information, it will be impossible to put the fire out before six or eight weeks. Moreover, I can tell the House that I am informed that the damages do not extend beyond a distance of 500 feet from the drilling point.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: As I understand the minister's answer today and the answer he gave on Friday, two people were fired because, as alleged by the minister, the drilling company, or Panarctic in control of the drilling company, went beyond 1,800 feet contrary to the instructions of the minister. Are those the facts?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, according to the information I have received, the drilling continued beyond the 1,800 foot limit. The president of Panarctic Oils Limited told me that the two representatives of the company on the spot have been fired.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask one more supplementary? Would the minister tell the House who authorized the firing of the two men? Was it Panarctic, the drilling company or the minister?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it was Panarctic Oils Limited that took this responsibility towards its own employees.

[English]

SUPERVISION OF OIL EXPLORATION OPERATIONS BY GOVERNMENT INSPECTORS

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a supplementary for the minister on this subject. Was any government inspector on the site while this drilling was going on and, if not, will the minister assure us that in future operations of this kind government inspectors will be present to ensure that the ecology is not unnecessarily endangered by oil exploration operations?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to answer directly to this question. According to the terms and conditions of permits delivered to the companies involved, the latter must abide by the department's written conditions.

As to sending a government's representative in the field, we are in the process of reviewing the regulations on drilling in the North and we might take into consideration the hon. member's suggestion.

Normally, regulations should force companies to act and the latter should be responsible enough to abide by them.

AIR CANADA

CANCELLATION OF CHARTER FLIGHT CONTRACT WITH UNITOURS (CANADA) LIMITED

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of a report that Air Canada has cancelled a contract it had made with Unitours (Canada) Limited for 15 chartered flights to Cuba, the first of which was to have left tomorrow, can the minister say whether this action was taken by Air Canada on its own initiative or whether any government pressure was applied?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I can assure the hon. member that it certainly was not taken on my initiative. As far as I am aware there were no discussions with anyone in government, but I should like to reserve final comment until I have had an opportunity to check.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ESKASONI RESERVE—ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR HOUSING

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that all moneys available for new housing and repairs at the Eskasoni Indian reservation are depleted, and since some of the people on this reserve are crowded, nine or ten, in run-down, three-room shacks, would the minister do his utmost to allocate further funds immediately at least to pay for emergency repairs? I apologize for not having given the minister notice of this question, but I hope he will give the matter serious consideration.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that I will inquire immediately to find out if there is an emergency situation in Eskasoni and, if necessary, we will take the necessary measures to remedy it.

LONG GRASS PEOPLE—ACTION TO PREVENT WINTER HARDSHIP

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer a question which was asked me yesterday by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River about the Long Grass people who live on the shores of Lake Williston.

We know that the situation there is quite serious. We have offered to evacuate the Indians involved since the flood occurred, and while we have had four meetings with them, they refuse to leave because they are happy to live in the present conditions.

This year and last year, sums of money were allocated to the construction of houses elsewhere, but the Indians stated that they were still not ready to live in them and that they would advise us when they would be ready to do so. As we do not want to force a bureaucratic decision on the Indians, we await their answer.

[English]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether he would be prepared to refer this subject matter to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development so it could make a thorough inquiry into the attitude of the native Indian people who want to remain in their homes? If the minister is prepared to do so we would commit ourselves not to take up the time of the House by debating the matter.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I would have no personal objection to that suggestion because I have been informed that the Indians have been consulted four times so far. I have asked my people to be there before the end of the month. It would be a good idea to have both sides studied by a committee of the House and I have no personal objection to this.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will appreciate that we are quickly reaching the end of the question period. I think we should limit the number of supplementary questions. Perhaps we should hear briefly from the hon. member for Skeena and the hon. member for Peace River and then go on immediately to a new subject.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, just briefly I want to ask the minister whether he might be prepared to do this tomorrow. I am sure he would get unanimous consent to waive the 48 hours notice if he desired to do so.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): In approving that, Mr. Speaker, might I also ask the minister, who is sitting with the chairman of the committee, whether or not the committee might look at the question of ecological damage to the Peace-Athabasca delta and also the situation posed by the report of the special task force which looked into the situation surrounding the Mackenzie delta?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Both questions are suggestions for consideration by the minister.

FISHERIES

SUGGESTED CLOSING OF EAST COAST PORTS TO FOREIGN FLEETS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Has he received and is he entertaining a request to close east coast Canadian ports to foreign fishing fleets?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I have received several suggestions to that effect but we are not going to act on them in any way whatsoever.

POST OFFICE

RESTORATION OF MAIL DELIVERY SIX DAYS A WEEK

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the minister responsible for the Post Office. Now that he has had the opportunity to discover and look at the slippage that has occurred in the service rendered to the Canadian people by the Post Office, is the minister considering the restoration of the six day a week delivery of mail?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Not for the moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hales: When the minister is considering this matter, if he cannot see his way clear to giving six day a week delivery would he consider at least a six day a week wicket service in all Post Offices?

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—PROTECTION AGAINST LAND SPECULATION

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the arguments used regarding the choice of the Montreal airport site at Ste.-Scholastique and the fact that we were protected against speculation, has the minister given any consideration to the special protection which may be necessary if the location of the new airport near Toronto is reviewed with the Ontario cabinet? I understand three sites will be discussed and there may be some opportunity for land speculation.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have said repeatedly that, first of all, the government wants to have maximum consultation regarding the sites relating to the new airport in the Toronto region, but that the limitation on that consultation and the extent of it involves the issue of whether or not adequate protection against land speculation can be achieved. With a view to determining that question I propose to meet later this week with the Premier of Ontario with the idea of perhaps working out appropriate mechanism through which we can protect against land speculation and then move on to the second point, public participation in discussion.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. Cafik: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I was not rising to ask a question as I usually do, but I appreciate your recognition anyway.

PROVISION OF RAPID TRANSIT GROUND FACILITIES

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, my question is a supplementary directed to the Minister of Transport. In light of the recent statement of the former Minister of Transport, now the President of the Canadian Transport Commission, that the greatest difficulty with air travel today involves ground transportation for passengers to and from the airports, is the government now prepared to take an active interest in and support rapid transit facilities in our major cities?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is not just now prepared to do that; the government has been in close consultation with many major cities and I can think of three, namely, Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg. There has been a considerable amount of discussion on this subject for some time.

Mr. Horner: I have another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which deals with the situation in Vancouver. Has the British Columbia government contacted the Minister of Transport asking whether this government will contribute 37½ per cent of the cost of constructing a rapid transit system to and from Vancouver airport?

Mr. Jamieson: That was not exactly the nature of the representations, Mr. Speaker. They did not involve the airport but rather a request for federal participation in a general form of rapid transit within the Vancouver area. This is being examined but no reply has been made as yet.

Mr. Horner: I have a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period has just about expired, in fact it is actually three o'clock now. Perhaps I should allow the hon. member for Fraser Valley West to ask a supplementary question and then we will call orders of the day. I apologize to hon. members who have not had an opportunity to ask their questions.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the discussions on this question, could the minister advise the House why in his consideration of rapid transit systems to and from airports in major cities there has been no provision for rapid transit facilities in respect of the new bridge to serve Vancouver airport?

Mr. Jamieson: For the simple reason, Mr. Speaker, that a number of authorities on the matter, excluding the authority of hon. gentleman opposite, do not believe this is the best way to proceed on this question. That is why a full and detailed study is being undertaken.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps hon. members will allow the Chair to recognize the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington. He has been trying to ask a question for a few days.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ASSISTANCE FOR WINTER WORKS IN RURAL MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. During the coming winter months will the government provide assistance to certain types of winter works in rural municipalities where high unemployment conditions exist?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my impression that this question has been asked on a number of occasions during the last few days. Orders of the day.

Mr. Woolliams: Before you call orders of the day, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might rise on a point of order. In view of the fact that the Minister of Justice has seen all the proposed amendments to Bill C-181, would he advise the House whether he intends to agree to any of them? If he does not intend to do so, it seems to me we are taking a lot of time on something that is just not going to be successful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the minister to reply but it seems to me that we are jumping ahead. This is a question which might be asked when we go into Committee of the Whole. However, the minister might be allowed to reply briefly to the member's point of order.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the debate has been very useful. I should not like to trespass on the time of the House by declaring my position before we get to the individual clauses.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT, 1970

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY POWERS FOR PRESERVATION OF PUBLIC ORDER

The House resumed from Monday, November 16, consideration in committee of Bill C-181, to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada—Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton)—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. May I have order in the committee please? If hon. members wish to hold discussions, I wonder if they would move outside so that we may proceed. When the committee rose last evening clause 8 of the bill had been agreed to. The committee is now considering clause 9.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

On clause 9—Arrest without warrant.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, without taking very much of the time of the committee, I wish to move an amendment to clause 9(1)(a) and a similar amendment to clause 9(1)(c) of Bill C-181. I could do this separately or place both amendments in your hands, Mr. Chairman, and you could put them before the committee as you see fit. I move:

That clause 9(1)(a) of Bill C-181 be amended by deleting the word "reason" in line 3 on page 6 thereof and substituting therefor the words "reasonable and probable grounds."

I also move a similar amendment to clause 9(1)(c) as follows:

That clause 9(1)(c) of Bill C-181 be amended by deleting the word "reason" in line 8 on page 6 thereof and substituting therefore the words "reasonable and probable grounds."

The Chairman: Order. The amendments presented by the hon. member for York South deal with clause 9 and, in particular, two subclauses thereof. Unless there should be representation to the contrary, it would seem to the Chair that we might deal with these amendments together.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I do not require much time in which to support the amendments I have respectfully moved. I am sure the minister is perhaps even better aware of the difference I am seeking to introduce. I say that whatever may have been the situation on October 16, at this stage the police ought not to have the power to go around arresting people on mere suspicion, without reasonable and probable grounds for that suspicion. I merely draw the attention of the minister and of the committee to a simple fact that everyone knows. If my arithmetic is correct, something like 85 per cent of the persons arrested under the regulation under the War Measures Act were released without charge and less than 10 per cent have been charged to date, unless there is later information. In addition, some others are still being kept in custody.

I suggest that at this stage of the game there is no excuse for varying the usual provisions of our criminal law. You will note, Mr. Chairman, that I am not suggesting the provision that the officer may arrest without warrant be changed. It is precisely because he may arrest without warrant that I believe it is important for the law to contain the kind of language with which a peace officer is acquainted, and which will make him look much more carefully at the situation before he goes around putting people in jail, even for seven days. A person ought not be put in jail without charge unless the police officer has probable and reasonable grounds for suspecting that such a person is a member of the unlawful association or that he has committed, is committing or is about to commit an act described in the earlier clauses of the bill. I do not think this restriction would interfere with his police work.

What this really does in practical terms is put the peace officer on guard. He will know that if he goes around arresting someone without reasonable and probable grounds, that person may go into court at some later date and charge the policeman or police organization, whatever it may be, with false arrest and seek a remedy against such false arrest. I submit that at this stage of the situation in the province of Quebec this added protection for people who might be arrested ought to be in the bill.

In conclusion, I want to say I do not think this would reduce the peace officer's power in any reasonable way. He would still be able to arrest without warrant, but instead of being able to arrest on a subjective conclusion of his own that he has reason to suspect, he would have to have an objective reason for it. He would have to analyse the situation and have some prima facie evidence that would lead him and that would lead a court or any reasonable tribunal to conclude that the arrest was made on probable and reasonable grounds. That is the only distinction. I suggest it is a very important distinction in order to avoid the situation we have had, where 440 or so people were arrested and 390 of them released without being charged. This means that 85 per cent or 90 per cent of these people, or at least most of them, obviously were arrested without probable or reasonable grounds for the suspicion the police officer had. This has been done within recent weeks, particularly during the critical situation that was said to exist on October 16. The committee knows my view concerning what the situation really was, but the critical situation was said to exist on October 16. It is important that from now on the police forces in Quebec, acting under this law whenever it comes into effect, have probable and reasonable grounds for arresting someone under suspicion for the acts dealt with in clause 9 of the bill.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief. When the minister replies I wonder whether he would also give us the up-to-date figures on arrests and releases. I believe a daily box score is kept on these activities now. May I also say that on the face of the argument of the hon. member for York South I do not think I can support his amendment. If the minister does not put his foot in his mouth, I think I shall stick to that position. However, I will be interested in hearing the minister's views on the argument advanced.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member has set for me an impossible task. I will try my best to avoid doing that. First of all, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants asked for the recent figures. I have them as of ten o'clock this morning for the benefit of the committee. The number arrested is 450. The number released is 397. The number detained is 53. One was re-arrested, 43 were charged and one was sentenced.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Francois Mercier was sentenced, as I understand.

Mr. Lewis: He pleaded guilty, if I remember correctly.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The amendment proposed by the hon. member for York South would change subclause 3 as follows, if I seize the purport of his amendment. It would read: "a peace officer may arrest without warrant a person who he has reasonable and probable grounds to suspect is a member of the unlawful association". I want to say to him that the words we chose, namely the words "reason to suspect" were deliberately chosen. As I pointed out in my speech on second reading, particularly as recorded at page 883 of Hansard, clause 9 is a special measure which the government recognizes does not exist in the ordinary criminal law.

We are dealing with specific short term legislation to meet a specific purpose, namely to attempt to immobilize and render inefficient the FLQ. The requirement "to have reason to suspect" is less stringent than that contained in the Criminal Code which requires the existence of reasonable and probable grounds to believe that an indictable offence has been committed. I refer hon. members to section 435(a) of the Criminal Code. The amendment does not remove the word "suspect" in clause 9(1)(a), and I assume this was done deliberately. However, by doing it deliberately, the hon. member leaves us with a hybrid concept, neither "reason to suspect" nor "reasonable and probable grounds to believe", but "reasonable and probable grounds to suspect", I believe this would confuse the case law even more than it may be confused already as to what the words "reasonable and probable grounds" may mean.

In any event, the amendment is obviously designed to make the condition precedent to lawful arrest more stringent, and in the present circumstances the government does not favour that. We are of the view that the requirement "reason to suspect" is both necessary and reasonable in the circumstances. It is the equivalent of the requirement prescribed in the statutes, principally with regard to matters of national security. I refer to the Official Secrets Act. Section 10 of the act provides:

> Every person who is found committing an offence under this Act, or who is reasonably suspected of having committed, or having attempted to commit, or being about to commit, such an offence, may be arrested without a warrant and detained by any constable or police officer.

I want to submit to the committee that hon. members should not be under any apprehension that the words "reason to suspect" means that a person can be arrested without grounds. In order to satisfy the requirement in clause 9 (1) (a) as it is now written, there must be a bona fide reason to suspect that a person is a member of the illegal or unlawful association. In the absence of any bona fide reason to suspect, the provision would not apply. In other words, because of the nature of the conspiracy, because of the difficulty of obtaining evidence, because of the clandestine nature of the conspiracy, we feel that the standard imposed on a peace officer to arrest should be lowered as it is under the Official Secrets Act from "reasonable and probable grounds to believe" to "reason to suspect". For this reason, we prefer to use the concept of reason and suspect rather than the hybrid concept which the hon. member has used which is halfway between "reasonable and probable grounds to believe" and "reason to suspect".

I really do not know what the hon. member's words would achieve. In effect, if the clause were amended as he suggests the provision would be more stringent upon the police than it is in the bill, but we believe that in the circumstances we need those words.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, the main purpose I am trying to achieve—and I had hoped the minister might look upon it a little more reasonably than he seems to do—is to remove from the police the temptation to wholesale arrest, as has happened since October 16. I do not see how any Member of Parliament or how the Minister of Justice can look with equanimity at a situation where 450 people are arrested, all of them held in jail and 397 of them released without charge after being in jail for six days, 10 days, 12 days or 21 days. I do not understand how anyone in Canada can look with equanimity at a situation where 90 per cent of the persons arrested are released without charge after being kept in jail, sometimes incommunicado.

I submit that all I am trying to achieve is to let the police know that they must have reasonable and probable grounds even for suspicion, even if it is something less than belief. To say that they must have reasonable and probable grounds for believing would be too much in the present instance, and on that I agree with the minister. However, their suspicion must be based on some reasonable ground. I am not a police officer nor am I an intelligence officer so I cannot tell you what the grounds might be, but as a layman I can see a situation where an officer may have interviewed the 450 people who have been arrested—it may be 460 before the bill becomes law—and as a result of his conversations he has reasonable ground to believe that X or Y was or is a member of the FLQ. This would be reasonable or probable ground for that suspicion. I want to prevent the continuation of the situation which I think is scandalous and unforgivable. It is a kind of excessive zeal on the part of the police which a democratic society should not tolerate.

Perhaps there is an indication of incompetence when 450 people are arrested, with all the consequences that flow from arrest, not only being kept in jail incommunicado but being under the cloud of having been arrested in connection with the FLQ and then released. As I said the other day, I have met some of them. They told me they cannot explain to their children why they were in jail. To my knowledge, two of them lost their jobs. Arrest has consequences; it is not a picnic, it is not a tea party, and when 400 out of 450 people are arrested apparently without grounds because they were released without charge, then I think the situation is very serious. The purpose of my amendment is not so much to affect the end result in the court—one can never foretell that—but to achieve a desirable influence on the police so that they would be less likely to go around picking up anyone about whom they may have a suspicion.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

I say to the minister that I am quite ready to suggest to him that I drop the adjective "probable" and leave the words "reasonable grounds". In my submission, the difference between saying that the fellow has reason to suspect and saying he has reasonable grounds to suspect is quite obvious. In the one case it is a subjective reaction. I have reason to suspect, so I make an arrest. In the other case it is an objective test that there has to be a ground for his suspicion that can be looked at objectively by anyone, including a tribunal. The reason for the amendment is to stop the wholesale, scandalous, excessive, incompetent type of arrest which obviously has taken place since October 16.

I repeat that I, as one Canadian, as one member of this parliament, simply cannot tolerate the arrest of 450 people, 400 of whom are released after some days in jail without any charge against them. These people have to carry all the consequences of having been arrested, having been associated with the FLQ when obviously they were not or they would have been charged. They have had to undergo the shame, the humiliation, the inconvenience and the discomfiture of having been jailbirds for six, eight, ten or 21 days without any charge, and without any grounds for their arrest.

If you had the qualification which I suggest should be placed in the bill, then the police officers would be a great deal more careful. They would follow not quite the procedure they follow in ordinary crime because they don't have to believe that a person may be guilty, they have only to suspect he may be, but they would be put on guard that they must have reasonable or probable grounds for that suspicion or else face the possibility later of being dragged into court on a civil suit for damages for false arrest.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I think the hon. member for York South has focussed on the prime objection to clause 9(1)(a). I find the explanation given by the minister to be extremely weak and without the kind of justification that should have been forthcoming for what he has described as a most stringent form of clause in terms of the requirements for arrest.

The minister has suggested, not only on this clause but on various other clauses, that what we are dealing with is a special situation, a particular event of a highly unusual nature, and that the bill is obviously of short-term duration. Because of these two arguments which he has put up again and again, we are supposed to believe that we should not be concerned that the legislation seeks to confer extraordinary powers. It is my understanding of the operation of a bill that once it becomes law, whether it is in effect for one day, one month, one year or 100 years, it carries with it the same kind of application. To say the least, it was a fallacious argument for the minister to suggest that because this is short-term legislation that excuses the kind of excesses, in terms of power, that it provides in clause after clause. I find that argument totally without substance.

The minister says that in order to effect the apprehension of those in the FLQ who are committed to terrorist activities we need this kind of legislation, even though he still fails to define the exact nature of the illegal organization. As long as that is the case I think he is only arguing for the other side, that we should not willy-nilly grant this kind of police power under statute.

The hon. member for York South has proposed an amendment which would bring this clause more in harmony with the present wording of the Criminal Code. He has suggested that we need such vague phrasing as "probable reason to suspect" because that in effect will open the door wide enough to arrest almost anyone. Certainly, that will be the case under the present wording of the clause. But he has pointed out that a large percentage, he might have said 80 per cent or 90 per cent, of those already arrested have been released and presumably most of these, if not all of them, will not be charged. Therefore, they are not guilty of any offence either under the regulations in connection with the War Measures Act, or under subsequent legislation.

I am still waiting for a substantial explanation for the wording "reason to suspect." I would say that "reason to suspect" means absolutely nothing. It is in no way indicative of any kind of objective information or facts that are normally required for due process of apprehension and arrest. It is completely left to the subjective opinion and feelings of the individual police officer.

I would argue that "reason to suspect" means nothing more than how the individual police officer may feel when he comes up to any specific individual. If he gets up in the morning after a poor night, tired and irritable, and he runs into somebody he does not like, under this phrase "reason to suspect" he can place that person under arrest. That is the sum total of what "reason to suspect" means. It has nothing to do with the facts that need to be available for proper arrest. The reason may be good, bad or indifferent. The clause just stipulates "reason to suspect." If the minister is seriously interested in the cause of justice, he will move immediately to accept the amendment.

The minister tells us that we are dealing with a special situation and with short-term legislation. We, in turn, also know that we are dealing with a very serious situation in the province of Quebec which has raised fundamental questions about the effectiveness of the whole police organization. Hon. members and people throughout the country have been wondering about the inefficiency of the police, and about the adequacy of their judgment. How in the name of all that is just and right could the minister be arguing for these kinds of broad, subjective powers to be placed in the hands of a police organization, which, on a number of counts during the past few weeks, has proved itself woefully short of good judgment?

This is completely contradictory. If this bill is to have any esteem at all from the people of the country, and particularly from those in the province of Quebec, then this "reason to suspect" provision must be changed. If we leave it in the bill, it will do the cause of justice a great disservice and could lead to a great amount of injustice. I ask the minister to accept the wording of the amendment, or similar wording. Only then can we avoid the ambiguity and vagueness that are so dangerous in clause 9(1)(a).

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that if we were to ask the minister if abuses had occurred under the similar provision in the War Measures Act, he would agree that they had, based on the figures he has quoted of 397 persons out of 450 being released, and those 450 having been arrested on suspicion.

I am not going to repeat the persuasive arguments of the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Egmont, but I would ask the minister to study what the hon. member for York South has said with regard to "reasonable and probable grounds." The minister said that the hon. member for York South is really producing a hybrid between "reasonable grounds to suspect" and "reason to suspect," and he argued that the definition of "reason to suspect" really means bona fide reason, otherwise the arrest would be unlawful. I am sure that "bona fide reason to suspect" would satisfy the mover of the amendment, and also the hon. member for Egmont, and would give some direction to officers who are about to make arrests. I am sure the minister would agree that there have been abuses of the powers of arrest exercised under the War Measures Act. He should either agree to the wording of the hon. member for York South of "reasonable ground to suspect" or, to use the minister's own wording, "a bona fide reason to suspect". I should like to hear the minister's comments.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, "reason to suspect" includes "bona fide reason to suspect". The words bona fide are assumed and would not add anything.

There are two standards imposed by our statutes at the moment upon the police. One is "reasonable and probable grounds to believe" in the standard provisions of the Criminal Code; the other standard is the reason to suspect in the Official Secrets Act. We have chosen the latter. I do not want to confuse the law by imposing another standard which would have to be interpreted by the courts if there were charges of false arrest.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter which I should like to raise in this connection. In earlier remarks, the minister indicated that because of the difficulty in defining "unlawful association" he had to allow sufficient latitude. I suggest that the minister has, in fact, placed the argument on exactly the opposite side. The fact that the wording on which an arrest may be based is so vague makes the danger of abuse that much greater. Surely, if a peace officer were about to make an arrest he would not be utilizing the Criminal Code which provides for "reasonable and probable grounds to believe", when he would have the kind of open door the minister has provided in this clause of the bill. In fact, by bringing this clause forward he is encouraging the kind of abuse that may well be made under this bill.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: The question is on the amendment. Hon. members will recall that there were amendments to clause 9 (1)(a) and subclause (c) which the committee agreed to deal with together. If the committee is ready for the question, the question is on the amendments.

Amendments (Mr. Lewis) negatived: yeas 11, nays 66.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Shall clause 9 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Lewis: On division.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Matane. Is the hon. member for Moose Jaw rising on a point of order?

Mr. Skoberg: No, Mr. Chairman, just a question on clause 9 before it is carried.

The Chairman: I shall see the hon. member later. I have recognized the hon. member for Matane.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few comments on subclause (2) of clause 9 which reads in part as follows:

—a person arrested under subsection (1)—

If we abide by the present wording, it would mean that, in fact, peace officers would be encouraged to arrest people without warrant.

I think it would have been better to write:

"Subject to subsection (3), a person arrested on one of the grounds mentioned in subsection (1)", because by using the expression "arrested under subsection (1)", that is "arrested under suspicion", peace officers would be encouraged to arrest people without warrant.

As for me, I would like to bring in two amendments: the first to the effect that the peace officer—

[English]

The Chairman: Order. I interrupt the hon. member to suggest that he might submit his first amendment, and the committee could deal with it. I understand the second amendment deals with an unrelated part of the section so that might be dealt with at a later time.

Mr. De Bané: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My first amendment is to add at line 2 after the words "may arrest without warrant" the words—

—after having as far as possible obtained the authorization from the Attorney General or from any of his substitutes, by telephone or otherwise.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

By that amendment, I would like the agent of the policer officer—

The Chairman: Order. In order to conform with the Standing Orders, I think the Chair should put the amendment before the hon. member speaks to it. I shall ask the Clerk to read the amendment.

[Translation]

And the Clerk Assistant (Legal) having read the following amendment:

Mr. De Bané moved to add at line 2, after the word "warrant" the following words:

—after having as far as possible obtained the authorization from the Attorney General or from any of his substitutes, by telephone or otherwise.

Mr. De Bané: The experience we have been through since October 16, Mr. Chairman, goes to show that police officers have often arrested people without having any grounds whatsoever for doing it.

I spoke of the amendment I am introducing to some officials of the Department of Justice. They say that it would be quite possible and "feasible", if I may say so, for the peace officer, in most cases—this is why I used the wording "as far as possible"—to call the district Crown attorney in order to ask for his authorization. I think that this will be necessary, due to some abuses which have taken place since October 16.

Once again, I do not see how my amendment might in the least hinder the work of the police. On the contrary, its sole object is to reduce as much as possible flagrant errors in judgment.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I think that the words sought to be added by the hon. member, in the circumstances of the additional powers that the bill seeks to give respecting apprehension and investigation, would paralyze the effort of the police to attempt to immobilize or apprehend members of the FLQ. In the circumstances it would be impossible for a police officer, in the time in which he would have to operate before making the arrest, to get the specific authorization from the Attorney General. If that were possible, obviously we would have insisted in the first place that they have a warrant specifying the person to be arrested and the charge to be laid. It is because we are contemplating arrest without warrant that we say "without warrant". The circumstances are similar to those found in sections 434-436 of the Criminal Code.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay the business of the House, but I call the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) to the fact that the amendment which I propose contains the words "as far as possible". Besides, under this clause, in actual practice anyone could be arrested. For instance, the police could arrest someone anywhere, and if other persons are present, nothing will be easier than to telephone from that place to the Crown attorney and tell him who else is there. I spoke about this problem with provincial government officials who told me that this authorization can be granted on the telephone, and that it is not mandatory in every case, because, as the minister said, obviously this would not be possible in some cases. For this reason, I used the expression "as far as possible". This is the reason for my amendment.

• (3:40 p.m.)

[English]

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. De Bané) negatived: Yeas, 1, nays, 58.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, I would like to propose another amendment in order to add a subclause which would become No. 4 and would read as follows:

[English]

No employer shall, without penalty, dismiss or suspend an employee merely because of that employee's arrest under this bill.

The Chairman: Order, please. I shall ask the clerk assistant to read the amendment.

[Translation]

And the Clerk Assistant (Legal) having read the following amendment:

Mr. De Bané moved that the following subclause (4) be added to clause 9:

No employer shall, without penalty, dismiss or suspend an employee merely because of that employee's arrest and release without charge under this act.

He said: The amendment I propose is a corollary of the right of peace officers to arrest merely on the strength of suspicion. Hundreds of persons have already been arrested, several of whom were unable to return to their jobs because, according to their employers, the fact that they had been arrested and then released was reason enough to fire them. It seems that, especially because the police have in fact the right to arrest any individual and that, unavoidably, innocents are arrested and then released, considering our experience since October 16, we should pass a special clause forbidding an employer to fire an employee merely because the latter has been arrested.

I feel that this will not effectively prevent abuses which might result under clause 9(1) of the bill, but at least, it will make it so that persons already arrested, and whose arrest is per se a denial of justice, will not have to pay once more their alleged debt to society, when they are not guilty of anything.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move that the following subclause be added to clause 9.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I submit to the committee that it should reject the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Matane. If there is unwarranted arrest, there is still the right to sue for false arrest; but, in attempting to do what the hon. member is trying to do, we would be interfering, in my opinion, with the civil law of contract, which is a provincial matter.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question. What is the status of those who have been arrested and subsequently released?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I do not have that information.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I rise without hesitation to support the amendment, subject to a suggestion which I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Matane. I do not have his amendment before me, but, as I remember it, the motion speaks about a person——who has been arrested under this act. But it does not say whether the person had been released without charge or put in jail for that reason.

Therefore, I would ask the hon. member for Matane to agree that the following words be added to his amendment:

—and release without charge—

—so that the amendment would read as follows:

—merely because of that employee's arrest and release without charge under this act.

[English]

Mr. De Bané: Certainly.

Mr. Lewis: If the hon. member accepts that suggestion and it becomes part of the amendment, I should like to say one or two words in support of it. I appreciate the point the Minister of Justice made, that the relationship between an employer and his employee is basically a provincial matter and comes under the umbrella of contract of employment involving the employer and employee. None the less, there is no reason why we cannot, as part of the penal statute, prohibit the employer from dismissing an employee merely because he has been arrested under this law and later released without being charged. This is why I wanted those words added. I am not prepared to say that, with a person who has been charged and perhaps convicted, the employer should be under any obligation. But persons who are arrested and later released without being charged ought to have their jobs protected by this law.

The minister refused to accept my suggestion or even my amended suggestion that would have reduced the likelihood—although nothing is certain—of the kind of wholesale, excessive arrests which have already taken place. If he is going to give the police the powers, which he now seeks to give them, to continue in the excessive and inefficient way in which they have arrested people to date, most of whom have been released, then surely there is a moral as well as a social obligation on him and on this Parliament to make sure that people who are arrested by the police without grounds and later released do not have their livelihoods jeopardized. I strongly support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Matane, with the addition of the words I have suggested. Perhaps he can tell me whether he is satisfied with the words, et relâché sans accusation. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether I should move this as a subamendment or whether you will accept the words from the mover of the amendment as part of his amendment.

The Chairman: I understand that the hon. member for Matane will accept the addition of the words suggested by the hon. member for York South. Perhaps the best way to regularize the proceedings would be to ask the committee if it consents to having the motion of the hon. member for Matane amended by the addition of the words suggested by the hon. member for York South. Is there such agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: This being agreed, I shall ask the hon. member for York South to give to the Chair his words in writing. In order to conform with the Standing Order, the suggested words should be added to the amendment in that way.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, may I say a few words. The amendment I am suggesting was inspired in its drafting by our Quebec civil procedure and by section 650 in the chapter relating to the specific rules as to the seizure of salaries and wages. Clause 650 reads:

No employer shall, on pain of all damages, dismiss or suspend an employee merely because his salary or wages have been seized by garnishment.

The amendment is inspired by the law which already exists. As a result of the action taken on October 16, people were arrested and later released. Some of these people were fired by their employers because of these arrests, even though they were detained for only one or two days. There should be a safeguard for those innocent people who are held only on suspicion.

Mr. Broadbent: I wish to make a few comments. It has been acknowledged by members of all parties that this is an extraordinary piece of legislation. To understate the case by about 1,000 per cent, it is much more likely that innocent people will be arrested under this act. The amendment introduced by the hon. member for Matane seems to be the minimal kind of assistance that the state should introduce to protect innocent people. Instances have been reported in the press and in this House of people who have been arrested under the War Measures Act and released because of their innocence, who have lost their jobs. This is a very civilized proposal, one which this House should accjept.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I have a copy of the transcript of an interview with the Prime Minister on "Format 60" of November 3, 1970. The interviewer at that time asked the Prime Minister:

But surely the concern of the legislator faced with drafting laws such as this, those making exceptions, is to guard against the possible arrest of too many people who have nothing whatsoever to do with the terrorism, for example.

The Prime Minister replied:

Exactly. That is our concern.

The minister must realize that he is adding a penalty to those people who may be employed by an employer who, although he realizes the person was arrested for undue cause, will probably dismiss him. There have been many such cases in this country. Even those who have served short terms and paid their debt to society are being penalized twice. Of 450 people arrested, 397 have been released. These people are faced with the situation where they may have to pay double penalties. They may lose their jobs and, therefore, their salaries. Surely, the minister realizes the situation that exists.

I am amazed at the minister saying this is a provincial matter. This bill is being debated in the federal House. The minister, in fact, is again taking the provincial authorities off the hook by imposing laws to which employees will be subjected. I strenuously object to dealing in this House with laws and the regulations that will be implemented by the provincial authorities. If that is the situation with which we are faced, we should have nothing to do with it.

Employees who are arrested without justifiable cause will be penalized by being held without recourse to any type of representation and, upon release, losing their employment. What kind of society is this? I urge the minister to grant the small concession in this amendment.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, the member proposes a remedy for those people who have been arrested, detained and subsequently released and who have lost their employment. If we accept the explanation by the minister that there is a jurisdictional problem in that it the remedy may lie exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces, then I feel that in so far as federal industries are concerned the provision could be effective. There is a way around this which I ask the minister to consider.

If it were made an offence under the Code, punishable by summary conviction, for employers to discharge any person who had been arrested, charged, detained and subsequently released, that would come within federal jurisdiction. I have often said that in my view the minister is a fair-minded, reasonable person. This is an opportunity for him to again exercise this reasonableness that he has exercised on many other occasions.

If it were made an offence, punishable on summary conviction, for any employer to discharge a person who had been arrested, detained and subsequently released, then those people would have some remedy, some measure of protection. This would apply to 397 of the 450 arrested. I am sure the minister does not want to throw these people to the winds by failing to recognize that they should be given some protection. The minister might say they have protection under the Civil Code and can bring an action against the police for damages. The minister knows better than I the difficulties involved.

The member for Sault Ste. Marie and the minister's parliamentary secretary are sitting beside him. They know the difficulties involved in suing the police. It involves time, money and effort and it is difficult to obtain a result. This is an opportunity to make it an offence for an employer to take this approach to people who have been arrested, detained and subsequently released without charge. I am sure the two wise men sitting beside the minister will agree that the minister should exercise his good judgment, wisdom, reasonableness and compassion for people who have suffered thus far.

The Chairman: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: The question is on the amendment. I will ask the Clerk to read the amendment as amended, because hon. members will recall that by agreement there were words added to the original proposal. Before I put the question, I will ask the Clerk to read the amendment.

And the Clerk Assistant (Legal) having read the following amendment:

Mr. De Bané moved that the following subclause (4) be added to clause 9:

No employer shall, without penalty, dismiss or suspend an employee merely because of that employee's arrest and release without charge under this act.

• (4:00 p.m.)

[English]

Amendment (Mr. De Bané) negatived: yeas, 11; nays, 51.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 9 carry?

Mr. Skoberg: A brief question to the minister, because I think this is the most dastardly piece of legislation we could look at at any time. Would he care to spell out his interpretation of the words "has reason" as they appear in 9(1)(a) and elsewhere in the bill?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I have no dictionary before me, but "has reason" means "has justification" or "has cause".

Mr. Skoberg: That answer is typical of what we can expect, I suppose. Really, the intent of my question has been passed over. This is something we must know, as it is something fundamental. It is not enough to look up a dictionary and read what "has reason" means. How will the words "has reason" be defined in practice? Will they cover any situation where a police officer finds something that is not to his liking? I am not looking, now, for a legalistic interpretation but for a practical answer to a question which I believe the people of Canada have a right to expect will be answered.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10 agreed to.

On clause 11—Seizure

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, I wish to explain why I am proposing an amendment to clause 11, which authorizes, in exceptional cases, a search without warrant and the seizure by a peace officer of such objects as may be deemed useful. There is no provision then compelling the peace officer to turn over the seized objects to the court and to conform to the other provisions of the Criminal Code, such as drawing up a report, bringing back the seized objects to the court, obtaining the authorization to hold certain objects. On the other hand, there is also no provision establishing the necessary machinery to allow the person whose objects have been seized to have access to them, as provided in the Criminal Code. I suggest, therefore, that a new subclause (2) be added to clause 11 which would read as follows:

From the time of seizure, other provisions of the Criminal Code related to property seized during a search remain fully applicable.

Mr. Chairman, I move this amendment because, under that clause as it now reads—

[English]

The Chairman: I will ask the Clerk to read the amendment.

[Translation]

And the Clerk Assistant (Legal) having read the following amendment:

Mr. De Bané moved that a subclause be added to clause 11, to read as follows:

From the time of seizure, other provisions of the Criminal Code related to property seized during a search remain fully applicable.

He said: Mr. Chairman, I see no reason why, in cases of seizure of property, the provisions of the Criminal Code, particularly those of Section 432, determining the disposal of things seized, should not apply here, since we should bear in mind that the provisions of the Criminal Code are relevant and deemed adequate in all possible and conceivable cases.

I therefore feel they should be specified, to the extent that they apply to a situation.

Thus, would not the person whose property had been seized be given a copy of a statement listing items belonging to him? Therefore, if the Criminal Code provides that in any kind of offence, if articles are seized, certain formalities must be observed, and that the provisions to this effect are judged relevant, I believe that it would be advisable to add this subclause to clause 11 to specify that any provision of the Criminal Code, not inconsistent with clause 11, continues to apply.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): In accordance with the ordinary provisions of the Code, once the order to seize has been vacated, either on the expiry of the period of 90 days or of the extra period granted by the judge, the goods will be returnable to the person from whom they were seized. I ask the committee to reject the amendment.

Mr. McCleave: What would be the procedure within the 90 days? Suppose a man was released but his car was still held on police premises. Would the police automatically release the car?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): If the person was released prior to the expiry of 90 days, the evidence related to the charge would no longer be required and an application could be made to a judge for the release of the property.

Mr. Lewis: With respect to the Minister of Justice, I invite the hon. member for Calgary North and others to look at section 11 and tell me under what authority a person can apply to a judge before the expiry of the 90 days and ask for his property to be returned. The section provides that property may be seized without warrant and detained for not more than 90 days, but there is no suggestion the owner can do anything about it before that period expires. I do not want to get into a legal argument at this point, but it seems to me that when a clause provides authority for a judge to extend the period but does not say he has any authority to reduce the period, the likely judicial decision would be that there was no authority to reduce, otherwise Parliament would say so. I wonder why the minister does not take a few minutes to specify, for example, that before the expiry of 90 days, where a district magistrate or a judge is satified having regard to all the circumstances, upon an application for the release of the goods seized, he may so order. The section would give the court the right either to say the goods were not longer needed and should be released, or to decide they were needed for a longer period and authorize them to be kept.

I do not see any reason why the minister should not make that simple correction so there is no argument in court as to whether or not the court has the authority to do so. I remind the minister of the old Latin phrase inclusio unius exclusio alterius—if you include one you exclude the other. I suggest to him there would be a very strong legal argument that since the clause includes the right of the court to extend the period but says nothing about reducing the period, the likelihood is that at least some judges would say they had not the authority. I think you should give them the authority in specific language.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, this clause is drawn along the lines of Section 432 of the Code which also provides for additional detention but not for earlier release, yet applications are made under that section for earlier release.

[Mr. De Bané.]

The Chairman: Is the Committee ready for the question? The question is on the amendment. All those in favour of the amendment will please rise. All those opposed to the amendment will please rise.

Amendment (Mr. De Bané) negatived: Yeas, 11; nays, 49.

Clause agreed to.

On Clause 12—Bill of Rights

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I wish to move that Bill C-181 be amended by inserting therein the following new Clause 12 and that the remaining clauses be renumbered accordingly. I think a copy of this was put on the table some time ago; if not, I may have an extra copy. I think the minister has a copy of it.

The Chairman: The table does have a copy of the hon. member's amendment to Clause 12. Does the hon. member for York South wish the Chair to put the amendment at this point?

Mr. Lewis: Yes. Would you like me to read it or would you like to read it.

The Chairman: Yes. It is moved by Mr. Lewis:

That Bill C-181 be amended by inserting therein the following new clause 12 and that the remaining clauses be renumbered accordingly:

12(a) Immediately upon the coming into force of this Act, the Minister of Justice shall appoint a supervisory Commission of three persons who shall not be employees of the federal or of any provincial governments or of any police force, and who shall have authority to interview persons arrested under this Act, to ensure that they are treated according to law, that they have had access to counsel, that they do not continue to be detained without adequate grounds and they have been given the opportunity to contact their families.

(b) The said Commission shall have the authority to make public its findings in any way and as frequently as it deems necessary.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, may I say first that I am not wedded to that particular language. If the minister were prepared to accept the idea, I and my colleagues would be prepared to have him produce something satisfactory.

The point of this amendment is sharpened by what has happened, to which reference has been made a number of times. We have to look at the facts since October 16 as far as we know them, and the facts relevant to this amendment are the following: First, some 450 people have been arrested but some 397 of them were released as of ten o'clock this morning, I think the minister said; second, for some days many of them—perhaps all of them—were kept incommunicado without being given access to counsel. This is now public knowledge. I am not saying this happened in every case because I do not know, but I am not saying this happened in every case because I do not know, but I am saying that it probably happened in every case and that it certainly happened in most cases. These people who were arrested were kept incommunicado for many days without being given the opportunity to see and retain counsel, without being given the opportunity to see their wives or members of their families, or indeed to communicate with them in any way whatsoever in the first week or so.

Later, after the first six or seven days, in some cases that have come to my attention, those in jail were given the right to write a note to their wives. In the cases that have come to my attention the people involved were wives. They were given the opportunity to write a note to their wives, and a policeman or guard at the jail, then read the note over the telephone to the incarcerated person's wife. They were not allowed, in the cases that have come to my attention and this is not guesswork as I have spoken with 10 or 12 of these people, some of whom were in my office, to have their textbooks. Students, one of them from Carleton University and the other from the University of Ottawa, were not allowed to have their textbooks during the time they were incarcerated, although they pleaded for them because they wanted to continue their work. In one case that has come to my attention a wife brought some clothing for her husband who was arrested and he got the clothing after he left the jail. He was in jail eight days and had no change of underwear or shirt or any other piece of clothing and was released without charge but was interviewed for only ten minutes during those eight days. I cannot tell you how many times this kind of thing occurred, but the fact is these things have happened since October 16, and as sure as you and I are here they will happen again if things are left as they are.

It was interesting to read the report of the Civil Liberties Association of Montreal. It was a report prepared by Mr. Hébert and his committee of three who not only complained about the conditions under which people were being kept under arrest but also cynically pointed out that for some reason they were given a date to visit jails at a time when most of the people who were in jail had already been released. This is the kind of thing he found and reported to the press. I have read the reports and could quote them if I wanted to take the time or if anyone here has not read them. I listened to Mr. Hébert at one time on the television, both in English and in French, when he gave a description of what he found.

The minister is going to say again, I have no doubt, as he has said throughout, this is an extraordinary piece of legislation to deal with an extraordinary set of circumstances and to break up an extraordinary terrorist organization. If he is right in all of these things, and I know he is right in at least some of them, then I think the situation requires extraordinary remedies and extraordinary safeguards.

If he refuses, as he has done before, to accept efforts to lessen the arbitrariness and repressiveness of the bill which is before us, then he ought to agree to this suggestion of appointing a supervising commission of three independent people who will make sure that those who are arrested on mere suspicion and kept in jail up to seven days, instead of the longer period under the regulation, are treated according to law and according to a sense of decency and of justice which even our worst criminals get in normal times.

I therefore say to him that precisely because this is extraordinary legislation, and precisely because it is legislation that abridges very seriously a good many normal liberties and rights, this kind of supervisory body should be established. In an amendment which I have seen which the official opposition intends to move an administrator is suggested, although personally I prefer the notion of a commission of three rather than one person. Such a body should be established to provide a safeguard against abuse, against over-zealousness, against arbitrariness and against incompetence. Such a provision should be put into the law because since October 16 we have had experience with all these things, arbitrariness, abuse and incompetence. There is only one way to make sure that will not happen again; that is, by establishing through this piece of extraordinary legislation a special kind of supervisory commission to make sure that those persons arrested are treated properly.

The reason for subclause (b) in the amendment is that I want to be sure, as I assume the minister himself would want to be sure, the new commission would operate under conditions which would ensure that its findings become public so that the people of Canada would know exactly what was happening, since the only final sanction against abuse of the type I have described is the anger and annoyance of the people of Canada or the people of the province of Quebec as the case may be. I do not intend to say anything more now, Mr. Chairman. The evidence of what has happened in the last few weeks makes clear that such a provision is necessary and that such a supervisory commission is desirable. Unless the minister can show very good cause why this provision should not be incorporated in the bill I invite him to accept it. If he does not like my language, but accepts the idea, then we can see his language or the language of his officers because I do not suppose it would be his.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I have to say to the committee I reject this suggestion most strenuously. I do so for a number of reasons.

Mr. Peters: I am glad to see you are consistent.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The first reason is that it would clearly be tantamount under the present circumstances to a deliberate vote of want of confidence in the Attorney General and government of the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes; that is exactly what it would be.

Mr. Orlikow: You want to give him a blank cheque.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Under the administration of justice pursuant to the Criminal Code, and under the administration of the current regulations as proclaimed under the War Measures Act and under the scope of this bill, the enforcement of those regulations and this bill, as is the case in respect of the enforcement of the administration of justice under the criminal law, is left with the attorney general of the province, in this case of Quebec, who is responsible to the legislature of the province and through the legislature to the people of Quebec.

The Attorney General of the province of Quebec is responsible to the people of Quebec in the same way the 74 members of Parliament elected to this House of Commons also are responsible to the people of Quebec. We are dealing with a federal state and, because the geographical location and the seditious threat relates primarily to Quebec and its relationship to Canada, the primary responsibility for the administration of this bill will lie in this case with the provincial Attorney General. That is clear. The hon. member is suggesting that we superimpose on the Attorney General of Quebec a supervisory commission of three persons, not appointed by the Attorney General of Quebec but appointed by the Attorney General of Canada or the Minister of Justice of Canada, who shall not be employees of the federal or of any provincial government or of any police force, which would have supervision over the administration of justice which by law and under the practice of responsible government is incumbent upon the Attorney General of Quebec.

To whom would this supervisory commission be responsible? It does not have to report to anybody. It has to make its findings public but does not report to anyone. It cannot be held to account. The Attorney General of Quebec can be held to account. If in the view of the people of Quebec or Canada the administration of the regulations or the bill have been improper, he could and would be held accountable.

Mr. Woolliams: Do not talk nonsense.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Wait. What powers would be given to this commission? By the terms of this amendment there would be the power to ensure that any people who were arrested under this act were treated according to law. That is a judicial function. That would be giving to this commission the power to supervise what is normally left to the Attorney General or the courts. Next, it would ensure that persons arrested would have access to counsel. That is already provided for in clause 12. Then, there would be a provision that these people be not detained without adequate grounds. That is a judicial function, too. Is this commission to be given this supervisory power over the Attorney General and the courts?

Finally, there would be the provision that those arrested by given the opportunity to contact their families. If the right to counsel is inherent in the bill, which it is, then the right to communicate is related to that because the right to contact a lawyer usually involves the right, through the lawyer, to contact the family. But, better than this, the Attorney General of Quebec has already appointed a committee which is to concern itself with the administration of the emergency legislation. The membership of this committee is as follows. The chairman is Jacques Hébert, president of the League of the Rights of Man and also a Montreal publisher. The members are Roland Parenteau, an economist, and Jacques Tellier, a priest. The terms of reference are spelled out in this way in French—I am translating:

The Minister recognized its existence, provided its actions were within the frame of reference:

1. Communications between prisoner and family.

That is provided for.

2. Care of families—financial and otherwise.

That is provided for.

3. To see that person arrested does not suffer, e.g. lose jobs, etc.

(But are not to work in area of ombudsman).

4. Anything unusual to be communicated to ombudsman.

5. Report to Minister or ombudsman anything not correct.

The Attorney General of the province of Quebec in the exercise of his lawful authority, the authority for which he bears responsibility to the people of Quebec, has already appointed this type of committee.

If what the hon. member is seeking is an accountability process, the accountability is there under the law to the legislature and to the people of Quebec. The Attorney General of Quebec, or of any province, or the Attorney General of Canada is a good deal more accountable under the fundamental principles of responsible government than would be any supervisory commission appointed under the terms of reference suggested by the hon. member. For these reasons, and because we live in a federal state, I am constrained to reject, as I said, very strenuously this suggestion.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have asked the minister several times whether he is prepared to accept our amendment to clause 15 of the bill. That amendment would be similar to what we have before us now. I had hoped the minister would have said something about that because he had had a copy of it for days. However, I think we might come to the conclusion now that no matter what kind of amendment we move to this bill this government, through the Minister of Justice, will refuse it. My good friend beside me says that he would not give even a choir of angels all this power without some protection. I said the other night, and it has not been denied, that the Prime Minister has done with this bill what he did with another bill that was before the House, the bill on capital punishment. He told the Minister of Justice that no matter what the opposition suggested he should oppose it and this bill should go through without any changes. So we can take it that there will be no changes.

Mr. Benjamin: Even by a government member.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, but there seems to be some hanky-panky going on in that corner. I am not too sure about that.

On the face of it, I would be prepared to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for York South or the amendment we will move in a few minutes. I think ours is superior. I believe any provision that sets up a body to review the abuses that are bound to take place under this bill, which gives extraordinary powers to the police, is good. I and other members of my party will vote for the amendment that was moved by the hon. member for York South, although I think in some respects ours is superior. I will deal with that when the time comes. It is obvious now—and I do not play games when I speak—that the Minister of Justice with his majority behind him will vote down the amendment of the hon. member for York South. There is no question that it is going out the window.

I want to answer the first argument of the minister. He said that the attorney general has already set up a special committee. He knows and we know that this committee has no power under the law. It may consist of a group of friends, associates or colleagues or even a group of good minded citizens, but if the attorney general and the police said "Tomorrow we do not want you around the jail, get out" that is what would happen. This is the weakest part of the minister's argument. It is a pretty good bluff for the news media but I, as a lawyer, do not swallow it. I am sure that neither the hon. member for York South nor his party will swallow it, either. There is no power under the law that permits the committee to protect people from the abuses that are bound to take place under the bill before us. That is the first point I am making. When I said "hogwash" when the minister was speaking, I meant it. It is straight hogwash.

The Minister of Justice knows how to sell. But let him not try to sell us something that has no merit. He is a tremendous salesman. That would be the first characteristic I would describe if I were writing his biography in the Parliamentary Guide. That kind of salesmanship, when we are dealing with possible abuses, does not go very far.

I am supporting the amendment of the hon. member for York South because we want some body created by law with some powers in view of the fact we are now setting aside the Bill of Rights and giving the police extraordinary powers. The minister keeps referring to the attorney general, but he is actually giving to the police the right to detain people without counsel and to hold them for a period of time. We tried to reduce the period of time from 90 days to 30 days and we put forward other amendments with regard to this. These prisoners can be denied counsel and many of them are held incommunicado. We heard the hon. member for York South describe the conditions. I have raised questions at times regarding the right under the Criminal Code, and even under our immigration laws, to detain people for 80 days or 90 days without charges being laid.

I have much respect for the RCMP, and I have said that before, but I still say that the police are not angels. They are normal human beings and we know what human behaviour is. You are arming policemen with special powers, and of course the attorney general could not possibly personally review 500 or 600 cases. That would be an impossibility. What we are asking is that a committee be set up, or an administrator appointed, with special powers to review the abuses that might take place. An accused, after a reasonable length of time, can make an application to obtain counsel and have his case reviewed. Surely, that is reasonable.

The Minister of Justice has tried to assume the image of a reformer. He has tried to reform the Criminal Code through a bill called the omnibus bill, and I have questioned whether it brought about many reforms. He has tried to reform the law on bail. He spoke with great affection about reforms to the law to the Canadian Bar Association when they met in the Chateau Laurier Hotel. After the meeting all the lawyers went home and said the minister is a great reformer. They said, we at last have a great new Minister of Justice in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: I am glad to hear this applause. You are rejoicing now but you will soon be crying because abuses will take place under this bill. I cannot believe for one moment that any lawyer on that side of the House—I will separate you people—who has had any experience at all, or any Member of Parliament who has some knowledge of civil rights, would not say that the opposition's suggestion to establish a review board or committee to review abuses under the act was a reasonable one.

I want to mention another argument which the minister has put forward every time we moved an amendment. He keeps saying "This is not our responsibility; we are handing it to the province of Quebec".

Mr. Fairweather: That is the very reason we need protection.

Mr. Woolliams: I agree. The minister says "we are handing this to the province of Quebec and they are going to take care of all the abuses". As I said last evening, as soon as this bill becomes law the minister will say "I cannot answer those questions. I do not know who is in jail. I do not know whether 50 per cent of the citizens of Quebec are in jail. That is for the attorney general of the province to worry about. If they are detained illegally without proper reason or purpose, that is not our concern, it is that of the attorney general of the province of Quebec".

I agree that at present both the government of Canada and the government of Quebec happen to be Liberal, but even that association does not give the minister or his government any reason to escape their responsibility. We have to take a few moments to analyze what is going on here. To start with, the government brought in the War Measures Act. We supported it because we were told, upon our request, that a bill would be put before the House. At least the government kept its promise in that regard and we have the special bill. That is why we are supporting it. However, if you take a look at the defence of Canada regulations, which were a part of the War Measures Act during the war and the regulations that were part of the War Measures Act when it was invoked on October 16, you will see that both are identical. When the federal government invoked the special regulations during wartime, it assumed its responsibility. Why is the government not assuming its responsibilities today? This is straight politics and it makes one wonder. I say that there has been a lot of politics played in implementing this measure. It makes one wonder whether there was anything in the trucks that left Quebec before the provincial election. This is straight politics.

I plead with the minister once more. We are coming to the end of this debate. Surely, in the name of reason, he will agree to set up a special body to review possible abuses under this bill and accept the amendment of the hon. member for York South. I am not inflexible over this nor I believe is any member on this side. However, I hope the minister will be prepared to rise in his place and say he thinks our amendment is superior. But what he wants to do is say, "We are not accepting anything. We are going to fight you to a standstill. We are going to create an all-powerful police state in the province of Quebec."

We have heard a lot about special status from those people for a long time, and even about two nations.

Mr. Clermont: That was your leader.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member says that was my party. I can readily pick out for him references in Hansard during the Pearson years which indicate that idea came from him. The hon. member happens to be chairman of the Finance Committee. He had better stay with that subject rather than deal with justice. What we have here is a special law for the province of Quebec, a special law to deal with a certain association. There may be other associations in Canada besides the FLQ which believe in violence. In fact I think there are, but the government has picked on Quebec. I am surprised that some of the members from Quebec have not shown their anxiety about this.

An hon. Member: They know the situation.

Mr. Woolliams: The government is saying to them, "We are going to give you this kind of arbitrary legislation and you must take it whether you like it or not. We can throw up our hands when it goes through because if things go wrong we can blame the province of Quebec when we are on the hustings."

Mr. Béchard: Nonsense.

Mr. Woolliams: Look at the bill—arrest without warrant, search without warrant, detention for such a length of time, and all this in unusual circumstances. Why, the door to the house of the Secretary of State was kicked in because his name happened to be the same as that of somebody else sought in connection with the FLQ. Yet, the government members say there is no abuse. If my house is in Westmount and there is somebody by the name of Woolliams who is suspected of being in the FLQ, is my door going to be kicked in? My hon. friend opposite shakes his head.

Surely, when there are abuses there should be somebody to review them. Members of the government say, "Oh well, we will trust the police." But if such a thing as this can happen to one of the ministers of the Crown, then what about the poor little average citizen? What is going to happen to him? That is why there should be a review body provided with power to review the observance of terms spelled out in the Bill of Rights and which exist in the common law of the country.

This bill can create a police state. I say with the proper respect, Mr. Chairman, and in its proper perspective, that when we hand a document like this to the government, together with the War Measures Act, we hand them the same kind of powers as were handed to Adolph Hitler. Of course it can be said that he was crazy, but these documents might fall into the hands of a few people who are crazy, too. All I am asking is that the citizen who is abused have some place where he can get a remedy. I plead with the minister, but it seems to me I am just wasting my time. It is like pleading before a prejudiced court, when you know the judges have made their decision in some club even before you arrive at the court house door.

Mr. Béchard: It's a pretty good speech.

Mr. Woolliams: I hope you take it to heart. I am sure the reason I am being interrupted is that I am getting at the consciences of good men like yourself. I have sat on committees with you, and I know you think well and think right.

Has the minister looked at our proposed amendment? We kept our speeches to a minimum on this bill so as not to delay its passage. The minister must agree with that. We did so knowing we would come to this type of amendment and, even with all the powers granted by the bill, if the amendment were adopted some protection might be given to the citizen. Now we have reached such an amendment, and the minister's answer is no. The minister said he was not going to decide on our amendment until we got to it. Mr. Chairman, he had decided before this debate started. He closed his mind. It was only open until the the Prime Minister told him, "No amendments."

Mr. Lewis: He might as well have had the bill adopted by the Liberal caucus.

Mr. Woolliams: I understand he makes better speeches in caucus than he does in Parliament. I know that from talking to some of the Liberal backbenchers.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I will not be long because it will not take me very long to say what I want to say. We have agreed in principle to these powers being granted. We went along with the very broader powers under the War Measures Act regulations. We are quite prepared to provide the authorities with the additional powers they may need to seek out these terrorists and to deal with them. But, Mr. Chairman, there is not the slightest excuse for the government refusing to establish some machinery of review, which would not interfere in any way with the effective searching out of these terrorists but which would at least provide individuals affected with some degree of review, and which would also eventually let the people of Quebec and the people of Canada know what took place.

The minister speaks of federalism. He speaks of the power being given under this bill to the attorney general of the province of Quebec. Mr. Chairman, I throw this in the minister's face. He is simply using a concept of federalism to slough off his responsibility. I do not want to be abusive. I realize the government has been under a lot of pressure and difficulty. These are difficult days, but I say to the minister in all sincerity that there is not the slightest excuse, and one cannot possibly justify powers of the sort granted under the War Measures Act regulations or the powers being granted in this bill, without providing some right of review. As to the mechanics of it, I have an open mind.

For the minister piloting this bill through the House, and for the government as a whole, to refuse to lift a hand, even to lift a finger to provide some protection to individuals who are effected—this I cannot understand. I do not want to be offensive or personal. I noticed a good many members opposite smiling when others were discussing this matter.

I realize perfectly well that the majority of the people of this country today are not really interested in the question that is raised in this amendment. I realize that the only thing the great majority of the people of the country are interested in is searching out the terrorists. But I say that is not the slightest excuse for members of this House not being interested in this question. It may very well be that this bill will be adopted without any provision for review, either along the lines indicated in the amendment sponsored by the hon. member for York South, or in the later amendment to be sponsored by the hon. member for Calgary North. However, I say this House would be derelict in its duty in creating the powers set forth in this clause without setting up a reasonable method of review. There is no way the Minister of Justice, or any member on the other side of the House, could possibly justify what they are proposing to do.

I wonder whether the Minister of Justice has communicated with his colleague, his partner in federalism, because federalism is a partnership as well as a good many other things, about the proposal for a review procedure suggested by my hon. friend from Calgary North and my hon. friend from York South. Have the propositions proposed in these amendments and their implications been discussed with the Minister of Justice of Quebec? I should like to have an answer to that question before I continue. If there have been discussions, what was the answer?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, very early in the administration of the regulations pursuant to the War Measures Act I discussed with the Attorney General of Quebec the proposition of appointing the type of committee that has been appointed under his jurisdiction and responsible to him, the ombudsman and the people of Quebec. That has been done.

Mr. Fairweather: Under no statute has it been done. We have to remember that we are debating in the context of a situation where it took a court order to get the fundamental right of counsel for people who were incarcerated under the War Measures Act; it took application to the courts and a decision by a judge. We have to discuss these review implications under the—I was going to say threat but I do not want to be abusive—alarming context of a speech made last Friday in the National Assembly by the Minister of Justice of Quebec. That speech was one of the most flagrant abuses of what I would have hoped was a cooling off period in a very grave situation, the worst I have seen since the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion tried to inflame us at an earlier stage.

It has been suggested seriously that citizens of one part of Canada be fingerprinted and made to carry identification cards. The Minister of Justice now suggests that this is clearly unconstitutional. It is in this mood that we are earnestly proposing—and as my colleague has said, with considerable flexibility as to which proposition is accepted—a simple procedure so that justice will be seen to be done. I suggest there is very good evidence that justice has not been seen to be done in connection with many of the arrests under the War Measures Act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: I do not think I have used inflamatory language here but I challenge, in fact I dare, the Minister of Justice to come here after the dinner hour with a review procedure authored by himself that would fit the joint amendments that we have proposed. He would see how quickly this Parliament would accept his proposals. That is a challenge and I should like to see it accepted.

Mr. Wahn: Mr. Chairman, I believe members on this side of the House are as interested as those on the other side in protecting the rights of individuals who may be detained under this extraordinary legislation.

Mr. Lewis: Show it.

Mr. Wahn: It is important that there should be a review group which has access to those who are detained. The only question is whether this review group should be established under federal legislation or by the provincial government which has the responsibility for the administration of justice under our constitution.

As I understand it, the provincial government of Quebec has already established a review group. That review group has functioned under the War Measures Act and has pretty well established its independence. In effect, the amendment proposed by the opposition indicates a lack of confidence in the administration of justice in the province of Quebec and a lack of confidence in the government which, under the constitution, has been given the responsibility for administering justice in that province. We do not share that view. We do have confidence in the administration of justice as carried out by officers in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Lewis: It made the War Measures Act necessary.

Mr. Wahn: As I understand it, we do not accept the amendment as proposed by the opposition.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Chairman, as pointed out by the hon. member for St. Paul's, members on this side of the House are as concerned, I am sure, as members on the other side. I, too, feel that there should be a review board but I cannot accept the amendment offered by the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: Rewrite it.

Mr. Murphy: I am going to suggest that if you give me a moment.

Mr. Fairweather: You want to clear it in caucus first.

Mr. Murphy: I cannot accept the proposition that any review board should have the power to determine whether the people arrested should be freed. In giving the board that power we would, in effect, be giving them the power of a court.

Mr. Fairweather: Exactly.

Mr. Murphy: I cannot accept your proposition that such a board should determine whether people detained or arrested should continue to be detained. This, too, suggests that the board should have the power of a court of law. My view of federalism is that the provincial governments cannot exercise the powers granted under this bill unless those powers have been granted specifically to them. Surely, if we have the authority to give them that power, we must also have the authority to put certain restraints on it.

Mr. Stanfield: The responsibility.

Mr. Murphy: I would be prepared to accept a review board which would have the power to interview persons arrested under the act to ensure that they have had access to counsel and have been given an opportunity to contact their families.

Mr. Fairweather: We are getting close to it.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question before he sits down? He sat down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. As the committee must now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, it is my duty to leave the chair.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Wahn.]

DEFERRAL OF TIME FOR FILING OPPOSITION MOTION—SUSPENSION OF PRIVATE MEMBERS' HOUR

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, there have been some consultations through the usual channels about the procedure for tomorrow and Thursday and it is likely that there will be an opposition motion by this party which will affect both days. While there is no wish to inhibit the course of this very serious and important debate, if it should appear later on this evening that the bill might be concluded with reasonable dispatch tomorrow, we would not want to take that opportunity away from the House. This is a prelude to my asking the leave of the House to suspend until ten o'clock this evening the right to file the usual notice under the appropriate Standing Order, for an opposition motion.

I have discussed this matter with other hon. members. I think it is quite well understood and that everyone will accept it.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to agree with the suggestion without having investigated all the implications that may flow from it. I hope there are none that have not been brought to my attention. There seems to be a disposition on the part of the members of the House to proceed with and complete the committee stage, perhaps even third reading, of Bill C-181.

Perhaps we could also request unanimous consent to defer private members hour today, so that we could proceed with this bill. Hopefully, we shall come to the point of knowing, with certainty, what is to happen tomorrow. We are prepared to designate both tomorrow and the next day as opposition days. If deferring by a few hours the time when the motion ought to be filed would be helpful in this situation, we would be glad to agree.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, at this point I rise merely to say that we are prepared to agree to the request of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) namely, that the members of the official opposition shall have until ten o'clock tonight to file their motion for the next two days. I refrain from commenting on the other point because, it seems to me, it is a matter for the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) to consider.

An hon. Member: A great Canadian.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I only want to say that we are prepared to agree to the suggestion of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), providing that we are acquainted early enough and in the usual manner with the contents of the motion he would like to bring before the House tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), who would have taken up the initial part of private members' hour with that distinction which has always marked his speeches in the House, has agreed. I think, if he had proceeded with his proposal regarding Sir John A. Macdonald Day, he would have shown that one of the characteristics of that distinguished Father of Confederation was that form of tolerance which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner, Ottawa-Carleton) has not displayed so far in this debate. After having made those preliminary remarks, I say we are prepared to consent.

Mr. Speaker: There seems to be consent and agreement for adopting the numerous proposals which have been made by the various members who have taken part in this debate. It is so ordered.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Before we return to committee of the whole, may I draw to the attention of hon. members that the following matters will be considered if and when there is an adjournment debate later today. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Pensions—Old age security—Action on increase before Christmas; the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson)—Broadcasting—Performance of North Battleford satellite television station; and the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski)—Grain—Production and receipts policy—Farm consolidation program.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS OF EMERGENCY POWERS FOR PRESERVATION OF PUBLIC ORDER

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-181, to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada—Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton)—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-181, to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada. Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, in asking parliament to adopt this bill the Minister of Justice, on behalf of the government, is asking the people of Canada to adopt the kinds of controls to which we have never agreed in peacetime in the history of Canada. Part and parcel of this bill is the right to search, the right to arrest without warrant and the right to hold people without permitting them to contact their families or counsel. We, in our party, have been criticized because we voted in support of this bill on second reading. We did so because we felt that this was a lesser evil than the War Measures Act and because we thought that the minister, in the light of his statements and expressions of the past couple of years which tended to show, as my colleague for Calgary North suggested, that the minister was a progressive sort of person, would accept reasonable amendments. Mr. Chairman, the longer this debate continues the more it becomes obvious that we were wrong in our judgment. By refusing to approve any and every amendment, the Minister of Justice is asking parliament to approve a bill which lays down the stringent conditions I have enumerated very briefly. And, not being satisfied with that, Mr. Chairman, the minister suggests that the federal government and Parliament should thereafter wash their hands of the bill and permit the attorney general of one province to administer it.

When the amendment proposing an independent review committee was brought in, the Minister of Justice tried to argue that the amendment was not necessary because the Attorney General of Quebec had already agreed to the establishment of a committee which, according to the Minister of Justice, had the powers which this amendment would give to such a committee. Actually, that committee has no power under the law. That committee can only do those things which the Attorney General of Quebec permits it to do. The Attorney General of Quebec can pay to it as much or as little attention as he chooses.

Mr. Woolliams: That is right.

Mr. Orlikow: I will not go into the record of the operations of the present government of Quebec under the provisions of the War Measures Act. I say to the Minister of Justice that if he is not disturbed about some of the proposals which have been made by the Attorney General of Quebec, he is possibly the only so-called Liberal in this country who is not disturbed.

Let us look at the speeches and statements which the Attorney General of Quebec has been making. He has proposed that every citizen of Quebec be required to carry an identity card. I presume that means photographing and fingerprinting and everything else that goes towards making up a real identity card. He has implied that the freedom of the press may need to be restricted. He has also implied that the fundamental and traditional freedoms which citizens of Canada have enjoyed ever since there has been a country may have to be restricted.

I for one, Mr. Chairman, am not prepared to vote for a bill which would give some other person, the Attorney General of Quebec, the right to restrict the rights of citizens in Quebec in the way in which the present Attorney General of Quebec has indicated. The Minister of Justice may have a very short memory; I suggest that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion ought to have better memories. This is not the first time the people of Canada and the people of Quebec have had to deal with attorneys general who thought that there were reasons—good reasons so far as they were concerned—for restricting the rights of the citizens of their province. I remind the members of the committee and the Minister of Justice that the former premier of Quebec, Mr. Duplessis, was also the attorney general of Quebec. Under his régime we had the padlock law in Quebec. Under his regime in Quebec the asbestos strike was smashed, with the use of police, in a bloody way. Under his regime we had the strike at the Gaspé copper mines in which the present Prime Minister was involved.

We have had varying experiences with the attorneys general of Quebec. I am only talking about Quebec because this bill will have effect, at present at least, only in Quebec. When Mr. Duplessis was carrying on as he did, when Mr. Duplessis was passing the padlock law, he had virtually the unanimous approval of the press and of the legislature of that province. As I say he enjoyed, virtually, the unanimous approval of the press and the approval, or at least their acquiescence through silence, of the Members of Parliament from Quebec. We, who are not in Quebec, are being told not to pay any attention to all these things. I wonder if the Prime Minister would change his views about the kind of regime they had in Quebec when Mr. Duplessis was premier? I wonder whether the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, who lived through the days when these things were taking place in the province of Quebec, has forgotten what Mr. Duplessis did? Have they asked themselves what Mr. Duplessis could have done in that province had there been the legislation that is being proposed today?

Mr. Béchard: That regime is gone.

Mr. Woolliams: What makes you think other human beings are better today?

Mr. Orlikow: We have the usual objections from the silent members from Quebec whose only purpose in Parliament is to stand up to vote when told how to vote. I will not be very long. I will then be happy to hear from the Parliamentary Secretary or the hon. member if they would like to defend Mr. Duplessis. The Parliamentary Secretary shakes his head. I say to him that the legislation being proposed today is foursquare with what Mr. Duplessis did during his time. Because I feel this way, I have no intention of voting for this bill.

The Minister of Justice will not accept any amendment which calls on the Attorney General of Quebec, or any other province which may have to use this legislation, to keep in mind the democratic rights of their citizens. The Minister of Justice has shed the liberal views which he expressed so often with regard to bail and the right to counsel. I do not agree with terrorists and separatism, but people have a right to say what they think. They do not have the right to kidnap people, kill them or plant bombs, but in this country they have the right to say what they think. This bill will help certain groups in Quebec which do not believe that people have this right and want to put the clamps on them. I do not support that feeling.

I wish to record some thoughts of a man who is much more eloquent than I, although unfortunately he seems to have changed his views. I wish to read some views which he held before entering politics. I will quote from the November 14, 1970 issue of the Winnipeg Free Press. It contains a summary of a book which will be published shortly by the Oxford University Press. The name of the book is "Approaches to Politics". By whom was the book written? It was written by our Prime Minister, Pierre Elliott Trudeau. I am quoting for the benefit of the members from Quebec and the Liberal backbenchers who feel certain that what now is being done is right and necessary, namely abridging the freedoms of their people:

> Democracy recognizes that one person may be right and ninety-nine wrong; that is why freedom of speech is sacred. The one person must always have the right to proclaim his truth in the hope of persuading the ninety-nine to change their point of view—
> One can say that the power of government rests on a psychological disposition on most people's part that it is good to obey and bad to disobey. Why is this belief so universal? Partly because the majority seek only their own comfort and pleasure: When those ends are assured, they ask no more than to conform to a given social order and to obey political masters who work to maintain that order. Few men are aroused by injustice when they are sure of not being its victims themselves.

If that is not a classic illustration of what is going on in Quebec today, and how the government of Quebec is dealing with the situation, I have not heard of one. I wish to read another short paragraph:

> Citizens must take care to delegate to (the state) no more authority, no more force, than are strictly necessary to establish a just social order, protect that order from harm, and make sure it will progress.

I suggest that the government is not heeding these words of the Prime Minister because they are giving the government of Quebec a great deal more power than is necessary or wise.

[Translation]

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Chairman, I would merely point out to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat that when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) was speaking about federalism a few minutes ago, he also meant no doubt the respect of the rights and powers of the provincial ministers and premiers.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with the hon. member for St. Paul (Mr. Wahn) that even though the motion moved by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) seems to show a real concern for justice, nevertheless it is a sort of insult and reflects a desire to control the Quebec Minister of Justice, casting doubt as to his ability and authority to administer the legislation he is responsible for.

Despite the good intentions expressed a while ago by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), what is basically wrong with this motion is that the federal government is trying to say to a provincial government answerable to its electors: Gentlemen, we are going to control you, that is, subject you to the control of a group which, even though independent—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Laflamme: Perhaps my hon. friend does not agree with me but it is nonsense to say to a minister responsible for the administration of justice in a province: "We do not think that you have the legal capacity and the authority to act; there may be abuses in the discharge of powers which you are responsible for administering under the constitution and instead of you, who are responsible before the Quebec National Assembly and the voters, we would rather deal with a group of individuals, of public servants who are not responsible before the people".

This is the true meaning of the amendment and this is why, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that under the cover of these good intents, what is at stake is the lack of confidence in the capacity of the Quebec Minister of Justice to administer the laws of this country.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: I wish to comment briefly in response to the remarks of the hon. member. I think he has placed his finger on the defect in the argument that has been made from the other side, that we are giving to the Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec powers for which he does not have constitutional responsibility in the usual exercise of his duties. Parliament is being asked to give him extra judicial, extra curricular powers in lieu of a judge.

Under our system of jurisprudence and criminal law, it has always been the courts which decided whether, in the circumstances, bail should be granted. By giving the Quebec Minister of Justice the right to file a certificate, we are giving him the right to decide whether there is just cause for detaining a person in jail, over and above the usual causes. These powers far exceed those he inherited when he took office, and in these circumstances responsibility lies upon us to make sure there is accountability for the exercise of these powers. We recognize that certain individuals are invested with authority by the people of a province; there are those who exercise authority as members of a cabinet. This is a situation we accept. But we are now being asked to delegate extraordinary powers which do not normally fall within the ambit of any member of an elected government, powers usually exercised only by judges who are appointed for life and who have a special responsibility to sit in judgment upon their fellows.

When this authority is given to a minister, I think we can do nothing less than make provision for these elected officials to account for what they have done. Remember, the minister of justice of a province is a human being, subject to making a misuse of his powers, in the same way as the Minister of Justice, or myself, or anyone else. No human being can be excluded from the possibility that he will misuse extraordinary powers. Surely, it is not asking too much when we proposed that a commission or an administrator be set up to scrutinize the manner in which these extraordinary powers are exercised, nothing more and nothing less. If they feel we have gone too far, I ask the government to tell us how far they are prepared to go.

Mr. Alexander: I have not taken an active part in this debate, feeling that those on both sides of the Committee who have advanced arguments have done so admirably. We are not concerned at this moment with whether a person, be he the Minister of Justice for Quebec or the Minister of Justice for Canada, is to be trusted or not. We are concerned about human frailties, frailties which become more pronounced in times of stress. When we consider what we are being asked to do now in terms of conferring extra powers, I believe we must of necessity impose some kind of a safeguard, whether those suggested by the New Democratic Party or those which will be suggested on behalf of this party. I am not particularly interested in the mechanism; possibly something could be done on the basis of the principle which, I believe, has been accepted by the hon. member for St. Paul's and by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

It seems to me the lawyers among us are beginning to clear away some of the haze. What is happening is beginning to stir their consciences as members of the bar trained in the law with a duty to seek justice not only for those who are innocent but also for those who are guilty.

It is time for us to assess what we are being asked to do. We supported the invocation of the War Measures Act and its regulations on the understanding that legislation would be introduced to meet the particular circumstances. In so doing, we had expected the government would show a reasonable attitude toward proposals and ideas which would be advanced from this side of the chamber so as to produce legislation which would truly reflect the wishes of this grand body. It seems to me that what we have been witnessing has been an exercise in frustration. Surely the minister realizes that the extra powers we are asked to confer are of such a nature that abuse could arise because of human frailty, yet for some reason he is reluctant to move in this area of law reform, though it is precisely his interest in this field which I have admired in him as he goes across the country speaking. Apparently he is not prepared to accept safeguards, and I find this attitude wholly unrealistic, wholly inconsistent with what he is preaching in the land. I cannot understand it. I do not doubt that this legislation is needed. But in its present form it is loaded to an unprecedented degree in favour of peace officers, in favour of the Crown, in favour of the Attorney General and in favour of the Government of Canada.

It has been said that with the invocation of the War Measures Act, Canada will never be the same again. I hope we have not reached a point at which, in attempting to protect the innocent, we have not forgotten about their rights entirely. Someone has to be the conscience of the government if we are to be consistent with the new thinking of the Minister of Justice, if we are to be consistent with our democratic way of life, if we are to be true to our democratic institutions. It is all very well for the minister to say that his responsibility ends with the proclamation of this measure and that its administration can be left to someone else. Surely, this is not a realistic attitude. I trust he will take into account the views of those who have spoken earlier on this subject.

My good friend from Sault Ste. Marie is a lawyer of great capacity. He has made a marvelous contribution to the Justice Committee, as the Minister of Justice knows, and I was glad to see him stand up, because I know his conscience is beginning to bother him. I hope the minister will give serious consideration to this plea which comes not only from the opposition but from members of his own party who believe that some amendment of this measure is needed. I trust he will consider it with sympathy and understanding because, in my view, to ignore it would imply a grave lack of judgment; it would be a serious error.

As I said earlier, I am not particularly concerned about the form the amendment might take. Very often I do not like to think that the government is in possession of all the expertise, with the help of its advisors, but in this case the minister has all the facilities he needs at his disposal. Let the government come up with something it thinks is reasonable in terms of a review of the administration which will be acceptable. Let it come up with something that will show it is not only worried about those who are guilty but also about those who through abuse and the overzealousness of police officers may be affected although innocent.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I cannot do as good a job in outlining the tremendous dangers which will exist as a result of this bill as the hon. members for Peace River, Calgary North and York South. I do not want to repeat what they have said. I rise simply to reply very briefly to the hon. member for Montmorency. The hon. member implied that because I was critical of the Attorney General of Quebec, I somehow was doing him an injustice. I have not seen a newspaper in Canada which has not editorially been extremely critical of the proposals and suggestions the Attorney General of Quebec has been making.

I do not question the right of the Attorney General of Quebec to propose any legislation which comes within the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec. I do not question the right of the government of Quebec to pass that legislation because, after all, in our democratic society the people of Quebec at a future date will indicate, by their support or rejection of the government, what they think of the measures the Attorney General of Quebec brings forward in the way of legislation. I would not presume to question what the Attorney General of Quebec wants to do in Quebec when it is within his jurisdiction.

What we are being asked to do is pass legislation which has never before existed in Canada; legislation which restricts and limits the rights of the people of Canada or, at the moment, of those in the province of Quebec. The Attorney General and the police in Quebec will administer the law and look after the regulations. People laughed yesterday when we read that the police—I do not know whether it was the Montreal police, the Quebec provincial police or the RCMP—were asked to pick up a 21-year old man whose name happened to be Gerard Pelletier, and went to the house of the Secretary of State. I am not one of those who always criticizes the police but that to me indicates some lack of judgment, and that is putting it mildly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh!

Mr. Orlikow: If that happened to me I would be unhappy, to say the least. This is the kind of power we are being asked, through this legislation, to give the Attorney General and the police in the province of Quebec. If we are to live with our consciences in the future and not have the feeling that we have done something which will be detrimental to the people of Canada for years to come, the least we can do is provide for an independent committee or commission which will have the power to look after and protect the rights of citizens who are affected.

We are told this is a bad amendment because by adopting it we would write into a future statute a restriction on a provincial attorney general. Surely, since it is a federal statute we are being asked to vote upon and endorse, we have the right to do that. Surely it would not be too much to ask the Minister of Justice to say to the Attorney General of Quebec, "If you want this kind of legislation and if you need it, we are prepared to bring it in; but we think you ought to have this kind of committee." This would not be a committee set up by some kind of verbal or written order on the part of the minister, which he could revoke tomorrow, next year or whenever it suits him, or the moment the committee starts being critical of him. Surely the Minister of Justice should say to the Attorney General of Quebec, "If you want this legislation you must write into your statutes the provision that there will be an independent committee."

I do not think we would quarrel about the three people who might be appointed. Certainly we would not quarrel about the appointment of Mr. Hébert. I would be prepared to accept the view of the Attorney General of Quebec and the Minister of Justice that it was a good committee. But let us have written into the law of the province that wants to use this legislation which we as Members of Parliament are being asked to approve that there will be an independent committee. Then if people's rights are infringed, if they are held too long and are not permitted counsel, talk to their families or have books and newspapers to read, the committee will have the power to do something other than just plead with the Attorney General of the province.

We are told that this committee might take the place of the courts, but that is not true and the members who put forward that argument must know it is not true. We are concerned that this bill takes from the courts the traditional rights the courts have always had. A lawyer representing an accused who is being held can go to the courts, as they did in Montreal last week, with a writ of habeas corpus asking the judge to protect the rights of the person involved. After listening to argument on behalf of the Crown and the defence, the court can decide whether the person ought to be released on bail. We are not questioning the right of the courts to do that; we are saying that this bill sets down conditions under which the courts will not be able to fulfil the judicial function they have had since the beginning of this country. It is that kind of thing which I am not prepared to support. The hon. member for Montmorency may be prepared to support that kind of repressive legislation, but I am not.

Before I sit down I would urge the Parliamentary Secretary, who so noticeably disagreed with my comparison of this legislation with the kind of power a former Premier of Quebec, Mr. Duplessis, assumed and exercised, to get on his feet and tell me publicly how I am wrong and how this legislation differs from the kind of power Mr. Duplessis so effectively used so anti-democratically in years gone by.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, at the conclusion of my remarks I shall have a suggestion for the Minister of Justice regarding the point that is now being pursued. First I should say that I am one of those, and my colleagues pretty well joined with me, who agreed beforehand that when we entered this debate we would treat this as emergency legislation and emphasize that aspect of it. Up to now I suggest we have done so. Perhaps that is why the civil rights aspect of the matter has not been dealt with by the opposition as fully as would normally be the case. In that regard, when the long-range legislation comes before us to replace this legislation which will expire next April, there will be far different emphasis placed by the opposition on the things in this bill which will undoubtedly be carried over into that legislation.

I say that until now, we have treated this as a serious, emergency matter. The fact that a man I knew in Halifax, Mr. Cross, is still held somewhere in the province of Quebec by terrorists, and is held successfully despite tremendous police and armed forces searches, to me indicates we are dealing with a conspiracy that is not the fly-by-night work of amateurs but the work of experienced, skilled and resourceful persons. I have had that thought very much in mind throughout this whole debate, even though sometimes it is pretty hard to believe it is a serious matter when we do not see the galleries filled with people, or when the Prime Minister of this country is away from the House so much during what we are told is a period of tremendous national crisis. I can accept those things, however, because I knew Mr. Cross and I know he is still held somewhere against his will and is being used as a pawn in a very dangerous game in which all Canadians have a stake.

These are the questions which have prompted many of my colleagues and myself to become involved in this somewhat drawn-out debate. It has been drawn out much beyond the time we expected. Last Friday, for example, I believe the official opposition took up five or seven minutes to deal with points which we knew had not been dealt with already. We were not inclined to take up the time of the committee. But, sir, when we have a point we can dig in our heels as well as others. This heel-digging is on the matter of the awesome powers to be granted the Attorney General of the province of Quebec.

In effect, the government of Quebec has come to Ottawa and asked that we provide an extraordinary police force for use in that province. The whole tenor of this legislation is that the administration of law and order in the province of Quebec is to be beefed up by an almost superhuman pouring in of resources from all parts of Canada. We have been good enough to give the Attorney General and the Premier of Quebec those powers and those resources without quibbling. No one has said the army or that extra Royal Canadian Mounted Police should not be there. As a matter of fact, the reverse has been the case. I recall the leader of the New Democratic Party a few days ago asking whether the RCMP had been withdrawn. He was told they had not been withdrawn.

We do not mind the federal government or the provinces coming in to help the authorities in Quebec during a critical period. No one has quarrelled about this at all. But there must be limits. The Minister of Justice himself imposed one limit when he did not invoke the regulations of the War Measures Act for ever and a day and when he did not word this legislation in such a way that it would be in effect for ever and a day. There is an expiry date in this legislation. Therefore I must say to myself that somehow the authorities of the province of Quebec and the minister got together to discuss the type of regulations that should be passed, and the Minister of Justice told them he would put a time limit on the regulations. I think that is a fair inference to be drawn from what has gone on; otherwise why that time limit was imposed, would be incomprehensible to any sensible mind.

We are dealing with ideologies of a terrorist movement. This movement will not come to an end by the time this legislation expires next April. We will not be able to put the gravestone on it by next April. It will still be there; the problem will still remain, albeit in an altered form because of the steps we are taking now. In other words, I am saying that the minister has recognized there should be some limit on what was requested by the Bourassa government in Quebec and certain limits have been imposed. Not all the bite there could be has been put into this legislation or the predecessor regulations. There are still some restraining influences.

We have dealt with the difference between the word "reason" used in this bill and the words used in the Criminal Code. The word "reason" represents a restraining influence. Therefore, the Minister of Justice and the government have decided these powers should not be absolutely unfettered but that there should be limits on what the government of Quebec is able to do with this massive federal outpouring of help into the province at this critical time. It is as simple as that. There are some restraints on the powers. There is a restraint on the time this bill will be in force. That was a decision of the government. Why, then, can we not make suggestions concerning one further restraint which is not a very large one?

We suggest there should be power of review so that the methods of operation of police forces which kick in the door of the Secretary of State or arrest a person because he has the same name as another person could be examined. It is ironic that the two abuses which have been drawn to our attention involve identity. The Secretary of State apparently has the same name as someone who is wanted, and a person who was picked up in Hull has the same name as somebody else who is wanted. This would lead one to wonder how prepared the administration in Quebec was to deal with this problem.

The case for some provision in this respect has been made over and over again by hon. members. Even members on the other side have now joined us, such as the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, one of the adornments of the Justice Committee, and the hon. member for St. Paul's who I believe is close to being skeptical of the intransigence of the minister. There are others, because one would expect that within the ranks of large "L" Liberalism there would be some with small "l" liberal consciences.

Mr. Fairweather: They are well hidden.

Mr. McCleave: Perhaps they are; but because of these extreme measures the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie has started to burst the bonds and perhaps we will hear more from others. We are not asking for much; we are asking for some kind of hobble to be put on the otherwise wide open, loping gait of the Attorney General of the province of Quebec. We want him to come back to earth and run properly once in a while. We are suggesting that there should be a provision such as that contained in the amendment of the hon. member for York South, the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North, perhaps a compromise of the two or one that the minister himself could bring in. We have good and serious reason for asking for this.

We are surprised that the Minister of Justice, who normally is a most affable person and accepts amendments not only in the Justice Committee but in this House, will not accept this amendment. I do not know who in the cabinet committee has some power over him so that he can only say no; perhaps it is the Prime Minister. We hope he will unflex a little when we are bringing in perfectly reasoned amendments and putting forward a perfectly reasoned point of view.

Since the minister makes much of the fact that we must not question Mr. Choquette in Quebec city, why does he not call Mr. Choquette over the supper hour and say, "The House of Commons is debating the matter of the large police force we have sent you, the regular army and the extra RCMP, and some questions are being put. We cannot understand why the door of the Secretary of State should have been kicked down, how the guys remained in the clothes closet when young Lortie was picked up, and things like that. Perhaps you could suggest something". Perhaps the minister could put this on a friendly basis, because he is a friendly and amiable man, and have this man-to-man conversation.

We do not want him to call on Mr. Choquette humbly, and I do not think the latter would answer the Minister of Justice humbly, but perhaps the minister could suggest to him that we are faced with the problem that we do not want high, wide and handsome or hell-west and crooked powers given to the government of Quebec; that we are not inclined to do that, despite the mutterings of the hon. member for St. Boniface which I cannot quite hear. They would probably not educate me but I would like to know what is being said, if it is going on the record, because sometimes one does not hear remarks and these inane things get there anyway.

I suggest to the minister that he call Mr. Choquette and point out to him the honest dilemma in which we find ourselves. Perhaps Mr. Choquette will have an answer. Perhaps we can put a federal presence in the committee of three from the city of Montreal; but that in itself may not be a good solution. However, I suggest it might be a good idea to have a federally-appointed authority which would supervise. We provide the bodies so at least we should have some say as to how they are used. I make that suggestion perfectly seriously to the minister in the hope that his gentlemanly flexibility will come back to him and that he will be able to give us some comfort when we raise a serious issue of conscience at this important time.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, I want to make two points briefly. One is an elaboration of the argument put forward by the hon. member for Peace River. He pointed out correctly that the point made by the Minister of Justice about the criminal law being administered by the Attorney General of Quebec is politically inappropriate in this context, that we are creating in Ottawa an extraordinary set of laws which extend the powers of search, of arrest, of detention, and so on. This is a federal act that does not fit within the normal ambit of the Criminal Code. It is creating extraordinary powers for a given period of time. It seems to me that this argument justifies accepting the amendment before the committee.

The point I want to make is a political one. If we are seriously concerned about what may be called the civilized and democratic leadership in the province of Quebec, we as the federal Parliament have a very important obligation to create a body that would supervise the implementation of these extraordinary new powers being bestowed upon the Attorney General and the police forces of Quebec. I say this because it is what I call the civilized and democratic leading element in the province of Quebec that has been most vocal in its criticism of the federal government, and it is mainly this group of French Canadians in the province of Quebec that should concern us very much. It is they who are pointing the finger at Ottawa and saying, "There are your centralizers, your authoritarians. It is Ottawa that is taking away French Canadian freedoms in general". It seems to me that this political argument has to be faced very seriously.

If the federal government is to impose the kind of restrictions it is imposing upon the province of Quebec—restrictions with which, I should point out, I do not agree at all—we have an obligation as the federal Parliament to propose the establishment of a supervisory commission which will ensure the fair implementation of these new laws. That is one point with which I would like the Minister of Justice to deal. If this matter is entirely from people such as Claude Ryan, leaders of the CNTU, university professors and many other people who have a genuine commitment both to democracy and to the province of Quebec and who will be saying, "There they go again. The government in Ottawa letting us down in this important question of civil liberties".

The second point I want to make—and it is quite different—concerns the attitude of the Minister of Justice toward all our amendments. I heard earlier this afternoon on what I can reasonably call very good authority that when this bill was discussed in cabinet a decision was taken not to alter one semicolon: no amendment was to be accepted. I was told that the instruction given to the Minister of Justice was that nothing whatsoever was to be accepted in the way of amendment. If this is the attitude of the cabinet and of the Minister of Justice, we are doing two things that should not be done: we are using up valuable time in Parliament—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it being six o'clock I do now leave the chair. The committee will resume at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose at six o'clock it was dealing with clause 12 and an amendment thereto by the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, before the supper adjournment I was relating that I had heard from a good source that it had been decided in cabinet not to accept any amendment to this bill, even to the point of not changing a single comma or semicolon. I put it to the Minister of Justice that the attitude he has revealed during the serious discussion of amendments put forward from all sides of the House seems to confirm that story about the cabinet decision.

I would like him to reply to this suggestion because if it is true that before the bill was introduced it was decided that no changes would be acceptable, two conclusions can be drawn. The first conclusion is that this procedure would completely vitiate the whole purpose of the committee stage of a bill, which is supposed to provide an opportunity for amendments which would not change the basic intention of a proposal. Many amendments have already been presented which would not change the basic proposal of this bill and which were aimed at providing certain protective guarantees for innocent people, but the minister has either cavalierly dismissed them or resorted to the most arid kind of legalistic arguments in defence of his position.

What is particularly bad is that a bill of this nature should be so treated. It would be bad in general to operate on this basis during committee stage of a bill, but on committee stage of a bill which so transforms the state of civil liberties in Canada it is particularly reprehensible that such a rigid attitude should be taken by the minister and/or the cabinet toward the members of this House and therefore toward the people of Canada.

Before we spend the rest of this evening and conceivably all of tomorrow in debate, or in the event that we adjourn the debate until next week to continue it for another day or two, would the minister please tell us if we are wasting our time, because if we are we might stop this discussion. Let us get on with other business that should be before the House concerning problems facing the country. We should not be talking just for the sake of talking on amendments. I would like to hear what the minister has to say on this point.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, despite the sense of frustration expressed by my colleague, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, I dare to express the hope that the Minister of Justice is a reasonable man.

Mr. McCleave: He is unreformed, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Well, maybe my approach will not work, but I am still going to try it. I am still going to believe that the Minister of Justice is a reasonable man and that he will listen to the kind of appeal that is being made to him from this side of the House with respect to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York South. May I remind the minister and hon. members who are present that when the Prime Minister told the House on October 16 about the proclamation of the War Measures Act, he made this statement which is to be found at page 195 of Hansard for that date:

> To those who will voice concern at the extent of the powers assumed by the government under this procedure, I can only say that I sympathize with their attitude, and applaud them for speaking out.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, in speaking out about the powers given to the government we are only doing something that the Prime Minister himself applauds. He went on to say:

> I hasten to suggest, however, that the legislative record of this Parliament in the field of individual liberties contributes unequivocally to its credibility and good faith.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister gave as a justification for the resort that the government was making to the use of extreme powers the fact that this Parliament's record with regard to individual liberties is one that has established its credibility and good faith. What we are asking in this amendment to clause 12 is for Parliament to maintain that credibility and good faith.

In case the Minister of Justice is tempted to say to me that those words of the Prime Minister applied to the proclamation of the War Measures Act and to the regulations brought in thereunder, whereas we are now dealing with a bill to take the place of all that, may I remind him of what he said when he introduced Bill C-181 on November 4. I shall quote a few of his words from page 884 of Hansard. I am overlooking two or three pages before that. These are the words of the Minister of Justice on that occasion:

I say to Your Honour that those of us in the government did what we had to do with great reluctance. We did what we did because it had to be done. Some of the measures we have had to adopt in the short run and for a short term are philosophically abhorrent to us.

This is the Minister of Justice telling us that the things the government felt it had to adopt as set out in this bill are philosophically abhorrent to members of the government. He went on to say:

We intend as soon as we can to turn once more to the road of law reform and the continuing enhancement and protection of civil liberties.

Mr. Chairman, I urge as strongly as I can that no particular credit is due to any government or to any Parliament which asserts that it is protecting civil liberties when there is no storm, when there is no difficulty. What counts is what you do when the storm is on. Civil liberties that are protected when all goes well are just run-of-the-mill. It is a government or a Parliament that will protect civil liberties when there is fear and hysteria, when there is the argument of necessity and convenience, that has something of which it can boast.

I plead with the Minister of Justice to stand by the statement of the Prime Minister, that he counts on the legislative record of this Parliament in the field of individual liberties. I call on him to stand by his own words, that he wants to get back to the continuing enhancement and protection of civil liberties as soon as possible. It is no promise of any value and it is no guarantee at all to tell us that this will be done when all our troubles have melted away. If the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice meant those words, let them show it by their attitude toward this amendment.

I for one am not persuaded that we now need Bill C-181. I might concede to the government an argument on its side with respect to what it did on October 16. I did not agree with the course the government took, but I concede an argument on its side. However, I submit that the only argument that had any weight was the need for surprise, the need to do certain things right away. That necessity has disappeared and there is a strong argument today for doing away with the proclamation of the War Measures Act and for suspending this bill and not going any further with it.

If the government is not persuaded to do that, then I say the least it should do is stand by its own philosophical protestations. It should stand by its own statement of high principle as expressed by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice. It should see to it that in the administration of this legislation which is abhorrent and repugnant to the government there is a leaning over backwards to protect civil liberties.

What is asked in this amendment is that there be an independent commission with the rights, powers and obligations set out in the proposal made by the hon. member for York South. It is an attempt to keep alive the credibility and good faith of this Parliament that the Prime Minister talked about on October 16. If we do not do that, Mr. Chairman, then those words the Prime Minister used that morning were just hollow mockery. Here is our chance right now to demonstrate their credibility.

Like other members from this group and from the official opposition who have spoken, I am prepared to concede that the formula proposed by my colleague is not the only one. Maybe the formula proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North appeals more to the Minister of Justice, or maybe he himself has some other proposal. I urge very strongly, however, that we cannot bring in this kind of repugnant, abhorrent, repressive legislation, we cannot listen to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice say that they do not like it and applaud those of us who speak against it, that they want to get back to the maintenance of civil liberties, and then do nothing about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I hope the appeal made by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, others in the Conservative party as well as in this party to the Minister of Justice before five o'clock had some influence on him, and that during the course of this evening he will admit that the hon. member for York South is making a reasonable request. I hope there will be a reasonable response from this minister who I still want to believe is a reasonable man.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, as mover of the amendment I wish to take a few minutes to deal with the minister's argument. I for one resent the red herring that he dragged across the path and which the hon. member for Montmorency mentioned, namely, that this amendment is an expression of non-confidence in the government of the province of Quebec and in the Attorney General of that province. Mr. Chairman, I throw that back at the minister. If such a law applied to the New Democratic government of Manitoba and was to be administered by my friend the Attorney General of Manitoba, I would make precisely the same suggestion. It is of no consequence at all who the Attorney General is or what government is involved. It is of consequence that no human being is an angel. It is of consequence that none of us is free of the corruption of power and none of us is free of the abuse of power if we are put in certain positions. I do not care what government it is or what Attorney General it is—the same principle would apply.

The suggestion that we are insulting the government of Quebec in expressing non-confidence in Mr. Choquette is irrelevant, although let me add, Mr. Chairman—this has nothing to do with the amendment—that some of the suggestions that have come from the Attorney General of Quebec worry me very much as a Canadian. Some of the suggestions about identity cards and additional powers on a regular basis for the police of that province, some of the suggestions about censorship, and so on, which he is now making are very worrying to me. I remember Mr.

Maurice Duplessis and the Duplessis days. I hear uncomfortable echoes of the Duplessis-ism which the Prime Minister condemned 20 or 30 years ago. I hear uncomfortable echoes of Mr. Duplessis type of interference with civil liberty in some of the suggestions Mr. Choquette has made.

That is not the reason for this amendment, however. The reason for this amendment is that in my view and in the view of those who have spoken from this side of the House it is important to have this type of safeguard in the law. Like all members on this side of the House, I believe in federalism as much as does the Minister of Justice. I do not see how a country like Canada, large as it is, with regional interests and regional preoccupations, can be governed in any way but by an appropriate federal system. I accept that in any federal system the likelihood is that the day-to-day administration of justice would have to be in provincial hands: it is not practical to think that all police investigations across the country could be run from one centre like Ottawa, or that all the rules relevant to the courts in the provinces could be made in one centre. You cannot do that in a country like Canada, particularly when one of the provinces has a body of law that is different from that of the other provinces. That is accepted and no one is suggesting any interference with it.

It is a thoroughly bad and unacceptable principle to suggest that the Parliament which has the duty of passing a law has not the duty to make it the best law. That is what the principle is: we have the duty to pass a law; we have the duty to make it a good law. We must make it the best possible law. To suggest that we cannot do so because of some jurisdictional difficulty is to talk, in my opinion, utter irrelevancy. It is our duty in this Parliament to make this law as good as it is possible to make it. What does this mean in terms of this particular bill?

We have before us, as the government admits, as the Minister of Justice admits and as almost everyone admits, a bill that interferes seriously with the normal civil rights and liberties of Canadians. That is what this bill is about. This bill extends powers to police, extends powers to the Attorney General, enables arrests without warrant, enables search without warrant, enables detention without charge for seven days, enables the Attorney General to say, "This man shall not be let out on bail", and enables him to keep a person 90 days in jail before the authorities are forced to set a trial date. All these interferences with the normal rights and liberties of Canadians are what this bill is about, Mr. Chairman. It is a basic aberration of decent law.

An hon. Member: For five months.

Mr. Lewis: The hon. member for York Centre says, "For five months." One of my colleagues said it is all right to sin for five years but not for five months, or vice versa. That is not the point at all, Mr. Chairman. The point is that you do not need it for those five months. Nobody is suggesting that this amendment interferes with what the bill is trying to do. I say that it is an interference with the liberties and rights of Canadians. That being so, I suggest, as other hon. members have, that when we pass this kind of bill Parliament has the duty to adopt all possible safeguards to make sure that these extraordinary, undesirable, repugnant powers are not abused.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: And if we pass this bill without taking these safeguards, then all the talk about belief in liberty, all the books that the Prime Minister has written and all the speeches the Minister of Justice has made, are sheer, hollow hypocrisy. Therefore I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that it is important to have these safeguards. It is not a matter of wilfulness; it is a matter of absolute necessity to have safeguards that will avoid the abuses that I detailed before five o'clock this afternoon, and I could go on doing so for another half hour. We must avoid doing what has been done, because the abuses have been intense and painful in hundreds of cases—not in one, two, ten or twelve cases, but in hundreds of cases already in only six or seven weeks. Therefore, I just do not dare think of the kinds of abuses that could occur in the course of five months.

One obvious way to make sure that these abuses will not occur, that the extraordinary powers will be used as properly as possible, is to have some kind of supervision over the use of those powers. The Parliament that has the duty of passing this law has the duty of providing that kind of supervision. The reason I began my remarks when I moved the amendment this afternoon by saying that I have no pride of authorship and that I would be pleased if the minister would bring in his own wording was that, of course, there are various ways of approaching this matter. It is possible, for example, to say in the amendment that the Minister of Justice shall, with the consent of, in consultation or in co-operation with the Attorney General of the province affected, set up such a body to supervise the way in which these powers are exercised. It is entirely possible to do that.

It is also possible to say, for example, that this commission to be appointed by the Minister of Justice shall consist of citizens of Canada resident in the province affected. There are various ways in which it can be done and I invite the minister and members of the committee to suggest a way that will be satisfactory to all. It is possible to include the suggestion embodied in the amendment which I gather will be moved by the hon. member for Calgary North. He was good enough to send me a copy of it. It provides that an administrator—if I remember the amendment correctly, it is to be a judge—be appointed.

Mr. Woolliams: That is right.

Mr. Lewis: It is possible to include that provision. I do not care how it is done. None of my colleagues or, I believe, anyone on this side of the House cares particularly in which specific way it is done so long as it is done within this law. It is no use saying that the Attorney General of Quebec has appointed a committee of three. I have not taken the trouble to look through Hansard, but may I be permitted to say that for a number of days there have been questions asked in this House about such supervisory authority. There were questions for a couple of weeks to that effect. I think the Leader of the Opposition asked a question about it. I remember I asked a question about it. Requests were made by church bodies in this country, including church bodies in Quebec, that that be done. Nevertheless, it took the Attorney General of Quebec a few weeks to appoint this committee and they were the worst weeks from the point of view of abuses because many of the abuses occurred in the first week or two. By the time this committee was appointed things were a little less abnormal than they had been during the first two weeks.

I suggest it was not accidental that time was taken before this committee was appointed. It was not accidental that the Attorney General of Quebec wanted a couple of weeks to pass with the police having complete freedom to do as they pleased and to abuse the powers of the regulations made under the War Measures Act—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: —as in fact they did.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: The Attorney General of Quebec, Mr. Chairman, wanted to give them this freedom for a couple of weeks and only after two or three weeks had passed did he finally yield to the request of church bodies, the Civil Liberties Association and members of this Parliament. No doubt there were messages sent through the Minister of Justice to the Attorney General of Quebec, and only after that length of time and after those pressures had been applied did he appoint the committee.

That committee has no powers. If tomorrow he decides he does not want it any more, if Jacques Hébert says something Mr. Choquette does not like, there is nothing to prevent his saying, "Speak to me no more, Mr. Hébert. Your committee is hereby dissolved," and it would be so dissolved. Or he could say, "You can go to jail, No. 1; but you cannot go to jail, No. 2. Why? Because I say so." There is no legal authority for what that committee does. The authority is only that which Mr. Choquette gives to it. He who gives can take away in that kind of system and in this kind of situation.

What we require, if we are serious about supervising the exercise of these abnormal and repugnant powers, is a provision in the law for such supervision as I have mentioned, so that neither the Minister of Justice, the Attorneys General of Quebec, Manitoba or British Columbia, nor any man across this land can play footsie with such a committee and do as he pleases with it. He should not have the power to appoint or not appoint, to give terms of reference and change them on Monday, alter them on Tuesday and forget them on Wednesday. This is what happens when you do not have the legal basis for this kind of body—and a legal basis is what we need.

It is unfortunate—this is a fact of history—that most of us in a democracy take our civil liberties for granted. As my friend for Winnipeg North Centre said, when there are no storms and when everything is quiet, all of us accept these things and take them for granted. We do not realize their importance until we lose them. The unfortunate fact is that those people who do not lose their liberties are frequently not moved by the fact that others have lost them. I had that experience in the 1930s when I returned to Canada, having been a student in England. I travelled a great deal through fascist and nazi countries, Italy, Austria and Germany. I saw and studied what was happening in those countries.

I tried to describe the situation to audiences in this country in 1935, 1936 and 1937. It was extremely difficult to get the average, decent Canadian even to imagine the possibility that such horrors could in fact exist. This was because our liberties were untouched. Canadians simply read about these things in the newspapers. Canadians felt sympathy for those living across the ocean but were not vicariously touched. We were spectators. The same is true of Canadians today. Most Canadians are not affected by the hardships felt by 397 Canadians. The civil liberties of most Canadians have not been interfered with. However, 397 Canadians have had that experience without ground, reason or justice.

I have read a great many writings by social philosophers. It is my conviction that when you permit a few people in a society to be humiliated by taking away their civil liberties, everyone in the society suffers; a little is lost from every human being in a collectivity which permits degradation and humiliation of a human being in that society. That is the basis upon which our philosophy ought to be structured, Mr. Chairman. It is the framework within which we ought to consider this bill. If these powers are needed, let us make them as narrow as possible. We must take every precaution to ensure that they are not abused by the people who must exercise them. It is not the Minister of Justice or the Attorney General of Quebec who will apply these powers; it is the police forces. That is entirely different from the elected representatives in legislatures or in Parliament.

I listened to the Minister of Justice throughout the debate on all the amendments. I watched him as the discussions were going on. I have no doubt he is unhappy because he is not willing, able or allowed to make the kind of provision that would give some control over the exercise of these repugnant powers. If I do not make an appeal to him it is because I have watched him throughout this debate and I have reached the conclusion that I will get nowhere by making that kind of appeal. I get fed up begging to a stone wall and a stone heart.

If the minister, as the guardian of the liberties of Canada—which is what the federal Minister of Justice ought to be—is ready to do his duty, this is the kind of amendment he ought to accept because it does not in the slightest reduce the powers of the police. It does not interfere with the purpose of the bill; it merely sets up machinery for supervising the exercise of those powers. If the minister does not accept this amendment or the one which will be proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North, I will reach conclusions that it would not be polite to utter.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask a 14-word question: Did the minister speak to the Minister of Justice of Quebec since six o'clock?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Lewis) negatived: Yeas, 44; nays, 54.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause 12 agreed to.

Clause 13 agreed to.

On clause 14—Acts, etc., deemed done under Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, 1970.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I would like to present an amendment that will follow clause 14. So there will be no misunderstanding, I am presenting it in English and in French.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Who translated it into English for you?

The Chairman: The Chair will put the amendment at this time. It is moved by the hon. member for Calgary North:

That Bill C-181 be amended by inserting therein, next after clause 14, on page 9 thereof, the following:

"15. (1) The Governor in Council, as soon as possible after the coming into force of this act, shall appoint a person holding judicial office under Her Majesty in right of Canada, who shall be called the 'Administrator', and who shall inquire into and report to Parliament from time to time upon the administration of this act and of the Public Order Regulations, 1970.

(2) The Administrator shall have the powers of a commissioner appointed under the Inquiries Act and shall continue as Administrator for such period after the expiration of this act, whether by effluxion of time or by proclamation, as the case may be, as is necessary for the carrying out of his duties under this act.

(3) The Administrator shall have power to review and confirm, vary or revoke a certificate filed by an Attorney General of a province under subsection (1) of section 7 or an order made by an Attorney General under subsection (2) of section 9, or to make an order fixing a date for trial."

And renumber clause 15 accordingly.

Mr. Woolliams: As this amendment will follow clause 14 and could be numbered 14(b), could clause 14, which is just procedural as to when this act shall be implemented and for how long, be put before we discuss clause 15? It is just a matter of procedure.

• (8:40 p.m.)

The Chairman: I think the hon. member is correct. If the committee agrees, clause 14 would be carried, subject to the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 14 agreed to.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, this amendment is similar to the amendment moved by the hon. member for York South, but it is different in certain respects so I hope we can obtain some sympathy and support from the government. The proposal is that an additional clause be added to the bill as follows:

"The Governor in Council as soon as possible after the coming into force of this act shall appoint a person holding a judicial office under Her Majesty in right of Canada"—

That person could be a judge of the Superior Court, either of the trial division or of the Court of Appeal; he could come from the Province of Quebec, in which case he would be familiar with the situation in that province.

—"who shall be called the 'Administrator' and who shall inquire into and report to Parliament from time to time upon the administration of this act and of the Public Order Regulations, 1970."

The administrator would be a judicial person acting in a judicial capacity and he would have the right to review certain procedures which had been adopted. If there were many applications for his intervention he could appoint other judges, in effect setting up boards or panels to act under him. In this way any abuses in the administration of the legislation could be corrected.

Even in time of war when the security of the whole of Canada was at stake, provision was made for some kind of review system under the War Measures Act regulations, so I would be surprised if the minister could present any acceptable arguments to show that an amendment of the kind I propose ought not to be accepted at this time, even taking into account the situation which prevails in Quebec today. If this amendment were agreed to it would in no way affect the extraordinary powers which are conferred by the act itself. It would simply give those who have been detained without charge, as well as others who had been detained for a considerable period awaiting trial after being charged, the right to apply to a judge and have a time fixed for trial. Surely this is a reasonable request.

After looking over the bill we on this side realized we were being asked to give the government extraordinary powers. We realized that those powers were virtually the same as those conferred by the War Measures Act. But we decided to keep the time spent in debate to a minimum, having regard to the situation which confronted the country. We knew the government wanted legislation to replace the War Measures Act, with its wide, sweeping powers, so we were content to keep discussion on our part to a minimum, as we have done. In these circumstances, surely the minister will consider this amendment very carefully. If he turns down this last request by the opposition it would seem to me that his credibility as a reformer has been knocked to pieces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: The amendment continues:

"The Administrator shall have the powers of a commissioner appointed under the Inquiries Act and shall continue as Administrator for such period after the expiration of this act, whether by effluxion of time or by proclamation, as the case may be, as is necessary for the carrying out of his duties under this act."

We then go on to say:

"The Administrator shall have power to review and confirm, vary or revoke a certificate filed by an Attorney General of a province under subsection (1) of section 7 or an order made by an Attorney General under subsection (2) of section 9, or to make an order fixing a date for trial."

Section 7, to which reference is made in the last paragraph, provides:

A person charged with an offence under section 4 shall be detained in custody without bail pending his trial unless

(a) the Attorney General of the province in which the person is in custody has not, within seven days after the later of the time when the person was arrested or the coming into force of this act, filed with the clerk of the Superior Court of criminal jurisdiction in the province a certificate—

We deal with this; we say the Administrator shall have the power to review and confirm, vary or revoke a certificate in these circumstances. All the Attorney General has to do with reference to such a certificate is say a person is detained for just cause. When we are talking about the Attorney General, of course, we are really talking about all the agents of the Crown who will have the power to act in the name of the Attorney General; we are really talking about the police who are given powers under this bill. We say the Administrator should have authority to go behind this certificate, review it and, if he thinks fit, revoke the certificate in question. Surely this is reasonable. Our amendment says, also, that the Administrator shall have power to make an order fixing a date for trial if a charge has been laid.

Mr. Chairman, I have said before but perhaps this is an occasion upon which I should repeat it, the most cherished thing which a democracy allows us is liberty. I am not thinking, now, about liberty to be as free as a hog on ice. I am talking about the liberty which we sometimes give up in part in order that we may enjoy an even greater freedom in society. Unless provision is made in this bill for a review procedure, for a trial date to be set, for the right to counsel, we shall tonight be setting back 700 years the system of jurisprudence in Canada. As far back as 700 years, after the passing of Magna Carta, no freeman could be held in gaol after an application had been made for trial. Surely any Canadian citizen should have the right to a trial. It is common decency that these shortcomings in the bill should be corrected. These were the rights for which people fought so hard 700 years ago and they have been granted ever since. So this government, led by a Prime Minister who is supposed to be a civil rights advocate, is turning back the pages of history 700 years—and what have Canadians done to deserve this?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: The poet Byron put it better than I could when he wrote The Sonnet on Chillon:

Eternal spirit of the chainless Mind!
Brightest in dungeons, Liberty! thou art,
For there thy habitation is the heart—
The heart which love of thee alone can bind;
And when they sons to fetters are consign'd—
To fetters, and the damp vault's dayless gloom,

People are held in gaol for seven days; people are held in gaol for 21 days; people are held, maybe, for 90 days. They can be kept in dungeons. We can chain the body, we can chain the physical being, but we can never chain the mind. Even the kidnappers of Laporte will find that out. Though they may have chained him, though they may have kept him in captivity, they could never chain the mind of that man. You can chain the body, but you cannot chain the mind of man. In man's mind there rests the very seed of freedom and that is what Byron had in mind. So I say as he said:

• (8:50 p.m.)

Their country conquers with their martyrdom,
And freedom's fame finds wings on every wind.
Chillon! Thy prison is a holy place,
And thy sad floor an altar—for t'was trod,
Until his very steps have left a trace

The great lesson from this sonnet is that this person was incarcerated for so long when civil rights had been set aside, as Byron penned it, that as he walked around the pillars of the jail he left markings on the pavement of the prison. What did the poet say? He said:

—May none those marks efface!
For they appeal from tyranny to God.

That is my belief. I know we have pounded the Minister of Justice long on this point, but knowing his training, background and everything about him, how can he refuse to allow this kind of amendment which would permit a review when abuse had been committed? What is wrong with an amendment of that kind? What harm will it do to law and order in Quebec and everywhere else in Canada to have people's cases reviewed, whether they be the most guilty of criminals, in order that they may be brought to a court of justice? Surely no minister and no government in their right senses could turn down this amendment.

If we were cutting down the powers in the bill I could understand the minister saying he needs more power, but we are not cutting down one of the powers given in the 14 clauses that have been debated by Committee of the Whole. All we are asking for is what Canadians have asked for throughout the generations during which we have adopted the traditions in which this nation is steeped. All we are asking is that decent men and women who may be detained without charge, without the right of bail, without the right of counsel, without any communication with their families and without even the decency of having clean laundry, be given the right of a board of review headed by an administrator independent of parliamentary institutions.

If there is abuse, is it not better that the Minister of Justice and the government be aware of it, or even embarrassed by it? Would the Minister of Justice not rather be embarrassed than be a political animal? I say to him tonight there is no justification for the men here, particularly those who are lawyers and who know the traditions and the basis of stare decisis behind our common law, to sit and oppose the reasonable request we have made.

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie knows what I am talking about. He said he would look at this matter differently if the power was not given to an administrative body. He said this is an independent but an administrative power because that body would be acting in a judicial capacity. To save him that embarrassment we have now put forward the most reasonable suggestion that this body should be headed by a judge steeped in the tradition of our common law and with an understanding of our parliamentary and legislative measures. What harm could come from that? I say as Byron said:

> And when thy sons to fetters are consign'd—
> To fetters, and the damp vault's dayless gloom,
> Their country conquers with their martyrdom,
> And freedom's fame finds wings on every wind.

The prison was a holy place because of the marks that person left. That is what the hon. member for York South meant when he talked about his trip through Europe. People have said this afternoon that we should trust the Attorney General. Let me say that the people of Germany trusted Hitler, and this was contrary to every good principle. The freedom we have in Canada does not come only from the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice, the Premier of Quebec, the Attorney General, the Leader of the Opposition, any Member of Parliament or of the cabinet. Freedom comes from the law. Our children leave our homes to go to school and arrive there safely, not because the Premier guarantees their safety but because the law guarantees that they will arrive at their school doors in safety.

It is all right to say that there is a committee set up, but that committee can be hired or discharged with a wave of a hand. Germany may have had committees in the days of Hitler, but how long did they last? Promises were made and promises were not kept. The government has been given great power and it has been given the confidence of the Official Opposition in this crisis. Let me say to the minister through you, Mr. Chairman, that even when we questioned the government, which would not tell us why it needed these extraordinary powers, we said because it is the government and the people of Canada gave it responsibility to govern, we would accept its word.

Now when we ask for one reasonable amendment based on the arguments we have put forward, the minister will say—I know this to be the case—we should be turned down. It is my hope that my words or the words of someone will impress the government. I hope the government will decide to set this measure aside until a Liberal Party caucus has been called with asks the Prime Minister this question, "Do you want to go ahead now with this kind of law in this kind of fashion?"

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the arguments put forward so ably by the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Calgary North who expressed the feelings of many members on all sides of this House. Our problem is to reconcile what we are doing in passing an extraordinary law, with safeguards. I had hoped misguidely or naïvely that the Minister of Justice, who I think in his heart agrees with what has been said this afternoon, would come up with an amendment providing safeguards because of the powers provided in this measure.

No government, no matter which party may be involved, should be given these powers without safeguards as to how the powers are used. There should be some means of checking whether or not the powers are abused. Whether the government is composed of Liberals, Progressive Conservatives, members of the NDP or the Ralliement Créditiste, they are but men who can err and misjudge in the exercise of the extraordinary powers they have been granted.

The minister made much of the amendments of the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Calgary North. He contended that this type of amendment would impose upon an officer of the Crown in another jurisdiction instructions as to how he should administer law in his jurisdiction. The minister and others suggested that this would be an insult to the Attorney General of Quebec or the Attorney General of any other province. There are two assumptions one can make after hearing that argument. If one were to assume that the Attorney General of Quebec or of any other province were likely to abuse or misuse this power, one must also logically assume that some safeguard in this law is necessary.

But let us assume the best. Let us assume that the Attorney General of the province of Quebec will in his best possible manner and on his own ability administer this law with the best intent, and let us assume that he is the most honest and upright Attorney General that one could ask for. Assuming that to be the case, it seems to me it would be an insult to such a man not to have this safeguard, because he would be the first person to ask for and to want safeguards in respect of powers which he is obliged to use.

If the federal Parliament, in passing legislation which grants extraordinary powers, does not provide safeguards in respect of those extraordinary powers, I think any self-respecting Attorney General of any province in Canada would be insulted. I find the argument put forward by the Minister of Justice and some of his colleagues specious and one that falls to the ground.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat what has been said earlier. None of us is wedded to the words contained in the amendments put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for York South. Our main point is that the Minister of Justice has led us down many paths but he has yet to tell us that he will accept the idea of having some safeguards. I hope he would at least agree that the idea is good in law and in principle. If he would accept that much and, even if he would not accept the amendments of the opposition parties, come forward with his amendment, he would do his bill and this House a great deal of good which we are badly in need of at this time.

One hates to think unkind thoughts or bring up past memories about a person one might know in this chamber, but I remember when I received mail from the National Liberal party headquarters prior to and during their leadership convention. I received the brochures of all the candidates of the Liberal party. I wish I had with me tonight the brochure which came out on behalf the person who is now Minister of Justice for Canada. I wish I could have laid my hands on it tonight—I tried to do so over the supper hour—because I would like to read to the hon. gentleman what was in that brochure concerning him, his record and his stance and why he should be the leader of the Liberal party of Canada. Much of those words, methinks, would haunt him now. That brochure made him sound better than the second coming. We got, instead, the first coming and he is now the Prime Minister.

The hon. gentleman who occupies the position of Minister of Justice has much to live up to concerning what is alleged to be his record and his position on civil liberties and the law, as well as about how the law should serve the people. All that has been said about him, and all that he has said about himself, does not stand up today unless he is prepared to at least agree to have some safeguards in this legislation. If he rejects both the first amendment and the amendment now before us, then he should come forward with his own amendment. If the minister will accept the idea only and not our words or the wording of the amendment, and provide the better words which he thinks should be used, he will receive agreement from members on all sides of the House.

I am not one who has had any training in the law; therefore, I shall not comment on the legalities of the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North. It just seems to me to make sense to one who considers himself to be Joe Canadian. I add my voice to that of many other members in this House. I hope that some of our colleagues to your right, Mr. Chairman, will now decide to ask the minister to agree that this item should stand, so that overnight the minister could think about it and come to this House tomorrow, or whenever this bill comes up before us again, with his amendment and his words to provide safeguards. I say this because no government made up of men of any political party should be without these safeguards. If I have any hope left at all, it is a very small hope that the minister will agree to at least do this. I hope he will give himself a little time to reconsider, accept the idea and bring in his amendment.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, there is no man more deaf than he who will not hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gilbert: We have had an example of that in the past few days in respect of the amendments brought forth by members of the opposition. We in the New Democratic Party support the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North. In spirit it is much the same as the amendment brought forward by the hon. member for York South. In respect of both these amendments an approach has been made to the minister on the basis of reason. The members of the opposition used all their persuasive powers in an effort to persuade the minister that he is wrong in not agreeing to the appointment of a supervisory commission or an administrator as a safeguard of abuses which have occurred and which probably will occur with regard to this legislation.

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby presented a political argument to the Minister of Justice in which he stated that the unity of this country is very necessary and that we must have the strength and support of the people of Quebec in the development of the unity of a federal state in Canada. The minister has turned a deaf ear to this. I remind the minister that back in 1943 or 1944 the Liberal government passed an Order in Council under the War Measures Act which had the effect of deporting Japanese Canadians. Who administered that Order in Council? None other than the RCM Police.

The minister is well aware of the abuses that resulted from the enforcement of that Order in Council. What happened as a result of those abuses? The government was so ashamed that a commission was set up to investigate the property losses these people suffered as a result of having been transferred inland because of the Order in Council. The government paid millions of dollars to these people, but this was not adequate compensation. All the terms of reference of that commission were concerned with property losses and not with the loss of dignity, of political rights, and so forth, that these people suffered.

I am sure that the Minister of Justice at the time the Order in Council was passed would have welcomed some sort of supervisory regulation that the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Calgary North proposed as an amendment to the bill, because it would have meant there would have been a body or a person that would have studied the abuses that were perpetrated by the RCMP. Now we have another Order in Council affecting the FLQ. I repeat that of the 447 persons arrested, 397 were released without charge. Surely there has been great abuse of the powers granted to the Attorney General of Quebec and exercised by his officers.

I had hoped that a minister who could say on second reading that this bill was philosophically abhorrent to him, would insert safeguards to protect the rights of people who have been injured as a result of this legislation. I would like to think that we have a Minister of Justice who is like a King John with the Magna Carta rather than a King John with a mini carta, because this bill represents a mini carta which restricts the rights and suppresses the freedoms of people. It is totally repugnant to all who believe in the democratic processes in this country.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, I want to speak for a moment or two on this amendment because I believe it is the final opportunity the government has to prove to members of this House that it is justified in asking for extraordinary legislative powers. In fact, throughout the course of the debate the minister again and again in defence of the bill indicated that particularly wide-ranging powers were required. I as one member in this House have not agreed with this fact. Certainly, most of the members of the minister's party, as well as members on this side of the House, have agreed with it.

I think it is interesting, however, that the amendment now before the House is proposed by the official opposition which has in the main supported the government's action with respect to this bill. For that reason, if for no other, I think the minister should be giving this amendment every consideration. If in fact the minister seeks not only to do justice but to make sure it is well evidenced to the country, I think he has a very serious obligation not only to the official opposition in the House but to the many Canadians who are most disquieted by the steps that the government has taken.

The request for the kind of judicial commission that was proposed first by the hon. member for York South, and now by the hon. member for Calgary North, is not for something that has been framed within the reference of any particular party; it is, in fact, echoing the sentiments of many Canadians. The minister himself has received requests from a number of respected groups which have communicated with him since the War Measures Act was invoked, asking for the kind of independent commission that would ensure that these wide-ranging powers are not abused.

I think many millions of Canadians have been more than willing to accept the government's action—which is not one with which I agree—provided the government is prepared to give the kind of objective assurance that these powers will not be seriously abused. It is not just the members of this House but important groups in this country, such as the Canadian Council of Churches to mention one, which communicated with the government at an early date asking that this kind of assurance against these wide-ranging powers be instituted in the law.

I find it incredible, as I think many members in the House do, that the minister should be asking for the kind of powers that are spelled out in the clauses of this temporary public order bill without, at the same time, offering the kind of basic safeguards that are only sensible in light of the action that is being recommended through this legislation. What assurance have we that elements of the broad powers that are given to arrest and detain on suspicion will not be abused? Where can the minister indicate that that kind of assurance will stand up where it will matter most to those who will be affected by the application of this act?

I think that this is the last and most important opportunity for the minister to state very clearly to members of the House and, therefore, to people generally what kind of definite assurance and safeguards there will be with respect to the very special and extraordinary powers that are being requested under this temporary legislation. Unless the minister can do more than give the personal assurance which he gave today, unless he is able to present an amendment or accept the amendment before him to ensure that this safeguard exists, Parliament and the people of this country will not have been well served.

I recall an earlier day when the Prime Minister was warning the people of this country against the danger of extremes and the importance in times of great pressure in one direction to have an equal or countervailing pressure in the other direction. The government has asked for, in the person of the minister presenting this legislation, extraordinary powers to be placed in the hands of the police and in the courts. It is inconceivable to me that any minister on behalf of any government should be asking for these powers in this situation without offering a visible and tangible expression of a device that would give assurance to the people that such powers will not be abused.

Verbal assurances about the wisdom, good faith or judgment of specific individuals are worth nothing more than the communicated statements that they are. I feel that this statute cannot be received with any respect by the thinking people of this country unless the government and the minister are prepared either to accept this amendment, which goes to the heart of making these special powers close to being responsibly carried out, or put forth amendments of their own to that effect. I trust that before we conclude the debate on this amendment the minister will ask, as one member suggested earlier, to have this matter stood in order that he may consult his officials and bring in an amendment which he might find more acceptable, or consider the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North so that it may be accepted by all members of the House.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I cannot disguise the fact that I am very impressed by the eloquence to which I have been subjected during the past three or four hours, and that I have been impressed by the sources of that eloquence. I think that the government tried to prepare a piece of legislation, based on the experience of the weeks in which the regulations passed pursuant to the War Measures Act were in force, specifically directed to the threat it was intended to combat, namely, the FLQ and allied and successor organizations operating out of Quebec. The purpose was to mobilize only those extensions in power for the law enforcement authorities that in our opinion were needed, namely, specific extensions of the power to arrest without warrant, to detain before a charge was laid for a specific period of time, to search without warrant and the other powers that have already been described in detail to this committee during clause by clause review of the bill.

We have been conscious of the fact that we had to draft and cast those powers in terms that did not go beyond the scope needed to meet the threat. We were also conscious of the fact that we did not want to interfere with the ordinary liberties of Canadians as they have been built up through the traditions of our country, whether at common law or by statute, any more than they had to be interfered with. I have tried to meet every argument that has been broached on the floor of this chamber since debate on clause by clause began; I have tried to meet it with counter argument which may or may not have been persuasive in so far as the total membership of this committee is concerned. In any event, I have tried my best to outline the government's position.

I want to assure the committee that before this debate began and during the course of the debate we have tried to assess, and I personally have tried to assay, the value of each argument supporting each amendment. In the final analysis the government will have to bear the responsibility of the action we are taking, and we understand that. We also recognize that what we did depends in the long run on a value judgment which only history will verify or rebut, and there being no certainty in human affairs there is no one here who can fully determine what the final accounting or verdict will be. But we did what we did because we felt it had to be done. We used the vehicle and the tool of the bill before the committee because we thought that it struck the proper balance between extension of the power of law enforcement agencies on the one hand and restriction of individual liberties of Canadians to the minimum necessary to achieve its objective on the other hand.

I have considered the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Calgary North; he introduced it with verve and eloquence tonight. But I must reject it and recommend to the committee that it be rejected for basically two reasons. First, it offends against the principle, under our federal structure as it operates at the moment, in law enforcement, that the administration of justice under the Criminal Code and under those measures akin to the Criminal Code is the responsibility of the Attorneys General of the provinces. Just as the amendment introduced by the hon. member for York South implied a supervision of the discretion inherent in the responsibilities of a provincial Attorney General, so the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Calgary North has, to my mind, the same objective. It is he, the Attorney General who is responsible to the people of Quebec, to the legislature of Quebec, who must bear the ultimate accounting for how this will be administered, just as I, within the general content of this bill and of the criminal law, have to bear responsibility for that.

That brings me to my second ground for objecting and it is this: I believe in responsible government. I believe that under the British parliamentary system, the person charged with the institution of criminal proceedings, the person charged with exercising that sometimes awesome discretion and the person who under the terms of this bill has the discretion either to suspend bail or not, either to detain a person or not to detain him, or to institute prosecution or not, must be someone responsible directly to the people. All that is his responsibility under the Constitution as it operates in this country. He has to exercise that responsibility in weighing what the public interest will be. He has to weigh that public interest, not for political motivation—indeed, under our tradition, which binds Quebec as it does the federal government, he cannot institute or withhold proceedings on the basis of that consideration—but in the best interests of the administration of justice. That is his responsibility, as it is mine within the sphere within which I am appointed to operate.

The Attorney General of any province, accountable as he is to the legislature, accountable as he is through the legislature to the people, must be more sensitive to the administration or to the possibility of the maladministration of justice than any commission responsible to no one. I do not think that any paraphernalia or any superstructure of review can in any way derogate from the fundamental responsibility of an Attorney General under the British parliamentary system. There is no way in which that can be done.

When I read the third paragraph, in particular, of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North, when I see that the administrator who would enjoy judicial office, holding judicial office, would be given the power to review and "confirm, vary or revoke a certificate filed by an Attorney General of a province under subsection (1) of section 7"—that is the clause in the bill relating to the granting or withholding of bail—I do not believe that a judge should be given that responsibility or held accountable for that responsibility of an Attorney General of a province, given to him under the bill.

An hon. Member: They are all the time.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Not in the enforcement of extraordinary measures like this for which he has to take responsibility in the long run. Secondly, I do not believe that a specially appointed judge should have an overriding responsibility under clause 9(2) of supervising what an ordinary judge, under that clause, would have done in terms of detention before charge and the extensions that may or may not be allowed. In effect, that would be one judge superimposing his judgement on another. I know that the hon. member for Calgary North referred to the administration of the War Measures Act during the last war. At that time, by executive action people were detained. They were detained for unlimited periods and without charge and without trial.

Mr. Woolliams: What about this bill?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is completely different from this bill, because the detention is limited to seven days or three days, the charge must be laid and the trial must be brought on. It is not detention without any recourse whatever. I can understand in that situation, when the whole administration was centred in Ottawa, when there was no charge and no trial, that there was argument for some system of review—

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): This is only semi-totalitarianism.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —but that does not apply under these circumstances. The detention is public. The arrest is public. There is a maximum period put on the detention. There is a maximum period put on the time that a charge can be delayed. There is a maximum period put on the period after which a trial must be brought on. I submit this to the committee with the greatest respect: I do not believe that the comparison is valid. I have listened and digested what hon. members have said, and in all seriousness I submit to the committee that both the principle of federalism on the one hand and the principle of the responsibility and accountability of an Attorney General on the other, an accountability as sensitive as any which the British parliamentary system has imposed on any officer of Parliament, are offended by this amendment.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): He is not accountable to this Parliament.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): But I am accountable to this Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question? The minister says he is accountable to this Parliament. Is he prepared to be accountable for every action that is taken under this legislation by the Attorney General of the province of Quebec? Would the minister answer that question?

An hon. Member: That is a silly question.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has added a little sting to that question so he will have to excuse me if he gets a little venom back. I say this: If the responsibility under a federal statute lies with the Attorney General, he is responsible to his own legislature and the people of Quebec and he will be held responsible, but if the responsibility lies in Ottawa I will be held responsible.

Under our Criminal Code and under the bill, the primary responsibility for the administration of justice lies with the Attorney General of the province and he is accountable to the people and to the legislature of that province. In so far as the jurisdiction rests with me and with the government for the content of this bill, we are jointly and severally responsible to this Parliament.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): You will be washing your hands of this bill in two weeks' time.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member for Peace River rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Baldwin: I should like to ask the minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, if it is not a fact that the jurisdiction of the federal government for narcotics and restrictive trades practices with respect to prohibitions and sanctions rests squarely within the criminal law of Canada, and is it not the Attorney General of Canada who launches prosecutions and is in full charge of the proceedings in these matters?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, that is so—

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —but under the Criminal Code and under any statute for which responsibility is not otherwise allocated, under section 27 of the Interpretations Act the responsibility lies with the provincial Attorney General.

Mr. Baldwin: Is it not a fact that all the extraordinary remedies which are granted are remedies not under the Criminal Code but under offences created by this new legislation?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, Mr. Chairman, that is not a fact. This bill contains certain departures from the ordinary criminal law. Aside from that, it is administered as the criminal law is administered.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, I think that a bill which gives to a large number of persons who are not accountable to any higher authorities the power to arrest people on mere suspicion, a bill which allows seizure and search in a systematic fashion, a bill which prevents any recourse for damages, a bill which has already destroyed reputations, a bill which permits a tear in the very fabric of democracy, namely the involvement of politics into the judiciary process, a bill which, I would say, is contrary to an almost natural law, by convicting a spouse who helps the other to escape after he or she has committed an offence, a bill which allows the emprisonment of anyone at the Queen's will, without the assurance of a trial within a set time, a bill which does not even define the fact of being a member of the illegal association, a bill which is retroactive without any set date as to this retroactivity, a bill which infringes upon the first principle of legality, i.e. to be clear, to the point where some of the best criminal jurists claim that under this bill, a lawyer cannot, without violating subclause (e) of clause 4, defend members of the FLQ for a special fee, is of such an exceptional nature that it makes necessary the equally exceptional amendment that is proposed.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the Minister of Justice has seriously tried to deny the need for some powers of review in connection with the rather extraordinary powers created under the War Measures Act regulations and the powers to be created under this bill. Earlier this afternoon the minister took the position that the province of Quebec had established some sort of committee. He has always taken the position that the administration of this bill is the responsibility of the government of the province concerned and that the Attorney General concerned is accountable to the legislature of his province.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that we are considering this bill after the War Measures Act regulations have been in effect for several weeks. The context in which we are considering this bill is that the province concerned has made no adequate provision for review. I repeat that: the context in which we are considering this question tonight is that the Attorney General and the provincial government concerned, for one reason or another have made no adequate provision for a review of the extraordinary powers created by the regulations of the War Measures Act.

It is all very well for the Minister of Justice to say that this is the responsibility of the province concerned. I say to all my hon. friends opposite that they are putting this before the House and that they are apparently going to reject any provision for review in the full knowledge, which not one of them can contest for a moment, that the government concerned has not made any adequate provision for review.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: As far as the action taken by that government or this government is concerned, the people of Canada will never know what has taken place under the War Measures Act except in so far as journalists may make that knowledge available.

The Minister of Justice does not seriously try to argue that there should not be some power of review. I know that he talks about the accountability of the Attorney General of the province to the legislature and he also talks about his own accountability to this House. I want to speak to him very frankly now, Mr. Chairman. If he were seeking these unusual powers, I hope he would have sense enough to want a review body; and if he did not have sense enough to want it, I hope that I for one would insist that such a review body be formed. I do not think this minister should be given powers of this sort without some power of review. Tonight we are being asked to accept a rejection of any provision for review in the full and certain knowledge that the province concerned has not itself made any adequate provision for review.

An hon. Member: Get out of that one.

Mr. Stanfield: That cannot be challenged. I do not think there has been anything like this in the history of our country in peacetime. I cannot understand my hon. friend opposite putting forward such a proposition. This is not a necessary part of dealing with terrorists. The refusal to establish a review commission is not designed to strengthen our society; it is not designed to protect our society. I do not say that the refusal is calculated deliberately to weaken our society, but that would be its inevitable effect.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It could not be justified in wartime. Whether or not certain things have been necessary in wartime, they have been carried out. But we are not so weak in this country, neither is our society so weak that we need to provide these unusual powers without any review. When the minister spoke, he bristled a little. He suggested the time has come for us to be frank. The time has passed when we should be polite about this matter. The time has come for us to be frank. It seems to me this government should answer questions frankly. In particular, what is this government afraid will be disclosed if such review is provided?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: That is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. Fairweather: Where are the Liberals? We want to hear a Liberal.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take many minutes because I have already expressed my views about the importance of the review. But the minister keeps repeating the jurisdictional aspect of this matter. He displays a "holier than thou" attitude and keeps saying, "I believe in federalism", as if the people on this side of the House do not.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: The comments of the great Minister of National Defence show the kind of arrogant attitude that the cabinet has adopted in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: It is an attitude which the members of this arrogant government always take.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member should not talk about arrogance. Let him consider his party's leadership campaign.

An hon. Member: Stand in your place.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, all of us in this House believe in federalism and in Canadian federalism. Almost everyone in Canada believes in it. There are ways to make that federalism strong and there are ways to make it weak. There are ways to make people the friends of federalism and there are ways to make martyrs of the enemies of federalism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: That is precisely what the government's attitude does: it makes the demagogic separatists in Quebec, and even those who are a long distance from the views of the separatists, point at Ottawa as the centralizing, insensitive capital of Canada and at this government as one that ignores the needs of the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Every time a government or a Parliament passes this kind of law aimed at a certain region of the country and which deals with people as 400 people in Quebec have already been dealt with, something happens: you make every one of those 400 people resent Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: And you run the risk of making them martyrs with their ideas. How do you avoid that? You avoid the social consequences of this kind of extraordinary bill by appointing, I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, some kind of review and supervisory body. Then everybody in the country, whether he be in Quebec or elsewhere in Canada, will know that the Parliament which gave the police in Canada, the police of a province, the police of a city, the Attorney General of a province—

Mr. Fairweather: And the armed forces.

Mr. Lewis: —and the armed forces these extraordinary, repugnant powers, powers contrary to the basic principles of our society, is making sure that these powers will not be abused. There is no guarantee that they will not be abused unless you have some kind of supervisory body. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary North is a thoroughly reasonable one. The minister is outraged by the suggestion in the amendment that the administrator will have power to review the decision of the Attorney General to withhold bail. What is outrageous about that, when the administrator is to be a judge?

Mr. Woolliams: That is quite right.

Mr. Lewis: According to the normal practice in our society, it is the court that decides whether a man shall be let out on bail or held in jail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: If the minister had accepted the earlier amendment that suggested this provision should be included in the bill—and I still do not see why it should not be—this part of the present amendment would not be needed. At present the Attorney General has the arbitrary power to say, "This man shall remain in jail." He is under no obligation to give reasons; the certificate does not have to say why. He merely has to say that in his opinion there is just cause for that man to stay in jail for another 30 days, 40 days, half a year or one year until the date of trial. It may be one month or one year away from his arrest. I have known these things to occur.

If you give the Attorney General that kind of arbitrary power, what in heaven's name is so outrageous when you say that a judge in the capacity of administrator under this law shall be able to review the way in which the Attorney General uses that power? I say to the Minister of Justice, what is so outrageous about that? In what way does this interfere with provincial rights?

Mr. Fairweather: In no way.

Mr. Lewis: If I had time I would go through the Criminal Code to illustrate my point. Until this bill was introduced I confess that I had not looked at it for a long time, but I would be ready to bet there are sections in the Criminal Code—I am referring to the passing-off sections and others like them—that give the federal Minister of Justice certain powers. There is no absoluteness and there cannot be any absoluteness in this regard.

Mr. Fairweather: There is also the Parole Board.

Mr. Lewis: One must also include the Parole Board. One must consider the situation. What is the situation? At present the situation is that this Parliament is required to pass a special law to deal with an extraordinary state of affairs, so says the minister. He wants extraordinary powers, says the minister. I do not think they are now needed, but if they are there ought to be extraordinary precautions to ensure that these extraordinary powers will not be abused.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: This is all that the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North seeks. Neither his amendment nor the one that was before the committee previously interferes with any of the powers. It does not remove the power of search, the power of arrest, the power of detention, the power to withhold goods seized, or any other power. It merely states that a supervisory person, a judge, shall look over, supervise, report on or deal with the way in which these extraordinary powers are exercised. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the minister's refusal to accept this kind of amendment is very suspect. It may be that he and the government of Canada have not the courage to undertake their responsibilities for fear of what someone in Quebec might say.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: If that is the case, it is shameful and all the pretensions about liberty and rights are hollow pretensions of which the minister and the government ought to be ashamed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I ask, what is wrong with the amendment?

Mr. Stanfield: What is wrong with the government?

Mr. Lewis: All the amendment asks is that a judge, who has had training in these things, be required to look into these matters. He is given very limited powers. Generally speaking, the powers that he is given under the amendment are powers set out in the Public Inquiries Act; they are not powers which my friend, the hon. member for Calgary North, has created or that his leader or anybody else has created. They are powers now contained within the statutes of Canada. Those powers are used all the time by people investigating all sorts of things across this country, by commissions and bodies that governments and Parliaments have set up for decades. The administrator, or judge, has no more powers than every other commission of inquiry has had, precisely on the basis of the same law. What in the name of heaven is wrong with that suggestion?

If there was the slightest inclination on the part of this government, not only to deal with the situation in the province of Quebec but to deal with it in a decent, democratic and sensitive way, they would accept the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I will first deal with the point I brought to the attention of the minister. I do not know whether he caught my question properly. I attempted to point out that when he was trying to relate the functions of the Attorney General of Quebec or the Attorney General of any province to this bill, and to the powers given by it, to the ordinary function under the Criminal Code, I think he was wrong. Only in respect of offences created under this bill is there given the extraordinary power of detention and refusal of bail. The minister may have some exceptions in mind, but this is my reading of the bill.

The attitude of the minister emphasizes a dillusionment under which many members of this House labour. They think we need only to pass legislation and need not be cornered about its implementation or worry about the impact. I deny that. When we accept the responsibility of enacting extraordinary legislation—I am not quarrelling about the type of legislation that lies beyond our scope under this amendment—we cannot absolve ourselves by saying that having passed the bill, we can forget about it. We cannot leave our responsibilities outside this House. We cannot park our consciences at the door. The conscience of each hon. member of this House is with every police officer when he arrests, detains and places in an institution for continued detention a person charged under this act. Parliament is responsible when the Attorney General of the province of Quebec signs a certificate indicating that there is no just cause for allowing a person to be admitted to bail.

I have no complaint in so far as this bill is directed against those who are guilty of the type of terrorist activities which have concerned us. However, almost 400 people have been picked up and detained in custody for a considerable period of time. We must admit that there have been some abuses in the operation of this legislation. Because we are afraid that abuses will continue when these powers are given to certain people, we must ask for a means of review so that abuses will be limited. When abuses are brought to the attention of the administrator, he must be compelled to report them to this House. This House will then have the opportunity to hold accountable those who are delegated with the authority. Without a safeguard of this kind this House is not fulfilling its duty under the democratic process.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, it appears that the committee is about ready to decide on the amendment to the second last clause of Bill C-181. In view of that, I ask Your Honour under Standing Order 6(5)(a) to request permission of the Speaker to extend the sitting until the Committee of the Whole has completed consideration of Bill C-181 or until eleven o'clock, whichever is earlier.

The Deputy Chairman: In view of the request made by the Minister of Agriculture, it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 6(5)(a) to interrupt the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole in order to permit the House to decide on the motion which will be proposed by the minister.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture) moved:

That the sitting be extended until completion of the Committee of the Whole stage of Bill C-181, or eleven o'clock p.m., whichever is the earlier.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Before putting the motion I must remind members that Standing Order 6(5)(a) permits the Speaker to put the motion and at the same time ask members who oppose the motion to rise. If ten members or more rise, the motion is defeated.

And more than ten members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I declare the motion lost.

And the House having resumed in committee:

The Deputy Chairman: It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PENSIONS—OLD AGE SECURITY—ACTION ON INCREASE BEFORE CHRISTMAS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, November 12, as reported at page 1090 of Hansard, I put the following question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau):

Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the right hon. gentleman's statement a short while ago that he thought old age pensioners might be able to get through the winter without an increase in their pensions, but that he hoped they would not have to, can he now say whether there will be an increase in the old age pension before Christmas?

• (10:00 p.m.)

The first reply of the Prime Minister was as follows:

Mr. Speaker, without agreeing with the premise of the question, which is not exactly in the terms I put it, I can only say what the Minister of National Health and Welfare has been saying, namely, that in due course he will announce the government's policy on these matters.

I tried again, by way of a supplementary, to obtain some assurance that something would at least be started before Christmas but I am afraid I was not successful. I asked the same question in different words on Monday, November 16, as recorded in Hansard at page 1188, when I put it this way:

Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? There being 39 days to Christmas, has the Prime Minister yet decided in what way he is going to say "Merry Christmas" to Canada's old age pensioners?

An hon. Member: Ho, ho, ho!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I got no answer to that so far as Hansard indicates, but I believe a number of hon. members did say what I have just heard—"Ho, ho, ho!"

Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the Prime Minister if he felt that my reference to what he said was not exactly correct. He did not quarrel with the general terms of my quotation but relied on the fact that I had paraphrased him a bit. Actually, I did paraphrase him by making his words softer than the press had reported. Following an interview with him outside this chamber on Friday, October 9, the press had reported the Prime Minister as saying he thought pensioners could get through the winter—I changed "could" to "might"—but it would be too bad if they had to, and he hoped it would not be necessary. I have seen reports of this interview in papers like the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, October 10, and the Winnipeg Free Press of Monday, October 12. At any rate, it was clear that the message of the Prime Minister was one which had the effect of giving old age pensioners some hope. The headline of the story in the Ottawa Citizen was, "More Dollars for Aged". The headline of the same story in the Winnipeg Free Press was, "Pensioners Promised Action".

I think this is most unfair. It has all the earmarks of a cruel hoax for the Prime Minister to say these things and give the impression that something is going to be done, yet continue to stall in this House to the point at which it will become legislatively impossible to deal with the matter before Christmas. After all, the old age pension cheques for the month of November are probably made up already and before long the December cheques will be in production. If anything is to be done before Christmas, it must be done right away.

I remind hon. members that the situation respecting our senior citizens is getting worse and worse. The difficulties they face, in getting by on the amount they have, whether by way of pension or other income, are increasing day by day and week by week. Figures which were given in answer to a question of mine some days ago, figures which are to be found in Hansard, show that 27 per cent of the people of Canada who are 65 years of age and over qualify for the full amount of the guaranteed income supplement.

In order to qualify for the full amount of that supplement one has to have practically nothing else at all. I am not now talking about the 57 per cent who qualify for some part of the guaranteed income supplement and thus are living below the poverty line. I am saying that 27 per cent of all the people in Canada 65 years of age and over are in the position that apart from what they get by way of old age pension and guaranteed income supplement they have nothing else. That means they have to get by on $111 and some cents a month. That means they are destitute.

In these days, in light of today's cost of living and in light of today's standard of living, which may be very nice for those who enjoy its affluence but which is repressive for those who cannot enjoy any part of it, I suggest this is criminal and immoral and that Parliament ought to be given the chance by the government to act on the matter of a substantial pension increase right away, certainly before Christmas.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as Shakespeare once said, "once more into the breach, dear friends." Questions relating to old age security posed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have been debated at ten o'clock in this Chamber no less than five times in the last year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Isabelle: Old age pensions began in Canada in 1927. The first pension which was based on a means test was administered by the provinces and was cost-shared on a 50 per cent basis with the federal government. This pension was in the sum of $20 per month. The old age pension continued unchanged except for the amount of payment until 1952. By the same year the pension had increased to a total of $40 per month. Shortly after World War II Canada's concern for its senior citizens was reflected by the action of the government of the day which in 1951 appointed an all-party committee of the House and the Senate to study the old age pension.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That was in 1950.

Mr. Isabelle: Yes, 1950. The study carried out by this all-party committee was most comprehensive and reviewed pension plans then in effect in all parts of the world. The major recommendation of this committee, which was unanimous, proposed the introduction of a flat-rate benefit program. The new pension program adopted by the government was called the old age security program and came into effect on January 1, 1952. The same basic rate of $40 pension per month still applied, but because the means test was eliminated many more of Canada's senior citizens were included.

Since the introduction of the old age security program in 1952, payments have increased as follows: July, 1957, $46 per month; November, 1957, $55 per month; February, 1962, $65 per month and October, 1963, $75 per month. Since 1963 old age security has been escalated to the present rate of $79.58 through the introduction of a cost of living clause. In 1966 legislation was introduced bringing the guaranteed income supplement to the old age security program into effect and commencing on January 1, 1967, a maximum rate of $30 per month was established for the guaranteed income supplement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Parliamentary Secretary, but his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But he has not answered the question.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): We covered 20 years in three minutes—pretty good.

BROADCASTING—PERFORMANCE OF NORTH BATTLEFORD SATELLITE TELEVISION STATION

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, the other day I asked whether the government would enforce standards required for licencing of TV stations. I had reference to the satellite in respect of North Battleford through station CKBI-TV at Prince Albert.

• (10:10 p.m.)

I should like to refer briefly to a telegram I received from some of my constituents. They say that there is unbelievably poor TV reception in the Battlefords despite thousands of names on petitions sent to the TV broadcasting commission. On this telegram there are 79 names. This is not the first time the people in this area have tried to do something about the problem. The board of trade in North Battleford and many citizens on their own have attempted to have some action taken.

I asked a question on the Order Paper on November 24, 1969. These are some of the things we have done in an effort to get the attention of the minister in respect of the unbelievably poor television reception. I had assumed that when a station received a licence to broadcast it would be forced to live up to certain minimum standards. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how you would explain the situation to your constituents or perhaps to your grandchildren if you had only one TV picture, if there was a hockey game on between Toronto and Montreal and if during the last period the score was tied and Montreal were advancing on the Toronto goal and then the picture faded out.

This is the type of thing that happens. I have heard about these things from many people, and not always in polite terms. I believe it is high time something was done about this situation. I do not want to hear excuses from the other side concerning what is wrong. I want to hear what is to be done to make the situation right. We have a TV signal that comes and goes like a yo-yo. I do not think this is necessary. If something cannot be done about this, let us give the licence to somebody else so that we will have at least one good TV signal in North Battleford. In Ottawa, for instance, there might be eight or ten channels including three French channels. The rest of the country is talking about two channels, and we cannot even get one in our part of the country. I suggest it is time something was done to correct this problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Faulkner), I would like to give the following information to the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley in reply to his question.

A representative of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission recently checked the technical facilities of station CKBI in Prince Albert. A representative of the Department of Communications also visited them. Subsequently, the licencee, Central Broadcasting Limited, decided that a micro-wave relay connecting North Battleford to Altican could ensure better service in North Battleford.

The company therefore applied to the Department of Communications for authorization to establish such a relay and we are now waiting for such a licence to be issued. We hope the hon. member's constituents will receive better service.

GRAIN—PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—FARM CONSOLIDATION PROGRAM

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, on October 29 the minister in charge of the Wheat Board tabled a program of proposals respecting the western grain industry. While the proposals are vague in many areas, one fact emanates abundantly clearly. That fact is that the contents of the new plan are based to large degree upon the task force report which outlines the Liberal government's agricultural policy platform for the seventies. This report is documented by a group of professors and accountants.

The grains program basically outlines three objectives. First, a program of supply management which could more appropriately be referred to as bureaucratic production control encompassing new marketing methods and new quota programs. It also outlines an objective of providing an income stabilization program which would be basically financed by the producers themselves. Another proposal involves an announcement that the government intends to withdraw support in the area of storage, that is, the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, certain interest costs on export sales and the provisions covering any shortfall incurred in pool accounts. All of these collectively will reduce the net income to the producer and place the vagaries of the international marketplace squarely on the shoulders of the producer.

Above all, while achieving these goals it is suggested another development will occur and it is also included in the proposal. However, I must say that there is very little accompanying background information and direction in this area. I am referring to the suggested proposal to encourage the adjustment of farm units into more efficient sizes. I believe that this is where more information is required.

It is for that purpose that I rise in this debate tonight. I raised the matter on November 9 and November 16. One answer that I received from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) was that the problem I raised was much too broad to be covered and dealt with in the question period. I raised the matter again yesterday in an attempt to elicit more information with respect to the government's direction and policy in this area, and inquired specifically whether a policy would be announced before the convening of the agricultural congress. To that question I received a negative answer.

The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board said that it was his desire to have the proposals thoroughly aired before proceeding with the legislation. He envisaged a debate involving the producers, the farm groups, members of the grain trades and anyone else interested in the grain industry. Yet the government's position respecting the consolidation and laying out of its intended procedure in this area have not been clearly defined. It seems to me that with such encompassing proposals, which strike at the potential disbanding of existing farm units, I as a Member of Parliament have the prerogative to ask how we can ever discuss this policy with any degree of intelligence and skill without having all the pertinent facts and without knowing the intentions of the government.

The task force report put forth some very direct proposals respecting farm adjustment and rationalization. I would simply like to ask the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, if we are to assume that the government will be following along the lines proposed in the task force report. Then we get back to the age-old question about what constitutes an economic, viable unit, what size it will have to be and whether it is the intention to doom the family farm to extinction only to have it replaced by a few corporate structures, probably vertically integrated conglomerates.

One has only to analyse the intentions of Bill C-175 and Bill C-176 and examine some of the evidence that was tabled in the committee on agriculture to conclude that it seems very obvious the government is moving in this direction. It seems to me that the government is set on a deliberate course of destroying rural Prairie life as we now know it, and in its stride bringing about the destruction of our rural communities. I believe the Canadian Economic Council on rural development also bears out this fact. The saddest aspect of all is that through government measures people are being literally coerced into making undesired adjustments, with little or no recourse in so far as their options or alternatives are concerned.

If we are simply being asked to propose and agree to the policies and programs which are being brought forth in the name of efficiency, such as those contained in the task force report, the grains policy and the various bills—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have only three minutes and so I must be very brief in my replies to all the matters raised by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). First of all, I want to say categorically that the task force report, both in its findings and recommendations, does not constitute government policy. I think it is a great disservice to the task force, and indeed to the farmers of Canada, for members of the opposition continually to go around the country attempting to perpetuate that myth.

So far as the proposals in connection with the agricultural stabilization fund are concerned, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) has made it very clear—and the hon. member has confirmed this tonight—that he wants to have a thorough discussion of this question and he is willing to make adjustments in the proposals before drafting the legislation that is to follow, in order to put whatever the consensus is into effect. At the congress which is to be held here next week there will be ample opportunity to discuss the proposals in the task force report. Indeed, that is what the meeting is for. I am sure the hon. member would be the first to get up in this House and criticize me for determining, in advance of that meeting, what the government will and what it will not accept in respect of the task force recommendations.

I see my time is about up, Mr. Speaker. In conclusion I wish to say it is absolutely wrong to contend that the government is attempting to do away with the family farm, or for that matter rural Canada. We have taken many measures, not to weaken that sector but rather to strengthen it and that is what this government, in particular the Department of Agriculture, is dedicated to do.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PRIVILEGE

MR. STANFIELD—INCORRECT REFERENCE IN "HANSARD" TO LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION AS AUTHOR OF STATEMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a statement with regard to Hansard. I would ask your indulgence for a moment because there have been a number of instances in the past few weeks in which the Prime Minister has given the impression that the official opposition is in collusion with the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not believe that according to the rules the Leader of the Opposition is entitled to make such a statement on motions. I suppose he could make a statement at this time on a question of privilege or perhaps on a point of order, but certainly he cannot make a statement on motions unless it is under one or the other guise or under Standing Order 43.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, it is a question of privilege relating to a statement made by a minister as reported in Hansard on which I would like to speak.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This would require the unanimous consent of the House. The Leader of the Opposition is suggesting a procedure which is entirely unknown to me and entirely new in so far as the rules are concerned. I doubt very much whether we should get the House involved in any procedure whereby every member, including the Leader of the Opposition, can rise on motions and make a statement about something in Hansard with which he disagrees. If the Leader of the Opposition has a question of privilege, he knows much better than I do what the rules are. He is required to give notice to the Chair. At the same time the Leader of the Opposition, because of his office, enjoys a special position in this chamber, and I would think there might be agreement to allow the Leader of the Opposition to indicate what his statement is. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, it relates to a statement in Hansard by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council replying to a question put by my colleague, the right hon. member for Prince Albert, regarding the removal of the coat of arms from departmental and ministerial stationery. It is recorded at page 1173 of Hansard. In replying to the question the Parliamentary Secretary refers to a statement of policy made in the House on October 23. In the House the Parliamentary Secretary attributed the policy statement to the Hon. Robert Stanbury, and I do not object to that, but I do take exception to the Hansard account which indicates the Parliamentary Secretary as saying that the October 23 policy statement was made by the Hon. Robert L. Stanfield. Surely, Mr. Speaker, I would have said something quite different with regard to the removing of the Coat of Arms from government stationery, but in defence of the author of the error I suppose I should be prepared to admit that the statements I have made about the government's stationary policy and stationary attitude on many issues may have contributed to this peculiar error.

TERRITORIAL SEA AND FISHING ZONES ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND CANADIAN FISHING LIMITS

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-195, to amend the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, this bill is precisely the same as one I introduced last year and would extend exclusive Canadian fishing limits to the edge of the continental shelf and continental slope. The purpose is, first, the protection of the resources which at present are being greatly exploited by other nations and, second, to protect the livelihood of Canadian fishermen from the encroachments of foreign fleets.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADIAN BOOK PUBLISHING DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

On the order: Introduction of Bills:

November 16, 1970—Mr. Howard (Skeena)—Bill intituled "An Act respecting the Canadian Book Publishing Development Corporation".

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Skeena has just filed with the Chair a copy of his proposed bill. I have not had an opportunity to look into it in detail, but the title is "An Act respecting the Canadian Book Publishing Development Corporation." The hon. member proposes the establishment of a corporation. Clause 6 states that the members are to be paid a remuneration and reasonable travelling and living expenses. This bill appears to me on first glance to have clear money provisions. I would not want to make a ruling at this point, but I would like to have an opportunity to look at the bill further. If it is not in order it cannot be put to the House. Having had a first glance at it, I think I should have a second glance.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, you are to be congratulated on your perceptive eye, but the bill deals with Canadian authority and Canadian integrity in the book publishing industry, and because of the hypocrisy of the Liberal party in this matter—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that if there is to be a debate on the acceptability of the bill this should be done in due course, but at the present time I indicate to the hon. member that I would like to have a further look at the bill. He is on notice that there may be procedural difficulties about the bill, and when the matter comes up for discussion I would think he would be prepared at that time to make the arguments which he appears to want to submit for the consideration of the Chair and of hon. members at this time.

HALIFAX HARBOUR—DEVELOPMENT POLICY RELATING TO DARTMOUTH SIDE

Question No. 83—Mr. Forrestall:

1. With reference to the reply to Question Number 2,535 that specific steps to formulate a development policy with the Dartmouth side of the Halifax Harbour would depend on consultation with local interests, can the government state what steps have been initiated by it to further such consultation with local interests, can the government state what steps have been initiated by it to further such consultation with local interests and evolve the development policy?

2. What specific proposals are being considered by the government under the DREE Program for the development of the Dartmouth side of the Halifax Harbour?

3. What specific proposals are being considered under the DREE program for the development of the Halifax Harbour and the Bedford Basin?

4. Is the government considering any expansion proposals of the port in its facilities which do not include the Dartmouth side?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the National Harbours Board advise as follows: 1. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion develops plans in cooperation with the Province, which consults local interests in the process.

The National Harbours Board learned in the spring of 1970 that a Management Consultants firm, Stevenson & Kellog Ltd., had been commissioned to undertake on behalf of the Halifax-Dartmouth Port Commission a study of the future of Halifax harbour. While awaiting the receipt of this report, the Board has not initiated steps to further consultation with local interests.

2 and 3. A wide range of proposals, developed with such consultation, are presently under consideration and it is not possible at present to identify the specific projects that may be decided on.

4. For any expansion proposals, the National Harbours Board considers the whole area within its jurisdiction as a single unit. No new major projects are contemplated at the present time.

DE HAVILAND 125, CF-CFL ACCIDENT

Question No. 122—Mr. Forrestall:

1. With reference to the News Release dated May 27, 1970, No. 26-70 of the Department of Transport, what steps have been taken to ensure that procedural errors will not reoccur?

2. To what specific "system procedural error" is the News Release referring?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The method of handling amendments to Canada Air Pilot in area control centres has been changed to reduce the possibility of error. The methods used, by Unit Chiefs to ensure that these changes are brought to the immediate attention of the Unit Control Staff, have been revised and steps taken to provide a more positive check that all copies of cancelled procedures are promptly removed and destroyed.

2. The "system procedural error", was that the Moncton Centre's copy of Canada Air Pilot was amended by removing the cancelled WK beacon Approach Plate for Wabush Airport, in May 1969. However, there were additional copies of this Plate, contained in Sector binders located at the control boards and through an oversight, these copies were not removed with the result that controllers continued to issue clearances for the "WK" approach after it had been cancelled.

DARTMOUTH PUBLIC WHARF

When does the government intend to do something for the people of Dartmouth with respect to the existing condemned Dartmouth Public Wharf?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): In so far as the National Harbours Board is concerned: A consulting firm has recently completed a report to determine what should be done with regard to the wharf at Dartmouth. Recommendations are expected shortly from the management of Halifax Harbour.

HALIFAX INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Question No. 132—Mr. Forrestall:

1. For what reasons was the Halifax International Airport not included in the list of airports at which technical stops by aircraft would incur greatly reduced charges?

2. Is the decision open to review?

3. Will the government review their decision to exclude the Halifax International Airport in light of real possibility for increased employment opportunities?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. This program was introduced on a trial basis to ascertain whether reduced landing fees would attract trans-oceanic flights for technical stop purposes. The sites chosen were those with greater overflight traffic. On that basis Halifax was not included.

2. The results of the program cannot be fully assessed until late 1971.

3. Yes, if assessment of the program next year indicates it has been successful in increasing business at the airports now included in the scheme.

1. Will the federal government consider the importance of continuing the Militia Summer Program and extend it for all students?

2. How many students took advantage of the Militia Summer training and what was the cost of the program?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Manpower and Immigration and by the Department of National Defence as follows: 1. In any discussion the government might have concerning students, no doubt the Militia Summer Program would be carefully considered in all its aspects.

2. Various programs were undertaken in support of the Government's decision to assist students in finding employment during the summer of 1970. These included: (a) Casual labourers employed at bases and stations; (b) Additional personnel on militia training; (c) Additional personnel on cadet training; (d) Personnel on trades training (pilot project); (e) Labourers employed on range clearance (bush and logs).

The final report on these programs, including actual expenditures, has not been completed yet, but approximately 7,750 additional personnel took militia training. The funds budgeted for Militia training were $4,500,000.

UTILIZATION OF MEAFORD RANGE PROPERTY—ST. VINCENT TOWNSHIP, GREY COUNTY

CLEARING OF UNDETONATED EXPLOSIVES—MEAFORD RANGE, GREY COUNTY

Question No. 293—Mr. Noble:

Is it the intention of the government to establish measures for the purpose of collecting any live ammunition that may be hazardous in the target areas of the Meaford Tank Range and, if so, when will this work be done?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Service procedures require that the officer-in-charge of live firing exercises destroy any live ammunition that does not detonate on contact with its target. There are, however, instances when such ammunition cannot be located and destroyed. As a general policy, National Defence can not dispose for other uses property that is unsafe. The Defence Research Board is examining feasible technical methods of economically clearing and rendering safe areas polluted with undetonated explosives. This study will include consideration of the particular problem at the Meaford Range. However, it is not known at the present time when this study will be completed, or whether it will be practicable to undertake the task.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The use of computers has not contributed directly to a saving in man-hours. As a result of the use of computers by the Department of Veterans Affairs how many employees have been (a) laid off (b) hired?

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence between the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and members of the Consumer Council of Canada regarding the functions of the Council, as mentioned by the Minister and reported in Hansard of December 3, 1969.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the correspondence requested in this motion was between myself and the individual members of the Consumer Council on a personal and confidential basis, and I would therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw the motion.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that a lot of it was published in the press I would like to get the rest, so I should like the question to be put.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mrs. MacInnis) which was negatived on the following division:

Motions for Papers

FEES PAID BY PRIVATE AIRCRAFT USING DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT FACILITIES

Motion No. 74—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the review on user charges and fees paid by private aircraft using the facilities provided by the Department of Transport as mentioned by the Minister without Portfolio in Hansard of November 26, 1969 on page 1291.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the whole matter of user charges and fees is in the process of being revised. However it is not anticipated that the revision will be completed before the fall of 1971.

I would therefore ask the hon. member to kindly withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Skoberg: I agree, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Motion is withdrawn.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

CONSULTANT REPORT FINANCIAL MANAGEMENT IN AIR TRANSPORT COMMAND—1966

Motion No. 79—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Simpson, Riddell, Stead and Partners on the financial management in Air Transport Command undertaken in 1966 for the Department of National Defence, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st Session of this Parliament.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have been in touch with the hon. member in regard to his motion and I believe he is agreeable to withdrawing it.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, the minister has made two good touches today. I agree.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

1967-68 CONSULTANT REPORT, DESIGN OF MANAGEMENT INFORMATION SYSTEM

Motion No. 82—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Operations Research industries, a study and recommendation on the design of a management-information system supporting the departmental planning, programming and budgeting system, undertaken for the Department of Manpower and Immigration in the fiscal year 1967-68, as mentioned in answer to Question No. 1,323 of the 1st Session of this Parliament.

[Translation]

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is requesting a copy of a report prepared by a private firm for the department. This report contains matters confidential to the department, and therefore I regret it cannot be tabled. Under the circumstances, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree to that. I ask that the motion be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

AGRICULTURE—REPORT ON EFFICIENCY OF BILL TO ESTABLISH NATIONAL MARKETING BOARDS

Motion No. 100—Mr. Baldwin:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy or transcript of the report, received by the federal-provincial conference to consider matters of current concern and held in Ottawa on 16 September 1970, that Bill C-197, the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Bill, would enable national marketing boards to be established which could help to meet the marketing problems being encountered in the interprovincial marketing of certain agricultural products, and which report is incorporated by reference thereto in a paper, published and dated the 16th September 1970, titled and purporting to be a "Statement of Conclusions", at page 3, paragraph 13 thereof.

Mr. Barney Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the report requested by the hon. member was made orally to the conference, which by agreement of the participating parties was closed. I think the hon. member will agree that an oral statement is not worth the paper it is printed on anyway. Only the statement of conclusions was authorized for publication. For this reason I would ask the hon. member to withdraw this motion.

Mr. Baldwin: This is agreeable, Mr. Speaker. We find that the oral statements we get from that side of the House are not worth the paper they should be written on.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair is at a loss as to how to interpret the hon. member's reply. Is the motion withdrawn, transferred for debate, dropped, or do we vote?

Mr. Baldwin: Withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Motion withdrawn.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

[Translation]

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON METHODS OF STIMULATING EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance who I am glad to see back in the House looking alive and apparently well. We missed him while he was away; we found it difficult to get information. May I ask the minister whether there have been and are consultations going on with the provinces in regard to methods of easing unemployment this winter?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to welcome my hon. friend back to the House since he was not here on most of the days I was here last week.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Gentle Ben.

Mr. Benson: May I also indicate that I did not expect while in western Canada immediately to understand in a couple of days all of the problems in that part of Canada, as my hon. friend attempted to do in Toronto.

An hon. Member: Remember Lisgar.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that he should now get around to answering the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: In direct answer to the question, may I say we are continuously reviewing methods for improving the economic situation in Canada, and in doing this we are in constant consultation with the provinces.

Mr. Stanfield: Then I gather the answer is that no such consultations are going on. I wonder whether the government of Canada has made any proposals of a joint nature to the provinces for their consideration in order to stimulate employment this winter?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be quite improper for the government of Canada to make proposals to the provinces without first presenting them to the members of this House.

Mr. Stanfield: The air in the mountains must have been rather heady, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether it is his present intention to present a budget to the House before Christmas?

Mr. Benson: No such decision has been made at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

INVESTIGATION OF PRICE INCREASES BY STEEL COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the announcement by the Steel Company of Canada that it intends to increase its prices by 3.3 per cent up to 5.3 per cent, allegedly due to increased labour and material costs despite the fact that the labour contracts were negotiated over a year ago, may I ask the minister whether he is investigating this matter, and what action he and his department propose to take with respect to what appears on the surface to be an unnecessary increase?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Prices and Incomes Commission launched an inquiry into these increases yesterday.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I should like to address to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that investigations by the Prices and Incomes Commission have generally resulted in price increases and no action, would the Prime Minister be prepared to refer the whole question of labour and material costs, operation costs, profits and dividends of the steel industry over recent years either to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs or to a special inquiry set up by the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will take that into consideration, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A further supplementary question. While the Prime Minister is taking that into consideration, may I ask him whether he would be prepared to take the necessary action and ask the steel industry to hold prices where they are pending the Prime Minister's decision on this matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have attempted to do this over the past year with other sectors of the economy but I was not very successful.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Further to my question of yesterday to the right hon. gentleman concerning the recording of a statement by Michel Chartrand on magnetic tape, while in detention, and the smuggling out of the tape under the nose of policemen or guards, is the Prime Minister in a position to clarify the matter today?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Unfortunately I am not, Mr. Speaker. I have obtained no satisfactory information since yesterday. I understand that the Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec has called for an inquiry on this subject and that the police is—

Mr. Fairweather: Do they allow television?

Mr. Trudeau: Excuse me. Does the hon. member have something to say?

Apparently the results of the inquiry are not yet known.

FINANCE

PRIME INTEREST RATE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO BRING ABOUT FURTHER REDUCTION BY BANKS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In order to stimulate the economy, is it the intention of the minister and the government to urge the chartered banks strongly to make a further reduction in the prime interest rate before the end of the year in view of recent further and substantial reductions made by the Bank of Canada, the United States Federal Reserve Board and United States chartered banks, which clearly indicate that a further reduction by the chartered banks in Canada is not only justifiable—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: —but very necessary in order to stimulate the economy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: May I have an answer, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that the question was so long it was difficult to determine whether it was a question or perhaps a little more than that. Would the hon. member state his question briefly.

Mr. Hees: May I state my question a little more briefly. In view of what I have said, is it the intention of the government strongly to urge the chartered banks to make a further reduction in the prime rate before the end of the year?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): If we decide to do this, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will know very quickly.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question since the minister has obviously not so decided. When does he intend to start acting like a financial leader instead of the Charlie McCarthy of the chartered banks?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SCIENCE

SPACE EXPLORATION—SUGGESTIONS MADE BY PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board who apparently is now the spokesman for the government on the subject of space exploration. Do his remarks last night to the Canadian Aeronautics and Space Congress indicate that the government of Canada contemplates seeking associate membership in the planned European space organization, or what was the purpose of the prophecies he made during a most interesting speech?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister should be allowed to reply to the question, but I would think the question should be asked directly rather than by reference to what was said outside the House. Having said that, the minister may reply to the question.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, rather than give a lengthy answer I would be glad to send the right hon. gentleman a copy of the speech to read in which he will see that the suggestions made were specifically and explicitly stated to be hypothetical and exploratory.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is about the first time I have heard a minister of this government tell the truth.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Has the hon. member a supplementary?

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Yes, I have, Mr. Speaker. My supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board is simply this: Does the government's space program merely involve the flying of a kite?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MANPOWER

LACK OF EMPLOYMENT FOR UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has the minister taken into account the reports from various parts of the country, from many organizations of graduate students in Toronto and elsewhere, which highlight the growing unemployment of post-graduate students numbering not hundreds but thousands who have graduated from Canada schools, and has he looked into the matter of applying reciprocity to Great Britain and the United States regarding the admissibility of post-graduate students to work in our institutions and industries?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I presume the reference to reciprocity indicates a desire to explore opportunities for these people abroad. The reports, of course, speak largely of a future situation. It would be our hope that we can maintain employment in Canada for as many of these people as possible. It has been only in recent history that it was a major objective of the Canadian community to attract and retain as many of these people as possible within Canada and I think this will remain the objective.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, has the minister had an opportunity to consult with his manpower centres to ascertain the number of these graduates who are unemployed and have no hope of obtaining work in Canada in the foreseeable future?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

APPOINTMENT OF CANADIAN GRADUATES TO UNIVERSITY TEACHING POSITIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the difficulties Canadian graduate students of Ph.D. level and lower are having in finding jobs teaching in universities, will his department be discussing with the organization of Canadian universities the whole program of filling teaching positions and whether there ought to be a greater drive to fill them with Canadian graduates?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think there have been quite a few discussions on this subject on every level with the universities. They are certainly very much aware of the supply situation, and I am hopeful they will do everything they can to place as many qualified Canadians as possible in the positions which are available.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON ASSISTANCE TO DEPRESSED AREAS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the recent events in the province of Quebec and the fact that certain reports indicate that the federal government is prepared to provide certain funds to that province to alleviate the economic situation there, is the minister prepared at this time to enter into negotiations with the premiers or his counterparts in other provinces where the economic situation is equally bad because of the fact that there is no mobility in the work force and the provinces would like to be able to retain their people? Is he prepared to enter into negotiations with the premiers or his counterparts in these other provinces with a view to giving them the same kind of consideration he is prepared to give to the province of Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are in continuous contact with the provinces about the under-developed regions and the employment situation in said regions.

[English]

[Later:]

SPECIAL INCENTIVES TO INDUSTRIES TO LOCATE IN SASKATCHEWAN AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is the minister giving consideration to providing special incentives to industries to locate in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Newfoundland in view of the failure of the area incentives program, as evidenced by the statistics tabled in the House on November 16, to attract industries to these two provinces?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have indicated my reservation about hon. members asking about each province and each region individually. I would think that if hon. members ask about programs and how they affect each region or province of the country it is doubtful that we would make very much progress. However, the hon. member having asked the question and the Chair having taken a few minutes to comment on it, perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think that the program, as conceived, will necessarily lead to variations between the provinces, i.e. at a given time, some provinces will profit more from it than others, because of the nature of the industries or of the problems involved. In my opinion, a period of one month, or two or even six months is not long enough to judge this program.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: I have a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. This is a very important question because these are two provinces that have a very high rate of unemployment and this program is not helping these provinces. I repeat my question. Is the minister prepared, especially in light of the additional winter unemployment that is anticipated, to provide special incentives for industries to locate in these two provinces?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, in so far as Newfoundland is concerned, that is the province, I believe, that has the largest number of special areas and, as the federal government is spending large amounts there, this creates employment. As a matter of fact, those citizens of Newfoundland whom I have met tell me that the effects of this program are beginning to be felt.

[English]

Mr. Korchinski: What about the northern area of Saskatchewan? Did you ever hear about that?

[Later:]

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Could he indicate in a statement on motions at a later date, in order to clarify the controversy over incentives to industry, what effect this program has had on the employment situation in Atlantic Canada, and also indicate the extent of unemployment in view of the prediction of 14 per cent in Atlantic Canada this winter and over 20 per cent in the province of Newfoundland?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, a debate on this subject will take place shortly, either today or tomorrow. I shall certainly take part in it and I shall then give all the information required.

IMMIGRATION

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS IN REPORT ON APPLICANTS IN CANADA

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Does the minister intend to implement the recommendations of the Sedgwick report on immigration problems?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to consider the report very carefully and to come forward in due course with a decision concerning implementation.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ALLEGED LACK OF POLICE CO-OPERATION IN SEARCH FOR KIDNAPPERS AND MURDERERS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to either the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice. In view of the apparent conflict between the Quebec Provincial Police and the municipal police, has the minister received any information that the conflict has impeded the RCMP in the co-operative investigation, particularly in view of the fact that they have not even been notified of Rose's escape?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the conflict of which the hon. member speaks, but in any event I want to assure him that the RCMP have not been impeded in their work.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister tell us, in his usual factual way, whether either the municipal or provincial police actually informed the RCMP of the fact that Rose and his cohorts had escaped from the apartment in question?

Mr. McIlraith: I am not aware of any factual situation which indicated that Rose and his cohorts did escape. We know that persons escaped. Who they were is not yet established.

An hon. Member: Did they not take their fingerprints?

Mr. McIlraith: Let me say in any event, to deal with the substantive part of the question of the hon. member, that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were not informed until Tuesday evening of that week.

Mr. Woolliams: I am not going to quarrel over who was there, but in light of the Solicitor General's answer I wonder if he could advise the House why the RCMP were not notified. I heard the minister's answers previously, and I understood there was supposed to be a co-operative investigation by the RCMP, together with the other two police forces. Why were the RCMP not notified?

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

Mr. McIlraith: I regret I am unable to answer the question. I simply do not know.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wonder if I could help out the minister with information which I received within the last few minutes. I do not know whether this has been brought to his attention. Quebec Provincial Police Director, Maurice St. Pierre, has stated that the RCMP was not notified about the escape until the following Tuesday, which is what the minister said, "because we had no official notification that the RCMP were on duty Friday night". I ask the minister, is the RCMP co-operating with the Quebec provincial police and the municipal police on selective duty on selected days, or what does this nonsense by Mr. St. Pierre mean?

An hon. Member: Are they on the roster system?

Mr. McIlraith: The right hon. gentleman will have to take responsibility—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do.

Mr. McIlraith: —for the truthfulness of the document he just read. I simply cannot accept the document as an accurate statement of what the director of the Quebec sureté said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was this information not passed on to the minister? Was any information passed on to him? Mr. St. Pierre said that murder and kidnapping fall within his jurisdiction anyway. Is that the way in which the co-operation is taking place, that the Quebec Provincial Police are actually not securing the co-operation of the RCMP?

An hon. Member: Or vice-versa.

Mr. McIlraith: The right hon. gentleman is trying to draw inferences from his questions that the facts do not warrant.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They were three days without notice.

Mr. McIlraith: The RCMP was advised of the arrest of Lortie early Saturday morning.

Mr. Woolliams: What about his friends?

Mr. McIlraith: Dealing with the other matters to which the right hon. gentleman referred, one did not occur until late Saturday and the other incident or discovery on Monday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The RCMP did not receive any notice until Tuesday night. Is that co-operation on the part of the QPP?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Champlain.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if I could ask one question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Champlain.

AGRICULTURE

INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): I would like to address my question to the Minister of Justice. Since there now appears to be a very real danger that the obstruction of the normal interprovincial trade in eggs and broilers brought about by recent provincial regulations may extend to other primary foods and to manufactured goods, will the government now consider referring this question to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Earlier questions from the hon. member for Peace River and other hon. members prompted from me the answer that I do not feel a reference to the Supreme Court is the best way of handling the situation. I subscribe entirely to the view of the Minister of Agriculture that the piece of legislation before the House is a more satisfactory way. Aside from that, there is no uniformity in the legislation of the various provinces, nor is there any pattern in the factual basis on which the regulations are being administered. Unless there is unanimity on fact, a reference to the Supreme Court would be of no avail.

Mr. Danforth: May I ask this supplementary question of the minister? If this restriction is placed against trade in manufactured goods, it appears it will in no way come under the regulations to be prescribed by the national marketing agency, so will the government give consideration to this new situation that is developing?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The government will consider all new factors.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Will the minister not consult with the Attorneys General of the provinces to see whether it is not possible to get agreement on drawing up terms of reference which would deal with this very acute problem threatening the union of our country to see if it cannot be brought to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): At the last meeting of the first ministers, most of the Attorneys General were present. The consensus of that meeting of first ministers was that the best solution was the type of legislation proposed by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Horner: That is no solution at all.

CITIZENSHIP

RESPONSE TO LETTER FROM NATIVE CULTURAL AND COMMUNICATIONS SOCIETY OF ONTARIO

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to whoever is the Acting Minister without Portfolio dealing with citizenship matters. Why has there been no response to the letter written to the minister under the date of August 24 of this year by the Native Cultural and Communications Society of Ontario? Out of courtesy at least, could there not be a reply?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will take note of the question and communicate it to the minister.

QUEBEC—INFORMATION TO BE PUBLISHED BY POLICE—ALLEGED DIFFERENCE OF OPINION BETWEEN AUTHORITIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Solicitor General a question relating to the difference of opinion between the federal authority and the Quebec provincial authority concerning what information should be released by the police. Has any reason been given by a spokesman for the police in Quebec as to why no public statement was made about missing these men until some days afterwards? In view of the difference of opinion between the Quebec and federal authorities as to what information should be published, the police in Quebec are now simply passing information on to Mr. Choquette and having him decide what should be published. What is the difference of opinion between the Quebec and federal authorities as to what information should be published by the police?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): I think I should point out to the Leader of the Opposition again that the responsibility for the administration of justice in criminal cases lies with the provincial Attorney General. I am not aware of any difference of opinion between the federal and provincial police authorities as to what should or should not be published. If the hon. gentleman has evidence of some difference of opinion on that point, I would be very grateful to him if he would pass it on to me. I would be glad to explore the matter further.

Mr. Stanfield: Yes, Mr. Speaker. May I be of assistance to the Solicitor General and refer him to the responsible police authorities in the province of Quebec. I suggest to the minister that he might make inquiries in that quarter to find out what the difficulties are.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to deal with that question. I do not think it is good enough, in a matter of this seriousness, just to take every item in every speculative story in the press and rely on what is asserted there as fact.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the Solicitor General whether this is not the proper place to give the responsible minister an opportunity to assert the facts?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is, if a proper question is asked.

Mr. Woolliams: I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Solicitor General, who has gone so far as to state that the RCMP is under his jurisdiction and responsibility. If he has not got the information today would he seek it out and let us have a full statement so far as this mess is concerned, instead of giving all these answers which are mere verbiage?

HEALTH

INCLUSION OF PARAMEDICAL SERVICES UNDER MEDICARE

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. How many provinces must agree to the inclusion of paramedical services under medicare before these services will be accepted by the federal government as a cost-shared item?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the government in the past has been that we would desire a consensus to develop before there is any extension of coverage. Of course, this question was never seriously considered until every province had entered medicare, and that is just about the case now.

Mr. Harding: Is the government considering cost-sharing of paramedical services with any province which will include these services under its medical care program?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. member could be a little more specific. Paramedical services cover a very wide area.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): As a supplementary question, if the optometrists of any one province were to ask him to make an agreement with them under medicare, has the minister the power to make it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not acceptable. The hon. member is asking the minister to express an opinion. I would not think that in those terms the question is in order.

Mrs. MacInnis: Then, may I ask it in a different way. Has the minister met with the optometrists in any one province to consider making an agreement with them, and is he prepared to do so?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I met with the optometrists—I do not believe they were from any one particular province but rather representatives of their national association—many months ago to hear their representations to be included in medicare. But as they are well aware, that has to be done through the provinces. If they are to be covered there would have to be agreement between the provinces and the federal government.

PENSIONS

OLD AGE SECURITY—CLAIMS FOR OVERPAYMENT OF SUPPLEMENTARY BENEFITS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It concerns a specific case about which I received a lot of letters, that of an old age pensioner who was poor enough to qualify for supplementary benefits. After his death it was found that he had been overpaid by the sum of $6, and a formal claim was filed against his wife, who was in poor circumstances. Would the minister investigate this pernicious practice of making claims for small overpayments of supplementary benefits against the estates of old age pensioners who have been overpaid through the error of the government?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is in the form of a submission. He will have to take it that his suggestion will be considered by the minister.

WAR MEASURES CUT—JOBS LOST BY PEOPLE DETAINED AND RELEASED WITHOUT CHARGE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Perhaps the minister would like to take this question as notice, because obviously the details have to come from the Minister of Justice of Quebec. How many people who were arrested, detained and released without having been charged under the War Measures Act regulations have lost their jobs?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I will take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PAKISTAN—ASSISTANCE TO CYCLONE AND FLOOD VICTIMS

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I address my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the tragedy in the Bay of Bengal and Pakistan and continuing reports of the spreading of disease, with loss of life running into the hundreds of thousands, can the minister say whether any relief program, in addition to the original gift to the Red Cross, is being planned by the Canadian government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I said in the House the other day, we have made a gift of $50,000 to the International Red Cross, and we have asked the Pakistani authorities to give us a list of the goods that would be useful in this emergency. As soon as we receive it, we will give it sympathetic consideration.

Mr. Thompson: Has the minister considered the establishment of an office which would be geared to meet such tragedies, and which would be able to cut through the red tape and bureaucracy that often hinders such emergency programs?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that in the case of Canada there has been any red tape to be cut through. As I say, we are waiting for a list. As soon as we receive it from the Pakistani authorities we will give it sympathetic consideration and act quickly.

WAR MEASURES ACT—TIME SPENT IN CUBA, ALGERIA OR JORDAN BY THOSE CHARGED

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Has the minister seen fit to have an investigation made to determine whether any of the people arrested and charged under the War Measures Act spent any period of time in Cuba, Algeria or Jordan during the last two years?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there has been no special investigation ordered on that matter. I do not know that I should give details of the background of particular persons who have been charged, as that may have a bearing on their trial. There is some difficulty in this regard, but there is knowledge on that subject concerning a good many of them.

GOVERNMENT OFFICES

USE OF PUBLIC TENDER SYSTEM IN LEASING SPACE

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Is the government giving consideration to the use of the public tender system in the securing of leased space for government offices and in securing architectural services?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Coates: As a supplementary question, has a study been under way within the department, and when will the public be made aware of what action the government intends to take in this regard?

Mr. Laing: We have invited tenders for space in the cities of Ottawa and Hull. We now have a variety of offers, but no decision has been made yet in respect of those that will be taken up.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES MINISTERIAL MEETING—ITEMS ON AGENDA

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance similar to a question I addressed to the Prime Minister the other day. Can he tell us what items will be on the agenda of the Canada-U.S. ministerial conference which is to be held in Ottawa next week, and which ministers will be representing the Canadian government on that occasion?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will defer to the Secretary of State for External Affairs for an answer to this question.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the agenda has not yet been agreed with our U.S. counterparts so that I cannot give a definitive list of the items that will be discussed. However, I expect that all the principal questions affecting Canadian-American relations in the economic and financial fields will be discussed. I have seen a tentative list of an agenda that we would put before our American friends but, as I say, I cannot reveal that since it has not been agreed.

The ministers who ordinarily attend are the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry depending upon the matters to be considered. In addition, the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Canadian Ambassador to Washington are usually included on the Canadian side. In addition to that, on this occasion if there are other ministers who have responsibilities that are touched upon in these discussions they will be invited to attend at that time.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that the Deputy Minister of External Affairs, the Deputy Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Chairman of the National Energy Board have been in Washington this week holding discussions with the U.S. authorities, is the whole question of energy resources going to be discussed at this conference in Ottawa next week?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would be very surprised if it were not to be. It will be one of the matters to be discussed between the ministers and the secretaries of the United States. I think it is very useful that we should have an exchange of views. As the hon. member knows, no decisions are made at such meetings. They are purely a matter of exploring one another's points of view to prepare the ground for any agreements that may subsequently be made.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION DEALING WITH DISPUTES

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): I have a question for the Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister intend to present legislation in this session which will provide better methods for dealing with labour-management disputes in Canada and, if so, when will it be introduced?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as indicated in the Speech from the Throne, amendments to the existing legislation will be brought forward in this session of Parliament. In the interval, I can only suggest to management and labour that they show the usual degree of responsibility in arriving at collective agreements.

GRAIN

WHEAT—DELIVERY TO RUSSIA OF REMAINING QUANTITY UNDER SALE CONTRACT

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Can the minister indicate if the government has a firm commitment that Russia will take the balance of the 135 million bushels of wheat still outstanding on the previously negotiated three-year sales contract? If so, can he say when the board expects to deliver this grain?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, no specific bookings have been entered into for this grain. The Canadian Wheat Board and Exportkhleb referred to this particular amount of grain in the course of their last discussions and it was agreed that it would be taken as soon as it is conveniently possible and desirable for the U.S.S.R. to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have only two or three minutes left before the end of the question period, so perhaps we might allow two or three more questions.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

SYMBOL PAINTED ON WAR MEMORIAL

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, he being the minister responsible for the NCC area. I would ask if the symbol that has been painted on the National War Memorial was put there with government approval and, if not, what action is the government taking to prevent the defacing of national monuments?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I have to inform the hon. gentleman that I am no longer responsible for the National Capital Commission.

An hon. Member: Hurrah!

Mr. MacLean: Then, could I address the question to the proper minister?

Mr. Stanfield: Wherever he is.

WAR MEASURES ACT—PAYMENT BY QUEBEC FOR SERVICES OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of National Defence.

Two weeks ago I asked the right hon. Prime Minister who would have to pay for the armed forces services in Quebec. The answer was that the expenses had to be borne by that Province. Two days later, it was said in reply to a question of the Ralliement Créditiste leader (Mr. Caouette) that negotiations were going on on that matter between Quebec and the federal government. I ask the Minister of National Defence if a decision has been reached in that regard and if the armed forces services in the province of Quebec will be paid by Ottawa or Quebec, or on a joint basis.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the matter is still being discussed.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question—

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Joliette on a supplementary, I believe.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

As Quebec could be responsible for the total cost, which might prove embarrassing for the Quebec government, can the minister tell us the daily cost for the services of the army in Quebec?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the exact figure with me at this time.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF NEW CHIEF COMMISSIONER

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Has the government reached a decision on the appointment of a new chief commissioner for the Canadian Wheat Board and, if so, when will this be announced? Also, can the minister assure the House that whoever is appointed will not be from the private grain trade?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No decision has been reached on this matter, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members are aware of the fact that the Wheat Board has appointed a very important committee to examine its operations. It has been my thought that before reaching any firm conclusion, the Wheat Board should be in possession of this report and in a position to comment on it to us. The report is expected before too long.

PUBLIC WORKS

EDMONTON—REQUEST FOR GRANT TO BUILD OMNIPLEX

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the referendum on November 25 in the city of Edmonton, and in view of the thawing of the austerity deep freeze, will the minister consider making a substantial federal grant to the Edmonton omniplex, the first all-weather stadium in Canada, in order that it can be available for the 1972 Arctic Bowl or Grey Cup?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I promise the hon. member that I will look into the measure of responsibility, if any, which we have. I also assure him that I will first find out what an omniplex is.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED LACK OF POLICIES AND PROGRAMS TO PREVENT UNEMPLOYMENT, POVERTY AND SOCIAL INJUSTICE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That this House condemns the government for increasing the economic inequalities between different regions of Canada by its opposition to full employment policy and its refusal to use short term and long term programs in a timely and effective manner to prevent the resulting recession-level poverty and social injustice now widespread in Canada.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the House would agree to the same form of time limit that we have had and which has proved successful in previous debates, namely half an hour for the Leader of the Opposition introducing the motion, half an hour for the spokesman for the government, 20 minutes for other party leaders and 15 minutes thereafter. This has been very acceptable and has certainly improved the quality of the speeches.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: We agree, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There seems to be agreement on the suggestion made by the hon. member for Peace River and it will be so ordered.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, during the question period there were several questions which I think arose from a reported statement by Dr. Frank Kelly, a science adviser to the Science Council of Canada to the effect that it is anticipated that about half the Ph.Ds' who will be graduating within the next few months will not be able to find work. No doubt this is partly due to inappropriate training in some cases, but surely it also indicates in a very dramatic way the extent of the slowdown in economic development in this country. It also indicates in a very dramatic way the effect this is having even upon highly educated young Canadians.

There can be no question now but that the government has bungled very badly in its economic policies during the past year. Some of us have the impression that the ministers have been so busy admiring themselves they have not really noticed what has been going on in the country. The complacency which has been manifested, particularly in the Speech from the Throne, is in such striking contrast to actual conditions in the country that it is very difficult, when reading the Speech from the Throne now, to believe that it referred to the country in which we have been living these past few months.

The difficulty does not merely arise from the outbreak of terrorism, kidnapping and murder in the province of Quebec; it also arises out of the mounting unemployment that exists in this country. It is true that during this past year or so the government has been busy fighting inflation. This is fine. This is important and it is good, provided it is done with good judgment. But I have the impression sometimes that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) felt he was going to take this country by the neck if necessary and shake inflation right out of it, even if he choked the country in the process.

Because we have been waiting for some relief for the veterans and we have been waiting for some further assistance to older people, we have refused to believe that this country is in such a desperate position that the veterans and older people must pay such a heavy price for the fight against inflation. We wonder what happened to the war against poverty which was declared a couple of years ago. We have wondered why the government has not made some response to the call from the Economic Council of Canada for the Government of Canada to meet headlong the challenge of poverty in this country. What the government chose to do instead was to slow down our economy, the result being the heavy increase in unemployment and an anticipated very heavy increase this winter.

All this, the projected increase in our employment this winter and the projected deplorable conditions that will exist then, has not been taken seriously by this government. One could consider the budget of last spring and the warnings given by all sides of what would happen. May I remind the House that early in August I asked the government to reconvene Parliament promptly for two reasons. One of those was to enable the government to present to Parliament, so that Parliament could discuss them, plans for actively combatting anticipated heavy unemployment this winter. That was last August, but no program has been presented yet.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: All this has been brushed aside. The Prime Minister and others have chosen from time to time to ridicule programs such as winter works. They content themselves with reciting day after day and week after week the few measures that have been taken by the government during recent months, measures which have always proved to be totally inadequate. We had a debate last week, I think it was, on this and related subjects; yet all we obtained from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) was another recital of the things that the government had done. Apparently, there was no recognition at all of the inadequacy of the measures that the government had taken. Now, we have had the Minister of Finance, who has been out west this past week, expressing warnings. The warnings were about the dangers of protection in the United States. We were warned about the danger to Canada arising from certain philosophies held in the United States. I wonder, sir, whether he would not be better off paying a little more attention to the benighted policies of his own government.

I have heard rumours and reports to the effect that officials serving this government are hard at work trying to develop programs at this stage, at this time of year, to fight unemployment this winter. It is reported that this plan will be unveiled soon. I hope so. It is late in the day and the outlook at present is that as a result of the folly of this government the people of this country are going to pay a very heavy price indeed. I hope, sir, that at least one thing will come out of this; I hope that this government will be shaken out of the nineteenth century.

All across Canada unemployment is mounting. We have the unemployment statistics published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics; we have the information that unemployment insurance benefit payments have increased. We had information disclosed in the supplementary estimates considered recently that payments to the provinces for welfare have had to be increased. As a consequence, the supplementary estimates of this government in this area increased by $51 million. This, in part, is the result of increased unemployment. Of course, an incidental effect of it will be that very heavy burdens will be laid upon the municipalities and provincial governments involved. It is bad across the whole country, sir, and it is particularly bad in slow growth areas. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand, Langelier) is not present. But I say to the minister, through you, sir, that the economic slowdown in this country and the pronounced effect that will have on our slow growth areas is such as to virtually make a mockery of the efforts of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in his attempt to encourage development in those areas.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) pointed out in the question period how little had been done for his province, at any rate, by that department. Yet even where the effort of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has been substantial, even where the effort of his department has been substantial, that effort could accomplish nothing in view of the slowdown and the demoralizing effect resulting from general economic policies prevalent in this country as well as the discouragement that results from the slowdown in the national rate of growth.

All this, sir, is particularly hard on such areas as Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, but the effect is not confined to them. Actually, differing rates of unemployment in various areas are themselves one of the best indicators of how serious this problem has become. British Columbia, the Atlantic provinces and Quebec are all going to suffer a great deal this winter. Of that there can be no doubt. The amount of aid available through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is not going to help very much, and the extra money that the government has promised is pretty ridiculous when contrasted with the need. This is another example of this government's lack of concern, and of its lack of effective policies, in doing anything of importance to smooth out these dangerous discrepancies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not want to be altogether unfair about this. In its own way, the government has done something along this line. It is true that the areas of high unemployment are still there, and that the unemployment is getting higher. But there has been one development in that the areas of relatively low unemployment are becoming scarcer and scarcer, and they may even soon vanish altogether. The Prairies are expecting a rate double that of last year and Ontario appears to be heading for its greatest number of jobless in a good many years. That, sir, is equalization according to the style of the present government. If you cannot cure poverty, spread it around. I wonder what it is going to do for an encore.

What does unemployment mean in concrete terms, sir? Even to the person and community still relatively untouched by unemployment, it has a real, though subtle, significance. It means lost opportunities for the businessmen; it means a lower standard of living for the family and for the community; it means at the very least a certain sense of insecurity. Actually, it means everything that comes from living in an economy that is working at far under its own potential, in an economy that is therefore insecure. This is the effect of mass unemployment, even on those who do not seem immediately to be affected, or directly affected. It is different for those who perhaps are not yet personally affected and who live in a city or town where unemployment is rife. The feeling of insecurity is much more pronounced; social morale is down; business and commerce of all sorts are much more directly hit. The community itself is poor; it cannot afford to spend money even for social essentials. It tends to become run-down.

It should not be necessary to talk about the people, the wage earners and the families who are directly involved. But with this government, it seems to be necessary time after time to remind it what this means in terms of loss of human dignity, of vanishing hopes and of a bitterness towards society. This loss of human potential and of human resources may well be more than temporary, because a man can be out of work for so long that he loses a great deal of his drive, and even his sense of personal dignity. A prolonged period of joblessness for a proud man can be a terrible thing. It can destroy his willingness and even his ability to work. That is one of the dangers of the prolonged and massive type of unemployment that this country has been experiencing. And it will go on experiencing this more intensively according to the forecasts. No government should need to be reminded of this, but it seems that this government must be reminded.

I will not take time this afternoon to speak about social unrest. Certainly, I am not going to suggest that political terrorism and support for political terrorism are a direct result of mass unemployment. That would be far too simple an explanation and it would not be right in any event. Yet, surely it is obvious even to this government that unemployment of this type creates a social climate where whole groups of men are embittered to the point where they begin to think about violent attempts at solutions, even if they are not yet accepted.

Along with human poverty, loss of individual dignity and social unrest, there are of course the economic effects of unemployment. I should not have to remind a government that has put so much stress on economic statistics that mass unemployment means a lowered input into that system, combined with a higher level of unproductive demand on that same system. As the Economic Council of Canada points out in its latest report, when an economy is working below its potential, there is no way of it ever recovering the losses that it sustains during such a period. That is an absolutely irrecoverable loss.

And yet this government does not seem to be unduly concerned. The Minister of Finance is quoted as having said yesterday that everything is looking up—that prosperity is just around the corner, so to speak. Well, I hope it is pretty sharp corner because, if it is not, the promise does not mean very much. In fact, on the face of it, it looks simply like a new expression of the complacency we have come to expect from this government. It tells more about the government than it does about the economy of this country.

It seems a long time ago, in terms of the events that have taken place, but it was just a little more than a month ago that the government produced what still has to be considered as the utmost example of complacency, the Speech from the Throne. We were described as a country somehow calmer and better than the others, despite our tiny little problems that the government was going to solve for us. We were even on the verge of greatness. I would say rather than the government was on the verge of lateness. The government's tardiness in all fields, from security to economic management, has been amply demonstrated ever since. I say that with no joy. All hon. members in this House are Canadians and have no desire to see this country in trouble. But neither can we deny the existence of the signs that we are in some trouble. That is why I am sorry I have to remind the government about the effects of its policies. We must keep insisting until we get action. It should not be necessary, as I said before but, unfortunately, in view of the apparent lack of concern that this government has demonstrated, we in the opposition must do so.

This government, and let us make no mistake about it, has responsibilities that it cannot simply slough off. It is very easy to blame business, it is very easy to blame labour unions, farmers, or any other groups you might care to mention, for the economic problems we are facing. The government has not been shy about blaming other people. And when it runs short of people it will even blame humanity in general. It is greed that is to blame, as the Prime Minister said last September when he was discussing unemployment in a speech in Quebec.

If the Prime Minister wants to blame human frailties, I suggest he choose a few others. How about incompetence on the part of the government? How about a lack of concern on the part of that same government as to what is happening to the workers and to the economy of this country? What about complacency? There is the real ally of the devil. And it is a quality that this government has in abundance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: One of these days we will have to discuss trade policy because that is another area of complacency. We are talking about matters of more immediate concern. I hope that this government does not repeat the steps it has taken because the steps that have been taken have been inadequate. I hope no one will do what the Prime Minister did some time ago with regard to housing, rise and say that there is no crisis. The housing situation is serious, as is the unemployment situation. It is late in the day to attack the problems of this winter, but we must try.

I have made these suggestions before. First, the government should have an immediate conference with the provinces, move forward on projects and discuss other methods of stimulating employment this winter. All the municipalities and provinces have projects on which they can move forward, if they can solve some of their budgetary problems. This conference should examine the position of some of the municipalities and provinces with regard to their capacity to meet the responsibilities they will have to discharge this winter in terms of welfare.

Second, the government should review the position announced by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) about a week ago that no interim changes were planned with regard to the amount and duration of the unemployment insurance benefits or the qualifications required to earn these benefits. This would be useful and should be studied.

Third, the Minister of Finance should present an immediate budget which, among other things, should indicate a clear direction to the economy, not a continuation of the ambiguous statements being made by the minister such as "We will encourage the economy to expand as rapidly and as soon as we think it is efficient for it to expand". What does that mean? In what way does that indicate to the business community or the country the concrete way in which the government would like the economy to expand? To what extent does this indicate in a tangible way the economic goals of the government for the immediate future? To what extent does it give guidance to the business community or the community as a whole as to the basis of its plans.

The government should concentrate on tax reductions. It should remove the sales tax on building materials used in the construction of housing. This would provide an immediate stimulus throughout the country in terms of employment as well as providing additional homes for Canadians. A reduction in income tax should be more than an elimination of the surcharge that was added to fight inflation. This would not be inflationary. It would be interesting to see whether such a move would reduce the inflationary pressures resulting from rising wages. It would not necessarily affect government revenues because the expanding economy would produce additional revenues. Perhaps just as important as far as the private sector is concerned, the government should remove as quickly as possible the uncertainty with regard to the unpegged dollar and our exchange rates, as well as the main outlines and positions on tax reform which are causing the uncertainty. The government should immediately indicate its position with regard to the modifications in the white paper proposals as suggested by the House of Commons and Senate Committees.

There are other suggestions that can be considered. I say to the government, through Your Honour, let us get going. During the past two years inequalities have increased in this country. That is unfortunate, but it is true. Inequalities have increased as between regions and among individuals with regard to opportunity. There has been increased poverty among the aged and the unemployed. I say people are paying a heavy price for the complacency of this government and I sincerely request that the government give us today not merely a recital of what has been inadequately done in recent months, but what it proposes to do. Unless the government comes forward today or tomorrow with some concrete proposals reassuring us of its energy, its concern and its effectiveness, I certainly call upon this House to support this motion.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I was pleased to note that during some part of his speech today the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) addressed himself to the words of the motion. I must say I thought he was probably in a mood to repeat once again a speech which he has made before in the hope that its impact would grow with retelling. Unfortunately, it does not seem to be having that effect, although I must say that when he refers to the difficult situation of individuals who are unemployed, of individuals who find themselves in difficult circumstances, his speech is improving, probably because he has been using the eloquent words spoken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) on this aspect of the subject.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

The Leader of the Opposition seems to find difficulty in appreciating what is involved in solving the inflation problem while at the same time producing an atmosphere in which the economy, and employment opportunities, can expand. It is true the Leader of the Opposition did note that there was inflation to be fought, and that this was an important task, but he did not seem to realize the natural economic impact of attempts to get the economy under control. It appears to me that members opposite fail to appreciate the tremendous importance to this country of the private sector and of decisions made in that sector of the economy; the government's monetary and fiscal measures can, it is true, have an important effect—but only an effect—on those decisions.

The economy of this country is basically sound and is capable of moving forward along a path which now seems to lie clearly ahead. It was vital, though, that inflation be brought under control—vital for the sake of those on relatively fixed incomes, vital for the sake of every region of this country. We have begun to succeed in this task. When we began, we made it clear that in our view the controlling of inflation, so fundamental to long term growth, could have a serious impact upon immediate employment levels unless marked restraint were exercised by all sectors of the economy in their claims as to the amount they would like to take out of the economy in return for their services. We urged restraint upon business, upon labour and upon all groups in this country to the end that more people might be employed in the production of goods at lower cost. This is simple economic truth which I should apologize for repeating were it not so clear that members opposite do not understand it.

Our dilemma at this time arises from the need to maintain a firm hand on inflation within the economy. The Leader of the Opposition talked about additional expenditures and tax reductions without showing any concern for their effect in terms of inflation. I should not say he showed no concern; his words were "It would be interesting to see the effect—." Well, it is not hard to foretell the effect of removing all constraints on economic policy. Surely, the road to an expanding economy, to growing employment, is to build and maintain confidence within the whole of the economy and particularly within the private sector, in its readiness and ability to grow and move forward. It is inflation itself which has been, in its way, a deadly throttler of growth in the private sector. It is confidence in the economy which will, in itself, bring about more investment. What are needed at this point are firm decisions on the part of the private sector in the economy to move forward.

The Leader of the Opposition asked for a signal. Surely, that signal has already been given in terms of announcements which demonstrate the determination of the government to deal with inflation and create a climate in which jobs can be provided through investment and growth. There remains a serious issue in relation to the amounts sought to be taken out of the economy by those who are strong and, at the same time, unwilling to moderate their claims. I know from what they are saying that members of the Tory party would not like to see restraints applied to the business community. And I know we shall hear from our friends in the New Democratic Party how wrong it would be if the restraints of good sense were applied to certain other sectors of the economy. It is important they be applied to all.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): What is stopping you?

Mr. Lang: It is important both to maintain the economic policies designed to control inflation and to encourage the forward movement of the private sector which is now, as recent figures indicate, beginning to show. The government has taken significant steps in the direction of improving the atmosphere for growth and development. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has, during the last few weeks, given details on several occasions of monetary and fiscal measures which should create greater opportunity for the private sector to move forward.

Mr. McIntosh: Should, but don't.

Mr. Lang: The pessimists on the other side say "should, but don't." What we need basically is faith in the strength of the economy.

An hon. Member: We need Oral Roberts.

Mr. Lang: I might draw attention, among other things, to the improvement of the financial position of provincial governments through the advancement of payments to the provinces, which in turn have enabled them to help municipalities go forward with their own projects.

The motion referred to regional disparities. Surely, no words could be more displaced than words which suggest a lack of concern by this government about regional inequality in this country.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. McIntosh: What about selling some more wheat?

Mr. Lang: The hon. member says, what about wheat? I suggest that is one other factor, and its impact is beginning to be felt, which will lead to a burgeoning growth of the economy in the west and from that will follow, as the hon. member must know, an impact which will be felt across the whole of this country, and before long at that.

Mr. McIntosh: Tell us about barley now.

Mr. Lang: The government has been increasing in dramatic fashion the amount of money made available to regions of this country that have fallen behind economically.

Mr. McIntosh: Through barley sales?

Mr. Lang: Through regional economic expansion. Expenditures have been made to develop these regions industrially and to place jobs there. Within the sector for which I have some special responsibility, manpower, this year the government will be spending $291.3 million on a manpower training program alone. I should like to outline to hon. members the way in which this program not only deals with the specific problem of helping to train and upgrade an individual, but also the great impact it has in regions that need the most help.

Mr. McIntosh: What are you going to do now?

Mr. Lang: Through this program the department directs its attention primarily to those areas in which are to be found the largest number of people in need of retraining and upgrading. This has a direct impact in offsetting those factors in our economy which might tend to leave these regions behind.

I made reference to the sum of $291.3 million. Hon. members opposite frequently refer to the old winter works program which, with all its difficulties and disadvantages, in its final year received only $27 million. Here is a program involving the sum of $291.3 million that is directed toward the training and upgrading of people all across the country, but particularly those who can best use retraining and upgrading in the course of seeking employment, thus strengthening the economy as a whole.

I think it is obvious to hon. members of this House that the government is seriously concerned about an unemployment problem that is visible to all. Speaking in a debate on a similar topic only a week ago, the Minister of Finance expressed his and the government's concern when he emphasized, as I have done, the need to go ahead in terms of a solid economy while at the same time doing everything that can be done to encourage that growth for which we are all looking.

To suggest that any lack of attention is being paid to regions of the country which have the highest unemployment is, of course, to fly completely in the face of the policies and actions of this government. This government has been concerned not only about those regions having special economic difficulties but also about those groups of people who have special problems. In addition, it has been concerned about the fact that as long as inflation is allowed to continue it will be these people who will suffer the most. It is our determination, as it is our responsibility, to see that the economy is put into such sound shape that inflation is under control; that an atmosphere is created for additional employment opportunities, particularly in the private sector of the economy; that the private sector is able to move forward and, together with the public sector, take steps to create the employment that is required.

We on this side of the House have faith and confidence in the economy. We do not think that the suggestions of the Leader of the Opposition with regard to a further conference and further discussions, which seemed to be the meat of his proposals, would be any substitute for the action that is being taken to encourage, to the extent that is responsible, growth in the economy, particularly in the private sector.

The Leader of the Opposition has commented on government expenditure, and I note only that he would be interested to see the effect of his suggestions. He does not feel any sense of responsibility in regard to those actions that he proposes. It is our responsibility to deal with both sides of this difficult question. We must inspire confidence in the economy, must ensure that fundamentally it is sound, and that the private sector will see the economy move forward with rapidity in the days ahead.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the motion presented by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) criticizes the government because its opposition to full employment has increased economic inequalities in this country. It also criticizes the government because its refusal to introduce short-term and long-term programs has resulted in recession-level poverty and social injustice in this country. It seems to me that the facts that are apparent in Canada today fully bear out these grounds for condemnation.

The government's decision to precipitate an economic recession in order to combat inflation has caused injury to the entire society of Canada. However, it has fallen with undue severity upon the depressed areas and segments of our society. When the government decided to curb inflation by precipitating an economic recession, it took no steps whatever to safeguard those areas of Canada which were already adversely affected by economic conditions.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) has stated that the government is valiantly trying to combat inflation but that it cannot put any programs to work without reviving that inflation. He went on to say that the members of the New Democratic Party were opposed to any limitation being placed on the incomes of those in certain sectors of the economy. The minister is either not paying any attention to what is going on in the House or he is playing fast and loose with the facts. The members of this party have repeatedly said, and moved motions to the effect, that we believe the government should long ago have imposed a prices and incomes policy.

The only two stipulations we made were that an incomes policy should cover all forms of income, not just wages and salaries but also prices, profits, interest rates and rents, and secondly that it should not freeze those who are on very low incomes but should allow them to be raised to a reasonable level. That is the position we have taken. When the Minister of Manpower and Immigration says they want to curb inflation and stop it, then I ask why on earth do they not get on with the job. No one is stopping them imposing a mandatory prices and incomes policy. If they asked the provinces they would receive the co-operation of most of them. They, of course, have been victims of inflation.

There is no doubt that the government's policy has not only affected employment all over Canada generally but has caused more unemployment in those areas which already had less employment, particularly the province of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. Now the Prairie provinces, which generally do not have unemployment, have seen a very sharp rise in unemployment.

Not only are regions affected by the government's policy but also segments of society itself, those least able to protect their own interests such as farmers, fishermen, small businessmen and those in the service industries. These have suffered because when the government started its policy of fiscal and monetary restraint it did nothing to make sure the areas already adversely affected were not subjected to still further depression. This government has forsaken the basic goals set by the federal government and the governments of all the provinces at the end of the Second World War. When the war was over, we started out to build a new Canada and all governments agreed there were two goals toward which we should move. The first was full employment with a high level of income. The second was the right of every Canadian no matter where he or she may live to enjoy a high standard of health, education and welfare services. I point out, although it is unnecessary to do so, that the government certainly has failed in respect of this first objective. The government has not managed to obtain full employment. This is shown by the latest figures issued by the government.

The unemployment figure for October is shown as 419,000. That does not include those persons receiving training, farm labourers, or the women and a number of other people who drop out of the labour market through sheer frustration. The total would probably represent half a million people. But the figure of 419,000 is 105,000 higher than the total for the previous year. The most unfortunate part of the statistics is that 188,000 of the unemployed are young people 24 years of age and under. This afternoon the minister boasted about the large sums of money the government is paying for training. We in this party support these expenditures for training. For years we advocated the setting up of a manpower training department. Certainly, we will continue to support such a vote and give the minister all the co-operation we can. But that is only part of the program. If you train people you must have jobs when their training is completed. At the rate we are spending money on training without any programs to provide jobs, we will have the most highly trained unemployed force in the world and we will develop a race of perpetual students and perpetual trainees.

The fact is that we now have pockets of poverty all across Canada. The situation is worse in some provinces than in others. The Economic Council of Canada says that between 4 million and 5 million people live on or below the poverty line and that more than 3 million people live in a state of deprivation. In other words, 7 million or 8 million Canadians are unable to enjoy the full employment and high level of income we started out to establish 25 years ago. The tragedy, however, is that this poverty is concentrated mainly in certain areas of Canada and particularly in the poorer provinces. The government in the course of this debate probably will tell us that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is solving this problem. Mr. Speaker, I want to point out that the effectiveness of the government's program to reduce regional disparity is not measured by the amount of grants given to large corporations. It is measured by the results.

On November 16 this year, in an answer to a question asked by my colleague the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton), we find that by the use of the Regional Development Incentives Act some $95.5 million has provided 17,284 jobs. That I believe is an average of some $5,500 of capital investment per job. But let us look at the unemployment picture issued by the Economic Council of Canada. In Table 3 of their report we find that in 1970 the increase in the number of persons employed is 77,000. That is the lowest increase since 1958 when we actually had a deficit. The tragic thing is that of those 77,000 persons employed, about two-thirds were in the province of Ontario. In the Atlantic provinces, the increase is only 1,000. In the Prairies there is an increase of 1,000. In the province of Quebec there is an increase of 3,000 and in the province of Ontario an increase of 49,000. Measured by those statistics, the government's program for removing regional disparity is a colossal failure.

This afternoon when speaking on behalf of the government the minister commented on the concern which has been expressed by both the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance. No one is complaining about the lack of expressions of concern. But what we are complaining about is the lack of action and the lack of concrete programs and specific policies that will help get the economy going, put the unemployed to work and remove the pockets of poverty that obtain all across this country. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration said it is up to the private sector to make the decisions about investment. Now, we have another scapegoat. Some time ago it was labour because it would not agree to freezing wages and salaries while interest rates and profits went sky high. Now, the scapegoat is to be the private sector which is not prepared to make the necessary investment decisions.

Let us look at the Department of Regional and Economic Expansion. We find that the large part of the expenditures which they have made, about two thirds of them, consist of grants which were paid to United States corporations. In the period to the end of 1969 they have paid to foreign corporations $46,176,000, and to Canadian firms only $20,877,000. Some of these companies received these grants from the government by closing a plant, for instance, in Oshawa and opening another one in Hawkesbury as did Duplate of Canada, which is hardly likely to help reduce regional disparity.

If we are going to deal with the problem of regional disparity, it seems to me we have to do something more than make grants to manufacturing firms. We have to deal with community involvement. We have to deal with industries that are indigenous to the community. We have to be prepared not to wait, as the minister says the government is doing, for the private sector to make investment decisions. We should be prepared to work through Crown corporations federally and provincially. We should be prepared to help support co-operatives, farmers and fishermen's co-operatives, for the processing of their own products. We should be prepared to support community feeder lots, sawmill operations, tourism, food processing, and not rely entirely on persuading large corporations to come into a community where, in many cases, their sole purpose is to pay low wages and have very little relationship with the community itself.

I think the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has failed to state clearly what its objectives are and what its criteria are. I have in my hand the third report and review of the Canadian Council on Rural Development which was submitted to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) in July of this year. I do not have the time to quote from it extensively, but I am sure that every member who has read it will realize that it is a very trenchant criticism of the way that department is being operated. Page 63 of the report reads:

> In the first place, a development programme of any kind needs to identify with reasonable precision its goals and objectives. Secondly, programmes must be instituted consistent with these goals and objectives. These programs must be continuously evaluated both in terms of their effectiveness and in terms of priorities.

The next page reads:

> There is no evidence that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has, thus far, established this kind of objective basis for its programmes. There is a possibility that the department may come to measure its own success in terms of how many grants it has provided to industries, how many factories have located in designated areas, how many jobs have been created, and so forth. This can lead to maintaining programmes that should not be continued, or only in revised form, but also to termination of reduction of programmes without adequate rationale. The undoubted uncertainty and confusion about the value and effectiveness of the ARDA programme over its years of existence can be traced in very significant degree to this lack of precise definition of targets and objectives in the context of a plan.

It seems quite apparent that if the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is to be effective, it must be increasingly concerned about the infrastructure of the communities in order that the whole milieu of the depressed area can be assisted by the department and by an infusion of public funds. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration said today that the government is waiting for the private sector to make investment decisions. But when it makes those investment decisions, there is no guarantee that those decisions will benefit the depressed areas of this country. I wonder if the government has given any thought to the program which the Swedish government introduced many years ago, called the capital investment reserves program. It seems to me that this is something at which the government ought to look. Under that program in Sweden any company can take up to 45 per cent of its undistributed profits and deposit them with the bank of Sweden, draw interest on that money, withdraw the money any time it likes, but must pay income corporation tax on it. But if a company is prepared to draw that money at a time when the economy is slack and to invest it in areas where the government requires development, then it can withdraw those capital investment reserves without paying the tax on the money which it has deposited. During the time that I, along with a group of economists, spent a month studying this and other policies in Sweden, I was tremendously impressed with the fact that they have been able to move industries into more depressed areas and to control the location of industries. The result has been that they have been able to maintain a very high degree of employment and of economic activity.

I want to go on to another question but since I see that my time is almost up may I read the amendment that I propose to move? If the House will let me spend just a few minutes on it, I would like to do so.

I move:

That the motion be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"and this House condemns the government for aggravating these conditions by its policy of opting out of its responsibility to be involved in the maintenance of national standards in health, welfare and education.

I began by saying that 25 years ago the governments federally and provincially had set two goals: full employment and a high level of income and national standards of health, welfare and education. I am contending in this amendment that the goverment has aggravated the situation by continuously opting out of many of the programs which were designed to maintain national standards.

Mr. Caccia: Come on.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I remind the hon. member who said "come on" that the government opted out of the winter works program, of construction grants for hospitals and of capital grants for technical educational training. It stopped giving the $500 for the construction of new homes which helped to get homes built in many of the depressed areas, and post secondary education grants have been discontinued.

Mr. Lang: We are spending more than ever.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Yes, but it is costing more than ever. This is exactly what the government is doing to the poor provinces of Canada. They are saying "we are discontinuing these shared programs. But we are making tax transfers by giving to the provinces some additional points of the income and corporation tax".

Mr. Lang: That is equalization.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The fact is that the poorer provinces do not get the same benefit from an additional number of points on income and corporation tax, and they are the very provinces that need more than other provinces because they are so far behind. The government has now accepted that it is proper to have a variety of standards across this country with respect to health, welfare and educational services.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

The government keeps talking about unity. There is nothing that will destroy national unity so quickly as for Canadians in one part of the country to know that their children will have fewer and less adequate educational, health and welfare standards than children have in some other part of Canada. If Canadians are to feel they are part of this country they must know that, no matter in what part of Canada they reside, they are going to be entitled to certain national standards, particularly with respect to health, welfare and education.

Every move made by the government has been to make it more difficult for the poorer provinces and easier for the wealthy provinces. The Minister of Finance told the House about the extra money he was giving to the provinces, yet I noticed in the speech made in the Manitoba Legislature last June by the Provincial Treasurer of that province, he said that:

—Manitoba will not receive any more money now on the basis of this adjustment. In fact we may receive less from the equalization factor than we had estimated on the basis of earlier federal data.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but he has had his full time under the special order made earlier this day by the House, and indeed a few minutes extra because the Chair felt this would have been agreed to by other hon. members in view of the amendment that the hon. member was moving. If it is now agreeable, before I see the next speaker, I should put the amendment moved by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), as follows:

That the motion be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"and this House condemns the Government for aggravating these conditions by its policy of opting out of its responsibility to be involved in the maintenance of national standards in health, welfare and education."

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that this motion makes it possible for us to clearly assess the situation, to analyze the government action and to bring in constructive suggestions. It is not because special circumstances seem to give the government a comforting cover that we should forget the situation which exists now in our country.

The gross disparities alluded to in the motion under consideration are so obvious that we wonder whether we live in such a large and rich country where life is so enjoyable. In fact, the disparities between the privileged classes of society and the various categories of workers, of pensioners, in short the disparities between French Canadians and English Canadians, are inconceivable.

Mr. Speaker, a quick analysis of this situation, shows us that there is no concentration of effort to reach an agreement between the propertied classes and the workers to make everyone feel really good and ready to contribute to the best of this ability, to the progress and the development of our people.

How can such flagrant income disparities be explained? Some citizens receive an annual income of $6,000, $7,000, $8,000, $10,000 or even $20,000 while others live on salaries of $1,200 and $1,500. How can such a situation exist? The figures are here to prove that it does and they are bewildering. Union activities have succeeded in obtaining reasonable wages in most trades. However, there is still a great number of workers who would rather forfeit their starvation wages and go to the nearest social welfare office to pick up the slim allowance cheque. When one has lost taste for work and effort, we can only fear the unforseeable and disastrous consequences of such decadence.

It is therefore in order to wonder, with regard to the present situation, what the government has done to check such decadence. We can clearly see that the government has not done anything and that the situation still prevails.

The inequality between the large and the small family is, in my view, the most flagrant injustice. We have reached the point where we accept the fact that "large family" means poverty and "small family" means affluence and wealth. And yet, the worthiest, the noblest and the most important contribution of Canadians to their nation is the one they make through their blood: their children.

When considering the millions of dollars we pour into immigration, one wonders where the logic is. Family allowances are still at a ridiculously low level although several opposition members, particularly from the Ralliement créditiste, have repeatedly asked that something be done about it.

Such disparity, such inequity which affects the very core of a nation, namely the family, seems to me most revolting.

Publicity is used to lure immigrants to this country. I have nothing against immigrants, but I wish we would start exercising sound and well-ordained charity to provide our citizens who do not have to adjust to our country, because they were born here with at least the possibility of bringing up their children properly and turning them into assets for the common good.

Inequality is found also in welfare measures, including unemployment insurance. A white paper on unemployment insurance was tabled and we hope that the problem can be solved once for all.

Somewhat foolish rules result in officials telling the unemployed: Unfortunately, you have no more stamps; it is over, go back home, you can receive no more payments. And yet that person must continue to live and to provide for his dependents, if any. What has been done in this connection? A white paper has been issued. We shall wait for the concrete results of this policy.

As for inequality between Canadians, depending on their ethnic origin, it is useless to insist on this subject. An inquiry on bilingualism and biculturalism has given fantastic statistics on this subject which could explain several embarrassing situations which now plague Canada.

It is inadmissible that salaries should vary depending on the ethnic origin of the employee and yet this situation which exists in Quebec, in the Montreal area, is defended by a number of Liberal members who seem unaware of what is going on before their eyes and who are always ready to criticize those really willing to contribute to the economic growth, to the welfare and to the emancipation of all Canadians whatever their ethnic origin.

In connection with this situation, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government are boasting about the extraordinary fight they have been waging against inflation.

We still do not know exactly what this fight consisted of, even though we heard about it many many times. This quixotic fight which they claimed to have won, brought no concrete changes in the life of the Canadian people. Why wage a fight which gives no results? And only the arrogance of the government and of the Prime Minister seem satisfied. For the people the same situation prevails, when it is not a defeat.

The action of the government boils down to pious wishes which, in theory, seem to be attainable ideals. The just society, we await it, we have awaited it, and we will continue to await it. We are ready to co-operate closely in order to achieve it, but until now, it has simply seemed to be very pious wishes and nebulous theories, and we do not know exactly where this is going to lead us.

The action of the government has also consisted in answering by a definite no to the provinces which were trying to solve, through tax reforms or others, the special problems of each region. And, as a matter of fact, the motion blames the government for not doing that.

The action of the government only went as far as to tell the provinces, "Go back home, and if you need more money, collect more taxes. We do what we have to do; you do the same". In theory, this looked like a solution to the problem, but we know that when it comes to putting into practice the principles of federalism, wich they would like to be well alive and quite co-operative, and which they adorn with all kinds of adjectives, they give flat noes as answers to the provinces.

There is also the systematic and intentional increase in unemployment. This is the worst scheme, the most disastrous action, and they are beginning to boast about it. They boast that they are solving the problem of inflation by intentionally increasing the number of unemployed. That beats all, Mr. Speaker, and nevertheless the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has every chance, every opportunity to take more popular measures which would solve the real problems.

Some action was taken by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which, admittedly, was rather effective in certain cases. There is still, however, something mysterious in the designation of special zones, and one wonders why they bother to say that a community or area is designated as a special zone, when problems are known to affect all regions and all areas. This may be only window-dressing at times, but it seems that a certain effort has been made in this connection.

We now come to our suggestions, because it is not enough to criticize and to establish facts; we must act. As usual, our suggestions are clear, precise, concrete, even though we are accused of bringing forward vague solutions. They keep saying that without ever taking the trouble to specify what is vague about those solutions.

Making available to citizens money and real credit, corresponding to the real guarantees the country possesses, there lies the open secret, something very simple, and we come back to the suggestions implicit in the principle that it is money that should serve the citizen and not the citizen who should serve money.

Mr. Speaker, let us take as a starting point what the Prime Minister himself advocated in 1954, and not the statements emanating from the leader of the NDP. As the leader of the Ralliement créditiste (Mr. Caouette) said this week, let us take as a starting point a statement made in 1954 by the Prime Minister, as follows: "Happily, there is a remedy that can be applied instantly, at the first sign of weakness in the national economy: it is to stimulate purchases by putting more money into the hands of the consumers."

It may seem unbelievable, but our present Prime Minister said that in 1954.

Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to fully agree with that statement which had already been made by another one of his predecessors, Mackenzie King. All we want is that this be done. Let there be a declaration of war on inflation, but let the choice of weapons be the right one.

To go moose hunting, one does not use a slingshot or a peashooter. Therefore, in order to really fight inflation, the best weapon should be to increase the purchasing power to increase consumption and, consequently, give an invigorating shot-in-the-arm to all producing businesses. That is still what we suggest.

It is possible to ease the burden of provinces and municipalities by giving them access to the Bank of Canada.

Will they finally answer that question? Why do the premiers of Quebec and of other provinces have to go and ask permission of New York bankers to build a dam, a bridge or a school? On account of what principle do we cringe to that extent? Is it because we have no guarantee? Have we not enough resources in our country to guarantee the actual credit that we want and advocate? We should put an end to that stupid procedure under which we have to ask foreigners permission to do something here.

It is not because they have never been implemented that our suggestions are wrong! That is the kind of argument we always hear: Money does not grow on trees; if that solution were adequate, it would have been applied elsewhere. We must apply it for the first time. Before the caveman saw a wheel for the first time he had to imagine one and build it. It is not because other people did not think of that solution that one should not apply it.

When a policy to abolish inequalities will be considered, when a concrete policy will be suggested to provide everyone with the strict minimum, when we become convinced that our country has everything to provide everyone with this strict minimum, we will have found the solution.

To conclude, we urge the government to implement some if not all of the basic principles which we have been advocating for many years. I said it before in this House, we have no exclusive rights on the monetary reform we advocate. The government is quite free to draw inspiration from it. We will support it in its task. We must stop thinking about the advisability of doing one thing or another and listen to those who advocate it.

The pretense that our party represents only a few constituencies does not justify saying that what we are advocating is not good. We must stop living in the clouds and identifying the whole government with one man who pretends to be in the limelight and finds nothing better to do than to cover his head with feathers and play drums to draw the attention of the people of this country. It is time to end such childishness and to tackle the basic problems. We have to mix with people, know their opinions, their problems, their aspirations. We must listen to the people and muster everything in order to give to all Canadian citizens the possibility of looking forward to better days.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, in this country we are faced today with a very formidable taks, that of providing 500,000 additional jobs by this winter and in the future to keep unemployment at an acceptable level of around 3 per cent of the work force. Today my leader, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), very ably outlined the steps which the government must take to stimulate the economy and make it possible for additional industrial activity to provide additional jobs for our people. Mr. Speaker, I intend to deal, in the few minutes which are available to me this afternoon, with one particular aspect of the problem facing us, and that is the difficult task of providing the jobs which we need in the underdeveloped areas of this country where unemployment is considerably higher than in the other parts of the country.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the best way to increase employment in such areas is to work out a means by which we can attract more manufacturing industry, which is, of course, by far the greatest employer of labour, to those areas. That, of course, raises the question, can this be done? The answer is yes. The other question, "Well then, how can that be brought about", I intend to deal with now.

It has been obvious for many years that we have been shipping overseas a far too large proportion of the raw materials which we produce, for people in other countries to process into finished products, which mean for them the great benefits of employment and profits which accrue from manufacturing. This loses for us, in Canada, those benefits which I believe can and should be ours.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, that we in this country possess all the ingredients which are necessary to make this country into one of the really great industrial nations of the world. We have the raw materials, the cheap power, the transportation, and the skilled manpower. We have a certain amount of capital of our own, and we have proved that we can attract additional capital from the outside world without too much difficulty. What we need is far more manufacturing industry in this country to transform a far greater proportion of the raw materials which we produce into finished products.

How can we bring this about? I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it can be done by means of an industrial development incentives plan which would offer such generous incentives to companies which have proved their ability to manufacture successfully, both in Canada and in other parts of the world, that they will decide it is to their financial advantage to establish plants in areas which the federal government would designate, areas which need industry to balance their economies and make them less dependant on their production of primary products.

Despite the introduction of the government's regional development program, persistent unemployment of around 10 per cent in the Atlantic provinces, in Quebec and in British Columbia shows very clearly that, with the exception of the larger cities in those areas, there has been far too little development of manufacturing industry which, as I said, is by far the greatest producer of employment. It is obvious that the incentive which the government has offered has not appeared to be sufficiently rewarding to attract the number of new industries which we need to keep employment at a satisfactory level in those areas, and that an additional incentive is required. I have no quarrel with the government's plan. It simply is not enough, and that has been proven by the unemployment figures prevalent in our country today. The plan I am going to suggest would act in addition to the government's plan, and would not interfere with it in any way.

In working out such an additional incentive, we must remember that unless what we offer is sufficiently attractive to persuade companies that it is well worth their while to establish plants in those areas where we need them, they will simply decide not to establish plants in such areas. The taxes and the employment which would have been available to those localities will simply not materialize.

I believe that the kind of incentive which industries need to persuade them to operate in areas not normally considered to be economically attractive must convince those industries that two things will happen. First, they will be able to make a satisfactory profit. Second, they will be able to obtain the additional capital they need at a cost which they can afford to pay. I will deal with each in turn.

The kind of incentive which I believe will convince industry that the first condition will be met, is freedom from paying taxes, federal, provincial and municipal, for the first ten years of operation, and a graduated scale of taxation for the next 15 years. After 25 years of operation, they will pay full taxes. As a large proportion of taxes are provincial and municipal, concurrence of the province and, through them the municipalities, will be necessary to make the policy work. However, these taxes are not now being paid, because the industries in question do not exist and will not exist unless they are persuaded that it is worth while for them to establish in these slow growth areas. I am sure that the prospective construction, employment and future taxes will persuade the provinces and municipalities that the plan makes possible such attractive prospects for the future they will agree to participate in it. Any province or municipality which does not wish to enter the plan would, of course, be free to stay out.

To enable municipal governments to finance the cost of services which would have to be installed to enable these new plants to operate, the federal government should make available loans at no more than 5 per cent interest and payable in 25 years. Although this would impose a cost of 5 per cent on the municipalities, I am convinced that the construction; additional sales by merchants in the district; the employment which would provide taxes to the municipalities instead of having to pay welfare; additional house-building, and a great many other benefits which would accrue to the locality, would more than compensate the locality concerned for the payment of the 5 per cent interest on the cost of producing the necessary services.

The second requirement, that of being able to obtain the capital that industry needs at a rate that it can afford to pay, would be met by investment in the enterprise by the Canada Development Corporation when it comes into existence, which I hope will be soon. I believe that participation by the CDC as a minority shareholder in any of these enterprises which need additional capital would be an excellent kind of investment for the Corporation to make. I stress minority position because it is essential that the government should not get into the business of running industries, and should rely on the management skills of already proven enterprises to successfully direct the new plants which would come into existence through the introduction of the development incentive.

I am convinced that the plan I have outlined will be sufficiently attractive to persuade many successful producers, both in Canada and in other parts of the world, that it will be worth while for them to establish additional plants in this country, close to sources of raw materials. I have discussed this plan with a great many industrialists that I know and with whom I have had dealings in the past, both as a minister of the government and in private business. They have told me that they believe a plan of this kind would be extremely attractive and practical, and that it would persuade many industries in Canada and outside the country to establish in areas which would be designated by the government.

Because taxes from which the new developing companies will be freed for the first 25 years are not being paid now, nor will they be paid unless the companies concerned find the government's offer sufficiently attractive to persuade them to establish additional operations in these slow growth areas, the plan will not impose any cost on the governments concerned, nor on the taxpayers of Canada.

I believe that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) should now call a federal-provincial conference, which should include representatives of the provincial mayors and reeves associations, to discuss the details of a development incentive which will be sufficiently attractive to persuade the manufacturing industry to establish plants in areas which badly need industry to balance their basically primary product economics, and overcome seriously rising unemployment. When the policy has been agreed upon, it should be put into practice at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Gilbert: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hees: I will be glad to.

Mr. Gilbert: I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member on his proposed plan to aid industry in certain areas. Will the hon. member give consideration to imposing restrictions with regard to foreign companies, because experience in Ontario has shown that moneys from the Ontario government have primarily gone to American firms rather than Canadian firms. If the intent of many American firms is just to serve the domestic market rather than to develop an export trade, it may have harmful effects. Has the hon. member given consideration to a plan whereby if moneys are given, priority should be given to Canadian companies and restrictions imposed on American companies?

Mr. Hees: I am glad the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) has asked that question. In the plan I have outlined I have made it very clear that this would not cost the federal government or any government concerned one penny. At the present time, the additional industries do not exist in these areas of slow growth. They will not exist unless a plan is offered to them that is so attractive they will decide to establish in these areas. I am hoping that when companies, particularly those outside of this country, start to operate, the only cost will be that of providing services for the operation concerned.

I have said that would be paid for by a loan from the government at 5 per cent interest, which the government can well afford. I believe the municipalities can well afford the 5 per cent interest because of the additional benefits which will accrue through additional construction and employment. People will be earning wages instead of living on welfare provided by the municipalities. Additional people will move to the municipalities, housebuilding will increase, and there will be other benefits.

This plan is good because it does not require any money to be given to companies which will establish in these areas. The companies are simply told if they will do something which is needed and is not being done now, namely manufacturing, we will not charge taxes anywhere near the level the company would normally pay, for a certain number of years. This is a tremendous incentive. Industrialists have told me that this is very attractive to them. It is not giving anything away. If we do not do this, the taxes will not be available because the industries will not establish themselves in these areas.

Mr. Peters: Could I ask the hon. member—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may ask a question. I am sure the hon. member is anxious to reply to the question. I suggest to the hon. member that he might address his reply to the Chair.

Mr. Hees: My apologies, Mr. Speaker. I got carried away.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to complicate matters, but the hon. member's time has expired. If hon. members wish to continue with questions to the hon. member, it requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Peters: I was very interested in the program which the hon. member has outlined, and the novel approach he has suggested. I was wondering whether he contemplated some special concession to industries which locate in depressed areas rather than in areas which support most of the major industry in this country.

Mr. Hees: Yes, I mentioned that, Mr. Speaker. I said this plan would be available only in areas which the federal government would designate as under-developed areas, and that it would be available only to companies which would locate in such areas.

Mr. Speaker: Before calling upon the hon. member for Provencher may I welcome to the table the new and very distinguished Third Clerk Assistant, Mr. Antonio Plouffe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mark Smerchanski (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I feel the present government has been generous in its legislation providing incentives for industry. But we have to realize that no government can solve all the problems of the under-developed rural sections of Canada. This task must be undertaken in co-operation with the business community and with the assistance of labour.

There seems to be a feeling on the part of some of our labour unions that they are not permitted to undertake and develop new enterprises. I would urge not only the business world but the labour unions to join the rest of Canada and the various governments at federal and provincial levels in helping to develop the rural parts of this country. This is not a task which should be left to any particular government or to any particular segment of society; the co-operation of all segments is needed. I believe that if some of the money which union organizations presently remit to the United States were retained in Canada and used here as a starter for equity capital to establish new industries, a great deal of employment could be created.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion has been providing a large proportion of the dollars spent on setting up the services required before new industry can establish itself in under-developed areas. The department has spent a great deal of money on hydroelectric power installations, roads, water supplies, sewage installations and other services required by a normal, operating community. There is no basis whatever for opposition statements that nothing has been done in this connection. I question very much whether more industry would be attracted, even if more generous grants were made. If the government becomes more generous, the tendency is to say: this is government money and it need not be spent with any degree of efficiency. I could give some examples to the House by way of illustration. An outstanding example is the heavy water plant in Nova Scotia. Here is a plant which cost several hundred millions of dollars, for which funds were made available. The design and engineering were inadequate as the basis for a properly operating plant, and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was eventually called upon to advance further financial help. A large additional amount was then spent on redesigning and reconstructing the project. The plant is now successful, but the cost per job turned out to be in the order of $8,000 or $9,000, far above the average amount required to provide employment in the rural parts of Canada.

Opposition speakers have suggested that new industries locating in under-developed areas should not be required to pay taxes of any kind for a period of ten years. But who will be called upon to pay the additional cost of the auxiliary services such as roads, water, sewers, power lines, schools and so on which go to make up a viable economic and social unit? These are the services normally provided by municipal governments, and they are extremely costly. To say that the money will be advanced by the federal government at 5 per cent means that somebody in our social structure will be called upon to pay higher taxes. I, for one, feel that taxes today are already far too high.

There is a tendency on the part of certain members of our society to speak too glibly and too freely of welfare. It is encumbent on every Canadian to encourage his fellow men to be independent, to find their own way and to resort to welfare only when it is really needed. I know that many hon. members have personal experience of instances when welfare funds have been abused; out of every dollar spent, less than 50 cents finds its way into the hands of those who really need help. In my view, Mr. Speaker, the initiative shown by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has led to one of the finest and best types of incentive program we have ever seen in Canada. If the opposition feel they can improve on it, fine and dandy.

This afternoon I listened very attentively to the argument supporting the contention that we should be more generous with our incentives. I am not convinced. I am not convinced because I, too, am associated with others in my constituency who have shown some initiative in creating new industry. These are people who have had to pioneer new industry in the same way as our forefathers built this country. This is the type of person we need to develop the business world in Canada and to create new industry.

We have the people and we have the motivation. I think it is now a question of a little more education. At the present time our incentive program is conducive to establishing new industry. For example, where else could any member of this House today set up a new industry and be given a 50 per cent grant? Suppose I was prepared to invest $1 in a certain industry, having worked out my rate of return spread over 7, 10 or 12 years, the federal government through its Department of Regional Economic Expansion would be prepared to give me a grant of up to 50 per cent of my cost, with no strings attached except that I must stay in business for three years. If I have no intention of staying in business for more than three years, then I should not start any kind of business.

The financial incentives presently offered by the government are good ones. However, I think there is one thing we have lacked. I should like to ask every member of this House, to how many of his constituents has he explained the incentive program in a proper and precise way. I wonder how many members have even seen the application form issued by the department. A high percentage of applicants in my area have been successful in getting grants, thus creating a substantial number of new jobs. Every new job creates revenue in the form of deductions for personal income tax, sales tax, municipal tax and insurance costs. In addition to that there is added cash flow in the community. All of these factors build a broader base for the economy and contribute more tax dollars to the coffers of the provincial and federal governments.

During the last day or so there has come across the desks of all hon. members a booklet entitled "Financing Canadian Industries," prepared by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. May I again congratulate the department for taking the time to analyse in crystal clear fashion just what is involved in the financing of Canadian industries. The booklet explains what is equity, what is risk capital, what is loan capital. It also outlines some of the provincial agencies, all of which are anxious and willing to support anybody who is prepared to start an industry but able to put up only 50 cents on the dollar. Indeed, in the case of large industries, I dare say you need to put up only 10 to 15 cents on the dollar.

In the foreword to this booklet, which I think is absolutely terrific, is this passage:

> These are but a few of the questions to which the businessman may have to find answers. This booklet, in providing information and suggestions, may be of some assistance.

There is nothing in Canada to prevent any member of this House, or any member of the industrial or business community, from setting up new industry and thus providing employment for our people. Nevertheless, there seems to be a tendency on the part of some of our academics to criticize, to nip at the heels as a dog nips at the heels of a cow, and to find fault with a program that is one of the best. It has been said that for some Ph.D.'s there will be no assurance that they will be able to find employment. I would ask the Leader of the Opposition whether these academics are not trained to lead the people of Canada. Are they not trained to be leaders in the community? Can they not create new industry and provide new employment? Can they not create new sources of tax for the government? Why should anyone find a job for them? Why do they not create jobs for themselves as well as for others? Is that not the proper and responsible way of living?

I think my time has expired, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the House for its indulgence.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part in this debate during which will be discussed most particularly the possibility of checking poverty and of removing by the same token a social injustice now widespread in Canada. It was quite normal to discuss this matter in the present context, in view of the difficulties we are facing now.

It is clear that every responsible government has the duty to create a climate of confidence. Certainly, it is difficult to create such a climate when we know that about 30 per cent of the Canadian people now live in poverty. In the last few years, insecurity has become prevalent here in Canada as well as the deterioration of the social environment.

As far as young people are concerned, they refuse to identify themselves with society. How could they agree to it blindly? In fact they have lost confidence not only in Parliament but also in its individual members.

The difficulties we are facing now may be due to the rapid evolution we have undergone in the past few years. It seems that youth craves liberty very much. To my mind, it is not only by dictatorial legislation that we will succeed in establishing a new atmosphere of confidence. The mere passage of legislation will not endow our society with a better way of life than the one we are enjoying at the present time.

I believe that it is the responsibility of the government to adopt the measures likely to fulfil the aspirations of Quebecers and all other Canadians.

It might be advisable to convene, as soon as possible, a summit meeting made up of representatives of the federal and provincial governments and of labour and management associations. Such a meeting would enable responsible members to discuss our present problems. In my view, such a meeting is necessary because it would represent not only the interests of governments but also those of the Canadian community. In fact, it would be beneficial to everyone.

Has the government really tried to give, for instance, to the young people, that freedom they are craving for, and which is the product of an evolution experienced throughout the world and not only in Quebec or in other regions of Canada? Has the government done its utmost to enable them to find summer employment?

I know that we spend millions, and I would even say that this is wasted money in some cases, to allow a certain number of young people to find summer jobs. Some people have suggested the establishment of compulsory military service, thought I do not feel that through such a dictatorial law we could solve this problem or satisfy youth.

I have always considered that the majority of our young people are full of good faith and prepared to build a better Canada. I have thought that a disciplinary training service, with pay, would perhaps be required, or at least valuable. We could in this set up mix business with pleasure, as people often say, allow all young Canadians, over the summer period, to join voluntarily this training service which would give them a certain discipline and would train men for peaceful purposes instead of training soldiers to wage war.

But who would be responsible for that disciplinary service? Would it be the federal government or the provinces? I would be inclined to think that the federal government should make some funds available to the provinces anxious to make use of such a service, ensuring to those young people an income which would enable them to continue their studies while giving them the opportunity of attaining manliness, as we all wish.

Such a service should be voluntary, because we have to take into account businessmen and farmers who need their children during the summer to work at home. But a responsible government could, through such an initiative, enable each province to take advantage of such a service and would allow thousands of young people to earn an income sufficient to improve their education and also practice the elementary discipline to which we must all submit in this world.

Since this would be a voluntary service, it would allow young people to reach university level with an excellent record. Application of this program would not involve a much greater cost to the taxpayer, since the young people, having earned an adequate income during the summer, would not need to apply to provincial governments for scholarships.

This program would give us an opportunity really to assess our young people and to know exactly how many of them want, not merely training, but work, and the experience of earning a dollar and investing it in themselves and the community as a whole.

This formula could help to improve the difficult situation we are now witnessing. Unemployment and poverty co-exist and there is talk of checking poverty.

In the name of inflation, thousands of unemployed have unfortunately been created, unemployed who still cost the government, directly or indirectly, about $100 a week. I have always thought that a citizen who works regularly is of far greater advantage to the government.

I find it hard to understand exactly to what extent, in the name of inflation, our economy can be stabilized again while the expense is being allowed of up to $100 a week per unemployed who could otherwise still work and be worth something to Canada.

Yet, the winter works programs were allowed to go by the board without hesitation. I had thought that, under the circumstances, supplementary credits would be granted hurriedly to provinces and municipalities in order to allow them to carry out priority projects and this at special rates. It is unthinkable that we continue to tolerate borrowing at exaggerated rates. I venture to believe that the government is as aware of these possibilities as we are. Indeed, the purpose of this debate is not necessarily to criticize the government, but to allow each member to contribute in finding a solution—however small—liable to reestablish the stability of society.

All members are aware of the reduced credits allocated to various departments and Agriculture was not spared. It was sad to let some producers fall into unemployment by cutting subsidies for agricultural production, which did not leave them any other recourse than social welfare. Suggestions were made by opposition members. I had the pleasure of saying a few words on the question, Mr. Speaker, but we did not win.

I hope that knowing what conditions prevailed last spring, the government will do something. As lately as yesterday, I did not agree to a reduction of some subsidies. On the contrary, producers forced to abandon agriculture for serious motives should be given an alternative. I think the responsible government was under the obligation of creating jobs, giving retraining programs and offering advance pensions. Finally, this has often been mentioned before a subsidy reduction was considered.

We hope the government will change its mind and favour that position, particularly with regard to the working class.

As I am dealing with social injustice, in the next few minutes, I would like to talk about amendments to the constitution. The subject may not seem related to the matter now at issue, but it has a connection with the social climate we have to create.

Our constitution must be changed because it is outdated, no doubt about that. In fact, a number of Canadians, both in and outside Quebec, cannot accept the idea that federalism in its present form can provide well-being in Canada.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that young people in particular will no longer be satisfied, as they have been up to now, with unacceptable compromises. More than ever, I think that the members of this House will have to be very honest with our youth.

As a consequence of the government's hesitation in introducing certain changes, we are now facing the problems of poverty and social injustice. And these problems make the members of this House vulnerable in the eyes of both the young and the rest of the Canadian people.

We have the responsibility to create an atmosphere of confidence for all. It is surely a great challenge to take up, but it is needed. By being more administrators than politicians, we will succeed together in creating this climate of confidence. We will succeed if we apply ourselves to the protection of our industries by adopting certain measures which would give them some necessary incentives.

No doubt the measures applied by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion are necessary and beneficial, but I think that we have forgotten our industries too long. We have also forgotten to consider the new importance of short-term pump priming in the building trade. Once again, I urge the government to consider seriously removing the 12 per cent tax on building materials and the possibility of paying back some interests to those who have a low or an average income.

My time is running out fast, Mr. Speaker, and I would still have many things to say. I dare hope that these few comments will help the government to eradicate this poverty and social injustice which afflict not only the people of Quebec, but of all Canada.

• (5:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I am very pleased that a vote will be taken on the motion introduced by the opposition so that the wish of the House can be expressed on this important matter. We have been very concerned in the last few weeks, particularly those of us who are not as emotionally involved as are others in what has been happening, that some of the problems facing Canada arise not from differences but from the same problems that occur in a number of regional areas in Canada. The fact that for a number of years now regional programs have been in effect to assist in the improvement of parts of Canada on a regional basis, programs which have not achieved their goals, has tempted some hon. members I am sure to take a look at some of the solutions offered by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) in his very interesting speech this afternoon.

Some of the proposals of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings have been tried out in many countries. Recently, I saw an advertisement for the Bahamas which announced a ten year tax free period for industry locating in that area. The fact is that in many of these countries this tax free period has benefited the development of industry with the result that the area has been faced with the same problems which we had recently in Jamaica. Canadian investment was encouraged in that country, and then questions were asked as to whether or not the industry was used to the advantage of the depressed area or solely to the advantage of those who benefited from it in the first place.

Before that type of incentive is applied to the depressed areas in Canada, we should consider some of the major problems that are affecting us, one of them being our Canadian sovereignty in terms of industrial development. I come from an area where incentives have been applied for the last five or six years. Hon. members may remember having listened to me on a number of occasions referring to the fact that our area was not designated for special assistance. We looked with a jaundiced eye on some of the areas that were so designated, and after much twisting of arms, the area was designated for a short term under the old program. Now, it is designated under the new program.

Northeastern Ontario continues to lose its population. We are not like other parts of Canada which have been doubling their population. Twenty years from now we may be only a recreation area, and people will be going there to hunt and fish in the clear waters because there will be nobody there to dirty them. I think this is really the purpose of the people of that area. We have improved our education, which is a necessity for the development of industry. Someone may ask: "Why would you want computer technicians in northern Ontario?" I am sure I do not know because we do not have any computers, but we are turning out, through a very beautiful college in Kirkland Lake, computer operators who obviously have to go to Toronto to get a job. The same is true of dozens of courses that are being provided for our young people. We are providing the machinery and the facilities that are necessary. We have many advantages but there are many that we still lack.

The previous speaker mentioned our inability in Canada to solve the constitutional problem. Our federal government is so concerned with giving autonomy to the provinces that any program we design federally is watered down by whatever initiative the provincial government takes in this regard. I remember recently a project approved by the federal development agency which had to be withdrawn because the Ontario government had not put in their share. It would seem to me that if we are going to have a program, surely the two governments should get together to make it possible for some type of equal development of the project to take place. But that is not what happens.

Another problem with which we are faced is lack of co-operation with regard to education. The other day I had a visit from some young students from northern Ontario who attend a technical college there. Their complaint was that they could not obtain a student loan, although the federal government provides that kind of money. Why could they not receive this type of grant? Apparently the answer is that they reside in the province of Quebec. They indicated to me that is only one English school in Quebec where they could have obtained this kind of technical education, so they came to Ontario. Until this year, Ontario has provided them with a grant as if they were residents of Ontario. This year they are about to complete their courses, but now it is said that because these people live in Quebec that province must make the grant. Mr. Speaker, it is the federal government which provides the money. But Ontario says that because they are now going to a designated school in Ontario, even though there is not one in Quebec, they will not be provided with a grant. As a result, they may have to quit at Christmas. They live 50 or 60 miles from this school. The only other similar school is Dawson College in Montreal, about 400 miles away. It is already full and could not accommodate them.

One of the methods of solving regional disparity must be the provision of better education. The complaint has been made that new industry must be established in the centre of a large educational pool from which it can draw the technical people it needs. Yet in some areas where the educational facilities have been provided, people have received no other advantage than that of being able to send their children to school in that area. Then, they have had to export the finished product, so to speak, to the industrial markets.

Our record is not good. We have had some new industries established in Northern Ontario. I refer in particular to two announced recently by the Department of Regional Expansion in its "Report on the Operation of the Regional Development Incentives Act for the Period September 1 to September 30, 1970" published on October 14. The first is Ecstall Mining Limited, of Toronto, Ontario. Mr. Speaker, in effect, this is Texas Gulf, one of the largest mining companies on the continent. They have located their new plant at Hoyle, just outside Timmins. The type of industry is an electrolytic zinc plant. The bulletin describes the project as a new facility.

Why is it a new facility? It is because the province of Ontario finally made up its mind that if this company was not going to process the product before exporting it, then the government would not allow them to export it. The estimated capital cost is given as $45,700,000, and estimated employment as 360. What did we offer them? We offered them 11 per cent of the approved capital costs and $2,000 per job. The same company is putting up another plant in the same place, Hoyle Township. The type of industry is described in the bulletin as "roasting and sulphuric acid." It is a new facility, and the estimated capital cost is $17,200,000. Estimated employment will be 90 people. We have offered 11 per cent of the approved capital costs and $2,000 per job. If there was ever a company in this country that did not need such assistance it is that company. Mr. Speaker, that company is well able to look after itself.

We gave that company a tax holiday. We gave it other advantages. All the minerals it is going to mine have belonged to Canada. This is an extensive operation, and in return that company will supply us with 360 jobs in one plant, maybe 400 jobs in the mines, and possibly 90 jobs in the sulphuric acid plant. That's a great big deal, Mr. Speaker! That company could not possibly place these facilities anywhere else. Ontario provincial law made it place them there.

I have looked over the projects listed for Quebec, which is fortunate in having the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) as one of its representatives. Exactly the same picture applies there. There are food processing plants. Obviously, you process the food where you produce it. Then, there are saw mills. Obviously, you cut the logs into lumber where you produce them. I am not objecting to Quebec having these plants. If we have the money to supply them, then all well and good. But, Mr. Speaker, one of these days we will have to take a real look at what we want in the way of regional development.

We will have to assess the cost of putting industries in our major cities, new industries which will involve new subways, new highways, new recreational facilities, and more expensive pollution and environmental control. We will have to weigh all these things, and then decide whether there is an advantage in putting new industry in major cities. Every time I travel beyond a major city I go for at least ten miles before reaching the outskirts of it, and that ten miles is taken up with industrial plants. This is true of Quebec City, Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal, Windsor, Vancouver or any other major city you care to name. Yet in my area a number of mines have been closed down, and some 4,000 to 5,000 people are living in communities that could support small factories employing about 100 people.

It is on this point that the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings is right. If a factory is placed in a small community, and we do not charge the company any taxes for a period of ten years, it will at least keep the 100 people it employs off the welfare rolls. In the mining communities we have the highest welfare rate in the province of Ontario, running somewhere from 4 per cent to 6 per cent. Welfare is our biggest industry. If we did not have that kind of welfare the communities would be bankrupt.

If we put a factory in such a community we would have 100 people working. They would pay municipal taxes. They would want new sewers, and new water supply. They might require more buildings, and in that way would generate more employment. For every person employed in the factory, probably two or three others would be employed in service industries. Why can't the municipalities do that now? It is because in Ontario there is a law which says that municipalities are not allowed to write off taxes against new industries. That is a mistake and should be corrected.

Until we really decide we want to maintain growth centres in Canada and put new industries in them, until we decide we are really interested in providing reasonable economic expansion, reasonable educational and health facilities, and all the other things that are included in the benefits of industrial development, we will only be giving handouts to companies that are going to settle in certain areas any way. We will make it easier for those companies, but the taxpayers will derive no benefit from the money spent. The net result will be that the dividend collectors will be really well off.

We in Northern Ontario are getting more advantage from the $10 million that is spent on emergency gold mining assistance than we will get out of most of the projects that are connected with regional expansion. That is a wrong way to proceed, Mr. Speaker. It is a disgrace when a subsidy provides employment which cannot be obtained through other methods.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY, NOVEMBER 23

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions between representatives of the parties with respect to tomorrow's business. As I think most hon. members know, arrangements have now been made so that members of the House of Commons from all parties may attend the funeral of our former colleague from Chambly, which will take place in that community tomorrow afternoon. On that basis it would be necessary to depart from the House at 11.45 a.m. and we would not return until almost five o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

There have been a number of discussions with regard to the possible timetable for the House, but I think there is now agreement that rather than attempting to meet for any part of the day it would be more appropriate if we do not have a sitting tomorrow at all. On that basis an order in the following form would seem to be appropriate:

That when this House is adjourned this day, it shall stand adjourned until 2 p.m. Monday, November 23, 1970.

As I say, there have been discussions about an order in this form. If there is found to be general agreement, I wonder if unanimous consent to that order could be sought.

Mr. Baldwin: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion put forward by the Minister of National Defence. Is it so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 to discuss a matter of urgent national importance—the report of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics yesterday that during the third quarter of this year, which has just ended, the country experienced the highest rate of unemployment it has had in any similar period since the latter days of the great depression of the 1930's; and particularly, the refusal of the government to introduce positive measures to stimulate the economy, and the refusal of ministers, particularly those with economic portfolios, to be present in the House when this important matter is being discussed to listen to the suggestions put forward by the elected representatives of the people for combating serious and rising unemployment.

I therefore move, under Standing Order 43, that this matter be brought before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, where expert witnesses from the fields of industry and labour can be called to make positive suggestions to the government for dealing with this very serious situation, in the hope that these suggestions will be paid attention to and acted upon without delay.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. The motion requires the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity, so the motion cannot be put at this time.

CANADA CORPORATIONS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING STATUS OF CROWN COMPANIES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-196, to amend the Canada Corporations Act (Not Agents of Her Majesty).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of introducing this bill the purpose of which is to place Crown corporations on an equal footing with private enterprise. More precisely, this bill has the following objects: to submit public corporations to municipal taxation in the same way as private companies; in a case of bankruptcy, to provide payments to public corporations in the same way as to others, without privilege; to deny them any privileges in the matter of patents; to permit that a writ of mandamus be sought against a Crown corporation in the same way as if it were a private company; and finally to provide that criminal legislation apply to Crown corporations in the same way as it does to private companies.

Mr. Speaker, in other words this bill intends to subject government corporations to private corporation legislation and to take away from them the rights—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he knows that under Standing Order 68 explanation of a bill must be succinct. In any case, I consider that the hon. member has concluded.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADIAN BOOK PUBLISHING DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

On the order: Introduction of Bills:

November 16, 1970—Mr. Howard (Skeena)—Bill intituled "An Act respecting the Canadian Book Publishing Development Corporation".

Mr. Speaker: The House may remember—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Could this stand, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: —that the Chair raised a matter of procedure in respect of this bill. In view of the fact that the hon. member is not here at the moment, perhaps the bill might be allowed to stand.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

[Mr. Speaker.]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SIGNIFICANCE OF INCREASES IN PRICES OF BASIC MATERIALS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Mr. Speaker. In view of the several price increases in rather basic materials in recent days, which will tend to work their way through the economy, does the minister, on the basis of studies that I am sure he has been making, believe that these constitute part of a pattern and that we may expect further increases in the prices of these basic materials in accordance with this pattern, or does the minister feel that these are simply isolated instances?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I made it clear in the House yesterday, Mr. Speaker, that the Prices and Incomes Commission had already launched inquiries into the steel price increases and now into the fabricated aluminum price increases. We have no particular studies that would indicate that this constitutes a pattern. With the Leader of the Opposition, I hope it is not a pattern and, if it were, I would hope that the Prices and Incomes Commission and other policies of the government would make sure that it was not a pattern.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to understand from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that he has no knowledge or that his department has no knowledge whether there are likely to be further increases announced in the prices of other, similar products? Am I to understand that the minister has not even conducted such a study?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure just what other products the Leader of the Opposition is speaking about. Does he mean other steel price increases, or does he mean increases in the prices of things made of steel? If he were more specific in his question I could be more specific in my answer.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, by similar products I mean similar products of basic importance in the economy. In view of the increases that have taken place, would the minister not take the trouble at least to make some inquiries to find out whether they constitute a pattern and whether we may anticipate more of such increases, so that we can govern ourselves accordingly in our judgments?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the Prices and Incomes Commission and other departments of government are observing these price movements, some up and some down, all the time. We have no specific study under way to determine whether this is a pattern or not or whether those particular price increases constitute a pattern. Copper prices have gone down in some instances, for example. The cost of living index on a year-to-year basis is at the lowest level it has been for a number of years.

Mr. Baldwin: Only because of lower food prices.

Mr. Basford: So we have that pattern being established—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister but it seems to me we are engaging in the field of debate.

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO STEEL PRICE INCREASES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Since not one inquiry by the Prices and Incomes Commission has led to a finding that price increases in the steel industry, of which there have been many, have not been more than they ought to be, would the government give serious consideration to the repeated suggestion of the steel workers' union that a public inquiry be organized to which all sides involved in the price increase dispute could make their submissions?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hypothesis of the question is not entirely correct. The last inquiry by the commission into steel price increases was conducted before the pricing criteria the industry is expected to operate under had been laid down. Whether any particular inquiry is held in public or not is a matter for the commission itself. It has the power under the Inquiries Act to hold public inquiries if the circumstances warrant it. I trust that the United Steel Workers Union will be as helpful and co-operative as it can possibly be in the enforcement of the policies of the commission and the enforcement of the pricing criteria that the steel companies are expected to live up to.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): May I direct a further supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the evidence which has already appeared, particularly in the white goods industry, that any increase in steel prices is going to be reflected in higher prices of other commodities, would the minister ask the steel industry to withdraw its price increases until the Prices and Incomes Commission can report?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I believe that question was answered yesterday by the Prime Minister.

POWER

SKAGIT RIVER—POSSIBLE FLOODING OF VALLEY—APPLICATION FOR APPROVAL OF CONSTRUCTION OF DAM

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the February 13, 1970, statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that before any dam construction can begin which would result in the flooding of the Skagit Valley approval must first be granted by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, may I ask whether any such application from Seattle Power and Light has been received by the government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is the sort of question that should be directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources when he is in his seat.

Mr. Baldwin: Have there been any dam talks?

Mr. Rose: May I ask the Acting Prime Minister if the government has received any information from the legal officers of the Crown supporting the contention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that first, such an application must be submitted to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources?

Mr. Sharp: I would like to take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker, since it involves a legal opinion.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The people of British Columbia would like the minister to assure the House that the government will take whatever steps are necessary to prevent the flooding of the Skagit River valley.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the whole situation has been under most urgent consideration by the government.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): A supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This is a very vital problem in British Columbia. Is the government prepared to renegotiate with Washington the provisions in the 1942 agreement of the International Joint Commission relating to the Skagit River? If not, and if all other methods fail, will the government be prepared to introduce legislation to stop this flooding?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this is a very far-ranging question. I will take it as notice, and perhaps the government will be making a statement soon regarding its position.

QUEBEC GOVERNMENT DIRECTIVE RESPECTING CORRESPONDENCE—EFFECT ON FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): I have a question for the Secretary of State. Is the recent directive of the Quebec government that communications with Ottawa institutions and municipal governments be unilingual only in accord with the federal government's program to assist bilingualism in all provinces?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say there is agreement or disagreement, since I am not fully informed of the decision the Quebec government has taken. I will just say that, as far as the policy of the federal government on bilingualism is concerned, I don't see how that decision can help its implementation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PAKISTAN—ASSISTANCE TO CYCLONE AND FLOOD VICTIMS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is in connection with a matter that is close to the hearts of all Canadians, namely, the terrible catastrophe in Pakistan. The extent of the catastrophe in this Commonwealth country seems to be mounting from day to day. By today's estimates there is the possibility that close to half a million people have died and 235,000 are homeless. Will the minister say whether the government is considering a substantial contribution? Fifty thousand dollars is merely a drop in the bucket compared with what is needed. Indeed much more assistance has been given to countries outside the Commonwealth. Is provision being made for a lead to be given by the government to enable private citizens to engage in a crusade for funds with credit being given to them in connection with their income tax returns?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman has asked two questions. The first relates to the contribution that the government of Canada might make to the relief of the victims of these great tragedies in East Pakistan. The other relates to the larger question of the organization of a fund to which the public might contribute. We have now received a request from the government of Pakistan for substantial quantities of relief supplies. It has only just arrived. This matter is under consideration at the moment, and it may be that a decision will be reached some time today. I am quite confident it will involve a very substantial sum.

With regard to the second question, I hope that I or officials of my department will shortly have discussions with those who are considering the organization of a fund to which the public might contribute. I hope that some means can be found to facilitate it because I share with the right hon. gentleman the view that the people of Canada are deeply touched by this great tragedy whose dimensions seem to grow from hour to hour.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the answer I expected from the minister. The catastrophe seems to be as great as was the flood during the days of Noah. I should like to ask whether anything is being done to mobilize helicopters from across Canada to enable them to join the fleet which the United States is preparing, to the end that Canada shall make a substantial contribution to transportation in this connection, bearing in mind that helicopters are the only means of transporting supplies to certain of the areas affected?

Mr. Sharp: The gift which I hope the Canadian government will approve could be available for this purpose. The immediate request we have received, however, is for blankets, medicines and so on, and we feel we should give priority to the request of the Pakistani government itself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On the basis of such a request would the minister tell us what will be the value of the contribution which Pakistan has suggested that Canada should make? I am not trying to pin it down within $10,000, but approximately what would be the value of the assistance requested?

Mr. Sharp: The request is for supplies of various kinds. It is my hope that the donation will be in the millions of dollars.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the fact that students at the University of Ottawa have been gathering materials of the kind the minister has been describing, will the government give favourable consideration to providing some form of transport so that goods collected by citizens groups in Canada can reach East Pakistan in the quickest possible time?

Mr. Sharp: Yes. This is a problem we have in connection with our own supplies and it will be looked at in the light of any voluntary contributions which are made.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

APPEAL FOR INTERIM INCREASES IN DISABILITY PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the urgent appeal addressed to the government by the President of the Royal Canadian Legion on behalf of the veterans organizations of Canada for interim increases in disability pensions and war veterans allowances, will the government consider responding to this appeal at an early date?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, as I have said many times we are giving this matter our most sympathetic consideration and I hope that in the very near future I will be in a position to respond more specifically.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That has been the answer for a year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the Minister of Veterans Affairs take up with the Government House Leader the possibility of arranging with the various groups in the House for action to be taken with a minimum of debate in order that there might be no delay in dealing with this matter?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

JORDAN—ACTION TO SOLVE REFUGEE PROBLEM

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Considering that Canada has been a contributor to UNRWA for a long time, can the minister advise whether his department has obtained a report on existing conditions in the refugee camps in Jordan? If so, can he indicate whether any new initiatives are in progress or in prospect to minimize the hardships in these camps and, hopefully, to make some assault on the solution of this too long existing refugee problem?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the hon. member knows, Canada has been one of the largest contributors, proportionately, to the funds available to UNRWA. The latest reports we have received are to the effect that the organization is in very serious financial circumstances. We have not yet decided whether it would be appropriate for Canada to make another contribution, since our contribution is already, proportionately, very substantial, but we are very much aware of the problem and we are considering it at the moment.

HEALTH

INCLUSION OF OPTOMETRIC SERVICES UNDER MEDICARE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Speaker. Further to questions posed to the minister yesterday with reference to the inclusion of optometrists in medicare on a cost-sharing basis, is the minister aware that in the September 21 issue of Key Man Bulletin, a publication of the Canadian Association of Optometrists, it is reported that the hon. member for Fraser Valley East was advised on September 14 by the minister's executive assistant that the subject of federal cost-sharing of optometric services was not only under consideration but that, in fact, it was under way. Would the minister care to elaborate on this statement by his assistant?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking the minister whether he is aware of a reply given by his Parliamentary Secretary. I would not think that a question in those terms is in order.

Mr. Muir: Then may I rephrase it, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether the statement made by his executive assistant is correct, and is he now ready to include optometric services, on a cost-sharing basis, in medicare?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would think that the second part of the question might be in order. The hon. member knows he cannot ask whether a statement is correct. If the minister wishes to reply directly to the second part of the question, that would be in order procedurally.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have endeavoured to answer this question several times before, namely, that this matter will have to be discussed with the provinces. There are no plans to extend medical coverage, until all provinces are in and Quebec, the last province to come into the plan, only did so recently. The whole question of to what degree coverage will be extended and to which professions it will be extended will be discussed with the provinces over the course of the next several months.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF CERTAIN PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Has he noticed that some companies, like Husky Oil, have just increased the price of their crude and refined oil by about 25.4 per cent, and does he contemplate asking the Prices and Incomes Commission to determine whether this increase is justified since oil products are in abundance in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have only noted the press reports, which I take it are what the hon. member refers to. They have been brought to the attention of the Prices and Incomes Commission, but I have had no response from them at this moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question to the minister.

In the light of the facts he has just agreed to, does he intend to order an inquiry or ask some of his officials to get in touch with the Prices and Incomes Commission on this subject?

[English]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the oil companies, like other companies, are expected to adhere to the pricing criteria that have been agreed to and which are being enforced by the Prices and Incomes Commission. If the oil companies are not abiding by those criteria, of course the commission will be inquiring into the matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Considering the answer the minister has just given, would he check with the officials of the Prices and Incomes Commission in order to find out if these companies were consulted by the Commission before the increase was put into effect?

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Secretary of State.

Could he suggest to the CBC that photos of FLQ members now wanted by the police be flashed on the screen several times a day?

[English]

Mr. Speaker, if I may have your indulgence, I should like to ask a second question that is unrelated to the one asked of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Speaker is very indulgent but perhaps my indulgence can be shown by seeing the hon. member a second time later in the question period.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall gladly suggest this to the CBC.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RESOURCES POLICY

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister which he may wish to deal with as Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the government intend to make a statement or to publish a white paper on its energy resources policy before discussing the matter with United States authorities?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that it would be very useful to have as wide an exchange of views as possible on this subject, including discussions with the United States secretaries, before the government does announce its policy.

Mr. Aiken: Could I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether, in view of the varying statements being made by different ministers on this subject, it would not be possible to have at least a paper correlating to some extent the various statements of ministers?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think it is probably a measure of the complexity and difficulty of the problem that there is some difference of view at the moment, and perhaps this will help to stimulate discussion. The government is very concerned that it should arrive at a decision that is in the interests of all the people and that all points of view should be considered. I think that some difference in view among ministers before the government has made up its mind is really quite useful.

Mr. Aiken: A further supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Simcoe North.

HEALTH

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PERSONS IN NURSING HOMES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On January 28 and March 24, 1970 I asked the minister whether he had met with his provincial counterparts to discuss extending financial assistance to persons discharged from hospitals to nursing homes. Can the minister tell the House whether he did discuss this matter with his provincial counterparts, as he promised, at the last federal-provincial ministers conference or on another occasion? If so, will the government be announcing new policy regarding this question, and when?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will be aware that since he asked the question there has not been a formal federal-provincial conference of ministers. One is anticipated within the near future—I am talking in terms of the next couple of months—and this question will undoubtedly be raised at that time.

Mr. Rynard: May I ask the minister whether the government is going to present a positive and specific response to the Canadian Hospitals Association when they raise this matter with the government shortly?

Mr. Munro: As the hon. member may be aware, we are already sharing with the provinces the cost of nursing homes under the Canada Assistance Plan. Extending assistance in this area under hospitalization right across the board would, I think, be a very serious matter in terms of discussion with the provinces who are very concerned with rising health costs. Just how far they would be prepared to go along with us—and we would need their agreement to extend coverage in this area—is very questionable. As I say, this is a prime area of discussion; it has been raised on several occasions over the last year or two, and I expect will be again.

TRADE

ACTION RESPECTING INDUSTRIES, INCLUDING GRAIN, ADVERSELY AFFECTED BY FLOATING EXCHANGE RATE

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It arises out of the government's undertaking to consider the position of industries adversely affected by the change to a floating exchange rate last summer. I understand that the minister received representations from such industries. Could the minister indicate whether the government has taken action in response to such representations? If so, would the minister undertake to make a statement on motions at an early date outlining what action was taken?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, our position was to receive representations from each of these companies that could claim it had been hurt by revaluation and try to render assistance on a very practical basis. I do not know whether I could provide an analysis of the information that was given, because it has taken the form of services and advice of all kinds. I presume that there would be too many categories to try to report on that particular matter.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether any consideration was given to the adverse effects of the revalution on the grains industry which is already suffering from a combination of bad situations and conditions? Has any action been taken by the government in that regard?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I seem to recall reading a copy of a letter sent to the hon. member on that subject in which it was explained to him by the acting minister or the minister in charge of the Wheat Board that the effects of revaluation had been compensated by the increases in prices.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether it would be correct to infer from his difficulty in making the statement requested by the hon. member that a substantial number of industries have found themselves in difficulties as a result of the change in the value of the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Pepin: That is very well known, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Regina East on a supplementary question. However, I must bring to the attention of hon. members that there are only a very few minutes left, and I suggest we should have no more supplementary questions.

Mr. Burton: I should like to make a correction first, if I may. The letter I received was from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the floor for the purpose of asking a supplementary question.

Mr. Burton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was going to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether he would give special consideration to the fact that in spite of the limited recovery in grain prices these prices are still depressed and that there was a particularly bad effect upon the grains industry, which should be taken into account by the government.

GREAT LAKES—MEANS USED TO PERSUADE UNITED STATES TO MAKE GREATER EFFORT TO CLEAN UP CONTAMINATION

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that we are using every possible means in trying to persuade the United States to clean up pollution.

BORDER WATERS—MEASURES TO BE TAKEN BY UNITED STATES TO CLEAN UP CONTAMINATION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the strong statements made yesterday by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry on pollution control, has the minister any report to make to the House on the measures that will be taken by Washington to help clean up the pollution of Lake Erie resulting from the use of detergents, or the pollution of the Saint John River as a result of the use of starch and fibres or, for that matter, the pollution of any other body of water on the border between Canada and the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of making such a statement at the present time. As the hon. member knows, it was mainly as the result of the initiative taken by Canada and the International Joint Commission that we are now seriously engaged in dealing with these problems on both sides of the border. We are trying to attain co-ordination of effort, and to get the United States to play its full part in the measures we have been taking.

May I ask the minister whether this statement is in accordance with the objectives of the current negotiations between the two governments?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have seen this report. I suggest that the hon. member is asking for an opinion of a legal nature, which is out of order.

I wonder whether the minister would be willing to give consideration to the establishment of low-interest loans to these farmers to enable them to buy, first of all, feed for their animals and, second, food for their families?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows we have cases similar to this in many localities in Canada almost every year. FARM MACHINERY PRICE INCREASES PROPOSED BY WHITE MOTOR COMPANY

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Has he had an opportunity of ascertaining from the White Motor Company whether it in fact intends to introduce price increases? Has the minister in his discussions with officials of this company been able to convince them that if they had not been so negligent in sending out parts, sometimes taking more than three weeks—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is more of a submission to the government and I would not think it is acceptable in that form.

Mr. Korchinski: Could I ask if the minister has been able to ascertain whether this company will in fact introduce its price increases before the price of steel is increased?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to ascertain that.

BROADCASTING

NORTHERN NOVA SCOTIA—TELEVISION COVERAGE WITH PROVINCIAL NEWS CONTENT

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Is the minister in a position to inform the House what action will be taken by the CRTC to provide the residents of northern Nova Scotia with television coverage that contains Nova Scotia news content, which is presently not available, or will he obtain this information and report to the House?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the question straight off. I do not know whether the CRTC has taken decisions or made plans in that regard, but I would be happy to inquire and transmit the information to the hon. member.

NORTHERN NOVA SCOTIA—HEARING OF CABLEVISION APPLICATIONS

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): My question is in line with the question asked by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North. When the secretary of State is checking with the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, will he ensure that cablevision applications for the Pictou County area, which is northern Nova Scotia, will be heard at the Maritime hearings of the commission which are slated for early in the new year.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

INFORMATION CANADA

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF ADDITIONAL CENTRES

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the minister of the Crown responsible for Information Canada.

Could he tell the House whether he intends to establish other Information Canada centres elsewhere in the country? If so, could he tell us which areas or cities will have priority?

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, this information could be given to the House in a statement on motions. If there is some urgency in that respect, the hon. member could notify the Chair so that the matter could be discussed at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Serré: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member could then also discuss the supplementary question at that time.

Mr. Serré: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRY

LONDON, ONT.—CLOSURE OF EATON AUTOMOTIVE PLANT

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce regarding the announcement this week that the Eaton automotive plant in London, Ontario, will be closed early next year throwing about 300 men out of work. I ask this question because the London plant is located on the edge of the constituency of Huron and many people from Huron are employed there. Will the minister look into this and see whether anything can be done?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I have already done that. Indeed, a decision has been taken by the United States parent company to transfer the heavy duty truck transmission operation to a U.S. subsidiary. This is bound to happen in a qualified free trade agreement, and when it is in our favour complaints are made by employees in the United States to their government. We expect transitional assistance benefits to be requested in the near future. I might complete my reply by saying that plants of the same company in Toronto, Scarborough, Wallaceburg, Woodstock, St. Catharines, Hamilton and Chatham are not affected by this decision.

HEALTH

STUDY OF SOLID WASTE DISPOSAL

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare of which I believe he has notice. It has to do with solid waste disposal in Canada. In view of the fact that the public health engineering advisory committee made a strong recommendation to the Department of National Health and Welfare that a preliminary study of this serious problem be undertaken, can the minister advise whether such a study has been undertaken and, if so, would he be prepared to make a statement on motions as to the results of the study?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I do not think a statement is necessary, and I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of the question. The advisory committee on public health did set up a subcommittee under Dr. Jones of the University of Toronto. He went into the extent of the problem and the needed areas for further research. That brief is going to be approved by the health committee and then taken up with the science secretariat. It is still very much in the study stage within the department and within the government.

INDUSTRY

GENERAL MOTORS—USE OF FRENCH AS WORKING LANGUAGE AT STE. THÉRÈSE PLANT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would the minister use his influence with General Motors and join with Premier Bourassa and the United Auto Workers Union in trying to persuade that company to agree to make French the language of work at its Ste. Thérèse plant so the strike may be settled as quickly as possible?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I would be very pleased to do so, Mr. Speaker, now that I have been requested to do so.

PUBLIC WORKS

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS IN FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): My question is for the Minister of Public Works. Is it his intention to include in the next set of supplementary estimates amounts to provide for capital expenditures in the Atlantic provinces to alleviate unemployment during the upcoming winter months in view of the fact that this area of Canada seems to have been carefully omitted from the present estimates?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): It would be our hope and intention to include votes in the estimates for the Maritime provinces. Over a five-year period the Maritimes have done better than any other part of Canada.

An hon. Member: That is not very good.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): God help the rest of Canada.

Mr. Laing: It would be our intention, however, to build installations there that are conducive to continuing employment rather than merely to provide employment in the building thereof.

[Mr. Alexander.]

HOUSING

URBAN RENEWAL AREAS—LOW-INTEREST LOANS FOR REHABILITATION PURPOSES

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): My question is directed to the minister in charge of housing and urban affairs. In view of the recent agreement between the city of Toronto and CMHC making loans available to home owners for rehabilitation purposes at low interest rates in areas not designated as urban renewal areas, would the minister consider making money available to urban renewal areas in a similar way so we could avoid the bulldozer approach to those areas?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): There is a great deal of merit in the suggestion of the hon. member, and indeed it is the thrust of the experiment we are negotiating with the city of Toronto, and I hope to be able to extend that general idea into next year's operations with some funds behind it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask my usual Thursday question of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council regarding business of the House for next week from Monday to Friday.

Mr. Jerome: Today, of course, will see the conclusion of the debate on the opposition motion. Pursuant to the order made today the House will not sit tomorrow. On Monday it is the intention of the government to complete the temporary emergency measures bill, following which we will proceed with government order 36, the surtax on shirts. We will then proceed to the young offenders bill, Bill C-192, followed by the CNR finance bill and the omnibus bill, C-191, to renew several loans programs, followed by the statutory instruments bill, the Buffalo and Fort Erie Bridge bill, and the anti-dumping legislation.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED LACK OF POLICIES AND PROGRAMS TO PREVENT UNEMPLOYMENT, POVERTY AND SOCIAL INJUSTICE

The House resumed from Wednesday, November 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stanfield:

That this House condemns the government for increasing the economic inequalities between different regions of Canada by its opposition to full employment policy and its refusal to use short term and long term programs in a timely and effective manner to prevent the resulting recession-level poverty and social injustice now widespread in Canada.

and the amendment thereto of Mr. Douglas, (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands) (P. 1298).

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, without question we are faced with the most difficult winter that we have had in years, both from the point of view of employment and the economy. The realization just now seems to have hit the government, probably too late. Despite the growing promises in the Speech from the Throne and in the hundreds of speeches that cabinet ministers have made all over the country, Parliament and the government are in neutral gear. We have done nothing but talk about the situation in Quebec, urged on by rumours originating from government sources.

Even if we had set all that aside, there is practically nothing on the Order Paper for us to consider that would do anything to meet the emergency situation. Just now we had an outline of the business to be dealt with within the next week, and it is a dismal effort as far as any measures to improve the economy or to relieve the employment situation are concerned. Just look at the 20 pieces of legislation on the order paper right now. There is hardly one job creator in the whole lot. There are bills concerning the labelling of products, statistics publication, cutting the powers of the Auditor General, amendments to the Customs Tariff, and so forth. Then, we should look at this week's accomplishments so far as this Parliament is concerned. Monday and Tuesday we spent on the public order temporary measures bill. Yesterday and today, we have the special debate to urge some action to relieve the unemployment situation. Tomorrow, we will not be sitting. That does not give any feeling of confidence to those who are watching this government and Parliament in our ability to meet an emergency situation.

In my opinion the time has come for us in the House to face up to the ridiculous and tragic situation to which we and our country have been brought. A couple of dozen revolutionaries in Montreal have made fools of the Canadian government and the Canadian people. They have panicked the government into declaring a state of war or insurrection. They have frightened the life out of everyone in Quebec. They have given the rest of Canada a national emotional binge. They have eluded the police for six weeks, although apparently they are still around the city of Montreal. They have caused Canada to lose its high standing internationally, and Quebec to lose millions of dollars economically. The government of Canada has played into their hands right down the line, and we look more foolish as the days go by.

We have spent six weeks of Parliament's time in discussing the War Measures Act and the temporary public order bill while the nation's economy is crashing down around us, the unemployed are walking the streets in increasing thousands, and pollution is continuing to choke us and ruin our heritage. Sitting in this House during the six weeks since the session began has been among my most saddening and frustrating experiences here.

As we watch unemployment and misery in Canada mount, as the number of letters sent to members looking for help and jobs increases, and as the economy deteriorates the government has sat apparently helpless, and without policy or action. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has concerned himself almost entirely with the political situation in Quebec. The rest of Canada must wait.

The Prime Minister has indicated no concern, in any remarks he has made in this House or outside it, about the human misery, or unemployment. They are only figures on a chart. I do not know when the people of the country are going to wake up to the fact that they are being distracted from their misery by a series of confrontations in the province of Quebec. Probably that will come when the Prime Minister's opponents in Quebec become tired of being the whipping boys every time he wants to bolster his image in the rest of Canada.

Within the past few days, the government has indicated that it will allot extra money for the creation of employment this winter. But it is well known that suddenly making money available will not create jobs. You cannot just go out and build a new factory, or create a demand for goods and services in a few weeks. It takes not weeks but months, and in some cases years. The demand for goods and services, for increased production and the reversing of lay-offs in industry, cannot be met unless money is available to the public to buy goods. The tight money policy of the past few months has left less money in people's pockets with which to buy goods and services. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, you do not increase your purchasing power from unemployment insurance or welfare cheques.

So far as inflation is concerned the government itself may be a strong contributing factor. Just today the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee was presented with supplementary estimates for the current year showing an increase of $457 million, almost an extra half billion dollars. Our total federal spending is now $13,355,000,000, but so far as we could learn this morning only $60 million is for job creation this winter, that is $60 million of that $457 million. The $17 million was for student employment last summer. This large increase in government spending can do nothing but increase the inflationary trend unless it is used substantially for job creation, and that certainly does not appear to be the case from the figures presented to that committee. The government is now forecasting a budgetary deficit of some $400 million this fiscal year instead of a surplus of $200 million. It is finally recognizing, to some degree at least, the desperate situation we face this winter.

The extra money being spent would be justified if it were shown that it was being used to create jobs, but this does not appear to be the case. So, the increase in expenditure of half a billion dollars is not to fight unemployment, as is often recommended, but is merely an increase in general spending by the government, an increase which the public will have to meet by way of taxes, which will reduce by that amount the money they have available for purchases.

I would like to look for a few minutes at unemployment prospects for this winter. Unemployment affects the different regions of Canada differently yet, as obvious as that might be, government policy is not tempered by this reality. Apparently the government is obsessed with controlling inflation. However, that applies to everybody else except the government. So far as its expenditures are concerned inflation continues to rise.

British Columbia at present has a rate of unemployment which is higher than the national average. The rate there is predicted to peak this winter with over 13 per cent of its work force unemployed. The highly seasonal nature of employment in the forestry sector accounts for some of this unemployment, and recently the Economic Council has cited the heavy incidence of industrial strikes as another reason for the unemployment picture. Yet this province rightly boasts of one of the best educated work forces in the country, and the highest per capita income in Canada.

The Prairie region traditionally has the lowest level of unemployment of any area in the country. It is worth noting then, Mr. Speaker, that the forecast actual rate of unemployment, set at 8 per cent for this region this winter, is almost double what the area normally experiences. In addition, there is reason to believe that there is considerable hidden unemployment in the Prairies, since the labour force figures omit farmers idled by a slowdown in farm production. Furthermore, it is obvious that the "government's left hand doesn't know what the right's doing"; regional policy has been particularly lamentable for this region.

The government of Manitoba has estimated that that Province has lost more jobs because of the government's closing of certain military bases and the moving of Air Canada's repair facilities to Montreal, than the province has gained through the government's regional incentive programs. The government is trying to pump funds into certain areas to repair the damage it has done itself. As I said previously, Mr. Speaker, pumping money into an area cannot create jobs immediately, or even in the near future. It seems that the quickest way of producing work for people has always been, and will continue to be, through the municipalities and local governments. All of these governments have on their shelves many projects which could usefully be done during the winter months.

In previous years of high unemployment, special projects or winter works have been undertaken with federal and local co-operation. This means that even if a man does not have a permanent job he will be able to go out and do something, giving himself the satisfaction of earning money to keep himself and his family. This could very easily be done through a winter works program but the government has rejected it time and again—perhaps because it was originally a policy of the former Progressive Conservative government. If that is the reason it is a most lamentable situation, because this is where some help could reach those badly in need this winter.

[Mr. Aiken.]

To come now to Ontario, which is the traditional beneficiary of government money and fiscal policies, this centre, under the government's national policy, will not be helped this winter. Peak unemployment is headed for a ten-year high of 7 per cent in Ontario. In some areas within the province local unemployment will be twice the provincial average.

Mr. Speaker: I regret that I have to interrupt the hon. member but I understand that his time expired two minutes ago.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would respectfully recommend to the federal government that when the federal and provincial finance ministers meet in Ottawa on December 7 and 8 to compare notes on the economy and to exchange information on the economic prospects for the next year, the federal government initiate discussions with the provinces immediately on the unemployment situation. They should also discuss joint initiatives that the two levels of governments could take to meet the crisis situation of the jobless in Canada this winter. I understand that most provinces are willing, and indeed quite anxious, to take part in such discussions. I feel it is incumbent upon this government to initiate the studies with the provincial finance ministers when they meet here on December 7 and 8.

This winter Canadians appear to be facing the most severe unemployment crisis since the great depression of the 1930's. According to economists and people eminently qualified to speak on the subject, it is expected that one out of every ten Canadians in the country's labour force will be out of a job by March of next year. This is a very very serious prospect. Should this happen, 750,000 to 800,000 men and women and their families will be facing a bitter struggle for economic survival in the months ahead.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Carter: It is quite apparent, Mr. Speaker, that, as pointed out by the previous speaker, this government has been so preoccupied with Quebec terrorism and the FLQ that it has all but lost sight of the bitter economic crisis that Canada faces this winter. While it is not my intention to criticize the government's action in Quebec in recent weeks and months, I suggest to them and to the House that there are problems facing Canadians far more serious than the FLQ in Quebec. These are the problems connected with being able to keep body and soul together during the coming winter and are a result of this government's illogical and completely insane policies to fight inflation which have had a ruinous effect on the economy of this country to the grief and sorrow of the average man, the unemployed, the untrained, the underemployed and the little people of Canada generally.

Instead of dealing with unemployment with the same vigour and enthusiasm, and the same degree of urgency that has been applied to imposing law and order in Quebec, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his colleagues have been groping around like blind men, groping around in a daze as though they do not really believe that things are going to be very bad in Canada during the coming winter. They have used the old ostrich psychology of sticking their heads in the sand and pretending all is well.

I feel that this House and Canadians generally, Mr. Speaker, should demand, must demand, that this government treat the coming winter unemployment as an emergency, and must produce emergency measures to deal with it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Carter: Whether the government wishes to acknowledge this fact or not, it does have a moral obligation to deal with this problem which has been created to a large extent by its own illogical and irrational inflationary policies of the past year and a half.

The unemployment situation in Canada is a continuing embarrassment to the government's fight against inflation. The House knows that the embarrassment is much more acute when the unemployment figures are released by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. The result is that the government has developed a method of presenting unemployment figures which makes them appear better than they are. I might say that it is quite obvious to most members, and I am quite sure to the Canadian public, that the government has actually succeeded in fooling itself by its own figures. However, I am sure they are not fooling the average man and certainly they are not fooling the large number of Canadians who now find themselves unemployed or are facing the prospect of unemployment during the coming winter months.

Economists tell us that by February, 1971, an estimated three-quarters of a million Canadians will be out of work. Donald MacDonald, President of the Canadian Labour Congress, has predicted that by February our unemployment figures will reach 9 per cent. Other observers have predicted that the rate could go as high as 14 per cent for the same period.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Carter: It appears that this government has an obsession with inflation, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the Prime Minister have embarked upon a program of economic policies that guarantee no assurance of success and no assurance that they can beat inflation without having a ruinous effect on the economy.

The unfortunate aspect of this government's folly is that the people who contribute less to inflation, the untrained, the unemployed, the people who are barely scraping a living, the widows and the orphans and the people on the welfare rolls, are the real victims of this government's anti-inflationary policy.

What we need in Canada, Mr. Speaker, is an economic policy which is devoted to growth and full employment for all Canadians. It is unfortunate that our country, which boasts of having the second or third highest per capita income in the world, should have such a high degree of poverty. The elimination of the disparity between our "haves" and "have-nots" presents a monumental challenge to our leaders, but unfortunately the present government has failed in its mandate and has been unable or unwilling to meet this challenge.

The fourth report recently published by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council has revealed some startling statistics with regard to the economic conditions of the Atlantic region. For example, it is said, I believe, that in 1969 one person in four in Atlantic Canada was either unemployed or employed on some job that paid very low wages which were barely sufficient to keep body and soul together. We also find that conditions were such in Atlantic Canada between 1956 and 1969 that there was a mass exodus of people from that area. Indeed 209,000 people—I repeat, 209,000 people—were forced because of economic conditions to move from the Atlantic area between 1956 and 1969. This, I believe, underlines the serious weakness of the economy of that region. Newfoundland lost 54,000 people in the same period. Other Atlantic provinces lost large numbers of people they could not afford to lose.

It appears, Mr. Speaker, that the difficulties were brought about because this government refused to acknowledge that Canada is made up of four or five different areas or regions. Instead, it has adopted the same policies right across the country in fighting inflation and unemployment. Quite obviously, the government ought to adopt regional policies for dealing with the difficulties in each of the regions. It is sheer madness to expect the Prairies and the Atlantic provinces to pay the price for the government's fight against inflation when those regions are already suffering their worst unemployment in years. The result of the government's policies in fighting inflation is economic chaos, and complete and utter frustration in the provinces that are affected most. I think I am not exaggerating when I say that the Atlantic region has probably been affected more by the government's anti-inflation policies than any part of Canada, with the exception of Quebec perhaps.

I should like to make a few proposals which the government may wish to consider and implement in the months ahead. They may help to alleviate the very serious difficulties brought about by unemployment. I strongly recommend that the benefits payable to all eligible unemployed persons be increased, to alleviate the distress that has been caused to many by the loss of their jobs. Families without any weekly income need money now, and not in two months time or whenever the white paper of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) will be implemented. They need money now, because their chances of gaining employment are growing slimmer every week.

I also recommend that the government should increase the funds available under the Canada Assistance Plan. Reports from many cities indicate that municipal funds in this field are all but exhausted. This indicates clearly that there is a great need for more money, which ought to be distributed to the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan.

I urge the government to remove financial constraints from the construction industry. Canadians need homes; yet the number of workers in the building industry has declined this year to a greater extent than is customary. The decline this year has been greater than in any year in the past decade.

I call on the government to remove the doubt existing in the minds of many Canadians, many businessmen both large and small, relating to the matter of tax reform in order that industry may have the necessary information with which to finance new development and order new construction. We have seen the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) dancing and working around the problem; I am afraid that has been of little consolation to the average Canadian or to the average Canadian businessman, big or small. There is a certain amount of doubt as to how tax reform will affect business.

I also ask the government to cease its attacks on organized labour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carter: Let it stop using labour as the sacrificial lamb of inflation, because this is what it is doing. We need the co-operation of labour, and I am sure this co-operation could be achieved if a new climate were created by this government. Instead of trying to pin the responsibility for what is happening on labour, let us try to get together with labour and work out the means whereby we can help each other to create a new climate.

I strongly urge the government to support the construction of urban transit projects. Most cities have in existence detailed urban transit plans; all they are requesting is the money to put those plans into effect. I ask the government to inaugurate immediately, in consultation with the provinces and municipalities, plans under which we can start work on sewage treatment plants and other anti-pollution measures.

Programs such as I have enumerated are intended to create new jobs and new job opportunities. Such programs, working through the public and private sector, would stimulate the economy and hence, of course, increase the demand for labour. Regionalized winter works and house construction would also provide additional stimulus to the regions. Accelerated transfers to provincial governments would enable those governments to meet their commitments. I also ask the government to step up grants under the regional industrial incentives program.

I heard an hon. member yesterday refer to the industrial incentives program, and he spoke as though this program were the answer to all our problems. I ask him to reconcile his position, that these programs are the answer to all our difficulties, which the high rate of unemployment from which we suffer at present.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I must interrupt the hon. member. His time has expired.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, throughout Canada's history, the various governments which have run this country have seeked to abolish what we call regional disparities, or at least to lessen them considerably.

When Canada came into being, it was felt that by creating a national common market, by building a railway to link east and west, not only would the economic activity be stimulated, but the wealth would be distributed more equitably between various areas. After many years, it was quickly realized that it was not sufficient to link east and west with a railway, and that other means had to be found.

After the Rowell-Sirois Commission, we came to adopt the equalization formula. It was then believed that by trying to re-establish a better balance between the provinces from the standpoint of income, it would be possible to abolish those disparities or at least to lessen them to a considerable extent.

Well, in spite of all those commendable efforts, it was quickly realized that this second method was still insufficient. Then came the series of special programs designed to assist the areas of the country which were developing less rapidly than the others.

As early as the thirties, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, better known under the name of PFRA, was enacted. Somewhat similar legislation was in effect in the Maritimes. Then, what has been called ARDA was enacted in order to promote rural development. The ambit of ARDA was later enlarged in order to implement more general programs under FRED. Then we attempted, with industrial incentives, to encourage the establishment of industries in areas with a slower rate of growth.

Last year, on July 1st I think, the House passed a new piece of legislation on industrial incentives which provided for the setting up of special areas and gave us the authority to help those individuals faced with readjustment problems because we realized that up to that point, in spite of our efforts, disparities remained.

Had these programs not been applied, would these disparities be the same? We can safely say that they would probably be greater than they are now. However, these are hypothetical inferences which make it rather difficult to reach concrete conclusions.

When we initiated these new programs, we did not kid ourselves. We never though that overnight we would succeed in solving the problem of regional disparities in Canada. On the contrary we knew we would have to spend quite some time on it.

For instance, when a subsidy is granted to a company, normally it takes one or two years before that company goes into production, especially if it is of a certain size.

The same situation applies to special areas where we undertook the develop an infrastructure in order to create development centres capable of providing the various areas of Canada with equal opportunities. We know fully well that the designation of an area is not enough to solve its problems but the tools needed to give equal opportunities to Canadians, wherever they live, are available to us.

A moment ago I was reading the speech made yesterday by the member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). He said of course—that is his usual argument—that not only did the government fail to do anything to eliminate regional disparities but that they have increased since this government is in power.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make my first remark now. The slate of programs I administer have never been designed to fight a general economic slow-down in this country. These regional development programs can reach their full efficiency provided the overall economy works normally. Therefore neither ARDA nor FRED nor the law on industrial incentives should be expected to straighten up our entire economy. We should rather consider these measures under their true aspects.

• (3:30 p.m.)

[English]

An hon. Member: What a ridiculous statement.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Do you want to make a speech?

Mr. MacEwan: You haven't said anything yet. Go ahead.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might be allowed to make his speech.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. members could keep quiet I could proceed with my speech.

These programs were not meant to correct the defaults of our economical activities on a national level.

The tax equalization system and the programs I administer are working normally. When the hon. member is saying that we did nothing his arguments betray complete ignorance of our activities in this field.

Of course, I would like things to progress more quickly. I wish I could do more. If Parliament should agree to grant me three of four times as much money, I would certainly find some way to spend it. One does not need to be a genius to spend money in these areas since it is overwhelmingly needed there.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, since January 1, 1969, we have assisted, through implementation of the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act, the establishment of 774 firms in Canada, thus creating approximately 36,940 jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The incentives have called for an overall capital investment amounting to $1.1 billion of which 205 million were directly dedicated to the incentives themselves. So much for the industrial incentives program.

Now, when I say new jobs, Mr. Speaker, I mean those jobs which have been effectively created or those which will be as a result of the grants which have been paid. But these new jobs also give rise to new openings in other areas and I would say—this is indeed a very conservative estimate—that we may expect an equal number of resultant jobs being created in other enterprises.

Of course, I would rather have 200,000 new jobs, but to say that the present number is but a trifle clearly amounts to an exaggeration. If I refer to—

[English]

Mr. Burton: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to remind hon. members the minister has 15 minutes for his speech.

An hon. Member: He has all the time he wants.

Mr. Burton: The figures the minister quoted, 36,000 jobs and $1.5 billion of development, do these refer just to the Regional Development Incentives Act or do they go back to the old area development incentive program? Do they also include special development area programs? Do they refer to industries in existence or only commitments of grants made by the government?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, part of it refers to the previous regional industrial incentives program, and part of it to the new legislation.

The 774 plants I have mentioned are not all in operation now; however they should be before long and this will provide jobs, as I said.

Concerning the other programs applying to special areas—ARDA, FRED, PFRA and so forth—I can say that they led to the creation of new jobs and to the investment of large amounts of money. In fact, in the Atlantic provinces, $167.6 million have been invested and 10,060 jobs have been created. In the province of Quebec, $40.6 million have been invested and 2,550 jobs have been created. In Ontario, $5.5 million were invested and 330 jobs were created. In western Canada, $31.2 million were invested and 1,870 jobs were created. Total outlays amount to $246 million and new jobs number 14,810. If one takes into account the number of jobs indirectly created, the total figure is about 34,000 new jobs.

Obviously this alone is not sufficient to solve the general unemployment problem in Canada. But to say that our programs designed to minimize regional disparities have not been and are not operative, is sheer irresponsibility. These programs are working well and we are enjoying very valuable co-operation from the Maritime provinces, from Quebec as well as from the other provinces. Furthermore we have reasons to believe that if these programs are intensified, they will help in substantially reducing the disparities that have existed ever since Confederation.

Once again I say, Mr. Speaker, that those programs are not intended to restore a general situation which is unsatisfactory and which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has dealt with to some considerable length indicating the solutions he wanted to propose. I feel that these regional expansion programs are very thorough. There are others, for instance, the relocation plans in Newfoundland, and the "New Start", program which results in extremely interesting experiments. I believe that all this is worthwhile and that one must not expect from it what can be achieved through a fiscal or general policy aimed at achieving full employment in Canada.

I do not intend to repeat the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). There are, obviously, reasons for inflation; but I shall merely comment on these. This government should not have to make a choice between inflation and unemployment. Ours is a matter of finding out whether inflation is going to create more unemployment than the anti-inflation steps that we have taken.

Now, if we had to do this over again, would we proceed in the same way? I am far from sure, Mr. Speaker. It could be that a more stringent policy would be required with regard to prices, profits and salaries. At the present time, some balance is being re-established, and, with the help of the measures we will be taking shortly, I believe that we shall succeed in creating a dynamic economy, one in which Canadians will feel happy.

However, my department should not be asked to work miracles, we are unable to do so. We have already accomplished much, and I am not including here a number of measures in the regional field for which I claim neither merit nor glory. I could mention, for instance, Devco in Nova Scotia. Also, thanks to the former Atlantic Development Board, known as ADB, sustained efforts have been made. I am sure that, without such undertakings, disparities would be even worse than they are now.

Mr. Speaker, I simply and strongly challenge the hon. member's comments to which I referred a while ago. Instead of downgrading all the efforts made jointly by the provincial, federal and often local authorities, we should appreciate these worthwhile programs. Of course, we should not expect from them more than they can normally give.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) brought forward the following motion, and I quote:

That this House condemns the government for increasing the economic inequalities between different regions of Canada by its opposition to full employment policy and its refusal to use short term and long term programs in a timely and effective manner to prevent the resulting recession-level poverty and social injustice now widespread in Canada.

[Mr. Marchand.]

Mr. Speaker, taking into consideration facts as they are, one cannot but agree with the Leader of the Opposition and say he was quite justified in introducing a motion of non-confidence toward the present government.

During the new minutes available to me, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a rapid review of the economic situation of the province of Quebec.

Surely, no one will blame me for pointing out the weaknesses in the province of Quebec. I do so, hoping to help the people in power to do away with the disparities from which stems the growing unrest in my province.

Quebec has the largest number of unemployed in Canada. From September 1965 to September 1970, Quebec accounted for between 27.5 to 28 per cent of the national labour force, while the rate of unemployment, compared with the national figure, ranged between 35.5 and 41.5 per cent. Except for the Maritime provinces, over the last ten years the rate of unemployment has always been higher in Quebec than in the other provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I am not saying that those who have more than we do, in the province of Quebec, should be penalized in order to improve our lot. I think the Maritimes also deserve special attention, since their economic situation is very unsatisfactory.

I am sorry to say that in October 1970, 8.8 per cent of the labour force in Quebec was unemployed. In fact, the percentage was higher because the statistics provided exclude workers on retraining allowances. Therefore, it is certain that there are more than 159,000 unemployed in the province of Quebec, including those who get unemployment or retraining allowances.

The Quebec labour force is increasing more rapidly than the employment opportunities. Between 1961 and 1969, the Quebec labour force increased by 25 per cent; during the same period, jobs increased only by 17 per cent.

We therefore note a gap between the number of workers and the anticipated number of jobs. Young Quebecers especially are affected by unemployment. The unemployment rate among young Quebecers from 14 to 24 years of age reaches 11 per cent. This rate is much too high when we want to keep people happy and confident in their future and we must absolutely enable them to earn a decent living.

There is a large percentage of chronic unemployment in the province of Quebec. Indeed, 28 per cent of claims from that provinces as of August 31, 1970 covered a period of at least 27 weeks. In addition, a survey of the chronic unemployed in Canada shows that Quebec has 31 per cent of claimants and that claims extend to more than 27 weeks.

A considerable number of unemployed reside also in the Montreal area and it is essential that some steps be immediately taken to check that national evil which is unemployment. It has been proved that 40 per cent of the unemployed people of Quebec who receive unemployment insurance benefits are from Montreal.

What is the situation in the business world? More than half of commercial bankruptcies in Canada have been registered in Quebec. In other words, the province of Quebec is lagging behind in both industry and labour. The government has much to do in order to cope with the situation.

In 1969, 52 per cent of Canadian bankruptcies were recorded in the province of Quebec. Several sectors of the Quebec industry have suffered from some decline during 1970, but on the other hand, in certain other industries, some encouraging signs have to be noted. It is to be hoped that the situation will keep improving so that our industries may offer more and more jobs to Canadian people who need them.

About 30 per cent of the new manufacturing plants were established in the province of Quebec between 1960 and 1969, mostly between 1960 and 1964 rather than between 1965 and 1969.

In the field of home building, the situation is far less than comforting in Canada, particularly in the province of Quebec. During 1970, home starts declined in this province as compared with the previous year. There is a shortage of housing, because when families want to put a roof over their heads, they have much difficulty in finding one.

In 1961, 17,204 homes were built in Montreal, 17,518 in Toronto. In 1969, 23,650 homes were built in Montreal and 31,874 in Toronto, which is an increase of 81.9 per cent for Toronto and only 37.5 per cent for Montreal during the same period. During the first nine months of 1970, the situation in Montreal did not improve greatly.

What do we see now as far as prices and costs are concerned, Mr. Speaker? The price that consumers have to pay in Montreal for some commodities and services is substantially higher than in the other regions of Canada. For its bonds the government of the province of Quebec has to grant a much higher interest rate than any other provincial government. Ontario grants an interest rate of 6.85 and 8.84 per cent for its bonds if they are held to maturity. Quebec rates range from 9 to 9.6 per cent for similar securities.

Let us have a look at the current situation in the field of investments. There is a disastrous disparity between Ontario and Quebec as far as job-creating investments are concerned.

Total investments scheduled in Quebec for 1970 amount to 3 billion 400 million dollars compared with 7 billion 100 million dollars in Ontario. Quebec whose population represents only four fifths of that of Ontario receives only half as much investment as Ontario does.

Despite the fact that its population represents 29 per cent of that of the whole of Canada, the province of Quebec is getting a mere 19 per cent of the total Canadian investments. Six years ago investments in Quebec amounted to approximately 75 per cent of what Ontario was getting and to somehwere around 26 per cent of the Canadian total.

During the last few years, capital investments dwindled in practically all areas except one and present forecasts are none too bright.

Personal income which is of interest to us all, has decreased in the province of Quebec.

The average hourly rate is lower in Quebec than in British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario but higher than in the Maritimes and Saskatchewan.

Wages paid in industries in Quebec are generally lower than those paid in other regions of the country, except the Maritimes.

Personal per capita income has been constantly lower in Quebec than in all other provinces except the Maritimes. However, some improvement is noted in the situation in Quebec.

In my opinion, this short review of economic conditions in the province of Quebec shows beyond doubt that a situation exists in this province which it is urgent to correct as soon as possible.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) described a few moments ago the work which has been done by his department during the last few months. I agree with him that his department has made a tremendous effort to try to correct the situation, but because of the steps taken by his government to fight inflation, unemployment has increased, bringing about even more poverty among the people. I am certainly one who would wish his department were more successful but I am afraid that with some of the projects suggested by the minister we will, within a few years, be facing situations not too encouraging.

Some of our cities' small and middle-sized industries would certainly deserve assistance from the minister's department in the form of loans. They do not solicit grants unnecessarily, being convinced they can be self-sufficient. If these industries could get interesting loans at latively low interest rates, they could go on offering employment to many Canadians, this to the benefit of all.

I should like also to make other suggestions. I would like again to inquire to the minister about the Saint-Hyacinthe region. I would like today, if possible, to convince him that it is his duty to declare it a designated area—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member but I must point out to him that his time has expired.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard)?

Mr. Ricard: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. As the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe has run out of time, the hon. member must first obtain the unanimous consent of the House. Does the House agree to allow the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) to ask his question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. members for their kindness.

I wish to ask the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, who has drawn for us a rather dark picture of the economy in Quebec, to give us his views on the reasons for the economic deterioration and to offer suggestions to improve the situation.

Mr. Ricard: Well, with regard to causes, Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not have enough time at my disposal to go into them thoroughly. As for suggestions, I have already made some. There are others, I am sure. The minister, like myself, would surely be interested in hearing the hon. member's own proposals, because he shares my wish to see that the situation in Quebec is improved as quickly as possible.

[English]

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House at the present time states, in essence, that the government is not making the economic system work. There are, of course, many people who will agree with that statement. The amendment moved by my leader, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), suggests that there is a lack of defined purpose in the government's programs and that its efforts are essentially not being adequately directed to meeting the wellbeing of people across Canada. I am glad that hon. members have an opportunity, through this amendment and motion, to discuss the government's regional development policies in particular. I suggest that the government's performance in tackling regional development and poverty problems has become a national disgrace. The government has failed to even make a start in its so-called war on poverty. All of us will acknowledge quite freely that some good things have been done, but the show that the government has put on in respect of these programs has been nothing more than a sham and a farce.

There are some 4 million to 5 million Canadians living in a state of poverty today, and another 3 million or so in varying states of deprivation. I suggest that the federal government had better realize there is a different mood and attitude toward conditions of poverty and hardship today. People are not prepared to tolerate unsatisfactory conditions indefinitely because they know they do not have to be that way, and they know that many of the disparities which exist are due to various elements of exploitation in both the present and the past.

The government has faced serious problems in the province of Quebec over the past month and a half. If the government had shown as much concern with tackling basic economic and social problems in Quebec as it is now showing in tracking down elusive bands of criminal conspirators and adventurers, it would never have been faced with some of the problems now before us. I was particularly struck by some excerpts I read recently from a book written, but not yet published, by Pierre Vallieres, one of the people now held on charges in Montreal. This book entitled "White Niggers of America" describes his view of the Quebec society in which he grew up. No doubt all of us will have disagreements with some of the views expressed, but we ignore them at our peril.

I noted one excerpt in which he described the conditions in which his family lived in Ville Jacques-Cartier, a community on the south shore of the St. Lawrence across from Montreal. It reads as follows:

> The shack was made of wood covered with "papier brique", a kind of tarpaper designed to look like brick. In the centre front was a little white porch. Inside, only three rooms: in the middle a kitchen, which also served as dining room, living room, bath room, etc., to the left, a large bedroom which my parents shared with Raymond (who was not yet walking); lastly, to the right, a tiny room with a double-decker bed and a chest of drawers, this was the room of "the two oldest", Andre and me. The rooms were separated by walls of "donnaconna", a kind of hard, thick cardboard which could be bought quite cheaply from any dealer in building materials. Manufactured by Domtar in the Portneuf region (I think), "donnaconna" was easy to cut up, install and paint, and it was usually sold in panels four feet by eight. Many of the shacks that went up in Ville Jacques-Cartier in the years following our arrival were built entirely out of two-by-fours and broad panels of this economical cardboard, which was then covered with tarpaper. It was not exactly warm in the winter, but it didn't cost much, and with this miraculous material you could build a little house in two days!
> Our shack seemed almost luxurious compared to most of the hovels in Longueuil-Annexe, which were covered with black tarpaper and looked like sinister old shanties abandoned in a swamp. On rainy days especially, Longueuil-Annexe looked like a burnt-out shantytown. The only trouble with this shantytown was that it was inhabited, to adopt the phrase of the Quebecois poet Roland Giguere.

This excerpt struck me forcefully because it reflected the viewpoint of one who had given up hope of being able to make meaningful change or improvements in society through existing institutions. That is a bad situation. As I read this excerpt, I thought of similar conditions I have seen in the past in Saskatchewan and, indeed, other parts of Canada. Fortunately, there was a difference. In my own province people did not give up hope. That was the great accomplishment of people like M. J. Coldwell, T. C. Douglas and others who led a new political movement in Saskatchewan in the 1930's. They offered hope of meaningful change, improvement and a better life through the democratic process. People felt there was a way out of their dilemma. For some today in Canada, for whatever reason, that hope does not exist. But the government says: Look at all the money we are spending. True, there is a lot of money being spent as the minister indicated this afternoon but the question is, how is the money being spent and is it doing the job.

My leader, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), pointed out yesterday that to the end of 1969 $46,176,000 in grants was provided to United States corporations by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion while only $20,877,000 was made available to Canadian concerns. Surely, this policy is in serious conflict with any attempt that might be made to check the growing influence of foreign corporations in Canada.

Let me refer to another matter. Yesterday my leader drew attention to an answer given to me this week that some $95,500,000 in grants have been made available by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which will provide 17,284 jobs. This makes only a very small dent in the unemployment situation. It might be worth noting that many of these jobs are not yet in existence. It is true the government has made a commitment to assist Canadian concerns, but the government I suggest is making many of these grants in an ad hoc fashion. They assist a variety of operators but whether the benefits envisaged will be achieved is not at all certain. I can give one example which came to my attention recently. It concerns my home town where I grew up, the town of Humboldt, which is in the consituency of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang).

Last June an announcement was made that $512,000 was to be provided for a poultry processing plant that cost some $1,200,000 and would provide about 207 jobs. I find that this company does not yet have the land on which to put up that plant. It has taken out an option but does not really, as yet, own the land that is available to it. The company is trying to raise capital. It has the $500,000 grant, or the commitment for it, and now is trying to raise the rest of the capital amounting to $800,000. I presume this would include some provision for working capital as well as the capital cost of the plant.

Apparently the company has some $370,000 or so now which it raised through a farm grain deal that ties in with other operations of the company, namely, some feed mill operations. I am subject to correction on this point, but the information I have at the moment suggests that the principals involved in this particular operation will not have to put up one penny of their own money. Certainly, that will be the case if this company is successful in raising the $800,000 in capital it is trying to raise in the district before construction of the plant can be commenced.

I don't want to suggest that I do not want to see a plant of this sort in my old home town, even though it is not in my constituency at the present time, but certainly I feel we need to look at these proposed operations with a view to seeing that they are efficient and, are developed in a manner which will be to the benefit of the communities concerned.

I suggest that the government is engaging in the worst type of "ad hocery" in its regional development programs. Where is the concern for the impact of these programs or how they meet the needs of the community? I suggest plants must meet adequate tests before they are started, regardless of the incentive. Until it has been shown that these proposed plants can meet adequate tests in respect of economic criteria and that they will be viable operations, the government should not throw away money on operators of various types, friends of the government and foreign interests. The government is not planning or providing the type of framework that is needed in this regard. I suggest that it does have to grapple with the needs of the total economy, and I suggest it has not done this to date. This, of course, is essential if regional development programs are to be successful.

In this regard, I agree with the minister that two aspects of the situation have to be co-ordinated. The government is not adequately tackling the total problems in respect of the economy. The prices and incomes approach—the Boy Scout approach—has been a failure. The government has not developed an economic policy which would help to deal with the disparities that exist in this country. It certainly has not moved toward full employment. Four hundred and nineteen thousand people are out of work at the present time; some 9 per cent to 11 per cent of the labour force may be out of work before the winter is over. Regional development programs must be planned and the planners must take a long run approach. These programs must also be geared to time considerations and to the needs that exist at present. I suggest that further attention must be given to the whole question of providing an adequate infrastructure for the communities concerned, and efforts must be made to develop it. Rural problems must be tackled. The Indian and Métis peoples' problems must be tackled. The government must avoid pitfalls and must beware of the growth of situations leading to the types of comments that have been made by some people in this country recently. The government should remember the words of some of the people who are now taking a very bitter attitude toward our country.

I suggest that the government should place high priority on regional development programs and on correcting regional inequalities. To date its programs have been a failure. It is late in the day, but the government must correct its course while there is still time.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, the motion now under consideration is one of those which makes us look back to live once more what we generally call the "good old days."

A world war ended in 1945, 25 years ago already, and our country went from full employment to a state of deplorable conditions where unemployment ranges from five to 12 per cent depending on the areas. Should we come to the conclusion that wartime is necessary to create full employment? Is it true that these would be the only possible conclusions for our narrow minds?

I should like to suggest to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) and to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) that they take retraining lessons from the masters of work and labour in Germany which we destroyed so completely during World War II and which today stands as a model to the whole world, as far as full employment is concerned.

Employment Programs

On November 11, 1970, the official day set aside to honour the memory of our dead soldiers of the last two world wars, La Presse, the Montreal newspaper, published an article on the progress of automation in Germany where there is work for everyone. This is quite enlightening and impressive.

On page 3 of section "J" of the November 11 issue of La Presse, one can read the following:

During these last ten years, automation and rationalization have "freed" 13 million workers in West Germany. Yet, they have not become unemployed: with a few exceptions, they did not even have to learn a new trade.

—the workers, the government and the unions nevertheless follow closely the development of the employment market, because they still remember the great world economic crisis of 1929-30 with its devastating consequences in the domestic field.

Even if the whole article is interesting to read, I will quote but the last paragraph:

There is no need therefore to be pessimistic for 1980: the number of vacancies will always be greater than that of jobs wanted.

That is simply marvelous and that is happening in capitalist Germany, under the eyes of our capitalist country. In 1970, we even get large loans from that country in order to finance our administrative deficiencies in Canada, and particularly in the province of Quebec.

If Germany can thus export capital, and at the same time maintain full employment on its own territory, why not also ask that country to export its experts in full employment, whom we could put at the head of our departments to replace inefficient ministers, who can only preach resignation in the face of our own inertness in filling the vacuum of a sick administration suffering from incurable unconcern.

Mr. Speaker, this happy situation of labour in Germany is due, and I quote:

—to the necessary qualifications, to the permanent training and to the sensible direction given to the growing generation—

The whole policy in the field of education is geared to the future by taking into account the high requirements of productivity for the next decade. This is enough, I believe, to shake us awake. These objectives are achievable since they have already been attained by men in Germany.

It is just possible, in my view, that men living in Canada achieve a similar aim. I urge that a mission of our most insignificant officials in charge of full employment be sent to Germany to undergo a conclusive retraining which would be profitable to the hard-working Canadian people who, as a whole, have always been willing to do their best under the leadership of their elite.

Let us not kid ourselves: the misgivings of a people always come as a result of the misgivings of its leaders. When a bus overturns, the fault does not lie with the passengers who bought their tickets. Let us rather look for the driver.

In Canada, we have everything we need except goodwill among our leadership.

[Mr. Godin.]

When an economic problem such as unemployment arises, why not seek first its causes? Let us stop making speeches, ordering inquiries, issuing white papers.

If we are really unable to find out who is at fault, this merely means that we are unwilling to suppress unemployment.

Unemployment, inflation, poverty, excessive taxation, these are many economic ills that cannot be said to derive from earthquakes, tidal waves, floods or acts of God. No, those ills derive from the action of our statesmen and financial leaders.

We are being governed by inefficient and blind people. "Can the blind lead the blind? Both shall fall into the ditch." This is written in the Gospel. The Bible says also: "The light of the body is the eye: therefore, when thine eye is single, thy whole body also is full of light."

If, as in Germany, management is enlightened, the whole labour force benefits from it. There is no unemployment, no inflation in that country. Probably their fiscal and financial system is adequate to the size of a productivity commensurate with their population and their natural resources.

All these things we have in abundance in Canada, but we lack adequate leadership. It must be realized, understood and stated in order to change the situation.

Let us replace the incompetent leaders, not only in the labour field, but in the areas of finance, currency, politics, industry and university training.

If our elite fails us, if our institutions are inefficient, let us proceed to the necessary changes and we will achieve our purposes.

Our whole administrative, monetary, economic and political activities overlook the real objectives and only seek profit. At the present time, this is where the trouble lies. We seek financial gain rather than satisfy the citizens' needs.

That is why in a period of unemployment, labour is sacrificed to financial profit.

That is why, even in war-time, life is sacrificed while finance reaps profits. In times of inflation, the cost of living goes up, taxes are increased, and all the citizens suffer. But finance pays off. Interest rates go up even as high as 10 and 12 per cent, but finance still makes profits.

What do we do when there is unemployment? We study its causes and show how it can be checked. But if we do not want to check it, then nothing can be done. The government could put an end to unemployment overnight, for they have the means to do so.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself knows what to do, but he will not do it. He has the means to force his ministers to do away with unemployment, but he does not want to use them to that end.

It is inconceivable that unemployment should be tolerated. Fortunately, there is one remedy that can be applied at once to stimulate purchases by making more money available to consumers.

Who wrote this important sentence? None other than the present Prime Minister, on page 33 of the March 1954 issue of Cité Libre, under the title "Fluctuations économiques et méthodes de stabilisation", and I quote:

Competition among producers would result in price reductions. Competition among the unemployed seeking a job would bring about lower wages, which would reduce production costs. The interest rate would decline accordingly, and new investments would thus become profitable. But today, prices and wages are prevented from going down by monopolies and labour unions.

Here is what the author said on page 34 of the same issue:

The problem is still to find out whether there is any other limit to unemployment than utter destitution.

The most obvious solution would be to equalize the incomes among the various social classes, so that the poor would have more money to spend, the rich less to save.

The following is found on page 35:

The government will then be compelled to increase its expenditures (railways, roads, airports, parks). As long as such needs exist, it is inconceivable that unemployment should be tolerated.

Fortunately, there is one remedy that can be applied at once —to stimulate purchases by making more money available to consumers. The state must distribute largely and determinedly all kinds of allowances—

Mr. Speaker, I shall quote a few excerpts from the March 1954 issue of Cité Libre:

—to stimulate purchases by making more money available to consumers.

This is what the Prime Minister was then advocating. Today, now that he has been elected thanks to an election fund supported by high finance, he merely reverses his opinions. Consumers are not only neglected, but he even asks them their co-operation by requiring them to tighten their belt.

The Créditistes have demanded that the purchasing power be distributed well before 1954 and they are still demanding it.

We are demanding it, because we already have the products and unfortunately, there are also needy costumers.

Among those who are expecting higher benefits are veterans, widows, needy mothers, disabled persons, father and mothers who are asking for increased family allowances, the unemployed, permanent or seasonal, and all workers who are paid a salary they consider inadequate to meet their commitments. As the present Prime Minister once stated, and I quote:

The state must distribute largely and determinedly all kinds of allowances—

Then, why not pay a salary to students? How many students are now facing financial problems? Why maintain and defend the system which is causing concern to them?

Mr. Speaker, these are so many reasons why it is urgent to implement the measures advocated in 1954 by our present Prime Minister.

Employment Programs

Since American economists and sociologists have stated in a open letter to President Johnson that the first condition to avoid economical and social troubles, in the present state of production, is to ensure that each individual and each family is guaranteed a minimum income as a right, let me repeat the famous statement of the Prime Minister, and I quote:

"The state should distribute profusely and resolutely all kinds of allowances so as to stimulate consumption."

This sentence is all the more true today because, since 1954, the value of our national production has increased from only 25 billion to an expected 80 billion in 1970.

Mr. Speaker, I feel quite at ease to suggest that this type of administration be tried since, as early as 1954, the right hon. Prime Minister declared: "Fortunately, this remedy can be administered right now."

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, the appropriateness of this motion could not be any more heavily underlined than by the headline in yesterday's Toronto Star reading, "Unemployment Rate for Last 3 Months Worst in 25 Years." Since there was virtually no unemployment during the war, this means it is the highest it has been since the dirty 30's. The article goes on to say that there were 140,000 more Canadians looking for jobs in the last three months of this year than last year, representing the highest third-quarter unemployment rate since World War II.

Canada's economic progress faces an uncertain future. At the moment Canada's surplus export sales are at a record of $2,250,000,000 for the first ten months, up from $561 million in 1969. Purchases from the United States have continued to drop, while our sales to them have continued to increase. There is good evidence that this state of affairs may not continue, but rather be reversed. In so far as our automotive trade is concerned, it has turned out to be one of the brightest spots in our over-all trade, but not because of particularly good management but rather as a result of a fluke that a particular small car was very popular. The automotive pact is under heavy attack in the United States because there is great pressure to bring automobile production back home. President Nixon contends that because of the protection afforded Canada, undue pressure is on his government to have the pact abolished.

There is a rising protectionist movement in the United States and our ministers have been warning them about it. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has stated that growth in Canadian manufacturing is necessary to improve job opportunities. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), in a speech delivered in the United States, has just reiterated this sentiment. To illustrate how this protectionist sentiment is rising, Phillips Electronics Industries Ltd. of Toronto recently decided to bid on supplying Chrysler Corporation of Detroit with car radios. Chrysler placed the order in Detroit, and an official of that company said strong political pressure in the United States had caused the order to be shifted because it was felt that the auto agreement was working too much in favour of Canada. It is believed that this switch will result in 700 people being laid-off.

Then, Eaton Automotive announced on November 16, the closing of its London division early next year because the products made by the London plant are now being made in the U.S.A. This company is likely also under political pressure to maintain employment in their factories in the United States. Surely, this is a lesson for the strong nationalists who think we can live completely alone. We have the textile industry in chronic trouble as a result of low-priced imports, and the government is to amend the Export-Import Act to allow it to set mandatory import quotas. This is our own form of protection, yet we lament others raising their tariffs.

Then, there is the very probable entry of the United Kingdom into the European Common Market. It seems very probable that there will be a serious loss of markets, and especially could this be so in agricultural exports. The European Common Market is showing considerable protectionist tendencies.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the United States is suffering from a recession just as Canada is. It would seem likely that multi-national companies of both countries will be expected to expand in the United States. If the nationalism that is now so rampant in Canada against all things American continues, then those companies are most likely to consider themselves unwelcome in Canada. The Premier of Quebec has been telling Americans that they can only come to Quebec if they speak French, in effect telling them that they can only come in under severe restriction.

The Canadian economy is moving into a hard winter, largely as a result of Canadian government policies. It takes time for fiscal and monetary controls to take effect because such changes, either inflationary or deflationary, take time to work. The brakes applied a year ago are only beginning to take effect now, a year later. Similarly, the switch of the government to deficit financing, and the large expansion of the money supply, will not show up until next year. Even with these brakes applied, the price increase has still been running at 3 per cent, which is still very high. We should not forget that the Canadian economy is mainly supported by our great export industries. Without the great export boom, the nation would be in serious economic difficulties indeed. The outlook for profits in all but a few fortunately placed industries is much reduced, as is the outlook for the capital investment necessary to create new jobs and reduce unemployment.

The Prime Minister himself on the CBC program "Encounter," being interviewed by Charles Lynch on November 5, stated:

> We have been homing in on unemployment in Quebec and in the Maritimes because this is where unemployment is highest, and we've done so by pouring in literally hundreds of millions of dollars in the past few years into those areas through regional economic expansion. Other hundreds of millions of dollars more through manpower retraining programs. Just a month or two ago another hundred million dollars for housing.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that much of these hundreds of millions of dollars that have been poured into regional economic expansion in Quebec have not been as effective as they should have been. I think we all realize that much of the money spent in regional economic expansion must at best be considered a social expenditure and not recoverable in the form of economic gains. This great debate will have to come some time in the future.

I would like now to turn to what I feel is an important factor in our current economic trouble and that is the freeing of the Canadian dollar last May. For the second time since the end of the Second World War Canada removed, on May 31, the fixed rate of exchange of its dollar. In both cases, the rise took place under a Liberal government when the United States was engaged in a limited war. The response to the inflow of American capital resulting from the Korean War was the floating of the exchange rate 20 years ago.

This year the decision to abandon the fixed value appeared less urgent, particularly if proper precautions had been taken. The Canadian economy was not drawing in funds for expansion but was able to remain stable only because of a temporary surge of exports to western Europe and Japan, along with auto exports to the United States. The domestic side of the Canadian economy exhibited sagging tendencies. In the first six months of 1970, the merchandise trade surplus reached $1,246 million compared to $208 million in 1969. However, there does not appear to be much special life to exports and United States trade policy appears to be on the verge of becoming more protectionist, tending to depress exports to that country.

The huge merchandise trade balance was the result of several non-recurring factors. Demand for Canadian base metals received special stimulus after the strikes last year. Automobile exports, which alone accounted for 20 per cent of the gain in exports, benefitted from the popularity of a particular small car manufactured in Canada, but later this year several competitive models will be built in the United States, so that this can be regarded as a non-recurring event. Metal prices are declining most noticeably on the volatile London Metal Exchange, and shipments to the United States will decline because capital spending is very metal intensive, and as capital spending declines, metal shipments will also experience less buoyant markets.

Defence sharing agreements which have led to a spill-over to companies such as Canadair will no longer be a favourable trade factor for Canada; even though, in all likelihood, the war will continue, more defence production will be handled in relatively depressed United States areas like southern California. In 1968 United States defence spending in Canada amounted to $320 million, in 1969 $300 million and 1970 will probably be lower. Because of balance of payments problems in the United States, direct investment in Canada will be discouraged. It is scheduled to drop from $2.67 billion in 1970 to $2.18 billion in 1972. Oil shipments may also suffer a temporary decline.

The relative strength of the Canadian dollar depends on our merchandise trade balance and the flow of the capital account. The latter is affected by, first, short term inflows, usually as a result of a difference in interest rates, or the desire for an alternative haven by investors concerned about their own country; second, long term inflows which stem from either direct investment, non-resident purchases of securities, or borrowing outside of Canada by government or corporations. Hitherto changes in the relative values of the Canadian dollar reflected short term inflows; that is, changes in foreign holdings of Canadian currency and foreign assets of Canadian chartered banks.

This summer the short term inflow stemmed not from a relatively alluring spread of interest between Canada and the United States, but from the unusually large merchandise trade balance and the repatriation of short term funds. The funds returned to Canada after the white paper on taxation proposed that investment and capital gains in non-Canadian securities would be penalized. The applicable provisions would restrict to 10 per cent the percentage of pensions fund assets that could be held in non-Canadian investments and capital gains in non-Canadian investment would attract a 50 per cent capital gains tax compared to a 25 per cent capital gains tax on widely held Canadian investments. This is another example of the way in which the white paper on taxation materially increased the pressure on the Canadian dollar with an untoward and unexpected affect, even though no change in the law has taken place up to now.

Furthermore, the Quebec election gave some renewed confidence to lure investment back to Canada after the panic exodus earlier this year. Much too little was done to counterbalance these factors. The Minister of Finance foolishly chose to ignore these trends. Foreign exchange reserves improved by $267 million in the first quarter of 1970. In April reserves were increased by an additional $225 million. Canada, however, should be carrying higher exchange reserves on average than it did during the decade of the previous fluctuating rate. This is not the case. If strong counterbalancing efforts had been made earlier this year, short term inflows could have been checked, temporarily at least.

One reason often cited for the revaluation of the Canadian dollar is our relatively better control over inflation. The "state of the art" is such that it is doubtful that price movements can be measured with any such precision but even if Canada maintained greater price stability over the last year or two, this, even in combination with our large merchandise trade balance, did not warrant an unpegging of the dollar.

A common argument against a fixed rate of exchange is that it leads to alterations in monetary and fiscal policy for exchange reasons rather than to promote a satisfactory level of domestic income employment and growth. However, this summer concurrently with and because of the abandonment of the system of fixed exchange, the Minister of Finance announced an easier money policy. This was implied by the Bank of Canada's reduction in bank rate from 7.5 per cent to 7 per cent. The reduction in interest rates can be expected to reduce the incentive for short term funds to flow into Canada and to relieve the upward pressure in the dollar. The Minister of Finance thus was acting to have fiscal and monetary policy influence the exchange rate; proponents of a floating rate have claimed that this was like having the tail wag the dog. Interest rate differentials with the United States are now narrower than usual. If such an easy monetary policy had been adopted in March when the United States federal reserve board indicated it was moving toward easier money, the upward speculative push on the Canadian dollar in all likelihood would have been avoided. However, all winter and spring the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance adhered to a relatively restrictive course in order to arrest inflationary pressures.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I must remind him that his time has expired.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the motion before the House refers to long term programs to cure unemployment. I am glad it contains that language because some of the suggestions I wish to make relate to a long term cure for unemployment. I am also glad that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) is in the House. I wish to talk briefly about atomic energy plants and the part they could play in this long term cure.

Since unemployment is not caused by one factor solely, the cure for unemployment also will not involve merely one factor. We must do a great many things if we wish to cure unemployment. I should like to talk for a few moments about some ideas I have for this long term cure.

This morning in committee I asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) how our money is being spent on research. The point of my question was this: I felt that we were adopting a scattered approach in our spending on research, and that we ought to concentrate. Since we do not have enough money to spend on all areas of research, we ought to concentrate on those areas that will be of greatest advantage to us. We ought to concentrate consciously on those areas of research in which we can compete with other countries effectively. We must concentrate on those resources and goods with which we can compete with other countries of the world. As I say, we cannot afford to indulge in research in all areas, so we had better specialize.

A few weeks ago I visited the atomic energy plant at Gentilly, Québec, and I must say I was surprised at what is being done there. I regret that we have not sold plants of this type abroad. It seems to me that the government has been somewhat remiss in the amount of money it has devoted to this particular type of development. We seem to be developing a type of atomic energy plant that is different from atomic energy plants elsewhere. I am not saying this is wrong. Hopefully, this may have been a wise move. It may have been the best thing to do. Yet, benefits do not come about automatically. We must be prepared to spend more money on this particular type of plant, to the point that others will have confidence in it. I suggest that we have not done as much as we could in this area.

I am glad that we are seeing some signs of success. As we all know, the cost of a commodity goes down when it is produced in greater numbers. A commodity becomes competitive when produced in volume. I suggest to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that, if we are to produce only those atomic energy plants that we need in Canada, we cannot hope to become competitive on the world market. Our plants are of a style that is different from those produced by the rest of the world, and the number of plants required in Canada is small. In this area especially, we ought to concentrate. We should make sure that we are pretty efficient in this area, and I suggest to the minister that we are not efficient. We must concentrate our research efforts in this area to enable us to become competitive with other nations.

Another area in which we ought to concentrate is that in which, for reasons of our climate or our terrain, we must develop commodities for our own country. Let me give you some examples. The skidoo, developed in Quebec, has proven very effective. We are the leaders in the world in this field. This is an example of the sort of thing I am thinking about. The skidoo was developed for our own country, for our climate and our terrain. It was designed for our winter conditions. We had better make sure that we maintain our lead, and that we produce cheap, competitive, effective machines which will compete with those produced elsewhere in the world.

Let us look at other commodities in this general category. When I was in the Arctic a short time ago I saw a tractor-truck, or a track-truck, which was made in Calgary. It is used for travelling over muskeg or swampy ground. Since then I have heard that the U.S.S.R. has ordered some of these trucks. This proves the point I am trying to make. When we develop something for ourselves which can be used by others, we make that commodity better than anybody else could, and at competitive prices. What better way is there to cure unemployment?

We should also be looking at the best way to develop clothing suitable for our cold climate. Speaking as one who has spent a great deal of time outdoors in the cold, I say that we do not as yet have adequate or effective clothing, whether it be shoes, underwear, or other clothing, to withstand our cold climate in Canada. Any such clothing is very bulky or too heavy. Often it is very expensive if it is at all adequate. I suggest that we ought to conduct a great deal more research in this area. The previous speaker and some members from Quebec told us that textile plants in Quebec have been suffering as a result of competition from other countries. Why do we not produce materials of the nature I have mentioned. We could sell those to other countries which are on the fringes of the cold climate belt. We all need this type of clothing. It is high time that we gave some thought to a project like this.

[Mr. Thomson.]

Another example of the sort of thing I have been talking about is a product that was developed in Ottawa. It is known as frost foam. Frost is something we contend with for a great part of the year. It is a cheap and effective type of substance which is easy to spread and which can be used for agriculture. Hopefully, it will be useful to other countries.

Another area which we ought to consider if we are to provide employment, and it is in the national interest that we consider this area, is that of shipbuilding. It is in our national interest to retain some shipbuilding capacity. I am not saying that we ought to build ships madly of all shapes and sizes. Obviously, we cannot compete with Japan which builds supertankers of 200,000 and 300,000 tons displacement. Yet, it seems reasonable that we could build the ships we need for our great lakes and our inland or coastal waterways. That is why I say it is in Canada's national interest to retain some shipbuilding capacity. Let us make a conscious decision as to what type of ships might reasonably be built in Canada. Let it be admitted that no one is better able to build ships of this type than we are. Perhaps we shall be able to sell a few of these ships to other countries which have a need for them. I have heard, for example, that the ships needed by the third world—if that is the correct term to use for the developing nations—are of the type we would build, coastal steamers and smaller ships. These are ships which one can unload where port facilities are not too adequate, which certainly is the case in the Arctic. We need to be able to unload ships quickly; yet we do not always have adequate port facilities there.

I think those are some of the areas we might look at in this country. There are other areas in which we have been fairly successful. I am thinking of the grain that is grown in Canada. We ought to spend more money in this area to make sure that our product stays in the forefront. No matter whether one considers corn of the kind grown in Ontario, and the climate is cooler there than in Ohio, or barley which grows in my part of the country, we must remain in the forefront with these products. We have not always done this. If we can produce these products cheaply, effectively and competitively, we will sell them. This is one of the best ways to decrease unemployment.

I wish to deal with one or two other matters. I understand that Ontario is introducing legislation which would compel those who mine in Ontario to smelt in Ontario. I understand there are some loopholes. However, we should examine it. If companies mine in Canada why should they not smelt or refine in Canada? Mining has been allowed to develop without any compulsion with regard to smelting. This cannot be changed overnight. It must be done on a long term basis and, for the sake of argument, I suggest possibly ten years. Instead of using the law to compel mining companies to smelt in Canada, this could be done by encouragement. It might be a much better approach. If this were done, more people would be employed here. This is what this resolution is really all about.

I have visited the CBC station in Ottawa, a radar base in my constituency, the Atomic Energy plant at Gentilly and, as a member of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, some food processing plants. A great deal of the industrial equipment used in all these plants is manufactured in foreign countries. I am not knocking these other countries because they are able to produce this equipment cheaply and effectively so that it is economic for us to purchase it. However, I feel that some of this equipment could be produced just as well in Canada.

The electronics industry is too small and fragmented to compete with foreign firms. Possibly the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce could give some leadership to rationalizing this field so that more of this equipment could be produced in Canada. I do not think it would be economically feasible to produce all of this equipment in Canada because of our limited requirements, but some of it could be produced in this country. The government should study seriously what could be done in this respect. The government should give assistance for research, capital or whatever else is required for specified areas, so that Canadian firms will be competitive. This, in part, will solve the unemployment problem.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the motion before this House today is very important. It gives members an opportunity to discuss one of the most serious problems facing this country today, unemployment, and the consequences of the government's fiscal and anti-inflationary policies with special regard to the regionally disadvantaged areas of the country. Attendance in the House does not indicate the importance of the measure before us. The tens of thousands of Canadians who are unemployed and have no voice will draw precious little consolation from the attendance to-day, especially by the members of the government and those charged with the responsibility.

Mr. Greene: Or the quality of the debate.

Mr. McGrath: I hope the minister who has interjected will favour us with a contribution to this debate. Perhaps he can enlighten us a little more than some members as to what the government have been able to do. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) participated in the debate today. Although he talked a great deal, he said nothing. The great expectations of the minister and the new department, when the legislation was enacted by Parliament creating the department, have not been fulfilled. The minister made no reference to his responsibilities with respect to co-ordinating government programs to cope with regional disparity and the resulting consequential unemployment. He made no reference to the difficulties, indeed the impossibility, of carrying out effective programs to deal with regional disparity when the fiscal and monetary policies of the government do not take into account the regional facts of life in this country. Those provinces which contribute least to inflation, the Atlantic provinces, Quebec and some western provinces, are the ones which have to pay the cost of the governments' anti-inflationary policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGrath: We expected the minister to make some reference to that in his speech. He is responsible to Parliament and the country for coping with these very serious problems. However, he said nothing about that. When we have occasion to raise the problems of unemployment and lack of government action in dealing with unemployment and regional disparity, the members of the government always conveniently refer to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the regional economic programs which are supposed to be the be-all and end-all.

We must examine these programs for their effectiveness in coping with unemployment and regional disparity. We must examine them in the context of growing unemployment. Today's unemployment is the most serious for this period since the depression of the 1930's. This is evidenced by the latest Dominion Bureau of Statistics' figures. We must look at the programs under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, we must look at them in that context.

The main thrust of the government's regional development policy is the Regional Development Incentives Act. Yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It was prompted by the tabling of figures under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the period ending October, 1970 which showed great disparities in the allocation of funds and the estimation of jobs created. For example, the province of Newfoundland received $826,000, whereas the province of Quebec received almost $40 million, almost half the total funds. By skating around the question the minister, in effect, refused to answer it. He indicated he would be participating in the debate and that he would have something to say about it at that time. We sat and listened to the minister, Mr. Speaker, but he did not say anything in this regard. We are as wise as ever.

The provision of these grants does not take into account the fact that there are five regions in this country; most important, they fail to take note of the fact that under the Regional Development Incentives Act the initiatives are in the hands of industry, not the hands of government. In my opinion this is the major weakness of this program. This illustrates the reason for the wide ranging disparities in the allocation of funds under the program. Companies obviously establish in more attractive areas where they can attain the same incentives as those provided for locating in some of the more remote parts of the country. Instead of locating in Newfoundland, or northern Saskatchewan, or northern Ontario they would obviously choose the more populous areas in Quebec around Montreal and Quebec City, or they would choose southern Ontario. This is surely the major weakness in the program. This is why the program should be changed and its administration and concept decentralized.

Then, there is the complementary program covering the so-called designated growth areas, the program designed to enable the federal government to move into areas of provincial jurisdiction to build up the so-called infrastructure which is supposed to attract industry. Take my own city as an example. It is one of the special areas, one of the growth areas. Under this program the federal government has announced its intention to build two high schools; it has announced it will build a new access route from the Trans-Canada Highway to the harbour in St. John's; it has announced it will provide water and sewage facilities. That is good. That is tremendous, because the city of St. John's and the various school boards could not afford to provide these schools and other amenities. The municipality is already taxed to the limit. But it is my contention that not one new job will be created. I say this because we already have, in this city, the infrastructure needed to support industry. It has been there for a hundred years, but it has not been enough to encourage industry to establish there. Why? Simply because of our geographical position in relation to the major markets of this hemisphere; because of our insularity and the consequent problems of transportation costs. All the clichés used by the minister or by any of his officials in trying to sell this program will not alter the facts which I have stated. The result is we have a program in which the government ignores these facts.

The government is unable to use the Regional Development Incentives Act in the way it was designed. It is unable to use the act as a tool to stabilize the economy and increase employment. The great weakness of the program, in my view, is that the government has lost control of it. The government finds itself unable to determine what type of industry shall locate in any particular area of the country as a consequence of its planning and investigations. This initiative is entirely in the hands of the industries concerned. If it is to be effective, this program, like the government's monetary and fiscal policies intended to combat inflation, must be decentralized. It must take into account the facts of life in this country, and these include the fact that Canada is not one homogenous unit but five different regions comprising five different economies. It is because of the government's failure to take this into account that its programs are not working, and unemployment is increasing.

It is all very well to talk about the necessity of building up infrastructures under a program which enables the government to enter areas of provincial jurisdiction, but the cold fact of the matter is that the program is a flop, the program is a total failure, and the minister's unwillingness to deal with this aspect today is proof positive of my statement, if proof were needed. I think it is fair to say that the minister's program, and government policy, have become bogged down in a quagmire of "adhocery"—a maze of ad hoc programs and ad hoc decisions. Much of the difficulty has been caused by the failure of the bureaucrats and the technocrats in the minister's department to take into account the experience and knowledge of municipal authorities and provincial governments. There has been scarcely any consultation in connection with the planning, conception and implementing of these programs. These people go across the country and look down their bureaucratic noses at the provincial and municipal authorities as being somewhat inferior; this is certainly the case in the province from which I come.

Ask any member of this House who comes from Prince Edward Island or any other area of Canada where the department is heavily involved, and he will quickly say the same thing. The department parachutes into these areas technocrats and so-called experts for the sole purpose of carrying out the wishes of the minister's deputy minister, because nobody else knows anything about this program. It is obvious the minister knows very little about what is going on. The whole show is being run by one man only. He sends out teams of experts and they fan out all across the country—"You get in there; those local yokels don't know anything." This results in all kinds of difficulty due to lack of understanding or appreciation of local conditions. The Province of Newfoundland is a classic example. They have practically taken over the department of community and social development. We even had the chairman of the Regional Development Committee down there working during the summer—I do not know what his particular expertise consists of, but he was there; he was joined by the technocrats who are still down there. They even provided a deputy minister. Nobody on the island has any say in the implementation of the program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I regret to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, it is all so very clear that what has been said by the hon. member who spoke before me is nothing less than a political speech, reeking of partisanship, in the true stereotyped fashion, and seeking merely to destroy the confidence that the people of Canada have in the government's efforts to erase any regional disparity still prevailing in Canada. However, it is generally acknowledged that these efforts already have had some effects and there is no question but that given a good amount of doggedness, the scourge of unemployment may be overcome one of these days.

On the other hand, one must realize that the federal government is not the only level of administration that is responsible for setting up new industries or creating new jobs. I believe the federal, provincial and municipal governments all have to share this responsibility. The full responsibility for this situation should not be left to one government in particular.

This will perhaps lead me to make a speech which might be described as political and partisan but I shall make it all the same.

During the sixties, especially since 1963, the government of New Brunswick took its responsibilities in this field by co-operating with the federal government. One may wonder what happened in New Brunswick during these years. Several hon. members may not be interested in what goes on in the small province of New Brunswick. But for me, it is very important and it shows the degree of quality of our administration. We made more progress during this decade than during any other period in our history since Confederation.

A recent statistical survey of the area by the Economic Council of the Atlantic provinces shows that, in the last few years, the economy has been healthy and that, in some sectors, expansion has reached a new high.

One of those sections is that of metal mining. In 1960 there was no activity whatever in mining in New Brunswick. Since then, the Heath Steele Company which had begun operating in our area in the 1950's closed its doors.

An $11 million program has since converted this mine and the concentrator it feeds into a vital element for the economy of the Northumberland constituency, in Eastern New Brunswick. Daily production is 3,000 tons and there are 270 workers. Such accomplishment is due to federal-provincial co-operation.

On the other hand the Brunswick Mining and Smelting Company operates two mines and two concentrators thanks to a $60 million investment. It produces 8,000 tons a day and has 1,025 employees.

The Nigadoo River Company mine and concentrator are now in operation. This represents an investment of $10 million. The daily output is 1,000 tons of ore and the mine provides work for 315 people.

At the present time the Anaconda American Brass is building a copper concentrator of a 1,000-ton daily capacity which should have been in operation in September this year. It means a capital investment of $6 million providing jobs for 110 workers at the present time.

I could continue, Mr. Speaker, quoting figures to show all the improvement in the New Brunswick mining sector which is due, if I may say so again, to the co-operation between provincial and federal governments that has existed particularly since 1963 and has gained momentum in the last few years.

I could talk about expansion in the forest industry which employs a great many people; this would have been impossible without the efficient part taken by the federal government. The same applies to hydro-electric power. In this respect, the hydro-electric plant at Mactaquac is an example that speaks for itself.

Now, members opposite are blaming the federal government for the situation prevailing at this time. As for me, I believe the official opposition should perhaps examine its own conscience and go back a little to find what it failed to do while in power, in order to avoid the situations that we now know.

If I may be partisan and deal again with the province of New Brunswick, I will refer particularly to the field of education in which, during the 50's, when practically nothing was done, the only effort of the provincial government was to maintain education at such a level that only about 25 per cent of the young people who attended school were able to get a degree.

Today, of course, the situation is quite different. In vocational training only, the federal government has made an enormous contribution. Before 1960, there was not a single vocational school in New Brunswick. This was really scandalous and I am somewhat ashamed to say it. But since 1960, we have had something to be proud of. In 1961, the New Brunswick Technical Institute was opened in Moncton. Building costs reached $1.9 million. The required equipment for the Institute has cost $1,500,000 up until now and a new $2.4 million wing was added last year, which makes a total investment of $5,800,000 about 75 per cent of which has been paid by the federal government.

The St. John Technical Institute, in New Brunswick, was opened in 1963. To date, building and additions cost $2,100,000. The cost of initial and additional equipment was $1,300,000, bringing the investment in the future of the youth of New Brunswick to a total of some $3,400,000.

The Bathurst Trade School did not exist in 1960. It was inaugurated in 1963. Its cost was $1,400,000 and the school is now undergoing expansion evaluated at $1,300,000, bringing the total investment for vocational training, with the assistance of the federal government, to $2,700,000.

The Edmundston Trade School, in my riding, was inaugurated in 1965 and represents an investment of some $1,700,000, in vocational training.

Another trade school in my riding is the school of Grand-Sault which has just been built, and this means an investment of more than half a million dollars.

Mr. Speaker, a new government has been elected in New Brunswick a few weeks ago. I really do not know if they will give the province a better administration than the previous government. Time will tell.

I do know, however, that during the sixties, considerable growth has been recorded in the field of industrial development in that province, under the leadership of the hon. Louis J. Robichaud. Remarkable and willing co-operation has been extended by the federal government, and I sincerely hope that this co-operation will carry over into this decade. I do hope so and in my opinion, all the citizens of New Brunswick expect it. The provincial government should now show its mettle, it should come out of its shell and vigorously carry on the aggressive policy set forth and implemented by the previous government.

I am sure that the federal government will not be found wanting, because of its strong present policy.

[English]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, being a man of charity I do not begrudge the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) his opportunity to write the epilogue to a very important period—

An hon. Member: Epitaph.

Mr. Fairweather: Epilogue I said, history will deal with the epitaph. I do not begrudge the hon. member this opportunity to write the epilogue to a very obvious and important part of New Brunswick political history. I think perhaps the hon. member might have read more fully the fourth annual review of the atlantic economy which shows that despite growth there was little evidence of change in the basic structure of the region's economy. Much of the growth that did occur occurred on the existing base, a base not capable of generating the advance needed in the latter third of the twentieth century.

The migration, particularly from our own province of New Brunswick and the hon. member must see this with as much agony as I do, remains the highest in the region. The statistics reveal that between 1956 and 1969, 209,000 was the net out migration from this area, and it is the type of migration that no province can stand if it expects to meet the challenges of this part of the century in the years to come.

Also in "The Atlantic Economy" fourth annual review it is stated:

> —the region continues to experience a slower rate of population growth than the nation, that too much reliance is being placed on primary and primary-processing types of industries and that the region continues to experience low participation rates, high rates of unemployment, structural unemployment and underemployment in numerous sectors of the economy.

I have no wish to enter, as I say, a "who was right and who was wrong" argument. This is the type of argument that does not impress the voters but it is the type of argument that I think tragically has been used far too often in provincial elections in the province from which I come. Rather I should like to take a look at what I think is going to be the political framework of the '70's in the Atlantic region and make a couple of suggestions to the minister. I admit to him that some of them are copied rather directly out of one of the most interesting reviews, "Rural Canada 1970: Prospects and Problems", I have seen. It is the third report and review. It suggests that, like the rest of Canada, we will be faced with the phenomenon of nationalism and the increasing problem of reluctance on behalf of the people in central Canada to accept the implications of foreign-owned corporations. We would need a day or two to go into this, and the government has had six or eight months, or almost a year to consider the implications of such a thing. I am only headlining them.

We will of course be part of the total environmental phenomenon, the phenomenon that people now are willing to make choices they were never willing to make before; choices between industry that would have a devastating effect of polluting water, land and air, or not having those industries at all. Up to now, we have opted for the industries. From now on I think there will be a considerable change in plans.

I suggest, thirdly, that our region will be seeking in a much more vigorous way an entry fully into what I term the total heritage that is ours in Canada. Labour parity will be a proper objective of unions in Atlantic Canada. I suggest, too, there will be a recognition and willingness to share a very precious and unique way of life in our part of Canada. The 35 million people who live within 1000 miles of central Atlantic Canada will want, because of the horrors of their cities, the effects of pollution, violence and other trappings of technological change, a respite that we can offer in national provincial parks. We can also offer site locations for factories that really do not need to be part of the huge, urbanized hell that is so much a part of many of the great cities of this continent.

I suggest, too, that there will be a backing into a form of Maritime union, not really a political union, but rather like Europe in the never, never, days. I think politicians, after all, are a cheap commodity in the sense of what it costs the country to maintain us. I think there is a competition for experts that does damage to the on-going initiatives in Atlantic Canada, in the rationalization of services and in the rationalization of professional and public employees in many of the fields that really have no reason to compete, which will all be useful.

I think, too, there will be—an ugly phrase perhaps but one that is understood in the context of this debate—an achievement orientation that has been lacking up to now. There will be much more effort and more sophisticated and civilized labour-management arrangements. It will no longer be the case, I hope, that great projects, particularly in Atlantic Canada, will be held up because of resistance to reasonable initiatives by trade unions and so on. I am troubled to state that during the construction of the General Electric Company heavy water plant in Nova Scotia there were 41 wildcat type work stoppages. I think that both sides have a very serious amount of soul searching to do so that this type of interference will not continue.

The next suggestion I have is that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should become increasingly, and this should be easy, flexible in the initiatives it takes. There should be much more public involvement in planning. Part of the hangup in northeastern New Brunswick has been that the public has not had very much idea what the over-all plans of the government are in this regard. There will be much more help in respect of the problems of the rural poor who are, in fact, by far the worst off people now in the country with the terrible exception of our indigenous people, the Indians, Eskimos and Métis. There will be more infrastructure help to small towns and villages on the periphery of our cities. The trend toward rationalization will continue; a trend I do not expect to hold up my hand like Canute and be able to resist.

For many of us, living in surrounding areas will be a very much more pleasant way to live and I hope the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will keep this in mind in their infrastructure program. This also applies to decisions in respect of some of our national parks. I hope the minister will be glad to hear me on this subject a little later when I discuss the water and sewage needs in a community in the constituency of Fundy-Royal. However, that is not incidental to the people there but it is incidental to this speech.

• (5:30 p.m.)

I think it would be useful to list some of the initiatives or guidelines which I think might be helpful to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in their drive to even out the situation in this country. I should like to quote from "Rural Canada 1970: Prospects and Problems", the third report and review, as follows:

(a) The goals and objectives of the department should, so far as is practicable, be objectively defined and made public.

I mentioned that earlier. It is part of the over-all program.

(b) The economic assumptions taken into account by the department in planning should be also made a matter of public record.

This is a great weakness in the department now. They sit on giant piles of confidential reports that have nothing to do with the security of the state, and I suggest that the security of the state should be the only reason any government paper should be confidential.

(c) An evaluation component should be built into all departmental programs and projects and responsibility for the evaluation function be assigned to objective outside agencies. Again, evaluated reports should be a matter of public record.

(d) Participation by members of the public should be built into all departmental operations at police, program and project levels.

(e) There should be functional co-ordination of planning operations at all levels, municipal, regional, provincial and national.

I think these guidelines are extremely useful. Lastly, in my list of prognostications I suggest that we are in for a period of less emphasis on constitutional change because of other serious problems facing the country. I do not particularly like this but I say it is a fact of our political life. I earnestly hope that the government of Canada will use to the limit what we have in the form of a Constitution, because I happen to be one who believes that the Constitution is sufficiently flexible to allow many more initiatives in the whole field of urban transportation, housing, and so on. I think there are few blocks to action in the BNA Act, and I hope that that document can be used to the full.

I would like to conclude by setting before the minister a couple of problems. The first one happens to be unique to Fundy-Royal but their over-all implications frankly frighten me, and if anyone who takes part in the debate after I sit down can suggest a solution to them, I will go away comforted. In the Minto-Chipman coal mining area there has been a rationalization of coal mining. I think no one objects to that because it was essential.

Employment in mines there is down from a maximum of about 1,200 men to about 100. There is a handsome industrial park funded by national and provincial funds. I went to that park. I was unable to go to the opening because under the quaint system operating under the former government, no invitation could be sent to a Member of Parliament who happened to represent a political party other than that of the government. However, I shall survive. That type of childishness is recounted for the record and nothing more, because I prefer to go to these things not in the glare of publicity but, rather, to see exactly what is going on.

I did go there last week. I found three rather interesting, small industries employing at that time a total of 70 people. They are highly automated. Two of the industries have serious problems and I do not want to name them because it might harm their sales. They are so automated that most of the miners who have been phased out are down the road in the industrial park at manpower retraining schools earning $80 a week but without a prospect in the world of obtaining work in the immediate vicinity. It is degrading for them and it is saddening for me. If anyone wants to tell me what the future is for that type of situation, I will be happy to hear it.

Lastly, in the context of the crisis that is facing our country I hope that those of us who live in what is commonly known as the dichotomy of Canada, because I am afraid there is one, in English Canada will understand in the days ahead what must be done. I am not speaking about the police or the War Measures Act but about the techniques, the cash and the good will that will be needed on behalf of the federal government to ameliorate some of the grave social, I was going to say disparities but it is such an overworked cliché now that I do not wish to use it, and anyway it is too close to despair. I believe there will be an obligation upon those of us representing areas with, in my case, perhaps 1 per cent or 2 per cent French-speaking people to really batten down for what I feel may be a very serious polarization of opinion.

What I am trying to say in a rather clumsy way is that I think we recognize that a substantial amount of cash will be needed for Quebec. I hope that those of us in the rest of Canada, even those from the Atlantic provinces with a very low economic base and serious problems, will understand with all the good will at our command what must be done so that the social reasons behind the tragedies can be at least met in the immediate future. Perhaps that is a good point at which to finish, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, most of the speakers in the debate yesterday and today have been dealing, quite understandably, with the problems of unemployment, poverty and regional disparity. I intend today in the few minutes at my disposal to deal with another subject which I submit is related. The projected costs of what we are doing are so tremendous that unless we think about our programs and our objectives, and unless we begin to set national goals we will create problems for this country the result of which will be that unemployment, meeting health needs and housing needs, to mention just a few of the basic needs of the people of this country, will become insoluble.

I want to discuss the failure of the federal government in "its policy—to take the words of the amendment to the motion put forth yesterday by the leader of our party—of opting out of its responsibility to be involved in the maintenance of national standards in health, welfare and education." It has become fashionable since the arrival in Ottawa of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) increasingly to hear the view that education is a provincial responsibility under the provisions of the BNA Act, and therefore that Ottawa ought not to be and cannot be too involved in educational problems. Mr. Speaker, whether we like it or not, we are involved and we always have been involved.

Ottawa by which I mean the federal government, is involved in the education of Indians. Ottawa is involved 100 per cent in the manpower training programs. Ottawa is involved in provincial educational programs at the elementary and secondary school levels. Every time the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) signs an ARDA or FRED agreement with one of the provinces, with the exception of Quebec, a major component is the reorganization, upgrading and redevelopment of the educational system of that province. Ottawa is certainly involved in the financing of university education both at the undergraduate and graduate level.

Mr. Speaker, some of our top civil servants at the federal and provincial levels have been giving thought to what has happened in education and what is likely to happen within the next ten to 15 years. They have been pointing to the dangers. Unfortunately, so far as I can tell there has been no response by anybody in the federal government to their analyses, by either the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), who has some responsibility for educational and cultural matters, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang), or the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

I commend to hon. members a speech delivered by the director of the education division of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, Dr. Wisenthal, to the conference held at Banff in October by the Alberta Human Resources Research Commission. He points out what we all know, that there has been a tremendous increase in the number of young people attending post-secondary educational institutions, universities, community colleges, technical and vocational schools. This increase is understandable. We were remiss in these kinds of programs until the last few years and have been trying to catch up. Dr. Wisenthal documents the growth in enrolment. He points out that if one takes 1961 as the base year and puts the index figure of those attending university at 100 in that year, by 1969 the figure had risen to 250.9, an increase of more than 2½ times. He projects what will happen by 1980 if we continue in the way in which we have been going. His figure for 1980 is 581.8, an increase of almost 600 per cent.

Dr. Wisenthal goes on to analyse the enrolment figures. He points out that if you take the undergraduate university enrolment in 1961 as 121.5, by 1969 it had grown to 268.2, substantially more than double. He projects this on to 1980 and comes up with the figure of 638.4, an increase of almost sixfold from 1961 to 1980. At the graduate level, and I am not too critical of this because our graduate students have traditionally gone first to Great Britain and in more recent years to the United States, he points out that where there were 7.3 thousand students doing graduate work in 1961, this figure had grown by 1969 to 30.2 thousand, and by 1980 he estimates it will grow to 111.6 thousand. That is a tremendous increase.

Dr. Wisenthal has also calculated the costs and his figures are startling. If you take university costs in 1961 and give them an arbitrary figure of $100, by 1969 this had increased to $507.7, an increase of more than 500 per cent. By 1980 this will increase to $3,181.5, more than 31 times as much as we were spending in 1961. I am one of those who over the years have called for better things in the way of education. According to the statistics given by Dr. Wisenthal it appears that we may be facing an actual expenditure of $8.3 billion on all forms of post-secondary education in 1980. I do not know if this country can find that amount of money, but it seems to me this projection raises a number of very important questions about which the federal government has not even begun to think.

If we find this money, must it be at the expense of sacrificing other programs which are equally or even more important? We know about the housing needs of people in the low-income bracket. We know about the housing needs of people in the middle-income bracket in cities such as Toronto and Vancouver. These people are not able to finance adequate housing for themselves. If we have to find the kind of money which Dr. Wisenthal talks about, we may not be able to fulfil the desire of the Canadian people for proper kinds of social security systems, for adequate pensions, for an extension of health services to include such things as dental care and mental health, and for a guaranteed income. With respect to the latter, it appears to be part of the programs of all political parties, although we may differ about the details and we certainly differ about the timing for the implementation of such a program.

All this has happened at a time when easy assumptions were made by people in the educational field and by political leaders of all parties, that an education pretty well guaranteed an interesting job at good pay. That was the case until recently, Mr. Speaker, but obviously it is not the case any more. I am sure there is not a member of Parliament who has not been faced in his own city by young people coming to him and saying they have a B.A., an M.A. or even, according to yesterday's Globe and Mail, a Ph.D. and yet they cannot find employment. A study conducted by Dr. Frank Kelly, science adviser to the Science Council of Canada, shows that fewer than half the people in Canada who will be granted Ph.D. degrees in engineering and science this year will find jobs next spring. I could give details of a study carried out by the Graduate Students Association of the University of Toronto. The study shows that not only will this happen this coming spring but in fact it happened last summer when half the Ph.D. graduates of the University of Toronto did not get a job and so went on to further post-doctoral studies.

We are facing an extremely difficult situation, Mr. Speaker. I have raised some of the questions asked by Dr. Wisenthal. I take no credit for the Ontario government, which is not formed by the party to which I belong but is a Conservative government; however, it appointed a commission on post-secondary education in Ontario headed by Dr. Wright. This commission has made a preliminary report. Whilst they have not any more answers than I have, they have asked a number of very important questions which they intend to look into.

They asked why higher education must be carried out in institutions called universities and colleges. They asked why it would not be possible to have, in place of segregated and fragmented institutions, a plethora of educational services available to all, at any age. They asked why universities have to be conducted in such a way as to have summer holidays lasting several months. They asked why it is necessary for young people to go directly from high school to college, which means that a student has almost 20 years of continuous education. They asked whether in fact young people coming from poor or low-income families have been or are able to go to university in any substantial numbers; whether in fact we are subsidizing the children of middle and upper-income families, those best able to look after their own needs.

These are questions of importance in respect of all the educational programs of the federal government for the next couple of generations. I hope the federal government will stop simply paying what it has accepted as its share of the cost of higher education and will begin to involve itself seriously with the provinces in a co-operative study of the problems of higher education, where we are going and what we ought to do in the next couple of generations.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a few remarks to make on this question and related economic conditions in the country, but in view of the fact that it is almost six o'clock I wonder if you would be inclined to call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—OPENING OF PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT ON SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21—REMUNERATION OF STAFF

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, notice of which I gave to Your Honour more than an hour ago, as required under the provisions of Standing Order 17(2). It was brought to our attention a day or two ago that on Saturday of this week the parliamentary dining room will be open for the lunch and dinner periods. May I make it completely clear that I have no objection whatsoever to this being done. We all know the reason for this. It is to enable government members to entertain in the dining room their guests who will be here for the Liberal convention. As I say, I have no objection to that whatsoever; I think it is a legitimate arrangement.

However, it has come to our attention, from members of the staff of the parliamentary restaurant, that they have been asked to work on Saturday for this occasion but that instead of being paid for that day they will be given another day off later on.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I find that there is a fair amount of feeling about this among those who are affected, and it seems to me that it is inconsistent with the provisions of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. I hope that if the information that has been given to us by the employees concerned is correct, the matter can and will be corrected.

Normally when one raises a question of privilege, one moves the reference of the matter to some committee. That is not necessary in this case. I hope that His Honour, the Speaker, either by himself or with the commissioners of internal economy will take care of the matter. If it were not for the fact that we are not sitting tomorrow, I would have pursued the matter in other ways and perhaps raised it during the question period tomorrow morning. Since Saturday intervenes between now and the time when the House will meet again, I have raised it in this way. I am sure that all hon. members of the House would want Parliament to do the fair thing by our employees in the parliamentary restaurant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member has indicated, he gave the Chair notice of the question of privilege. The Chair will, as the hon. member has suggested, discuss the details of the question of privilege with Mr. Speaker. I undertake to the hon. member and to all hon. members of the House that I will do that.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED LACK OF POLICIES AND PROGRAMS TO PREVENT UNEMPLOYMENT, POVERTY AND SOCIAL INJUSTICE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Stanfield:

That this House condemns the government for increasing the economic inequalities between different regions of Canada by its opposition to full employment policy and its refusal to use short-term and long-term programs in a timely and effective manner to prevent the resulting recession-level poverty and social injustice now widespread in Canada.

And the amendment thereto of Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, generally speaking, unemployment and regional disparities can be discussed together because one is often dependent upon the other; they are two interdependent factors. In 1968 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his party won the election. They won it partly on the promise, I think, that they would be instrumental in removing regional disparities within the country. Generally speaking, when somebody says he wants to do something about regional disparities, I take this to mean that he is going to make efforts to improve the condition of poverty-stricken areas, that is to say, to improve their economic status. At the same time I take this to mean the provision of more employment in those areas and that disparities will be wiped out because we should make economic conditions across this country uniform.

Unfortunately, the opposite has occurred. I think the government attempted to live up to its promise to remove regional disparities, but it is not doing it in the way I have described. What is happening is that areas of prosperity and high employment are being dragged down to the level of those areas where there is great poverty and high unemployment. This is paradoxical. The government has adopted the wrong approach in dealing with unemployment and regional disparities. It is important for us to recognize that if we are to reverse the trend that the government has begun, the government must follow a national economic policy based upon certain economic realities. It must do that if it is to achieve the desirable economic goals which the Economic Council of Canada has set, namely, full employment.

We consider that an unemployment rate of 3.8 per cent of the work force constitutes full employment, a high rate of growth, by which we mean an increase of approximately 4.75 per cent per year in the gross national product, and reasonable price stability, by which we mean that prices shall not increase by more than 2 per cent per year. Also, we must be in a viable balance of payments position in which the foreign exchange rate of our money is not subject to undue fluctuation. Finally, we must see to it that there is an equitable distribution of our rising incomes.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Unemployment affects different regions of the country differently. However, as obvious as this might appear, the government's policy has not been affected by this reality. Part of the difficulty, it appears, is that the government is obsessed with controlling inflation. Because of this position it has virtually ignored the very important side effects of its war on inflation. One of those consequences is the reduced capability of the economy. The economy has already fallen substantially below its potential. The second side effect is the high unemployment rate that we have in the country today.

Let us look at the unemployment figures for the various provinces. We see that the situation is extremely unhealthy at this time. In British Columbia, for example, projections are that unemployment this winter will be in the area of 13 per cent. In the Prairie region, which traditionally enjoys the lowest level of unemployment of any region of the country, projections point to an unemployment rate of 8 per cent, which is more than double the rate normally experienced in that region in the winter. In addition, there is reason to believe that there is a considerable amount of hidden unemployment in the Prairies because the labour force figures omit farmers who have been made idle because of the slowdown in farm production. The projection for Quebec is that more than 12 per cent of the work force will be unemployed this winter. For the Atlantic region, which traditionally suffers from the highest unemployment rate, the projections show an unemployment rate this winter as high as 14 per cent.

The structural reasons for unemployment, such as remoteness from markets, aging population and reduced educational capabilities of the work force, have been seriously aggravated by the government's anti-inflation policy. It does no good for the government to saddle this region with the high costs of its anti-inflation campaign and then unsuccessfully try to offset these costs with an inadequate regional incentives policy. In order to properly tackle the questions of regional disparity and unemployment, a regional approach to this problem is needed. The fiscal and monetary policies of the government must be sensitive to the differences in the economic and social potential of Canada's regions. It is absurd to expect the Prairie and Atlantic provinces to pay the price of the government's fight against inflation when these regions are suffering the worst unemployment in years.

A regionalized approach toward inflation and unemployment would match the cure with the illness. The Atlantic, Prairie and British Columbia regions depend very heavily on international trade, particularly with respect to primary products. In June the government decided to float the value of the Canadian dollar. This action had very severe effects on regions involved in international sales of primary products. The government has contemplated no positive measures to alleviate the burden caused by this move. In addition, the existing tariff policy of Canada does little to help those regions which depend upon foreign trade in primary products.

Unemployment is high. This is one of the effects of the government's war on inflation. When we examine the situation we find it is a little paradoxical that the government is probably the greatest contributor to inflation. This can be illustrated by the fact that the government's spending and taxation policies will be the main inflationary causes for at least another couple of years. Direct taxes contribute greatly to rising costs and prices. However, that is only part of the story. Increased government spending was achieved by bidding away resources and people from private industry. The result has been to increase incomes and prices and to make these resources scarce in the private economy.

This inflationary pressure will probably continue, because even at this time government spending is greatly increasing. Business cannot continue much longer to absorb increased costs and defer price increases. Business profits are 14 per cent lower than they were a year ago. In manufactured goods, profits are down 27 per cent. Capital investment, and ultimately long-term productivity, appear to be in jeopardy. As I mentioned previously, the Prairie region is in difficulty.

A few days ago I was alarmed to see a report from the Department of Agriculture indicating that in 1969, Canada for the first time in history became a net importer of agricultural products. This development becomes even more startling when one compares the 1969 agricultural trade deficit of $35 million with a net agricultural export surplus balance of $826 million, which was achieved in 1966. Over the years we have traditionally had a favourable balance of trade in agricultural products, ranging from $200 million to the high of $826 million.

The reason for the current unfavourable balance is two-fold. First, a recognizable decline of exports has been recorded since the high registered in the mid-1960s, 95 per cent of which is attributed to wheat. Second, importation of agricultural products has risen by roughly 80 per cent since the mid-1950s while at the same time exports have increased by less than 30 per cent for the corresponding period. While the majority of the decrease in our exports was the result of our dismal sales performance in wheat, other grain sales were disastrously affected. As a matter of fact, exports of coarse grains, barley, oats and rye reached the lowest level in more than ten years, registering an export figure of $37 million compared with an average of $96 million recorded in the period 1955-59. I ask hon. members to recall which party was in power at that time.

Turning to the meat industry, we note another startling revelation. The year 1969 produced an unfavourable balance in the meat trade, recording imports of $121 million against exports of $76 million. Such a large discrepancy has never before occurred, although there were slight deficits recorded in the years 1963 and 1967. Imports of $121 million represents an increase of 538 per cent over the level established in the period 1955-59, while exports for the year represent an increase of 78 per cent over the level established during the same period. Another fact which undoubtedly a vast majority of Canadians, especially farmers, find very difficult to accept—is that Canadians are now consuming some $60 worth of imported agricultural products annually, per capita, which is twice the amount for 1960.

When one analyses these figures, one wonders just what lies in store for the agriculture industry in the 1970s. The implications of the government's program to control production through restrictive quotas and national marketing measures, coupled with no-grow policies in respect of grains and the general concept of gearing production closer to domestic consumption, could very well inhibit the prospect of ever achieving a healthy, viable industry. We now have a grains policy which advocates the consolidation of farms into large, so-called commercially viable units. At this time, no one knows what farmers will do when they find they are forced to leave their farms. It will obviously add to the terrible unemployment situation which now exists. There appears to be no satisfactory program to cope with the retraining of these people and relocating them in satisfactory economic situations.

We have a marketing bill now before Parliament—which proposes to impose government controls on all aspects of production—buying, pricing, assembling, packing, processing, transporting, storing and determining the quantity, the time and place at which a regulated product may be produced. Why are such impositions being instituted? According to the experts and the government, the reason is that we have huge surpluses of agricultural products and we must institute quotas and other measures to ensure supply management and production control.

I believe this approach is sheer nonsense. What we need, first, is an admission by the government that the sales performance and marketing record of agriculture products has deteriorated to the point that it now must be classified as a dismal failure. I believe we then must take cognizance of the observation of the task force that our present allocation of funds to market research is far from adequate. In the past, a meagre 1.2 per cent of the total amount spent on all agricultural research programs has been allocated to market research, distribution and international trade. The task force also said that it found totally incomprehensible the present lack of policies and priorities in the field of market research. It questioned whether the industry could withstand the vagaries to which it will be subjected without some clearly defined policies and goals. So evident was this that in several instances the task force was unable to secure adequate research data in Canada to compile its report and found that such information was more readily accessible from foreign sources, particularly the United States.

I believe we should ask ourselves whether we in Canada wish to continue to be a net importer of agricultural products. If the answer is no, as I am sure it is, then it is the duty of the government and of the agricultural sector in general to establish some priorities. We have already proved we can produce. We have the land, we have the ability, we have the technology and we can produce efficiently.

The first priority, as I see it, is that government and the agricultural sector in general must allocate more resources to market research and place more emphasis on market information and the dissemination of this information. On the basis of such factual and comprehensive information, farmers throughout Canada will be able to achieve an effective degree of product diversification related to forecasts and surveys made of market potential at home and abroad. In addition, we need an aggressive and effective sales force, thoroughly knowledgeable with respect to our products and the needs of our customers, which would show distinct loyalty to the concept of Canada first.

In conclusion, I believe the government should reassess its spending and taxation policies and then take a fresh look at its approach to regional disparities which have been treated in a backwoods manner up to the present time.

[Translation]

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, neither the no-confidence motion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), nor the amendment of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan The Islands (Mr. Douglas), are acceptable. Instead, we should congratulate the government for the steps taken to reduce regional disparties and what social injustices exist in Canada.

The Gaspé area, one of whose representatives I am in the House, has always been considered by Canadians generally as being economically weak, but offering great possibilities for industrial development. The situation that prevails in the Gaspé peninsula also exists in many other parts of Canada.

To all those questions, there is an answer; it is a matter of finding it. There is no reason why the people of the poorer areas should keep on living in a state similar to that of the 30s, even in eastern Quebec where neither farming nor the lumber industry are profitable in many cases.

Referring to the history of Gaspé, should we say or even think that the federal government is the only one to blame for the economic and social situation now prevailing?

In the 1930's, local authorities, very often the priests of various Gaspé parishes, made representations to governments for the formation of new parishes, most of the time under the pretext of developing natural resources such as agriculture and forestry. The undertaking met with doubtful success.

Indeed, lengthy studies revealed that the economy of such parishes or villages was not profitable and that the social atmosphere was very difficult for their inhabitants.

Once those parishes, called marginal, disappear, nothing will prevent the movement of the population towards well-established service centers where it will be possible to attract industries.

Such is the situation of people anxious to improve their lot and ready, through the policy of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, to take the necessary means to reach this aim.

It is difficult to admit that in 1970, a group of parish priests should endorse a manifesto more negative than positive urging the people to stay in marginal parishes where experience has proved that economic and social life is impossible. Why blame this government which does use every possible means in order to improve the living conditions of people likely to be displaced?

Mr. Speaker, the opposition criticizes the regional economic expansion policy of the government but, in my opinion, it is the only solution to achieve the suppression of economic disparit.es. In a few years, we shall admit that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) were right.

Because of the experience gained in eastern Quebec as a result of the surveys carried out by the Eastern Quebec Development Agency (BAEQ) and following the Canada-Quebec agreement, we are looking forward to a general and gradual breakthrough during the next few months.

In spite of the delays, is it right for us to find fault exclusively with the central government which has been supporting its fair share of the financial burden? Should we not remember that during the past two years, while the Quebec government was responsible for the implementation of this agreement, some of the provincial ministers, ostensibly to preserve the territorial integrity of their province, tried along with some officials, to hinder the carrying out of individual projects provided for in the agreement, the financing of which was to be the responsibility of the federal government on a 75 per cent basis.

I do not have to recall those lengthy and hazardous discussions which set the provincial authorities against the federal government with respect to the development of the Forillon national park.

Are we to think then that, because the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) initiated the establishment of this park and had the funds required, the federal government is to be blamed if the agreement was signed two years late? I do not believe so. However, considering the attitude of Mr. Marcel Masse, provincial minister responsible for the Eastern Quebec Development Bureau at that time, the Quebec government is entirely to blame since it appeared, for numerous non valid reasons, to want to deprive the Gaspé population of an annual economic expansion worth from $30 to $40 million, when the national park is ready for use. Those figures do not appear to have been exaggerated, considering the experience of other provinces.

Every member nows that although it is underdeveloped, the Gaspé peninsula possesses considerable natural resources, which can be exploited with profit.

Would it be normal that in 1970 the Canadian government should venture to spend substantial amounts of money to create in every village of the Gaspé peninsula industries like the Gaspesia Pulp and Paper Company Ltd., in Chandler, and the Consolidated Bathurst Limited, in New Richmond? Is it not preferable to apply government policy, which consists in helping these lumber companies to expand and offer more jobs to the population, and consequently, enable it to reach a standard of living comparable to that of other regions with a stronger economy? This policy, which I consider acceptable, will make possible the establishment of service centres adequate to present needs. The policy we are trying to implement in the Gaspé peninsula should also be applied in the Atlantic provinces.

The government's regional development policy is aimed at ensuring for future generations a standard of living more in keeping with the economic progress of the nation as a whole.

The present government has already shown, and continues to show a keen interest in the establishment of new industries in Canada. Volvo, Michelin, Canadian General Electric are now operating in Nova Scotia and the leader of the Opposition, before presenting his motion of non-confidence, should have taken into consideration the benefits his own province has derived since 1963 from the federal government's policies.

The present government, through its Department of Regional Economic Expansion, has made it possible for existing companies to obtain grants for purposes of expansion. In this way the government participated financially in the expansion of several industries in my riding, including the Gaspesia Pulp and Paper Company Ltd. in Chandler, the Consolidated Bathurst Limited mill in New Richmond. It also helped the construction of the Canadian International Paper Company mills in Matane and, finally, it subsidized the fisheries complex in Rivière-au-Renard.

I would suggest that certain mining companies such as Noranda Mines and others decentralize some of their operations and install refining plants in underdeveloped areas. This decentralization would achieve two very definite objectives: the industrial development of such areas, which would ensure additional jobs and enable their residents to attain a living standard similar to that of the more favoured Canadian regions; and the possibility for decentralized plants to combat pollution of urban centers.

For a long time, transportation has been a problem in several parts of Canada. For some years, the present government has endeavoured by all necessary means to meet all the requirements in this field. This goodwill on the part of the government is demonstrated by the fact that work has already begun on the site of the new Sainte-Scholastique airport.

In the Gaspé and Lower St. Lawrence region alone, the federal government has spent, since 1964, $13 million for road construction, excluding the Trans-Canada Highway. It has built the ocean ports of Chandler, New Richmond, Matane and Rivière-au-Renard so as to allow the regular operation of the local industries, thus ensuring a decent standard of living for a good part of the population.

In conclusion, the motion moved by the hon. leader of the opposition and the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands are irrelevant in the present context.

In fact, after these remarks, it would appear that the government, in my view, is fully able to set priorities notwithstanding the stresses it has to face. The future will demonstrate that the right hon. Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet were working for the well-being of the nation as a whole.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, the way the motion under consideration is now worded, gives hon. members the opportunity to point out, each in his own way, the poor results witnessed by the Canadian people concerning the unequal opportunities for a decent life in a country so affluent with a variety of all sorts of assets that its present administration is faced once more with an overproduction problem.

Instead of looking for a solution in the improvement of the means of distribution, a price and income commission was set up at the cost of $160,000 to $179,000 per year, in order to show to the Canadian people that they overspend. Here is an example of income distribution: a few good friends of the administration are paid salaries of $28,000, $33,000, $37,000 and $40,000 a year.

Several Canadians realize that it is a big price to pay to learn that they overspend. We learned lately that the members of the commission had succeeded in establishing, after investigation, the price of a cup of coffee. They would be of much greater service to the people if, while looking for price adjustment methods, they would try to uncover the true reasons for the price increases. They would easily find that one of those reasons is the high cost of interest on the public debt.

From confederation until 1964, the Canadian people have paid over $15 billion in interest on the public debt, and since then, the cost of interest on that famous debt has exceeded one billion dollars each year. Let us consider for one moment the tremendous increase of our debts and of all kinds of taxes which inevitably affect prices and we shall find the major cause for the increase in the cost of living.

The higher the proportion of income absorbed by taxes the more the purchasing power of the consumer is decreased and, without noticing it, he is drifting towards state socialism.

This is easy to understand: the money the taxpayer keeps he can spend at will while the tax money taken in by the government is spent by the state according to its own plans and not according to the individual's plans.

The federal government now takes more than 25 per cent of the citizens' income. It manages more than one quarter of the total expenditures in this country. It rules over a little more than one quarter of our production and our consumption.

To this must be added the share taken by the provincial and municipal governments. One can wonder whether this is leading to the forced abdication of the human being to governments. And yet, the human being is free, and the government is only an institution bound to his service.

Some complain of being overburdened by taxation and above all consider that they are being deprived of the fruit of their labour, and they have a good point. However, I wanted mostly to outline that steadily increasing taxes are leading us quickly to state socialism.

Besides, when the overburdened private enterprise loses heart, it is, of course, replaced by an industrial or a state monopoly. In the first case, we have financial domination, and in the second, state bureaucracy. A system must be quite out of gear to force a choice between those two forms of human enslavement.

However, there is another solution: the control of money where it originates, according to the facts, the rights of the human being, and the capacity of the country. This would be Social Credit. But our governments prefer to rule the individuals rather than interfere with the privileges of the people who create money.

It is true that unless we decide on reform according to the Social Credit theory, whether we like it or not, we are on the way to state socialism, including the degradation of the human being.

Socialism and communism approach the problem of the distribution of goods with the idea that some people have too little and others too much. Instead of requesting the distribution of all surplus products, which represent an unused collective share, they insist on taking away from those who seem to have more than their share.

Unfortunately, sociologists, labour leaders, even earnest supporters of corporatism, approach the distribution problem somewhat in the same light. Without falling into the excesses of a sour and levelling communism, they seek a solution to the social problem only in a less unequal distribution of goods, and not in a generous distribution of the goods not already apportioned.

They all follow the rule of work participation in order to have titles to production, while promoting a more equitable allocation of those titles. Their submission to that rule is the cause either of their errors, or their deficiencies, or their difficulties, because since man has been using his brains, he seeks to eliminate human labour from production. And in an age when he succeeds more and more, the problem becomes harder and harder for those good researchers, however well-intentioned they might be. They all lack a clear understanding of the distributive economic doctrine of Social Credit.

Besides denouncing this paralyzing and debt-breeding tyranny of the monopoly of money and credit, we suggest means to end it.

As soon as one acknowledges that the realities to produce are there—and I believe that they are easy to see—one has to proceed to implementation. It will also have to be accepted that the implementation of the financial suggestions of Social Credit set forth by Major Douglas would eliminate the obstacles precisely by putting finance before those realities.

"Finance, as rightly stated by Major Douglas, must be controlled by production and consumption or the production and distribution of products should not be conditioned by finance."

Money and credit—the purchasing power—available to the people must be constantly equivalent to the total price of goods available in that country—whatever the cost price of such goods—and those means of payment must be cancelled or depreciated only in accordance with the consumption and depreciation of consumer goods.

Any new production must be financed with new credit which would be recalled and cancelled only according to the appreciation-depreciation ratio.

The distribution of the purchasing power among individuals must depend less and less on employment to take into account an increased production, while there is a reduction of manpower. Dividends must gradually replace wages as the production capacity increases through automation and improved machinery. We must set up a financial system whose application patterns may vary yet respect those principles, as opposed to the present system which is inappropriate and disorganized, which breeds hardships or worries, inertia or unpaid debts while there is boundless productivity. There no longer shall we complain about lack of schools, of houses or of other things to meet real public or private needs.

Progress thus put at the service of everybody, without any financial restrictions, will prevent man from becoming too preoccupied and too busy with economic matters. It will therefore be up to him alone to engage in free activities favouring full development of his personality. Evidently, there will remain a wide field of action for teachers and priests but, at least, limits to this full development will not be imposed any longer by financial decisions only. We will no longer suffer from a financial dictatorship rationing human beings despite plentifulness and paralyzing citizens despite efficient means of action.

If everyone knew really what it means to be an honest and hard working man who is a victim of unemployment and finds himself unable to provide his family with a decent living, through the fault of an obsolete economic system, many people would change their mind and those mummies left over from a past to be forgotten would soon be revived through a live contact with the realities of today.

Some people are quick to state that the Créditistes have "forward" ideas. This could well mean an implicit condemnation of the position of those who prefer to mark time in a world continuously striving for new achievements. Should we, in order not to disturb those champions of an economic statu quo, burden the rest of humanity—the healthy part—with the unbearable weight of so-called dogmas, the work of human brains trying hard to be considered infallible?

Because of the present situation, it is obvious that this winter will bring a great deal of unemployment and that many regions will particularly be afflicted by it. Among the various classes of manpower, it is the younger and the older people who are the most hardly hit. These two classes of workers deserve special sympathy. If it is appropriate to seek the best means of solving the problem, a task which is everybody's concern, it might also be important to show some understanding for the unemployed, to avoid summary judgments and, mostly, to avoid taking advantage of the present situation to retaliate on the workers. The spectre of unemployment is hard enough to bear without that.

It happens that we take the young people to task for their lack of ambition and ideals and find them skeptical and blasé. We also severely blame them for being heartless and lacking in initiative. Of course, too soft and too superficial an education or the search for easy living have degraded the taste for well being earned through sacrifice. But that could not be true in every case. Those who have grown up in a large family have already had the opportunity of learning the value of sacrifice and self-denial. They soon learned how to take care of themselves. Those who had more than their share of hardships, those who had to make efforts to get a high school diploma or a university degree have already earned, through their will to succeed, a capital that others do not have.

Anxious to work and to build a successful future, they are faced at the start with an artificial system which raises obstacles in their path. They feel crushed and deprived of a fundamental right: the right to work. They feel useless. A large number of them keep hoping that tomorrow maybe they will be accepted on the job, like the immigrant to whom the door of the country is widely opened. He will remember this with sorrow and with resentment, unable to understand why he was turned down.

What is more serious still is that many, even thousands, face the same situation. To be sure, a distinction must be made between those who want to work and those who do not, between those who are lazy and those who are not, between those who are capable and those who cannot do any kind of work.

One fact remains: during the economic depression of the 30's young and not-quite-so-young people with ambition had a taste of what it meant to be jobless and to wait for prosperity over long years. Among them some had enough courage to face exile in order to find employment, yet without brighter hopes than the expectation of three meals a day. Others had to wait for the war to break out in order to relieve their parents of the burden of a dependence very unwillingly imposed upon them.

Let us try and find solutions more in keeping with 1970 realities.

• (8:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to remind him that the time allotted by special order of the House has expired. Is there unanimous consent that the hon. member continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no unanimous consent.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I have been looking forward to this opportunity to pass along to the government the expressions of great concern that my constituents are conveying to me in increasing numbers and with increasing urgency. It becomes more difficult with every day that passes to explain to my constituents why the government of our wealthy nation cannot provide the basic necessities of life for its citizens. It is not enough just to say to the unemployed that our country is being poorly managed. It is not enough to say to them that the present government is inept, inefficient and confused. If I were to offer no more than that, I would be doing the same as the government is doing; I would be offering words instead of action.

Since the government appears to be tragically unaware of the seriousness of the unemployment situation in this country and of the seriousness of the general economic climate in Canada today, I would like to lay on the table a few frightening examples of what we are faced with, in the hope that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will take note of them. First of all, it will probably come as a surprise to the Minister of Finance to learn that his attack on inflation has been a disaster. It will probably come as a surprise to this government that the people of Canada are not smiling as broadly as the Minister of Finance when they contemplate the greatly increased unemployment that faces us in the coming winter months.

At the present time the rate of unemployment in Canada is the worst in 25 years. But according to the forecasts, that is only the beginning. The outlook for even our most affluent provinces, for the provinces with the best management, is dire indeed. Starting with the Atlantic provinces, the prospect is 14 per cent unemployment in the coming months, and some forecasts go up to 20 per cent. This is a high price to pay for the government's ill-conceived and ill-fated war against inflation.

In Quebec, the prospect is 13 per cent unemployment, and this figure is likely to be exceeded. There is a Liberal government in Quebec now, and even the attempts of the federal Liberal government to shore up Quebec's tangled economic situation is not likely to help matters a great deal. The federal government has accepted the responsibility to provide the jobs that the Premier of Quebec promised his people if he were elected, and it appears that both governments have failed miserably.

In the Prairie provinces the prospects are no better. It is predicted that unemployment in the three Prairie provinces will run to at least 8 per cent, and again this is a conservative estimate. Moving to the west coast, that western anchor of this great nation, this wealthy nation, the province of British Columbia faces the prospect of 12 per cent to 14 per cent unemployment at a time when jobs should be most plentiful.

Using the round figures of 500,000 unemployed and $5,000 as the annual income lost by each unemployed person, the net loss to the country is astronomical. This represents a loss of income in the order of $2½ billion a year. Using a base tax rate of 10 per cent, the loss in taxes amounts to $250 million. The lost income represents lost purchasing power, lost opportunity for these people to better themselves in our society and lost dignity and pride of accomplishment.

We cannot afford a loss of this magnitude. If any corporation or business adopted the same shoddy business practices that this government is using to manage the country, that company or business would surely fail. The same logic must be applied to our country, because our country is a giant corporation that is being managed for its stockholders, the Canadian people. Any government that attempts to manage Canada as though it were five separate economic entities is inviting disaster, and that is just the manner in which this country is being managed.

Surely the government must be aware of the seriousness of the unemployment situation. The figures are there for them to see. If the average Canadian can assess the danger that faces us economically, surely our jovial Minister of Finance can see the danger. In an economic system such as ours we can consider that we are holding our own if we hold unemployment to about 3.8 per cent, but only if we maintain an economic growth rate of about 4.5 per cent per year. We are tragically short of a healthy growth rate, at approximately 1 per cent, and we are certainly exceeding the limits of unemployment. In fact, that rate is more than double the acceptable rate.

There is clear evidence that the government does in fact recognize the danger in our economic and fiscal postures, in spite of its attempts to cover up with a smile and a shrug of the shoulder. There is evidence of panic in the ivory tower. There is clear evidence that the largest cabinet in the history of this country is slogging hopelessly in a morass of indecision and confusion. This confused situation is being compounded daily by the implementation of hastily contrived, stop-gap measures in a vain attempt to stem the tide.

One example of such hastily conceived measures is the streamlining of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In the process, hundreds of local commission offices were closed and thousands of qualified persons have been required to deal at a distance with offices that are there for the sole purpose of serving the people. Every day I receive requests from constituents for assistance in cutting through a new brand of red tape in order to obtain benefits that are rightfully theirs, benefits that have been paid for over many years. The percentage of cases in which I have been able to gain satisfaction for my constituents has been almost 100 per cent. This in itself points up the extent to which this particular management innovation has failed. However, it is useless to try to convince the government that other methods should be instituted.

The government is much too busy innovating and experimenting to concern itself with serving the Canadian individual. It is much easier to jump from one stop-gap measure to another than to try to develop long-range programs that work to the advantage of the individual. I am sure that the Liberal backbenchers receive the same type of complaints from constituents as do opposition members. It surprises me that there is so little evidence of concern on the part of those members with regard to government practices and government failures to resolve fundamental problems. It surprises me that at least a few government members do not take advantage of their rights under our parliamentary system to make their views known to their government.

It is typical that when the government announces loudly a program to deal with a problem, it tells only half the story. I am thinking about the program announced a few days ago to deal with unemployment. Included in the program is the provision of $10 million additional funds for the Unemployment Insurance Commission retraining program. One would automatically assume that this would mean additional schoolroom seats for those who would like to improve their level of schooling and their employability. Speaking for Ontario, that is not the case. In response to complaints from constituents who were unable to enrol in a retraining course, I made inquiries about the state of the program in my area. I found that the budget for my region is short of its basic requirement by approximately $89,000 and, as a result, several levels of formal schooling have been wiped out for the present and for the foreseeable future.

For instance, two of the most important levels as far as improvement of employability are concerned, grades 11 and 12, have been eliminated from the training centres in my region. There are four classroom seats available in grade 8, and only one seat in grade 7. The number of job-seekers in the region has doubled in the past few months. The need for retraining has increased correspondingly, yet there has been a serious setback in retraining funds and facilities.

There is another aspect of the compound problem of economic slowdown and high unemployment that should be stressed, and that is the long-range effect of decreased revenue on the one hand and a spiralling welfare budget on the other. When people are unemployed for long periods of time, people who would ordinarily be employable, the drain on the public treasury for welfare and other assistance will in time create a serious imbalance in our economic structure. When people who should be contributing to the economy are, instead, drawing from that economy, those who are contributing will be required to contribute still more. If this process served to eliminate the problem, it might be acceptable. But all it does is perpetuate the problem and we have a gradual roll-back in the economy instead of healthy growth.

As I mentioned before, Mr. Speaker, this situation cannot be prolonged indefinitely, not in a business or in a corporation and certainly not in a national economy. The fact remains that poor management is behind most of this country's ills. It is also a fact that the only way we can recover from the dilemma of impoverished affluence is to institute sound management principles. It would behove us to move in that direction now, while we can still move at all.

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, in order to develop those parts of our country which have experienced relative disfavour in the past, the government adopted certain programs under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I was overjoyed to see those programs adopted and I embraced them. The theory that money should be pumped into those areas to a greater degree than into the more developed centres is a sound one, but I wonder how it works in practice; I wonder if the end result is what we intended by bringing in that kind of measure.

Earlier in the debate many hon. members spoke about the incentives plan. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), and I have great regard for his selling ability, particularly when he was the Minister of Trade and Commerce—he and his executive assistant had many great ideas for selling Canadian products—spoke about the industrial incentives plan and about other plans to be added to it. Regardless of what we add to that plan, I am wondering if the end that we seek is being accomplished. We hear murmurings from different parts of the country about whether the incentives plan really does develop the kind of industry, and therefore the kind of employment, we would like to see in those parts of the country that are less favoured than others.

How does it actually work, Mr. Speaker? The government comes along with a plan and says, "These areas are less favoured. If industries would like to establish in them, we will give certain amounts of money as an incentive for them to do so." But what in fact happens? I speak, as we say in French, en connaissance de cause, because northern Ontario has been established as one of those areas largely because of the efforts that some of us made to bring attention to that part of Canada. But there are many people who ask, "Even though northern Ontario is a designated area, just how much money has come into it for regional economic expansion?" If we make comparisons, and some people have done this, we see that some parts of Quebec have received more money. But let us look at this matter a little more closely. Let us look at my own constituency of Cochrane. Let us look at the various areas which could support new industries.

I believe that no economic base is sound unless it maintains a variety of industries. A one-industry town is not economically sound, and this is the basis of many towns in northern Ontario. When you visit these towns and ask, "How would you like to have a new industry?" they reply, "By all means. We will do everything possible to help bring in a new industry." But, Mr. Speaker, when it comes down to the nitty-gritty, how many of those people have actually gone out and done something about bringing in industry?

I am raising these points because I do not know anyone who has put more effort into attracting secondary industry to northern Ontario than I have, and I have travelled all over the world. You just do not sit back and say, "We are a nice area. We have lots of nice fishing and hunting. Everybody should be happy to come here and establish industry." It does not quite work that way. Even with the incentive provided by the federal government of up to 25 per cent of the capital cost, how many people say, "We would like to go to northern Ontario"? There are not many who say that.

It is a question of selling them the idea, bringing them there and letting them see what we have to offer in the region. Then perhaps they may establish a new industry. We have asked people from outside the country to put money into industries in that area, but the point is that unless there is some kind of input from local individuals, from local governments, and co-operation among all levels of government, we will not develop secondary industry in northern Ontario or anywhere else in Canada. It would be an anathema for us to speak against the idea of foreign capital in northern Ontario because we know we have no alternative source of capital. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), has spoken on this subject. I suggest that those members of the New Democratic Party who are so ready to speak against foreign investment in this country should stop and think for a moment. No one in northern Ontario would stand behind that idea. It is strange that people in the New Democratic Party are so anxious to speak against American investment in Canada, or any kind of foreign investment but they specify American investment, of course.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): It is amazing that they never mention that the unions in Canada which are international—we call them international, but they are American—control the destiny of this country because they decide whether there will be a strike. They would rather talk about American money. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I would accept money from the Americans any day of the week to help develop industries in northern Ontario. I am sure the hon. member for Timiskaming would, also.

An hon. Member: Would what?

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): In the riding of Cochrane not very many people have enjoyed this regional economic expansion handout. I consider it a straight handout and it is a great thing. If I had money, there is nothing I would rather do than start new industries wherever the government would pay me these incentives, because there is nothing greater as far as I can see. However, in my constituency there have been only three instances of people making application and being successful in obtaining an incentive grant, and these were strictly on the basis of expansion.

Two weeks ago I was in Cochrane for the expansion of Cochrane Enterprises. This is a plywood plant which had expanded considerably, and we were all happy about it. However, no new industries have come into the area despite all the efforts being made. This leads me to believe, Mr. Speaker, that something must be wrong somewhere. It is not only a question of the incentive grant. It is not only a question, as my hon. friend from Prince Edward-Hastings suggested, of granting tax relief for a number of years. There has to be something else. It seems to me that we should be trying to find a way to get people from the horseshoe around Lake Ontario to say, "This is not where we want to be. We want to be up where the air is pure, where land does not cost much. We would like to establish an industry in northern Ontario or other areas".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: We need a new transportation policy.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has lit upon the question I was going to raise next, that is, transportation. In my wanderings around the world I came across a group willing to go into a pulp and paper enterprise in northern Ontario, which is something the local people cannot go into because it requires a large amount of capital, and so on. This is a case where you have to accept somebody else coming in. We hope this industry will come about. There are economic studies being made now to determine whether we should go into it.

One thing that concerns them and everyone who thinks about establishing in the northern part of Ontario and other regions of Canada which are disfavoured is the question of transportation, the question of freight rates. This is an essential program. Every time we speak about development we come back to the problem of freight rates, the cost of sending the products to market.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): For this reason we hope very shortly to have a conference in northern Ontario which will determine a new transportation policy for the whole of that area. For the moment, however, let us consider one of the existing industries there, pulp and paper. Why should companies in Cochrane, Smooth Rock Falls, Kapuskasing, Timmins or anywhere in northern Ontario be jeopardized because of their location? Why should they have to spend more than someone in another part of the country to send their products to market? A producer in British Columbia can send his products to Europe much more cheaply than a producer from northern Ontario, yet the British Columbia producer has to ship through the Panama Canal and across the ocean. In Germany, from anywhere along the Rhine River to the North Sea the cost of sending the product is the same. Of course, Germany is much smaller than Canada, but the principle is there. The point is that no one is jeopardized because he lives in one part of the country rather than another. Why should we in Canada be jeopardized in this way?

It seems to me that these disparities will not be cured by this program of incentives alone. We have to look deeper. The real problem is transportation. This is a big country and we cannot send products to the sea from every part of it for the same price. But we should be able to do so and there should be a policy established for that purpose, otherwise people in one part of the country are disfavoured as compared with people in another part.

In years past, Mr. Speaker, we have heard these problems discussed. People have said, "We in northern Ontario are not understood by people in the south. People in Toronto don't know about us, don't care about us; they forget about us."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): That is the truth. People in northern Quebec have said, "Those people down in Montreal and Quebec City don't know about us and don't care about us." The hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) can confirm what I am saying, because people in the northern part of Quebec have the same mentality, the same outlook and aspirations as the people in northern Ontario. A few years ago there were those who thought that because of this lack of understanding and our richness under the soil, although we are disfavoured on top of the soil, we should get together and have the northern part of Ontario and the northern part of Quebec form a new province. When I first heard about this I thought it was not a very good idea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I think this might be a good time to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a motion which, among other things, refers to the increasing economic inequalities among different regions of Canada. For the purpose of my remarks tonight I should like to state that there are four regions of Canada. The first is the metropolitan megalopolis like that to which the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) referred. Those of us who live in other places feel they are such vast centres of power and luxury that the rest of us are hewers of wood and drawers of water for the city dweller. However, I have heard the hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens) say that the second heaven has not yet arrived for people in places like Toronto. I have to agree. I would not want to live in one of those asphalt jungles.

We are considering the responsibilities of the federal government and what it has accepted as its responsibilities in dealing with the inequalities of various regions of Canada. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there are specific policies to make provision for such things as urban renewal, urban reconstruction and that sort of thing in the urban regions of Canada. Then we have what have been referred to as the slow-growth areas of the country. These are areas where for one reason or another it would appear the economy has become stagnant and unemployment has reached unusually high levels. In respect of these regions we have had much debate for many years in the House. Various types of programs have been tried and developed, and some have been discarded. At present we have ARDA and we had the designated areas program. Now we have the designated regions under the regional Area Development Incentives Act.

• (9:20 p.m.)

The third region I refer to constitutes 30 or 40 per cent of the land mass of Canada. It is the area of the territories. There, for constitutional reasons that I will not go into, the federal government has assumed great responsibilities, both in the area of industrial resource development and toward the provision of community facilities, to make it possible for the people who live and work in those areas to enjoy a reasonable standard of living. There again we may say that perhaps everything is not all that it might be.

I suggest the fourth region of this country is what I will refer to as the fast-growth resource area, which is largely in the northern parts of the provinces. The hon. member for Cochrane referred to one of these areas. These areas, for one reason or another, feel alienated from our great metropolitan regions such as Toronto or Vancouver. The area that I represent, which is roughly the northern three-quarters of Vancouver Island, is one such area. It is not a matter of redevelopment; it is not a matter of the existence of a high level of unemployment in those areas: it is a matter of beginning with undeveloped resources and undeveloped facilities and of people having to live there and of travel to and from the area.

I have been examining various programs of the federal government. It seems to me that the whole area of the country which has sometimes been referred to as a possible mid-Canada corridor has really been left out of the picture so far as concerns economic inequalities and social inequalities that may exist between this region and the other regions of Canada I have outlined. Therefore, I think it is time that a few minutes were taken to examine this situation.

The only existing federal programs in those areas that I can think of are programs under the auspices of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the fields of housing, and sewer construction which have general application across the country. I suppose one could say that the manpower retraining and mobility programs do something toward providing skilled manpower in those areas, but I suggest that these programs tend to aggravate rather than improve matters involving the provision of social amenities, transportation and other necessary facilities. This is a situation which I have discussed in the House and have raised with members of various federal governments over many years.

I must say that it has been a rather frustrating task so far as I am concerned because I come from the province of British Columbia. It seems to me that this is something in which the government of the province of British Columbia has been completely uninterested. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, when we talked about the need for federal assistance in the provision of community facilities and transportation facilities in areas such as the northern part of Vancouver Island it was pretty difficult to build a convincing case when the Premier of British Columbia was talking not so long ago about having $300 million to pour into the Yukon if that part of Canada would link itself with British Columbia. That was $300 million for the building of highways and other community facilities.

An hon. Member: Give him Cochrane instead.

Mr. Barnett: That is an example of the kind of problem that a member in the federal House representing such a fast growing area has had to face. There has been a need to examine the situation and to determine whether specific and particular problems and inequalities applied to the people living in those areas of the country, and to determine whether they need a distinctive program apart from that provided for slow-growth areas or for the great metropolitan centres.

There has been a glimmering of interest in this matter since the special areas were established under the government reorganization bill of the previous session. I am referring to the bill which established the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The minister of municipal affairs has suggested that northern Vancouver Island is one of the areas that should qualify under this program. My initial reaction to that, Mr. Speaker, was that the suggestion probably did not amount to much more than the kind of sparring that had gone on between the federal and provincial authorities. I mention, for example, the idea which was bandied about of making the road to northern Vancouver Island part of the trans-Canada highway. I have suggested more than once that this proposition was never properly put to Ottawa and that if Mr. Bennett had $300 million to spend in the Yukon, he could certainly afford to build 100 miles or so of road northerly on Vancouver Island.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Barnett: However, Mr. Speaker, this does not alter the fact that there is a real need for social capital to be invested in roads, sewer and water systems and in the normal paving programs that take place in communities. Also, when large industrial undertakings move in to exploit resources almost overnight, without any particular provision being made by any authority for a comparable investment to be made in community facilities, the people who are expected to live and work in these areas will be faced with real problems and, I submit, with real inequalities. So I suggest that when we talk about these programs to deal with such problems in specific regions of the country, consideration must and should be given to the particular needs of the people who live in the undeveloped, fast-growth resource areas in the northern parts of the provinces of this country.

I should like to see more serious attention paid to these problems. If the statements I have read in the press are correct, that the government of the province of British Columbia through a cabinet committee is making at long last a serious study of this problem with a view to making a presentation to the federal government in a proper way, I hope that that presentation will be given consideration by the government. I could expand on this situation in some detail. I could particularize those areas in my constituency where the need for this kind of development is the greatest. In the circumstances, and with the limited time I have in this debate, I do not think I have an adequate opportunity to develop this theme. I have, therefore, contented myself with giving a general outline of the problem which I submit exists virtually across the whole of Canada. It is one which, as I have already said, is of particular urgency in the area of Canada that I represent in this House.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it was only a few short years ago, 1961-1962, that the government of that day was being violently attacked in this chamber by those who now form the government because of the serious unemployment problem that confronted the country. Day after day, with their usual bloodthirsty motivation for political advantage, the Liberal opposition of those days—

An hon. Member: Author?

Mr. Nielsen: I wrote the speech—just a few short years ago heartlessly traded on the sorry plight of thousands of unemployed in Canada, not caring for a moment that their conduct was adding to the social unrest, just so long as they succeeded in undermining confidence in the government of that day. They could not have cared less about being helpful, because if they had been constructive it might have helped the government and, consequently, the country. All they cared about then was to bring the government down, and to hell with the country. In that they succeeded, and perhaps the single most important factor in the defeat of that government was the unemployment in the country at that time.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Their strategy at that time is most relevant to this debate, for they have not changed at all. Then they distorted the statistics at will. When a statistic was harmful to the government, it was exaggerated and distorted by them. They are following the same strategy now, only the situation is reversed. Now, the overwhelming evidence shows serious unemployment existing, with massive unemployment to come this winter. And what do they do? They are again distorting the facts, playing with the statistics to make them appear more favourable to the government than is the case. In the process they deliberately mislead the people of Canada, deliberately paint a rosier picture than is the fact and, most repugnant of all, they deliberately set out to make organized labour the scapegoat for their own glaring inadequacy. All for the purpose of power! Their philosophy is, stay popular and stay in government whatever the cost in terms of truth to the people of Canada.

In 1961-62 they even set up their own bureau of statistics, led by the now government leader in the other place and abetted by many who now sit on the treasury benches. We called it, not the DBS but the MBS, after its leader—the "Martin Bureau of Statistics." The statistics which they produced bore as much similarity to the truth as do those which the government today produces. They wilfully, knowingly and repeatedly present to this House and to the public the unemployment figures in such a manner as to induce the belief that they are better than they actually are.

What they are doing is using the aggregate figures on total unemployment and the aggregate percentage of those unemployed. In doing so they are deliberately ignoring the regional variance in unemployment because this is embarrassing to them. They completely ignore the age variance in unemployment, one of the chief reasons being that the hardest hit in this category are young people and students and it certainly would not do to have the students and young people realize that the Trudeau government was deliberately knocking the economic stuffing out of them. They totally ignore the amount of hidden unemployed, perhaps the largest sector of which is in the native Indian and Eskimo population whose unemployed numbers, if they were added to the list now, would increase the figures by some 100,000. Finally, they turn a completely blind eye to the length of unemployment.

I have not the time to analyse each of these omissions in detail. Suffice it to say that government spokesmen know they are distorting, by their omissions, and are thereby misleading the House and the country simply for the sake of maintaining popularity and power. They consistently quote the actual rate of unemployment rather than the seasonally adjusted rate. With regard to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson)—some call him "Gentle Ben" but when he pulls tricks like this he would be better called "Heartless Ben"—is even stooping to the device of trying to discredit the validity of the seasonally adjusted rate and to play down its significance. This is exemplified by his contribution to the debate on the Speech from the Throne last October 13. I begin to believe there is no end to the depths to which they are prepared to plunge in order to deceive as long as it is to their political advantage.

They blame labour, particularly the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who has on several public occasions painted labour as the evil originator of inflationary forces in Canada. There has been a significant increase in labour unrest in this country in the last two years. I deal with this question, Mr. Speaker, because no single factor has contributed more directly to labour unrest than inflation brought about by this government's policies. By inflation, the have-not unions and the unorganized have been reduced progressively to a lower standard of income and living. The powerful unions and those organized for bringing pressure on the economy have been compelled by their membership to press for higher and higher wages to replace lost purchasing power. This is the situation created by this government's policy of high taxes, high costs and high prices. It is a ruinous, iniquitous policy and has resulted in forcing down the standard of living of a whole group of Canadians who have joined the rank of the new poor as a result of this government's policies.

Inflation picks the pocket of the working man, siphoning purchasing power from his pay cheque, forcing him to demand higher and higher wages, taking the food away from his family. And that inflation is the product of policies of high taxation and high spending invoked by this government, which have subtracted the working man's gains at both ends by reducing the amount he receives and adding to the cost of the things he buys. Under this government labour has become the forgotten department. Labour has been downgraded. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) has been reduced to chief conciliation officer for the federal government. He is the closest thing to a minister without portfolio. These are the areas and these are the problems where the government has failed pitiably.

We have growing unemployment, the iniquitous indirect tax of forced inflation, high costs, unjustified government spending resulting in high taxation, with Canadians being squeezed more and more every day and having to run faster just to stay where they are. This is the area in which the government should act and in which it stands indicted by a record of inaction unparalleled in the history of this nation. This government should come back to earth, forget about long-range theorizing and academic abstractions and come to grips with the people's problems. They should stop preening and admiring themselves. They are all on a permanent ego trip. Where is the just society? What happened to the war on poverty? Where is participatory democracy? Slick phrases coined to get votes, but principles forgotten. Poverty cannot be beaten without full employment. Society cannot be just, with poverty increasing.

This government has been spending hundreds of thousands, nay, millions of dollars on armies of task forces running all over the country, to say nothing of the commissions and royal commissions. The Prime Minister, his ministers and most members on the government side have been busy mounting platitudes and paying lip service to the just society, participatory democracy and the now infamous war on poverty in the various regions of Canada. Since all these task forces, commissions and royal commissions, studies and reports have a name, I think we should give a name to the government's efforts to fight the war on poverty, a name to describe the things being said by government spokesmen in their posture of being great generals riding to do battles which they have not even begun. Let us call their efforts and their statements "combined regional anti-poverty." The true measure of their efforts and the truth of their statements may be best described, I suggest, by the first letters of each of four words of that title.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: They deserve a medal, Mr. Speaker. When I was in the RCAF, if I may still be permitted to call it that, we had a medal which was awarded to those who persistently fouled up the works, particularly those who did not learn by their mistakes or sat back and did nothing. In other words, it was an award to those who fiddled while Rome burned. It was called the MHDOIF, and anyone who was in the air force will know what those initials mean. If there is one man who has earned this medal, it is the Prime Minister, and I think I am speaking for all members on this side of the House when I say that the government has earned this medal. I hereby present the Prime Minister with the MHDOIF—the Most Highly Derogatory Order of the Irremovable Finger.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): All I hope is that my hon. friends will not clap for too long in their enthusiasm, because I see that time is running out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I can state that the only difference between this debate and the debate which was held on November 12, 1970, is that the opposition is even more intent in its determination to make clear to the people of Canada the reckless, cold-hearted and barbaric attitude of the government toward the millions of Canadians in the work force, numbering 8.5 million, and those who would like to form part of it but have little chance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: This attitude caused unemployment figures to skyrocket to 419,000 in October of this year, compared with 314,000 a year ago. I should like to add that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is striving earnestly for the dubious honour of going down in history as the Prime Minister who held office during the period of highest unemployment since the depression. Such a course will surely lead historians to state that he flirted with disaster and was seduced without benefit of affection. It will also be known as a regrettable side effect of the government's fiscal and monetary policies—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It being 9.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section (9) of Standing Order 58, to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

An hon. Member: Where are the government members?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The question is on the amendment. All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Division

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed to the amendment will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Douglas, Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands), which was negatived on the following division:

SOCIAL SECURITY

GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask leave of the House to make a motion under Standing Order 43, under which it is possible to do so without notice if there is urgent and pressing necessity and if there is unanimous consent—

An hon. Member: No.

An hon. Member: That is typical.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Liberals say no before they know what it is all about.

An hon. Member: We know you.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, now that there is agreement on the part of all parties in the House to the principle of a guaranteed annual income, I feel that there is urgent and pressing necessity that this fact be reflected in the government white paper on social security that is shortly to be presented. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis):

That this House urges the government to include in its white paper on social security, to be presented shortly, a definite provision for a guaranteed annual income for all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member, who knows the rules so well, has himself indicated that for this motion to be put at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. I have to inquire whether there is universal agreement among all hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is dissent.

CRIMINAL CODE

ABORTION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I wish to move a motion on a matter that is of urgent and pressing necessity, particularly in view of the strong stand taken on this issue at the Liberal policy convention held in Ottawa over the weekend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. MacInnis: I am glad I have got unanimous support. This is the first time I have ever been one up on my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre. I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), to move the following motion:

That this House urges the government, at an early date, to introduce legislation to remove abortion from the Criminal Code.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Is there agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and therefore the motion cannot be put to the House at this time.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING BUMPER IMPACT STANDARD

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-197, to amend the Motor Vehicle Safety Act (bumpers).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Mather: The purpose of this bill is to require that automobiles manufactured after January 1, 1972, and used in Canada be equipped with bumpers capable of withstanding impact into a standard barrier at five miles per hour without damage. Modest as the requirement may appear, it will mark a significant safety improvement over the protection offered motor vehicles and passengers at present by the costume jewellery type of bumpers now in use.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved the first reading of Bill S-5 (from the Senate), respecting weights and measures.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PAYMENT BY TELESAT CORPORATION TO RCA LIMITED

Question No. 48—Mr. Orlikow:

How much did Telesat Corporation agree in June to pay RCA Limited of Montreal for the privilege of delaying the ANIK Communication Satellite decision until September and, of this amount, how much has been paid to RCA and is it intended to pay the remainder?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): The following information has been supplied to the Minister of Communications by Telesat Canada: In consideration of RCA Limited agreeing to extend the validity of its proposal for the construction of the spacecraft beyond 1 July, 1970, Telesat Canada agreed to pay RCA Limited $3,600 per day to defray the costs incurred as a result of this extension commencing 8 June 1970. This understanding was terminated 31 July, 1970, by the Board of Directors. The amount owed to RCA Limited pursuant to this understanding is $194,400 and payment is expected to be made in the near future.

AVAILABILITY OF PUBLIC SHARE OFFERING IN TELESAT CANADA

Question No. 50—Mr. Orlikow:

When is it anticipated that the government will make available to the general public one-third equity participation in Telesat Canada?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): According to Section 10 of the Telesat Canada Act, it is the Board of Directors of Telesat Canada which has the discretionary authority respecting the timing, the price and the share allotment of any public share offering, although the approval of the Governor-in-Council must be obtained. Telesat Canada officials advise that they do not foresee an immediate public share offering.

ANIK COMMUNICATION SATELLITE PROGRAM—PAYMENTS TO RCA

Question No. 54—Mr. Orlikow:

How much money has RCA Limited of Montreal received from the federal government and/or its agencies on matters related to the ANIK Communication Satellite Program and what was the purpose of each specific expenditure?

[Mr. Mather.]

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned: The Department of Communications has paid no money to RCA Limited of Montreal on matters related to the Anik Communication Satellite Program. Since Telesat is not part of the Canadian Government, or an agency of the Government, it should be assumed that details as to payments by Telesat were not expected. However, the management of the Corporation has provided the minister with the following figures:

Program Definition Phase:	$3,500,000.
Sustaining Engineering:	360,000.
Extension of validity of RCA proposal beyond 1 July, 1970:	190,000.
Total:	$4,050,000.

In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: The department funded the Study Program for a Canadian Domestic Communication Satellite. The study was carried out in 1968 and RCA Limited was paid $274,347.00. The design concepts in the study were presumably the basis for the RCA's proposal of the ANIK satellite.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION—NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES RECEIVING MORE OR LESS THAN $6,000 YEARLY

Question No. 57—Mr. Broadbent:

2. How many men employed by the Public Service in the latest available year earned (a) less than $6,000 (b) more than $6,000 a year?

3. How many women employed in the Public Service are ranked in the senior officer category?

4. How many men employed in the Public Service are ranked in the senior officer category?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Supply and Services and the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. (a) 2,162; (b) 1,459.

2. (a) 792; (b) 3,735.

3 and 4. As at September 30, 1970, two women and 479 men held appointments in the senior executive category.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO UNITED NATIONS FUND AND INTERNATIONAL PLANNED PARENTHOOD FEDERATION

Question No. 201—Mrs. MacInnis:

What is the estimated financial contribution by Canada in the current fiscal year to (a) the United Nations fund for population activities (b) the International Planned Parenthood Federation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer is: (a) $1,010,000; (b) $505,000.

DVA—LONDON, ENGLAND OFFICE

Question No. 210—Mr. Marshall:

1. How many war veterans receiving assistance under the Pensions Act are being serviced out of the Department of Veterans Affairs office in London, England?

2. Is the DVA office in London, England being closed and, if so, for what reasons?

3 How many government employees are there in the DVA office in London, England?

4. Will alternate employment be provided for those employees and under what conditions?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. There are 2,218 war veterans residing in Great Britain who are receiving a pension under the Pension Act. The only service provided by the London office to these pensioners, and to the widows and orphans of pensioners, relates to the benefits available to them under the Veterans Charter and is similar to that given by the Foreign Relations Division in Ottawa to veterans residing outside of Canada, including the United States of America.

2. The DVA office in London will be phased out gradually as the workload diminishes; however, the office will not be closed in the immediate future.

3. Eight; one classified officer and seven locally-engaged staff.

4. Arrangements affecting staff members whose positions become redundant will be discussed with them individually as the occasion arises.

BUILDING OF C.B.C. TELEVISION STATION IN AREA OF NORTH SHORE OF ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

Question No. 256—Mr. Blouin:

Will the government consider building a CBC television station in the area of the North Shore to extend the French and English networks across the North Shore of the Saint Lawrence River, as well as to mining cities of the hinterland and the Northern side of the Gaspé Peninsula and, if so, will the work begin in the near future?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State of Canada): The CBC recognizes the need for improving television along the North Shore of the St. Lawrence and it has plans for extending the English and French television networks in these areas. A survey of the requirements of these areas is about to be completed, but it is not possible to set a date for the introduction of these services until certain technical obstacles have been overcome.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PUBLIC ORDER BILL—PROVISION OF INDEPENDENT REVIEW

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I direct this question to him because he may not be able to be present in the House later and a favourable answer would greatly expedite the proceedings of the House. Is the Prime Minister now prepared to support a provision for an independent review in the public order bill, as has been urged upon him by the policy conference of his party?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Prime Minister might be allowed to reply at this time to the question put by the Leader of the Opposition. Nevertheless, I think I ought to bring to the attention of the House that we are somewhat anticipating the order of the day. It is my understanding that later in the day we are to consider the bill in Committee of the Whole, including the amendment to which the Leader of the Opposition has referred. On the other hand, I appreciate that this is a matter of importance, and the Prime Minister might be allowed to reply, with the consent of the House.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, does the House consent?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister, in order to expedite the debate, not consider supporting some amendment along the lines suggested by us in the debate last Tuesday? This is an important matter. The amendment seeks to establish review machinery. Such action would expedite the debate and would put us on all fours on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I respectfully suggest to the hon. member for Calgary North that this really is the kind of question that should be asked when we are in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But the Prime Minister will not be here then.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the Prime Minister whether he would graciously consider answering my question?

Mr. Trudeau: If the members of his party would graciously remain silent while I answer it, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Sh, sh-h-h!

Mr. Trudeau: It is not going to be that good. The position of this party has been that we are not trying to invade the constitutional responsibilities of the province. I noticed that the Leader of the Opposition, while in Winnipeg over the weekend, accused the government of seeking confrontation with the province of Quebec and therefore worsening the separatist situation. I noticed that the young New Democrats also accused the federal government of holding the province of Quebec in a colonial status and stated that we should not continue this overbearing position.

I submit that the amendment proposed by the opposition along the lines of establishing such a commission would precisely be doing that, seeking confrontation with the province of Quebec in a matter of its jurisdiction and, as the New Democratic Party suggests, treating the province of Quebec as a colony. The position of this government has consistently been that in matters of provincial jurisdiction such as the administration of justice, the province would not be looked upon by the federal government as a Big Brother to see whether it does its job well. The resolution adopted by the convention stated in the final part that a way must be sought to do this without infringing upon provincial autonomy. We have found no way of doing what is suggested without appearing or in fact endeavouring to oversee the province of Quebec in its rightful operations.

I must add that the Minister of Justice and I have both had communications with the authorities of Quebec. Twice today I spoke with Premier Bourassa trying to find a way in which we would at least be able to go some distance in ensuring that a statutory committee would be established to consider the application of this Act in Quebec. I must say that a way was not found. I bow to the Premier of Quebec in that he has undertaken to ensure that administration of justice under his authority is done well. As the House knows, he has set up a review commission of members of the civil liberties union to look into the abuses which might happen under the administration of that Act. I can go no further than to report to the House that if the province of Quebec does not want to consent to the statutory establishment of such a committee, it is not our intention to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Has the Prime Minister requested the province of Quebec to establish its own independent review, Mr. Speaker? If so, has he received any assurance from that province that it will do so?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I raised that question with the authorities of the province of Quebec after it was made clear that establishment by federal statute would be considered by them as an infringement. I asked if they would consider establishing such a commission. The reply was that they have such a commission now in operation, that one had already been set up. They saw no need to give it a statutory existence because they already have an ombudsman who can perform, in the event that the committee should fail, the operation of surveillance of the administration of justice.

Mr. Stanfield: Is the Prime Minister himself satisfied that the province of Quebec has provided an adequate, independent review of the exercise of the powers that this House is being asked to provide?

Mr. Trudeau: I think I can truthfully say yes, Mr. Speaker. I know personally two members of the commission which has been set up by the province of Quebec; I have already had occasion to talk to one of the members of the commission on a personal basis in the past little while and I am convinced you will not find more honourable or independent-minded people to survey, to oversee, the administration of justice in this particular case.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): In light of the fact that the legislation under discussion is in contravention of Article 11 of the International Charter of Human Rights, does the government intend to consider indicating to the United Nations that we are withdrawing our support for this article of the declaration?

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): On a point of clarification, Mr. Speaker, did the Prime Minister state to the House that the Premier of Quebec made it clear to him that it would constitute an infringement of provincial rights for the federal government to establish such a commission?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I do not necessarily say he used the expression "provincial rights" but he did use the expression "provincial autonomy" and spoke of the ability of the province to administer itself within its own areas of jurisdiction without big brother looking over its shoulder, and I think he was perfectly right in that contention, personally.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): In view of the Prime Minister's indication that because of the explanation by the Premier of Quebec he will bow to the wishes of the Minister of Justice, can this House and the country take it as a precedent that Liberal party policy as defined at a Liberal party convention is to be secondary to the wishes of a provincial premier wherever there is joint jurisdiction?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

GREAT LAKES—ALLEGED VIOLATION OF BOUNDARY WATERS TREATY BY UNITED STATES—SUGGESTED WITHHOLDING OF VITAL RESOURCES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I want to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising from a statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to the effect that the United States has violated the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 by its pollution of the Great Lakes. In view of this violation of Article 4 of the Boundary Waters Treaty, what action does the Canadian government propose to take?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I was not aware of that statement before it was made. I will consult with the minister and ask him what he has in mind in terms of follow-up.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is the government's intention to move under Article 10 of the treaty or under Article 45 of the Hague Convention to deal with this matter before pollution reaches a stage where protest will be of very little value?

Mr. Trudeau: I will take the hon. member's plea to the minister and ask him to report to me on it.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I want to ask the Prime Minister about a similar statement made by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry in New York to the effect that Canada would be prepared to withhold vital resources from the United States if the United States does not deal with the question of Great Lakes pollution. May I ask whether this was a statement of government policy?

Mr. Trudeau: I have not heard of that statement, Mr. Speaker. If he has been accurately quoted I think the minister will have to indicate to the House and to the government how he intends seeing this happen. I am not aware that the minister made a statement in those terms.

ALLEGED INVITATION TO FRANÇOIS GIROD

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

Can he tell the House whether the CBC has sent an invitation, as it usually does in similar cases, to François Girod who has just made an inflammatory statement in Algeria with regard to the FLQ?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I could inquire, Mr. Speaker. I am not aware of any such invitation, but I shall ask the CBC whether an invitation was extended.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice.

Will there be police supervision over the visit of François Girod to Canada and will this man be declared a member of the FLQ as soon as he enters the country?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think this comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration or the Solicitor General.

AVAILABILITY OF WEAPONS—PASSING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. On November 9, 10 and 12 I asked the Minister of Justice a question with reference to restricted and prohibited weapons and whether the necessary proclamation had been made in accordance with section 82 of the Criminal Code prohibiting these types of weapons and stopping their sale to kidnappers and gangsters.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the problem about the type of weapon to which the hon. member referred at that time and to which I take it he refers now, the 30M-1, is that the rifle is, first of all, definitely semi-automatic and not a machine gun. It is not currently prohibited or restricted; in other words, it can be bought and sold quite lawfully and without the necessity of any kind of permit. The Governor in Council may add to the list of prohibited and restricted weapons by virtue of the legislation that this Parliament passed a year or so ago if the weapon concerned is not a shotgun or rifle of a kind commonly used in Canada for hunting or sporting purposes. At the moment I have no definite information whether the M-1 that I have described above is so used. In any event, consideration of what further weapons should be prohibited or restricted is a primary responsibility of my colleague the Solicitor General, who is in the course of seeking advice from the RCMP in order that if necessary, and if appropriate, recommendations can be made to cabinet.

Mr. Woolliams: I take it from the answer of the Minister of Justice that there is no proclamation at the present time forbidding the sale of these weapons. In view of the fact that a newspaperman walked into a war surplus store even after I put these questions to the Minister of Justice and purchased the kind of weapons that were used in the kidnappings, would the minister or the Solicitor General now assure the House that action will be taken immediately, since these were the type of weapons used in the kidnapping?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in view of the additional information now given I would be very glad to press the examination of this subject.

POLLUTION

GREAT LAKES—ALLEGED VIOLATION OF BOUNDARY WATERS TREATY BY UNITED STATES—SUBMISSION TO INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the allegation by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources at Burlington that the United States is in violation of the Boundary Waters Treaty in dumping pollutants into the Great Lakes, is the government proposing to take this matter to the International Court of Justice or some other international tribunal?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take it that ministers who make this kind of statement have some idea of how they are going to follow up on it, and I will ask the minister how he intends to follow it up.

Mr. Aiken: In view of the numerous speeches that have been made by several ministers, does the government intend to take a firm stand on pollution at the United States-Canada ministerial conference, or are we merely going to shout at them like small boys?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROPOSED DIVISION OF RADIO SERVICE

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Having in mind the announcement by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation over the weekend that it intends to divide its radio service and seemingly its listeners too into two parts, AM and FM, and to add new stations throughout the country, can the Secretary of State say whether he was apprised of this decision and, if so, whether he approved of it?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker, I learned of that decision through the newspapers just like everybody else. I have already received representations against that decision and I have communicated them to the Corporation as I will convey those implied in the hon. member's question.

[English]

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that he is scheduled to appear before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee tomorrow morning at 9.30, could he obtain from the corporation a breakdown of how this new policy is to be applied across Canada and the priorities in allocation of funds between development and expansion of the one good part of the CBC, the radio service, and funds for bilingual stations and/or complete TV coverage across Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: I will do the utmost to secure that answer by tomorrow morning, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot promise it. I have the impression that a comprehensive study will have to be undertaken, if all the facts involved are to be taken into consideration.

PERFORMANCE OF ILLEGAL ABORTION IN PROGRAM "WEEKEND"

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State. Following last night's CBC "Weekend" program and because of the insignificant answers Members of Parliament receive from the CBC to their letters, would the minister make an inquiry and report to the House whether the performers in a criminal illegal abortion shown on the program were paid for their performance, second if next week's proposed opinion poll report is meant to influence rather than report public opinion and, finally, if the purpose of all this is justifiable or the usual CBC effort to increase ratings by offending a large segment of the Canadian viewers?

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF SO-CALLED PRICE WAR AMONG GROCERY CHAINS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Will he instruct the officials of the Combines Investigations Branch of his department to investigate thoroughly all aspects of the so-called price war presently being carried on by several major grocery chains?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what particular aspects the hon. member is concerned about. We would investigate any apparent violation of the law, of course.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, will the minister in particular investigate the degree of control which permits chain stores to charge 10 per cent more on numerous items in small cities compared with what they charge in large cities only 15 or 20 miles away, and will the minister request the officials of the branch to investigate the possibility that some of the major chains may be trying to force a number of small businesses in small towns out of business by this so-called discount war?

Mr. Basford: I am not sure whether the hon. member is urging me to implement some form of price control.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have already stated in the Speech from the Throne what we will do this session.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister what the purpose of such a debate as that promised would be?

TRANSPORT

HALIFAX—REPORTED INADEQUACY OF CONTAINER TERMINAL PIER AND TUGBOAT SERVICES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I regret the absence of the Minister of Transport but I understand this is not his day to be here. In his absence may I direct a couple of fairly serious questions to the Parliamentary Secretary or to the Acting Minister. In light of the very serious charges made by the President of the Atlantic Container Line Limited in respect of the adequacy of the container terminal at Halifax, would the minister institute an immediate investigation to determine, first, the adequacy of the pier itself, second, the adequacy of the tugboat services and, finally, whether the port of Halifax and the users of the container service, which just started this weekend, are about to undergo a loss of business as a result of what appears to be poor planning?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that the minister is very well aware of this situation. He has requested that a survey be conducted immediately and he will probably be able to answer the hon. member's question tomorrow or within a few days.

[English]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works. Are there any plans under way to construct additional protection in Halifax harbour for the new container pier in order to prevent danger or difficulties for ships in stormy weather?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, a very great investment has been made in the harbour itself, I think something in the nature of $15 million. There is some suggestion now that in order to protect that investment we may have to put in another $2 million to fend off rough water.

Mr. Stanfield: Has any decision been made in this regard or can the minister indicate that a decision will be made shortly?

Mr. Laing: No, Mr. Speaker, no decision has been taken yet. I assume that the decision will depend upon experiences such as we are having with the first vessel.

CONSIDERATION IN WHITE PAPER OF DISPARITY BETWEEN URBAN AND RURAL INCOMES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the third report of the Canadian Council on Rural Development, which has just been published, indicates that the disparity between urban and rural incomes is increasing, can the minister say whether the forthcoming white paper on social security will deal with this problem?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the over-all incomes position of those people in a low-income situation with be reviewed.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, following the rather intensive discussions over the weekend, is the minister now in a position to tell the House with some degree of precision when the white paper on welfare policy will be tabled in the House?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Soon.

Mr. Munro: As the Prime Minister indicated, Mr. Speaker, we expect to have it tabled very soon indeed. I cannot give the precise date at this time.

In order to stimulate employment this winter, particularly in the Atlantic area, would his department accelerate the building of wharves which are badly needed as this work would alleviate unemployment this winter?

Mr. Speaker: It would seem to me that the hon. member's question is in the form of a submission or representation to the government. He must assume that his submission has been taken into account.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

REMOVAL OF HEAD-END TRAINMEN FROM PASSENGER TRAINS—IMPLEMENTATION OF ARBITRATOR'S DECISION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister aware of a recent decision of an arbitrator giving Canadian Pacific Railway the immediate right to remove head-end trainmen from passenger trains without regard for the age or length of service of the men involved? If he is aware of this, would the minister or one of his officials enter into discussions with the CPR to persuade the company to implement the arbitrator's decision in such a way as to avoid hardship among long-service employees?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member's request is a very moderate one. I have already taken steps to ask for a full report on the situation, the basis upon which the arbitration decision was made and what, if anything, can be done to make the decision effective in a more humanitarian way than the report indicates could be the case.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the minister for having given consideration to this matter already. May I ask him whether he would inform the House or otherwise make public as soon as possible what steps he is taking to achieve that purpose?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, before I commit myself to anything I want to see the report I have asked for this morning from my officials.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to direct my question to the Minister of Finance but since he is not here I shall direct it to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. First I should like to congratulate the former general manager of the Calgary Football Club on their wonderful victory.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: I also wish him well in the Grey Cup.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: I should like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance to show his influence and enlighten his colleagues so that Edmonton will obtain a substantial grant to help it build the first enclosed coliseum, after the inclement weather we saw yesterday on television.

Mr. Speaker: Again, this question is in the form of a representation and the hon. member must assume that it will be taken into account.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CORNWALL—SUGGESTED NAMING AS DESIGNATED AREA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It has to do with a subject which has been discussed before, namely, the serious and overwhelming unemployment situation in the city of Cornwall. The other day the minister said that some public works would be proceeded with. The people there tell me that this will not provide the employment required. Considering all the circumstances, has a decision been arrived at yet whereby this very needy city will be named as a designated area so that industry may be encouraged to locate there?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have expressed my view before that questions of this nature referring to individual cities are not in order. The question, therefore, is not in order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then, Mr. Speaker, without specifically mentioning Cornwall, since other areas in Canada where unemployment is as high as it is in Cornwall have been designated, may I ask why those cities have been designated and Cornwall has been left out?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Would he tell the House if those so called great protectors, the Montreal labour unionists and intellectuals, have made any appeal to him in favour of Mr. Paul Cliche's sacred right to freedom of speech within FRAP?

AIRPORTS

STE. SCHOLASTIQUE—AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND QUEBEC RESPECTING ACCESS ROADS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

As two important contracts have been awarded by the government regarding the Ste. Scholastique airport could I ask the minister if definite agreements have been concluded between Quebec and Ottawa regarding the development of access roads in connection with the Ste. Scholastique project?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. La Salle: I should like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the minister say whether the establishment of special zones will be announced in the near future in view of the road works which will be undertaken in connection with the Ste. Scholastique project?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): We are almost constantly in contact with the province of Quebec on that matter, Mr. Speaker, and we hope to be able to announce—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

PENITENTIARIES

REQUESTED REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT TO COMMITTEE ON JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Would the minister consider referring the annual report of the Penitentiaries Branch to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs so that the committee may continue its visits to the penitentiaries across the country in order that we may be better informed in this matter?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to make such a recommendation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSED EXTENSION OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING TO CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. If he deems it proper, I wonder if he would advise us whether he has replied to the president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, Mr. Edwards, with regard to amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act which would have the effect of extending collective bargaining to the Canadian Armed Forces? If so, would he indicate the nature of his reply?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not yet answered this letter. Perhaps an acknowledgement has been sent, but a substantive answer has not yet been sent.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ROLE OF WORKERS IN DECISION-MAKING

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Could the minister inform the House whether or not the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion was stating government policy on the weekend when he argued against the view that working people in Canada should be given effective authority in areas of decision-making hitherto regarded as the prerogative of management only?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows the question cannot be placed in those terms.

BILINGUALISM—PAYMENT OF BONUS TO PROTECTIVE STAFF MEMBERS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Since bilingual employees of the Public Service and bilingual secretaries of Parliament benefit from a 7 per cent premium for being bilingual, could the Prime Minister, as the great defender of this cause in Canada, tell us why the bilingual members of the Protective Staff are not granted this premium?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that the employees he refers to come under the House of Commons. The question must therefore be directed to Parliament, through the Chair.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Information Canada. In view of the continuing anxiety of disadvantaged Canadians to learn dates of introduction of legislation on veterans pensions and social security, and in view of the difficulty in extracting these answers, would he use his influence to get this information and pass it along through his new department to the many Canadians in need?

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION ALLEGING FLQ CONTROL

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Last Tuesday in the absence of the minister I asked a question of another minister arising out of a report of a speech he is alleged to have made in St. Jerome a week ago yesterday in which he is reported to have said that Radio-Canada was being controlled by the FLQ. I should like to ask the minister to inform the House whether he made such a statement and, if he did, whether he has presented the evidence of that statement—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South is aware, I believe, of the rule regarding questions related to statements made outside the House.

Mr. Lewis: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether he has evidence that the CBC or Radio-Canada was under the control of the FLQ or FLQ sympathizers and, if he has such evidence, did he present it either to the Solicitor General of Canada or the Attorney General of Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may ask questions of the minister relating only to his ministerial responsibility. A question in those terms directed to the minister in question is not in order.

Mr. Lewis: May I rephrase it again, Mr. Speaker. Assuming that the minister was reported correctly—he may not have been—he has made a serious allegation, so may I ask the first part of my question as to whether the minister has evidence or information to justify his statement that Radio-Canada was controlled by members or supporters of the FLQ?

Mr. Speaker: I certainly do not want to appear obstructive, but again the hon. member knows he cannot ask the question in this way. Perhaps he can ask the question directly of the Secretary of State as to whether he has such evidence.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, obviously I have to bow to your order—

Mr. Gibson: Get bowing.

Mr. Lewis: —but when a minister of the Crown is reported to have made so serious a statement I thought he ought to have the opportunity to say whether he made it or not. May I then ask the Prime Minister the same question I asked him a week ago and, if I remember correctly, I asked it of the Minister of Justice too. I asked whether he knew that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is reported to have made such a statement and, if my memory serves me right, the Prime Minister said he would inquire. May I now ask him if he has inquired whether the minister made such a statement, and if he is satisfied there is evidence to that effect?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I understand from the minister he has not made such a statement, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion has been made many times, I think, to the CRTC which has every authority under Section 15 of the Broadcasting Act to conduct any investigation it deems appropriate in respect of broadcasting, both public and private.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the hon. minister.

Has he himself made any representations on behalf of the members who had already made them to the CRTC, so that the undertaking of such an investigation can be considered and ordered as soon as possible?

INFORMATION CANADA

INFORMATION ON SUBJECTS UNDER SURVEY

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of Information Canada. Would the minister make available to the House all the subjects which Information "In" has now under survey in Canada, such as the one regarding blind allowances that was announced by one of his departmental chiefs the other day?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): I will be glad to do that, Mr. Speaker. I also appreciate the question previously directed to me, but while we can give a great deal of information about bills that exist, we can give none about bills that do not yet exist.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, when the minister is doing that will he also prepare a script or something of that sort to show, for his own convenience, where the resolutions adopted by his party's convention differ from the stands taken by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT, 1970

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY POWERS FOR PRESERVATION OF PUBLIC ORDER

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 17, consideration in committee of Bill C-181, to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada—Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton)—Mr. Laniel in the Chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose on Tuesday, November 17, 1970, a motion by the hon. member for Calgary North to insert a new clause 15 in the bill was under consideration. The text of the proposed clause will be found at page 1261 of Tuesday's Hansard. Shall the motion carry?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, in light of what the Prime Minister said today in response to questions from the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Calgary North and others, I think we have to review this situation because in my view the Prime Minister has misinformed the House as to what the issue really is. There is no question at all about the distribution of powers between the provinces and the federal government with regard to civil law. That is set out very clearly. Section 91(27) of the B.N.A. Act provides that the federal government shall have jurisdiction in respect of:

> The criminal law, except the constitution of courts of Criminal Jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I would like to remind hon. members that they should hold their private conversations outside the chamber so that other interested members might listen to the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Baldwin: I quite agree with you, Mr. Chairman. I assumed that a great many members thought they were still in the more jovial circumstances of yesterday and the day before.

There is that clear and precise definition of the jurisdiction of the federal government. For a great many years, the Criminal Code of this country has made it absolutely clear that questions with regard to bail lie exclusively under the jurisdiction of the federal government. There are a number of sections, from section 463 on of the Criminal Code, which constitute a code dealing with this issue of bail. On this issue of bail, as is proper, jurisdiction has been given by the federal government to the courts and to a judge. What the Prime Minister said today, and what the Minister of Justice said previously, in my view indicates that there is a cowardly skulking behind a misinterpretation of the constitution. That is the situation, nothing more and nothing less.

Certainly, in so far as this bill we are now dealing with creates new criminal offences, the Prime Minister is absolutely right. The procedure in connection with the administration of justice lies within the hands of the provincial government, and under the special aegis of the provincial attorney general. So it does, Mr. Chairman, with regard to the question of arresting without warrant. But every one of the problems posed by this new legislation, every one of the remedies sought by this party for the purpose of trying to provide some form of safeguard, ultimately comes back to the question of bail.

When the federal Parliament presumes by this bill to take away from the courts and put in the hands of a provincial attorney general the right to say whether or not bail shall be granted, which is the total effect of the provisions I am referring to, it is not proper. In fact, it is wrong for the Prime Minister and for the Minister of Justice to say that this is a matter which lies squarely within the jurisdiction of the provincial attorney general. He is given that extraordinary power because it has been taken away from the courts. This amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North asks, if you take this extraordinary step of depriving courts and judges of the right of deciding whether or not bail shall be granted and give that power to the attorney general of the province, then why not have a means for reviewing that procedure? That is all we are asking.

I suggest that the statements made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice bear no resemblance to the facts and no resemblance to the law. The Liberal convention was a little wiser than they in urging this sort of review process in respect of bail. That is the essence of one of the great contributions to criminal law in this country and the United Kingdom, the right of a person charged with an offence and detained in custody to go to court and seek bail. He is brought before a J.P. or a supreme or county court judge; the question of bail is argued and the attorney general, through his agent, is a party to the proceedings. The attorney general can argue against bail because of the nature of the offence or, if bail is to be fixed, he can ask that it be in an amount large enough to ensure the appearance of the accused at the time of trial.

This government wants to take this right away from the courts and put it in the hands of the attorney general. To say that this is the constitutional right of the attorney general under the British North America Act is absolute drivel, Mr. Chairman. The Minister of Justice knows that and so does the Prime Minister, or they should know it.

All we are asking is that the kind of safeguard in respect of the granting of bail which, since time immemorial, has been intertwined with the principles of criminal law in this country, be maintained. I can only assume, by reason of their obstinacy and obduracy, that this government long ago entered into a secret covenant with the province of Quebec not to change this bill one iota. This is the only inference I can draw from this refusal to agree to this very reasonable proposal.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, my colleague and friend, the hon. member for York South, has already indicated the approval of this party for the amendment before us. The Prime Minister's remarks in answer to a question from the Leader of the Opposition today clearly require something of an answer.

In effect, the Prime Minister has told this House that the government is not going to give effect to a resolution of the convention of his party which voted in favour of the creation of an independent review tribunal to serve as a check against abuses of power under this legislation. I suggest the resolution represented the grass roots view of the people of this country, and it gave support to what this party as well as the official opposition has been saying in this House during the last week. I believe it was evidence of the very deep concern of the people of Canada that the legislation introduced to meet the emergency caused by FLQ activities should not be unintentionally abused or misused in such a manner as to cause injustice to innocent citizens.

What is the excuse offered by the Prime Minister today? It is that there is some constitutional or other reason concerned with the relations between federal and provincial governments which makes it impossible to take this very small step to make sure that injustices are not consequent upon this legislation. The Prime Minister has a deserved reputation as an expert in the field of constitutional law. I join with the hon. member for Peace River in saying that in this particular case this is constitutional drivel. If the Prime Minister derived his opinion from the alleged view of the Prime Minister of Quebec, then in so doing I think he abandoned a matter of proper federal concern.

It is this act and this Parliament which has created a series of new and very sensitive offences, offences of a political nature, affecting the welfare of Canada as a whole. To suggest that there is something wrong in this Parliament, when it creates these new and sensitive political offences, saying "we want to take action to provide some sort of remedy against the abuse of these powers because by so doing we are interfering with some provincial jurisdiction", is to fly in the face of the realities and the facts. There is nothing new in this. When this Parliament passed the Narcotics Act, the whole administration in the field of narcotics was given to Royal Canadian Mounted Police officers appointed by a force under the jurisdiction of this Parliament. So, this proposal is not an insult to the people of Quebec; it is a recognition of a sensitive field.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice are fully aware of the fact that time and again the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled that political rights are federal in nature and not a provincial concern at all. Case after case, many emanating from the province of Quebec, draws a clear distinction between civil rights, which are of a provincial nature, and political rights which are rights of the citizens and all people of Canada.
to protect those rights against any invasion that may flow

It is because this amendment seeks to protect the rights of the citizens of Canada that this Parliament clearly has the jurisdiction to approve it. This Parliament has created offences involving great dangers to the political and a constitutional right, and indeed a duty and obligation, fundamental rights of all Canadians; this Parliament has from the application of this bill. I say to the Prime Minister that he is guilty of a too ready acceptance of the proposition apparently made by the Prime Minister of Quebec.

Parliament has the authority to do what is asked in this resolution, and Parliament would be neglectful of its duty if it failed to do so. Any such flimsy constitutional pretext as that advanced by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice is no justification for failure or abnegation of our duty as Parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with the rights of the individual under the provision of this bill. If it becomes law, fundamental freedoms could be interfered with to a degree that was never contemplated except in time of war. When the Bill of Rights was before the House of Commons, members of the Liberal party presented their views. I do not have here quotations to indicate the attitude taken by the then leader of the opposition and afterwards prime minister, the Right Hon. Lester Pearson, nor of the Liberal leader in the Senate today, the Hon. Paul Martin both of whom contended that the Bill of Rights was vacuous and of no consequence. They said that it could not be other than a pious declaration of rights. Indeed, if I had the adjectival capacity that they possess I could nearly fill a book with synonyms in respect of the view they were expressing. They ridiculed it and said it was simply for show.

Apparently the liberalism of that day has not altered because recently, when the Drybones case was argued in the Supreme Court of Canada, the law officers of the Crown appointed by the Minister of Justice fought bitterly against the Bill of Rights being accepted as an effective instrument for the protection of individual rights. They fought the Bill of Rights. They opposed it over and over again. That was a strange attitude for members of a so-called Liberal government to have taken before the Supreme Court of Canada. However, the Supreme Court of Canada did not accept those arguments advanced by counsel representing the government of Canada. Yet in this legislation the government is preventing the Bill of Rights from being operative so long as this legislation is in effect.

Over and over again the Minister of Justice said, and he repeated this the other day as I listened to him in one of his television appearances, that the rights of the individual are not being unnecessarily abrogated or interfered with. Unlike the Prime Minister who, after having supported the concept of Civil liberties over the years, today brushed aside any suggestion that individual's rights should be preserved with a so-called constitutional argument which was completely specious, I find the Minister of Justice, as a recent convert to this principle, to be in a most difficult position. This is especially true when he argues a case that is not very strong. It is never difficult to know his feelings, on the basis of what one sees and hears. Knowing his position is weak, he has attempted to argue the unarguable. This was an amazing attitude to take.

After all, this Liberal convention met. I do not know how many hundred resolutions they moved. I can only conclude that, for them, participatory democracy means the right to express their opinion but not the right to have those matters which the majority of the convention supported accepted by the Liberal government of the day. It is an interesting attitude. Apparently those people did not understand what they were doing. The majority who voted were blind. They did not realize that a commission of the nature suggested by the hon. member for Calgary North is wrong and unconstitutional. Well, 492 advanced intellectuals who sat at the feet of Gamaliel, the Prime Minister of Canada, and placed this matter before the convention in an objective way, took the stand that action should be taken along lines suggested by the hon. member for Calgary North.

Did they not know what they were talking about? Did they lack intelligence? Why was it that the members of the Liberal party in the House of Commons turned out as a phalanx to argue against the amendment that was suggested and finally passed? It was interesting to read what took place there. I was impressed by many of the arguments advanced. I must say that the Minister without Portfolio in charge of Information Canada ought to give consideration to what the Liberal leader in Manitoba said. Mr. Asper, who spoke with asperity, said the whole concept of the just society was a farce.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In effect he said, "Where, oh where has the just society gone?". If Information Canada would just let Mr. Asper sing the song, "Where, oh where, has the just society gone," it would be a top ranking record and would be popular in all parts of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And where has it gone? Sir, I speak with the utmost seriousness. I have followed the course taken by the Attorney General and the Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec. It represents his interpretation of a law passed by the government of Canada, or a law brought about by the promulgation of the War Measures Act.

An hon. Member: You were not speaking to him?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. I have to find somebody I can understand.

Some hon Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec has shown an attitude with regard to this matter that is not in keeping with the position he occupies as custodian of the Queen's conscience, law and justice in his province. He indicates that he wants power, absolute power, unchallengeable power. I suggest that Lord Acton's maxim is just as true today as it has ever been, that power corrupts and absolute power corrupts absolutely. That is what has happened here.

What right has the government of the province of Quebec to say to this Parliament, "You shall not look after the interest of the freedom of the individual; we have that responsibility." The hon. member for Peace River set out that situation in respect of this bill. To deny an individual the opportunity of applying for bail is the most serious denial of the individual's rights, whoever he is and whatever crime he is alleged to have committed. As I see it, no province can endeavour to say to this Parliament, which has the responsibility of passing this law, "We do not want any safeguards placed around those who are unfairly treated or who claim that an injustice has been done."

Those Liberals who voted on this matter apparently said this view is not acceptable. At that Liberal get-together the proposition was advanced that if a person against whom there is no evidence has been taken into custody and thereby suffered the indignity of arrest and the denial of freedom, he should be entitled to compensation. This party has recommended that. The Liberals who met recommended that very step, which means that they accepted the view that many who are being picked up are guiltless but will for all time to come bear the stigma of having been taken into custody, however innocent they may have been.

Mr. Woolliams: The vote was 841 to 49.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In that connection the vote was 841 to 49, overwhelmingly in favour of action along that line being taken. Are we going to allow the current Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec to say to us, whose law he is relying on, "You shall not have any right to determine how the rights of the individual shall be protected." That is a proposition that has no constitutional merit whatsoever.

Now the Prime Minister has said that nothing is going to be done. When he says nothing is going to be done, it is never done. You know, he believes in his own form of securing the opinions of those who sit behind him. He goes to each of them and says, "Whenever I want your opinion I will ask for it, and give you the answer." That is the situation now. He says, "I will give you my opinion so you will be in a position to give an opinion". By what he said earlier today, he has denied the House the right to do that for which it has a constitutional responsibility, as pointed out by the hon. member for Peace River. It is impossible to justify the course being taken by the government. It is far removed from the days when the right hon. gentleman was a cornerstone for the preservation of civil liberties, not only in the province of Quebec but across this country. When he gives his ipse dixit it is final and absolute. Even so, I like to think there are members of the government who are prepared to think for themselves about a matter that deserves their thought and consideration rather than following the course of the right hon. leader who, when criticized, invariably finds it necessary to leave the chamber. That is the reason Parliament has become a shadow and a caricature.

• (3:20 p.m.)

When the Prime Minister says, "This is what we are going to do", the Minister of Justice says, "Me too". All the government members with one accord applaud the decision, regardless of whether it is in keeping with their own views on civil liberties or on other matters. There is no use making an appeal any more because we face a solid membership in the government.

Mr. Gibson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I knew that the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth, for whom I have always held a tremendous respect, would immediately applaud. I wonder how far the government will have to go in carrying out those things that are unacceptable to civilized people before the hon. member finds it necessary to even utter a qualified doubt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the purpose of this great week end Liberal meeting? They met, they talked, they recommended, they went home and what they recommended has already been forgotten. These recommendations have been put into a position from which they will never be rescued. The Prime Minister has said, "Thumbs down. They had their right to speak. I permitted Liberals from across Canada participatory democracy." Incidentally, that is an expression that was invented by Mao. He said, "I have given them their opportunity to speak. They spoke, I spoke and the matter is closed."

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Chairman, we have never witnessed so much mental confusion as since Bill C-181 has been before the House.

We seldom see a party so determined to fight against an act such as the War Measures Act, so systematically, irresponsibly, day after day.

How strange that the very parties which asked the government to act with greater moderation, with regard to the events in the province of Quebec, should be so opposed to this bill which meets almost completely the suggestions made during the debate on the War Measures Act. Indeed, they apply themselves irresponsibly, chaotically, to rejecting, day after day, every clause of the bill.

It is a rare thing for the leader of an opposition party to say in advance that his party will vote for the proposed legislation and say today: Let us be careful; the legislation is getting so important—although it is good and the party has decided to support it—that its administration should not be left to the provinces. In other words, a provincial government should not be trusted or the administration of the measure left to a provincial Minister of Justice. In my opinion, this attitude towards the provinces is irresponsible and fails to respect the various jurisdictions recognized in the constitution.

There have been unfounded charges, even some odious assumptions. I have in mind what the leader of the opposition said on the last day we discussed the amendment now before us: Has the Quebec government anything to hide? If the leader of the opposition is aware of details hidden by the provincial administration, let him stand courageously and tell the House. The people shall then judge the government. But to voice insinuations and slanders against the people and the government of Quebec is acting in a totally disrespectful manner. It is neither in Toronto nor out West that the leader of the opposition should state charges; let him come to Montreal and say the same things in front of Quebeckers.

The New Democratic Party is behaving scarcely more responsibly. In fact, during the last few days, the members of that party have spoken as if they were shocked and constantly pitied the separatists whose liberties were being restricted. The legislation is not aimed against separatists, but strictly against terrorists—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair wishes to remind the hon. member that the debate deals with a motion to amend clause 15 of the bill now under consideration and that it must not extend to the entire matter of urgency measures which has been discussed on second reading and when clause 2 was under consideration.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Chairman, when it is suggested that an administrator be appointed in order to supervise the administration of justice in the province of Quebec and to report to Parliament, this means acting as arbitrator of conditions beyond our jurisdiction.

When it is said that the Quebec Minister of Justice must fulfill the prerogatives conferred upon him by the Constitution and by the population under the supervision of an administrator, then the Canadian Parliament states bluntly and before the fact that the Minister of Justice is not to be trusted.

If this principle has any legal basis, we must be consistent and admit that it also applies to ourselves and in future every time we are in a difficult political situation our ministers will have to be kept under supervision.

Is the population willing to trust its leaders and to allow those it has entrusted with power to take a stand on the way they are carrying out their duties?

Now, the New Democratic Party states: We respect Quebecers and we believe that, today, they are being discriminated against by the law, as are the separatists. But, what solution does that party offer? It is satisfied to say: Let us exercise greater control over the government that Quebecers have elected, over the powers that the Constitution gives that province.

Is that showing respect either for the Constitution or for Quebecers? I suggest that by acting in this way one implies that Quebecers are irresponsible and unable to govern themselves, and that is deplorable.

This wish to appoint a federal administrator who would check the way Quebec administers the law reminds me somewhat of the people in charge of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association of Toronto. A few days after the emergency legislation was passed, they went to Montreal and said to the leaders of the Civil Liberties Union: We are coming to your rescue, gentlemen. We will show you how to defend civil liberties. Quite happily, English and French Quebecers alike replied: Gentlemen, we can solve our own problems and please go back home to defend your own civil liberties.

I think it is outrageous to accept such an amendment. Only those who are unaware of the situation in the province of Quebec—because, precisely, they have had practically no representatives elected in that province to the House of Commons—and who act in an entirely irresponsible manner, will be punished and severely criticized by the Quebec people because of their attitude. They should realize right now that they are working against Canadian unity since they do not respect the constitution.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, I seize the opportunity to state my views on this very important bill. I want to say once more that I unhesitatingly voted for the War Measures Act when it was put before the House, as we did not have much choice and it was absolutely necessary. I have, I repeat, no regret that I gave it my full support.

Of course, we had been assured that within the next few days, special legislation would be submitted, with the participation of Parliament. We were told that after taking into consideration suggestions emanating from all political parties, a special legislation, adapted to today's needs, albeit of a temporary nature, would be brought forward.

It seems to me that the participation of Parliament was not very significant. The bill was introduced and, if I am not mistaken, not a single amendment has been accepted by the government.

Of course, this bill affects Quebec in a particular way, since the problem under discussion exists in the province of Quebec.

I did not want to miss the opportunity to discuss the proposed amendment. It has been said earlier that the opposition has been trying for several days to demolish the bill clause by clause. On the contrary, the proposed amendment does not change anything at all in the wording of the clause put forward by the government. Why do they refuse to establish a commission or a supervisory committee, or to appoint an administrator—which would amount to the same thing and change nothing at all in the bill—in order to give the innocent people who have been annoyed without reason by the War Measures Act the assurance that the special measure now before the House will not have the same effect for them?

As a Quebec member who has studied seriously the wording of the act, I wonder if the federal government can intrude in the affairs of the provinces. At any rate, it seems that the general wording of the act which will be applied everywhere in Canada does not include any distinction on this matter. The act must be enforced everywhere in Canada. It is not even wondered if Quebec will accept it or not. The duty of the administrator would be to prevent abuses. I have the clear impression that this is only an assurance.

In my opinion, this is not a lack of confidence in the Quebec Minister of Justice or in the persons responsible for the administration of justice, because of the temporary nature of the act. The application of the War Measures Act has nevertheless permitted the arrest of many persons, in Quebec, for serious reasons and, sometimes, for not so serious reasons. I wonder, as a Quebec member, if it is not incumbent on me to ask the government to devote all its attention to this amendment that I consider valid.

Should the federal government appoint such an administrator, this would be contrary to provincial competence; maybe the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) could, prior to moving third reading of this legislation, provide for a provision enabling each province to appoint such an administrator if found advisable.

But, I precisely wonder if this would not be interfering with provincial jurisdiction.

At least, it should be made clear in the legislation that each province may appoint an administrator to prevent abuses.

I fully agree with the principle of the measure and, in that respect, I took position right from the beginning. Since the introduction of this legislation was considerably delayed, I feel that despite fierce resistance by opposition members, some understanding could have been shown.

Mr. Chairman, I feel it is also important not to leave the impression that we want to muzzle not only the people but also the press and the information media, for if there has been respect recently for the opinions of certain Quebec personalities having some sense of responsibility, I think that it is also important to respect certain opinions and to acknowledge that the measure before us is in principle very valid, even if it contains some alarming weaknesses. But these concerns could be dissipated if an administrator were given the responsibility to supervise the administration of the law.

The amendment before us is necessary and I believe that this is an excellent opportunity for hon. members to demonstrate their goodwill, even if I feel that it would not be desirable for every province to appoint such an administrator, in view of doubts concerning the division of jurisdictions, which I continue to have myself. But the provinces would all be responsible to that administrator as long as the legislation under consideration would remain in effect.

I take this opportunity to tell the House that I voted with great pleasure for the War Measures Act which I believe was necessary since we had no choice.

I recognize that after a number of days, we could have considered making this amendment I would not say more flexible but at least susceptible of reassuring those who could be embarrassed, especially the innoncents because, whether we like it or not, there is always the possibility that, although they have proven their innoncence, some defendants might feel embarrassed to have been arrested under this legislation.

I recognize the merits of this legislation but before I support it I would require at least one proof of the government's goodwill.

I would not want to be blamed for having supported a piece of legislation which could make it possible for Parliament to abuse the powers given to it and, under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I believe the minister responsible for the administration of this act as well as the hon. members from Quebec who have a tremendous responsibility in respect of this act which affects Quebeckers in a very particular way should seriously think about the opportunity of letting this province appoint an administrator. This, in my view, is essential.

Any abuse attributable to this act would be condemnable as would be any other abuse of power. For the last couple of days, the government has been accused of wanting to break down a certain political party in Quebec by adopting this measure. The statement made last night by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has demonstrated how false that is.

I should believe that in the mind of all hon. members, this bill is not aimed at destroying a third party which nonetheless has succeeded in obtaining considerable number of votes through democratic processes, and if this legislation were to tend in that direction I would clearly vote against it.

Honestly, I think this bill should provide for a means of exercising some sort of supervision and I have already pointed this out several times. In fact, rejecting the amendment which will be proposed to that effect would be like saying: "We intend to stick to the letter of the bill and we consider that the participation of the opposition amounts to absolutely nothing".

As a member of this House, as a citizen of Québec, I certainly cannot vote freely for this bill as it stands, when the government has refused to study any amendment proposed by members of the opposition. This bill will be passed but not thanks to the participation of Parliament, solely because of the government participation. In view of that attitude, I am sorry but I cannot vote in favour of this bill. In fact, unless I am assured that the federal government will accept the appointment of an administrator authorized to exercice some control, or if at least the provinces are allowed to exercice it—unless a province were to refuse to do so—neither the federal government nor myself, as a member of a federal political party, can be blamed for having refused that assurance. On the contrary, the province will be blamed for not providing itself the right of revision if it has the opportunity to do so under the legislation.

Therefore, I hope government members will reconsider their reasons for their stand and allow all those who are in favour of the revision, that I find necessary, to get the amendment approved, considering the temporary nature of the legislation. I repeat that revision provisions would in no way interfere with the essence of the act. Their application may not be necessary but should cases of abuse occur, I would be very proud to have fought for their inclusion. To refuse this is to refuse to give us evidence of the goodwill of members and risk at the same that authorities exceed their powers.

As far as I am concerned, I am against abuse of authority, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Dollard made the kind of speech that one expects from an ex-parliamentary secretary who would like to be a cabinet minister in the near future. He suggested that only those people from parties that had no representatives in Parliament from Quebec could be so irresponsible as to propose the kind of amendment we are now discussing.

Over the weekend the Liberal party held a convention here in Ottawa. I do not know whether the hon. member was there, but if he was, then certainly he could not have listened to what the delegates had to say about precisely what we are discussing at this moment. The national party conference of the Liberal party endorsed by a substantial majority a resolution calling for the creation of an independent review board to serve as a check against the abuse of powers under the bill as long as it is in effect. Was that convention irresponsible, as the hon. member for Dollard claimed those members of this Parliament are who suggest the creation of an independent review board under this bill?

The resolution approved by the Liberal party conference yesterday called for the creation of a review board under the legislation to help ensure that democratic principles are preserved and abuse is minimized. It added that establishment of the board would not necessarily be an expression of lack of confidence in the Attorney General of Quebec. Is the hon. member for Dollard suggesting that the delegates to the Liberal conference were irresponsible in voting precisely along the lines of an amendment proposed to the government by members of the opposition but rejected every day by the Minister of Justice?

I suggest that the hon. member for Dollard is the kind of lap dog that the Prime Minister wants; that he will do anything the Prime Minister wants as long as it gets the hon. member for Dollard ahead. The members of this Parliament and the people of this country cannot expect any defence of civil liberties from the hon. member for Dollard, who is only interested in his own civil liberties.

The hon. member for Dollard suggests that the bill is aimed at terrorists and not at separatists.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Everyday, until this weekend when the Prime Minister went on television to make a distinction between terrorists, of whom there are a few, and separatists, of whom there are many more, members on that side including the hon. member for Dollard were trying to create exactly the opposite impression. They have been trying to create the impression that separatists are terrorists, and if the hon. member for Dollard questions that then—

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Dollard on a question of privilege.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Chairman, I never in any way suggested in the House or outside that a terrorist was a separatist, or that a separatist was necessarily a terrorist. I always made the necessary distinctions, and if the hon. member can prove that his statement is accurate, I shall readily comment on the evidence that he will submit. Otherwise, I ask him to withdraw his remarks.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I should advise the hon. member for Dollard that his question of privilege is unfounded, and it is simply a correction. I do not believe that assertions made by an hon. member in the House can become the subject of a question of privilege, unless they involve the member's integrity. However, the hon. member for Dollard will have the privilege to rise again later to put the facts straight or to explain them further.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I cannot say I heard every word the hon. member for Dollard has uttered during this debate, but I have read every word the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has said in this House as well as outside this House. I remember, and hon. members can go back to the speech made on the first or second day of the debate on the War Measures Act, when the Minister for Regional Economic Expansion intimated that there were between 1,000 and 3,000 members of the FLQ, that the FLQ had infiltrated all the important positions in the province and had been able to get people into positions in radio so they could broadcast their instructions in code. We have never had from the minister the slightest evidence that the charges he made in that speech, or in subsequent speeches, were true. Not only have we not had this evidence, but obviously he has not given the evidence, if he has any, to the Solicitor General or to the Secretary of State who is in charge of the CBC because there have been no dismissals, no arrests and no charges to substantiate that kind of irresponsible charge which was made both inside and outside the House.

We were told by the hon. member for Dollard that these amendments challenge the constitutional rights of the Province of Quebec. I am not going into detail on the constitutional questions, since I think they have been dealt with in detail by a number of members who are much more competent than I am. All I say to the hon. member for Dollard, as I have said on another occasion, if the Attorney General of Quebec wants to bring legislation before the National Assembly of Quebec which is within their jurisdiction he has every right to do so. If the National Assembly of that province passes the legislation, and it is not challenged in the courts, it will become the law of that province.

What we are being asked to do here today, and what the hon. member for Dollard does not seem to understand or if he does is not concerned about it, is pass legislation which will be implemented and administered by the Attorney General of Quebec. I have no intention of voting for the kind of legislation which would restrict the rights of the people in any province of Canada along the lines the Attorney General of Quebec has indicated he would like.

We are being told that it is showing a lack of confidence in the government of Quebec to ask for this kind of an amendment. Let me say I have no confidence in the Attorney General of Quebec. I remind the hon. member for Dollard that the Attorney General of Quebec has called for a system of identity cards, with which the Prime Minister does not agree. I remind the hon. member for Dollard that the Attorney General of Quebec, and I think the Prime Minister of that province, have intimated that they look with favour on some form of press censorship. The hon. member for Dollard may not mind press censorship but I, for one, have no intention of voting for anything which would lead to press censorship today or any other time.

I remind the hon. member for Dollard that a member of the Liberal caucus of the Province of Quebec, Mr. Bienvenue, made the kind of attack on press and radio representatives in Quebec City which, in all probability, has never been made before in any province or city in this country. The hon. member for Dollard may not be interested in civil liberties but some of us are. The hon. member may not realize that the kind of legislation we are passing today, and the kind of legislation which Mr. Choquette would like to see in the Province of Quebec, would have been greeted with hosannas by Premier Duplessis. He would have loved to have had the kind of power which this legislation would give to him. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion had some experience in fighting Mr. Duplessis but they seem to have forgotten a great deal about it.

I can only conclude from the remarks of the hon. member for Dollard that he not only does not know about Mr. Duplessis, but he would not have minded the kind of legislation Mr. Duplessis would have liked to have used or the kind of action Mr. Duplessis took. I say to him that what he is supporting now goes much further than the kind of power Mr. Duplessis ever had or used. If he wants to vote for it that is his responsibility, but I have no intention of supporting that kind of ridiculous and nonsensical legislation.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I can certainly be brief as I only wish to make three or four points which I feel should be made at a time when we are coming very close to a vote on the amendment.

The amendment before the House is a very simple and clear one. It would provide for the appointment of an administrator, to be a member of the judiciary, with the power to appoint other people to be administrators in order to investigate and remedy abuses which may arise as a result of the implementation of this measure. The amendment also gives the administrators the power to review and confirm, vary or revoke a certificate filed by an attorney general where someone may be put in jail for 90 days. If the attorney general files a certificate that the man is there for just cause or reason, then that is it. Of course, it is very easy to do this because it just involves a matter of bureaucracy.

What we are asking is very simple. We are asking for review machinery very similar to that suggested in the amendment moved by the NDP, except we may have gone a little further by suggesting that the administrators would be members of the judiciary. I agree with what has been said in this regard. We do not care about the makeup of this review board. All we want to have is a review board to be used against abuse.

The question to ask today is what evidence is there of abuse. Just before answering that question, let me say that I cannot believe we can have this kind of legislation administered by any human being in office anywhere in Canada, whether it be within provincial or federal jurisdiction, without there being some abuse. We must come back to the premise that the only protection the individual has is that given under the rule of law. Without that protection, we have no protection.

Has there been abuse to date? We know there have been abuses. We know this by the number of arrests and the number of people who have been detained without charge under the War Measures Act or under the Criminal Code. We know that Gerard Lortie, a student in Hull, was picked up, even though he had voluntarily given his name to the police. He told them he was not the man they were looking for but thought he better tell them he had the same name. We know from reading the newspapers he was held in custody, and that is the only way we can get facts from this government. We know he was held incommunicado for a period of time without the right to retain counsel or see his parents, even though they went to Montreal. We know the door of the house occupied by the Secretary of State was kicked in. If he had not been the Secretary of State he might have been thrown in jail.

I believe that right now, and I make no apology for this statement, there are men who are being detained in custody in the province of Quebec who were friends of the Prime Minister when he was a young man. These men are being held in solitary confinement. The Prime Minister, with his background and with the knowledge that people are involved with whom he was associated, apart from anything else, should review the situation to find out why these people are being held in solitary confinement. This is the type of difficulty that now exists. Today the Prime Minister said, when we questioned him, that he does not care if 492 delegates to a Liberal Convention ask for similar review machinery. He said, in effect, that he is the dictator of his party; that so long as he is Prime Minister he will make the decisions and that the convention will not tell him what he is to do. So, he turned down the suggestion and he turned it down in this House.

The next question is, how long should we continue to debate this bill when this government has an overwhelming majority? The government intends to ram it through. I am too logical a person to waste my time in this House of Commons arguing something when I know that, with one or two exceptions, the Liberal government intends to ram this bill through. Let us review what the Minister of Justice said. He came up with some rather novel arguments the other day when answering me. Let us see what he did have to say in this regard. He gave basically the same answer the Prime Minister gave, so we know that his instructions have come from the Prime Minister. He said:

> The Attorney General of any province, accountable as he is to the legislature, accountable as he is through the legislature to the people, must be more sensitive to the administration or to the possibility of the maladministration of justice than any commission responsible to no one. I do not think that any paraphernalia or any superstructure of review can in any way derogate from the fundamental responsibility of an Attorney General under the British parliamentary system. There is no way in which that can be done.

It is this House that is passing this legislation. We are the ones who are thrusting it on the province. The premier of Quebec may have asked for this type of legislation, but possibly the Prime Minister has had two or three conversations with him and he has said that he does not want this review machinery because there is a committee in existence. Let me make one fundamental point now. This committee is composed of a voluntary group of good living citizens in Canada who are trying to operate under very difficult circumstances. However, this committee has no authority in law to go into the jails, to examine the situation or hold any hearings. It may be a desirable thing and so on, but really it has no power. The committee is composed of people who are good citizens and good people. They would not have volunteered to act in this capacity if they were not. But there is no power in law that gives them the right to go into the prisons where these people are detained any more than there is in respect of members of the John Howard Society, the Red Cross or anybody else.

Surely, when we have legislation such as that put forward by this government there should be certain safeguards. We are giving the power to the police to detain people without charge, without the right of appeal and without the right of communication with their families. So, surely when we are setting up that power structure in a province, a review committee should be established by law. As we have said before, we do not mind if the government does not like the kind of review committee suggested by the Conservatives. We say to the government, suggest your own committee. Perhaps it should be established by this bill or, as one member said, perhaps the province should set up the committee and appoint members from among the judiciary. The constitution is quite clear and it is hogwash for the Prime Minister to hide under the constitution as he has on many occasions.

We have set out our amendments and our views. We have laid these before Parliament and yet this government says it will not listen to anything but will ram this bill through. What is so sad is that the Prime Minister appeared on the TV network last evening and left the impression that Parliament had already vetoed any review machinery because it had not chosen to hang its hat on the NDP amendment or on our amendment. The Prime Minister left the impression that Parliament had already voted on the total review machinery. He left the impression that Parliament had spoken and there was nothing more to do. That, to me, was a falsehood. Whether it was intentional or otherwise I leave to him, because he is the only one who knows what motivated him. But the suggestion is there. I want to remind the minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, that we ask men like yourself to stand now and be counted because we have a Prime Minister who will not listen to the convention, to the cabinet or to the backbenchers of his own party who have set him up like a dictator. This legislation makes him appear to be a dictator.

Some good French Canadian citizens of the province of Quebec believe the whole deal is a hoax and that the Prime Minister manufactured this crisis. Only history will show whether or not there was a real crisis. However, the kind of psychology this gentleman used is the kind which creates a crisis which would split this country apart rather than unite it as has been suggested. What has this government told us? They have turned us down flatly. There is nothing more we can do. I want to emphasize that I, and Members of Parliament over there, know that the Minister of Justice is unhappy. I know that lawyers over there are also unhappy about this legislation. The reports in the press would indicate that the only ones who defended this legislation at the Liberal convention were a few Members of Parliament who were put there almost as hired counsel on behalf of the Prime Minister's position.

There is only one other thing I should like to say—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: All right; so long as it is not your civil liberties that are involved you do not mind. People even write to me to that effect. As I pointed out last time I spoke when I referred to Lord Byron, it is only when a person has lost his civil liberties that he becomes concerned. I ask the Minister of Justice to stand up against his own Prime Minister. Maybe it is time for one or two ministers to show what kind of calibre and integrity exists in the executive. It would be far better to resign today with your principles than continue in office without them. Once this Prime Minister gets you under his thumb you will gradually lose your principles. The Prime Minister is endeavouring to use you as a means of implementing what he knows is wrong.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, I am not going to emphasize the obvious failure of the government to be responsive and responsible, even in the face of the expressed wishes of its own party supporters. That fact has been well documented. The amount of obstinacy that can be seen in a government is really incredible, when it will not even listen to the group of people one would most expect to support the position it had taken. The fact that the rank and file of the government party's supporters at a national meeting could indicate, by majority vote, that the government had failed in a very grave way to respond to the request for a review clause in this bill is nothing short of shocking.

What is just as shocking is the misleading impression created by the government, both in this House and throughout the country, that it was prepared to deal with this issue on the broadest possible front in the belief that a united stand in this House, or as close to it as could be approximated, would be important in resolving the question. Therefore, in dealing with the regulations under the War Measures Act, both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice made it very clear there would be a process of consultation with regard to the drafting of legislation to be submitted as a temporary public order bill. As is well known, some consultation did occur. However, I believe even the Minister of Justice will confirm the fact that during the periods of consultation prior to the introduction of this bill he was not able to provide a detailed summation of what the bill would contain.

Now that the bill has been introduced, we have seen a complete unwillingness on the part of the government to continue what was supposed to have been a policy of constructive consultation. There has been an unwillingness on the part of the government to accept the amendments presented by the NDP and by my party at their face value, as being important and reasonable contributions to the bill. Not only has there been an unwillingness to do so, but there has been a stubbornness that has been nothing short of unbelievable with respect to this important piece of legislation. Surely the process of consultation which took place before the introduction of the bill must now be considered a farce by most people because the government has proven itself unwilling to consult on the most important details of the bill. To say the least, it has shown a willingness to hide behind arguments that are unsound, arguments that do not in any way face the facts.

As recently as this afternoon, the Prime Minister has argued that to place a review clause in the legislation would call the competency of the provincial government into question. I would think that is a total misreading of the responsibilities of this House and of the joint jurisdiction that exists with regard to the courts and the processes of justice. As has been emphasized by the hon. member for Calgary North, through this amendment we are not asking for a review body that could only be viewed as some kind of federal intervention. What we are seeking is an assurance, under law, that there will be a review board which will ensure that justice is not only being done but will be seen to be done. The fact that the government refuses to respond in any reasonable fashion to that request must make this legislation not only dubious but in direct opposition to the best interests of the people of the country.

Time and time again within the past few days the Minister of Justice has argued that we must be prepared to allow particular anomalies in this legislation such as retroactivity, the provision that might allow a husband or wife to give evidence against a spouse, and the provision with respect to the period of time that a person may be kept in jail before he is brought before a court. Time and time again he has said that because of the nature of the situation, because of the grave difficulties in Quebec, because of the crisis, these are temporary and special powers that the government would not normally seek, but which it must ask for in this instance.

I am not saying that I have accepted that argument, but at least it is the one that the Minister of Justice has put forward. It is one with which he feels comfortable. If that is an argument on behalf of special powers which, to use the words of the right hon. member for Prince Albert, place the rights of many Canadians in cold storage for a period of time, why is the minister not willing to ask for special assurances, for a special review board, and for a special protection under the law so that the abuses to which reference has been made could not in fact take place? It seems unreasonable to me that on the one hand the minister would ask for these special and extraordinary powers, and on the other hand not be willing to examine with his cabinet colleagues, and with the authorities in Quebec, special and extraordinary powers to protect abuses under this legislation. In short, he is asking for a very special and extraordinary privilege without introducing the kind of guarantees and protection which we in this House have a right to expect.

Our debate on this bill, even that part of it dealing with the question of a review board, may seem somewhat remote to people generally throughout the country. However, I think it is important to let them know that we are acting in their best interests, that we are in fact ensuring that justice will be done. Editorial after editorial has supported our position. The party which supports the government, the people who have given overwhelming support to the government for introducing the War Measures Act regulations and this temporary public order bill, have said that at the very least there must be some kind of review commission to ensure that not only will justice be done but that it will be seen to be done.

In arguing this afternoon along the kind of arid, and in this instance somewhat theoretic line about constitutional interference, the Prime Minister has avoided facing the basic questions involved in this issue. He has misled the House and misled the people into believing that the matter of constitutional haggling is more important than justice being done for millions and millions of people in this country.

Anyone who has examined what has happened under the administration of the War Measures Act regulations, anyone who is aware that more than 80 per cent of the people arrested were subsequently released without being charged, must realize that more people are going to be arrested, detained and searched who really in no way, shape or form are related to the acts of terrorism involved. I think that the people of this country who may have been quite willing to place their good faith in the government will now have to think very seriously about withdrawing that good faith, because it is quite apparent that the government is not prepared to act in good faith on this bill. In the face of a request by its own party it has committed itself to a course which is both obstinate, unwise and unjust.

• (4:20 p.m.)

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Woolliams) negatived: yeas, 33; nays, 63.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

On clause 15—Expiry.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, as I rise to introduce the final amendment that our party has to offer in order to make Bill C-181 at least somewhat less repressive, I should like to assure the Minister of Justice that my words will not include another musical criticism of his previous performance.

Given our experience earlier in this debate, Mr. Chairman, when the minister has been impervious to all reasonable attempts by opposition parties to "liberalize" this present bill, and given the sweet glow of euphoria that undoubtedly envelops the government following the great Liberal potlach here this past weekend, I am not particularly optimistic that my words will go very far in moving the minister.

Many more persuasive speakers than I have taken part in this debate. Sound and reasonable arguments have been presented in order to make less objectionable some of the features of Bill C-181, popularly known as the "Son of War Measures" in our caucus. All of these arguments have been to no avail and most were rejected out of hand by the minister. I think all of us who listened to the debate last week and again this afternoon feel that legitimate concern for the erosion of civil liberty was expressed by all parties, both inside and outside the House, except perhaps by some of my friends in the Créditiste party. I do not think they are particularly concerned about it.

One of our main concerns is the concept of retroactive guilt. I do not want to repeat all the arguments, but I do know that many people are concerned that membership in an organization that was not illegal before the War Measures Act was proclaimed could be considered retroactively as an offence, meaning that a person could be guilty of doing something that was within the law before the proclamation. Another worry which we have heard expressed this afternoon by some of the opposition parties and also by the Liberal policy convention, relates to the institution of a review board or commission to take care of possible excesses that may occur under this bill. The motivation prompting these suggestions is that, while Parliament is responsible for passage of this legislation, it has little or no authority in its administration. We heard the minister, in response to questions in the House, say, "Yes, we passed the War Measures Act but the administrative responsibilities are under the attorneys general of the various provinces and therefore, if there are excesses there is very little parliament can do about them at this time."

This fear has been expressed by many members and the government rebuttal to the concept of a review commission or tribunal can be summed up something like this: "If you are making this kind of suggestion about a review tribunal, then you don't trust the provincial attorneys general and in a federal state you must be prepared to do this."

I should like to say to the minister now that I do not share the same confidence in the attorney general of Quebec that he seems to possess. I hasten to say that I see my job here as an opposition member as one of trusting no one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Rose: Perhaps I will make an exception of the former parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. I think our professional opposition responsibility is to look with a cynical eye and lack of trust at all kinds of legislation because that is what we are paid to do in this Parliament. I wonder what the government's posture would be if the reigning government of the province of Quebec had been other than Liberal? I wonder if the same arguments would prevail? Mr. Chairman, the minister's response to the reasonable amendments, and there have been many, to Bill C-181 convinces me that he is being backed by popular opinion and reinforced by a substantial majority. This public opinion, coupled with the majority, automatically makes his decisions right, or so he feels. I think this posture is somewhat equivalent to that of an army private who, when questioning a decision of his sergeant is told, "Sure, I am right; if you don't believe me, count the hooks." But there is no democracy in truth, Mr. Chairman, and I know that saying itself is a truism. The truth is the truth regardless of how many people or how few people believe it at any one time.

I should like to believe that Canadians are very concerned about what we do here with regard to their civil rights, but I am not convinced that great numbers of them care about it one way or the other since it does not strike them personally. We have all spoken a great deal on this subject but I wonder seriously how many Canadians are really listening. Indeed, when I speak in this House I wonder how many parliamentarians are listening. Judging from the catcalls opposite, I realize I have gained a few listeners; some at least have remained awake.

I should like to read to the House, Mr. Chairman, the opinion of one journalist who has something to say on the topic of people caring. J. R. Dahling writing in the Columbian, the newspaper of that great city of New Westminster, of November 12, 1970, has this to say:

> It seems as if "Johnny Canuck" has an aversion to the examination of problems in their early stages. Perhaps because it must capture his interest, and more important, his time. Much rather he prefers to have many of the social problems of his country (province or city) swept under the rug.
> Unfortunately for the whole nation, these problems do not lie quietly under the rug but multiply and fester until they erupt violently. And then the glib and heavy-handed pseudo-messiahs uttering glib and heavy-handed pseudo-solutions arrive with bugles blowing and flags flying like a Hollywood version of the U.S. cavalry.
> It is only too true that very drastic measures are necessary, not because drastic measures were always necessary, but because we "Johnny Canucks" did not want to believe there was a problem—we did not believe our "honest" politicians when they tried to tell us before it got out of hand.

This correspondent certainly expresses a view considerably more pessimistic than the one I hold. But I should like to emphasize that my disagreement with this correspondent is more a matter of degree than of kind. For those who prefer the words of a more learned and highly placed official of the Crown, may I quote a statement made by Mr. Justice O'Halloran in 1953. Admittedly, His Lordship was speaking with regard to a matter different from the one we are discussing. The circumstances involved a different context. On that occasion he said:

> . . . it is rather remarkable to suggest that the judgment of a political head of a department shall be substituted for that of a court. The Minister at best is a transient holder of office, subject to all the vicissitudes of political climate and a party policy that completely envelop a man who is responsible to the political expediency of parliament and who belongs to the party in office which humanly seeks to remain in office.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Justice O'Halloran's words, though they apply to another context, might well apply to the matter we are considering. The minister has repudiated our attempts to establish, under this bill, a review commission. I have searched my mind—

An hon. Member: That didn't take long.

Mr. Rose: —to discover the reason behind the minister's repudiation of that reasonable amendment suggested by the opposition. We were trying, I think, to make Bill C-181 a little more humane. The opposition was well intentioned. I think any action designed to make government bills more humane ought to be encouraged. There are some people who are very concerned about civil liberties but there are many others who are not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rose: In searching my mind, and this took a little time—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rose: —to learn why the minister was so obstinate, I concluded that I could do no better than ask orally and aloud those questions I have been asking myself privately. They are as follows:

Will the softening of this public order bill, Bill C-181, weaken in the eyes of the minister the validity of invoking the War Measures Act in the first place? If, as described by the government, the War Measures Act is a blunt instrument, does not this bill risk being tagged with the same description? Another question I have asked myself is this: Has the Attorney General of Quebec informed the government that unless he receives these extraordinary powers in full measure—I am referring to the powers contained in Bill C-181—he will resign, thus throwing the Bourassa government once more into a renewed state of shock. My third question is this: Is this really a right wing law and order bill designed to appease the sabre rattlers throughout Canada, the ones who see in all change a symbol of creeping permissiveness to be stamped out forthwith. Also, does Bill C-181 somehow affect the minister's future political goals?

I think these are valid questions. I do not know the answers; I can only pose the questions.

I wish to propose an amendment to clause 15 of the bill. I propose to extend to Parliament the right that the government now holds of limiting the period of the enforcement of the bill to April 30, 1971. At present clause 15 reads:

> This Act expires on the 30th day of April, 1971 or on such earlier day as may be fixed by proclamation, unless before the 30th day of April, 1971 or before any earlier day fixed by proclamation, both Houses of Parliament, by joint resolution, direct that this Act shall continue in force until a day specified in the resolution, in which case this Act expires on that specified day.

My amendment is as follows. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North:

> That section 15 be amended by adding the following words as subjection (2),
> (2) a Notice of Motion in either house signed by ten members thereof and made in accordance with the rules of that house, praying that an earlier day for the expiry of this Act shall be fixed by proclamation, shall be debated in that house at the first convenient opportunity within four sitting days after notice thereof is given,
> and renumbering the first paragraph of Section 15"(1)".

I have two copies of this particular amendment for distribution. In 1969, Mr. Chairman, the Bill of Rights contained an amendment affecting the War Measures Act and asserted the right of Parliament, for the first time, to fix an earlier date for the suspension of that act if any ten members should signify their intention in writing to hold a debate. We know that clause 15 contains a paradox, in that Parliament has the right to extend the special powers beyond April 30, but only the government can shorten the period. This, as I have said, is wrong, because Parliament ought not to be placed in a position that is subordinate to the duly elected autocracy.

There are two conditions under which I think Parliament can invoke the right to "pray for an earlier expiry". I think I have used the correct words. One of those conditions involves police excesses and injustices, of which we have heard a great deal this afternoon and on previous days. There must be, as I said, police excesses and injustices causing mental and physical anguish to those arrested on suspicion only. When those conditions exist, Parliament ought to invoke the right requested. The second condition involves the lack of demonstrable need, because of a return to normalcy in Quebec, that the civil rights of all Canadians which are unnecessarily being restricted should be withheld no longer. Under those conditions Parliament ought to avail itself of this right to end the special powers as unnecessary.

I hope that the minister and his colleagues will consider this amendment. Last week the minister said that the invocation of the special powers and the consequent loss of personal freedom was based on a value judgment. He indicated that the government was prepared to take the risk consequent upon this value judgment. That is all very well. I do not think the minister ought to be congratulated for pontificating on what is obvious. Everybody knows that with special powers comes a corresponding loss of freedom. We know this. I know this, and every Canadian knows and is prepared to accept this. There is to be some loss of freedom. The value judgment tells us that much. It is not the loss of freedom we object to; we want to know how great will be the loss of freedom, and for how long a time. In order to meet the need, and in order to meet this real or imaginary challenge to the state, we must be prepared, as we have said we are, to lose some freedom. The question is, how much freedom will we lose? That is what separates our position from that of the government. This is where we disagree and where we part company with the government.

I hope that this reasonable amendment to give to Parliament the right to shorten the life of the bill will be accepted. It ought to have the right so to alter the expiry date. That right ought to be shared with Parliament which, as we are all told, is the highest court in the land.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is to alter the termination clause to provide that ten members, by signing a resolution, can have a debate commenced in this House calling for a termination of the law prior to April 30, 1971, the date when the bill, or at that time the law, will terminate. We deliberately made this a short term, terminating April 30, 1971. It has been made quite clear that if we feel the responsibility given to the government can be terminated earlier, we will do so.

We also made it quite clear that the bill cannot be extended beyond April 30 without approval by a joint resolution of both Houses of Parliament. In other words, we are in the hands of Parliament if it is necessary to extend the bill beyond April 30, 1971. We believe that is the proper position to take. Parliament will be consulted before April 30, 1971 if we intend to extend the operation of the bill. We only ask for authorization of Parliament, if the situation warrants it, with regard to the exercise of initiating termination of the bill prior to April 30, 1971.

Parliament is setting a maximum date. The maximum date we have asked for is April 30, 1971. Having accorded us the maximum date, we hope that Parliament will accord the government the discretion of withdrawing the bill prior to that date. There is no infringment of Parliament. The date is clearly stated in the bill. In order to extend it beyond the maximum date, we will require the approval of Parliament. Surely, the government should have the discretion of analysing the situation in order to determine whether the bill should expire prior to that date.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I suggest the minister was not very logical in his explanation. It is consistent with the adamant position the minister and the government have taken on every suggestion that has been made, but it is not logical. This amendment does not suggest removing the discretion of the government. This amendment does not remove from the clause the discretion in the government to terminate the bill prior to April 30, 1971. This amendment merely asks that Parliament continue to have the right to review the operations of this exercise and to be able to say whether the judgment of the government that it should not be terminated on a certain date is right.

The suggestion is made for two very good reasons. One is simply that it plagiarizes the amendment to the War Measures Act contained in the Bill of Rights which has precisely the same kind of provision. I am aware that invoking the War Measures Act was not for a definite date. Therefore, the minister will argue that is the reason for having the provision. He need not say that because I understand it. None the less the principle involved is that when extraordinary powers are invoked and exercised by a government, Parliament should have the right to say how long the government will exercise those extraordinary powers.

The fact that Parliament has set a termination date of April 30 and, as the bill suggests, the government will be given the right to terminate it earlier if it sees fit, does not remove the duty of members of this House of Commons to be able to debate the issue. That is the meaning of my hon. friend's amendment. On a motion signed by ten members, Parliament will debate whether the bill should continue until April 30, 1971, or, to pick a date out of the air, terminate on February 28, 1971. What the minister is refusing is not quite as nice as he put it. The minister said, please leave us with a discretion.

The minister is, in effect, saying that unless we use an opposition allotted day, introduce something under Standing Order 26 or some other gimmick like that, Parliament shall not have the opportunity to debate whether this bill ought to remain in force until April 30, 1971. The minister insists on having an act which muzzles this Parliament until he is ready to let Parliament do something about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: If the minister is not insisting on that, I ask him what harm there is in the amendment. What possible harm is there in accepting the proposition of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West? In what way does it interfere with the powers of the bill? Members opposite keep on cackling in support of the minister. I challenge any one of them to tell this committee in what way this amendment would interfere with the powers under the bill. In what way would it interfere with the powers the police may exercise or with the discretion which the government has under this bill? It would interfere in no way whatever with anything else in the bill. It merely gives ten members of this chamber the right to inscribe a motion on the Order of the Day—

An hon. Member: Every day of the week.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, the amendment calls for only once but I like the idea of presenting a motion every day of the week, if necessary, to protect the interests of Canadians.

An hon. Member: Now, we know.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: Hon. members are saying, "Now, we know". The thought comes to my mind that it does not take much knowledge for them to cackle in that manner. Hon. members ought to recognize, (a) that this amendment does not call for every day and, (b) that no one in his senses would do this every day. That is not the issue. Even the Minister of Justice did not suggest that as his reason for opposing it. Now that the minister has had the wise and careful advice of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth, he will no doubt be a great deal more enlightened than he would otherwise have been. I cannot really expect the members of the Liberal party to listen any more respectfully to me than they listened to their own convention delegates on the week end, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Osler: Will the hon. member permit a question? I wonder whether I heard the hon. member correctly? He said that when appeals under Standing Order 26 were made that these, as well as opposition days, are gimmicks. If they are gimmicks, and those days could be used for the purpose of advancing the business of the House or the feelings of the opposition, I wonder whether it is fair to use these gimmicks as much as they are used?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre will forgive me if I return to the subject rather than answering his inane question. I will return to what I was saying at the time the consciences of the Liberal members caused them to start cat-calling. I seriously suggest to the minister and members opposite that the amendment moved by my friend does not in any way weaken the contents of the bill, interfere with the rights of the police under the bill or with the discretion left with the government. It merely adds the possibility of ten members of this House instituting a debate as to whether the bill should continue in force.

If hon. members opposite are honestly worried about this motion being moved every day, if that interjection was not merely for some purpose other than honest worry, I will now move a subamendment to this amendment providing that this may be done only once between now and April 30, 1971. Hon. members opposite are not going to get away with dishonest interjections. If someone will write out the subamendment for me, I will move it.

• (4:50 p.m.)

The Chairman: Order. I understand that the hon. member is moving a subamendment to his amendment.

Mr. Lewis: Not to my amendment, but the amendment of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

An hon. Member: Seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member will continue his remarks. I am sure that in due course the Chair will get the sub-amendment in writing.

Mr. Lewis: We are putting it in writing, and you will get it. The likelihood is that it will not be necessary, because the rules provide that a debate on a given subject can take place only once in a session, and for this reason the amendment itself is probably sufficient; it will be voted on only once and cannot be repeated. But if hon. gentlemen opposite want this concession and if, as a result of this concession they will vote for the amendment, I will move it.

I say to the minister that his refusal to accept any amendment at all is altogether unreasonable, and he ought to have been willing to accept this one, which in no way interferes with the powers he maintains he needs or with the powers the Attorney General of Quebec maintains he needs. It is some kind of recognition that not only the Prime Minister, not only the members of the government, not only the members of the Liberal party, but all Members of Parliament have a responsibility for this law and for its implementation as well as for the length of time it will exist in force.

I therefore move, in accordance with what I have said:

That the amendment be amended by adding after the word "given" the words "provided that such a motion should be made only once before April 30, 1971."

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton-West): My purpose in rising is merely to point out that some hon. members seem to have failed to read clause 15. The bill requires merely a resolution by both Houses of this Parliament to extend its life for a year, 18 months or two years, whatever may be the date specified in the resolution. It is not as though the legislation will be called back for discussion in a month. What about the period beyond April 30, 1971, when the bill could not be amended? It would not be in order to advance any amendment at that time to a resolution which might be advanced by the government to extend the life of the legislation. I ask hon. members who are the guardians of the civil liberties of this country: what is your answer to that? The bill could be extended for 18 months on the strength of a vote by the government majority, and Parliament would be muzzled by a dominant cabinet at all times.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton-West): This is precisely the effect of the refusal by hon. members opposite to accept the amendment to this clause. It is not the period to April 30, 1971 that the opposition is concerned about; it is the period after that. The minister knows I am right when I say the danger lies in the fact that the government could ask for an extension, lasting, perhaps, a year, at which time the legislation would not be subject to review. For this reason, and all the more for the other reasons which have been advanced, the amendment should be accepted.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Edmonton West is to be commended for making the point he has just brought to the attention of the House. In keeping with what he has said, I should like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Justice the fact that even if the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West were not accepted the claim the minister made that the government can discontinue this act on its own initiative would disappear if there were a resolution agreed to by both Houses to continue the act beyond April 30, 1971. True, the resolution must contain a specified date, but knowing this government's concern for civil liberties it might be five or ten years off. Once a date has been put in after April 30, 1971, even the government by proclamation could not provide that the act should expire on a date earlier than that. This clause really needs the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Fraser Valley West or some rewriting to make it much clearer than it is at the present time.

The Chairman: Order. So that the House may proceed with the consideration of Private Members' business, it is my duty to leave the chair.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg)—Canadian National Railways—Non-payment of minimum wage—Retired employees' pensions—Government action; the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte)—Inquiry of the Ministry—General de Gaulle's funeral; the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy)—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—Performance of illegal abortion on program "Weekend".

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' business as listed on today's paper, namely, Notices of Motion.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' NOTICES OF MOTIONS

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN PROVIDING COLLECTION AND STORAGE FACILITIES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of providing loans and grants to encourage the building and improvement of fishing facilities along the Atlantic coastlines for the better collection and storage of all marketable species of fish.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am putting forward this motion today because I have witnessed the unnecessary loss of livelihood by fishermen in my own district, and I presume a similar situation confronts fishermen in other parts of the Atlantic provinces. I was prompted to submit this motion because of a situation which exists in my district which takes in some 250 miles of coastline and embraces many small fishing communities which depend solely on the inshore cod fishery. During the season when the fishermen are fishing for cod many other species of fish, including flounder, mackerel, herring and salmon, are attracted to the nets. Since the fish plant on which the fishermen must depend to buy their fish is only prepared to accept the cod, the fishermen have to throw back the other species of fish and loss of income results. Along 200 miles of the northwest coast, which I represent, there is only one fish plant and during the season it is only able to handle the cod.

In one community last year when codfish were very scarce, the fishermen of the community as well as others had literally to discard thousands of pounds of other species of fish because the fish plant could not handle them. Strangely enough, many of the other species of fish are worth much more than cod, and the fishermen were deterred from selling this fish due to lack of storage and cooling or freezing facilities where the fish could be kept for other markets.

Many buyers in the provinces are prepared to buy other species of fish but cannot be on hand immediately it is caught. Nevertheless they are ready to handle it if the facilities are satisfactory. The federal government, in co-operation with the provincial government, are now granting up to 90 per cent of the cost of a long liner under their boat building program, and it is very evident that codfish stocks are being depleted. I say that a similar type of program should be instituted immediately to make available similar types of grants or long term loans to groups of fishermen in a community on a co-operative self-help basis. This would enable them to market the other species of fish by building small holding units with cooling and freezing facilities to keep the product at the proper temperature for sale to the market.

I have visited the industrial development branch of the Department of Fisheries and Forestry and have seen plans of this type of facility which could be built for as little as $20,000, though I would venture to say that on a self-help basis it could be built much move cheaply. In communities where government community stages already exist, cooling facilities could also be installed and would afford a much wider scope for fishermen to earn a livelihood. I have also found in my visits to fishing communities that much government money is being wasted by building wharves and breakwaters on contract. A great saving could be effected if this type of fishing facility were built by the fishermen themselves under the supervision of the engineering staff of the Department of Public Works.

The fisherman in Newfoundland has the native ability and knowledge, passed on through generations, to know where and how a breakwater should be built for the greater benefit of all concerned. I have seen too many hundreds of thousands of dollars wasted on breakwaters and wharves which were built for political advantage, of no avail to the fishermen concerned and at too great a cost to the taxpayer.

If I can quote another example of taking other species of fish, through the initiative of the industrial development branch of the Department of Fisheries great value has been placed on lump spawn, and a market for this spawn has been found in Germany and other countries. Through this branch of the department a buyer from Germany came to Newfoundland and contracted to purchase lump spawn, which previously was not even considered of any value. For this spawn the fishermen is paid more than twice what he gets for cod; but again lack of cooling facilities prevents him from taking advantage of the market for this type of product, with the result that again he loses a source of income. I know of other experiences where fish buyers refused to buy salmon from the fisherman in his community due to lack of ice. Upwards of a hundred men could have been employeer if the facilities to store the salmon and prepare it for market had been available.

Irish moss is another product which the government spent many dollars to find; yet the market for a new product which brings income to fishermen has gradually deteriorated due to the fact that proper facilities are not available. The government for some reason or other will not realize that studies and surveys must be supported by facilities to take advantage of a product.

How many times do I get replies from the Department of Public Works to my requests for breakwaters and wharves and dredging to the effect that, since the catch and the number of fishermen are decreasing in a particular community, there can be no justification to spend the money? Little do they realize—or they do not want to realize—that the reason for the decrease in the catch and the number of fishermen is that there are no facilities in the first place.

It is time we gave our fishermen some credit for initiative and decision to an industry which is the lifeline of my province. In this fast advancing age of science and technology all they require is a little guidance and assistance. I am sure that my motion would have the support of those in the Department of Fisheries who are more closely associated with the fishing community; and while I appreciate especially the work of the industrial development branch of the department, I hope my motion will receive the consideration that I feel it realistically deserves.

Therefore, I plead with the minister to consider this motion very carefully. May I suggest respectfully that there be a few test cases at strategic locations in the Atlantic provinces which depend on the fishery to evaluate the proposal which I put forward today, and I hope that I will have the support of my other colleagues who must have experienced like circumstances in their districts.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I compliment the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) for his interest in, and concern for, the fisheries which are so vital to Newfoundland and to the welfare of Newfoundland fishermen. The Department of Fisheries and Forestry is, and always has been, acutely concerned with the improvement of facilities to enable fishermen to handle their catch and to expand and diversify their operations. The department has programs along this line and others designed, in one way or another, to increase fishermen's incomes and to improve their standard of living.

Many changes are presently underway that directly or indirectly affect the orderly development of the fisheries in Newfoundland. Resettlement, improved transportation, the swing from the salted to the frozen product, the harvesting of new or under-exploited species and stocks, and new catching and processing techniques, are just a few examples.

These factors make it difficult to come to hard and firm decisions about the location and type of facilities for handling fish. In the past we have built community stages at suitable places where fishermen can handle their own fish, especially for salting. There is now the feeling that fishermen should devote their full time to fishing—which is, of course, their principal occupation and the thing that they do best—and have their catches processed by workers at appropriate shore facilities. This would tend to produce more uniform and better quality salt fish.

Recently the government announced an expansion of its fishing vessel construction assistance. Under the new regulations, financial assistance—35 per cent of the approved cost—will be provided for eligible fishing vessels of all types built of any materials, 45 feet in length and over. For vessels 45 feet to 75 feet in length, funds in the amount of $2 million have been appropriated by the Department of Fisheries and Forestry, and applications from vessel owners are now under consideration.

For vessels more than 75 feet in length, assistance is available through the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce by way of grants paid directly to shipyards after approval by the Department of Fisheries and Forestry. An expenditure of $3 million is projected for this program. This assistance is helpful in enabling fishermen to obtain larger, more up to date and more mobile boats which will make it possible for them to use different kinds of gear and catch additional species of fish, and, through this diversification, allow them to extend their fishing season. All these factors, details of which I will provide in a moment, may mean that we shall eventually have fewer but better serviced fishing centres for better boats where there will be improved unloading and handling facilities, better wharfing, haul-out and so on.

In the program for community fish processing and handling facilities, federal expenditure between the fiscal year 1953-54 and 1968-69 amounted to $4 million. Fifty-three community stages for saltfish were built, and 22 fresh fish holding units, as well as related marine works. The purpose was to meet the problems of Newfoundland fishermen in previous years, such as low individual productivity and indifferent quality of fish produced. In addition to the Newfoundland program, two fresh fish holding units were constructed in Nova Scotia and one in New Brunswick.

The department reviews the operation of this program every year with a view to assessing the use made of the individual units and the benefits accruing to fishermen. With some exceptions, the program is felt to have met its purpose in Newfoundland. As I intimated, no new community stage program is planned for the current year.

There are instances where some kind of facilities such as those proposed by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe—something perhaps more elaborate than a community stage for fresh fish holding unit—would be desirable.

The 1970 report of Imbucon Services, a firm of consultants, recommends consideration of a program of licensed landing centres for the inshore fishery, a place for receiving fish and providing a number of services to fishermen. Part of the costs of the proposed operation might be covered in part by a levy on all fish moved over a dock serviced by the unit.

In co-operation with various provincial administrations the department undertakes fisheries development programs on a joint share basis. From April 1, 1962 to March 31, 1971 federal contributions in the Atlantic coast provinces will total just over $6 million, of which $2,758,000 will have been spent in Newfoundland. I should like to include details of these expenditures along with my remarks. Perhaps I might have the indulgence of the House to table these figures, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has asked for consent to table certain figures. Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the hon. member asking that they be tabled or put in as part of Hansard?

Mr. McGrath: As an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Corbin: Does the hon. member ask that they be appended to Hansard?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have permission to append this to Hansard?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will it be appended to Hansard or put in as part of the hon. member's speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. Parliamentary Secretary will agree, and I think this is the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), there has been a general practice that such information be included as an appendix to Hansard rather than part of the speech. There is some concern with reference to the printing of Hansard if we have voluminous material put in the body of the speech itself. If hon. members of the House will concur with me on this matter, and the Parliamentary Secretary will agree, perhaps the order we should make is that the information be printed as an appendix to Hansard. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For text of above document see Appendix].

Mr. Corbin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the fiscal year 1970-71 alone we have ten shared-cost projects in Newfoundland and five of these are for the west coast. These are experimental and development work on queen crab and mussels, exploratory work for crab and mussels from Barrie Bay to St. Anthony, a survey of Irish moss resources in the Port au Port-St. George's area, a survey of eel resources and experimental pair seining operations in the Port aux Choix area with a view to future vessel conversions if these are commercially feasible.

The other five are for other areas of Newfoundland. They are exploration for sand launce and capelin on the Grand Banks and off the south coast, development of capelin and herring traps and trap skiffs on the south and southeast coasts, a survey of inshore waters for commercial stocks of mussels and clams on the east coast, a study of the economics and feasibility of air transport of fresh fish to mainland and overseas markets and fishermen's technical upgrading. This last provides for an interchange of information on developments, techniques and equipment between fishermen with a view to improving their technical capabilities.

Then there is the Newfoundland bait service. This provides bait depot facilities for the benefit of Newfoundland fishermen at strategic locations in the province. It is a carryover of a provincial program for which the federal government undertook responsibility under the terms of union.

Fisheries Storage Facilities

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. I am trying to relate the Parliamentary Secretary's remarks to the wording of the resolution before the House. It seems to me the hon. Parliamentary Secretary is giving a complete review of all the activity of his department in the Province of Newfoundland. I respectfully submit to Your Honour that he should address himself to the resolution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have been listening carefully to the Parliamentary Secretary who has been relating his remarks generally to fishing facilities in the Atlantic provinces. It may well be, however, that as quickly as he can he might move to a more specific discussion of the resolution.

Mr. Corbin: I would thank you, Mr. Speaker, but with respect I must point out that the various activities of fishermen in Newfoundland are interrelated to the point that one cannot consider a proposal separate from these various activities. I am endeavouring to point out to hon. members that, in spite of the fact that I tend to agree in principle with the remarks of the hon. member, there are grounds for agreeing that the department is working in the sense he wants. I will come to that point shortly, Mr. Speaker.

The fisheries groundfish loan program for 1969-70 was designed to overcome problems of fish processing companies which suffer a shortage of working capital and which were unable to obtain financing through regular commercial sources. In the five Atlantic coast provinces, and this includes Quebec, there were 42 participating companies of which 17 were in Newfoundland, with total loans amounting to more than $3,500,000 of which $2 million were in Newfoundland.

Federal responsibility under the Newfoundland fisheries household resettlement program, and this has a direct bearing on the remarks of the hon. member, which was begun in 1965, were transferred in the current year from the Department of Fisheries and Forestry to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. A new federal-provincial agreement has just recently been negotiated extending the program for a further five years. Federal expenditure under the household resettlement program to March 31, 1970, totalled more than $5 million. Another $2,500,000 is provided for in the current year's estimates.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. McGrath: I say to you, Sir, with great respect, that the resettlement program and all the details the Parliamentary Secretary is going into have absolutely nothing to do with the resolution before us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would think the relationship is a very broad one and, without having any particular knowledge of the Newfoundland resettlement program to which the Parliamentary Secretary has referred, I suggest to him that perhaps he might indicate how it is related to the motion.

Mr. Corbin: With due respect, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might refer to the motion put before the House.

[Translation]

—the government should consider the advisability of providing loans and grants to encourage the building and improvement of fishing facilities along the Atlantic coastlines—

[English]

Surely, we're not going to build these facilities in the outports from which people have been moved. This, I think, is pertinent to the hon. member's motion. I believe the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) is simply trying to confuse me, Mr. Speaker, so I will carry on.

An hon. Member: Did you lose your place.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are doing very well.

Mr. Corbin: As I was saying, federal expenditures under the household resettlement program to March 31, 1970 total more than $5 million. Another $2.5 million is provided for in the current year's estimates. The activities of the Fisheries Prices Support Board in 1969-70 included, in addition to the loan programs which I have just mentioned, a saltfish deficiency program and a frozen groundfish stabilization program. The former was to assist salted cod fishermen who had experienced severe price declines as the result of oversupply and currency devaluation in traditional markets.

There were 5,400 payments in the Atlantic coast provinces for a total amount of more than one million dollars. Of these 4,700 payments in the amount of $950,000 were made to Newfoundland. The objective of the Frozen Groundfish Stablization Program was to forestall distress selling of frozen groundfish and to raise the market price of selected groundfish products to a point where basic costs were covered. Before this program was started the market price for cod blocks was 21 cents per pound. Before the end of the year the market price had risen to 26 cents and 27 cents. The program has been continued this year and the market price for cod blocks had risen to 30 cents per pound. The quantities of frozen groundfish acquired by the board in the five Atlantic coast provinces under the program were 17.5 million pounds valued at $4.25 million. Of these, 13 million pounds valued at $3,200,000 were in Newfoundland. During the peak production season the Fisheries Prices Support Board purchased 17.3 million pounds of cod blocks, 26 per cent of production, at prices ranging from 23 cents to 26 cents. Before the end of the year the entire inventory was returned to the industry at cost.

The Canadian Saltfish Corporation is now a going concern with the president and the headquarters operations based in St. John's, Newfoundland and the chairman in Ottawa. Newfoundland has joined the corporation and Nova Scotia and Quebec are considering joining. It is not clear if and when these provinces will actually join. New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are watching the corporation's activities with interest, but their production of salt fish is relatively small.

Mr. McGrath: What does this have to do with additional storage?

Mr. Corbin: The corporation had to commence operations after the season had already started. However, initial prices were announced on May 31 before the fishermen started fishing. They were revised upward on July 1 this summer in the light of market conditions. These opening prices were higher than the fishermen had received in past years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hesitate to refer to this matter, but I do have to say very respectfully that the matter of pricing and the particular board to which the Parliamentary Secretary is referring are not directly related to the motion. I would respectively ask the Parliamentary Secretary to return to the subject matter of the motion.

Mr. Corbin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think I appreciate your point. I shall endeavour to follow your directive. Perhaps I would be permitted to conclude my remarks to the satisfaction of hon. members opposite. Programs of benefit to fishermen in the Public Works sector in the Atlantic region include construction of wharves, breakwaters, shipways, and their repair and maintenance; the dredging of harbours and other related works. At the present time about 1,500 wharf facilities service fishermen in varying degrees. Of these, possibly 800 are truly fishermen's wharves. The Department of Public Works spends from $5 million to $7 million a year on support services to fishermen. There are 353 fishermen's wharves in Newfoundland. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion also has many programs related to the fisheries. There are quite a few projects under the Area Development Incentives Act. Payments for these in Newfoundland in 1969-70 amounted to $625,000, and in 1970-71, $500,000. Under the Regional Development Incentives Act project payments for 1970-71 amounted to $557,000. I hope the foregoing will reassure the member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe that the government is doing all it can to encourage the improvement of our Atlantic coast fishing facilities.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), in his opening remarks, very directly put before the House the problem faced by all fishermen in this area. I must say that while listening to the reply of the Parliamentary Secretary I felt he almost successfully ignored the resolution. What he put before us really sounded like the Atlantic coast segment of the annual report of the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. McGrath: That's right.

Mr. Barnett: I am not suggesting he was quoting directly from it, but it is the kind of review we expect to come from the department in a document of that kind.

Now, with what does the resolution concern itself? It raises a specific question about the need for better facilities for the collection and storage of all marketable species of fish. The hon. member proposing the motion put before the House the fact that fishermen in this area are taking fish which are potentially marketable but are suffering a loss of income because there are no available means for keeping the fish in proper condition and for getting them to market.

This is the question we should be discussing but which the Parliamentary Secretary failed to discuss. He made some reference to the difficulty of coming to firm decisions during a period when technological changes are taking place in the industry. I suggest that when we have an immediate, practical problem concerning fishermen placing fish on the market, fish which otherwise will simply go to rot, it is not good enough to sit back and say, "Things are in a state of flux. We may be getting technological changes that will provide an answer to this kind of problem ten years from now."

The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe suggests that we should do something now to deal with an immediate problem before these fishermen are forced out of the industry. Because of the decrease in their catch of cod and the unavailability of marketing arrangements for the other species they land, they can no longer afford to stay in the industry. That seems to be the kind of problem that has been placed before us.

I do not claim to have much knowledge of the particular problems of the Atlantic coast fishery. From observations I was able to make some years ago at first-hand and from discussions I have heard both in this House and in the committee, I know the problems are very different from those on the Pacific coast. On the Pacific coast we have developed techniques of mobile collection and mobile storage facilities, so that by and large the fisherman is not faced with this particular problem. We have fish-buying camps which move into the fishing areas during the fishing season. These are equipped with ice refrigeration. We have packers that travel the coast quite frequently, pick up fish from the fish-buying plants and take them to the processing plants or direct to the fresh fish markets. I do not know if anything like that would be applicable to the fishery in Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, but it seems to me this is the kind of practical consideration that the hon. member is suggesting should be give by the House, by the government and in particular by the Department of Fisheries and Forestry to this question.

That is the question to which the Parliamentary Secretary should have addressed his remarks, rather than giving us a rambling review of the whole ambit of the activities of the Department of Fisheries on the Atlantic coast, with which many of us are already familiar having read the annual reports and listened to statements made in the Fisheries Committee. I hope that before this hour is concluded the House will give favourable passage to the resolution as an indication that we want to see practical and immediate steps taken by the department to deal with the problem which the hon. member has said exists.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I was truly interested in listening to the comments of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Corbin). This is the first time that we hear him speak on the problem of fisheries. I was struck by one thing: his comments applied mainly to Newfoundland.

[English]

The motion presented by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) affects not only the province of Newfoundland but the whole of the Atlantic provinces. The Parliamentary Secretary dealt mainly with the problems in Newfoundland, but I think the motion is more encompassing than that. The Parliamentary Secretary said the department had introduced shipbuilding grants. Mr. Speaker, if we increase the fishing facilities we must also increase the cold storage facilities. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) made a very interesting suggestion about mobile facilities. I shall later seek further details on that point. While the Parliamentary Secretary was speaking I noticed that his predecessor was trying to assist him. I suspect that he also wants to participate in the debate, so I shall not be too long. This motion is one that I commend to the House. It refers to—> —the advisability of providing loans and grants to encourage the building and improvement of fishing facilities along the Atlantic coastlines for the better collection and storage of all marketable species of fish.

The House is aware that a bait freezer and cold storage subsidy program was suspended last year and that the suspension was to last for approximately two years. Following my inquiries the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) wrote to me as follows:

> The Fishery Products Storage Regulations which came into effect in 1967, provide for assistance towards the cost of construction and equipment or modification required for refrigerated storage of fishery products and authorize the Minister of Fisheries to make a payment to the applicant "of one-third of the cost of the commercial facility but in no case shall the amount of the payment exceed one hundred and fifty thousand dollars."
> However, due to the necessity of reducing government expenditures, we have had earlier this year to suspend payments under these regulations. It seems unlikely that funds will be provided for that purpose in the next fiscal year and therefore no new applications are being accepted. I can assure you, however, that if the financial climate improves the regulations will again become operative.

Within the last couple of weeks the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has stated that the government is anxious to get the economy moving again. Therefore I submit that this program should be reintroduced. The Minister of Fisheries did not openly condemn the program; simply suspended it for a year or two. I can see the government has been on a savings binge, if one wants to call it that, for the past several years. I commend it for that. But the people who have suffered are those at the bottom of the ladder, including fishermen and pensioners. Be that as it may it seems the government now wants to increase expenditures to get the economy rolling again.

The minister's letter saying "if the financial climate improves the regulations will again become operative" seems to support the motion that is before the House. However, the Parliamentary Secretary did not state whether the department was in favour of this type of program. Mr. Speaker, such a program would stimulate the economy and reduce unemployment in some parts of the country. The fact is that individual fishermen cannot afford to provide themselves with proper cold storage facilities. Often when fishermen reach port, buyers cannot buy all the fish they have caught; therefore, the fishermen have either to throw away the surplus fish, try to find another buyer or find some place in which to store them. Proper storage facilities would remedy the situation.

Over the past several years I have had many inquiries from groups of fishermen asking that this type of program be reinstituted. Several co-operative movements in my riding have inquired about it because at present they do not have proper facilities. The government might say they want to save money and cannot provide a subsidy to everybody who asks, but if they do not want to accept this motion in its entirety perhaps they could provide low-interest loans. The fishermen then could operate on a co-operative basis as they have been doing.

This type of motion lends itself to many types of facilities other than cold storage. The fishermen could have loans made available, or grants, in order to improve facilities. I know of a case where a canal had to be dredged by the fishermen themselves because it was badly needed for the coming season and the Department of Public Works would not carry out the work. The fishermen did it, but they were not compensated. If loans or grants were made, in the long run it would save the department money. The fishermen would be willing to accept loans, if not grants, to improve their facilities. This motion is a good one, Mr. Speaker, and I feel that it should be supported.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, this motion will obviously commend itself to all members of the House, so I shall not take up too much time because I know the House is ready to come to a conclusion on it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The motion merely calls upon the government to consider the advisability of providing loans and grants: we are just asking the government to take this matter into consideration. We heard the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Corbin) read a précis on the annual report of that department which was not relevant to the motion before the House. We had hoped that he would have addressed himself to the motion because it is a very important one, underlining as it does a serious deficiency in the Department of Fisheries and Forestry for which the Parliamentary Secretary now has some responsibility.

Every year in my constituency we have the spectacle of hundreds of thousands of pounds of fish being dumped into the water because there is no space to hold them until buyers can be found and the fish can be transported to market. This resolution merely calls upon the government to provide these facilities and, in effect, preclude the necessity for this terrible waste of a very valuable high protein food. There are many fishermen within the city of St. John's, and a number of fishermen in the small areas surrounding St. John's, but there are no fish plants: there are only two small units to receive the catches. There were two large plants in the city itself but they were forced to close because of market conditions and other factors of which I am not fully aware.

Certainly, if cold storage units were built at strategic points along the coasts of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—and I offer my own constituency as an example—it would preclude this terrible waste of high protein food and would help the fishermen. The catch could be held until it was determined whether there was a market for it. Fish is a very perishable product, and under the present circumstances, if no buyer is immediately available there is no alternative but to dump it and the fishermen is in the unhappy position of labouring for naught.

This is a very serious matter, Mr. Speaker, and I regret that the Parliamentary Secretary did not seem to comprehend its importance. I hope the House will be constrained to allow this matter to come to a conclusion. By this motion we are asking the government to consider the advisability of providing loans, etc., to provide fishermen with the facilities to store the catch until a market can be found.

The Parliamentary Secretary referred to bait holding depots. These can be utilized and called upon; the precedent is already there. We could have depots to hold groundfish or herring and the product could be preserved until marketing conditions improved. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would urge the House to give favourable consideration to this most important resolution which affects so many of our fishermen and means much to them.

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join the previous speakers in congratulating the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) for bringing this motion before the House. The plight of the fisheries industry along the Atlantic coast in general, and Newfoundland in particular, has been of very great concern to us all. I am pleased that the hon. member who moved this motion has given the government another opportunity to demonstrate, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Corbin) has done during this debate, what action has been taken to improve the lot of the fishermen and their families. Nevertheless, I agree with the mover of this motion that there is need for more facilities on the Atlantic coast.

The measures which the government has taken, and those programs which are on a continuing basis, are designed to assist the Newfoundland fishermen to help themselves. They are proud and rugged individualists who dread any thought that they might end up on the dole. These people have a tradition of working for a living and are not looking for handouts. Yet no one would deny that the typical Newfoundland fisherman is hard pressed. For long hours, in rough seas and using the most primitive of equipment, he earns $900 a year. He earns $900, on the average, for a full year's fishing. The over-all income of the average family in our outports in Newfoundland is only about $2,300. That is less than $200 a month. More than half of this income derives from what we call transfer payments. More than half of the $2,300, in other words, is made up of old age pensions, family allowances, unemployment insurance and welfare cheques paid under our new Canada Assistance Plan.

As I have said, to be on the dole is still thought to be degrading in Newfoundland. I wish that were still the case in British Columbia. Unemployment insurance, because they believe it is somehow related to production, is a little more respectable. So are old age pensions. But welfare, straight welfare, is only a last resort and one which this government rejects as a solution to the problems of these fine workers.

Mr. McGrath: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am trying desperately to relate the hon. member's remarks to the motion before the House, and I find it very difficult to do so.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has heard the point of order raised by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). He knows, as do all hon. members, that remarks must be related at all times to the matter before the House. I am sure the hon. member can relate the remarks he is making to the motion under consideration.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Goode: I thank the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). The point I am trying to make is that the government must assist these people by providing facilities. It must understand that the situation which now exists, which I have been trying to outline to the House, is intolerable. Until we understand the situation that these people face, I do not think we can say whether this notice of motion is worth while or not.

I should like to discuss in detail the problems of the inshore fishery. That would, I think, take into account the hon. member's position. About one year ago, in a report published by the Atlantic Development Board the following appeared:

> —the inshore fishery throughout the Atlantic provinces is an instrument of poverty. Far to many men, boats and equipment are being applied to a basically limited resource.

This is what the Atlantic Development Board said, and those words apply to the motion we are discussing this evening. Long-run trends are disturbing. In Newfoundland, for example, the number of inshore fishermen has risen over the past decade despite a 25 per cent drop in the landings of fish. The inshore catch has fallen from 200,000 metric tons in 1956 to around 150,000 tons at the present time. Real incomes, however, have remained relatively constant because the price of fish has gone up faster than that of most other goods and this has offset the decline in the number of fish caught. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion—

Mr. McGrath: Question.

Mr. Goode: Therefore, in conclusion, I agree with the hon. member's notice of motion. I compliment the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe for bringing it before the House. I certainly do not wish to talk it out and therefore I shall resume my seat.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Essex): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's notice of motion covers the entire Atlantic coast. In the four minutes remaining I shall try to talk about a small part of it. I believe his motion is a worthy one. Before embarking upon my speech I think I should say that the government has been doing in a very energetic fashion what he suggests it should do. For two years at least it has carried on such activities under the capable leadership of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member was Parliamentary Secretary to one of those ministers. Things have now changed.

Mr. Whelan: I do not think things have changed very much, Mr. Speaker. Actually, in these areas we are moving a little faster than before. The motion before the House deals with an important aspect of the fishery, namely, collection and cold storage facilities. Although important, it deals with only one aspect of a very complex activity. This activity is broader than that with which the motion on the Order Paper attempts to deal. These cold storage facilities are closely related to the number and location of fishermen, the number and size of fishing vessels used by fishermen, the volume of the catch, the availability of harbour facilities, the location of processing plants, and so on.

Moreover, the Atlantic coast fishery is experiencing significant changes. Fishing effort is increasingly oriented toward deep sea activity, with larger and more sophisticated fishing vessels, while inshore fishing is receding in importance. As the previous speaker said, there is still a great deal of inshore fishing and we should like to see a change in this area. As he pointed out, we can provide subsidies for sophisticated fishing vessels and encourage their construction. In addition, Mr. Speaker, more of the catch is being processed into fresh and frozen fillets and less is being cured. Also, more landings are concentrated in locations with large processing plants.

It must be readily apparent that it would not be wise to adopt a new general policy to provide for better collection and cold storage facilities, let alone a set level and amount of financial assistance, until we can see where it fits into the general fisheries development policy. The definition of such a policy will incorporate the matter of collection and storage facilities. The prime responsibility of fisheries development, of course, lies with the Department of Fisheries and Forestry. However, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has since its inception had a direct interest in this significant regional economic activity.

Several of DREE's activities are specifically oriented toward the Atlantic coast fishery. Financial assistance is available for new fish processing plants and for the modernization and expansion of existing plants under the Regional Development Incentives Act. Assistance provided under this program since July 1, 1969, amounts to $1.7 million. The federal-provincial agreements under the fund for regional economic development for northeast New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island also included substantial fisheries development programs. DREE is also contributing in a significant manner to the development and rationalization of the Newfoundland fishery by way of the Newfoundland resettlement program. Again, DREE is at present negotiating renewals of ARDA agreements with the provinces of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret very much that I have to interrupt the hon. member. I must advise the House that the hour set aside for the consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT 1970

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY POWERS FOR PRESERVATION OF PUBLIC ORDER

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-181, to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada—Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton)—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: At five o'clock, the Committee of the Whole was considering clause 15 of Bill C-181, particularly the amendment moved by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West. The Chair feels it might be useful at this time to read the amendment:

> That section 15 be amended by adding the following words as subsection (2):
> (2) a Notice of Motion in either House signed by ten members thereof and made in accordance with the rules of that House, praying that an earlier day for the expiry of this act shall be fixed by proclamation, shall be debated in that House at the first convenient opportunity within four sitting days after notice thereof is given,
> and renumbering the first paragraph of section 15"(1)".

The hon. member for York South moved the following subamendment:

> That the amendment be amended by adding after the word "given" the words "provided that such a motion should be made only once before April 30, 1971."

Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I rise to point out that I realize the provision in the bill for the possibility of extending it beyond April 30, 1971, by joint resolution of both Houses of Parliament, and that my subamendment relates only to April 30, 1971. I think it is in order to have it worded that way, for two reasons. First, my mind boggles at the thought of the government asking for an extension of this legislation or at Parliament granting such an extension. Second, a resolution that may become necessary or possible seeking an extension of this bill can contain the discretion of the government to terminate the force of the bill before the date set out in such resolution and can also contain a provision for ten members of the House to be able to place a motion on the table which, if it does not contain such provision, an amendment can be moved at that time. While the point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West drew a very important matter to our attention, it does not negate the value of either the amendment, or the subamendment.

I moved my subamendment in response to a challenge from the other side concerning a motion being lodged with the House every day. As I considered it over the dinner hour, I felt that one might have thought of that earlier. It is a good suggestion even though, as I indicated earlier, it will not be necessary. It is a good suggestion that a motion of this kind be moved only once during the first period, and I hope the last, that this bill remains in force. It is a good idea to have that provision.

With that wording in the amendment, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether it is possible to persuade the minister to accept it. With the subamendment there is now a limitation of one motion prior to April 30, 1971. If so, all that I said earlier, which I will not repeat, holds true. There is not anything in the bill that is interfered with in any way by this provision. With the safeguard of only one motion written into the amendment, it seems that the minister, the government, members opposite and this House in general should not have the slightest hesitation in providing this extra parliamentary safeguard of a motion moved by ten members of the House. I rose merely to make these comments in support of both the amendment and the subamendment.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I said before the dinner adjournment, Mr. Chairman, that there is provision in clause 15 to give Parliament control over any extension beyond April 30. Any extension has to be endorsed by resolution of both Houses of Parliament. I said we could not accept the amendment nor the subamendment because Parliament has the initial guarantee that the bill cannot go beyond April 30. For the earlier termination, it remains necessarily within the discretion of the government to analyse the situation.

If in the period between now and April 30 any opposition party or any Member of Parliament is dissatisfied with the administration of the bill, there is always the option under Standing Order 26 for leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration. Under Standing Order 43 a member, by way of unanimous consent, may in the case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover, introduce a motion. There are also available the opposition days.

What disturbs me about the amendment, even if the motion were available only once, is that it takes the control of the business of the House away from the government. It prevents the government from discharging its responsibility of initiating business for the consideration of Parliament. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made the point that if by proclamation endorsed by both Houses the bill, or the force of the law, were extended, there is nothing in the clause as it presently reads to provide for its termination by proclamation after it had once been extended. I would be prepared to meet that point.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If the minister is prepared to recognize the point, how does he propose to meet it?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): When I have the floor at an appropriate time I will propose adding the words, after the last line of the clause, "in which case this act expires either on that specific date or at such earlier date as may be fixed by proclamation." This would meet the point which the hon. member raised. But I cannot get the floor to make that amendment until the committee has dealt with this one.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before we vote on this amendment and subamendment, I feel inclined to ask the minister whether he was serious in suggesting we would be able to deal with this kind of circumstance under Standing Order 26 or under Standing Order 43. Surely the minister is aware of what happens to attempts to move motions under Standing Order 43.

An hon. Member: Because you don't consult the government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope that brilliant intervention is on the record. The hon. member says, "Because you don't consult the government." In other words, his concept of the rights of an opposition is that it is entitled only to such rights as the government is prepared to give it. I do not believe that even the Minister of Justice goes that far. If the government were prepared to give unanimous consent for a motion under Standing Order 43, it would mean the government was prepared to discontinue the use of this legislation and, hence, would be able to do so, through the exercise of its own rights under the bill. So that argument falls to the ground. As for using Standing Order 26, the minister is well aware of the problems we have with Mr. Speaker in getting motions accepted under that order, and if we do succeed all that follows is a general discussion. In my view, the seriousness of this issue is such as to warrant a built-in right to deal with this question without the matter being left to the judgment or opinion of Mr. Speaker.

I would point out that this right is included in the part of the War Measures Act which was amended by the Canadian Bill of Rights and I believe the request we have made is a legitimate one, namely, that Parliament should be put on all fours with the government in terms of having the right to seek the ending of this legislation. I am glad the minister is prepared to make the minor amendment to which he referred a moment ago to correct the situation to which I drew attention at five o'clock, but it does seem to me we should not be asked to rely on Standing Order 43 in connection with this important measure and that we should be on even terms with the government as far as this important aspect is concerned.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to some strange arguments in this House during the years I have been in it, but this is the first time I have heard it suggested that what should or should not be contained in a particular piece of legislation should be related to the Standing Orders governing this chamber. I can understand such an idea being put forward jocularly amid the cross-fire which sometimes takes place during debate, but to hear the Minister of Justice seriously suggest that the point raised in an amendment should be met by what appears in our Standing Orders seems amusing, to say the least.

If we were to follow that logic through, the obvious thing to do would be to pass an amendment to the Bill of Rights saying, in effect, that Parliament should be governed by the wishes of the government as far as its timetable is concerned. I believe the minister would not suggest, on reflection, that all the proceedings in this chamber should be ruled by the wishes of the government. Since the Bill of Rights makes provision for a motion, set down presumably on reasonable grounds, calling for a debate it is surely not out of place to incorporate a similar provision in a measure so closely related to the War Measures Act as this one.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): May I ask the hon. member a question? Is he not aware of one substantial difference between the two measures to which he has referred? There is no termination date attached to a proclamation of the War Measures Act, but there is a termination date in this bill.

Mr. Barnett: That reminds me of a phrase one sometimes hears, that it is not really safe to be just a little pregnant. That covers the substance of the argument as far as I am concerned. But I must say I found myself resenting the suggestion by a minister that our position in relation to a bill should be influenced by whether or not the government has control over the business of the House.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Lewis)) negatived: Yeas, 26; nays, 65.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment to the amendment lost. Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West? The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I was about to ask a question after this particular matter had been disposed of. Perhaps I might retain that right.

Amendment (Mr. Rose) negatived: Yeas, 33; nays; 58.

• (8:20 p.m.)

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 15 carry?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, thank you for retaining my dubious point of privilege in this matter. May I ask the Minister of Justice a question, which I think is a rather serious one, arising out of the effect of the act or regulations—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. McCleave: No; the hon. member is rising to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. Now I shall have to start all over again, Mr. Chairman. What I wanted to ask the Minister of Justice was a very serious question arising out of the fact that sooner or later either the regulations passed under the War Measures Act or under this particular legislation will cease to have force and effect. I should like to know what happens when we reach the deadline for the operation of this legislation, and I presume of the regulations, of April 30, 1971. Supposing a person is serving a 15-month term, by reason of his membership in the FLQ, which expires beyond April 30 of next year. I want to find out for the committee and for the country what will be the legal effect of that situation.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, subject to any other action taken by Parliament, any action taken under this legislation while it is validly in force will, of course, persist until completion of sentence.

Mr. McCleave: Then I ask a supplementary question. Would this legislation remove from that person any right to parole or to time off for good behaviour if the person concerned were still serving his sentence when the act and regulations expired on April 30, 1971?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, sir.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Chairman, as undertaken by the Minister of Justice a moment ago, I move the following amendment:

That Bill C-181 be amended by striking out lines 18 and 19 on page 9 and substituting the following:

"in which case this act expires either on that specified day or on such other earlier day as may be fixed by proclamation."

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I appreciate the fact that the minister has met the point that I raised just before five o'clock. The amendment that he has proposed seems to do that. We welcome it and shall, of course, vote for it.

An hon. Member: Don't commit me.

Mr. Lewis: You may have to move a subamendment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I am getting some legal, if non-parliamentary, advice to the effect that I should try to move an amendment to add the words, "or if advancing the date is proposed by ten members". But it has been made clear that the government does not look kindly on what ten members might do.

An hon. Member: Ten Liberal members.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, one thing we are getting tonight is absolute honesty from members on the other side. A few minutes ago I was told that if only I would consult the government before moving motions under Standing Order 43, they would be all right. Now we are told that if ten Liberal members ask for something, then that is all right. At least we understand the place that the Liberals have in Parliament for anyone who is not a Liberal.

Before I had these interruptions from the right and the left I was merely going to say that I wish the minister had taken the same attitude toward some of the more important points that we have raised during the course of this debate.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think there is a question of paternity here. I think 60 per cent of the credit for paternity should go to the hon. member for Edmonton West, 30 per cent to the hon. member for Fraser Valley West or the hon. member for York South, and 10 per cent to that little, small "1" liberal band that met in Ottawa over the weekend.

Amendment (Mr. Hogarth) agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 15 as amended carry?

Mr. Lewis: On division.

Clause 15 as amended agreed to.

On clause 3—Unlawful association.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, when we were dealing with clause 3 at the beginning of the discussion of the bill, the hon. member for York South drew to my attention the fact that in his opinion there was some divergence between the operation of the second paragraph in the preamble and the definition of an unlawful association to be found in clause 3.

I think I can meet the point that he made in this way. The definition of an unlawful association in clause 3 includes:

> —le Front de Libération du Québec, and any successor group or successor association of the said le Front de Libération du Québec, or any group of persons or association that advocates the use of force or the commission of crime as a means of or as an aid in accomplishing the same or substantially the same governmental change within Canada as that advocated by the said le Front de Libération du Québec—

And so on. The question that the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands put to me was: What kind of governmental change are you talking about? May I quote from the second paragraph of the preamble, which refers to:

> —accomplishing governmental change within Canada with respect to the province of Quebec or its relationship to Canada—

Mr. Woolliams: Why do you not put that in the clause?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Exactly. That was the point that the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands made, and I referred them to certain authorities on statutory construction. I also refer to section 14 of the Interpretation Act, which reads:

> (1) The preamble of every act shall be deemed a part thereof, intended to assist in explaining the purport and object of the act.

• (8:30 p.m.)

I felt this was clear. However, in order to remove any doubt—and I might say the hon. member for Calgary North made this point in his reference to Driedger in the early part of the debate—I am prepared, with the courtesy of the committee, to have my colleague the hon. member for New Westminster, in the absence of my Parliamentary Secretary who has been called away from the committee by a death in the family, move the appropriate amendment.

Mr. Woolliams: Mellowness such as this is beyond me. Could we start over again?

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Chairman, I move:

> That Bill C-181 be amended
> (a) by striking out line 10 on page 3 and substituting the following:
> "mental change within Canada with respect to the province of Quebec or its relationship to Canada as that" and > (b) by striking out line 39 on page 3 and substituting the following:
> "Canada with respect to the province of Quebec or its relationship to Canada as that advocated by the unlaw—"

The first six letters are part of "governmental".

The second part of the amendment is consequential upon the first part.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair wishes to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Westminster to page 3 of the bill relates to two clauses. In view of the fact that only clause 3 is before the committee at this stage, the Chair feels we would need unanimous consent to put the two amendments at the same time, otherwise the Chair would be forced to limit the discussion to the amendment to clause 3. Does the committee agree that the Chair put the two amendments together?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gleave: Put the one on clause 3.

The Deputy Chairman: There seems to be disagreement, so the Chair will put the amendment to clause 3. It is moved by the hon. member for New Westminster:

> That Bill C-181 be amended
> (a) by striking out line 10 on page 3 and substituting the following:
> "mental change within Canada with respect to the province of Quebec or its relationship to Canada as that"

The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, unless the hon. member for Peace River is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: No, Mr. Chairman. I looked back but did not see the hon. member rise.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I wanted the discussion to be on clause 3 instead of taking the two clauses together. I should like the mover of the amendment to explain the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Chairman, in respect of the change to clause 3, in the definition it automatically brings about the change in line 39 on page 3, so the two definitions coincide. One is merely consequential upon the other.

Mr. Baldwin: We are going to agree to this amendment, but it has been called to my attention by the learned author of "Woolliams on Statutory Amendments" that the way to get an amendment through is to call to the government's attention the mistakes in the legislation, rather than having the audacity to move an amendment, and then when the time comes the government will move the amendment themselves.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the amendment just moved by the hon. member for New Westminster, (Mr. Hogarth) I find somewhat strange that only the province of Quebec should be mentioned. The following text is suggested as a substitute for line 10 on page 3:

"mental change within Canada with respect to the Province of Quebec or its relationship to Canada as that"

I wonder why the act could not apply to all the other provinces, if the need should arise.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member will notice that the second Whereas on page 1, in the preamble, at lines 12 and 13, stipulates as follows:

—governmental change within Canada with respect to the Province of Quebec or its relationship to Canada—

The only effect of the amendment would be to transfer words from the preamble to clause 3.

It is obvious that the bill is restricted to the FLQ whose purpose is to bring about "a governmental change with respect to the Province of Quebec or its relationship to Canada" through force or violence.

The bill is not limited to Quebec but to the FLQ which seeks to accomplish a governmental change in Quebec or with respect to its relationship to Canada.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice a question.

If I am not mistaken, the amendment would delete the terms "à peu près". The amendment would read as follows:

—"un changement de gouvernement identique ou à peu près identiques."

Does the amendment of the hon. member strike out the words "à peu près"?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, Mr. Chairman, the last words of the amendment are:

—"changement de gouvernement identique ou à peu"

—but the following line will be the same, beginning with the word "près", so that both words are not struck out.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, this clause seems somewhat vague when it refers to " un changement de gouvernement identique ou à peu près identique à celui préconisé par ledit Front de libération du Québec." Either it is the same or not—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, lines 8 and 9 only are changed. Line 10 which starts with the word "près" remains the same. The amendment ends with the word "peu". Therefore, the words "à peu près" remain in the text.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice what would happen, for instance, if a similar situation occurred in another province. Would Bill C-181 apply anywhere in Canada or would it be limited to a particular territory?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the law will apply throughout Canada and will affect the FLQ or any successor association.

[Mr. Laprise.]

[English]

Mr. Gleave: What I really want to know, Mr. Chairman, is whether this amendment will limit the application of this measure to the province of Quebec.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No.

Mr. Gleave: Then what is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that the definition of the purpose of the FLQ is properly set out in clause 3 and does not merely depend upon the relationship between clause 3 and the second paragraph of the preamble. This was pointed out to me by the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for York South.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: Mr. Chairman, after reading clause 3 and the amendment, I remain quite puzzled because one might even wonder whether, in this clause, we really want to condemn the means used by the terrorists or whether it is not precisely the purpose sought by those resorting to these means. We seem to condemn both. The purpose might be highly commendable, but the means could be wrong.

After reading the amendment I find that this is anything but clear. We wonder where we are going. Which means that if, for instances, force and terrorism are used as a means to achieve another purpose, it would be accepted. Should the amendment not simply state that those who use or want to use force and violence as a means to achieve a purpose, are guilty anywhere in Canada?

Why should this legislation apply solely to Quebec? Why condemn all those using violence and terrorism to reach objectives that are not necessarily condemnable?

With this amendment and under section 3, the aim is condemnable as such. In fact, Section 3 reads in part as follows:

—any group of persons or association that advocates the use of force or the commission of crime as a means of or as an aid in accomplishing the same or substantially the same governmental change within Canada as that advocated—

I cannot see at all why the proposed change could be acceptable that is not what should be condemned but the means and it could be done by anybody even outside Quebec.

This amendment to Section 3 could be interpreted as meaning—as stated by the Quebec Minister of Justice—that the underworld could use terrorism, machine guns and bombs, that it is acceptable for underworld as we should not be unfair to them. But when it is a political matter, action is an absolute necessity. I quite agree on this but let us write a law designed to check violence and terrorism whatever the purposes. Indeed, one could very well resort to violence and terrorism for very noble objectives.

This is why I find this amendment complex and prejudicial to Quebeckers.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I agree with the hon. member that we should be against terrorism and crime. This bill only deals with force used or crime used to overthrow a government in Quebec with respect to the rest of Canada, whether by the FLQ or another association that might succeed it. I agree with the hon. member, but the target of this bill is the FLQ.

Mr. Matte: In other words, Mr. Chairman, in order that we may come to understand each other, we could easily, through this clause, attack the P.Q. for instance. What is the opinion of the hon. minister in that respect?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is only the overthrow of the government by persons or groups of persons who advocate the use of force or crime or violence, which is faced. Therefore—

Mr. Matte: Mr. Chairman, I understand as far as the use of force and terrorism is concerned. We all agree on that, there is no doubt about it. However, as to the second point, it is that we could eventually use it "as a means of accomplishing the same or substantially the same governmental change within Canada." The P.Q. could advocate "the same government change" as—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair wonders whether the hon. member for Champlain is discussing the amendment before the House or clause 3 itself. At the present time, we have before us an amendment which, if I correctly understand the English version, seems to link this legislation to the province of Quebec. At this stage, it might advisable not to go too far with other points that could have reference to clause 3.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, in reply to the question put by the hon. member, I should say that all the words have to be read as a whole. The bill is directed at the FLQ and any eventual successor group. The FLQ is defined as "any group of persons or association that advocates the use of force or the commission of crime as a means of accomplishing governmental change within Canada—" All these words have to be taken as a whole. The words "force" and "crime" cover everything.

I do not see the problem faced by the hon. member. I appreciate his viewpoint; however, I believe that he should not worry.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Chairman, may I ask an explanation from the Minister of Justice?

The words "the same governmental change" have an extensive and at the same time a quite restrictive meaning. What would happen, for instance, if some members of the FLQ kidnapped a prominent government figure or a member of Parliament to force the government to enact legislation designed to nationalize, let us say, Bell Canada? That could happen.

The words used now are "the same governmental change". A similar definition appears in the Criminal Code about sedition. What would happen if the FLQ resorted to violence to compel the government to enact legislation?

• (8:50 p.m.)

Let us take as an example the nationalization of Bell Canada. Suppose some people kidnap the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and tell this government: We shall not free the minister unless you nationalize Bell Canada. Would such a tactic be considered an effort aimed at a governmental change? Then, the law is neither comprehensive nor clear enough.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This would apply merely to a change or an overthrow of government. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it could not be clearer.

Mr. La Salle: Just one comment, Mr. Chairman. On page 1, line 11 of the bills it says:

> ...as a means of accomplishing governmental change within Canada with respect to the Province of Quebec...

Would it not be possible to simply say: "as a governmental change within Canada with respect to the provinces or their relationship to Canada"?

I do not see why the Province of Quebec is the only one mentioned, as if the FLQ could be active only in Quebec. I wonder if this is not simply a question of a special law for Quebec. I am aware that under the circumstances, this is maybe so...

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, according to the FLQ manifesto, its purpose is to overthrow by force the Quebec government or the Quebec government in relation to the rest of Canada, i.e. to separate Quebec from Canada by force.

In order to limit the object of this bill, only the FLQ is mentioned, the goals of which must be defined, namely overthrowing the Quebec government by force, by crime, or separating the Quebec government from the rest of Canada, by force or by crime.

Such are the goals of the FLQ and that is why the scope of the bill is so restricted.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put another question.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Joliette.

Mr. La Salle: I would like to ask the minister whether in his opinion the FLQ has any intention whatsoever of undermining the Canadian government.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I did not understand the question.

Mr. La Salle: I would like to know whether, in the view of the minister, the FLQ will attempt or has attempted to destroy the Canadian government.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Perhaps, in relation to Quebec, yes.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I would like to go back to the wording of the amendment which reads as follows:

—aid in accomplishing the same or substantially the same governmental change within Canada with respect to the province of Quebec or its relationship to Canada—

I have this question which I want to ask the minister: Let us suppose the FLQ or some other similar group advocated the use of force and terrorism as a means of supporting Canadian federalism, an assumption not provided for in the bill before us, what would happen? It could very well happen that a group of terrorists most anxious to reaffirm Canadian federalism could resort to force as a means of consolidating such a system.

An hon. Member: To oppose the other one.

Mr. Matte: When we discuss the purpose, it becomes obvious that we are off the track. What could the minister answer to that?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This is not provided for but the Criminal Code certainly has provisions with respect to the use of this type of violence.

Mr. Matte: Then why should we pass emergency legislation if everything is provided for in the Criminal Code?

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Hogarth) agreed to: Yeas, 95; nays, nil.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment carried. Shall clause 3 as amended carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Clause 3 as amended agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair is wondering whether it should not come back to clause 4 and ask if it is the wish of the committee to put the consequential amendment that was proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster. Does the committee agree that the Chair should put the amendment to clause 4?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 4—Offence and Punishment.

The Deputy Chairman: It is moved by the hon. member for New Westminster that clause 4 of Bill C-181 be amended as follows:

by striking out line 39 on page 3 and substituting the following: "Canada with respect to the province of Quebec or its relationship to Canada as that advocated by the unlaw—"

Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Amendment (Mr. Hogarth) agreed to.

Clause 4 as amended agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the preamble carry?

On the preamble.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, I would only like to suggest another wording without, however, bringing it in as an amendment. I would propose the following text:

ATTENDU que c'est la conviction indéfectible du Parlement du Canada que les hommes et les institutions demeurent libres seulement si la liberté a comme fondement le respect des valeurs morales et spirituelles et la suprématie du droit;

ET ATTENDU qu'un groupe de personnes ou une association qui s'appelle Front de Libération du Québec menace et compromet l'ordre public au Canada en préconisant de recourir à la force et au crime pour changer de régime politique du Québec et les rapports de cette province avec le reste du Canada, ou pour y contribuer, et qui, de fait, a eu recours aux meurtres, menaces de mort et enlèvements de même qu'à d'autres méthodes comme la contrainte, l'intimidation et la violence;

ET ATTENDU qu'à la suite de l'approbation par la Chambre des communes du Canada des mesures prises par Son Excellence le gouverneur général en conseil, en application de la Loi sur les mesures de guerre, pour mettre fin à la menace d'insurrection dans la province de Québec, étant bien entendu que l'autorité invoquée à cet égard ne devra être maintenue que provisoirement, le Parlement du Canada désire s'assurer que des mesures légales et efficaces soient prises et continuent de l'être contre ceux qui recherchent ainsi la destruction de notre régime démocratique, et convient en outre que toutes les mesures ci-après, jugées nécessaires en raison de l'état d'urgence actuelle, ne soient prises que sous l'autorité et en conformité d'une loi d'exception quant au fond et provisoire quant à son application.

Mr. Chairman, I did not want to suggest this version as an amendment, since after all one must profit from past experience. Also, having received a letter this morning from the chief translator of the legal division, I want to explain why I made certain remarks about the French wording of this bill.

I am very sorry I gave the impression by those remarks that I wanted to question the work or the competence of the legal translators.

I admit that the adamant and contemptuous attitude which my amendments met with made me lose my temper at times, and on some occasions my words went beyond my thoughts. This was an error on my part for which I beg the legal translators to forgive me, for they are often wrongly attacked and even imposed upon by people who are far from having their competence and who know nothing of their profession.

I admit that I have not sufficiently kept in mind, during my speeches, the conditions in which legislation is translated and the reasons why it is not possible, in some cases, to present a French version in which the translation is not felt.

Indeed, the federal legal system is strictly Anglo-Saxon, entirely based on common law, and this empiric and obscure labyrinth is so far from Cartesian thought and French clarity that the French have yet to find a translation for the words "common law".

Therefore, common law and the English legal language have absolutely nothing in common with French law or the French language and when translators are asked—as they are—to have the French version of a text of English criminal law correspond exactly with the English version, they are required to do an impossible thing.

When moreover, they are requested to do so in record time because those who drafted the English text took up practically the full time allowed for preparation of a bill to lick their style contorsions into shape, then I do not have to wonder who is flouting whom when it is claimed that both languages have equal rights. It is not only the translators who are being flouted, but also Canada's French-speaking community as a whole.

I offer no solution to the problem. I am merely stating an undeniable fact, which I consider to be worthy of consideration.

In concluding, I will repeat my most sincere apologies to our legal translators. If I have spoken of them unfairly, I ask their forgiveness as I had not the slightest intention of causing them prejudice. They are, as I know perfectly well, more skilled, hardworking and competent than many other public servants, although they get less consideration and retribution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (9:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I rise merely for two or three minutes to indicate that the preamble makes statements which some of us in this chamber do not accept as being facts of the situation in Canada, either now or on October 16 and the days that followed.

An hon. Member: They are Liberal facts.

Mr. Lewis: I rise merely to underline that the preamble states in the second paragraph:

AND WHEREAS the public order in Canada continues to be endangered—

Mr. Baldwin: That is not what Pierre says.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, there has not been any evidence given by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice at any time during these discussions—

Mr. Gibson: Of course there has.

Mr. Lewis: —not the slightest evidence, to justify the statement that the public order in Canada continues to be endangered. There has been evidence that in the province of Quebec there has functioned, and probably still functions, a criminal conspiracy called le Front de Libération du Québec that has engaged in awful criminal acts which every Canadian and every member of this Parliament condemns. But, Mr. Chairman, there has been no evidence to support the kind of thing this preamble says.

All through the debate on this bill, both on second reading and at committee stage, I have been waiting to hear from the minister statements of fact justifying the reintroduction of the repressive legislation which we have now under the War Measures Act. This reintroduction in the form of a new law, even though it is limited in time, serves merely to reinforce the point we have made many times. I am certain that the Canadian people are beginning to realize now, and will increasingly realize, that they were got given the information to which they were entitled for the introduction of so reactionary and repressive a measure as the War Measures Act and so reactionary and repressive a measure as has been discussed in committee clause by clause.

The Minister of Justice has not given us anything to justify this measure at the present time. There is no evidence that the public order or Canada is being threatened at this time. There is evidence of the failure of the police to find kidnappers and murderers; there is ample evidence of that. There is evidence of the failure of the police authorities to find the members and supporters of the FLQ. But there is no evidence to support the statement in the second paragraph of this preamble.

An hon. Member: What does your mail say?

Mr. Lewis: There was no evidence, Mr. Chairman, at the time when the War Measures Act was introduced—

An hon. Member: That is enough.

Mr. Lewis: —nor was there evidence at the time when the War Measures Act was proclaimed, that there was a state of apprehended insurrection in the province of Quebec.

Time and time again we have asked the government to explain what it meant by the statement that there was confusion in Quebec; what it meant by the statement that there was an erosion of will in Quebec; what certain ministers of the government meant by stating that the CBC was controlled by the FLQ; what they meant by stating that every high place in Quebec was infiltrated by FLQ; what they meant by statements such as that made by the Minister of Justice, that, the people of Canada will never understand the reason for it unless they are given all the information. Since October 16 none of these statements have been explained and none of the information to which the people of Canada are entitled has been brought forward. There was no evidence of an apprehended insurrection on October 16, and there is no evidence that the public order of Canada is threatened today.

As far as I am concerned, and I am sure as far as my colleagues are concerned, the preamble makes statements that have not been proven to this Parliament or to the people of Canada. I could not let it pass without repeating my condemnation of the government for its failure to give the information and my apprehension about a government that reintroduces the evil, repressive measures of the War Measures Act in this bill without even finding it necessary to tell Parliament or the people of Canada exactly what makes this kind of repressive measure necessary at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the preamble carry?

Preamble agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Title agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Bill reported.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I shall be voting for the third reading of this bill but I shall not be voting happily. I shall be voting for it because it is a temporary measure, because despite its weaknesses it is an improvement on the War Measures Act. Above all, I shall be voting for it because it gets rid of the War Measures Act, the invocation of which has not yet been justified by this government. Those are my reasons for voting for the bill on third reading. I want to make it perfectly clear to the government, to this house and to the people of Canada—

An hon. Member: You had better find a better one than that.

Mr. Stanfield: Did I hear somebody over there say, "You had better have a better one than that"?

Mr. Ricard: The member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay).

Mr. Stanfield: Well, you had better have a better one than this. I want to make it perfectly clear that this is not a good law. It has serious faults, and in one way at least it is a very bad piece of legislation. It is very bad despite all the demands of the members of this House, despite the demands of many independently-minded citizens of this country and despite the demands even of a majority of delegates to last weekend's Liberal convention in Ottawa.

• (9:10 p.m.)

This government has stubbornly refused even to consider the establishment of an independent review commission to guard against abuses in the operation of this act. Today the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that in some way this would involve, on our part, an act of mistrust toward the government of Quebec. It is this Parliament and not the National Assembly of Quebec which has this legislation before it, legislation which we all recognize abridges on a temporary basis the civil rights of Canadians. This Parliament is responsible for taking this action. I submit that it is not too much for members of this Parliament to demand, as we have demanded, that there be guarantees against abuse.

An hon. Member: But you will vote for the bill.

Mr. Stanfield: It is suggested that somehow this would involve a lack of respect on our part for the government of the province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that I suffer from a very grave lack of respect for any government which will not provide for a reasonable review in connection with the abrogation of civil rights, as provided in this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It follows from this that I lack respect for the government of Canada, for the government of Quebec and for my hon. friends opposite. The government of Quebec and perhaps the governments of other provinces will be using the special powers passed by this Parliament. I do not see how it can be said that it would somehow be derogatory to the province of Quebec if we were to insist upon an independent board of review. I have not heard any member opposite seriously try to justify the absence of an adequate review provision. Not one member has risen in his place, sir, and really attempted to justify the absence of a board of review, although I notice that quite a number of them tried to hide behind the Constitution and constitutional provisions that just do not exist.

Mr. McCleave: That is right.

Mr. Stanfield: There is no question at all that jurisdiction over criminal procedure lies with this Parliament. If for any reason it seems to the government to be more politic to have such a board of review established by the government of the province of Quebec rather than by this Parliament, then let it obtain that assurance from that province. The government's attitude and the Prime Minister's attitude today was that a committee of civil libertarians should be allowed to visit the jails. The suggestion that this constitutes an adequate arrangement for review is nothing short of fraudulent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I say, Mr. Speaker, that anybody who pretends that a committee of civil libertarians constitutes an adequate board of review deserves nothing but the contempt of this House. I say that the government's attitude toward this proposal has been at least consistent with its attitude toward all the other proposals put forward by parties in the opposition. Obviously, the word went out that there should be no changes whatsoever in the bill except in so far as they might be put forward by the government itself. Why is that, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. Member: Vote against the bill, then.

Mr. Ricard: Hon. members over there are to dumb to understand anything.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the opposition have shown their good faith in voting for the principle of the bill on second reading. Why is there all this stubbornness?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I might say that all the static from the rabble opposite is a pretty good indication of their present attitude.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gibson: What about the thousands of letters sent to us?

Mr. Stanfield: Why is there this stubbornness? Is it an indication of some god-like complex on the part of the government, or is it simply the result of the cocksureness of a government that believes it is not capable of error? Others may be subject to human error, but not this government!

Mr. Woolliams: They think they have the divine right to rule.

Mr. Stanfield: Part of the reason, I suggest, is that the government has become blindly arrogant in this matter. I say again that I have no choice but to vote for the measure if I want to get rid of the War Measures Act and the regulations under that act. I certainly want to do that. But I warn the government that we in the opposition will not forget the contempt that it has shown for Parliament, the contempt it has shown for the rights of individuals in this country and the contempt it has shown for the right of the public to be involved in this whole affair.

We shall be demanding an accounting from this government on behalf of all the people of Canada. The government has refused to establish an independent board of review, and no doubt it will also refuse our demands for an independent commission of inquiry to look into this whole sorry mess. If it were less arrogant it would not dare refuse that request. The arrogance of this government and its supporters passes all understanding, and therefore it is hard to say with any assurance what it may or may not dare to do.

An hon. Member: Why vote for the bill, then?

Mr. Stanfield: So, Mr. Speaker, it is with regret that I have to vote for this measure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Stanfield: I shall vote for this measure in order to get rid of the War Measures Act. But I want to make it clear, most emphatically, that I am not doing so out of any sense of confidence in this government, because I have no confidence in it whatsoever.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the third reading of the temporary emergency powers bill constitutes the final chapter in the legislative program which began with the kidnapping of James Cross and the kidnapping and murder of Pierre Laporte. Nevertheless, this is not the final chapter in so far as the consequences which will flow from the action which the government has taken are concerned. I submit that for years to come the results will be seen in the province of Quebec, where extraordinary powers have been abused and used for political intimidation and harassment.

In years to come historians will scan the record to see what evidence the government had of an apprehended insurrection. I suggest, sir, that they will scan the record in vain. They may find the apprehended insurrection as groundless as the imaginary military coup which the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King dreamed up in order to frighten some of his ministers into supporting him on the conscription issue.

I want to point out that throughout this entire discussion, beginning with October 16, the position taken by the New Democratic Party has been consistent and clear-cut. On October 16 we made it clear that we had two objections to the resolution which was introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on that day. The first was that we had received no evidence whatsoever that there was a state of apprehended insurrection in Canada. We still have no such evidence.

I think it is rather significant that when the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson was asked on television to endorse the government's action in invoking the War Measures Act, he refused to do so on the ground that he did not have sufficient information. The former Prime Minister is in exactly the same position as the rest of us. We did not have information on October 16, and we still do not have any information that would justify curtailing the liberties of 21 million Canadians because of a state of apprehended insurrection which has neither been proven nor outlined.

Our second objection to invoking the War Measures Act was that we claimed that the regulations passed under the War Measures Act constituted an unnecessary abridgment of civil liberties in this country. The best proof of that is the bill which is now before us. The government has introduced legislation which is less repressive and less arbitrary than the regulations under the War Measures Act. The provisions in the regulations under the War Measures Act which were most heinous have been somewhat softened in the legislation now before us.

In the debate on the War Measures Act, members of this party maintained that the government could have acted under the provisions of the Criminal Code. There are adequate provisions there dealing with treason, seditious intention, seditious conspiracy, possession of offensive weapons and so on, which adequately provide the government with the necessary powers to deal with a terrorist conspiracy in the province of Quebec. As an alternative, we suggested that if the government wanted additional powers they should have asked Parliament for additional police powers. There were two powers which we indicated might be necessary: first, on a temporary basis to extend the length of time of detention and, second, to permit without warrant the search of private dwellings for explosives and other offensive weapons.

The Prime Minister wrote the party leaders asking for suggestions with respect to either temporary or permanent legislation to deal with emergencies. In a letter to the Prime Minister dated October 23, I set forth on behalf of the members of this party the additional powers we were prepared to grant on a temporary basis along with the safeguards which we insisted should accompany any additional powers granted to the police authorities.

When the government introduced Bill C-181 which is now before us, we voted for second reading of that bill because we had committed ourselves to considering the request of the government for additional powers if the government could justify the need for more powers. I quote what I said in the House of Commons on November 4, as recorded at page 893 of Hansard:

> I think we have to question whether such restrictive legislation is required in a situation which the government itself contends no longer constitutes an insurrection. I think Parliament should grant the police the powers necessary to apprehend terrorists and kidnappers, but I do not think the government has shown us that it needs powers as wide and as repressive as those which are contained in this legislation.

At that time the members of my party said that we had serious misgivings about this legislation. We thought it was too arbitrary and too repressive. In our opinion, up to that time the government had not given any justification for declaring that public order in this country was in danger. Since we said we were prepared to consider the request of the government for additional powers which they felt were not contained in the Criminal Code, we allowed that legislation to come before the Committee of the Whole in order that in Committee we might get two things from the government—some justification for the declaration that public order was endangered and the more repressive and heinous sections of this bill removed or at least modified.

Every member of this House knows the result of the debate which took place in Committee of the Whole. The minister was completely adamant and inflexible. He refused to accept a single amendment presented by the opposition parties. The most reasonable requests were rejected out of hand. The government used its huge majority to smother every attempt to make this legislation less repressive and less objectionable. The result is that on third reading we have before us a measure which in the opinion of this party is completely unacceptable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It is unacceptable because the legislation goes far beyond the additional temporary powers to detain and search without warrant which we talked about at the time the War Measures Act was invoked. This legislation still retains the power to hold a person who has been arrested for 90 days before a date for trial is set. A person can not only be held for 90 days without bail, but if the trial is set some time in advance, bail can still be denied. An accused person could be detained for months before being given the opportunity to have his day in court and have the properly constituted authorities decide whether he is innocent or guilty.

• (9:30 p.m.)

The second feature of this bill to which we take strong exception is that it takes from the judiciary the right to grant bail and vests that power in the Attorneys General of the provinces. When an accused person asks for bail, the agent of the Attorney General is the prosecutor; he can give the court the reasons why in his opinion no bail should be granted. What the minister has done under this legislation is to make the Attorney General and his agent not only the prosecutor but also the judge and the jury; they have not only the right to argue against bail being granted but the right to deny bail no matter what the court might think.

In defending this indefensible piece of legislation the minister has trotted out a new doctrine of justice, that of political accountability. I say that this is the most dangerous and the most sinister doctrine I have ever heard outlined in this Chamber. The minister says the Attorney General, to whom this legislation gives the right to deny bail, is accountable. To whom? He is accountable to the legislature in which his colleagues have a majority. Mr. Speaker, that is not a great measure of accountability.

Second, the minister says the members of the legislature are accountable to the electorate. But what if the majority of the electors do not agree with the ideas of the accused? Is the fate of accused persons to be determined by a show of hands? Are we to have people's courts in this country as they have in mainland China? Are we going back to the days of the Roman mob when a man's fate depended on whether the crowd held their thumbs up or turned them down?

We in Canada have been proud that under our system of justice any individual, though the majority of the community might disagree with him, has the right to be tried before a competent court of jurisdiction, by due process of law. The minister now tells us that accused persons will be judged by a count of heads, a show of hands. If the minister's theory of political accountability is put into effect, what will happen to minorities? The measure of a country's system of justice does not depend on the rights granted to majorities. The measure of a nation's sensitivity to justice depends on the rights it grants to minorities—even to a minority of one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): If we come to a point where the treatment of an accused person is determined by a political officer and is dependent on political accountability to elected members and the electorate, we have moved from the idea of the rights of a minority to a position in which we allow the majority to determine what happens to an accused. I say that the government, by this legislation, is substituting political justice administered by elected officers for judicial justice administered by persons who are free from political pressure and political influence.

Our third objection to this legislation relates to the retroactive feature in clause 8 which we say is abhorrent to all who believe in basic civil liberties. This clause states that mere presence at FLQ meetings some time in the past warrants a presumption of guilt and constitutes proof that an accused person is a member of the FLQ unless he can prove otherwise. If he cannot prove otherwise, he is liable to five years' imprisonment.

How does one prove that one is not a member of an organization, Mr. Speaker? How does one prove a negative? This is the one clause in the bill on which I thought the minister would relent, because it is the one part of this legislation with regard to which there has been almost unanimous condemnation. I notice that the Attorney General of Ontario, Mr. Wishart, speaking in the legislature said he hoped Parliament would amend the retroactive feature of the new bill which requires a person who had attended meetings of the FLQ to prove he is not a member of that organization. I notice that the former Premier of Quebec, Mr. Bertrand, said he objected to the retroactive clause because, and I quote:

> It places the onus of guilt on persons who "used to be members of the FLQ one or two years ago" before the movement was declared outlawed.

He added:

> There is a danger here to human liberties—liberties which have taken men ages to acquire.

Almost every reputable newspaper and most of the outstanding editors of this country have condemned the retroactive features which are to be found in this legislation.

I believe the bill before us is even more dangerous because it represents a delegation of powers to persons who are not accountable to this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): During the time this legislation was going through committee of the whole, the minister gave us bland assurances on almost every clause that our fears in this respect were not well founded. The fact is, of course, that the administration of this bill will not be in his hands; it will be in the hands of the Attorneys General of the province, in particular, of the Attorney General of the province of Quebec.

I recall that on November 4 when I was speaking on second reading of this bill, the minister interrupted me to contend that the Bill of Rights was still in effect in spite of the fact that the War Measures Act had been invoked. If this is true, the Attorney General of the province of Quebec has been breaking the law for weeks on end, and I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) what he has done about it. Has he raised his voice? Has he done anything? Day after day when we asked the minister about the fact that persons detained in Quebec have been held incommunicado—and the Attorney General of that province has publicly so admitted—he said he would convey our concern to the Attorney General of Quebec.

The Prime Minister talked today about the review committee which had been set up in the province of Quebec. That committee has made some reports on its activities. Mr. Jacques Hébert, president of the Civil Liberties Union, stated publicly that, contrary to what they had been told by the Attorney General of Quebec, they found that very few of the prisoners' families had been apprised of the situation or advised that they had the right to visit. Mr. Hébert said that the committee had been told by several prisoners that they had been victims of psychological and sometimes physical methods that are absolutely unacceptable.

When I raised the matter in the House, the Minister of Justice said, "Well, that is the responsibility of the Attorney General of Quebec". When I asked the minister whether he would investigate the statement made by Mr. Jacques Hébert and his committee and report back to the House, the minister said that he would consider it. He has never replied in the House nor told us what was the result of his investigations into the treatment of the persons who were detained. The fact is that the powers granted under the War Measures Act have been abused, and abused abominably. The author of those regulations, the Minister of Justice, has merely stood in this House ringing his hands like an outraged virgin.

This is what has happened since October 16. Ninety per cent of those arrested and detained have been released, presumably because they were innocent. Many of them have lost their jobs, their reputations, and I am afraid in some cases have lost their faith in the system of justice in this country. The powers that were granted under the War Measures Act have been used to settle old political scores and to harass political opponents. It is not without significance that many of the people who were picked up were members of the FRAP organization, a municipal political organization that was endeavouring to get some seats on the municipal council in opposition to the overwhelming majority of Mayor Drapeau.

It is also not without significance that a large number of those picked up belonged to the Parti Quebecois. I disagree heartily with the separatists of Quebec or of any other province. I think that anyone who wants to take Quebec or any other province out of confederation is stupid. But as long as those who advocate such policies propose to do so by constitutional and democratic means, they have as much right to express their views as any member in this House. If they can be abused, harassed and detained, then it is only a matter of time till other groups get exactly the same treatment. Individuals have been kept in prison anywhere from three to 21 days, then interrogated for a few minutes and dismissed. But dismissed embittered, and having lost faith in the judicial process in this country.

The Attorney General of the province of Quebec is already showing an appetite for more arbitrary powers; he is now asking for emergency powers for the provinces which they can invoke on their own without having to refer to the federal government or the federal Parliament. He is asking for censorship of the press, for exceptional powers of arrest and for identification cards which will require every citizen to be photographed and fingerprinted. He is now talking of taking action against teachers who are accused of political indoctrination in the classroom. Who is to decide what is political indoctrination? What started out as a measure to stop terrorist activity is now moving into repression against ideas.

When you start to suppress ideas, to decide what teachers will teach and what students will study, then you have started down the road toward a police state.

The Attorney General of Quebec says that the powers for which he asks "are not to remove civil liberties but to give us an efficient police force". The police force does not need more power; it needs more competence. We all remember the persons who were arrested on the basis of mistaken identity, and the police who raided the house of the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) at four o'clock in the morning. It may be that to the police in Quebec the Secretary of State is a suspicious looking character, and it may be that Westmount is a questionable area. But surely the police in Quebec ought to know who is the Secretary of State for Canada and where he lives. If he can be treated in that way, then can you imagine what would happen to an humble citizen living in St. Jacques or St. Henri.

Let me speak bluntly. The antics of the police in Quebec during the last few weeks have made the Keystone cops look like James Bond. These are the law enforcement bodies to whom the Minister of Justice is now handing powers that could result in unjust imprisonment, arbitrary arrest and conviction on the basis of past association. This is why we have been pressing the government, as have members throughout the opposition, to set up an independent commission, board of review or tribunal to ensure that the powers granted by this Parliament will not be abused.

I am going to move the following amendment, and then if I have time left I will take a few moments to say something about it. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That Bill C-181 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of reconsidering clause 12 with a view to the inclusion therein of a provision for the establishment of an independent body to review the administration under the said bill.

• (9:50 p.m.)

The Prime Minister said yesterday in the House, and last night on television, that the setting up of an independent body to ensure that the powers under this legislation were not abused would constitute a lack of confidence in the government of Quebec and, particularly, a lack of confidence in the Attorney General of Quebec. That is a specious argument. Let us look at the logic of the situation. The province of Quebec asked the government of Canada for extraordinary powers. It was given those powers under the War Measures Act. The government of Canada is now asking Parliament to give to the province of Quebec extraordinary powers. I submit that before this Parliament is asked to give such arbitrary and extraordinary powers to any provincial government we have the right to insist that extraordinary safeguards shall be written into that legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It is not a matter of whether we trust the Attorney General of Quebec or of any other province. I would not be prepared to give these wide, sweeping powers to any Attorney General whether he be in the province of Quebec, Manitoba or any other province of Canada, because the Attorney General of a province is accountable only to his own legislature. We are being asked to pass this legislation. Surely there ought to be a body accountable to us which will supervise the exercise of these powers and see they are used with proper discretion so as to safeguard the civil liberties of the citizens of Canada.

When the Prime Minister says, as he did this afternoon during the question period, that the opposition parties in asking for such a review board are indicating a lack of confidence in Quebec, or we are trying to make Quebec a colonial state, I ask the government whether the delegates attending the Liberal policy conference this weekend tried to insult the province of Quebec and make it a colonial state. Were they as ignorant of the Constitution as we are on this side? Did the delegates attending that conference not understand the implications of this situation?

Surely the hon. members opposite tried to persuade the delegates to accept the government's rejection of this proposal, but could not do it because even their own members attending the conference know perfectly well that it runs contrary to all the sense of decency which Canadian people have that such powers should be given to any man or any government without some safeguards to protect the innocent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): To tell us that a committee of volunteers through the John Howard Society or the Civil Liberties Association will do this without any power and without any authority, who can be kicked out of office and be treated as Mr. Jacques Hébert of the Civil Liberties Association has been treated in Quebec, is not good enough. They could not even get the facts or the truth, and I could not even get a report from the Minister of Justice. Is this the travesty we are to have in respect of a review of these powers?

I say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that we have had some black pages in Canadian history in respect of violations of basic human rights. In 1919, at the time of the Winnipeg general strike, we had the deportation orders. In the 1930s we had prosecutions under section 98 which outlawed the Communist Party, drove it underground and put men in jail. During the war we had regulations under the War Measures Act which allowed the picking up of Canadian Japanese, interning them and confiscating their property, although at the end of the war the Prime Minister of Canada at that time had to stand up and say there was not one proven case of sabotage by any Canadian Japanese. These are not things we like to look back on.

An hon. Member: Why do you bring them up, then?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I will tell the hon. member why we bring them up. Then we had the padlock law, a vicious restraint of our civil rights. Now the Minister of Justice is to add his name to this catalogue of wrongs and injustices. I say to the minister he will be remembered in Canadian history as the man who in this critical hour did more to destroy the civil liberties of the people of this country than has ever been done before in peacetime. It is not enough in normal times for the minister to go to seminars and teach-ins.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member although his time has not quite expired. Some hon. members have brought to the attention of the Chair that it is ten o'clock. I will not put the motion now because I have a slight reservation about it. It may not be too important, but it seems to me that the hon. member has proposed an amendment which may be doubtful in that it refers to clause 12. It may be clause 14 the hon. member should attempt to amend. Perhaps it is the Bill of Rights that the hon. member is attempting to amend. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) seems to agree with my suspicion. If it is the Bill of Rights the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) wishes to amend, he cannot do it by an amendment to clause 12 of the bill.

In any event, it is such an important matter that I would want to consider it, and I will not declare the amendment out of order without hearing argument. The hon. member might consider in the meantime whether it would not be easier to move an amendment to the effect that Bill C-181 be sent back to Committee of the Whole for the purpose of reconsidering clause 14, rather than clause 12.

In any event, it being ten o'clock, a motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been made.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—NON-PAYMENT OF MINIMUM WAGE—RETIRED EMPLOYEES' PENSIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, on November 4 I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) a question regarding the payment of less than the minimum federal wage to employees of the Chateau Laurier Hotel in Ottawa. The minister replied:

I expressed this opinion two weeks ago and gave my department the authority to proceed in the matter in the usual manner. I refer to the application of the rules and regulations under which the Department of Labour normally proceeds in such cases. I presume that advice is now being sought from the appropriate department in regard to proceeding further.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question dealt with the Canadian National pension plan. But speaking first to the original question put to the Minister of Labour, it appears at this time, which is more than two weeks after November 4, that the situation at the Chateau Laurier Hotel has not been clarified. It is my information that there is hesitation on the part of some departments of government to take any action to find out whether the Chateau Laurier Hotel falls within federal or provincial jurisdiction. It is very ironic, to say the least, that at one time the CNR Chateau Laurier Hotel was quite prepared to be within federal jurisdiction so far as the payment of wages and other conditions were concerned, but now that the federal minimum wage is more than the provincial minimum wage they have the audacity to suggest that they are under provincial jurisdiction.

Even though there may be a case in Canada—I understand there is one in Alberta in respect of Jasper Lodge—regarding whether or not a certificate of collective bargaining can be granted under provincial or federal legislation, I cannot understand why the appropriate department of government will not move in respect of the Chateau Laurier Hotel and decide that it should be governed by federal legislation.

A supplementary question was asked of the minister in respect of the CNR pension plan. In view of the CNR labour-management question which is before the country, and the fact that labour is asking that pensions be put on the bargaining table, I think it is only right that we be assured that the CNR will consider putting its pension plan on the bargaining table.

We are aware that the unanimous report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, which in effect took no position concerning collective bargaining, suggested that persons already on pension should be given the same consideration that pensioners received some time ago. At the same time it was suggested that there should be an escalator clause. This suggestion received the unanimous agreement of the House of Commons. It would seem appropriate therefore, that a minister should answer to the House in respect of whether Canadian National plans to do something similar about its pension plan. I am given to understand that Canadian National has communicated with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), but neither the Minister of Labour nor the Parliamentary Secretary would be in a position to answer for the Minister of Transport so I shall defer that question until another time. The most important questions at this time are why the Chateau Laurier is not paying the federal minimum wage, and why no action is being taken on the part of the Canadian National management to act at least in part on the recommendations of the committee which were adopted unanimously so far as pension plan is concerned.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, within its jurisdiction, this government is determined to provide decent wage standards for the working people of Canada. While 30 per cent of Canadian workers are organized, the percentage stands at 50 per cent in those industries within federal jurisdiction. Many workers, particularly in the unorganized sector, are in low-paying jobs. Some time ago the federal government established minimum wage legislation. Periodically, this federal minimum wage has been increased. Today it stands at $1.65 an hour, the highest in Canada.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) believes it is a major responsibility of the government to continue to assure, by law, an adequate minimum wage and to secure compliance with the rules and regulations which form the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. The Department of Labour and the minister support the view that Crown corporations like the CNR are bound to comply with the federal minimum wage legislation, as are all other industries coming within federal jurisdiction.

A short while ago the minister instructed his officials to proceed with action designed to establish beyond all doubt the obligation of the CNR to pay at least the federal minimum wage. It is not the minister's prerogative to determine in law whether federal minimum wage statutes apply to all phases of Canadian National operations. Without any doubt, however, if legal ambiguities are resolved in favour of federal jurisdiction, the Minister of Labour will continue to enforce vigorously federal minimum wage provisions on behalf of all Canadian National employees.

With respect to the hon. member's other observations, the Department of Labour shares with him a hope that the outstanding differences between the CNR and its employees will be resolved satisfactorily. The minister has stated in this House that the report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications should be required reading, not only by the CNR but also by the unions in view of the report's wide-ranging recommendations for both management and labour.

One current dispute between the CNR and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers is at the conciliation stage, as is a dispute between the CPR and the same union. Other disputes between the CNR and the unions representing most other categories of railway employees are at the direct negotiation stage, that is, no conciliation officer or board has been appointed. The specific question of pensions is dealt with in the demands presented by most unions involved in the current negotiations. The Department of Labour's industry specialist, Mr. Arthur Gibbons, is keeping in very close touch with the parties and the proceedings. The government is sure that both parties realize the importance of the negotiations. I thank the hon. member for directing these important inquiries to the Department of Labour.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY—GENERAL DE GAULLE'S FUNERAL

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the question I asked last week was rather important although it was received with indifference by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Since 1968 we have been getting used to that eloquent silence which is a manifestation of the childish and offhand streak in his personality. The carnations (oeillets) that he often wears in his buttonhole do not make us forget the blinkers (oeillères) on both sides of his head. He refuses to see anything but his own opinions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would call on the hon. member to speak on the question to be discussed at the present time. The hon. member must be relevant, that is, deal with the question which he had asked in the House earlier. As he has not received the reply which he expected, he is entitled under Standing Orders to discuss the matter later, but he must only deal with the subject of the question.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mr. Matte: Why, Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister keep silent instead of answering the questions that are put to him? It is a rather simple question. Had he any reasons for refusing to attend General de Gaulle's official funeral? Is it because all the eminent chiefs of State went to Paris on that occasion that the Canadian Prime Minister has not deigned to do so? Does he have any complexes in front of Nixon, Heath, Kosygin, Saragat and the pleiad of other chiefs of State? Does he question the value of the greatest man of contemporary history? Why turn up his nose at the remains of the one who had the last word with such famous men as Churchill, Roosevelt and Stalin? Why does he not recognize France's great saviour?

Some concepts of the General undoubtedly gave rise to discussions, if not dissensions, but are those sufficient reasons to show the whole world such pettiness? The President of the United States has not always been in agreement with the General, nor has the British Prime Minister. Yet, they were there. So was the head of the U.S.S.R. Such occasions are surely not the right time for a show of petty spite.

It took a prime minister like ours to dare bring shame to our country. God knows that the prime minister is fond of travelling. He goes here and there, skiing, scuba-diving, cruising, etc. He keeps saying that he wants his privacy to be respected. We know how he has run down newspapermen—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member. I have recognized him for a question and not a speech on the subject of the Prime Minister. The matter before us now is General de Gaulle's funeral and not whether the Prime Minister has answered the question or not.

The hon. member might perhaps on another occasion ask the Prime Minister why he did not answer his question. If there is no answer he will be able to give notice to the Chair and discuss the matter later. At present the matter under consideration is the funeral of General de Gaulle and this has nothing to do with the silence of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to justify the question.

Does the immobility of the Prime Minister on that occasion become as sensational as his social activities and his trips? Never has a country been represented in such a strange way. Therefore it is important that we should be told the true reasons of his refusal to attend the funeral of General de Gaulle. France and Canada have many reasons to maintain frank and sincere ties of friendship. Pettiness, spite, differences of opinion must not alter these ties. It can be said that this is a tempest in a teapot; I will answer that very often such tempests mark the beginning of useless hostilities.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister should speak frankly. He does not have any valid reasons to offer—as his silence implies—he should say so frankly. In the meantime, he can always draw inspiration by reading General de Gaulle's memoirs.

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister and of his Parliamentary Secretary the hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson), who are both presently attending a meeting here in Ottawa with representatives of the American government, I wanted to answer the hon. member for Champlain, but, after the Chair's two appropriate reminders, I think I have nothing to add.

I would have gladly brought to the attention of the Prime Minister or of his Parliamentary Secretary the remarks of the hon. member for Champlain, but really there is nothing to draw anyone's attention to. I only have to say that the Canadian government was very honourably represented at the funeral of General de Gaulle by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp).

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—PERFORMANCE OF ILLEGAL ABORTION ON PROGRAM "WEEKEND"

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) a three-part question regarding last evening's CBC "Weekend" program. For reasons known only to himself, the minister decided to ignore the question and not answer, but I hope an answer will be given this evening for I am sure that if the minister had seen this program he would have felt the same concern and disgust as I did. It is of little use to express this concern to the CBC's officials, Mr. Speaker, for these officials have even more disregard for the representations of citizens and MPs than the minister.

Part of the program in question to which I am objecting was the presentation of an abortion, beginning with a call from a girl in Vancouver to a Los Angeles abortion clinic, continuing with the surgical intervention, the vacuum suction procedure of the abortion, and ending with the post-surgical care to the patient. My first question, Mr. Speaker, is whether the performers in this presentation were paid directly or indirectly for their performance in a criminal, illegal abortion, but many more questions come to mind. Was the patient an ordinary individual really going through an abortion, or was she an actress? Were her abortion fees, air fare and other expenses paid with taxpayers' money? How was this young lady found, and how did the CBC stage the event? Did the doctors or the clinic receive any direct or indirect remuneration from the CBC? Was the program seen and/or approved by top CBC management?

At the end of the program the CBC announced a proposed opinion poll, the results to be shown next week. Mr. Speaker, I am curious to know if this poll will be taken to influence public opinion rather than report on it. Is the patient, coming from Vancouver, part of the diabolical plot involving that group of ignorant young ladies who gave Your Honour such a trying time and showed such disrespect for this House and the democratic process earlier this year?

Is this program part of such a plot to influence public opinion, or is it the reflection of sympathy by the producer and some CBC officials for the cause of free abortion? Their stupidity in contravening the proposed House of Commons debate by showing a program in such bad taste is morally offensive to very many Canadians. Mr. Speaker, the minister, I submit will be party to the connivance if he allows this report to be shown, probably after much editing, many staged interviews and the usual rating-affecting, distorted impact scenes have been taken. If the top CBC officials have any such control, then surely they are prostituting their mandate by agreeing to such programs.

The final part of my question, Mr. Speaker, asked the purpose for which this program was produced. Is the reason justifiable, or is this just another attempt by the CBC to influence program ratings by showing another program offensive to the morals of many Canadian viewers who pay for this nonsense? With each new, additional and questionable program of this type, Mr. Speaker, the goals, objectives and purposes of our national networks become more and more suspect. One network, the CBC, seems intent on the destruction of the moral values and fibre of our society. The other branch of the corporation, Radio Canada, seems intent on the destruction of our elected governmental bodies and our democratic system.

It is true that Parliament has given the top CBC management an autonomy which practically places this organization out of reach of all authority. Unless those responsible can stop delegating their authority to all sorts of irresponsible people down the line, and unless they have the courage and judgment to accept their responsibility and make the decisions necessary to stop this gross abuse of our national television system, they should resign. No program which offends the morals of people is justifiable, and this latest example goes much beyond the bounds of decency and objective programming.

I hope that the minister will insist on full answers and explanations with regard to these questions and will accept the duty inherent in his position of giving explanations to the House. I am supported, Mr. Speaker, in this submission by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Sullivan) and many other hon. members.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the reply from the corporation is as follows: The question of legal abortion has been a matter of public interest for some time now. It was one of the questions discussed very recently at the Liberal party convention, and the CBC considers that the "Weekend" item was entirely justified. No performers were used in the item, nor were fees paid by the corporation to any of the participants. The CBC, however, did pay the American producers of the item in Los Angeles. The opinion poll commissioned by 'Weekend" will be carefully taken over a number of weeks, not just next week, to discover what public opinion is with regard to the question of abortion legislation.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EARLY BUDGET WITH MEASURES TO FIGHT UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Finance yet made any decision on whether he will produce an early budget with a view to indicating the measures that the government proposes to take to fight unemployment and get the economy moving forward?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no such decision has been made at this time.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the Minister of Finance whether he proposes to make an early decision and bring some plans forward shortly, or are we to go through the winter unemployment first before he decides to move?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, as usual—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benson: As usual—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Apart from deciding whether to bring in a budget, has the government decided to decide on whether to get the economy moving?

INVESTIGATION OF STEEL PRICE INCREASES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, last week when the Steel Company of Canada announced price increases ranging up to 5.3 per cent I asked the Prime Minister whether he would consider asking the steel companies to withhold any increases until an investigation had been made in order to decide whether these increases were justified. The Prime Minister said he would consider the proposal. Has he given consideration to that suggestion, and what decision has been reached?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am afraid not, Mr. Speaker. I asked that the question be followed up, but I have not given consideration to any suggestion which might have come my way. I have not seen any yet.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since Algoma Steel has announced that it is raising its prices and other steel companies have indicated that they will follow suit, and in view of the announcement yesterday indicating that the profits of the four leading steel companies have increased by 27.8 per cent in the first nine months of this year, will the Prime Minister undertake to have this profit position investigated to see whether or not any price increase at all was required by the steel industry of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: It was my understanding, subject to correction, that the Prices and Incomes Commission said it would investigate these rises in prices.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Will the Prime Minister urge the steel companies to withhold these price increases until the Prices and Incomes Commission has completed its report, and will that report be made public?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as I answered in the first part of my reply, it depends on what consideration has been given. The element which I think would need to be elucidated is whether or not these prices increases are compatible with the principles accepted earlier this year by all that sector of the economy, to wit, whether they would increase the margin between their price increases and the cost increases. I do not as yet have that information. I know that their costs rose considerably because of the labour factor, but I am not aware of the increase or otherwise of the discrepancy.

NATIONAL SECURITY

USE OF U THANT AS MEDIATOR TO SECURE RELEASE OF JAMES CROSS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Does the Canadian government intend to ask U Thant, Secretary-General of the United Nations, to act as mediator in order to obtain an agreement providing for the release of James Cross in exchange for that of the so-called political prisoners, as required by the FLQ?

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the question raised by the hon. member for Shefford is of direct concern to the Secretary-General of the United Nations. The latter has indicated that he was available to act as intermediary in some cases, but that the request should come from a government and not from a criminal organization.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rondeau: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Since such a request can only come from the British or the Canadian government, does the latter intend to ask for the intervention of the Secretary-General of the United Nations?

Mr. Ouellet: I have already answered the question, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

FURTHER STEPS TO SECURE RELEASE OF JAMES CROSS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Would the Prime Minister be prepared to make a statement on motions as to what further steps may be taken in order to secure the release of Mr. James Cross in view of reports in recent days that he may still be alive and that, hopefully, his freedom might be secured?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the offer which was made much earlier by the government of Quebec and by this government to ensure the safe conduct of the kidnappers out of the country in return for the safe release of Mr. Cross still stands. If through one mediator or another the FLQ wants to discuss this with the government, we are still prepared to discuss it.

EFFECTIVE LIAISON BETWEEN POLICE FORCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the apparent difficulty in establishing and maintaining effective liaison between the various police forces involved, has the Prime Minister personally checked into this to assure himself that there is effective liaison between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the provincial police? Can he assure the House that this type of liaison exists and that the various police forces are working together as a team?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I discussed this with the Solicitor General and he might be able to report in greater detail in reply to a question directed to him. It is my understanding that an increased effort is being made to co-ordinate the work of the three police forces and that a special group has recently been constituted for this purpose.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED RETENTION OF RADAR AND COMMUNICATIONS SCHOOL AT CLINTON

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. According to reports last week, the department will have to spend $1,200,000 on construction at Canadian Forces Base, Kingston, to facilitate the establishment there of the radar and communications school now housed on the Canadian Forces Base at Clinton. Will the minister not consider having this school remain at Clinton where there are already adequate facilities, along with other training programs which are being considered by various departments, both federal and provincial?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that his question is in the form of a submission or representation to the minister; I do not think it is acceptable as a question at this time. If there is urgency, the hon. member might give notice of his intention to discuss the matter at ten o'clock.

Mr. McKinley: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member obviously cannot ask a supplementary to a question which has been ruled unacceptable.

[Later:]

Mr. McKinley: My question is quite urgent, Mr. Speaker, because some of the facilities are being transferred at the present time. Could the minister give us an assurance that no more fixtures will be moved from the Canadian Forces Base at Clinton until a final disposition concerning the base has been made?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already suggested to the hon. member that his important question might well be debated at the time of adjournment. I am sure he would wish to ask his supplementary at that time.

ADEQUACY OF ARMED FORCES TO MAINTAIN INTERNAL SECURITY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether, in light of the use of the armed forces in the province of Quebec, his department has reached any conclusion that the standing forces as they now exist are inadequate even for the purpose to which I have alluded?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): No, sir, we have not come to that conclusion. However, an assessment has now been made in connection with that operation, and the results of this assessment will undoubtedly find their way into the white paper on defence policy some time next year.

[Later:]

Mr. Woolliams: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence arising out of the minister's earlier answer. He says there will be an assessment of the adequacy of the armed services. Can he advise the House whether this is a result of some criticism by NATO or the result of what has taken place in recent days in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I can confirm there was no criticism from NATO.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): And there was no criticism from any part of the country about the response of the armed forces. In fact, even Claude Ryan thought they had done rather well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INCREASE IN RESERVE FORCE TRAINING

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister in a position to announce any plans, if such plans exist, with regard to an increase in training for the reserve forces during 1971, either in numbers or in the length of courses given?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): No, sir, not at this time.

DESTROYER CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM—ADDITIONAL COST

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Now that we know the two destroyers will be launched in the St. Lawrence in the next few days, can the Minister of National Defence tell us how much additional money is involved and, if not, when will he be able to give the House this information?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): The program is currently being reviewed. As a matter of fact, negotiations are taking place between the representatives of the government and the two contractors concerned with regard to the contracts. It is expected that the result of the negotiations and the final assessment in this regard will be available by about the end of the year.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF BANK INTEREST RATES BECAUSE OF HIGH PROFITS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of reports that the banks have made tremendous profits, more especially the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, up by 13 per cent in one year, and the Canadian National Bank, up by 15.7 per cent, will the minister ask the banks to roll back their interest rates so that their profits may fall within the 6 per cent guideline suggested by the government?

MANPOWER

QUEBEC—PROVISION OF RETRAINING COURSES FOR FARMERS' WIVES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

With a view to enabling farmers' wives to contribute to a larger extent to the success of agriculture, has the minister looked into the possibility of purchasing for those ladies training courses from the province of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to take this question as notice.

AIR TRANSPORT

ARCTIC REGION—PROVISION OF ADEQUATE NAVIGATIONAL AND LANDING AIDS

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Transport who I thought was supposed to be in the House today. In his absence may I redirect it to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development since he may have a personal interest in the matter. My question arises out of statements made at the International Aviation Council meeting last week with regard to the alleged lack of navigational and landing aids in the northern and Arctic regions. Would the minister confer with his counterpart to ascertain what action the Department of Transport is taking to provide adequate navigational and landing aids to ensure the safety of those travelling by air in Arctic regions?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we passed legislation concerning control of navigation in the north last winter. I am also very much aware that the Minister of Transport is devoting a lot of his attention to the problem of navigation in the north, and I will convey to him what the hon. member has said today.

CANADA-UNITED STATES MINISTERIAL MEETING—REQUEST FOR STATEMENTS ON SUBJECTS DISCUSSED

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Now that the ministerial committee meeting with the ministers' counterparts in the United States is over, I wonder whether he would indicate when he, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will be making statements on the various subjects dealt with in the intergovernmental talks during the last two days?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be tabling a communiqué tomorrow.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

IMPLEMENTATION OF LAND USE REGULATIONS—PERFORMANCE BONDS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. When are the regulations respecting land use operations in the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories coming into effect?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Soon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

[English]

Mr. Harding: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the required posting of $100,000 performance bonds by the two oil companies doing work on Banks Island in the Arctic, why has this regulation not been applied to all companies doing similar work in the Arctic area?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would not think that this question as asked is in order.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ATHABASCA-PEACE DELTA—ACTION TO OFFSET LOSS OF WATER CAUSED BY BENNETT DAM

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who is doing so well today, whether he has had discussions with the government of the province of Alberta with a view to providing either a dam or other works in the Athabasca-Peace delta to compensate for loss of water caused by the Bennett dam?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this is a very complex problem in which two provincial governments are involved as well as the federal government since it is responsible for Indians who live in this area. We have initiated consultations with Indians. I personally met with their counsel who intends to take action against the British Columbia Hydro Commission about damages they suffered and I think this may be the procedure in the circumstances, because the Bennett dam was built in British Columbia, not in Alberta.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: In light of the fact that it has now been suggested by knowledgeable engineers that there cannot be enough water released from the Bennett dam to make this compensation, will the minister be prepared to cooperate with the government of Alberta, if it should ask for aid for that purpose, of course, in arranging for some works to be constructed in the area in question so that these people, including the Indians in question, can be helped?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I was in Edmonton two weeks ago and I discussed that problem with the Indians of Alberta. It was agreed that a meeting will soon be held between the Alberta premier, the president of the Indians in that province and myself to discuss all the problems. It was specifically mentioned that we should examine the problem of Indians in the Athabasca area.

[English]

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this Peace River-Athabasca delta problem has further reduced the ability of the Indian people in the area to make a living, would the minister be willing now to respond meaningfully to the Alberta government proposal to settle the question of the Wood Buffalo Park boundaries so that any industrial development that might take place would then be able to proceed?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have a well-established policy on the matter and I do not think that it would be proper at the moment to reduce the present number of territories for conservation purposes. However, we have indicated to the Alberta government that we are ready to consider an exchange, if necessary, provided that our national parks system would not be the loser.

GRAIN

BARLEY—AMOUNT OF FINAL PAYMENT TO FARMERS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the widespread conjecture and concern of Prairie farmers that there will be little or no final payment on the 1970-71 barley pool owing to the large cash forward sales at the lower prices prevailing last spring, would the minister inform the House whether or not this will likely be the situation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot inform the House at this stage. It has been indicated before that until a pool has been closed or a calculation made, this information is not available.

AVAILABILITY OF BOXCARS—EFFICIENCY OF BLOCK SYSTEM ALLOCATION

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of the considerable amount of space in terminals at Thunder Bay, and in view of complaints at a number of local points of a lack of boxcars to move grain forward, would the minister assure the House that the railway companies will provide adequate transportation in the near future to improve this situation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the grain in place at Thunder Bay is at about the ideal level for maximum working efficiency. There is a significant progress in maintaining space in elevators throughout the Prairie region in line with what is really the new objective, to see that there is space there and that congestion does not get in the way of proper handling of the grain.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, could the minister assure the House that the procedure under the block system whereby cars are supposed to be allocated following shipping orders is working effectively?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I can say that the block system seems to be working very well indeed. Of course there is some concern at particular points about the allocation of cars. I should remind hon. members that a portion of the decision as to where cars are allocated within the share allocated to a specific elevator company belongs to the elevator company.

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, could the minister inform the House when legislation based on his October 29 proposal for grain income stabilization will be introduced?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot put an exact time on that at this point.

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, will the minister inform the farmers of the full details of the plan and provide adequate opportunity for them to make representations on the proposals before the legislation is finally enacted?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it certainly is our intention, and this has already been made known to producer organizations, to welcome representations, and I am inviting them directly from all producers in moving toward final details of the plan. Those details which have not been finalized have not been finalized simply because we wanted the full advice of producers before coming to such a decision.

DAIRYING—REVISION OF POLICY RESPECTING GRANTS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I wish to direct a question to his Parliamentary Secretary. Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question asked by the hon. member, I must say that the policy of the Department of Agriculture concerning dairy products is presently under consideration, and when the department has taken a decision, we shall inform hon. members.

The Prime Minister stated he would look into the matter. Has he had an opportunity to look into the matter and is he able to indicate the position of the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There is no provision for reconsidering this matter at this time.

GRAIN

ALLEGED EFFECT OF DIVERSIFICATION PROGRAM ON HOG PRICES

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the seriously depressed price situation in regard to live hogs, would the minister tell us what plans he has to rectify this disastrous situation since it is a direct result of his diversification program in relation to grain?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, quite clearly this was not a result of the diversification program. If the hon. member knew his local facts he would know the move was well under way before the diversification program, but it is also true, of course, that the stabilization program which we propose should have a very good indirect effect on the hog industry.

INTERNATIONAL GRAINS ARRANGEMENT STABILIZATION —DISCUSSION AT CANADA-UNITED STATES MINISTERIAL MEETING

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration responsible to the House for the Canadian Wheat Board. With respect to the high level talks presently going on between the Canadian and United States governments, can the minister indicate whether the two governments are discussing the matter of arriving at a formula to help stabilize the International Grains Arrangement?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, these conversations touched upon very many matters of interest between the two countries. That subject did come up as well.

STATUS OF PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS PROPOSALS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether the papers he tabled setting forth his stabilization program are to be regarded as government policy or simply proposals for discussion?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the papers tabled indicate a plan of action which of course the government is indicating it would be willing to support. In some respects, of course, the proposals are not complete in final detail because there is very much elaboration which is to take place after discussions with producers and producer organizations, and of course we, as always, are ready to listen to any reasonable alternative proposals which seem to improve the plan.

IMMIGRATION

PROCESSING IN CANADA OF PERSONS FROM IRON CURTAIN COUNTRIES

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the report by Mr. Sedgwick tabled last week, is the minister in the near future planning to institute regulations so that people coming from iron curtain countries to Canada and who wish to immigrate here may be processed in Canada and therefore be on the same basis as would immigrants from other countries?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the whole question of the matters arising out of Mr. Sedgwick's report and related issues is under consideration, and a decision will be taken in due course.

STEPS TO RELIEVE BACKLOG OF INTERVIEWS, INQUIRIES AND APPEALS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the backlog of interviews, inquiries and appeals, what immediate steps does the minister propose to take to solve these problems?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It would seem to me that the hon. member is asking a question which should be answered by way of a general statement. Unless the minister can reply very quickly, I would think the answer should be given by way of a statement on motions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EAST PAKISTAN—ARRANGEMENTS FOR DISTRIBUTION OF CANADA'S EMERGENCY RELIEF CONTRIBUTION

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs this question. Hon. J. A. Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I will make representations.

CRIMINAL CODE

ABORTION—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement by the President of the Ontario Medical Association that Canada's present abortion law is now more restrictive than before the so-called reforms came into effect and that the required procedures now make the obtaining of an abortion more difficult, can the Prime Minister inform the House whether the government will introduce new legislation in this field and, if so, when?

POLLUTION

CONTROL OF MERCURY WATER CONTAMINATION BY DRYDEN AND SASKATOON COMPANIES

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the recent strong condemnation of the United States voiced by the minister and by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in relation to pollution of the Great Lakes, can the minister advise the House what steps have been taken, if any, concerning the industries at Dryden, Ontario and Saskatoon which are causing extensive pollution of Manitoba waters.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, neither industry has polluted the Great Lakes system in any way. However, we have had meetings with the companies concerned and they have stopped dumping mercury into the adjoining waters.

INDUSTRY

ELECTRONICS—HARDSHIPS CREATED BY ALLEGED DUMPING OF FOREIGN TELEVISION SETS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the charge by the Canadian Electrical Manufacturers Association that foreign competition is creating undue hardship and high unemployment in the Canadian electronic industry, has the government made any move to investigate charges that Japan and Taiwan are dumping television sets in this country and, if so, will any tariff relief be granted to Canadian manufacturers?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, anyone who is injured can allege dumping and there is a procedure whereby national revenue looks into the matter forthwith; we have an anti-dumping tribunal to look into such matters.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance tell the House whether he has received any such representations from the Canadian Electrical Manufacturers Association.

Mr. Benson: I have not myself, but I could not answer for the Minister of National Revenue in this regard. However, I shall make inquiries.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LIBERAL POLICY CONFERENCE RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING NUCLEAR FREE ZONE

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister inform the House whether or not the government is considering acting on the recommendation of the Liberal policy convention that Canada declare itself a nuclear-free zone.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, there will be a white paper on defence policy in which all these subjects will be considered.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

PURPOSE OF INCREASE IN MONEY SUPPLY

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of Finance. It concerns some of the interesting activities of the Bank of Canada in the last several weeks. In light of the rapidly expanding money supply, I wonder whether the minister could tell us if the Bank of Canada is acting to expand the economy or is it supporting the Canadian dollar in the international market in order to maintain a subpar value for the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the United States dollar?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with regard to transactions on the exchange market, these become known only at the end of the month when figures are published, and my hon. friend can understand the reason for this. What has happened over the past eight or nine months is that the money supply has been increased by the Bank of Canada deliberately in order to stimulate the economy along with the steps that were taken on the fiscal side by the government.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Would the side effect of this be to maintain the Canadian dollar at a slightly subpar value in relation to the United States dollar in the hope that the Canadian dollar would soon be pegged at some value just below the United States dollar?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the reasoning that my hon. friend has brought forward is necessarily correct. The reason for the expansion in the money supply is the obvious one I have stated previously, that we are expanding the economy and have a much easier monetary policy than we had a year ago or eight months ago.

POST OFFICE

INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS FROM RETROACTIVE PAY

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Post Office. My question was originally directed to the minister on Thursday, November 19. I would like to remind him of it. In view of complaints from postal workers that sums approaching $165 in income tax have been deducted from retroactive pay amounting to $574 awarded to postal workers will the minister undertake to determine if the amounts deducted at source are excessive?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Following that question, Mr. Speaker, I asked officials of my department to check whether errors had been made in issuing these cheques. It seems that such is the case and I have asked the Departments of National Revenue and Supply and Services to inquire into this matter and remedy the situation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

PROHIBITION OF SNOWMOBILES IN NATIONAL PARK

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

As the Chairman of the National Capital Commission has announced a ban on the use of snowmobiles on federal park grounds and in view of the announcement by the Quebec Minister without Portfolio in charge of inter-governmental relations that a decision has been made and that the federal government must abide by Quebec policy in regard to such parks, may I ask the minister whether the government has decided to accept the Quebec decision?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the National Capital Commission does not come under my jurisdiction.

Concerning operations within national parks, snowmobile policy is well known.

HOUSING

PARTICIPATION BY CITIES IN FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I would like to direct a question to the minister in charge of housing. In view of the fact that over the weekend a group has placed much stress on the problems of urban growth and the necessity for reaching early solutions, and in light of the fact that the minister has given a grant to the Vancouver inner city group to follow through with an attempt to find solutions, has the minister taken any immediate steps to see that initiative is taken by other large centres in Canada in this regard?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): All such initiatives are being considered by us. Some can be encouraged and some cannot. I rather think the question is somewhat general but I will be glad to discuss it with the hon. member privately if I have missed the substance of the question.

Mr. Alexander: To get into the specific area, in view of the fact that the same group—

An hon. Member: What group?

Mr. Alexander: —indicated that there should be cities participating in federal-provincial conferences, is it the intention of the minister to approach his counterparts in the provinces in order to feel them out in this particular area?

Mr. Andras: Our views are already very clear on that. In fact there have been some informal discussions with various provincial ministers to continue to test their receptivity to tri-level discussions. That position has not changed.

Mr. Baldwin: You should send Hellyer out.

[Mr. Côté (Longueuil).]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Would the minister take this opportunity to answer the question that was asked him from the back bench while he was on his feet as to whether or not they are Liberal groups?

MONTREAL—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCIAL AUTHORITIES TO ALLEVIATE SHORTAGE

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of housing.

In view of the emergency situation that exists in the field of housing in Montreal as a result of the proposed demolition of 4,000 housing units for the building of the East-West freeway, would the minister tell the House whether he has entered into any discussions with the provincial authorities in order to correct this critical situation, and what decisions were made in this respect?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this question was asked a few days ago. If I am wrong, perhaps the minister can answer it.

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): A few days ago I did make reference to some facts and figures on that. However, to repeat the answer in general let me say that we are consulting about this matter. We have poured great amounts of money into additional housing starts in the city of Montreal. We are aware of the situation which the hon. member describes and we will do everything we can to work with the provincial government to try to alleviate that distress.

Mr. Valade: My question was put to the minister to make sure that all the necessary means are taken to ensure that these displaced persons and families will find new houses when they are displaced or before.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

TAKEOVER OF RYERSON PRESS BY UNITED STATES COMPANY

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I wish to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the many representations to the government concerning the sale of Ryerson Press to McGraw-Hill, is the government engaged in any discussion on this matter or is it considering any measures to assist in retaining Canadian control over this operation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member will recognize that that question was asked in exactly these terms on a number of occasions. However, if I am wrong, perhaps the Prime Minister might wish to reply.

Mr. Burton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there have been new representations on this matter within recent days, and I thought the Prime Minister might like to comment in view of these representations, particularly from the Liberal convention.

POST OFFICE

RECEIPT OF RETROACTIVE PAY BY EMPLOYEES

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): I should like to address a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Post Office. Could the minister indicate to the House when all employees of the Post Office will receive their retroactive pay resulting from the recent postal settlement?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, although these cheques were to be sent out within 60 days, it seems that as early as the end of the first month they were being mailed out. Most of the employees have already received them.

MANPOWER

UPGRADING OF ACADEMIC QUALIFICATIONS OF UNEMPLOYED—PROVISION OF FACILITIES FOR TRAINING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. As he is well aware, a goodly proportion of those who are unemployed and will be unemployed this winter do not have the necessary academic qualifications to qualify for vocational training. I should like to ask the minister whether his department is making a particular drive this winter to assist these unemployed people to achieve the necessary academic qualifications?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): A portion of the additional funds which were made available recently, as well as the main portion of the budget for training, is of course devoted to basic skill training with a view to dealing with this particular problem. Of course the object of the department is to deal as much as possible with all of the applicants in a balanced way to produce the best over-all result.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question for the minister. Has he or will he undertake to enter into discussions with the provinces with a view to making available federal buildings, such as National Defence buildings, to handle the upgrading program in anticipation of the high unemployment this winter?

Mr. Lang: I have looked into the question of the problem which the provinces have in regard to facilities. Facilities of a temporary nature are not normally adequate for the more complicated forms of training. For the basic skill training which requires much simpler facilities, those seem to be available in adequate supply.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister make a statement on motions at an early date indicating how many persons it is proposed to upgrade in terms of basic academic skills during the coming winter?

Mr. Lang: A report can and will be made in the ordinary course after the completion of the year or the placing of the full budget of the department. Until that is done it is impossible to put an exact number upon it because within the available finances more persons can in fact be trained if basic training is used than are trained if more expensive, higher skill courses are called for.

OLD AGE SECURITY—TIME OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE INCREASE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the government's proposed legislation regarding old age pensions be introduced in time so that any increase provided therein can be included in the December pension cheques?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The exact date will be known to the House when the legislation is introduced.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will that be soon?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SIZE OF INCREASE IN GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT—TAX RELIEF MEASURES TO STIMULATE ECONOMY

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): My question is for the Minister of Finance. In light of the estimate of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics that in real terms the gross national product may only rise 2.7 per cent for 1970, which would be the lowest in more than a decade, is the government going to announce tax relief measures soon in order to stimulate the economy?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): If the government were contemplating such a program of tax relief it would be announced in a budget in the House.

POWER

PROPOSED FLOODING OF SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—SUBMISSION OF BRIEF TO STATE OF WASHINGTON INQUIRY

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): My question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the news reports that Mr. John Biggs, head of the Washington state department of ecology, has announced that his department is going to hold hearings on the proposal by Seattle City Light Company to flood 6,000 acres of the Skagit valley in British Columbia, and in view of the fact that Mr. Biggs has made public his intention to ask the British Columbia government and the federal government to participate, will the minister assure the House that the government will submit a brief in opposition to any such flooding?

Mr. Baldwin: Order paper.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING BRITISH POLICY ON SALE OF ARMS TO SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. [Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think the Canadian government's position on that matter is well known, and on his next trip to London, the Secretary of State for External Affairs will certainly restate the government's view.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LENGTH OF EMPLOYMENT TERMINATION NOTICE TO SURPLUS WORKERS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. In light of statements made in this House by his predecessor that employees of Canadian Forces Bases who had been declared surplus as a result of base closures would receive six months notice before employment was terminated, can the minister give the House an assurance that this policy is still in effect?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I will have to make inquiries to see specifically what the hon. member is driving at.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT, 1970

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY POWERS FOR PRESERVATION OF PUBLIC ORDER

The House resumed from Monday, November 23, 1970, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) for the third reading of Bill C-181, to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands had between 30 and 60 seconds left to his credit when we adjourned last evening.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose I was pointing out to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) that it was not good enough for him to be attending seminars and meetings of law societies to declaim about individual liberty and civil rights. He has an opportunity now to demonstrate that this is not mere empty rhetoric.

When the debate began the minister accused some of us in this corner of shrieking for our political lives. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that there is something worse than shrieking for your political life and that is shirking for your political life. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made it perfectly clear yesterday that the only reason the government is not agreeing to the setting up of a tribunal to ensure that there may be no abouse of the powers granted by Parliament is that the government of Quebec, and particularly the attorney general of Quebec, wants these extraordinary powers without any safeguards.

The position taken by the Minister of Justice demonstrates clearly that the man who has been held out as the Prince Valiant of the Liberal party now stands revealed as the spineless wonder of the just society.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As we adjourned last evening, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands had just moved an amendment to the motion that Bill C-181 be read a third time, proposing that the bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of reconsidering clause 12 with a view to the inclusion therein of a provision for the establishment of an independent body to review the administration under the said bill.

I indicated I had some reservations about the regularity of this amendment. I should immediately put the hon. member's mind at ease and assure him that, although I still have serious reservations about the procedural aspect of the proposed amendment, I will put it to the House so that hon. members may have an opportunity to debate it and in due course, vote on it. Similar amendments were debated at length in Committee of the Whole House in relation to clause 12 and to clause 14 of the bill; I would think it would be the wish of the House that similar latitude be allowed at this stage of proceedings. A bill such as this one, which deals with individual rights and fundamental freedoms, should be discussed as freely as possible and should be given the benefit of the liberal interpretation of the rules and precedents.

As hon. members know, debate on third reading should be confined to the contents of the bill. This principle is enounced in May's 17th edition at page 572. May states further that reasoned amendments which raise matters not included in the provisions of the bill are not permissible. Citation 418 of Beauchesne's fourth edition reads as follows:

> All amendments which may be moved on a second reading of a bill may be moved on the third reading with the restriction that they cannot deal with any matter which is not contained in the bill.

At the third reading stage a motion is always in order to refer the bill back to a committee for the purpose of reconsidering any clause thereof. It is doubtful, however, that it is procedurally correct to refer a bill back to a committee with instructions to include a provision which is not included in the clause which it is proposed to amend and which in fact goes beyond the purview of the clause. If in fact the proposed addition goes beyond the scope of the clause it seeks to amend, it becomes a substantive motion and cannot be moved by way of amendment.

These are general principles which apply on third reading. I respectfully suggest to hon. members that these principles should not be deemed to have been altered or amended in any way by the Chair's action in putting to the House the motion proposed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

With this caveat I will, therefore, put the motion as follows:

That Bill C-181 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of reconsidering clause 12 with a view to the inclusion therein of a provision for the establishment of an independent body to review the administration under the said bill.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the object of Bill C-181, An Act to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada, now at one of its most important stages, is to replace the War Measures Act now in force since mid-October as a result of the kidnappings of Messrs. Cross and Laporte. It is unfortunate that in Canada, in times of peace, the government should have been forced by circumstances to apply that statute in order to preserve public order.

Increasing social and economic injustices of all kinds finally breed public disturbances capable of doing considerable damage to our society.

The disturbances we are now witnessing in Canada are such that they could seriously harm the interests of Canadians and particularly those of Quebeckers.

I recently attended a reception given by one of the Canadian representatives at the United Nations and I was deeply humiliated and sorry to be asked the following question by several delegates from foreign countries: What is happening in that pacific country of Canada that did so much for world peace? Now it is fighting terrorism.

Mr. Speaker, if we are now afflicted by troubles, it is because authorities have been falling short of their duty for a number of years in failing to take the necessary steps to ensure a fair distribution of wealth in our country. Our economic system is defective, because some people who have an urgent need of money to meet their basic requirements have no purchasing power.

For many years, we have been warned by competent persons that if we did not reform our economic system, we would suffer from very serious social troubles. Only three years ago, American economists and sociologists, in a letter addressed to the President of the United States, stated that the first condition to avoid an unprecedented economic and social disorder would be to secure for each individual a guaranteed minimum income.

Since our country is close to the United States, obviously the warning served to Americans applies also to Canadians. Monopolies, trusts, economic dictatorship, all these keep on ruling the roost under the benevolent eye of this government. Financiers keep on controlling this country's money supply and credit and thus, they distribute the lifeblood through the economic system whose life is in their hands.

There, Mr. Speaker, is the main cause of the disorders that we live through and which also create misery and unemployment, as well as a lack of confidence from the younger elements of our present society.

So far, government authorities have met this disorder by displaying police machinery. Certainly it is the duty of the state to protect its citizens against aggression by those who threaten its legitimacy. However, it is also its duty to control the greediness of those who squeeze the people, of the big financiers who have abusively increased interest rates, one of the main causes of inflation and unemployment.

A social and economic situation cannot be remedied the way a bomb is defused. In a certain sense, when democratic governments have to rely on police forces to restore the prosperity and security of the country, it means they are gradually losing the game.

When groups of citizens, even if they are a minority, come to contest the legitimacy of government and to doubt the ability of public institutions to govern properly, when they resort to violence and disorder, it is a sign that something is wrong with the system.

This is an indication that it is most urgent that we should pass from the mere denunciation of the effects of violence to the consideration of its causes.

There are several other causes of disorder at the present time. A society is indeed in a permanent state of disorder when it tolerates the existence of the greatest number of unemployed in our entire history, half of them in the province of Quebec, lack of employment opportunities for millions of young people leaving colleges and universities, different standards of living from one region to the other in Quebec, especially in the rural regions which are not sharing in the affluence of large cities, inadmissible waste within the framework of an austerity program, useless delay in the reform of our fiscal and financial system—reform which would be possible without increasing personal income tax—nearly complete disorder in the development of our urban centres contaminated by pollution, noise, slums and poverty pockets.

• (3:10 p.m.)

It is unconceivable in this so-called era of evolution and progress that modern man, so clever in other fields, should want to remain today the salve of his own creation and should be unable to free himself from a financial system which shows flaws and inefficiency.

According to Bossuet:

The greatest disorder of the mind is to believe certain things because we want them to be such and not because we have seen what they are.

What hidden power forces our governments to maintain such a financial dictatorship? The true question is: who directs this country's destiny?

Another major cause of disorder is the broadcasting of television programs which show day after day acts of violence to the children. This has been going on for 20 years on the CBC, a Crown corporation costing millions of dollars every year to the Canadian taxpayers. We teach violence and, of course, we get violence as a result.

I remember that few months ago, a group of people had been invited by the CBC to see a film in a moviehouse of the Ottawa area. Among those present, there were a judge, a lawyer, a policeman, a clergyman and a politician who, in the circumstances, was your humble servant. The film being shown was "Z", which was presented for the first time in Canada. At the end of the representation, we were all invited to give our comments. Since it was a film on dissent, that the dissenters had finally resorted to violence, and there had even been assassinations of politicians, each of us contributed his comments. I remember that when the moderator asked me what was my view of the events depicted in the film and what my reaction would have been, had they taken place in Canada, I replied that everything seen in the film also happened in Canada now, only more hypocritically, and that it had been so for some time.

It is sad for parents who for many years made all kinds of sacrifices to bring up their children properly, give them good principles enabling them to live in society—paying the high price of this education—to see all those principles and training destroyed in all kinds of ways on radio and television. Everything likely to destroy, distort ethics and the highest human values, to hold them up to ridicule, is highlighted on the airwaves, and enters our homes to poison the minds of our children from their earliest years. However, only a very minimal part of broadcasting time is used to show the other side of the coin. Our young people should be shown programs which could help the parents to educate their children.

Television is a wonderful invention which could be very useful to society if the government would assume its responsibilities by giving to this means of communication a better orientation.

The authorities let agitators promote their views on the airwaves, stir up the fire of violence, and when this fire is making havoc, the government uses radical means which strike people with dismay, and make individuals fear for their liberties.

It is unfortunate for the province of Quebec that such legislation be passed. At first sight, the situation prevailing presently in Quebec seems to justify the darkest predictions.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

According to the explanations given by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) in answer to questions asked by some members of the opposition, this legislation is solely intended for the province of Quebec.

The Minister of Justice said last night, as recorded at page 1393 of Hansard, and I quote:

This bill does not deal with force used or crime used to overthrow a government in Quebec with respect to the rest of Canada, whether by the FLQ or another association that might succeed it.

And he added:

I agree with the hon. member, but the target of this bill is the FLQ.

Let me remind you of a speech which a former RCMP Security and Information Director, Mr. Kelly, delivered before the members of the Canadian Club. He said in substance:

The Canadian campus has become the haven of dozens of foreign teachers and students who advocate political extremism.

And he went on:

School boards and universities—

—and as far as I know, there are universities outside of the province of Quebec—

—should make certain that professors and teachers are making use of their profession for teaching and not for spreading extremist ideas.

The educational institutions in Canada must not become incubators of terrorists.

He asked the following question:

"Who will have the courage to say that we have had enough?" He recommends that the public say it.

How many times have we heard similar remarks? What is the silent majority, who has always lived in a normal way and respected the rights and freedom of others, waiting for before it starts acting? What is this majority waiting for before it shows an attitude which could inspire confidence to the young who are now in search of their destiny?

The story goes on as follows:

He gave warning that unless severe measures are taken, Canadians will have to face other situations such as terrorism from the Front de Libération du Québec.

He did not only refer to Quebecers. He said: All Canadians across the country. He told the audience which was composed of federal senior officials and businessmen who gave him an ovation that he recommended —capital punishment for the kidnapping and murder of political men and judges.

He added the following:

The federal policy permits revolutionaries like Jerry Rubin to visit Canada and make speeches provided they are under the aegis of persons of good character.

Provided speeches are made to persons of good character, we may allow anything to be said, by anyone and we may allow the poisoning of our youth's mind. What is more, we put up with that, without saying a word. One may see what such an attitude is leading the nation to at present.

Mr. Kelly, former RCMP Commissioner, also said:

Boards of Education, school boards and university administrators must make a wise choice, and this applies not only to Quebec but to the whole of Canada.

Calling upon the people to become aware of the present situation, Mr. Kelly stated that new measures were required to fight crime. For instance, the police should be given access to tax files in order to be able to fight organized crime.

Organized crime is found not only in Quebec but throughout Canada.

This is why we would have wished for the special legislation to deal as drastically with organized crime as with the FLQ in Quebec, because indirectly and more surreptitiously it is also terribly destructive.

Mr. Speaker, here is my personal opinion with regard to capital punishment. Whether it is a crime against a minister or an individual worker, the victim has lost his life. This is why we have recommended that capital punishment be restored. Whether the family of a politician or that of a worker loses its head, in both cases the family head is gone and either life is of equal value at the family level.

I cannot understand why, in some cases, the authorities consider life as being invaluable, when in other cases they allow it to be destroyed. Evidence of this can be found in the great number of abortions. We have even reached the point where they are shown on CBC. Is our society going through the process of deChristianization? What is done to maintain the highest degree of civilization in history?

Such tragedies do not occur only in Quebec. Here in Ottawa, since 1962, ten violent developments have occurred in Parliament. The last one took place on May 11 last, when 36 persons, 11 of them tied on their seats, demonstrated in all the galleries. And hon. members will recall that the business of the House was delayed for two hours because of that.

In Vancouver, a professor was dismissed for expressing his support for terrorism. Those are the many reasons for which the emergency powers legislation should not only apply to Quebec.

I would also have wished for the relatives and friends of the detained person to be immediately made aware of his arrest. That suggestion had been made by the members of the Ralliement créditiste upon the invitation of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

In order to avoid irreparable prejudice to certain persons who could be found innocent later on, the law should provide that the names of persons arrested should not be published before charges are laid. Democracy and justice still have their rights. Since this special legislation does not repeal the War Measures Act, that is one more reason why it should not apply only to Quebec.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the central government should show more understanding towards the legitimate claims of Quebec. For many years, people who have nothing in common with terrorism have been asking for a more equitable distribution of income sources between Ottawa and the provinces, including the province of Quebec. Progress is very slow in this area. Unfortunately, events leave us for behind. Steps should be taken much more quickly to establish important industries in order to provide employment for the greatest possible number of people. The present unemployment crisis is far from improving things.

How can the province of Quebec develop when it has to pay $2.5 million per day in interest on its debts, half of which is paid to American financiers? It is far from surprising that Americans should have funds to invest in Quebec.

Here is an example of American control in different areas of our economy. I have in my hands a table showing that we have to work to correct certain situations in order to control more efficiently the Canadian economy.

American control amounts to 85.8 per cent in iron ore, to 65 per cent in oil and natural gas, to 68 per cent in manufacturing of boilers and plates, to 89 per cent in manufacturing of industrial electric equipment, to 68 per cent in pharmaceutical products, to 67 per cent in paints and varnishes, to 66 per cent in toiletries, to 62 per cent in soaps and detergents—and God knows how much of them we consume—to 47 per cent in other chemical products, to 51.3 per cent in sporting goods and toys.

This is the situation. To correct it, we need not arm ourselves with sticks nor explode bombs. First of all, people should become aware of the facts and then take the necessary means to achieve the changes required.

The sum of the interests paid annually by Quebec is nearly $1 billion, and this excessive appropriation of funds keeps the province from expanding at a quicker pace. This is why we would suggest greater use of the Bank of Canada to finance the public sector.

Actually, taxes increase constantly, which creates discontent and hardship. So, the revolutionary forces take advantage of the circumstances to make claims that may be justified while resorting to reprehensible means.

Therefore, we must immediately try to correct the situation. Otherwise, we might witness a bloody revolution—and I am indeed weighing my words, Mr. Speaker —and regret our inaction. Similar situations have occurred elsewhere and they developed as I have just explained.

Thousands of young people bursting with energy and new ideas are unable to find support and confidence to initiate the changes which they think are necessary. Grown-ups are concerned by the eagerness of the young generation to which they belonged not so long ago. In the absence of a valid solution from the state, they are tempted to look for a leader who will know how to meet their aspirations.

On Saturday, November 21, I met in my Montmagny office a young man aged 22. His first words were: "Sir, can you receive me even though I wear long hair?" His hair was long enough to reach to his shoulders. I stood up as if he had been the Prime Minister, I shook hands with him and told him: "You are here at home, you came to meet your representative. What is your problem? I do not care about your hair. I know you are a human being and that a heart is beating in your chest. I also know that in this heart there is something good and I want to help you." The young man replied: "I am jobless. I completed my studies last year in June and I am looking for work. Everywhere they ask me the same question: But, young man, do you have any experience? I am disgusted that the same question is always asked. Put yourself in my place. What do you think is going on in my mind?

I kept him in my office for one hour. I tried by every means available to make him understand how confident we are in our young people and how prepared we are to make the necessary efforts to give them an opportunity to live in Canada, particularly in Quebec, not as millionaires but so as to meet their needs provided they be the regular needs of a human being.

When he left, that young man was satisfied. He told me: "There is a man who understands us, a man who has faith in youth." And on the same evening, I took the opportunity, on the occasion of a Canadian supper, to spread this hope among the young for they need to believe in the sincerity and in the responsibility of adults and if we all stick together we shall be able to dam the tide of confusion and disorder which is now rising in our province and across the country.

We must first assure the financial security and the civil liberties of the citizens in Quebec as well as in the other provinces for these values have an economic significance. We believe that today civil liberties do mean something, but in theory only. For a very long time our party has been advocating a more equitable distribution of incomes across Canada. It is time for the government to listen to our voice which is also the voice of the people who demand greater justice.

Now is the time for generosity, sharing, reform of the economic system, fraternity, and humanization of economic as well as social and political structures. It is time to make money serve the human being in order to remove the understandable feeling of frustration that the people have because they do not get their fair share of the national production.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, if we must consider deep constitutional changes to eliminate the causes of the FLQ in Quebec, we believe that Canadian society must show greater flexibility and liberality. Now is not the time for arrogance but for understanding. Our task is to build a country, not destroy it.

The legislation before us should not be used elsewhere in Canada to tell the population: The act aims at bringing Quebec to heel, and tell the Quebecers: The act seeks to bring the FLQ to heel, because, then, that one act would have two purposes.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Mr. Speaker, I spent five days in western Canada during the summer recess. I went there, not as a member of Parliament, but with my farmer's overalls. I visited the farmers to see what the situation was. In fact, in that part of the country, I saw people who live quite comfortably and others of modest means. I was impressed to see to what extent the people in that area are well aware of the situation that prevails in Quebec, to what extent they respect French Canadians.

If people in high places, and in information circles, were more objective and encouraged that feeling of Canadianism, of brotherhood and understanding, we could far more easily and rapidly build a strong and prosperous country, for our energy would serve to build rather than to divide and destroy.

In addition, we firmly believe that the federal government should from now on proceed with constitutional discussions in a spirit of brotherhood and reconciliation. As I said before, the essential matter is that Canadians should enjoy a decent standard of living. The constitutional problem should not be an impediment to the self-fulfilment of Canadians, including Quebecers. Such is my opinion.

As for me, I love my province and my country. I trust most of my fellow-citizens and I am ready to fight vigorously for the survival of democracy through democratic means. But I wish to goodness people would stop preaching patience to us and asking us to live with misery in the midst of affluence. This is becoming disgusting.

The silent majority will also have to become sensitive to social and economic problems and to co-operate to bring about the reforms necessary in order to build a society where life is enjoyable.

As for us members elected by the people, we must tackle immediately the task of settling the basic problems which gave rise to the FLQ. Finally, it will be necessary to bring back within the fold of democracy the individuals convicted under the special legislation. We must at whatever cost devise a rehabilitation system so that these individuals will come to believe in our form of democracy and its values. Action must be taken to prevent Canada from being perturbed again as it was in October last.

I know that this bill affects a single group and I am deeply moved by the fact that it is meant for Quebec only. It is unfortunate for my province. I also regret that our suggestions receive so little consideration. I hope that the present problem will not make us lose sight of our main objective, namely, to further the building of a beautiful and great Canada, from coast to coast.

• (3:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): In speaking to the amendment to the motion for third reading of this bill, it seems to me we are again addressing ourselves to the heart of the question before us, that is to say, the manner in which the extraordinary powers which have been requested by the government are to be effectively administered in the best interests of the people.

I would say that nothing in the statements or actions of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) have in any way alleviated the fears, doubts and disquiet of members of this House or of the people generally. If anything, events over the past few weeks only confirm the tremendous need to have clearly stated in the law an effective form of review that will prevent, or at least will redress, the abuses that are more than likely to occur.

• (3:30 p.m.)

The arguments that have been put before the House both by the Minister of Justice and by the Prime Minister to the effect that we should trust the provincial authorities, particularly the Minister of Justice, seem to me to be fallacious reasoning, if not to say a rather ill-informed view, as to how the law operates in this country. The minister of justice or attorney general of any province is as much bound to observe federal and provincial statutes as any other individual citizen. To say that in certain instances, particularly instances where extraordinary powers are to be set forth, we should simply set aside the normal processes of protection and allow what we believe to be the wisdom, good faith and good jugdment of the provincial minister to be exercised, to me is the weakest form of argument possible.

I think it is an even weaker argument when there is the kind of pressure—and the pressure must be very great indeed—that there is on provincial officials at this moment. When those of us who are concerned about basic questions of civil liberties and civil rights in this country examine some of the things said by the Quebec Minister of Justice—I refer only to the possible introduction of identity cards—we are given a clear indication that in passing this legislation the members of the House must be given assurance, not through some statement of good intent or through trust of any given individual but through the only kind of guarantee that is possible with regard to the workings of this House, namely a guarantee in law.

If there are any doubts, Mr. Speaker, that abuse of the law by the authorities is possible, then those doubts should surely have been confirmed last evening and yesterday afternoon when we heard the Prime Minister, not only in this House but on the national media, respond to the question why a review clause was not inserted into the bill. The Prime Minister responded in his well-known, off-hand manner by saying: "Well, you know, there is a lot of propaganda being circulated by the separatists and the FLQ about how we are calling the shots for the provincial government".

In the first instance, I wondered why it was that he referred to the separatists and the FLQ. The people of this country have been told by the government over past weeks and months that the one threat the government and the country must move against is the FLQ. In the Prime Minister's statement heard nationally on television and radio last night, he said that it was the propaganda that was being circulated by the separatists and the FLQ, indicating at the very least a confusion of mind, or if not confusion, a very dangerous intent, on the part of the Prime Minister. If the right hon. gentleman who leads this government is that confused, then how can the members of this House be expected to trust good intention and good judgment, not just of a provincial attorney general and minister of justice, but of individual police officers and authorities, thousands of whom will be acting under this special legislation?

If the Prime Minister is so confused as to lump together all those of separatist persuasion in the province of Quebec—a factor that some of us have feared for some time now—and the members of the FLQ, who surely must to most reasonable people in this country be an entirely different order of individual, then it is all the more important that the amendment that has been requested over past days to this law be not only earnestly considered by the Minister of Justice, but acted upon at once.

Once more the Prime Minister seemed to return to his favourite argument, all reason seeming to be unworkable and all answers seeming to be not worth mentioning, when he resorted over the past week end to suggesting that there is, of course, the well-known constitutional problem. How often it has been convenient for the Prime Minister to talk about the constitution posing a major problem. He has talked about it in response to the tremendous need there has been in this country over past years for something to be done about the desperate plight of those people who have no decent housing. His only response has been that we really cannot effectively meet that situation because there is the constitutional problem.

We are now again being told in this grave situation that there is this constitutional problem. I think Canadians should know that when the Prime Minister throws in, as his final and strongest argument, the statement that there is a constitutional problem, what he is really saying is: "I won't do it, I don't want to do it, and I have made up my mind I am not going to do it". That is what the Prime Minister means. When dealing with questions of great importance to this country it is high time the Prime Minister stopped resorting to this shabby "non-argument", because, frankly, that is all it is.

Why is the question of review so important to this legislation? It is important for any number of reasons. I would say in a general way that, as we have gone through the clause by clause study of this bill during the past few days, we have come to realize collectively, as individual members have made contributions to the debate in this House, that there is much more than a first glance would indicate that is dangerous and unclear in this legislation. Even worse than the things it does say are the things that the legislation does not say, but to which there are hazy referrences. The fact that almost every clause is open to very dangerous misinterpretation should itself demand that the government be only too willing to respond to something that is overwhelmingly supported by the people of this country. Surely this was obvious when the government's own party, meeting over the last week end, spoke favourably of the action taken by the government and at the same time spoke of the utter necessity for there to be some kind of review clause in the legislation.

A basic question has not yet been answered by the Minister of Justice, and this alone should underline the necessity for some kind of check being made on the administration of the bill. That basic question is this: What does the FLQ stand for? What in fact is the FLQ? In the preamble, and I think also in clause 3, the minister has tried to describe some of the things that the FLQ might do. In referring to those things he is referring to things which quite accurately and honestly will be covered by the provisions of the Criminal Code.

One question that is being raised here, a question that I think it is critically important that the minister answer, is: What in fact makes the FLQ different from other organizations? What are the stated aims and purposes of this organization, the members of which can be indicted and found guilty? The Minister of Justice has given no clear statement with regard to what the FLQ is, and neither has the Prime Minister. I doubt whether either of them has answered this question publicly outside the House. We know for a fact that the very dangerous step that has been taken by the government, both in its introduction of the regulations under the War Measures Act and its introduction of this legislation which makes an organization illegal in itself and its members subject to certain penalties, is the foggiest, fuzziest, most fraudulent kind of thing to do. It has been done in the hope of trying to deal with a very serious situation.

Apart from being very bad legislation, it is very old-fashioned kind of legislation. Members of the governing party some 30 years ago realized how foolish it was to try to define an illegal organization, and they did something to try to end such legislation. The fact that it is almost impossible to know from the legislation just what the FLQ really stands for, and that the government has not tried to define it in this House, is bad enough. But what is transparent to an increasing number of people in this country is not only that you cannot define what the FLQ is as a distinctive organization in itself, but the very action of outlawing a certain organization lends the possibility, the very real possibility, of smearing individuals, groups of people and organizations.

We have seen an example of this as recently as a few days after the invoking of the War Measures Act when the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) inadvertently, to say the least, referred to the FRAP party in Montreal, indicating that it might be some kind of front organization for the FLQ. How a minister of the Crown could make that kind of a monumental slip in the last few days of a major municipal election campaign, and then not feel compelled to resign, is a principle I cannot understand.

Even more, there is a kind of ridiculous quality to this whole affair. I suppose the letters that have become most well-known in our society in the last few months are, of course, the letters FLQ. In fact, I heard a little story the other day and apparently it is true. A child came home from school and asked his father how many letters there are in the alphabet. His father replied that there are 26. to which the child said: No, no, there are only 23, they have taken out F, L, and Q. Even the children realize the ridiculousness of this situation, and it is ridiculous I agree.

I presume that if somebody were to come to parliament hill this afternoon waving a placard with the letters FLQ on it, he would immediately be apprehended and obviously indicted because he was displaying these three letters. If it turned out that in very small print below FLQ there appeared "Fédération de libérale du Québec" I wonder, then, what in fact would be the interpretation of his innocence or guilt.

This is ridiculous because the idea of dealing with a very serious problem of terrorism and social unrest in the Province of Quebec or anywhere else is futile if it is based on the idea of outlawing an organization. If in fact the minister wishes to insure that justice is going to be done, in what I call an almost absurd situation, at the very least there needs to be the establishment of some kind of a review board. I would ask quite frankly when this bill becomes operable, as the successor to the War Measures Act, who will be the major victims of this clause outlawing this organization? I do not think the victims will be the people who have committed acts of terror.

I think the first and most obvious reason for this statement is, of course, the penalty which, as I recall it, is only five years or $5,000. In respect of a man who has participated in a bombing, in an act of terror, in a kidnapping, or in that most brutal act of all, an assassination, it would be utterly and transparently ridiculous to charge anyone under that kind of measure. Naturally, he would be charged under the Criminal Code in which there is a reference to these acts of physical destruction, kidnapping or of murder.

What is then left? If there were a group of people who were plotting to overthrow the government by violent means they, too, would not be charged under this bill because this is a major crime. There is a provision for sedition and treason in the Criminal Code. So, we cannot include those masterminds who may be plotting to overthrow an established authority in this country.

Who then remains to be convicted under this measure? We have seen that one person was convicted because he confessed. Presumably, if some person had not committed some obvious act of crime or terror but admitted freely to being a member of such and such an organization, he might well be convicted. In other words, those people who might be convicted under this measure would be those who might convict themselves of membership in the organization.

What happens in a society during a period when there is great focus upon a particular crisis or a particular act of social unrest? Some people who are on the fringes of sanity, or on the fringes of the regular mainstream of society, will seek some kind of perverted sensationalism or publicity by coming forward. Any experienced lawyer will tell you that when a bizarre crime has occurred, perhaps robbery or murder, and the police are looking for suspects, all too frequently a number of people will come in to confess because they are intrigued with the publicity they will get, never thinking of the consequences that the confession might bring them. This is one of the very real dangers. A number of deluded people, misguided and forsaken, will allow themselves to be abused under this foolish and unnecessary provision of the law. I think more than likely those are the people who are going to be affected. I refer to these ill-advised individuals who, almost because of themselves, will be caught up and convicted under this provision.

The action of the government in bringing forth this legislation, without at least introducing a provision for review, seems to me to be the height of presumption and arrogance. Surely, it must only be because people have not had time to think through the total situation, or because the fear they have shared individually and collectively has been so great, that they have lost the willingness at least to question what the government is requesting.

As I have indicated, the government is asking for a drastic provision outlawing an organization without in any way attempting to define what it is. Secondly, it is going to reverse the standard court procedure which has operated for centuries in relation to the presumption of guilt. It is going to ask as well that there be unlimited powers of search which will apply in every situation. It is asking that property may be seized and held for an indefinite period of time, a subject in respect of which there has not even been too much question here. The government is requesting that there be a period of detention of from three to seven days initially without charge, and following that a period of up to 90 days, a quarter of a year, before a person may be brought to trial. It is asking that evidence of membership or activity in this organization, which may have occurred years prior to this bill becoming law, be accepted as proof under this law.

This is a contravention of the basic workings of our legal structure in this country. Even 20 years ago, we were willing to sign an international declaration of human rights which said, in Article 11, that no government shall pass a law today declaring something which happened before that law was passed to be a crime. I am really wondering what our government is going to do about that. Is it going to indicate to the United Nations that we can no longer concur with that particular article of the International Charter on Human Rights? I will have more to say about that later because I feel that is only one aspect of the very retrograde steps this government is pursuing in this legislation.

The government is also asking for the right to arrest without evidence, but simply on how a certain police officer may feel on a certain day. He might have "reason to suspect" but it is not important whether his reason is good, bad or indifferent; as long as he has reason that is sufficient. The government is asking as well that this act be extended, if the government so desires, without too much fuss or bother even at that point.

We have here a series of truly amazing requests being made by the government without any substantial indication that there is a real need for them. In the early days when the War Measures Act was invoked and the regulations were passed, there was a certain sense of overwhelming support from this House, and one believes from the country, for what the government was doing. In succeeding days and weeks what has the government done to indicate either that it was right when it acted in the first instance or, even more important, at this point. We can only deal with the present and try to work towards a reasonable future. For what earthly reason does the government at this point, some five weeks after the imposition of the War Measures Act, now ask for the continuation of this legislation until the end of April next year?

That, surely, is the major question which must be asked by members of this House. Why is the government so anxious to have the legislation at this point? What are its reasons for asking for such sweeping, and in many aspects unreasonable, powers to be placed in the hands of those who have not overly proved their competence in the weeks gone by? In what way can the government or the Minister of Justice assure us that the passage of this bill will ensure the freedom of Mr. James Cross? In fact, if I may be frank about it, I have not been overly touched by the concern this government has exhibited in the past few weeks in respect of securing the freedom of Mr. Cross. Certainly, in so far as my question to the Prime Minister today was concerned, there seemed to be no real desire to consider new avenues and new ways in which the release of Mr. Cross could be obtained.

An hon. Member: Suggest a couple.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): This would be shocking enough if a citizen of this country were involved, but we are talking about a man from whom this country has a very special responsibility, a representative of another sovereign nation. Yet for some days the government has acted as if this question were simply no longer important. If this is not the case, then I would simply urge the government to give us more evidence of the fact that it is doing everything possible to secure this man's release and to relieve the unbelievable suffering and uncertainty he has been living under these past number of weeks.

The government suggested a review commission is presently operating. It has suggested a group of men is operating on behalf of the provincial government which is quite able to fulfil all the concerns or even the problems which may arise in respect of the administration of these special powers. I think, however, that perhaps the government, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice have been less than frank in telling us what real responsibility this commission has or what real stature it has.

In today's newspaper the Prime Minister is reported as having said that the commission will be able to look after the problems that would be raised in this respect. But the reporter for the Globe and Mail, in trying to check out the position this commission might hold in relation to the authorities in Quebec, was told this commission apparently has no legal power. A spokesman in the office of the Quebec justice minister, Mr. Jerome Choquette, said yesterday that he believed the commission has government approval but no government mandate. That is the sum and substance of it. The commission has government approval, presumably for as long as the government feels it is acting in its best interests, which is reasonable to assume, but has no government mandate. In fact, it operates merely at the whim of the authorities. I am sure that if Mr. Hebert could be here to report on everything he could give us a particular review of what has been happening in respect of the administration of War Measures regulations and it would not be a very encouraging tale.

The government has given the impression that the institution of such a review board would be difficult to achieve. One wonders where the members of the government have been for the past 30 or 40 years. I have been a member of this House long enough to know that almost every piece of legislation, whether in an area of joint jurisdiction, as much of it has been in the past two years, or legislation in one jurisdiction or another, has time and again included provision for review boards or boards of some kind. This provision gives the public and the members of this House some feeling that the administration of a particular measure will be carried on in an effective way. Right now, in this country there must be hundreds of separate advisory and review boards which act to protect the public interest. For the government to fall back on the weak and irrelevant constitutional argument seems to be the last vestige of any reasonable argument at all.

Yesterday afternoon in this House of Commons the Prime Minister reported that, as a result of the Liberal policy convention, he tried to work out with the Prime Minister of Quebec some kind of instrument. I find it difficult to believe the Prime Minister can sincerely believe in that argument or that he could be so short of imagination. I find it difficult to believe that he and the Quebec Prime Minister would be that unwilling to follow the express wishes of the country and of their party by failing to introduce an amendment which would provide for an effective review procedure that would guarantee at least minimal safeguards in respect of the administration of this bill. The dangers that are inherent in this bill are difficult for any member of this House to accept, but I think it is even more important that we remember the climate in which this bill is being brought forth. This bill has been introduced as a result of a special situation; in many senses of the word, it has been a crisis situation. From being in contact with and talking to people in the province of Quebec, I know there has been a deep feeling not only of unrest but of great fear.

The authorities who have been trying to root out those responsible for terrorism, kidnapping and murder must be frustrated and must be becoming more and more tired. One might expect that some of the thousands of people who have been working night and day for a period of almost two months must be becoming almost desperate in trying to write an end to this unhappy page in our history. What makes me so fearful in this instance is that when men are frustrated, tired and desperate they are quite likely to do very desperate things and innocent people who have a right to expect basic protection under the law suddenly find themselves in the most unfortunate situations. This is something that members of this House should not treat lightly. If the Prime Minister can be so easily confused between the FLQ and separatists, and we know that some men and women in the province of Quebec have been moving toward separatism, we cannot be happy about the fact that the abuse and misuse of these sweeping powers could achieve ends opposite to those for which this legislation is intended.

If we should find ourselves in the unfortunate position of having to look back on this period and realize that the legislative action taken has, in fact, deepened and worsened the problems that exist in the province of Quebec, then not only the members of the government but all members of this House will bear a great sense of guilt. I am not saying we can remove ourselves from that guilt even with the introduction of a review commission, but I think it is the kind of minimal guarantee that the government surely must recognize is a necessary requirement, even at this point. If the government does not recognize this, then I can only say that, to the best of my knowledge and understanding, they have not acted in the best interests of this country.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I had not planned on speaking today, but I am absolutely astonished that the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) does not know what the FLQ is. There was a man in Quebec not too many weeks ago who pleaded guilty to being a member of the FLQ and received 15 months in prison. I think he knew what the FLQ was. There was a 65 year old Montreal watchman who, on April 20, 1963, was the first bombing victim of the FLQ, and his family knows who they are. A month later a demolitions expert was endeavouring to demolish one of the bombs that have been put in 15 mail boxes in the city of Montreal. That man knows who the FLQ are. There are 23 convicts in the penitentiary in Canada whom the FLQ are trying to get out. They know the FLQ exists and they are there because since 1964 there has been a series of thefts, hold ups and every other conceivable form of nefarious crime, including the theft of every type of weapon, munitions and equipment from military establishments. These people are obviously responsible for these crimes and at times boast about it.

On August 29, 1964 two people were killed during an unsuccessful attempt to hold up the International Firearms store in Montreal. This was attributed to the FLQ. Who are the members of the FLQ? They are a group of psychopathic terrorists who are doing exactly what the bill before us is trying to stop them from doing. You asked for evidence. In 1965, FLQ terrorism included the derailment of two trains, endangering the lives of hundreds of people.

Mr. Paproski: What did the government do about it?

Mr. Hogarth: On May 5, 1966, a 65 year old office employee was killed by an FLQ bomb. His family knows who the FLQ are. In 1968, 300 sticks of dynamite were stolen from The Chomedy quarry, and that year there were 21 bombings, including the bombing of the Montreal city hall.

Mr. Paproski: Where was the government?

Mr. Hogarth: The FLQ bombed the Montreal stock exchange on February 13, 1969, injuring 27 innocent people. On September 28, 1969, the home of the mayor of the city of Montreal was bombed. On June 24, 1970, an FLQ explosive killed a 50-year old Ottawa civil servant.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Perhaps at this time the Chair should remind hon. members that the debate is now on the amendment which would refer the bill back to the committee for the purpose of establishing an independent body to review the administration of the said bill. The Chair has been lenient and has given some leeway to the previous speaker, but I feel that at this time I should remind hon. members to try to confine themselves as much as possible to the amendment. It is only after a vote has been taken on the amendment that a general debate on all the clauses of the bill can be entered into, unless another amendment is put forward.

[Translation]

So I would ask hon. members to keep as much as possible to the matter now under consideration, that is, the advisability of referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole, with a view to adding to it provisions aimed at the establishment of an independent review agency.

Even if so far the discussion has extended over the subject of such an independent committee to review those measures provided in the bill, I feel that it is important at this stage to ask hon. members to keep as much as possible to the amendment under consideration.

[English]

Mr. Hogarth: I certainly appreciate your directions, Mr. Speaker, but it would appear to me that since the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), asked these questions and said that there was no evidence, I am entitled to put some of the evidence before him and before the House.

Let me say, to conclude, that there have been riots. There is ample documentation to show what the FLQ intended eventually. There have been kidnappings and the infiltration of federal and provincial agencies. There has been all kinds of evidence.

Mr. Paproski: But you did not believe it was in the Company of Young Canadians.

Mr. Hogarth: There has been all kinds of evidence to indicate that this legislation is necessary. When the hon. member says he does not believe it, may I point out to him that if he reads the Committee minutes relating to that evidence he will find I asked why it was that the then government of Quebec had not requested assistance from us. He will see that when the present government of Quebec asked us for assistance, this government acted.

Mr. Paproski: You should have acted there and then.

Mr. Hogarth: That is the point on the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). The government of Quebec, whatever political philosophy it might have, is and has been responsible for the administration of justice in the province of Quebec. We are responsible for the establishment of the substantive law.

Mr. Paproski: Then be responsible.

Mr. Hogarth: We are responsible for the establishment of the laws of criminal procedure, but this government is not responsible, nor can it assume the responsibility, for looking after the administration of justice in Quebec. The political decision has been made, and the sound constitutional decision has been made, that the law that we have before us is to continue with the same constitutional provision we have with respect to all our criminal law, and that is that the administration of justice is the responsibility of the attorney general in any province in which justice is to be administered. In this instance we have provided that the attorney general of Quebec have broad powers in dealing with the liberty of the citizen, and he has established de facto what is really requested in this amendment.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Where?

Mr. Hogarth: It was announced in this House. The names were given. In addition, there have been absolutely no complaints filed with the federal Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) that he has not carried out his duties properly in the interests of the administration of justice not only in Quebec but in the whole of the country. How could we gain by, first of all, entering the field of the administration of justice by accepting this amendment or one of the amendments similar to it that have been put forward and then telling the attorney general of Quebec that, on the one hand, we give him these powers but, on the other hand, not only are we going to ensure that they are properly carried out but we are going to have independent citizens see that they are? This is absurd. So, we would delegate the administration of justice not even to the Attorney General of Canada or the attorney general of Quebec but, in the last analysis, to a group of independent citizens. How absurd can you get. This is manifestly out of the question.

A suggestion has been made by the hon. member for Egmont that this law eventually will bring about the aims of the FLQ. That is absurd. I suggest that the moment we interfere so drastically with the administration of justice in any province we will bring about a constitutional problem which will just amplify those we already have on our hands.

Hon. members opposite are concerned, and so are we, about the resolution that was passed at the convention last weekend. We must all be concerned about that, particularly on this side of the House, but let us bear in mind that that resolution was predicated on the belief that there would be no want of confidence in the attorney general of the province of Quebec. It is obviously absolutely impossible to do what these projected amendments and the resolution suggest on the one hand, and then say we have complete confidence in the attorney general on the other. That is the only way in which we can deal with the resolution.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): In my contribution to the debate on this amendment to the motion for third reading, I would like to deal at least with some of the points raised by my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth). I would like to suggest to him that he put his case forward strongly and urgently. A colleague close to me adds "ridiculously". Anyway, he spoke very forcefully about this particular matter. It seems to me, however, that on a number of other occasions the constitutionality argument has been raised and, I believe, answered.

There are a number of special cases in our legal system which result from the government of Canada having passed special laws and because of the speciality of these laws the federal authority has handled their administration. I should like to cite three or four of these. There is, of course, the narcotics legislation which is under the authority of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

An hon. Member: That is different.

Mr. Rose: There is customs and excise; there is the Income Tax Act.

An hon. Member: That is different.

Mr. Rose: There is the Food and Drug Act.

An hon. Member: That is different.

Mr. Rose: It seems to me that it is not a closed case, no matter how loudly are shouted the positions from either side of the House. I believe some room for argument exists and I think we delude ourselves if we suggest there is no room for a constitutional argument on this or even on the matter of the war measures proclamation itself.

I think we can claim that our debate during the last month has shown that there is another side of the coin in our dealing with the vicious things that happened due to the FLQ in Quebec. People are now beginning to realize that all the arguments that have been used by the government in the proclamation of the War Measures Act are not necessarily valid and that there is room for another opinion. I think more people are beginning to take a look at the alternative option.

Dealing with the amendment before us, I should like to read a brief excerpt from the Gazette of November 14, 1970, dateline Quebec where Derek Hill writes:

> The honest law-abiding citizen has nothing to worry about whatever measures are taken by the government, concluded Mr. Choquette.

Mr. Choquette's argument has been raised a number of times all over the country, not just in Quebec. We hear that you have nothing to worry about as long as you are a law-abiding citizen. We are always told this, but try and put that across to the 397 people who were in jail for days and weeks without charge and were subsequently released. I would like to ask if their experience illustrates that law-abiding citizens had nothing to fear under the legislation and regulations following proclamation of the War Measures Act. Obviously, a number of those people had a great deal to fear.

How many innocent reputations have been tainted, not because they were charged and convicted but because they were picked up in the street? They were left to languish in jail with no opportunity to inform their families. They were a worry to their families and employers and have had the finger of suspicion pointed at them for the rest of their lives. We should think of these things and ask some of these people who were picked up and released without charge how they feel about the absurdity of a review board.

Police can make mistakes, Mr. Speaker, as can all humans. I happen to believe that the Montreal police may be more accident prone than others. I say this because my province had a recent nasty experience with the Quebec police when a British Columbia civil servant was pistol whipped on the the street by the Montreal police.

An hon. Member: Quebec.

Mr. Rose: I am sorry, Quebec City.

An hon. Member: Get the facts.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think that this case is before the courts and so the hon. member may not want to say too much more about it.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): He can certainly discuss the facts of the case.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The case is before the courts and one of the rules of this House is that members use their best discretion when a matter is before the courts. I think the member could use his best judgment.

Mr. Lewis: He can just say it has happened.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is right.

Mr. Lewis: That is all he is saying.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is right.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The Chair is not aware of the conversation that took place between the two hon. members, so it might be a good time to remind them to address themselves to the Chair so that a decision can be made if it relates to the work of the House.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry you were not in on the exchange but I sat down and the Minister of Justice was kind enough to update me on some of the facts of this particular case and to admonish and warn me that I must not go too far here. I accept the warning. I really did not wish to comment on it but I think I could ask a question. What would have happened had this particular situation occurred with a common labourer, say an unemployed labourer from British Columbia who happened to be visiting Quebec City on his vacation?

I hear a comment from the wings to the effect what would have happened if the War Measures Act had been in effect? There was no apology. Since I understand this matter is before the courts, I shall not comment on it further except to say it is unfortunate that a British Columbia civil servant happened to have the bad luck to resemble a bank robber.

Mistakes can happen in spades with the normal powers of police. Some of us fear that with the special powers granted under Bill C-181 more excesses will become a matter of course, and we are worried about this. This is why, aside from the constitutional problem, people on this side of the House and at least one on the other side have risen repeatedly to make their views heard. Canadians need some kind of officially constituted review board, not a review board that operates on sufferance. It has been said repeatedly that special powers need special kinds of protection. One of Parliament's hangups has been that while the federal government passes and transfers these awesome powers to the attorneys general of the various provinces, our federal government has no responsibility for the control of them.

As I said yesterday, trust is a wonderful thing and so is faith, but so often these are not enough. We have heard that all members of the FLQ are not necessarily terrorists. I do not know whether that makes them any more acceptable; certainly terrorists are unacceptable in this country. Canadians have had very little experience with terrorist behaviour. If FLQ members are not terrorists, then what are they and what are they doing? Are they pursuing legitimate ends through legitimate means and just happen to be separatists, a view not particularly acceptable to me nor to many other people in Canada.

Why do we need these powers? Is it to deal with FLQ members who are not terrorists but may be separatists? Are we looking for the kind of power necessary to deal with people who have not committed any crime? It seems to me that our democratic institutions should be sound enough to deal with these ideas without special powers to apprehend people not because they have committed crimes but merely because they possess ideas that may be unacceptable. Our system must be strong enough to be victorious over ideas or it is not worth keeping. We are afraid at this stage that the cure contemplated by the special powers, or the legacy of the cure, may well be much worse than the disease. We say this in all sincerity, and without any frivolous intention whatsoever. Therefore, we are speaking in support of the kind of review board, tribunal or body that may be acceptable to the government, that will take care of worries, concerns and fears relating to the excesses which I have mentioned. We do this because we think that if there is a will there will be a way in which to protect the civil rights of people, regardless of the rigidity and inflexibility of the government and the constitution.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I should like to say a few words of congratulations to my colleagues in the Conservative party for the valiant fight they have carried on in order to make Bill C-181 more acceptable to those Canadians who are sensitive about matters affecting civil rights and threats to our civil liberties. I was impressed by the indignation expressed by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). I listened carefully to the Leader of the Official Opposition, who is a fair minded man. I have great respect for him. His words and logic convinced me that unless the government does something to make Bill C-181 more acceptable, I ought to vote against it on third reading. If he was able to convince me that I ought to vote against Bill C-181 on third reading, I do not understand why he did not convince himself to do the same.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rose: This is the part of his position that I find particularly difficult to understand. It seems to me that the Conservative party in this whole issue has been attempting to ride two horses.

Mr. Paproski: Leave the Conservatives out of this.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, at least one Conservative has been left out. He has just walked out. In that party's attempt to ride two horses—

Mr. Paproski: I am back again.

Mr. Rose: —that party may have fallen between them.

An hon. Member: Not the hon. member who has just returned.

Mr. Rose: I was not referring particularly to the hon. member for Edmonton West who has just returned.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, my constituency is Edmonton Centre.

Mr. Alexander: I wish the hon. member who has the floor would tell us what his party intends to do.

Mr. Rose: I am pleased that the hon. member for Edmonton Centre, who fell between two stools, was kind enough to identify himself just now.

An hon. Member: Surely, he would not fall between two stools.

Mr. Rose: I suggest to the hon. member for Edmonton centre in all sincerity that we are all big enough to tolerate having some fun poked at us once in a while. I am sorry that, despite all his fine words, despite all his fine arguments and despite his real and sincere concern, the Leader of the Opposition stated publicly, before the House had embarked very far on the third reading debate, that he would support the government on Bill C-181. I feel sorry, because I feel he has closed off his options. Because the minister knew that he could count on the support of a substantial portion of the House, he was probably less willing to accept amendments on third reading. In other words, I feel that the options of the party headed by the Leader of the Opposition have been closed in this way. I think the minister certainly would have been more convinced by the kind of sincerity expressed by people such as the Conservative justice critic from Calgary North if he had not been absolutely and positively assured of support on third reading.

I feel, too, that many members of the hon. gentleman's party will vote in favour of the bill on third reading, regardless of their particular convictions on it, because they will legally want to follow their leader. I regret that they have been put in this position.

Mr. Alexander: Do not go too far, now.

Mr. Rose: I say this in all sincerity. Many rumours have come out of the rumour mill that the FLQ has infiltrated into various agencies of government and various institutions. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) told us in the House that we have no idea of the extent of such infiltration.

Mr. Peters: Neither has he.

Mr. Rose: I ask, what federal agencies have been infiltrated by the FLQ?

An hon. Member: The government cannot answer that.

An hon. Member: The CYC was.

Mr. Rose: What does the government plan to do about this alleged infiltration? How many federal employees have been fired because it is alleged they infiltrated from the FLQ? Or is all this talk really scuttlebutt and part of the general picture of crisis that the government has been attempting to portray for the past month? How bad is the situation? Let the government come clean and tell us. In the meantime what we are debating at present is a motion that may lead to the establishment of a review board.

[Mr. Paproski.]

May I conclude by saying that I support such a concept. Many other Canadians support it. I think the House ought to try to establish something to meet this need.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question? Can he tell me of any instance in which the criminal law is administered by the federal government in a province without the consent of the attorney general of that province?

Mr. Alexander: Take that question as notice.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to look into that matter for the hon. member and have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Alexander: That is the sort of answer they give us all the time.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The hon. member sounded just like a Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I had been hoping that perhaps the debate on this amendment might be concluded rapidly and that we could vote on it. I see that a number of hon. members are ready to speak on it. I shall, therefore, make a few remarks at this time and give the House my reasons for supporting this amendment which seeks to establish a review procedure applicable to those people who would be held under this bill. This is the first and last time I shall speak on this bill, and I should like to give a brief background of the reasons that led me to my conclusions.

The national pride of Canadians has been severely hurt by recent events. We had always felt that we are above and free from those ills that have beset others, particularly ills such as political kidnapping and assassination. As a result, the majority of Canadians reacted angrily and violently to the recent outrages. They are prepared to support almost any measures that look as if they will prevent this sort of thing from recurring. I believe it is only because Canadians are in this state at this time that they and their government would consider the introduction of a piece of repressive legislation of this kind, without including in it at least the power of reviewing the situation of people who may be thrown into jail without charge, without warrant, and on the mere whim of the police. This, certainly, is not a situation of which we can be proud. Mr. Speaker, it is not easy, as many have assumed, to arouse our anger. We in this Parliament must not continue to act out of the sense of anger and shame that currently fills our country. We cannot react in the savage or violent way that individuals are free to do. We are charged with responsibility for the future.

Over the years the state has had to take the long view. It has had to avoid meeting violence with violence and has had to administer justice in the knowledge that the state will exist long after the present people are gone and perhaps forgotten. Accepting the danger of being misunderstood, I want to deal with the present situation under this bill, a bill without a review procedure, to see what our position is at at this particular time.

Over many centuries nations have learned that there must be a continuous, strong and well understood set of laws which are enforced in a firm and understandable manner if there is to be public order and respect for the law. When laws are unreasonable or poorly enforced, respect for the law disintegrates and public order breaks down. Furthermore, we have learned from many sad examples that releasing power to a government or head of a government in a crisis is almost as dangerous an aberration as convicting several innocent persons in order to catch one guilty person. The powers to act without review in such a situation are even worse.

What has happened during the past six weeks as a result of the government's action? I believe they have polarized positions in the province of Quebec, leaving no place for the moderate who might possibly have got us through the dangerous and difficult days. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has gone out of his way to attack those who oppose his policy in this particular instance in an effort to discredit them politically. I am not talking about the FLQ. I am talking about those who favour peaceful evolution in this country.

The government has created a state of fear, hatred and anger in this country which we all love so much. People are now buying out the gunshops for their own protection. This situation is self-escalating. The government should try to cool down the national anger and lessen the use of emergency and repressive laws, rather than building them up. In introducing the legislation now before us, the government has now expended the whole residue of available federal power; first, by calling out the troops; second, by proclaiming the War Measures Act and, finally, by the introduction of the temporary measures bill. What is left if we have a real national emergency or insurrection? The federal government has nothing left. When there is no power to review arrests, there is even less freedom in the country and it is more difficult to return to normal.

In English speaking Canada a backlash is growing, almost unnoticed, because of fears and hatred. I know a few people who do not like Quebec. I have been surprised and humiliated when these people have said to me that the Prime Minister is the greatest man who has ever lived. They certainly misunderstand the situation, either by intent or by mistake. As a nation, this does not lead us anywhere.

Our international image has fallen to a new low. Several members commented today on our international problem and the low regard in which we are held in other countries. We are now known as a land of insurrection, government by aid of troops and war measures. That is the picture from abroad. If the present legislation is enacted and people can be thrown into jail without charge, held without bail, with no provision for review of the situation, our international image will fall even lower.

According to many sources, Canada has passed a watershed and as a result is a changed and poorer country. When was this watershed reached? Was it reached at the time of the kidnappings of Messrs. Cross and Laporte or was it reached after the proclamation of the War Measures Act and the introduction of this legislation? We do not yet have the answer.

The economic loss in the province of Quebec will result in the federal government pumping millions of dollars into that province. The need has been created and it must be filled. Unfortunately, it will not go unnoticed in other parts of the country. It will not do anything for national unity. In the short run, because of our national humiliation and anger, this repressive measure we are now considering may receive some commendation from those who want to see a repressive government deal with that part of our society that is dangerous and non-conforming. The situation will not continue forever. Some people say that because of this situation unity is being achieved in Canada, but I believe it is unity of anger and hatred, not love or compassion and it will not survive in that form.

The emergency that was, and continues to be, escalated by the government will be escalated even more by introducing measures without review procedures in an effort to show that we are in such a desperate and dangerous situation in this country that we need measures of this repressive nature. I think this escalation of the emergency is wrong. The least we can do is to ensure that the legislation before us is something more normal than a war measure. Surely, any measure that does not have an appeal procedure is not normal. On many, many occasions we in this House have worked for appeal procedures. The minister introduced legislation to establish federal courts which essentially are a great series of appeal courts from all boards and tribunals. Now these are appeals from decisions made in offices concerning matters which many people believe to be inconsequential. Yet we pile on provision for appeal after appeal. And I have no objection; I think it is right. But when we come to a matter affecting fundamental freedoms the government declines to bring in a normal appeal provision, in an attempt to give the impression that the emergency is greater than it really is. In my opinion, the emergency has been escalated to an abnormal degree.

• (4:40 p.m.)

To indicate exactly what I am trying to say I should like to turn to the poll which was run by CTV and released a week ago Sunday. Some of my Liberal friends—and I have some—take great comfort from this poll.

An hon. Member: You might have a lot of them, but you are losing some now.

Mr. Aiken: I don't mind losing a few. I hope the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) did not identify himself as one. Supporters of the government are saying "See, we were right in everything we did; look at this poll; we are in tune with the mood of the people; the Prime Minister is a great statesman." I want to say that the government has created the mood of the people, and if that mood is really reflected in the poll we are really in trouble in this country. I believe that far from being a great statesman the Prime Minister has created a state of mind from which it will take years to recover. What do Canadians want, now that their baser instincts have been encouraged? They want student activists, hippies, labour militants, communists, women's liberation groups sent to gaol and stifled; they want censorship of the press and imposition of the death penalty for a host of new crimes, and Heaven knows what else.

An hon. Member: That came from Jack Horner.

Mr. Aiken: Is this something of which a so-called Liberal government could be proud? I am a Conservative, and I think it is tragic. It might be said that this was all brought on by the FLQ, not by the government. I deny this. The potential was there. There has been a growing reaction to the government's careless attitude toward the immigration of people with criminal records and its failure to enforce the law. There was an exchange a few minutes ago—it was out of order—involving everything that has happened in connection with the FLQ since 1963. The concern of the government was not very evident during those seven years, and we cannot say there was no violence. The hon. member who spoke before the last hon. member set out to prove that there had been FLQ violence over the last seven years. I say it was the government's panicky and fearful reaction to the situation in the City of Montreal which brought us to the difficulty we face today. We are now considering legislation which should not be found in any free country even in wartime, legislation under which people do not have the right to be represented or to have their cases looked into, legislation under which there is no recourse to appeal from the actions of police.

Even if the War Measures Act were the only tool available to the Montreal police in hunting the criminals responsible for the kidnappers of Mr. Cross and Mr. Laporte, even if its invocation was necessary, it should have been the objective of the government to abandon this extraordinary measure as quickly as possible and to take steps toward reestablishing normalcy. Even if the bill before us has to be passed—and there is some doubt about that—surely it should be our aim to approve a law as close to normalcy as possible. To leave this measure as it is merely advertises to the world that we are still in a state where insurrection is apprehended. This is where the government has taken the wrong course.

Like a good many other members, I feel trapped in voting on the War Measures Act and on this bill, because there is no doubt some need for continuing supervision of the explosive situation in Montreal. That need exists. But I blame the government for what it has done in connection with hundreds of ancillary matters—for statements such as that made by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) that thousands of subversive people had infiltrated the civil service and that many of them held high rank in government employment. Dozens of other things were said and done in order to build up the situation in justification of the government's action.

In my view a more statesmanlike course would have been to cool off the situation and let the international community feel that at least we were masters in our own house and knew what we were doing. I believe the government has maintained a state of emergency either to justify its original action or because of a belief that there is still some danger.

Mr. Speaker, there is always danger. There is no way known to man to prevent murder or assassination. The only defence lies in removing the will to commit these crimes while maintaining ordinary prudence. Has this been accomplished in Canada during the last few weeks? I say it has not. There are many more dangerous mental psychopaths, sex criminals and potential murderers walking the streets than there are revolutionaries in hiding or in gaols. The average citizen is forced to take his chances with these maniacs. There are lots of them. There is an average of one murder every day in Canada—the figures show something like 364 reported murders a year on an average, although the murderers are not always convicted. There is one kidnapping, on an average, every week—in the neighbourhood of 67 charges of kidnapping are laid each year and convictions are secured at the rate of almost one a week. So we have one murder every day and one kidnapping every week.

Mr. Cross is entitled to special consideration. Mr. Laporte, we weep for. We do not know yet what happened to him. We hope we shall know. But with all this in the background, let us keep our perspective. Two mounted policemen were murdered in Saskatchewan in the course of their duties. Is this any less the concern of the Canadian people? I say that we will have freedom in our streets when law and order are established, but not so long as we have repressive measures. This is not law and order at all, and a lot of people are making this mistake today. I say clearly that those who say that we now have law and order are wrong. We have the opposite of law and order; we have repression. Law and order is respect for the law, and the maintenance of that respect.

In conclusion, may I say that this bill is directed toward maintaining or restoring law and order in Canada. Against whom is it directed? Certainly, it is not directed against the 300 people already picked up and released, nor against those now held under the War Measures Act. Certainly, it is not directed against the kidnappers and murderers who are guilty of crimes and subject to procedures under the Criminal Code. Actually, it is directed against those shadowy, unknown figures who have been lurking in the background since this crisis began, people who have never been defined, named or found but who are the justification for a continuing state of emergency and crisis. Who are they? How many are there? Where are they? Will they ever be caught?

Do these few people—if there are any—who are still at large and cannot be charged under the Criminal Code in any way justify this bill? Even if the bill is justified, is it justified in its present terms without the normal protection of the law? I say that regardless of what we have done up to the present time, and regardless of the mistakes that have been made or the praise that has been given, it is time to get back to normal. I think we can make one move toward getting back to normal in this country by accepting the amendment that has been offered.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Faulkner: Call it five o'clock.

Mr. Otto: With friends like that I do not need enemies. Listening to this debate over the past two weeks, it would appear that we are introducing some sort of new legislation. We have had speeches about the severity of the measure and its lack of justice as if, indeed, we were introducing some brand new law that would restrict the rights of all citizens.

I would remind this House that this is not new legislation. We have in force at the present time the War Measures Act; the purpose of this legislation is to replace that act with something less onerous, something not quite so severe, and something that will last for a specific length of time. Indeed, the time is so short that I wonder whether we will get through the bill before the expiry date of this legislation. But my point is that we are not imposing new restrictions on the Canadian people.

If members want to be honest, they would have to say: "We don't want this legisation. We want to do away with the War Measures Act. There is no crisis in Montreal or in Quebec, indeed no crisis whatever. Let the FLQ do what it likes". That is what is being said.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Come, come!

Mr. Otto: The hon. member who has just taken his seat said there was no crisis and never has been one. If hon. gentlemen believe that, let them stand up and say so. But why say that this legislation is so repressive—

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Is the hon. member rising on a point of privilege?

Mr. Aiken: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I hope the hon. member was listening to my speech, because I did not say that there never was a crisis.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I wish to remind the hon. member that the point he has made is not a point of privilege but merely a point of debate. The hon. member for York East.

Mr. Otto: I will not debate the issue, Mr. Speaker. I thought I heard the hon. member say that he doubted whether there was a crisis. However, if he now says that there was and that the introduction of the War Measures Act was justified, then I am pleased to hear him say that. May I remind the members of this House that this legislation is indeed less onerous than what is in force at the present time, and no one has denied that. Neither has anyone mentioned that this legislation has a definite expiry date.

Now, I am not going to deny that there will be abuses of this legislation. There are always abuses of legislation which deprives people of their rights. That has been the history of this kind of legislation, and no one wants to use it.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) referred to the introduction of the War Measures Act during the last war. I bow my head in shame with him, and with all Canadians, at what we did to those Canadians of Japanese descent in British Columbia. These things happen, and as I say, I have no doubt there will be abuses of this legislation or of any legislation of this sort.

I should like to ask hon. gentlemen whether these abuses will be more onerous and harder to bear than abuses of the body—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but it is my duty at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McKinley)—national defence; the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose)—air transport; the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode)—energy, mines and resources.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, as listed on today's Order Paper, namely public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

Public Bills

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD DAY

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH AS LEGAL HOLIDAY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough) moved that Bill C-8, respecting Sir John A. Macdonald Day, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Hogarth: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hon. member for New Westminster is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member who is presenting this bill could get it to committee immediately, with the unanimous consent of the House, if he made two small amendments, namely in paragraph 1, that the act be cited as the Sir Wilfrid Laurier Day Act, and the same amendment at the bottom of paragraph 2.

• (5:00 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Hillsborough.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, unlike King Agrippa, I am not even "almost persuaded" by that interesting suggestion. I must note that this is the third time I have attempted to make it up the aisle on this, and having lost out on private members' hour before I want, in the kindest way, to suggest to my colleagues in the House that henceforth I will no longer be inhibited from protesting personally the dropping of private members' hour. In the future, when I am here during private members' hour I will want to be convinced that there is a clear and present value in cancelling private members' hour or there will be no unanimous consent coming from this member. I have watched the diminution of private members' time in the House of Commons in my long and laboured 13 years here, but I would not like any further development along these particular lines. Having said this, with all the kindness of my heart, I hope it will be borne in mind so I will not have to be an unrepentant interrupter in the future.

We Canadians, we must admit, are unfortunately not an historically minded people. In this we are unlike the Americans whom it is now again so popular to denigrate. They have, of course, their Washington's birthday, their Lincoln's birthday and so on. Since I last presented this motion we in Canada have shown our lack of historical mindedness by allowing Glensmere, the beautiful home of Sir Robert Borden, to fall before the wrecker's hammer. We can in this country celebrate St. Andrew's day, St. Patrick's day, St. George's day, St. Jean Baptiste day and even Robbie Burns day.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

John A., like Robbie Burns, was not a saint, but surely he was an essential Canadian, the father of his country. Surely, he is among the architects of confederation, the builder of a coalition government which fostered the union of the colonies. He was at all the great conferences, including the one at Charlottetown in 1864 where the whole thing was really decided.

Sir John A. was prime minister from 1867 to 1891, with a brief, inglorious interregnum from 1873 to 1878. He was a member of the legislature of the then Canada at the age of 29. He was in public life for nearly half a century. He was a consummate politician and a vigorous but not hysterical nationalist. He was interesting, colourful, engaging, a charming man, a man of gaiety and a man who was not noted as a teetotaller. He was a man of joyous nature, but for those who know of his life he was not a man unacquainted with personal sorrow. Along with the burdens of personal problems and pain, he had more than his share of public anxieties. He, too, knew insurrection and his handling of the Louis Riel crisis was not quite as easy then as it now seems to be from the comfortable hindsight of several decades. He knew the terror and anguish which comes from the assassin's bullet and his sorrow over the death of Thomas D'Arcy McGee was bitter and agonizing.

In the days before image makers, before hidden persuaders and even before Information Canada, he came through as a genuinely interesting public man, a good fellow, and we used to say that great and gay John A, until that last adjective took on a certain meaning we do not like, and a man deserving of his country's trust. The word charisma was not in vogue in the 1870's and 1880's, but this uniquely unhypocritical man, this thoroughly political person, seemed to be able to command public confidence and to engage successfully in the art of nation building. It is a part of our tepid lack of interest in our history that we do not realize how difficult was the task facing our founding fathers, nor how splendid was the achievement of those who brought this about.

Sir John A. himself declared that his greatest work was done before 1867, an interesting tribute to this earlier period. Deserving a major place in this era was the creation of the political party of which I am a member. In 1854 he set the pattern and parameters of a party, and incidentally gave it the name which it was to pick up much later. He said in 1854 "there would be a new House and new people to choose from, and our aims should be to enlarge the bounds of our party so as to embrace every person desirous of being counted as a progressive Conservative."

Although he gave little time to theory or philosophy it is clear that Macdonald wisely knew, recognized and appreciated, that political parties are in fact older than democracy and without political parties the parliamentary process does not work. Of all the qualities which made Sir John A. Macdonald a great figure, and made it possible to create and maintain a nation, I think the quality most notable was his moderation. In a country so vast and diverse as Canada, it is the man of the middle course who will prevail. Indeed, it is men like Macdonald, and I am proud to mention Laurier, who was referred to a moment ago in a humorous way, and men like Mackenzie King who have triumphed.

Macdonald refused always to play the race or religious game. He was unwilling to be an extremist, although God knows he was tempted. I am a little concerned when I hear public men today laud the virtues of polarization, and I do not like to hear moderates decried as wishy-washy bleeding hearts. When I hear that I fear a little for the land and for the political institutions which must play a vital role in holding this land together. The greatest danger in Sir John A. Macdonald's day was polarization of different groups, and especially and very simply the group which spoke English and the group which spoke French. That is still a very great and serious danger.

Old tomorrow, the great compromiser, the driver of a six horse team, as Professor Lower called him, saw the essential virtue in reaching consensus but not encouraging confrontation. Heaven knows, he was often tempted to assume the brittle and immediately satisfying role of a sharp protagonist. But like Edmund Burke he knew, and knowing he cherished the value of compromise. It was Burke who said that "all government and indeed every human benefit and enjoyment, every virtue and every prudent act is founded on compromise and barter." The word "compromise" is another one of which we have lost the meaning, as we think now in terms of the habits of a loose female.

So today, as I have before, I ask that we look upon this our founding father and set aside one day—not a day that usually comes on the weekend, nor a summer celebration because summer is more pleasant, but a day of historical significance, the birth of the father of this country, the chief architect of confederation. I ask in the words of Ecclesiasticus "let us now praise famous men and our fathers that begat us." I think we should do this for our political fathers as well. I want my friend across the way to know that as soon as the committee reports on this bill and it becomes law I will join vigorously with him in getting a Laurier day, too. This is not a compromise or a barter, this is a fair declaration of intent.

I am pleased, sir, that something has been done in the country. I had the pleasure of being in Kingston last June on the anniversary of Sir John's death. It was a splendid ceremony arranged by the Progressive Conservative party. I also visited the home where Sir John A. lived. It is a fine, national institution well maintained under the direction of a very able, sensitive and understanding curator. This is one thing for which the present government deserves credit. Not just Kingston should honour Sir John A. Macdonald. He was the hon. member for Kingston, of course, but he was the father of the country.

As an additional inducement, when we set aside this day as a holiday, we shall honour some of our great contemporaries as well; the hon. member for Lafontaine (Mr. Lachance), whose birthday is January 11, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), his birthday is on that day, our much-beloved whip, the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) who also has January 11 as his natal day. What a time we would have in this House with so many birthdays. This date is also the birthday of the premier of Ontario, Premier John Robarts, who in these last seven lean years of federalism has through his wisdom, moderation and common sense done more to hold this country together than any man in public life. Therefore, I commend to all my colleagues this suggestion which I have long advanced and which in these trying times I advocate with more feeling and fervour than ever before.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the hon. member for York East rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Otto: I am rising to ask a question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the hon. member for Hillsborough would answer my question. He says that January 11 was the birth date of Sir John A. Macdonald or at least the alleged Sir John A. Macdonald. I and others understand that there is no certificate of birth or record and indeed not even a certificate of death of one called Sir John A. Macdonald.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Chair feels the hon. member should put his question.

Mr. Otto: The question I have just put is whether the hon. gentleman has any record to show that the man called Sir John A. Macdonald did indeed exist or was sort of a figment of mass imagination.

Mr. Macquarrie: If I may be permitted to reply, Mr. Speaker, for a moment I thought when this wavy suggestion was made that the hon. member was speaking of another prime minister who was somewhat spiritualistic. But I am confident of the existence of Sir John A. Macdonald and I am satisfied with the date of his birth. I shall try to get the appropriate documents for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Otto: They do not exist.

Mr. Macquarrie: We are satisfied he was there.

Mr. R. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) for introducing this private member's bill, C-8 which is designed to give national recognition to Sir John Alexander Macdonald, one of the most decisive figures in North American history, a man whom the Canadian author, Bruce Hutchison, has described as "a magnificent paradox—as widely known for his scandalous public conduct as for his political acumen". As is the fate with almost all private members' bills, this one will not likely become an act of Parliament. However, it seems fitting, Mr. speaker, that a bill similar to C-8 should be introduced annually at or near the birthdate of this Father of Confederation. In this way at least once each year the House of Commons could honour Sir John A. Macdonald, and members would have the opportunity of commenting on the man, his ideas and his significant accomplishments. The federal Parliament ought regularly in some way to pay homage to this outstanding Scotsman who saw so clearly that the scattered and divided colonies of British North America had no future apart from one another. He dreamed and worked for a united Canada, a future nation with a dual society. Progress toward Macdonald's goal was slow and tortuous, but it was this cause which give meaning to his life and guaranteed him a privileged position of prominence in our history. He once said in the period before 1867:

—for twenty long years I have been dragging myself through the dreary waste of colonial politics. I thought there was no end, nothing worthy of ambition; but now I see something which is well worthy of all I have suffered in the cause of my little country. The question of "Colonial Union"... absorbs every idea as far as I am concerned.

Many members of Parliament may well envy this politician and statesman who found a genuine cause into which he could pour all his energies. The Dominion of Canada, as it was then called, was proclaimed here in Ottawa on July 1, 1867, amid cannon salutes, bonfires and orations. The new dominion included only four provinces and the boy from Kingston who had become its first prime minister knew that his nation was as yet only a structure of paper documents. Today it is much, much more than that. A man's dream and his ambition, a necessity for survival and an act of the British Parliament have together become an economic and political reality made possible by the work and sacrifice of a diverse people occupying a land with an equally diverse geography. The dry bones of history acquired sinews and muscle; life and spirit were breathed into this body politic and a new nation was created.

The story of Canada clearly reveals that we have had our times of trouble. We have experienced periods of despair and we have had our bouts of illness. Even now, the surgeon is seeking to eradicate a tumorous growth which threatens our health and perhaps even our very existence. The threat of terror and violence could lead to this nation's destruction. Sir John A. in 1865 was deeply distressed by the forces which were at work to destroy the legislative union of 1841. In the parliamentary debates of 1865, speaking on the subject of Confederation, he uttered some words which would have been most appropriate to the current crisis in Canada. He said:

This condition of things was well calculated to arouse the earnest consideration of every lover of his country, and I am happy to say it has had that effect. None were more impressed by this momentous state of affairs, and the grave apprehensions that existed of a state of anarchy destroying our credit, destroying our prosperity, destroying our progress, than were the members of this present House; and the leading statesmen on both sides seemed to have come to the common conclusion that some step must be taken to relieve the country from the deadlock and impending anarchy that hung over us.

For many, the concept of Confederation was strong medicine to cope with the crisis. Even so, for us, the measures taken to deal with terrorism have been direct and forceful. I am reminded, however, of what Albert Camus, the French novelist once wrote:

—our world has no need of lukewarm spirits. It needs ardent hearts that can place moderation in its proper perspective.

Mr. Speaker, I can readily support the principle of this bill which is to honour one of the most important architects of our federation, but I do have some reservations about declaring a national holiday for this purpose. We are fighting inflation, and another day off would decrease our productive capacity and increase costs thereby contributing to this economic malaise. Another long week end would result in additional deaths and injuries on our highways. Students would be deprived of another day in their education at a time when educators are concerned with the knowledge explosion, and at a time when legislators and the taxpayers they represent are seriously questioning both the degree of efficiency and the rising expenditures of our schools, colleges and universities.

Sir John A. worked to build a nation and that task is far from complete. It is sometimes said that today's youth lack a purpose; that they are bored with life and disillusioned with society, so many seek escape in chemical dreams which all too frequently turn out to be nightmares. If anyone needs a challenge, let him turn his eyes northward. In the region of Canada which I represent, and even further north, there is a tremendous need for trained and dedicated people with a wide variety of skills which can be used to develop our resources, to serve the needs of people and their communities, and to help in protecting and restoring the national environment. Many people coming to Canada from abroad have responded to the needs of the north, but for many of our own young people the call has either not been heard or else has gone unheeded.

Nation building is for the bold and for the committed, and in this regard Sir John A. Macdonald has a meaning and message suitable for our day and vital for our future.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take only a few minutes to indicate my support of Bill C-8, as introduced once again this year by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). In his various speeches on this bill he has made it clear that it is important for us to be aware of our history and to keep its memory alive. I think that the suggestion he has made is one that should be implemented. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) say that he agreed with the principle of this bill. I was sorry, however, to hear him suggest that we should confine ourselves to an annual one hour in Parliament talking about Sir John A. Macdonald. We all smiled at some of the arguments he put up as to why we should not have a holiday. May I suggest to him that thanks to the foresight of Sir John A. Macdonald, he was born in the early part of January, so we could arrange, certainly in the parts of the country from which the hon. member for Thunder Bay and I come, for a blizzard to take place on that weekend so that the day will be one on which people stay home and think about our history and not run the risk of the dire catastrophes referred to by the speaker.

An hon. Member: You still stay here anyway.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, we can stay here and have a blizzard even in this place. In fact, it might be good for us to have one here once in a while.

I hope that my hon. friend, the hon. member for Hillsborough, will not feel that I am taking some of the time in this hour simply for the purpose of giving the House some useless information, but when he was telling us about the various people who had birthdays on the same day as Sir John A. Macdonald, it led me to pursue still further some research that I was doing in the Canadian Directory of Parliament. This is a book that was published in our centennial year and gives brief biographies of all those who were Members of Parliament during the first 100 years of this nation's history. On going through the book I find that we have had in Parliament since we came into being 45 persons by the name of Macdonald, 29 of them spelled Macdonald and 16 spelled McDonald.

Mr. Stanfield: How many were spelled with a capital D and how many with a small d?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That was the kind of information that I was anxious to complete, but the way this book is set up did not accommodate me on that point. May I point out that in addition to having that number of members by the name of Macdonald we have had eleven John Macdonalds, seven John A. Macdonalds and four John Alexander Macdonalds. So, the place has been overrun. We have two right now as a matter of fact, but we will not go into their biographies at this point.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay had some doubts about having a holiday, but when you look at the total picture, it seems to me it is significant that we should honour our Macdonalds, beginning with the first one.

I wondered about some of the other famous names. I find that we have had only three Lauriers, two Bordens, four Kings, four Bennetts, two St. Laurents and three Pearsons. Thank heaven, as someone will say, we have had only one Diefenbaker and one Trudeau.

An hon. Member: How many Knowles?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Four, I believe. If hon. members are interested in this kind of research, I can pass the book around and I am sure that someone else might take away the medal for useless information.

At any rate, even though I have spoken in this light vein, the fact is that not only have we had many Macdonalds in this House of Commons but that the one whose name is mentioned in this bill today has played a significant part in the history of Canada and in the history of North America, and I believe we should honour his memory in the way suggested in this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I would like to make a few comments on this bill. I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). That was one of the most interesting speeches and useful contribution of information that he has made in the House in a long time. I am sorry that the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) called for the question when he saw me rise because I was impressed by the argument adduced by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) that in view of the fact we are not dealing with one birthday but a variety of birthdays, and among them are included the birthday of the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) and the hon. member for St. John's East, it makes the over-all proposition more compelling than it was before.

I might start by paying tribute to the hon. member for Hillsborough. If one looked objectively around the House for a suitable apologist for Sir John A. Macdonald one would be hard pressed to improve upon the happy choice of circumstances which have led to the hon. member for Hillsborough being the apologist that we have.

Mr. Stanfield: You mean eulogist.

Mr. Faulkner: Eulogist or apologist. Not only has he, to many of us, embodied some of the finer qualities that we associate with Sir John A. Macdonald in his own presence, but also he demonstrates those qualities of moderation to which he referred and qualities of middle of the road moderation, as he described it, plus the jovial, erudite and good natured exterior which makes the total man so attractive. I also admire his persistence, because I do not know if all members of the House are aware of the fact that this is not the first time the hon. member for Hillsborough has introduced a bill to create a Sir John A. Macdonald day and if my instinct is correct it will probably not be the last. He has done it over a period of years, and prior to his efforts there were other members who have done the same.

In an effort to brief myself on the complete significance of the debate in which I intended to participate I reviewed previous debates. It seems to me that one of the problems which has persistently hampered his efforts is that this is a popular measure and there have constantly been more people interested and talking about it than there was available time.

I reviewed the speeches back in 1964. The hon. member attracted some very strong support in favour of his efforts. At that time the hon. member for Renfrew North, the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) spoke on the subject. That is an interesting speech for private members to read because it gives new members an idea of how private members' hour can be used to discuss a variety of subjects, not necessarily the subject immediately before the chamber. In fact, reading the remarks of the then hon. member for Renfew North I was not sure whether he was speaking about Sir John A. Macdonald Day or St. Patrick's Day. In the course of developing his argument he quoted a wide variety of historical sources from Pliny the Younger to Henry Ford, who described history as bunk.

Not only did we have speeches from the hon. member for Renfrew North, who is the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but also from a gentleman who is now Premier of Nova Scotia. Reading his remarks it is difficult to know whether he was more enamoured by the concept of Sir John A. Macdonald or Joseph Howe. It was an interesting debate in so far as it revealed a great deal about private members' hour.

The idea of a national day for Sir John A. Macdonald creates a number of interesting questions, Mr. Speaker, but I do not intend to deal with them all. Aside from the merits of the man himself and his particular and unique position in Canadian history, one of the really compelling arguments is the broader idea of recognizing in a suitable way those Canadians who have made a remarkable and unique contribution to our history.

As a part-time teacher, one of the things that I find depressing about our situation in Canada is not so much the absence of heroes but that we do not seem to know very much about any Canadians who have made a contribution. This is probably as much the fault of our publishing industry, boards of education, departments of education or to the shortage of interested and creative authors, as anything. The fact remains, however, that Canadians generally are not too conscious of figures of historical importance. What is worse, they are not aware of the rather unique qualities of the Canadian historical process, not just the evolutionary constitutional process which is dealt with in university courses but some of the very particular qualities of our history. I do not think it is possible to overcome this by agreeing to a Sir John A. Macdonald Day. As we have already noticed, there would be a variety of claims from different members of this House for other heroes who more closely reflect different political affiliations. I am sure J. S. Woodsworth might have some support in the House, as certainly would Sir Wilfrid Laurier and some others.

In discussing the merits of this particular case we expose a real problem within our country that in our schools, universities and the population at large there is an appalling ignorance of our history, of our antecedents and of the process that led to the development of our country. It may not be argument sufficient to justify Sir John A. Macdonald Day, but it is sufficient for everybody to examine what is going on in the country and ensure that something be done not in a chauvinistic way but in a rational and broad minded way to overcome this deficiency. It could instil in Canadians an understanding and appreciation for the history of their country and in particular for the people who made the important decisions at various times in its development.

[Mr. Faulkner.]

Mr. Speaker, when I started making a few notes for this debate today, having lost the notes I had prepared for the three previous aborted sessions we had, I sent to the reference library for some material.

Mr. Stanfield: What about Information Canada?

Mr. Faulkner: As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, Information Canada is not dealing essentially with Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They will tell you about Laurier and Trudeau.

Mr. Faulkner: I was going to add that, but I thought it had better come from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). One of the documents the library sent me is very interesting. It is entitled "The Dominion Campaign! Sir John Macdonald on the questions at issue before the people. The Premier's great speech before the workingmen of Toronto." Inside is the title "A brilliant review of the vital issues of the present Campaign." I am not sure who published it, but I could hazard a guess.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Information Canada!

Mr. Faulkner: What is particularly interesting about this speech is the first two pages. Unlike the speeches today, in that day they used to add the audience response to the remarks made by the speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: We are probably just as lucky that it is not done, today, but in Sir John A's day there was no risk apparently. In the first page he has one "loud laughter", one "loud cheers", one "laughter", one "cheers and laughter", one "renewed laughter" and one "great cheering". On the second page he has one "hear, hear and applause", five "cheers", one "loud cheers" and two "applause".

This occurs throughout the speech, Mr. Speaker, and is characteristic of the quality of the speech. But one thing I ran across is a familiar argument to people in public life. He was explaining his record to the workingmen of Toronto and was caught in the ambivalent position of all politicians in power, that of trying to claim credit for great achievement and explaining away those areas where there was not achievement. He said: Why then, I ask, has not more been done?

Three years is a short time, but in three years much has been done.

Mr. Speaker, the argument will come as a surprise to you. It was:

Because we have had an unscrupulous opposition; because we have had an unpatriotic opposition.

It was as it says, Mr. Speaker, "A brilliant review of the vital issues of the present campaign," but it reminded me very much of political speeches I have heard in more recent times.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In Peterborough?

Mr. Faulkner: Never in Peterborough.

There are two particular points to be considered in dealing with this man. If you read this material about Sir John A. Macdonald and read some of his speeches, one of the facts that impresses itself upon you is the extraordinary relevance of what he said at that time to the situation today, particularly in two areas that have been alluded to. One is that he was a nationalist, and the other is that he understood the rights of the minority as few Canadians have done. He understood the significance of language rights. If we had only had the wisdom as a people to follow the advice of Sir John A. Macdonald on language rights and minority rights, we would have largely eliminated the problems we face in this country today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: I should like to turn briefly to his record as a nationalist and the relevance of that today. One authority on Sir John A. Macdonald, of course, is the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). In the debates of January 11, 1967, commemorating the 152nd anniversary of the birthday of Sir John A. Macdonald, the right hon. member for Prince Albert said:

> —his principle for Canada, that it must be an independent nation on the north half of the North American continent willing to co-operate in freedom but insisting on the right that policies for Canada be made by Canadians. That was his contribution.

Mr. Speaker, that has extraordinary relevance to Canada and to Canadians today. He rejected the liberal option of that day of free trade. In many ways that option could be viewed, to use modern language, as the continentalist option today. He rejected it then, and many of us who are looking at a similar proposition in contemporary terms are wondering if we should not be equally vigilant against the continentalist option. For that reason Sir John A. Macdonald's relevance today is undisputed.

• (5:40 p.m.)

I read an article in Maclean's about the formation of a committee for an independent Canada. I suggest that if Sir John A. Macdonald were alive today, he would be a charter member of the committee for an independent Canada. As one reviews the eight-point program of that group it becomes clear that the nationalist position has as much relevance today as the nationalist policy had in 1878 and in subsequent elections. I will not go into the program of the committee for an independent Canada.

Mr. McGrath: Please do.

Mr. Faulkner: Those who are concerned about the classic problem of Canadian national identity and Canadian policy could well review this program in light of some of the advice given by Sir John A. Macdonald.

I should like to make another point which deals with the other element of his policy. This, too, is extremely relevant to our scene today. I am speaking of his policy in the area of language rights. He made a great speech on February 17, 1890, in which he dealt with language rights in the Northwest Territories. The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) pointed out very ably the circumstances in which he made the speech. Considering the prevailing degree of religious bigotry that characterized not only this country but other countries, the degree of distrust that characterized relations between language groups and religious groups in this country, when Sir John spoke in this area, and particularly when he spoke in a way that had a particular affect on his following within his own party, he acted with extraordinary wisdom and courage. As I said before, if we had only had the wisdom to follow the example of Sir John A. Macdonald on this delicate question throughout our history, many of the problems that plague us today would not exist. In his speech on February 17, 1890, he said:

> I have no accord with the desire expressed in some quarters that by any mode whatever there should be an attempt made to oppress the one language or to render it inferior to the other; I believe that would be impossible if it were tried, and it would be foolish and wicked if it were possible. The statement that has been made so often that this is a conquered country is à propos de rien. Whether it was conquered or ceded, we have a constitution now under which all British subjects are in a position of absolute equality, having equal rights of every kind—of language, of religion, of property and of person.

If we had had the wisdom to follow the principle of the first, second and fourth points, our history until 1970 might have been somewhat different and, hopefully, somewhat happier. Throughout the speech—and it is a speech of wisdom and courage—he asks: Why is language so important to individuals? Halfway through the speech he says:

> Why, Mr. Speaker, if there is one act of oppression more than another which would come home to a man's breast, it is that he should be deprived of the consolation of hearing and speaking and reading the language that his mother taught him. It is cruel. It is seething the kid in its mother's milk. The greatest, perhaps, of all the objections to this measure is that it is a futile measure. It will not succeed.

He understood precisely the significance of language for our people. Our failure in part to understand this has puzzled me in the debate we have had in recent years on language rights. I happen to be one whose mother tongue is the tongue of the majority in this country, if one likes to put it that way; yet I know the umbrage and strength of feeling I would bring to bear if I were in the minority position and my right to use the language in which I had been raised, which embodies the heritage of which I am proud, were interfered with in any way. My feelings would be as strong as the feelings of the people wo are in the minority position.

Sir John A. Macdonald had the wisdom to see the importance of the question and to see its relevance to our confederation. He had the courage to pursue a principle that was unpopular in its day but is tremendously relevant to our history. That is all I wish to say, Mr. Speaker. I have enjoyed participating in this debate. Since there are others who wish to speak, I shall take my seat. I end by saying that in the areas of nationalism and language rights, Sir John A. Macdonald is as relevant today as he was more than 100 years ago.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must advise the House that the Parliamentary Secretary's time has expired and he would need unanimous consent in order to answer the question. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary mentioned in a very serious and proper way what Sir John A. Macdonald had done for us with respect to unity and language. Does he not also agree that if we had followed his advice in other respects there would be no Grits or teetotallers in this country today?

An hon. Member: I will drink to that.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I think Sir John A. Macdonald would have appreciated thoroughly the flavour of this debate. He would have said, "Oh, well, it is almost six o'clock and this measure has not passed. Perhaps it will pass some other time—hopefully, tomorrow."

I am pleased to second the continuing effort of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) to pay tribute to Sir John and his attempt to allow all Canadians to pay tribute to the man who put Canada together. I, too, had the pleasure of going to Kingston and taking part in the ceremony performed each year by the Kingston Progressive Conservative Association to do honour to Sir John A. Macdonald. I think even hard-shelled Grits could gain something from making a pilgrimage to that city. They have there a fantastic graveyard, and if we must go to one, and we all shall one day, we might as well go to one as fine as that. The ceremony is sincerely staged by the Conservative Association with the help of cadets wearing uniforms of former times.

Then, of course, there are the speeches—one was made this year by my hon. friend from Hillsborough and one was made last year by myself—that go back a considerable time. I suggest that the Grits could very usefully see our ceremony and hear us pay tribute to Sir John and, in return, we would be glad to attend their ceremony when they pay their annual respects to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. We would be glad to accompany them at that time.

I think one of the most moving experiences I had during the 1967 centennial celebrations was seeing costumed actors of Canada visit Halifax and play the roles of the Fathers of Confederation. The man who played Sir John A. Macdonald was Robert Christie. It so happens, I think, that Mr. Christie is a teetotaller or as near a teetotaller as one can imagine, if one can imagine such a state.

Mr. McGrath: I can't imagine it.

Mr. McCleave: The man who played George Brown, another great figure of that time, I will not name. George Brown, as everyone knows, was the founder of the Globe and Mail and, as one can imagine, he had no use for booze whatsoever. The actor who played him had a great deal of use for booze. Therefore, the teetotaller was playing Sir John A. Macdonald and the tippler was playing the part of George Brown. It added a certain merriment to the evening when these "Fathers of Confederation" sat down with the citizens of our day. I recall it because Christie did a very good job of playing the part of Sir John A. Macdonald. That Halifax audience responded in a way in which I have rarely seen an audience respond to an actor. Their attention was riveted on Robert Christie. If he did epitomize Sir John A. Macdonald, one could imagine the magic hold that Sir John A. had on people. I understand that Mr. Christie spent a considerable amount of time learning Sir John A's mannerisms. Therefore, he may be the nearest that any of us will ever see approaching the mannerisms of Sir John A. I was tremendously impressed.

• (5:50 p.m.)

I support the efforts of my hon. friend. Anyone who has visited the office of the hon. member for Hillsborough, one of the original settlers in the West Block, will have noticed a plaque on his wall from one of the early election campaigns. It is a picture of Sir John A. Macdonald leading the successful Conservative party with the words, "The old flag; the old policy; the old leader". In 100 years people have gone from the belief in established things to the point where in the last election the successful party brought someone in from virtually under the rug, one who probably was not known to most Canadians. It is an interesting reflection on how political techniques have changed. In past years people voted for something in which they believed; now they will accept almost anything born in the age of advertising, any charismatic promise. I will not get into a discussion on advertising. I will do that when the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) introduces his bill in that regard.

I vigorously support the bill of the hon. member for Hillsborough. It may be all very well for each party to espouse its own heroes but with this bill we are doing more than just paying tribute to Sir John A. Macdonald, the greatest Conservative of all. We are asking Parliament to recognize the fact that confederation, the union of provinces from the Atlantic to the Pacific, is really his handiwork. Oddly enough, at one stage of his career Sir John A. had no use for the concept of confederation. He then saw it as the means of solving the great instability between the quarrelsome Canadians in Quebec and Ontario. Once he set his foot on the path toward confederation, he used his skills and ability to bring it about.

Great persons such as George Brown were associated with him in that endeavour. I am sure that historians in this House, including the hon. member for Hillsborough, will agree that if Sir John A. had not set the course for confederation it would not have been accomplished, or would have come about in a vastly different form. Such was his ability to deal with people. Above all, he was a master at dealing with people. Long nights spent sitting around tables with the conversation flowing as freely as the wine may have been responsible; I do not know. Sir John A. was not a great orator. I understand that his speaking technique was to stand, more or less turn his back on the opposition and speak in somewhat confidential voice to his followers, urging them to support some sensible measure which he was introducing.

I hope we will not be waylaid into choosing heroes of the various parties, laudable though that may be. What we are now discussing is paying tribute to the one person who created confederation.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, in light of the Conservatives' singular lack of success in recent elections, I suppose it is appropriate that the day which they celebrate each year should take place in a graveyard. I in part support the principle of this bill, but I would have been happier if it had been founded upon the premise of a Prime Minister's Day rather than a Sir John A. Macdonald Day.

I have done some reading and research concerning Sir John A. Macdonald. I feel if this suggestion had been made to him personally, his answer would have been decisive, abrupt, eloquent, clear, rude and it probably would have been "No". I think Sir John A. Macdonald would be more pleased that we have seen fit to name an icebreaker after him, in keeping with the independent and pioneering spirit of this man.

If this bill had suggested a Prime Minister's Day, tribute could have been paid to the former member for Lambton West, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. We recognize that a politician who beats another politician deserves some credit and it should not be forgotten that Sir Alexander Mackenzie did, in fact, defeat Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT, 1970

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY POWERS FOR PRESERVATION OF PUBLIC ORDER

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-181, to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada, be read the third time and do pass.

And the amendment thereto of Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, before five o'clock I was indicating to the House that the bill we are discussing is not, in a sense, a new bill or some strange measure introduced for the first time, but a bill to replace the War Measures Act presently in force. I was dealing with the question of possible abuse raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). It is true there are bound to be abuses and that some people will be arrested who should not have been arrested. The question we have to decide is what type of abuse there is to be. In the absence of a bill of this type there will be abuses by the FLQ, because this is what Bill C-181 is about: it is not legislation in a vacuum; it deals with a specific problem. I am sure there is a problem in Quebec, and it is one which arises because of the FLQ. The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) and the other hon. member who spoke from the Conservative side of the House made certain remarks about the merging of separatists with the FLQ. Let me remind hon. members that the aim is still separatism; what we object to are the means by which to bring about separatism.

The amendment seeks the provision of some sort of safeguard, one which would amount, I suggest, to a pre-trial trial. Hon. members with legal training on both sides of the House will know that one thing the common law does not tolerate in criminal matters is a trial before a trial. The speeches made before the amendment was moved indicated there should be some body, some committee, which would investigate not only the condition of prisoners, whether they had been given an opportunity to get in touch with their relatives and solicitors, but also to find out whether or not they should have been arrested. But how would the committee, or commission, find this out? By guesswork? Prisoners do not wear labels on their coats.

The only way to find out would be by investigation and getting evidence. However, evidence obtained in this way would not be in the purview of a court. Let us say the committee decided that a person under detention had been properly arrested. What bearing would this have on his subsequent trial? A committee would already have reached the conclusion that he ought to have been arrested and, as I say, it is one of the principles of our law that a person to be tried should be tried in the courts where he has an opportunity to examine witnesses and bring forward evidence. I should like the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands to tell me how this committee or board would do its work without getting into a pre-trial trial which is obnoxious to our system of law.

Mr. Lewis: It is obvious, when you think about it.

Mr. Otto: The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) will have an opportunity to let us know how this is to be done. I have heard these points of view expressed over and over again. There are some, Mr. Speaker, who think they have a monopoly of conscience, a monopoly of concern for the rights of citizens. They do not. We are all seriously concerned with this aspect of the bill. I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) struggles with the thought that after 800 years of striving for civil liberty, the rights of citizens are being placed in jeopardy for a short time. But we have to make up our minds. Shall we allow a party or group to use bombs, violence and kidnapping to attain a certain end, an end which would obviously mean the destruction of Canada, or should we use every means at our disposal to prevent this happening?

We on this side have thought this out. We, too, have struggled with our consciences and we have concluded there is only one way to deal with the situation, and that is to make illegal the fraternity or group of people who are dedicated to the overthrow of this nation by threats and by violence. I would not have supported this bill if it concerned merely an attack on property rights or something of that nature. But something else is involved. The obvious purpose, and the only purpose of the FLQ is to achieve an end which is the destruction of Canada as we know it by using ways and means which we consider obnoxious and dangerous.

I urge all members of the House, if they cannot accept this bill, to say so and vote against it. Let them not delay it, though, and allow the War Measures Act to remain in force while they continue to expound the same points. I do not for one minute suggest that anyone in this House or on the other side is trying to delay the passage of this measure for a political purpose; I believe legislation of this nature is too serious for that. Everybody here is wrestling with his conscience in an attempt to decide whether or not to support the bill. Surely, though, an answer must come one way or another and we must take our stand and determine whether or not the FLQ shall be allowed to use the methods it has used in the past, or whether we should say: No, we cannot allow the destruction of this nation by violence, threats, kidnapping and murder.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, the amendment currently under study reads as follows:

That Bill C-181 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of reconsidering clause 12 with a view to the inclusion therein of a provision for the establishment of an independent body to review the administration under the said bill.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of this amendment which provides for the establishment of such a body for three reasons. First of all, we are all human beings and for that reason we may all make mistakes, whatever our chosen field of endeavour. Secondly, owing to the nature of their work, policemen are more liable to make mistakes than other people. Their having to work fast makes them all the more liable and the fact that we live in a bilingual country does not make their work any easier.

We all remember the case of the minister from British Columbia who was arrested in Quebec City last spring and put in jail simply because the officers who arrested him could not speak English. They did not understand him when he explained.

I myself speak only French, and on two occasions in one week I had troubles with the police, because Ottawa police officers, who spoke only English, pressed two charges against me.

Unfortunately, policemen work under a system of quotas, that is, in order to get promotions, they must make a certain number of arrests.

So, if a policeman wants to be honest, and only arrests true culprits, he may very well never reach a senior position. So, to gain promotion some of them take awful chances and I repeat, that is exactly what they did to me twice in the course of a single week.

The first chance they took on March 28, 1969. It was a Friday evening and I was driving to Quebec City. At ten after six, I was ordered to stop in the outskirts of the town of Alfred, on Highway 17, and charged with driving without having my headlights on. The sun had set at five after six. Charged for the fun of it, I was convicted by mistake. The hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), who had witnessed this incident simply said it was ridiculous. Being a little fluent in English, he asked to meet one of the superior officers in charge of the stupid fellow who had stopped me. The hon. member for Champlain was granted the interview. He asked the sergeant: "Will you please tell me what is going on? Why this stupid handing out of tickets? Has there been a violation and, if so, why convict people that fast? Would it not be possible to warn people when they commit the first offence?"

I felt relieved when the sergeant said that the policeman had been extravagant and that there had been no traffic violation. He asked the member for Champlain to urge me to return the copy of my ticket. The following week I received a request for payment from the Magistrate's Court of the province of Ontario. Again I was guilty and I had to pay. Once more I asked the hon. member for Champlain to plead for me. Therefore the member wrote to Sergeant Washburn of the Ontario Provincial Police, and I quote:

Sir: In spite of the clear agreement reached during our meeting, Mr. Godin has nevertheless received a request for payment from the Magistrate's Court.

I would ask for immediate correction of this embroglio.

Trusting that you will give this request your attention, I remain, René Matte, M.P. for Champlain.

And the letter was dated May 14, 1969. Then, on May 16, 1969, the hon. representative for Champlain, received from the Provincial Police a letter worded as follows:

Dear Sir: Further to your letter of the 14th, this is to inform you that an error has been made in Magistrate's Court, L'Orignal, Ontario, in connection with the notice of payment sent to Mr. Roland Godin, indicating that he had been found guilty and was to pay a fine and costs. This was a mistake on the part of the court clerk.

A letter will reach Mr. Godin in the near future from the Magistrate's Court, explaining that the notice of payment was sent to him in error.

I regret any inconvenience this may have caused you and rest assured that all necessary steps will be taken to remedy this.

With best regards, I am,

Yours very truly,
D. F. Washburn,
Sergeant, No. 1588

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I had been arrested for the fun of it and condemned by mistake.

I would not say all officers are stupid, but even if there were only 5 per cent of them, the establishment of an independent body as is now proposed would really be essential for the protection of the public.

The third reason why I support this amendment, is that I am a Quebecer and, as a matter of fact, because Quebecers do not hold the Bar and the Bench in very high esteem. On March 9, 1970, one could read on the front page of the Quebec newspaper Le Soleil the following, and I quote:

The Quebec people have no great regard for the Bar and the Bench, according to the findings of three public opinion polls published today in Montreal.

These polls were taken at the request of the Royal Commission on the administration of penal and criminal law presided over by the Assistant Chief Justice of the Court of Social Welfare, the Hon. Yves Prevost.

Two of them were conducted by a group of researchers under Professor Denis Szabo, head of the Department of Criminology at the University of Montreal, and the third was effected under the guidance of Professor André Normandeau.

Like the people of the province, criminologists were consulted and Appendix No. 6 is entitled: "The Quebec people on criminality and penalties"; let us note that the authors assume all the credit and responsibility for these polls.

That article shows us what is happening in Quebec, with regard to the Bar and to the Bench.

And those who have commented on the findings of this survey have stated, and I quote:

Some 62.4 per cent of Quebecers think that lawyers are hypocrites, 20.2 per cent believe that they are rather useless to society, 43.1 per cent consider them dishonest and 34.4 per cent go so far as to say that they are thieves.

Furthermore, according to the Quebec people, the law profession—

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Is the hon. member for Charlevoix rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Asselin: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I am a member of the Quebec Bar and I say that the hon. member's assertions are absolutely without foundation and, furthermore, the survey merely concerned itself with a sample group and did not produce any conclusive evidence.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I must say that lawyers are respected in Quebec. They are not all hypocrites and thieves. I must add that the hon. member's comment has nothing to do with the debate now under way. I would ask the Chair to call him to order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Chair must inform the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) that his question of privilege is not motivated. It is rather a question of procedure. The hon. member has not broken into a torrent of abuse against an hon. member or against Her Majesty. However, I would like to take this opportunity to point out to the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) that even if up to now the Chair has allowed some latitude to hon. members and that some of them have temporarily digressed from the subject under consideration, he must limit his remarks to the amendment under consideration.

Mr. Godin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members know how sensitive I am and incapable of expressing malevolent views or making charges.

I am merely quoting a newspaper article supporting the motion before us. Nothing in our Standing Orders could prevent me from quoting a newspaper article. I would ask the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) to please be patient. At the end of my speech, he will realize that he stands among a number of good lawyers. Indeed, if he had been bad, he would now fill another position in society. It is because he is honest that he is nothing more than an ordinary member of Parliament.

For the information of the hon. member for Charlevoix, I was quoting the following:

Only 8.5 per cent of the people think that the law is a distinguished profession, while 49.8 per cent feel that physicians rank first.

Moreover, most of the people interviewed (59.1 per cent) consider that criminal lawyers' fees are too high. What is even worse, Quebecers do not have any regard either for the Bench. Indeed—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. After having appealed to the goodwill of the hon. member, the Chair must once again ask him to restrict his remarks to the amendment now before us. To my knowledge, the House is not now judging the Bar, lawyers or other people and to develop this line of argument does not contribute anything to the progress of the debate.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, I take leave to read the text of our amendment once again:

That Bill C-181 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of reconsidering clause 12 with a view to the inclusion therein of a provision for the establishment of an independent body to review the administration under the said bill.

We want an independent body to be set up, Mr. Speaker, precisely because we find this, in my article. I quote:

—the poll revealed that 43.3 per cent of the people feel that judges are individuals with prejudices, 34.4 per cent feel that they are uncomprehending, 30.1 per cent accuse them of being corrupt—

On the other hand, 21.9 per cent of those who answered believe that judges are appointed solely because of their political convictions.

If it were not the case, Mr. Speaker, we doubtless would have felt that the amendment before the House was not required.

It is precisely to provide for such cases that we want an independent body to review the administration of the law. In fact, we doubt that the present crisis will end, which concerns us greatly. Now, let it be clearly understood that I am not saying that all judges are bad.

We must admit that in the opinion of Quebeckers we are hypocrites, useless, dishonest and thieves. For instance, it is known that important people have been involved in the forgery of certificates and in fraudulent bankruptcies while others have been accused of patronage. Before being a judge, I think one must be a lawyer.

I know that many judges come from such circles. Unfortunately, to save the legal profession the government—controlled by lawyers—has found no better means than to appoint them to the bench. This is how their past activities are cast into oblivion. Quite a number of lawyers would now be in jail had it not been for their occupation. Means have been found to hide them. They cannot even be called as witnesses before any court. So, what are the verdicts based on? I have already told how I had been charged twice within the same week.

One night the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) took ill, here in Parliament. The Parliament nurse who was really ill at ease, called upon some medical doctors to visit the hon. member for Bellechasse in his office. Those were the hon. members for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie), for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) and for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk); Senator McGrand, also a physician, was present.

Four physicians advised him to go to the hospital but the hon. member, unable to move, had to be carried out by ambulance. In the hospital, English only was spoken. They could not find any room for him and he was sent back out in the middle of the night. The next morning, the hon. member for Bellechasse asked to drive him to the airport so that he could go to a Quebec hospital where he could be admitted. Since I had driven at 50 miles an hour in a 30 mile an hour zone on Riverside Drive, and at 65 miles an hour on McCarthy Road in a 50 mile an hour zone, I was fined once more and charged with impaired driving. I was charged in English, I was tried in English and an English speaking judge sentenced me to a $250 fine. My driver's licence was also suspended for a period of three months and, three months later, the lawyer sent me a bill for $1,000.

At the same time, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) a Liberal member, went through a 30 mile an hour zone at 100 miles an hour. He simply had to pay a $50 fine. Well if politics do not come into play in cases like that, I certainly would like to know. This is why I shall vote for the amendment under consideration and if I could, I would even vote twice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the main motion. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on third reading yesterday my leader set out our position lucidly and forcefully and there is no need to repeat all that he said. I rise first to indicate what happened during the committee stage of the proceedings and, second, hon. members opposite will be delighted to hear, to move another amendment to the motion before the House. If I may, I should like to refer to the remarks that I made on October 16, similar to those that my leader made on the same date. I said on that day:

> If we had been faced today with a request by the government for certain specific changes in the law, with evidence that those changes which this House of Commons would pass were necessary, we would have a different situation.

Later in that speech I also indicated that it may well be that the criminal crisis in Montreal and Quebec—and it was a crisis dealing with criminals—required expanded rights of search without warrant and some expansion of the right to arrest without warrant and to detain for three or four days.

In a memorandum which my leader sent to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in reply to a letter from him which was discussed by our caucus on two occasions, he made suggestions of the kind of thing that this party might be prepared to support. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) indicated, we voted for second reading of this bill in the hope that it might be possible during Committee of the Whole to get the bill amended, thereby reducing its repressive, undesirable and obnoxious aspects.

Mr. Gibson: You don't seem to care.

Mr. Lewis: I wish some hon. member opposite would take the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson) behind the curtain and pat his head. Of course, if he has his head patted he might make more noise than ever, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ricard: He is sitting on it.

Mr. Lewis: I think it is important to review what happened during the committee stage of this bill. Amendments were moved by the official opposition, by members of my party and by the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané). These amendments were reasonable and none would have interfered with the basic needs that the government claimed were necessary to deal with the situation still present in the province of Quebec.

I repeat that the situation, if it needs any expansion of powers, needs no greater powers than an expansion of the right to search and the right to arrest and detain for a short time in order to apprehend the criminals who are members of the FLQ, and in order to find the dynamite, the arms and ammunition which we were told were stolen—and there is only a suspicion of that in many cases—by the FLQ. This bill goes away beyond that, Mr. Speaker. On several clauses we tried to bring it into greater harmony—

Mr. Gibson: You don't understand.

An hon. Member: Down, boy.

Mr. Lewis: —with the sense of civil liberties and civil rights. On every point the minister and the government remained adamant and would not move an inch. Why is that, Mr. Speaker? That is what I ask myself.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Peters: There is nothing new in that.

Mr. Hogarth: Nobody wants to listen to the hon. member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair is experiencing some difficulty in following the hon. member's speech. I wonder if hon. members in the chamber would allow the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) to conclude his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind interjections from the Liberal benches if they are even half intelligent. I can tolerate them then. May I remind hon. gentlemen opposite that whenever somebody interjected on an earlier occasion, they were all indignant at not being taken seriously; but apparently the defence of civil liberties is something they can laugh at. They are laughing at that this evening, as they have before.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gibson: The hon. member knows better than that.

Mr. Lewis: We tried to bring in a number of amendments—

Mr. Gibson: The hon. member knows better than that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lewis: I wish hon. members would not pay attention to the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson). It is really such an awful waste of time and energy. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, we tried during the committee stage of the bill to amend the law so that its most obnoxious aspect would be removed. We tried, for example, to persuade the minister to change part of clause 4 of the law so that it would be impossible to intimidate people and inhibit them from communicating information regarding the FLQ, something which journalists all over Quebec were worried about. They are inhibited in this matter today. The hon. member for Matane tried to suggest to the minister that in clause 5 ought to be incorporated provisions similar to those now contained in the Criminal Code, so that the right of a spouse, which under the Criminal Code is extended to the spouse of a kidnapper or murderer, would also be made available to the spouse of one who might be arrested, I suggest to you, for a much lesser offence, the offence of having participated in some meetings some years ago as set out in clause 8.

We tried to persuade the minister that the provisions of clause 7 with regard to bail ought to be a matter for the judiciary and that the power ought not to be given to a political officer and, therefore, to the police forces of a province. My hon. friend, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) asked the government to accept an amendment which was surely correct, right and just. It sought to provide that no one should be convicted of a crime under clause 8 unless when he attended a meeting of the FLQ many years ago he knew of the criminal aspects of the organization.

I tried to persuade the minister to remove the provision that a policeman may arrest people on mere suspicion and to replace it with reasonable and probable grounds for that suspicion. We emphasized the importance of this provision, because we were not talking in a vacuum; we were speaking with experience behind us, with the experience that 400 or so of the 450 people who had been arrested were released without charge. We had 400 innocent people incarcerated from between three and 21 days and then released without charge. Above all, we tried to persuade the government to establish some supervisory body. We moved such an amendment, as did the official opposition. We tried to persuade the government to allow Parliament to say that if ten members so signified with their signatures, this law could be terminated on a date prior to April 30, 1971.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that every one of the amendments to which I have alluded, and I remember those that we moved better than those the hon. member for Matane moved—many that he moved fell into exactly the same category as the amendments we moved—would have removed the most obnoxious parts of this bill and made the bill not a good bill, because it would still have interfered with civil liberties, but one that would have been confined merely to the powers that the police in the province of Quebec could reasonably desire and expect. They would have removed the excessive arbitrariness of that bill. But the minister sat there unmoved, adamant and intransigent.

I ask myself, why was that, Mr. Speaker? I can find only two reasons. The first is that there was some kind of order from the cabinet to the minister, an order given perhaps with the acquiescence of the Attorney General of Quebec, saying that there would not be a comma changed in this bill: it had to go through with every word and every comma just as originally drafted.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Lewis: The second reason I can think of, Mr. Speaker, is that the minister and the government feared that if they reduced the severity and arbitrariness of this bill, they would be admitting that invoking the War Measures Act and the regulations under that act were clearly panic-stricken measures for which there was no excuse. Indeed, there was none then and there is much less now.

I say to this House, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) was entirely right in what he said this afternoon. We in this party have said on many occasions that the Prime Minister set out deliberately to create in Canada a state of panic and a state of hysteria. He deliberately set out to do that, and he can wave his arms all he likes.

Mr. Trudeau: I am not waving my arms. I say the hon. member is a phony.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister suggests that I am a phony.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: All I can say in return is that he is an expert to learn from.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Every act of his since he has taken power and rejected and discarded every progressive idea he ever held shows precisely who is phony in this House and in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: The people don't think so.

Mr. Lewis: He set out deliberately to create a state of panic and hysteria in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: And he succeeded, Mr. Speaker. He succeeded in making many of the people in Canada feel that there was an army of people in Quebec that was about to spring not only on the government of that province but on the government of every other province and the government of Canada.

An hon. Member: Cut it out.

Mr. Lewis: There may be 50 or there may be 100 of these criminals in the province of Quebec; but there has been nothing move than a failure of all the police authorities to deal with this situation as they ought to have dealt with it.

An hon. Member: Who are these people?

Mr. Lewis: What the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka said was absolutely right. I suggest to hon. members of the House that he spoke profoundly and sensibly when he said that since the criminal difficulty has receded, the time has come for us to act in such a way as to reduce the tension in this country, to reduce the tension in the province of Quebec and to reduce the tension between Quebec and the rest of Canada. We ought not to pass a measure such as this one which will merely continue the same hysteria, the same panic and the same arbitrary, regressive legislation that has been in force since October 16.

There are some improvements in this bill, of course, but in some ways the present legislation is worse than the law it replaces. When you keep hysteria like this going, you merely increase it and escalate it. The abuses which have already taken place will continue under this legislation, and there is no reason why we should permit legislation that makes it possible to continue those abuses.

Public Order Act, 1970

• (9:10 p.m.)

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, my leader has stated our position so lucidly and forcefully that I need not deal with that any longer. After these few words of introduction I will deal with what I consider to be one of the most reprehensible parts of this bill, namely, the feature of retroactivity contained in clause 8. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That Bill C-181 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of reconsidering the retroactive aspects of clause 8 thereof.

There is nothing in this bill more reprehensible than the retroactive aspect of clause 8. The amendment seeks to remove from the bill the most objectionable feature of this legislation. Hon. members will recall I moved a similar amendment during the debate on clause 8 at the committee stage. It was negatived by 51 votes to 29. I am again moving this amendment to see whether our object can be achieved on third reading. It will at least give all members the opportunity to stand and be counted on this reprehensible part of the bill now before us.

Despite the effort, involvement and prestige of the administration, the majority of those who voted at the recent Liberal convention could not approve the retroactive feature of the legislation. According to newspaper reports, the resolution dealing with this was defeated by 471 votes to 331, with 219 undecided. A total of approximately 550 could not accept the retroactive feature of the legislation, as opposed to 471 in favour. At the Liberal convention this objectionable feature was rejected by a majority of the delegates.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is straining it a bit.

Mr. Lewis: It is not. It is perfectly clear that the 219 who were undecided were certainly not in favour of this feature of the legislation. If they are undecided, they are not in favour. Although the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and other hon. members tried to persuade the delegates, the majority did not accept their position. The 219 undecided were against this feature or they would have voted in favour of it. I interpret it as merely a sense of loyalty to the smile of the Minister of Justice that prevented them from saying no. Therefore, they sat on the fence, an appropriate posture for a Liberal. None the less, they were not in favour.

I suggest the vote at the Liberal convention is further evidence of the instinct of Canadians to avoid that which is repugnant to fundamental rights. As I reminded the House during committee stage and as my leader stated on second reading of this bill, retroactivity has been condemned by the constitution of every civilized country that contains this kind of provision. It has been prohibited by an international agreement to which Canada is signatory and which Canada has ratified. Clause 8 is against the tradition of justice in this country, our obligations under the international agreement and what is accepted in every civilized country in this world.

Retroactive legislation is always wrong. Retroactive criminal legislation is particularly obnoxious and unjust. There can be no argument about the retroactivity of clause 8 of the bill. It states in simple words that anyone who at any time before the passing of this bill attended a meeting of the FLQ or of any branch, committee or members thereof, who communicated statements on behalf of the FLQ or gave support to it at a time when it was not an unlawful association, can be found guilty of being a member of the FLQ unless that person disproves it through acceptable evidence in court.

Anyone who has had experience in court, and my experience has not been as long or as wide as that of many other members of this House, knows very well that an accused, faced with evidence of past activities when the organization was perfectly legal, would be in a terrible situation. He would have to give evidence he is not now and has not been connected with the FLQ whether he likes it or not. That is contrary to our traditions with respect to criminal charges. In essence, a person is in jeopardy of being convicted for acts performed at a time when the acts were entirely lawful, a time when the law did not prohibit attending meetings or communicating statements on behalf of an organization which was only made illegal on October 16. I want to emphasize that I am not speaking of a person who has committed or is charged with a criminal act.

If the minister had accepted the amendment of the hon. member for Broadview it would have been a different story, but he did not. I am speaking about a person who participated or was present at a number of meetings of the unlawful association, spoke publicly in advocacy of the unlawful association and communicated statements at a time when the association was not unlawful. That is the retroactivity feature of this clause.

The precedent that clause 8 would establish is very regrettable. A precedent will be set that if an organization is declared illegal at some date, after it has been declared illegal we can add that anyone who participated in its activities before it was declared illegal is guilty of an offence. That method is used by dictators throughout the world to stifle freedom of speech and intimidate freedom of association and expression of opinion. Dictatorships throughout the world have done that. There is a danger in legislation which is made retroactive to any date the government may wish so that they may spread their net and take in everyone they do not like or anyone opposed to the social or political situation.

This amendment gives Parliament, assembled in the House of Commons rather than in committee, the opportunity to at least remove this vicious, unnecessary and retroactive feature of the bill. I appeal to hon. members to do so.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, as one who has listened with great attention—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gibson: —to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) both in the House in this debate and for many hours recently on radio and television, as one who has patiently, through force of circumstances created by the generous time allotment enjoyed by a splinter group in this House, been waiting to answer the sardonic and ill-conceived, partisan attacks launched by the said member on the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—

[Mr. Lewis.]

Some hon. Members: Author.

Mr. Gibson: —I take great pleasure in responding to the ill-considered views of the said member which, on reflection, I believe to be based on a false appraisal by a man who has no real understanding of the problems of Canada today—

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, to bring to your attention that it has always been the custom and the rule of this House that no member may read a speech, especially one prepared by somebody else.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member knows, I am sure, that the rule is not one which has been entirely respected, especially in recent years, and hon. members are familiar with the reply sometimes given by Mr. Speaker to the effect that members may refer to what have been called copious notes. Obviously, this is what the hon. member is indulging in at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I think the point is well taken. I have always felt that as an assembly we should try to enforce the long-standing practice that speeches should not be read, except perhaps for those connected with technical subjects, ministerial statements and the like; the ordinary speeches should be delivered extempore rather than read. I hope hon. members will keep this in mind as far as possible when addressing the House.

Mr. Gibson: —by a man who has no understanding of the problems of the day and absolutely no sympathy or tolerance for those in authority in the province of Quebec, which is one of our provinces, a part of Canada and a part of this nation. Moreover, it is a province in which the party to which the hon. member for York South belongs has no representation, never has had any representation and never will have any representation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gibson: This situation is, I am sure, partly the result of the asinine comments the hon. member has made against the wishes of the people of Quebec and against the wishes of the people of Canada. It is high time somebody spoke out against the hon. member for York South when he unfairly attacks this administration and the Minister of Justice on a basis which has no legal sanction or support. He has failed to acknowledge that under the laws governing narcotics and many other laws of Canada, the rules of evidence provide for a shifting of the onus of proof in certain circumstances, related to peculiar crimes, where an accused has particular knowledge of the facts.

This is a trend in the law of evidence, and the hon. member has sufficient experience in court to know it. But he does not bring this out into the open; he surreptitiously meanders through the debate in a sardonic and sarcastic manner and avoids bringing out the true nature of the circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: I am going out for a while.

Mr. Gibson: He cannot take it any longer. He is on his feet. He is on his way.

It would have been a sad day for Canada had the deputy leader of the New Democratic Party been prime minister, for he would have gambled with the lives of cabinet ministers and of public officials as well as with the safety of the city of Montreal, threatened by explosion. He would have waved the phony white flag of justice against the barrels of machine-guns, shooting with peashooters against the FLQ gangsters and kidnappers. If the real force of the tragedy of the Laporte murder had penetrated the skull of the member for York South, he would have appreciated that the very existence of law and order was seriously in jeopardy and that emergency measures were required.

Unless the said member was speaking for the sake of partisan benefit, seeking to gain the support of bleeding hearts like Claude Ryan and others in Quebec whose actions were calculated to undermine the stability of the Quebec government, unless he spoke with the intention of getting support for his party in the province of Quebec, unrepresented as his party is in either the legislature of Quebec or in this House with regard to that province—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gibson: I do not know whether that is the case or not, but his party has not enhanced the cause of Canadian justice one iota. The feeble utterances of the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas) would better be expressed—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member's interesting speech, but I remind him that what we should be discussing at the present time is the amendment before the House, not the approach or the attitude of individual members toward this bill. I believe we should keep it in mind, while we have an amendment before us, that the debate should be related to that amendment.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, it should probably be explained that the person who wrote the speech probably did not know that the amendment was coming up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) did not make that observation in a serious vein, because he cannot suggest that an hon. member is not making his own speech.

Mr. Gibson: —as using a peashooter to shoot a murderer, in contrast to his words "using a sledgehammer to smash a peanut."

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gibson: As to the merits of the administration, I submit one can only turn to the arguments made so forcibly and clearly by the learned Minister of Justice who has gone over the matter carefully. His assurances are more to be relied on than the arguments produced by the so-called brilliant experts in the NDP splinter group who have failed to produce any authority for their assertions.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, we now have before us an amendment by the New Democratic Party which opposes clause 8 of the bill.

Unlike my predecessor, I will attempt to put the debate back into perspective. Clause 8 states, and I quote;

> 8. In any prosecution for an offence under this Act, evidence that any person, either before or after the coming into force of this Act,
> (a) participated in or was present at a number of meetings of the unlawful association or of any branch, committee or members thereof,

Mr. Speaker, I shall limit my comments to the first part of that clause. In my view, retroactive legislation, as evidenced by precedents, is not an usual feature of our legal system of criminal law.

In that respect, clause 8 is a precedent, an exception. The retroactivity of the legislation becomes necessary in special circumstances where the security of the state may be jeopardized. As for criminal law, the retroactivity of a legislation has seldom been invoked.

When I read clause 8, I thought in the first place, owing to the troubles in Quebec and the extremely confused, anarchic and dangerous conditions, that to my regret I would have to accept the retroactivity of the bill since that measure was quite unusual and could be a dangerous weapon in the hands of the government.

When I read the amendment moved by the government concerning clause 8 as well as the preamble to Bill C-181 which states that the government could declare unlawful the association called the FLQ operating only in the province of Quebec and not in the other parts of Canada, it can be assumed that the retroactive effect of this legislation, on account of clause 8, would be a weapon for eliminating any individual who in the last five, ten, fifteen or twenty years might have opposed the government or the present system by means of violence, verbal incitation or otherwise.

Being a Quebecker, what hurts me most is the will of the government to bring the people of Quebec to heel and to keep them within Confederation against their wishes. And now the government wants to use this retroactive clause to condemn and to hunt down any individual opposed to the established order.

Sharing the views of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) in this connection, I claim that this is another step toward dictatorship, toward tightening the gag on Quebec people. To impress upon them the benefits of living in Canada, we intend to break them and force them into it.

Those who might have objected during the present crisis are definitely the convicted ones and we readily agree to this proposal. But there is a feature which we refuse to accept and that is to make it an offence to have carried on activities two, ten, twenty or twenty-five years ago. At that rate, the government should go back—and I say "should"—over the discussion which were held last year with respect to the Company of Young Canadians in the Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts. In fact, at that time, the Chairman of the Montreal Executive Committee came to Ottawa and told the government: "You should assume your responsibilities. At this very moment there are people paid out of public funds who are busy undermining the Canadian nation, in Montreal and elsewhere and they are doing it under cover of the Company of Young Canadians". The Chairman of the Montreal Executive Committee was then urging the government to look into and to investigate the activities that these people were carrying on and he went as far as asking for a termination of the appropriations to the Company of Young Canadians. Instead, this government, bent on fostering anarchy, said No.

Mr. Speaker, this government is seeking votes. That is why it attempts to break whoever would oppose its views, for it knows well that it will be defeated at the next election. Indeed, it believes that the only way to remain in power is to gag people.

Mr. Speaker, making an act retroactive is unusual. It is most unfortunate that following the events which took place in Quebec, the legislation under consideration should be made retroactive, taking into account the preamble, as well as the broadness and the obscureness of clause 8, which I quote again:

> —either before or after the coming into force of this act,—

Do we have to go back 30, 20 or 5 years in order to lay a charge, for instance, against someone who was a member of the Arcand group or any other group which would have incited people to violence? Thus, all the persons who would have directly or indirectly protested or incited people to violence, to overthrow the government of Quebec or to change the status of that province in connection with the rest of Canada, would be considered as outlaws.

We will have from now on to ask ourselves what is permitted in Canada and if it is quite democratic. The bill states and I quote:

> —either before or after the coming into force of this act,—

What is even more damaging and dangerous is that this legislation, with the amendment imposed by the government in clause 3, and considering what the preamble says, applies only to Quebec. This means that any act of terrorism, any incitation to violence in any other province, before or after this legislation is promulgated, would not be an indictable offence, whereas in Quebec, because some people are asking themselves questions, such action would be blamed and a constitutional framework would be imposed on those guilty of it.

In conclusion, I wish to say that the imposition of a constitutional framework on the people of Quebec will not solve the problem. The only effective method is to show them the benefits involved in federalism. The government saw fit to impose a constitutional framework and also—which is more serious—to muzzle any person who, before or after the coming into force of the act, would have more or less advocated violence.

Then, one should remember the Asbestos strike, on which occasion our three doves prompted the workers to resort to violence.

• (9:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, we come again to another aspect of this bill that is not only obnoxious but retrograde in its implications; an aspect that indicates that this particular clause is not only retroactive but that the bill itself is a retrograde step, one taken on the initiative of this government. Indeed, it is quite true that because we have been dealing with this bill for some weeks now, even the members of this House may have lost the sense of proportion expected of them by all fair minded and justice-oriented people in the country.

I pointed out yesterday to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the question period not only that we were taking very serious steps to reduce normal liberty in this country and reverse not simply decades but centuries of advancement in the law; we were in fact denying some of the very instruments that have been ratified internationally under the auspices of the United Nations. Yesterday afternoon I pointed out, perhaps not too successfully, that the international charter of human rights, the international bill of human rights, or the universal declaration of human rights as it is sometimes called, as adopted and proclaimed by the General Assembly on the United Nations on December 10, 1948, contains a provision in article 11 to which, if we are to be consistent—which seems to be one concern that the government has at this point—we must indicate to the international community, and more specifically to the United Nations, we can no longer give our assent. Article 11 reads as follows:

> 1. Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.
> 2. No one shall be held guilty of any penal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a penal offence, under national or international law at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the penal offence was committed.

In both the first and second sections of article 11 of the universal declaration of human rights we have a declaration that runs directly counter to that which we find in clause 8 of this bill. The presumption of innocence is substantially altered by this clause. There is also the offensive aspect of the clause that establishes a criminal act retroactively. I am impressed by the fact that not only did Canada vote for the resolution adopting the universal declaration of human rights, but in response to the charter of human rights our delegate at the United Nations on December 10, 1948, had this to say:

• (9:40 p.m.)

So far as the position of Canada in regard to the maintenance and extension of human rights is concerned, we shall, in the future, as we have in the past, protect the freedom of the individual in our country where freedom is not only a matter of resolutions but also of day-to-day practice from one end of the country to the other.

The representative for Canada who made that statement was Mr. L. B. Pearson, chairman of the Canadian delegation. How tragic it is that a man who was later to become Prime Minister of this country, and having affirmed what certainly was the will of the Canadian people at that time, should now live in this year 1970 to see his good words and ideals abrogated by the proposals of the government in this temporary public bill.

It is inconceivable to me and it was certainly inconceivable to members of the party who moved this amendment, as the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) pointed out, that such a provision could be made the law of this country. As of yet we have had no explanation from the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) as to the necessity for this action. The reason this debate has continued so many days can be related to the agony that many members of this House are expressing increasingly about the very grave and bad provisions which are being put into law by this House. Certainly as one member, even as an opposition member, I cannot be proud of being a witness to these unfortunate events.

I think also, as I said earlier in the House, that the long and arduous process of this bill through committee and now through third reading has been symptomatic of the fact that there has been no real willingness on the part of the government to consult in good faith and legislate in good faith on the issue facing this country at the present time. The government has neither clearly informed the House nor the people as to the reason for its request for this legislation, nor has it entered into consultation in respect of the necessity of this bill at the present time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I respectfully suggest to the hon. member that his remarks should be germane to the amendment before the House and not of a general nature such as he is now making.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my words of just a moment ago, I respectfully suggest, were quite relevant in that I was indicating the reason we have this particular amendment before us and considered the earlier amendment, namely, that the government was unwilling at the committee stage to deal in a consultative and realistic way with the provisions which are increasingly offensive as the people in this country become aware of them. There should be no reason for anyone in this House to apologize for this amendment, or any other, because it deals with something that goes to the heart of our whole system of justice.

What in fact the amendment seeks to do is remove clause 8 of this bill, which in effect states that what a person did yesterday today becomes a crime. I want to make it quite clear that we are not here referring to activities and acts which in the past have in fact been crimes, when people committed acts of terror whether by way of bombings or harassment of one kind or another, or caused a social disturbance or the more serious crimes, for instance, of kidnapping, threat to kidnap, physical assault or murder. Those offences have been well known to the body politic and have been offences not just for decades but in most cases for centuries.

What is being attempted through this clause we are seeking to amend is, in effect, to establish that membership in a particular organization and evidence of that membership, which may go back a number of years, is sufficient to convict a person of a criminal offence. That, I think, must be regarded not only as a serious step but one which is particularly offensive. I think, too, in this context we must realize that the precedent it establishes is surely one of the most shocking that we could consider. By allowing this legislation to pass we will be, in effect, allowing a precedent to be established that a person who may hold a particular belief or who has participated in a particular organization may find that while it may not be a criminal offence at the present time, two years from now or ten years from now Parliament may be able to say, "We now consider membership in or support of this organization or its ideals to be crime."

I think we only have to look at the fact that there has been almost no definition of what the FLQ stands for to realize how broad and how vague that kind of implication can be. We are asked, in effect, to allow the authorities to arrest men and women on the evidence of having attended a meeting or two of this organization two years ago, five years or seven years ago. We are being asked to agree that someone who may have in an informal conversation with a friend half a dozen years ago spoken well of this organization should be regarded now as having committed a criminal offence.

Because this clause refers to a communicative statement, we are being asked to regard even those who transmitted information relating to this organization as having committed a criminal offence. While the Minister of Justice has argued that it is now clearly stated that a simple transmission of this information, without doing it for propaganda purposes, would not constitute a crime, we only have the minister's words in the House in that regard. But we know only too well that when statutes are being interpreted in the courts, only what is in the statutes counts and no desire expressed in this House will affect that interpretation one way or another.

Perhaps most shocking in regard to this retroactive clause 8 is the fact that the government was unwilling to even provide a time limit. It is known to almost everyone in this country that before the month of October those who belonged to or participated in the organization known as the FLQ, unless they were then participating in accepted criminal activity were not regarded as having done anything illegal. We know of people who have been close to some of the parties in this government who have over the years participated in the FLQ without in themselves having committed a criminal offence.

Now we are being told that if at any time an individual before the month of October participated in, spoke on behalf of or transmitted information with regard to this organization he is liable to a five year term of imprisonment and a substantial fine. How far back are the authorities going? Since there has been difficulty in apprehending some of the individuals who have been directly involved in recent FLQ activity as frustrations and suspicions have increased, we know how much easier it might be to go back and root out these individuals. It might be much easier to go back further in order to deal with those who perhaps at an earlier time, without any thought of participating in a criminal organization, lent their support however briefly it may have been to this organization. Are they to be convicted because of that earlier act or innocent involvement?

One could even ask the question: How widely will this clause be interpreted? The minister has said from time to time in the House that he is not only talking about the FLQ per se, but about a successor or an allied organization. What does that mean, and what will it mean in the interpretation of this statute? What kind of definition or what kind of limits will be set if evidence is gathered about the activities of people? Will it involve those who have been opposed to a certain point of view which perhaps is held by the Prime Minister or by the authorities in Montreal or in Quebec city? What is to be the criteria for guilt under this clause?

This clause is so vague and so bad that when coupled with the preamble and clause 3 it literally gives the authorities carte blanche to arrest and charge just about anyone whom they dislike or feel they would like to put away for a period. Quite frankly, the vagueness of this clause in particular and the bill in general terrifies me. The fact that it might be acted upon by men who are tired, desperate and frustrated leads to greater fear on my part. I believe it is interesting to note that since this crisis occurred, and since the shocking kidnappings and the tragic murder of Mr. Laporte, certain individuals have said things at least in support of some of the ideals of the FLQ while in no way supporting the criminal activities in which the FLQ has been engaged. They, too, surely could be arrested and convicted under this clause.

Even in the riding of the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) a substantial number of the clergy have spoken out in support of some aspects of the proclamations of the FLQ. Are they not also liable under the edict of this clause? Again I would urge the government to realize that it is directing the country on a most serious, retrograde course and that in asking for this retroactive power, which at no time in my estimation has been justified, it is in effect asking the country to close its eyes to the administration of justice. I do not think the Canadian people should be asked to do this, nor in the final analysis to do something of which they would not approve.

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, this is the second sermon I have heard from the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) today on the same subject. I humbly suggest that he try to get a church where only one service is held on Sunday so that he would not have to deliver the same sermon twice in one day.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I would be quite happy to offer the hon. member counselling service whenever he feels the need of it, which obviously might be right now.

Mr. Whicher: If I ever have such a need I will try to get somebody who is not quite so wet behind the ears. As my hon. friend said, we have been talking about this subject, whether in respect of the War Measures Act or Bill C-181, for several weeks. It seems to me it is high time those of us who are really interested in this House and in seeing other matters discussed which are important to the people of Canada, such as the prospective increase in old age pensions—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whicher: —increases in veterans allowances, and so on, should be given an opportunity to get on with these subjects.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Save your speech for caucus.

Mr. Whicher: I suggest to my hon. friends to the left that what the government is attempting to do in bringing forth Bill C-181 is to keep the solemn word it gave Parliament four or five weeks ago, when it said it was initiating the War Measures Act for a limited period because it went too far in respect of civil liberties and that less restrictive legislation would be presented as soon as possible. This is what the government has been and is trying to do. One might very well wonder what would have happened had the government, instead of initiating the War Measures Act—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. Perhaps his remarks are merely introductory at this stage, but I remind him and all hon. members that they should limit their contributions to this debate to the amendment before the House. I do not want to be restrictive because it may be that the hon. member is building up to a speech which will take into account the amendment before us. However, I hope he will keep this in mind.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Speaker, I assure you that was only a preamble. I wish to speak about the civil liberties which greatly interest our friends to the left. When they suggest that no one on this side of the House is interested in civil liberties across Canada, I wish to assure them that we are just as interested as they are, and have been for many years. One might wonder what would have happened if this bill had been presented to the House some weeks ago when the Premier of Quebec, the mayor of Montreal and the chief of police of the city of Montreal asked for such legislation. I suggest there could very well have been an insurrection in Montreal. My hon. friends to the left take delight in the fact that there has not been a rebellion in Montreal. May I say that perhaps as a result of the initiation of the War Measures Act that was prevented from taking place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being ten o'clock, in accordance with Standing Order 40 a motion to adjourn the House—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Without trespassing on the patience of the House, I wonder if there might be disposition to extend our sitting for an hour.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 40, a motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been made and seconded at this time.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—SUGGESTED RETENTION OF RADAR AND COMMUNICATIONS SCHOOL AT CLINTON

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, today I addressed a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) in which I asked him to consider keeping the radar and communications school at the Canadian Forces base at Clinton rather than moving it to Kingston. The Canadian Forces base at Clinton is scheduled for phasing out in September of next year. This question is urgent and proper because last Thursday night, the last day on which the House sat and the minister was in the House, it was announced on the news that the Department of National Defence was to begin construction shortly at the Canadian Forces base at Kingston, at a cost of $1,200,000, for accommodating the radar and communications school which is being moved from the Clinton Canadian Forces base which is scheduled for closure in 1971.

There were many other reasons for asking the question. I was told by the former Minister of National Defence, when there were rumours last June, that there would be new construction but there would be only minor renovations made to the Kingston base to house this school. Therefore, I did not feel quite so badly. Many months ago I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to place a new air services training school for the training of air traffic controllers at Clinton in order to keep something operating at the base. This came up previously when consideration was given to spending $6 million on a new building to do this.

I was turned down at that time, but in the meantime Treasury Board refused to grant the Department of Transport the $6 million and told them they should use existing facilities. I immediately wrote the Minister of Transport and requested that another look be given to the Canadian Forces base at Clinton. I received an answer to my letter from the Department of Transport, dated June 19, which stated:

> Reference is made to your letter of April 30, 1970, concerning the possibility of the facilities at Canadian Forces base, Clinton, being suitable for the proposed air services training school.
> Treasury Board has requested that the feasibility of joint civilian-military air traffic control training be investigated. The decision in this matter could have a major impact on the type of training facility required. Accordingly, consideration of your proposal regarding the use of the Clinton base will be deferred.

The minister goes on to say that he expects a decision to be made about the middle of the summer. I waited until the middle of the summer, and the feasibility study was carried out by the department. I can report on some of the recommendations that were made. The first was that military-civil air traffic control training be combined, and that a common manual of operations for Canadian air traffic control be developed: standard military deviations from the norm shall be noted therein. The recommendations went on to say that an investigation into surplus buildings and suitable sites for an air traffic control school should be completed by December 15, 1970, which is yet to come.

Naturally, the Department of National Defence is involved in any suggestion that would combine the training of military and civilian air traffic control. I am advised by the minister that that study is now being carried out by his department. I am sure that the completion of this study, in co-operation with the Department of Transport, will affect the decision as to where the training will be carried out.

The fact that the station in Clinton was built for radar and communications would make it most suitable for carrying out training. Many of the facilities and training requirements are similar to those used for training at the radar and communications school. It would be sensible and reasonable to have both carried out at that site if the decision is that civil and military air traffic control training should be combined and carried out at the existing location.

Furthermore, we have investigated further requirements for the base after it is closed, or even before, and that is at Conistoga College which is a community college which serves the Huron County area. They have already put in their requirements, at my request, as to how much of the base they might be able to use if it is not to be used fully in the way I have suggested. This matter is being considered by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, who are waiting for these other people to make up their minds.

I am not in any hurry for an answer so long as it is the right one, but the people in the area are becoming quite concerned and they hope to have an answer as soon as possible. I suggest that an answer should be given early in the new year. I am trying to establish that this question is urgent. In my opinion it should have been allowed by the Speaker. In any case, this adjournment debate gives me a little more time to deal with the matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Forces base, Clinton, is mainly devoted to giving training in radar and communications. For a considerable period of time the Canadian forces activities for training in that field have been divided between Clinton and Kingston.

It had also been evident for some period of time that it would be desirable to consolidate the technical training, and the fact that the military reason and requirement for training provided at Clinton would no longer be required in the near future made it possible to consolidate the operation at Kingston for reasons of economy.

The hon. member referred to the fact that there would be a capital expenditure at Kingston of $1.298 million for the purpose of establishing the consolidated facilities in that city. I would point out that as a result of the closure of Clinton there will be a net saving in annual costs of $2.9 million. In other words, the annual saving from closing the base will be more than twice the amount expended in the first year in putting into effect the training facilities. I might point out to the hon. member, if he does not already know, that the department has been active in locating civilian personnel in other employment.

With regard to his request for the school for air traffic controllers, I should point out that he has a competitor in the field, because the provincial government of Prince Edward Island has made clear its feeling that the air traffic controllers' school should be located at Summerside and this has been supported by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). We will be in touch with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) on this question and will give favourable consideration to both possibilities when the time comes to decide the location of the aircraft controllers' facility.

AIR TRANSPORT—INSTALLATION OF RADIOS AND HOMER BEACON DEVICES ON PRIVATE COMMERCIAL PLANES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my remarks tonight concern homer devices to be installed on private commercial planes. I am no expert on the subject, but my interest was prompted by my concern for a lost helicopter pilot whose wife happened to be from my riding. It might interest hon. members of the Conservative party to know that he was formerly the pilot of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). This man was lost in the bush area of northern Saskatchewan for 21 days before the search was called off by the search and rescue section of the Department of National defence.

The area covered by the search seemed to me to be extensive, although it was considered by Search and Rescue as limited. Seventy-two thousand square miles were covered twice by search and rescue planes, but during the 21 days there was no sign of the lost pilot and the search was called off. Finally the miracle occurred and the pilot, because he was wise in the ways of the bush, walked out of the bush 30 pounds lighter. Everybody was pleased to learn that he was still alive.

After discussions with a number of people it seems to me that there is in this regard a tremendous expense to the Department of National Defence and also a tremendous risk to the pilots of Search and Rescue. It also seems to me that in this day of sophisticated, technical knowledge we might expect some of this technology to be used to assist pilots lost in a country as vast as ours.

My investigations reveal that the pilot had flown from his base during a white-out and was without radio or homing device of any kind. Upon further investigation I was appalled to learn that the Department of Transport regulations do not prescribe even such fundamental life-saving devices as radio or, indeed, any kind of homing device. Why not? Lost planes are common, especially in British Columbia and Ontario. Why are regulations not necessary, not only to save the lives of people who are lost but also to protect people who by nature of their occupation have a professional duty to find them? On November 6, I put a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and part of this answer was as follows:

> The difficulty is that at the moment there is no such assurance of proper standards and we would not want, for example, to require their installation and perhaps give people a false sense of security which, indeed, the equipment now available might not be able to provide.

That seems reasonable enough. We are aware, of course, that all military and commercial transport aircraft using IFR—those letters stand for "Instrument Flight Rules"—are equipped with CPI, otherwise known as Crash Protection Indicator devices. Unfortunately, these devices cost approximately $10,000 each to instal. This amount, of course, is far beyond the reach of many private and small commercial aircraft operators, the loss of whose aircraft causes so much anguish and difficulty to the Department of National Defence. That, I think, is reasonable to assume.

I think we all should examine the criteria necessary for VFR, or aircraft using visual flight rules, the losses among which are probably far greater than among aircraft, the pilots of which can fly on instruments. I have a letter from a constituent of mine which reads in part:

> When our own and other companies' personnel got together, discussions often centered around two points; firstly the difficulty associated with suitable crash detection gear, i.e., Sarah & Dart. It was generally agreed that before such a device could be made compulsory by the DOT it would have to meet the following standards—

The device must be light and small enough so as not to rob valuable pay-load space. It must be sufficiently inexpensive for private and commercial operators. It must produce a signal, audible or visual, which can be picked up by other VFR aircraft. And, above all, it must be 100 per cent efficient.

In the time remaining I think I ought to elaborate a little on these points. My constituent, incidentally, has submitted an experimental device and I think the Department of Transport would be well advised to assist in the development and research of devices of this kind which do not seem to be available at present. All Canadian flyers and all those interested in aviation ought to be concerned about this matter. I think many other groups are concerned. In conclusion I wish to quote from a booklet entitled "British Columbia Chamber of Commerce, General Policy Statements and Resolutions, 1970-71". On page 11 the following notation appears:

RECOMMENDED

That the government of Canada require all aircraft operating in Canada to be equipped with crash position indicator or homing beacon device.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the specific subject matter, that of issuing regulations requiring all aircraft using Canadian airways to instal homer beacon devices, has been raised several times in the House. It is an important matter and it is one which the Department of Transport has been directly concerned with for a number of years. I congratulate the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) as well as the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) who have continued to emphasize the need to require aircraft to carry such equipment.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) indicated in the House, in answering the hon. member's question on November 6, that he is prepared to initiate such regulations. He explained to the House that the matter is not as simple as it would appear on the surface. To merely set out regulations would not solve the over-all problem at this time. What is required is a relatively low-cost locator beacon which is capable of meeting an agreed common technical standard. I should point out that a standard was established and adopted by the International Civil Aviation Organization last year. Subsequently it was incorporated in national technical specifications which were issued in May, 1970, and which are presently administered by the Department of Communications.

The specifications which I have mentioned cover four different types of emergency locator transmitter, only one of which, the personal locator beacon, could be called low-cost. I understand that there are no personal locator beacons on the market which could meet these specifications. However, one Canadian manufacturer of such equipment has recently informed the Department of Transport that he will commence production of a personal locator beacon in 1971. The availability of this equipment will be given very full consideration by the Department of Transport and by the Department of Communications, as will any other similar devices which appear on the market in future.

In conclusion I would like to point out to the hon. member that proposed regulations with respect to emergency locator transmitters were circulated in early 1969 to the aviation industry. Comments received were encouraging and generally favourable.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Parliamentary Secretary, but his time has expired.

ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—POWER—PROPOSED FLOODING OF SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—SUBMISSION OF BRIEF TO STATE OF WASHINGTON INQUIRY

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I put a very important question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) on the subject of the proposed flooding of 6,000 acres of the Skagit Valley in British Columbia by the Seattle City Light Company. I should say at the outset that the fight against this agreement, which was made in January of 1967 between the province of British Columbia and Seattle City Light, has been led in Victoria by the Liberal members of the legislative assembly, notably David Brousson, and here in Ottawa by all the members of the British Columbia Liberal caucus, especially the member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle).

My concern on the issue is prompted by the firm conviction that what the Socred government has done in British Columbia is wrong and is both a disgrace and disservice to the people of our province. What they have done, Mr. Speaker, is to sell out to United States interests, for an annual rental of $5.50 per flooded acre, one of the few remaining wilderness areas in the lower mainland of our province. By agreeing to let the city of Seattle raise by 125 feet the level of the reservoir behind the Ross dam, the government of British Columbia has shown that over the protests of its own citizens it is not only willing but eager to sacrifice the last wilderness valley in the lower mainland, to flood ten miles into British Columbia, to cover over nine miles of fish spawning ground, to inundate the spring feeding ground and nursery for some 450 deer, and to do all of this just so the neon lights in Seattle can shine a little brighter at the expense of the recreational needs of our children and our children's children.

The people of British Columbia will not stand for this, Mr. Speaker. As a last resort they are looking to the federal government to provide a means of saving the Skagit Valley. In an effort to help I have introduced into this House Bill C-130, an act to amend the International River Improvements Act. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall read the effective paragraph of that bill. It is as follows:

Notwithstanding any approval given by the International Joint Commission pursuant to an act of Parliament and notwithstanding this or any other act of the Parliament of Canada, no land in Canada contiguous to the Skagit River in British Columbia shall be flooded without prior approval from the Governor in Council.

If the government decides to accept this bill I will be very pleased indeed, and so will the scores of persons throughout British Columbia who have written asking me to do my very best to prevent this outrage. I will be just as happy if the government can stop the flooding by some alternate means. That is why this afternoon I asked the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry a question along the following lines: "In view of press reports that Mr. John Biggs, head of the Washington State Department of Ecology, has announced that his department will hold hearings on the proposed flooding of the Skagit Valley in British Columbia by Seattle City Light Company, and in view of the fact that Mr. Biggs has indicated that the government of British Columbia and the Canadian government will be encouraged to submit briefs, will the minister assure the House that the government will submit a brief in opposition to the proposed flooding?"

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the minister is prepared now to make a statement on the government's position in this regard.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, it is good news that ecologists on the U.S. west coast are beginning to line up against the flooding of the Skagit Valley, particularly the flooding back into British Columbia. My department will gladly supply any information which Canadian interveners may require when appearing at hearings held in the territory of the United States in opposition to this project. I have not yet had an opinion from the Department of External Affairs as to whether it would be proper for an agency of the federal government to appear in a foreign court dealing with matters of this kind, but if there is no problem in this connection I would certainly want us to appear. To repeat, I qualify this, depending on advice I expect to get from the Department of External Affairs.

I should like to outline the present status of the application of Seattle Light and Power to U.S. authorities to raise the Ross dam and flood back into Canada. The Seattle city council voted in favour of its application, but action has been held up by the mayor of Seattle. The Seattle City Light and Power Company will also have to obtain permission after January 1, 1971, from the new department of ecology set up in the state of Washington and get another annual permit of the kind they have been getting every year since 1929. I understand that the new department will require a hearing to be held so there will be an opportunity, early in the new year, for interested Canadian citizens to appear in the Seattle area in opposition to this project.

Assuming the Seattle City Light and Power Company does obtain authorization from the new department of ecology, it would then be obliged to apply to the United State Federal Power Commission in Washington, D.C., which would also require a hearing to be held. A number of Canadians have been asking why we do not require hearings in Canada. Seattle City Light has been contacted on several occasions by the government of Canada with respect to the application of the International River Improvements Act, and we have yet to hear from the company in that connection.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MARCEAU—OBJECTION TO STATEMENT OF MEMBER

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in connection with a statement made yesterday evening by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin).

As recorded in Hansard at page 1441, the hon. member stated, and I quote:

> Hon. members know how sensitive I am and incapable of expressing malevolent views of making charges.

This might be the only time he said anything true since the rest of his speech is made up of slanderous and inexcusable charges directed against the bar association and myself.

At the end of his speech, the hon. member for Portneuf made a reference to a speeding charge laid against him and mentioning the member for Lapointe he stated the following:

> At the same time, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) a Liberal member, went through a 30 mile an hour zone at 100 miles an hour. He simply had to pay $50 fine. Well if politics do not come into play in cases like that, I certainly would like to know.

I should like to say to the hon. member for Portneuf and to other members of this House that our private lives have nothing to do with our proceedings and that hon. members are in no way interested in learning about them.

The charge laid by the hon. member for Portneuf is entirely inaccurate and the circumstances under which he was fined $250 are entirely different from those in my case. I wish to say to the hon. member that such charges made in the absence of the person concerned indicate a narrow-mindedness about which I will say no more.

I do not associate all Ralliement créditiste members with such statements, because I have the pleasure of knowing several of them who are honest and charming people. I must say, none the less, that the hon. member for Portneuf disappoints me greatly when he refers to such things. I hope he will withdraw his remarks in due time if he wants us to remain friends.

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

Second report of Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs—Mr. Tolmie.

[Editor's Note: For text of above report, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF COMMUNIQUÉ ISSUED BY CANADA-UNITED STATES COMMITTEE ON TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table in English and French copies of the communiqué issued by the Joint Canada-United States Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs which concluded its meetings yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the past it has been customary for a minister or several ministers of the Crown to report to Parliament on motions following discussions with their counterparts in the United States government. It is not sufficient to fob off the House with a communiqué which has already been given to the press.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The minister has the responsibility on motions not only to table the communiqué but to make a statement to the House as to the items that were discussed and the conclusions that were reached.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: I can assure the hon. member that if he will read the communiqué he will find that all those points are covered.

AUDITOR GENERAL

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF BILL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I ask for unanimous consent to make a motion without notice being given.

The urgent circumstances are as follows: The almost universal opposition in the media and from individuals to the provisions of Bill C-190 makes it clear that Canadians take the strongest objection to any attempt to restrict the authority of the Auditor General. Nevertheless, the continuance of the bill on the order paper in its present form constitutes an attempt to intimidate and harass the Auditor General in the discharge of his duties and to inhibit his examination of such government spending as the substantial increase in costs alleged in respect of the destroyer construction program.

I therefore ask leave to put the following motion:

That in the view of this House the government should forthwith withdraw Bill C-190 and bring in a new bill along the lines of the draft bill which the Public Accounts Committee requested the Auditor General to submit to the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure, of course, that the motion is in order because it anticipates an order of the day, but obviously I do not think I should be called upon to rule on this point. What I should ascertain is whether there is unanimous consent to put the motion at this time.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member will recognize, there is no unanimity and obviously the motion cannot be put.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

CANADIAN BOOK PUBLISHING DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

On the order: Introduction of Bills:

November 16, 1970—Mr. Howard (Skeena)—Bill intituled: "An Act to establish the Canadian Book Publishing Development Corporation".

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, since Your Honour drew attention the other day, after a quick glance, to some of the provisions of the bill covered by this notice I have taken your advice, looked at it very closely and have concluded that perhaps it does not meet the test of the rules of the House. Accordingly, I should like to withdraw the notice.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has foreseen the ruling I would have to make on this point. I did look at the bill closely and noticed one clause entitled "financial". I also noticed a striking though, I am sure, accidental similarity to another bill called an Act to amend the Canadian Film Development Corporation Act, and I am sure that if the hon. member will consult the Journals for June 20, 1966 he will note that this bill had been preceded by a resolution. In the circumstances I believe the hon. member is wise to ask the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw the bill. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY ACT

EQUIPPING OF COMMERCIAL VEHICLES WITH DRIVER SAFETY BELTS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-198, to amend the Motor Vehicle Safety Act (seat belts).

[Mr. Baldwin.]

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to require that as an additional Canadian motor vehicle safety standard buses and trucks travelling on interprovincial highways be equipped with safety belts and that the use of these safety belts by the drivers of the equipment be mandatory. This is in line with recent legislation in the United States.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

2. How many people are employed?

3. How many years has the program been in operation?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. In 1970/71, total federal allocation for the Fashion Design Assistance Program is:

Program administration and operation, including salaries	$27,400
Grants, bursaries and awards to promote design	32,000
Total	$59,400

2. One officer, full-time, plus one secretary, half-time.

3. This program is in its first year of operation.

OIL EXPLORATION PERMITS—BANKS ISLAND, N.W.T.

Question No. 51—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Did the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development issue permits recently for oil exploration on Banks Island in the Northwest Territories and, if so, which companies received these permits?

2. Was there any consultation with the native people of Banks Island prior to the issuance of these permits?

3. Were any representations received by the Government of Canada from the native people on Banks Island urging that no further exploration take place until consultations be made with the Eskimo people and, if so, what has been the response of the Government of Canada?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. No, the permits involved in the agreement between the Department and Deminex and Elf Oil Exploration Company Limited regarding the methods of conducting exploration on Banks Island were issued in December, 1964, May, 1965 and July, 1968.

2. No.

3. Yes, representations were received and the Department consulted with the Eskimo people on Banks Island after the abovementioned Oil Companies indicated their intentions to commence geophysical operations. After meetings with representatives of the native people and oil companies, the oil companies were required to sign agreements containing stringent conditions governing the conduct of their explorations. These conditions were aimed at protecting the wildlife and safeguarding the traplines. A copy of the agreement signed by the companies was tabled in the House of Commons on October 21, 1970.

CONSIDERATION OF INCLUDING IN COMPUTATION OF GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT VALUE OF HOUSEWIFE AND HOUSEHOLD DOMESTIC SERVICES

Question No. 58—Mr. Broadbent:

1. Is the Government of Canada and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics giving consideration to including the computation of the Gross National Product the value of the housewife and of household domestic services?

2. Has any department or agency undertaken estimates of household domestic services made on the basis of equivalent values for paid domestic services at market rates and, if so, what percentage of the Gross National Product do these estimates represent?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. In following the standard national accounting conventions used to define production, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has excluded the value of the housewife and household domestic services from the measurement of the Gross National Product. At the present time no consideration is being given to include this item in the computation of the Gross National Product.

2. No.

2. What is their annual salary?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): 1. and 2. The workers in the constituency of Kamouraska are directly assisted by the UIC office of Rivière-du-Loup to obtain whatever information they need.

CANADIAN TV—CUTTING OF FILMS

Question No. 157—Mr. Robinson:

1. How many films shown on Canadian TV in the years 1969 and 1970 were cut in length from the original film?

2. What was the average amount of time the films were cut when shown on Canadian television?

3. Has CRTC done any research into the cutting of the films shown on television and, if so, what research has been done and is the cutting of the film considered to be an unfair or deceptive practice to the public?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): 1. I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that the CBC keeps no record of the films or other programs cut in length for presentation on television. Complete film or tape programs may be cut in length for one or more of the following reasons: (a) In the case of a television series produced in North America, the program length may have to be cut very slightly in order to accommodate commercial messages, institutional announcements, or program promotional items. (b) Film programs produced in Europe that are not specifically tailored to North American requirements may have to be shortened slightly because the television projection rate in North America is 4% slower than in Europe. (c) Feature films produced for theatrical release rarely accord with the required program length. Usually features have to be edited to fit the program time slot available, although occasionally they are short enough to be presented in their original form. (d) Film or tape programs that contain unredeemed violence, illegal visual or sound content, or in which there is extreme exploitation of the emotions, are cut by the minimum amount necessary, where these programs are otherwise desirable.

In the case of television series, wherever possible the cuts are made where there is no dialogue, and in every case a conscientious attempt is made to respect the integrity of the original production or story line. In the editing of features, the original concept and balance are preserved as much as possible. Films regarded as "classics", or those produced by acknowledged masters of the cinema, are invariably either presented intact or not at all. In the preparation of a magazine type program a short segment illustrating a particular topic is sometimes taken from a longer film.

2. I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: (a) On North American television series where cutting is necessary, approximately 40 seconds in a half-hour program and approximately 50 seconds in programs lasting an hour or longer. (b) Feature films scheduled at the end of the broadcast day are usually allowed to run out without any cuts. Those scheduled earlier, when the timing is more inflexible, are edited by the amount of time necessary to enable them to fit the time period available. Typically, this could run between five and twenty-five minutes.

3. I am informed by the Canadian Radio Television Commission that the CRTC has not conducted any special research on this matter. Through its monitoring activities, the study of station logs, and its general surveillance of program practice, the Broadcast Programs Branch of the CRTC is familiar with the fact that episodes of television series produced outside Canada are sometimes cut by small amounts to accommodate advertising material. Feature length films, not made originally for television, frequently are cut to fit the more rigid time schedule of television. The manner in which the editing is done is extremely important so that the deletions do not distort or destroy the dramatic sequence of events in the original. But unfortunately the Commission has been unable to do any research on the subject.

OIL INDUSTRY IN CANADA

[English]

Question No. 189—Mr. Harding:

1. What were Canada's estimated oil reserves for the years 1965 to 1969 inclusive in terms of (a) barrels (b) number of years supply?

2. For the same years, how many barrels of oil were (a) produced in Canada (b) imported (c) consumed in Canada (d) exported?

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

TELECOMMISSION STUDIES

Motion No. 47—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all representations, briefs, submissions etc., received by the Department of Communications regarding its Telecommission studies?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Communications, I wish to accept motion for production of papers No. 47 with the following reservations. The telecommission study reports are now being edited and printed and should be available early in 1971. At that time, any representations which are in the form of briefs or submissions to the telecommission will be tabled in response to this motion, except in those cases where the originator or source of information has requested that the information be treated as confidential.

Mr. Orlikow: That is acceptable, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations or conditions expressed by the Parliamentary Secretary, is it the pleasure of the House that motion No. 47 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT OF DR. A. VENNEMA, DIRECTOR OF CANADIAN MEDICAL AID IN VIETNAM

Motion No. 58—Mrs. MacInnis:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Interim Report made in March, 1968, by Dr. A. Vennema, Director of Canadian Medical Aid in Vietnam in 1967-68 and for copies of any subsequent correspondence between him and the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, all experts of Dr. Vennema's or Mrs. Culhane's calibre who render special services under contract with the Canadian International Development Agency generally have to submit a routine report on the work accomplished. Such report is part of the terms and conditions set and is submitted under previous agreement that it will be treated confidentially. Often such documents include personal information and assessments...

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member, but I must remind him that he is not allowed to make a speech at this time. He must merely indicate to the House whether he is agreeable to the submission of the document.

Mr. Ouellet: As such information is confidential, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to kindly withdraw the motion.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, she does not withdraw her motion. Question!

Mr. McIlraith: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

LIST OF PHOSPHATE CONTENTS OF DETERGENTS

Motion No. 61—Mrs. MacInnis:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the list prepared by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding phosphate contents of detergents.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, since enactment of the phosphorous content control regulations effective August 1, 1970, by Order in Council P.C. 1970-1341, dated July 29, 1970, the various laundry detergent manufacturers have reconstituted their products to conform with these regulations which limit the concentration of phosphorous—

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the Parliamentary Secretary and remind him—would the hon. member kindly resume his seat—that he cannot make a speech but should indicate as quickly and as briefly as possible whether or not the motion is acceptable.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, no specific list of these reconstituted products now on the market has been prepared since the regulations went into effect. I would therefore ask the hon. member whether he would consider withdrawing the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Motions for Papers

REPORTS FROM MRS. CLAIR CULHANE AND DR. ALJE VENEMMA ON CANADA'S INVOLVEMENT IN VIETNAM

Motion No. 69—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence with and reports to the Prime Minister, Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Canadian International Development Agency from Mrs. Clair Culhane and Dr. Alje Venemma with respect to their observations concerning Canada's involvement in foreign aid to Vietnam, possible misuse of Canadian aid and reported atrocities.

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that also is a confidential document requested by the Agency. As such information is likely to assist and improve the program of Canadian aid to underdeveloped countries, I would ask that it be kept confidential and that the hon. member withdraw his request.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, since the government seems unwilling to provide any information in respect of this important question I ask that it be put to a vote.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. McIlraith: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

AGREEMENTS RESPECTING COMPONENT PARTS FOR TELECOMMUNICATIONS SATELLITES

Motion No. 96—Mr. Macquarrie:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the agreements between Hughes Aircraft Co. on the one hand and Northern Electric Co. of Montreal and Spar Aerospace Ltd., Malton, Ont. respecting component parts for telecommunications satellites.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Communications I wish to report the following. Telesat Canada is an independently operating corporation and is required under the Telesat Canada Act to provide its services on a commercial basis. Therefore it would not be in the best interests of Telesat to make public its private commercial agreements with other members of the industry. Under the circumstances I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his question.

Mr. Macquarrie: I do not accept the explanation.

Mr. McIlraith: Transfer for dabate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

CONTRACT BETWEEN TELESAT CANADA AND HUGHES AIRCRAFT CO.—CONSTRUCTION OF TELECOMMUNICATIONS SATELLITES

Motion No. 97—Mr. Macquarrie:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the contract signed between Telesat Canada and Hughes Aircraft Co. for the construction of telecommunications satellites.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the reply to this notice of motion is the same as the one given for notice of motion No. 96, and for the same reason I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion. I assume that for the same reason he will refuse.

Mr. Macquarrie: I do not accept the explanation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McIlraith: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

STUDIES UNDER NATIONAL HEALTH GRANT PROJECT 605-7-510 OF 1969

Motion No. 105—Mr. Harding:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all studies prepared under National Health Grant Project 605-7-510 of 1969.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there is an agreement in scientific circles to the effect that details of special research projects are to be considered as confidential by researchers and the sponsoring agency. For this reason, the Department of National Health and Welfare does not release the findings of researchers to the public. I would therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Nonsense!

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, I feel this information should be made available to members and I ask that the motion be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

STUDIES RELATING TO FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF CANADIAN MINING AND MINERAL PROCESSING INDUSTRIES

Motion No. 107—Mr. Saltsman:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the studies undertaken in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources on the degree of foreign ownership and control of the Canadian mining and mineral processing industries as indicated at page 33 of the 1968-69 Annual Report of the Department.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the report on the study of corporate disclosure requirements as they pertain to mining communities, referred to on page 33 of the 1968-69 annual report of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, is in the process of publication. It is anticipated that the printed report will be available for distribution within seven or eight weeks, at which time copies of the report will be tabled. In view of these circumstances the hon. member is requested to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Saltsman: Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

STUDIES BY DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE REGARDING NATIONAL YOUTH HOSTELS

Motion No. 108—Mr. Nystrom:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all studies and reports undertaken by the Department of the Secretary of State regarding National Youth Hostels.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, no report has been issued by the Department of the Secretary of State regarding national youth hostels. I would therefore request that the hon. member be good enough to withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: In that case I will withdraw it.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

INFORMATION PREPARED BY DRUG ABUSE EDUCATION UNIT

Motion No. 112—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all literature and other information prepared by the drug abuse education unit of the Food and Drug Directorate.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the drug abuse education unit of the Food and Drug Directorate is now distributing material and literature published by various agencies while its own publications on this matter are being prepared.

I would then ask the hon. member to be so kind as to withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Perhaps I got the translation incorrectly, Mr. Speaker. Did I understand the Parliamentary Secretary to say that the drug abuse unit has not published any material? I consider that a preposterous kind of anemic war on drug abuse if they have not got anything prepared.

Mr. McIlraith: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining Notices of Motions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order similar to others I have raised in preceding sessions. On the order paper now there are 35 or 40 Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers, nearly all of which have been transferred for debate at the request of the government. If this course of action is continued we will be in the same position we were at the end of the last session. The government is using this procedure under the rules to sweep these motions under the rug and deny any opportunity for debate on many of the items transferred. I submit that this is an abuse of the rules and an attempt by the government to escape its responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not for the Chair to determine whether there is an abuse of the rules. The hon. member has pointed to a difficulty which was brought to the attention of the House before.

It was my understanding that the rules committee was to take a look at the application of this rule. The committee should be sitting very soon, and it is my hope, along with all hon. members, that this matter will be looked into by that committee.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL SECURITY

WAR MEASURES ACT—ARRESTS RELEASES CONTINUING DETENTIONS—CLEARING OF NAMES OF THOSE RELEASED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he can give us up to date figures concerning the number of arrests and releases under the War Measures Act regulations and also whether he can tell the House if any discussions have been held with the Quebec authorities with regard to clearing the names of those who have been released in so far as the implications of any such arrests are concerned?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the latest figures as of ten o'clock this morning are the same as yesterday. The number arrested is 453, the number rearrested is one, the number released is 402, the number of those detained is 51 and of those, two have already been sentenced.

I have had conversations with the Attorney General of Quebec on matters involving protection not only for those who are currently detained but for those who have been released, and I expect that in due course the Attorney General of Quebec will be making an announcement.

WAR MEASURES ACT—ALLEGATION OF BRUTALITY—INDEPENDENT INQUIRY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it has been indicated by the Prime Minister of Quebec that no independent review board is to be established there because he would regard that as constituting an insult to the police. But the police in the province of Quebec have now been charged in court with brutality in one instance at least. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether, in fairness to the police and to the country, some method will be established to conduct an impartial, independent inquiry into a charge such as this or whether it will be left in the air and in doubt to cast a shadow on the police and indeed upon the administration of justice in the whole country?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): That question is framed in such a way I cannot deal with it definitively here, but I think that any announcement will be forthcoming either from the Premier or from the Attorney General of Quebec.

WAR MEASURES ACT—NUMBER DETAINED BUT NOT CHARGED

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice whether any of the 51 or 49—I am not sure of the number, but since two have already been sentenced the number now is probably 49—who are still in jail have not yet been charged.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I cannot be categorical about that. It may be.

WAR MEASURES ACT—SUGGESTED VISIT BY HOUSE COMMITTEE TO JAILS WHERE PERSONS DETAINED

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he would be prepared to agree to contact, if necessary, the Minister of Justice of Quebec or the Prime Minister of Quebec with the idea of permitting the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to visit the jails where men and women are detained under the War Measures Act, with or without charges, and report to the House?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): If that sort of exercise were undertaken, it might properly be done by a committee of the National Assembly of Quebec.

Mr. Woolliams: In view of the fact that the Minister of Justice has some responsibility, would he make the suggestion that he has made in the House to the Minister of Justice or the Prime Minister of Quebec and ask that a committee be set up made up of members of the National Assembly if he is not prepared to do anything so far as this Parliament is concerned?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will transmit the representation of the hon. member to the Attorney General of Quebec.

SUGGESTED JOINT COMMISSION TO EXAMINE EVENTS LEADING TO INVOCATION OF WAR MEASURES ACT AND ADMINISTRATION THEREOF

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider consulting with the province of Quebec with a view to establishing a commission to inquire into the general background of the terrorism and the events leading up to the invocation of the War Measures Act as well as the administration of the Act. I ask this particularly in view of the rather extraordinary statement attributed to the Minister of Justice suggesting that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has been guilty of exaggeration and that there have been too many conflicting comments and opinions coming out of Ottawa during the crisis. Could we have such a joint inquiry with a view to deepening our understanding of the development of terrorism in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On a point of order—

Mr. Stanfield: I beg your pardon. I did not refer to our fair-haired Minister of Justice but the Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Is the Minister of Justice rising on a point of order?

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It has been clarified, thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: I think the Prime Minister would like to respond to my question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is a rather intricate question and I must say an intriguing suggestion. If the Leader of the Opposition would either make a clear proposal or perhaps write to me in that respect and indicate—

Mr. Bell: And do away with the question period?

Mr. Trudeau: —what kind of joint commission he would like to see set up between the Quebec government and the federal government, I will certainly consider it. But I would appreciate a clearer explanation of the proposal. I must say it does not strike me as a very practical one or one that is customary.

Mr. Stanfield: I would really prefer the Prime Minister to set up such a commission himself but I thought he might be happier in consulting the province of Quebec about it.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question put by the Leader of the Opposition to the Minister of Justice.

The Minister of Justice knows that his counterpart in Quebec will announce today a formula for compensating the people who were arrested unjustly under the War Measures Act. I should like to know if the federal government will contribute to that compensation fund. If so, to what extent?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, last July, the whole matter of compensating victims of crime was discussed in a general way. But no firm agreement was reached in this regard in Halifax, last July, except that all the provinces agreed that an effort should be made to achieve uniformity in that kind of legislation. To date, there has been no agreement between the province of Quebec and the federal government with regard to compensation in the present situation.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Lotbinière have a supplementary question?

Mr. Fortin: No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

WAR MEASURES ACT—JOBS LOST BY PEOPLE DETAINED AND RELEASED WITHOUT CHARGE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Perhaps this would be a good point at which to ask about those who have been arrested, detained and released without charge. I asked this question the other day. How many of them have lost their jobs as a result of their incarceration? Perhaps the Solicitor General could answer this question.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not able to answer it.

Mr. Fairweather: Perhaps he would find out the answer.

ENERGY

DISCUSSION OF CONTINENTAL POLICY AT CANADA-UNITED STATES MINISTERIAL MEETING—REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of the meetings held in the last two days between representatives of the Canadian and United States governments. Were there any discussions on a continental energy policy and has the Canadian government made any commitment with respect to the sale of Canadian gas or other energy resources in return for a promise of free access for Canadian oil to the U.S. market?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer to both questions is no.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the minister a question arising out of the statement by Mr. Walter Hickel, United States Secretary of the Interior, who said to the press and also on television last night: "We are still trying to work out how we can have a continental energy policy". Assuming that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Mr. Hickel were at the same meeting, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he is now saying that Mr. Hickel's statement is inaccurate?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. I would point out to the hon. member that the pronoun "we" is somewhat ambiguous in this context. I can assure him there were no discussions—

Mr. Baldwin: Only the Prime Minister can use that pronoun.

Mr. Sharp: —at our meetings about a continental energy policy. Mr. Hickel, of course, and his friends may have an idea along this line, but I cannot answer for him.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I then direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that discussions have been held in Washington last week with respect to oil and we have already made commitments with respect to 6.3 trillion cubic feet of gas, would the Prime Minister undertake to have the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources make a statement to the House tomorrow outlining Canada's energy policy before we fritter away our resources bit by bit without any over-all program?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am sure the minister will be anxious to satisfy any question the opposition may have on this or other subjects, and if the hon. member properly addresses a question to him when he is in the House he will do his best to answer.

OIL—REMOVAL OF UNITED STATES IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the report from this meeting that the United States has agreed in principle to do away with the restrictions on imports of Canadian oil into that country, has any specific date been set or agreed to by the United States ministers for putting that policy into effect?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am sure the hon. gentleman will want to correct Hansard. He talked about ending imports into the United States. I am sure he meant restrictions on imports into the United States. May I read a sentence from the communiqué that I think is the answer.

Mr. Lewis: You should have made a statement on motions.

Mr. Sharp: I thought that hon. members would like a statement that has been agreed to by both sides.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

URANIUM—OPENING OF UNITED STATES MARKET TO INCREASED IMPORTS FROM CANADA

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the agreement between Canada and the United States to open the U.S. market to increased shipments of Canadian crude oil, can the minister say if any progress was made in the recent talks concerning the opening of the U.S. market to increased sales of Canadian uranium?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We did make exceptional progress in opening the market for oil. We did not make much progress on uranium.

Mr. Foster: Is it the policy of the government of Canada to work toward an open quota system with regard to the U.S. market for Canadian uranium?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We made the strongest representations to the United States and we reminded them of their obligations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. I believe that in due course the United States will honour their obligations.

OIL—REMOVAL OF UNITED STATES IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister might now be permitted to complete the answer which he started to give me with regard to the specific state of import quotas on oil shipments into the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I would be happy to do so if there is no objection from other hon. members. The communiqué, which is of course the record of the meeting that I think I ought to quote on this occasion, says:

> For 1971, it is expected that pipeline capacity would need to be fully used and it was agreed that arrangements should be worked out quickly to permit in subsequent years—
> Subsequent to 1971.
> —full and unimpeded access to United States markets of Canadian crude oil and petroleum products, surplus to Canadian commercial and security requirements.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. In light of the statement made by the minister—of course we thank him for not making an initial statement in the House and for keeping it all to himself—how can the minister be satisfied that these arrangements can be made unless he has received an assurance that the Trade Act which has been passed by the House of Representatives will not become law, since by its terms it would prohibit the President of the United States from relaxing any oil import quotas?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Edmonton West will agree, I am sure, that this is debate rather than a question.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, I asked whether an assurance was received.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this issue and so that it may be fully debated, would the government not agree to set aside a day for debate on a motion by the government to agree to the terms of the communiqué?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if the opposition would like to oppose the arrangements we have made for full and unimpeded access into U.S. markets for Canadian oil, I think they should use an opposition day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Calgary North has a supplementary. The Chair will recognize him, and after that go to the hon. member for Lotbinière who has been waiting for a while.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask this question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Have the actual quotas been lifted or are Canadian exports still under restriction? If they are under restriction what was the amount agreed upon, if there was agreement, between this country and the United States with respect to the export of Canadian crude petroleum to that country?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know, or at least certainly those who were members of the previous Conservative administration should know, that these meetings are held between ministers and secretaries. We deal generally with the principles and on this occasion we got the U.S. secretaries, who are very responsible people and who could not speak if they were prevented by legislation, to agree that we should in years subsequent to 1971 get full and unimpeded access. We did not deal specifically with the amount for 1971, except that we would probably utilize the full capacity of the pipelines. I hope that will satisfy the hon. member.

Mr. Woolliams: It is just words.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROVISION OF JOBS FOR UNEMPLOYED PROFESSIONALS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the fact that the Canadian economy will not offer in 1970-1971 adequate prospects for the increasing number of university graduates who will not be spared by the heavy unemployment, according to a report of the federal Department of Manpower and Immigration to be released shortly, would the minister indicate what his department intends to do in order to solve this problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister intends to answer the question, may I suggest that he be brief. It seems to me that the hon. member for Compton is asking the minister to make a statement which should normally be made on motions.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN ABSTENTION IN VOTE ON RESOLUTION CALLING FOR RESUMPTION OF MIDDLE EAST PEACE TALKS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has to do with the United Nations General Assembly resolution which called for the unconditional resumption of the Middle East talks and which was passed with the United States voting against the resolution. Having regard to the amount of criticism that is taking place across the country concerning the fact that Canada abstained from voting on this resolution, having only a few days earlier been so outspoken in favour of the Israeli stand during the visit of the Prime Minister of Israel, what was the reason for the abstention?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. member will know if he followed the debate very closely, that we voted with Israel on a motion proposed by the Latin American countries which was satisfactory to Israel. We voted with them and that motion was defeated. Then came the motion that had been proposed by the Afro-Asian bloc which we had been trying, not with too much success but with some success, to have modified in such a form that it might have been acceptable to us. We did not succeed and therefore we abstained.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the nature of the qualification the minister desired to have in the resolution in order to make it acceptable to Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think that is quite clear. We wanted that motion to be fully consonant with resolution 242 of the Security Council. Since it was not, we abstained.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister since received criticism from various Jewish organizations across Canada for having maintained a position of neutrality at a time when Israel needed Canada's help?

Mr. Sharp: We had commendation from them for supporting the motion supported by Israel. They would have preferred, I think, to have us vote against the subsequent motion, but I do not think they were unhappy that we abstained. We certainly did not support it. We protested very strongly against the inopportuneness of the debate itself which we felt, and which I still feel did not advance very much the cause of peace in the Middle East.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister read The Canadian Jewish News and its editorial about Canada taking a position of neutrality detrimental to the Jewish people and to Jewish Canadians as a whole? Has he read that?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CITIZENSHIP

RESPONSE TO LETTER FROM NATIVE CULTURAL AND COMMUNICATIONS SOCIETY OF ONTARIO

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, last week I put a question to the Minister without Portfolio dealing with citizenship matters, and I gather it is possible that he is now in a position to answer it. Inasmuch as the question and answer should appear on the same page, perhaps I might state the question again. I ask the Minister without Portfolio who deals with citizenship matters why, as of last week, there had been no response to the letter written to the minister under date of August 24 by the Native Cultural and Communications Society of Ontario?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of an actual organization by that name, but letters from a lady interested in forming such a society have been responded to in personal discussions with her.

Mr. Woolliams: What society is that?

Mr. Stanbury: The society referred to by the hon. member. They have been responded to by discussions with her over a long period on the part of departmental officers. Consultations with provincial authorities and interested organizations have also been carried on, and as a result a decision can and will now be conveyed promptly.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I commend the minister for taking the opportunity of speaking personally to the young lady. It means there is hope yet within the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Inasmuch as the letter of August 24 directed to the minister contained a request for a grant, similar to a request made to the provincial government of Ontario, to cover the cost of some organizational meetings, would the minister state what decision has been made with respect to that request?

Mr. Stanbury: The decision that is being conveyed is the same as that of the province of Ontario—in the negative.

AIR TRANSPORT

BASING OF FARES BY CERTAIN AIRLINES ON CANADIAN DOLLAR PEGGED AT 92 CENTS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who, according to the roster, was to be here today. It relates to the Department of Transport and perhaps the Acting Minister can deal with it. In view of the action of Air Canada, Canada Pacific Airlines and BOAC in artificially raising the cost of international air travel to Canadians by basing fares on the Canadian dollar pegged at 92 cents, what action is the government taking to remove this discriminatory practice?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to take that question as notice on behalf of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the critical importance of air travel to the Canadian community, I wonder if the Acting Minister could request the minister to make a statement on motions at the earliest possible opportunity?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I will draw that matter to his attention for his consideration.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INCLUSION OF HOSPITAL WORKERS—PAYMENT OF COST

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of the severe hardship that may be caused by the inclusion of hospital workers, who are in a low wage bracket, in the unemployment insurance plan, which action would increase hospital costs by approximately 2 per cent, and in light of the government's call to hold hospital costs, can the minister inform the House whether this added hospital cost will be met by the federal government in future cost-sharing programs?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the premise of the question. I think such coverage will be very beneficial for the hospital workers involved. We know that they wish to be covered, and I have been approached about this matter personally. As far as costs are concerned, of course the employers' portion would be part of the administration of the hospital and would be shared.

Mr. Rynard: Does the minister not recall or does he not know that a previous minister of health did not include these workers because of the rising costs?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think that the question as asked is not in order.

Mr. Munro: The interests of the workers are being upheld.

HEALTH

INVESTIGATION OF HAZARDS FROM USE OF LEADED GASOLINE

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Have any surveys been completed or are any under way to check into the health hazards arising from the use of leaded gasoline?

An hon. Member: That is a leaded question.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I shall take that question as notice.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PARTICIPATION OF EMPLOYEES IN ELECTION CAMPAIGNS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Did the minister give leave to his special assistant, Mr. Jean-Paul Matte, to campaign in favour of the Liberal party for the by-election in the constituency of Frontenac?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should remind the hon. member that this question has already been asked. I do not remember the minister answering, but in any case, if he did not, I think this question could easily be put on the order paper.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC—TRANSFER OF MANPOWER AND HEALTH INSURANCE SERVICES TO PROVINCE

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that Premier Bourassa of Quebec stated yesterday in the National Assembly that decisions will soon be made jointly with the Ottawa government, in order to put the manpower and medicare services under the control of Quebec authorities, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can confirm that statement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would respectfully point out that the quotation is not accurate, Mr. Speaker. I believe Premier Bourassa said that such matters were under discussion. He did not indicate that those discussions would bring about the results the hon. member mentioned.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Will a decision be taken soon as a result of the present discussions between the federal government and the province of Quebec?

Mr. Trudeau: It depends on the province's request, Mr. Speaker. If it asks that Ottawa renounces part of its jurisdiction, the reply will evidently be no. If attempts are made for an agreement that the reciprocal jurisdictions of the two governments operate more efficiently the reply will certainly be yes.

FINANCE

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR REFUND OF SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT TAX

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, would the right hon. Prime Minister say whether the next federal-provincial conference is expected to deal with refunding of the $250 million levied as a so-called social development tax and which Premier Bourassa asked for again recently?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking questions which were answered a long time ago. This question was put several months ago and I no longer see its relevance since the last September conference.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the hon. member for Sainte Marie another supplementary question. However, we are running out of time and I ask the co-operation of hon. members in trying to move on a little more quickly.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I wish the right hon. Prime Minister would clarify his statement. In view of the fact that a request in this regard has been repeatedly made by the Quebec premier since he took office, and that the question of a repayment was therefore brought up at the last federal-provincial conference, is the Prime Minister ready to reconsider this matter or does he consider the question as closed?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that this question was first raised because the Union Nationale government in Quebec had been far too long in accepting the federal medicare plan. Fortunately, the present Liberal government has been able to implement this excellent health insurance plan and the question is thus closed.

DISCUSSION OF UNEMPLOYMENT PROBLEM AT MEETING OF MINISTERS

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance concerning the meeting of finance ministers that is to take place in Ottawa on December 7 and 8. Does the minister intend to set aside a period during those meetings in which to discuss the very serious unemployment problem that will be facing Canadians this coming winter?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, one of the prime purposes of having the meeting in December with the provincial treasurers and Ministers of Finance is to discuss the economic situation as foreseen for the coming year.

TRADE

EXTRATERRITORIAL APPLICATION OF UNITED STATES EXPORT CONTROLS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct to the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question relating to the communiqué issued following the joint Canada-United States ministerial meetings. I direct his attention to the bottom of page 2 and ask him whether it is proper to conclude from this that the United States participants at the conference refused to give any assurance to the Canadian ministers with regard to the extraterritorial application of controls in the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The secretaries, since they were bound by the laws of the Congress, could not give an undertaking to change them. They are not members of a legislature, as the Leader of the Opposition is and as I am. Therefore they were not able to commit the Congress. However, we did impress upon them the desirability of using their influence to have these laws changed so that the extraterritorial application of such laws, which we believe to be provocative and ineffective, should be ended.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I apologize for taking the time, but I think this is a question of the greatest importance. Was any assurance given that the United States administration would press for the policy that the Canadian ministers were pressing upon the American ministers?

Mr. Sharp: The secretaries with whom we were discussing these matters said that they understood the point better than ever before, and they were influenced, I believe, by what we said. That is the best we could hope for.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIDE-MEMOIRES ON POSSIBLE UNITED STATES RESTRICTIVE POLICY

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is in connection with a meeting of ministers in Washington. It is reported that the Canadian government has delivered two aide-memoires to the American government regarding the possibility of a restrictive trade policy. I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he has tabled these aide-memoires in the papers he placed before the House today and, if not, whether he intends to do so?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no, I did not table them today. The notes were presented some time ago. They were not part of the papers before this conference. I should like to take as notice the request of the hon. member to have them tabled. I believe that they may have been of such a character that they could be tabled. I will examine that question.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PERFORMANCE OF ILLEGAL ABORTION ON PROGRAM "WEEKEND"

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Justice and concerns the illegal abortion presented on last Sunday's CBC "Weekend" program. Was the minister's department consulted for an opinion on whether an offence was committed under the Criminal Code by this advocacy of an illegal act on our national network? Also, does the minister intend to take any action with regard to the subtle urging of organized abortion clinics in defiance of the law on this subject?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no. To the best of my knowledge the Department of Justice was not consulted. The answer to the second part of the question is that I do not believe it is an offence to advocate a reform of the law.

AIR TRANSPORT

GRANTING OF LANDING RIGHTS AT TORONTO TO CERTAIN AIRLINES

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister inform the House whether the government intends to grant landing rights at Toronto for the five European airlines that have requested these rights, namely Alitalia, KLM, SAS, TAP and Lufthansa?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that question ought to be addressed to the Minister of Transport. I think the general answer is that the matter is still under consideration.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDUSTRY

ELECTRONICS—HARDSHIP CREATED BY ALLEGED DUMPING OF FOREIGN TELEVISION SETS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the charge by the Canadian Electrical Manufacturers Association that unfair competition has brought about high unemployment and could mean the extinction of the Canadian electronics industry, has the government made any move to investigate charges that Japan and Taiwan are dumping television sets in this country? If so, will the anti-dumping tribunal be taking any action on this matter?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, an investigation has been initiated by the Department of National Revenue. Notice of this investigation was published in the Canada Gazette on November 14, 1970. The investigation is now in progress. If in fact dumping is established, provisional duties are then applicable. At that time the question of material injury will be referred to the anti-dumping tribunal for decision. If the tribunal finds that material injury exists, anti-dumping duties will apply to any dumped television sets.

COMMISSION ON MEMBERS' AMENITIES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has informed the House that the Beaupré report has not been tabled because the translation is not yet complete. In view of the fact it has been in the hands of the government for three months and in view of the fact that the Canadian dollar is completely bilingual and speaks equally well in either language, will the Prime Minister consider tabling the report in English only?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The information conveyed by the hon. member is not quite correct, Mr. Speaker. I understand that the translation is finished and that the report is now being printed. When it has been delivered to the government we will then see what steps can be taken, with the assistance of the opposition, to implement it or otherwise.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board, who has been neglected for some days. Can the minister indicate whether members of the Canadian Armed Forces will receive a pay raise before the end of this year?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): As the House knows, Mr. Speaker, changes in pay are made on the recommendation of the Minister of National Defence. I can assure the hon. member that appropriate consideration will be given to all his recommendations.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTING OF MINERAL DISCOVERY ON NEWS BROADCAST—ENCOURAGEMENT TO SPECULATION

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. It relates to the CBC national television news broadcast at 11 p.m. on November 18 which devoted two or three minutes to a mineral discovery by a company which describes itself as a speculative mining adventure. The result was that the next day the price of the shares of the company increased by 60 per cent and well over one million shares were traded. I am informed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member kindly ask his question; we are running short of time.

Mr. Watson: Will the minister entertain the suggestion that the Quebec or Ontario Securities Commission or another appropriate body be asked to investigate whether this kind of encouragement to speculation should be permitted on the national television network?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): The matter has already been brought to my attention, Mr. Speaker, and I had the opportunity to discuss it with the C.B.C. authorities. The hon. member's suggestion is new to me. It sounds interesting and I will consider it.

If so, when will this amount be announced?

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. NATIONAL MARKETING POLICY—RIGHT OF PROVINCES TO REGULATE TRADE WITHIN THEIR OWN BOUNDARIES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I will address my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the announced policy of the National Energy Board to the effect that the Canadian market west of the Ottawa valley is open only to Canadian oil products, can the right hon. Prime Minister tell us whether this does not, in his opinion, represent a violation of the right of provinces to control commerce within their boundaries?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will recognize that he is inviting the right hon. Prime Minister to express an opinion in the field of constitutional interpretation. The question is therefore out of order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EAST PAKISTAN—ARRANGEMENTS FOR DISTRIBUTION OF CANADA'S EMERGENCY RELIEF CONTRIBUTION

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he will answer today the question I asked yesterday concerning CIDA's arrangements for the effective distribution of Canada's $2 million emergency relief supplies to the East Pakistan cyclone survivors. Also, will he comment on the accuracy of CIDA's press release of November 20 stating that Canada's shipment of medical supplies contained, among other things, only 500 capsules of tetracycline, which I would point out to the minister is barely enough to treat 12 patients and costs only $5.82?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have sent eight National Defence aircraft from Trenton carrying approximately 125 tons of priority relief supplies. Another four flights are scheduled to depart by Saturday. They will contain very large quantities of medical supplies. If I could pronounce the names, I would give them to the House. However, I think Your Honour would stop me in any event.

On the specific point regarding cholera and typhoid vaccines, the fact is that these diseases are rare in Canada. They are so rare that the stocks we have of these vaccines are adequate for little more than our own requirements. These vaccines perish. After discussing this matter with the World Health Organization, they stated they could get the supplies more effectively from nearby sources rather than waiting for Canada to supply them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period expired a few minutes ago. A supplementary might be allowed if there is consent, but I would also like the support of hon. members to recognize the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate who has shown commendable patience in trying to get the floor for a few days.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question which has serious implications in respect of economic development and regional disparity on the east coast of Canada. Will the Minister of Supply and Services refer to the Privy Council for reconsideration the sale through Crown Assets Disposal Corporation of "One Crown-owned building formerly used as an outhouse, wood frame, approximately 10 feet by 7 feet"?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT, 1970

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY POWERS FOR PRESERVATION OF PUBLIC ORDER

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-181, to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada, be read the third time and do pass.

And the amendment thereto of Mr. Lewis.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, last night I had just begun giving my reasons for believing that the amendment proposed to Bill C-181 should be defeated.

It is true that this bill may adversely affect the civil liberties of many people in the province of Quebec. This is unfortunate; it has always been the case when such things take place. Only a few days ago the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas) spoke very eloquently on this theme. He gave as an example the situation of Japanese Canadians during the war and what had taken place on the west coast. He reminded us that these people had been interned and that after the war it was found that not one case could be shown of a Japanese Canadian being guilty of an offence against the war effort. We all agree with this and know it to be true. What the leader of the NDP neglected to point out, however, was that when this action took place, Canada was in danger—and when the country itself is in danger civil liberties must be forgotten to some extent.

What was done was most unfortunate. Certainly it was a dark day in the pages of Canadian history when these most loyal Canadian Japanese were interned. But I would impress upon you, Mr. Speaker, and upon all members of the House that we cannot gamble with the safety of 22 million Canadians at the present time by thinking about civil liberties when they effect only relatively few people. Of course, as I say, it is unfortunate. I know this Parliament and the provincial legislatures will do everything possible to see that civil liberties are not unduly interfered with. But Canada is too great a nation to allow the safety and the future of 22 million people to be endangered because of arguments based on the fact that up to the moment some 400 people have been jailed and not charged.

I would remind my friends to the left of this chamber who have opposed this legislation at every opportunity, that members of the FLQ are not a bunch of Sunday school teachers; they do not go to church every Sunday. They are people who have condoned bombing and murder. This, of course, is not in accordance with the way we live here in Canada. I point out too, that the vast majority of the people of Canada agree with what the government has done, and they agree with what the government is attempting to do now in replacing the War Measures Act by legislation which is at least not quite so trying.

[Mr. Speaker.]

All hon. members have to do is read their mail to find out that when the War Measures Act was passed in the first place, there were probably a thousand Communists in Canada opposed to it, a thousand supporters of the FLQ, 16 members of the New Democratic Party and one Tory. And 22 million Canadians were in favour of it. We cannot afford in any circumstances to gamble with the freedom of those 22 million Canadians. It is, of course, unfortunate that some people who may not be as guilty as the police have suggested they are, should be put in jail. It may take a few days or it may take a month before they come to trial, but eventually they will have their day in court.

In closing, I express the hope that hon. members to my left will stop this nonsense of bringing in amendments every hour and calling for a vote every day. We have important things to do in this Parliament. There are senior citizens who deserve a little better treatment in the form of increased pensions. Our veterans need higher pensions and allowances. There are many other tasks which remain to be done. Today the government is attempting to remove some of the hardship of the War Measures Act, and I ask hon. members to my left to show the dignity which their constituents expect them to use in this hallowed chamber and let us get on with the business of making Canada a better place for its citizens to live in.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I just would like to state briefly that I agree with this amendment which, in my opinion, should be examined seriously because of its contents.

It is quite inadmissible that a so-called democratic society could tolerate a system where culprits who have been members of an organization like the FLQ could be tracked down without time limit. We should think about this, because that is a precedent which may have disastrous consequences.

By approving the amendment under consideration we would be able to study more closely the implications of clause 8. At a time when we are in a certain state of panic due to the tragic events to which we have not yet found a solution and when minds are still overheated, we should not take steps that we would sorely regret later.

We should not give ground to future charges that Parliament has acted too quickly and too stringently, without thoughtfulness nor sense of responsibility. In any case, whether this emergency legislation is or is not implemented quickly, it will not give an ounce more of competence to those who normally should already have settled the problem which cropped up in October last. Adopting legislation bound to make the inalienable rights of the citizens very insecure will not speed up the discovery of Mr. Cross's kidnappers or of Mr. Laporte's murderers. We must therefore think coolly and most of all prove beyond doubt to those who precisely doubt Canadian democracy that we have a real democratic sense and that we do not wish to abuse our powers.

Hence, considering these few basic principles, it would be altogether reasonable and logical to send this clause back to the committee of the whole House for revision and closer alignment with the democratic traditions of this country.

• (3:20 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The question is on the amendment to the main motion. All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but there is really too much noise in the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Roberval has the floor.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, there were exclamations on the government side when I rose. However, I wish to point out that I have certainly not taken too much of the time of the House during this debate, since this is the first time that I speak to the subject. I listened patiently to the other hon. members and I hope that my colleagues will show me the same consideration.

We have things to say on this bill. Indeed, we shall introduce an amendment, if not several. We have not been able to do so until now because the procedure allows the other opposition parties to introduce as many amendments as they wish. As a consequence, the Ralliement créditiste could not participate in the debate to the same extent as the official opposition party or the New Democratic Party with their numerous amendments.

Mr. Speaker, we have now reached third reading of Bill C-181, which aims at replacing the War Measures Act invoked after the October events.

We supported the government then because we had no alternative in the circumstances. The government had promised to introduce in the House, as soon as possible, legislation to maintain public order in the event of circumstances similar to those we have just experienced.

We were therefore expecting permanent legislation which would have applied to the whole nation from Halifax to Vancouver.

We wanted a legislation with clear definitions and precise enforcement clauses. We are obliged to confess that, unfortunately, this is not the case and that our hopes did not materialize.

After the first reading of the bill, we carefully considered the government proposals because we hoped to use the study in committee of the whole as a means to oblige the government to rectify some of the monstrosities contained in its bill. However, this did not happen because the government group, behind its absolute majority, seemed to take a cunning delight in defeating with complacency all the amendments which could have improved certain parts of the bill.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

Everything was turned down flat, except for a few insignificant words. I listened and watched these developments and I did not see any reason even to vote because of the uselessness of these arguments since the government was determined to accept no change.

If I rise to speak today, it is not because I feel that I could make the government more congenial in view of the fact that the word was passed and orders will be fully and blindly obeyed as usual.

My only purpose is to reveal to the people the tactics used by the government to make us vote for Bill C-181, which we opposed in its present form, because it is not national in scope; it is only temporary and applies only to Quebec. Furthermore, it is not clear and it could undermine the very foundation of our legal system.

As members of the Canadian Parliament, the legislation we pass must be national in scope. We notice that this bill deals only with the FLQ movement in Quebec as if difficulties could erupt and FLQ demonstrations could take place only in Quebec.

However, we already have evidence to the contrary. Certainly all the provinces are not immune from the FLQ ideology since some people have already been arrested even in Ontario on parliament hill, in front of the peace tower.

I have seen with my own eyes signs bearing the words FLQ. We have seen them in British Colombia and even in England where one FLQ member just committed suicide.

Mr. Speaker, that one at least did not agree with the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on capital punishment.

In order to reach the Front de Libération du Québec, would it not have been more logical and particularly more realistic to propose measures to protect public order in Canada in general? Is it to be acknowledged that the word "Canada" excludes the province of Quebec? Those who drafted the measure probably had something against Quebec. They wanted all Canada to see that province explicitely named in a law.

Is this not simply discrimination? I cannot really find the spirit which moved the government to use such a procedure. On certain days, we would very much like to know what goes on in the mind of the right hon. Prime Minister. Besides, many on the government side ask themselves the same question. He appears to us as an elusive man with a thousand contradictions. At times, he frightens us.

Indeed, now he appears as the untiring protector of the laws of Quebec, now he multiplies opportunities and reasons to further interfere with jurisdictions previously reserved exclusively to the provinces.

I realized that when I heard him answer the hon. Leader of the Oppositon (Mr. Stanfield) in connection with the bill before us. The Leader of the Opposition, as recorded on page 1359 of Hansard, was asking whether the Prime Minister was prepared to support a provision for an independent review in the public order bill.

The Prime Minister then answered, and I quote:

I submit that the amendment proposed by the opposition along the lines of establishing such a commission would precisely be doing that, seeking confrontation with the province of Quebec in a matter of its jurisdiction—

What does the Prime Minister do with the jurisdiction of Quebec—which he has just cherished—in the areas of health, education and culture?

Assistance given by the federal government will be used as an excuse, but Quebeckers know that through taxes levied by the federal government they pay this so-called assistance ten times over.

I mention this because I consider that the causes which force the government to present this bill do not originate only in reprehensible acts by some members of the FLQ. It is therefore our duty, in our capacity as elected representatives of the people, to scrutinize this matter more exhaustively. I will add that it is up to this government to make a serious examination of its conscience, in order to determine whether its attitude towards the province of Quebec is not the main reason behind the dissatisfaction which is evident in that province.

Since the last general election, the Liberal government is giving the impression that it is doing its gest to provoke Quebeckers and keep them in line through fear.

Under the former Prime Minister, there had been a glimpse of hope for Quebec to recover its autonomy. In fact, the former Prime Minister had promised to eliminate all joint programs and to transfer back to the Quebec government all the taxation fields which had been temporarily granted to the federal government during the last war.

The Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson then recognized that Quebec was not a province like the others and this never prevented it from being one of the best partners in Confederation. But this dream was too good for Quebeckers, too expensive for Ottawa and too dangerous for high finance. This is why Mr. Pearson was obliged to leave his place to another not so diplomatic Prime Minister.

Unfortunately, once more it had to be a French Canadian who would take care of the dirty job of restraining Quebec's noble aspirations.

And of all contradictions, this Prime Minister is still pretending that Quebec is and must be a province like the others, like all English-speaking provinces.

In my opinion, the roots of the evil are this inflexible obstination. If you add to this an unbearable economic situation at all levels because of the double taxation, you know why there are so many rebels in Quebec.

We are against this bill because its application is only temporary. In fact, it will expire in April 1971 as if the government were sure that at that date all the FLQ members will have been eliminated or will have become Liberal supporters.

The War Measures Act was temporary. Now, we replace it with another temporary legislation. When shall we have a permanent legislation? Finally, we are against this bill because there is nothing clear, no accurate definition in it.

We still have to ask the government what they mean by "unlawful association" and that is why, seconded by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), I move the following amendment:

That Bill C-181 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of reconsidering clause 3 as amended concerning the definition of the unlawful association.

We fear that this measure will be a blow to the basic principles of our legal system. So far, in the province of Quebec, the accused was deemed to be innocent as long as the Crown had not demonstrated that he was guilty. If Bill C-181 is passed, the accused in Quebec—and in Quebec only—will be deemed to be guilty as long as he has not demonstrated himself that he is innocent.

I consider this "overthrow" of our jurisprudence to be just as frightening as the overthrow of our system of government by an association of reactionary citizens. The whole thing is carried out in a very hush-hush fashion and this will make it even more harmful to Quebecers. It is just another gimmick designed to pump some more money into lawyers' pockets and to starve to death those indicted by the state.

Let us stop asking ourselves why there are so many rebels in Quebec. Oh, they may not all be revolutionaries ready to take up arms, but revolt lies deep in their hearts, and that is even worse.

Mr. Speaker, are those people solely responsible? I say no, because too often they have been betrayed by the members they elected. The Quebec people are a peaceful people; all they want is the right to lead their own life in Canada, not the kind of life dictated to them by the central government.

We know public order demands that the law be respected, and I am all for it. But, in return, the government must respect the rights of every individual. To live its own life fully Quebec needs all its financial resources. You may rest assured that with those resources and the return of the taxing powers the federal government sneaked away from it, Quebec will no longer come begging to Ottawa: it can then live happily, just like Ontario and the other Western provinces.

All this to say that Bill C-181 will not solve the case of the FLQ or bring peace back to Quebec.

The law will make it possible to put a few in jail, but most will go free. More than anybody else, I hope that the people will regain confidence in our institutions. It is the only way to restore peace.

I urge the government to give up the idea of resorting to repression and to act more sensibly. We are no longer living in the age of caves and ghettos, but in the age of dialogue and negotiation.

The reign of dictators is over and it is useless to try to return to those historical times. We must go back to the true democracy of government by the people and for the people.

Finance must be at man's service. Man must not be the slave of our rotten and outmoded financial system. We have been earnestly fighting here for years in the hope of bringing to reason government members who have always been the docile servants of big finance.

Once more, we urge them to help all workers, farmers, fathers, young people who are expecting from government members the opportunity to live a full life in their country, Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

[English]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise merely for the purpose of saying that the amendment asks that Bill C-181 be not read a third time but be referred back to Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the definition of "unlawful association" contained in clause 3 thereof. We have serious reservations about the terms of clause 3. Our reservations are not those expressed by the hon. member who has just spoken. He is under the impression that this clause applies only to the province of Quebec. We take it to mean that it applies throughout Canada. The latter part of clause 3, as amended, beginning at line 9, reads as follows:

—or substantially the same governmental change within Canada with respect to the province of Quebec or its relationship to Canada as that advocated by the said le Front de Libération du Québec, is declared to be an unlawful association.

While we do not follow the logic of the member of the Ralliement Créditiste who has just spoken, nevertheless we think changes ought to be made to clause 3. We have taken particular objection, as we have said on other occasions, to the word "advocates". Clause 3 speaks of any group of persons or association that advocates the use of force. The term "advocates" is so broad that it could even cover an abstract, theoretical discussion of the necessity of using force in order to bring about separation of the province of Quebec from our confederation. We have felt all along that a term such as "incites" would be more specific and more restrictive.

For this reason we are inclined to support this amendment to send the bill back to the committee, because we think that clause 3 ought to be reviewed. Nevertheless, our reasons for so doing are not similar to those expressed by the previous speaker.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, without repeating the arguments I put before the House yesterday afternoon with regard to the whole process of making an association unlawful under the terms of the bill, while not agreeing with all the reasons put forward by the hon. member I believe that this clause is the nub of the legislation and is what makes it so reprehensible. Neither the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) nor the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has yet clearly indicated to the House or the country what the FLQ stands for or how, in all justice, this kind of legislation will work effectively in the province of Quebec or anywhere else. Because of that, I am led to support this amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, even if I have examined the amendment to clause 3, there is still enough doubt in my mind for me to support the amendment that the bill be referred back to the committee of the whole.

I understand, as stated by the previous speaker, that the bill is applicable, according to its first draft, throughout Canada. However, the amendment, passed in the committee of the whole concerning page 3, line 8, after the word "Canada" where the following words are added: "with respect to the Province of Quebec or its relationship to Canada,", shall necessarily be included in clause 3. We should therefore logically refer the bill, as provided in the amendment, to the committee of the whole for thorough consideration and to enable it to give a more detailed definition of the terms "any association of Quebec."

I think it might be advisable to take a closer look at the possibility of widening the scope of this clause to provide for a similar situation eventually arising in another province of Canada.

The older among us well remember the famous Chaloult trial which took place during World War II. This good man, a member of the Quebec legislative assembly, had had the courage to express strong nationalistic opinions at a political meeting during the war. And under legislation which was not clear enough he was charged, brought to court, forced to defend himself, to secure the services of top notch lawyers, although he himself was a very famous one, in order to establish beyond doubt in court that he was not a revolutionary, that he had not intended inacting the population to say no to the requests of the government concerning the defence of freedom outside Canada.

He had simply wanted, as a good Canadian, to speak a language that had been heard quite often during the electoral campaigns of 1924, 1925, 1930, 1935 and 1939, to the effect that not a single French Canadian would ever be mobilized. He had simply repeated remarks which had been used quite often to invite the people of Quebec to place their confidence in a certain party.

I remember that I followed this trial with the greatest interest and this memory has burnt into my mind.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I am just wondering how this legislation will be interpreted when it will have to be enforced. Will it be possible, in some cases, to accuse a person who has good intentions, but may be more of a nationalist than others, and therefore may use more direct and more violent words? Would it then be possible, under clause 3 of the bill, under some pretext, to charge that person of inciting others to use force or commit a crime to reach some goals?

I feel that in the interest of the whole of Canada and also in the interest of justice itself, we should take the trouble, as parliamentarians and responsible people, to reconsider this clause, taking into account the amendment that has just been moved.

When the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) rose a few minutes ago, I was very upset to note that some members were distressed. Yet, we are in parliament. If we take a close look at the word parliament, we find that it means a place where one can speak. If in our democratic parliamentary system, we have reached the point where it is a negative gesture aimed at extending the debate and at embarrassing the government when somebody rises to express his view—thus to speak—I wonder where we are heading for.

Being fully aware of the dignity and the ability of the member for Roberval, I am convinced that, like all other members, he does not wish to extend the debate deliberately.

As I was among responsible people, I have been accustomed, from a very early age, to assuming my responsibilities. I consider that one should play when it is time to play and work when it is time to work. Indeed, one should take things seriously when it is time to do so.

It is therefore our duty to review the clause thoughtfully, in an effort to improve it, to bring it more into line with our traditions and to give more protection to the freedom of those, still in a very great majority in Canada and particularly in Quebec, who are imbued with the principle of respect for the freedom of others.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize, at the beginning of my speech, the realism, the clarity and the lucidity of the remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), when the amendment before us was introduced. In my opinion, he made the most remarkable speech that we have heard since we started discussing the War Measures Act, for he pointed out that it was essential to proceed methodically and without too much haste in passing legislation which can rightly be applied not only today, but also in the month of April, or later if necessary.

The urgency of this emergency measure should not overly alarm us because if, in fact, with all the strengh and force of the war measures, the police are not bright enough to look in closets to find the kidnappers, it is not the passage of this emergency act that will ensure greater success. There is therefore no urgency to pass this emergency act.

However we can take this opportunity to adopt a measure which might be quite useful to the government when it decides to introduce permanent legislation on the matter.

In today's Le Devoir may be found an article by Karl Lewitt, associate professor of economics at McGill University, which I would like to quote:

> Should I remind you that invoking the War Measures Act has neither saved the life of Pierre Laporte nor obtained the release of James Cross nor hastened the arrest of the abductors and murderers; this Act was not needed to move the RCMP and the army into Montreal, nor to deliver all the warrants required under the Criminal Code, nor to search everywhere and question all suspects. Still we are entitled to know exactly why the War Measures Act was invoked. Whatever the Prime Minister may say, those reasons remain inconspicuous.
> Of all the more serious arguments handed out by government leaders when the country became panic-stricken, there was this "apprehended insurrection" and "wearing away of the people's will in Quebec". No evidence has yet been given to support either of these allegations; therefore, we have to take their word for it. And this brings us back to question the reliability, the integrity and the motivations of the politicians concerned.
> Therefore, this is only a matter of opinion; the authorities did not leave us much choice.

When we, during the most tragical events of October, were called upon to pass the War Measures Act, we then took the word of the government and its leader, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who said he had every reason to believe that the War Measures Act was necessary.

More than one month has gone by and we are now inclined to believe that his reasons were not justified.

This is why, now that we are going to pass a legislation which aims at putting an end to violence, we must not give any chance to those responsible for violence or those who would be tempted to use it.

With the situation prevailing in Canada, and especially in Quebec, we cannot afford to insult Quebecers, and this is what will happen if clause 3, as amended Monday, is left in the act.

Clause 3, which defines the illegal association, may be interpreted in numerous ways, as I mentioned last Monday. My colleague the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) just mentioned, with concrete examples to support it, that the government could even go as far as jailing all those who would fail to please them, if they were to abuse their power.

This is what we want to prevent. We must avoid by all means giving to those who are ready to resort to violence—but who have not yet done so—new motives to use violent means. This is why we must quietly and reasonably attempt to embody in equitable legislation ways and means to put an end to violent confrontations.

Mr. Speaker, we are being told that violence is not the prerogative of the province of Quebec but the government went as far as to accept, Monday last, an amendment designed to pinpoint the type of offence covered by the bill, namely "Canada with respect to the province of Quebec or its relationship to Canada". In my view, it is quite clear that this provision is only designed to establish whether the FLQ acted in Canada or not. If the FLQ acted in Canada, then let us pass an act that applies to Canada. To my mind, the argument is very simple.

By making that distinction, making that reservation in Clause 3 of the bill, and the preamble, it is implicitly recognized that the act applies only to Quebec. One of the objectives of the FLQ is recognized in part. I think we must pass an act that applies throughout Canada, because by saying that the FLQ exists not in Canada, but in Quebec, we recognize the separation of Quebec. Let us admit one of two things: that the possibility of the secession of Quebec is imminent, or that the FLQ is acting in Canada. That is the alternative facing the government when it persists in stating specifically that it is meant for Quebec.

The more so as Clause 3 is vague in many regards, namely where it stipulates, and I quote:

—in accomplishing the same or substantially the same governmental change—

Well, Mr. Speaker, this point has to be cleared up.

In Quebec, on April 29, 700,000 people voted PQ. If we were to convict people because of their aims, we would have quite an extraordinary case of abuse which could lead the government to take away all possibilities of constitutional emancipation for Quebec.

We must therefore take that into consideration, weigh each word and evaluate properly the scope of the clauses of this act to provide emergency powers.

Mr. Speaker, in Quebec, not so long ago, the leader of a party nearly still-born, the Christian Nationalist Party, was stealing paintings or had them stolen on the ground that christianism must be saveguarded in Quebec. It is quite laudable to want the expansion of christianism, the protection of religion and confessionality in schools, but if we resort to stealing and to violence to attain such a purpose, this is inadmissible, no matter how good the purpose can be.

• (4:40 p.m.)

This is why, when we say that the movement or the association become unlawful, provided they seek the same ends as the FLQ, we allow abuse of power. And when we know that our government at the present time is very close to dictatorship, we do fear that this insignificant emergency legislation might be used in order to control Quebec once and for all and to prevent its true emancipation and development.

Therefore there are truly several reasons for requesting a more complete and more responsible study of clause 3. It is not because we have to put an immediate end to terrorist activities in Canada that we should pass meaningless legislation.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, the War Measures Act is still in effect and it is a lot more efficient than the bill under consideration. If we do not succeed in arresting the offenders under the War Measures Act, what would be the use of a much less efficient legislation. All the more so, Mr. Speaker, since trouble is not restricted to Quebec. My colleague, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), has just told us about what happened in the House last year when a group of young ladies or women tied down to their seats came here to disrupt order. As far as I know, they were not from Quebec. On the contrary, most of them came from the other end of the country, which shows that trouble can erupt anywhere. I do not want to impute motives to anyone but I wonder what would happen had these ladies been from Quebec.

Others besides Quebeckers have also been the source of trouble. As an example I will mention what happened at Sir George Williams University in Montreal where damages amounted to several million dollars. Once again, those involved were not necessarily Quebeckers, members of the FLQ.

Therefore, this emergency act should enable to determine which organizations it is essential to treat rigorously in order to check any violence, regardless of its goals. Clause 3 implies, as I said Monday, that if an association uses force and violence to strengthen Canadian federalism, it would pursue a commendable goal, since clause 3 specifies that it is necessary that the goal of the indicted association be identical with that of the FLQ. There is clearly something irrational in that clause. That is why I strongly and whole-heartedly support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Roberval.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief and precise in my remarks, I hope, concerning the object of the amendment moved by my friends of the Ralliement Créditiste. They suggest in the wording of their amendment that clause 3 restricts the application of this act to the province of Quebec. They refer to words which were added a few days ago, in committee, to clause 3, namely those concerning the province of Quebec or its relationship to Canada. Those words appeared and still appear in the second paragraph of the preamble. They do not restrict geographically the implementation of the act, but they specify the definition of the FLQ with regard to its aims and objectives.

As a further precision, this legislation will apply throughout Canada. Its application will not be geographically restricted to Quebec. The law will be applicable by the Attorney general of Ontario, by the Quebec Minister of Justice or by the Attorney general of British Columbia, against the FLQ or any other association with the same objectives as the FLQ, namely the overthrowing by force or by crime of the Quebec government in relation to the rest of Canada.

The field of application of this legislation is not limited to Quebec but is aimed at the FLQ. This is a most specific legislation. As the member for Champlain (M. Matte) said, the government will have to look more fully into the problem of violence or of the use of force in our society.

I am trying to prove to the satisfaction of my friends opposite that the amendment recently adopted has brought about no essential change. I explained that point to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan The Islands (Mr. Douglas), to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and to the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). They were under the impression that clause 3 was not clear enough as concerns the aims and objectives of the FLQ.

Therefore, to clear up the matter, I thought advisable to add the words in the preambule. I believe that was unnecessary, since under the Interpretation Act, the preamble is included in the interpretation of other parts of the statute.

I should like to refer the house to section 12 of the Interpretation Act, contained in the 1967-68 Statutes of Canada. It reads as follows:

> The preamble of an enactment shall be read as a part thereof intended to assist in explaining its purport and object.

Therefore, the act is clear, even without the amendment made at the suggestion of the hon. member for York South. The legislation had to be clarified. To satisfy the claims of the hon. member, I proposed the addition of those words, and I want to give the mover of this amendment the assurance that I have in no way changed the essence of his proposal. It is simply a question of clarification.

To make myself clear about the advice I get from the legal advisers in the Department of Justice, I say again that, of course, this legislation will apply all over Canada. It is aimed at the FLQ, and this, throughout Canada.

I recognize that the hon. members on the other side may have experienced some interpretation problems, but I want them to be sure of the good faith of the government as regards this amendment.

[English]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I on behalf of the official opposition, make it very clear at the outset that we reject the amendment that has been proposed. I should like to explain why we reject it. Clause 3, as amended, deals primarily with the organization known as le Front de Libération du Québec. It is obvious from any of the facts about this organization that have come to our attention that it fits all the elements of what has become the twentieth century classic terrorist organization. For one thing, it does not hold public meetings; its work is clandestine. As far as anybody is aware, there are no doves in this organization and no philosophers advocating peaceful means. Its arguments are conducted at the point of a gun used against people whose hands are tied behind their backs. It uses terror tactics purely and simply. It steals dynamite to use the same. It steals guns to use the same. It preaches force.

All these things are known about this organization. Anybody who wants to loiter and become part of one of its cells or part of its whole philosophy is, therefore, motivated by one reason alone—the notion of terror appeals to that person. It is as simple as that. Why doubts are expressed—and doubts that are pretty far off target and illogical—is beyond me. You could ask Jasper Cross—when he moved from Halifax to Montreal they came to call him James Cross—just what the FLQ is, and he would tell you. You could also have asked Mr. Laporte before he was murdered by the FLQ. I reject absolutely and out of hand any suggestion that clause 3 does not, in as specific a way as possible, represent what we in this Parliament are after, which is to come to grips with this terrorist organization. It is not a terrorist organization that was at work in czarist Russia or in the miserable thirties and forties in some European countries; it is one that is alive, very much alive, and at work in Canada today.

I say that the definition contained in the bill is as reasonable an approach as a legal draftsman could make to identify the group that we are after. It must be effective, because several people have already pleaded guilty to being members of the FLQ and have been sentenced to 15 months' imprisonment. They must have known what they were about when they made that decision. I think there are safeguards. If somebody is picked up and wrongfully accused of association with the group, in due course a trial will be held and that person will be found not guilty.

There may be a little oversensitivity because it does appear there is maladministration of the regulations under the War Measures Act. There is some question whether the rights of people are being respected by the police. But those things can be straightened out in time. Above all, what we have to consider now is that there is a problem to be met in Canada. That problem involves the rooting and stamping out of a terrorist organization. For those reasons, on behalf of the official opposition—I want to make that very clear, particularly to the people of the press—let me say we reject the amendment that is now proffered.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the line taken today by the Créditiste members on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Roberval (M. Gauthier) is a symbolic gesture aimed at making the voice of the province of Quebec heard in the House on the problem now facing our country.

We wish our hon. colleagues and the Minister of Justice (M. Turner) to realize that the problem which has recently plagued a part of our province will probably go down in history as the "October events". This was not only a Quebec problem but a full-fledged Canadian national issue.

With patience and very often with impatience, I listened to the speeches of my colleagues of other parties. At times, I felt like rising to energetically protest against the insidious way of exaggerating the importance of problems in Quebec. In short, the intent was to present Quebecers as trouble makers, which is absolutely untrue.

My fellow citizens in Quebec want peace. They are against violence and the excessive use of force and that is why the mouthpiece of Quebec, the Ralliement Créditiste, sincerely supported the proclamation of the War Measures Act when the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) moved it at the height of the crisis. We gave our support in good faith because we were aware of the major problems facing Quebec.

Today, we are proud of having held out against anarchists and terrorists and those who want to overthrow the government by undemocratic methods.

Today, one month after the passage of the War Measures Act, one month after the death of a renowned Quebec statesman and the kidnapping of an equally renowned British diplomat, we ask ourselves if the Prime Minister has not taken advantage of the tragic events in Quebec to make it look to other Canadians as a province not like the others which is difficult to control and which one day will have to be subdued, muzzled and put in its place once and for all, in order to restore peace.

It is a serene spirit that in the course of this debate today we wish to submit the following argument in connection with clause 3.

The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) said earlier that it was to please our colleagues of the New Democratic and Progressive Conservative parties that he had repeated in clause 3, by means of an amendment, what was stated in the preamble.

In doing so, he has displeased us much as he has repeated in clause 3 the provisions of the bill that we did not like.

The preamble stated that it was intended to declare illegal the association known as Le Front de Libération du Québec because it was a threat to public order. That is quite clear, Mr. Speaker, it means Quebec.

Besides, one can read, and I quote:

—who advocate the use of force or the commission of crime as a means of accomplishing governmental change within Canada with respect to the province of Quebec—

It does not concern the province of Ontario, British Columbia nor New Brunswick. It is clearly stated here twice that it is "with respect to the province of Quebec". I go on quoting:

—or its relationship to Canada—

The War Measures Act was applied when the trouble started in order to settle once for all the problems in Quebec and to restore public order there.

The Creditistes unreservedly supported this act because these were major problems, because it was necessary to regain control of the situation, because we lacked information and because the right hon. Prime Minister could only say that there existed in Quebec a state of "apprehended insurrection".

• (5:00 p.m.)

Today—as pointed out by my colleague from Champlain (Mr. Matte)—we are still wondering what that state of insurrection was? What were the motives, the reasons, the evidence, the assumptions on which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) could rely to say to the government of Quebec, to the city of Montreal, that there really was a state of insurrection in Quebec? I do not say there was not, but we are entitled to know the real reasons that made the application of the War Measures Act necessary, to maintain order in Quebec.

A month has gone by since that act was invoked, but we have neither saved the life of Pierre Laporte nor found James Richard Cross.

Does the state of insurrection still exist in Quebec?

Mr. Speaker, the game has been lost, as far as the War Measures Act is concerned, because the government did not take the proper action. They panicked, created tension in Quebec and raised a national storm to show all Canada that they were justified in subduing Quebec once and for all. We are hurt, as Quebecers, to find the name of our province continuously coming up in the bill and to see that once more the problem is confined solely to Quebec.

A month has gone by since the War Measures Act was brought into force. However, at the time it was passed, it was fully agreed that it would remain in force only temporarily and that it would be replaced by permanent legislation in the near future. Instead of permanent legislation, the government is introducing another temporary measure to replace the first, on the grounds that there had not been time to draft a permanent one.

In all fairness, I must say that the Prime Minister sent a letter to all party leaders asking them for suggestions for the drafting of a permanent legislation. None of the suggestions made by the Créditists was accepted. Our leader made suggestions for the drafting of a permanent law, but they were disregarded.

The suggestions made by other party leaders were also brushed aside. In order to conceal its inaction, its incompetence, and to justify the dictatorial means used to subdue Quebec, the government told that province: We are applying the War Measures Act, we are bringing in the Army and we will do even better and act more sensibly once a permanent law is adopted. This legislation has not been introduced yet. It is quite possible that it will not be during this session. Since we have no guarantee that it will be introduced, we must be content with an inadequate and unfair legislation that repeat the mistake of the War Measures Act and applies only to Quebec.

This is what I find revolting as a Quebec federalist: an attempt to condemn an unlawful association in Quebec because it questions the status of the province of Quebec with regard to its relationship to Canada, implicitly means that the Canadian government uses the law to impose on Quebecers, regardless of their political party, the constitutional framework in which they must live. Under such a law, they are told: You are going to live under this set-up or you will be subject to convictions under the War Measures Act for the preservation of public order. And this, under the pretext that they are not using democratic means to achieve their purpose.

Agitation is not confined to Quebec and Quebec is not the only place where people are asking questions about the constitution. It is not only in Quebec that people resort to violence in desperation because of unemployment, misery and lack of welfare.

This bill deals with none of these problems but only calls the attention of Canadians to the problems of Quebec instead of striking at the root of terrorism in Quebec, which we deeply regret.

Instead of bearing down on the underlying causes of this evil, the government says: "We shall subdue you, break you, muzzle you! We shall even go as far as making this legislation retroactive so as to reach all the trouble-makers who may have disturbed public order."

Mr. Speaker, we are saying that the government, in this respect, lacks good faith. And I wish to tell the hon. Minister of Justice and my colleagues that we from Quebec, while we strongly oppose violence, also oppose this government's misuse of power. We stand against violence and force. We supported the War Measures Act but we disapprove of this kind of provocation on the part of a government which, because of its inability to act is spreading poverty, hardship and despair among our people, to such an extent that this is unfortunately but the beginning of terrorism.

Mr. Speaker, there are twice as many university graduates as there are jobs available. What shall we do tomorrow with those young people? God knows.

Mr. Speaker, those young people are desperate, and the government, instead of coping with real problems, beguiles the people with supposedly severe crises, with war measures acts, or with the use of excessive powers, so that tomorrow, if the troubles go on, we will be told again that Quebec is the trouble-maker in confederation.

Mr. Speaker, this attitude is quite unjust and provoking to my fellow citizens of Quebec, who are not violent, who do not want to use force, but who want to have valid and reasonable motives for remaining within the Canadian confederation. As a Quebec federalist, it is difficult for me to make my fellow Quebecers understand that confederation is viable and that life within its framework is pleasant, when one sees a government provoke these people and take advantage of a crisis, no matter how minor, to show off its strength and give orders to its Quebec servant.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to conclude my remarks. We approve the strong measures to condemn revolutionaries and put some order in Quebec. We are prepared to support the government in its efforts to restore public order in Canada. However, we disagree when it wants to confine the problem to Quebec, and say very clearly in its bill that the problem of terrorism only exists in Quebec, for this is untrue.

When the government wants to make us believe through its bill that revolutionaries exist only in Quebec, this is also untrue, even though the minister states that this bill applies to the whole of Canada. But, if this is true, Mr. Speaker, as he is now suggesting by shaking his head, that he only deletes the expression "Province of Quebec", and that he no longer names the province of Quebec in this bill, then he will have our full support, as he had on the proclamation of the War Measures Act. But as long as he wants to confine the terrorists, the revolutionaries, the bearded ones and the trouble-makers to Quebec, we will not agree, because this is provoking for us, and unjust for the Quebecers. There are problems not only in Quebec, but throughout Canada, from time to time.

Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Justice does not want to reconsider his position, if he absolutely wants to "frame" Quebec and refuses to admit that difficulties can exist elsewhere in Canada, not only does he fail to solve the problem, but he risks to bring about a revival of terrorism, violence and force.

When the first bombs exploded, the government was much alarmed. When they kept on exploding, the government did nothing. When the Company of Young Canadians started to pay its expenses out of the public funds, the government did nothing. When Mr. Saulnier from Montreal came here and said to the government: It is time you acted in Quebec, that you came to the assistance of the City of Montreal to restore order, and that you stop financing the revolution in Quebec. The government answered: No, that is untrue, that is nonsense, Saulnier is wrong.

But today we realize that the government did not act in time, so that the cause of unrest in Quebec, including terrorism, is not necessarily the constitutional framework but indeed the economic problem, which the government has made worse, brought about, so that at a given time it led people to resort to violence.

Mr. Speaker, terrorism in Quebec is a national disgrace, just as the CBC is also a national disgrace. It is unfortunate that the government should be trying to make us believe the issue is confined to Quebec. Therefore today, in this debate which we purport to be symbolic, we want the voice of Quebec, the voice of reason, to be heard in order that our colleagues here who represent all Canada may think and realize that the problem facing Quebec is not confined to Quebec, but is a national problem. It should be understood that when there is a problem in British Columbia, Quebec feels its impact and sometimes suffer from it.

We would like to ask the government to show the same broadmindness, the same understanding towards Quebec's problems, and especially, we would like to call its attention to these problems. For example, a 14 per cent rate of unemployment is forecast for the Maritime Provinces and Quebec, while it will be only 7 per cent in Ontario. Why, Mr. Speaker? For the last 15 years, in Quebec, the unemployment rate has been over 4 per cent, it has always been 20 or 40 per cent higher...

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The chair feels the hon. member is getting further away from the subject matter of the amendment before us, which, in short, proposes that the bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, in order that the definition of "unlawful association" be considered. During his speech, the hon. member has been allowed to digress so that he may prove some particular points but it seems that at present he is discussing the whole problem of Canada, which is contrary to the rules.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to prove in a few seconds that the economic problem of Quebec is the underlying cause of the evil which has befallen us, that this problem does not exist only in Quebec but also in the other provinces. So long as the government will not tackle seriously the real issue, superficial problems will keep worsening which might endanger law and order.

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member continues the government will never be able to tackle them.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, the members opposite interrupt me. I would like to end my remarks by saying that Quebec is a "province like the others" which wants to get its just share and which wants to make efforts to this end. Quebec is fed up with being treated as a "province not like the others", as the province of agitators. Quebec has no monopoly on disorder.

This is why we regret that this bill is aimed only at the FLQ or at Quebec terrorism because terrorism is not a phenomenon peculiar to Quebec. Indeed, it did not grow there like a mushroom but it was brought by foreign people, on account of the Immigration Act which comes under the federal government and which is bad. Moreover, terrorism exists for all sorts of economical, political and social reasons.

Mr. Speaker, we ask our colleagues from the other provinces to show for our problems the same broadness of mind we showed for theirs.

Once again I ask the minister whether this legislation actually applies to the whole of Canada as he says. If such is the case, he should delete the word "Quebec" and stop naming that province because this induces all Canadians to think that if we were not there, everything would go smoothly in the country. This is too bad, but Quebec will continue living within Canada and Canada will still have to put up with Quebec.

If we really want Quebec's status in relation to Canada to remain unchanged, let us act as true Canadians and not as bigots, and let us not make distinctions because we do not speak the same language. French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians want to build Canada, not pull it apart. Let us open our minds and stop provoking people.

I intend to vote against this bill because, all in all, it amounts to about the same as the War Measures Act, because it has approximately the same provisional character, because it is based on false pretences and, above all, because it merely repeats the error made with the War Measures Act, i.e. apparently confining the problem to Quebec.

That is why we are asking for a new definition of the terms "unlawful association", "terrorist" and "terrorist association" in order that the problem be no longer limited to Quebec only and that it may be extended to all of Canada. Each and every Canadian must try and find a solution to the problem now facing Quebec.

[Mr. Fortin.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The question is on the amendment to the main motion. All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Call in the members.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the debate in Committee of the Whole and the debate on the amendments moved during the third reading stage of this bill. I listened with particular interest to the last speaker. He discussed one of the amendments in terms of the relationship of this bill to the province of Quebec. Most members have had to consider in the last few weeks the reluctance by members from the province of Quebec to make a decision or indicate to this House problems with which they are familiar; they were willing to shout across the floor of the chamber indicating that other members were not familiar with the problems.

I feel sorry for the people of Quebec. They have found their government wanting. The government of that province cannot conduct its ordinary affairs. The Quebec provincial police are wanting. There is no cohesion in the metropolitan police force of Montreal. There is no unity among those police forces. There are in this House approximately 75 representatives from the province of Quebec. I am sure in the last six weeks they have been very concerned about the problems in their province. However, many of those members have not done anything in the House other than to vote or speak from their seats. The people of Quebec must have been shocked when their government, which was elected only a short time ago, had to ask for federal police to deal with a police strike situation. I am sure they were not proud of the fact that federal troops had to be called in to deal with the problem of strike action. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is willing to give great power to the Quebec system of justice. However, it has not operated in the normal sense that the citizens of the province expect.

I sympathize with the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). He stated that as a member from Quebec it was his impression that this bill is directed entirely against his province. While the minister will say that is not correct, and I agree with him, it does indicate the feeling of most of the citizens of Quebec, namely, that this matter has been treated as a political problem. In the first place there was considered to be an insurrection. This legislation indicates that there was an apprehended insurrection in the province of Quebec. Everyone in the country now knows this is not true. The "minister of regional disparity" indicated that 3,000 or more persons in high places and elsewhere were involved in this insurrection. The Minister of Justice has had the full powers of our national police force and the police forces in the province of Quebec, as well as 6,000 or 7,000 troops. Thousands of raids were made which resulted in hundreds of arrests. The minister has now indicated that not more than 150 people are involved. Probably a lot less people than that are involved.

Most people feel that when the two Rose brothers, Simard and four or five other people are apprehended, the insurrection in Quebec will cease. If that is true, why are the members from Quebec not demanding that the federal government help the province of Quebec to eliminate these problems? Obviously, Scotland Yard, Interpol, the United States police and international police forces are at the beck and call of the federal police in Canada. Not too long ago they received assistance from these police forces to help strengthen security in this country.

The members from Quebec should make this type of request to the federal government, rather than just participating in votes. They should do something positive and constructive. I have talked with a number of people from Quebec who are not interested in politics. They do not care about the political structure of Quebec or, for that matter, of Canada. Nevertheless, they are very proud of being citizens of Quebec, they are very proud of being citizens of Montreal and they are very ashamed that their police forces do not seem to be able to do the normal job of police operations which is expected in other places.

It is all very well for the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) to say that when 22 million Canadians are in danger of something, perhaps loss of liberty, it is time some people gave up a portion of their liberty so that the rest of the people could enjoy it. Mr. Speaker, every dictator in the world has always said: Give me power; I will only need it for a short time and I will clear up the mess and make it safe for you to walk in the streets. Dictators are always promising to make their countries safe by taking away the liberties of the people. This is not what Canadians want. This, surely, is not what the people of Quebec want. I am shocked that the Quebec members should sit in their seats and, worse still, vote for anything the government presents to them.

There have not been many really strong people from the province of Quebec in the federal field, at least since I have been in this House. They come here to vote, not to put forward ideas. I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Lotbinière say this afternoon that as a Member of Parliament and as a citizen of Quebec he did not want Quebec to be treated differently from the other provinces. I am sure most of the people of Quebec are not looking for different treatment.

The legislation before us is repugnant to everyone who thinks about it. Some members are inclined to take the view: We are not in Quebec and this law will apply especially to Quebec. It will not hurt me or the people I represent, so we shall not do a damned thing about it; let us not worry about whether anyone else gets hurt. The people of Quebec will revolt eventually against the treatment they have received over the years. It is all very well for the "minister of regional disparity" to say that FRAP is a terrible organization, that it is part of the insurrection. This was one of the reasons for the implementation of the War Measures Act in the first place.

I was surprised when I first came to this House, because I was new and did not know much about these things, to note that the last time we used the War Measures Act we allowed Camillien Houde to get out of gaol and he was elected in Montreal with a huge majority.

Other Canadians were also surprised. But I was not surprised a few weeks ago when not one person was elected to the Montreal council in opposition to Mayor Drapeau.

Let us suppose the "minister of regional disparity" was right in assuming that some of the FRAP candidates were people who should not have been elected; I do not know. Can he tell me that there is not one person among those who stood for election from that party who would not have been suitable for office, who would not have had the good of the city at heart? Was it only the people who supported Mr. Drapeau who should have stood? After all, many of the things which have been done, or neglected, by the present administration of Montreal have not been especially advantageous to the people of that city. There are the slums, for example. There are many other social problems. But they could have Expo, which cost us $300 million, a sum we gladly donated to that cause. And Mayor Drapeau is now working to get the Olympics for Montreal. I said in this House that this would cost us $50 million, but one of my friends who knows something about sports said $50 million would not cover the expenses of the last two countries in which the games were held, so the cost to the Canadian people will probably be considerably more.

An hon. Member: Could the hon. member speak to the motion?

Mr. Peters: The hon. member who interrupted me has not been here very long and his knowledge of the rules is about as wide as his knowledge of most of the other topics I have heard him discuss. But even he will understand that Quebec is faced with the task of cleaning-up the terrorism experienced in the province, particularly in Montreal, for many years. I do not want to be unfair to Montreal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: As usual, all members opposite do is make a noise. Most Canadians find Montreal an amusing city to visit, a city where things are a little different. It is also Canada's largest city; this is a fact which many of us do not realize. A city of two million inhabitants is not easily policed, no matter how good the police force may be. It is not unusual in a city of this size that there should be 60 or 70 murders a year.

In passing this legislation we are not doing a service to the people of Quebec. We may be doing a service to the government of Quebec or to the Mayor of Montreal. But the citizens of Montreal want to clean-up their city. They want to build a police force sufficiently trained to handle the terrorism which has been practiced by half a dozen young political terrorists bent on destroying the political institutions of the province. There are economic problems in Quebec which the representatives of that province have not brought to the attention of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I wonder whether there would be any disposition, if there were a possibility of concluding this debate within an hour, to sit for that length of time.

Mr. Bell: As always in these debates, we have been willing to sit late in order to make progress and we would certainly be willing to do so tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Public Order Act, 1970

Mr. Speaker: If we are to sit beyond six o'clock it would require the unanimous agreement of the House. Is there such agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimity. This House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at two o'clock.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of an article which appeared in last night's Ottawa Citizen, November 25, under a Canadian Press byline. The second last paragraph in the article states:

> New Democrat leader Douglas shouted that the Ontario Liberal was "a damn poor defender of the Canadian nation."

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO ENSURE CANADIAN OWNERSHIP

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-199, to amend the Canadian Film Development Corporation Act.

Mr. Speaker: Before I inquire of the House whether the hon. member has leave to introduce his motion, perhaps I might say this: the hon. gentleman has just filed at the table a copy of the bill—I have not looked at it and I think there is a presumption in the case of the hon. member that the bill will be procedurally correct—but with this caution, that it should be looked at, in any event, by the Speaker, I will put the motion. Does the hon. member have leave to introduce this bill?

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): In light of what the Liberal party did over the weekend, maybe the subtitle of this bill should be "Put your money where your mouth is."

The Canadian Film Development Corporation was established "to foster and promote the development of a feature film industry in Canada." However, no provision whatever exists in the Act to contain the industry within Canada. In other words, there is no protective feature with respect to foreign ownership, and I understand that at the moment foreign interests are attempting to move into the feature film industry which has been subsidized and assisted by the Canadian taxpayer through the fund established under the Canadian Film Development Corporation Act.

This bill simply seeks to amend the relevant section of the Act to ensure that the film industry will remain Canadian in ownership with its purpose being to promote Canadianism.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

INDICATION OF SIDE EFFECTS ON DRUG PACKAGE LABELS

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-200, to amend the Food and Drugs Act (Labelling).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, despite many changes in the labelling of consumer products, the law relating to the labelling of drug packages has remained virtually unchanged. The purpose of this bill is to have such packages properly indicate the side effects of any particular drug. In other words, if a drug one takes for hayfever makes one drowsy one should know about it before starting to drive a car.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ENERGY

CANADIAN OIL EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES—NEED FOR FURTHER CONSULTATIONS FOLLOWING RESIGNATION OF U.S. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of what the House was told yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the interministerial meeting earlier this week was merely for consultation and not for the purpose of obtaining binding agreements between governments, and following the very optimistic and welcome announcement regarding the future market for Canadian oil in the United States, would the minister say that there will perhaps have to be further consultations now as a result of the resignation of Mr. Hickel?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the latter part of the hon. member's question has anything to do with the situation as it exists. The government's position in respect of United States oil markets has been directed toward obtaining access to those markets on a competitive basis with indigenous United States oil and subject, as the communiqué said, to Canadian regulations under the National Energy Board Act or other applicable Acts of Parliament. The communiqué, which enunciated the agreement between Canadian ministers and their United States counterparts, indicated that the United States is now prepared to consider this position of opening their markets to our oil in competition with their own indigenous oil. While no final resolution has been made of the problem of security in the event of a short-term cut-off from the east there will continue to be—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister's statement is very interesting, and I am sure enlightening, but it seems to me that this kind of statement ought to be made on motions.

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the non-answer to my previous question. In light of the fact that the consultation and exchange of information did not result in an agreement between governments, I should like to know whether the minister now feels he will have to consult with the successor of Mr. Hickel in order to maintain the progress which he indicated in the communiqué?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, discussions are continuing in an attempt to bridge the main question that still exists in the minds of the United States authorities before they can make access to their oil markets available to Canada, namely, eastern security in the case of an emergency. These discussions will continue at the official level, and if need be I will be pleased to continue discussions with the successor to Mr. Hickel.

FUTURE QUOTAS ON CANADIAN OIL ENTERING UNITED STATES MARKET—OTHER FUELS—CONTINENTAL POLICY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the minister might be prepared to revert to motions to make a statement because the communiqué gives us very little information. In view of the fact the communiqué merely speaks of allowing western Canadian oil to flow into the United States market as United States oil moves into eastern Canada, I should like to ask the minister specifically whether the quotas on Canadian oil entering the United States market are to be raised for 1971 or are they to be removed entirely? Has any agreement been reached on this point, and at what particular time will it be possible to raise Canadian exports of oil into the United States market?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, with the quotas our sales into the United States market this year are about 17 per cent over last year and are the highest in history. The communiqué indicates that in the coming year the pipeline capacity will be used to the full, which would be an indication that the quotas will be raised even more. The communiqué further indicates that the United States is prepared to consider seriously the question of opening up the markets completely so that we have access to compete freely with United States indigenous oil in their markets.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The communiqué speaks of increased trade in crude oil, petroleum products and other fuels between the United States and Canada. Would the minister clarify and elaborate on what is meant by the two words "other fuels"? What other fuels were included in the discussions between the Canadian ministers and the representatives of the United States government?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, certainly discussions were held in respect of Canadian uranium which since 1964 has been barred from the United States market. We urged very seriously that that market be opened again to Canadian uranium, as we believe this would be in the interests of both countries. So far as natural gas is concerned, I think our position was made very clear at the time of the government's announcement, when the National Energy Board judgment in respect of the export of 6.3 trillion cubic feet was approved by the government recently, in which we indicated to our United States friends that an open oil market would engender more exploration for oil and thus—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands in a moment for a supplementary, but perhaps I should caution hon. members about reaching the point of debate on this very important matter.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister one more question. In view of the statement by Mr. Hickel when he was here in Ottawa that "we are still trying to work out how we can have a continental energy policy" and in view of the denial by both the minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs that there was any discussion about a continental energy policy, may I ask if any complaint has been lodged with the President of the United States by the Canadian government regarding Mr. Hickel having let the cat out of the bag, thereby resulting in his dismissal?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I think it is Mr. Hickel who is out of the bag and not the cat. But, Mr. Speaker, if by continental energy policy my hon. friend means the opening of United States markets to Canadian production subject, of course, to the regulations of the Canadian government and the Canadian Parliament or the National Energy Board under an Act of the Canadian Parliament, that is, of course, what we are after. No other discussions took place on any other aspect of Canadian oil policy.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that no report was made verbally to the House by the minister after this conference, would the minister agree there is now a good case for reporting to the House immediately following these conferences in case any of the parties cease to hold their positions?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question obviously is argumentative.

SALE OF WATER—UNITED STATES ENERGY MARKET

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary which may be self-answering because there has been a lot of hot air. Can he advise us whether there was any discussion whatsoever either on the part of the United States representatives or the Canadian government in reference to linking any export of fresh water or selling water to the United States to their energy market?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised at the self-effacing preface to the hon. member's question, but there was no discussion at any time in respect of the export of water in consideration of opening the energy markets or for any other purpose. There was no discussion whatever in respect of water except that water which was consumed by the members of the ministerial conference during the meetings.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—STATUS OF SAFEGUARDS IN CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The communiqué issued following the Canada-United States ministerial meeting uses the phrase "transitional arrangements" with reference to the protective clauses in the auto pact. This phrase is used for the first time in a Canadian communiqué; the Canadian government has adopted the United States terminology and replaced the word "safeguards" normally used by the Canadian government. Could the minister inform the House whether or not this means that the Canadian government has accepted the view that the safeguards in the auto pact are merely transitional in nature?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): It is a very fine point. There are "transitional arrangements" but there is no date for the termination of the arrangements.

Mr. Broadbent: That was a wonderfully ambivalent answer, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that we now have a $25 million deficit in the auto trade with the United States, would the minister assure the House that the government will not abandon the existing safeguards in the auto pact?

Mr. Pepin: The figure quoted by my hon. friend is not an exact one. Is he referring to the balance of trade for this year? If so the balance of trade for this year on automobiles between Canada and the United States is favourable to Canada at this time, that is, at the end of the third quarter, in September, by $69 million.

OIL

POSSIBLE REVISION OF MARKETING POLICY

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Since the Caloil Company of Montreal announced it was dropping plans to build a refinery in St. Augustin in the Portneuf riding, because the National Energy Board has refused to allow it to sell imported oil west of the Ottawa Valley, could the Minister say whether the policy will be reviewed and amended as required?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the member's question. Would he be kind enough to repeat it?

Mr. Godin: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall repeat my question.

In view of the fact that the Caloil Company of Montreal announced yesterday that it had decided against building a refinery at St. Augustin, in the riding of Portneuf, because the National Energy Board has refused to allow it to sell imported oil west of the Ottawa Valley, can the Minister of Energy tell the House whether the policy of the Board will be reconsidered with a view to making the necessary changes?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada is that the policy of the government is fair constitutionally. No consideration is being given to changing it because it is felt that it was adopted in the interest of the whole country.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Does the minister know that the trade barrier put up by the National Energy Board between Quebec and Ontario is a one-way barrier since Ontario can still sell oil in Quebec?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED SPECIAL MILITIA TRAINING PROGRAM FOR YOUNG CANADIANS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the success of the summer student militia training program last year, would the minister consider introducing a series of six-week courses under a special militia training program similar to the one initiated in 1961 in order to combat unemployment and to give the advantage of youth development to students and other young Canadians?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we do not have such a program under consideration at the moment.

Mr. Marshall: I know there is no program in effect now, but would the minister consult with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and recommend this type of course before Christmas or shortly thereafter?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as I said, we do not have such a program under consideration.

[Mr. Godin.]

POST OFFICE

CHRISTMAS MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I would like to direct a question to the Postmaster General and perhaps he would pass it on to the minister in charge of the Post Office. Noting the department's announcement regarding no mail delivery on December 25, 26, 27 and 28 and since a good many Canadians still use the mails, could consideration be given to reviewing the decision not to have mail even on the fourth day of Christmas?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): I will be glad to pass this on to my colleague.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EAST PAKISTAN—SUGGESTED USE OF CANADIAN AIRCRAFT AND PILOTS TO DISTRIBUTE FOOD AND SUPPLIES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs but in his absence I will direct it to his Parliamentary Secretary. In view of the pressing need for a rational distribution of food and supplies to the disaster-stricken area of Pakistan, will the minister consider sending immediately by Canadian Air Force Hercules transports, Canadian bush pilots and float planes currently idle as a result of the freeze-up in our north?

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): I would like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question, Mr. Speaker. Canadian officials have been giving the most careful consideration to the possibility of Canadian aircraft and hovercraft being made available for relief operations in East Pakistan. We are in continuous touch with the Pakistani authorities as to their priorities, but to my knowledge no specific requests have been made to us to supply helicopters, hovercraft or the type of plane mentioned by the hon. member to transport relief supplies.

PROMPT RESPONSE TO DEMANDS FOR AID FOLLOWING DISASTERS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. In view of the time difficulty in connection with the East Pakistan situation, and as it took three days to decide to go to the aid of Peru and six days to send aid there, is the government making any plans to speed up emergency disaster aid for other countries and to get helicopters, float planes, and short take-off and landing planes on site a little more quickly?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if I may answer this question I would point out to the hon. member that nine flights have already delivered a total of 286,499 pounds of relief supplies and by this weekend another four flights will have delivered an additional 123,000 pounds. On this basis I think it is fairly obvious that the ability to respond quickly to the demand for relief supplies in any part of the world is very high both with regard to the External Aid Office and with regard to the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Ryan: But are the supplies getting to where they are actually needed on the site of the disaster or are they backing up in warehouses?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as was already pointed out, it is the responsibility and concern of the government of Pakistan to distribute it to its own citizens and, as the Parliamentary Secretary has already indicated, we have had no request for additional assistance, whether in personnel or aircraft, for the purpose of distribution.

AUTOMOBILES—CONSIDERATION BY PARLIAMENT BEFORE DROPPING OF SAFEGUARDS IN CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is supplementary in a way. In view of the anxiety that will now be created by the indications from the minister that he is backing off from the safeguards in the Canada-U.S. auto pact, will he assure the House that none of the safeguards will be dropped without first bringing the matter to Parliament?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I think I made that promise four, five, or six months ago, and I will repeat it now if that is useful.

COMPLAINT BY UCC REGARDING ATTITUDE OF TASK FORCE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Since he stated at the opening of the annual agricultural conference which is now taking place in Ottawa, that the main trends of the government's agricultural policy would be included in the report of the task force can the minister tell us whether he shares the opinion of the CFU which reproaches it not only with ignoring Quebec interests, but also with not providing the federal government with the information needed to determine its agricultural and trade policies so as to promote the development of various sectors of agriculture, including those of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, of course I will be very happy to hear the views of any farm organization and particularly of the UCC, it being one of the largest ones in the province of Quebec, but I do not think I should give any indication of a degree of support or rejection of the task force report until this congress is over, because that is the purpose for which it was called.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that the General Assembly of the United Nations has unanimously condemned aerial hi jacking, is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation at this session of Parliament which would provide fitting punishment for anyone who carries out or attempts the hi jacking of aircraft?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I would hope this would be possible, Mr. Speaker.

NEWS RELEASE INDICATING SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR CANADIAN STUDENTS IN GERMANY IN 1971

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of citizenship. It is in regard to a widely publicized news release by Student Employment Europe which states that arrangements have been completed to give 5,000 Canadian students employment in Germany this coming summer. Can the minister tell the House whether the government has come to some arrangements with this group? If so, what are the arrangements, has this group completed any agreement with the German government, and was the government consulted before the publication of this official looking document?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the answer to all those questions is no. However, I have had discussions with authorities in Germany about the activities of Canadian youth there next summer, and officials of the Department of Manpower and Immigration and of the Department of the Secretary of State are pursuing these discussions.

ALLEGED LOSS OF QUOTAS BY WESTERN CANADA DAIRY FARMERS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Because of the continuing loss of dairy quotas by dairy farmers in western Canada under the government's quota program, would the minister take the necessary action to adjust this policy before the dairy industry in the west suffers beyond repair?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those erroneous preambles to a question which make it impossible to answer. The fact of the matter is that no one in western Canada has lost a dairy quota unless he gave it up.

Mr. Dinsdale: Inasmuch as these quotas are moving to central Canada—

Mr. Olson: That is not true.

Mr. Dinsdale: —would the minister take the necessary steps to see that quota adjustments are made within the provinces concerned?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, that assertion is not true.

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask a supplementary?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we should try to move on as quickly as we can because we will soon be running short of time. I suggest that supplementaries should be limited at this point.

REASONS FOR INVOKING WAR MEASURES ACT —ESTABLISHMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

As a result of the recent events in Quebec, I would ask him whether he does not believe that it would be in the public interest to establish a royal commission of inquiry to investigate impartially all the circumstances, facts and events which have led the federal government to invoke the War Measures Act.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will recall that the question was asked yesterday.

Mr. Valade: No, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, I asked for the establishment of a parliamentary committee, while I am asking today for the establishment of a royal commission of inquiry. I think that it is an entirely different question, Mr. Speaker.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must say that the government does not intend to set up such a commission of inquiry. We know what we voted on and I believe the opposition, who supported the government, are also aware of the facts on which they voted. Furthermore, I see no reason for setting up such a commission.

Mr. Valade: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Prime Minister says the opposition voted with full knowledge of the circumstances, a statement which I consider to be false. The opposition voted on the basis of the information given by the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order! Order! That is not a point of order.

POLLUTION

GREAT LAKES—ALLEGED VIOLATION OF BOUNDARY WATERS TREATY BY UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising from a recent statement he made to the effect that the United States had violated the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 by its pollution of the Great Lakes. In view of this violation of Article 4 of the Boundary Waters Treaty, what action does the Canadian government propose to take?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member will have been glad to note the very specific statements in the communiqué issued subsequent to the ministerial meetings between ourselves and our U.S. counterparts to the effect that the pollution of boundary waters was to be of particular concern at the ministerial level, especially in regard to the Great Lakes, and that a further meeting was contemplated early in January, or just as soon as the final report of the IJC on this matter was issued.

Mr. Harding: What specific commitments did the minister receive from his American counterparts that action would be taken on this problem?

Mr. Greene: I think the communiqué speaks for itself in this regard, Mr. Speaker. Certainly it indicates that both sides are determined to carry out the recommendations of the International Joint Commission in regard to pollution of the Great Lakes.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the heavy unemployment in the country, could the minister advise whether the government intends to bring forth measures to assist the shipbuilding industry in Canada at an early date?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am very hopeful that this can be done.

Mr. MacEwan: In the consideration of this matter, is it the intention of the government to bring forward and examine the recommendations made by the Robertson committee on shipbuilding?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, the committee makes 23 recommendations and we are studying them at this time; as I just said, I am hoping that some of them might be adopted rather soon.

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN AMOUNT SHIPPED THROUGH PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is also responsible for the Wheat Board. In view of the visit of the icebreaker Louis St. Laurent to the port of Churchill next week, which will be a record for any ship docking late in the year and which we hope will have a significant effect on the lengthening of the shipping season, will the minister consider conferring with the Wheat Board and asking them to offer something over 30 million bushels of grain to the trade for export out of Churchill next season?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make it clear to hon. members that there is no limit on the amount of grain offered by the Wheat Board for shipment through Churchill. The problem is that individual buyers and agents are hesitant about booking ships for wheat in certain parts of the season when they cannot be absolutely certain that ships can navigate at that time. The particular navigation at a particular time does not change that over-all attitude.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister could explain why it is that the offerings of the Wheat Board early in the spring usually correspond very closely with the final sales?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member will realize that his supplementary is argumentative.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: I will foresake my supplementary question until tomorrow and ask the Acting House Leader or the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council about the business for the balance of this week and next week.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, we would proceed immediately with government order 36, the surtax on shirts. Following that we will resume the third reading debate on Bill C-181, the temporary measures bill. This will be followed by the second reading stage of Bill C-186, the CNR finance and guarantee bill. Tomorrow we will deal with bills in the following order: Bill C-179, Buffalo-Fort Erie Bridge, second reading; C-191, Loans, second reading; S-6, Anti-dumping, second reading; C-182, statutory instruments, second reading; C-174, Tax Review Board, report stage, C-180, packaging and labelling, second reading and Bill C-177, co-operative associations.

[Mr. Andras.]

Mr. Baldwin: Will the Parliamentary Secretary indicate whether any more bills will be placed on the order paper before the Christmas recess? Also, what are the realistic expectations of the government with regard to the passage of measures? Has the government any idea when the Christmas recess will be so that we will know what our diet will be between now and then?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is expected that additional bills will be given first reading before Christmas. I understand the President of the Privy Council will be back in the House on Monday next. He will be consulting with representatives of the parties with respect to the program for the balance of the pre-Christmas part of the session, particularly with regard to the order of business for that time.

Mr. Marshall: Will the Minister of National Defence indicate whether one of the bills to be introduced for first reading will be the veterans' pension legislation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I certainly hope so.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And old age pensions too?

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all hon. members I wish to indicate to the House leaders, through Your Honour, that the 40-minute question period is having a detrimental effect on the business of this House. Every day at least 40 or 50 members are unable to ask questions on urgent matters. GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INDUSTRY

MAINTENANCE OF SURTAX ON IMPORTATION OF MENS AND BOYS SHIRTS

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved:

That this House, pursuant to subsection (1c) of section 7 of the Customs Tariff, do approve that the Men's and Boys' Shirts Surtax Order, being Order in Council P.C. 1970-959 of 2 June 1970 made under subsection (1a) of section 7 of the said Act, continue to have force and effect until the 29th day of November, 1971.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when I informed the House on June 2, that the government had decided to impose a surtax on some imports of woven shirts offered at prices such as to disrupt the Canadian market, I indicated that it was a temporary measure making use of currently available instruments, pending the full implementation of the new textile policy. It might be useful to consider the situation that developed early in 1970 and led the government to make that decision, namely that of June 2, the application of which we are now seeking to extend.

Several hon. members knew then—as they still do—that the activity and the employment level in the Canadian shirt industry had dropped since 1966 and that many plants had closed down. This phenomenon was closely related to the very rapid and sharp increases in imports from countries with a low cost price and those whose external trade is nationalized, commonly called state-trading countries.

In an effort to minimize the disruption caused by these cheap imports, Canada had negotiated with seven of these countries agreements under which they agreed to limit their exports of woven shirts to Canada. The first agreement entered into with Japan goes back to 1960. Early in 1970 it was realized that men's and boys' woven shirts were entering Canada in considerable quantities outside the framework,—I emphasize "outside the framework"—of these voluntary restriction agreements between Canada and some exporting countries, at a low cost or at prices liable to cause serious prejudice to Canadian manufacturers and workers.

So, Mr. Speaker, two causes, namely quantity and prices, are involved in this case.

Furthermore, there was evidence that exporters were taking steps to buy large extra quantities of such textile shirts offered at prices likely to disrupt the market and from countries, and this I wish to emphasize, that were not parties to those restrictive intergovernmental agreements. Therefore we have here imports over and above the quantities provided for in the voluntary restriction agreements, coming from countries which have yet to agree to the voluntary restrictions.

Then, and after a careful study of the situation in the industry and on international markets, the government decided to take measures which, hopefully, would prevent shirt imports from exceeding the 1969 level, that is 1,200,000 dozens. At that time, attempts were being made to restrict imports to that level which is nevertheless impressive.

Those measures were designed to protect the Canadian shirt industry, while meeting with our international commitments. At the same time, since approximately 40 per cent of the Canadian consumption was exempted from the surtax—I repeat, 40 per cent—Canadian consumers still had many opportunities to buy cheap shirts.

It now seems that the 1970 imports will exceed by approximately 15 per cent the 1969 figure I mentioned earlier, that is 1,200,000 dozens, at least according to our statistics.

Mr. Speaker, I stress the importance of the present imports, so that some hon. members will not be able to claim that the Canadian government is closing the door. That is not so: the door is far from closed, according to the statistics which I have just mentioned. I know that several hon. members are opposed on this issue, some being in favour of imports, others of exports. What we are trying to do, is to reach a happy mean, which may appear fair to some and most unfair to others.

This increease of 15 per cent, Mr. Speaker, is partly due to the great quantity of shirts which were in transit when the Order in Council of June 2, which I mentioned earlier, came into force and thus escaped the surtax. Again, it was not very easy to foresee that, because of the shirts which were in transit when the surtax of June 2 was applied. It is to be noticed, however, that our imports statistics include quantities still detained in Customs warehouses, while awaiting the expiration of the order prescribing the surtax. The market has thus not yet felt all the possible effect of the increase in imports.

The representatives of shirt manufacturers and officials of the Department of Finance and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce met recently to discuss that subject. The manufacturers indicated that their orders for the coming season would be greatly reduced and some big importers admitted they are keeping large quantities of shirts in customs warehouses until the Order in Council imposing a surtax expires, that is on November 30.

Canadian manufacturers fear that the shirts presently in storage will be then brought out and put on the market at the beginning of December, thus disturbing the sales of Canadians products during the holiday season.

In my opinion it is the government's duty to maintain present restrictions on imports of shirts until it has been able to study the recommandations of the Textile and Clothing Board as to the future of the Canadian shirt industry.

As hon. members know when the Board was established on October 29, 1970, I asked the Chairman to give priority—second priority as the first belonged to cotton textiles—shirts. It is felt that the government should now be in a position to implement the Board's recommendations by mid-1971. As matters now stand, I feel it would be wise to see that imports liable to disrupt the local market remain banned and that the status quo of the shirt industry be maintained until the government is in a position to assess the long term possibilities in this area.

I also insist on advising hon. members that a bill on textiles will shortly be introduced before the House and that they will then have the opportunity to discuss all the aspects of the matter. Therefore, I would ask them to be as brief as possible in their remarks today and if they should have more significant points to make with reference to any philosophical or economic theory, they should wait until then.

Accordingly, I would like hon. members to pass the motion to approve extension of Order P.C. 1970-959 of June 2, 1970.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I will not try to follow the example of the hon. minister, but I will be as brief as possible. There was an agreement that we would say very little on this matter. I expected that the minister's comments would be brief.

However, I want to assure him that this question is so important and that there has been so much delay in adopting the necessary measures to preserve the jobs of our Canadian workers that it is time to act.

It is comforting to see that we have finally succeeded in convincing the minister and the government to act. We did not start in 1970 pointing out to the minister and the government how imperative it was that the necessary measures be taken to ensure that imports from countries where salaries are much lower than here be reduced so that the Canadian shirt industry could continue to exist

The hon. minister has said so himself: Several industries, several shirt factories have ceased their operations since 1966. Several others operate on a part-time basis, with the result that in several cities, the economic life has been deeply affected.

Consequently, in order to prove to the minister that we wish to provide him with the opportunity to do all he can to help workers, we want this measure to be passed as soon as possible and, as he suggested, we will wait until later to make comments which perhaps will not be as pleasant as those we made today.

We have much to say on this subject, and we shall be looking forward to this day.

Meanwhile, we offer our best wishes to the minister and his staff in order that they can go on protecting our workers' jobs.

• (3:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, we, too, intend to listen to the minister on this occasion and to give the resolution speedy passage. This order provides protection to the shirt industry and prevents its elimination, which I am quite convinced in the absence of this measure could easily happen. I think there is no alternative to the present course.

If the shirt industry itself suffered harm, so would other industries since there are primary textile industries that depend upon the shirt industry to buy their materials. More than that, many of those who are engaged in textile industries live in what are known as small, one industry towns, around which a social structure has developed.

I would not want this motion to pass on this placid note without sounding a few words of warning. One of the reasons this motion is necessary—I am sure there are others in the House who have reservations about protectionist policies—is that this government has put this country into a box by creating unemployment of a level that is criminal. The present level makes some of the programs we have talked about make little sense. After all, what is the point of moving people around if there is no place to move them? What is the point of retraining people if you have nothing to offer them when they are retrained? Certainly, there are no alternative jobs for workers in the textile industry at the present time.

Let there be no mistake about the resolution we are agreeing to today: it is certainly not a solution to the problems of the shirt industry. The minister mentioned this when he pointed out that the matter had been referred to a committee for study and recommendations. I am glad the minister did not argue that it was not his government's fault. Neither did he raise the question of low wage industries and protectionism in other countries, or the fact that we do not have entry to the markets of other industrial nations. Had the minister so argued, Mr. Speaker, then he would have come in for even more criticism than he is going to get now. Let us not forget that this is not something that has happened to Canada alone, though we have been under attack from low wage countries. Our textile industry has been declining for the last 40 to 50 years.

May I remind the House that during the course of that period, with few exceptions, the Liberal party has occupied the seat of government. It is the Liberal party that has failed to find a solution to the problems of this industry. Very often it has seemed to me as though the Liberal party's solution was one of attrition, of letting this industry die gradually; of turning its head the other way and pretending the situation did not exist, and then rushing in with emergency legislation when an absolute disaster was in the offing.

It is also obvious that we cannot go on in this way, quickly passing legislation, with the minister appealing to the House on the basis of humanitarianism and telling us that the industry will be dislocated unless legislation is quickly passed by the House. We cannot continue jumping from one cliff to another as we have in the past. I do not want to take the position taken by Professor Creighton and others that probably it is too late now to remedy matters; that as long as there is a Liberal government we will have disaster and the country is lost; that the Liberals have not had any policies in the past to preserve this industry and probably will not have any in the future. I think there is still hope. There is always the possibility that they will be defeated at the next election.

Mr. Anderson: Do not hope too much for that.

Mr. Saltsman: It may be the only hope, if not a very big one. Since the minister is going to give some consideration to this matter, and has set up a committee to look into the problem, perhaps I might make some suggestions at this time. They are not ideological suggestions on our part. Perhaps it is hon. members on the other side of the House who are ideological, because even the absence of policy is a kind of ideology. I see the minister's professorial instincts rising to that and he will probably say a few words about it later on.

• (3:20 p.m.)

We have seen the results of a hands-off the economy, Liberal, laissez-faire policy with a mere reliance on an invisible hand. We have seen the shoe, textile, electronic, chemical and furniture industries move into desperate conditions. We have taken a look at the Canadian-U.S. auto pact agreement. As soon as that agreement started to bring about some kind of parity with the United States, they insisted that the safeguards be removed. The United States people forgot about all the years of imbalance we had experienced.

Today, in reply to my question, the minister gave me the assurance that the safeguards would not be removed without the matter being presented to Parliament. I tried to ask a supplementary question but it was not possible to do so today. Perhaps I can discuss this subject now in the context of this resolution. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister if he will seek the approval of Parliament before agreeing to the removal of these safeguards? I hope he does not do, as previous ministers have done, that is reach an understanding and then come to Parliament. This has happened in the past. Ministers have come to Parliament sometimes years after an understanding was reached. I hope this minister will find an opportunity to tell us there will not be an understanding with the United States some years before we have been informed about it. I know he will follow the course I have suggested because to do otherwise would make a mockery of his statement today.

I say this to reinforce and draw attention to what the minister said today, just in case he does not intend to seek Parliamentary approval before reaching an agreement. I hope that will not be the case and that perhaps we have someone holding the portfolio of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is prepared to behave somewhat better than the previous occupants of that position. I must say his predecessors behaved rather badly while they were in office. They broke faith with this House on several occasions. They made decisions before gaining approval of this House which acts on behalf of the people of Canada. To put a tag to it, they reached agreements behind closed doors.

Mr. Pepin: I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member has been overly-enthusiastic. I hope I did not give the impression I was sacrificing the powers of the executive branch of government today when I said I would bring the subject to the attention of the House if the government decided to review the safeguards. I did not say I would make it conditional on the approval of parliament if ever it became necessary in the national interest to do so.

Mr. Saltsman: Well, at last we have an honest Liberal who is able to say the government has no intention of consulting the House of Commons on the Canada-U.S. auto agreement. The government of Canada, or the Cabinet, intends to make a decision, and then tell us what it is all about.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please the Chair should remind the hon. member that the debate at this time is on a resolution in respect of a surtax relating to men and children's shirts. I do not think the Chair should allow the debate to continue on the point just raised. The hon. member should try to bring his remarks back into perspective. He should relate them to this surcharge resolution we have before us. I do not feel he should relate his remarks to a question asked during the question period or to any other matter such as the auto pact.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your advice. I will try to keep my remarks in line with your excellent suggestion. We are losing more and more control of industry in this country. The point I am trying to make is that the shirt industry is one which is being affected. We have virtually lost control of our technological development and ownership of industry under Liberal regimes. In view of conditions in the shirt industry today, some of its members might not mind selling out but the auto industry is one which is not facing that danger.

As a result of government policies, we have wound up with one of the worst industrial structures in the world. We are using more capital per worker than any other country in the world, and capital use is an indication of efficiency or at least it should be. There are industries here that use 30 per cent more capital than similar industries in the United States, a country which is considered to be one of the most capital conscious countries in the world. These companies operate at about 30 per cent less efficiency.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that much of the reason for this can be related to the fact the United States has a planned economy. I do not want to elaborate on this today because it might not relate to the specific matter before us. I want to bring to the minister's attention the position of the NDP on this matter of trade. We believe in an international policy of integrated trade between nations because we feel that such trade on an integrated and free basis is of mutual advantage. In other words, we are very much in favour of free trade among nations.

We are opposed, however, to the establishment of blocs whether they be between Canada and the United States, or Atlantic blocs, as has been suggested, or European blocs where some countries seek to isolate everybody else, or groups like NATO which have an economic dependency. We are opposed to this kind of organization which divides people one from another. We believe that international trade should be arrived at through governmental action—we make this distinction very carefully—rather than by paternalistic, arbitrary and undemocratic decisions by international corporations.

There is a kind of international vision in the world today which is not being created by the elected governments of the free world. It is being created by international corporations which have usurped this power on their own behalf. We are opposed to this. We appreciate that the move toward free trade in some industries will have to be accompanied by temporary measures such as the one before us. These are necessary to avoid human dislocation, but such measures must be accompanied by a program of assistance and change. This brings me to the major distinction between what the government's position is, has been and probably will be, and our position. Talk about free trade is not enough. Liberals have always done that. Given the state of corporate and foreign control over our economy, how much of the decision making process is left to the elected representatives of the country? That kind of free trade would be a disaster for this country.

We take the position that free trade must go hand in hand with a program of national economic planning or it will not work. That is what is required at this time. Therefore we are quite willing to see the resolution adopted, but I must also indicate that unless the government moves toward some kind of economic planning we are only giving them a green light to follow their own interests.

[Translation]

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes at my disposal, I should like to express the views of our party on the motion the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) proposed today.

I remember full well what the minister told us when he introduced the order on June 2, 1970. He said that the surtax was intended as a protection for the Canadian shirt industry which, for several years, has suffered great pressures partly because of massive shirt imports from countries where production costs are low. In fact, imports in recent years have increased very considerably.

There is no doubt that this order is a good thing for the clothing industry; within a short time it will soften the hard blows inflicted upon the clothing industry and, indirectly, the whole textile industry.

So, this is a short-term measure but, necessarily, there will have to be long-term ones, to protect not only the clothing industry but the whole textile industry. We know that in the past the imposition of special taxes proved to be an ineffective protection for the industry.

On November 5, the minister announced the creation of a board to study the problems relating to the textile industry, and proceeded to appoint the members of that board. In my opinion, one of the first tasks of the board should be to study the problem of the shirt industry. It will be recalled that the setting up of a board had been promised a long time ago. In June 1969, the matter came up again but I believe that at that time, the minister was not ready to present his policy and therefore, we had to wait a few more months before knowing the position of his department and that of the government.

Mr. Speaker, it is always the same story. We always wait until a sector of the economy is dying before we decide to take action. The same thing is happening now in the footwear industry. Shall we wait until all the factories close down to take action? I hope not.

A motion similar to the one now before us has been requested before. Many studies have been conducted on this subject by various departments in the last few years.

In my opinion, more should be done. Indeed, the possibility of setting up a quota system should be considered, in order to retain for the Canadian industry a realistic percentage of the Canadian market. Such a measure would be likely to put factories on a sound economic basis and, in some cases, would even make it possible to cut down some prices.

Everybody knows, that a great number of factories are operating now at 60 or 70 per cent of their capacity, simply because they get fewer orders. What is the use of increasing productivity, if goods are to be stored in warehouses?

We are all in favour of greater productivity but when the goal is reached, it is advisable to seek solutions where they are to be found, because no manufacturer is interested in keeping his goods in storage, especially at a time when interest rates are quite high.

As for productivity, in my opinion, the Canadian textile industry is in the vanguard of the technological progress throughout the world thanks to its many investments during the past ten years.

Textile products have only shown slight price increases in recent years, and in some cases, for instance woven fabrics manufactured in primary textile plants the prices have even dropped. This is another reason why we should take strong action in the case of the shirt and other textile industries. Indeed, we have jobs to maintain and assets to protect.

It is time the government took strong action in order to bring some stability in the sector of the textile industry, which stability is necessary if we want people to look to the future with confidence.

Further steps will probably be necessary to ensure the stability of the shirt industry and that of other textile products. I hope the minister will not wait until the last minute to introduce such measures.

At the present time, we are at grips with unemployment, especially with the threat of heavy layoffs in many industrial sectors. This is not the result of a situation that has just cropped up, but rather of a lack of determination on the part of the government.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is brushing our proposals aside. He seems to know only one thing: taxation. Well, when the minister of Finance imposes taxes, he takes some purchasing power away from the consumers and therefore does exactly the opposite of what is called for.

However, when the pieces of legislation announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce are introduced, we will have the opportunity to make proposals.

In conclusion, I must say again that we are far from pleased with the delay in looking into the problems of the textile industry I hope that the legislation now before us will contribute to solve some of the problems now facing the clothing industry.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Yves Forest (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, since we are discussing a motion of a temporary character and that we will soon have the opportunity to consider at length the matter of textile products and the government policy on this subject, my remarks will be brief.

I hope, as does the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), that this motion, which covers merely an extension of the Order in Council up to November 1971, the expiry date of the Order in Council in respect of the surtax on some shirts, may be passed quickly, because the expiry date is drawing near.

Mr. Speaker, I support the measure passed by the government last June, in order to curb imports of shirts into Canada. As a matter of fact, this measure intends to help an important sector of the textile industry until such time as a new policy on textile products is put into effect as announced by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce here, toward the end of the last session.

We are keenly concerned with the problems facing the textile industry and we have discussed them time and again, in committee, with other members specially concerned with them, and we have, on several occasions, made representations to the responsible government authorities, after many discussions with industries and unions involved.

I can tell the minister that the new program announced has been, on the whole, favourably received by all concerned but, as in the case of all programs, we are reserving judgment until we can see how fast and efficiently it will be implemented.

As the minister indicated earlier, this measure will give shirt manufacturers some protection against massive imports from low-cost countries, or countries where industries are nationalized, until such time as the new Textile and Clothing Board, the membership of which was announced last October, has been able to study and examine the whole problem and subsequently make recommendations to the proper authorities as to steps required to standardize and streamline this industry which is vital for the country.

I know that the shirt industry has been particularly affected for about fifteen years by a constant, immoderate and inadmissible increase of imports which lately contributed to the closing down of a certain number of factories and put others in an unbearable situation.

But the measure which was adopted last June and whose effect will be extended by the passage of this motion was certainly well received by all shirtmakers who are struggling for survival.

I insist that we take as soon as possible all necessary steps to protect at last the textile industry against irresponsible imports and to ensure that this industry whose survival is essential for the economy of Canada and especially of Quebec goes in for short and long term planning.

It should be recalled that in the past we have outdone ourselves in welcoming textile products from developing or low-cost countries. For instance, in 1966, Canada imported, per capita, three times as many textile products as the United States and about twice as many as Great Britain, and this inflow has surely not decreased since.

The shirt industry for several years now has had to face a major volume of imports which reached a peak in 1968 while decreasing to some extent in 1969. But the situation is still critical and we must take action if we care for the survival of at least part of the industry. Like others, the textile industry is in need of a long-term overall policy which will allow it to build-up and modernize accordingly, to contribute as it should to our economy, to create jobs, to pay taxes and, finally, to operate in the same manner as any other responsible Canadian industry.

I know that, at the present time, large investments are in abeyance pending a clearer situation and knowledge of what exact direction will be taken by the industry.

Textile plants are mainly located in centres where the economy needs stimulation, in rural areas especially, i.e. in rural areas of Quebec and Ontario, and in some parts of western Canada. It is urgent to implement the new program aimed at establishing a development structure and conditions liable to create a climate of confidence in which the textiles industry could invest, and also to undertake or carry on the manufacturing of products which could compete increasingly on the international market.

Mr. Speaker, it should not be forgotten that one person out of eight employed in manufacturing in Canada is employed in the textile industry and that, in Quebec, the textile and clothing industry supplies 20 per cent of the jobs in the manufacturing sector. It cannot be blamed for dragging its feet with regard to modernization, because our industry is one of the most advanced in the world, from the technological angle, and has not stopped investing to stay up to date. If the government applies in a quick, efficient and realistic manner the new policy announced by the minister, I am sure that this industry will continue its efforts to adapt to future markets and to contribute more to the progress of the Canadian economy.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish so much to talk about the resolution which we support, as we indicated by my colleague from Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard), as to raise a point of order.

When I began to study the resolution, I referred at once to the statutes of Canada, 1968-69. By looking at the last amendment which dealt with section 7 of the Customs Tariff, I came to the conclusion that this resolution is not legal.

Therefore, we had to refer to Bill C-140 passed during the 1969-70 session to see what was the procedure to follow regarding the acceptance of a resolution concerning the adoption of such an Order in Council. In view of the fact that it has become the usual practice for Parliament to adjourn at the end of June until October, as was the case this year, the printing and binding of statutes stop then. Nobody, except those familiar with Parliament who might have a copy of legislation passed during the last session, would be able to check to see whether or not the resolution is legal and to advise their customers accordingly.

After all, the minister must know that several importers have shirts in their warehouses waiting perhaps for the Order in Council to expire or to be continued in effect through the adoption of the resolution under consideration.

For instance, if a Vancouver lawyer had to advise an importer, he could not tell him whether it is true or not, and in what way he should act, because he would not have the Statutes of Canada for 1969-1970.

That is why I say it is all very well to adjourn the House from June until October, but we should not stop the publication of the statutes passed during the year. The statutes adopted during the previous session are not yet published. I suggest that the House administration services look into this problem, since it affects the people's rights.

It is easy for people from Ottawa or Montreal to meet their representative in the House and to seek his advice, but it is not so easy for those living outside Ottawa or Montreal. I urge the Chair to consider the possibility of taking remedial action.

As for me, I fully support the statement of my colleague from Saint-Hyacinthe, even though he had to limit the scope of his remarks.

I am sure he would have liked to speak a little longer on this but we had agreed that this resolution should be passed quickly, without prejudicing the right of members to state, when necessary, their views and their grievances with regard to the whole textile industry in Canada which, in passing, is not concentrated in eastern Canada alone. Indeed, there are a few sizeable shirt and men's wear factories in my own town and in my own constituency.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Chair appreciates the remarks made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and receives them as a grievance or, perhaps, as a clarification on an administrative problem that may come under the jurisdiction of the Chair. Whatever the case might be, his remarks will be taken into consideration.

[English]

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take any lengthy time in putting forth my views on this subject, but I do feel that perhaps there has been some avoidance of the real subject as a result of the unanimity in all parties.

[Translation]

In this regard, I agree with the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Rodrigue) whose remarks were the clearest, the most complete and the most to the point, although I do not accept them all without reservation.

[English]

The points which I would like to raise and which I think are the most important are, first, that this is a particularly negative type of action for a government to take, especially at a time when many people suspect we are entering into a period of trade war. All those who have read the financial pages of the newspapers will be aware of the great concern there is about restrictive Common Market policies and restrictive United States policies. I feel it is most unfortunate that we are being asked to approve such a measure which, to my mind, although it may be perfectly legal under GATT or any other international agreement, nevertheless is extremely restrictive.

• (3:50 p.m.)

We should point out that the countries affected by this particular measure are not the rich countries. They are countries which generally are much poorer than ours. In many cases they are countries which through their own very hard efforts have raised their standard of living above what it was some time ago. They have developed industries and wish only to be able to trade with the wealthier countries of the world, such as ours. This measure is not designed against the United States of America or against Japan. It is a measure damaging to Hong Kong, Singapore, Malaysia, China and India. This aspect should be considerd, and it has not been considered as yet.

Further, Mr. Speaker, I point out that this particular resolution is contradictory to the Canadian government's white paper on foreign policy with respect to external aid. This aspect has been completely ignored by previous speakers, and I do not think it has been properly explained by any minister in the House.

Another aspect I would like to deal with is quite different, and it is that this particular measure bears most heavily on those Canadians least able to bear it. If we maintain an artificially high price for shirts we are hurting the man on the lowest income scale in Canada and indeed, in these days of unemployment, the man who is without income. It is all right to say that they do not have to wear shirts, but that is as absurd as Marie Antoinette suggesting, "If they can't afford bread let them eat cake." This is ridiculous. The Canadian who has a good income can afford to buy Canadian made shirts or quality imported shirts, but the Canadian with no income at all could benefit substantially from buying a shirt which costs $2 instead of $5.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I should indicate that it is not my intention to suggest that aid should not be given to the industry. But this type of aid which forces prices up, and which forces the low income consumer to pay the higher cost, is the wrong one. If we need to pump $100,000 or $500,000 into the Canadian shirt industry let us take it from general tax revenues to which we all contribute, and let us not force the consumer, who may be a low income consumer, to bear the entire burden. The method which is being adopted by the government is wrong in principle and will have unfortunate effects.

I have one further point to make, Mr. Speaker. We have long heard of the problems of the shirt industry.

We have long heard that subsidies are necessary to make sure that our Canadian shirtmakers can be more competitive. Indeed, we have even been told that maybe one day they will be able to export. I do not know how they will be able to do that, if they are now incapable of resisting imports. But, Mr. Speaker, we have heard all this, and perhaps it is time for the minister and his department to get down to deciding how precisely they are going to go about it.

This idea of temporary measure put upon temporary measure, extended for six months, and extended for a year, is simply not good enough. If it is a viable industry let us assist it properly. If not, we should retrain the workers in it, and import shirts. But let us not continue with a policy that is plainly no policy at all. I hope that in his closing remarks, the minister will make some comment on this matter because we have heard a great deal about a new policy in this House today, about how in the future things will be better, and that we will not need this type of protection. However, we have had very little inkling of what such a policy might be, or indeed if there is any possibility of achieving this goal through any change in government policy.

It is disappointing to me to see the hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary (Mr. Howard), coming from the west and theoretically a free trader, supporting such a measure. But of course he happens to be a parliamentary secretary and thus is in the position of supporting his minister. Perhaps it only indicates that we British Columbians are all protectionists at heart, and our reaction depends on whether the policy touches our areas. In any event, I do hope that sometime before the end of the debate we will hear some figures and facts with respect to how many workers are protected, about how long this protection has been given, and about how long it is expected similar temporary measures will be put one on top of the other. I should like to know, too, what the decline in shirt production in Canada has been in the last few years as a result of foreign competition, and when we can expect a new and viable program which will get the shirt industry out of the problems it now faces?

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, the following motion appears in today's order paper:

That this House, pursuant to subsection (1c) of section 7 of the Customs Tariff, do approve that the Men's and Boys' Shirts Surtax Order, being Order in Council P.C. 1970-959 of 2 June 1970 made under subsection (1a) of section 7 of the said Act, continue to have force and effect until the 29th day of November, 1971.

Mr. Speaker, it is not very often that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) deserves congratulations, but since he was kind enough to introduce this motion concerning our imports, I must recognize that he made a commendable effort.

Unfortunately, this order is restricted in part to imports from Korea. As regards Canada's purchases in that country, its implications are rather insignificant.

• (4:00 p.m.)

And the only item that may be of advantage to us is found in paragraph 2 of the Men's and Boys' Shirts Surtax Order, of which I got a copy in French from the Library. This paragraph reads as follows:

2. That the import of woven fabric men's and boys' work, dress and sports shirts shipments of which the Republic of Korea has not duly approved for export to Canada under the restrictive agreements reached between Canada and the Republic of Korea threatens serious injury to Canadian producers of men's and boys' work, sports and dress shirts;

The third paragraph reads as follows:

3. That the government of Korea has agreed that the Canadian government should take appropriate measures to help control shipments which are not approved for export;

So Korea is prepared to control its shipments whose export is unauthorized, which means that men's and boys' shirts may still have access to the Canadian market provided they come from either Japan or China.

I quote paragraph 4:

4. That subsection (1a) of section 7 of the Customs Tariff authorizes the Governor in Council, when satisfied that goods of any kind, the growth, produce or manufacture of any country are being imported into Canada under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to Canadian producers of like or directly competitive products, to order that the goods be made subject to a surtax at such rate as is specified in the Order;

Mr. Speaker, I will read again these words which struck me:

—the Governor in Council, when satisfied—

I will say that the Governor in Council is hardly prepared to take advice and consequently, very hard to convince that mass imports threaten Canadian manufacturers.

The proof of it is, Mr. Speaker, that all the recommendations made to that effect in this House in recent years, recommendations made by the supposedly democratically elected members, have been completely ignored. The manufacturers meet the minister, explain their problems, make suggestions, but His Excellency is not convinced.

Plants close down in St. Jérôme, Granby, Sherbrooke, Grand-Mère; thousands of Canadians lose their jobs in plants located in Beauce, Drummondville, Montmorency, Trois-Rivières, Montmagny, and the minister is still not convinced. To convince him, he needs the report of his political friends, Messrs. Jacques St. Laurent, Annis and Campbell, whom he recently delegated to go and see. Mr. Speaker, I suppose the next time he meets those boys, there will be musical entertainment; he can sing them the song entitled: Dis-moi ce qui ne va pas? (Tell me what the trouble is.)

Mr. Speaker, if Mr. Jacques St-Laurent, a lawyer, was experiencing financial difficulties, it really was not worth asking him to tell us what we already know about the textile industry. All he had to do, as all other victims of the present system and administration, was to go to the office of the Family and Welfare Department in Quebec, and he would have been given the minimum rates set for such cases.

The present administration is no way different from its predecessors. In fact, this way of messing about that is leading the country to stagnation is unfortunately the consequence of our colonial status.

We have always exported our resources and raw materials at ridiculous prices to England or to the United States which promptly process and refine them in order to sell them back to us at high prices.

Today, we are still facing the same problem. To please our mother country, Great Britain, and especially those capitalists who have become manufacturers in Hong Kong and Japan, we have entered into agreements which contribute to fill Canadian warehouses to the point of practically disrupting several sectors of our economy, and the footwear industry is not spared either.

The Association of Shoe Manufacturers which has been trying since 1954 to draw the government's attention to those conditions, pointed out on December 12, 1966, when submitting its fifth brief, that "shoe imports represented 47 per cent of the Canadian production."

Such was the situation in 1966 and the then Minister of Trade and Commerce was not convinced either.

His administration gave proof of it. Indeed he gave us such proof on January 16, 1967, as reported on page 11284 of Hansard. At that time I asked the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce the following question:

Is the minister aware of the difficult situation in which the Canadian shoe manufacturers now find themselves due to excessive importation of these products from Asian and communist countries?

If so, will the hon. minister inform the house as to the steps he intends to take in this regard; also, will our representatives in Geneva be advised in time to avoid a catastrophe in this industry?

The hon. Robert Winters, the then Minister of Trade and Commerce gave me the following answer:

—this matter has been brought to my attention before and it is under consideration. It is a fact that imports of shoes have increased, but domestic production has substantially increased too.

Today it is the same. Last spring, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), made an eloquent speech in the House and referred to DBS figures. These showed that from 1956 to 1969, when the Canadian population increased by 33 per cent shoe manufacturing decreased by 1 per cent. In the same period, there was a 568 per cent increase in shoe imports.

As a result plants closed down and thousands of workers were laid off in Canada. At the same time, employment rose from 90,000 to 107,000 in Italy, a country from which we import.

After examining the Association's last brief, the one released last spring, I asked the minister the following question as recorded on page 8338 of the Official report of the House of Commons Debates of June 19, 1970:

In view of the fact that shoe imports which have been tolerated to date place our Canadian manufacturers on the brink of bankruptcy, can the minister tell us if he intends to recommend that the customs tariff be amended with a view to correcting the situation.

[Mr. Godin.]

The hon. minister answered:

Mr. Speaker, I am at the present time reading the brief submitted by the Shoe Manufacturers Association of Canada. This document contains certain questionable statistics.

The minister has doubts about figures supplied by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. If this is not somewhat dishonest, Mr. Speaker, I wonder what is.

In front of such criminal carelessness, unemployed people, manufacturers, in short the general public have come to the point where they question the honesty of the minister. If he intends to make up for that, I think it is high time for him to take action.

If at one time he held the position of Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, it is because someone in Parliament believed he had a little energy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must remind him that he may not in the House make any insinuations concerning the integrity of a minister or of an individual member.

Therefore, I would ask him to continue his remarks and refrain from making insinuations towards an hon. member or attacking his integrity.

Mr. Godin: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall comply with the rules.

It is on account of some ministers that there is so much inertia in Parliament.

There are unemployed people in all constituencies because somebody does not assume his responsabilities, thanks to the protection afforded under the Standing Order.

At any rate, I say in conclusion that the time of disappointment has been long enough for us and, as our good friends of Quebec said in 1960: it is time for a change.

I can assure the House that I approve the motion proposed by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Rodrigue) in order to obtain a better control over imports.

[English]

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks in connection with the subject before us to answer some of the very good points raised by members on both sides of the House and thank them for their contributions to the debate today.

We have had a number of interesting comments but I should like to correct some misimpressions as I go along. I should like to refer to the comments by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) and suggest to him that perhaps, in the spirit of western freedom, there is some room to consider workers all over Canada who are unduly penalized by changes in our trading patterns. I should like to remind him that those who have suffered from the changes that have taken place in our textile industry are not confined to any one province of Canada but are spread all across the country, including our own province of British Columbia.

As Canadians, we recognize our responsibility to the developing countries of the world. We are concerned that they have an opportunity to trade in our markets and we are concerned that nations that buy from us will have an opportunity to sell to us. I should like to point out that as far as this particular commodity is concerned we have more than done our share. For example, we consume twice as many imported textiles per capita as do the people of the United States. We consume many times the number of imported shirts per capita as do the people of the European economic community.

Mr. Hogarth: We are always losing our shirt.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): We do not take a back seat to anyone in sharing the load of offering trading opportunities to the people of the developing world. We have had to pay a considerable price to do this. I have great sympathy for the members who have spoken on behalf of workers in their ridings who have suffered because of the changes that have taken place in our trading patterns.

• (4:10 p.m.)

According to the figures which I have, approximately 1,400 workers in Quebec, 3,000 across Canada in the shirt industry have lost their jobs. I think at some point we have to call a halt to this depradation. The hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) said that free trade must go hand in hand with economic planning. We cannot disagree with this point except to say that we should use the words "freer trade" because this is the objective towards which we are working. I think the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich recognizes that we are working for freer trade. In good conscience, we cannot see established industries wiped out by a program of freer trade.

Canadians can be proud of the fact that our exports to countries around the world are growing tremendously. If we are going to be fair to our fellow Canadians, we must allow some opportunity for adjustment and acceptance of these changes. This is what the motion deals with.

The government has appointed a Textile and Clothing Board to examine the situation that exists in the textile industry. This board has the power to recommend changes to the government which would enable existing industries to adjust and change, thereby making it possible for them to employ their workers in new lines of endeavour which will enable them to earn their living.

The emphasis of this program is to have industries concentrate on style promotion in order to develop export markets which do not presently exist. The emphasis is also on restructuring the industry. It is anticipated that our shirt industry will enjoy $1 million in export business this year, the textile and clothing industry as much as $200 million.

So, the shirt industry will be able to adjust to these changes, the government is making available a full range of programs to assist the industry, including consultations with economists and experts of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It also includes the range of help available to the industry under the GAAP program. I remind hon. members that the GAAP program has been very successful, not exactly of a stimulating nature, but in the nature of making a change such as was made in the automotive industry. This is what the government is prepared to do.

It is most important that these adjustment programs be successful. As I said a moment ago, the industry is suffering considerable depradation. In 1966, for example, the Canadian shirt industry accounted for approximately 90 per cent of that market. In 1970 it will account for approximately 55 per cent. This is a considerable shock to that industry and it must have time to adjust. I think these adjustment programs which the government is suggesting will be effective, but a reasonable time is required to have them established.

The government is asking that the order be extended until November 19, 1971. During that period the Textile and Clothing Board will have an opportunity to make recommendations that will aid the industry and which will guide the government in introducing measures to help the industry to adjust.

I know that all members want this measure to be expedited. A number of excellent points were made by members this afternoon for which I thank them. The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Rodrigue) suggested there should be a quota system with regard to shirt imports. I remind the hon. member that at the present time there is an excellent voluntary restraint system for countries with which we trade in this area. Today we are engaged in a measure to bolster this system.

In conclusion, I recommend the speedy passage of this measure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT, 1970

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY POWERS FOR PRESERVATION OF PUBLIC ORDER

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-181, to provide temporary emergency powers for the preservation of public order in Canada, be read the third time and do pass.

Public Order Act, 1970

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, third reading is the stage at which we decide whether a bill should be passed. Some members opposite decided this bill should be passed long before it was even introduced. If they had paid attention to the debate, they would have realized that some very important amendments were moved, none of which were accepted.

When the War Measures Act was introduced there were many rumours in Parliament and throughout the country regarding the necessity for this measure. The charge was made that many of us did not understand the problems. After seven weeks, most of the information is available to the public. We can now make a decision on that evidence rather than making a supposition on information received from very doubtful quarters.

In the November 25 edition of the Montreal Star there is a statement by the Quebec Minister of Justice, who has been given a great deal of authority and latitude by this government under the regulations of the War Measures Act. That minister disagrees with the situation as stated by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). The headline of the article reads: "Choquette slams Marchand's estimate of 3,000—FLQ strength 'highly exaggerated'." I read from the article:

"There are maybe 100 or 125 active members of the Front de Liberation du Quebec in my opinion," Mr. Choquette said.

"Mr. Marchand has his own way about him. His statement was highly exaggerated. There were far too many conflicting comments and opinions coming from Ottawa during the crisis."—

Mr. Choquette shied away from answering directly any question on government reasoning but, though the answers he did give, left the distinct impression that all, or at least most, of the facts behind the Quebec position have been bared.

• (4:20 p.m.)

There are many who do not blame the government for responding to the request from Quebec in the way it did. To be fair to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), he was one of the few Liberals who thought it was necessary to replace the War Measures Act with some less onerous legislation. There are probably many members of his party who would gladly have given him dictatorial powers had they been asked to do so. One Liberal member indicated yesterday that some Canadians might have to lose their freedom for the sake of the protection of 22 million other Canadians. It seems to me that if freedom is of any importance to the Canadian public, then the freedom of one individual is also a matter of importance. If this view is not shared, it appears to me that the liberties of the 22 million he mentioned are really not worth very much.

I am interested in the position taken by some of the Quebec members belonging to the Ralliement des Créditistes. They have expressed concern about the effect this legislation will have in limiting freedom in their province. I am surprised that other members from Quebec are not equally concerned. The bill before us goes very far in limiting the field of the powers contained in it to one particular province. The people of Quebec must feel ashamed that they have been unable to deal with these
